House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Tuesday, February 16, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

THE LATE MR. J. E. MARCILE, M.P.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following letter:

Honorable RODOLPHE LEMIEUX,
Président de la Chambre des communes,
Ottawa, Ont.

Honorable Monsieur,

J'ai l'honneur d'accuser réception, de l'édition des "Débats de la Chambre" que vous m'avez gracieusement adressée, et contenant les consolantes et élogieuses paroles que les honorables chefs des différents partis ainsi que le distingué représentant de Bagot, ont prononcées à l'égard de mon regretté mari.

Nul plus que moi fut à même, à travers les sentiers de la vie, d'apprécier ses nobles qualités de cœur et d'esprit, aussi, le geste spontané, et unanime de la Chambre, déposant au pied de sa tombe, le touchant tribut du souvenir, m'émeut, plus que je ne puis l'écrire, et je me sens réellement impuissante à vous exprimer toute la gratitude que je ressens.

Veuillez, s'il vous plaît, accepter, et présenter pour moi, aux honorables membres de la Chambre des communes, l'hommage de ma profonde reconnaissance, et soyez assuré que je garderai précieusement, ainsi que ma famille, le témoignage de cette haute marque d'estime et de sympathie.

J'ai l'honneur d'être, monsieur l'Orateur,
Votre très obligée,
Mme J. E. MARCILE.

Acton Vale, 15 février 1926.

TRANSPORTATION OF COAL

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I lay on the table copies of the order in council dealing with the instructions for an investigation into the railway rates on coal.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Statement of estimated amount of work done and approximate expenditures made on the Canadian National Railways to December 31, 1925.—Hon. Mr. Lapointe.

Statement of estimated amount of work that will be done, and approximate expenditures that will be made, in the year 1926 on the various branch lines of the Canadian National Railways.—Hon. Mr. Lapointe.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Leader of the House) moved:

That Messrs. King (Kootenay), Casgrain Charters, Tolmie and Spencer be a committee to prepare and report with all convenient speed lists of members who compose the select standing committees of the House.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask if the names of the members from this side were given by the chief whip?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

DISTRIBUTION OF CANTEEN FUND

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): I should like to ask the government what has been done in regard to the distribution among the soldiers of the canteen fund amounting to $2,000,000. It is nearly a year now since parliament passed an act in respect to this matter, and voted the sum of $800,000 to the province of Ontario as its share. As yet, however, no commission has been appointed for that province and apparently none will be for some time, although there are many men in need of relief owing to unemployment and distress. Will the government later on in the week state the cause of the delay, and inform the House as to the nature of the existing situation?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think boards have been appointed in the various provinces in connection with the fund referred to. However, I will communicate with the minister in charge of the department concerned, and give the information to my hon. friend in the House.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Monday, February 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. C. Elliott for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Sutherland (South Oxford).

Mr. J. A. FRASER (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, before resuming my remarks on the particular subject now under discussion, may I refer to an interesting event which occurred no later than yesterday. Hon. gentlemen opposite were kind enough last evening to show their appreciation of various remarks of mine by their applause. Now I should like to congratulate them on the successful termination of the election in the constituency of Prince Albert. May I say, in all sincerity, that I recognize the Prime Minister as an outstanding man in Canada. He is a man of conspicuous ability and capacity in the administration of public affairs. Like myself the right hon. gentleman is a Canadian, and speaking as a Canadian I am very proud of Mr. King as Prime Minister of this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER: I wonder if hon. gentlemen opposite would have paid a tribute of that kind to my leader had he been in the same position.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Surely.

Mr. FRASER: Now that hon. gentlemen opposite are in such a good humour it might be opportune to inform them what they look like from this side of the House. The boot is now on the other foot, and the Liberal party with all due respect to every member of it looks like a second-hand dilapidated motor car, ambling round this parliament on four flat tires, with a broken steering gear and hitting on one cylinder. Hon. gentlemen opposite have sent to Prince Albert and repaired their steering gear and have done it handsomely. The next thing I advise hon. gentlemen opposite to do is to send to the Massey-Harris firm for a set of spark plugs; but for goodness sake let them not ask us to adjourn this House in order that they may be able to purchase and inflate a new set of tires.

Having got the House into a pretty good humour and having exchanged compliments across the floor, I will proceed now to the business which I was sent here to attend to, and that is to have the hon. members on the opposite side of the House sent over to this side as quickly as possible.

I referred last night to mining matters generally throughout Canada, and I will now discuss more particularly the amendment before the House, which has particular reference to tariff matters as they apply to the trade and commerce of Canada. Whatever may have been the main feature of the election in any other part of the Dominion, so far as the district of Cariboo is concerned hon. gentlemen will understand that the principal feature in the campaign, without any manner of doubt, was the tariff question. It was the outstanding issue in Cariboo and I believe in British Columbia. I am not so sure of British Columbia as a whole and therefore will confine myself to my own district. In my opinion that question decided the election. The people in my district are certainly interested in tariff matters; when you apply the incidence of the tariff to the different occupations of the people in that district, they are certainly interested and will listen to you, and if you present the issue in a proper way, as I did, you will see the result. I desire particularly to discuss this tariff question as it applies to the agricultural industry. My hon. friends on the other side as well as the other groups, go around the country when tariff measures are under discussion and try to terrify the people about the Conservatives and the Conservative policy by telling them that we are the favourites of the big interests, that the tariff question is not one which has any application to the prosperity of the ordinary individual, the farmer or labourer, but that it only adds to the notoriously large profits of the corporations and big businessmen. That is the outstanding feature of the talk we hear from the Grits when an election is being held. I desire to be very specific in this, and I say that that is not a proper interpretation of the tariff policy of the Conservative party at all. As I understand it, the Conservative party does not favour high protection. That party favours a fair measure of protection to everybody and every interest.

An hon. MEMBER: Adequate protection.

Mr. FRASER: I will give the hon. member a better word than that—something else which he can talk about. The Conservatives are not a high tariff party. We are not in favour of a low tariff but fair tariff.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FRASER: I am glad to see that I still continue to get applause from both sides of the House. That being the generally accepted policy of some of our Liberal friends, why not give us a hand to assist us to put it into effect?

An hon. MEMBER: Why do you not do so?

Mr. FRASER: If my hon. friends were over here, as they are going to be in a short time, we might be able to do it. I desire particularly to refer to the application of this fair tariff policy to the dairying interests of the district I represent. In regard to the dairy interests of Cariboo I speak with some authority, because I helped to organize the co-operative dairy association in the little town of Quesnel, British Columbia. I was a director for the first three years of its life and helped to put the organization on a proper basis so that it could operate for the benefit of the farmers who were anxious to see what could be done in that district by co-operative effort. We have five creameries in the district and one of them is in the Pouce Coupe district, of the Peace river country. We have a creamery working up there across the boundary from Alberta in the Peace river section of the country, and that creamery is located in the district I represent. Since the inception of the creamery at Quesnel I have been closely associated with all the members of the organization, and I have noticed that my farmer friends in the district are continually complaining that the industry is not as profitable as it should be, that the net return they get from the manufacture of cream and the selling of the product to the creamery is not a profitable one, and that, after they deduct the expenses of their operation, there is very little net return for the farmer himself, which is an important point. The industry at present is a going concern, but is not in my opinion firmly established. It is a very grave question to me at the present time whether it is going to be able to function properly or not, or to continue in operation, because the margin of profit is so small. When a man does not get a profit out of any work he is carrying on, he will quit working altogether, and I am afraid that, on account of the small profit the farmers are making out of this operation, they will sell their cows or turn them over to the butcher for beef, and then the organization will be out of business. Just as soon as you reduce the number of cows below a certain line you are operating your creamery on an unprofitable basis, and no business can operate for a long time without a profit. You must have a reasonable profit in any business. When I apply the tariff policy of the Australian treaty to the conditions that I see in my own district, I am afraid the result of that treaty will be to close up just such organizations as the one I refer to throughout the country, because there is no question—and it cannot be denied—that you are reducing the profit of the farmer from the cream he is selling to the organization, and if that is done in a large degree the farmer will go out of business and try something else.

With particular reference to the Australian treaty and the difference that exists between the height of our tariff walls and that of those we find in other countries, let me point this out. The difference between the United States tariff and the Canadian tariff on butter is at present four cents a pound. If a Canadian farmer wants to send butter into the United States, there are customs men on the border to prevent him from sending it in unless he pays the duty of eight cents a pound. In regard to this question, I am speaking from the British Columbia viewpoint with the city of Vancouver on this side of the border and the city of Seattle on the other. The British Columbia farmer, if he wants to find an export market for his product, can always find it in Seattle. On the other hand, a United States farmer who is exactly the same distance from the Seattle market as our farmer is from the Vancouver market and who can produce butter at the same or probably a little less cost, can send his butter into the Vancouver market under a duty of only four cents a pound, whereas the British Columbia farmer has to pay a duty of eight cents a pound in order to market his butter in Seattle. I contend that a government that will maintain a tariff of that kind, where there is such inequality, is robbing the Canadian farmer of four cents a pound on his butter. If the government in its wisdom would only raise that tariff to the same level as the United States tariff, that is eight cents a pound, immediately the Canadian farmer, handling butter in his home market, would reap the benefit of that additional four cents a pound. I believe and I am now convinced that is a fact. What has convinced me? The operation of this Australian treaty has convinced me that this government under the general tariff as applied to the United States, is robbing the Canadian farmer of that four cents per pound. What did this Australian treaty do? It robbed the Canadian farmer of another three cents per pound, because it lowered the protective duty on this commodity to one cent per pound and as the difference between four and one is three immediately that reduction in duty went into effect, what did we find?—every dairyman of the Dominion of Canada receiving exactly three cents per pound less for his cream and butter. That has been admitted by every minister who has spoken on this question and, therefore, this government have taken from farmers throughout this Dominion the value of three cents a pound on their butter.

I am not complaining at all about the United States tariff or about the Australian tariff. That is the business of the people of the United States and Australia. I am here to attend to Canadian business; I am here to tell the Canadian government that I am finding fault with them and not with the government of the United States or Australia. The United States farmers make representations to congress that they want enacted such and such a law. For instance, they say that they want a duty of eight cents a pound imposed on butter going into the United States, and congress goes to work and very wisely gives their farmers the protection they want. Legislation of this character is enacted at the demand of the United States farmer or the Australian farmer, and if that is a good principle for the Australian or the United States farmer, why is it not a good principle for our Canadian farmer to pursue? Why would the Canadian farmer not be just as glad to put that extra three or four cents a pound into his pocket as the United States or Australian farmer? I commend those two governments for doing what they are asked to do by the people who are interested in the different industries, and they must be interested or they would never have got that legislation passed. The United States congress or the Australian Commonwealth parliament are not going to enact laws unless they are requested to do so by people who are interested in the industry concerned.

I am not arguing in favour of the abrogation of the Australian treaty. I claim that if the Australians, in their superior judgment and wisdom and by virtue of the fact that they have men of greater ability to represent them in the making of treaties, secure a certain advantage over us, they are entitled to it; but the agitation on this matter should not be allowed to stop until we get these public men out of the way and let some person step in who can make a treaty that is equal all around. I have every sympathy with inter-imperial trade, and I am not going to argue in favour of the abrogation of the Australian treaty just because in it there are certain things which should be corrected and which we shall soon correct if hon. gentlemen opposite will only let us get men of good judgment in charge of the government of this country.

Another reason why we should not be too anxious to ask for the abrogation of this treaty is because certain of our people enjoy advantages under it. For instance, our pulp and paper men, our salmon canners, and also, I think, manufacturers of certain automobile parts and probably automobiles themselves, enjoy substantial advantages in the Australian markets and they are entitled to the advantages which they enjoy in those different lines of industry. If they require that in order to make a little better profit and to stabilize their industry in this country, I am not going to argue that the treaty should be abrogated and these advantages be taken away from them just because the treaty is not fair all around. If one set of men can make a treaty which is not altogether fair, surely another set of men with a little better judgment can be got together to make things fair and just to all.

I want to read certain telegrams which I have received from the pulp and paper industry in British Columbia, a province of which I have the honour to be one of the representatives in this parliament. Both of these telegrams protest against the removal of their advantages under this treaty. I am pretty familiar with the Powell River Pulp and Paper Company. No company is better organized than this. It treats its men fairly and everything is done in an up-to-date manner. The employees are provided with all the care and attention that they should have and nothing is left that could be desired. Everything is provided for the comfort and convenience of these men. On the other hand, the men realize this and they have every respect for the company for which they are working. The company telegraphs:

> With reference to amendment to Speech from Throne dealing with the Australian treaty, we would urge upon you that based on this treaty we are expending some eight million dollars in plant extensions hoping to get our share of Australian business and abrogation of treaty would be manifestly unfair particularly without giving it a fair trial. We are satisfied that investigation will disclose that the treaty is both favourable and valuable to Canada.

The other one is from the Pacific Mills, Limited, an organization of which I know very little, but I know it is a bona fide pulp and paper mill company. What I have said with reference to the Powell River Pulp and Paper Company would apply equally to Pacific Mills Limited. I would call the attention of the House to the following telegram:

> We are advised that Mr. Donald Sutherland, M.P. representing dairy interests contemplates amendment to throne speech criticising Australian treaty on ground that such interests are being jeopardized. You are thoroughly familiar with treaty naturally and have full access to customs import figures and we are satisfied that any investigation will show that such is not the case. Further than that while the treaty has only been operative four months the benefits to the paper industry and the country as a whole so far exceed any slight disadvantages that any criticism at this time will do great harm both in Australia and in Canada.

This telegram expresses the attitude of these gentlemen to the amendment now before the House in so far as it relates to the Australian treaty, and they have a perfect right to state their views on the subject as emphatically as they can. It is, I think, exceedingly proper that they should be alive to their own interests and they are to be commended for the activity they display in looking after those interests when they fear that the privileges they enjoy in this country are threatened. To that extent they have my entire sympathy. I do not want it understood for a single moment that I am advocating the abrogation of the treaty to the detriment of the pulp and paper industry in Canada. But I do want to ask these gentlemen in British Columbia a very pertinent question. They derive some benefit from the treaty; they enjoy a certain profitable trade because of its operation. Very well; but do they expect the dairymen of Canada to pay for the privileges they enjoy? Why deprive the dairymen of this Dominion of the same privileges that are extended to a particular industry? On the floor of this House the other night the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) informed us that we produced in Canada some 275,000,000 pounds of butter of which he said we exported 25,000,000 pounds. That left a total of 250,000,000 pounds which we sold in the local market. Now I think I have already established the fact that the inequality in the tariff under this treaty, since it has come into force, has been responsible for a reduction of 3 cents per pound in the price of butter in Canada. No one can deny that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. FRASER: Hon. gentlemen apparently do not follow me. At any rate, that is my contention and while I shall not stop here to argue the point I state, what is a fact, that we sell at home in Canada 250,000,000 pounds of butter, in regard to which the producers have suffered a loss of 3 cents per pound because of unfair competition. That works out at a total of $7,500,000 which these gentlemen in British Columbia, if their demands are acceded to, would have the dairymen of Canada lose, as in fact they have already lost it. The pulp and paper people of British Columbia are very properly looking to their own interests; but why should the dairymen of the Dominion stand a loss of $7,500,000 in order to protect those interests? Why not let us all get in line and give to the dairymen the same advantages that are extended to the pulp and paper interests?

Mr. DUSSAULT: Is the hon. gentleman multiplying the 25,000,000 by 3?

Mr. FRASER: I am multiplying the 250,000,000 by 3. The 25,000,000 we export. The hon. member does not understand my argument. I subtracted that 25,000,000 from the total production because the 3 cents per pound could not apply to what we exported but only to the quantity of the product sold at home; and I contend that on that 250,000,000 pounds of butter the farmers would have received 3 cents per pound less under the operation of the Australian treaty than they got. I do not think that anybody is arguing that the tariff will protect us at all in our export business.

Mr. DUSSAULT: Does the hon. member contend that 4,000,000 pounds of butter imported into this country will fix the price of 275,000,000 or 250,000,000 pounds?

Mr. FRASER: Where do you get the 4,000,000?

Mr. DUSSAULT: That is what we have imported.

Mr. FRASER: I think my hon. friend is altogether on the wrong track. The price obtained in the home market is governed not by any quantity of exports but by the extent of the tariff protection afforded; and as I have said, the dairymen have lost $7,500,000 on the butter sold at home as a result of a reduction in price of 3 cents per pound. Let me impress upon the government as well as upon these gentlemen out in British Columbia this fact, that the dairymen of the Dominion have as effectually lost that $7,500,000 as though a gang of men had shot their cows or burned their buildings or rifled their safes. That is virtually what has been done to the dairymen of this country, for you might just as well injure them one way as another. Now I ask in all fairness, I ask hon. gentlemen representing these pulp and paper interests, is it right, is it fair that our dairymen should be sacrificed in order to protect others? I do not think that we can stand for that.

And do not let hon. gentlemen run away with the idea that our dairymen are the only ones who have suffered under this treaty. My hon. friend from West Kootenay (Mr. Esling) the other night pointed out that the fruit industry had been hit hard, and this applies to all branches of fruit growing. There are numerous branches of that one industry alone which have suffered; and in addition to this the treaty has affected the vegetable grower, the truck gardener, the honey producer, and the hog raiser, for the tariff under the treaty certainly discriminates against Canadian lard.

And fresh and smoked meats are also in the list of the things affected. In my own district, as I have explained before, we have an area 650 miles by 350, and the people are making a start now in the raising of sheep. But what will happen when we allow the cheap mutton that comes from Australia to enter into competition with our product? And remember that mutton is only a by-product in Australia; it cuts no ice at all with the sheep raiser, whereas in British Columbia it is vital to the sheep industry. He must get a fair price for his mutton in order to make the industry profitable. Sheep-raising is the best paying industry in my constituency to-day. True, it is only being carried on in a small way at present, but the industry is going to grow rapidly because it is profitable. After all, the farmer is a pretty wise man, and when he sees that a particular branch of agriculture is profitable he is going to take a crack at it. But I am afraid the government will come along and with another trade treaty ruin the small sheep-raiser. Remember, we need plenty of wool in this country. In the name of common sense—if this government had any, which I doubt,—why should it put into operation a treaty that would bear so harshly on some of the most deserving classes in this country?

Now, one of my friends opposite asked me something about the meaning of an adequate tariff. Apparently he did not understand the term. I hope to enlighten him before I am through. During the general election our Liberal friends tried to terrify the people by telling them that the Conservative party advocated a high tariff. But we do not want to talk about high tariff, adequate tariff, low tariff or free trade. What we want to talk about is equivalent tariffs—equivalent protection—nothing else. I went to the trouble of looking up the definition of "equivalent" I do not see my note here, but I can tell the House what the word means.

An hon. MEMBER: Brick for brick.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. FRASER: Maybe hon. members will take it as read. My recollection of the definition of "equivalent" as I copied it from Webster's new international dictionary is: equal in value, force or import. Equal in value—that is what we want in our tariff policy. We want such a tariff policy as will give the same value to the Canadian as the Australian demands for himself. What this country needs is equivalent tariffs, equivalent protection, up and down the whole tariff line. The question should be studied carefully and thoroughly by men who have a sympathetic interest in it, and a policy founded on their conclusions should be put into operation by a government that has some back bone and some sense. I have just placed my hand on what I copied from Webster's dictionary. Equivalent means: Equal in worth or value, force, power—

An hon. MEMBER: That is nothing new.

Mr. FRASER: Well, some other hon. members might be enlightened if I read the full definition:

> Equivalent: Equal in worth or value, force, power, effect, import and the like; alike in significance and value; of the same import or meaning.

That is what I submit we need in this country—tariffs that are of the same import or meaning, alike in significance and value. We want them to apply in a fair and reasonable way. We do not want them to apply for the benefit of the manufacturing interests alone. What we are particularly interested in at present is the agricultural industry—the primary and basic industry of this country. I maintain that our agricultural industry in every line is being unfairly treated by this government, it is being robbed.

In the Speech from the Throne I notice this declaration: My government proposes to proceed forthwith with the completion of the Hudson Bay railway. Why does the government in the Speech from the Throne specify the completion of a common, ordinary public work? To me such a statement is entirely out of place in a Speech from the Throne. It is not dignified to so specify the completion of a public work. I may say here that my people in Prince George want a post office. Next session are we to find a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne saying: We propose forthwith to construct a post office in Prince George? I see my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) smiling. I have made application to him for that post office, and I hope he will not forget to include it in the estimates. Now, I contend that the completion of a public work should not be mentioned in the Speech from the Throne at all. It is not a declaration of public policy. On the contrary, it is a sign of weakness. The rules of the House, Mr. Speaker, clearly intimate to me that I must not talk about "purchasing" independent votes in this House; but I do not know what that passage in the Speech from the Throne is if it is not an offer for support or something of that kind from the independent members in this House. It looks like that to me at any rate, because on the very face of it it is not a subject that should be introduced into such a document.

Then why introduce it? I have not heard any other member speak along this line, but I thought from the very first minute I saw that passage in the Speech from the Throne that it was rather anomalous to include it there.

Now, I have an open mind with regard to the completion of the Hudson Bay railway. I do not believe it will ever be any use for the transportation of grain; but I am prepared to accept any reasonable arguments that may be submitted in support of the completion of the railway for the development of the country tributary to it. That is a different proposition altogether. And I do not mean to say that the amount of money that is proposed to be expended on the completion of the line is exorbitant or extravagant in relation to the resources of that northern country, for I would not venture, from my own knowledge of these outlying places in the Dominion, to guess either the extent or nature of the local natural resources that would amply repay completion of the road. All I desire in this regard is to remind members from the province of Ontario of what happened when the provincial government started to build the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario line into northern Ontario. I understand that the primary purpose was to develop agricultural land in that territory. But the contractors stumbled on a rich mine—that is just about it—and the silver and gold-mining industry that developed later amply repaid the province for all the expenditure on that railway. I would not venture the suggestion that there were not equally as good possibilities in the Hudson Bay territory, because I have seen a whole lot of those great open spaces of the west, and you can never tell what they are worth until you examine them. But is the Hudson Bay railway the only railway question that is vexing the people of this Dominion, even admitting that it is proper to mention it in the Speech from the Throne? I do not think so. I have heard a lot since I have been in this House about the railway troubles of the Maritime provinces, and I must say it seems to me they have a legitimate ground for complaint down in that part of the country; they have a railway situation there of some magnitude. Then why not mention the railway grievances of the Maritime provinces in the Speech from the Throne, as well as the Hudson Bay railway? I have brought up this subject particularly for the purpose of pointing out that British Columbia has also a very important railway question on its hands, and British Columbia needs assistance from the Dominion government in order to solve its problem. British Columbia's railway problem concerns very materially the province of Alberta also. The Peace River and Alberta railway situation comes down to this: the Peace river people are looking for a western outlet. Look at any map you like, and you will find that the only way in which the products of the Peace river country can be got to their natural market is through British Columbia. There is no use talking about taking those products down to Edmonton or through Alberta or anywhere else. British Columbia is the only way. I should like to refer to a statement in this connection made in the House by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy). At page 541 of Hansard he says:

> Including Pouce Coupe and the Canadian National lines there was $427,800 worth of creamery butter produced north of Edmonton last year.

I have every respect for the intelligence of the hon. member for Peace River, and I do not think he ever intended to make a statement of that kind at all, for as a matter of fact there is not a single mile of Canadian National railway operated north of Edmonton. The hon. member must have meant the Canadian Pacific railway. We have the Canadian Pacific railway operating in that northern territory the Edmonton and Dunvegan railway. That road was originally planned to provide a proper outlet for the products of the Peace river country by way of our road in British Columbia, the Pacific Great Eastern, but unfortunately, owing to the financial condition during and following the war, the connecting up of these two lines has been delayed. But the point I want to make is this: If it is proper to mention the Hudson Bay railway in the Speech from the Throne, the railway problem of the Maritime provinces should also be mentioned, as well as the railway problem we have in Alberta and British Columbia of connecting up the Peace river country with the coast.

During the last election campaign the Prime Minister said that he was going to direct the spearhead of immigration to the Peace River country. Now if the spearhead of immigration was going to be directed to the Peace river country during the election campaign, why is there no mention made in the Speech from the Throne of the necessity for an outlet for the Peace river country?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is the comparison the hon. member is making fair? The money for the Hudson Bay railway has already been provided by the sale of western lands.

Mr. FRASER: If the money is provided, why mention it in the Speech from the Throne?

Mr. CAMPBELL: I do not understand.

Mr. FRASER: Why put it in the Speech from the Throne if the money is already provided?

Mr. CAMPBELL: The money is in the treasury of the country, and, of course, has to be expended by the treasury of the country, but actually no money will be taken from the federal treasury for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. FRASER: The hon. member may have better information than I have, but I cannot see how you are going to construct the Hudson Bay railway without spending money. The money must be provided.

The House has been very indulgent, Mr. Speaker, and I do not wish to try its patience too far. In conclusion, I would like to issue a warning to my Liberal friends and to the different groups in this House. I challenged the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) yesterday that he was afraid of another election. I think all hon. gentlemen opposite are afraid of another election. I think they are scared to death that they will be all wiped off the face of the earth in another election. It reminds me of a situation that is described in Burns' Tam o'Shanter. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that the hero after a night's carousel is going home at the witching hour of midnight, as they call it in Scotland. It was a stormy night, with wind and rain, and riding his good nag through the woods, the hero had to pass a church, surrounded by the usual churchyard. Approaching, he saw streams of light coming from the windows, and emboldened by the forty-rod which he had been drinking, he rode up to the windows and looked in to see what was going on, for in addition to the lights, sounds of merriment were coming from the church. Looking in he saw a dance of witches in progress. He was very much interested; in fact, he became so excited that he gave vent to an exclamation of delight at the performance he saw going on in the church. The lights were immediately extinguished, and the witches were out after him. The hero had to make quick steps to get across a stream nearby, and then, of course, he was safe from the witches. As he was making for the stream Burns apostrophizes him thus:

> Ah, Tam! ah, Tam! thou'll get thy fairin'!
> In hell they'll roast thee like a herrin'!

[Mr. Campbell.]

I think, Mr. Speaker, that illustrates the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite towara an election.

Mr. W. T. LUCAS (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to detain the House at any great length at this particular stage, but owing to the fact that I voted against the Australian treaty when it was before the House last session, and owing to the fact that I stressed the unfairness of this treaty during my campaign I feel that it is only right, in fairness to myself, before casting my vote on the motion before the House and the amendment to it, to at least make some explanation indicating clearly where I stand on this matter.

But before doing so I wish to draw attention to certain remarks made during the debate by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Davis) and to correct a mis-statement on the part of the hon. gentleman. I listened very carefully to the remarks of my hon. friend and I must say that I was impressed with the fact that he had apparently given a great deal of study and thought to the subject matter. Furthermore, the whole tenor of the hon. gentleman's remarks was very fair and impartial. But he made this statement, as reported at page 878 of Hansard with respect to Mr. H. W. Wood, president of the United Farmers of Alberta to which I must take exception:

> At the convention of the United Farmers of Alberta held a couple of weeks ago, Mr. H. W. Wood, the president of that organization, said:
> "We are inviting immigrants to come here, and at the present time conditions for that purpose are better than they have been for some time. It will mean that the people will have to pay from five to ten cents on every bushel of wheat they raise. If they do they would be of such mental calibre that we would not want them. We must fight this infernal thing to death, and if we cannot do it in any other way we must appeal to the immigrants of other countries and say, 'For God's sake do not come here.' "

Then the hon. member for East Calgary proceeded to say:

> I mention these circumstances so that the government may have full knowledge of the feeling prevailing in the western provinces with respect to any immigration policy.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that the hon gentleman did not want to be unfair. Hon. gentlemen will see that the impression given is that Mr. Wood was directing his remarks against immigration. I have here a verbatim report of what Mr. Wood really did say and I ask the permission of the House to place that statement on Hansard so that hon. members will have the correct version of Mr. Wood's remarks before them. Before reading the excerpt I may say that Mr. Wood was not speaking of immigration, but as president of the Alberta wheat pool he was dealing with the question of an export duty on wheat:

To me the greatest peril that we are facing immediately, and it will be the most infamous crime that was ever committed in the country in my opinion, and that is an export duty on our wheat. Now that thing is very, very visible on the horizon just now.

An export duty means just one thing, it means—and it don't mean anything else—that we go down in our pockets, or we don't because the money never gets to our pockets; but we pay just so many cents a bushel to the Canadian millers on every bushel of wheat that we raise in Canada.

Robbery, yes a straight unqualified theft, but done through legislation. Now we had some very valuable advice yesterday about not going to the government to get the government to solve our problems for us. "Attend to your own business," and that was as good advice as we ever had. But that advice would be infinitely more valuable to Canada and to humanity if it were given to other people as well as us. Now we are inviting immigration to this country and it is beginning to look like we could honestly do so, because I am not sure they would not be able to make a living here if things go on as they have been going. But suppose we say to them, "If you come to these great wheat fields of western Canada and begin to raise this wheat, in addition to all the natural difficulties that exist, we would expect you to pay to the milling industry of Canada 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 or 10 cents a bushel on all the wheat you raise." Do you suppose they would come? If they do they would be of such mental calibre that we would not want them.

Now, that don't only mean that they want to take anywhere from five to forty million of dollars a year out of the wheat producers of Canada, but it means also that they want to create a false position where it will be necessary to maintain that and to increase it.

I heard a manufacturer on the train the other day. in the smoking compartment, where all the problems of the nation are solved—who told about when Grover Cleveland was President of the United States they reduced the tariff on certain things and put certain industries out of business.

I am satisfied that that was true. I don't know the details. But why did it put them out of business? Because they (the manufacturing industry) had been built upon an absolutely false basis. That false basis was created by legislation, and when you begin to remove that false scaffolding and let it down to an honest, true basis, it could not stand; it had all been falsely developed.

Now to put five or ten cents a bushel export duty on Canadian wheat, and instead of having a milling capacity of 90,000,000 bushels as they milled last year, you will soon have developed a milling capacity of 350,000,000 bushels and you cannot sustain that without a continued theft from the producer. They will ask for increases, saying. "Here is a great industry that we have built up here and must be sustained."

Now I only want to say one thing more. We want to fight this infernal thing to the death, with every means at our command.

Mr. DAVIS: Mr. Speaker, may I—

Mr. LUCAS: I ask the hon. gentleman to let me finish the statement, there are only a few more words:

And if we cannot successfully fight it any other way, we must appeal to the emigrants of every country in the world, "For God's sake don't come here and get involved in this infamous thing."

It will be evident from the quotation from the speech of Mr. Wood which I have read that his remarks had nothing whatever to do with immigration.

Mr. DAVIS: I desire to state that the quotation I used was taken from the Calgary Herald of January 20 last and was published on the first page of that paper. If my hon. friend will look at the revised Hansard he will see that the source of the quotation is given.

Mr. LUCAS: I accept the hon. gentleman's statement. As I have already said his whole speech was couched in a very fair manner; I feel that he did not want to be unfair. However, the report of his remarks in unrevised Hansard did not give the authority for his quotation, and I simply took the opportunity to present the correct information as I have it here. Had the hon. gentleman stated in the first place that the quotation he gave was taken from a paper it would have relieved him from responsibility.

Let me now deal for a few minutes with the Australian treaty. While that treaty is not specifically mentioned in the amendment before the House there is no doubt it is one of the treaties under fire at the present time. When the treaty was brought down I felt that it was unfair, especially to the agriculturists of Canada. I may say that I listened with a great deal of interest to the figures given by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) the other night as showing the trade between Canada and Australia. Those figures are as follows:

	Imports from Australia	Exports to Australia
1917..	$ 762,113	$ 6,549,546
1919..	4,963,446	14,019,629

A question that has occurred to me, Mr. Speaker, is, why we were concerned about going down to Australia to secure a treaty at all. The foregoing figures would indicate that Australia was the one that should have been concerned about sending representatives to Canada for that purpose. Seeing that Australia was not worried about the existing trade conditions I do not think it was wise for Canada to negotiate a treaty with that country especially when in order to make a bargain, the agricultural industry had to be sacrificed to such an extent. We feel as producers that we have been hit in two ways. An import duty of three cents a pound was placed on raisins, which means raising the price to us as consumers, and then the duty was taken off the products we had to sell; in that way we have been hit both going and coming. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. King, Kootenay) last night made a very fair and reasonable request in my opinion, and that was that the treaty should be given a fair trial before asking for its annulment. With that I heartily agree. This treaty was negotiated with Australia and passed last year. True there is a clause in it, No. 5, which provides that by order in council any other of the British dominions may be admitted to the provisions of that treaty. Generally, as I understand it—I may be wrong—treaties are made for a period of years, but in this case no period of years is mentioned, but a statement is made that the treaty may be abrogated by giving six months' notice. Judging from that provision, it would appear to me that the whole thing was more or less of an experiment, and in my opinion the government would have been very well advised to have confined this treaty to Australia for one year before extending its provisions to the other dominions. If, at the end of that year, we found the treaty was to our advantage we could then extend it to other dominions. If we found it was not to our advantage we would have to deal only with Australia in abrogating it. However, the government saw fit, before the treaty came into operation, by order in council to extend it to New Zealand, and for this I do not hesitate to criticize them. However the deed has been done and as I wish to be reasonable I believe that Canada, as a nation having negotiated this agreement with another sister dominion, we should be fair enough to give it a trial for at least one year.

Now, while I opposed the treaty last year and while I opposed it in my camapaign, I desire to make my position clear in regard to the stand I shall take on this amendment. The amendment does not ask for an abrogation of the treaty, nor do I believe we could amend it, and if this treaty should come before the House at some future time—and I think in fairness it should not be brought up for another year, I would be quite willing to deal with it on the information then before us. But, connected as it is with the Speech from the Throne, and not being able to deal intelligently with it at the present time, I feel that I cannot support the amendment now before the House.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Rosetown): I did not intend to take part in this debate, but seeing that so many things have been said which I think have given rather a wrong impression in the country, I feel that I should answer one or two allegations. There is before the House now an amendment to the motion for an Address in reply, which is supposed to serve more than one purpose. Our friends who have moved it and who have spoken to it at some length are carrying on a campaign which is camouflaged party strategy. The amendment in the first place is supposed to put the group to which I belong in a false position before our electors, because my Conservative friends cannot gracefully accept the decision of parliament as to who is to carry on the government at the present time. The other object of the amendment, as I view it, is to persuade the agriculturists of Canada to accept the price-fixing power, or supposedly price-fixing power, for their products, so that an excuse will be had for the manufacturing and distributing combines to increase the price-fixing power which they already have. That is, for the sake of immediate gain to themselves, our workers and consumers generally are to be fleeced of their earnings and the agriculturists of their dues by having to pay enhanced prices on all the commodities which they need to purchase.

A good deal has been said regarding the Australian treaty. The Australian treaty, like all trade treaties, is a one-sided piece of legislation, and I venture to say to-day that were it possible for the farmer, and particularly the producer of butter, eggs, poultry and other things of that nature, to take advantage of the production which covers those articles now, neither the manufacturer, distributor nor politician would want the farmer to receive fair play or to obtain the protection for his products which they are now seemingly anxious to give him. The member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) is at variance entirely with all economic laws, to say the least. Were it possible to protect the farmer, the government would have to pay him an amount per pound for his product equal to the protection or price-fixing power which the trade penalties give to the manufacturer, and which is always passed on to the consumer. To give the farmer any protection this would be necessary, because all his products have found their price in the open markets of the world. Will the protectionists do this? I say no, they cannot, and if they could the circle again would soon be complete, because the price of doing anything else would be increased. Whether it was surgeon, physician, mechanic or organized labourer even that gave the farmer any service whatsoever, the cost would be passed on and the farmer would find himself very soon in the place where he started. The end would be that he would be compelled sooner or later to join in the plaintive whine that goes on in this House year after year on behalf of protection for the manufacturer, and this seems to be very largely the purpose of the amendment.

I say you cannot protect the farmer. All he asks is that the other industrialists shall get off his own back. It used to be that those enjoying the benefit of import penalties persuaded the workingman that protection would give him high wages and a full dinner pail. The labourer has already found out that all they care about him is to have plenty of men seeking work at the factory door each morning. They are trying to persuade the farmer that if he would only agree to higher protection for the manufacturer, he would have his own product increased in price by protection. This cannot be done while we are producing for export, and every bit of increase in the tariff must make it harder for the farmer to produce at a price at which he can compete in the world's market. The protectionists in this House no doubt hope to place us in a wrong light with our electors, but we are supporting the government on a programme of legislation of benefit to the agriculturist and the people generally. Indeed, much ridicule has been thrown at this group by the press, by anonymous letters, and by debate in this House; but had the Conservative party been sincere in their criticism of the Australian treaty and their professed concern for the welfare of the agriculturist, they would have attacked the Australian treaty from another standpoint altogether. They would have attacked that part of it which places a duty of three cents a pound on raisins, seeing that the bulk of what we use in Canada comes, not from Australia, but from other countries to which no preference in the tariff is shown. I suppose that Australia will not be able to send us this year more than a one-twentieth part of what we shall need. Whatever we may get from Australia duty free will benefit only the importer or the big dealer; the benefit will not be passed on even to the retailer, much less to the consumer. The strange thing is that I do not hear our Conservative friends attack this part of the treaty, the part that will most affect the manufacturer, by raising the cost of living, and will as well put further out of line the cost of production on our farms. But as long as there is a penalty placed on anything that we have to import, the protectionist advocate always thinks it is all right because he is himself blinded by the prospect of the immediate gain he thinks he will get when the government agrees to tax what he is particularly interested in. Indeed, consistency and fair play are terms that cannot be applied to men advocating a tax on foodstuffs.

The hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Davis) the other day, when purporting to quote me from page 488 of Hansard, was really reading a quotation from Sir Richard Cartwright. But I do not want to apologize for Sir Richard Cartwright; his arguments were unanswerable at the time. I still believe that every kind of protection is robbery, yes, legalized robbery, just as Sir Richard Cartwright said it was, and, indeed, it is quite plain to-day to anybody who looks into the matter that if it was not possible under the system of protection to obtain something for which no return was given, protection would die a natural death in about the time it takes to tell the tale. They say it will look after the unemployment question. It has never done it. They say it will give us a home market. That is only a joke. The hon. gentleman quoted from Hansard showing that the agricultural industry had been subsidized by large sums of money, and he cited some sums paid for travelling expenses of inspectors and others on educational work. How he can call this a subsidy to the industry, I do not know. To pay travelling expenses for inspectors or educational speakers is not subsidizing the industry. I would like to know what he has to say regarding travelling expenses for hon gentlemen going to the ends of the earth to negotiate trade treaties for the sake of other industries. What has he to say regarding the salaries and expenses of prevention officers in every manufacturing country that sends manufactured goods to this country? In the interest of our protected manufacturers there is an army of men following up every shipment of goods made to Canada in order to see that the invoices are not falsified and that the goods are not sold cheaper for export than they are in the country of origin. Indeed, our own preventive service last year cost us between $300,000 and $400,000. But can the hon. gentleman point to one dollar the farmer has ever received by enhanced prices on his products on account of the tariff? Is there any product on the farm to which any existing tariff can be applied by way of protection? Is there any commodity the farmer needs to buy that is not affected by trade penalties in the interests of manufacturers? The hon. gentleman mentioned the sum of $63,646 spent in 1923 for educational work as a subsidy of enormous extent. Why, the bounty paid for the production of crude petroleum alone last year was just equal to that, besides $2,500 for the administration of that act. The bounty on copper bars and rods paid to one company last year was just $15,000, besides a duty of ten to thirty per cent on the products of this metal, which duty the consumers must pay. The salaries of the minister, deputy and staff at Ottawa alone of the Customs department last year amounted to over $534,000. Drawbacks paid in 1925 on material for use of manufacturers on exported goods amounted to $10,420,019, and drawbacks on goods consumed at home amounted to $1,533,175, or a total of $11,953,-294 in drawbacks alone. There was a total expenditure in that department of $22,018,007. But this is only a small part of what it has cost this country to give manufacturers a price-fixing power on their products, which price the consumer must pay. I find that General Motors of Canada, at Oshawa, Ontario, one company alone, received a drawback of $2,165,107, while we have to pay over thirty per cent too much for our motor cars because of import penalties. But that is only one company out of 132 that benefits under this drawback, and yet the hon. member quibbles about the name that should be given to such a nefarious system. Yes, I say robbery, robbery as true to-day as it was in the days of Sir Richard Cartwright.

But let us go back and take a glance again at these drawbacks. Not only did we spend nearly $12,000,000 of public funds to enable the manufacturers to scour the world for raw materials, but we have maintained on the free list practically everything they need to use in their factories. I say public funds, because since the policy of this country is one of protection that money is taken out of current revenue without a doubt. They tell us that free trade is a myth; but when it comes to the point where they themselves are obliged to purchase supplies the manufacturers are all free traders. The tariff schedule is perhaps the most one-sided piece of legislation extant to-day. I question if there is in the whole world a piece of legislation that so completely delivers one class of the people over to another to be exploited, a class whose interests have become by legislation of privilege entirely out of line with the interests of the rest of the people. On pages 66 and 67 of the Customs Tariff we find a whole list of articles on the free list. I would invite hon. gentlemen to peruse this book and see the one-sidedness of the whole thing, the discrimination against the agriculturist and the consumers of the country in general. Take pages 93 and 97 again, dealing with manufacturers' supplies, or pages 98 to 100 inclusive with reference to drawbacks, and you will realize how utterly unfair and one-sided the tariff system is. We tax ourselves to give the manufacturers an advantage; surely then it is not too much to expect that their raw material shall be purchased at home so as to give employment to our working men. But such is not the case. This Customs Tariff provides that our manufacturers shall enjoy all the advantages possible to enable them to scour the world for the cheapest raw material while our own raw material and our natural resources go undeveloped, although we tax ourselves for the sake of the manufacturers. We maintain on the free list even importations of iron and steel, the product of foreign mines, while the suppliants of privilege in this House prate about a home market for the farmer. What with bonuses, bounties, tariffs and other things, we have given millions for the production of steel in our own country, and yet in the very place in this Dominion to-day where working men are starving there is a company who have benefited by the system of protection and bonuses and bounties and free raw material, importing these things to work in their own smelting furnaces. We have scoured the whole world for scrap iron, old steel, old rails, and so on, importing them free under item 775 of the tariff, while the people have to pay from 20 to 35 per cent for the products made from these metals. I would advise hon. gentlemen to consult items 414 and 417 which I will not detain the House to read just now.

Our manufacturers do not believe in their own policy. By protection they have driven the cost of doing anything in this country out of line with world prices, and to-day they find it cheaper to import their own raw material than to secure it in this country. Then they come here and claim protection under the tariff to look after the working man. What a fallacy. In this parliament we have suddenly become aware somehow of the fact that the farmer is not sufficiently protected, but I say that the farmer needs to be delivered from those who would protect him. The truth is that the price-fixing power hitherto enjoyed has become useless in defence of the labour organization, and that is the cause of the feverish anxiety for immigration to-day. It is argued that if the farmer would only demand protection it could be used as a fulcrum for the political lever to pry a little more privilege out of the people. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) yesterday deplored the sending of natural products from Canada to other countries, but I would point out that this goes on only in proportion to the extent of the want of enterprise and patriotism on the part of our industrialists and capitalists. For instance, the desire for an export embargo on pulpwood is prompted by the desire to have the pulpwood producers delivered over to the manufacturer; all our manufacturer needs to do is to bid a better price for the raw material. And the desire for an export embargo on wheat is prompted by the same selfish longing to have the producer of wheat at the mercy of the Canadian miller. The Canadian miller never asked for this until the farmer formed his own co-operative marketing scheme by which he could better look after his higher grade. The one thing that protectionists need to learn is that the word "wealth" is significant only when our natural resources are in course of use and enjoyment by the people. To hamper your competitor in order to increase your own wealth is a fallacy, because it always restricts the purchasing power of the home consuming public. Our protectionists have fallen into the same error as the working men did when they tried to prevent the introduction of labour-saving machinery. It is all restriction; but then it is the boast always of the conservative that he ever remains the same. A very illuminating address was delivered lately to the National Council of Farmers' Co-operative Marketing Associations at Lee House, Washington, D.C., by a Professor Macey Campbell of Cedar Rapids, Iowa. He points out that the discrimination against the agriculturist by the protective system of the United States is undermining the life of the whole nation. I want to read one or two paragraphs from the report of his address:

Dr. Campbell quoted records of the United States census bureau showing the steady increase in the percentage of landless tenant farmers. In 1880 the percentage was 26; in 1900 it had increased to 35 and in 1920 to 38. Seven states, he said, now have reached the 50 per cent mark, while in two states more than 50 per cent of the farmers are landless.

Landlessness by the mortgage route also is steadily increasing Dr. Campbell asserted, quoting statistics to show that in 1890 28 per cent of the farmers were encumbered by mortgage, that in 1920 over 40 per cent were so encumbered, and that now farm mortgage indebtedness in the United States has reached the tremendous total of seven thousand million dollars. He says:

While mortgage indebtedness has been increasing, the farmers' equity in these mortgaged farms has been decreasing, with the result that while in 1910 it was 72.10 per cent, in 1920 it had dropped to 70.9 per cent and in 1925 to an estimated 60 per cent.

As the farmer loses the ownership of his land the equity held by others increases. With the average interest rate on farm mortgages standing at 6 per cent, and the average income from farm lands at 3 per cent, there seems little hope of paying off the $7,000,000,000 of farm mortgages. The ownership of mortgaged farm lands is passing into the hands of persons who live largely in towns and cities.

This leads one to ask, Sir, if at an interest rate of 6 per cent farm land in the United States is going so rapidly out of the hands of those who use it, what must be the condition in this country, particularly in western Canada, where our average rate of interest runs to 8, 9 and 10 per cent, and sometimes over. This has made necessary the cry for cheap money for agricultural purpose, but I predict that unless some of the handicaps are removed from our basic industry, even an agricultural credit scheme will in time also become useless. Let me quote another paragraph from Dr. Campbell's address showing the discrimination against life on the farm. He says:

We who are engaged in education judge of the attractiveness of life in the rural communities as compared with life in the cities by the conditions we find in the homes and the schools. Recently my work brought me into close contact with the homes and schools in the South, in the Dakotas, and in the city of Detroit. I saw barefooted white mothers and children at work in the cotton fields beside the men trying to make cotton enough to carry them through the year. I found a white school operating but two months during the entire year in a bare shack with two windows. The teacher had no preparation above the rural school. Children sixteen years old were in the third grade. They had had no more months of scooling than many children have in the cities by the time they are eight.

Here is a further paragraph from his address:

In reply to my questions concerning conditions in Detroit, I received the answer. "Our big organized industries bring in sufficient profits that we are able to support schools like these for our children." I saw more good, modern homes in Detroit in three city blocks, occupied by the families of working men, than I saw in an eight hundred mile drive among the farm homes in the entire state of South Dakota. The memory of those barefooted women in the cotton fields of the South haunts me still.

To-day by co-operation we are trying to alleviate some of the unsatisfactory conditions we find on our Canadian farms. The hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) the other day quoted some information he had received regarding the working of one of our co-operative companies, and he charged that company with exploitation of the farmer, stating that while the duty on a certain farm implement was $22.80, the company was charging the farmer $38.30. I am very glad, Sir, to have the opportunity of correcting the entirely wrong impression which the hon. gentleman gave the House. These are the facts. As indicative of the discrimination against those engaged in the basic industry of this country, I want to say that under the rules of our distributing combines a co-operative company is classed merely as a consumer. That rule to-day is recognized in the administration of our tariff legislation. Under this rule a co-operative company is forced to go to a foreign country and buy its requirements, but at once the Canadian combine steps in and, on the ground that the co-operative company has gone past the wholesaler, the jobber, the dealer and the manufacturer, applies under the Dumping Act for the imposition of a penalty equal to the profits of all these concerns in between. Our co-operative companies, I repeat, are classed only as consumers, irrespective of the volume of business they do or what they distribute. Is that fair? Is there any British fair play in that, Sir? I would respectfully ask this House to consider this unjust discrimination before any further legislation along this line is passed. Is this fair play to the working men and women of this country, to those engaged in our basic industry?

I think, Mr. Speaker, it is time that we emphasized the disparity between life on the farm to-day and in the city, and the state of slavery that our men, women and children are subjected to in their attempt to keep themselves above the line of want. I believe it is the patriotic duty of men in Canada occupying positions similar to that occupied by Dr. Macey Campbell in the United States to make known the discrimination against our rural life lest we sink to the level of the conditions he has described as prevailing to-day in some of the finest states of the union. What he has described, Sir, is the result of the system upon which we are exhorted to base our fiscal policy by hon. gentlemen who advocate protection, and who are willing that those engaged in our basic industry may suffer degradation as deplorable as that witnessed by Dr. Campbell if only they themselves can reach immediate wealth at the expense of their unfortunate fellow-Canadians.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, representing a constituency in which the people are engaged in mixed farming and are especially interested in dairy production, I desire to give my support to the amendment which has been proposed with characteristic ability and attention to detail by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), than whom no more sincere or better qualified champion of the farmers of Canada has had a seat in this House during the last twenty years.

I support the amendment proposed by the hon member for South Oxford for the reasons stated in the amendment—that the Speech from the Throne proposes no remedial legislation to alleviate the injustice under which the farmers of this country are suffering at this time, and have been for many years. I support the amendment also in order to indicate my lack of confidence in a government in which sixty per cent of the people have said they have no confidence, in which the members of this House have indicated they have no confidence—a government, in addition, which has indicated its lack of confidence in the members of this House, as well as its lack of confidence in itself. I also support the amendment as a protest against the manner in which two hon. gentlemen of this House have presented demands on this government and against the acquiescence of the government in those demands—demands the compliance with which constitute a supplement to the Speech from the Throne, demands which are subversive of the very fundamental principles of responsible government, demands which indicate the desperate character of those presenting them and the desperate necessity, pitiable weakness, and lack of dignity on the part of the government acceding to them.

On the 29th of October last the government appealed to the country for reasons plainly stated by the Prime Minister in his Richmond Hill speech. In that speech he stated that he wanted a more definite mandate from the people of Canada. In that speech he stated that the government would no longer be justified in merely marking time and drawing their salaries, that four years of simply marking time and drawing their salaries was long enough. He asked for his mandate; the election was held, and his party now finds itself in this position: the Prime Minister defeated, half of his cabinet defeated, and the membership of his following in this House reduced by some sixteen as compared with its standing in the previous parliament. But notwithstanding those facts, notwithstanding the fact that practically sixty per cent of the people of Canada by their votes on the 29th of October declared they had no further use for this government, the remnant of this government nevertheless comes back here and undertakes to carry on as a government, and then it presents the pitiable spectacle of influencing members of other groups to give them their support in order that they may be able to carry on. They further indicate their lack of confidence in themselves as a government, or their lack of confidence in the merits of the legislation they propose, when they ask this parliament to give them a recess of five or six weeks in order to reorganize the government.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that I would vote for this amendment also as a protest against the manner in which two hon. gentlemen of this House, representing less than two per cent of the membership of this House, have made demands upon the government for certain legislation, which the government has agreed to bring down. On 7th of January, as you will find by referring to page 560 of Hansard, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) sent to William Lyon Mackenzie King, to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), and also to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) who is leading the Progressives in this House, a letter in which he asked the question:

Is it your intention to introduce at this session legislation with regard to (a) Provision for the unemployed; (b) Old Age Pensions.

Those letters were sent on the 7th of January. On the 8th of January the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre gets up in this House and declares that his little group—I use his own words——are so placed as to be able almost to say which of these two sides—

That is to say, Liberals or Conservatives:

—is to carry on the government of the country.

I think the only inference from that is that it was a very plain indication to the government that they had better come across and favour the proposals demanded; otherwise there might be unhealthy consequences for the government. The letter sent to the right hon. leader of the opposition was answered on the 9th of January, and, as we would expect, the answer was clear-cut and to the point. There was no bidding in the answer sent by the leader of the opposition. Following the letter sent to the Prime Minister, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says that he had an interview with Mr. King. At that interview, recognizing the desperate position in which the government was placed, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and his colleague pressed for further legislation. Their additional demands referred to the Naturalization Act, the Criminal Code, and the Immigration Act. They received no answer from Mr. King. Then came the vote in this House on the 14th of January, in which the government was sustained by a majority of only three. Evidently the member for Winnipeg North Centre thought that was a favourable time to press for something definite from the leader of the Liberal party. Apparently he was not satisfied to accept the verbal assurances of the leader of the Liberal party in regard to this legislation. He asked him to put his views in writing. The hon. member very frankly says that this method which he has pursued of finding out what the various parties think with regard to proposed legislation is perhaps somewhat novel in this House. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is a somewhat novel procedure, and one which I think should not be encouraged. On the 28th of January Mr. King writes to the member for Winnipeg North Centre agreeing to his demands, which, I repeat, constitute a supplement to the Speech from the Throne, and constitute also an unblushing bid for support. On the morning of the 29th of January the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says he received that letter from Mr. King, and on the afternoon of the 29th he rises in his place in this House and puts that letter on Hansard, with these words:

It seems to me—

Says the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre:

—that we must be very grateful indeed that the peculiar combination of circumstances which we find existing in the House at this time has seemingly made it possible to place upon the statute books long over-due legislation in the interests of some of the most needy but least influential elements of our population.

Those were the words of the hon. gentleman in regard to the course which he had pursued. May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that it was in a somewhat similar manner that the celebrated Robin Hood took the purses from the rich at the point of a pistol and distributed their contents amongst the most needy but least influential members of the population? The motive inspiring Robin Hood, the bandit, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, may do credit to their hearts; but I submit, Sir, that the method is one which would have placed the noose round Robin Hood's neck if they had caught him.

Mr. FORKE: Did Robin Hood use a pistol?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a poor picture.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Perhaps he used a bow and arrow. My hon. friend must take the language as figurative. At all events I am right in saying that he used force in obtaining the wealth of the richer people and distributing it among the most needy of the population. I do not know how to characterize what is proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre under the Criminal Code.

Mr. HEAPS: Would you call old age pensions robbery?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): No I have no intention of the kind.

Mr. HEAPS: The inference is there just the same.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): The inference I want the hon. gentleman to take—and I think he is intelligent enough to take it—is this: That in the case I referred to the bandit used force, took advantage of circumstances, to obtain what he wanted whether he was entitled to it or not; and the plain inference from my remarks is that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) have done exactly the same thing. I want to tell them that in my judgment such methods are absolutely subversive of the very first principles of responsible government.

Now, the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) asked me a question. We are told that many long years ago a gentleman named Cincinnatus was twice taken from between the handles of the plough and conducted to Rome as dictator, and with the help of the Roman legions performed some wonderful achievements. I believe, on looking over the record, that the hon. member for Brandon has twice been taken from the handles of the plough, brought down here, and is in the position of dictator to the government at the present time. I dare say that with the help of the legions across the way he will be able to perform achievements even greater than those performed by Cincinnatus.

The present situation in this House, which has been brought about by the government's greed for office, is nothing more or less than a two-ringed political circus, with the hon. member for Brandon as the ringmaster cracking the whip and obliging hon. gentlemen opposite to dance to his music. Well, every circus, of course, has its clown, its fun maker, and it is almost unnecessary for me to say who occupies that position in this particular political circus. We all appreciate the fact that the central actor in this political vaudeville is the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Thank you.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): I wish to say that I would be remiss in my duty if I did not express to that hon. gentleman my thanks for the entertainment he has provided for the amusement of the members of this House—my appreciation of his magnificent humour and of the grotesque verbiage in which he clothes that humour.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): What is wrong about that?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Let him go on. It is a free country.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): The situation, Mr. Speaker, strikes me as one of the greatest farces ever staged in any deliberative assembly in this or any other country. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. King, Kootenay) the other day quoted a number of figures in regard to the paper industry, the transportation of grain by our railways, and so on. He also declared that the government had given very strong evidence of economy in administration, and so forth. He did not call attention to the fact that the government had paid out over $75,000 to a pulpwood commission, or $167,000 to a grain commission.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): All of value.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Nor did he call attention to the $181,000 spent on radio outfits.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): All of value.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): "All of value," the hon. gentleman says. Nor did he call attention to the $270,000 paid out in providing golf courses for the entertainment or amusement of those gentlemen who have wealth enough to travel up and down the country with a bag of sticks under their arm and play with a little round white ball whenever they feel like doing so. Nor did he call attention to the Scribe hotel facts, closely connected with our railway arrangements. He did not point out that they paid to a gentleman called Aronovici $16,250 for thirteen months work, $9,291 for expenses or pocket money, and then gave him a bonus of $7,500 besides, a total of $33,041 to that gentleman, or an average of $85.75 a day for his work. These are the evidences of economy on the part of the government opposite.

But there is more. Between 1917 and 1920, both years inclusive, the Conservative government collected in special war taxes $179,939,000. That was denonuced in the strongest possible terms by hon. gentlemen opposite, but in the next four years—1921 to 1924 inclusive—those hon. gentlemen collected $709,540,000 from the same source, or $529,000,000 more than was collected by those whom they formerly condemned. The total taxes collected during the period from 1917 to 1920 under the Conservatives were $1,156,000,000, or an average of $289,000,000 a year. That was denounced by hon. gentlemen opposite. "Put us in power," they said, "and we will reduce the expenditure." In the next four years they collected $1,628,000,000, an average of $407,000,000 a year, or $118,000,000 more per year than was collected by those whom they condemned. I will call attention to this fact, which should not be lost sight of: that the Conservative government in the period from 1917 to 1920 made these expenditures: $164,000,000 for soldiers' gratuities; $102,000,000 in connection with the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment; $80,000,000 in connection with soldier settlement on the land; $10,000,000 on technical education, $7,000,000 on soldiers' insurance; a total of $363,000,000. Most of that expenditure was needed and was incurred before the Liberal party came into power.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Did that money come out of revenue, or was it borrowed money?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): It does not make any difference whether it came out of revenue or was borrowed money.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Did it come out of taxation, or was it borrowed money?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): It came out of the treasury of this country. If you borrow money I suppose you intend to pay it back some time; or do hon. gentlemen opposite not consider that a debt or obligation? What difference does it make? The facts are there for everybody to draw their own conclusion. The net debt in 1921 was $2,350,000,000. In 1925 it had grown to $2,417,000,000. If you add to that the guaranteed railway bonds in 1924 and 1925, amounting to $118,000,000, it made the debt on March 31, 1925, no less a sum than $2,535,000,000. This is the record of the government which tries to speak of the creditable manner in which it has conducted the finances of this country.

The hon. member also said, if I understood him correctly, that the Conservative party was responsible for our railway problem, in that it was under the Conservatives that the railways were amalgamated. My recollection of it is that the amalgamation of these roads, forced upon the country, was acceded to by members on both sides of the House. There was nothing else to do. The Conservative party is in no way responsible for Canada's railway problem. The railway problem of Canada was brought upon this country by the wild spree of railway building conducted by the Liberals when they were in power between 1896 and 1911. It was the Liberal party which built the National Transcontinental and guaranteed the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific. It was the Liberal party which also brought into existence the Canadian Northern and guaranteed its bonds, with the exception of the bonds in British Columbia.

The hon. member also referred to Canada's favourable balance of trade. He thought that that was a good point. In some cases it might be. I take this view in regard to the favourable balance of trade: If Canada could show it had a favourable balance of trade produced by the sale of goods made in Canada and finished in Canada, I would say that that would be a good argument; but what do we find? Canada exports 73 per cent of its wood and wood products in the raw state and imports 64 per cent of those wood products in the finished state. We export 87 per cent of our metals in the raw state and import about the same percentage of those metals when they have been finished, by work on the other side of the line or in other countries. A favourable balance of trade obtained by the export of our raw materials, and especially by the export of those raw materials which can never be replaced, is not a favourable balance of trade of which we should have any right to boast.

Another matter which was referred to by the Minister of Public Works and referred to by several other hon. gentlemen is the reciprocity pact of 1911. "Oh," they say, "if you had allowed us to put that pact on the statute book it would have been a fine thing for the farmers of Canada." That is the ground they take. I take absolute issue with them in that respect. What did that pact propose to do for the farmers of this country? The reciprocity pact did not propose to reduce the duties on the implements of production used by the farmers. It left the duties on, and as a matter of fact the duties on some sixteen agricultural implements, a list of which I have in my hand, were lower in every case in 1921, when the Conservatives went out of power, than under the proposed reciprocity agreement of 1911. In this connection I call attention to this further fact—and I do so because of the reference made to it by the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans)—that while the members from the west supporting the United Grain Growers Grain Company, which was engaged in the handling of machinery, fence wire, fence posts, flour and various other articles, found fault with the duty in 1911 on binders, mowers and so on of 12½ per cent, which duty they say obliged the buyer of a binder to pay $22.80 more for that machine, they did not want to say one word against that company which was selling binders and mowers and other machines, taking out of the pockets of the farmers $38.30 profit on a binder, $13.80 profit on a mower, and so on all down the list. While these people condemned the Conservative party, or any party that left a duty on farm implements or machinery, the United Grain Growers Grain Company of the west were exacting a profit of over 21 per cent on these very same machines, and were taking absolutely no risk whatever in regard to bad debts—because it was a cash transaction all through the deal so far as they were concerned. They stood in the same position in the buying of machines as anybody else. If they bought a mower from the United States it came over at a certain price. They claimed that the duty obliged them to add a certain amount to that price. Very well; accept that if you like; that does not justify their adding a still further 21 per cent profit for themselves. While they professed to be particularly anxious about the farmer, they were showing that in their dealings with the farmers—cash dealings in which they ran no risk of bad accounts—they were taking exorbitant profits all along the line, not only in regard to machinery but in regard to everything else.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Does the hon. member happen to know that the Grain Growers Grain Company, even if they were taking 21 per cent more on account of duties, or whatever they took it for, sold those implements at a great deal less than the regular line companies of Canada?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): No, I do not know anything of the kind. I know that was the sworn evidence of Rice-Jones, the manager of the company, given in this building a few years ago. He stated under oath that the company of which he was manager was taking a profit on those implements of over 21 per cent. There is the plain language; there is the source of my information, and my hon. friend can find his evidence in the report in the Library, as I found it. That is my statement, and I again point out that you must take into consideration the fact that they had their men under salary at the various elevators; they were paying them anyway, and all they had to do was to write one or two letters; it was a cash transaction in every case and there was no risk of bad debts. Surely people who profess to be deeply concerned about the farmers should be content to give them the benefit of the service and let them have the machines without taking a profit of over 21 per cent on the transaction. When they were taking a profit of over 21 per cent in their own dealings with the farmers, I say it ill became them to come to this House and find fault with any government or party which was imposing a tariff of a little more than half of the profits they were taking.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), referring to the reciprocity election of 1911, said that the man who wrote "Rule Britannia" was the one who won that election for the Conservative party. I do not think he is right in that at all. The people of Canada voted as they did in 1911, not because of "Rule Britannia;" not because they were patriotic citizens of the country, but they voted in their own interests. So far as singing Rule Britannia is concerned, I hope the party on this side of the House will always take the lead in singing that grand old hymn, and I say to the Minister of Finance that he will never find this party trying to substitute any other flag for the Union Jack, either.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Some hon. gentlemen across the floor laugh, but I am particularly serious when I say that, and I am justified in making that allusion because of what was done here about a year ago by the hon. gentleman who is leading the Liberal party in this country.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): It worked well in the election.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): It was not that which worked in the election at all; it was the fact that under the reciprocity pact this was what was proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite: They proposed to oblige the farmer to pay additional money because of tariffs on everything that he had to buy and to expose him to the competition of the world in everything that he had to sell. That is the situation. Will any hon. gentleman contradict me in that? The United States in that pact opened its doors to the natural products of one country alone—Canada. That was where their competition was coming from, and many people even to-day believe that if Canada had adopted that agreement she would be opening her doors to the natural products of only the United States. That is not the case at all. Under that agreement when we opened our doors to the natural products of the United States, we also opened them to the natural products of some fifteen other countries under the favoured nations clause. I need mention only one—the Argentine republic. At that time, perhaps, competition from the Argentine republic would not be serious—not at least as serious as it would be at the present time. But that is the fact in regard to the reciprocity agreement of 1911; and while my hon. friends opposite may say what they choose in regard to that reciprocity pact, down in their hearts they do not believe it would be a good thing for Canada. If they do so believe, then they have not the courage of their convictions, or they do not believe they have the ability to present the claims of that treaty before the people of this country—one or the other. Hon. gentlemen opposite may try to console themselves by saying that it was a mistake for the people of Canada to vote as they did in 1911, but I will venture the prophecy that they will take very good care they do not make any such proposition in any future election in Canada. They have had their lesson in that regard, and it is one which they will not soon forget.

The Minister of Finance, in his remarks the other day, said that the hon. member for South Oxford was a protectionist, but that he could not give him the same credit when it was a case of the government bringing into this country articles used in dairying. I do not know what the government has done in particular along that line. Looking over the tariff schedule, I find there is still a duty of 27½ per cent on glass milk bottles and on paper bottle caps, very extensively used. There is still a duty of twenty per cent on cans used for fresh milk or cream. There is still a duty of ten per cent on milking machines and machines for testing butter fat in milk or cream. These items are still in our tariff, and if hon. gentlemen opposite are consistent in their arguments, they should move at once to strike them out and to make all these articles free. The Minister of Finance said that when it was announced on October 21 that a considerable quantity of butter was on its way from Australia and New Zealand, prices immediately dropped in the Old Country. That was his statement as reported on page 826 of Hansard. A few minutes later, as reported on page 828, he said this:

> You cannot fool them—

That is, the people.

> —into the belief that because butter comes in from Australia and New Zealand it is going to lower the price in Canada.

How in the world does he square those two statements? Of course, this is along the line of Liberal propaganda, Liberal talk. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been for years preaching one thing in one part of the country and another thing in another part. They have arguments or statements on both sides of the question and you can take your choice.

Speaking in regard to eggs and butter from Australia, the hon. gentleman stated last year that bringing those products from Australia to Canada would cause a reduction in the cost of living in this country. Now he says that it is not going to have that effect at all. Last year he said that it would give us a cheaper breakfast table. Now he ridicules the idea of eggs coming from Australia or New Zealand at all. Last year he stated:

> We do not claim that this treaty will be of any material advantage to agriculture.

And he further stated that they were arranging with Australia for a continual flow of butter, eggs and so forth to Canada, while we send ours to England and other markets of the world. Why should the producers of dairy and farm products in Canada be forced to send the products of their labour to England and other world markets in order to sell them, while these articles are coming in under a low tariff or no tariff at all to take the place of what is grown at home and should be used? There is no doubt that that is the effect. Last year the Minister of Finance gave an illustration of the dumping clause. He referred to there being an over-supply of butter in New York and he said that there was a drop in the market because of that over-supply. What was done? Thirty or forty carloads of butter were sent to Canada; immediately the market in New York was stabilized and the price of butter fell in markets on this side of the line. I maintain that the present tariff in Canada is and has been for years unfair to those engaged in agriculture, our basic industry; that it has been made still more unfair by the treaty with Australia, and it has been aggravated by the extension of that treaty to New Zealand. The following is a statement of the exports of butter and cheese from Australia and New Zealand and Canada during the first three months of last year:

	Australia and New Zealand	Canada
Butter	102,000,000 pounds	310,000 pounds
Cheese	57,000,000 pounds	10,000,000 pounds

These figures indicate, it seems to me, what our producers of butter particularly will be exposed to in the way of competition.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): Are those the winter months in Canada?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): The first three months.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): The summer months in Australia?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Yes, I am glad the hon. member reminds me of that because it seems to me still more thoroughly to emphasize the unfairness of this treaty. These are summer months in Australia when the cost of producing butter there is at its lowest and when in this country the cost of producing that article is at its very highest. Surely that should be taken into consideration.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): My hon. friend is speaking of exports?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Exports from Australia and New Zealand and Canada.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): I thought it was to Great Britain.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): General exports. I understand. I think, from the minister's own statement that the distance from Australia and New Zealand to Great Britain is about the same as to Canada, and the time consumed in going to one place is the same as in going to the other. While these products will go in great bulk to the British market, the very fact of reducing the duty to one cent a pound, a negligible amount, will in my judgment have the result of bringing millions of pounds of butter of Australia and New Zealand to Canada at a time when our own producers of butter are working at great disadvantage and heavy cost and when they are entitled to special consideration because of climatic conditions.

The present government has not shown that sympathy for the dairying industry of this country that the people have a right to expect. The Dairy Products Act came into effect on April 1, 1923. Under that act there are twenty graders in Montreal drawing a salary of $2,520 each, whose business it is to grade our butter and cheese according to four standards, namely, special and first, second and third; and although the act became operative on the day I have mentioned not one single pound of Canadian butter exported in the year 1923 bore any mark of having been graded. In the year 1923 the graders graded 110,513,200 pounds of cheese for export but the grade was not stamped on one single box of that cheese. I supported the grading proposition in this House when it was first mooted. Now what was the purpose of it? It was intended to maintain the reputation of Canadian butter and cheese in the British market so that when our Canadian butter was exposed for sale there the people would know whether they were buying either special or one of the three other grades; and the same in regard to cheese. Our factory men were obliged to submit to the grading done in Montreal, but they received no protection whatever, as they should have received by means of the stamping of the grades on the butter and cheese exported in 1923. No explanation has ever been given of this failure to carry out the provisions of the act and it indicates in my opinion a lack of sympathy and a lack of efficiency on the part of the government.

Canada has made great strides in dairying. I am very glad indeed to have the opportunity of stating that men from my own part of the country, from the counties I represent in this House, have contributed greatly to enhance the reputation of Canadian butter and cheese in the Old Country market. At the Royal Dairy Show in London, England, in 1923 the first prize for colonial cheddar cheese was captured by Mr. W. C. Taylor of the county of Frontenac, in competition with makers from all parts of the world, while the third prize went to Mr. James Sprott, also a resident of my county. The same year Mr. Joseph Craig, a citizen of that part of the country, captured the first prize for butter in competition with the world at Glasgow, and in 1924 Mr. Sprott captured the first prize for cheese, Mr. A. McIntosh of Lanark second prize, and Mr. B. Avery of Kinburn third prize. In 1925 Mr. W. C. Taylor, the same gentleman who took first prize in 1923, gained first prize again with Canadian cheese in competition against the world. These gentlemen did a great deal to enhance the reputation of our products in the British market.

But I can give further proof. Our cheese in 1924 brought 6s. 2d. per hundredweight more than the top price paid for the best New Zealand cheese, while in 1925 it brought 2s. 5d. per hundredweight more than the highest price paid for the New Zealand product. In other words, in those two years, on the amount of Canadian cheese exported to the Old Country, Canadian producers, by reasons of the enhanced reputation of our product due, as I claim, to the gentlemen whose names I have mentioned, received $2,043,850 more than New Zealand shippers got, at the highest price, for the same quantity of cheese they shipped in the very same period.

In those two years we had to contend against very keen competition. As I have already mentioned, the Argentine republic is rapidly coming to the front as a dairy country. In 1911 that republic exported only 3,000,000 pounds of butter and just 1,140 pounds of cheese. Eleven years later, in 1922, it exported 53,864,000 pounds of butter and 14,798,403 pounds of cheese. The Argentine republic has gone to considerable trouble to obtain at the very highest salaries the very best cheese and butter experts in the world. They have gone to Australia and New Zealand and captured the best men there by offering inviting salaries. The republic apparently is not affected by the American duty of 8 cents per pound on butter, as is evident from the fact that whereas in 1922 it exported to the United States only 257,000 pounds, it exported in 1923 2,323,000 pounds. Why are they not affected by that 8 cents per pound duty imposed in the United States? The reason is that they are under favourable conditions which enable them to produce butter and cheese at a very much lower cost than it is possible for us to manufacture in this country. The same of course is true of Australia and New Zealand; the cost of production in those countries is very much lower than it is in Canada. Their cattle can graze the year round and they have not much capital expenditure in the way of barns and stables; nor do they pay what we have to pay in the matter of wages.

The hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) does not seem to think that a duty is of any use at all, in that it does not enhance the price of the farmer's products. At least that is what I understood the hon. gentleman's position to be. Well, if he is right in his reasoning in that regard, that if we place a duty of 8 or 10 cents per pound on butter the effect is not to increase the price of his commodity to our Canadian producer, how does he contend that a duty or tariff on machinery increases the price of the manufactured article and has the effect of robbing the people? The rule should work both ways. It is, I know, frequently argued that the price of an article is increased by the amount of the duty imposed, but that is not economically sound. That is not the case except in respect of things that we do not produce here at all. If you put on a duty of 5 or 10 cents per pound on tea I can understand that the price of that commodity would be raised by that amount or approximately that amount, but that is not the case when you apply a duty to an article which is produced in this country. Then the law of supply and demand comes into play and the price is not raised to the full amount of the duty; it depends upon the supply available in the home market at the time.

I protest against this arrangement for the reason I shall state. It is perfectly true that in the agreement with Australia some benefits accrue to certain people in Canada; I admit that at once. I can understand that the paper men would be very much in favour of the arrangement, as would the automobile manufacturers. I do not know that we should be particularly anxious about the welfare of the automobile men—it strikes me that they have had pretty generous treatment—and I do not know but that the paper men could get along without very much help. But is it fair that the interests of our farming class, those who are engaged in our basic industry, should be sacrificed for the benefit of the paper men or the automobile men?

While we do get something for certain of our people from the Australian treaty, we get absolutely nothing from New Zealand. We give to New Zealand the same benefits as to Australia; we receive some reciprocal advantage from Australia, but none whatever from New Zealand. This is so manifestly unfair that it does not seem to me to require developing further.

But it is not merely our dairymen who are interested in this treaty. I have in my hand a resolution passed by the Vegetable Growers' Association of Ontario about the time this treaty was before the House for ratification. Allow me to place it on Hansard:

Moved by N. T. Sanderson, London No. 7, seconded by Jos. Cyr, Cyrville, that we, the Vegetable Growers Association of Ontario in convention assembled with representatives from the various Branches of the industry find it impossible to profitably compete on our own home market with the vegetable products grown under semi-tropical conditions by cheap negro, mexican and oriental labour in the south and southwestern states, the reason for this untenable condition is the unfair method of applying the tariff; the failure of the Dumping Act, to prevent dumping, and the custom of flooding our market with stale or rotten goods, with duty rescinded.

Therefore, be it resolved that we, the Ontario Vegetable Growers' Association petition the hon. the Minister of Finance through the Canadian Horticultural Council to amend the present tariff as it applies to vegetables:

We request the following tariff Schedule:

Onions 1 cent and potatoes	½	cent	per pound
Cabbage..	1½	"	"
Bunch carrots..	2	"	"
Bunch beets..	2	"	"
Celery..	3	"	"
Cauliflower..	3	"	"
Cucumbers..	3	"	"
Brussel sprouts..	3	"	"
Asparagus..	3	"	"
Fresh peas..	3	"	"
Fresh beans..	3	"	"
Lettuce..	5	"	"
Spinach..	5	"	"
Radish..	5	"	"
Tomatoes..	5	"	"
Peppers..	5	"	"

Weight of package in all cases to be included.
Carried.

That resolution, I believe, was concurred in by the Dominion organization, so it may be taken as the considered view of the vegetable growers of the Dominion. They are vitally interested.

It may be asked: Why should we endeavour to encourage our basic industry of agriculture? I reply: Because of the immense amount of capital invested in it, and because of our climatic conditions, which make our cost of production greater than that of our competitors. In 1924 we imported $45,000,000 worth of animals and animal products, and $186,000,000 worth of vegetables and agricultural products. Of these two classes we imported $113,000,000 worth from the United States alone, and I may add that $55,500,000 worth paid no duty at all, while the tariff on the balance was low and in many cases did not afford any protection whatever to our producers. Now, our exports of animals and animal products and of vegetables and agricultural products show conclusively that there is no scarcity of these commodities in this country. We exported $140,000,000 worth of animals and animal products, and $430,000,000 worth of vegetables and agricultural products. I think, Sir, that when we take into consideration that our exports of these two classes of commodities totalled $571,355,000, which is 57 per cent of all our exports, we must realize that our basic industry is deserving of every possible encouragement. I submit it is absolutely unfair that our producers should be forced to compete with similar products from other countries that have the advantage of mild climate and cheap labour.

The policy of the Liberal party, Mr. Speaker, during the last four years has resulted so far in driving out of Canada at least half a million Canadians. I am putting it low when I give that figure. This means a loss of home market to our farmers of at least 35,000,000 pounds of beef, 40,000,000 pounds of pork and 4,450,000 pounds of lamb and mutton, representing a total value of $16,300,000. That is what our farmers have lost in the diminished demand for those commodities alone by so many of our people being obliged to seek a livelihood in the States. In butter, cheese, poultry and eggs it means a loss of $13,500,000. That is, a loss of home market to our farmers by so many of our Canadians being forced to cross the line of at least $30,000,000, at wholesale prices; I believe we might add at least another $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 if we take retail prices. Surely, Sir when we consider that the total value of our dairy products in 1924 was $218,430,000, or $70,000,000 less than in 1920, we must realize that such a serious loss to our dairymen should have induced the government to tighten rather than loosen the restrictions against outside competition.

[Mr. J. W. Edwards.]

I have in my hand, Sir, a tabular statement showing by provinces the value of our dairy production and field crops for 1924, and with the permission of the House I should like to place it on Hansard, for I am sure it will be of interest to all hon. members:

Value by Provinces of Dairy Production and Field Crops—1924

	Value of Dairy Production	Value of all Field Crops
Prince Edward Island.. ..	$ 3,073,212	$ 11,990,400
Nova Scotia..	8,979,274	16,785,800
New Brunswick	7,119,861	16,080,000
Quebec..	65,925,135	139,359,000
Ontario..	87,075,286	260,534,000
Manitoba..	11,041,692	136,025,000
Saskatchewan..	17,566,406	237,310,000
Alberta..	12,584,065	159,759,700
British Columbia..	5,065,701	17,197,000
	$218,430,532	$995,235,900

In four years, 1920 to 1924, the production of milk in the prairie provinces increased by over 260,000,000 pounds, while their production of creamery butter increased in the same period by 86 per cent and of factory cheese by 351 per cent. Is this worth encouraging? Will the Australian and New Zealand treaties encourage mixed farming in the west?

It will be noted that the province of Ontario is first in the value of field crops, $260,535,000, and of dairy production, $87,075,286 With these facts confronting me, Mr. Speaker I would not be doing my duty if I did not rise in my place and enter my strong protest against these treaties. Might I ask the government to consider this phase? We have about half as many cattle as they have in Australia and New Zealand, and we have about one sheep to their thirty. The government of Australia bonuses the Australian farmer $2.40 for every carcass of beef exported. We cannot possibly produce cattle as cheaply as they can in Australia. I do not think there is a gentleman in this House who will dispute that statement. We cannot produce sheep as cheaply as they do, and by opening the doors of Canada to the meats from Australia and New Zealand, as we are doing by this half a cent a pound duty, I ask hon. gentlemen whether that will encourage our cattle and sheep men in the Dominion of Canada? In my judgment we are doing everything we possibly can do to discourage them. The same thing applies to poultry, fruits, and so forth. It is the principle of the thing that I object to.

I am very glad indeed to see by the statistics furnished by the government that dairying is making wonderful progress in the west, especially in Alberta in the last ten years, and very rapid progress in Saskatchewan particularly in the last five years. That is a good thing, and I say I am glad to see it. I know it has been advocated up and down this country in the press and by public men generally that the western farmers should go more into mixed farming; I believe it would be in their interests to do so, so that they would not be so much dependent on the grain crop as they are at present. I believe that farming is the great basic industry of this country and that it is deserving of every possible encouragement, not only because of climatic conditions, but because of this further fact, which is often lost sight of: many of our farm products are perishable and must be marketed within a limited time, and because of that fact proper transportation rates and every other possible encouragement should be given to those engaged in farming, particularly in view of the vast amount of money which has been invested in that industry. Climatic conditions are not so favourable to the farmer in this country as they are in Australia and New Zealand. I think the course taken by the government in these treaties was ill-advised and will result in very serious damage to mixed farming in this country; I believe it will discourage it in the west, where it ought to be encouraged. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, and because my own county is directly and materially interested, I register my protest against these treaties.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): Owing to an inherited and perhaps unfortunate directness of mind, Mr. Speaker, when I first spoke this session I omitted, much to my regret, the observance of one of the graceful amenities of parliament. I desire now to repair that omission by extending to you my heartiest congratulations upon your re-election as Speaker. Having had the privilege of sitting four years under your direction, I have a full and complete idea of your impartiality, of the dignity with which you maintain the office, and your observance of the best traditions of the speakership under British institutions. I think I may speak for the whole House in saying that it is highly gratifying that you have been able so far to sustain the heavy strain imposed upon you in the absence of the deputy, and in expressing the sincere hope that that happy state will prevail to the end of this debate.

If, Mr. Speaker, there is any form of the agricultural industry to which the government should pay particular attention it is in my judgment the dairy industry. The men who are engaged in that particular form of agriculture must work every day. The occupation is not a spasmodic one like grain growing; it calls for work early and late, seven days a week, and a constant measure of industry that is more exacting, I think, than that involved in any other branch of farming operations. It is more than that, Sir. The dairying industry is really an agricultural manufacturing concern, because the products of the dairy must go through certain manufacturing processes before they are marketed; and the dairy farmer is akin to the manufacturer in the city, both by the constancy of his employment and by the fact that he must manufacture the raw product which he himself produces.

If my argument is sound, Mr. Speaker, it must appear to be most unfortunate that this particular industry should be jeopardized by any treaty that this government could make. It is the business of a government to deal with and to protect impartially all classes of citizens; and there are some forms of agriculture which it is not easy for a government to protect. The growing of wheat is something that is not easily protected, although I think that might be done in this country now. For instance, an export duty on wheat that is exported in bond to be ground in the United States would react, I think, to the advantage of the farming community in Canada. But here is an industry—dairying—which the government could do a great deal to foster. It can protect these men who work harder than any other people, the men on the farm, from unfair competition either from Australia or from the United States, and in my judgment the argument that is based upon the protection of the dairy industry is just as sound as the argument in regard to any other industry.

I entirely agree with the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) who spoke this afternoon. He said that he wanted an equivalent tariff, an adequate tariff. Well, that was put into another phrase in the last parliament, one that struck me as being very suitable—a phrase used by an hon. member on the other side of the House. The then member for St. Lawrence-St. George argued for what he called a cost of living tariff. He wanted a tariff just high enough to enable the manufacturer of this country to live—not to exploit the consumer; not to reap excessive profits for himself, but to carry on his industry and give employment to the men he had engaged. That is the stand that this party takes, as far as I know its sentiments, with regard to the tariff. We want the factories of Canada to do business. We want to have them busy, for the sake of the men who work in them, for the sake of their wives and families, and for the general welfare of this country.

I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to direct any particular attention to the tariff, or to say anything more than I have said with regard to the dairy industry. I desire to draw the attention of the House to something different, something touched on by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Tolmie) the other day. I am not going to repeat his statistics, but I wish to draw the attention of this House to the scandalous indifference this government has shown towards the question of immigration. There is a clause in the Speech from the Throne setting out the purpose of the government now to adopt an energetic immigration programme. I should like my hon. friends opposite to tell me why they did not do that four years ago. If it is necessary now for this country to get immigration of the right type, it has been necessary for the last four years; and if steps had been taken even two years ago something substantial might have been accomplished by this time. But as we look over the immigration figures we are astounded to find that about as many people are leaving the country as are coming into it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: More.

Mr. HOCKEN: Or more. A country like this needs these people more than it needs anything else; indeed, practically all its problems will be solved if we can add substantially to its population. But what do we find? For three years there has been no Minister of Immigration. The hon. minister who had charge of that department was taken from his duties and made Acting Minister of Finance, and from the time that Mr. Fielding retired from the office of Finance minister, with the exception of a few months during which a general election was held, there has been no Minister of Immigration. I consider the Department of Immigration at the present time the most important department in the administration of the affairs of Canada. A great deal depends, of course, upon its successful management. If we had in charge of it a man with a broad outlook who could adopt a large policy, his efforts would result in making it easy for the Finance minister, because a million or more of population will certainly reduce taxation, will make it easier to balance the budget, will eliminate the deficit from the National Railways, and will restore the country to the state of prosperity which existed in Canada in 1913 and 1914, just before the war. It was during those years we had the largest measure of immigration. If you take the figures for 1911, 1912, 1913 and 1914 you will find we had almost a million and a half immigrants in those four years. If you take any other four years since 1885, you will see that they do not compare with that period. So that I attribute the present state of affairs with regard to immigration to the failure of the government to recognize the importance of that department. They took from it a capable minister and put upon him the heaviest duties I think any minister has to perform at any time, leaving that department without any head, the administration of it being in the hands of the deputy minister and other officials.

This state of affairs is most unfortunate, particularly in view of the fact that the Imperial government, which is really anxious to assist in immigration to Canada as well as to Australia and New Zealand, have appropriated for that purpose fifteen million dollars a year for three years. That is a large sum, but, as they have stated over and over again, they stand ready with organization and with money to co-operate with the Dominion of Canada to fill up our vacant spaces and to relieve the over-population of the Old Land. Could we get any immigration quite so valuable to us as that from the British Isles? I submit that that is the very best we can get, because those people understand what it is to live under British institutions; they are not strangers to our form of government, our manner of living or our processes of business. Therefore I hold that every possible effort should be made, and should have been made in the past, to bring into this country a very heavy influx of people from the over-populated British Isles.

The problem, Sir, is fundamental to the prosperity of Canada, but although that fact has been emphasized by some of the most prominent and outstanding men in our public life, the government has done nothing. I understand that the Deputy Minister of Immigration is now in Europe formulating some plan. That visit is four years overdue. Had this question been regarded as fundamental to our prosperity four years ago, I venture to think we would have had half a million, if not a million, more people in Canada than we have, thus creating business for our railways, our banks, our merchants and our farmers. So that the dereliction of duty in that regard is one for which the government in my judgment is heartily to be condemned.

The hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Tolmie) the other day quoted some remarks of Sir Henry Thornton, Sir Thomas White and others. As far back as September, 1924, I heard Sir Henry Thornton deliver an address at the National Exposition in Toronto and he then brought to my mind the supreme importance of the question of immigration. He said that he thought a man of the highest capability in Canada should be selected as Minister of Immigration and that he should not be hampered by government, by any red tape or anything of that kind, but should be assisted by government and should have practically a free hand to carry out policies for filling up this country. Sir Thomas White has been going about making addresses on this subject, and Mr. Corless of the Mond Nickel Company, another man of some importance in Canada, has been addressing Canadian clubs and similar organizations, bringing to the attention of the public the absolute necessity of an energetic immigration policy. I hope Mr. Corless and Sir Thomas White will continue their propaganda, and I hope Sir Henry Thornton will continue to point out to the people of this country that if they want the deficit of the National railways removed, they must fill up our vacant spaces.

It is true some little work has been done in this regard. For instance, several hundreds of immigrants were taken from the Hebrides to Alberta; but I question the judgment of taking those people to that particuar spot, because they come from a country where fishing and farming run together as they do pretty well in our Maritime provinces. I think the place for the Hebrideans was New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, or Prince Edward Island. There they would have had a climate very much like their own and physical conditions almost identical with those they had left, and I believe they would have felt more at home on the great stretches of sea, lakes and bays down there than away out on our vast prairies. As a matter of fact, a good many of them have left the prairies and gone to British Columbia. Some will remain there and, I have no doubt, will make good. But the only real plan that has had effective support from this government has, in my judgment, been wrongly directed. I do not know why the Immigration department should take men two thousand miles past vacant farm lands for which they are well adapted into a country for which they are not adapted; I question the wisdom of the department in that regard.

Of course a government department will function without a minister; and we have had proof of that in regard to immigration, but no government department can function properly and efficiently without a minister. It is to the man at the head of a department that the officials look for a lead; they must look to him for the formulation of policies, and he must be a man who feels a sense of responsibility to this House and to the country before such a department can function efficiently. A department that is left for three years in the hands of officials must inevitably drift into a condition of routine. Officials necessarily follow routine methods; it is not their business to formulate policies. Indeed I presume—without having an adequate knowledge, as I have never been a civil servant—that civil servants who formulate policies and try to put them into effect of their own initiative are likely to get into trouble. If they want to be safe they will go along the smooth and easy way, and that seems to have been the one adopted by officials of the Immigration department.

As I said, a minister has a sense of responsibility. Without that no man is going to accomplish very much; the more keenly he feels his responsibility the better public servant he will be. Let a man take hold of any department and feel that the country and parliament are looking to him to administer that department successfully, and he will be inspired with a desire to put forth his best efforts to make his department highly efficient. My remarks apply to the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) only so far as he is a member of the administration; but here we are to-day, five years from the time this government was elected, without having had that department effectively and efficiently organized and, for the last three years and at the present time, without its having a minister at all. My hon. friend the other day, when asked certain questions, was unable to answer them. I am not surprised at that, because he is an acting minister with a very heavy department to administer in the Department of the Interior. I am sure he is doing the best he can, but the fault lies with the administration as a whole that they should allow this exceedingly important department to function without the directing mind and hand of a responsible minister.

It should have been and was possible during the past four years to have all the provincial governments co-operating with this government in some well considered plan for the settlement of our vacant areas. I am quite sure that the premiers of Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Manitoba, Ontario and the eastern provinces would have been more than delighted to confer with a minister of immigration who had any large and presumably profitable scheme to lay before them. There is no province in Canada that is not anxious to get larger settlement, and every provincial government that we have stands ready now and has been ready for the past four years to co-operate with this government in carrying out work of that character. There are many ways in which this might be done. I read recently a proposal made by General Crichtley, of Calgary, that a small community might be taken from some particular county in England and Scotland, brought out here as a body, and placed all together in one of our provinces. They would be living with their neighbours; they would not suffer from that homesickness which is a very difficult thing to overcome during the first few years that people enter into a new land, and they would settle down to form a new community working together and doing their part to build up Canada. That is only one of many plans that might be suggested.

In Ontario—and I speak of it because it is my own province and I know more about it —there are between three and four thousand. probably five thousand, vacant farms. Anyway I am well within the mark if I say there are four thousand farms that are vacant or will soon become so by reason of the increasing age of the owners. Their children have gone west and have settled there. The old folks were left at home when they were vigorous, but age has crept upon them and they are no longer able to carry on agricultural operations. Thousands of these farms can be sold for the value of the buildings that are on them. A well considered plan by this government in co-operation with the Imperial government could plant from 3,000 to 5,000 families in Ontario alone and start a movement for the further settlement of the western prairies subsequently by drawing upon central Canada. For how were the prairies first settled? The backbone of the first settlement of the prairies came from Ontario; the best blood of the west had its source in that province. It was the young men and young women, the adventurous and the enterprising, who went out from that part of the country to settle the west. No province has contributed more to the prosperity of western Canada than Ontario has done. Ontario gave the west something more than money; it gave them breed and blood, brawn and brains.

Mr. CAMPBELL: My hon. friend must not overlook the Maritime provinces.

Mr. HOCKEN: I was about to point out that while in my opinion Ontario did rather more for the west than any other part of the country, the eastern provinces have nevertheless contributed their share to the building-up of western Canada. But now it is time that these vacant farms in Ontario were filled up. This would be possible if we had a Minister of Immigration, with a well thought out plan of co-operation between this government and the imperial authorities, and I venture to say that for the west nothing better could be done than what I now propose. From these farms in Ontario would go young men and young women properly trained in farming operations and in every other way fitted to take their part in western life.

There is another aspect of the question which I shall touch upon, but before I do so I want to read to the House what the Prince of Wales has had to say on the subject of immigration. We all regard His Royal Highness as a young man of considerable ability, and I do not think that I am going too far when I say that perhaps he is the most outstanding advocate of empire settlement to be found anywhere in the British Empire. He has travelled the empire and he knows it better than any of us. He has been to Australia, South Africa and Canada more than once and he realizes the necessity for filling up this country for our own sakes and at the same time with a view to contributing to the relief of the Motherland. Some time ago there was held in London, England, what was known as Australian and New Zealand Day, and at a meeting called for the purpose the question of immigration was discussed. Have we had a Canadian Day in London to discuss the same subject? If we have I have never heard of it. The governments of Australia and of New Zealand have taken this method of arousing interest in the Old Land in order to secure the very best kind of settlers for their country. Why has not Canada done the same thing? Why should not Canada hold a Canadian Day in London? Will Canada do so now? I should like to see this government adopt the modern methods of attracting attention and securing publicity with the object of spreading a knowledge of the advantages of this Dominion. On the occasion of which I speak the Prince of Wales said in part:

A Vital Problem

I am also very interested in the question, which is of comparatively modern development, of the settlement of children. In my travels I have never seen finer or happier children than in the outlying parts of the Empire, but there are not enough of them. The Child Emigration Society is helping this on, and I remember your Premier, Mr. Bruce, speaking very favourably of that society at a luncheon last year. The society, which works in conjunction with the Kingsley Fairbridge School in Western Australia, is training 200 children from our big cities on a fine farm to be good citizens of the Commonwealth. I understand the society aims at sending 100 more children. Then New Zealand has a fine institution, the New Zealand Sheep Owners' Society, providing training for boys and girls from the Old Country whose fathers were killed in the war. These I am mentioning are just a few, and up to now I seem only to have been talking of men and boys, but women have also a big part to play in Empire Settlement. Group settlement is one of the best schemes, and it has been given a good start in Western Australia. The help of the wives is vital to the husbands in many cases. I hope the right men and women will be encouraged to help to populate the empty spaces of the Commonwealth. My remarks merely scratch this great subject which provides a problem as wide and intricate and as vital as any of the multitude which face us to-day. But to anyone who has travelled, it cannot fail to appeal and to interest. Most of you are travellers, and I hope you share my interest, and if so, you ought to share my optimism, because it is that that wins through in the long run. We have a very long way to go indeed in the matter of Empire Settlement, but we have made a start since the Armistice seven years ago. We have made progress, and I look forward to the day when we may smile at the obstacles which now seem insurmountable.

I wish His Royal Highness had been able to tell of training farms in Canada where hundreds of boys from the British Isles could be trained in agricultural pursuits and taught to love the land, as boys will love it if you get them early enough and imbue them with a desire to stay on the farm and develop into a fine type of agriculturist. I notice in to-day's Ottawa Citizen another plan which has been adopted by Australia but not, so far as I know, by this Dominion. I quote from the article in question:

A training school for Australian farmers has been established at Lynford Hall, in Norfolk, a fine old English mansion. Through this establishment, it is hoped to prepare the younger British men who have capital to invest. The training course lasts six months, and is to cost each pupil £100. It is a condition of the scheme that everyone who takes advantage of it should be prepared to pay his own way to Australia and to get there with at least £250 in his pocket. This means that he must have at his disposal not less than £425. He will then be given a farm of 160 acres and the right to a state loan of £750 to help him develop it.

Australia is thus making a strong bid for British university men and settlers who start with the advantages of an English public school education. The commonwealth is endeavoring to attract a stream of migrants who may be exceptionally qualified to take a useful part in the intellectual as well as the material development of the country. A career of wonderful possibility is offered to the educated settler.

This indicates to me that the Commonwealth of Australia is much more alive to the advantages that will accrue from an increased population than is Canada, and I venture to assert that the need of population is not so great in the Commonwealth of Australia as it is in this country, for the various reasons which I have indicated.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another phase of immigration to which I would direct the attention of the House, and if possible persuade the government to make a change in what I regard as a very vicious regulation. As stated by the Acting Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart) the other day in answer to my question, early in April last year, when there was no minister of the department, a regulation was put into effect by, I presume, the officials, having all the virtue—if there is any—and all the authority not only of a minister but of parliament. This regulation prohibits voluntary immigration societies bringing to this country children under fourteen years of age. For forty years these societies have been bringing out children ranging in age from eight to ten years and upwards, and in all that period I am told there has been not more than two per cent of failures. Could there be any better type of immigration than children? The argument of the department is that children should not be brought out here until they have had a public school education. I take issue with that, Sir. I say it is much better to have a child educated in Canadian schools than to bring it out here after it has received its education in British schools. A child from six to fourteen is in its most impressionable years, and we can make it a good Canadian much more effectively during this period than after it has had its primary school education in England.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. gentleman if he is aware of the reports made by the Child Welfare officials both of the Dominion and of Ontario?

Mr. HOCKEN: I am, and I will deal with them. The regulation I object to was put into effect as the result of a report made by Miss Bondfield. She apparently was acting upon the theory that the care of young children is more difficult than that of older children. Perhaps it is; I am not prepared to dispute it; in fact I am rather inclined to concede the point. But I would remind the House that these children are the wards of a society which watches them in their home life, their school life and their working life until they are eighteen years of age. Therefore I submit that the earlier a child comes to this country the better.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman, I take it, is aware that the reports tend to show that the guardianship was anything but adequate, and that a number of young children were horribly overworked?

Mr. HOCKEN: I did not so read the report, and I think my hon. friend is exaggerating a little. There was no substantial proof that any large number of these young children had not been properly taken care of. Miss Bondfield's report has simply been an excuse for the officials of the department to put the regulation into effect at a time when there was no minister in charge of the department, as there ought to have been. That is the gravamen of my charge against the government.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend in the thread of his argument, neither do I wish to enter into controversy with him whether or not children should come to Canada under fourteen years of age; but if he will allow me, I might explain that when I was minister of the department, while in England I met the Overseas Settlement Board. Miss Bondfield was then a member of the British government. A campaign was being carried on in the British press against the sending of young children to Canada, on account of reports received in England regarding the treatment of certain orphans placed in homes in Ontario. We wanted to bring the government and the people of Great Britain to a more favourable attitude towards Canada as a desirable country for immigrants. We therefore invited Miss Bondfield with a member of her committee to visit the Dominion, and we promised to place at her disposal the services of the department to assist her in visiting the homes in which these children had been placed. It was out of regard for her recommendation, endorsed by the Child Welfare Association of Ontario, that I approved of the regulation that children should not be brought to Canada until they were fourteen years of age.

Mr. HOCKEN: Well, Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend and the government accept responsibility for the regulation, my criticism must be levelled at them. I say they are absolutely wrong in prohibiting the immigration of children younger than fourteen years of age. Allow me to cite the experience of the Barnardo Home, an organization which has brought out to this country 28,000 boys and girls during the last forty years, with less than two per cent of failures. That organization has also sent out during that period 99,500 children to the various dominions—

Australia, New Zealand and Canada. Some of those children to-day are occupying prominent positions in this country. I know them, and they are proud to acknowledge that they came out under the auspices of the Barnardo Home. The operations of that institution have been seriously hampered by this regulation. I may tell the House that there is no more carefully selected immigrants than those who come here under the auspices of the Barnardo Home.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, may I ask whether the hon. gentleman has read the report of the general hospital board of the city of Toronto with regard to the Barnardo children that passed through their hands?

Mr. HOCKEN: No, I have not had the privilege of reading that report. Mr. Speaker, in the earliest stages of its operations Dr. Barnardo drew up a set of rules, which I am informed have been rigidly adhered to ever since. These rules are:

(1) That no child shall be sent out manifesting criminal or vicious tastes.

(2) That no child is to be sent out who is not at the time in excellent health and without tendency to disease.

(3) That all such children must have been passed through a period of the most careful training, not only in industrial pursuits but also of moral and religious character.

(4) And as regards all children who come up to the standard of the three previous conditions, only the flower of our flocks are to be sent to Canada.

(5) That upon reaching Canada all children are to come under the care of properly qualified persons connected with our institution on the Canadian side, by whom they are to be distributed carefully into well selected homes. And even then our work is not to be considered complete but regular communication shall be maintained with these children for years by personal visitation of experienced assistants, and by a system of written reports from the child and its employer. That careful statistics shall be kept showing frequent reports of their whereabouts, progress and general welfare, until they have reached an age when they no longer require our supervising care.

(6) That, if in spite of all these tests, precautions and safe-guards it should be found by experience that some particular child, after having been placed out in Canada becomes definitely immoral or criminal that every legitimate means are to be adopted to recover possession of that child and to return him or her at the earliest opportunity to the Old Country.

That is the policy which I am informed has been followed by the Barnardo officials in the Dominion of Canada. They have placed these 28,000 boys and girls almost entirely upon the farm. Most of these children have gone to school in Canada. They have gone into homes in this country to be treated as one of the family, and how infinitely better that is for the child than to be put into an institution of any kind. I have heard men argue that a child whose parents are wicked, if brought up in a home as one of the family, has a better chance than a child brought up in an institution, and I am very much inclined to agree with that. The taint of institutionalism upon a child trained in an institution is something from which it is very difficult for the child to escape, if it ever escapes; but brought up in a home as one of the family and engaging in all the avocations of the family doing the farm work or whatever it may be, the child grows up as a normal young Canadian, with Canadian ideals and Canadian aspirations, and enters upon our life as if it were native-born. There are 3,500 of these boys and girls in Ontario to-day, and the society claims that every one of them is making good. In addition to that, there are known to the managers of the Home and still in touch with them 8,000 older members of the Barnardo family in Ontario. And the wonderful thing, Mr. Speaker, is not that so many of these children have succeeded, but that so few of them have failed; for it is on record—I believe upon the records of the statiticians of our own government—that less than two per cent of these children have failed to make good.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not like to interrupt but I should like to ask where that is on file in the statistics of this country.

Mr. HOCKEN: I will find that out and let my hon. friend know.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should be very glad to see those statistics.

Mr. HOCKEN: I want to give the House some idea of how a party of these children who set sail for Canada is chosen. I am arguing, Sir, for the removal of this restriction. I am arguing that these voluntary societies which have made good should be allowed to continue to bring out children in order to place them in homes in this country and have them brought up as young Canadians.

Here is what happens in the process of selection: On the child being put forward for Canada—and this is never done without the full consent of the child and its next of kin—if it is found that the father or mother has been insane or that the health, mentality or moral state of the child is unsatisfactory, it is not proposed for emigration. If it has been known to be dishonest, untruthful or is mentally backward, it is not allowed to go. Many a time the officers of the society have examined 200 young children to find only 75 suitable for Canada, only 75 who would come up to the standard set for entrance to the Dominion of Canada. Then before these children leave England they have to go before a committee which is presided over by the medical director of the Barnardo Home. This committee considers first the report from its own medical officer, then the family history of the child, then the dossier card giving a record of the health and mentality of the child during its residence in the home, and a certificate of character supplied by the superintendent of the home in which the child has resided. Now that is pretty careful selection. You cannot get as careful selection as that when you get into the adult class.

Then, after the selection is made, all the papers referred to have to go before the Canadian authorities for their examination, and finally the child has to be passed by the Canadian officers and other officials.

To give you some idea of the type of young Canadians these Barnardo boys have been, I may tell the House that when the Great war broke out, 6,385 of them enlisted to fight in France for the defence of France and of the Empire. I do not know, Sir, what better test could be applied than that. Children who come out here at a tender age, who grow up as young Canadians, and who are prepared to go out and face what they did face in the big war, must certainly be considered among the very cream of our population, and it is to their credit that over 6,000 of them went out and did their bit. Many of them were on farms when the war broke out, and they gave up their farms, either rented them or left them as best they could. Some of them came back to find their farms in a very sad state, and some of them did not come back at all. That is the product of the Barnardo Home, and I say to the House that if the minister finds it desirable to place a limit of fourteen years upon the age of children brought out by societies that do not take care of the children they bring out, that limit should not be applied to a society that does take care of its children and that is doing as much as the Barnardo Home is doing to populate this country, and populate it with the very best kind of people we can have.

I am trying Mr. Speaker, to make a defence of the Barnardo Home. I think the Barnardo Home has been unfairly and unjustly treated. I want to quote what the Rev. Canon Cody of Toronto says. Those who know Canon Cody —and he is pretty well known in this country —will place the utmost reliance upon what he says. Speaking to Mr. Percy Roberts, the chief migration officer of the society, Dr. Cody said:

We want your young people. Their failures compared with their wonderful successes are negligible. Compare them with the same number of other people who come to Canada—there is no comparison. They grow up in the country and they grow into the community. We want your children ninety-nine per cent of Canadians will agree with me.

There is the statement of a man who is deeply immersed in questions of this kind, one of the moral and religious leaders of the province of Ontario, a man not given to making hasty statements, a man careful in all he says, a man whose word is taken wherever he is known or wherever his reputation has gone. But there is not only Canon Cody. I would submit to the House the reports of the Department of Immigration and Colonization of this government, and we have those reports right down to the present day, all approving of this kind of immigration. The report of the Department of Immigration and Colonization for 1920-21 says:

The interest of Canadians and the children were shown in various ways:

(1) By the cordial welcome given to them on their arrival.

(2) By the continuous and extraordinary requests for their services received from all parts of the Dominion.

(3) The profound interest shown in their welfare, treatment and success.

(4) The general popularity of the movement as a source of supply of farm and domestic help.

(5) Favourable press notices and widespread desire that the work, as conducted under the present auspices and departmental regulations—

That was before April, 1925.

—should rceive the utmost encouragement and sympathy as the result of its immense national and economic importance.

Those are the words of the officials of the Immigration and Colonization department, and in the same report it is stated that there were 581 children sent out by the Barnardo Home that year, and for these there were 13,398 applications. That would indicate to any reasonable person that these children coming out at the tender age of which I spoke, but whose coming is now prohibited, are very much wanted by the men and women in the rural districts of Canada. The demand comes from practically every province in Canada, although there are more of them in Ontario than in any other province. I quote the report further. Speaking of the whole of the children brought out, not only the Barnardo children but others, it says:

The children were generally found contented and well settled, and a very small, number, comparatively, changed situations or had to be recalled on account of faulty traits of character on their own part or during the year.

Let me quote just a paragraph from the report of the department in 1922. The statement is there made:

That the readiness with which the services of these children are sought is conclusive proof of their general adaptability for agricultural employment. In the last twenty-three years the extent of the demand for these young immigrants is shown by the following figures: From 1900 to March 31, 1923, inclusive, 38,589 children were received. And for the same period 451,680 applications were received.

It will be observed by the members of the House that the supply is only seven per cent of the demand for these young children, and two per cent, it is said, are failures. I want to bring the question right down to the present report which was tabled by the minister the other day. It will be found on page 71 of the Immigration and Colonization report. The director of that branch of immigration says:

It must not be supposed that all the children referred to in this report are perfect models of the human kind. They are just like ordinary boys and girls, although by training and strict discipline of the schools whence they originally came—

And this is the clause I would like to impress upon the minds of the members of the House.

—they certainly compare favourably with our own Canadian children.

Why should we hesitate, Mr. Speaker, to bring to this country young children who favourably compare with our own Canadian children?

The report goes on to say:

The department through its inspectors, receives definite information, not ony regarding the care and treatment of the child by his employer, but also concerning the child's development, and when failure or unsuitability is established deportation follows. It is gratifying, however, to be able to report that deportations from the ranks of our British juvenile immigrants are comparatively few.

These are the statements of the officials of our own government. They are the men who are in daily contact with the juvenile immigrants, the men who know what every voluntary child immigration society is doing. Do you mean to say, Mr. Speaker, they would put such a statement as that on the record if they were not well within the facts; if these children had not proved—I was going to say to the extent of 98 per cent at least —suitable immigrants to this country?

I have argued here before, and I should like to repeat, that of all classes of immigrants the most desirable for this country are the young people. We have an organization in Montreal called The British Immigration Aid Society. They aim to bring out boys and girls under twenty years of age. As nearly as possible they bring them out at sixteen years of age. Before a boy leaves the Old Country his parents know where he is going; they know the name of the farmer he is going to; they know his post office address; they are in communication with him from the day he lands in this country, and he is in communication with them if he so desires. I say that is the best kind of immigration that can be had in Canada. I would not settle down to that class and neglect other classes, however. I would bring in every suitable adult we can get. If I were in charge of the immigration propaganda I would say to these people: "You cannot come to Canada and pick up money. There is no use in your coming unless you are willing to work; but every young man who is able and willing to work can get a competence in the Dominion of Canada before he is fifty years of age." But the introduction into this country of boys and girls is the best thing we can do; and instead of discouraging that movement, as this regulation does, we should go to the other extreme. We should assist every voluntary organization that is spending its own money, that is doing its own part in bringing settlers into Canada who will make good. Therefore I ask the government, I ask the Minister of Finance, I ask the Acting Minister of Immigration, to reconsider this regulation excluding children under fourteen years of age. If it is necessary to discriminate between different organizations, all right; but those organizations which are bringing children in, which are taking care of them and turning them into good young Canadian citizens, surely ought to be encouraged, not discouraged; because nothing better can be done for Canada.

As I said at the outset, this is the largest problem which confronts Canada to-day. I will venture to say that when the government changes—and that is an event not very far distant—you will find at the head of the immigration department some outstanding man, who perhaps is not in politics at all to-day—some man such as described by Sir Henry Thornton, who, because of his outstanding capacity, his courage, his vision of the needs and future of this country, will gain for himself the confidence of the whole population. I appeal again to the minister to wipe out this unfair and discouraging regulation and to let these young children come in to be citizens of our country.

I should like to say one other word before I close. I have listened to my hon. friends from the Maritime provinces air their grievances, and I want to express my sympathies with them. They have put their case before this House. Sir, in forceful language, but in a way that I am sure has commanded the attention and excited the sympathy of every hon. member. I know that in speaking as I do I can speak for the people of Ontario. That province has prospered more as a result of confederation than the Maritime provinces have, and almost as much as the western provinces have. Its people are alive to the importance of solving the problems that face us, and are willing to do everything in their power to bring together, by any means that will work out as a suitable national solution, those provinces that are geographically widely separated.

I point out to hon. gentlemen from the Maritime provinces that the Premier of Ontario has been working diligently to create a bond in trade with the province of Alberta. If it is possible we want the people of the whole province of Ontario to burn Alberta and Maritime province coal. I am not so sure that a solution has not been found for the Alberta situation. If we can get a $7 freight rate—and I do not see that there is any insuperable obstacle in the way——we shall free ourselves from the domination of Pennsylvania in the central provinces of this country in respect to coal. If we can do that in the case of far-off Alberta, it surely can be done in the case of nearby Nova Scotia. And if the two great central provinces, where industry is largely centered at the present time—but where it is not going to remain, because industry is bound to be established in equal measure in the provinces of the west—can by co-operation with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in the east and with Alberta in the west create a bond of trade aggregating $100,000,000 a year, it will do more to bring about a feeling of unity in this Dominion than anything else that I can suggest.

I heard one hon. member say: "We are not talking secession or anything of that kind." No, Mr. Speaker, they talk as true, red-blooded Canadians, bound to stand by this Dominion and to solve its difficulties. For there must be a way of solving those difficulties by working unitedly and making of this country what it is capable of being made and what it is destined by Providence to be, one of the greatest nations on the face of the earth.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): During the last six weeks, Mr. Speaker, I have been frequently reminded of an incident recorded in that very readable book, Dean Ramsay's Reminiscences of Scottish Life and Character. It was formerly the custom of ministers to preach a sermon two hours long in the morning, and, to avoid the necessity of the congregation having to go home and return again in the evening, the minister would proceed and preach for another two hours. On one occasion a little girl who was with her grandmother sat patiently listening to the sermon for the first two hours, but when the second sermon was started she was getting rather hungry, so she said, "Granny, come alang hame, this is a lang grace and nae meat." So that I would be disposed to think that we have had a "lang grace" for the last six weeks, and if the meat is to be judged by the amount of actual good accomplished in the country it must be reckoned very small.

Before proceeding to discuss the motion before the House, I wish to make some reference to certain remarks of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley). I listened with a good deal of interest to the speech of the hon. member for Pictou when he was presenting to the House the question of Maritime rights. I have been honestly anxious to get the Maritime point of view. Sometimes I think our Maritime friends have confused the general difficulties of Canada, if there be such, with those which are peculiar to the Maritimes. I would like to concede to them a right for which the members at present representing the Maritime provinces seem to have made no demand, namely, the right to trade more freely with the world. I think if they would recognize that right and assert it, we in the west would be willing to concede it to them, and that would go a very long way towards solving their difficulties. It would bring trade to Canadian ports and would bring about a state of prosperity in those provinces which they have not enjoyed for many years.

As I stated, I was interested and anxious to get the Maritime point of view. I gave proof of that when the hon. member for Pictou was speaking by moving to the other side of the chamber, in order that I might face him and thus be able to hear more correctly what he was saying. When the hon. member was depicting the railway situation and showing the prevailing rates between one part of Canada and another, I did feel that on questions of railway rates they had some cause for complaint, and that they were not being given those rates which would enable them to compete with the United States in the movement of coal. At that point I had a good deal of sympathy with the claims of the Maritime provinces, but as the hon. member went on with his speech I began to lose some of my sympathy for him and his cause, when he advanced an argument which seemed to me to be absolutely unsound. I wish to place before the House something of the point of view of the west with regard to this matter. This involves the question of the natural resources of the Dominion and the position that the western provinces occupy in this Dominion. The hon. gentleman on that occasion said:

> As to what Nova Scotia as one of the original partners in confederation paid into the common fund of the Dominion, Mr. Speaker, within a few years of the confederation of the four original provinces into the Dominion of Canada the Hudson's Bay Company's interests were bought out for the sum of £300,000 sterling and other considerations. This purchase, the cost of the organization of the territory then acquired, the establishment of government, surveying, policing of the immense territory, the building of the Canadian Pacific railway, in short, all that was necessary to make a civilized and habitable settled country of the northwest, was done at the joint cost of the four original partners in confederation, who later agreed to build the Canadian Pacific railway as the inducement to British Columbia to join.

I wish to take exception to the statement that all this was done at the joint expense of the four original partners in the confederation. When the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company in Rupert's Land were extinguished, an arrangement was made with the British government that that should be done by the payment of £300,000. It was provided in the Rupert's Land Act by the Imperial parliament in 1868 that the extinguishment of those rights should impose no burden upon the consolidated funds of the Imperial government. That made it necessary that, if the provisions of the British North America Act were to be carried out and if Rupert's Land and the Northwest Territories were to come into the Dominion of Canada, that monetary obligation should be assumed by Canada. That was done, and an arrangement was entered into under which British bankers advanced the money to the Canadian government under a guarantee by the British government. The terms of that loan were that the principal should be repaid in the year 1904. I looked up the public records in regard to the national debt for the year 1904, and I found that in that year a certain amount of it was redeemed. These were the items:

Intercolonial railway loan, 5 per cent, $2,433,334.34.

I wish our Maritime friends to remember this. This was the Intercolonial, paid for by Canada, or to be paid for by Canada. The other items are:

Intercolonial Railway loan, 4 per cent, $7,300,000.
Rupert's Land loan, 4 per cent, $1,460,000.

That is the £300,000.

Loan of 1876, 4 per cent..	$7,300,000 00
Temporary loan..	3,893,333 33
Loan of 1883, 4 per cent..	1,377,400 00
Dominion stock B., 3½ per cent.. ..	128,300 00
Dominion stock, 1901, 3½ per cent.. ..	3,200 00
Total..	$23,795,566 67

That is, there was redeemed of the public debt that year, $23,795,566.67, and the Rupert's Land loan of $1,460,000 was one of the items. Now how was this debt redeemed? I put the question to the Finance minister and have not received the answer as to the exact form in which the matter was handled at that time, but naturally it would be redeemed in one of two ways: either that amount of debt was paid out of surplus revenue of 1904, or it was paid through some refunding operation and the whole amount carried on into the general debt of Canada. It does not make any difference which way it was paid; if the first, it was extinguished by the people of Canada, and if the second, it still forms part of the debt of Canada and either has been paid or is to be paid by Manitoba and the western provinces just as well as by Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec. I wish hon. members from the east would try to get our point of view on this matter. The statement that this and other matters were paid for by the four original provinces has no foundation in fact. It was paid for as well by Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, which entered the confederation after the province of Manitoba did; the people of those provinces have assumed their share of the burden just as much as have the people of the four original provinces.

But supposing that for the purpose of the argument we grant this fiction of a purchase. What was it that was purchased? I said that the claims of the Hudson's Bay Company to Rupert's Land were extinguished by the payment of £300,000. What was Rupert's Land? I had occasion to look up an old map dated 1856 which I found in one of the departments, and on it was shown the territory claimed by the Hudson's Bay Company. In the Rupert's Land Act of 1868 to which I refer, Rupert's Land was defined for the purposes of that act as all territory held or claimed to be held by the Hudson's Bay Company. What was it they claimed to hold? According to this map, we begin up at the east at Cape Chidley; we come up the height of land between the waters flowing into the Hudson bay and the St. Lawrence river, through the province of Quebec, through the province of Ontario, following the height of land down to the lake of the Woods to the American boundary. Originally it went to the headwaters of the Red river, but a settlement was made with the United States prior to that, and the boundary line runs straight along the 49th parallel. Then it follows the international boundary to the Rocky mountains, turns north to the head waters of the Saskatchewan river, to the height of land between the Mackenzie and the Saskatchewan systems, and out northeast along the height of land between the waters flowing into the Arctic and the waters flowing into the Hudson bay.

What has since happened to that great territory? A large portion of it is now a portion of the provinces of Quebec and Ontario—and this is a point we must deal with when we come to discuss the question of natural resources. That portion of Rupert's Land and the natural resources contained in it were handed over to those provinces to be administered in the interest, not of the Dominion, but of those provinces. I intended to point out that when British Columbia entered the confederation the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company in that province were extinguished by the British government, and the natural resources of that province were all handed over to the British Columbia government for the benefit, not of the British government, but of the province, as they should have been. A slightly different arrangement was made with Prince Edward Island. Thus the prairie provinces have been placed on an entirely different footing from the other provinces, and even if we admit the fiction of the purchase of Rupert's Land for £300,000, we must remember that a very large proportion of that land has been handed over already, as I have said, to Ontario and Quebec. Therefore, even on that score we are not to be charged with the whole amount of the £300,000, and certainly with not more than a proportion. But we do not admit the point at all.

We listened with a good deal of interest to the hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken). Of course, we admit that Ontario gave her best to the west; we admit that just as readily as we will admit that Great Britain gave much of her best to build up Canada and the United States. At the same time we do not like to have it cast up to us that we are in an inferior position, and that is just the grievance that we have against eastern people. They insist on treating us as though we were still in a colonial position. It is the attitude of mind that so many eastern people have toward this question that we in the west so strongly object to. I have not discussed this question at any great length; I have only touched upon it briefly, but I would like to suggest these points to eastern members.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Where does the hon. member find any expression of that attitude of mind on the part of the east towards the west?

Mr. BROWN: In the claim of the east that for the sum of £300,000 they bought out all our territory, and on that claim they base their right to administer those lands and resources for the welfare of the Dominion rather than in the interest of the provinces.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Again I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he regards that as an expression of a feeling of superiority on the part of the east towards the west?

Mr. BROWN: It is placing us of the west in a colonial position. It is the same attitude that was assumed by the British government in former days toward all their colonies when they insisted on administering the natural resources of the colonies for the benefit of the Mother Country rather than for the benefit of the colonies themselves.

Mr. CHABOT: Who built the Canadian Pacific railway?

Mr. BROWN: I must have failed completely in my endeavour to point out that whatever has been done for the west has been done at the cost of the whole of the people of Canada and not at the cost of the people of the four original provinces. So much for that matter; I shall not dwell on it any longer.

I wish to refer briefly to the question that is more immediately before the House. Our hon. friends to our right have been putting forward one amendment after another, something that they thought was a glittering bauble which they believed we would be very ready to jump at. I cannot but be reminded of picking berries in the berry patch in our old school days, when the children would run here and there. Someone would call out: "Here is a good patch," and they would run off. Then another would shout: "here is another good patch," and the children would be running here and there while the older people were filling their baskets. I have thought my hon. friends have been trying to treat us as children by saying to us: "Never mind the Speech from the Throne; here is something good for you." Of course many of them admit it is good, but they say: "Here is something better," and they expect us to run after that.

The dairy industry is a matter of supreme importance to the people of Canada and no one realizes that more than do those who are in this corner of the House. We know all about it by personal experience, for when we are at home we have to milk the cows and do what is necessary in helping to promote the dairy industry of the country. I voted against the Australian treaty when it was before the House in the last parliament, and it is because I recognize the tremendous importance of that industry and of the treaty that deals with it, as well as with some other matters, that I object to dealing with it as a side issue—to having it put before me as an alternative for something else; because that is what this amounts to.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), when it was said that he had endorsed the Speech from the Throne, denied that, of course, as he had a perfect right to do. But are we to conclude that he and those who sit around him are not in favour of those things which are promised in the Speech from the Throne? If we are to come to that conclusion, then I am right in saying that this amendment is placed before us as an alternative, and for my part I do not intend to accept it as an alternative to those things which are promised us in the Speech from the Throne. When the matter itself comes before the House, if it comes before us and we deal with it on its merits, I shall be only too happy to try to deal with it in a way that best meets the needs of the people of Canada. I believe however that the injury wrought to the dairy industry by that treaty has been rather over emphasized. If hon. members would content themselves with saying that during the period of the year when Canada is not on an export basis in the matter of dairy products some injury may be done to the producer, I might be disposed to agree with them to some extent. But when the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) goes so far as to declare that the price of all the butter that is produced in Canada and of all that is exported, as well as of what is sold in the home market is lowered during the entire year to the extent of the reduction that has been made in the tariff through the Australian treaty, then I must most emphatically dissent, for I cannot follow his argument in any degree. During that period of the year when Canada is on an export basis I cannot see how the Australian treaty can work very much injury to the producer of our dairy products. I shall not follow this matter any further for I have already taken up the twenty minutes which I consider sufficient for me to place my views before the House, but certainly it is my intention to vote against the amendment.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Why did you vote against the Australian treaty?

Mr. BROWN: Very largely for a reason that has not been mentioned by hon. gentlemen to the right. I voted against it because of the increase in the general duty on raisins. As I say, it is my intention when the vote is taken, if we ever get to it, to vote against the amendment; and if we get an opportunity to pass upon the Address itself it will be my pleasure to support it.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Coming as I do from a constituency comprising fifty per cent of dairy farmers and fifty per cent of an industrial population, I want to say a word or two on the amendment now before the House. I desire to refer to something said in this House last night by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King, Kootenay) in regard to the accomplishments of the government which we have had in this country for the past four years in relation to the public debt and more particularly in connection with the railway situation. The hon. member, with that recklessness which one frequently observes on the part of hon. gentlemen who endeavour to create in this House and in the country a false impression with regard to the railway situation, undertook to lay at the door of the Conservative party the responsibility for the position in which Canada finds herself to-day so far as the National Railways are concerned. He overlooked entirely the fact that, in the first place, it was the government which was supported by himself prior to 1911 that caused this country to assume an obligation of $220,000,000 on account of the Transcontinental railway east of Winnipeg and to become contingently liable and responsible for an approximately equal sum for the Grand Trunk Pacific west of Winnipeg, making in all a total of about $450,000,000, of which about $150,000,000 was represented in the actual construction of railways without regard to the efficiency or the proper placing of the roads.

The next point my hon. friend touched upon was the matter of railway earnings in the years 1919, 1920 and 1921, and from 1922 onward. I took the liberty of asking him at the time what lines he was referring to in regard to the years between 1919 and 1921, and he did not vouchsafe a reply. I want to point out to him that in 1919, 1920 and 1921 we were administering the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern lines, not one of which was completed. We were not administering as part of the Canadian National Railways the Grand Trunk Pacific or the Intercolonial, which has since been brought into the system and which should have made it possible for all the Canadian National railway lines to be put on a paying basis.

In connection with the moneys that have been expended, the minister pointed out that $150,000,000 had been spent on capital account in the last four years on account of the National railways. I have under my hand the latest report from the Department of Railways in which the deputy minister points out that more than $524,000,000 has been expended directly on the Canadian National Railways in the past four years alone, exclusive of over $100,000,000 worth of equipment bonds that have been guaranteed by this government. As a matter of fact the debt of the Canadian National Railways has been increased in the past four years and a half by more than $700,000,000, so that, turn it whichever way we may, the Canadian National Railways will never be able to earn interest on 50 per cent of the money that has been sunk in them. I shall touch but briefly on this subject inasmuch as an opportunity may be presented later on to go into it in detail. But what in reality was necessary, when these railways were consolidated into one, to bring them up to standard was an expenditure of $275,000,000, whereas in the meantime we have spent some $700,000,000 on supposed improvements, while the railways are still not up to the mark.

I have here a very illuminating clipping in connection with the National railways. I almost hesitate to quote it, for we seem to have reached the point in this House in relation to our railway problem where one must touch the Canadian National system with very great care and with exceeding caution. The bubble may burst at any moment in someone's face if we touch it harshly, and it is not advisable, it would seem, for anyone to handle the thing roughly. But the president of the Canadian National Railways, addressing the Canadian Club in Toronto on February 1, after pointing out that in the last fiscal year, 1924, there had been expended on capital account more than $100,000,000, which he referred to as an investment, went on to say that the lines were going behind at the rate of $53,000,000 a year, or more than $1,000,000 a week. And this money, he declared, the Canadian people had kissed goodbye. Well, they have kissed good-bye a lot more than that in connection with the Canadian National Railways, and one is at a loss to know what a minister of this government can be thinking of when he points to the Canadian National Railways as one of the evidences of what members of the government call the excellent manner in which the affairs of the country have been administered in late years. When the time comes to discuss the Canadian National Railways, as I trust it will before long, and when the whole situation is placed squarely before the country, the Canadian people will have some revelations brought out which have been systematically kept from them during the past four or five years. They will see revealed a condition of things which, unless it is checked, will bankrupt this country entirely and make it impossible to have such transportation charges as Canadian industry will be able to stand.

I come now to the particular amendment in its relation to the Australian treaty. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, in elaborating the advantages accruing to Canada from the treaty, referred to the development that is taking place in the pulp and paper industry of British Columbia, Manitoba, northern Ontario and northern Quebec, to the development that is taking place close to the city of Ottawa, and to a statement by the Minister of Lands and Forests of Ontario that some $40,000,000 was being expended in that province in such development; he endeavoured to create the impression that this great development has all been brought about by the Australian treaty. I wonder if the minister is aware that one single operating company in northern Ontario can supply all the Australian and New Zealand trade in forty days' operation? Any one of the plants that he stated were being developed on the Pacific coast will be able to handle the whole of that Antipodean trade. By reason of the position in which the government for the past four years has placed Canada, our ministers went to Australia with their hands literally tied behind their backs. Why? Because we have been simply maintaining a so-called tariff policy that was no policy at all, that was founded on no principle whatsoever, saving the principle of political expediency. Anything that might secure a temporary advantage in any part of the country at a particular time, political expediency made that advantage seem desirable. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), for whom I have personally the very greatest respect, had negotiated the treaty with the Australian government, bearing in mind the fact that we had a definite and fixed tariff policy, he might have been able to effect an arrangement of advantage to Canada; but shorn of every single opportunity for reasonable negotiation, he simply took what the Australians would give, with the result we have before us.

Now let me deal with the effect of this treaty on our butter industry. As I said a moment ago, fifty per cent of the people whom I have the privilege of representing, are interested solely in the dairy industry, which they carry on in the winter. In the summer their product is brought into direct competition with grass-fed butter produced in the United States and other countries. Then there is a surplus of butter, and they have to take advantage of the market that comes to them in the winter months when there is not such a plentiful supply on the market. In a word, they have to depend on the winter product to make their business profitable. But they have to do what the Australians have not to do: they have to shelter and feed their animals all through the winter on feedstuffs that are taken off the land in summer and stored in silos and barns at considerable expense. Then at the very time when they should be getting advantage of conditions in their home market, trainloads of butter are brought in at Vancouver from New Zealand and Australia and distributed across the Dominion, depressing the price to a point that takes away from our butter producers the advantages that rightfully belong to them. And this is not the only regrettable feature in connection with the Australian treaty. Every single carcass of beef exported from Australia is bonused by the commonwealth government. Our farmers in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia, and all over the province of Ontario, are forced to put their meat on the market in competition with this bonused meat of animals grass-fed in Australia during the winter months.

Two or three days ago I was particularly struck while listening to my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke), who is presumed to lead the group in this House that claim to represent the farming community of the Dominion. Referring to protection for farmers —the dairymen, the cattle, hog and sheep raisers, the fruit and vegetable growers—he took the position that they could not advocate protection because it might force them to concede protection for someone else. I should like the House just to appreciate that viewpoint. The dairy farmer, the stock raiser, the sheep raiser, the hog raiser, the vegetable grower and the fruit grower must be sacrificed for fear that the representatives of the wheat growers of western Canada may be brought into the position where they will have to concede protection for somebody else! When I heard that statement I thought it the most cold-blooded declaration of narrow sectionalism that I had ever listened to in this House. Just because they might be called upon to concede some measure of protection to the Canadian workingman through a policy that would stabilize industry in this country, they are willing to sacrifice the real farming population of Canada! That is the position those hon. gentlemen take.

A few days ago the hon. gentleman to my left (Mr. Evans)—I am sorry he is not in the House—referred to myself and those associated with me in terms something like this: Members to my right are the concentrated representatives of organized industry and capital; they do not believe their own policy; they have absorbed the little industries, the small proprietors, and have concentrated them under their own control; they win elections by intimidating their employees, and all that sort of thing. So far as I am concerned, the hon. member and those associated with him may express just what opinions they choose, I simply say to them and to the House that members of the official opposition, let them be what they may in the opinion of these gentlemen, stand for one definite principle—for Canada first, for all the people of Canada; they stand here for a policy that will make it possible for Canadians to live in their own country. It makes one—I was going to use a very unparliamentary term, Mr. Speaker; I will pass it over—but to listen to some hon. members talking about the immigration policy suggested in the Speech from the Throne—not that mentioned in the supplement; I may have an opportunity of referring to how it came into existence some time later when the hon. gentleman who was primarily responsible for that statement is in his seat—when we hear hon. members and the government talking about a vigorous immigration policy while conditions make it impossible for our own boys and girls to stay in their native country because of their inability to make a living here, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, it is time for the House of Commons to stop and consider the direction in which we are drifting.

Let me conclude, Sir, by saying again that regardless of what may be stated about us, of how we got here, where we are from, or whom we represent, what we stand for is a policy that will develop Canada as it should be developed. As one views the Dominion extending from Cape Breton to Vancouver Island, with all its limitless possibilities, and realizes that in the past four years alone 550,000 Canadians have been forced to leave their own country to make their livelihood in the United States, it seems to me it is time for us to sit up and consider what we are doing. The province of Ontario alone, every single day from the first of January, 1924, until the latest date for which a return can be secured, granted birth certificates to 100 native sons or daughters of the province of Ontario to enable them to take up permanent residence in the United States. Those are the things we are here to correct, and let me say to my hon. friends that we are going to stay right here until we do correct them.

Just one further point. I heard the hon. member for Brandon a few days ago say: "I heard the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) say that he was going to oppose this government," and as he said that, with his hands clasped across his breast and his eyes rolling to Heaven, one might have thought he had just completed the pronouncement of the benediction at a meeting of the directors of the United Grain Growers Limited, after they had voted a cheque for several thousand dollars to the campaign funds of the Progressive party. But be that as it may, and at the risk of my hon. friend collapsing from heart failure if he should hear these words, I say: Yes, I am here to oppose this government, and to continue to oppose it, until it recognizes the will of the people as recorded on the 29th of October last, in so far as it is possible for me to oppose it; and until it vacates the seats it has no right to occupy in this House.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we are drawing to the close of a debate which has been somewhat prolonged, but of which it can be said that it at least serves a much better purpose than any alternative which has presented itself to members of this House. We have heard old subjects discussed and new, and we have heard the usual allegations which too often come from hon. members down the aisle, that all offered to the House is chaff and straw save what they present themselves. We have heard also, not only in the House, but outside, that we are standing in the way of public business.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hon. gentlemen across the way say "Hear, hear," and not one of them could answer me now, what that public business is. Every one of them knows that the only alternative to this debate is to disband and go home and do nothing. Hon. gentlemen opposite are in a splendid position to talk about delaying the business of the House when they not only have no business to present, but themselves, a government and members supporting the government obstructed this House by consuming all its time without intermission for three days in succession. For a government and its followers to do this in a parliament is unprecedented in the annals of Canada.

There is one object at least we can serve besides the usual purpose of parliament—the discussion of public affairs—by attending to the post of duty. We can support the hands of a committee which is to-day charged with the heaviest responsibility which any committee of this House has undertaken for many years—the committee on the Customs investigation. I put it to hon. members of this House: Is it not somewhat better to be here to do our duty as far as we can and uphold the hands of that committee, than to abdicate our task, surrender and go home? For our part we have not been permitted, thanks to the votes of hon. gentlemen opposite and to my left, to proceed to the business of parliament as it is the duty of parliament to do, but we are determined to make the best use of our time we can under the circumstances dictated to us by a conjoint majority of this House.

We have before us an amendment, the second one moved to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. These amendments go to the root of what we believe are faults in the public policy of today. If the debate on the Address is for any other purpose save to enable parliaments to do that, I know not what that purpose is. The Speech from the Throne is there. First in one particular, again in another, we ask parliament to declare that that Speech is lacking, and some hon. members have suggested—I know that no one would who is acquainted with the practice of parliament—that because we make complaint in a certain regard of a Speech from the Throne, therefore we accept it in every other particular. From time immemorial amendments have been addressed to Speeches from the Throne, but never till this debate was it suggested that those amendments assumed acquiescence in all features of the Speech not attacked. Time after time Speeches from the Throne have carried through this parliament without any amendment offered whatever, but in the face of opposition and still without a vote upon the Speech itself. Therefore it is manifest to all that nothing has taken place on this side of the House to be conclusive of acquiescence in the Speech in any regard.

As respects the subjects of the Speech from the Throne, our position was stated, in so far as it is in my authority to state it, in the address I delivered first. I think I then traversed every subject there treated; where we stand upon it was then stated. The government in this Address has departed from the usual procedure. Why it has departed all of us know, and no one knows more clearly than hon. gentlemen down the aisle. They departed from it just to offer an alluring berry patch to hon. gentlemen to my left. It has not been customary to come down with a Speech from the Throne and tell where a public work is going to be built, to tell that some public building or some railway is going to be constructed. That practice was reserved for the Speech this year. The leader of the government knows why. It was in order to invite a practice hitherto unknown, that members of this House who ran against government policy and government record should be induced in parliament to vote for the government on the faith of new promises made.

We are told in the Speech from the Throne that the Hudson Bay railway will be completed. On behalf of all those who sympathize with its completion, on behalf of all those, whatever their views may be, on whose behalf I can speak, I ask the government, having taken the responsibility of so declaring and asking this House to vote for such declaration, to tell us what under their plans is involved in the completion of the Hudson Bay railway. Just tell us the beginning and the end of this commitment. It is not usual I know to do so in debates on Speeches from the Throne, because it is not usual to make commitments as to public works in Speeches from the Throne. But the government has done so, and they want our votes for the Speech. We have a right to demand, and we should not be called upon to vote until the demand is answered, what is meant and what money is involved in the completion of the Hudson Bay railway. Are we to have the terminals completed? Are we to have elevators constructed? Are we to have the dredging done? Are we to have all those things done which the government itself declared in a return brought down just a few months ago were included in the completion of the project which, if that return were correct, means that we are committing ourselves to an expenditure of fifty millions of the people's money? Now, I ask the members of the government again: Are we to be asked to vote acquiescence in a Speech, to put our endorsement on a programme in utter blindness of where that programme leads and the extent of the commitments involved?

Similar remarks might be addressed to the government, though they are not wholly so important, in respect to other features of the Address. As to the amendment it challenges the programme of the administration as laid before us this session in respect of specific grievances suffered by large portions of the population of Canada; it declares that this administration has involved that portion of our population in very serious losses and in further danger because of treaties which it has recently entered into, and it complains that there is no suggestion of policy or proposals of any kind designed to remove the discrimination under which these people suffer, the injustice which actually is imposed upon them. Now, we are asked what are those treaties? The debate had not gone very long until it was made quite clear they are the treaties which from the commencement we have opposed. They are the French treaty, to a lesser degree the Italian treaty, and the Australian treaty. These treaties we opposed. When they were before parliament we declared they would involve injury to Canadian business and Canadian trade. We are now at a stage where we are able to demonstrate by results that the position we took was right. And having reached that stage what is the answer of the government? If the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) could be said to speak for it, the answer of the government is this: "The treaties are passed. Surely you do not think we are fools enough, now that we have passed them, to go back upon them? Surely you are not going to ask us to reverse what we did?" We have a right to ask the government to do so, for the reason that before it took the step we challenged its soundness as applied to Canada; we challenged the virtue of its course; we declared these results would follow. Therefore we are in a position to call upon the government to remedy injuries done by itself.

The French treaty can be passed over very quickly; it has been before parliament and under debate many times. A very few comments on its consequences will illustrate its value. In the French treaty there did not appear from the beginning one single concession offered this country save in respect of a few spare parts of farm implements, which obtained entry into France on a little better terms. In every other regard, wherever this treaty touched the actual exports of Canada, the government brought to this House a treaty which raised the duties against them, or which did not affect them at all. In not one single other particular did the government come to parliament with duties against the actual exports of this country lower than before. On the contrary, in relation to some of our most valuable exports the government brought back a treaty under which the duty against our products entering France was fifty per cent higher than before the treaty was entered into at all. The government told us the treaty was the best it could do. We criticized the government at the time, on the ground that before it ventured to enter into a treaty with France—which had raised its tariff anywhere from four to twelve times over, it was bound in justice to this country to raise the Canadian duties on products in respect of which France would want concessions from us. The government ridiculed our suggestion; it intimated that it was against its policy. With arms tied behind their back, by their own folly, members of the government went over to negotiate a treaty with France. Now I ask any member of the administration to tell me one article in the whole range of Canadian exports which he can show from the trade returns was benefited by that treaty.

The Minister of Railways—either the Minister of Railways or the ex-Minister—told the people down in South Essex that the farmers had done better with their hogs because of the treaties the government had made. But not in respect of hogs, or anything else, has the government opened a market; it has not opened a market for the single product of a Canadian farm. In respect of products of major consequence, the government virtually killed the industry so far as exports to France are concerned. The member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) showed from the returns of the Trade and Commerce department that where we sold four and a half million pounds of condensed milk before the treaty was entered into, we sold France last year only eighty thousand pounds of that article, and the year before less than a million pounds. Why? The treaty raised the duty on condensed milk by fifty per cent and killed the trade with France. The treaty raised the duty on canned salmon fifty per cent and seriously damaged that trade; and we stand to-day with a balance of trade against us of seven millions where we had seven millions in our favour before hon. gentlemen opposite ventured on the negotiation.

In respect of Italy we are buying now from that country a few hundred thousand dollars more than we were when the treaty was entered into, and we are selling to Italy $8,000,000 less than before hon. gentlemen put their blundering hands on our trade with that country.

Now let us come to the Australian treaty. I state frankly that I base my criticism of this treaty on the fact that protection is the right and the settled policy of Canada. If protection is not our policy my criticisms will have very little force. I see hon. gentlemen down in the Saskatchewan colony indulging in smiles. When an attack is made on protection in this House the applause is confined to the colony from Saskatchewan. They are all new members of parliament; and I venture to say that after just a few months' experience; after a few lessons which they may learn from caucus, and after going through a few sessions in the composing room, they will not be quite so vociferous in this applause. When protection is condemned, have they observed that in the case of their party, the fathers of the 1919 platform, a dead silence prevails? Was that not a surprise to them when they came into parliament enthusiastic over the principles of free trade or freer trade and the identification of the Liberal party therewith? They have now read the speeches of their own leader, delivered in Ontario after he got safely out of Saskatchewan, in the last campaign. They have read where he declared that the industries of Canada had to be protected against competition from the United States, against competition from European countries with depreciated currencies, against competition from countries where labour was cheaper than in Canada. Are they then still of the belief that the Liberal party has its face set against protection? Am I told the Prime Minister did not use the word "protection"? If I am, I must admit he did not. He chose the word "safeguarding," because possibly he thought that word would not rack the conscience of the members for Saskatchewan quite so much But if "safeguarding" is more congenial to their ears, I am prepared to use that word myself; it suits my purpose just as well. I ask the members from Saskatchewan who applaud when protection is condemned, do they find now that such is the attitude of the government of the day? With a tariff commission, which is no use on earth unless there is a principle upon which the tariff is to be based; with even the leader of the Progressives admitting that he is prepared to concede some protection in this country—with all these facts confronting them, do hon. members not think protection is the settled policy of Canada? Have they any hope they will influence the course of policy in this House and bend it from the protection principle? If they have, I venture to caution them now that they will have just as much influence in proportion to their numbers as sixty-five hon. members to my left had during the course of the four years of the last parliament. If therefore that is the position, I should like to ask how anyone defends the Australian treaty in its present form.

The Finance minister knows just as well as I know—and he would not dispute it sitting in his seat now—that protection is the settled policy of Canada, and I would like to ask him how in the face of a settled policy of protection he defends this treaty with Australia. He stands up and says, "Oh well, things might have been better if we had had reciprocity". Reciprocity! A dead reciprocity to hon. gentlemen opposite is a whole lot better than a live reciprocity. It is a fortunate thing for the Minister of Finance that he is able to point to a reciprocity treaty defeated rather than to a reciprocity treaty enacted. If the reciprocity treaty had been carried in 1911, it would have gone by the board years ago at the hands of the majority of the American people, just as every reciprocity treaty large and small has gone in years gone by—gone by the board, to the dislocation and disruption of Canada business and great loss to Canadian people. Had we not reciprocity in wheat and potatoes? Can the Finance minister not remember when hon. members from Saskatchewan and all their colleagues to my left fairly tore the purple off the clouds in western Canada on behalf of free wheat, and seemed to think if we had a free exchange of wheat with the United States there would be paradise in this country, a new Heaven and a new earth? But we never hear anything about it now. Reciprocity in wheat was alive at one time, whereas this larger compact was always dead. We had free wheat, free potatoes, and a very few months after the pact went into effect—because it was a pact the same as the old treaty—it was torn into tatters by the Americans without any consultation with us at all, and a duty of 40 cents a bushel placed on wheat, $2.04 on flour and 50 cents on potatoes. That is the road the old one of 1911 would have gone, and inasmuch as it was far vaster in extent, the shifting of policies would have shaken far more the industrial structure of our country to the great injury of the trade of the Dominion.

Reciprocity! I heard hon. gentlemen cheer when the minister said, "If we only had reciprocity". I put it to the government now—there are four or five of them in their seats—

I put the question to them now—and I invite the attention of hon. gentlemen from the fruit districts of Canada; from the fruit districts of British Columbia and of Ontario; from parts of Quebec and the Maritime provinces; and in the hearing of the representatives of the great vegetable areas of this country I ask any member of this government to answer who feels that he can speak for the administration— "If you had a chance to-day to re-enact the old reciprocity treaty of 1911, would you do it?" Who is the member who will answer, yes? Now, behold the silence of the ministry! No; a live reciprocity treaty would not be any use to hon. gentlemen now, but a dead one they can plead. Not a member of the government dare rise in his place to-night and say that he would put fruit on the free list if he had a chance, or that he would put potatoes on the free list if he had the opportunity, but both of those commodities were free under the treaty of 1911. Witness ye members from Saskatchewan! They have learned their lesson from the defeat of that year and they have learned it better every year since. While they have shed artificial tears over the old reciprocity treaty, they are mighty glad it has gone; they would not re-enact it if they had the chance, and they dare not stand in their places to-night and say that they would.

I come back again to the question, how is the treaty to be defended in face of the undoubted and admitted fact that protection is the settled policy of Canada? What is the result of this treaty? It exposes the whole farming population of Canada to the almost unlimited competition of the biggest meat exporters of the world and to the largest dairy exporters of the world. We were told of course this competition would not mean anything. We were told a year ago that because very little butter came in here over a four cents a pound duty, we could rely upon it that very little would come in over a duty of one cent a pound. We were told that unless a flood of butter came to Canada the prices would not be affected. What has experience taught us within the year? Experience has not gone very far yet; it has not gone far enough to get into the season of meat exports, but it has gone far enough to get into the season of dairy exports, and we find that more than four million pounds of butter have arrived in this country already. The Minister of Finance shakes his head. He stood in parliament and gave returns from his department, but why did he not tell this House that those returns included only the butter which was taken out of bond? There was more imported in a month than in a year under conditions before the treaty.

Who are the best judges of this matter in our Dominion? If there is one opinion better than another, whose opinion is it, as to the effect of the Australian treaty on the butter prices of the country? Hon. gentlemen may each have his view; I give mine for what it is worth. I would say it is the opinion of those who have dealt in the article more than anyone else, and everyone knows that is the Burns Company. I have seen letters from the Burns Company, written in stronger terms than that read by the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Davis); but his letter is sufficient for me, and his letter has been published. It declares that even in the absence of the shipment of a pound of butter from Australia to Canada, the level of the price of Australian butter will govern the level in this Dominion, and the very existence of the Australian treaty, wiping out all but a negligible protection on that article determines from this time on the price of butter in Canada. The United States of America maintain a duty of eight cents a pound. They do so because they have their protection structure, and they know that to maintain a protection structure, they must, in the words of their president, Mr. Coolidge, build agriculture right into the framework of that protection structure. In doing so, they give to the dairy producers of the United States a protection of eight cents a pound which, by actual statistics put on record in a most comprehensive manner by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), gives the farmers of that country as regards their home sales a bonus over the produce of other countries of anywhere from one to eight cents a pound. That, the farmer of the United States is entitled to in a protected country. That, the farmer of Canada is entitled to, and unless he gets it he will submit to no protective system, no matter how necessary it may be.

I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), who is responsible for the tariff, whether he will stand in his place and tell the House how he justifies a protection of thirty-five per cent on automobiles and two and one-half per cent on dairy butter? I will ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe): How does he justify a duty of thirty per cent on boots and shoes and not a particle of duty on eggs? If I said no more, he might rise and declare that I am complaining about these higher duties. I am doing nothing of the sort; what I do say is this: All productive enterprises in this country must, under world conditions of to-day, have in this Dominion such protection as steadies the Canadian market and assures to Canadian producers the first and the preferential hold on the market of our own country. While this is the case and essential to the very life of our industry, hon. gentlemen opposite think the farmers of Canada must labour under a handicap of virtually no protection at all on their meats, none at all on their cheese, one cent a pound on their butter, very little on their vegetables, or their fruits, and nothing on their eggs, the great products of the mixed farmers of this Dominion.

Hon. gentlemen say: We can now export paper into Australia free of duty. So we can; and nobody is going to complain of any action which is taken to benefit the paper industry. Indeed, we rejoice if this benefits the paper industry. That is all right; not only are we ready to benefit it, but we are ready to pay a price in order to benefit it. We know we cannot get a treaty for nothing; the concessions cannot be one-sided in our favour. We must pay something; but I will tell you something the Australians did not do when they made their concessions: they did not make them at the expense of the Australian producer; they made them at the expense of the Australian treasury spread over the whole country, and they never opened a rift in the protective tariff structure of that commonwealth. The Minister of Finance said: "Do not be afraid of these imports; we are an exporting country with regard to butter and this determines the price." I think he had his ear attuned to the song which he often hears from hon. gentlemen of the Progressive party. They seem to think that if we are selling some of an article, it does not matter where the Canadian market is at all. The Minister of Finance knows far better than that; he knows that is not true. If it is true, anything the most absurd could be deduced from it. If a statement can be made which fairly approximates to the truth, it is this: that to the extent that the home market consumes the product of an industry, the greater that proportion is, the more that industry is affected and benefited by a tariff. And the greater the proportion of export to the home consumption, the less can that industry be protected. It seems to me this is a general law.

In respect of our wheat where our export is very great as compared with our home consumption, the direct influences and benefits of a protective tariff cannot come in the same degree that they come in the case of other of our productions. But this does not apply to the great dairy industry of this country. The proportion of exports in the case of butter is small, about one-tenth, or in other words, ninety per cent of our production is consumed at home. Does anybody in his senses suggest that the home market, protected, is not better for the farmer here in relation to the goods he sells in Canada than a home market not protected at all? I know the Minister of Finance does not credit any such talk as that. If he does, why did he not address such an argument to his Australian friends? Why did he not say to the statesmen of Australia: You produce a surplus of butter, eggs, cheese and meats. You do not need any tariff against Canada; take it down. We are giving you free eggs; you give us free eggs. Would his argument not have been compelling if there was anything in it? It would have been far more compelling than if applied to Canada. You sell your surplus abroad and nothing else affects your price at home. But if he ever addressed it to the Australians he could not budge them; they did not move an inch, and he brought back a tariff of eighteen cents a dozen against our eggs, six cents a pound against our butter, five cents a pound against our cheese and five cents a pound against our meats—although Australia is the biggest exporter of meats in the world. How is it that Australia did not succumb to these arguments of the Minister of Finance, if indeed they were ever used? Why, the Australian statesmen were just as impervious to that kind of nonsense as the hon. gentleman's colleagues are impervious to reason. Not one single product of Australia has the tariff against it thrown down in this Australian treaty.

We have given Australia a preference on raisins and currants, and to that I have no objection at all. The Prime Minister went through the country saying that I was complaining of it. Never anywhere did I complain of it in respect of such an article, not an article of Canadian production. It may be a sacrifice as regards Canada in the way of a tax on our people, but at least it is spread over the whole nation and it does not undermine any Canadian industry. It is a concession we can afford to make, and more of those concessions would not have been objected to. We cannot expect something for nothing, and this was the kind of concession we should have made unless the government was prepared to overthrow the whole protective structure in this Dominion. I ask the Minister of Finance again: How does he defend exposing the dairy producers of this country to the competition of Australia and New Zealand, in some respects the greatest exporters in the world, while he asks those same dairy producers to submit to a protective system which he supports and intends to maintain on the whole range of industry in our country? It is true the paper industry and the canned salmon industry are important, but as pointed out by the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson), one mill in this province in forty days could supply the whole market of both Australia and New Zealand for an entire year. Is it worth while doing this universal damage to the dairy industry in order to get business for one mill for forty days?

Let me also point out this difference: The paper industry, valuable though it be, is an industry which is being developed at the expense of a fast depleting resource of this Dominion. It is right, of course, that that resource should be manufactured into paper and sold, but it is not so vitally important to accelerate, to rush to get it out just as fast as we can, that to do so we must eat into the vitals of a truly great industry supporting virtually millions of people. As regards the money which the farmers of this country get from the dairy industry, every dollar stays in Canada, or at least every dollar not spent in buying from another country something which should be kept out. The money is money paid for the hard work of the farmer, his wife and his boys and girls. No proportion of it goes to pay interest on foreign capital, payable out of the land. It is the best money that can be earned and preserved in this Dominion, and it is earned in every province from Vancouver to Prince Edward Island. It is the best, the most valuable portion of the Canadian agricultural structure, and it is that which the minister has exposed and is exposing to an utterly unnecessary peril.

Before the minister went to Australia he was asked from this side to raise the tariff on farm products of this country. He was told plainly in the debate on the French treaty that if he did not do so he would be in no position to negotiate with Australia. As a matter of fact he went there in no position to negotiate; he had no weapons to negotiate with. He had nothing to trade with and so he had to bend the knee and take what Australia gave him. It is true he did try to get an instrument and he made a timid attempt to assert Canada's position. He did propose to come back and raise the tariff on farm products and to give, in view of such elevated tariff, a concession to Australia. But he became frightened and yielded. Why he swerved from that intention we have never been advised. I have never been told, parliament has never been told; but we all have a suspicion. Why did the minister cast away the first treaty he made with Australia? Did he do so at the request of Australia? Not at all; he will not suggest for a moment that he did. Australia passed that first treaty; their government put it through parliament, and that treaty was infinitely better for us than the one which the minister subsequently brought to this House for ratification. True enough, it was not perfect but it was infinitely better than the one we finally got, for it went some distance in the direction which we say the treaty should have taken. I repeat, why did the minister swerve from that treaty and abandon it? Hon. gentlemen who are new to the House do not remember the whole history. The government came into this House day after day, and what did they tell us? Did they tell us that they were somewhat afraid that a raising of the duty on farm products might get them in wrong with the Progressives? If they had so declared I fancy they would have told the truth, for I have no doubt this was the real reason. No; they put up an excuse and misled the House from day to day. They gave us to understand that the reason for the delay in bringing in the Australian treaty was some action on the part of Australia, some regulation as to how much must be made in Canada of Canadian products if we were to get the benefit of their tariff. Everyone knows now that this was a blind and that while the government was singing this song in parliament they were secretly preparing to reverse their whole treaty, to abandon it in fact, and callously to make the Canadian farmer and the Canadian dairyman pay the entire price of the Australian agreement.

I said a moment ago that the best judges should surely be those most intimately engaged in the industry. But I have by no means given the authority of all; I have received communications very numerous on this subject from many parts of the country. I want to read from a letter addressed to me by the Canadian Creamerymen's Association. It is a long letter which from beginning to end is hostile to this treaty, but I am going to quote only two passages and I venture to say that these two passages, in their reflection on the wisdom of this treaty, contain language stronger than has been addressed to the government by any member on this side of the House. Let me quote:

> The cut in duty from 4 cents to 1 cent per pound has wiped out in one blow the fruit of the whole campaign for winter dairying in Alberta.

How does the minister like that language? Is it the language of prejudiced men? It is the language of an association which represents this industry throughout the whole Dominion. Two, three, four cents a pound on butter in the middle of a winter season, when it is harder to maintain the industry than at any other time of the year, represents the difference between profit and loss, the difference between encouragement, and discouragement, the difference between failure and success. That difference the minister has eliminated, and in eliminating it he has done just what the association says he has done: he has undone the work of the whole campaign for winter dairying in Alberta. I read further:

The treaty was framed in politics, regardless of the needs or opinions of the dairying industry. Its damaging consequences are already imposing hardship upon our people, and undoing all that has been done in the past several decades to build up this foundation block of Canadian prosperity.

If I wanted stronger language I would read the opinions of the Creamerymen's Association of Saskatchewan. I should have thought that the opinion of that institution would have some weight with hon. gentlemen to my left. I do not doubt that those who framed this language—for it appears in their annual report—had in mind the fact that they as part of the taxpayers of our country contribute to the system which exists to-day and that, contributing to it, they are entitled to its benefits. In that contention they are absolutely right. And here is what they say:

Your directors further feel that it is their duty to draw to your attention the impending peril to the dairy interests of western Canada created by the Australian trade treaty, passed near the close of the last session of the Dominion parliament and which came into force on October first of last year. This treaty reduces the duty on Australian butter entering Canada to one cent per pound and permits the entry of Australian cheese duty free. This tariff, unfortunately, is much lower than the British preferential tariff and has already created a competition in Canada against Canadian dairy products which is destined to have a disastrous effect upon the dairy industry of Canada. By virtue of a previous trade agreement with New Zealand these Australian tariff rates, likewise, became automatically operative as far as New Zealand is concerned. The Western Canada Dairy Association is formulating plans to resist the continuance of this trade agreement and a delegation from this body will wait upon the Dominion government shortly to urge for the repeal of this portion of the treaty referred to. Our company will be represented on this delegation.

Hon. gentlemen will recognise that this does not come from rock-ribbed protectionists; it comes from men who are engaged in the farming industry in western Canada. It comes from representatives of the industry in that portion of the country which of all looks least kindly upon the protective tariff. In the face of these opinions, will hon. gentlemen set up the helter-skelter judgment of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), expressed in that classic tone of which he is so capable, that all this objection is "bunk"? Are hon. gentlemen going to listen to him rather than to the views expressed by those of actual and long experience, and universally expressed without any dissent? I ask the Minister of Agriculture, what does he propose to do?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I had a talk with them this morning.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister had a talk with them this morning. Well, all I hope is that they have had more influence on him than he will ever have on them. The Minister of Agriculture, anxious to find some virtue in the treaty, declares that at least there is a clause in it enabling its cancellation. I am frank to admit that probably this is the best clause of all. But the government should never have been in a position where they could be called upon to cancel the agreement. They are in that position because of their own folly, because of the surrender of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) to the importunities of hon. gentlemen whose principles he knew were diametrically opposed to his own. Let the government reform this treaty; let them reform the treaty in the direction of the agreement which was offered them by Australia itself. Australia offered them a better treaty than the one they ultimately brought into this House. And do not let the government be heard to say that they could not get such a treaty; they got it and came back here and pitched it away because of the importunities of hon. members to my left. Will the Minister of Finance say right now that this is not right? We call upon the government now to remedy this wrong; we call upon them to remedy it, because it cannot continue in this Dominion. The farmers of the country will never consent that protection shall be placed around other industries of Canada while they themselves remain exposed. This Dominion will never consent, and the government knows it will never consent, to the removal of protection upon the industries of Canada. This government will never dare venture further along that course. They may be driven, but they will not venture of their own accord. I think I can measure them pretty well; I have watched them these last few years. Where are they on this tariff issue now? They are under the barn. You cannot get a word from them. All they boast of is that somewhere inside the barn there is going to be "a tariff commission". You cannot get them to announce on what principles they will build their tariff. So knowing, as I know right well, that virtually one and all of them, certainly all but one or two, are just as confirmed protectionists as I am; knowing, as I know right well, that two-thirds of this House are determined that protection shall be the settled policy of Canada—that two-thirds apply to hon. gentlemen opposite; on this side we are unanimous; knowing, as I well know, that this Dominion by a vast majority of its people has declared for protection every time it has been an issue, and never more decidedly than in the last campaign,—knowing these things, I call upon the government to remove the unsightly lopsided system which they have imposed upon us, and restore to the country a fair, equitable system of protection, to give to the farmers of Canada what they know this people one and all require. Such is the purpose of this amendment.

Hon. gentlemen of the Progressive party say: We are against the Australian treaty, but we cannot vote for this amendment, because if we vote for it we vote against the berry patch in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. BROWN: The berry patch is in the amendments to the Address, not in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, the child usually runs to the best blossoms, so I ask the hon. member which berry patch he is at himself?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He wants them all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Let me ask: What is the duty of members of this House? The duty of those who believe in the continuance of the condition I have described is clear: Their duty is to vote against the amendment. Every one who votes against the amendment votes for the continuance of this condition of affairs. Does he say that he votes against this new programme? He does not at all. This government went to the country, not on the theory that later it might develop a berry patch, or a list of new promises; not at all. This government went to the country on its record. Hon. gentlemen to my left were elected against that record, they were elected against the government's candidates. I ask those hon. gentlemen to consult their consciences and then to say: Do they feel that being so elected they have a right in this House to vote confidence in the government whose candidates they defeated because the government comes down with a new programme? Those hon. gentlemen were elected on their own record in this House. Included in that record was a vote against the very treaty which is challenged in this amendment. Are they going to vote now against this amendment because of alluring promises held out, handed to them for their support, contained in a Speech from the Throne? Is that constitutional government? Is that doing justice to their position as members of a British parliament? May I ask: What is there in this Australian treaty that justifies you in voting for it for the sake of the promises of this government? Or may I put it the other way: What reliance is to be placed on the promises of this government that justifies you in voting for the continuation of conditions such as I have described?

You, Mr. Speaker, have ruled that we cannot apply to hon. gentlemen of this House, "purchased by legislation." Therefore I will not apply it, and—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —and inasmuch as that phrase is out of order—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —I am sure also it would be out of order to say that hon. members were purchased by promises, for such an allegation is infinitely worse. But I ask hon. members in the quiet of their own homes—if any of them have suspicion that voting for this Speech from the Throne and for the condition of affairs I have portrayed has any fitting description in the words, "purchased by promises"—to reflect whether or not it is their duty to do something which, by the rules of this House, is condemned when properly described.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Sutherland, South Oxford) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. CASGRAIN: I was paired with the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Boys). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I was paired with the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Culligan). Had I voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a few remarks to the main motion. I want to make them in the nature of a retrospect of the session so far as it has gone, and to point out the part played by the Progressives.

At the outset we were faced by an amendment by the opposition which at one and the same time was highly technical and very deeply political. That amendment challenged the right of the government to meet parliament and address this House through the lips of His Excellency. The Progressives, after some deliberation, penetrated through the subtleties of the situation, brushed aside the disquisitions of our learned constitutionalists in the House, and listened to the still small voice of common sense. The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that there is a third party in this House and some people do not know it yet. The Conservatives attempted to meet the situation by ignoring the third party. We were the poor relation at the feast, to be seen and not heard. But, very politely, very firmly, we refused to be ignored.

The next incident of importance, the incident of chief importance, was the Speech from the Throne coupled with the amendment of the opposition. The Speech from the Throne proved to be distinctly acceptable to the Progressives. The amendment proved to be just as conspicuously unacceptable. Confronted with the two berry patches already alluded to, we chose the Liberal berry patch because the berries seemed more or less real. The others seemed to be hung on. I think that every honest and fair-minded man in this House, including hon. gentlemen to my right, will give the Progressives the credit for voting in line with what they have been advocating in this House for the last five years.

I notice some of the younger members of the opposition have used the threadbare gibe that we have a sort of affinity with the Liberals but I want to say that that kind of taunt is played out. We might have allowed other influences to affect our judgment. We have been reminded over and over again by our friends to the right that we endured four years of disappointment from the Liberals. That was fresh and vivid in our minds. We were reminded that they fought an election against us. That also was vivid in our memory. We might have chosen to play the vindictive role. We might have chosen to kick the Liberals out into utter darkness where there is weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth. We might have chosen that, but on deliberation we felt that we had not been sent here to indulge in petty party recriminations; and that applies to my hon. friends to the right as well as to the Liberals. It would have been an easy matter to us to forget what our constituents sent us here for. It would have been an easy matter to allow our judgment to be warped by what we had gone through a few weeks ago. But we did not choose that course. The advent of a third group into this House is bringing many innovations. Such a thing as political forgiveness may sound strange on the ears of hon. gentlemen; this House has never known such a thing. But I want to tell the Liberals and I want to tell the Conservatives that we forgive them from the bottom of our hearts. We have much to forgive, and therefore we hope we may be loved much.

We are told by our friends to the right that the Speech from the Throne was a bribe, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) repeated the charge a short while ago. Well I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that if the present Speech from the Throne is a bribe then every Speech from the Throne for the last generation has been a bribe, and both parties were equally engaged in the bribing. The Speech from the Throne as a parliamentary institution has changed its character considerably from what is was in the old days when political parties began the session in just about the same way as the British and French armies began the battle of Fontenoy, by inviting each other to fire the first shot. The times have changed since then. Grim realities have entered parliament and have greatly changed conditions. Parliament is not what it used to be when party distinctions were clear cut. In modern parliaments, most of all in a country like Canada, it is impossible for any government, I do not care how big its majority is, to bring down a Speech from the Throne which could not be described as a bribe in the sense that the gentlemen to our right are using that word. The leader of the opposition a few moments ago, addressing his remarks to the government, in this connection said it was one of the most startling, one of the most unusual things, for a government to place in its Speech from the Throne a promise to complete a public work. The leader of the opposition was speaking rashly when he said that; he should have known that it is not unusual. He should know that that thing has been done and done by a Conservative party. Lest I should be charged with speaking rashly I will quote the chapter and verse. In Hansard of 1912-13, volume I, I read from the Speech from the Throne, a Conservative Speech from the Throne. It says:

> A contract for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway from Le Pas to Port Nelson has been awarded and the work is being pushed forward with all possible speed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman not see the difference between an announcement of that kind and an announcement of public policy?

Mr. BIRD: I contend that paragraph is a berry patch just as purple as the face of the right hon. gentleman should be at this moment. Now I wonder what has happened to this Hudson Bay berry patch during all these years. I was reminded by someone sitting near me that sometimes the reason why the berries are not picked is because there is a bear in the berry patch. All these years this berry patch has been dangled before our eyes, and we have not yet picked a berry from it, and I think we will find the bears somewhere, to use the words of an hon. member, on St. James street, Montreal. Every time the Hudson Bay railway is mentioned as a practical proposition the bear makes its appearance, and the berrypickers are frightened of him again.

I was very much struck by a reference made by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) in this same connection. He said the Labour party and Progressives were like Robin Hood. That stirred up in me a lot of associations. I remember as a young man turning from the old school of English Toryism to become a Radical—not in the present sense of the word, but to become the thing I have been ever since; that is, to be on the side of the bottom dog all the time, and that is where Robin Hood used to be. I never saw an allusion that miscarried as much as that, and I will tell you why.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the hon. member admit the government is the bottom dog in this case?

Mr. BIRD: The hon. member knows more about dogs than I do, but you know that this beautiful legend of British tradition came right out of the hearts of a suffering people. Unfortunately, literary history and secular history have been so taught that the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington actually believes that Robin Hood was a bold, bad man. His education has not been complete. I am not sure that I can tell the House much about Robin Hood at present. The time has been too short for me to inquire into the legend, but I am only using this as a parallel. The legend of Robin Hood—it is not much more than legend—came into existence because of the savage persecutions maintained in England after the Norman invasion. Robin Hood was a true British man who would not put up with game laws—and no British man has ever been able to put up with game laws, unless he profited by them. He was one of the first men in British annals who protested against special privilege. I have been trying to hunt up one of the famous Robin Hood tales.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): If the hon. member will allow me to interpolate, I gave Robin Hood credit for his motives and his kindness of heart, but it was his methods I objected to.

Mr. BIRD: Yes, I am going to give him credit for both. In order to come as near to the spirit of Robin Hood as I can, I am going to quote from Wordsworth's poem, "Rob Roy," a good old Scotchman. Wordsworth copied this ballad from the Robin Hood ballads, and it applies as much to Robin Hood as to Rob Roy. They are both Roberts, and it is a good old English name. He says of Rob Roy:

> For thou, although with some wild thoughts,
> Wild Chieftain of a savage Clan!
> Hadst this to boast of; thou didst love
> The liberty of man.
> And had it been thy lot to live
> With us who now behold the light,
> Thou would'st have nobly stirred thyself,
> And battled for the Right.
> For thou wert still the poor man's stay,
> The poor man's heart, the poor man's hand;
> And all the oppressed, who wanted strength,
> Had thine at their command.

That applies to Robin Hood as much as to Rob Roy, and more. I will now quote from a well known ancient English ballad. Rob Roy had been asked by his merry men what kind of methods they should use—methods now—and he said:

> But loke ye do no housbonde harme—

That is the farmer.

> That tylleth with his plough;
> No more ye shall no good yeman,
> That walketh by grene wode shawe,
> Ne no knyght,—

He was very broad.

> Ne no knyght, ne no squyèr,
> That wolde be a good felawe.

That was the spirit of Robin Hood. I was looking in the Encyclopedia Britannica, and it says that Robin Hood in the middle ages "is the people's ideal as Arthur is that of the upper classes."

It seems rather strange that the cycle should be complete. We have an Arthur and a Robert here. Then it says he "is the ideal yeoman"—we know the significance of the yeoman in British history—"and Arthur was the ideal knight." That is, the feudalist knight. "He readjusted the distribution of wealth. He deprived the rich and endowed the poor. He was a great sportsman, the incomparable archer"—he loved to pull a long bow, but not in the sense that the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) pulls it when he addresses the House. "He was a lover of the greenwood and the free life, brave, adventurous, jocular," —just like my hon. friend and leader—"openhanded"—the parallel breaks down a little there; my leader is a Scotsman—"a protector of women." My leader leads the only party which sufficiently believes in the feminine movement to elect a woman to parliament. The knights of King Arthur's table protected women, but they were the women of their own class. That was a one-sided proposition, but this knight of Sherwood forest protected all kinds of women. He had the heart to do that. He was not a low brow. Shakespeare described these men in one of his plays when he said that they could find "books in the running brooks, sermons in stones, and good in everything." But the knights of King Arthur's round table did not see good in everything and it was because they could not that they did not last. It is a great pity that Tennyson was an aristocrat. If he had been a man of the people, he would have written the Idylls of the Knight of Sherwood Forest, because it is the spirit of that bold, good man that has followed the movement of the people down through all these centuries and that is still embodied in the people of that beloved country to-day in a way that it is not in those of any other country in the world. It owes much to the example of men like that and it is these men that special privilege and vested interest have attempted to wipe off the annals of our glorious country. A party such as the one with which I am associated can find much to admire in these humble men who suffered so atrociously and cruelly all the way through our history at the hands of special privilege. In those days special privilege stood out in all its horrors. These knights of King Arthur's table were not what they said they were. They kept their underground dungeons into which they thrust men like Robin Hood, Wat Tyler and the rest of them. Special privilege is all right to contemplate nowadays—

Mr. LENNOX: I am a lawyer and I voted in favour of the farmer. How did the hon. member vote?

Mr. BIRD: That is the quarter from which we get all the condemnation of class representation. I never said that I voted for the farmers. I voted for my constituents, who are not all farmers.

So much for the Speech from the Throne. We will take our stand alongside the Robin Hood tradition and not alongside the cruel and conscienceless Norman barons who invaded free England in the eleventh century. The fight has gone on ever since; it is just as real to-day as ever it was. There has been no break in either of those traditions.

Now we had an amendment from the government to adjourn the House and the Progressive party acted quite logically; that is, they accepted the Speech from the Throne; they wanted to see that legislation come into force; they wanted this government to carry on, not merely by leave of the opposition, but effectively and with despatch—

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): By adjourning.

Mr. BIRD: —and all those arguments that make the plea that the government because it cannot carry on now, cannot carry on at all, are palpably far-fetched. Time alone will tell whether there is anything in that argument or not. There is talk about waste of time and perhaps our friends over there have been to blame as well as the Conservatives; but unfortunately waste of time is a normal feature of this House. It did not begin to-day; it did not begin a few weeks ago. A committee was formed in the last parliament to study this very question, to try to take up this slack. We know that our parliamentary rules, especially as they apply to a debate like this, are totally out of date. We know that the rules in respect to a debate like this are so lax that it is just as easy for an opposition of half the strength of this one to prevent the government from doing business as it is for a number of bad boys to wreck a railway express. There is no trick to it at all; just go on moving amendment after amendment. So we make no apology at all; we have not been the party that has wasted time in this House either during this session or in the last parliament.

I come to the last amendment, the one that has just passed the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: It was defeated.

Mr. BIRD: Well, it passed in disgrace. Our friends to the right have charged us with voting down this amendment condemning the Australian treaty when we voted against the Australian treaty in the last parliament. That is what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) went out of his way to try to prove. They forget that we voted against the Australian treaty—

Mr. SPEAKER: May I remind the hon. member that he may not discuss an amendment which has been disposed of by the House?

Mr. BIRD: I very much regret to have transgressed the rules. I had almost reached the point where I thought it was impossible to transgress them. I suppose I can discuss the essence of the amendment, which was high protection for Canada. This amendment—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BIRD: I do not wish to transgress the rules very much—just a little bit. I want to get a start for the next thing I desire to say. I was going to say that this amendment like the first one—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BIRD: I was going to say that high protection was at the heart of the last amendment and it was at the heart of the first one. The second one was a clever repetition of the first one. I do not say that in a bad sense at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BIRD: I am trying to compliment hon. gentlemen to my left by saying that they were clever, and their purpose is this—and I do not blame them for it—to drive a wedge through the low tariff opinion of this country. That is a perfectly legitimate line of tactics. If you can win over the horticulturist, the truck farmer, you will have a good point of vantage as regards the dairyman and some day as regards the cattle man and maybe the wheat man. My hon. friends believe in climbing up a step at a time and I do not blame them for that. Frankly speaking, I am one of those who believe and have believed for some time that their tactics are going to get a measure of success, because the appeal to self interest is the most powerful appeal when you come to political questions. If you can persuade any class of farmers that protection will pay, you will win over those farmers because farmers are no better than any other Canadians.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): Does the hon. member imply that the five Progressives who voted contrary to his party are more selfish than the rest of the Progressives?

Mr. BIRD: Not at all. I have known three of them a good deal longer than I have known the hon. gentleman and I am sufficiently well acquainted with them to know that they stand high in the esteem of the Progressive party. I am sure that any course they have taken this session is as conscientious as any course I have followed myself. When discussing this matter just now I was merely pointing out that the temptation to vote against the government was very real to all Progressives, including these five gentlemen and no one outside of the Progressive party will know how real it was.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BIRD: Hon. gentlemen to my right should accustom themselves to have the very best opinions of the motives of others. The Canadian farmer is no different from the American farmer, and if the American farmer has chosen protection I see nothing to prevent the Canadian farmer from doing the same if he believes that he can derive any benefit from so doing. But the going for our protectionist friends will become heavier and heavier as they get away from the truck farmers to the grain growers. The ease with which they have converted the small farmers on the fringe of the big cities is no index to the job they will have on their hands if they attempt to convert the grain growers of this country. I regret to say it, but I think that this is a right estimate of the average Canadian farmer. They are not all like my hon. friend to my left (Mr. Evans), who would advocate theoretical free trade through thick and thin. There is a big sprinkling of such free traders through the west, but I do not think that the average Canadian farmer is just like that; and if our friends want to make a breach in the generation-old phalanx of rural Canada they must do a lot of persuading, and they must not be too particular on what they base their persuasion. They must appeal to self interest.

The American farmers have accepted protection, but there is one thing that hon. gentlemen have forgotten, and that is that the American farmers, having experienced protection for two or three years, are at the present time agitating for the privilege of fixing prices on wheat. Now I want to say something that has not been frequently said in this House; it has not been said for the reason that the position of the farmers' organizations of this country has not been apprehended by members of this House. Since the beginning of last parliament we have seen grow up in western Canada one of the biggest co-operative organizations in the world, which to-day is marketing 70 or 80 per cent of its wheat through one channel. What does that mean? It means that in a short time the farmers of the west will all be marketing their product through the same channel. And what are these Canadian farmers going to do? If we take hon. gentlemen at their word, and believe with them that Canada has for all time decided for protection, what is the commonsense wheat grower of the west going to do?

Mr. MULLINS: Are you speaking for the wheat farmer or the man who is engaged in diversified farming?

Mr. BIRD: The question is a polite one but I do not see its relevancy. I was talking about the wheat pool and I was saying that if what our friends contend is true, that Canada has for all time to come accepted protection as the policy for this country, then something must happen within the ranks of the organized farmers of Canada. If you can persuade the farmers of this country that protection has come to stay, then they are going to come to parliament and, if the Conservatives happen to be in power, they will say, "Now then, your brick for brick policy fits in very nicely. We want 40 per cent of a duty on wheat and if the United States duty goes up to 70 cents, then brick by brick the Canadian farmer will demand that the tariff on this side be built up to that level". Then, poetic justice coming to pass, what will happen with a body of farmers controlling a stable commodity marketed through their own agency? They are going to fix prices just as much as the Ford motor works fix their prices. That will be the outcome, and when that happens the theory of protection will explode in universal derision. The part of the body politic who are at present unprovided for will at last have got their feet into the trough and will shove the other hogs along and out in order that they may share in the contents. You say that this is a very imaginary picture I am drawing, but it is not; it is very present in the minds of the farmers to the south of us in the Dakotas and in the wheat growing areas generally in the United States. And more than that, it has got to be practical politics there. It is very well known that the late Secretary of Agriculture in the United States, in the post-war period, was in favour of a price fixing arrangement whereby the American farmer could sell his product on the home market at a price that would recoup him for the cost of production. Let me quote from Henry C. Wallace's book, Our Debt and Duty to the Farmer. At page 200 he says:

> The sole purpose of the McNary-Haugen Bill was to re-establish and maintain the normal pre-war ratio between the prices of agricultural crops of which we produce an exportable surplus and the general commodity-price index, thus putting agriculture somewhat near an equality with industry and labour.

Then again at page 202:

> This bill met with astonishingly violent opposition. It was fought by grain dealers and exporters who thought it might interfere with their business; by laissez-faire economists; by those who want nothing done to relieve discontent which makes grist for their political mill; by opponents of the protective tariff system who saw in this an application to farm needs of the tariff principle; by representatives of the industrial interests who want nothing done to increase domestic prices of food products; and by many who did not study the measure for themselves but accepted at par the unintelligent criticisms made against it.

Now that is proof beyond all doubt that a movement is on the way in protectionist America whereby the farmers may recoup themselves for the cost of their production—and in the United States they have no wheat pool.

Mr. LENNOX: May I ask the hon. gentleman, if the Australian treaty protects the Australian farmers on eggs to the extent of 18 cents a dozen, what objection has he to that so far as our farmers are concerned?

Mr. BIRD: I am dealing at present with the price-fixing problem that will be precipitated if my hon. friends get their way. In Canada the wheat farmers are in an infinitely better position to take advantage of this kind of thing than the United States farmers have ever been; and as I say, if it is true that protection has come for good, then for these men on the western plains who have to send their surplus to Europe it seems to me there is only one issue: they should use their combined selling effort in order to do exactly what the manufacturers want to do under protection—raise the price of wheat to a point where it will pay them for their labour and invested capital. I do not think they will ever want 10 per cent like the Canadian Pacific Railway, or 20 per cent like the banks; but they surely have the right to demand that their return on their product should be equivalent to what they have invested in the way of labour and capital.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my voice is getting weak. My purpose in rising was not to go into these matters very extensively, but to give the House an opportunity to say whether it had had enough of amendments or not. Therefore I beg to move the following motion, seconded by the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans):

> That this question be now put.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I understand that moving the previous question permits one to discuss the whole matter at length. Therefore, unless the leader of the House desires me to continue, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—WEDNESDAY SITTING

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Robb:

> That when this House adjourns this day, it stand adjourned until three o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the House adjourned at 12.10 a.m. (Wednesday).

Wednesday, February 17, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

NATIONAL MONUMENT, CONNAUGHT SQUARE

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word in regard to the position which has been suggested for the new war memorial in Ottawa. I notice that Saturday Night of last week states that the memorial to commemorate the services and sacrifices of Canadians in the Great war will be erected by the government on Connaught square near the post office. The design as shown in the cut in Saturday Night is a very fine one. I should say that it would be a magnificent memorial to those who fell in the war. But I want to submit with all the force I can that Connaught square in front of the post office is not the proper place for it. I think most hon. members of the House will agree with me that there is no room at that point for a memorial of this size and description. That part of the city is congested at present. We need that open space in the heart of this city, and it seems to me that some very much more fitting place could be found for this magnificent memorial as shown in the cut in Saturday Night. I would suggest to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King, Kootenay) and to the government that, although in years gone by objection has been taken to placing any statue or memorial in front of the Parliament Buildings, this is a special and unique memorial; it is in memory of those who fell in the war, something that we hope will never occur again, and is therefore deserving of the best location we can give it. I suggest that the middle of the walk in front of the buildings would be a suitable and striking place for it and that the site be circular in form. In any case I urge on the government, if they have decided to put the memorial on Connaught square, to reconsider the decision because I am certain that some more satisfactory place can be found in this city for a memorial of this kind.

Hon. JAMES H. KING (Minister of Public Works): I might say in reply to my hon. friend that the whole matter was very carefully considered before the beginning of the competition which resulted in the memorial shown in Saturday Night. It is true that Connaught square is limited in area, but taking the squares in cities generally, they are all similarly restricted. Those who have been advising the government came to the conclusion that Connaught square offered the best site for the memorial. I will send my hon. friend the booklet the department got out at the time the competition was entered into and a description of the memorial designed to be set up in that square. I will be very glad to talk to my hon. friend about it, because we do realize that the square is somewhat cramped. But if you take the view coming up Sparks street or Wellington street and looking towards the square, you will find the monument will stand out very well. However, I will be very glad to confer with my hon. friend and give the matter consideration.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: What the minister says is quite correct. The memorial would be seen well from every point of the city coming towards it, but the base of this monument is 24 feet by 26 feet, and I submit to the minister that there would be very little space left after the monument was placed there, and that there would be too great a congestion right in the heart of the city.

Mr. McGIBBON: Will the minister undertake to have the matter discussed in the House before it is finally settled?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes, an opportunity will be afforded for discussion.

DEATH OF QUEEN ALEXANDRA

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following resolution from the Senate:

> The Senate doth unite with the House of Commons in their Address to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, expressing the deep regret and heartfelt sorrow of the House at the demise of Her Majesty the late Queen Mother Alexandra, and have filled in the blank space therein with the words "Senate and."

And also a second resolution:

> Requesting this House to unite with the Senate in an Address to His Excellency the Governor General praying His Excellency to transmit the Joint Address of both Houses to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, expressing the deep regret and heartfelt sorrow at the demise of Her Majesty the late Queen Mother, in such a way as to His Excellency may seem fit, in order that the same may be laid at the foot of the Throne, and that they fill in the blank space therein with the word "Commons."

TRANSPORTATION OF COAL

SEVEN DOLLAR RATE ON ALBERTA COAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): I would like to read this telegram and to ask two questions:

> Seven dollar rate on Alberta coal is stopped needing fifty cars more to meet the immediate demand my stock of fuel has dwindled to ten tons although I had stored some since July and made contract with the largest manufacturer of coke for eight cars per month they fell down to six last month and not one car shipped this month have schools and street railway contracts and not three days supply on hand situation very acute.

WM. BUCHANAN.

Mr. Buchanan handled over one hundred carloads of Alberta coal last season and I am at a loss to know why the government do not act in regard to this matter. They have received, I am satisfied, many requests from western Ontario and, in fact, from all parts of Ontario to do something to relieve the coal situation. There is no use of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) telling members of parliament from Ontario to look to the fuel controller of that province, because he is powerless to act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I am going to ask a question. If necessary, I will move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. BOIVIN: That has already been done.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Let the minister tell the House what he has been doing. I want to ask what the minister has done and what he intends to do in regard to this matter.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton, Minister of the Interior): The minister intends to act on the request of the fuel controller of Ontario. So far, the minister has not heard from that fuel controller. Might I ask the hon. member where Mr. Buchanan lives?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): London, Ontario.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): The fuel controller of Ontario is acting on behalf of that province for the distribution of coal, and so far as I am aware, we have from him no communication whatever.

RATE ON NOVA SCOTIA COAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): May I ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, West Edmonton) whether he has seen Sir Henry Thornton to-day in regard to freight rates for the transportation of 15,000 tons of coal from Sydney Mines? I understood, as did some of our friends on this side, from the Minister of the Interior that he was anxious to facilitate this matter and that at the earliest opportunity he would see Sir Henry Thornton. I saw him in the city to-day and I should like to know whether the minister also has seen him and whether he can give to the House some assurance that the rate will be put into force.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton, Minister of the Interior): I did not know Sir Henry Thornton was in the city; that is news to me. May I say again however, in the hope that I shall be able to get it across to hon. members opposite, that neither the government nor any member of the government is negotiating freight rates with the Canadian National Railways; that is the prerogative of the railway company itself. As I have repeatedly declared, I am willing to use my good offices in the matter, but beyond that I can do nothing.

Mr. CANTLEY: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CANTLEY: Pardon me for asking—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CANTLEY: I may ask another question with the permision of the Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the hon. member desires to put another question.

Mr. CANTLEY: I take it, Mr. Speaker, that I have your permision to ask another question of the minister. Is it the intention of the minister to implement the promise he made us on this side the other day to see Sir Henry Thornton in order to facilitate the movement of coal from Nova Scotia?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I certainly shall be willing to do that at any time, but that is not the implication that hon. gentlemen wish to convey. And that is the point I desire to make clear. I have repeatedly stated that I am ready to use my good offices, but I am not going to be put in the position in which hon. gentlemen are endeavouring to place me as being a negotiator in the matter of freight rates.

NEW ZEALAND PREFERENTIAL TARIFF

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. RAYMOND MORAND (East Essex): Was the Government notified of customs regulations C No. 34, New Zealand, requiring fifty per cent Canadian labour and material and not fifty per cent British Empire labour and materials for entry under preferential duty? If so, does the government know that this regulation closes the New Zealand market to practically all automobile manufacturers in Canada? What remedial steps are being taken to correct this condition?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Through the courtesy of my hon. friend in advising us yesterday that he was going to ask this question, I was enabled to check up the records, and I am now in a position to give him a reply which, I hope, will be reassuring to the industries in his constituency as well as to similar industries in other parts of Canada. I have the following memorandum:

1. The Department of Trade and Commerce received a copy of customs regulations C No. 4 New Zealand. There is nothing in the new regulations to bear out the statement that the regulations require fifty per cent Canadian labour and material and not fifty per cent British Empire labour and material, to enter under a preferential duty. The new regulations, to be in force as from the 1st April, 1926, are practically the same as the former regulations, excepting that "one-fourth of the factory or works cost" is changed to read "one-half of the factory or works cost." Among "the classes of goods which shall be deemed for the purposes of the Customs Amendment Act, 1921, to be the produce or manufacture of countries the produce or manufacture of which are entitled to be entered for duty under the British preferential tariff," section 5, (d) of the regulations enumerates the following:

"Goods partially produced or partially manufactured in such countries; provided that the final process of manufacture has been performed in one of such countries—

That is, British countries.

—and also that the expenditure in material produced in such countries and or labour performed within such countries (calculated subject to the qualification in the next succeeding regulation hereof) in each and every article is not less than one-half of the factory or works cost of such article in its finished state."

I wish to direct the attention of my hon. friend and the House to this:

2. Instead of closing automobile factories in Canada, the new regulations will encourage the manufacture of the increased proportion in Canada or within the British Empire.

The new regulations have been published in the Canadian Commercial Intelligence Journal dated December 12, 1925.

Mr. MORAND: Might I ask the Minister of Finance whether he has seen the interpretation put on that regulation by Mr. Stevenson, official representative for New Zealand at New York, which is the interpretation that the automobile manufacturers have at the present time and upon which they have practically ceased manufacturing for export to New Zealand?

Mr. ROBB: I have not seen that interpretation, but I wish to make it clear again that, as I understand the matter, under the New Zealand regulations, the final process must be in Canada; that is, one-half of the work could not be done in a British country and then shipped to the United States and finished there. The United States cannot take advantage of the conditions which are made cast iron that the final process must be within a British country.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

SHIPMENT OF CATTLE TO GREAT BRITAIN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): I have in my hand a communication which I would like to read for the benefit of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), in order to get his opinion and answer in reference to the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. This letter pertains to the live stock industry, one of the basic industries of this country, and it reads:

In our conversation a short time ago you were anxious to know how the first shipment of cattle on the ss. "Ontario" turned out. As you are aware she left St. John on the night of January 24, and was in the worst storm on the Atlantic in a period of over thirty years. The steamer discharged fifty per cent of her cattle at Birkenhead on the night of February 7, after having stopped at Queenstown on account of a shortage of coal. From Birkenhead to Glasgow the master cabled she made a speed of eleven knots per hour and discharged her cattle in Glasgow in excellent condition. The most of the cattle were on the lower decks of the steamer.

I want to emphasize that so that the minister will understand the situation:

Mr. Irwin cabled the following: "Cattle weighed as usual shrinkage 5.90 to seven per cent the lowest on record for winter journey."

It speaks phenomenally for the live stock industry that, after coming through such a terrible storm at sea, our Canadian cattle stood up so well on that journey. The Live Stock Producers' Limited have taken these ships of the Jensen line and refitted them. Why cannot the government merchant marine ships be fitted in a similar way to those of the Jensen line so that they may be used in helping the live stock industry of this country?

THE AUSTRALIAN TREATY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): I desire to call the attention of the government to a Canadian Press cable from London which appeared in the Mail and Empire of the 16th instant with reference to the debate in this House on the Australian treaty. According to this communication, Representative Rodgers of the Australian parliament, referring to the discussion in the Canadian House of Commons on the treaty between Canada and Australia—

—suggested that the government should inform Canada that Australia cannot allow a treaty solemnly made after great deliberation to become a political plaything of the three parties in Canada. When the treaty was negotiated many other countries were prepared to give Australia trade advantages but Australia preferred this treaty as an empire family matter, he said.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEENAN: The despatch goes on:

Premier Stanley Bruce said that as head of the government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I take it for granted that the hon. member will conclude by putting a question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Exactly.

Mr. HEENAN: I will read just one sentence and base a question upon it.

Premier Stanley Bruce said that as head of the government he could not express his views on any action which the Canadian parliament might take regarding the treaty, which Australia welcomed for the reason that it might do something to promote reciprocal trade within the British Empire.

In view of the vote which was taken in this House last night, will the leader of the government intimate to the Australian authorities that we do not in Canada treat our treaties as scraps of paper?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Answering the question of my hon. friend—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROBB: I do not mind saying that the hon. member informed me before coming into the House that he would ask the question. I read in yesterday morning's press a despatch from Australia giving a purported interview by Representative Rodgers and I was a bit disturbed in consequence. Representative Rodgers was, on the occasion of the negotiation of the treaty, Minister of Trade and Customs in the government of Mr. Hughes and although he was defeated in the election of that year he was re-elected in the recent election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How old is he?

Mr. ROBB: He is between forty and forty-five and is a very estimable gentleman like my right hon. friend. I hope our friends in New Zealand and Australia will not take too seriously the debate we have had in the House recently.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 16, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. C. Elliott for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed motion of Mr. Bird: "That this question be now put."

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): When I rose in my place last evening and temporarily gave way to the member for Toronto East Centre (Mr. Bristol) I did not know whether he was rising to a point of order or merely to register a pair, but in the practice with which I had been familiar I took it for granted that in giving way to another member by courtesy one did not lose one's precedence. Nevertheless, I abide by the ruling of the Chair and I intend, with the permission of the House, to proceed to discuss the previous question. The authorities on parliamentary practice note in all the volumes that the chief object of moving the previous question is to prevent an amendment to the main question and thus to force a direct vote on the main question to the exclusion of all possible amendments. I remember that so recently as 1913, when the previous question was moved in this House, hon. gentlemen opposite, whom I am glad to see still here, spoke of it as a most shameful proceeding on the part of the government of that day to gag public debate and prevent the free expression of opinion in the parliament of this country.

I have not yet had the privilege of speaking on this Address, but I had given notice to my friends on this side and, through the press, to hon. gentlemen opposite, that at the earliest opportunity I intended moving a simple vote of want of confidence in this government by way of amendment to the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. That was well known to hon. members on both sides of the House and perhaps I am not mistaken in deducing that while hon. gentlemen opposite, in view of their attitude in 1913, felt that they could not pursue a course which they had at that time described as so shameful, they had nevertheless secured the co-operation of the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) on this occasion.

Mr. BIRD: I rise to a question of privilege. I totally repudiate the suggestion of the hon. member.

Mr. CAHAN: I still persist in my statement, although I accept the hon. member's denial so far as it goes.

An hon. MEMBER: Withdraw.

An hon. MEMBER: Take it back.

Mr. BIRD: I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. My repudiation goes all the way. I entirely repudiate the suggestion that there was any co-operation between the government and myself.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, I am bound to accept the statement of the hon. member for Nelson, so far as it goes; but I hope before this debate has proceeded too far some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House will declare also that they have not directly or indirectly procured the moving of a motion that they themselves were afraid and ashamed to move.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The hon. member for Nelson repudiated the statement made by the hon. gentleman who is speaking—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): —that any negotiations had taken place between the Liberal party and himself with respect to the motion he made last night. The hon. member who is now speaking persists—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): He persists in asserting—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I am debating a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Nelson has denied that there was any arrangement between himself and the government with reference to the motion he made last night, and I understand that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has accepted his denial.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, before the—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is true the denial was accepted, Mr. Speaker, but I hope it is not understood that the hon. member for Nelson was able to speak for the government as well as for his own side.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, if the right hon. gentleman desires to have the repudiation of the government of the statement made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, I rise to repudiate it.

Mr. SPEAKER: This is apparently a love feast, so we may accept the statements of both sides and proceed to business.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, in order to clarify the atmosphere, I might also suggest that before this debate is closed the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), the leader of the Progressive party, might declare to this House whether or not the hon. member for Nelson in moving the previous question was doing so with the authority of the leader of the Progressive party and with the approval of his fellow-members of that party in caucus assembled.

Mr. FORKE: I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George would like to know all about the policy of the Progressive party.

Mr. CAHAN: Not only does the member for St. Lawrence-St. George have a vital interest in the matter, because there is a vital public interest in it, but the people of this country have a right to know the attitude of the hon. leader of the Progressive party when an attempt is made by one of his followers in this House to do what hon. leaders of the Liberal party have time and time again declared to be an attempt to gag the expression of public opinion. While I am bound to accept the statements which have been made, I shall await with some anxiety indeed a full declaration of the attitude of the leader of the Progressive party with regard to the matter I have placed before him.

In the history of the parliamentary practice of England I find that the use of the "previous question" goes back some three centuries, when it was introduced by those in authority for the purpose of suppressing subjects of delicate interest relating to high personages or that might call for observations of a dangerous tendency. I do not know whether the hon. member for Nelson is so extremely anxious to bring this debate to a close for the purpose of preparing conditions under which the Customs investigation may be closed also. I do not know whether he is afraid of being forced to vote on the direct issue of want of confidence in this government. I infer there are members on the Progressive side of the House who would find it very difficult, in view of present conditions, to register a vote of confidence in this government if the direct issue were placed before the House. Early in the session there was an issue of want of confidence, but the hon. Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Boivin), with that dialectic skill for which he is so well known, succeeded in impressing the members of the Progressive party with the idea that a vote in support of the government on the amendment then before the House would not be regarded by the government as a vote of confidence. It is only by reason of that explanation, Mr. Speaker, that I can reconcile the statements made in this House with the vote that the Progressive members registered when that issue came before them on a division. One member of the Progressive party, the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), rising in her place, declared:

I believe all can agree that the King government played atrociously poor politics when it continued to hold office after the verdict of the people had been given. The effect of this verdict, as I am sure all Liberals will in their hearts but not with their lips admit, is the increasing resentment of the people of Canada against them.

Then again, the hon. member said:

During the last parliament the King government gave us only crumbs of reform, and those grudgingly. The King government could have put through any reform which we favoured, but instead of that they chose of their own free will to mark time and to appeal to the country on the plea that they had not a sufficient majority, and now weakened in numbers and in prestige the same government comes back and promises everything.

Continuing, the hon. member said—

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I was going to allow my hon. friend to continue his quotation, but hon. gentlemen opposite seemingly intend to use all the freedom of speech possible. I have no objection to it, provided that they follow the rules. My hon. friend has no right to quote from a speech made by an hon. member in another debate during the same session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, oh.

Mr. CANNON: The speech made by the hon. member for Southeast Grey was made on the motion as to whether or not this government had the right to meet parliament. It was not made on the Address.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is the same debate. The speech was made on the resolution that the Address have precedence.

Mr. CANNON: No, no. It is not the same debate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I submit for your decision, Mr. Speaker, that such a resolution involves a debate on the Address—

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, no.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It throws us back to the debate on the Address and all matters arising out of it.

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no question about the rule and the usage. The point raised by the hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) is well taken; but Bourinot says—I have not the authority under my hand at the present moment, but I read it the other day—that without quoting the ipsissima verba of a speech delivered in another debate, without quoting the actual words themselves, an hon. member can build up an argument on the tenor of that speech.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There you are, the ipsissima verba.

Mr. CANNON: I contend that the actual words were quoted by the hon. member; therefore it is against the rule.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One has not the time to get to the actual authority in a second, but I speak with some confidence when I say that Your Honour will find that matters that may have been referred to in a previous debate which are directly relevant to the debate in question may be quoted. I might refer to Bourinot.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have read the authority.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the matters are directly relevant to the debate in question they may be quoted, but they cannot be quoted unless they are.

Mr. SPEAKER: According to my reading of Bourinot, the tenor of a speech delivered in another debate may be used as a basis for argument, but not the ipsissima verba. If the hon. member, therefore, will undertake not to quote the actual words he may build up an argument upon them.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is the point.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, in conformity with parliamentary usage the president of the tribunal will say that in the interest of accuracy he has procured a copy of the very words used. In order that I might not misrepresent the hon. member for Southeast Grey I procured a copy of the exact transcription of the words which she did use. But now, depending upon my own memory of that debate and having the exact statement before me which she did use, I wish to state that the hon. member declared—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CAHAN: —words to the effect—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. CANNON: The rules of this House apply to every member of it, including the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, although he is one of the youngest.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is quite within the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. Solicitor General seems to be very anxious to prevent discussion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friends will allow me—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Order.

Mr. CANNON: —I wish to state—

Mr. CAHAN: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. CANNON: We have had the decision of Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. CANNON: We have had the decision of Mr. Speaker, and I want the hon. member to follow that decision. We have had a ruling from Mr. Speaker and every hon. member must observe it. Every hon. gentleman is obliged to follow the ruling of the chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member is doing so.

Mr. CAHAN: I may say that I knew the rules of the House when the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Cannon) was a mere child. No member of this House has a greater respect for the rules and the ruling of the Speaker than I have.

Mr. CANNON: Well, show it.

An hon. MEMBER: Go ahead.

Mr. CAHAN: Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, that I am to await your ruling?

Mr. CANNON: It has been given.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman may not quote the exact words used by the hon. member for Southeast Grey as reported in Hansard, but I have already ruled that in conformity with the best authorities he may use his memory and thus refer to that speech.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that Hansard will disclose that when I was interrupted without excuse by the hon. Solicitor General I was observing that from my memory I could say that the hon. member for Southeast Grey—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I now have the necessary authority in my hand. At page 357 of Bourinot, 12th edition, I find the following:

[Mr. Cannon.]

> Neither can a member, in speaking, refer to anything said or done in a previous debate during the same session—a rule necessary to economize the time of the House, and a restraint upon members to prevent them from reviving a debate already concluded. . . . But a reference to, though not a quotation from, a previous debate, by way of illustration, is in order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: "A reference."

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, I wish to say again, if I am allowed to finish the sentence, that from my memory of the remarks of the hon. member for Southeast Grey she said that she had absolutely no confidence in the King government, that she was not pleased with their past performances and had no confidence whatever in their present promises. Words to a similar effect were used by other Progressive members in my hearing in this House, and therefore I can understand that there may be somewhat of an indirect motive on the part of the hon. member for Nelson in excluding, as he has attempted to exclude, any division upon a direct vote of want of confidence in the government. I wish to say to that hon. member, who represents the constituency of Nelson, including the port on the Hudson bay of which we have heard very frequently lately, and who has a great interest, I believe, in the completion of a railway through his constituency, that I for one, speaking for myself only, am prepared in this House to consider every measure brought before us on its merits, and to decide on every issue as I conscientiously believe I should decide in the general interests of the people of this whole country. But when the hon. gentleman seeks to preclude us from reaching a vote of want of confidence in this House; when he seeks to gag us in the discussion of what we regard as material and vital to the interests of this country, I can tell him that so far as I am concerned he will have to change the rules of the House to prevent my obstructing, in order to prevent the forcing through of any such measure as that.

Mr. BIRD: May I ask the hon. member to tell me what the committee of strategy was doing at that time?

Mr. CAHAN: I have not been taken into the confidence of the committee of strategy of the Progressive group, and I expect to have a clear exposition from the hon. leader of that group as to the strategic arrangements that have been made by him with his follower the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird).

Miss MacPHAIL: If the Conservative party wanted an expression of want of confidence in the government, may I ask why they did not use one of the many opportunities they have had to move a straight want of confidence motion?

Mr. CAHAN: All I can say to the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) is that I do not profess to be able to express fully the opinion of the Conservative party in this House; I leave that for the right hon. leader of the party (Mr. Meighen) to do at the proper time. But I do say this: Every member in this House has the right to express his views on this Address and to move, if he deems it to be expedient in the public interest, any proper amendment which he sees fit to move, and I as an individual member of this House had intended to make a direct motion of want of confidence in the government by way of amendment to the Address. I feel very much grieved indeed that I have been prevented from bringing that motion before the House.

Mr. BROWN: Did the hon. member notify the Progressive party that he intended to move such an amendment?

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, I had assumed that there was a certain degree of intelligence in the leadership of the Progressive group in this House and that they took the trouble to read the news of the day; and the news of the day would have informed them that for some ten days at least I have been waiting for the first opportunity possible to move an amendment.

Before I proceed to discuss the Address at length, I wish to call attention to one matter which is distinctly of public interest. It is asserted by the press of this country that the Conservative party in this House are wasting the time of the House, are delaying the business of parliament, are incurring unduly large expense by continuing the debate on this Address; in fact, by way of excuse, some of them have pretended to find some justification for us in alleging that under the rules of the House the Address must take precedence and that it is impossible to conduct any other business in the House while the Address is under debate. I wish to state clearly that there are no such rules. The position in which we are placed is due to the specific resolutions moved by the hon. leader of the House (Mr. Lapointe) and adopted by this House, some of them under our protest and on division.

First, the acting leader of the government moved a resolution on a certain day that the debate on the Address have precedence over all other public and private business in this House, and then, having obtained the passage of that resolution, he proceeded on a subsequent day to move that upon the debate on the Address being concluded this House do adjourn and stand adjourned until March the 15th. That is a fair statement of those two resolutions. Now those two resolutions in effect prevented this House from carrying on any public or private business that it might have carried on except for the moving and passage of those two resolutions, and I place upon the government of this country the distinct responsibility of having passed, on its own initiative, resolutions through this House which in any event, except in the event of the defeat of the government, precluded this House from transacting any public or private business until March the 15th. The fact, Mr. Speaker, that we on this side of the House have proceeded to discuss the matters raised by the Address and the several amendments to the Address has not cost this country, and will not cost this country, one dollar extra by way of stipend or payment to the hon. members of this House who are here under their own expenses, paying their own expenses like public men, and willing and anxious to conduct the public business of the country as presented to parliament to a sure and speedy conclusion.

Furthermore, the right hon. leader of the government—the hon. leader, I think it is, but I have such a great affection for him that I wish to give him all the titles I can—when invited by the right hon. leader of the opposition to specify one single measure of public importance that the government were now prepared to bring before this House, could not indicate a single measure which was prepared and ready for submission. Therefore I wish distinctly to deny in this House and to deny to the country as a whole the charge that we are wasting the time of the House. I say that we are not wasting one dollar of public funds while we sit here to force this government to enter upon the real business of parliament and to bring it to a speedy end.

Mr. MORIN (St. Hyacinthe): May I ask the hon. gentleman whether the House has not already pronounced on the adjournment?

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so, but at the instigation of the leader of the government, who wished thereby to prevent this House from doing business.

I wish to return from these incidental matters arising out of the initiation of closure in this House to discuss for just a moment the address given by the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird). The hon. gentleman raised one of his heroes to the rank of a household deity, the Robin Hood of whose exploits we heard in our boyhood, and he especially commended Robin Hood for one thing that I never heard him commended for before, and that was his anxiety to maintain liberty of speech in England, the liberty of the free expression of the individual; yet in the name of that titulary deity he proceeded to gag the members of this House and to forbid them from giving utterance to their opinions. I have such a high appreciation, from what I have heard in this House, of the independence, the fairness, I may say the impartiality, of a considerable number of the members of the Progressive group, that I still decline to believe they are unanimous in support of his motion. If they are unanimous in support of his motion I would suggest again to the hon. leader of that party that he take his proper place on the other side of the chamber, where he may give counsel and assistance to the government of the day and where we may look him in the face and regard him not as a treacherous friend who would stab in the back those on this side of the House, but as a political foe whom we may meet face to face in this parliament.

I do not expect by any argument I may use in this House to convert the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans). I would assume that he came to this House afflicted, intellectually of course, by a certain form of Bright's disease which has affected his intellectual insight, and that he is quite incapable of looking at issues which arise in this House purely from a Canadian standpoint. I wish to say further, Mr. Speaker, that in all matters relating to the economic development of this country I am a Canadian, and in regard to all domestic matters concerning this country I am a nationalist, anxious, more than anxious, to build up on a firm foundation a great, strong, stable Canadian nationality.

Mr. EVANS: I repudiate entirely the ungentlemanly insinuation which the hon. gentleman makes. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am a Canadian.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. EVANS: I wish to state that I am a Canadian as purely as the hon. member.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. EVANS: I have made my contribution to the country as much as he has.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is there a point of order?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. gentleman is speaking with the leave of the member who has the floor.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. EVANS: I am on a question of privilege, to repudiate the ungentlemanly inference—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has the floor.

Mr. CAHAN: I am always willing to retract and to put my statement another way. Instead of saying that mentally and intellectually my hon. friend is afflicted with Bright's disease, I will recall the statement and say that it is the Cobden-Bright disease, which I think entirely obscures his mental vision and prevents him from studying the real interests of the country as a whole. I remember, Mr. Speaker, many years ago swinging on a gate in front of my father's home and seeing the carriages with their flags go by, carrying the voters to the first election held in Canada after the union of 1867. Since that time I may say that Canada has held my supreme affection, and whatever course I may have taken, whatever mistakes I may have made, there was always in my heart a desire to see a Canadian nationality established politically independent of the United States of America, and maintaining its due relationship to England and to the sister colonies. In order to build up Canada on those lines, my old province of Nova Scotia, which has ever been associated by respect and esteem—I might almost say affection—with the other Maritime provinces and the province of Quebec, has united with the provinces in the east to carry forward policies which were not necessarily of great advantage to themselves, but were of public interest and necessary for the development of Canada as a whole. If we had been wanting in that spirit of patriotism; if we had been wanting in the spirit of self-sacrifice; and if we had not in the eastern province developed our commercial and industrial institutions to a considerable degree, Canada's international credit would never have been sufficient to enable her to raise the funds necessary to carry through the first line of railway into the northwest and to open up that country for our settlers. Had it not been for that spirit, Saskatchewan to-day would be growing prairie grass and over-run by buffalo, as it was in my boyhood days. But I do not wish to recount these things. We built those roads in the early days out of a spirit of Canadian patriotism; we made sacrifices for the good of the whole country in the building up and development of the northwest. With that spirit—and I am well acquainted with the people from the Maritime provinces—I do not believe there is in this House a member from any of those districts who will cavil at any measure which is brought forward and which is necessary for the proper development of the northwest and the general prosperity and wellbeing of the people of those western districts.

One hon. member, I think he was a member of the Liberal party, delivered an address at some length in which he spoke of agriculture as being one of the primary industries of this country and referred to the absolute necessity of encouraging the farming industry, especially the interests of the wheat growers of the west. In that I entirely agree with him. But the people of Canada cannot live by wheat alone; they require other industries than that of raising wheat. I remember in my province, when the middle west was opened up and produced wheat at a lower figure than that at which we could raise it, our farmers were driven out of that branch of farming known as the production of wheat. I remember being told in my early days that the old Grand Pré valley, which is now used for ordinary farming, was one of the best wheat producing districts in the world as to quality, having due regard to the size and extent of the area planted. But those days are gone, and it is necessary that members of this House should have a broad perspective in dealing with questions relating to the future of this country. I know something about wheat growing, and I will venture to say that I have a farm with a wheat field which will compare favourably with any two wheat fields owned by any two members of the Progressive or Liberal party from Alberta or Saskatchewan. I know something about the wheat trade, and I say to them that in a branch of farming which is largely speculative under present conditions they have reached the heyday of their prosperity if they continue to grow wheat alone When you find Russia on its feet again and producing wheat; when you have more competition—and it is bound to come—from Australia and Argentina, you farmers of the west will discover that unless you can grow wheat and put it on the market at your own railway stations at something like seventy or seventy-five cents a bushel, you will be forced into other forms of production in order to maintain the prosperity of those provinces. But in the meantime I concede that that industry, which was encouraged especially during the war and which gave not only to us but to the armies of the allies their sustenance through that great conflict, will never make any reasonable appeal to the whole body of this House without receiving a unanimous response.

We are all as anxious to benefit Saskatchewan as we are to further the interests of any other province. But when the hon. member for Rosetown rises in his place and speaks of the poverty of the farmers of that province, I wish to tell him that according to statistics compiled by the government of this country, no other province in Canada has as great wealth per capita as Saskatchewan. The western provinces come first in per capita wealth, Saskatchewan holding the first place with a per capita wealth of $3,757, Alberta second with a per capita wealth of $3,317, and Manitoba third with a per capita wealth of $2,705, as compared with Ontario, $2,507, and Quebec, $2,347, while Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have one-half the per capita wealth of Saskatchewan. I say to them that in every matter we of the east have dealt or endeavoured to deal with them fairly. When they were carved out as provinces from the territories of the west, parliament was unanimous in giving them large subsidies from the federal treasury in order that they might be placed in a really excellent position to carry out their work in building up new provinces from those territories. But Nova Scotia, if we take it as it is to-day with a population of 523,837, receives from the federal government by the way of subsidy $661,853, while Saskatchewan, with a somewhat higher population—828,600—received more than three times as much, namely, $1,757,005 per annum. That is, Saskatchewan, with 58 per cent more population than Nova Scotia, receives 165 per cent more subsidy from the federal treasury of this country. We of the east look upon this country as a whole. We cannot live by bread alone. The development of natural resources such as coal, the fisheries and the lumber from our forests is on an equal basis with the development of agriculture.

Mr. FORKE: Just for information, I would like to ask the hon. member if he knows how those per capita figures are made up in regard to the wealth of the people of the different provinces. Do they take into consideration liabilities by way of mortgages or other indebtedness of individuals in the several provinces?

Mr. CAHAN: I am reading from one of the reports issued by the Bureau of Statistics, published under the authority of Hon. T. A. Low, M.P., 1924, at Ottawa, entitled, A Report on the National Wealth of Canada and its Provinces. I am accepting that as a fair criterion in a general way of the position as regards the wealth of the different provinces. The government of this country, through its Bureau of Statistics, has entered upon an inquiry as to the productive activities upon which the prosperity of Canada depends, and it proceeds on the basis that such productive activities may be ascertained from year to year by consideration of the net value of commodities produced in this country for consumption at home and for export abroad. Making this computation on a broad basis, the Bureau of Statistics estimates approximately the national income of the Canadian people and thereby ascertains the values available for the maintenance of our own citizens, for the support of all public services, for taxation of every sort, and for the annual accretions of savings for the increase in future of these industrial activities. They take the year 1923, the very latest for which they have complete statistics, showing that in that year agriculture yielded $1,107,000,000 of produce. Economists both in this country and in the United States have criticized that figure as an over-estimate due to the fact that a considerable portion of the products of agriculture was used on the farm for seeding purposes and for the maintenance of farm animals and the like. They declare that that $1,107,000,000, in relation to the further figures which I am about to quote, should be somewhat reduced.

Of forestry, fisheries, trapping, mining and the development of electrical power, hydro-electric largely, the net income of the Canadian people was $654,000,000. But taking into account manufactures, construction and repairs, which are part of the manufacturing industry, and the net increase in value accruing to raw and partly manufactured products by converting them into commodities of a more finished character, thus necessitating the employment of machinery, labour and capital, the net spread between the original cost of the commodities entering into factories and the value of those commodities on leaving the factories was $1,581,000,000. Thus the value created by the industry of this country, comprising manufacturing, construction and repairs, exceeds by more than half as much again the value produced by the entire agricultural industry of this whole country. I am quite willing to admit that of that agricultural production practically one-third in 1923 was wheat alone, and therefore I have always contended that wheat production must receive peculiarly favourable consideration from the people of this country. But the manufacturing industry of Canada created $1,581,000,000 of wealth in one year in the production of things which are as necessary to the well-being of Canada as is the production of wheat itself.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. CAMPBELL: In those figures in relation to industrial products, are there not included dairy products such as butter, cheese and so forth?

Mr. CAHAN: I understand that the products of the cheese and butter factories are included in them, but not the output of domestic production. That, I believe, is the distinction; but if I am incorrect I can look into the figures at some future time and possibly explain them.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The hon. member will admit that the figures he has given are hardly fair to the agricultural industry inasmuch as a vast amount of the products which are classified as manufactures represent agricultural produce.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so; and there is not a single mechanical product, no matter how refined the process of its manufacture may be, which cannot be said to be due ultimately to the production of raw material in this country or elsewhere. For example a certain quantity of the wool of this country or of cotton imported from abroad is subjected to various processes of manufacture, all of which involve the use of machinery of some kind, and these processes contribute to the creation of wealth, which forms a part of the tangible income of the country. Now, in creating a billion and a half of manufactured wealth in 1923 we gave employment in Canada to a large body of our people in cities, towns and villages; and if that manufacturing industry is imperilled, as it was imperilled by the pronouncements of this government a year ago, I am prepared to prove that there will be driven from this country into foreign countries 45 per cent of our existing population, who will go elsewhere to produce the same things that they are producing in Canada to-day. And this will necessitate the importation from abroad of such articles of prime necessity as are indispensable to ordinary decent living in this country.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Does the hon. member distinguish between wealth created and wealth produced?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know; I should have to go back to the days I studied political economy—

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): In the production of wealth it is necessary to use other materials, whereas the farmer can create wealth simply by taking it out of the land.

Mr. CAHAN: I remember the old ditty: For want of a nail, the shoe was lost; for want of a shoe, the horse was lost; for want of a horse, the rider was lost; for want of a rider, the battle was lost. They were all necessary to the achievement of the great end; and the point I wish to make is that every department of human endeavour is necessary in this country to build up a strong, united and prosperous people. Therefore the man who works in a factory and helps in that way to create wealth is doing as essential a work and is discharging as patriotic a duty as are the 250,000 farmers of the west and of Canada who are producing wheat, which sails overseas and is sold at such prices as the impoverished people of middle Europe can afford to pay for the temporary sustenance which they require in order to carry on the industries of those countries. And those industries very largely supply to the people of Canada the ordinary necessities of life which, if given an opportunity, Canadians could produce at home.

Mr. BALDWIN: If the hon. member will allow me a question—how many speeches such as he is delivering now does he think it would take to bring about a united Canada?

Mr. CAHAN: I do not know from what part of the country the hon. gentleman comes—

Mr. BALDWIN: From Quebec.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, if the hon. gentleman is from the province of Quebec he must have noticed the policy adopted and pursued by the hon. gentleman who leads the provincial government. The policy which I advocate is the policy which the Premier of Quebec and his associates have been advocating for some years. They have laid down the sound economic doctrine that no country grows wealthy, no peoples become prosperous, simply by producing raw materials for export, simply by becoming hewers of wood and drawers of water for foreign peoples. My hon. friend will have noticed that the hon. Mr. Caron—I think he is the Minister of Agriculture in the provincial government of Quebec—has been making address after address throughout his province in which he has declared that it is absolutely necessary for its well-being that there should be protection of farm products. My hon. friend will find that he not only repeated that declaration in the provincial legislature, but that under his auspices—at least I assume so—certain agricultural circles or associations have been formed which are advocating exactly the same policy. I refer particularly to Mr. Caron's letter to the secretary of the Sociétè Agricole of St. Césaire of March 5, 1925, in which, if I recollect correctly, he laid down the policy of protection for the farm products of that province. The government of Quebec, almost alone of our provincial governments, has prohibited, so far as it could under the constitution, the export of pulpwood to the United States, insisting that all the pulpwood taken off the crown lands of that province should be manufactured within its borders in order to give increased employment and increased prosperity to its people. That government has also during the present session of the legislature introduced a bill prohibiting the export of hydro-electric power to any foreign country. It has proposed and, according to the statements of the premier, is now considering measures for restraining to a certain extent the export of asbestos in order to encourage its manufacture in the province. In short, within its constitutional powers the government of Quebec is carrying out in every way possible a policy of protection for home industries and of encouraging other industries to come into the province. I do not intend to discuss with any member from the province the question of protection in Quebec.

Mr. BALDWIN: Will the hon. gentleman allow me another question?

Mr. CAHAN: I will answer any questions if the hon. gentleman will save them up until I am through. Let me take the other address to which I referred—I will not read it, following the decision of His Honour—which was given in this House by the member for Joliette (Mr. Denis) a few days ago—in which he very frankly declared that not only had he himself procured his election by adherence to a policy of protection for home industries, but that a considerable number of members on his side of the House had also expressed the same views and had approved of the same platform during the recent contest. I know something about that province, and I think I can say without fear of contradiction that in its principal towns there is a strong feeling in favour of a protective tariff to the extent necessary to safeguard domestic industries. In some of the rural districts where the people realize that their best market, in fact in some cases their only market, is in the neighbouring towns and villages, there has been a growing feeling in favour of safeguarding and protecting the farm products of Quebec; and any person who imagines he can appeal to the provinces on the sole issue of free trade is mightily mistaken if he thinks he can obtain there any general support for such a policy.

To pursue my general argument, we have in the last five years—and I am referring to it again—lost at least half a million Canadian-born citizens to the United States. Very few of them were farmers; the great majority had been engaged in some local industry, and in view of our factories closing down and so diminishing employment—something that happened in too many of our towns and cities—it became necessary for a considerable body of our most expert mechanics to procure employment in the industrial centres of the United States. Those people have been driven abroad by what I regard as the entirely mistaken policy of the government of the day. I remember very well the unpleasant thrill which went through industrial circles in eastern Canada in March, 1923, when the legislature of Saskatchewan—under the leadership of the Hon. Mr. Dunning, who, I understand, has become the chief counsellor of the Prime Minister and is slated to become a member of this government—on March 1, 1923, unanimously passed this resolution:

Resolved, that in the opinion of this assembly, it is the duty of the government of Canada to introduce legislation which shall have for its effect the following:

(1) An immediate and substantial all-round reduction of the customs tariff.

(2) The reduction of the customs duty on goods imported from Great Britain to one-half of the rates charged under the general tariff, and that further gradual uniform reductions be made to the remaining tariff on British imports that will insure complete free trade between Great Britain and Canada.

The economic and tariff policies proclaimed by Mr. Dunning in Saskatchewan and unanimously endorsed by the legislature of Saskatchewan, were taken up in the following year and led to certain enunciations of policy from the Prime Minister of this country from his seat in the House on May 15, 1924. In his address on the budget in the House of Commons Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King announced his policy as follows:

No more tariffs based on the principle of protection—as set forth in the resolution of the Tory party, moved in this debate too late to be accepted—but a tariff based on the principle of revenue. That was "our policy" in the past—the Laurier-Fielding policy. The words can have no other meaning. That is our policy to-day—the policy of the Liberal party—proceeding step by step towards the goal of greater freedom in matters of trade, never imposing a duty for protection's sake, but always acting on the principle or the basis of a tariff for revenue and revenue only. I repeat this statement in the hearing of hon. members and before this country, this is the position of the Liberal party. We believe in proceeding step by step. We believe when it comes to a question of imposing a duty in having duties framed on a tariff for revenue basis and not on a basis of protection.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Could my hon. friend tell me what is the difference between the tariff policy of the government as it consists to-day and the tariff policy of the Conservative party?

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. CAHAN: And the tariff policy of the Conservative party?

Mr. CAMPBELL: With perhaps one exception.

Mr. CAHAN: I will tell you before I am through, but I do not wish to hasten. You know this is going to be a long debate—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CAHAN: —and I wish to contribute my share in the way and in the order I see fit.

Mr. CANNON: You have only given us half.

An hon. MEMBER: The rest is coming.

Mr. CAHAN: But when that statement was made to this country, with the further decreases which were made by the British preferential tariff, it led to great anxiety on the part of every man who was engaged in industrial enterprises in Canada. It stopped entirely the investment of new capital in almost every industry in this country. It prevented the establishment of new industries which were about to be established in the Dominion. There was ample money available in the country, and yet that money instead of seeking employment in industrial enterprises became a supply to compete for certain stocks which were regarded as likely to stand the strain of a revenue tariff pure and simple. We had a great increase in the value of bank stocks, and there was greater competition for their purchase. There was great competition in this country for the purchase of American standard stocks, and more than that: millions of dollars of Canadian capital were transferred month by month to the United States seeking employment in the industrial affairs of that country, where a safe and sound economic policy was in operation and where there was less doubt as to the stability of those enterprises under the conditions which prevailed there. Factory after factory to my knowledge, if it is necessary to go into it, which were employing men and women in the province of Quebec—ordinary industrial enterprises quite proper and suitable to our climate and our conditions, —giving employment to thousands of people, were transformed not into manufacturing establishments but into depots to which millions of dollars' worth of manufactured goods were brought from France, England, Italy, Belgium and Germany, and thence distributed to the people of this country. Thousands of people lost their industrial employment in consequence. The Right Hon.

Mackenzie King, in announcing that policy, was directly responsible for sending a very considerable number of our young men across the border to seek employment. In the city of Montreal there is destitution to-day the like of which we did not know when we had a stable tariff and stable conditions in our industrial life. There people are out of employment by the hundreds; women and children are under-nurtured; those who were born and brought up in fairly comfortable circumstances and became expert workmen are too poor to-day to sustain the life of their children but too proud to beg, and a generation of children are growing up under-nurtured—all simply because the Right Hon. Mackenzie King attempted to put into operation, so far as he could, a tariff policy that opened up our industries to the unfair competition of foreign countries. And not only that; he declared his intention to put such a tariff into force completely, thus threatening to drive our people out of employment and to force out of this country at least 45 per cent of its present population.

Mr. Speaker, I have made a careful analysis of the imports into this country, amounting to about $850,000,000 or $900,000,000 a year, and I am prepared at an opportune time to show that at least $500,000,000 of those annual imports might, under a proper tariff policy, under a proper economic policy, be produced by the people of Canada, giving direct employment to at least 350,000 or 500,000 more employees that at present have work in this Dominion, and sustaining an additional 1,000,000 to 1,250,000 people. I listened the other day with the greatest possible interest to the splendid address of the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Tolmie) on the question of immigration, and I quite approve of every pronouncement which he made, as I understand it. But it is not sufficient to bring in 250,000 men to go on the farms of the west or even to settle on the farms of the east if we have under proper conditions a proper tariff policy—I do not say a high tariff or a low tariff.

I agree entirely with the pronouncement made the other day by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) that what we need in this country is a safeguarding tariff that will give fair play and fair operation to the industries of this country, and protect them from the competition of certain countries with a debased currency, from the cheaper labour of Europe and from the mass production of the United States. We need a tariff that will enable us to build up here, as they have done in the United States, a great and growing industrial community which will give employment to our own sons and daughters for generations to come and so increase our employment that we may invite into this country not only farmers to come and till the land, but expert artisans of other countries who will teach us to carry on an improved industrial life in certain particulars, and enable us to establish factories for the production of many other articles either of necessity or of luxury which we now import from foreign countries.

That a growing export trade is sure indication of increasing wealth, well-being and prosperity on the part of the people is often stated in this House and throughout the country. A more damnable heresy never was preached. Take the country as you find it. For instance, I called your attention the other night to a country like Mexico, and I deal with it because I know from personal experience its conditions. Mexico is gifted by providence with natural resources unequalled by those of any other country I know of. Glance at what they might do, with a population larger than ours—some fourteen or fifteen millions of people.

Mexico has more sugar cane land than Cuba; more citrous fruit land than the United States and Italy combined; more tobacco land than the West Indies; more cocoanut land than the Philippine Islands; more banana land than central America; more corn land than any other country in the world except the United States. It produces more coffee than any country in the world outside of Brazil; cotton is grown in many parts of it. Mexico is the greatest producer of silver in the world; it ranks next to the United States in the production of copper; it produces large quantities of lead; it has the largest sulphate deposits in the world, as well as valuable tin beds and coal fields in the north; as an oil producer it is second to the United States. Yet with all these resources, year after year the peon and the Indian of Mexico toil for 50 cents of our money a day to develop these natural resources and send the products out of the country where they are employed as raw materials and oil for motive power in carrying on the industries of other countries. The natural resources of Mexico form the basis of industries which are carried on in the United States, in Great Britain, in Belgium and in France. A country with the most marvellous natural resources in the world giving itself up to the damnable policy of exporting its natural resources to other countries, leaving its people at home the most impoverished on the face of the north or south American continent! That is the condition which the tariff policy of the Right

Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King, if carried out logically, as he pledged his honour, for whatever that is worth before the people of this whole country—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CAHAN: I am talking about a gentleman who is not a member of this House.

Mr. CAHILL: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has mentioned the Prime Minister of this country and says he does not know what his honour is worth. I think there is no member of this House with a proper sense of dignity who will speak like that.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, the other day the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) referred to the high honour and sense of propriety of the hon. Prime Minister of this country, and repeated those expressions again and again. I am simply referring in exactly the same way to his high honour, sense of propriety, and all the rest, and I am saying that if the Prime Minister carries out the pledges which he has made to this country in times past, it will tend to reduce the people of Canada to the same impoverished condition as the inhabitants of Mexico.

Mr. SPEAKER: I will read to the House what May says, page 99:

> If a member should say nothing disrespectful to the House or the Chair, or personally opprobrious to other members, or in violation of other rules of the House, he may state whatever he thinks fit in debate, however offensive it may be to the feelings, or injurious to the character, of individuals; and he is protected by his privilege from any action for libel, as well as from any other question or molestation.

But, a little further on in May, and also in Bourinot, there is something which should be taken into consideration. The hon. member has used an unfortunate expression with reference to the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King. Technically Mr. Mackenzie King is not a member of the House at least until a return of the writ in respect to the recent by-election is made; nevertheless he is the Prime Minister of Canada, and any words affecting his honour should be withdrawn. Let me read to the hon. gentleman the following from May:

> All references to judges and courts of justice and to personalities of high official station of the nature of personal attack and censure have always been considered unparliamentary, and the Speakers of the British and Canadian Houses have always treated them as breaches of order.

I will not ask the hon. gentleman to consider Mr. Mackenzie King as a member of the House of Commons until the writ has been returned and he has been duly presented to the House, but surely—

Mr. CAHAN: If I may interrupt you, Mr. Speaker, I will certainly withdraw anything that I said that may be regarded as offensive, for I was brought up in a school to respect the decisions of the Speaker, and I desire to do so to the utmost.

Mr. SPEAKER: I thank the hon. gentleman. He has seen the point. I know that he would not be willing, except perhaps in the heat of debate, to say anything which might appear disrespectful. As I was saying a moment ago, although the Prime Minister is not technically a member of the House yet, he will soon be here, as we all know; and he is the chief adviser of His Excellency.

Mr. CAHAN: Without saying anything disrespectful to the Prime Minister at all, I think I can show by facts and out of the right hon. gentleman's own mouth that in certain respects, if he kept faith with the people of this country in regard to the pledges which he made to them on the eve of the last general election, he certainly would reduce this country in future years to a state of extreme impoverishment.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have been trying to follow the argument of my hon. friend. Do I understand him to say that the condition of the people of Mexico is largely due to the tariff policy of that country?

Mr. CAHAN: It is due to the fact that they have not any. Therefore I say that if we, the members of the Conservative party, representing as we do the people of this country, desire that that degree of prosperity which the country has attained shall be maintained; if we wish to give employment at home to our own people and to enable others to come here and find remunerative employment, the tariff policy announced by the Right Hon. Mackenzie King must be repudiated, not only by the government of this country but by parliament and the people.

If I were in a position to make a suggestion, the adoption of which would benefit the great body of the people of this country, it would be this: that we secure the services of experts to work for a year or more upon the determining of what industries could be established in this country—not in our cities for mass production; not in our larger towns for large production, but in our villages and country towns, to give employment there. I remember very well in my own province of Nova Scotia—and I knew it well from almost end to end—our village life and our town life was sustained by small industries employing five, ten, fifteen or twenty people. Look at the conditions in any industrialized country.

The name of Jules Maline will ever be revered throughout the Republic of France, because he gave to the farmers of that country a protective tariff which established on a firm foundation the financial stability of the republic and enabled it to stand, as it did, all the horrors of invasion and war. Jules Maline died quite recently, but his name will ever be held in reverence in France. The industrial stability of that country is largely due to the operation of small factories manufacturing artistic designs, commodities of value, commodities of luxury, which give employment to five, ten, fifteen or twenty people. I am sure if we made careful examination we could find not a hundred but a thousand small industries necessary to our well-being which could produce in this country articles which we are now importing from abroad, articles which are necessary to the life of our country and to the standard of living which we have adopted, the manufacture of which in Canada would give employment in our villages and in our smaller towns to the population which now, unless it goes on the neighbouring farms, must go to the United States. Moreover, with our hydro-electric power in this country, if we were guaranteed a stable tariff we could introduce certain chemical processes into Canada which would increase, not only by thousands but by millions, the annual income of the country, and give employment to a class of young men whom we are now educating at our colleges—such as Laval, which is making splendid progress in scientific teaching. I know some of the professors at Laval. Some of them have been brought from foreign countries; others are native-born, and they are equal to any of those who do similar work in the United States. In McGill University we are training and spending thousands of dollars upon the education of our young people, yet by the tariff policies of the country we are precluding the establishment and operation of industries which might give them employment under stable conditions. We are sending thousands of highly and technically educated young men out of the country year by year to seek employment. A policy such as that is most detrimental to our future progress, and unless we provide a remedy we never can reach a high state of national development.

Mr. BALDWIN: My hon. friend mentioned the hydro-electric development. Is he aware that there has not been a hydro-electric development in Canada where the power has not been sold before the development was completed?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): What has that to do with it?

Mr. CAHAN: I know that, because I probably have been as much interested in hydro-electric development as my hon. friend.

Mr. BALDWIN: I hope you have.

Mr. CAHAN: And I lost a fortune because I could not sell the product of one hydro-electric company. Under the tariff as it existed I could not introduce those collateral industries which were necessary—

Mr. BALDWIN: That was out in the Rocky mountains.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. CAHAN: —to utilize the hydro-electric power with the greatest effect and thus to create wealth in the country.

I desire to say a word to my Progressive friends; I observe that some of them have disappeared under my eloquence. One of them stated last night that prices should be fixed so as to give to the farmers a fairly remunerative return for their industry, including not merely a reasonable interest upon their capital, but remunerative employment for themselves and a living for their families. With that statement I entirely agree. If we are to build up and co-ordinate our industrial structure, that must be one of the elements of it. The farmer is entitled to exactly the same consideration that we give or will give to the manufacturing industries of the country. He is entitled to no more and should receive no less.

Referring to another feature of the present conditions in the country which preclude development—taxation and the public debt—I may point out that we incurred a public debt of $1,600,000,000 in round figures, during the war and the three years and a half of demobilization following the war. That is an enormous debt, and it weighs as a heavy burden upon the people. But during the last eight years, a period equal to that covered by the period of the war and the years of demobilization, the public obligations of this country have been increased by over $800,000,000 in connection with the Canadian National Railways. That is, in the last eight years, heaped up upon the burden of debt created by the war, we have created new obligations equal to one-half the same amount which we are now shouldering for the purpose of carrying on those railways under the conditions under which they are carried on. That is a problem which is giving great anxiety to every man who has at heart the best interests of this country, a problem which the government must solve, a problem which, as I will attempt to show in a few moments, it undertook to solve before making its appeal to the country in the last general election.

Our taxation weighs upon our people today as a grievous burden. Twenty-five per cent of the entire productive income of this country goes year by year to pay the federal, provincial and municipal taxes which are imposed upon our people. On the average, every Canadian workman, out of a year of twelve months, if he works twelve months steadily, gives approximately three months of his toil to earn sufficient to pay the taxes which are placed upon him. That burden is too great, and it must be reduced if we are to maintain the industrial activities of this country and to keep our people in Canada. I find that the United States of America reduced their annual federal expenditures from $5,538,000,000 in 1920-21 to $3,619,000,000 in 1925-26, a reduction of $1,919,000,000, or one-third of their entire annual expenditure in that period. During the same period they reduced their federal debt by $4,000,000,000 and their annual interest charges by $179,000,000. One-sixth of their public debt was wiped out. There has been a reduction in the cost of public services and an increase in domestic employment. Remunerative employment has been given to five million more people, thereby increasing the consumption of agricultural products in the United States during that period by eighteen per cent if we reckon in quantity and not in price. The cost of the executive services handled from Washington was reduced by $1,364,000,000 a year and the federal payroll was 115,000 employees less on December 31, 1925, than it was on the same date five years previously. During the past year the staffs at Washington were reduced by five thousand employees, and in the federal civil administration alone, which is the same as our civil list or our civil service at Ottawa, the sum of $60,000,000 was saved in twelve months. Such reductions as these in the United States mean large reductions in taxation, decreases in the annual fiscal burden of the whole body of the people, an increased purchasing power for every person domiciled in that country, a higher standard of living owing to the increased purchasing power, and an increased industrial saving throughout that nation giving them larger capital for investment in other enterprises. This is what President Coolidge said about a year ago in reviewing these facts:

> Past experience has shown that a reduction of taxes has been followed by increased prosperity. As the volume of business increases, the federal revenue increases. If we are moderate in our expenditures the natural increase in profits ought, within a few years, to furnish us still with a surplus revenue, which will permit further tax reduction.

This country is demanding to-day, not only that there shall be a decrease in the annual cost of government, federal, provincial and municipal, but that those expenditures shall be cut down right to the bone, until it hurts, because under present conditions applicable not only to federal, but to provincial and municipal affairs, we are lowering the standard of living in this country by one-fourth owing to taxation. We are taking one-fourth of the wages of every man woman and child in this country for the purposes of taxation, and the people of Canada demand that sincere, honest and effective effort be made to reduce those expenditures to the lowest possible limit.

Such was the condition of affairs when the leader of the government made his appeal to the country in September last. We had then and had had for years an increasing lack of remunerative employment in this country. We had had increasing taxation under which the people were groaning and we had a railway condition which demanded earnest, careful attention. We had a preferential treatment of Great Britain and certain foreign countries, not only under the preferential tariff but under treaties, enabling producers in foreign countries to send into Canada their manufactured commodities and thus drive our people out of employment and as far as possible out of the country. The Right Hon. Mackenzie King decided upon an appeal to the people to place these issues and his proposed solution of them before the electorate of the whole country for their final decision. He first interviewed His Excellency the Governor General, stating to him the grounds on which he intended to make that appeal, and fortunately we have an official report made by himself of the grounds which he presented to His Excellency the Governor General and on which he demanded the right of dissolution of parliament and of appealing. On September 6, 1925, when speaking at Richmond Hill at the opening of the campaign, and announcing for the first time the date of the approaching general election, the right hon. gentleman said, according to the Canadian Press report, which on inquiry I find was handed by his own secretary to the press, previously written out:

> The Prime Minister said that the government could have held on to office for many months yet and still have been within the limits of the constitution, in fact until February, 1927. But he stated that the ministry of which he is the head, had come to the conclusion that for an administration to give the best service to Canada at this important time, it should have a fresh mandate from the electors on several questions, the disposal of which will vitally affect the future of this country. His government, he asserted, had never been impelled by purely political motives in any of its acts since it was formed, and now, although it could have continued in office without an election, and perhaps continued to receive the substantial majorities it had enjoyed in the past, it had decided in the interests of Canada that the people should pronounce on the issues on which his party would appeal. There were four issues he said which over-shadowed all others: first, the fiscal policy; second, the railway problem; third, the immigration problem; and fourth, the reform of the Senate.

After discussing the right of the government of which he was Prime Minister to request from His Excellency the Governor General a dissolution of parliament, the right hon. gentleman said:

Next to be considered is the question of the ability of the government to carry on. So far as the House of Commons is concerned, I see no reason to believe that such support as we have all along been able to command in parliament will not continue to be accorded the administration another session. So far as the country is concerned, I believe we possess its confidence to-day to a degree greater than at any time since we came into office. Can there be any doubt that the federal administration has steadily grown in public confidence?

The Prime Minister then considered, from his own and his party's point of view, the following views which had been presented to him with respect to the advisability of holding an election at that time,—the existing commercial and industrial depression, which he recognized, and the prospect which he said existed of an early revival of trade and industry. He then continued:

If we are to look at public questions solely from the point of view of party political advantage, this argument and some of the others I have mentioned might appear to have much more force. For a government that has in its favour all the factors I have enumerated, not to speak of numerous other considerations, deliberately to forego more than a year of the time for which it has the right to continue in office, is a step which, in the eyes of the public, to say nothing of the eyes of its own following, requires not a little by way of justification. Indeed, under existing circumstances, the responsibility of advising a dissolution of parliament would appear to be quite as great as that of continuing to carry on, despite all the difficulties of government which we necessarily experience.

Are immediate party considerations, may I ask, the only ones that are to govern, or chiefly to govern, in the management of a nation's affairs? I can say of the present administration, since its assumption of office, that purely party considerations have never been permitted to override the national interests, nor will they now be a determining factor in reaching a decision on a matter of first national importance. Party is most important, but it must be remembered that party is the instrument, not the end, of government. Each is essential to the other; without a party, and a strong party at that, very little in the way of good government can be effected. The end of government is the well-being of the country, the happiness, the prosperity and the contentment of its people. Party is the means to that end, the means of uniting in a common aim and effort men and women who feel and think alike on the problems of government, the instrument for bringing about the policies which it is desired to make prevail. The best party strategy has in view always what in the long run is for the best of the country.

I commend these sentiments to the acting leader of the government (Mr. Lapointe) and those associated with him just now in carrying on this government in the dilapidated condition in which we find it. Further, the Prime Minister said:

That brings me to the situation with which at the moment the government is faced. As a government we can carry on until 1927 if we so desire. As I have already said, I have not the least doubt we shall be able to command such support as we all along have had in the House of Commons at another session, but shall we be able to do more than that? That is the question I have put to every one of my colleagues in the government and to not a few of 116 members. It is a question I now put to you who have honoured me with your representation in the House of Commons. It is a question I put to the electorate of this country. Is it sufficient that, as a government, we should continue in office, drawing our indemnities and salaries as members and ministers, and enjoying the other fruits of office, when great national questions press for solution, with which, for want of an adequate majority in parliament we are unable satisfactorily to cope?

And then, after stating the difficult position of his party in the House when they had a majority, if I remember rightly, of 130 members combined, the right hon. gentleman proceeded:

I have come to the conclusion that it is not in the national interests further to postpone the day when questions that are pressing urgently for a solution can be dealt with in a reasonable and satisfactory manner.

Then, having digressed to make a personal attack on the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), in which the country was not then nor is now particularly interested, the Prime Minister continued:

We could, I believe, so arrange our sessional programme as to continue to command in the House of Commons a support equal to that we have had during the last four years. But I doubt if we could do more than that. I doubt if, on the eve of a general election, we could introduce in parliament any great measure of reform without its whole aim and purpose being misconstrued and the legislation itself being thwarted. At most we would be reduced to marking time. This is not a moment in our country's affairs at which to hark time; it is a time to march forward.

Then approaching the very heart of the problem, in which the whole country was then and is now most deeply interested, more intensely interested, I think, than in the subject matter of the present Address, and upon which the future prosperity, I might almost say, the ultimate destiny of Canada depends, the Prime Minister said:

That brings me to a consideration of three outstanding national problems of the greatest importance

—the transportation problem, the problem of immigration, and the fiscal problem. To these I should add a fourth, the constitution and powers of the Senate. I can see no solution of the problems of taxation, no means of reducing materially our public debt, our income tax, our sales tax, and other taxes, apart from a satisfactory solution of the four problems here mentioned, all of which are inter-related and in more ways than one inseparably intertwined. May I say further, I believe each of the problems mentioned is a pressing one. I do not believe that any one of the four can be dealt with effectually at a last session of parliament. They can only be satisfactorily dealt with by a House of Commons fresh from the people and with a mandate from the people to carry out their will.

You will notice, Sir, there was no mention of rural credits, of the Hudson Bay railway or of old age pensions. He was discussing the four problems which the whole country then recognized to be vital, and upon which he was proceeding to invite the decision of the electorate and their mandate for the next four years. He proceeded:

I would say, further, I do not believe that any of the four can be dealt with effectively by a government which is not supported by a substantial majority in the House of Commons. Group government and minority government may be inevitable in transitional phases of our political history, but neither is the kind of government wherewith to achieve great reforms. In both Great Britain and the United States the electorate has shown within the very recent past that it wishes no more of either form, that what each believes the existing situation requires is a national party representative of all parts of the country, sufficiently strong in the representation it sends to parliament to insure the carrying out by the government of its plans and policies.

That is the pronouncement made by a party which went to the country, and which now stands with a greatly reduced representation in this House, assisted by the Progressive party, whose numbers have been reduced from 65 to 24—the Liberal party which now day by day in the eyes of the whole country shows that it is utterly incapable of properly carrying out the business of the Dominion—of functioning as a government. Then the Prime Minister proceeded to contend that his government was not solely responsible for the National railway system, in which contention we all agree, I think. He declared that despite the management of the National Railways, which, as he alleged, had been placed beyond political control, we must nevertheless admit that the balance sheets of the National Railways are of as much concern to the people of Canada as the balance sheets of the national ledger in all other particulars. He said:

The railway problem to my mind is the most important of all problems pressing for immediate solution. Can taxation be substantially reduced until we have overcome the deficits on our National Railways? Can the National Railways or the Canadian Pacific Railway reduce rates so long as there are deficits in the case of the one and a reduction in earnings in the case of the other?

Then he added:

There are many measures that might be adopted under the authority of parliament which would be to the advantage alike of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and of benefit also to the general public. It is not for me at this time to say in any final way what those measures should be.

Finality in this, as in all matters of legislative enactment, belong to parliament.

Referring to the appointment by the government of Sir Henry Thornton as executive head of the Canadian National Railway system, he continued:

It must be apparent, however, that something more is needed if government ownership is to have a fair trial in the fullest meaning of the words. So long as the system is handicapped by deficits, due in the main to encumbrances of the past for which the present management and directorate are in no way responsible, it cannot be said that government ownership is having a fair trial. It is equally true that so long as deficits on the National Railways continue, freight rates cannot be appreciably reduced, nor can our national taxation.

Then he referred to the competition for freight and passenger traffic which now exists between the two great railway systems, and added:

The situation is aggravated by the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway is the largest single taxpayer into the federal treasury. Is that a position that is easily defensible, or defensible for long?

Proceeding with his discussion of the possibility of developing a policy of "regulated and controlled competition," the Prime Minister said:

What I want to make clear and repeat at the moment is that we have no problem more urgently in need of solution than the railway problem, that without its solution there is little or no chance of reducing our national debt and the income and other taxes, to say nothing of railway rates; that in the interests alike of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the public its solution must not be delayed, and that the solution can be worked out and given effect to only by a government that has a strong support in parliament and a mandate from the people to act. I am prepared to say that if given such a majority the present government will take up its task immediately and at an early date present to parliament the necessary legislation.

The hon. gentleman insists that he received his mandate from the people, but I notice in the Speech from the Throne there is an entire absence of any suggestion that the necessary legislation to effect these reforms will be introduced by the government during the present session. Then we have a lengthy disquisition on the late lamented Petersen contract, a brief reference to an arrangement with the railways regarding immigration, a gibe or two at the leader of the opposition, and then he declared, in pursuance of the announcement which he made during the budget debate of 1924, and which I quoted, that:

The policy of the Liberal party is a tariff primarily for revenue.

And he announced the appointment of a tariff advisory board for the purpose of assisting the government in applying its policy of a tariff primarily for revenue only, from which every vestige of protection would be eliminated. He then said:

I believe that the people should be given an oportunity to pronounce upon a policy as far-reaching as that which is involved in this method of dealing with the tariff and other problems of taxation. That is another reason why I feel the time of a general election should not be postponed.

Dealing with Senate reform and the calling of a provincial conference to discuss the question, the Prime Minister continued:

As is known, the government has declared its intention of calling a conference of the provinces to deal with the question of Senate reform. Mr. Meighen is asking why the conference has not yet been called. I shall give him the answer. It is that the conference should be preceded by a general election at which the reform of the Senate is a principal issue, in order that its deliberations may be influenced by the known will of the people. That is another reason why I think an early election is advisable.

I think if you will look through the press of every constituency east of the Ottawa river you will not find a Liberal candidate in any one of those constituencies who presented Senate reform as one of the grounds on which he sought the suffrages of the electorate. The Prime Minister proceeded:

I have undertaken, if the government is in office—

It is in office—so they say.

—to see that the conference of the provinces will be held before another session of parliament. It will be for the people at the general election to make their will and their wishes known.

Then congratulating himself and the country upon the fact that this great work of Senate reform had been assisted by Providence removing certain members of the Senate from this terrestrial sphere—and he estimated that the Tory majority of 26 in that chamber would soon be reduced to 13—he continued:

I know I can say of those who have just been appointed that one and all have expressed their willingness to champion the cause of Senate reform, and I shall undertake to say that no further appointments will be made by the present government to the Senate except upon the distinct understanding that the appointee will give wholehearted advocacy and support to any measures of Senate reform the government, as a part of government policy, may ask both Houses of parliament to adopt.

Thereby striking a blow at the independence of the Senate and entirely emasculating it of all the independent powers which it must have if it is to act in the general interests of the whole country. And then he added:

May I—

Mr. CANNON: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CANNON: The hon. gentleman said at the outset of his speech that in view of the present situation he would use every possible means to obstruct the business of the House.

Mr. CAHAN: I beg your pardon.

Mr. CANNON: That is what he stated.

Mr. CAHAN: I beg your pardon.

Mr. CANNON: I beg to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to rule 19.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): What does it say?

Mr. CANNON: The Speaker knows the rules. Rule 19 provides that:

No member shall speak disrespectfully of His Majesty, nor of any of the royal family; nor of the governor or person administering the government of Canada; nor use offensive words against either house, or against any member thereof; nor speak beside the question in debate. No member may reflect upon any vote of the House except for the purpose of moving that such vote be rescinded.

Then paragraph (h) provides that no member may:

Use his right of speech for the purpose of obstructing the business of the House.

If we are not now witnessing obstruction pure and simple I should like to know what obstruction is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: Has the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George anything to say?

Mr. LAPOINTE: He doesn't say anything, he simply continues.

Mr. CAHAN: Then he added: —

Mr. CANNON: One moment. I have raised a point of order. My hon. friend does not seem to know the rules of the House, but I hope he will soon learn. I rose to a point of order and stated the point and Your Honour was kind enough to ask the hon. member if he had anything to say. But the hon. gentleman does not even condescend to do so, he is continuing his remarks. I should like to have your ruling, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: I understood the hon. gentleman a moment ago to deny that he had any intention of obstructing the business of the House, but he did say something sotto voce. If the hon. gentleman did use the words imputed to him I did not hear them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just a moment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have the floor and I am speaking on the point of order. If objection is taken to any words uttered by an hon. member the objection must be taken at the time they are uttered. The words referred to by the Solicitor General were uttered two hours ago, or very nearly that time, and they were not the words of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George in any event.

Mr. CANNON: They were the words he used.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They were the words attributed to him by the Solicitor General. But even if my hon. friend had uttered them it is too late now, after the expiration of an hour and a half to object.

Mr. SPEAKER: I may say that I listened very carefully to the address of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. I did not understand him to say that he would use all his efforts to obstruct the business of the House, but to prevent the adoption of the Address.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAHAN: Evidently, Mr. Speaker, what I was saying with regard to certain prospective legislation was dependent upon a very big "if," namely, as to whether the leader of the Progressive group had consorted with others for a certain purpose, which he may undertake either to confirm or deny at his convenience.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Go ahead with your speech. Take your time.

Mr. CAHAN: And finally he declared:

> What I have said will have been sufficient to disclose that the government have decided upon a general election to be held this year.

Now, here is the important part, a very important part, of this discourse which had entirely escaped my attention until I began to read it carefully:

> Immediately upon the return of the Governor General to the capital yesterday, I waited upon His Excellency at Government House and presented to him the many considerations for an appeal to the electorate before another session of parliament which I have presented to you this afternoon. I asked for an immediate dissolution of parliament, and was told by His Excellency that the request would be granted.

Therefore in the address, from which I have read these copious extracts this afternoon, you have what purports to be essentially a verbatim report made by the right hon. Prime Minister himself, which he presented to His Excellency the Governor General, as the reasons for his request for an immediate dissolution of parliament and an appeal to the country. Then he proceeded:

> We now make our appeal for support, not to parliament, but to the people, and ask for that expression of public confidence which we believe our record of four years merits—

Mr. CANNON: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Call it six o'clock.

Mr. CANNON: I think my hon. friends opposite are adopting a most extraordinary attitude. The more orderly the debate the better it will be for everybody concerned. The hon. member has been wasting the time of the House by reading us a speech, or a statement—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CANNON: —which has absolutely nothing to do with the business actually before the House.

An hon. MEMBER: There is no business.

Mr. CANNON: I wish once more to draw attention to rule 19. Under Paragraph (l) of that rule it is not in order for hon. members to:

> Discuss messages or reports which are not regularly before the House.

Let the hon. gentleman deliver his speech in accordance with the rules and we will have no objection. But do not let him waste public money in the way he is doing this afternoon.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any hon. member wish to speak on the point of order?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point of order is not well taken.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Go ahead.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question before the House is as to the adoption or rejection of the Address. After certain amendments had been moved the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) proposed "That the question be now put," which would prevent the submission of further amendments. Consequently the debate is now proceeding on the main question. No one will deny that any hon. member has the right, on the main question, to discuss the policy of the government, as well as any statement which may have been made during the campaign or outside it by the leader of the government. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is reading statements made by the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King of the reasons why he asked His Excellency the Governor General to dissolve parliament. I do not see that there is any point of order involved. In my opinion the hon. gentleman is perfectly in order.

Mr. CAHAN: Of course, Mr. Speaker, these remarks are largely by way of an introduction to a discussion of the Address, showing the circumstances under which the Speech was prepared and written. The right hon. gentleman added:

We now make our appeal for support, not to parliament, but to the people, and ask for that expression of public confidence which we believe our record of four years merits, and for such support in a newly elected House of Commons as will enable us to give effect in legislation to the policies I have outlined this afternoon, and which we believe to be in the interests of national economy, national growth and national unity.

Then again at Erindale, on September the 8th, three days later, the right hon. gentleman again prepared a speech which was delivered by his secretary to the Canadian Press in which he appealed to the country at large for a substantial majority to enable him to carry out the platform and present to parliament the policies which he had enumerated three days before in the speech to which I have just referred:

If—

He declared:

—we were again faced with the situation that confronted us in the last four years, I should ask for another dissolution of parliament to get this matter straightened out, until we got a majority sufficient to meet the country's needs.

Then he proceeded:

Parliament was dissolved because the government felt it coulld not bring in reforms, could do no more than draw salaries without a clear majority. If we should ever be faced again with conditions such as obtained in the last four years, I would not hesitate to again call upon the Governor General to dissolve parliament, and would continue until some party secures a majority to enable it to carry on the affairs of the country.

The right hon. gentleman, I might say by way of parenthesis, seemed to have overlooked in that speech the elementary rules of responsible parliamentary government which, in the event of failure in his appeal to the electorate, would absolutely deprive him of the constitutional right to act longer as an adviser of His Excellency.

Mr. POULIOT: Would the hon. member be good enough to read also part of his Toronto speech?

Mr. CAHAN: As it is now six o'clock, I will reserve that for to-morrow, when I am perfectly willing to read the whole of it if the hon. gentleman will repeat his question.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, February 18, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

CUSTOMS INQUIRY

FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri) presented the first report of the special committee appointed to investigate the administration of the Department of Customs and Excise as follows:

Your committee recommend that leave be granted them to employ counsel for the purpose of assisting in the investigation of the matters referred to them.

He said: With the consent of the House, I beg to move:

That the first report of the special committee appointed to investigate the administration of the Department of Customs and Excise be concurred in.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The motion ordinarily would require notice but I do not rise to take objection on that ground; personally I am prepared to give consent to its discussion. I do rise, however, to make some comment on the stand which the committee has taken in respect of counsel. I am informed that the committee's decision has been to ask this House for authority to employ counsel to act in its behalf, the counsel so employed to represent the committee in general. While my information is that this proceeding is concurred in by all members of the committee, it was adopted, as I am advised, after a much better method had been urged by those who represent the party on this side of the House, but had been rejected by the others. The proposal of the committee, that there should be a common counsel for all, seems to me anything in the world but satisfactory. I have never seen any investigation of the kind that was a success, any more than could an inquiry into facts before a court be a success were there only one counsel. In all such inquiries the proceedings inevitably divide themselves into two sections, just as any trial, civil or criminal, naturally falls into two phases. There are on the one side those seeking to bring home guilt, wrongdoing, irregularity or whatever it may be, while there are on the other side those who endeavour to remove inferences of guilt, that is to say, in a word, to defend the case. That is the way all trials are conducted. Experience has shown that these divisions inevitably occur; and if counsel are to be employed for the committee, if the committee feels that it cannot undertake the labour—and I can quite understand that there would be very much labour entailed in the study of documents, the systematizing of evidence and exhibits, and all that—then surely it would have been in the interests of justice and of the arrival at the truth if the committee had followed the regular course and had one counsel prosecuting the investigation, analogous to prosecution anywhere, and another counsel representing the other side.

I do not think anything in the world can be gained by appointing a common counsel for the committee. It seems to me that the experience of last session, when what was alleged to be counsel for the committee was appointed in the Petersen investigation, should have been a warning to the House not to follow that process on a subsequent occasion. I should very much have preferred had the committee come before us with a request for counsel, the intention being that the regular course should be followed and that counsel on either side be appointed. I do not think that members of the committee are entitled to counsel at all, whether it be those representing us in this end of the chamber, those representing the government, or those representing the Progressive party; members of the committee are no more entitled to counsel than is a judge entitled to legal advice as to what he ought to do. It is the public that is entitled to counsel; the public is interested not only in the bringing out of the facts but in seeing as well that no injustice is done in the elucidation of those facts. The government is justified in employing counsel in the public interests and not in the interests of the committee nor as specially representative of any members of the committee. I am sorry that this view has not prevailed in the committee, and I apprehend that if what has been stated to me as the decision of the committee in the matter of counsel be followed, and if this motion passes, the investigation will turn out to be unsatisfactory. Certainly the relation of counsel to the investigation will be unsatisfactory and the public interest will not be served.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is it not true that the members of the committee have concurred in the terms agreed upon?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand that they have agreed, but the agreement has come only after the other plan along the lines I have urged was overborne.

Mr. FORKE: I hardly understand some of the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen). The right hon. gentleman speaks about prosecution and defence, but I understood that this was to be a committee of investigation to get at the facts of the case and that there was no suggestion of either prosecution or defence. I think the leader of the opposition has the wrong view.

Mr. EULER: I listened with a good deal of interest and, at first, with sympathy to what the leader of the opposition said. What struck me as of great force was that the people should be represented, and it has just occurred to me that the members of the committee really represent the people and for that reason are entitled to counsel. Is not that a fair way of looking at the question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought I had made myself clear. Certainly as members of parliament they represent the people; but a judge, too, represents the people in the exercise of his jurisdiction. Every investigation before a court, whether it be a civil or a criminal case, is an inquiry into facts, just as this investigation is; and every inquiry as to facts is best conducted when one end takes the prosecution and the other the defence. Experience has shown that this is the best course to pursue. Every inquiry, as I have pointed out, falls into these two divisions and it cannot be otherwise; that has been the history of jurisprudence in all countries. Now why should this be different from any other investigation? I am not urging counsel at all, although I know they are good counsel. But if the committee feels that there should be counsel then there is no reason for departing in this investigation from what time has proven to be the right method in all investigations as to facts, whether the facts appertain to a criminal or to a civil dispute.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): How many counsel are to be employed and for whom are they to act?

An hon. MEMBER: One.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Is there to be any counsel representing the other side?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does not the position taken by the leader of the opposition imply that the committee must of necessity divide itself into two parts, one portion of the committee being inclined to assume the role of prosecutors and the other that of defenders? I take it that the committee and the House ought not so to divide. I understand that at least one member of the committee does not occupy any such position and if that gentleman is to be a sort of judge in the matter, then I would say that whether we have counsel representing either prosecution or defence, we should decidedly have counsel to represent as far as possible the interests of the people irrespective of party.

Mr. RYCKMAN: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Does a judge in a civil or in a criminal trial divide himself into two parts? Well, the committee is the judge.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Decidedly he does not. That is the very reason why the committee should not so divide itself.

Mr. RYCKMAN: But there are counsel on each side in any proceeding before a judge, civil or criminal.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not want to trespass, Mr. Speaker, but I would suggest the trouble is we are turning a parliamentary committee into a court.

Mr. RYCKMAN: That is what it is.

Mr. CAHAN: That is almost inevitable.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I regret I was not in my seat when this discussion began. Since the committee has been sitting I have reached the conclusion that we ought to have counsel representing the Conservative party, the Liberal party and myself respectively.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Now it is coming out. We ought to have three counsel.

Mr. KENNEDY (Peace River): We met yesterday in camera, but I was overridden. The recommendation now made I moved in the committee this morning in deference to the unanimous opinion of the other members. Of course, if the House is opposed to the recommendation, well and good; but this recommendation expresses the opinion of the committee that, so far as the committee itself is concerned, we ought to have counsel—possibly more than one.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I understand the government of the day has already appointed Mr. Geoffrion, of Montreal, as counsel for the defence. If that is a fair statement of the position, then I think in justice to the public some able counsel should be appointed to see that all the facts in relation to the charges now under investigation are put forward. Any counsel for the committee will merely act in an advisory capacity, and it will not be incumbent upon him to put forward the charges which have been made against the Department of Customs in the same manner as he would if he were free to act in the capacity indicated by the right hon. leader of the opposition. I for one do not think it would be satisfactory to have this report concurred in.

Hon. GEORGE H. BOIVIN (Minister of Customs and Excise): Mr. Speaker, I would not have risen had it not been for the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Hanson). I again want to make it quite clear to the House and to the country that there is no defendant in this matter. It was on a government motion that this committee was appointed. The government asked for the appointment of the committee after the charges of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), had been levelled against the Department of Customs, to thoroughly investigate the department. When the attorney for the Department of Customs was appointed, it was not for the purpose of defending anyone. We have no one to defend. We are just as anxious as hon. members on the other side to prosecute and punish those who may be found guilty. An attorney was appointed to assist in making the investigation. He was offered to the committee as counsel for the committee. That offer was refused. An offer was made that another attorney—and a very eminent gentleman's name was mentioned—would be retained, if desired, to act on behalf of the people of Canada. That offer was refused. To-day the committee unanimously decided that they required the services of counsel to assist them and the government has no objection that such counsel be appointed.

Mr. HANSON: In the light of what the hon. minister has said, may I ask why it is that the services of Mr. Geoffrion are being continued? The minister says the department has no defence to make.

Mr. BOIVIN: The services of Mr. Geoffrion are being continued in the interests of the Department of Customs because so far no other counsel has been appointed, and not until we are thoroughly convinced that it is the intention of the new counsel to probe the administration of the department very thoroughly, not only during the past year but during the past eight, ten, twelve or perhaps twenty years, will we dispense with the services of the counsel already retained.

Mr. JEAN J. DENIS (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) has just said that the committee this morning unanimously decided that counsel should be retained to assist them. This places me in a better position than I would be in if members of the committee who sit on this side of the House had themselves recommended this course. Now, I may be wrong, but I do not see the necessity for counsel. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre has brought charges against the Department of Customs and Excise, and it is up to him to prove those charges; it is not the duty of the committee to find witnesses for him. The committee is acting as judge of the evidence to be adduced before it. If the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has no evidence to bring forward, so much the worse for him; but the committee has nothing to do with that. The Minister of Customs drafted the order of reference in such wide and ample terms as to give the hon. member every facility to substantiate his charges. The duty of the committee is to hear the evidence and report upon it to the House, and having done so its powers are exhausted. In the last resort, it is for this House to determine whether or not that report shall be accepted or rejected, or to send it back to the committee with certain instructions. That is the procedure. I repeat, Sir, that I cannot see the necessity of retaining counsel to act on behalf of the committee.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, it is quite true, as the hon. Minister of Customs has stated, that the motion to appoint the Customs committee was made by the government. But it is equally true, and within the knowledge of everyone in the House, that certain charges were made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre of maladministration in the Department of Customs—

Mr. BOIVIN: I said that.

[Mr. Boivin.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: —and it was in respect of those charges, some of them very definite and very positive, that this committee of investigation was appointed. Personally I would have no objection whatever to the employment of counsel by the Department of Customs; I think under all the circumstances that is their right. But there is another side to the case—the public. Now, the public are concerned. My hon. friend from Joliette (Mr. Denis) stated that the member for Vancouver Centre had made certain definite charges. He certainly has made some very broad charges. My hon. friend from Joliette lays the burden on the shoulders of the hon. member of proving those charges. Surely, then, he should have something to say in regard to the prosecution of those charges before the committee. I think we are all well aware that three members of the committee represent the government side of the House—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Four.

Mr. GUTHRIE: —four members of the committee represent the opposition side, and one member represents the Progressive side. My information is only gained in the corridors, but I understand it was insisted that every one of those political parties should have counsel—for what purpose I hardly know. The idea to me was absurd, and I so expressed myself when I heard it. One party of members representing the government to have counsel, another party of members representing the opposition to have counsel, and the third and single member representing the Progressive party to have counsel! Surely that is not in the interests of justice, of fair play or of anything else. My hon. friend from Joliette, said he would be prepared to accept the proposition that no counsel be employed. Were it not for the tremendous amount of work that is to be performed, I think his suggestion would be a good one, and that the committee might deal with the matter themselves without counsel. But in this case there is so much involved and there are so many ramifications to be dealt with that I doubt if any nine men could do justice to the case without the reasonable assistance of counsel. If there is to be counsel for the committee one should suffice, but I think my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre should be the one to name that counsel. The government, or the Minister of Customs at the present time, has employed counsel, which I think is proper.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Surely then he will allow those who have laid the charges, who have been the real instigators of the investigation to appoint counsel on their behalf, in order that all sides of the case may be fairly laid before the committee.

Mr. BOIVIN: I would like to ask the hon. member a question. Does he not consider it sufficient for the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) to be at the same time the accuser and the judge, without giving him all the powers of the House of Commons?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Oh no.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): I would like to call the attention of the government to the acute unemployment situation in the larger centres of population this spring, and to learn if the government will consider by Monday adopting the proposal of the conference on unemployment by which this government was to contribute its share of one-third to help the provinces and municipalities and thus to relieve the whole unemployment situation.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Leader of the House): The government has already announced that it is prepared to do so. That is our understanding with the municipalities and the provinces.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. FRED DAVIS (East Calgary): I desire to ask the government if a promise has been made to a special group, or the leader of a special group in the House, that a bill to provide for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway will not be introduced, but that to guard against the defeat of the project by the Senate a substantial amount will be included in the estimates for the work.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Leader of the House): I would say to my hon. friend to wait and see. The government has announced in the Speech from the Throne that it is going to see that the Hudson Bay railway is constructed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member asked if the government of the day had given a promise.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Nothing except what is in the Speech from the Throne.

FLOOD CONDITIONS AT STUARTBURN, MANITOBA

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): I desire to refer to a despatch from Winnipeg appearing in the Montreal Witness of February 17:

> Claiming they are faced with starvation and without means of preparing their land for seeds, through lack of funds, residents of the Stuartburn district of Manitoba have forwarded a petition to the provincial government, appealing for assistance. Disastrous floods, caused by the overflow of the Roseau river last spring, ruined the crops of the district.

I desire to ask the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Stewart, West Edmonton) a question, and the reason I ask the Minister of Immigration is that all the people residing along that river have been brought here under our immigration system. Has the minister anything to say, and if so, what action does the government intend to take?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton, Minister of Immigration): I have not heard anything of the complaint my hon. friend has brought to the attention of the House.

TRANSPORTATION OF COAL

RATE ON NOVA SCOTIA COAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROBERT K. SMITH (Cumberland): I desire to ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, West Edmonton) whether he intends to use his influence and good offices with the management of the Canadian National Railways in connection with the movement of 15,000 tons of coal from Cape Breton to Montreal. I understand that Sir Henry Thornton was in Ottawa yesterday. Did Sir Henry Thornton interview the minister, and if so, has the minister anything to report to the House in that connection?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton, Minister of the Interior): I did not see Sir Henry Thornton yesterday, but a day or two ago I had a letter from Mr. Vaughan, the purchasing agent of the Canadian National Railways, stating that they had instructed the British Empire Steel Corporation that they were prepared to increase the order of 120,000 tons to be mined and banked for future delivery to 135,000 tons, the additional 15,000 tons to be mined at the Princess mine. Just the other day he informed me that they had received word that the mining company were not prepared to increase that order by 15,000 tons; in other words they were not prepared to bank that coal. That was the statement I received from Mr. Vaughan. I do not recollect, but I think I am safe in saying that the excuse given was that it was going to cost too much money. Since that date I have heard nothing further in the matter, but I did hope the mining company would go ahead, mine that small amount of coal and bank it. I cannot see why it should make any material difference to them in an order of the magnitude of 135,000 tons.

SOLDIER SETTLERS' LAND

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): I call the attention of the government to a report that fifty families of immigrants are being settled on lands on the Fraser river, British Columbia, lately vacated by soldier settlers who were not able to make their payments. I understand these immigrants are being settled there at valuations less than those originally placed upon the lands. I should like to inquire whether it is a fact that immigrants are being settled on vacated soldier settlers' lands, at valuations below those originally placed on the lands, and if that is the fact, why those lands are not revalued for our own soldiers who formerly occupied them or who now occupy them?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton, Minister of the Interior): With reference to the first question, I will have to get the information from the Soldier Settlement Board. I do not know of that particular locality being set apart for the settlement of British settlers, but I presume the information is correct. With reference to the second question, in regard to the placing of these British settlers on the lands at a lower valuation than that placed upon the lands for the settlement of the soldiers, I have heard that complaint on two or three occasions. I will also make inquiry to find out what are the facts in that connection.

STATUTES OF CANADA

CHARACTERIZATION OF LAW BY JUDGE ON THE BENCH

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): I would like to direct the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to some remarks recently made with regard to one of the statutes of this country, and ask him if in his opinion it is competent for any judge in trying a case to say that the law he is administering is a barbarous law and unworthy of any Christian country?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. SPEAKER: Under the rules of the House:

> All references to judges and courts of justice and to personages of high official station of the nature of personal attack and censure have always been considered unparliamentary.

I would also call the attention of the hon. member to paragraph 234 (i) under rule 19, which says that a member must not:

> (i) cast reflections upon the conduct of judges of superior courts unless such conduct is based upon a substantive motion.

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I am infringing the rules of the House when I ask the hon. Minister of Justice whether he intends to take any cognizance of these statements from the bench. The remarks in question referred to one of the statutes of the Dominion of Canada, and I was asking the Minister of Justice whether it was competent for a judge to refer to them in that way.

Mr. SPEAKER: The right course for the hon. gentleman to take, speaking from my experience of over thirty years of parliamentary life, would be to move for a return asking for a copy of the judgment, and then it could be debated in the House.

Mr. HOCKEN: All right.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. C. Elliott for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed motion of Mr. Bird: "That this question be now put."

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, as I was about to close the remarks I was making on the approach of six o'clock last evening, my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) interjected that I should deliver my speech in accordance with the rules of this House. In that respect, Sir, no one could have more anxiety to abide by the rules of the House than I, and I am sure that that is the spirit actuating the entire body of hon. members who sit on this side of the House. The hon. gentleman, referring to myself, said:

> But do not let him waste public money in the way he is doing this afternoon.

That statement has the same tinge of exaggeration which sometimes characterizes the platform utterances of my hon. friend.

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege—

An hon. MEMBER: I rise.

Mr. CANNON: I am rising to raise the point that when I made the remark referred to by the hon. gentleman, I asked Your Honour to remember his opening remarks as to his intention to obstruct the business of the House. The hon. gentleman denied having said any such thing. I would refer Your Honour to Hansard of yesterday, where at page 1086 the hon. gentleman expressed himself as follows:

> But when the hon. gentleman seeks to preclude us from reaching a vote of want of confidence in this House, when he seeks to gag us in the discussion of what we regard as material and vital to the interests of this country, I can tell him that so far as I am concerned he will have to change the rules of the House to prevent my obstructing, in order to prevent the forcing through of any such measure as that.

So I submit that when I said he was wasting the money of this country—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. CANNON: —I submit I was correct because he had said that he was going to obstruct.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The expression "obstruction" is not unparliamentary, and when an hon. member says that he will do his utmost to prevent any resolution from passing, he is not using an unparliamentary expression. I have been through debates myself in times gone by and I do not know that speaking against certain legislation, even though speaking for several hours, is against the rules of the House. As I said yesterday, the previous question prevents any amendment, but it does not prevent a member from speaking as long as he wishes on the main motion.

Mr. CANNON: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I ruled yesterday that the hon. gentleman had not acted in an unparliamentary way by stating that he would do his utmost to prevent a certain resolution passing—

Mr. CANNON: Obstruct, he said.

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, but that is not unparliamentary.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Speaker, I was referring yesterday to the possibilities of my action at some future time when certain measures were before this House, in certain contingencies, and I certainly shall abide in such case by the rules of the House and abide by any decision which Your Honour may make. The hon. Solicitor General proceeded to state:

> But do not let him waste public money in the way he is doing this afternoon.

I wish to reiterate again that I defy the hon. gentleman or any other hon. gentleman in this House to show in what way and to what measure we are wasting public money in this House. I wish to state to the hon. gentleman, and he knows it is true, that so far as this House is precluded from dealing with public business, it is due to resolutions introduced by the leader of the House and accepted by a majority in the House, that we are precluded from proceeding at the present time with the public business of the day. We have had laid on our tables to-day an order paper containing some 56 pages of printed matter, dealing with a great volume of public business, proposing resolutions affecting the vital interests of this country, but under the resolution which the leader of the House has had passed by his majority it is impossible for this House to consider one of them. More than that, I repeat that the leader of the House cannot at the present time state that he has one single public measure ready to submit to this House. If he has such a measure, and if he is willing that this House shall proceed with the despatch of business, I for one am prepared to ask the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and those supporting him to assist in rescinding the resolutions of which the hon. gentleman has secured passage, because there is nothing in the rules or the practice of the House, there is nothing in the dicta or precepts of parliamentary procedure, which prevent the government from proceeding with the despatch of business, proceeding with their public measures, and holding in abeyance for the time being or postponing to a future time in the session the further consideration of the Address.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question? He has asserted this afternoon, as he did yesterday, that I am responsible—

Mr. CAHAN: Oh, no.

Mr. LAPOINTE: —for this debate going on because of the resolution which I moved that the Address should have precedence over other matters until disposed of. Of course my hon. friend knows that is the usual motion, but my question is to this effect: He says this resolution of the leader of the House was accepted by the majority of the House. Does he not know that it was agreed to by the unanimous vote of the House including himself?

Mr. CAHAN: In reply I wish to say to the hon. leader of the government that if he is now willing to rescind that motion—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CAHAN: —the real dart of which was in a subsequent motion which we opposed, the real crux of which was disclosed when he by a majority secured the passage of a further resolution declaring that upon the adjournment of this House after the close of the debate on the Address this House would stand adjourned to March 15, and if he is now prepared to amend or to reconsider the position which he then took—a position which we endorsed when we had no knowledge of the further motion which he was about to propose—I can assure him—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does the hon. gentleman ever read the newspapers?

Mr. CAHAN: I do, although I do not accept all that is said in them. But I read the newspapers to this effect—that hon. gentlemen opposite are endeavouring to disseminate in their party press that we who are addressing the House on this motion are thereby obstructing public business—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAHAN: —thereby rendering necessary an expenditure which under other considerations would not be necessary. And I say that those statements, which are also expressed in the short, sharp interruption of the hon. Solicitor General as I was about to close my address for the time being at six o'clock last night, are not in accordance with the facts, and that the verities should be known.

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CANNON: Will the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CAHAN: I am sorry that my very pleasant remarks act as a pin prick upon the conscience of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. CAHAN: The position in which we find ourselves to-day—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. CANNON: Mr. Speaker, if hon. gentlemen opposite have any sense of fairness—

[Mr. Lapointe.]

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George does not wish to be interrupted that is his privilege. The rule is well known. An hon. member addressing the House and not wishing to be interrupted is within his right in declining to yield the floor.

Mr. CAHAN: I have no objection to being interrupted in the ordinary course of events, but when the hon. gentleman propounds questions for the mere purpose of creating a turmoil and disorder almost unprecedented in this assembly I ignore his interruptions.

On the issue between myself, and those who are of the same opinion as I, and hon. gentlemen opposite, we on this side are unanimously agreed that this government is utterly incapable of carrying on the public business of the country. It has demonstrated that clearly by refusing day by day, and week by week, to introduce one public measure for our consideration. Furthermore if there were any doubt in the mind of any hon. member here, if there were any doubt in the mind of any person in this country as to the utility—and not only the utility but the absolute necessity—of this parliament functioning while the special committee investigating into the administration of the Department of Customs and Excise is conducting its inquiry, I think it was disclosed here to-day how absolutely necessary it is. It is absolutely necessary in order that there may be a full investigation into those matters which resulted—according to the estimate I think, of the right hon. Prime Minister a year ago—in some $50,000,000 of defalcations in the public revenues of Canada. Therefore I say that hon. gentlemen opposite will not meet with very substantial support from the public of Canada when they talk about the expense into which we are plunging the country in continuing this debate, and in continuing to consider the matters which were presented to us by His Excellency the Governor General in his Speech from the Throne.

When parliament was convened there was a phrase in the message received from His Excellency the Governor General which was in accordance with the tradition and practice of parliament for all time. It was that phrase in which he announced, through his deputy, that he did not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present parliament of Canada until the Speaker of the House of Commons should have been chosen according to law. He then indicated to this parliament that upon our choice of a Speaker to preside at our assembly, he would, in accordance with ancient practice and tradition, declare the causes of his summoning the present parliament of Canada. Unfortunately His Excellency the Governor General may speak only such words as are committed to him by the Prime Minister of Canada for expression, and when we met we had the declaration by hon. gentlemen opposite that parliament was convened, for what? Did they declare that parliament had been convened in order that the assembled members might decide whether the government, in the shattered condition in which it was, still had the confidence of this parliament? The one thing which is absolutely necessary in our governmental institutions is that the Prime Minister shall deal with absolute frankness with His Excellency the Governor General and this parliament in all matters that are placed on the lips of His Excellency. Therefore, that statement, if properly presented, we agreed, might have been a matter upon which this House might decide, upon which, if there were any doubt about the matter in the minds of hon. gentlemen, they might call upon the members of this House to decide. But no such intimation appears in the Speech of His Excellency to parliament. It was not even intimated that parliament was asked to decide upon that question, and if there were any doubt about the matter, the Prime Minister had no authority whatever to present to this House a Speech from the Throne until that preliminary question had been decided by the House. That was very clearly stated by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) when he referred to May's Parliamentary Practice, twelfth edition, at page 142, and showed that the proper practice, in case the House was convened to enable parliament to decide whether or not the government would be sustained, was to postpone the delivery of His Excellency's Speech and to invite the House to decide that question upon the government's record and not upon the entirely new promises set forth in the Speech from the Throne. Hon. gentlemen opposite abandoned the precepts of the constitution and they introduced a new message which is now before us.

I took some pains yesterday to read to the House at great length the official declaration made by the Prime Minister of the considerations which he had presented to His Excellency when asking for a dissolution of parliament. I also gave from the mouth of the Prime Minister a complete and detailed statement of the issues upon which he appealed to this country. He also stated, in those addresses at Richmond Hill and Erindale, that he was prepared to appeal to and to abide by the decision of the people on the issues which he then presented. But when our hon. friends who now form the remnant of the government became parties to the presentation to this House of an address, under the circumstances under which they presented it, they omitted every single consideration which had been presented by the Prime Minister to His Excellency as a reason for dissolution. They omitted every ground upon which they had appealed to the people before, and by abrogating, annulling and refusing to follow the proper parliamentary practice, they came in with their bids for political support on grounds that they had never before dared to place before parliament and the people of this country. I told hon. gentlemen the other night some of the evils which were bound to flow from such an utter disregard of the precepts and practice of the constitution, and the result is this: They have themselves introduced anarchy into this House and they cannot complain if, within the rules, members on this side show that it is impossible for this mutilated government to function.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CAHAN: Hon. gentlemen opposite may laugh, but this country is not laughing. This country from one end to the other is in a state of the greatest anxiety, in a state of business depression, in a state in which the people are looking forward to ascertain if some stable government can be given them. Old enterprises are being curtailed, new enterprises are not being undertaken. From day to day it has been suggested by hon. members, whether they be from British Columbia, Hamilton, or Sydney, that under industrial conditions which prevail, men, women and children are in destitution and starving to death in this country, and that starvation and destitution will continue so long as this defunct government undertakes, against the will of the people, the functions of government which they are utterly incapable of exercising and which, if they attempt to exercise, they must exercise in so inefficient a manner as to disgust men, women and children throughout the length and breadth of Canada.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. CAHAN: I am not answering questions this afternoon as I want to finish my remarks before midnight. Hon. gentlemen yesterday persisted in asking me questions; they took up the whole of the time of the House, and then they blamed and condemned me for wasting the public moneys of the country. Without the interruptions, I certainly should have concluded my few remarks by at least six o'clock yesterday evening. Now it may be that I shall be unable to finish my address before six o'clock to-morrow morning. In these matters in which there is a conflict between us there apparently can be no decision in this House; no matter if my hon. friends of the Progressive party support the government unanimously in all their iniquities, it will be impossible for that government to function long. In such a case, I wish to present to them the opinion of their honoured leader the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier who, under similar circumstances on April 9, 1913, said:

> As I have said, there are some occasions on which there is a cleavage between the majority and the minority, and then there is an easy remedy, an easy solution. The remedy is not closure; it is not the application of brute force. The remedy is an appeal to the people. The people, after all, are the judge and the jury. The people, after all, are the parties to pass judgment as between the government and the opposition, as between the majority and the minority.

The vociferous remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite about the time of this House being wasted will have no effect upon me, because I understand and I believe in my inmost heart and mind, that the people of this country will never be satisfied until they have an opportunity to decide between those on this side of the House and the present members of the government on the other side. The people must decide this question unless we call a constitutional convention, which is not impossible in view of the manner in which parliamentary rules and practice have been broken down by hon. gentlemen. But saving that alternative, the judge and jury are the electorate of this country and only they can give the final decision on the issues that now divide parliament.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): The people have decided against hon. gentlemen opposite but they will not accept that decision.

Mr. CAHAN: They have decided against the hon. member, and that remark comes with ill grace from one of a body of men who represent a minority in this House and who are fewer in number than those who are criticizing them to-day.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Hon. gentlemen opposite are the only people in the country who do not realize that they are defeated.

Mr. CAHAN: That shoe belongs to the other foot entirely my friend.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Not at all.

Mr. CAHAN: Whether there is any doubt about it or not, the fact is obvious that the people of the country are utterly dissatisfied with the present state of affairs. If that state of affairs continues, without stable government and without stable industrial and commercial conditions in Canada, you will find the present dissatisfaction increasing and increasing until it will become a tumultuous volume from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): That is only the hon. member's private opinion.

Mr. CAHAN: I am giving my private opinion. In dealing now with the subject matter of the Address a little more closely, I do not desire to digress unless I am induced by hon. gentlemen opposite to do so. Let me observe in the first place that the people are looking for a strong, stable and constructive policy, for a solution of the very grave problems to which the Prime Minister referred in his speech and which I quoted yesterday, but which are not referred to in the Speech from the Throne. In the conditions that have prevailed in Canada for some time now, we find that during the past four years we have had a diminishing industrial employment at wages which would permit people to live, and such diminishing employment means in every case diminishing production, diminishing internal domestic trade, which is the most important trade to the country, the trade which most speedily builds the country up industrially and creates its wealth; we have had diminishing home markets for our products; diminishing traffic for our railways; diminishing railway revenues, necessitating increased taxation; and diminishing prosperity for all classes of the people. I notice in the latest returns to which I have access that during the three years from 1922 to 1924 inclusive the income tax returns of Canada showed that the assessed incomes available for taxation in the country had decreased in the aggregate by $370,000,000, indicating that the people of the country are not earning the incomes which they previously did. In Canada the ordinary income tax is four to five times as heavy as it now is in the United States. The men who have large capital in Canada are investing it in the United States where it will not be subject to heavy income taxes such as are extorted from the people of Canada. The burden of taxation in Canada, as I said yesterday, is really about one-fourth of the total output of all the productive energies of the entire people, and it is a burden which is as great as, if indeed not greater than, the burden which France had to bear after her tremendous efforts throughout the years of the war. The burdens on the backs of the Canadian people are increasing while the number of people who are left to bear them is continually decreasing as a result of the exodus of our best brawn and brain—brawn and brain quite the equal of any, and for work in this country quite superior to any body of immigrants whom we may bring into Canada under the immigration policy of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Now the obvious remedies for the deplorable conditions existing in Canada are, it seems to me, first, to increase the permanent and remunerative employment available to the people of Canada, and secondly to reduce the burden of debt and of taxation, which now overwhelms us, to a basis somewhat equivalent to that which obtains across the border in the United States. We must encourage an increasing production in agriculture and we must develop our mines, our forests and our fisheries by increasing the demand for the products of these industries in this country and their utilisation here in the production of finished commodities of greater value through the use of the labour and capital of the country. In addition to that, we must safeguard and protect the Canadian manufacturing industries, protect the farmers of the country, and protect every producer in Canada against all unfair and injurious competition from abroad in order that all products which may properly be turned out in Canada by Canadian labour shall be produced for our own use. In this way we shall increase the industrial activities of the whole country; in this way, beyond all peradventure, we can create remunerative employment and give that stable living wage to which the leader of the Labour party (Mr. Woodsworth) has referred in one of the resolutions he intends to propose to the House. We can find employment for tens of thousands by producing in Canada the things which at present we import from abroad. Those imports we can readily manufacture here if we are protected against the cheap labour of foreign countries. I declare that we are able to produce $500,000,000 worth of our present imports by Canadian labour, thus giving employment and support to at least a million and a quarter more people, if we put into force the policy that should obtain in this country. In Canada over 60 per cent of our imports are of the same character as the goods we produce right at home, and the products of this country are as good as those we get from abroad. In the United States, on the other hand, less than 30 per cent of their imports are of the same character as the products they manufacture in the country. Hon. gentlemen tell me that prosperity depends essentially upon building up an export trade. I grant that prosperity may be assisted by an export trade in the surplus products of this country raised to the highest standard of manufacture and production of which we are capable. The sale abroad of five million bushels of wheat in the form of flour is far more beneficial to this country than the sale of five million bushels of wheat simply, because the grinding of that wheat into flour gives employment at home, and the by-products are essential to promoting the activities of the farm.

Now, I wish to recapitulate to this extent: that 40 per cent at least, probably nearer 50 per cent, of our population depends directly or indirectly upon the prosperity of our manufacturing industries for its livelihood and well-being. When hon. gentlemen compare the cost of the sale of domestic articles with the price of similar articles produced on the other side, they must remember that we have business taxes which no longer exist in the United States—we have sales and stamp taxes to the extent of millions of dollars levied upon the industry and business of this country, and this levy ultimately is placed upon the productive energies of our people; but the industry of the United States has been relieved of this burden, and consequently is able to produce much cheaper than we can.

It seems to me that to decrease the burden of taxation we must, for the time being, postpone all extensive expenditures upon capital account which are not now really necessary for the well-being of the country, and we must postpone especially those expenditures which promise no increase in public revenue within a reasonable period of the future. We must, as I stated yesterday, pare down the cost of federal administration and federal services to the lowest possible limit. We must also reduce the annually recurring deficit on the Canadian National Railways. I believe that the source of revenue for a large part of that existing burden will be found in a due increase of the industrial activities of this great country. When I say, "industrial activities," I refer to farm activities, to the growing of wheat, as well as to all the other productive activities which have been hampered by the policy pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite, and still more by the threats which they have pronounced not only in this House but upon public platforms as to what they would do if returned to office. Nothing would more help us in stabilizing and increasing employment for our people than the reduction of this ever-increasing taxation. Nothing would more speedily raise the standard of living in this country. Nothing would more quickly increase our purchasing power. It would check emigration to the United States; it would bring in suitable immigrants without the expenditure of millions of dollars for that purpose; it would, as I said before, rapidly increase the net revenues of our railways; it would distribute the burden of debt over a larger number of people, and so assist every citizen by decreasing the burden which falls upon him individually; it would decrease the burden of taxation borne by every Canadian family, especially the family which relies upon the manual work of its head.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these matters which are of paramount importance to the people are entirely ignored in the Speech from the Throne. It is not because hon. gentlemen opposite are not conscious of them, because those problems have been so impressed upon the Prime Minister that he went officially to His Excellency the Governor General and asked for a dissolution of parliament in order that he might solve them. He presented the same problems to the people. But finding that he is returned in a minority, finding, as he himself has confessed, that it is utterly impossible for him under present conditions to present even a modicum of a solution, he utterly ignores those problems in the Speech from the Throne; in other words, he utterly ignores them in the programme presented to us for our consideration in that speech.

I think, Sir, that the present government has shown beyond all doubt during the past four years, and by its conduct during and since the federal election, that it is utterly incapable of dealing effectively with these existing conditions for which the whole country demands a remedy. The defeat of the present government in this House and in the country would again give confidence and courage to the great body of employers and employees who are dependent for their living upon the assured and stable prosperity of Canadian industry in all its branches. The defeat of the present government in this House and in the country would create immediately profitable employment for Canadian funds at home which now seek investment in the more stable American securities and industries. The defeat of the present government would encourage and increase the investment of foreign funds in this country in every efficient and well-managed industry, and induce the establishment of a great number of industries which are really necessary to supply the necessities of our ordinary standards of living. In other words, the summary and unequivocal defeat of this government will, I am sure, inaugurate an era of general prosperity throughout Canada, the like of which we have not known for many years. That being so, so far as the rules of this House permit, so far as parliamentary practice admits, yielding as we must and will when we go astray owing to the freedom of our remarks to the decisions of His Honour the Speaker, I say it is the duty of this House now to establish before the eyes of the whole country the actual facts—that this government is not functioning, that it cannot function, and that the prosperity of Canada remains in the balance until these conditions are changed.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Hon. LUCIEN CANNON (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, we have listened to a speech which has lasted nearly five hours and a half, a speech that was delivered, according to my hon. friend's peroration, for the purpose of showing, first, that he was gagged, and, secondly, that this government could not function. I wonder, Sir, if the hon. gentleman had not been gagged, how long his speech would have lasted. As to his second contention, I say that he did not show to the country that this government cannot function, I will in my few brief remarks show him that the will of the Canadian people will prevail in this House, notwithstanding speeches similar to the one we have just listened to.

Gag! The gag in Canada is an invention of the Tory party. The gag has as its father the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen). Gag! The gag has as it partisans and supporters in this House the gentlemen opposite who refused a few moments ago to allow an hon. member to put a question to one of their followers and fellow-members. We have no intention of imposing the gag, provided this House of Commons does its business in accordance with its traditional dignity and prestige. We have no intention of gagging anybody, provided the members on the other side of the House realize that we are the government, and that we shall remain the government as long as we have the confidence of the House. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) in rising yesterday afternoon complained most bitterly that the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) had prevented him from moving another amendment to the already numerous amendments which have been brought before this House and defeated. I will remind the House that on one occasion the gag was imposed upon this House, and that was in the year 1913. In that year these gentlemen, who to-day rise in their seats one after another claiming liberty and freedom of speech as representatives of the people, took away, under circumstances which I will briefly relate, the liberty and freedom of speech from the lips of the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the most eminent statesman who was then sitting in our Canadian parliament. The circumstances were of such a nature that they depict, describe and show to the fullest extent the character and nature of the Tory when he is in power. The right hon. leader of the opposition was then, if I remember rightly, Solicitor General in the government, or a private member, I am not sure which.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A private member.

Mr. CANNON: A private member. Although he was then but a private member, the nimbleness of his mind under those circumstances immediately indicated that he should be promoted and become leader of the party, the collective mind of which was so similar to his own. They wanted to stop the debate in this House. They wanted to stop the Liberal party from challenging one of the greatest encroachments on our national economy ever attempted by any party in Canada, and the way they did it was by altering the rules of the House, by bringing in amendments to the existing rules—

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. CANNON: And the right hon. leader of the opposition, the father and author of the closure, prevented the Liberal party from even discussing those amendments to the rules, and that party to-day is pretending to represent the liberty of the people. The party who to-day pretend to represent the liberty and freedom of the Canadian people may talk in this House for many a day, they may talk for many an hour or many a week, but when speeches are delivered such as the one which has just been concluded, the people of Canada will answer by a huge outburst of laughter, because they know that there cannot be any sincerity in their attitude to-day. I said that the first contention of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St.George was of such a nature that it should not be discussed seriously, and besides—I am coming now to the second point—if the hon. members on the other side were serious, if they wanted that motion of non-confidence to be debated and discussed, there was a well known procedure open to them. It was for any hon. member on the other side to rise and move that the floor be given, not to the hon. member for Nelson, but the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St.-George. Why was that motion not made? Why did the opposition not dare to challenge the hon. member for Nelson when he rose in his seat? The reason is very simple. A few minutes previously the House had given this government a majority of eleven—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Ten.

Mr. CANNON: —and the hon. gentlemen on the other side knew they were in a minority. The question now before the House, Mr. Speaker, is a very simple one: Shall the majority in this House rule, or are we going to be obstructed by a mere minority? We on this side, sitting as Liberals do not represent the majority of the House, but when our Progressive fellow members support this government we form a majority, we represent a majority of the Canadian people, and parliament owes it to its dignity and prestige that that majority shall rule in this House. I have spoken of the prestige and dignity of parliament. My hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George is a much older man than I am. I owe it to his age, to his experience, and to his seniority at the bar to speak of him with all due deference, but may I be allowed, Mr. Speaker, to ask every open-minded member in this House, be he Conservative, Liberal or Progressive, are the dignity and privileges of parliament maintained and upheld by such a performance as has been given by the hon. member for one of the Montreal constituencies? A gentleman who occupies at the bar a leading position, a gentleman who sat in the Nova Scotia legislature for many years, a gentleman backed by the Montreal Star and heralded as the future leader of the Conservative party, comes to this House, to give us the benefit of his experience as a legislator ostensibly to promote the public welfare and to contribute to the improvement of Canadian conditions. What has been his performance? His performance has been to hold up the business of this House for nearly two sittings. What to declare, what to lay before the minds of the members of this House? Nothing but articles which have been read by thousands of people already in the Montreal Star. I appreciate the very friendly, the very prompt and spontaneous help, may I say, given to his follower by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) whenever points of order were raised—

Mr. RYCKMAN: Rised.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend wishes to interrupt me, will he do it in French?

Mr. RYCKMAN: Speak in French then.

Mr. CANNON: The leader of the opposition, I say, came very promptly to his follower's assistance when points of order were raised. Why? Because one of his rivals for the leadership of the party was committing before the House of Commons and the people of Canada the most certain act of hari-kari ever committed here. I do not wish to detain the House to speak of the hon. member any longer. My concluding remark so far as he is concerned is that if he wishes to transform the House of Commons and parliament into a clearing house for Lord Atholstan and his election debts, he is making a mistake. We will not stand for it. Let my hon. friend go back to the noble lord who sent him here and tell him that he may boss in the office of the Montreal Star, but he won't do it here. The free representatives of the people in parliament will not stand for it.

One more word. The hon. gentleman stated that we were suffering in Canada from industrial depression, that people were starving, that they could not afford a meal. Judging by the strength and vigour the hon. gentleman showed at his age, he certainly eats well; he must be an exception. Industrial depression, Mr. Speaker? Instead of preaching here in Ottawa that gospel of ruin, desolation and despair, let the hon. gentleman go through the province of Quebec, which he knows, and tell the people the real facts as they exist. Let him go to the region of lake St. John where over $200,000,000 is being expended for the erection of new industries. Let him go to the city of Montreal, which is spreading every day, whose population has doubled, and see the industrial development everywhere. Let him go to my own city of Quebec and see the new factories being built there, and then when he comes back to the House, notwithstanding the mandate he may have received from the Montreal Star, at least let him not talk about industrial depression. How can the hon. gentleman reconcile his assertions about industrial depression with the millions which were given to himself and his friends in our province to defeat the Liberal party in the last election? Where did that money come from, Mr. Speaker? Did it fall from the heavens? Where did those funds come from? They came from the same people, from the Atholstans and the McConnells and all those other selfish Montreal capitalists who think that they can run Canada from the boards of directors on which they sit. But they are mistaken; we will not stand for it. Every day, Mr. Speaker, I see the Montreal Gazette printing special despatches to its readers saying that this government should not be allowed to continue in office, that we are ruining this country, and yet that same paper in its financial pages prints news absolutely belying what is said in the political sections of that paper. People can be deceived once; they can be deceived twice, but let these capitalistic friends of hon. gentleman opposite know once and for all that the people cannot be fooled all the time.

The honour and prestige of this House, Mr. Speaker, urges us to vote as soon as possible on this motion. The honour and prestige of the House urges us to do so because, not only has the majority of the House decided that this government should remain in power, but the interests of the country, well understood, demand that we should proceed to business and legislate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on then; go to it.

Mr. CANNON: I was surprised to hear a member of the bar like the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George bring forward the argument that we should go to it before the Address had been voted. I do not know in what houses he has sat. He has told us that he has been in Mexico. Maybe in Mexico public business is proceeded with before the Address is voted, but in British countries, where the constitutional precedents as we have them in England are followed, the Address is always voted first, and I challenge any member on the other side, no matter what his standing may be, low or high, to give me one precedent since we have had parliamentary institutions in this country where any bill, except the formal Oaths of Office bill, has ever been introduced before the Address was voted. Let us vote the Address, and then let us discuss on its merits the legislation of the government; and then it will be for the House to decide whether, standing on the merits of that legislation, the government shall be sustained or not. The west has needs; the east has needs; we have heard representatives from the Maritime provinces tell us that conditions in the Maritime provinces to-day are such as to demand immediate action in order to relieve the conditions, and yet, instead of allowing this government to bring down legislation to try and remedy the conditions complained of, hon. gentlemen sitting on the other side cheer speeches lasting for several hours and delivered for no other purpose but political obstruction.

I say that not only the honour and prestige of the House, and the interests of the country, but thirdly, the will of the people at large, demand that this government go ahead and that parliament legislate.

An hon. MEMBER: Why don't you do it?

Mr. CANNON: Vote the Address and we will do it.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Then you will take a holiday.

Mr. CANNON: I say that the will of the people at large as expressed is strongly in favour of this government going ahead. We hear hon. gentlemen opposite telling us of what happened on the 29th of October. Many other things have happened since. When the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition came down into the province of Quebec, into the constituency of Bagot, clothed as the new champion of anti-imperialism, when laying aside twenty-five years of his political career and throwing to the winds the principles for which he had fought for many a year, when, speaking to the population of the province of Quebec in their own tongue, he asked them to return one of his supporters in order that he could form a government, what was the reply? The reply was of such a nature that in the parish where the right hon. gentleman made his longest speech our majority was increased by over 200. What conclusion is to be drawn? The conclusion to be drawn is that the people who voted against my right hon. friend in the province of Quebec in October last, and voted against him also in December last, do not want him. They want this government to remain in power. They want the leaders of the Liberal party, if they can secure a majority in the House, to continue to administer public business.

I will go further.. My right hon. friend will probably say that Bagot is an isolated instance, that too great importance should not be attached to the result there. What was the result in Prince Albert? In Prince Albert following the meanest, the smallest campaign ever waged against a public leader in Canada on every hustings in the nine provinces of the Dominion, and in every Tory paper published in our largest cities, after a campaign had been waged in which every effort was made to revile even the private character of our leader, after every effort had been strained, after every ounce of energy had been exhausted, and after every possible cent of electoral funds had been spent to crush him, Mackenzie King went to the people of the west and asked them whether they were for the mean methods of the Tory opposition or for the larger ideals of the Liberal party; whether the leader of our party, who had given the best of his ability and the best of his energy, to the welfare of his country, should be crushed by racial and by small appeals; and western Canada declared most emphatically that my right hon. friend opposite should remain where he is sitting now. May I say to hon. gentlemen opposite that with the support of hon. members of the Progressive party, with the support of labour, with the support of every independent member, who can judge legislation brought down on its merits and not through the glasses of political partisanship, we will carry on, and we will give to this country a good government. Notwithstanding the appetite shown by the right hon. leader of the opposition for the privileges and emoluments of office, notwithstanding the eagerness of the new members who used to be in a former parliament and of former ministers in the Tory government, notwithstanding the zeal shown by those who wish to be leaders of the Tory party—notwithstanding all the grand eloquence of these gentlemen—I say that we shall rule by the will of the people. And the will of the people will prevail against the Tory party as it always has done. History has recorded that fact and will record it again.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, the House has just had a treat.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am glad my hon. friends opposite agree with me. We used to have many of these treats, when the wild, uncurbed exuberant eloquence of my hon. friend held sway—I refer to the days when the hon. gentleman was in opposition. In those days there was nothing to control the wildest manifestations of the hon. gentleman's exuberant fancy. My hon. friend is now getting back again into the realms of fancy. But he is not discussing practical questions. He is making an appeal—a very good appeal—he is making the only kind of appeal that can ever carry his party—an appeal to passion, but an appeal devoid of argument. The hon. gentleman is the best man in the world to do that. He has done well in that direction.

Mr. FONTAINE: Very well.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am always delighted when my hon. friends opposite agree with me. It would be better, however, if they agreed oftener. That they do not do so is one of their greatest shortcomings, but they are agreeing now. My hon. friend did very well with the material at hand. The pity is that he did not have some real material. The hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fontaine) gives me a beautiful laugh just on that point. I should like him to repeat that laugh before I continue. Perhaps the hon. gentleman has exhausted his resources; if so it is really too bad.

The hon. Solicitor General for one moment was rash enough to get down to something concrete, and he had the boldness to challenge anyone to give him authority for the proposition that this House could do business. He even chided the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) for his refernces to this point, and told him that as a lawyer he should have known better. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to trouble very much with my hon. friend's speech, but I am just going to show where the hon. gentleman can be checked. I will give an illustration of how very easy it is to check him. I am going to give the hon. gentleman the precedent that he asked for. I find it in May's Parliamentary Practice, twelfth edition, at page 163. The citation I wish to make reads as follows:

> In both Lords and Commons, since the commencement of session 1890-91, the answer to the royal Speech has been moved in the form of a single resolution, expressing their thanks to the sovereign for the most gracious Speech addressed to both houses of parliament, and amendments to the Address are moved by way of addition thereto. The transaction of public business—

And this is the point my hon. friend challenged and said was ridiculous to raise—

> —is carried on whilst the proceedings on the Address are in progress. Bills are introduced, committees are appointed, and, in session 1884, debate on the Address was postponed from day to day, whilst a motion of censure on the government, regarding events in the Soudan, was under consideration.

The real truth, Mr. Speaker, is that my hon. friend—I am not blaming him, I am commiserating with him—is mistaken in this as he has been in so many other cases. The law is not what he stated it to be; the law is as stated in May, and there can be no question about it at all.

Mr. CANNON: I never contended otherwise. There is a distinction. My hon. friend will draw the distinction between strict law and practice. I am talking about practice.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to point out to my hon. friend, in the first place, the extreme readiness with which I give him the floor in contradistinction to the manner in which he treated my right hon. leader a moment ago. In the second instance, the whole of May deals with parliamentary practice. It is not law; it is practice. My hon. friend will find no statute anywhere creating this law. It is simply the rule which has been worked up as a result of very long periods of parliamentary procedure and practice.

There is another thing in regard to which my hon. friend is wrong. He speaks about the closure rule and he dramatically tells the House how that was rushed through. My hon. friend and I both suffer under the same disability that neither of us was in the House at that time; but if my hon. friend takes the trouble to turn up Hansard, he will find that days and days of debate were given to the subject and that it was only after a very long discussion and then with a large majority that closure was adopted. I do not object at all to closure; it is a proper vehicle for the carrying on of public business. What I object to is an indirect, improper and cowardly application of the practice. Closure itself is necessary. Just so soon as a government comes honestly and properly to the conclusion that public business is being held up, it is its duty to apply closure if it has any faith whatever in its own conclusions. What have we to-day? This motion of the previous question is closure and it is not closure. It is closure of thought, closure of action, closure so that this House can do nothing useful by way of amendment. But it is an invitation to the House to debate this question just so long as it pleases, with the right to everybody to speak again, not confined by the terms of an amendment, but at inordinate length.

A motion of the kind which is before us to-day was never intended for the purpose of getting action out of this parliament. The only thing it can do is to prevent amendments being made which not only might have been but would have been very inconvenient for some hon. members. It is idle for anyone to pretend that we gain time by a motion of this kind. Everybody who has any knowledge whatever of parliamentary procedure knows that is not true. I do not know how the hon. gentleman was led into moving the motion, because everybody seems to deny the ownership of this new form of strategy. Why, the leader of the House (Mr. Lapointe) is absolutely ashamed of it, and he gives the most indignant denial to the statement that he had anything whatever to do with it. While we have not the whole of the governmental party yet giving their denial, we have an indignant denial from the hon. gentleman himself that he got any idea of it at all from the government. He does not, however, tell us from whom he got the idea, and we have no knowledge whether there was some other conduit pipe across the aisle than a member of the government itself, or whether this thought, so barren of any result except to prevent anything useful being done in this discussion, was the bright idea, without the slightest suggestion from anybody, of the hon. gentleman himself. If that be so, I sincerely hope that the next time an original idea strikes him he will do a little bit of thinking before he puts it into action.

I have dealt with the question of business. It is this government that are killing business in this country. They say: Pass this Address and let us get down to business. If there be any fairness, yes, if there be any real honesty in that statement, it will be accompanied by a motion to discharge the motion to adjourn. It is idle nonsense to say that we get on with the public business by adjourning, and it is also idle to say that this debate is costing a great deal of money. What does the adjournment do? After all, members of parliament are supposed to earn their indemnities. I wonder how many newspapers that have been ascribing the whole of the cost of parliament to this debate ever stop to think, as they well know when they do think, that for every day of a six weeks' adjournment members of parliament will get just as much money as they will if they stay here and look after the business of the country. I wonder if hon. members realize that. We have to put in a certain number of days. During that adjournment those of us who do not live in Ottawa—and that does not apply to me—are away from home; they have out of pocket costs and disbursements, and one reason why we should not adjourn is that in staying here to carry on the public business, hon. members will still receive their full indemnity but not save the expenditures which would be obviated in the case of an adjournment. The cost of parliament goes on in any case, but because attention is being focused upon the manoeuvres that are going on in the House, it is stated that this debate is costing the large sums that have been mentioned. There never was, and, I trust there never will be again in the history of Canada, a debate under conditions such as those which now prevail—a long adjournment ahead; but it means that we are debating practically without additional cost to this country. We have the regular machinery going; the employees are all here. I understand there is a proposal that in the case of an adjournment certain of those employees are to have a cut aggregating $300 a day made in their wages. If that be so, instead of working here without additional or further cost we are working at one-third the usual cost, because services of the kind I indicate run to about $900 a day while the House is in session.

I will refer to just one other thing in connection with the speech of the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) and I am sorry he has gone out because I would hesitate to do him any injustice. He spoke a great deal about the elections in Bagot and Prince Albert. I do not know why he is so very confident about the present situation when he looks at Bagot, because the fact is that the majority in Bagot was cut in two. Then he works himself up to a superlative degree of enthusiasm when he pictures the Right Hon. Mr. King as vanquishing the Meighen ideas out in Prince Albert. It is a first-rate, wonderful achievement to lick an opponent when you have the field all to yourself. This splendid victory that is so lauded—this return of the vanquished Prime Minister, who had been defeated where he was known, where he had been sitting, yes, where he was within striking distance—was achieved by his having the field all to himself—no Conservative candidate to oppose him.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hon. gentlemen laugh, but I would ask them whether the Progressive was a Liberal candidate in Grenville in 1922. These vacant laughs ought to stop unless hon. gentlemen are prepared to make that admission. They know that there was no Conservative candidate in that by-election in Prince Albert. The right hon. gentleman had the field to himself and the hon. member now rises to heights of enthusiasm over what he considers the defeat of Meighen principles. Mr. Speaker, it really is to laugh. If the hon. gentleman had desired to come somewhat nearer the truth he would have said that the Hudson Bay railway had delivered its greatest and most important load of eastern bound freight, and that is the only freight it will ever deliver out of the prairie provinces. It worked; and as is usual in such cases the country pays. If my hon. friends can derive any great political comfort from the situation I leave them to it.

So much for my hon. friend's speech, and so much for the present situation in this House. I have no intention of entering into a general political debate, although the door has been left wide open to me through the kindly offices of the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird). I shall simply deal with one concrete matter which would have been considered in relation to the want of confidence motion, one of those matters which give reason and understanding to the present motion made for the purpose of preventing their proper consideration in the proper place. But before going into the details of the incident I am going to make one or two general submissions which perhaps may not be quite out of place even as applied to this government. Has the country the right to expect from the government frankness in the statements which it makes? Has the country the right to rely upon the word of the government? Or is that word a light and fragile thing, the scattered pieces of which, when it is broken, can be put together again by some of that mysterious cement which is to be provided at the expense of the ratepayers of Canada, the cement that binds together various groups in this House? Again, has the country still the right to expect that affairs shall be so conducted that it will be enabled to put credence in the government? And if it is impossible for the people to place any credence in the government, is not that fact sufficient fully to justify even party supporters of the government in voting a lack of confidence in it? Is the government supposed to hold public credit and public cash inviolate except upon the order of this House, or is that, too, something that is to be lightly regarded?

I propose discussing for a few minutes the methods which this government have adopted in the building of railways when they want to build them—railways which they do not want the Senate to defeat, railways which they want to build without this House knowing anything about them. These things of course are done very much under cover. During the last campaign one of the strongest points taken in western territory by the present member elect for Prince Albert was his attack upon the Senate, and one of the chief reasons for that attack, a reason that appealed particularly to western ears, was the assertion that railways which were essential to the proper development of the west had been thrown out by the upper house. The right hon. gentleman did not take the farmers of the west into his confidence and tell them how, when he was considering the requirements of other and more favoured individuals, he could ingeniously arrange matters when it paid him to do so. He did not tell them that. I refer to governmental methods in connection with the building of the Rouyn railway. Now I want to make it absolutely clear that what I am objecting to in this connection is the method which was adopted. The district itself, I believe, is a splendid one. I do not think that the mineral wealth of the country is confined to northern Ontario; the belt will be found to run right through into Quebec. I have no doubt about it, and development in that country will and ought to achieve a success equal to the success that has been attained in other parts of Ontario. I am not arguing that simply because this country's credit has been strained, simply because many people to-day are of the opinion that our railway deficits are heavier than we have a right to expect them to be, we should therefore put a stop to further extensions. Nor am I suggesting that we should have done nothing in the matter inasmuch as the province of Ontario was willing to save us the cost. Not at all. This issue is not one that can be veiled by provincial interest or prejudice or anything else, and it has nothing to do with the question whether or not the particular country is one through which a railway ought to be built. Unless you want to increase further the deficits on the National Railways, why must traffic be carried forty-five miles up north, to be taken again forty-five miles south, with the inverse extra mileage on the return movement? I do not want to go into that. I want to make it perfectly clear that none of these questions need be given the slightest attention, having regard to the matters I purpose urging. What I do intend to go into is the method by which this government deceives and flouts parliament and the people —the method by which it did do so in this particular question. Then I am going to ask the House whether they like that sort of thing, whether the cement is sufficiently strong to reunite over the chasm wrought by such practice as hon. gentlemen opposite engage in in relation to those whose co-operation they have received up to the present.

Now, Mr. Speaker, naturally, for the reasons which I have already pointed out, the people did not know anything about how this matter was proceeding during the election. It would have been very, very inconvenient for my right hon. friend the member elect for Prince Albert, and would have spoilt many of his eloquent speeches against the Senate, but the election being over the matter now is in such a position that it can be safely ventilated. In the first instance, let me point this out. Hon. gentlemen who may be interested in following up this transaction will find at page 1290 of the revised Hansard for 1925 this statement by the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham):

The Canadian National Railway Company, believing it to be desirable to have a line from their main line into the very rich territory spoken of in the question, have suggested to capitalists that if they would build a branch line between two points to be named by the Canadian National, one of them being Rouyn, the company would be prepared to lease that line.

That is the information then given to the House. Public money was not to be taken, public credit was not to be used; capitalists were to build the line and the National Railway would rent it. Perhaps hon. gentlemen will be surprised—perhaps they will not, perhaps they will merely think the government is running true to form—to learn that the government itself is building that line through the agency of the Canadian National Railways under the guise of a dummy company incorporated by a charter granted by the government of Quebec. But such is the fact. We have the direct statement that the line will be built by capitalists, while the truth is that the only capitalists are the long-suffering taxpayers of this country.

The elections being over, I came back to Ottawa and in the ordinary way, to see if I could not get a copy of the Rouyn order in council and ascertain what had been going on, I telephoned the Clerk of the Privy Council, Mr. Lemaire. Not getting the order as a result of that telephonic request, on November 6, 1925, I wrote to Mr. Lemaire as follows:

With reference to our telephonic conversation as to orders in council in connection with the Rouyn railway, have you been able to get instructions for the release of these orders in council?

It would occur to me that with the elections over the secrecy of the past, even on the lowest political grounds, need be no longer observed and the mystery surrounding this matter which is, after all, a public undertaking and one wherein the members of the cabinet are risking not their own but public monies, ought to be dissipated.

I was in hopes that you would be able to give me a definite answer to my telephonic request before now. May I have either the orders in council or information as to when they will be obtainable.

As a result of that letter Mr. Lemaire wrote to me, under date of November 13, 1925, as follows:

In answer to your communication of the 6th inst., I am directed to forward to you herewith a certified copy of P.C. 1758 of September 26, 1925, concerning the Rouyn railway.

The exhibits were not forwarded, but I got them on the 19th. These exhibits, Mr. Speaker, disclosed a state of affairs such as I have indicated. But in order that hon. members may follow this case chronologically, allow me now to refer to the statute of the province of Quebec incorporating the dummy company through which this government is operating. The act of incorporation will be found in the Statutes of Quebec for 1925, chapter 110. The incorporators and provisional directors of the Rouyn Mines Railway Company are:

Albert Henry Millward, clerk; Harold Frederick MacPherson, clerk; Elmer Royce Moore, clerk; Howard James Spence, clerk; and John Thredgold, clerk.

I pause to point out to the House that all those gentlemen, so far as I have been able to learn, and I think my information is correct, are employees of the Canadian National Railways—stenographers in the office. The outside capitalists are conspicuous by their absence; they have nothing whatever to say in this matter. They simply get the profits owing to railway construction; they do not put up any of the money for constructing it.

The line to be constructed runs down from O'Brien on the National Transcontinental railway through certain townships to a point in the township of Rouyn, some 45 miles. Hon. gentlemen will find it fully described in section 7 of the act.

The company having been incorporated, matters stand until it was suggested—I do not know by whom, but from some unknown source, through some underground current from the cabinet—that there should be a meeting of these five stenographers, and we are duly informed that:

The meeting was informed that arrangements can, it is expected, be made for the lease to His Majesty the king, in the right of the Dominion of Canada, herein called the government, of the line of railway intended to be constructed by the company from a point on the National Transcontinental Railway near O'Brien in the province of Quebec, thence southerly to a point in the township of Rouyn, a distance of about forty-five miles, together with certain works and facilities in connection therewith; the rental to be paid by the government to include an amount equal, in the aggregate, to the interest on certain bonds to be issued by the company and the sinking fund payments to be made under the trust deed or mortgage securing said bonds.

A printed draft of lease between the company and the government was submitted to the meeting and considered, and it was unanimously resolved that a lease of the said line may be made to the government in the general form of the said draft, subject to such changes therein as may be approved or authorized by order in council and agreed to by the president and secretary of the company.

All this certified to be a true extract by Mr. W. H. Nicholas.

Whom the Montreal directory again shows to be another employee of the Canadian National Railways.

Just at that point let me say, so that hon. members who take any interest in seeing the public business of this country properly and honestly run may understand the situation, that the reason for this shift, or for this lease, is very simple. The government did not get from this House the authority to guarantee the bonds of the Rouyn Railway Company—not at all—or to construct the line. They thought they could work it in this way—and I think they are wrong, even legally; morally they are wholly wrong. This piece of twisting, tricky conduct, I say, is absolutely wrong, and it would be a lawyer of the most tricky type who would ever adopt it. I do not believe it is going to work. But this is how it was thought the difficulty could be got around. They say to themselves, "We cannot guarantee their bonds; we cannot put our hand directly into the public treasury and take the money out, but let us see what we can do. We will lease this precious railway for such a sum of money as will pay all the interest on the bonds, will pay as well all the taxes on the property, all the sinking fund charges in respect of the bonds, and all the expenses of the company, including even the trustees. Oh yes, we will do all that, and we will go a little bit further; we will say that in connection with all this grant and guarantee no taxes are to be exacted. The hand of the Minister of Finance is to be stayed; there are to be no Canadian taxes on this." Well, there is the first step taken to lead to this result.

The next exhibit is the lease. It is long and I hesitate to take the time to read it, but I really think hon. gentlemen should see this precious document in its entirety. Oh, the beautiful way in which the farce is kept up! Covenants here and covenants there; everything done as if they were at arm's length! The first recital is as to incorporation. The second recital reads:

Whereas the lessor by virtue of such powers is about to construct a line of railway from a point on the National Transcontinental Railway near O Brien in the township of Privat, in the province of Quebec, thence southerly through the townships of Privat, Aiguebelle, Destor, Clericy and Dufresnoy to a point in the township of Rouyn, a distance of approximately forty-five miles, such line of railway and all the works, facilities and appurtenances hereinafter demised being herein called the said line of railway.

And whereas the Minister of Railways and Canals (hereinafter called the minister) is of the opinion that the said line of railway is a line of railway which can more conveniently and usefully be operated as a part of the Government Railways System and one which may be deemed necessary or desirable for the more efficient operation of the said system, and the lessor has agreed to give and the Governor General in Council has authorized the minister to accept a lease of the said line of railway upon the terms and conditions hereinafter specified.

Bonds. Issue of bonds.

And whereas the lessor pursuant to section 8 of the act incorporating the lessor proposes to create an issue of not exceeding $5,000,000 of thirty year four and a half per cent first mortgage bonds (hereinafter called the said bonds) of which it is expected that approximately $3,500,000 will be required to provide for the cost of construction of the said line of railway; the said issue of bonds to be secured upon the said line of railway and other properties of the company as hereinafter referred to

They have done everything necessary to enable them to sign the lease; and then they go on with the lease. And the country is:

To have and to hold the demised premises unto the lessee for the term of thirty years from the date on which the said line is opened for traffic.

And this is what we are to pay. I read now from the covenant on page 3 of the printed lease:

During the first and every subsequent year of the said term such sum as shall be sufficient (in accordance with the terms and provisions of the deed of trust or mortgage securing the said bonds) to pay the interest and sinking funds upon the said bonds for the time being issued and outstanding, and all other moneys lawfully payable under such deed of trust or mortgage, including accrued interest on bonds purchased or drawn for redemption under sinking fund provisions thereof. The whole of such rental—

I am sure this will fall upon the ears of my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke) like drops of water on parched land.

—The whole of such rental shall be paid free of all lawful Canadian taxes or deductions of whatsoever nature, and shall at the option of the lessor be payable in the city of New York in gold coin of the United States of America of the standard of weight and fineness existing October 1, 1925, or in the city of Montreal, Canada, in lawful money of the Dominion of Canada, by equal half-yearly payments paid ten days prior to the respective dates for payment of interest and sinking fund moneys under such deed of trust or mortgage. It is hereby declared and agreed that the lessor intends to assign and may and will assign to the trustee or trustees under the deed of trust or mortgage securing the said bonds, the rental payments to be made for and in connection with said interest and sinking fund payments as in this paragraph (a) provided for; and the lessor hereby requests and authorizes the lessee to make such payments direct to the said trustee or trustees, to be received, held and used by said trustee or trustees as and for payment of interest and sinking fund moneys under said deed of trust or mortgage; and the lessee hereby covenants to make such rental payments to said trustee or trustees accordingly.

Just pausing there, what else could be found, I wonder, to pay them? Everything is to be looked after. The road is to be built out of $5,000,000 worth of bonds, $3,500,000 of which is to be put up now, then this rent is to be paid; and then, so as to avoid the slightest difficulty in the circuit, for the purpose of paying the rent the dummy is forgotten altogether. Instead of paying the rent to the dummy, the rent, which is the interest and the sinking fund, is paid direct to the trustee. Hon. gentlemen I think will understand that pretty well. What was there in this for the dummy? What outside interest is there? What outside expense is there? What is there in the whole of this except a screen, and a dirty screen at that, under which alone this kind of action could be taken?

Then the second covenant (b) provides, and this is, of course, the covenant of the country:

Such sums as may from time to time be paid or payable by the lessor by way of interest or discount on loans or advances made to the lessor by any bank or other corporation provided that interest on construction items may be charged to construction costs and that bonds forming part of the said issue may be issued in respect thereof.

Mr. Speaker, do we get the force of that statement? The force of that statement is simply this; that into our rent goes the repayment of any moneys borrowed from any bank outside of these bonds altogether, and goes further to the extent that for interest, repayment of bank loans or anything else, bonds may be issued, bonds which we will have to pay—of course, under the guise and pretence of rent.

Then covenant (c) provides:

Such further annual sum or rent as shall be equal to the actual annual expenses for administering the affairs and maintaining the organization of the lessor—

That, remember, is the Rouyn railway:

—limited, however, to an amount not exceeding one thousand dollars per annum.

I do not know what they would do with that one thousand dollars. It might be for street-car fares, as has been suggested to me, for going up and down to the office, but when they have not to collect rent or do anything else, I do not see why that should not be one cent instead of one thousand dollars. It continues:

also any remuneration for time being payable by the lessor to the trustees of the said bonds.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if any hon. gentleman could think of anything else the country could be made liable for? But I think we shall find a little more later on:

also any remuneration for the time being payable by the lessor to the trustees of the said bonds, the sums payable under this paragraph (c) to be paid without deduction on the same dates and times, and with the same option in the lessor as to the place and mode of payment, as the rent reserved by paragraph (a).

The railway company then turns around and covenants, in the first instance:

That it will use its best endeavours to complete the said line of railway now about to be constructed and to deliver the same to the lessee, ready for operation, not later than the first day of January, 1927.

That, of course, would be the usual kind of covenant put in if the people were dealing at arm's length. If the lease was anything else but the sham that it is, that covenant would be put in and it would stop there; but the lease being the sham that it is, being done merely for the purpose of justifying and making legal an otherwise illegal endorsation of bonds, the covenant does not stop there. Oh no, it never would do to stop there. Why, the banker would say: This railway might fall down; you might not want to go on with it; you might just trip up your dummy, and in that case the rent would not be payable, and then where am I with my bonds? So this clause is added to what otherwise would be the usual covenant:

But the non-compliance by the lessor with this obligation shall not in any way prejudice or affect this lease or the obligations of the lessee hereunder with respect to payment of the rents and other yearly sums herein reserved.

But somewhere in this government, Mr. Speaker, there was just a little bit of fairness. Somebody somewhere saw that this thing was perfectly ludicrous, absolutely impossible. I do not know when it was done, where it was done, whether in council or not, as I assume it would be done; but whether it was done in council or not, one minister had at least a little bit of regard for his duty and obligation to the country, because whether that clause was struck out in council or not, it was struck out. But did the striking out stand? Oh no, Mr. Speaker, the striking out did not stand. On the other hand, instead of it standing, according to the document furnished me from the Privy Council those saving words which were struck out:

But the non-compliance by the lessor with this obligation shall not in any way prejudice or affect this lease or the obligations of the lessee hereunder with respect to payment of the rents and other yearly sums herein reserved.

—that clause, which had been struck out, was reinstated. There it is—stet. Reinstated, why? For the sole and only reason that, never mind what else is done, the position of the banker, the position of those taking these bonds, is to be made absolute; the guarantee must be absolute, the rent must be paid, and the idle pretence of treating this as a business document might just as well be immediately abandoned by everybody. Covenant, yes. Of course, this paper dummy covenants, but then it does not matter—do as you please—this country stands bound and liable for every single cent of obligation under those bonds.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I had been paying attention to this Rouyn railway situation, and had demonstrated one or two things. These I imagine I should draw to the attention of hon. gentlemen who may not have been here at the time the House rose.

The first thing that was demonstrated—and I am not making any statement of my own; I am speaking of what is shown by government records, the records of this House, the records of the Privy Council—was that this railway line was to have been built by private capital. From the information given to the House in regard to the matter there was no intimation that anything would have to be done at the expense of public credit or public funds; the financing was to be done by private individuals who were to build the line. I then showed, Mr. Speaker, again from the records, that a paper company, a dummy company, was formed for the purpose of doing that which the government had led us to understand they themselves were not doing. Following up the formation of that paper company, we were able to get, after some considerable difficulty, the order in council dealing with this question and the exhibits therein referred to. In the first exhibit, which I was discussing when the House rose, it was shown that this government—which had absolutely no statutory authority from the House to do so—guaranteed the bonds of this railway company; who were to build the line, under the guise, form and pretence of a lease, which while existing in fact is but a form; and they guaranteed those bonds just as effectively as if full statutory authority had been given to them and the House had not been deceived. The government guaranteed those bonds by undertaking to lease the railway, which was to be built at such a sum per annum as would completely cover the whole of the interest and the whole sinking funds payable under the bond issue. They agreed to pay all that free of Canadian taxes, and in addition to pay the organization expenses of this dummy company as well as other incidental expenses, such as loans from banks and the like. I had got down, Mr. Speaker, to that part of this precious lease which dealt with those features. I had also discussed the covenant, which was supposed to amount to something and was then made nugatory, so that there is no doubt as to one thing, and that is the absolute liability of the country in connection with this sorry venture.

The lease in question is long. I do not know that I should burden the House by reading it all, but the form is kept up pretty well throughout. We have everything here, as I said before, to make it appear that this is a business deal instead of a pretence and a shadowy screen, a discoloured screen, under the cover of which the things I have mentioned, which are wholly and totally illegal, can be done. Now I am going to refer to a few more of these covenants. We have the usual covenant for payments, and I have already given the House the basis on which rent was to be paid. Just to show how clear it is that these bondholders are to be looked after and that this guarantee is actually given, let me read a few more extracts. Paragraph 10 of the lease on page 7 states:

> That the lessee—

That is the crown.

> —will during the continuance of this indenture, or so long as the lessee shall remain in possession or control of the demised premises under this indenture, pay to the lessor; or whoever shall be lawfully entitled to receive the same.

It has already been shown that the only person entitled to receive the same is the trustee of the bondholders. The lessor is not even a conduit pipe now. The money goes directly to the trustee for the bondholders. The paragraph continues:

> (a) The yearly rents or sums hereinbefore reserved or made payable at the times and in the manner at and in which the same are respectively hereinbefore reserved and made payable, free of all taxes and without deductions of any description.

Again it states:

> (b) All lawful taxes, assessments and outgoings whatsoever to the extent only that the lessor is liable therefor that may after the lessee receives possession of the demised premises be payable in respect thereof or be lawfully levied or become chargeable thereon, or on any part thereof, or upon the lessor in pursuance of any lawful authority.

Hon. gentlemen will see that every possible door of expense is covered. The government is responsible for everything, the dummy company responsible for nothing. It goes on:

> ...and will assume and pay every payment which during the continuance of this indenture may be required to be made by the lessor and not herein otherwise specifically provided for.

In case anything is left out, we have this omnibus clause. One would have thought that everything that could be thought of was provided for; but to make assurance doubly sure, as the back of the Canadian taxpayer is broad and strong, everything else is piled on in case something may be overlooked. Paragraph 11 states that the lessee will assume all the obligations of the lessor—and indemnify and save harmless the lessor against all actions, suits or other proceedings and against all damage and loss which may arise to the lessor. Then we find in section 13, under deeds and mortgages:

Whereas, under certain conditions—

In case that was not strong enough, paragraph 18 states:

That the lessee will at all times during the said term assume and pay, discharge and perform, all debts, obligations, and liabilities whatsoever, whensoever and howsoever, arising of the lessor in respect of the line of railway (other than and except the current expenses incurred for administering the affairs and maintaining the organization of the lessor for meeting which certain rentals are hereinbefore reserved—

We have already had $1,000 reserved for that purpose.

—and except also the liabilities of the lessor in respect of the said bonds issued or to be issued by it, or other borrowed moneys.

We have that already covered to every single cent that can be charged for it. It all gets back to the same intent:

To the intent that the rent mentioned in paragraph (a) of the clause next preceding clause 1 hereof may at all times during the said terms be available free from all deductions and claims whatsoever, for meeting the annual charge for interest and sinking funds in respect of the said bonds issued by the lessor pursuant to the provisions of this lease.

One would think that provided for these bonds pretty well, but the ingenuity of whoever was looking after this was not quite exhausted. We have this provision on page 12:

Provided also that if any part of the rent payable under the provisions of paragraph (a) or the granting clause on page 3 hereof be not paid on the due payment date and shall not be paid within ninety days from such date, the lessee shall and will immediately pay to the trustee or trustees for the time being under the deed of trust or mortgage securing the said bonds, in trust to distribute the same ratably among the holders thereof, in full settlement of all past, present and future claims for rent due or to become due under said paragraph (a) a sum equal to the aggregate of

(1) The principal amount of all the bonds issued and outstanding under said deed of trust or mortgage on the date on which the instalment of interest or sinking fund constituting said rent became payable, plus

(2) The face amount of all unpaid coupons on said issued and outstanding bonds maturing on or before the date on which the instalment of interest or sinking fund constituting said rent became payable, plus

(3) Interest on both of said amounts, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, from the date on which the instalment of interest or sinking fund constituting said rent became payable to the date of payment of said amounts to the said trustee or trustees, and also shall and will pay to the said trustee or trustees all other sums payable or to become payable to it or them under said deed of trust or mortgage by way of its or their remuneration and expenses in the discharge of the trust created thereby.

Hon. gentlemen will see that every possible thing is done to make this guarantee of bonds absolute, not only as to interest, but as to principal. If we make a default of ninety days under the terms of this lease, we immediately guarantee to pay the whole of the principal of those bonds and, in addition, not only the interest coupons themselves, but five per cent interest after certain delays. This country, under this so-called lease, becomes liable for the guarantee of all these millions of bonds just as fully and completely as if this House had not been flouted and a proper application made to it for authority to look after the matter in a legal way. Of course it is really no lease at all; the whole thing is a sham, a pretence. The whole idea is something to get around the law, something to enable this government to set at naught the ordinary provisions which protect the taxpayers of this country. When the government saw no other way of doing this, they framed this precious document. So much for the guarantee of the bonds, termed a lease.

Other interesting exhibits have been brought down with the order in council. I have already given the story of the Rouyn Railway Company and the lease. The next one is the agreement between the Noranda Mines, Limited and the King, the guarantee agreement re Rouyn Mines Railway Company. There is in this document a guarantee by the Noranda Mines Limited; but in order to set at rest any possible misgivings and fears on the part of the shareholders of the Noranda Mines, Limited, that their directors have done something foolish and have given something that amounts to anything, let me assure them at once that all those fears are entirely groundless. The business significance of this agreement is no more real than that of the lease! This agreement is not so long as the lease but still it is too lengthy to read in full. The recital begins:

Whereas His Majesty has arranged for the construction by a railway company hereinafter called the railway company—

I pause here. Here we have an admission by this government of everything that I charge; they admit it under the seal of the country. There is no Rouyn Railway Company, but there is a government that wanted to build a railway which they had no right to build; and they chose this method. It is all done, on their own admission, through their agency; it is their arrangement.

Whereas His Majesty has arranged for the construction by a railway company, hereinafter called the "railway company", of a line of railway, hereinafter called "the said line of railway", from a point on the National Transcontinental railway at or near O'Brien to a point in the township of Rouyn connecting with the plant of the guarantor to be there erected, which said line of railway His Majesty proposes to lease, which lease is hereinafter called "the said lease", and to cause it to be operated as a part of the Canadian National Railways;

And whereas it is anticipated that during the first few years after the said line of railway has been completed and opened for traffic deficits will arise in connection with the operation thereof;

And whereas the province of Quebec is willing to guarantee the payment against such deficits, if any, of $50,000 a year for five years from the date the said line of railway is opened for traffic, hereinafter called the "initial date,'" but a further guarantee is required of $20,000 a year for the same period from the guarantor who is interested in mining locations to be reached by the said line of railway.

After the delays to which I was subjected and of which I fully informed the House this afternoon, if I have now got everything that has to do with this precious excursion of the government into this field of operations, the facts would seem to show that they were in an indecent haste to push this railway on for purposes known only to themselves but very strongly suspected to have some political significance in relation to the last election. This very document shows that the Quebec government is to guarantee deficits to the extent of $50,000 per annum, and the government's haste was such that the order in council was passed and the work rushed on apparently without a single thing being done by the government of that province. I do not know whether that is true or not, but what I am stating is that I have here all the papers I could get and there is not one line here to indicate that the necessary legislative authority had been obtained by the Quebec government or that this government had received their bond. I call the attention of the House to striking evidence which we have before us of the fact that it is the government that is doing all this in the guise of a phantom company. I invite your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the first covenant:

His Majesty agrees—

Oh, what crimes are committed in the name of the King! What a pity it is that our constitutional forms require His Majesty's name to be attached to documents of this kind. However, His Majesty the King is made to agree:

(1) To cause the railway company to construct and complete the said line of railway with all reasonable expedition and to lease it from the railway company by lease approximately in the form attached.

Could clearer proof be obtained of what I now charge? This construction is the work of this government: is it possible to get anything clearer in proof of that fact than we have here? Is it possible to make it more clear that this work is the work of this government, executed under subterfuge and carried on under such a condition as to amount absolutely to a misleading, a misguiding and a flouting of the privileges and the jurisdiction of parliament? Could the evidence be more conclusive? The government agrees to cause the railway company to construct and complete the line of railway "with all reasonable expedition". There is an old legal maxim which probably hon. gentlemen have forgotten:

Qui facit per alium facit per se.

And many a criminal has done time under that same doctrine—Who does it through another does it himself. Everyone knows that, and here is this government building this railway through a phantom company. The next clause reads:

(2) To cause the operation of the said line of railway when leased to be entrusted to the Canadian National Railway Company for operation under the terms of section 11 of chapter 13 of the Statutes of Canada 1919.

(3) To cause accounts to be kept of all freight traffic moving over the said line of railway and/or freight traffic originating upon or destined to points upon the said line of railway moving from, through or to points upon the Canadian National Railways in Canada, all such traffic being hereinafter called "such traffic."

(4) To allocate 30 per cent of the gross earnings received by the Canadian National Railways from such traffic, hereinafter called "the said operating net earnings," to the said line of railway as earnings attributable to said line of railway for the purposes of this agreement.

I said that the shareholders need not be unduly alarmed. I wonder if the House appreciates for one moment what is being done here. Here we have a line of railway 45 miles long to connect with the main line. It is very much the short haul, and its rates and expenses will be of course in proportion to that short haul. Now railway ratios are stubborn things, although very simple, and sometimes we fail to realize their full import. We have to remember that the operating ratio of a railway applies to the dollar: it costs so much to earn the dollar. Supposing we take the earnings at a dollar and expenses at 90 cents, there of course we have an operating ratio of 90; that means we have a profit of 10 cents out of each dollar. Supposing we take from that dollar 30 cents—as is proposed under this so-called guarantee—the dollar would become 70 cents, the expenses would be just the same, 90 cents; but the operating ratio, instead of showing a profit of 10 cents for each dollar's worth of business, would become 128.75, making a loss for each dollar's worth of business done of 28.75 cents. I think everybody knows that the Transcontinental is not a paying proposition for this country. But the effect of this agreement is that before the company can be called upon to pay five cents towards the deficit, that 30 cents is to be taken away, not from the net—that would not apply, of course, in the case I have been giving—but from the gross earnings, insufficient as they are now to support the property. I wonder why they did not make it fifty per cent at once. Well, I think with the thirty they are probably just as safe as if they had made it fifty, because it seems to me there would have to be an awful lot of bad management, improper expenses of construction and the like, before even this line could be in such a bad position that after getting thirty per cent of all the long-haul National business there would be a shortage on its own short-haul business.

Let us look into it a little closer, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian National Railway's figures are not complete for the year, but I think 1925 can be fairly said to be the best operating year they have had. Nevertheless the operating ratio of all National lines down to the end of November last amounted to 87.83. Of course, the little business off this line would only go to a small extent in that large pool, but to the extent it did go let us take the local business and assume it was good enough—which it is not; I am making a violent assumption in favour of the local business—to show an operating ratio of 87.83, and just see what happens. If we take that dollar gross revenue, which we now have on actual figures, with expenses of 87.83, and if we take the thirty per cent off that dollar, thus pulling it down to 70 cents, we then have an operating ratio of 125.52. In other words, we lose 25.52 cents for every dollar's worth of business we do, instead of making 12.17 cents.

Let us look at it now from the other way and see while the government system is penalized on the one hand, and how the receipts of this local system are to be built up on the other. Supposing we have receipts for the local line and expenses worked out in ratio of $40 to $60, we would have a ratio of 150—spending $1.50 to earn $1. Supposing on the other hand you take the exact situation here and add 30 per cent of the long haul gross, your expenses remain at the sixty, and you at once have a profitable undertaking. But all that has to be done before five cents is to be taken from the Noranda company. As I said before, I do not think the Noranda shareholders need be at all anxious—yes, I am inclined to think, as has been suggested to me, Mr. Speaker, that they are just as safe as the stenographers of the Canadian National Railway Company who incorporated the railway. I notice this is to go on and there are to be periods for accounting and the like—I will not bother the House with the details.

That gets us down to the point where we have the suggestion coming from somebody in this government to the stenographers of the Rouyn Railway Company that the governmen is willing to do business with them. Acting on that suggestion, we have the lease and we have the agreement with the mining company. The next exhibit produced is an extract from the minutes of a meeting of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways held in the company's office in the city of Montreal, on June 9, 1925, reading as follows:

> With regard to the proposed Rouyn branch, Mr. Rayside reported to the meeting that the matter had been gone into further with representatives of the Quebec government, who had promised that free right of way over Quebec crown lands would be given, together with any timber on such lands, and that other interested parties may increase their contribution to $20,000 per year for five years.
> It was unanimously resolved that if the said line be constructed by another company, with free right of way on Quebec government lands as above referred to, and if there be contributed annually for five years $50,000 by the Quebec government and $20,000 by other interested parties, such payments aggregating $350,000 in all, and if the said line were leased for a long term of years to the Dominion government and by it entrusted to the Canadian National Railways for operation, and if said payments are made direct to the Canadian National Railways as representing the said lessee, and if the rental under the lease would represent not more than 6 per cent on the cost of construction, the directors would approve of such construction and leasing and entrusting.

That ties up the Canadian National management to the operation of the line. Their consent is there given. The amusing thing about it is that while again this thing is drawn as a matter of form for the purpose of deceiving the people, carrying the pretence right through, truth will out every now and again, and truth emerges here, for the minutes start with the statement:

> With regard to the proposed Rouyn branch.

Whose branch? What branch? If it had been a line for that company it would have been described as that company's line. If it is a branch of the Canadian National Railways,—well, truth will out, and it is stated to be their branch. If anything further was wanted to show the deception, here it is. The shadow is lifting, the pretence is disappearing. We have an application in Quebec to-day to change the name of the company to the Canadian National Branch Lines Company. It may take a little while to get the truth, but it is coming. We have another thing in these exhibits. Some people like to have the cash to play with—yes, and sometimes do something more than play with it. Here is a work that was to be done by contract in the autumn of the year. Anybody who knows anything about railway contracting knows that a very substantial sum of money has to be put into the work before any payments are made at all. If you are really in the contracting business, and not in the election-contracting business, you require to have some capital to go ahead with, and the money is put in and you do not get your drawbacks till some little time afterwards. All that should be done at that time of the year, unless a lot of money is to be thrown away, is to clear the right of way and take in supplies for the spring work. Everybody in the business knows that. Of course there may be a little more done. I see the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) is laughing. He knows it is true.

Mr. CAHILL: I know the opposite.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But it does not make any difference. Some people want to get money, and so we have another meeting of the directors of the Canadian National Railways, held in the company's offices in the city of Montreal, September 21, 1925, and I find the following:

> The meeting was informed that the Rouyn Mines Railway Company has been negotiating for a loan through Dillon, Read and Company of New York of up to $2,000,000 to be secured by the pledge of not exceeding $300,000 of its thirty-year, four and a half per cent first mortgage bonds, the interest to be paid on the loan to be at the rate of four and a half per cent per annum and that one of the conditions under which said loan would be made is that payment thereof within a year would have to be guaranteed by the company, the expectation being that within such year the Rouyn Company's bonds could be sold to sufficient amount and at a reasonable rate to pay off such loan.
> It was unanimously resolved that a letter in the general form submitted to the meeting or to like effect addressed to American Exchange Securities Corporation, guaranteeing payment of a loan, as above mentioned, may be executed under the corporate seal and delivered, subject to the necessary order in council.

And the report goes on. No date is given to it. I do not know when it was subsequently put through; there was no time to fill it in, anyway, when I got it in November it is not there. A letter is written from the Canadian National Railway Company's office and it unconditionally guarantees the prompt and full repayment of all advances made under the credit, both interest and principal, in accordance with the terms of the credit. I am not going to read all the letter; it would take more time.

So there we see the guarantee of the government so satisfactorily arranged for and the pledging of the credit of the Canadian National for $2,000,000 of money. We had assurances on the floor of this House that this sort of thing was to stop with the Scribe hotel; that there would be no more of it, and there is no more of it until the occasion arises. But it is done here, and we have the guarantee given by the Canadian National Railways of $2,000,000 to the American bankers. Over and above that we have the guarantee of the country for $3,500,000 in this rental. We have parliament deceived and flouted. Why? Why were we told during the last session that this road was to be built by capitalists? Why was it not so built? Was it again to indicate to this country that this government is careless of its word and that the country can have and ought to have no confidence in it? Surely there was a better reason. What was it? What impelling reason was there to make this government so advertise itself? And how do you think it is all done, Mr. Speaker? It is all to be carried out by this order in council, and the order in council on its face shows this government running true to form. The order in council is based on the authority of the statutes of 1915. The statute of 1915 is referred to in that order and set out in part. It is chapter 16 of the acts of that year, and under it the Minister of Railways and Canals is authorized and empowered, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council, to construct, purchase, and so on, branch lines of railway in Quebec, in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. There are provisions and limitations in connection with that act. One provision is that no line which is over 200 miles in length can be acquired. The other is that the minister cannot build any line exceeding twenty-five miles in length. If we are to believe this government, having regard to their statements made day in and day out in this House, the National railways of this country are under the management and control of the Canadian Railway Board. If we are to believe what they have set out in this order in council, they are under the management and direction of the Department of Railways. It cannot be both. Either the Minister of the Interior day by day in connection with that coal question has been misleading hon. members, or this whole order in council is a farce and a sham—either one thing or the other. The only railways that can be taken under that legislation of 1915 are railways which are run in connection with or joined to what are really branches of government railways. Government railways under the definition in the act, which is the controlling act, the statute of 1915, mean any railway and all work or works connected therewith under the management and direction of the department. Will any member of the department tell me that at any time last year the Transcontinental was under the management and direction of the department? If they do I am afraid they will prove themselves false witnesses in many cases and on many occasions. They are always saying: We have nothing to do with it; this is none of our responsibility. But for the purpose of pledging the money of the ratepayers of Canada, three and a half million dollars, oh, then they are in management, direction and control. Oh no, the Railway department could not be in control for the purpose of putting on a small twopence-halfpenny rate on fifteen thousand tons, but it can be in full control for the purpose of handling three and a half millions of dollars prior to an election.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The hon. gentleman surely is not implying that the government of its own volition could interfere with rates without the sanction of parliament.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I believe I can at once, in view of what my hon. friend says, and in view of the reputation he enjoys with us, say that I am inclined to think he knew nothing about this Rouyn railway company. I think it was something slipped over him. He would never have asked that question if it had not been.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would like my hon. friend to reply to my question. I am making no argument on the other matters my hon. friend has brought up, but will he argue that the government of its own volition have the right to put into effect a rate without the sanction of parliament?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I believe my hon. friend, not knowing where he is, is jesting with me in connection with this Rouyn railway. They could not put on a twopence-halfpenny rate, but they could pass this precious order in council. Mr. Speaker, there are sometimes when even this government cannot blow hot and cold at one and the same time. They come so close together that the wires get crossed; they are crossed now. I am pointing this out to my hon. friend. The statute of 1915 gave the Minister of Railways, under certain terms and conditions, the right to acquire branch lines connected with the Intercolonial railway in the provinces I have mentioned, but before he had the right to get those lines, they had to be connected with the railway under the management and direction of the department. Now in answer to my hon. friend's question, I am pointing out that if we go back to the date of this statute the government could do exactly what he says they cannot do, namely, make rates. The government could do anything they liked about rates, and they did it on the Intercolonial, and of necessity they had to do it when the whole system was under their direction and control. Here again I am pointing out the parallel to my hon. friend, and perhaps he will be able to assist me: For the purpose of this order in council this government say that the Transcontinental is under the direction and control of the Department of Railways and Canals. They have absolutely no right, no jurisdiction to build this railway, on the one hand, or to purchase a railway, on the other, unless the fact is that this Transcontinental is under the management and direction of the department, and for the purpose of this order in council they say it is under their management. The thing is really so clear that if my hon. friend did not raise the question I would apologise for labouring it, but as he has challenged me, it is just as well to labour it.

Under that act of 1915, under section 1—hon. gentlemen can read it for themselves; it is a short act—the whole right is given by which the whole of this scheme was concocted and put through, and the absolute requisite of jurisdiction is that the line from which the branch is built must be, or the line that is acquired must run to a line of railway, under the management and direction of the department. Now I wonder if all this was forgotten by the department. I wonder if the inside practices of this government and the railway that we do not know about, although we heard a little about them the other day in connection with the men engaged on the snow work—I wonder if the inside practices of this government and the railway are so close that the government forgot altogether about the order in council under the legislation of 1919 under which the management and control of this railway, the Transcontinental, was placed in the hands of the Canadian National railway. My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) nods his head. Then I tell him his whole order in council is absolutely improper, because it is an order in council dealing with the construction of a branch of a line which is not a government railway within the meaning of the Government Railways Act.

I also point out further, that even if that is so, even if we can have Tweedledum and Tweedledee each in turn working for the government—one moment National railways, government control, and the next instant, when it pays, Canadian National control—even if we can have that, in any event I say this is illegal, in any event it is wrong, in any event it is a scandal. I pay no further attention for the moment to what I said this afternoon as to the way in which this House was misled and tricked. This is a railway forty-five miles in length. Now there is a plain straight limitation here, so plain that he who runs may read, that nothing over twenty-five miles can be constructed except with the approval of parliament. There is the limitation. Now is there any dispute as to the forty-five miles? Let us concede everything the whole way along. There is always something else staring my hon. friends in the face—always. What is the answer to the plain breach of the statute except the whip of necessity, to get something done that it pays to do? Well, there we have the twenty-five miles.

We may have somebody get up in this House and argue: Oh, the government did not build it; the government have the right to buy a railway up to 200 miles in length; they have a right to lease railways up to 200 miles in length; the government are not building. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, which hon. gentleman is going to take that position, but he ought to be looked upon as the supreme humourist of our day if he ever thinks anyone will ever take that suggestion seriously. Here we have the government doing everything through the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National Railways having no rights at all. Here we have the trick of the lease just for the purpose of enabling the bonds to be put on. For what purpose? Because the government had no right to build the line; it had to do it through a third party. They had no direct right to pledge the credit of the country, therefore they had to do it by way of stealth and subterfuge. Who can say that this is not government action? Who will say that this is a real thing, a real railway company? Here we have the admission in the contract with the Noranda mines that this is indeed the work of the government, and that this government are causing this railway to be built. I wonder if anyone is going to argue under those circumstances, and in view of the documents from which I have quoted, that there is any room for doubt but that this government is building this railway, and that they had to recourse to subterfuge here, there, and everywhere for the purpose of doing crookedly what could not be done in a straightforward manner.

Not only is the action of the government absolutely in contradiction to the statements made to, but it is absolutely against the knowledge of, the older members of this House. It is another case of bad faith with parliament. This matter was discussed in 1915. The hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) knows all about it. He was in the House at the time and took the position, following his honoured leader, that we take to-day. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals knows all about it; he was in the House at the same time and took part in the same argument. In order to have even a semblance of right in this matter the provisions of the Government Railways Act have to be extended to the Transcontinental. That railway was never subject to that act; it certainly was not subject to it at the time this order was made. Further it was made clear in the House that under no circumstances were the enabling sections of this act of 1915 to be made use of for the purpose of justifying such an exploitation as this of the Transcontinental railway.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to your own recollection. You will recollect that for years we had in this country—particularly in the more easterly provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and in Quebec—branch lines which could not be run by themselves with any profit to their owners, or comfort or convenience to the public. The country was faced with a double set of rates, double sets of management, no through billing and the like. For years agitation was going on in the matter, and action was taken from time to time in the House. I remember reading the action taken by a former Minister of Railways, the late Mr. Emmerson, who I think first brought the matter up in concrete form. The whole idea was not to make possible an exploitation of the country's credit in this manner, not to open up new districts, not to have one set of rules for railway construction in one part of Canada and another set of rules for railway construction in another part of the Dominion; not to play favourites, not to pit the east against the west, Ontario against Quebec, farmers against speculators. No such use was ever intended. In those days the government had very different ideas from what are found to-day. The matter was not left in doubt, and I refer hon. gentlemen to Hansard of 1915, when this act was up for consideration. I referred a moment ago to my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence. He took part in the discussion at that time and is reported as follows at page 1542 of Hansard of that year:

Mr. Macdonald: While the Prime Minister is considering the amendment, I may say that I saw in one of the government papers to-day a statement to the effect that the government proposes to operate the National Transcontinental railway system as part of the Intercolonial.

I should tell the House, Mr. Speaker, that at an earlier period Sir Wilfrid Laurier had raised the question that this was a very large order and called attention to its possible effects. Mr. Macdonald goes on to say:

We ought to have a statement in regard to that announcement, which is an important one, in connection with this resolution.

The then Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, is reported on page 1543 as follows:

I should be perfectly willing to restrict this legislation so that it could have no possible application to any portion of the National Transcontinental railway which the government might find it necessary to operate, because that is not in our minds at all. If any amendment is desired to that end, I shall be glad to consider it.

Mr. Pugsley: As to the power to take branch lines, it may be said that there are no branch lines on the Transcontinental railway at the present time.

Sir Robert Borden: There is one I think.

Mr. Pugsley: If the government were operating temporarily, would the Transcontinental be a part of the government system of railways? I hardly think it would, because I think that by statutory definition the government system of railways consists of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways.

Sir Robert Borden: I do not think this legislation would cover the case of temporary operation by the government of the National Transcontinental railway. All the government has in mind is not to leave the National Transcontinental railway unoperated if any question should arise that might cause delay.

Mr. Macdonald: Would it be a part of the government railway system.

Sir Robert Borden: I do not think so, but I am perfectly willing to have that made plain.

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: We understand, then, that this legislation applies to the Intercolonial only?

Sir Robert Borden: And to the Prince Edward Island railway. That is thoroughly understood.

Why, Mr Speaker, both parties were committed to it, both parties knew what they were doing, and this government by their action are but committing another offence. The parliament of 1925 was deceived, was misled. So far as the parliament of 1915 is concerned, its acts are to be put to a purpose which that parliament declared they could not be put to, a declaration in which the leaders of both parties joined. Later the bill is up for third reading, and it was agreed to on what understanding? I quote from page 1685 of Hansard:

Sir Wilfrid Laurier: I understood the other day that the government policy was that this legislation was to apply only to branches of the Intercolonial.

Mr. Cochrane: Yes.

My hon. friends opposite, Mr. Speaker, indeed embarked upon a dark, twisting, tortuous adventure when they determined to set aside their own word in this House; when they determined to set at naught the statement made to members of this House and accepted by them; when they attempt, under cover of this dummy company, manned by stenographers of the Canadian National Railways, to deceive the public; when they attempt to justify all this under an order in council, held secret until no votes could be lost through the truth being known, held secret so that all the benefits without any loss could be had in connection with the political affiliations entered into, held secret until I got it in the way I have described to the House this afternoon. Ought there not to be an end some time to sham? Should we not start some time trying to deal with things on their merits? Should not even this government commence some time to have the same story for the prairies as it has for the east? Will the government, after this, again attack the Senate for holding up lines required in the prairie provinces for farmers, while at the same time they have special arrangements for their particular friends? In other words, is it really possible for a self-respecting house, irrespective of politics, irrespective of everything except decent Canadianism, to have any confidence in a government that brings down an order in council such as this, an order in council flying in the face of its obligations to this parliament and in face of the law? There are really no words which will properly describe the treatment given to certain people at the hands of this government. Is this fair, right or honest?

The order in council is a long one and I propose to hand it to Hansard, as I think it is fair, not only to hon. members but to the government, that the House should see exactly what the government has done, and so that if I have misread it in any way I may be corrected. I therefore hand it to Hansard in the expectation that it will be printed. In the same way I also hand the exhibits; it is only fair to the government and to this House that I should do so. So far as I know I have stated with absolute correctness the effect of the exhibits. I may be wrong, but if I am wrong I want to be corrected, and I can be put right only if these papers are printed properly in Hansard.

I conclude by asking the same question that I put at the commencement: Ought we to have regard for the word of a government? Ought the country to be placed in a position where it cannot tell whether the word of a government means anything or nothing? Is the word of government to-day such a light thing as to amount to nothing like the snows which have long since melted, of many winters ago? Or, has the country a right to expect that things shall be done decently and in the open? Has the country a right to expect that public moneys and credits shall be held inviolate until the necessary direct authorization is given? Have we a right to expect equality of treatment, or must this country continue to put up with a farce of this kind which, for some peculiar reason, known only to those doing these things, coincides very closely with election dates?

EXTRACT from Minutes of Meeting of the Board of Directors of Rouyn Mines Railway Company, duly held in the city of Montreal, on Monday, the 14th day of September, 1925.

The meeting was informed that arrangements can, it is expected, be made for the lease to His Majesty the King in the right of the Dominion of Canada, herein called the government, of the line of railway intended to be constructed by the company from a point on the National Transcontinental Railway near O'Brien, in the province of Quebec, thence southerly to a point in the township of Rouyn, a distance of about forty-five miles, together with certain works and facilities in connection therewith; the rental to be paid by the government to include an amount equal, in the aggregate, to the interest on certain bonds to be issued by the company and the sinking fund payments to be made under the Trust Deed or Mortgage securing said bonds.

A printed draft of lease between the company and the government was submitted to the meeting and considered, and

It was unanimously resolved,

That a lease of the said line may be made to the government in the general form of the said printed draft subject to such charges therein as may be approved or authorized by order in council and agreed to by the president and secretary of the company.

Certified to be a true extract.

W. H. NICHOLAS,
Secretary.

[SEAL.]

This indenture made this day of October, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-five, between: Rouyn Mines Railway Company, a Company having its head office at the City of Montreal, in the Province of Quebec, (hereinafter called the lessor) of the First Part, and His Majesty the King, in the right of the Dominion of Canada, herein represented by the Minister of Railways and Canals, acting by virtue of Chapter 16 of the Statutes of Canada, 1915, and under the authority of an Order of the Governor General of Canada in Council, dated the day of September 1925 (hereinafter called the lessee) of the Second Part.

Whereas the lessor was incorporated by an Act of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Quebec, being Chapter 110 of the Acts passed in the year 1925, with power to construct and operate the line of railway hereinafter mentioned, and to make the issue of bonds hereinafter referred to, and with power also to enter into arrangements with the Crown for the purpose of leasing the whole of its road or the whole of its interest in such road, or in any part thereof, on such conditions as to the Directors may seem advisable.

And whereas the lessor by virtue of such powers is about to construct a line of railway from a point on the National Transcontinental Railway near O'Brien in the Township of Privat, in the Province of Quebec, thence southerly through the Townships of Privat, Aiguebelle, Destor, Clericy and Dufresnoy to a point in the Township of Rouyn, a distance of approximately forty-five (45) miles, such line of railway and all the works, facilities and appurtenances hereinafter demised being herein called the said line of railway.

And whereas the Minister of Railways and Canals (hereinafter called the Minister) is of the opinion that the said line of railway is a line of railway which can more conveniently and usefully be operated as a part of the Government Railways System and one which may be deemed necessary or desirable for the more efficient operation of the said system, and the lessor has agreed to give and the Governor General in Council has authorized the Minister to accept a lease of the said line of railway upon the terms and conditions hereinafter specified.

And whereas the lessor pursuant to Section 8 of the Act incorporating the lessor proposes to create an issue of not exceeding $5,000,000 of Thirty Year 4½ per cent first mortgage bonds (hereinafter called the said bonds) of which it is expected that approximately $3,500,000 will be required to provide for the cost of construction of the said line of railway; the said issue of bonds to be secured upon the said line of railway and other properties of the Company as hereinafter referred to.

And whereas all necessary resolutions of the Board of Directors of the lessor have been duly passed and all other necessary steps have been taken to make the execution of these presents legal and valid in accordance with all the statutes relating to the lessor and to all other statutes and laws in that behalf.

Now therefore this indenture witnesseth: In consideration of the rents and other yearly sums hereinafter reserved and the covenants and agreements on the part of the lessee hereinafter contained, the lessor in pursuance of all powers it thereunto enabling doth hereby demise and lease unto the lessee:

The said line of railway, extending from a point on the National Transcontinental Railway near O'Brien, in the Township of Privat, in the Province of Quebec, to a point in the Township of Rouyn, a distance of approximately forty-five (45) miles, and all stations, yards, tracks, siding, buildings, rights of way, power houses, lines of railway, transmission lines, lines of telegraph or telephone, and all structures, improvements, fixtures, plant, equipment, rolling stock, machinery, tools, implements, fuel, supplies and materials of whatsoever nature, kind or description, and all lands, interests in lands, properties, easements, servitudes and premises, and all other properties, real and personal, moveable or immoveable, from time to time acquired for the purposes of the said line of railway, or constructed or used in connection therewith, or in connection with the maintenance and operation thereof, and also all rents, revenues, tariffs, tolls or other income arising or to arise from the said line of railway hereby demised, or from any part thereof, and also all corporate and other franchises, rights, privileges, authorities, powers and immunities now owned, held or enjoyed by, or that may hereafter during the existence of these presents be acquired by or conferred upon the lessor, and the full benefit of all contracts, agreements, by-laws, engagements or concessions, of whatsoever description, relating to the construction, operation, maintenance or otherwise of the said line of railway or of any part thereof, now made, held or enjoyed by, or which may during the existence of these presents be made or acquired by or conferred upon the lessor, subject, however, to all obligations and liabilities of the lessor under any statutes relating to the lessor, or the said line of railway, the whole being hereinafter called, or referred to as, the demised premises;

To have and to hold the demised premises unto the lessee for the term of thirty years from the date on which the said line is opened for traffic, fully to be complete and ended; yielding and paying therefor unto the lessor yearly during the said term the several rents or other sums following, namely:

(a) During the first and every subsequent year of the said term such sum as shall be sufficient (in accordance with the terms and provisions of the deed of trust or mortgage securing the said bonds) to pay the interest and sinking funds upon the said bonds for the time being issued and outstanding, and all other moneys lawfully payable under such deed of trust or mortgage, including accrued interest on bonds purchased or drawn for redemption under the sinking fund provisions thereof. The whole of such rental shall be paid free of all lawful Canadian taxes or deductions of whatsoever nature, and shall at the option of the lessor be payable in the City of New York in gold coin of the United States of America of the standard of weight and fineness existing October 1, 1925, or in the City of Montreal, Canada, in lawful money of the Dominion of Canada, by equal half-yearly payments made ten days prior to the respective dates for payment of interest and sinking fund moneys under such deed of trust or mortgage. It is hereby declared and agreed that the lessor intends to assign and may and will assign to the Trustee or Trustees under the deed of trust or mortgage securing the said bonds, the rental payments to be made for and in connection with said interest and sinking fund payments as in this paragraph (a) provided for; and the lessor hereby requests and authorizes the lessee to make such payments direct to the said trustee or trustees, to be received, held and used by said trustee or trustees as and for payment of interest and sinking fund monies under said deed of trust or mortgage; and the lessee hereby covenants to make such rental payments to said trustee or trustees accordingly.

(b) Such sums as may from time to time be paid or payable by the lessor by way of interest or discount on loans or advances made to the lessor by any bank or other corporation provided that interest on construction items may be charged to construction cost and that bonds forming part of the said issue may be issued in respect thereof.

(c) Such further annual sum or rent as shall be equal to the actual annual expenses for administering the affairs and maintaining the organization of the lessor, limited however to an amount not exceeding one thousand dollars per annum, and also any remuneration for the time being payable by the lessor to the trustees of the said bonds, the sums payable under this paragraph (c) to be paid without deduction on the same dates and times, and with the same option in the lessor as to the place and mode of payment, as the rent reserved by paragraph (a).

The Lessor Covenants With The Lessee

1. That it will use its best endeavours to complete the said line of railway now about to be constructed and to deliver the same to the lesee, ready for operation, not later than the first day of January, 1927, but the non-compliance by the lessor with this obligation shall not in any way prejudice or affect this lease or the obligations of the lessee hereunder with respect to payment of the rents and other yearly sums herein reserved.

2. That it will during the continuance of this indenture keep up its corporate organization, and will from time to time at the expense of the lessee perform all acts which the lessor is or may be by law in that behalf required to perform, and will neither do nor suffer to be done any act by which its corporate existence, rights or franchises shall become subject to forfeiture or impairment, and will make all necessary applications required by the lessee, but at the expense of the lessee, for extensions or enlargements of franchises and powers now existing as may be required by the lessee from time to time; provided always that the amalgamation of the lessor, with the approval of the lessee, with any other company with which it may at any time be authorized by law to amalgamate, and the proceedings relative to or consequent upon such amalgamation, shall not be treated as a breach of this covenant, nor in any way prejudice or affect this lease, nor the right, title and interest nor the privilege and powers of the lessee hereunder.

3. That the demised premises and each and every part thereof are free and clear of all liens, hypothecs and encumbrances.

4. That it will not under any of its powers as hereinbefore recited issue additional bonds ranking prior to or pari passu with the said bonds except with the consent of the lessee pursuant to clause 20 hereof.

5. That during the term of this lease the lessee shall have the right to exercise and enjoy all the franchises and powers of the lessor now or hereafter authorized by statute in respect of the demised premises and the construction, operation and maintenance thereof, or for any purpose incidental to the undertaking and works of the lessor, or the extension, enlargement or improvement thereof in any authorized manner; and the lessee is hereby authorized by the lessor to take all legal and other proceedings whatsoever that may be necessary or expedient in the exercise of the said franchises and powers, and for that purpose, at the lessee's option, to use the lessee's name, or the name of the lessor, and the names of the officers of the lessor, which officers are hereby authorized, upon the demand of the lessee, to append their signatures, and to affix the seal of the lessor to any documents or instruments, plans, applications, or writings of any sort that may be necessary or useful, in, or in respect of, the full exercise, use and enjoyment of every such franchise and power.

6. That the lessee may make such extensions, enlargements and improvements upon, alterations and changes in, and additions to the demised premises as the lessee may deem proper, within the limits of the corporate powers and authorities of the lessor as from time to time existing; and may entrust the management and operation of the demised premises to the Canadian National Railway Company or to any other company with which such company may be amalgamated, or any other company approved by the Governor General in Council; and may also make with any corporation or person the usual terminal, traffic, operating, running and leasing agreements (subject to the provisions of all applicable statutes or laws), providing, among other things, for the interchange of cars and traffic and the running of engines and cars upon, in, over or through the demised premises or any part thereof, or the exercise of privileges, or the furnishing of facilities or conveniences for the public, or in connection with the traffic handled thereon; the intention being that the lessee shall, during the said term, with respect to the use to be made of the demised premises, have and may exercise all the powers, rights, privileges and franchises of the lessor.

On demand of the lessee at any time while this lease is in effect and so long as no default thereunder has been made by the lessee the lessor shall consent to the amalgamation of the lessor with any railway company named by the lessee and shall take all necessary corporate action required to complete such amalgamation on such terms and conditions as the lessee may desire.

7. That the lessor will to the extent of its corporate powers from time to time make all or any further assurances and contracts and will do and perform all such acts and things as may be required to protect the lessee in the possession of the demised premises and for fully carrying into effect the objects and intentions of this indenture; and that the lessee may make, enact and enforce, either in the name of the lessor or of the lessee, all lawful rules, regulations and by-laws concerning the operation and maintenance of the demised premises and for the preservation of order therein and thereon from time to time necessary or required as fully and effectually as the lessor may from time to time make, enact or enforce the same under the statutes and laws applicable to the lessor or its undertaking and works; and the lessee may, but at the lessee's cost and expense, use the lessor's name in any action, suit or other proceeding whatsover in connection with the demised premises.

8. The lessee may with the consent of the lessor and of the trustee or trustees of the mortgage or deed of trust securing the said bonds, or of any other mortgages or deeds of trust for the time being lawfully executed by the lessor in respect of outstanding bonds issued by the lessor, in accordance with the provisions hereof, convey by way of release or otherwise to parties designated by the lessee any part of the demised premises which in the judgment of the lessee it has become inexpedient to hold or use for the purpose of the said line of railway; provided, however, that in each case other property which may consist of cash and/or lands, buildings, machinery, rails, equipment or plant of a value equal in the opinion of such trustees to the value of the property released shall be substituted for the released property and subjected to the terms of this lease, and that such release herefrom shall not in the opinion of such trustee impair the security under the said mortgages or deeds of trust or any of them; and the lessee may further without any consent by such trustees and free from the liens of any such deed or deeds of trust, sell, exchange or otherwise dispose of any equipment, plant, machinery, materials or other moveable property forming part of the demised premises which may have become worn out, disused or undesirable for use by the lessee, provided, however, that the lessee shall obtain or substitute therefor cash and/or other property which is of equal or greater value, and that all renewals or substituted materials and property shall be covered by and subjected to the terms of this lease.

9. That the lessee paying the respective rents or other yearly sums hereinbefore reserved or made payable, and performing and observing the several covenants, conditions and agreements herein contained and on the part of the lessee to be performed and observed shall and may peacefully and quietly hold and enjoy (subject and according to the respective natures and tenures of the various portions thereof) the premises hereby demised during the term hereby granted without any interruption or disturbance by the lessor or by any person deriving title to such demised premises through the lessor.

The Lessee Covenants With The Lessor:

10. That the lessee will during the continuance of this indenture, or so long as the lessee shall remain in possession or control of the demised premises under this indenture, pay to the lessor, or to whomsoever shall lawfully be entitled to receive the same:

(b) All lawful taxes, assessments and outgoings whatsoever to the extent only that the lessor is liable therefor that may after the lessee receives possession of the demised premises be payable in respect thereof or be lawfully levied or become chargeable thereon, or on any part thereof, or upon the lessor in pursuance of any lawful authority, whether municipal, provincial, or otherwise, and will assume and pay every payment which during the continuance of this indenture may be required to be made by the lessor and not herein otherwise specifically provided for, as if the lessee were primarily liable for the same, but only to the extent aforesaid. Nothing in this clause shall give to any assessing authority any power to tax the Crown nor be taken to extend any powers which such assessing authority would otherwise have.

11. That the lessee will assume, perform and comply with the terms and provisions of all contracts, agreements, by-laws, engagements or concessions of whatsoever description made, held or enjoyed by the lessor and existing at the time when the lessee enters into possession under the terms hereof, and will indemnify and save harmless the lessor against all actions, suits or other proceedings and against all damage and loss which may in any manner arise or be occasioned to the lessor in respect thereof.

12. That the lessee will cause to be operated and maintained the undertakings and works of the lessor included in the demised premises in such manner as to comply in all respects with the provisions of all statutes and laws relating thereto, and so as to protect the rights of all parties to this lease, and will do and perform or cause to be done or performed, at its own expense, all such lawful acts, duties, obligations, matters and things as may be necessary to preserve the corporate rights and franchises of the lessor from impairment or forfeiture, whether the same are required to be done or performed by the lessor, or with respect to the said undertaking and works or any part thereof by virtue of the laws of the Dominion of Canada, or of any province or municipality.

13. That if required the lessee will join in any mortgage or deeds of trust, hypothecs or other documents, which it may from time to time be necessary to execute, to provide for the issue or the payment or retirement of the said bonds for the purpose, but for the purpose only, of providing that the payments to be made by the lessee under this indenture shall be payable or available in such manner as may be specified in such mortgages or deeds of trust or hypothecs, not inconsistent, however, with the provisions hereof. It is understood that the lessee shall not in any event be called upon to pay any sum or sums on account of principal due or to become due under any mortgages or deeds of trust, or hypothecs, executed by the lessor to secure any of the securities aforementioned except in so far as the rent payable under this lease may provide for such payment.

14. That the lessee will at all times during the said term maintain all the demised premises in good and substantial repair and working condition and will, subject to the provisions of clause 8 hereof, renew and replace the same from time to time as the same or any part thereof respectively becomes out of repair, worn out, unusable, lost or destroyed, notwithstanding that this may involve substitution of new for old, and so that all such renewed and replaced premises shall be vested in the lessor and made subject to the terms of this lease.

15. That the lessee will at all times during the said term afford the lessor, its officers and agents, all such facilities as it or they shall reasonably require for ascertaining whether the covenants and provisions of this lease have been or are being duly performed and observed, and will make good any breach or non-observance thereof on demand in writing specifying such breach or non-observaance, and that in default of the lessee so doing it shall be lawful for the lessor, but without prejudice to the rights of re-entry under the provisions hereinafter contained, to make good any such breach or non-observance at the expense of the lessee, and the amount of any expense so incurred by the lessor shall be repaid by the lessee to the lessor on demand, and shall from the date of payment by the lessor be treated as rental due by the lessee under the provisions hereof.

16. That the lessee will at all times during the said term insure and keep insured against loss or damage by fire and other risk usually insured against in the case of similar properties, such of the demised premises for the time being as are of a reasonably insurable nature, to such an amount as is usual in similar properties, by means of an insurance fund maintained or to be maintained by the Canadian National Railways, and that in case of damage to or destruction of the demised premises or any part thereof by fire or other risk insured against the moneys received in respect of such insurance shall be laid out in restoring, reinstating or replacing the same and in case such moneys shall be insufficient for the purpose the deficiency shall be made good by the lessee; provided, however, that insurance effected under the terms of any mortgages or deeds of trust or hypothecs securing any bonds issued by the lessor, and outstanding, shall be deemed pro tanto compliance with this clause.

17. That except as provided for in clause 8 hereof the lessee will not assign, transfer, or part with the possession or beneficial ownership of, or permit to be taken in execution, the properties for the time being comprised in the demised premises, or any part thereof, but so that this present covenant and provision shall not prevent the lessee from making or requiring the lessor to make the various agreements or arrangements provided for in clause 6 of this Indenture.

18. That the lessee will at all times during the said term assume and pay, discharge and perform, all debts, obligations, and liabilities whatsoever, whensoever and howsoever arising, of the lessor in respect of the said line of railway (other than and except the current expenses incurred for administering the affairs and maintaining the organization of the lessor for meeting which certain rentals are hereinbefore reserved, and except also the liabilities of the lessor in respect of the said bonds issued or to be issued by it, or other borrowed moneys) to the intent that the rent mentioned in paragraph (a) of the clause next preceding clause 1 hereof may at all times during the said term be available free from all deductions and claims whatsoever, for meeting the annual charge for interest and sinking funds in respect of the said bonds issued by the lessor pursuant to the provisions of this lease.

19. That the lessee will, subject to the provisions of clause 25 of this lease, at the expiration or sooner determination of the said term surrender and deliver up to the lessor the demised premises, and all property, rights and assets of every kind and description comprised or which ought to be comprised in the demise hereby made, and all additions and improvements made thereto, so repaired, maintained and renewed as aforesaid, in good working order and condition; and also will at such expiration or sooner determination of the said term assign to the lessor, if so required by it, all or any of the contracts, agreements, engagements, or undertakings then existing which may have been entered into by the lessee in connection with the maintenance, use, operation, renewal or repair of the demised premises or any part thereof.

And mutually agreed:

20. That in the event of any extensions, enlargements or improvements of whatsoever nature of, upon or in connection with the demised premises or any part thereof, or in connection with the undertakings and works of the lessor, within its powers as now or hereafter authorized by Statute being at any time required by the lessee after the lessee shall have entered into possession of the demised premises the same shall be made, provided, constructed, erected or furnished by the lessee in such manner and in accordance with such plans and specifications as may be mutually agreed upon between the lessor and lessee, or failing agreement as may be settled by arbitration under the provisions of this lease. The cost of providing, constructing or erecting any such extensions, enlargements or improvements shall in the first place be paid by the lessee, but the same shall be vested in and become the property of the lessor, subject to the provisions of this lease, upon the issue to the lessee of bonds or other securities of the lessor, at the option of the lessee carrying interest at such rate and to be issued on such terms and at such prices as may be mutually agreed upon, or failing agreement to be settled by arbitration as aforesaid, to an amount sufficient at the price aforesaid to meet the cost of any such extensions, enlargements or improvements, including in such cost interest during construction and all engineers' fees and other costs, charges and expenses.

21. Before the lessee shall be entitled to require the lessor to issue to the lessee any such bonds or other securities as provided in the next preceding clause hereof, the lessee shall if required by the lessor execute all such assurances, leases, covenants and documents as may be necessary to vest in the lessor, subject to the terms of this lease, the property and works provided for or executed in connection with the said extensions, enlargements and improvements (as the case may be).

22. Provided always and these presents are upon the express condition following, namely:

(a) If any instalment of any rent or other yearly sum hereinbefore reserved or made payable, or any part thereof, shall at any time be in arrear and unpaid for thirty days after the due date for payment thereof, or

(b) If the lessee shall at any time fail to perform or observe any covenant, provision, condition or agreement herein contained and on its part to be performed or observed.

then and in any such case the lessor may give six months' notice of default in writing to the lessee, specifying (in the event of default being claimed in respect of the provisions of sub-clause (b) of this clause) the nature of such default and the covenant, provision, condition or agreement so broken; and unless (in the event of default being claimed in respect of the provisions of sub-clause (a) of this clause) the lessee shall within such notice period pay the rentals or other sums so in arrear, and all costs, charges and expenses which the lessor may have been put to by reason of such default, or unless (in the event of default being claimed in respect of the provisions of sub-clause (b) of this clause) the lessee shall within such notice period fully and effectually remedy and make good such default to the satisfaction of the lessor, the lessor may without further notice, treat this lease as void and may forthwith re-enter upon and take possession of the demised premises or any part thereof in the name of the whole and the said premises peacefully hold and enjoy thenceforth as if these presents had not been executed without prejudice to any right of action or remedy of the lessor in respect of any covenant, condition or provision herein contained; and no acceptance of rent subsequent to any breach or default other than non-payment of rent, nor any condoning, excusing, or overlooking by the lessor on previous occasions of breaches or defaults similar to that for which re-entry is made shall be taken to operate as a waiver of this condition, nor in any way to defeat or affect the rights of the lessor hereunder. And that upon the said lease being so treated as void and re-entry made the lessee shall forthwith comply with the provisions of clause 19 hereof, and that all and whatsoever is or ought to be surrendered, delivered and assigned to the lessor, shall be surrendered, delivered and assigned free of all claims by the lessee and without prejudice to any such right of action or remedy of the lessor as aforesaid.

Provided also that if any part of the rent payable under the provisions of paragrah (a) of the granting clause on page 3 hereof be not paid on the due payment date and shall not be paid within ninety (90) days from such date, the lessee shall and will immediately pay to the trustee or trustees for the time being under the deed of trust or mortgage securing the said bonds, in trust to distribute the same ratably among the holders thereof, in full settlement of all past, present and future claims for rent due or to become due under said paragraph (a), a sum equal to the aggregate of

(1) The principal amount of all the bonds issued and outstanding under said deed of trust or mortgage on the date on which the instalment of interest or sinking fund constituting said rent became payable, plus

(2) The face amount of all unpaid coupons on said issued and outstanding bonds maturing on or before the date on which the instalment of interest or sinking fund constituting said rent became payable, plus

(3) Interest on both of said amounts, at the rate of five per cent (5%) per annum, from the date on which the instalment of interest or sinking fund constituting said rent became payable to the date of payment of said amounts to the said trustee or trustees, and also shall and will pay to the said trustee or trustees all other sums payable or to become payable to it or them under said deed of trust or mortgage by way of its or their remuneration and expenses in the discharge of the trust created thereby.

23. Every disagreement which may arise between the lessor and the lessee as to the construction of this lease or any part thereof, or as to the rights or liabilities of the parties or any of them under this lease, shall be decided by arbitration, the lessor to appoint one arbitrator and the lessee to appoint another, and the two so appointed to appoint a third, but if the lessor or the lessee fail for two weeks after appointment and notice thereof by the other party to appoint an arbitrator, or if the two when appointed fail for two weeks to appoint a third, then any judge of the Supreme Court of Canada may appoint an arbitrator instead of appointment thereof by the lessor or the lessee or by the two arbitrators as the case may be, and the award in writing of the majority of the three arbitrators shall be conclusive and binding upon the parties hereto.

24. Any notice to be given to the lessee may be given by being delivered or sent by registered mail to the Minister of Railways and Canals or his lawful deputy at Ottawa, Canada, and any notice to be given to the lessor by the lessee may be left at or sent by registered mail to the office for the time being known to the lessee of the lessor. Should the lessee be unaware of the location of any such office it may leave or send by registered mail any such notice addressed to the lessor at the place where the then last preceding payment of rental hereunder was made.

25. The lessee may at any time during the term hereby created on sixty days' notice in writing to the lessor acquire the whole of the demised premises from the lessor upon assuming the bonds then outstanding and all interest thereon, provided that all bonds retired by means of sinking fund payments or by means of the application of rental payments under this lease, or portions of such rental payments, shall be deemed to have been purchased and retired by the lessee and shall not be considered as outstanding under this clause.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

In such case all sinking funds in the hands of the trustees of the said bonds shall enure to the benefit of the lessee in reduction of its liability on the bonds so assumed.

In respect of the payment of interest or sinking fund monies on or in respect of outstanding bonds, it is assumed that all payments of rental made by the lessee hereunder will up to the date of the delivery of the deeds be duly and properly applied to the payments of such interest and sinking fund moneys in accordance with the terms of this lease, otherwise the lessee may deduct any amounts not so paid out of the moneys payable under this clause.

Should the lessor for any reason neglect or refuse to deliver proper deeds or transfers of the demised premises pursuant to the notice given under this clause, the lessee may expropriate the whole of the demised premises, in which case the compensation payable to the lessor in respect of such expropriation shall be fixed at one dollar ($1.00). The lessor shall also upon exercise of such option if and when required by the lessee call in and assign to the lessee or its nominees all of the capital stock issued by the lessor.

26.. This lease shall enure to the benefit of and be binding upon the respective successors and assigns of the parties hereto.

In witness whereof the parties hereto have executed this lease. Signed, sealed and delivered in the presence of, Rouyn Mines Railway Company.

Minister of Railways and Canals

Dated September 1st, 1925.

Noranda Mines, Limited. (No personal liability) and His Majesty the King.

Guarantee agreement re Rouyn Mines Railway Company.

This agreement made this 1st day of September, 1925.

BETWEEN

Noranda Mines, Limited (no personal liability), hereinafter called the "Guarantor", of the first part,

AND

His Majesty the King in the right of the Dominion of Canada, herein represented by the Minister of Railways and Canals, acting by virtue of an order in council, dated the day of 1925, hereinafter called "His Majesty", of the second part.

Whereas His Majesty has arranged for the construction by a railway company (hereinafter called the "Railway Company") of a line of railway (hereinafter called "the said line of railway") from a point on the National Transcontinental railway at or near O'Brien to a point in the township of Rouyn connecting with the plant of the guarantor to be there erected which said line of railway His Majesty proposes to lease (which lease is hereinafter called "the said lease") and to cause it to be operated as a part of the Canadian National Railways;

And whereas it is anticipated that during the first few years after the said line of railway has been completed and opened for traffic deficits will arise in connection with the operation thereof;

And whereas the province of Quebec is willing to guarantee the payment against such deficits (if any) of fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) a year for five (5) years from the date the said line of railway is opened for traffic, hereinafter called the "initial date", but a further guarantee is required of twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) a year for the same period from the guarantor who is interested in mining locations to be reached by the said line of railway;

Witnesseth that in consideration of the premises the parties hereto have agreed each with the other as follows:

His Majesty agrees:

1. To cause the railway company to construct and complete the said line of railway with all reasonable expedition and to lease it from the railway company by lease approximately in the form attached.

2. To cause the operation of the said line of railway when leased to be entrusted to the Canadian National Railway Company for operation under the terms of section 11 of chapter 13 of the statutes of Canada, 1919.

3. To cause accounts to be kept of all freight traffic moving over the said line of railway and/or freight traffic originating upon or destined to points upon the said line of railway moving from, through or to points upon the Canadian National Railways in Canada, all of such traffic being hereinafter called "such traffic."

4. To allocate thirty per cent (30%) of the gross earnings received by the Canadian National Railways from such traffic, hereinafter called "the said operating net earnings", to the said line of railway as earnings attributable to the said line of railway for the purposes of this agreement.

The Guarantor agrees:

5. That should the said operating net earnings of any one year of the first five (5) years from the initial date be insufficient to cover the rental including sinking fund payable under the said lease, after crediting the fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) per annum agreed to be paid as aforesaid by the province of Quebec, to pay to the Canadian National Railway Company as operators of the railway within thirty (30) days after the receipt of a summarized statement of account showing a deficit, the amount following:—

(a) When said deficit equals or exceeds twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) the sum of twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) in cash.

(b) When such deficit is less than twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) the amount of such deficit in cash.

And mutually agreed:

6. That the certificate of the Vice-President of Finance of the Canadian National Railways, or such officer as may at the time be performing the duties of said vice-president, shall be conclusive as to the existence and amount of such deficit, but the guarantor may, if it so desires, take steps at its own expense to verify such statements and for such purpose shall have access to all the records and accounts upon which the certificate is founded, and any inaccuracies discovered shall be rectified in subsequent years, but no payments due, or accruing due, shall be deferred pending such verification.

7. That the liability of the Guarantor under this agreement is limited to the amount of the deficit (if any) in any one of the five years after the initial date, ascertained as provided in paragraph 5 hereof, but not exceeding the sum of $20,000 in any one year of such period of five (5) years, or One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000) in all.

8. That the accounts specified in Clause 3 of this agreement shall be continued for ten years from the initial date and if at that time it appears and is so certified by the Vice-President, or other officer as aforesaid, that the said operating net earnings have been sufficient to pay all the rentals including sinking fund payable under the said lease, after crediting the Fifty Thousand Dollars ($50,000) per annum agreed to be paid by the Province of Quebec, leaving a balance arising from such operation, then and in that case His Majesty will cause to be repaid to the Guarantor, without interest:

(b) When the balance is less than One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000) the amount of such balance.

9. If pursuant to the taking of accounts provided for in Clause 8 there results—

(a) No repayment to the Guarantor.

(b) A partial repayment only to the Guarantor.

Then the same accounts shall be continued for one further period of five years, or until fifteen years from the initial date, and if then a balance is found to arise and is so certified from such operation His Majesty will cause to be repaid to the Guarantor, without interest—

(c) When such balance equals or exceeds One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000) (less any amount repaid previously under the provisions of Clause 8) the sum of One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000) less such repayment.

(d) When such balance is less than One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000) (as reduced by any such partial repayment) the amount of such balance or profit.

The underlying principle in both Clauses 8 and 9 of this agreement being no repayment except from operating net earnings, as specified.

10. Clauses 8 and 9 have been drawn upon the assumption that the Guarantor was called upon to pay and duly paid the whole One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000) covered by their guarantee. It is, of course, understood that in the event of the Guarantor not being called upon to pay and not paying the whole One Hundred Thousand Dollars ($100,000) the obligation of His Majesty to refund shall in no case exceed the actual contribution without interest, by the Guarantor to His Majesty under the terms of this agreement.

11. That after fifteen years from the initial date the taking or continuing of accounts, as provided for in Clauses 3, 8 and 9 of this agreement shall cease absolutely, and all claims for repayment remaining unsatisfied after the application of the provisions of Clauses 8 and 9 shall be waived.

12. That should the operation of the said line of railway prior to fifteen years from the initial date be permanently abandoned or service be withdrawn continuously for a period of six (6) months (other than on account of the closing down of all mines served by such line of railway or the withholding of traffic by the mining interests) then His Majesty will repay to the Guarantor, without interest, any amounts paid to His Majesty by the Guarantor under this agreement.

13. This agreement shall enure to the benefit of and be binding upon the successors and assigns of the respective parties.

In witness whereof the parties hereto have executed this agreement.

Extract from Minutes of meeting of the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railway Company.

Held in the Company's Offices in the City of Montreal on Monday the 9th day of June, 1925.

With regard to the proposed Rouyn Branch Mr. Rayside reported to the Meeting that the matter had been gone into further with representatives of the Quebec Government who had promised that free right-of-way over (Quebec) Crown Lands would be given, together with any timber on such lands, and that other interested parties may increase their contribution to $20,000 per year for five years.

It was unanimously resolved.

That if the said line be constructed by another Company (with free right-of-way on Quebec Government lands) as above referred to and if there be contributed annually for five years $50,000 by the Quebec Government and $20,000 by other interested parties such payments aggregating $350,000 in all, and if said line were leased for a long term of years to the Dominion Government and by it entrusted to the Canadian National Railways for operation and if said payments are made direct to the Canadian National Railways as representing the said lessee and if the rental under the lease would represent not more than 6 per cent on the cost of construction the Directors would approve of such construction and leasing and entrusting.

Secretary.

Extract from Minutes of meeting of the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railway Company.

Held in the Company's Offices in the City of Montreal, on Monday the 21st day of September, 1925.

The Meeting was informed that the Rouyn Mines Railway Company has been negotiating for a loan through Dillon, Read and Company of New York of up to $2,000,000 to be secured by the pledge of, not exceeding $3,000,000 of its 30 year, 4½ per cent First Mortgage Bonds, the interest to be paid on the loan to be at the rate of 4½ per annum; and that one of the conditions under which said loan would be made is that payment thereof within a year would have to be guaranteed by the Company; the expectation being that within such year the Rouyn Company's Bonds could be sold to sufficient amount and at a reasonable rate to pay off such loan.

It was unanimously resolved.

That a letter in the general form submitted to the Meeting or to like effect addressed to American Exchange Securities Corporation, guaranteeing payment of a loan, as above mentioned, may be executed under the corporate seal and delivered, subject to the necessary Order in Council.

Dear Sirs:—You are about to grant a credit to Rouyn Mines Railway Company, a corporation incorporated by an act of the Legislative Assembly of the province of Quebec, for the term of one year from date hereof, in the sum of Two Million Dollars ($2,000,000); the terms and conditions whereof are set forth in the attached letter, dated , 1925, from you to said Railway Company.

This Company is to operate said line of railway of said Railway Company under an order in Council entrusting to this Company the management and operation of said line of railway. This Company also expects to acquire at least a controlling interest in the capital stock of said Railway Company.

In consideration of the benefits to accrue to this Company from the granting of said credit, which will enable said Railway Company to construct said line of railway, and in order to induce you to grant said credit, this Company hereby unconditionally guarantees to you the prompt and full repayment of all advances made under said credit, both principal and interest, in accordance with the terms of said credit.

Very truly yours,
Canadian National Railway Company.

Rouyn Mines Railway Company,
Montreal, Canada.

Dear Sirs,—We are willing to grant you a credit, for the term of one year from date hereof, in the sum of Two Million Dollars ($2,000,000) for the purpose of enabling you to construct a line of railway from a point on the National Transcontinental Railway near O'Brien, in the Province of Quebec, to a point in the Township of Rouyn, in said Province, about 45 miles distant, on the following terms and conditions: Said credit to be availed of in amounts of $500,000 from time to time, and the first $500,000 thereof to be availed of within 60 days from date hereof; the amount of said credit availed of to be placed to your credit on the books of The American Exchange-Pacific National Bank, not subject to payment of drawing interest, and to be withdrawn from time to time by you only as construction requirements in respect of the said line of railway necessitate; as soon as the first $500,000 advance upon the credit is exhausted a new advance of $500,000 to be taken and similarly credited to your account on our books, and this procedure repeated until the full $2,000,000 has been advanced or all advances under the credit have been repaid in full; the advances made to you under the credit to bear interest at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum; payable quarterly, and no interest to be otherwise payable; each advance to be secured by your promissory note for the amount of the advance, with interest at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, repayable on or before the expiration of one year from the date of the granting of the credit, and, as collateral security, by a principal amount of your First Mortgage Thirty-Year 4½ per cent Bonds equal to 150 per cent of the amount of the advances made under the credit; said bonds to be part of an issue limited to $5,000,000 and the mortgage securing the same to constitute, in the opinion of our counsel, a first lien on the said line of railway and on the lessor interest of your Company in lease of said line of railway to the Crown for a term extending at least to the maturity of the bonds, at a rental at least sufficient to meet the full interest and sinking fund requirements on all bonds outstanding under the mortgage; the Canadian National Railway Company to unconditionally guarantee to us the prompt and full repayment of all advances made under said credit, both principal and interest, in accordance with the terms of said credit.

The above is subject, of course, to the approval of our counsel as to all legal matters connected herewith.

Very truly yours,
AMERICAN EXCHANGE SECURITIES CORPORATION,
By.....
Vice-President.

Certified copy of a Minute of a Meeting of the Committee of the Privy Council, approved by The Deputy His Excellency the Governor General on the 26th September, 1925.

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 25th September, 1925, from the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, for the Minister of Railways and Canals, representing as follows:

1. That the Rouyn Mines Railway Company, hereinafter referred to as the "Mines Railway" or "the Company," is a body corporate, duly incorporated under the Statutes of the Province of Quebec, 1925, Chapter 110 thereof, with authority to construct and operate "a line or lines of railway from a point on the National Transcontinental Railway near O'Brien, in the township of Privat, in the Province of Quebec, thence southerly through the townships of Privat, Poularies, Destor and Dufresnoy, or other adjacent township, to a point in the township of Rouyn; with power to build branch lines from a point in said township of Rouyn westerly to a point on the provincial boundary between the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario, and easterly to a point at or near Grand Lake Victoria, and a point on the National Transcontinental Railway west of Parent.

2. That the Mines Railway under its Act of Incorporation is authorized to borrow in Canada or elsewhere the sums of money needed for the construction, maintenance and operation of the railway, the purchase of the land and the construction or acquisition of other properties or works, other than the railway which the said Company is authorized to acquire, construct or operate and to issue bonds, debentures and other securities for any sums so borrowed.

3. That the Mines Railway under its Act of Incorporation is authorized to lease, sell or transfer the whole of its railway or the whole or any part of its interests in the whole railway or any part thereof to any railway company or to the Crown.

4. That, pursuant to its statutory authority, the Mines Railway is constructing a line of railway from a point on the National Transcontinental Railway, near O'Brien, in the township of Privat, in the Province of Quebec, thence southerly through the townships of Privat, Aiguebelle, Destor, Clericy and Dufresnoy to a point in the township of Rouyn, a distance of approximately forty-five (45) miles, which line of railway is hereinafter referred to as "the railway."

5. That under the authority of the Statutes of Canada, 1915, Chapter 16, Section 1, Subsection (1) thereof, the Minister of Railways and Canals is authorized and empowered as follows:—

1. The Minister of Railways and Canals is authorized and empowered, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council, to construct, purchase, lease either with or without an agreement to purchase, or otherwise acquire in whole or in part, any line or lines of railway, branch line, railway bridge, railway station, railway terminal, railway ferry or other railway work in the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, or in any of the said provinces, which in his opinion can more conveniently and usefully be operated as part of the Government Railways system, or which may be deemed necessary or desirable for the more efficient operation of the said system; Provided, however, that a copy of every such lease or contract of purchase shall be laid before Parliament within one month after the execution thereof, if Parliament is then sitting, or, if Parliament is not then sitting within ten days after the opening of the next session thereafter: Provided, further, that no such line of railway so leased, purchased or otherwise acquired, shall exceed two hundred miles in length in any single instance: Provided, further, that no contract for the construction of a line of railway exceeding twenty-five miles in length shall be entered into or the purchase price of any such railway or other work be paid until after a sum of money for the purpose has been appropriated by Parliament: Provided, further, that any such railway, or other work, when so constructed, leased, purchased or otherwise acquired, shall form part of the Government Railways system and shall be subject to the provisions of the Government Railways Act: Provided, further, that no such railway shall be so constructed, leased, purchased or otherwise acquired unless it directly connects with some part of the then existing Government Railways system.

6. That the Mines Railway by a resolution of the Board of Directors passed at a meeting of the said Board held in the City of Montreal on the 14th day of September, A.D. 1925, unanimously resolved in effect that a lease of the railway may be made to His Majesty the King in the right of the Dominion of Canada in general form of a printed draft lease submitted, subject to such changes therein as may be approved or authorized by the Governor in Council and agreed to by the President of the Company, a certified extract from the Minutes of the Meeting of the said Board of Directors passing the said resolution and covering the same hereto attached marked "A," and a copy of the general form of the said printed draft lease hereto attached marked "B."

7. That the draft lease market "B," amongst other things, provides in effect as follows:

(a) That the Mines Railway proposes to create an issue not exceeding $5,000,000 of Thirty Year 4½ Per Cent First Mortgage Bonds, of which issue it is estimated that approximately $3,500,000 will be required to provide cost of construction of the railway; the said issue of bonds to be secured upon the railway and other properties of the Mines Railway;

(b) That the Mines Railway lease to His Majesty the railway, together with all moveable and immoveable properties of the Mines Railway acquired for the purposes of the railway, or constructed or used in connection therewith, or in connection with maintenance and operation thereof, and also rents, revenues, etc., including corporate and other franchise rights, etc., of the Company, for a term of thirty years;

(c) That the rentals to be paid by His Majesty to the Mines Railway under the lease during the terms to be as follows:—

(a) During the first and every subsequent year of the said terms such sum as shall be sufficient (in accordance with the terms and provisions of the deed of trust or mortage securing the said bonds) to pay the interest and sinking funds upon the said bonds for the time being issued and outstanding, and all other moneys lawfully payable under such deed of trust or mortgage, including accrued interest on bonds purchased or drawn for redemption under the sinking fund provisions thereof. The whole of such rental shall be paid free of all lawful Canadian taxes or deductions of whatsoever nature, and shall at the option of the lessor be payable in the city of New York in gold coin of the United States of America of the standard of weight and fineness existing October 1, 1925, or in the city of Montreal, Canada, in lawful money of the Dominion of Canada, by equal half-yearly payments made five days prior to the respective dates for payment of interest and sinking fund moneys under such deed of trust or mortgage. It is hereby declared and agreed that the lessor intends to assign and may and will assign to the trustee or trustees under the deed of trust or mortgage securing the said bonds, the rental payments to be made for and in connection with said interest and sinking fund payments as in this paragraph (a) provided for; and the lessor hereby requests and authorizes the lessee to make such payments direct to the said trustee or trustees, to be received, held and used by said trustee or trustees as and for payment of interest and sinking fund moneys under said deed of trust or mortgage; and the lessee hereby covenants to make such rental payments to said trustee or trustees accordingly.

(b) Such sums as may from time to time be paid or payable by the lessor, by way of interest or discount on loans or advances made to the lessor by any bank or other corporation provided that interest on construction items may be charged to construction cost and that bonds forming part of the said issue may be issued in respect thereof.

(c) Such further annual sum or rent as shall be equal to the actual annual expenses for administering the affairs and maintaining the organization of the lessor, limited however to an amount not exceeding one thousand dollars per annum, and also any remuneration for the time being payable by the lessor to the trustees of the said bonds, the sums payable under this paragraph (b) to be paid without deduction on the same dates and times, and with the same option in the lessor as to the place and mode of payment, as the rent reserved by paragraph (a)."

(d) That the Mines Railway shall not, without consent of His Majesty, issue any additional bonds ranking prior to or pari passu with the bond issue first above referred to, except bonds to reimburse His Majesty for work of extensions, enlargements, improvements, etc,, to be made at cost of His Majesty and subject to the approval of the Mines Railway

(e) That His Majesty shall not assign, transfer or part with the lawful ownership of the railway, but may entrust the management and operation of the railway to the Canadian National Railway Company, or any company amalgamated with the last named company or to any other company approved by the Governor in Council, and may make traffic agreements respecting the operation of the railway.

(f) That His Majesty shall pay all taxes, assessments and outgoings respecting the railway that the Mines Railway is liable therefor after His Majesty has taken possession of the railway under the lease, and His Majesty shall assume the contracts and obligations of the Mines Railway.

(g) That His Majesty will join in any mortgages or deeds of trust, hypothecs or other documents necessary to be executed to provide for the issue or the payment or retirement of the said bonds for the purpose only of providing that the payments of rental to be made under the lease be payable and available in such manner as may be specified in such mortgages, deeds of trust, hypothecs, not inconsistent with the provisions of the lease, His Majesty to assume no liability to pay any sum or sums on account of principal due or to become due under any such instruments, except in so far as the rent payable under the lease may provide for such payment.

(h) That His Majesty shall assume and pay, discharge and perform, all debts, obligations and liabilities of the Mines Railway (except the expense of administering the affairs of the Company in excess of the one thousand dollars per annum under rental provided, and except the liabilities of the Company in respect of bond issues) to the extent of the rental provided.

(i) That any extensions, enlargements or improvements, etc., made by and at the cost of His Majesty as above set out, may be taken over by the Mines Railway, if they be paid for by bonds or other securities of the company.

(j) That re-entry may be made by the Mines Railway upon six months' notice after thirty days' default in payment of any rental instalment when due; if rent be not then paid, or upon like notice after thirty days of any breach of performance of observance, if the default be not then remedied and made good to the satisfaction of the Mines Railway; and in case of default in payment of any rental instalment in respect of interest or sinking fund in connection with the said bonds within all the remaining rental instalments for the full term of the lease immediately become due and payable.

(k) That His Majesty may, at any time upon sixty days' notice to that end, during the term of the lease, acquire the railway upon assuming the bonds then outstanding with interest thereon, the bonds retired by means of the sinking fund payments or by means of the rental payments under the lease to be purchased and retired bonds by the lease and not outstanding bonds.

(l) That every disagreement which may arise between the parties under the lease shall be the subject of settlement by arbitration.

8. That the premier of the government of the province of Quebec has advised in effect that his government agrees to pay the Canadian National Railway Company as operators of the railway fifty thousand dollars annually for the period of five years to meet deficits incurred in the operation of the railway, payments to commence upon the completion of the first year's operation, and that the necessary authority of the Lieutenant-Governor in council and of the legislature of the province of Quebec will be sought accordingly.

9. That the Noranda Mines, Limited, a body corporate, interested in certain mining locations to be served by the railway, has agreed, in case the railway be leased to His Majesty as above set out, to supplement the guarantee to His Majesty of the province of Quebec of deficits in the operating net earnings of the railway for the period of the first five years of the term of the lease, in effect as follows:

That should the said operating net earnings in any one year of the first five (5) years from the initial date be insufficient to cover the rental including sinking fund payable under the said lease, after crediting the fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) per annum agreed to be paid as aforesaid by the province of Quebec, to pay to the Canadian National Railway Company as operators of the railway, within thirty (30) days after the receipt of a summarized statement of account showing a deficit, the amount following—

(a) When said deficit equals or exceeds twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) the sum of twenty thousand dollars $20,000) in cash.

(b) When such deficit is less than twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) the amount of such deficit in cash.

And the Noranda Mines, Limited, in connection with guarantee aforesaid, has agreed to enter into an agreement with His Majesty in terms as in draft agreement hereto attached marked (C) the draft agreement marked "C" hereinafter referred to as the "guarantee agreement".

10. That the guarantee agreement provides, amongst other things, in effect as follows—

That His Majesty agrees:—

(a) To cause the Mines Railway to complete the railway and lease to His Majesty by lease in form generally as set out in draft lease marked "B";

(b) To entrust the operation of the leased railway to the Canadian National Railway Company;

(c) To cause accounts to be kept for all freight traffic moving over the railway and of all freight traffic originating on or destined to points on the railway;

(d) To allocate thirty per cent (30%) of the gross earnings received by the Canadian National Railways from such traffic as operating net earnings to the railway.

11. That the guarantee agreement further provides:

(A) That the Noranda Mines, Limited, agrees:—

5. That should the said operating net earnings in any one year of the first five (5) years from the initial date be insufficient to cover the rental including sinking fund payable under the said lease, after crediting the fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) per annum agreed to be paid as aforesaid by the province of Quebec, to pay to His Majesty, within thirty (30) days after the receipt of a summarized statement of account showing a deficit, the amount following—

(a) When said deficit equals or exceeds twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) the sum of twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) in cash.

(b) When such deficit is less than twenty thousand dollars ($20,000) the amount of such deficit in cash.

(B) That the liability of the Noranda Mines, Limited, is limited to the amount of the deficit, if any, in any one of the first five years of the terms of the lease, not exceeding $20,000 in any one year, or $100,000 in all.

(C) That the accounts of freight traffic shall be continued for ten years of the term of the lease, and if then the operating net earnings have been sufficient to pay all rentals, including the sinking fund payable under the lease, after crediting the $50,000 per annum payable by the province of Quebec, leaving balance arising from the operation. His Majesty will repay to the Noranda Mines, Limited, without interest:—

(b) When the balance is less than one hundred thousand dollars ($100,000) the amount of such balance.

(D) That if after taking accounts as above provided, there results:—

(a) No payment to the guarantor;

(b) A partial repayment only to the guarantor;

(E) That after fifteens years from beginning of term of lease the taking of accounts of freight traffic shall cease and all claims for repayments remaining unsatisfied waived.

(F) That should the operating of the railway at any time prior to fifteen years be permanently abandoned or service withdrawn continuously for a period of six months other than on account of the closing down of the mines served by the railway or the withholding of traffic by the mining interests, His Majesty shall refund, without interest, any amounts paid by the Noranda Mines, Limited.

12. That the Canadian National Railway Company, through its board of directors at a meeting of the said board held on the 9th day of June, 1925, unanimously passed a resolution as follows—

"That if the said line be constructed by another company (with free right of way on Quebec Government lands) as above referred to and if there be contributed annually for five years fifty thousand dollars by the Quebec Government and $20,000 by other interested parties such payments aggregating $350,000 in all, and if said line were leased for a long term of years to the Dominion Government and by it entrusted to the Canadian National Railways for operation and if said payments are made direct to the Canadian National Railways as representing the said lessee and if the rental under the lease would represent not more than 6% on the cost of construction the directors would approve of such construction and leasing and entrusting"; a certified extract from the minutes of meeting of the board covering the resolution referred to herein attached marked "D".

13. That the Statutes of Canada, 1919, chapter 13, "An Act to incorporate Canadian National Railways Company and respecting Canadian National Railways", section 29 thereof provides as follows:—

29. The company may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, acquire, hold guarantee, pledge and dispose of shares in the capital stocks, bonds, notes, securities or other contractual obligations whatsoever of any railway company, or of any transportation, navigations, terminal, telegraph, express, hotel, electric power or of any other company authorized to carry on any business incidental to the working of a railway, or any business which in the opinion of the board of directors may be carried on in the interests of the company.

14. That the Canadian National Railway Company through its Board of Directors at a meeting of the said Board held on the 21st day of September, 1925, unanimously passed a resolution in effect, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council, that the said Company may guarantee payment of a loan to the Mines Railway of up to $2,000,000 to be secured to the lender by the pledge of, not exceeding $3,000,000 of 30 Years 4½ per cent First Mortgage Bonds of the Mines Railways, the interest to be paid on the loan to be at the rate of 4½ per cent; and that one of the conditions under which said loan is to be made is that payment thereof within one year would have to be guaranteed by the Canadian National Railway Company, a certified extract of the minutes of said meeting of the Board covering the resolution referred to, hereto attached marked "E".

15. That the guarantee by the Canadian National Railway Company of the loan to the Mines Railway has been agreed upon in the general form hereto attached marked "F".

16. That in the opinion of the Minister of Railways and Canals it is necessary and desirable for the more efficient operation of the Government Railways system, that the railway be leased by His Majesty upon terms and under conditions as generally in draft lease hereto attached marked "B" set out and contained, and that it is considered in the interests of both the Government Railways system and that of the Canadian National Railways that the Canadian National Railway Company guarantee payment of the loan to the Mines Railway to extent as approved by the Directors of the said Canadian National Railway Company under resolution as covered by copy of extract of minutes of meeting of the Directors of the said Company hereto attached marked "D" and that His Majesty avail himself of the guarantee of the Noranda Mines, Limited, in terms and under conditions as generally set out and contained in the guarantee agreement, draft hereto attached marked "C".

17. That the Statutes of Canada, 1919, Chapter 13, "An Act to incorporate Canadian National Railway Company and respecting Canadian National Railways", Section 11, thereof provides as follows:—

"11. The Governor in Council may from time to time by Order in Council entrust to the Company the management and operation of any lines of railway or parts thereof, and any property or works of whatsoever description, or interests therein, and any powers, rights or privileges over or with respect to any railways, properties or works, or interests therein, which may be from time to time vested in or owned, controlled or occupied by His Majesty, or such part or parts thereof, or rights or interests therein, as may be designated in any Order in Council, upon such terms and subject to such regulations and conditions as the Governor in Council may from time to time decide; such management and operation to continue during the pleasure of the Governor in Council and to be subject to termination or variation from time to time in whole or in part by the Governor in Council. Any such Order in Council shall be laid before Parliament within ten days after the opening of the next ensuing session, or if Parliament be sitting at the time such Order in Council is passed, then within ten days from the date of said Order in Council.

In view of the facts as above represented and the considered advantage and benefit to the Government Railways system and the Canadian National Railways system, as each in the respective matters may be affected, and upon the advice of the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals for Canada, to this end, the Minister recommends:—

(1) That the Minister of Railways and Canals be authorized and empowered to lease the railway from the Mines Railway for a term of thirty years, subject to and generally in accordance with the terms and conditions as set out and contained in draft lease hereto attached marked "B", and to enter into such lease accordingly with option of purchase of the railway as in said draft lease provided.

(2) That the Minister be authorized and empowered to execute the guarantee agreement in general form as hereto attached marked "C".

(3) That the approval be given to the Canadian National Railway Company to guarantee the contractual obligations of the Rouyn Mines Railways Company to repay a twelve months' loan or credit not exceeding $2,000,000 bearing 4½ per cent interest per annum, to be made or granted to the Rouyn Mines Railway Company by the American Exchange Securities Corporation or other corporation or institution to be approved of by the Minister of Railways and Canals, such guarantee, subject to such detailed changes or amendments as the Minister of Railways and Canals may approve, to be in the general form hereto attached marked "F".

(4) That upon the railway being acquired by His Majesty by and under a lease the management and operation of the railway be entrusted to the Canadian National Railway Company during the pleasure of the Governor in Council and subject to termination or variation from time to time in whole or in part by Your Excellency in Council.

The Committee concur in the foregoing recommendations and submit the same for approval.

E. J. LEMAIRE,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, had my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) confined his remarks to the question of the legality of the charter and the right to construct the Rouyn railway, I would not have attempted to reply, because I have learned, through a number of years of experience in parliament, that it is useless for a layman to get into an argument with a lawyer and particularly a man well versed in railway law like my hon. friend. I have never found in the seventeen odd years that I have been in parliament that lawyers can agree amongst themselves; they can always put up a fair argument on either side of the question. But when my hon. friend attempts to show, or rather, because he did not even attempt to show, to insinuate that some grave pre-election scandal was associated with the building of this railway, I hope to convince even my hon. friend that he is very much in error in his conclusions.

Hon. members will recall that away back in 1922, 1923 and 1924, there were reports of great mineral development in the northern part of Quebec. In 1923 and 1924 particularly, reports came to us of rich finds in that part of the country, and representations were made, not only to the Canadian National Railways, but to other railways, that they should extend a line into that district. In 1924, Mr. Timmins of the Hollinger mines approached the president of the Canadian National Railways urging him to build a line into that section of the country. A survey was made but the railway directors and the president were not satisfied that the building of a road in there would be a profitable venture.

Shortly afterwards another discovery was made of the Noranda mines and again they were approached to build a road. Representations were such that engineers were sent there to make a very careful survey of the possibilities of that section of country. It was discovered that there were very rich mineral deposits and there was a rush not only of miners, but of railways to get into that district. It is well known that an Ontario railway that has made it very profitable to the province at large by going into the mining country was anxious to build a line, and other railway companies were similarly anxious. The Canadian National Railways made a survey, and on reports made to them it was indicated that it was questionable whether, even with the prospects of building a 500 ton smelter, the road would pay at first. The government of Quebec was approached. The people of Quebec, like the people of Toronto, appeared to be anxious that feeders going into this district should be feeders running into their different cities. I am not going into that because it is natural that each should want to get the business. The government of Quebec were asked for a railway land grant and they said: We will not give you a railway land grant, but we will give you a grant of some $50,000 a year. I will come to that a little later on. Early in the summer of 1925 a location survey was made of this road, because of additional proof coming out of rich findings in that part of the country.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: By what engineers was the survey made?

Mr. ROBB: By the engineers of the Canadian National Railways.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is right.

Mr. ROBB: It is true that last session the Minister of Railways, from his place in parliament, declared that the road if built would be built by capitalists, and I am prepared to prove that it is being so built. I will give the names of the directors and I am sure my hon. friend will be satisfied that they are all responsible men. The hon. gentleman laid very much stress this afternoon and again this evening upon his allegation that this was a dummy company. I am sure he was not serious in that. As a lawyer who has organized a good many companies he knows that the names are never given of those who are really behind the concern.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Did the minister read the lease?

Mr. ROBB: I have not read it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the minister reads it he will agree that the company is a dummy one.

Mr ROBB: My hon. friend knows that in the organization of companies the method adopted is as I have stated; the names of clerks and stenographers in the office are used so that the public will not know who are behind the concern. But I propose to show just who the directors of this company are in order that the House may know what class of men are responsible for it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What difference on earth does it make what the names are in the light of the terms of that lease?

Mr. ROBB: My right hon. friend will not drag me away from the argument which was advanced this afternoon by his colleague, who attempted to show that this was a straw company. The directors of the company are these—Mr. Robert Adair of Montreal, to begin with. Will anyone say that he is not a respectable and a leading financial man in the city of Montreal?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will you tell us what stock he has in the company?

Mr. ROBB: I have no idea.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not one cent.

Mr. ROBB: Surely my hon. friend is not serious. Is there any company who would have a director on their board if he had no stock?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am absolutely serious. Having read these documents I know that no money could have been put up; if there was, then the documents are misleading.

Mr. ROBB: Another director is Mr. Charles M. Hart of Montreal. Does anyone suggest that he is not a responsible and a respectable business man of that city? Mr. Donat Raymond is also on the board, and he is proprietor of the Windsor hotel in Montreal, being also a large shareholder in the Hollinger mines. He has large interests in the city of Montreal and can pay his way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They all have money, of course.

Mr. ROBB: The bond people who are financing the organization in New York are represented on the board by Mr. Harold Fowler and Mr. Clifton M. Miller of New York City. These gentlemen are associated with the bank which is doing the financing. Right here I want my hon. friend to withdraw his insinuations; I am sure he will when he has heard me. He tried to create the impression that the contract was let at a time when it would be of great value as a campaign fund for one of the parties. Now he has had some experience in the running of elections and I would ask him, of what use is a campaign fund of this sort where the work done, which I suppose would consist in getting out the ties and clearing the roadway, represents a total amount paid out up to January 31, 1926, of only a little over $130,000?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not mind answering the question at once. That certainly would not add very much to my hon. friend's fund, but I would ask him a question in reply: why was there any necessity for arranging for $2,000,000 of cash? It looks to me as if anything that might be done was scared off by the Journal.

Mr. ROBB: The road is to be leased by the Canadian National Railways and my hon. friend wants to know why these people were controlling the construction of it and had men there. The reason was that no padding of accounts should take place and that there should be no extra cost attached to the building of the road. They wanted the cost to be reasonable and the railway company insisted that if they were to operate the road and pay interest on the bonds, which would be the rental they would pay, they should know exactly how much money went into the building of it. They therefore have complete control of the expenditures and it is all subject to auditing by the auditors of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the government also supervise the expenditure the same as has always been done in the past in connection with government guarantees?

Mr. ROBB: I do not care to stir up some of the government guarantees of my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not asking you to do so. Answer the question.

Mr. ROBB: My right hon. friend will not drag me into that to-night. I want to emphasize this fact, that the directors whose names I have just given are on the board not as representatives of the Canadian National Railways nor of the government but as representatives of the bankers who are putting up the money to build the road. I could not follow my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) this afternoon in his reference to certain payments which were to be made, not exceeding $1,000 per year. What are these payments? It is provided that after the road is built and everything is cleaned up these directors shall not get more than $1,000 a year, which sum is to be divided among the whole group of them. That is my understanding of the matter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But they do nothing.

Mr. ROBB: The cost of the road for the 45 miles is to be $2,655,000; it is to be financed on 4½ per cent 30 year bonds, and no bonds whatever are to be issued until the road is complete and ready to be handed over to the company for operation. They have arranged with the bankers who are advancing the money that they shall provide it in sums of $500,000 as required, and all they are paying is 4½ per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The bonds to be deposited with them.

Mr. ROBB: I suppose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The bonds are issued to the bankers; read the letter.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has had some experience as Minister of Finance and his leader had a long experience in different departments of the government. Hon. gentlemen opposite were in power when railways were being built, and I would ask them whether in their time the money was provided at as low a rate as 4½ per cent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We always got the money at the lowest current rate and I hope my hon. friend is doing the same. The minister is missing the entire point, however. He admits this guarantee in the lease; why did he not get his legislation?

Mr. ROBB: I tell my hon. friend that I am not going to be drawn into any legal argument on the question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not a legal question; it is simply a matter of morals, and on that ground the minister is perhaps better fitted to speak on the question than any of his colleagues. Should not the ordinary procedure have been taken if there was nothing to hide? Why was it not done? There was considerable time in which to do it, for the minister's men had the matter under review twice.

Mr. ROBB: I repeat, I will not be drawn into a legal argument with my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is not legal.

Mr. ROBB: I do not say he is right, I do not say he is wrong; it is purely a legal question.

Now, Sir, as said a moment ago the funds for the construction of this railway are not being provided by the government of Canada, but by a banking institution in New York. The directors I have named represent that institution. Before undertaking to operate the road the chairman and board of directors of the Canadian National Railways secured an agreement from the government of the province of Quebec that it would give a bonus of $50,000 a year for five years, and from the Noranda mines that they would give an additional bonus of $20,000 a year for five years, or a total bonus of $70,000 a year for that period. The traffic experts have carefully surveyed and investigated the local conditions, and they estimate that the road will carry itself with this subsidy, and that within five years at most it will return a profit to the company. Because it must not be forgotten that every person familiar with the mineral resources of that country agrees that the prospects of a railway being a profitable undertaking are exceedingly good. That is why there was not only a rush of miners into the district, there was also an attempted rush of railways. I do not say that my hon. friend is finding fault because the road which the nation had to take over and operate got a branch line into the Rouyn district before any other roads, but I appeal to the good sense of my hon. friend as a railway man to bear me out when I say that a trunk line railway cannot pay unless it has feeders. This line looks like a pretty good feeder for the Canadian National Railways.

Let me remind the House that the government does not undertake to say where railways are to be built. It accepts the advice of the chairman and directors of the Canadian National Railways on railway policy. And is there anyone in this House who will say that the chairman of the Canadian National Railways is not a good railway man? He has had his certificate of ability not only from the railway officials throughout the country; he is acknowledged by my right hon. friend as a good railway man. Looking into the traffic possibilities, he and his board of directors unanimously said to the government: This is a good feeder for the Canadian National trunk line, and we recommend to you that we should have authority to build the road.

I am not going to detain the House. I think I have shown that this was not a dummy company, that on the contrary it was a real company composed of real financial men; that the money was advanced by bankers in New York, who had a local board of directors looking after their interests; that the most careful survey was made of traffic possibilities; that provision is made for a most careful examination of the expenditures upon which the Canadian National Railways will have to pay rental; that the money was obtained at reasonably low rates of interest—that is admitted by my hon. friend—and that, in a word, everything was done above board. Well, what more does the House want? I say hon. members can have something more. This matter might properly be referred to the House Committee on Railway Estimates that is appointed each year. There hon. members will have an opportunity of calling in Sir Henry Thornton, the traffic experts and the auditors, and we will invite the fullest and freest examination into the accounts of this railway that is to be leased by the Canadian National Railways.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend promised to answer my questions as soon as he had finished his address. I have two to ask him. What was the date of the contract with the government of Quebec for the $50,000 guarantee? I have not been able to find it in the papers. Or is that still in the air?

Mr. ROBB: I did not think I had anything more to say about this matter, but a memorandum was placed before me at about six o'clock, which I have not yet had much time to look into. It states that the government of Quebec had previously agreed to give $50,000 per annum. I thank my hon. friend for asking me the question, for it gives me an opportunity of answering one of his statements. I said a moment ago I did not want to get into any controversy with lawyers. My hon. friend questioned the right of the chairman and his board of directors to enter into this contract.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, the government's action.

Mr. ROBB: I am going to quote him the authority of a gentleman that at least my right hon. friend will not question, because he is the counsel upon whose opinion my right hon. friend relied when he loaded the whole railway on to this country. I refer to Mr. Ruel, who is the vice president and legal adviser of the Canadian National Railways.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend just allow me—

Mr. ROBB: I will quote this legal opinion first, and then answer my hon. friend. Mr. Ruel's opinion is expressed in the following terms:

> There is no question that under the provisions of Chapter 16 of the Statutes of Canada, 1915, the crown may lease the line of railway specified in the draft lease, even before completion, and may of course agree to pay rental from the date of the lease. The language of the Act (Statutes Canada 1915, chapter 16, Section 1) covers "any line or lines of railway or any railway work in the province of Quebec." The line under construction is unquestionably a railway work.

That is the considered opinion of the gentleman who was the legal adviser of my right hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend give his opinion on what I have charged, namely, that this government had no right to construct this line? He is speaking of the leasing of a line which does not exist.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Will the minister answer two questions?

Mr. ROBB: One at a time, please.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Who will ultimately own this railway?

Mr. ROBB: I have not read the contract.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The lease will show it—the company.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The company will own it, will it not?

Mr. ROBB: I have not read the contract.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): And who is paying for it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The bankers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And we pay the bankers.

Mr. ROBB: The bankers are paying for it, and the Canadian National Railways are leasing it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who pays those people?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Are not the rentals sufficient to pay the cost of the railway?

Mr. ROBB: To pay interest on the investment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And sinking fund.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): As I understand it now, the company will ultimately own this road, and the Canadian National Railways—the Canadian people—will pay for it.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is another of the good lawyers in this House, and I suggest that he present a legal argument on this legal question.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am asking for information.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, when I left the chamber this afternoon the House was discussing the motion of the member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) that the previous question should be put as soon as possible, that is, as soon as allowed by hon. gentlemen opposite. As I may be absent from the House to-morrow, I should like to say in a few words what my position is on that motion, and what vote I will cast if it comes to a division when I am here. I do not purpose to take up any of the arguments that have been raised either before or during this debate. I shall merely confine myself to the attitude which I feel I must take in regard to the motion.

I gave my vote to maintain this government in power in preference to the opposition. That was in absolute accord with the attitude I took before the people who elected me to this House. Secondly, I voted against all amendments proposed by the opposition, which appeared to me as mere catching motions for election purposes, and I propose to do so in future. Were hon. gentlemen opposite on this side of the House, in the same position as my hon. friends to my left, I would do exactly the same thing. I also voted in favour of the motion made by the government to adjourn the House after the Address is adopted, because the ministers claim that they must have a recess to enable them to reorganize their government and to carry out the mandate which has been given to them, temporarily at least, by this House.

Now, Sir, it is one of two things: either the government needs that adjournment, or it does not. If the government requires that adjournment, then it should take the means to obtain it. If it does not require it, I do not think it should shelter itself behind what I would call a side motion, which does not bring on the adjournment. I said at the time I voted for the adjournment that the House would be transformed into an electoral committee, and there would be no use in our being here. I think this has been amply justified. But I do not think the motion of the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) at all advances the position of the government or the affairs of the country, nor does it give the House a chance to do anything useful; therefore I propose to vote against that motion. If the government needs the adjournment, I am prepared to vote for a straight motion for closure, which they should bring in if they require it. If they do not require it, then why take advantage of a process which simply lengthens the debate, and, although it prevents hon. members on the other side or hon. members of any group in this House from presenting further amendments to the Address leads us nowhere.

Some references have been made on one side or the other about liberty of speech. Quite so: liberty of speech, if it leads to something, is very desirable; but if I read well what is in the minds of the people outside of this House, I think they are more concerned about parliament doing something than about members of parliament talking individually or collectively. I do not begrudge either party all the advantage they may take; but I humbly submit that there is more at stake in the present situation than either the fate of the Liberal party or of the Conservative party. I have been out of this House for many years. I have kept in contact with people who, I think, have a public conscience, and who are becoming disinterested more and more from day to day and more separated from party shibboleth, from party spirit. It is not, I repeat, the fate of the Liberal party or of the Conservative party which is at stake: it is the confidence of the people in the usefulness of our public institutions. We have been here a month and a half. I have indulged in my share of the sin of talking, but I do not propose to repeat that sin too often, or to make the sin too heavy. Therefore, I simply state to-night that I do not think the motion of the hon. member for Nelson will lead us to any practical point. I do not begrudge him the right to make his motion, and I do not dispute the sincerity of his purpose. I do not try to ascertain whether he is acting under agreement with the government or not. I take him at his word. I believe in his word of honour, and as a matter of fact I believe that if he had consulted the government they would have advised him he was not rendering them a service by proposing that motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BOURASSA: Well, at least, that is my point of view. I do not think the government would make a happy move or would place themselves in a strong position morally or numerically if they tried to find shelter under the motion proposed by the hon. member for Nelson. To adopt such a motion would not improve the position of the government and would not enable them to reach the point they are aiming at, namely, to obtain the recess which they claim to be absolutely necessary for their purpose. Such a course would put them in the humiliating position of accepting a proposition dictated by another section of the House.

I am prepared to vote against the motion proposed by the hon. member for Nelson, but I am also prepared—and I state it quite frankly—to take my responsibility in voting for a motion for closure, if proposed by the government, as it must be under the rules, in order to reach something practical.

Then, we would have the recess, and the government could prove the advantage and necessity of having that recess to complete their membership and come back to us on the fifteenth of March with their policy. Then, we will judge them by that policy, and we will also judge hon. gentlemen opposite on their attitude in regard to measures submitted by the cabinet.

Mr. W. W. KENNEDY (Winnipeg South Centre): Probably I could suggest to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) an answer to the question which he has propounded to this House. He advances the argument that the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) could not have sought counsel with the government in taking the action that he did, because if he had done so, and if they wanted to close the discussion in this House, they would have introduced closure and would not have adopted closure by the less direct method. I should like to say if the hon. member has followed the conduct of this government in the past four years he would have observed that the record of the government is neither one of courage, nor of direct action. This is not a government having the courage to do what it wants to do, but as enunciated by its leader, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, on many platforms, it believes in the policy of the middle way, the policy of political expediency; I suggest to the hon. member for Labelle that perhaps, following that same policy by which it has been guided for four years, the same policy which has put it into the dilemma in which it finds itself to-night, by virtue of that same sort of policy it finds itself supporting the motion of the hon. member for Nelson.

In view of what the hon. member for Labelle, an old and distinguished member of this House, has said as to prolonging this discussion, I naturally feel, as a new member, a little diffident about continuing the discussion further. But, Sir, were it not for the circumstances under which the government of the day seeks to adjourn this House, I would not at this late day and at this late hour take part in the debate. What are the circumstances under which the government seeks to adjourn the House? A committee of this House is investigating the gravest charges which have ever been preferred, I understand, in this House of Commons for two generations and under these circumstances the government asks this House to adjourn, and, as I am informed, to leave that committee without the power to function effectively. If there were no other reason beyond that, Sir, I submit that that in itself is reason enough, not only for members on this side but for members in all quarters of this House, to take part in this debate with the object and with the intent that this government shall continue to sit; that this parliament shall continue in session so that witnesses may be examined here and be forced to give the evidence which is necessary in order that the committee may effectively proceed.

Mr. Speaker, in venturing into this debate I am conscious of many handicaps which are normally incident to the first effort of a new member of this House. Some thirty years ago I believe, Sir, you yourself, were in the position of a new member, and like myself, "with all your troubles to come." Perhaps when I recall those days to you, you will be able to recall some of the handicaps to which I refer.

Let me say, first, that there is borne in upon me at the beginning of my speech a consciousness of the comparative futility of talking at all. I say that for this reason: I have heard in this House, and you have heard, members of this parliament of mature experience bring forward matters of national interest and of national concern, bring them forward and elucidate them with outstanding ability; yet when the time came to vote no weight of argument, no amount of logic, no reason would stand up against the crack of the party whip. Does this House desire an illustration? I will give it two. We had, in the first instance, in this House a motion tantamount to a motion of want of confidence in the government. We heard expressions of opinion from all corners of this House; we speculated naturally as to the result. I for one when I heard the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) declare that she had no confidence in this government, thought: "There is one against them". But like many others, I counted wrong. When I heard stated in this House the opinion of the government entertained by the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans), and as expressed by him before he came down to this House, I thought: Well, the hon. member for Rosetown will not vote confidence in this government—and so with many others. Yet when the time for division came, all but five of the Progressive group in this House—and mark you, all but five of those hon. members who throughout the campaign recently closed talked and fought against this government and declared to their constituents that they had no confidence in it—all but five of them stood up in this House and voted confidence in the government.

In passing, let me remark as to the attitude taken by these five, without naming them. Within so short a time as I have been in politics I have come to realize that it takes considerable courage to get up in this House and vote against your party; and when five members of that group virtually take issue with the other members of it, I must say that I find only admiration for their courage.

One other example. We had a vote yesterday on the question of the treaties contracted by this government. Everyone in this House is aware that the amendment voted on referred particularly to the Australian treaty. I am informed and believe it is correct that when the same Australian treaty came up for discussion before in this House every one of the present members of the Progressive party who then sat in this House voted against it; yet when the vote came yesterday they all voted tantamount to endorsation of the treaty.

It appears, therefore, that argument is futile; but if futility of argument as affecting the result were a conclusive reason as to whether or not a man would speak in this House, I submit that the record would not contain nearly the number of speeches that it does; and when I say that I refer not to one side of the House alone.

Another handicap. Sir, is the attitude, of which I do not complain, of the members opposite, and it applies to a new member speaking either on this side of the House or on the other side. A new member realizes that he is facing old and experienced parliamentarians who are watching, perhaps in a kindly way, but nevertheless watching his every step, and as he proceeds, questions apparently innocent in themselves are propounded with the object that the feet of the unwary may be trapped. The only armour that a man can carry against such tactics is the armour of belief in his cause and sincerity in the arguments he puts forward. I hope, Sir, whatever else I may be accused of, that hon. members in all parts of this House will concede to me when I am through at least this measure of merit, that I have tried to be fair in my discussion of this Address.

There is also the matter of one's friends. After all, one's friends have a right to be critical, and they are.

Through the obscurity of all this maze of difficulties there comes one beckoning light. That, Sir, is the kindly features and the gracious mien of the honourable and honoured Speaker of this House. It may be a platitude to say that first impressions are lasting, but in this case it is indeed fortunate, for whether my time in this House be long or short, I shall carry with me always pleasant memories of your attitude towards the young members of this House, and of the kindly reception accorded to new members by this House on all sides and from all quarters.

I had heard, Sir, before the election and during the campaign something of the Liberal party. I had heard some pretty harsh things about them. I had heard too about many hon. gentlemen opposite whom I now see, but I have since learned not to think so badly of them, and, Sir, having become acquainted with you, by virtue of your position, perhaps a little better than with most of the others, I am encouraged to hope that, as you came from out among their ranks, perhaps when we get a little better acquainted we shall find many, many other hon. gentlemen whom we shall be delighted to know. I have met some of the hon. members outside of this House, and it has been a distinct pleasure. I must remark though, Sir, that in this House they seem to be an entirely different kind of people from what they are outside. Outside, in the corridors or at meat, they are human, likeable, lovable, but here they seem to be operating under some strain, under some handicap, under some overshadowing cloud. Then I endeavoured to speculate as to what the reason might be, as under the caucus system, no one outside of one's own caucus is allowed to know what takes place at those meetings. It has occurred to me that it might be because of this irksome alliance which they seem to have made with the Progressive party.

Objection, I think, has been taken in this House to their relationship being called a coalition. Some have called it co-operation. I saw a cartoon the other day where it was pictured as "A marriage of convenience". I think, though, that when they call it a "marriage" they go a little bit too far. I doubt whether it is as permanent even as a temporary marriage. I doubt whether a decree of divorce will be necessary to put an end to it. Perhaps, Sir, it might be more properly described as a liaison. I do not know whether the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) will object to that term. If he does object he hides his feelings very well indeed for he smiles pleasantly as he sits opposite to me.

In any event, whatever the alliance may be between the government and the Progressive group, it is one that is very definite in its working whenever a division occurs. No amount of denial from members among the Progressive group or from any other part of this House will prevent the country at large from believing that there is a distinct working alliance for a certain purpose, and that purpose is to maintain the Liberal government in power. It is not by chance that hon. members of the Progressive party, or of the Labour group, who time and time again have expressed opinions very critical of the party in power; it is not by chance, I say, that hon. members who have so expressed themselves support the government in every move in this House.

Complaint has been made by the leader of the Progressive party, the hon. member for Brandon, of articles appearing in the newspapers throughout this country imputing to the party of which he is leader reasons for supporting the government which do not reflect credit upon it. He has complained of that somewhat bitterly. Complaint has also been made of certain terms used in this House by which it was attempted to describe the reasons, which in the opinion of the hon. members in question, actuated the majority of the Progressive group in supporting the government on the motion for the adoption of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Well, hon. members may be prevented from using here such words in the English language as, perhaps, most fittingly describe their thoughts. Yet throughout the length and breadth of this country the people will not be prevented from placing their own construction upon the situation here. If such a construction has been placed upon it by hon. members of this House, or by the people of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, I say to the hon. member for Brandon that he and his party have no one to blame but themselves. I am not finding fault with them for resenting the construction which is placed upon their conduct. However, the reason lies at their own door. Any time a man in either private or public life attempts to sail or fight under two separate colours, there is bound to be some misconstruction as to his real intent; and from hearing the speeches of the hon. member for Brandon in this parliament, as well as reading those made in previous parliaments, I can come to no other conclusion than that he is an out and out supporter of the Liberal party at all times. Therefore I say that if the hon. member for Brandon were sitting in his right place here it would not be at the head of the Progressive group, but where he is sitting now, just opposite me among the government benches. I will name another hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown). The hon. member for Lisgar has no more right to the name "Progressive" than I have. If he were as open and frank as he would lead us to believe he is, he would get up from his seat, walk across the floor, and take his place with the government on that side of the House. Coming to the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans), who sits here and declares that he believes the best policy for Canada is a policy of absolute free trade, I ask hon. gentlemen, I ask the members of the Progressive party, what right has such a man to a place in the Progressive ranks? He does not belong there; I submit he should be in a party by himself.

I think it was the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird), who deems himself, apparently, to be a reincarnation of Robin Hood, who gave us a lecture last night upon the duty of man in this world. He himself declared that he was like the mythical Robin Hood. He was actuated by a consuming desire to right wrong wherever it might be found, and to uphold the weak. To use his own classic phrase, "he was always for the bottom dog". That has long been the express attitude of a number of members—I do not say of all—of the party to my left. Since they came into being they have always posed as being the one party that was in parliament to right the wrongs of the downtrodden of Canada; the one party that did not believe in election campaign funds; the one party that did not believe in election caucuses, but did believe that the older parties had outgrown their usefulness; and that they themselves were in parliament to purify politics. But has their conduct fulfilled their promise? Some of the hon. members of the Progressive party may think I am unfair to them, but I will state my reasons before I get through.

Mr. FORKE: You are all right.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Perhaps I may take some liberties with the Progressive party, because I come from the part of the country that is just on the fringe of their field of operations. I have the honour of representing the constituency of Winnipeg South Centre. During the recent campaign, and for the last number of years, I have had the privilege of moving about and mixing with them—sometimes fighting with them, sometimes against them—and I will say this: I believe that in their hearts most of them are sincere, but for what purpose? Sincere in righting the wrongs of Canada as a whole? Sincere in bearing up the weak of Canada as a whole? I say no. I say that the Progressive group is fundamentally and in fact an economic group that has for its definite object the advancement of the interests of that particular group, the grain growers of western Canada. I doubt if in their heart of hearts many of the Progressive members will disagree with that. I want to say more: I do not blame them as an economic group for endeavouring to advance their interests; but let them frankly acknowledge that they are an economic group in this parliament for a definite purpose in the interest of that group, and then we shall know where they stand. That is why I say that they are fighting under false colours.

Now I come to the Speech from the Throne. While I have read it, I do not say that I understand it all. Part of it I understand, the rest of it I can only use as a basis for assumption. I will not say that there is no merit in the Speech from the Throne. It foreshadows certain legislation with which I am in accord, and I propose to advance some reasons why I am in accord with those measures. But first, what is the purpose of the Speech from the Throne? What is it intended to contain? It appears to me that the Speech from the Throne is the vehicle through which the Prime Minister, after consultation with his trusted ministers constituting the government, presents to parliament a forecast of the legislation which the government intends to introduce, based upon the national needs of the country. Accepting that as the test of what we should look for, I am going to point out later on some things in which I think it is lacking. This Speech does not find favour with many in this House because it does not represent the considered judgment of this government translated into terms which would indicate what it thinks itself is best for this country, and because it does represent largely such legislation as this government believes would attract to it sufficient support in this House to pass the Speech from the Throne and thereby clothe it with some semblance of authority as a government. I suggest that it is an obvious compromise between what the government of this day thinks Canada needs and what the Progressive group, assisted by the Labour and Independent groups, demands should be placed in the Speech. In saying that I am not finding fault with the Progressive party as an economic group. Once we get the point of view of what they are here for, not so much blame attaches to them. Once we take the view that they are an economic group here for a definite purpose, namely, to get legislation which they desire to have enacted, I have little fault to find with their attitude. In fact, I am not surprised at the stand they have taken, because many of them have intimated as much.

The other night the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) likened the Speech from the Throne to a berry patch, and so did the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird). They said: If we find the berry patch offered by the Liberals more alluring than that offered by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), no blame should attach to us for going to the better berry patch. It is true the Speech from the Throne as originally brought down did not contain anything by way of special allurement to the Labour group who are represented in this House by two friends of mine from the city of Winnipeg. But they were not asleep; matters did not go very far until the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) came into this House with a letter from the Right Hon. Mackenzie King before the first vote was taken, promising his party what they want. If they are here as another economic group seeking certain legislation for that group, I do not know that any particular blame attaches to them. But the sum and substance of the whole matter is that this Speech is not such a one as represents the studied judgment of the government; it is a Speech such as by inducement shall win the support of two other groups in this House, which, during the election, were antagonistic to this government.

I wish to refer briefly to the matter of rural credits as suggested in the Speech from the Throne. I believe the question of rural credits is one of primary interest to the farmers of western Canada. I believe it is legislation that is essential in the interest of the farmers, not only of western Canada but of the whole country, for this reason: Our banking system as it is to-day is modelled for the purpose of supplying, not long term, but short term loans. You go to the bank to borrow money and, if you get a loan, you get it on your note for a term of three months. At the end of three months, you either pay off the note or renew it with a renewal charge, and so on until it is paid off. That is all right in mercantile business and other lines of industry; but in farming there is only one occasion in the year when the farmer, out of his produce, can meet his liabilities at the bank. Although some of my friends may not give me credit for knowing much about the farming industry, I grew up on a farm and I know something about farming. When a farmer needs money to put in his crop in the spring, he goes to the bank in March for a loan. Although he borrows the money until June, he knows and the banker knows he is not going to pay it back in June. He pays a renewal charge and the loan is carried forward until September, although the banker knows and he knows that he is not going to pay it back then. Then it is again renewed until December. Thus, you have three renewals, all with expense to the farmer, with this absurdity; that throughout all these proceedings both parties to the transaction know that the money will not be paid on the date originally agreed upon.

Do hon. members need any further proof that the farmers of this country need some other system of borrowing money? They need a system of loans placed at their disposal whereby they know, when they borrow money, they will obtain it for the period required and they can pay it back when they say they will. That, I submit, is the basis of the demand for rural credits which, shortly, is some system of placing at the disposal of the rural parts of this country credit whereby the farmers can obtain money upon such terms as to time and repayment as will be suitable to the conditions of their industry. As to what form that legislation will take, this House has no inkling. It is true that the leader of the House (Mr. Lapointe) has been asked for information on a number of occasions and to all such questions he has blandly told us to wait until the legislation is brought down. Perhaps that is not an unreasonable answer if the legislation is not ready; it is not an unreasonable answer if the government does not yet know what it intends to do. But probably some of us on this side of the House may be pardoned if as new members we are labouring under the impression that when a government proposes legislation in the Address it knows just what that legislation is going to be.

However, I will say that in the province of Manitoba we have had some experience in the matter of rural credits, and if the proposed legislation which this government intends to bring down is of the nature of that which has been in force in Manitoba I for one shall vote against it. In that province the money was placed at the disposal of the farmers in such a way and on such terms that it was, frequently, not the thrifty farmers who needed it, that got it, but those who happened to operate in certain cliques and circles. The result has been that although the law has been in operation in Manitoba only a few years the government of the province is obligated for loans to farmers there to the extent of $3,000,000 of which already $700,000 is gone, a loss to the province. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) nods his head and he knows that I am right. I think he knows too that before the end of the story at least half of that $3,000,000 will have been lost to the province.

Mr. FORKE: I do not want to interrupt, for I am enjoying the hon. gentleman's speech, but I do not like the expression that certain cliques are operating in the province. On second consideration the hon. member will not repeat that expression. I know that mistakes were made but I do not think the hon. gentleman should say that.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I do not want to be offensive to the hon. member and possibly if I explain what I mean it will serve the purpose. Under that system of rural credits, rural credit societies were formed in various municipalities. A board was created in the municipality consisting, I think, of nine members or directors. If I were a farmer seeking a loan in the province I would have to go to the society in my own municipality and put in my application to that board of nine. Now the intention of the legislation was good. The government took the view that no better advice could be obtained as to the desirability of any particular loan than the advice of nine men who were right in the heart of the municipality where the borrower lived. And in theory that is all right. But hon. gentlemen know that municipal politics are just as heated sometimes as provincial, and just as keenly contested as Dominion politics; under that system a temptation crept in among the members sitting on the board to pass loans, not on the strength of the security offered but because of other considerations. I do not think that the hon. member for Brandon will suggest that this phase of the question was entirely absent from the rural credits scheme in Manitoba. I do not say that it has been widespread, but just the same it is one of the weaknesses of the system. In any event the result of the operation of rural credits in that province has been an obligation on the part of the government for $3,000,000, of which as I have already said $700,000 has been dissipated, and before the thing is through at least half of that total sum will represent a loss to the province. And by whom will that loss be met? It will be paid for by the taxpayers of the whole province, not only by those engaged in farming alone but by people in all industries throughout Manitoba. They are the ones who will have to pay that $1,500,000 for the benefit of a certain number of farmers who borrowed and defaulted in payment. If that were all it might not be so bad, but there is another aspect.

In many cases, instead of being an assistance to the farmers themselves for the purpose of developing their farms and improving their position in the community, the loans have only served to put them deeper into debt from which they will never be free, so that ultimately when the government endeavours to realise on the loans they will find that many of these farmers whom they sought to help have been ruined by the very generosity extended to them and will be driven from their farms. The hon. member for Brandon will, I think, agree with that. That is why I say at this stage it is impossible for any member to deal intelligently with the question of rural credits.

There is another matter that interests me and which I almost hesitate to mention because of the warning I received in the election just past as to the attitude that would be displayed by members from the east. You can guess, I think, that I am referring to that old political chestnut, the Hudson Bay railway. I am quite aware that that measure will receive support from a number of members on the opposite side of the House while it will be opposed by some other hon. gentlemen over there. I am aware too that it will be opposed by some members on this side while it will receive support from others in all quarters of the House. On the question there is a great diversity of opinion. When the matter comes up for consideration it will be the duty of those of us who support it to bring to the attention of the House all those reasons which we can fairly urge in its behalf. I am not going to go into details now, as I hope to have the privilege of discussing the subject on a subsequent occasion. I shall simply touch upon it in passing. I want to give you the picture of the Hudson Bay railway as it stands to-night. We are sometimes told, "You members from the west want this Hudson Bay railway whether it is feasible or not. You want the Dominion of Canada to dip into the treasury and spend millions of dollars on a thing that is economically impossible".

Well, let me first ask those hon. members who are of that mind this question: by whom were we encouraged to believe that the Hudson Bay railway was a practical proposition and one that would be carried to completion? Is the answer to be found on one side of the House alone? I say that if you will examine the records you will find that right back to the days of Sir John A Macdonald every Prime Minister of prominence of whom I know has at one time or another expressed himself in favour of that railway; and not once or twice, not ten times, but on scores of occasions members of parliament from both sides of the House have gone to the west at election time and definitely and explicitly promised the completion of that railway.

What was the stand of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier in this matter? He was a great champion of that railway. It was under his administration that the contract for its construction was let. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) in 1910 turned the first sod, but the government of that day failed to turn any more. The following administration under the Right Hon. R. L. Borden proceeded with the construction and continued it until the war put a stop to it. Now what is the position? Under the Borden administration the whole line from the Pas to Port Nelson was graded, steel was laid for three hundred miles, and switches and other accessories were installed. At Port Nelson millions of dollars were expended on terminal facilities. Large quantities of materials were brought in through the channel which is not supposed to be navigable, and those materials are still stored on the shores of Hudson bay at Port Nelson. To-day another ninety miles of steel will complete the road. To date approximately twenty-two and a half million dollars has been expended on the undertaking. How much more money will be required to complete it? I do not know, but here is what we are up against. I have recently received, as no doubt other members have, a pamphlet from Calgary giving pictures of floating icebergs in the straits during practically every month in the year. Personally I am not in a position to say whether those pictures represent abnormal conditions or not; but I do know that experts engaged by past governments have examined the route, and while it is true that those opposed to the completion of the road can produce experts to say that it is not feasible, yet many honest and reliable men who have been on the spot say that the route is practicable.

Now, I grant you, Sir, that with this conflict of opinion, if we were initiating the road, I would not vote a single dollar for its construction until something more definite and concrete was presented to me. But with three hundred miles virtually ready for operation and the balance ready for the laying of steel, with twenty-two and a half million dollars already expended, and the road promised by all governments practically since confederation, I say that if the expenditure of further money within reason to complete the road forthwith did no more than prove that as a grain route to the markets of the world it is not practicable, it would be money well spent. And for another reason, that it would remove once for all a question which at every election is no small factor in raising dissension between the east and the west at a time when the expressed desire of all Canadian statesmen is for a strong and united Canada.

I think, though, that the House should be given the information that was asked of the leader of the government as to what extent he intended to commit this parliament to further expenditures for completion of the road. While I desire its completion, yet I know I would not be representing the best interests of my constituents or of the people of western Canada if I worked in season and out of season for the expenditure of large sums of money which would be wasted. I say that the attitude taken by the right hon. leader of our party in favour of spending such an amount of money as is necessary to give that route a proper test is the correct attitude to take, and I do not believe that members from the west, if they consult the interests of their constituents and their own real convictions, will ask for more; but that much they will ask for, and in pressing their demands I intend to bring to the question such energy as I can exert and the results of such investigation as I personally can make respecting this undertaking.

Now, while it does not appear in the original Speech from the Throne, yet in what is referred to as the supplementary Speech from the Throne there is a promise of some legislation along the line of old age pensions. I am in sympathy with the principle of such legislation. I think I have gone far enough along the road of life to believe that in the final analysis a country is responsible for seeing that those of its people who are aged and infirm and no longer able to fare for themselves are not allowed to starve. I believe in the principle that they should at least be taken care of. I believe that a reasonable measure in this direction will find support in all parts of the House. With a view to obtaining information, I placed on the order paper early in the session a question as to whether or not the government proposed to include in that legislation some measure of relief by way of pension for the blind. To that I have received no answer.

The Speech from the Throne suggests something which was intended, I think, to meet with the approval of members from the Maritime provinces. I will not attempt to go into the question or to discuss their needs. We have heard from them at length, and their views have been put forward very ably. Unless I am mistaken, I gather that what is suggested in the Speech from the Throne is not really what they want. It occurs to me that the offer of a royal commission, instead of mollifying the members from the Maritimes, has rather increased the urgency of their demands for something a little bit more tangible.

So much for the measures forecast in the Speech from the Throne. I wish to refer, now Sir, to some of the things that appear to me to be lacking, for I feel that not having expressed any animus against the government in the discussion of these matters in which I see some element of virtue, no one will deny to me the right at least to criticize. When I look through the Speech from the Throne I suggest to the government that it is not unreasonable for me to expect to find there the legislation which during the election the leader of the Liberal party told the country was so urgently needed. It is not surprising that I would expect to find some proposals to deal with those pressing problems which, at Richmond Hill, the leader of the government declared could not longer wait for solution.

Now what were those pressing problems? I want hon. members to mark them in their minds and see to what extent a solution is offered in this Address. Speaking at Richmond Hill, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of September 7 last, the Prime Minister asked, "What are some of the national problems pressing for solution?" and he said:

> First and foremost is the problem of taxation.

Well, do you find any suggestion in the Speech from the Throne as to alleviating taxation? He goes on to say:

> I can see no solution of the problems of taxation, no means of reducing materially our public debt, our income tax, our sales tax and other taxes, apart from a satisfactory solution of the four problems I have mentioned.

When the matter of income tax was mentioned early in this debate, if I am not mistaken, the hon. member for Brandon when referring to it intimated that he was not very much concerned with cutting down the income tax, or that he would not favour it. Well now, what prompted such an expression? What about the sales tax? What about various other taxes which have the effect of holding back the wheels of industry? who pays these taxes? If it were true that when I pay income tax this same tax would not affect my neighbour. I could very well understand the selfish interest that would prompt him to say "I am in favour of keeping on the income tax." It is the same with the sales tax and a multitude of taxes. But in the final analysis all taxes come out of the producer, and therefore what is for the benefit of the man who pays the income tax is also for the benefit of the producer, in so far as reduction of those taxes is concerned, and I say that we should endeavour to give business an impetus in this country, to unshackle industry by cutting off all special taxes at the earliest possible moment.

Sir, while no solution appears in the Address I will suggest one avenue through which some relief might come, and the avenue I suggest is that the government concern itself with collecting all the customs dues which are properly payable into the exchequer, and not permit goods to be smuggled into this country wholesale, brought in by people without paying the customs duty. If it is true, as has been charged, that not one million but many millions of dollars have been lost to the treasury of this country through that channel, then I say that every million dollars collected in that way by the diligence of the government means that by that amount it will be able to reduce the extent of the other taxes collected from the honest people of the country. While these smugglers of whom we have heard so much, these pariahs of business, become wealthy by evasion of the customs laws of this country, honest business men find themselves unable to meet their honest debts, and while these men with their ill-gotten gains parade the streets of our cities, honest business men are closeted with their creditors.

I say to this House and to the government: that if the government knew that smuggling was being conducted in a wholesale way, as the charges would indicate, then it was the duty of the government not to wait until forced by a resolution of this House, but on its own initiative to take proceedings to stop it, and to see that the exchequer was recouped. I suggest that it would not be amiss, under the heading of taxation, to have inserted in the Address something to this effect: "That your government regrets that many millions of dollars of the money of people of this country have been lost to Canada by smugglers bringing in goods from foreign countries without paying the customs duty thereon, thereby defrauding the treasury, and that this government expresses its intention to proceed forthwith to rectify that state of affairs." However, that apparently is not the custom, so far as governments are concerned, in the Speech from the Throne.

The second problem mentioned by the Right Hon. Mackenzie King at Richmond Hill was the matter of transportation. Is there any concrete suggestion in the speech as to a solution of that problem? Is the "building of the Hudson Bay railway forthwith" the real solution of the transportation problem of Canada? I think some of my friends from the Maritime provinces will not agree that it is. Many from the province of Alberta who want to get their coal into central Canada will not agree that it is the whole solution. Right there I want to point out to this House that the Speech does not represent a real effort on the part of the government to bring about a solution of this country's problems. On the contrary, it represents an attempt by this government to obtain support by suggesting these measures which it thinks will appeal to some of the groups in this House.

Another one of the four problems mentioned by the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King was the matter of immigration. I will deal with that later, but in passing I may ask what solution of the immigration policy is offered by the government? They have told us that they have entered into an agreement with the railways for the purpose of encouraging immigration into this country, and by the terms of that agreement they are getting people to come in by guaranteeing these people employment for five years from the time of entry. I suggest to this government that it would be a sounder policy, in dealing with the matter of immigration, if, instead of guaranteeing employment to people who are not here, they should adopt a policy which would give employment to people who are here in order to hold our people here and prevent them leaving the country. Surely the basis of a sound policy in the matter of immigration is not to bonus people to come here, but to make conditions in Canada such that those who are here can make a living and remain in Canada. If you do that and make the country prosperous you will not have any difficulty in bringing people to Canada.

The other and last matter with which he dealt was the fiscal policy. He called it one of the outstanding problems. Well, there is some mention of that in the Speech from the Throne. It says:

My ministers are of the opinion that a general increase in the customs tariff would prove detrimental to the country's continued prosperity and prejudicial to national unity.

Now what is that? Is that a solution? It is not in itself a policy. It is simply a statement of negation of policy; it offers no solution. It simply says that to do something would not be good for the country. To be fair, the Speech does suggest the appointment of a tariff board for the purpose of studying tariff conditions in this country and seeing what changes should be made. Now is the tariff a new question? Is it not discussed on every election platform during every election campaign? It has been since I can remember, and I believe since any hon. member of this House can remember. Has not a great amount of data been gathered by the departments upon that question already? I submit that with all the data at its disposal the government ought to do one of two things: it ought to declare definitely either that it believes in a policy of protection of industry in this country, or that it does not so believe. They did not do that in the last campaign, but they did it once. In August, 1919, when the National Liberal Convention was held in the city of Ottawa, among other resolutions, one was passed on the tariff. On that occasion they were very specific. I shall not read the whole resolution, but only those portions that are pertinent to my argument:

That the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation be made.

Did you hear any reiteration of that during the recent campaign? They go on to say, and I ask Progressive supporters of the government and also the Liberals from the west who delight to be connected with the party that always keeps its pledges to pay attention to these words:

That, to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food; farm implements and machinery: farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; nets, net-twines and fishermen's equipments; cement and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into same.

That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear, and on other articles of general consumption.

And they finish up by saying, so that there shall be no doubt where they stand:

And the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution when returned to power.

Now they were returned to power, I think they will admit, in 1921, and did they implement these pledges? Did we hear any repetition of those promises during the recent campaign? Did we see any indication of their intention to proceed along those lines foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne? Not one single word. Only do they say that they believe a general raising of the tariff would not be good.

Mr. DARKE. Does the hon. gentleman contend that no reductions have been made in the tariff by the Liberal government?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): No.

Mr. DARKE: The hon. member's statement implied that.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I contend that there were no substantial reductions all along the line, or anything approaching it. I contend, further, that the Liberal government as at present constituted does not intend to bring in any substantial reductions all along the line, or anything like it.

Mr. DARKE: You know more than the party does.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): We can judge them by their past performances and by what is suggested in the Speech from the Throne. If they believe in these substantial reductions, why do they not say in the Speech from the Throne that they intend to put them in force? What do they do? They simply shirk the question by saying: We will appoint a commission to inquire into what changes should be made.

Mr. DARKE: Is it not a fact that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has declared himself in favour of a tariff commission?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Quite so, and I am in favour of it. But there is this difference: the right hon. leader of the Conservative party declared his belief in the efficacy of a tariff commission in 1912, and a bill looking to the creation of such a commission was introduced into this House but was killed by the Liberal party in the Senate. That is the history of the tariff board. It is true that at the present time it is a plank in the platform of the Conservative party, but with this difference from the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite: The Conservative party's policy as to a tariff board starts with the premise that the Conservative party believes fundamentally in a policy of protection for building up the industries of this country. With that as a basis, it says: We will appoint a tariff commission, which, believing in that policy of protection, will head right into the storm, face the needs of this country, and give this country a tariff policy which is suited to the needs of the country. I submit that between that attitude, and the appointment of a tariff board by a government which says it believes in substantial reductions, but never carries them out, there is all the difference between life and death so far as an effective policy is concerned. I hope I have made myself clear to my hon. friend.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

Friday, February 19, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

TRANSPORTATION OF COAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. W. JOHNSTONE (Cape Breton North-Victoria): Has the Minister of the Interior suggested to the government that they provide a small sum of money sufficient to meet the costs of moving 15,000 tons of coal from Sydney Mines to Montreal over and above $3.25 per ton?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton, Minister of the Interior): No.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. W. KENNEDY (Winnipeg South Centre): On the 12th of this month I put a question to the government with reference to the importation into the province of Saskatchewan of a certain quantity of ties from the state of Minnesota for use on the Hudson Bay railway. The acting leader of the government (Mr. Lapointe) replied to the effect that the report was incorrect inasmuch as he had nc information on the subject. Thereupon I wrote to the vice-president of the Canadian National Railways, purchasing department, and I have this morning obtained a reply giving certain information which I should like to submit to the House.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Leader of the House): Is my hon. friend asking a question or is he seeking to give information to the House?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I am bringing a certain matter to the attention of the government.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Send us the letter.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): With the permission of the House I desire to quote from this letter:

> I have your letter of fifteenth instant in respect to the use of ties from the state of Minnesota.
> The information in connection with this situation is that we were asked by our operating department to furnish them with a quantity of cedar ties for the Hudson Bay line, as it was felt that cedar ties would be of more advantage on that line than others because the traffic is light and, therefore, the mechanical wear on the ties would not be very heavy, and because a good cedar tie withstands the atmosphere well under light traffic conditions. There are none of these ties available in the vicinity of the Hudson Bay line, and I may say that we are buying all the ties we can get in Saskatchewan. It was very imperative, therefore, that we bring cedar ties from somewhere.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would advise the hon. member to put the question on the order paper.

THE COUNTESS OF CATHCART

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier): I should like to ask the Minister of the Interior whether he has received an application from the Countess of Cathcart to enter this country and if so whether the "moral turpitude" clause, which in our law is similar to that in the United States, will be applied.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton, Minister of the Interior): No, Mr. Speaker.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): May I ask the Minister of Finance what has become of the first volume of the Auditor General's report. The last time we had this matter under consideration I gathered from what the minister told us that this volume of the report would be in the House that afternoon. I am afraid the Auditor General has forgotten about it in the meantime.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): No fault is to be found with the Auditor General. I had from the Assistant Auditor General, Mr. Kearns, a few days ago a memorandum, which I regret I have not before me now, saying that the work had been delayed in the printing department, but he assures me that the report will be ready early next week.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose my hon. friend will at least undertake before this House adjourns to make sure that that volume is brought down. It certainly ought to be.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, may I exercise the Scotchman's privilege and ask another question? When is the House going to adjourn?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps that might have something to do with it.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION

IMMIGRATION ACT, NATURALIZATION ACT AND CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENTS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the acting leader of the government (Mr. Lapointe) if he can give the House some information regarding proposed amendments to the Immigration Act, the Naturalization Act and the Criminal Code which were apparently promised to the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), as intimated in a letter which he placed on Hansard on January 28?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I should like to ask the acting leader of the government if he can give the members of this House the information which was evidently conveyed to the member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Leader of the House): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend has already asked that question. He is an old member of the House and knows that legislation is explained when it is introduced.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Might I ask my hon. friend—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): —if this information will be given privately to members of this House if they make a request therefor to the acting leader of the government?

Mr. SPEAKER: Orders of the day.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Thursday, February 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. C. Elliott for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed motion of Mr. Bird: "That this question be now put."

Mr. W. W. KENNEDY (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, when I had the privilege of adjourning the debate last night I was drawing the attention of hon. members to certain matters which, it appeared to me, were lacking in the Speech from the Throne, and I was discussing particularly the absence of any suggestion regarding our fiscal policy. Now, perhaps the letter which I attempted to read a moment ago would be germane to the discussion of that question, and for the information of the House I propose to submit this communication, which has to do with the bringing into this country of ties for railway construction that, in my view, should have been obtained in Canada. The letter to which I refer is dated Montreal, February 18, 1926, and is from Mr. R. C. Vaughan, vice-president of the Canadian National Railways, purchasing and stores departments, and is addressed to myself:

I have your letter of fifteenth instant in respect to the use of ties from the state of Minnesota.

The information in connection with this situation is that we were asked by our operating department to furnish them with a quantity of cedar ties for the Hudson Bay line, as it was felt that cedar ties would be of more advantage on that line than others because the traffic is light and, therefore, the mechanical wear on the ties would not be very heavy, and because a good cedar tie withstands the atmosphere well under light traffic conditions. There are none of these ties available in the vicinity of the Hudson Bay line, and I may say that we are buying all the ties we can get in Saskatchewan.

I may add that at that time there was an election going on in Saskatchewan.

It was very imperative, therefore, that we bring cedar ties from somewhere. We gave a contract to have them supplied from off the old Canadian Northern main line between Winnipeg and Rainy River, as in that section there is some good cedar available. As you know, the old Canadian Northern main line between Winnipeg and Rainy River runs for 43 miles through the state of Minnesota, and it so happens that the contractor is delivering some of these ties on his contract that are produced on that portion of our line which is in the state of Minnesota. I wired our Winnipeg office to ascertain the number of cedar ties which originated in Minnesota and which have been shipped to the Hudson Bay line, and I find the quantity is approximately 45,000. There will probably be a few more shipped from that district, but not a great many.

Our position is that we needed cedar ties for the Hudson Bay line and that we wanted to get these cedar ties at the lowest price and with the least possible haul to where they were to be used. Therefore, a contract was given for ties to be supplied in the territory referred to, and it so happens that the contractor is having some of these ties produced on the old Canadian Northern main line in the state of Minnesota. As you are aware, there is no duty on ties coming into Canada, and it is unfortunate that we were unable to get these ties elsewhere in Canada to meet our requirements, except at an increased cost to us.

As you know, a large amount of timber goes from Canada to the United States, and, no doubt, if we took objection to these few ties which are produced on our own lines coming into Canada, it might react against our general timber interests in a bigger way.

Our idea is to have all our ties, so far as possible, produced in Canada, and we buy approximately 7,000,000 ties annually, which are produced in Canada.

I saw a report in the paper that we were buying 600,000 ties in the state of Minnesota for the Hudson Bay line, which, of course, is ridiculous, and I assume in the final analysis there will probably be only 50,000 ties come from the state of Minnesota to apply on this Hudson Bay contract, but we must bear in mind that these ties are produced on our own lines and in a district where we get substantial revenue from manufacturers and dealers in forest products.

I would also like to point out that, under the terms of the contract, we stipulated that these ties were to be produced on our own lines, and it just so happens that a few of them are coming from the state of Minnesota.

I submit, Sir, that that is just 50,000 ties too many from the state of Minnesota. Surely the Canadian National management can get Canadian-grown timber for use on the railway, cut into shape by Canadian workmen, and thus give employment to our own people?

No mention is made in the Speech from the Throne of any solution for what has been called the national fuel problem. I am not going into the question at length because it has been fully discussed, but on every occasion when an hon. member from the Maritime provinces asked the government why it did not give some assistance in the way of lower freight rates to the coal mines of Nova Scotia, he was met with the answer: We cannot interfere with the railway commission; the commission is outside of politics, and we have nothing more to do with it than you have. In principle I take no issue with that stand, but I want to refer the House to something that transpired in connection with the railway commission just before the election in the province of British Columbia, which I suggest requires some explanation at the hands of a member of the government. On the very eve of the election an order was issued by two members of the railway commission, against and in spite of the desire of the majority of that commission, reducing the rate on the mountain haul. That needs some attention because, while it may not have been issued with any particular political object in view, it has been so interpreted in many districts by the Canadian people, and the action of the board on that occasion calls for inquiry.

There is also absent from the Speech from the Throne reference to the much-promised Senate reform.

There is something else, and while I do not criticize the government particularly for this, I wish it brought to their attention. There is throughout Canada a body of men who deserve and who, I believe, have received special attention at the hands of the government. They are returned, disabled veterans, and while the general policy of the Canadian government towards this class of men is generous, perhaps by reason of the difficulty of providing for all emergencies which arise, certain of them are labouring under disabilities which, I believe, hon. members in all parts of the House will be desirous of removing. I refer to the position of the disabled veteran who is unable to prove conclusively to the Board of Pension Commissioners that the disability from which he suffers can be directly traceable to his war service. Hon. members who are physicians know that it is very difficult sometimes even for the best physician to trace a given illness to its original cause. There have come under my notice many cases of disabled veterans who were accepted in the army as fit, and who, since their return, have developed certain ailments which they claim are traceable to war causes, but who, because of the regulation that the onus is upon them to establish conclusively that such ailments can be traced to war service, are without relief. I do not go so far as to suggest that the door should be opened to everybody; but instead of the onus being upon the shoulders of the men, I would suggest that the legislation be amended so that once a returned soldier who is disabled or suffering from an illness is able to establish a prima facie case that that illness can be traced to war service, he has thereby discharged his onus, and the onus should then rest upon the government of the country to show that the disability from which he is suffering was not caused by war service. That is perhaps giving a class of men in this country the benefit of the doubt to which, I think, they are reasonably entitled. So much for the omissions from the Speech from the Throne.

What does the Speech from the Throne offer? If you will examine the fabric of the Speech carefully, you will not find it woven out of honest wool; you will find in it much of shoddy, shoddy that is put there for what purpose? Perhaps I am not allowed to say what I think, but I will say that the effect of it is to make it more readily saleable. The Speech from the Throne, instead of being woven out of true, honest cloth, is woven out of a mixture of shoddy consisting of those particular things that have in their essence, not a national, but a sectional appeal to certain economic groups, as has been admitted by members in various parts of the House. In the original Speech there was the appeal of rural credits and the Hudson Bay railway which had a special appeal to the Progressive group. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), in discussing the Speech from the Throne, took occasion to remark that he found there something lacking. I refer hon. members to Hansard of January 19 last at page 274 where this statement appears:

> From the labour viewpoint the Speech from the Throne is notable for the omissions. There is no reference in it to some of the pressing problems which concern labour.

But that complaint no longer exists. That omission was speedily cured by a letter to which I have already referred from the leader of the government and which was placed upon the records of this House by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth).

I wish now to discuss the attitude of the Progressive group in this House towards the Conservative party, not with any view of creating antagonism, but with the sincere idea that, perhaps, I may place before the members of that group some matters concerning our attitude towards the tariff with which they will not be prepared to take direct issue.

It has been stated in this House by some representatives from that group that they support the government of the day, not so much because of their confidence in this government, but because, being placed in this House in the position of choosing between two evils, they have chosen the lesser. The inference I take from that is that their particular objection to the policy of the Conservative party is because of its announced and often repeated stand on the question of protection, and I doubt if that will be denied. For that reason, in discussing the attitude of the Progressive group towards the Conservative party, I am going to deal with that same problem of the tariff.

I am aware that no subject is so prolific of debate as the tariff. If you want to start a debate either during an election or between elections, all you have to do is to have one man say: I am for protection, and another man say: I am for free trade, and you can deduce two perfectly good theoretical arguments. But when you come to discuss this question in a practical way, it is just as well to dispense with those things which do not go to the root of the question; so I start with this statement and I challenge denial: There is not in this House or outside of it any responsible political party in the Dominion of Canada which to-day believes in, teaches or practises a policy of free trade. Is that true as regards the Conservative party? It is not challenged; we do not believe in free trade. Does the Liberal party believe in free trade? I will call two witnesses, the first being the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, leader of the government, who, when speaking during the campaign in the Winnipeg rink to an audience of approximately ten thousand people declared that the Liberal party was not in favour of the policy of free trade. He said: It does not believe in a high tariff; it does not believe in a low tariff. It believes in the middle course.

Speaking again in the city of Kingston on October 21 last, as reported in a Canadian Press despatch, Mr. King said:

> "I would oppose free trade with all my might," said Mr. King, at one stage, adding that he would just as strongly oppose the opposite extreme of high protection. "The present government" insisted Mr. King, "is not in favour of free trade, never has been, and would not be in the circumstances if it could."

I think that makes clear the position of the Liberal party on the tariff question, so far as it has been expressed by its leader.

If you want further evidence by a public man supporting the Liberal party during the last campaign, I will give you a name which is familiar to all members of this House, that of an outstanding Liberal in days gone by, a man of power, weight and experience in this country, who in the final battle in North York was called into that constituency by the leader of the Liberal party as his final hope and refuge; I refer to Sir Clifford Sifton. Speaking at Aurora, Ontario, on October 23rd last, as quoted in the Manitoba Free Press, Sir Clifford Sifton said—and I ask Liberals who profess to believe in free trade to pay attention to these words:

> I am bound to say that I have been disagreeably affected by the discussions with respect to the tariff which have taken place in the present election. They seem to me to have been crude and ill-informed showing no systematic or careful study of the subject. Let me say a few words to you on the subject of the tariff as it appears to me.

Then here is his pronouncement:

> Our tariff is the result of about forty years of very careful study and very hard, conscientious work on the part of different Finance ministers and a corps of very well informed assistants. Successive Finance ministers have had commissions of inquiry and the whole subject has been gone into in exhaustive detail. The result of this is that the tariff has been worked down to a condition in which there is very little more to be learned about it, and this is proven by the fact that as successive ministers of late years have taken office, no matter what representations they made before they got into office, they made very few changes in the tariff after they got in. The fact is that at the present time it is impossible to cut down our tariff sufficiently to make any substantial difference in prices to the consumers without making such confusion and such dislocation of business that the damage done would be altogether out of proportion to the benefit to be derived.

I wish to place upon the records of Hansard one further test. We have had in this country, within my memory, election campaigns in which the Liberal party openly preached a free trade policy. It is true that that policy was subsequently modified by the present leader of the government to a policy that claimed to be moving toward the goal of free trade. I submit, apart altogether from what party you belong to, that the best test of whether any party in this country believes in the policy of free trade is to see what it actually does when in power. You may theorize in opposition, but what you practise in power is the test by which you should be judged. Now since 1878, when the National Policy was introduced in this country, and here I am repeating the declaration made by the right hon. leader of the Conservative party in this House, the firm and settled policy of this country has been one of protection. If it were true that since that day only Conservative governments had been in power the other party might say: Well, if we had been in power, we would have changed that policy. But we have had alternating governments, a number of Liberal and Conservative governments since that day, and if the Liberal party believed in a policy of free trade we would at least expect to find some substantial movement in that direction when it was in office.

These figures which I wish to place on record speak for themselves. In the annual report of the trade of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1924, at page 10, there is a summary of the trade of Canada with all countries from the year 1868 to 1924. I will give you first the average ad valorem rate of duty on all dutiable goods brought into Canada from all countries for certain years.

In 1878 the average ad valorem duty on dutiable imports brought into Canada from all countries was 21.4 per cent. In 1896, when there was a change to a Liberal government, the rate was 30 per cent. Then we had a period of Liberal administration from 1896 to 1911, and in 1911 when the Liberals went out of power the average rate was 25.9 per cent, or a reduction of 4.1 per cent. In 1911 a Conservative administration came into power, and when it went out in 1921, the average rate was 20.6 per cent; yet when they came into power it was 25.9 per cent. So much for the average reduction. We had a Liberal administration again in 1921, and the average rate when they came in was 20.6 per cent; in 1924, it was 22.9 per cent.

One other set of figures I give you, and that is the average rate upon the total imports, both dutiable and free, for the same years. In 1878 the average ad valorem rate on all goods dutiable and free brought into this country was 14.2 per cent; in 1896, when the Conservative administration went out of power, it was 19.2 per cent; in 1911, when the Liberal administration went out of power, it was 16.2 per cent; in 1921, when the Conservative administration went out of power, it was 14.1 per cent; in 1924, during a period of Liberal administration, it had risen to 15.1 per cent. Now those figures speak for themselves, and they do, I think, suggest this, that the average rate of variation, either upon dutiable goods brought into this country, or upon all goods dutiable and free, is negligible. Well then, all of us recognizing the fact that we must pursue some policy of protection, what is the next question?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If the variation of duty was so negligible, how does the hon. member account for the closing of the two thousand factories which his party says were put out of business by the reductions made in the tariff?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I will tell you what in my opinion is the reason. The importance of a tariff policy is not so much the height of the tariff as a definite, consistent policy which will stabilize business. Very often the mere threat of substantial reductions creates just as much harm, sometimes more, than the actual reductions themselves.

I want to say, particularly to the members of the Progressive party and to those Liberals who are open to conviction, that one of the things our party has chiefly to fight is misrepresentation in connection with the respective positions of the different parties on the tariff. Throughout the length and breadth of this country, at every election, the Conservative party is represented as being a high protection party, and the Liberal as a low tariff party. You ask the representatives of the Liberal party how high the Conservative party believe in putting the tariff, and they will not tell you. They will use some expression which conveys the idea that there is no limit to the height to which we will go in raising the tariff. You ask them how much the Liberal party will reduce the tariff, and they will not tell you. So then it is not a question of a high protective party or a low protective party but, having decided that we must have a tariff, the question is how high shall that tariff be? There I think we can meet on common ground.

Let me submit an illustration: Supposing that in the city of Ottawa there is an industry employing, we will say, 150 men, manufacturing a commodity which enjoys a protection of 15 per cent. We will say that the government proposes to reduce the duty on that commodity by 5 per cent. Representations are made by that industry against the reduction. Forgetting altogether whether they are free traders or protectionists, if any five hon. members of this House were constituted a committee to decide whether or not that tariff should be lowered I submit, if they went about the matter in a business-like way, they would proceed somewhat along this line: First of all they would inquire, "Is that an industry that is good for the city of Ottawa and for this country?" Next they would say, "Open your books and show us why you must have a protection of 15 per cent?" If they show it is because they have to meet competition in respect of goods manufactured on a lower scale of wages in another country; if they show that they have to manufacture here under conditions which do not obtain in the competing country, then it must be decided whether it is desirable to give them the safeguard that they have asked for, or let them go out of business. Without carrying the illustration further, I submit it comes down to the question: shall we give them some protection? Then the next question is, how much? How shall the committee decide? Doubtless they would say: "Open your books and show us how much protection you actually need to carry on?" If the committee were of opinion that it would be bad for the city and bad for the community for that plant to close up they would say "We recognize that you are paying wages of sixty cents an hour, whereas your competitor is paying thirty cents an hour. We recognize that you are manufacturing here under conditions which do not obtain in the competing country. We recognize the fact that you are paying your workmen on an hourly basis for a period much shorter than the working day period of the employees in the factories of that foreign competitor. We recognize that this country is basically a country of high wages."

Therefore, in deciding what protection should be given, I submit that for these reasons the committee would say, "We will give you such a measure of protection as will enable you to continue your business, pay your workmen the standard wage that is demanded in this country, and allow you to get a reasonable profit upon your investment." That, I submit, is the test which should govern the decision in a matter of this kind. That far, I submit, as far as I can judge, is the extent to which the Conservative party should go in the matter of protection and no further.

But why a tariff at all? I think I have demonstrated why there should be a tariff. Let any hon. member take his own town. To bring the situation a little closer home take the city of Brandon, for the sake of choosing the constituency of the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke). We will say there is a plant there manufacturing some commodity under these conditions—basically high wages, hours which are regulated by statute, under our commendable laws which prohibit the employment of child labour, under conditions where a man can only be required to work so many hours a day, under conditions where he has to receive that certain standard of wages necessary in this country in order to buy the necessaries of life—fuel, clothing and food for himself and his family. Then, if there is no tariff that manufacturer has to compete against a competitor—we will say in the state of Alabama, or any of the southern states, where the climate is warm and labour is cheap. If the Brandon manufacturer pays sixty cents an hour to his employees and has to compete with goods manufactured by cheap labour, such as negro labour at 17 cents an hour; if he has to have an investment of $80,000, under the conditions in this country, as to heat, weather, and so on, as against an investment of probably only $8,000 down there, you will take those matters into consideration, and will make up your mind first of all as to whether that particular business should continue or not. If you do not believe in the policy of protection you will say, as some hon. members here say "No; if this institution cannot stand on its own feet without protection it does not deserve to live", and you will not give it protection. Then, by reason of the fact that it cannot compete with the goods brought in from the south, you know what will happen. You know what will happen if a concern cannot sell as cheaply as its competitors. There is only one end. That Brandon factory goes out of business. Suppose that factory employs 150 men? Very well, they are thrown out of work, and they join the ranks of the unemployed. You have to consider if that is a good thing for the city of Brandon? Whom does it affect? Is it only the manufacturer, with whom we are often said to be linked in some special way?

Mr. FORKE: Supposing you take some of the farmers around the city of Brandon and they put their case up to you. They show you that they are carrying on their business at a loss, what sort of protection would you give them?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): If my hon. friend will permit me to continue with my argument I will refer to the situation of the farmers in the vicinity of Brandon a little later on. In the illustration I have mentioned, what you have to consider is whether it is better for that community to protect that particular business and ensure its workmen continuous employment, or whether you shall say, "No you cannot have protection." If you make the latter decision that concern will go to the wall and its workmen will join the ranks of the unemployed. Then what do they do? Having being deprived of work in that factory and needing employment, they start looking for it. They will probably go to another factory in the same line of business in that city if there is one available. But if the same policy obtains so far as that factory is concerned what will they find? Jobs there? No. On their way into the office of that other factory to ask for a job they will meet more men like themselves coming away and swelling the ranks of the unemployed. So industry languishes. You have the problem of unemployment, and in the final analysis you have the problem of emigration from this country.

Why the need of protection? For this purpose, and it has no other justification: For the purpose of allowing a business, if it is a good thing for the country, to carry on, to pay the standard of wages necessary to be paid in Canada, to expand if possible and develop the resources of this country, and increase its pay rolls. By so doing it will benefit not that manufacturer alone. Far and away above the benefit that will accrue to that manufacturer, benefit will result to the employees and to the people of this country as a whole. Firstly there are the employees and their families. They buy from the local shops. The shops will buy from the manufacturers and the agricultural producers throughout this country, and the money which is paid out through the payroll of that institution will find its way through all the avenues of business, even into the pockets of the local agricultural producers. What is the history of this question since the war? Since 1921 sixty-three countries of the world have raised their tariffs. That should indicate something. What is the aim of a tariff? The aim of a tariff is to develop and work up our own resources by our own workmen; out of the proceeds of the wealth so created to pay these workmen, who as consumers buy from Canadian shops, who in turn sell the goods, the products of these very men who are their customers, in order that they may build up the greatest of all markets, the home market.

What is the result of such a policy? We build up our industries. We create employment. We fill up the vacant houses and create a demand for new houses. We increase our population. We stop the emigration from this country of the unemployed and the sending out of money to buy the manufactured goods of foreign countries. We attract people to our shores. Having done that we enlarge the home market.

Now how does this home market affect the farmer? I come now to the question asked by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). I refer to a statement made by that hon. gentleman relating to that very subject which appears in Hansard of February 10, 1925, when the hon. member said:

> No amount of reasoning, no amount of argument can ever convince the people dwelling upon the prairies that a protective policy can be of any benefit to them.

I ask this House, is it reasonable for the leader of a party to take the attitude that no amount of reasoning can convince him? I submit that the hon. member for Brandon does not do entire justice to all those in the ranks of that party. I will concede this, that the results of a protective tariff do not flow directly to the grain growers of the west. I think there is scarcely any other class of people in this country who will not admit that the effect of a protective tariff which builds up industries is directly beneficial to them. The hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) speaking the other night, referring to the matter of the tariff intimated that protection was good for the towns and cities and good for that rural class who were truck farmers in the vicinity of towns and cities, but he intimated it was of no value to the man who was strictly a grain-grower. I think perhaps that is what is in the mind of the hon. member for Brandon.

Admitting that the benefits do not flow to the grain growers directly, I ask the hon.

member to consider two things. My hon. friend is a prosperous farmer in Manitoba. His product is grain. In order to realize the value of that grain he must get it to market. The actual value of that grain on his farm is reduced by the amount of freight he has to pay on it to get it to market. Then I say that any policy that has the effect of either raising or lowering the rate on his grain is of direct interest to him. Suppose we wipe out protection in this country and introduce a straight policy of free trade; I do not think anyone will deny that many, many industries would quickly go out of business, and what does that mean to the railways, the carriers of goods? They will carry less goods. I ask this House, from what source are railway rates paid? There are only two sources, passenger traffic and freight traffic. The more important of these two kinds of traffic is the freight, which is more than twice as remunerative to our railway systems as the passenger traffic. In the case of every plant that goes out of business those railways cease to carry the goods of that plant. Multiply one by a thousand or two thousand, and you are eating into the very heart of the life of the railways of this country. You are taking away from them their most remunerative source of revenue —far more remunerative, so far as the rate per ton mile is concerned, than the grain rate. The railways still have to run, still have to pay their wage bills and pay for their upkeep and endeavour to get a fair return at least on the moneys invested. Who will pay it? The people who are left to use the railways. Where is the burden going to come? It is going to fall on the freight that is left to produce the necessary money to keep the railways going. What is left? With the falling off of industry, with the cutting out of that tremendous freight traffic which depends upon industry for its revenue, you have left the grain traffic of the west as one of the most important sources of freight. Under those circumstances, I ask the hon. member for Brandon, will the rates that he pays for every bushel of wheat taken from his farm to world markets be higher or lower? If higher then he is paying that much more because of the fact that free trade has driven the industries out of the country.

I say to the hon. member for Brandon that if, by a reasonable measure of protection, you preserve and develop the industries of this country and create freight traffic for the railways, to that extent you directly assist the hon. member for Brandon and those in his class.

Mr. FORKE: I want to ask the hon. member a question, because he has repeated that statement so frequently, and I cannot follow his reasoning closely. He speaks about wiping out industries, and I ask him, does Winnipeg exist for the purpose of supporting the prairies of the west to the Rocky mountains, or do the prairies exist to support Winnipeg?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I think the difficulty in answering the question is that my hon. friend assumes it must be one or the other. I submit it is not a question of the prairies existing to support Winnipeg or Winnipeg existing to support the prairies, but their mutual interests interlock and one works for the benefit of the other.

Mr. FORKE: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend, but that is the trouble with his argument. He is speaking altogether from the point of view of industry and he is forgetting the other side of the argument; he is arguing from the point of view of the producer and never giving a thought to the consumer.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I will go a step further and deal with the other point to which I refer. Let us assume that with free trade in this country industries languish and many are wiped out. Let us say that instead of half a million people going from Canada in the last four years, as the records show, a million emigrated. Supposing that drainage of man power continued: what would be the result? The aggregate debt of this country is not affected by the emigration of the people; the people go but the debt remains. When there are ten million people in the country it is easier for the individual to meet his share of the debt than when there are five million to bear the burden; fifteen million can more easily bear it than ten million. Well, then, if the effect of a policy of absolute free trade is to swell the ranks of the unemployed and to increase in consequence the stream of emigration of people who are obliged to seek work elsewhere because they cannot find it here, then every man who goes away leaves behind him his share of the taxation and it must be borne by those who remain. If the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) will follow that argument through he will find that if he intends to stay in this country he will be one of those who will have to bear the increased burden of taxation due to the exodus of our population. That is an important consideration.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The hon. member said a few minutes ago that if the representatives of any industry came to this House and urged that they could not carry on under the existing tariff, or in the absence of a tariff, he would examine the books and, if their representations were correct, he would either provide them with a tariff or increase whatever tariff was then in force, as the case might be. Now suppose the grain grower or the cattle producer came here and declared that he could not under present conditions make ends meet. How would the hon. gentleman by means of the tariff make either of these people prosperous? I ask the question merely for information.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I shall try to answer the question as best I can but I want the hon. member to understand that I do not assume to have a remedy for all the ills of the country. There is supposed to be a government for that purpose.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am merely asking for information.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): So far as one branch at least of agriculture is concerned, it has been suggested that foreign competition be kept out; that is one proposal at any rate. As to the grain grower in the west, I do not see that a tariff will keep out foreign grain. I will say this, however, that if the effect of such a tariff is to increase the home market, then by virtue of that improved market in this country the grain grower of the west will profit.

An hon. MEMBER: In what way?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): An hon. member asks, in what way. I am familiar with the attitude taken by a number of members of the Progressive party in dealing with this question. They say that so long as Canada is a wheat exporting country the price which the farmer receives for his wheat will not be affected in any way by the home market but will be governed entirely by the foreign market.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask the hon. member a further question? How is it that the grain growers of the United States, with high protection, are in a worse position than the grain growers of Canada?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): The hon. member for Provencher will be fair enough to let me answer his first question first. Perhaps he already sees the answer to his previous question. As I say, it is suggested in regard to the grain trade of the west that an improved home market does not affect the price received by the wheat growers so long as we are on an exporting basis. Well, let us assume that the wheat production in Canada in a given year is 400,000,000 bushels. The home consumption at the present time is probably 50,000,000 bushels and if you allow another 50,000,000 bushels for seeding purposes you have for export 300,000,000 bushels. Suppose, the population of the country should increase until the home consumption amounts to 300,000,000 bushels and the exportable surplus is reduced to 100,000,000 bushels.

What about the argument that so long as we are on an exporting basis an increase in the home market does not affect the price? Will hon. gentlemen contend that an increase from 50,000,000 bushels to 300,000,000 bushels in the home consumption would have no effect on the price to the farmer? Every million of bushels cut off from exports would represent that much less wheat in the markets of the world to fill the world demand. Let us push that argument to its logical conclusion; suppose none of the countries producing wheat were on an export basis, then what would be the price of wheat in the markets of the world where wheat must be had? I contend that with every million of bushels by which you reduce the visible supply of wheat in the world's markets you make for an increase in the world price of wheat.

A good deal has been said at times about the operation of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange and if it serves no other purpose, at least it furnishes an illustration. This argument will appeal to many of the farmers of the west because, although they do not go to the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, I understand that they frequently take a little flier in grain, so that they know how the markets operate.

If you go into any grain broker's shop where the prices of grain are tabulated you will find quoted at the beginning of each month the world's visible supply of wheat; and if a report comes from the Argentine or the United States or Russia or India or any other grain growing country that, by reason of the drought or a plague or something of that sort, the visible supply is cut down, immediately wheat jumps in price. So that when you reduce the exportable surplus of wheat of any given country you to that extent diminish the visible world supply, and that reacts on the price. If therefore you reduce the exportable surplus of wheat in Canada as a result of increasing the home consumption from 50,000,000 to 300,000,000, then you directly affect the world price of wheat and the result will be to raise the price in Canada to the advantage of the farmer.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would not the hon. member's argument apply irrespective of where the people lived so long as they consumed the wheat? Whether they lived in Australia or in England or anywhere else, so long as they consumed the wheat would not the argument be the same?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I appreciate the significance of the question; I have heard discussed in the prairies the theory implied in it. It is this. The farmer says, "There are only so many people in the world and I am not concerned with where they live, because they must buy our wheat." I submit this simple illustration. There is, say, a family of ten living in France and the wheat from a specific farm finds its way to that family. Suppose we transplant that family from France into Brandon; instead of the wheat being carried overseas it is taken by a much shorter haul to Brandon. Would not the price of the wheat be greater to the farmer under these conditions? Even if you do not admit that in such a case the value of wheat per bushel would be enhanced, even if you do not get a cent more, you certainly will not get any less.

Will it not be better eventually for this country that that family instead of living in Paris lives in the city of Brandon, and is there helping to build up the city and to create business for the local stores.

Mr. VALLANCE: While the hon. member is waiting on these millions to come into Canada to eat up this surplus that he says they will eat up, what is he going to do with us, the producers?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I am not undertaking to produce people to eat up the three hundred million bushels of surplus wheat. I am trying to pursue a line of argument which I see does appeal to hon. members of the group to my left, and also to some staunch Liberals from the prairies. Perhaps I have devoted sufficient attention to that phase of the argument.

I wish now to refer to where labour comes into this scheme of things, particularly as labour is ostensibly represented in this House by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps). I take it that those who are interested in the problems of labour are also interested in the problems of the unemployed. I ask the farmers of the west to forget for a few moments that they are farmers and to come and live with us in the cities. If they will do this and examine the conditions under which some of our urban population live they will find that things are not as bright in the cities as the bright lights would lead them to believe. I recognize that those residing in the rural parts of the Dominion have some difficulties and that life is not always as interesting as they sometimes would like it to be; but if I could take a poll of all our farmers, I wonder how many of them I would find living under circumstances that they do not know the day or the hour when the bailiff will come along and say: Your rent is overdue; pay up or out you go.

There may be some, but only a comparatively few farmers are in such distress. But in our great cities to-day if hon. members will examine the conditions they will be astounded to find how many people are living practically from hand to mouth, and do not know from one month to another whether they are going to receive sufficient wages to enable them to continue payments on their homes or rent to their landlords.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If the hon. member will allow me? Taking his statement about city conditions to be correct, and admitting that the policy of this country for the past fifty years has been high tariff with very little lowering of duties from time to time, does he think it worth while to continue this system?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): My answer to the hon. member is: We never have had a consistently high tariff. He expresses some impatience with that answer. Well, if he cares to examine the tariffs of other countries he will find that our tariff is exceedingly moderate, and always has been.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Will the hon. member allow me to substitute for the phrase, "high tariff" the phrase, "system of protection" that we have had for the last fifty years?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Then my answer is: Our chief difficulty is that we have never had adequate protection. When I say, "adequate protection" I do not mean high protection, I do not mean low protection, but I do mean such a measure of protection as is necessary to allow industry to carry on—to expand and to pay its workmen the standard of wages necessary for them to live in this country.

Mr. SPENCE (Maple Creek): Will the hon. member admit that agriculture is an industry?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Yes, certainly.

Mr. LADNER: What next?

Mr. HOWDEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question? If conditions are so very much better on the farms than in the cities, would it not be a good plan to have a lot of the city people live in the country?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I may tell my hon. friend that the happiest hours I ever spent in my life were in the country.

Mr. CHABOT: In the summer.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): But not all the city people can go to the country. I do not say that in the cities there is no happiness; I do not say that generally speaking there is extreme poverty in the cities; but I do say that there is a large element of our urban people who, if not in absolute poverty, are on the very verge of it.

Mr. FORKE: May I remind the hon. gentleman that some of us who live in the country know something about city life? For three years I was a member of a public welfare commission which inquired very thoroughly into the charitable institutions operating in some of our cities. I may tell him that as a result of that work there is nothing that I do not know about conditions in the city of Winnipeg; in fact, I think I could give my hon. friend some information about his own city.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I will admit to the hon. member for Brandon that there are some features of life in the city of Winnipeg with which I am not familiar. However, if this House adjourns until March 15, and the hon. member goes west on the same train with me, I hope he will stop off at Winnipeg and I will show him what I know of the city, in return for which I hope he will show me the rest—the real high spots.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was endeavouring to show that there is some relation between the needs of labour and a protective policy, although I must say that the two hon. members who assume to represent labour in this House do not seem to be very much in sympathy with the policy of protection of industry. One of the common arguments used during the last campaign—I believe it has been used in every campaign—with respect to the tariff problem as applied to the Conservative party was this: The Conservative party is a party of big interests, it champions protection because it is linked up with big manufacturing concerns, and it exists for the purpose of giving them a chance to make enormous profits out of the people; such a policy means higher cost of goods to you; vote against the Conservative party.

Let us see whom a policy of protection protects the most, if it does develop industry. Take again a concern in the city of Brandon. It is employing 150 men. Its protection is wiped off and it goes out of business. It is true that the manufacturer is injured. But do not those 150 employees and their families suffer equally with their employer? If you go into a shop in the city of Ottawa this afternoon and buy anything over the counter, out of every dollar you pay it is conservatively estimated that on the average at least 60 cents go to pay the labour that created the article. If a concern is kept going in this country employing a number of people, do not the employees profit? When next the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) addresses the House I hope he will deal with that phase of the subject if he is so inclined.

Since we have been in this House telegrams have been read asking this government to give federal relief to unemployed in various parts of Canada. Where are these unemployed? This includes the city of Winnipeg from which we heard. They are men and women who are unable to secure work in the community in which they reside. What do these people want? First and last they need work. Any policy which has the effect of destroying industry or of allowing it to languish is not one which appeals to the needs of labour. On the other hand, any fiscal policy which has a tendency to build up industry, creates employment and when you create employment you are doing something in a real and substantial way for that class of people which the hon. members assume to represent.

It has been suggested that, after all, Canada is not a manufacturing country. I am going to give the manufacturing output of the five leading cities of Canada simply to bring to the attention of the House how vitally a large number of people in this country who may be termed city dwellers are interested in a policy which means steady work. The following is the table for the year 1923, giving the cities in their order of importance industrially:

	No. of establishments	Capital	No. of employees	Salaries and wages	Value of output
Montreal..	1,444	$454,000,000	83,696	$91,307,201	$447,617,742
Toronto..	1,921	389,000,000	81,990	97,051,659	409,228,170
Hamilton..	421	136,000,000	23,564	27,263,253	112,946,317
Winnipeg..	450	76,000,000	12,500	15,854,946	82,942,209
Vancouver..	507	80,000,000	11,400	13,815,995	71,221,905

It is only fair to explain, so that hon. members from Vancouver may not challenge the correctness of my figures, that I put Winnipeg immediately ahead of Vancouver because in the output of the city of Winnipeg I have included that of the city of St. Boniface which is really in the same industrial district known as greater Winnipeg.

I now touch on the question of immigration to this country and emigration from this country and I give these figures. During the years 1921 to 1924, inclusive, there were brought into Canada from all corners of the world a total of 459,923 people. The records of the Commissioner General of Immigration for the United States show that to that country alone in those four years there emigrated from Canada 436,828 people who, when crossing the border, then and there declared their intention of residing in the United States. Does that represent the correct number of Canadian citizens who, during those four years, went to the United States of America? Everyone in this country who is familiar with conditions in the United States knows that they have in operation an alien labour law under which, if a man declares that he is going there to a job, he is at once told to right about face and return to Canada. Many people having that in mind do not declare that their intention is to stay in the United States, but say that they are going there on a trip and are coming back soon. It is conservatively estimated that for every citizen of this country who goes into the United States declaring his intention of remaining there, at least one goes without so declaring his intention. If that be so, then instead of half a million we should double that and say that a million people have gone from this country to the United States in the last four years.

I will not labour that point, but I will ask this House why those people went? In the final analysis they went simply because conditions in this country were such that they could not get work and earn the money to pay their bills. Who went? Many of them people who had been here for ten, fifteen or thirty years. When they went, what did they take with them? Their life's savings. This is what happens in the case of a family that decides to go to the United States. Let us say that a man who has a wife and five children gets out of employment. The boss at the manufacturing shop tells him: "We are slack just now; orders are not coming in, but as soon as business improves we will take you on." The man waits but business does not improve and he is not taken on. He goes to other places and tries to get a job, but he fails. His bills are mounting up for food, fuel, clothing, rent or his monthly payments on his little home, and nothing is coming in to meet them. Eventually this is what takes place in that home: the head of the house sits down some night across the table from his wife and says: "This cannot go on; unpaid bills are mounting up and I have nothing to meet them. The only way I can pay them is to get work. I have walked up and down the streets of this city and I cannot get work."

What is the solution? He says: "I am going away." Does he say: "I am going to a free trade country?" Does he stipulate to what country he is going as regards its tariff policy? No. He says "I am going to a country where I can get work." And during the last four years when a million people turned their eyes from Canada to the United States for work, did they go, I ask those who believe in a policy of low protection, to a free trade country, to a country that believes in a policy of low tariff? No, they went to a country that is recognized as the highest tariff country in the world.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Can the hon. member tell us how many of the people who left Canada went to the other sixty-two countries in the world that raised their tariffs so much in the last few years?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I cannot tell my hon. friend that and I do not know that it goes to the root of the argument at all. The main fact is that they left Canada, and when they left and went to the United States which is a high tariff country, they left that much more of a tax burden to be borne by the people of this country. I say that a country which struggles along under a burden of taxation with a population of ten millions will perhaps lightly bear that burden with a population of fifteen millions. What we want in this country is people. We shall not get them by a policy that drives people out, but only by such a policy as will build up industry in this country, create employment, and make living conditions attractive to people outside.

Mr. McMILLAN: Does the hon. member know that United States border immigration agents declare that between 1910 and 1920 over 742,000 Canadians went to the United States, while the official census of 1920 told us that there were 78,000 fewer Canadians in the United States than there were ten years before?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): It may have been that some of the efflux to the United States during those years was because of the conscription law in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I am not applying that to any particular part of Canada, but to all parts, for we had many people in this country from all corners of the world who were not particularly interested in our empire quarrels, and they sought the easiest way out, which was across the line.

Now I come to the last question. There are some matters in the Speech from the Throne of which I have approved. It is true that I have endeavoured to the best of my ability to criticize the Speech in some other respects and point out matters in which it is lacking. I am faced, when the time eventually shall come in this House for the vote to be taken on the Address, as all hon. members will be faced, with the question of how I shall vote. Let me say this: A vote in favour of the Address may not be equivalent to a vote of confidence in the government, yet it clothes with the appearance of authority a government which has neither the confidence of this House nor that of the people of Canada. The Speech from the Throne is not that of a government enjoying that confidence, and without which it has not the right to govern. A vote, I say, in favour of the Address would appear to clothe with authority a government which has the confidence of neither this House nor the country, and I propose to give you a few reasons for my view.

My first reason is because of the declarations of the first minister himself, made at Richmond Hill, where he declared:

> That brings me to the situation with which at the moment the government is faced. As a government we can carry on until 1927 if we so desire. As I have already said, I have not the least doubt we shall be able to command such support as we all along have had in the House of Commons at another session; but shall we be able to do more than that? That is the question I have put to everyone of my colleagues in the government and to not a few of the members. It is a question I now put to you who have honoured me with your representation in the House of Commons. It is a question I put to the electorate of this country. Is it sufficient that as a government we should continue in office, drawing our indemnities and salaries as members and ministers and enjoying the other fruits of office when great national questions press for solution, with which for want of an adequate majority in parliament we are unable to cope

Now if he was unable to cope with those problems with a majority of one over all in this House, how can he assume to cope with these same national problems now, labouring under a minority of sixteen under the largest group in this House?

I advance another reason! Because the government lacks the power to initiate and carry into effect even such legislation as it believes this country requires. If you want proof of that, all you have to do is to examine the Speech from the Throne and you will find that it forecasts no legislation seeking to solve any of the national problems which the Prime Minister himself said must be solved. It contains only such matters of promised legislation as were necessary for the purpose of securing the support of certain economic groups in this House.

Again, I say, because the government lacks its quota of ministers of the crown, we have the situation in this House of a government which presumes to govern when we have not sitting in this House a Minister of External Affairs, a Minister of Railways, a Minister of Immigration, a Minister of Trade and Commerce, a minister having charge of the Post Office department, a minister administering the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, or a Minister of Labour; and also because the government is without in this House its real directing leader.

Again, because lacking this quota of ministers it really formulates its policies, not through ministers responsible to the crown, but very frequently through those whom it attempted to elect as ministers in the last election but who were rejected at the polls. I refer to such men as Mr. Massey, Mr. T. C. Norris, Mr. Marler and others.

Again, because it lacks a leader who holds the confidence of the people of Canada. I say to this House, and I say it not in any discourteous way, that the record of the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King in the Dominion of Canada politically is not such as to command the confidence of the people of Canada to-day. For proof of that I point to his record. He entered parliament in 1908 for North Waterloo; in 1911 he was rejected by North Waterloo; in 1917 he was rejected by the constituency of North York; in 1919 he was elected by acclamation in the province of Prince Edward Island in a by-election; in 1925 he was rejected a second time by the constituency of North York; and now, it is true, he is representative for the constituency of Prince Albert.

Is there any reason for that record of defeats? I suggest that the reason is because the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King as leader of the Liberal party does not possess the confidence of even the Liberals throughout the Dominion of Canada, and that is because on all matters of national concern, when pressed for a solution of these problems he has never attempted directly to deal with them in any courageous way, but rather his manner of dealing with them has always been characterized by vacillation and uncertainty. That is why he has lost the confidence of the people of Canada.

There is another reason to which I wish to refer, and it arose during the last election, and that was the spectacle of the first minister of this country going throughout the constituencies of this country and seeking to offer a political bribe to the electorate by saying to them: If you elect so and so, you elect a man with a portfolio attached to him. I submit that that was highly improper for a first minister. I submit that once a man is elected, then, if a government sees fit to honour him with a portfolio, it is a matter for him to go back to his constituents and say: "The government desires me to take this portfolio." I say it is an improper thing for a prime minister to declare to a constituency: "If you elect so and so I will make him a cabinet minister." That argument was used. Where? It was used in an endeavour to elect the Hon. T. C. Norris in the constituency of South Winnipeg. But the electors of South Winnipeg declared that they would rather have the hon. member (Mr. Rogers), who to-day is welcomed back by all sides of this House, than the Hon. T. C. Norris, even with a portfolio attached. What did the Prime Minister say as to a portfolio for Mr. Massey? Speaking at Bowmanville, on October 19, according to a Canadian press report, he said:

> "I intend," announced Mr. King, "to give him one of the best portfolios I have."

Well, the people of that constituency decided to elect the hon. member who now represents them here, rather than send to parliament Mr. Massey, even with the best portfolio that the Prime Minister could give him.

Again I say we should not vote confidence in this government. We should not do so because this government deliberately shirked a straight vote of want of confidence on the motion that was introduced the other night. We should not do so because it exists only by reason of the support of a majority of normally three who have not confidence in it. You can pick those three members wherever you like among the government supporters. If you do so you will frequently find that that majority is represented by three or more men who are not in sympathy with this government on matters of principle, who have declared time and time again during the election campaign that they had no confidence in it. If you wish one example, I will give you that of the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) who is reported as having said, in discussing the matter of a coalition between the Progressives and the Liberals after the election:

> There can be no coalition as long as the Liberal party is wallowing in the mire of corruption as it is.

There is one of the majority of three. But the hon. member for Rosetown seems to have changed his opinions on his way down here from his constituency. I cannot suggest what induced him to adopt the course he has followed, but it reminds me of the story of Mary Malone. She decided to leave her native parish in Ireland and seek work in England. So she waited on the parish priest, told him her plans, and asked him for a reference. He gave her a certificate of character, but during the course of a severe storm on the passage over to England she lost her certificate. She went to the captain of the ship and told him her trouble. "Oh", he said, "I will fix that all right," so he wrote out a certificate that "Mary Malone left the city of Dublin with a good character, but she lost it on the way over."

Mr. EVANS: I should like to inform my hon. friend that it is not a matter of changing my mind; it is a case of choosing between two evils. In such a case as that what are you to do?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member would not like to change from bad to worse.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): All I can say is that so far as the hon. member for Rosetown is concerned the government can count on his support under all circumstances, and under all conditions, no matter how corrupt it may be.

Again I say the government does not enjoy the confidence of the country. I might refer to another of the majority of three, and I do not do so in any slighting way. I mean the hon. member for Southeast Gray (Miss Macphail) who in this House, I think, declared as plainly as words can declare that she had no confidence in this government. I do not think that the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps), who sits opposite, expressed any great admiration for the government of the day, either during his campaign or since he has come into the House. As a matter of fact if we take the reason given by the hon. member for Rosetown for his action what does it amount to? That he is only supporting this government as the lesser of two evils. Then I ask, is that such a measure of support as a responsible government should depend upon? I say that a government which depends upon the support of members, which expects them to vote for it, because it is the lesser of two evils is not fit to remain longer in office.

Mr. EVANS: Will the hon. member permit me another question? Even supposing what he says were true, would the Conservative party be in a better position, seeing that they were also in a minority?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I think the hon. member will have to wait and see. He will at least admit this: That when the present leader of the Conservative party makes a promise to the Canadian public he will carry it out, and from all corners of this House I have been pleased to hear expressions to that effect. The right hon. leader of the Conservative party entered parliament in 1908. From that time to this the hour hand of time has made many revolutions, but to this moment the hour has not yet struck when a promise of the right hon. leader of this party given publicly has passed at a discount from its face value.

I say this government does not possess the confidence of this House or of the Canadian people, because it wants to adjourn. When it wants to adjourn, instead of going on with the public business, it offers no other substantial reason than that it is tired and wants to go home. This government, unable to legislate, is unable to meet its obligations. When a man in private business cannot meet his obligations there is only one thing left for him to do. The same thing applies to a government. A government which can no longer meet its obligations ought in common decency to meet its creditors.

The government has ceased to guide the ship of state in this country. That ship is not guided by a man at the helm; it has lost its rudder; it is drifting helplessly without a pilot. Faintly perhaps to the ears of Mr. King but plainly to the ears of the people of Canada came the sound of breakers ahead. On October 29th last this government was tried by the people of Canada; the judgment rendered was that they had no confidence in the administration and that it should be evicted. The days of grace within which the government should have vacated the treasury benches have expired, and at this hour the sheriff of public opinion, armed with a warrant of eviction, stands knocking at the door.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all members present will join with me in felicitating the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) upon his maiden effort. To have spoken at such length, to have furnished the House with such a comprehensive review of the political situation in Canada, and to have made such an arraignment of the government and such an exposition of its demerits is an accomplishment which deserves, I think, the commendation of hon. members generally. We of the Conservative party who have been longer in parliament are pleased to find on our side in this House a number of new arrivals of such capacity, energy and ability, as will in the future ensure the vigour and the permanence of that party in this country.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, to offer a word of appreciation of yourself, and I wish particularly to congratulate the House on having in the Speaker's chair a gentleman of such superior cultural attainments, of such complete mastery of the English and French languages, of such wide experience in parliament, of such grace, dignity and knowledge of men's attributes—attainments which qualify Your Honour exceptionally well for the high position which you occupy. Having been in parliament for four years I know that on many occasions the position of Speaker has been a difficult one, calling not only for the exercise of sound judgment but for a great measure of patience and an attitude of courtesy and conciliation. These qualities, Sir, you possess in ample degree.

The Speech from the Throne brings to my attention the regrettable fact that the time will soon arrive for the relinquishment by Their Excellencies of the high positions which they hold in this country. As a great soldier Lord Byng did wonderful work in defence of the empire and of our own nation. As a statesman, as a governor general and as a man, I think I am safe in submitting to the House that Lord Byng has no peer in the annals of Canadian history. My hope is that the government and parliament as a whole may be able to prevail upon the government of Great Britain to extend their time in the high office their Excellencies now occupy when their period of service is concluded. We are all fully aware that their Excellencies Lord and Lady Byng of Vimy will receive from the people of Canada the hand of gratitude and friendship. I am sure they will from the people of British Columbia; we would welcome them to the citizenship of that fair province.

The country to-day is faced with a number of grave and very serious problems. Those hon. members who have studied our history prior to 1867, when confederation was brought about, will agree that the union of Canada at that time was largely a political union of scattered states with diversified economic interests. In Canada to-day we have arrived at a time when we need new makers of confederation—not a political but an economic confederation. Throughout the length and breadth of Canada we hear of growing bitterness; we hear expressions of sectional feeling and the voicing of ideas which indicate intensive thought along economic lines. In one portion of the country they would have no tariff, in another portion a very high tariff, in another a medium tariff. In one section they would oppose the export of natural resources; in another they would encourage it. So that the problems of Canada have largely assumed an economic aspect, and their solution requires the skill, the judgment and the ability of men of business, of men of affairs, if general advantage to the country is to result. In facing that situation the government necessarily plays a most important part; but instead of having a government of action, of vigour, of aggressiveness and of capacity, we have a government of weakness, of inaction and of incapacity—and, I may say, without being offensive, of political expediency. It is to that phase of the situation that I desire to address some of my remarks this afternoon, in order to bring to the attention of hon. members, and ask them to give some study to, one important question which affects western Canada. I refer to the question of the natural resources and the question of western development.

Before, however, dealing with those particular matters in detail, I should like to remind the government that in the Speech from the Throne we see no reference whatever to a possible solution or proposal for solution of problems affecting our ex-soldiers. These are many and difficult. Experience in the administration of existing laws has demonstrated the necessity of changes, some of them of vital importance. Throughout the country soldiers' organizations are complaining of lack of attention to these matters. The Speech from the Throne does contain reference to old age pensions. And it is interesting to observe that when this matter of old age pensions—for which I have always stood; I believe them to be in the interest of the country, and that the country can well afford to provide for them—came up last year, the government passed the matter to a committee of the House. When the report of the committee came in, no action was taken by the government, because the report recommended that there should be a conference of premiers to consider not only the matter of old age pensions, in which the provinces have or should have an important interest under our constitution, but also a number of other questions of importance to the provinces and to the federal government. In that connection the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) speaking on February 18, 1925, made this statement:

> If I remember well the language of the Speech from the Throne, it is that a conference shall be called together for the purpose of considering amendments to the British North America Act with respect to the constitution of the Senate and other matters. Surely this—

Referring to the resolution of the member for South York (Mr. Maclean) respecting a suggested amendment of the British North America Act to enable Canada to amend her constitution.

> Surely this would be one of the matters which the government would submit to such a conference.

And amongst other matters was that of old age pensions. The whole tenor of the debate, the attitude of the government and the promise of the ministers, was that they would call a conference to consider these questions in which the provinces had a vital interest and had to be consulted. But what has happened? Not a single thing has been done towards calling that conference. But all of a sudden the government announces in the Speech from the Throne that they have evolved a scheme for old age pensions, the value of which will only be known when the legislation is brought down. There we have another indication of political expediency. One time it is an excuse for taking one course; another time there is excuse for taking a different course.

We have heard considerable discussion in the House about the election last fall, and I shall not weary the House with details. But there are some things which I wish to bring before hon. members, because the promises of the leaders of public thought, especially the leaders of the parties, play an important part in the crystallization of public opinion, and in enabling the public to understand the attitude of the parties on the great issues of the day. In the election of 1925 we saw repeated many of the practices which were common in 1921. Local issues became the dominating subjects of contest in the various districts. In 1925 in British Columbia, and particularly in greater Vancouver where there were four candidates, the question raised by the Liberal candidates was that of freight rates. There the Liberals claimed the championship of lower freight rates, and the tariff was not an issue. They were all agreed that we ought to have a protective tariff. The propaganda engaged in by the Liberal press and candidates, as well as by advertising, was to the effect that the Liberal party was the champion of lower freight rates and that the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King had given an assurance that there would be a still further reduction. It was stated also quite incorrectly and unfairly that the Conservative party stood in the way of that reduction. I have before me a number of election advertisements as well as some of the speeches delivered by the candidates and reported verbatim, and one of the most interesting of those speeches is that of Mr. G. G. McGeer who ran against my distinguished colleague the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). When Mr. McGeer made his speech we had a stenographer report it and a copy of that report I have here. I desire to read for the benefit of the House an extract from Mr. McGeer's speech so that hon. members may appreciate the nature of the campaign in Vancouver and the difficulty of the public in grasping the real issues in that contest. Speaking at the Liberal convention on September 22, 1925, Mr. McGeer said:

> I believe we have accomplished a great deal. We have secured freight rate reductions that have shown to the people of western Canada the value of freight reductions, and the difficulties under which we have laboured in the past. We have done this: we have roused in western Canada a sense of public resentment and we have made equalization of freight rates the foremost national subject in the Dominion of Canada to-day. But more than that, we have received from the Prime Minister of this Dominion a declaration that he will give to western Canada equality of treatment and see that they get impartial justice and fair play. This is the first time this has been accomplished in this Dominion.
> We now have the opportunity as electors to accept the Prime Minister's word or we can repudiate his promise, and that is going to be the issue in this coming election. There are wrongs to be adjusted; there are rights to be declared, and we can go on if we will appealing to the Board of Railway Commissioners and the other courts of this Dominion, but I say to you, there is one court in which this issue can be finally settled; there is one place where the people of Canada can get lasting and final justice, and that is in the court of public opinion, and, when that is done, it will be written in the lists of the parliament of the Dominion. As your counsel—

[Mr. Ladner.]

Mr. McGeer happened to be counsel for British Columbia in connection with freight rates.

> —to-day I advise you to take the Prime Minister at his word, accept his declaration and his new national policy, and send a representative to parliament that will see that that is written in the statutes of the Dominion.

Hon. members who have studied the question know perfectly well that it was not the intention of the Liberal party nor of the government to write in the statutes of the Dominion anything further with respect to lower freight rates. They should have brought this about in June last; they started to make a reduction which would be of equal advantage to the Pacific coast and to the people on the route going from the prairies eastward. But they failed to give justice to British Columbia. In the election practically every candidate and every speaker in the district focused his attention and his discussions upon the question of freight rates, distorting the position of the Conservative leader and of the Conservative party, and putting into the mouth of our leader phrases and opinions which he never uttered. Consequently they perverted the facts so that the electorate hardly knew what those facts really were.

I mention these things because they are so significant of the campaign generally throughout the country, serving at the same time, as they do, to recall to us something of what occurred in 1921. In my judgment the government in this contest, through their candidates and their speakers, should have discussed their record of the past four years, but they said not a word in that respect either in defence or in approval. In 1921 the declaration of policy was that there would be severe economy in public expenditures. Of that, in the election of 1925, we heard not a word. In 1921 they promised to bring into effect the League of Nations principles in regard to labour, as set out in their platform; but so soon as parliament assembled and the business of the House got under way they forgot all about their promises. In 1925 they had no statement to offer on this subject. In 1921 they promised an adequate system of unemployment insurance together with old age pensions, widows' pensions, and even maternity benefits. They were going to take care of everybody. But hon. gentlemen who were here during the past four years know perfectly well that, apart from old age pensions, no serious discussion took place on any of these questions; not a single proposal was submitted by the government to parliament. Of all the promises made in 1921, and which no effort was made during the course of the last parliament to implement, the Liberal party, in promising cash grants or bonuses to soldiers' dependents, in addition to the gratuities already granted, assumed probably the greatest and most responsible obligation —an obligation to a class of people who had given their service to the country and who waited in anxiety and with some confidence in our public men who had made these promises to have them fulfilled. To the disgrace of the Liberal party and of its leaders, I say that during the whole of the four years they were in power in the last parliament they never uttered a single word in recognition of this particular promise, never gave any explanation of their delinquency in the matter, and never brought down a single line of legislation. When the election of 1925 came and we charged the government with default in this and all the other respects in which they had failed to live up to their promises, they had nothing to say. Of course they could say nothing, for they had done nothing. As a matter of fact, during the four years that parliament sat under the direction and control of the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King and his government not a single pledge of the 1919 platform, nor a single assurance given in the 1921 campaign, was actually honoured; not a single one. I leave it to the fair judgment of any hon. member who has studied these questions to determine whether or not my assertion in this respect is justified.

Perhaps the real spirit of the policy of the Liberal party in 1919 and in 1921, a policy of political expediency, can best be understood in the light of that classic dialogue of questions and answers which took place at Saskatoon at a meeting addressed by the Prime Minister, when somebody in the audience interjected in the course of the right hon. gentleman's speech a number of questions, the answers to which revealed his attitude when faced with the actualities of statecraft and the problems before the electorate. I am not going to cite many of these things, but I do desire if possible to impress upon hon. members the necessity for the leaders of our parties to carry out their pledges in a statesmanlike manner instead of bending to the whims of sectional influences and of sectional inducements. That meeting took place at Saskatoon. I am reading from a report of the Canadian Press, dated Saskatoon, October 7, and published in the Montreal Gazette:

"I want to make my position perfectly clear," exclaimed the premier. "The government wants to have that road completed, and to have it completed immediately."

Referring to the Hudson Bay railway.

"That is our desire. But how far can we go in the carrying out of our desire must depend upon the complexion of parliament." "How many miles per member will you complete?" queried a voice. The question caused a laugh. Mr. King: "I am afraid that if I say that I will go the limit if you will go the limit, Mr. Meighen would say that I am trying to bribe this constituency on the prairie."

Well, the rules of the House would prevent my right hon. leader saying what such a promise really amounted to, but a great many people outside parliament would certainly so express themselves.

Another voice broke in; "How long are you going to wait for the prosperity which is at the other end of the 92 miles of railway?" "That depends, "returned Mr. King, "on how strongly we are supported in western Canada, but if I find that the Liberal party has no representatives from Saskatchewan, do you think I can get the people from the other provinces to support an appropriation for the Hudson Bay railway?"

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and, through you, hon. members, if that is a commendable example of statesmanship from the leader of a great party?

Again there was an interruption that the Progressives had kept the government in power. "No, Sir, and they never did," Mr. King shouted back.

I wonder what he will say when he returns to the House.

"The Liberal party does not want to build the Hudson Bay railway," interrupted the heckler. "That is untrue," the premier warmly returned, "the Liberal party wants to build it, but we cannot build it unless we have sufficient Liberal support from the prairie provinces to work with the men of other provinces, because you cannot get the House of Commons to vote the money unless you have unity of action.

Unity of action! The "unity of action" we find to-day is the arrangement between the government and our friends of the Progressive party. There it is at its maturity. Let me give another extract from this interesting and instructive report:

"You forget that Canada is growing," Mr. King returned.

This reply was in answer to an inquiry relative to a vote of $5,000,000 for the Quebec harbour.

Another questioner wanted to know why the vote had gone to the Quebec harbour. "We get a certain amount of support from Quebec," said Mr. King. He added that the argument that the government should do nothing for the people who supported it and give everything where it got no support—well, human nature would not stand for that sort of thing.

Mr. RINFRET: That is all right.

Mr. LADNER: The hon. member for St. James says that that is all right. Well, that may be the political standard of our friends of the Liberal party, but I hope the Conservative party will never adopt it. Such a principle of action is ruinous to the country, for it corrupts the people; it causes men to seek office by promising all sorts of things to the electorate, instead of basing their appeal upon the enactment of legislation for the general welfare of the Dominion. It is a poor exhibition of statesmanship—in fact it is not worthy of the name of statesmanship. I take another quotation from this interesting report. It relates to the alternative vote.

> Mr. King said that had the alternative vote been adopted Liberals would have had advantages in a number of three-cornered fights, "but," he added, "I am coming to see more clearly that the alternative vote will help to perpetuate the group system, and I believe the group system of government bad."

He believes it is bad—that was in October last. Now that the election is over he comes right back to practise what he then believed to be bad. He joins with the Progressive group and promises the single alternative vote to maintain himself and his government in power against the clearly expressed opinion of the majority of the electorate.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have referred to these things because they are a sample of the campaign generally which was carried on last October. I believe that the questions and answers contained in this report of the Saskatoon meeting are very significant, particularly the question, "How many miles per member will you complete?" I think it aptly expresses the policy of the government in this present parliament. The Speech from the Throne discloses beyond doubt to any reasonable man who understands the great questions of the day that the whole purpose of the government's action is to seek the support of the Progressive members in order to maintain itself in power. In other words, the government is carrying out the policy of "How many miles of railway per member will you complete?" They have now got the support of twenty-four Progressive members. Just how many remaining miles of the Hudson Bay railway will be built? Well, the Prime Minister has run in Prince Albert in the meantime, and no doubt the whole road will be completed. You will observe, Sir, that in Saskatoon the question of the Hudson Bay railway was paramount; the report does not reveal any other subject of discussion. In Vancouver the question was freight rates, while in some other cities it was low tariff. I refer to these matters because I believe that instead of creating that unity of spirit and of action and promoting that good will among our confederated provinces which every true Canadian should try to foster, this temptation of yielding to the demands of certain sections of the country in order to secure votes is bad for the Dominion and must inevitably bring about sectional ill-will and disunion.

I purpose now to deal with that portion of the Speech from the Throne relating to the transference of the natural resources to the province of Alberta, namely:

> Your attention will be invited, among other measures, to a bill to provide for the transfer to the province of Alberta of its natural resources.

I recall to Your Honour that in the Speech from the Throne of 1922 a declaration was made that their natural resources would be handed back to the three western provinces. In keeping with the general sluggishness of the government, nothing at all was done to redeem that promise, but now, at this critical moment, when the government's fate depends upon the Progressive members, several of whom come from Alberta, the government suddenly awakens to the realization that it is in the best interests of western Canada to hand back their natural resources to those provinces. I wonder why the government has not come to an arrangement with the province of Manitoba, which has sent a number of Conservative members to this House? Those who have made a study of this question, particularly those who have read Mr. Chester Martin's little book, will undoubtedly agree that there are strong reasons why the province of Manitoba should receive its natural resources just as well as the province of Alberta.

Mr. DARKE: Is the hon. member aware that the same terms offered Alberta were also offered to Saskatchewan and Manitoba?

Mr. LADNER: I do not happen to be in the confidence of the government, but I have noticed that its conduct frequently co-ordinates with prevailing political conditions. In other words, I would judge that the agreement made with the province of Alberta is largely influenced by the advantages accruing to the administration from the support of Progressive members from that province.

Mr. DARKE: What about Saskatchewan?

Mr. LADNER: Saskatchewan seems to have been looked after in another way. I refer the hon. gentleman to this Saskatoon speech.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are just ordinary Grits.

Mr. LADNER: My right hon. leader suggests that the Saskatchewan members are "just ordinary Grits." The government has got them, anyhow.

Mr. DARKE: But they did not need to be bribed.

Mr. LADNER: If the hon. gentleman will read in Hansard the quotation which I have made from that famous speech in Saskatoon, he will find there the main incentive for most of the arrangements to be found in the Speech from the Throne.

I have taken for some time an interest in the question of the natural resources of the western provinces. In 1922, when I spoke on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I went somewhat exhaustively into the matter and into the claims of British Columbia with respect to the natural resources that were taken from our province unfairly and unjustly in order to bring about the completion of the Canadian Pacific railway. The principles underlying that problem are the same as those which apply in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

On January 26, at the request of a certain Toronto newspaper, I made a suggestion with respect to the railway belt and the Peace river block in British Columbia, and with respect to the Pacific Great Eastern railway and the very extensive land grants given to that railway and with respect to the Canadian National Railways. My proposal was published in the Vancouver Daily Province, and the next day Mr. Oliver, Premier of British Columbia, made a reply upholding a certain proposal that he had in the way of legislation for handing over the Pacific Great Eastern railway with some 16,075,000 acres of land to certain United States financiers who, it appears, were contemplating taking over this system. About ten days later Mr. Oliver, leader of the Liberal government, made in Vancouver a speech which was published in full in the Morning Star, a Liberal organ, of the 6th February, in relation to the same question. I make reference to this because I believe it is the first step by my good friend Mr. Oliver, who is a shrewd and able tactician in political matters, in connection with the next provincial election and, perhaps, in connection with the next federal election.

This question of British Columbia's claim for better terms had its inception in 1906 when Sir Richard McBride was leader of the Conservative government, and that question as well as the claim for lower freight rates began about the same time, the fight being carried on for a number of years. When Mr. Oliver became premier he took up the question of lower freight rates, and after enticing to his support non-political bodies such as boards of trade and other organizations in British Columbia, he finally made the freight rates question the centre of the hottest and fiercest political fight that has been carried on in that province. The question of freight rates became not only the centre of the political contest provincially, but the centre of the contest federally in the last election. Mr. Oliver proposes to hand over the Pacific Great Eastern railway, together with 16,075,000 acres of land containing many valuable assets, to these United States financiers, and he is making a claim on the federal government for the return to the province of the railway grants which originally consisted of about 13,000,000 acres but of which about 10,600,000 acres remain; and claims also the Peace river block.

That is the position of British Columbia at the present day. I make a proposal quite different from that. I think it will be a misfortune for Canada, and for British Columbia, if we allow a strip of land forty miles wide along the Pacific Great Eastern railway, with great resources in timber and mines and beautiful scenery, to be taken over by foreign interests of any kind who would gain a proprietory interest in those lands and in that railway. It is rumored that Mr. Oliver intends to call a summer session of the provincial legislature in order to consummate a deal which is under consideration and which was authorized to some extent by the last legislature. When my proposal was published in the Vancouver Province on the 26th January, Mr. Oliver the next morning made this reply which I will read because this is a matter, not only of provincial importance, as I will show in the development of my argument, but of national importance. Mr. Oliver made this reply:

(Special to the Province):

Victoria, January 28.—If American capitalists are willing to take over the Pacific Great Eastern railway, together with vast areas of subsidy land, they will not be barred on account of their nationality.

This was made clear by Premier Oliver when he issued a statement replying to the suggestion of Leon Ladner, M.P., as reported in "The Province," that the P.G.E. be kept in British control.

"As to whether British, Canadian or United States capital secures control of the railway and the subsidy lands matters but little," the premier asserted in his statement.

"If it is a private corporation it will operate for profit. Again, capital knows no international boundaries. If the railway and the lands are acquired by Britishers or Canadians their stocks would be marketable in the United States—British to-day, American to-morrow or the reverse.

"In respect of the P.G.E. and its lands being acquired by the Canadian National Railways, Mr. Ladner's suggestions are very similar to the policy of this government, as first outlined by myself in a letter addressed to Hon. George Graham, Minister of Railways, dated April 30, 1925, and as outlined in an address to the Vancouver Board of Trade this month. I am very pleased to see a Conservative member of Parliament endorsing to a large extent a policy proposed by myself."

As a matter of fact, I am condemning the policy proposed by Mr. Oliver and I am repeating the policy which was proposed in this House in 1922 by myself and by other Conservatives in years gone by, particularly by Mr. George H. Cowan, who was formerly a member of this House. I submit to the House and to the government the wisdom of retaining the Pacific Great Eastern railway with its 16,075,000 acres of land under the control of the Canadian National Railways. If the Pacific Great Eastern Railway and these vast resources are of sufficient importance that the United States financiers are willing to come in, take them over, assume the obligations and complete the railway in order to gain the advantages from the resources that lie along the railway, surely such a proposal must be equally sound and advantageous to the Canadian National system which would have not only the resources but control of an important railway system.

I suggest that not only could the Canadian National Railways take over the Pacific Great Eastern railway and these lands, but the Peace river block composed of 3,500,000 acres of land, which has long been in dispute between the province and the Dominion, could well be handed over by grant to the Canadian National Railways. That would ensure to the Dominion and to eastern Canada in particular freedom from demands on the public treasury by the Canadian National system as a result of taking over the Pacific Great Eastern railway. I suggest that the Canadian National Railways should build and the future development of this country will make it necessary to build a railway from the Peace river district to connect with the Canadian National Railways at or near Fort George, either through the Peace or the Pine pass, and in that way an outlet will be given to the vast area of the Peace river district. I know some hon. members will not be much interested in this and will not understand it; but in that Peace river district there is a great empire; there are about 70,000,000 acres of land of which 20,000,000 acres can be brought under cultivation. When you consider that eleven million acres of land under cultivation in Alberta produced 110,000,000 bushels last year, you begin to grasp the immensity of the Peace river area, its importance in the west. and its opportunities for immigration and development. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that not only should we retain these railway systems, but the Canadian National should take over the Edmonton and Dunvegan railway by arrangement with the province of Alberta, so that our government-owned system would have control over the different western railways, the Pacific Great Eastern and the Edmonton and Dunvegan, and then in co-operation with the government as well as with the other great railway system, the Canadian Pacific railway, they could undertake a scheme of immigration and colonization for the Peace river and other districts in western Canada.

This country is in need of immigrants. All hon. members, the press, and the public tell us that the solution of our problems, financial and otherwise, is to be found in the presence of more people in this country. We know that is the solution, but I submit that we cannot get people into this country unless the government takes the initiative in formulating a constructive policy which will induce people to come to Canada, and which will provide them with the means of making a living after they are here. For that reason I commend the government for the arrangement they have recently made for securing immigrants through the co-operation of the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific, whereby the two railway systems in a businesslike way will seek out suitable immigrants in Europe, and take the responsibility for placing them in western Canada, and see to it that they remain in western Canada to carry on the development of the country. I believe the scheme is sound, and I am suggesting to the government that the scheme should be extended to cover more completely the British Isles, so that our immigration policy would be based, not upon political expediency, not be subject to the whims of changing ministers, for we have had three or four ministers of immigration in three or four years, not be subject to a change of policy with a change of party in office, but there should be such continuity of policy and of business arrangements that the average business man who wants to make a capital investment in a pulp mill or factory of any kind in this country, and the average man who wants to settle on a farm, could go to certain business people such as we have in these two great railway systems and make his plans and arrangements for perhaps the next ten or twenty or twenty-five years to come. In that way, by taking the business of immigration and colonization out of politics and away from government and putting it under the control of competent business management, with a consistent businesslike policy, we will secure results in Canada better than we have had in the past. The immigration policy in the past has been a complete failure. There has been practically no immigration in the past ten years. I readily admit that it is largely due to the low tariff that we have and to the economic conditions of the country, but I also believe that the system which has been followed by the government in the matter of immigration has been no system at all. The policy has been changed so frequently that no one can depend upon its permanency, and no man can know when he comes here with his capital what will happen to his venture.

I relate this question of immigration, Mr. Speaker, to the general development of western Canada. The Prime Minister has intimated in one of his political speeches that the spearhead of immigration was pointing westward. My right hon. leader has pointed out that statistics show that the spearhead of immigration is pointing southward, which has resulted in very little access to our population during the last ten years. I urge upon this House, in my small effort to make a contribution towards a solution of the problems of this country, the wisdom of placing in a business-like way the control of the securing of immigrants in the hands of the management of our two great railway systems, subject to such restrictions as will protect the treasury of this country and the interests of the country at large. I suggest, I repeat, that the Canadian National railway system, without demands upon the public treasury, without obligating the government of Canada, without obligating the system itself, should be endowed with such grants of land as would enable it to take over the Pacific Great Eastern and the Edmonton and Dunvegan railways, and thereby be put in a position to settle these immigrants who come in throughout western Canada. That could be done without any trouble. In the Peace river district there are between 65,000,000 and 74,000,000 acres of land, of which 20,000,000 acres can be brought under cultivation; of that, 13,000,000 acres is class A land which will require no expense to bring it under cultivation, and the other 7,000,000 acres would require perhaps from $3 to $5 per acre to be made suitable for the growing of grain.

Mr. Speaker, an arrangement of that kind might involve not only the giving of the Peace river block now owned by the Dominion government to the Canadian National Railway, thereby settling a dispute between British Columbia and the Dominion of Canada, but, if necessary, the government should make such further grants of land out of the great Peace river area, which is owned by the Dominion government, as would absolutely ensure to the Canadian National system freedom from any financial obligations or loss in getting control of these two railways I have mentioned. I make this suggestion for what it is worth, and I am hopeful that in the course of time something like this will be done. I submit that this country will not develop unless some active, aggressive scheme is worked out and pushed forward, and the development of Canada to-day depends largely upon the development of western Canada and upon the opening up of these new areas.

Mr. DARKE: In that 60,000,000 acres, does the hon. member include the Peace river district in Alberta?

Mr. LADNER: Yes. The proposal I submit necessarily involves an arrangement not only between British Columbia and the federal government but also with Alberta. I am told that Alberta has actually control of the Edmonton and Dunvegan railway by arrangement with the bondholders. The situation is ripe. All the integral parts required to be brought together to enable development to take place are there ready to be taken over. The economic situation of the country at large makes it possible to make arrangements that would enable the Canadian National system and the government to take hold of this enterprise at the very minimum of expense, with all the opportunities which are bound to develop in the future.

Mr. BALDWIN: What is the mileage of the Edmonton and Dunvegan railway?

Mr. LADNER: I do not know the exact mileage, but the price asked by the Alberta government is in the neighbourhood of $15,000,000.

Mr. BALDWIN: Several hundred miles, probably.

Mr. LADNER: I understand that the Edmonton and Dunvegan railway is a remunerative system, and only a little extension by way of branch lines will make it quite profitable. I make this proposal so that hon. members and the people of eastern Canada will not feel that the public treasury of this country as a whole would be obligated with respect to this railway enterprise in the west. I think the west has now reached the stage where it can and should finance its own railway enterprises.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have made a suggestion, but involved in that suggestion is the question of the natural resources of the four western provinces. It will be a matter of very great interest to those hon. members who take the time and the opportunity to read the history of that problem. I will not worry the House this afternoon with any historical data, but I wish to bring to the attention of hon. members some of the principles on which the demand for the return of these natural resources is based, particularly that of British Columbia.

Before the western provinces became part of confederation, the six original provinces of Canada comprised an area of approximately 500 million acres. There remained a vast empire of nearly two billion acres which was the common property of the confederated provinces, as well as the unorganized territories of the country. By legislation enacted in 1899 and 1912, Ontario received land to the extent of 150 million acres, giving that province a total of 261 million acres, practically doubling its size. That legislation gave to Ontario lands of great value in mineral wealth, in timber, and in pulpwood. The province of Quebec by similar legislation in those years received lands which increased its acreage from 124 millions at the time of confederation to 452 millions. In other words, the province of Quebec is now four times its original size, and in these great additions of acreage it received properties which are now disclosed to have immense wealth in minerals, timber, and other resources. I wish hon. members from the eastern sections of Canada to bear those facts in mind when considering the claims of British Columbia and the other western provinces, because it will be found that in the course of events the western provinces, instead of receiving additions to their acreage, have been deprived of their natural resources which under the law of public domain was actually their property and should have been given to them. The province of Nova Scotia, through the construction of the Intercolonial railway, from which of course other provinces benefited as well, received the benefit of an expenditure of $160,000,000.

Mr. EVANS: Before the hon. gentleman gets too far away from the point, will he say why their natural resources were not given to those provinces?

Mr. LADNER: To the prairie provinces?

Mr. EVANS: Yes.

Mr. LADNER: Well, it is an exception so far as the colonial development of the British Empire is concerned. In the course of the last three hundred years, under the law of public domain, every self-governing colony, state and dominion, although the lands are vested in the crown, receives on incorporation the right of administration and a beneficial interest in all natural resources. I may as well deal with that point just at this stage.

Before British Columbia and the other western provinces entered confederation, the lands in those provinces were licensed or granted to the Hudson's Bay Company or other companies. They were either granted by charter or licensed to those trading companies. British principles with regard to the public domain are very ancient, and they have been known to all the colonies and dominions of the empire since their inception. The public domain—that is, lands unappropriated—has been and still remains land vested in the crown; but when a government is formed to take control of the country it secures the right of administration of the public domain and the beneficial interest therein. That principle has been accepted, as I have said, in the case of every self-governing colony or dominion with the exception of western Canada. When confederation took place in 1867 the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia received their natural resources, under the law which then existed with respect to the establishment of self-governing colonies, and also by virtue of section 109 of the British North America Act. Under this section the beneficial control of the public domain was vested in the several provinces. If you examine the constitutional history of New Zealand, Newfoundland, the provinces of the Australian Commonwealth, South Africa, and the other self-governing dominions, you will also find that all these dominions upon organization have been granted the right of administration in the public domain and the beneficial interest therein. The main point is that in the case of all the solf-governing colonies or dominions of the empire the one exception to this policy from all times has been the one with respect to western Canada.

I cannot see, having given some study to this question, any justification whatsoever for the retention by the Dominion government of those western resources. Nor do I see any justice or right in the contention which is sometimes made that the other provinces have a vested interest in the resources of western Canada. The other provinces have been increased in size from two to four times, but with the exception of £300,000 that was paid for Ruperts Land by the Dominion government, there has been no contribution made to that territory.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

Mr. ROBB: Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, may I have the unanimous consent of the House to lay on the Table volume 1 of the Auditor General's report?

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LADNER: When the House rose at six o'clock I had been dealing with the question of the public domain and the rights, constitutionally and in the light of history, of the self-governing colonies and dominions, particularly as relating to their right, upon attaining the status of self-government, to the control of their own natural resources. It is recognized by all constitutional authorities that both the dominions and the provinces should enjoy that right.

With reference to the question of natural resources, I had discussed a proposal under which the Canadian National Railway should take over two provincial railways, the Pacific Great Eastern and the Edmonton and Dunvegan. I wish at this juncture to summarize that proposal, because there is one feature of it to which I omitted to refer. Under that proposal the Canadian National Railway was to take over the Pacific Great Eastern, together with 16,075,000 acres of land which, under an act of the provincial legislature, had been given as a grant to that railway system. I omitted to make some reference to the resources contained in that new grant of land, comprising an area of about 40 miles wide and nearly 400 miles long, a grant almost as large as was originally given to the Canadian Pacific Railway for the construction of a line to extend from one end of Canada to the other. The sessional papers for British Columbia for 1924 set forth the report of the surveyor who, under the auspices of the government, conducted an investigation of the timber in what is known as the Horse Fly Cruise, near Quesnel lake. This is merely one example of the resources along that railway. The report reads:

> From investigations already made it would appear that this—
> Referring to the Horse Fly Cruise.
> —will prove one of the richest timber areas investigated by the department to-day. 75,000 acres covered, and 55.876 acres carried merchantable timber averaging 19,000 feet board measure per acre, a remarkably heavy acreage for timber east of the Cascade.

The total stand was over 1,000,000,000 feet of which 43.6 per cent was spruce suitable for pulp and paper, and I understand that one of the provincial ministers has made the statement that there is sufficient spruce and timber to keep two good sized pulp and paper mills going indefinitely. This report, as well as the report of Colonel Dennis, who is known to many hon. members as the head of the Natural Resources department of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and who had been engaged by the provincial government to investigate the lands along the Pacific Great Eastern railway, discloses the great richness of that district, particularly in mineral resources, which can hardly be calculated. I make special reference to this for the reason that in the past it has been proposed by provincial governments, who are always seeking to get something from the Dominion treasury without paying very much, that the Canadian National Railways or the Dominion government should take over the Pacific Great Eastern railway. That proposal appears to me to be not exactly fair to the rest of Canada. British Columbia has $47,000,000 invested in that railway and I might add, what I omitted to mention before, that the scenic beauty along the line constitutes a tourists' paradise.

The proposal which I now submit to parliament is that the Canadian National Railways should be asked to take over not only the Pacific Great Eastern railway and the obligations of the original investment, but receive as well the advantages of the 16,075,000 acres of land. As I have pointed out, the Canadian National Railways would also receive the Peace river block of 3,500,000 acres, of which 2,000,000 acres consist of arable lands suitable for cultivation. That Peace river block belongs equitably and, I might add, legally to the province of British Columbia although it was granted in 1884 to the Dominion under circumstances which would not be defended to-day. I suggest that if these grants of land, with their potential values in timber, mineral and agricultural resources, were not sufficient to indemnify fully the Canadian National Railways against any possible loss with respect to the Pacific Great Eastern or the Edmonton Dunvegan, then the Dominion could, as a matter of general advantage to Canada, grant to the Canadian National Railways additional lands, still in the hands of the Dominion government, out of the great Peace river area which comprises 65,000,000 or 74,000,000 acres of land, according to whichever engineer's report one is willing to accept. These are the concessions which the Canadian National Railways would receive. All that the Canadian National would be asked to do would be to construct what would undoubtedly prove a profitable connection, and not a very expensive one either, between the Peace river area through the Pine or Peace pass and down to the main line of the Canadian National railway, there providing an outlet for the Peace river district to Prince Rupert as well as to Vancouver. Propaganda for the building of that line has been extensively circulated for a number of years. The proposal at first was that the Canadian National Railways should build it out of their own funds, on the strength merely of the advantages which would accrue from the operation of the railway. But those who know the district feel that these advantages would not be very bountiful at the present time, unless the district were settled.

The other part of the suggestion, which I have submitted and which I repeat now in order to relate it to the remarks I am about to make, was that the question of immigration for that great area of the Peace river district and other portions of the west should be carried out somewhat along the lines of the present arrangement which has been made by the government with the two railway systems by which the two, in a businesslike way, having their eye on the possibilities of traffic and the production of freight for these railways along the line of settlement, should use their connections in Europe and in the Old Country to secure immigrants for settlement in that district.

These things relate directly to the question of British Columbia's claim for better terms, an old claim which has been the subject of political discussion for some time now. I have a complete memorandum which was prepared in 1913 by Sir Richard McBride and submitted to the government of Canada of that day setting out in the most conclusive manner the rights, the justice and the equity of my province to the return of these vast areas of land which stand to-day in the name of the Dominion government and which legally and constitutionally should revert to the province. I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that in 1849 Vancouver island was granted by letters patent to the Hudson's Bay Company, but it reverted by purchase on the part of the British government in 1867. The mainland of British Columbia had been licensed for certain purposes to the company and these rights were also acquired by the British government before confederation, so that when the province of British Columbia entered confederation it carried with it its constitutional rights, its right to the public domain, its right to the administration of that domain, and to the beneficial interest therein. And in order to make certain that these rights were not lost a section was inserted in the terms of union in 1871. It will be interesting to read to the House from this clause, 16, as it relates also to the rights of the prairie provinces which were deprived of their resources by specific legislation. The section is as follows:

The provisions in the British North America Act, 1867, shall be applicable to British Columbia in the same way and to the like extent as they apply to the other provinces of the Dominion, and as if the colony of British Columbia had been one of the provinces originally united by the said act.

The claim of British Columbia for what we call better terms, which means the railway belt along the Canadian Pacific railway and the Peace river block, is based upon a breach of agreement by the Dominion government following the terms of union. The terms of union have not been lived up to by the Dominion and our first claim relates to 13,000,000 acres of land along the Canadian Pacific railway known as the Dominion railway belt. That land is now of great value: it contains 22,000,000,000 feet, board measurement, of timber which along with the Peace river block, makes a total of 26,568,000,000 feet board measurment. These figures are given in an official publication of two experts of the Dominion government Whiffen and Craig, contained in their report under the title "The Forest Resources of British Columbia." Leaving aside the mineral and agricultural resources and the value in water power, the timber alone is estimated, on present day valuation, as being worth over $75,000,000. Now, this thirteen million acres of land was conveyed to the Dominion in trust, which trust will be found in clause 11 of the Terms of Union of 1871 and reads as follows:

And the government of British Columbia agree to convey to the Dominion government, in trust, to be appropriated in such manner as the Dominion government may deem advisable in furtherance of the construction of the said railway—

That is, the Canadian Pacific railway.

—a similar extent of public lands along the line of railway throughout its entire length in British Columbia, not to exceed, however, twenty miles on each side of said line, as may be appropriated for the same purpose by the Dominion government from public lands in the Northwest Territories and the province of Manitoba. In consideration of the land to be so conveyed in aid of the construction of the said railway, the Dominion government agree to pay to British Columbia, from the date of the union, the sum of $100,000 per annum, in half-yearly payments in advance.

Now, the original proposal for the purpose of aiding the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway was to give a strip of land forty miles wide from the western boundary of British Columbia through the intervening territory to Ontario a distance of nearly three thousand miles, which would have meant some seventy-five million acres of land. But that proposal was not acceptable to the promoters of the Canadian Pacific railway. When the company was incorporated in 1872 they found they could not finance the railway even on such an extensive land grant as that. So in 1880 the scheme was entirely altered, but the province of British Columbia was not consulted on that alteration. The new scheme was that the Canadian Pacific Railway company should receive twenty-five millions acres of land in the agricultural areas of the three provinces and $25,000,000 in cash; that was the total assistance to be given at that time. Under those circumstances the province of Ontario, which had actually provided for the appropriation of this forty-mile strip, took no further action. The twenty-mile strip on each side of the railway which was to have been allotted from what are now the prairie provinces was also withheld, so that British Columbia alone carried out her portion of the agreement of 1871.

Apart from the clause in the Terms of Union which I have cited, the intention at the time the original agreement was made can be gathered from the remarks of Sir George Cartier in the House of Commons when those Terms of Union were under consideration. They will be found in Hansard of 1871 at page 662:

Item 11 relating to the construction of the Pacific railway—

That is the clause that I have already read to the House.

—would no doubt provoke discussion. It was not the intention of the government to construct the road, but it would be undertaken by companies, to be assisted mainly by land grants. It was not the intention of the government to burden the exchequer much to obtain this railway. While this clause was under discussion between the delegates and the government, it was proposed by the Dominion that the colony should hand over a forty-mile strip of land towards the construction of the railway. It was proposed to give the colony $100,000 per annum, which, placing the interest at 5 per cent, would be the annual interest on 2,000,000 acres of land, leaving the remainder to be used by this government. The railway starting from Nipissing would be about 2,500 miles, 700 of which would pass through Ontario. They did not expect to get entirely the twenty-mile grant on each side of the road, but they expected to get from the Ontario government every alternate lot on each side of the line. That would give nine million acres of land from the Ontario government.

Similarly other members of the government indicated clearly that at the time British Columbia entered confederation this railway belt was given distinctly on the understanding that the province of Ontario and the Dominion government would each make a contribution of land, the latter from what now are the three western provinces, and that this land would be held in trust and, if necessary, used to provide money for the construction of the railway. But, as I explained a moment ago, nine years later, in 1880, the whole scheme of financing the Canadian Pacific railway was changed, so that the purpose of this trust failed, there was no execution of the trust, and constitutionally, legally and equitably the lands should have been handed back to the province. At that time the lands were not considered of much value; to-day they are of great value, and the people of British Columbia feel that they are suffering an injustice in being deprived of these vast assets, which rightfully belong to them for the reason that the terms of the original agreement have never been carried out.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Have any of those lands yet been disposed of by either party?

Mr. LADNER: Yes. The railway originally was to go through the Yellowhead pass, but the actual grant by the province to the Dominion was not made until 1880, when the route through the Kicking Horse pass had been decided on. In the interval lands had been alienated. It is in connection with that alienation that there arises a second claim that I am now about to deal with—that with reference to the Peace river block. Since then of course there have been further alienations.

The Peace river block, which constitutes our second claim, contains three and a half million acres of land, of which two million are arable. The Liberal government of 1874 was strongly opposed to the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, and found one excuse after another to delay the undertaking. Sir John Macdonald and his party were strongly in favour of aggressive action, and the people of British Columbia, small in numbers though they were in 1871—ten thousand whites and thirty thousand Indians—pressed vigorously for carrying out the terms of the contract. One of the excuses for delay made at the time was that in this vast railway belt certain lands had been alienated, and for that reason it was claimed that the province of British Columbia should give further lands, called "lieu" lands, to the federal government.

So an arrangement was made under the Act of Settlement in 1884 which adjusted a number of disputes, and this arrangement was mainly brought about by the desire on the part of British Columbia to have the railway completed. Among the disputes so settled was the claim that the lands in the railway belt which had been alienated should be compensated for by the province of British Columbia transferring to the Dominion government the Peace river block of three and a half million acres. The claim had no basis in reason or in right, for the railway belt had been granted to the Dominion government in trust for a definite and specific purpose, which had not been fulfilled because the whole scheme of financing had been changed. Nevertheless the province was so anxious to have the railway completed that the provincial government transferred the Peace river area to the Dominion government. It is true that the province received an additional annual grant of $100,000 a year, but this it should have received in any event.

There was another important point in the act of 1884 to settle the dispute concerning what is known as the Esquimalt and Nanaimo railway on Vancouver island. As a result of the settlement the province parted with another 2,000,000 acres in order to induce the federal government to carry out their undertaking to build that railway and the arrangement which had been entered into with the Dominion authorities. In addition the Dominion government subsidized that railway with $750,000 and took over the construction of the old Esquimalt dry-dock. This question of the 2,000,000 acres of land for the Esquimalt and Nanaimo railway constitutes in my opinion the third claim of British Columbia for redress. The Mackenzie government, under what are known as the Carnarvon terms of 1874, bound themselves to build the Esquimalt and Nanaimo railway free of cost to British Columbia, but they did not go through with it. The government at that time tried to get out of the deal and after negotiations actually offered British Columbia the $750,000 to give up its rights. The province foolishly did not accept the $750,000 with the result that it has never got anything in its place, and to-day the 2,000,000 acres of land are worth about five times what it cost to build the railway.

When the Act of Settlement of 1884 came before the parliament of Canada there was naturally considerable dispute. Ontario and Quebec each had a reason why no concession should be made to British Columbia, and in order to settle these disputes and to appease the claims of Ontario and Quebec, certain concessions were made. Quebec had subsidized what is known as the Quebec, Montreal and Ottawa railway and had spent $5,000,000 on it. So, as part of this arrangement or deal in connection with the Settlement Act of 1884, Quebec received back the $5,000,000 which it had expended on the Quebec, Montreal and Ottawa railway. Similarly Nova Scotia was refunded its outlay on what is known as the eastern extension which became part of the Intercolonial system, and a further settlement was made with New Brunswick with reference to some railway problems that existed there.

If you calculate the expenditures and revenues by the Dominion government in British Columbia and in the prairie provinces, you will find these interesting facts: that in the three prairie provinces the expenditures by the Dominion government exceeded the revenues by $40,000,000 since the Dominion government took over the administration, but in British Columbia, with its great natural resources, the excess of revenues over expenditures since the province came into confederation amounted to $40,000,000.

When we consider the question of our annual subsidies, we find another situation in which British Columbia, in my judgment, has the worst of the transaction. Of course these subsidies are based on population. The annual subsidies are approximately as follows:

Ontario	$2,400,000
Quebec	2,000,000
Manitoba	1,470,000
Saskatchewan	1,753,000
Alberta	1,621,000
British Columbia	623,000

British Columbia has the same population as Alberta. Of course the explanation is given that British Columbia has her natural resources and the prairie provinces do not have theirs, but in the proposal, as I understand it, which the government has submitted in the Speech from the Throne, Alberta will retain her annual subsidy of $1,621,000 for the next three years and then will take over her natural resources and receive quite a number of advantages.

To sum up the concessions which British Columbia has been obliged to make in order to induce the Dominion government to carry out, not a new agreement, but the original contract of 1871, a compact which was embodied in an act of parliament by the Dominion as well as by the province, and to complete the railway, constitute the giving up of lands the conservative value of which is as follows:

Value of timber, over 22,000,000,000 feet in this 11,000,000 acres of the Dominion railway belt, according to official reports..	$ 75,000,000
Peace river block: value of timber and agricultural lands..	35,000,000
Esquimalt and Nanaimo railway grant: value of 2,000,000 acres..	20,000,000
Excess contribution of revenue..	40,000,000
Total..	$170,000,000

This does not take into consideration the great value of mineral and coal deposits found in those lands. So I repeat that in order that we could have a consummation of confederation, in order that we could have a bargain which was signed, sealed and delivered with British Columbia, completed by the government of Canada, we were forced by the exigencies of the circumstances to part with lands and timber the value of which exceeds $170,000,000—a colossal sum.

I have already pointed out, but I repeat by way of contrast, the treatment which Ontario and Quebec have received since confederation. When confederation started the first six provinces contained an area of 500,000,000 acres, and there was a vast domain of 2,000,000,000 acres which was the common property of the provinces of confederation as well as of the people in the unorganized districts. Notwithstanding that, out of this vast domain of 2,000,000,000 acres, a great portion of which properly belongs to the prairie provinces and has not been given to them, by legislation of 1898 and 1912 Ontario has had her area increased from 150,000,000 acres to a total of 261,000,000 acres, or practically double, and Quebec has had its area increased from 124,000,000 acres to 452,000,000 acres, or four times as much. I refer to these matters because in those additions to the provinces have been found enormous resources in minerals and timber which to-day are making those provinces wealthy and creating trade, traffic and industry beyond the dreams of the legislators of those times.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Does the hon. member not think the Maritime provinces have a strong claim for some compensation?

Mr. LADNER: I do, but the Maritime provinces have also been looked after to a certain degree, because they have received the advantages of the Intercolonial railway and they have not been obliged like British Columbia to part with land and timber to the tune of $170,000,000. Moreover, Canada provided $160,000,000 to build the Intercolonial railway and it has been a losing proposition ever since. So the case of the Maritime provinces is less strong, although they have a certain case because, like the rest of Canada, they have a proprietary interest in the vast domain which is the common property of confederation and which, in my judgment, should not have been given, as it was, to the other provinces without some compensation.

That disposes, Mr. Speaker, of my contentions on the part of British Columbia. We have ten Conservatives here from British Columbia and I do not see why our appeal should not be just as strong as that of ten good Liberals; I admit it might not be as strong as that of ten Progressives, but nevertheless I submit these claims to the bar of public opinion, and I believe that when properly informed of the facts not only the whole of western Canada but the eastern provinces as well will realize the justice and merit and equity of these claims, and a satisfactory adjustment will be made.

There are a number of problems which face this country at the present time. In making that statement I am not indicating that I intend to trouble the House with much more talk—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. LADNER: My hon. friend from Bow River says, "hear, hear." I have not his eloquence, nevertheless I hope to make a contribution in fact and consistency of principle, which is something that has not always characterized the course of the hon. member in the last three years.

In reading over the Speech from the Throne, which says little and perhaps means less, we are not helped in trying to find a solution of some of the very great problems which press before the public of this country at the present time. In the earlier portion of my remarks I referred to the soldier question, to amendments to the Pension Act in connection with ex-soldier matters. There are quite a number of these matters, but the government has given no indication of any legislation in that respect. I know of cases of injustice due purely to the technicalities of the law, not intended by parliament at all, nor would they be defended by the public at large.

Then there is the question of old age pensions. That is going to be dealt with by the government. We have matters affecting labour in this country. There is the question of the tariff, which, of course, is the bone of contention. There is the question of immigration. There is the question of reduction of taxation, and in my opinion that is one of the most important before the country to-day, because unless our taxation is on a level with that of the United States, both capital and people will flow to that country and we will be at a loss. I do not see anything of a constructive nature in the Speech from the Throne that would help us toward a solution of that question.

Then there is the question of the National railways, a question which to a large extent is now out of politics. I am frank to say that in my humble opinion the National railways are under competent management which is proving successful, but there are matters which affect the Dominion of Canada in connection with the subsidies and assistance which must be given to that railway. Then there is the question of freight rates, on which I spoke earlier in my remarks this afternoon. The province of British Columbia particularly has suffered a great deal from the high freight rates. The fight has been carried on in parliament and before the Board of Railway Commissioners. The board has given certain concessions, but unfortunately during the last election campaign the Liberal candidate in Vancouver, Mr. McGeer, threw the whole question of freight rates into the heat of a political fight, and in my judgment did the cause considerable injury. However, the matter is now before the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Then there is a matter in which I am interested myself, concerning the protection of savings bank deposits by a system of insurance. I shall not go into that at the present time, because I have taken up the time of the House on previous occasions discussing it. I believe, however, that in addition to our existing bank deposit system, a system of guaranteeing savings deposits on an insurance principle would be both advantageous to the public and in the interests of the country as a whole, without doing any harm to our banking institutions; it would rather help them.

In regard to my own constituency, I propose to have a little private talk with my good friend the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) with regard to the north arm of the Fraser river. He is always open to receive us, but beyond that he does not always go in the matter of giving us concessions, but this time I am hoping to show him by merit as well as by persuasion the wisdom of making some concessions.

We on this side of the House have referred to a number of these problems, Mr. Speaker, because this party offers a solution for them. I do not think that solution can be better expressed than in the words of the resolution my right hon. leader presented to the House on the 1st of June, 1925. A number of the members may have heard this before, but they cannot hear it too often, especially my friends the Progressives. That resolution stated:

> That, in the opinion of this House, to meet the situation which has resulted from a strengthening in late years of the protective system the world over particularly in the United States; to give new life to industry and productive enterprise; to preserve and enlarge the Canadian market for Canadian farm products; to stimulate the development of Canadian resources by the Canadian people and thus create employment for our workers; to increase the traffic of our railways by which alone an all-round reduction of freight rates can be secured; and, as well, to provide added revenue and thus bring about a reduction of internal taxation, this Dominion requires an immediate revision of the Canadian tariff on a definitely and consistently protective basis.
> That such revision should apply to natural products such as farm products, fish, and coal with no less thoroughness than to manufactured goods.
> That to the same ends steps should be taken to conserve for Canadian development our essential and irreplaceable resources in material and power.
> That while every effort should be directed toward the establishment of a system of preference for preference within the empire no preference should be given at the expense of the Canadian worker and all preference should be conditional on the use of Canadian ports.
> That a tariff commission should be appointed representative of the three great classes of Canadian industry, agriculture, manufacturing and labour and be entrusted with the duty of studying Canadian tariff problems in their every bearing and of making from time to time such recommendations to the government as it deems in the general public interest with the reasons therefor, and with power also, where it finds unfair advantage is being taken of protective duties, of making recommendations to be given effect by the government for removing or reducing tariff schedules or imposing special excise taxes upon products in respect of which such advantage is taken, and that its reports, findings, recommendations and reasons therefor be given to the public.
> That to enable the products of the western and Maritime provinces to reach more readily the markets so developed the special transportation burdens borne by those provinces should be shared by the whole Dominion either by contribution to long haul freight costs or by assistance in some other form.

In my judgment that policy, short and to the point, offers a solution for many of the problems which face this country.

I would also like to direct attention to a few words from a report that many hon. members may have heard quoted from before, but it will do us no harm assembled here in parliament to hear them again. The United States Department of Commerce, in its official report No. 44, dated November 3, 1924, says:

> Economically and socially Canada may be considered as a northern extension of the United States. The establishment of branch factories in Canada—as a means of supplying the Canadian market—is closely tied up with Canadian tariff policy. In fact there are movements under way now which a year hence may considerably curtail the advantages of operating branch factories in Canada.

That movement I suggest was the general election in October. I quote further:

> Against the set policy of the Conservative party of building up a thoroughly protective tariff to favour Canadian industries has been operating the influence of the Liberal party who stand for a more moderate level of import duties.

I read that, Mr. Speaker, in order to bring to the attention of hon. members the dispassionate and well considered view of keen, shrewd business men of the United States. That is the analysis they make of the situation in Canada; and I would commend the thought and ideas to my hon. friends the Progressive members before they continue, without limitation, their help to maintain the government in power.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the debate in this House has from time to time revealed very clearly, whether in matters of policy or in conduct of public affairs, the weakness and the inactivity of the government. I commend to hon. members a reflection on the situation in the various democracies of the world. Before the war the sovereignty of the people was universally accepted. Since the war we have had a reaction, a very strong reaction. Russia has accepted a tyranny worse than that of the Czars. China to-day is weltering in anarchy. Italy has practically eliminated its parliamentary institutions and taken a dictator who rules the country with an iron hand, is oppressing the press, and otherwise exercising his will as dictators do. In Spain the democratic institutions of government have given away to a dictatorship. The three great countries of Germany, France and England have witnessed a partial disintegration of their parliamentary system. In Germany the president has recently threatened a dictatorship. In France there have been three cabinets in less than one year; and those who have travelled lately in the republic tell me that there are rumours from many directions of a dictatorship in order to right the difficulties that confront the government there. In England we have witnessed a strong reaction. Britain, the mother of democracies, has seen the development of strong, radical forces controlling the legislation and policies of the country. Throughout the world popular government is in serious danger. European nations are in the grasp of dictators. There is a revolt, not so much against democracy as against the inefficiency and the weakness of parliamentary institutions and of governments. I submit that is a fair analysis of the situation in many of the democratic countries of the world having parliamentary institutions similar in principle to our own; and I commend to hon. members opposite, as well as to hon. gentlemen to my left, the thought of the weakness, the impotency, and the lack of initiative on the part of the present government in matters of policy, in matters of administration, and in matters relating to the direction of the affairs of this country. The government is not only weak, but it shirks the course which a strong, vigorous and courageous government would take in regard to the various problems awaiting solution in this country. It lacks the vigour and the courage necessary to deal with the present situation in parliament. It could pursue a definite course but it is afraid to do so.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Do not be too sure.

Mr. LADNER: The Minister of the Interior says, "Do not be too sure." I can only speak for myself, but I say that if I were in the position of hon. gentlemen opposite, and if I had a policy to submit to parliament and proposed to carry on the business of the country, I would carry it on—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): So will this government.

Mr. LADNER: —and I would take the necessary means to enable me to carry on.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): From the statement the hon. gentleman has just made, is the House to infer that he advocates the application of the closure?

Mr. LADNER: Well, I can only express my own personal opinion, and I will tell you frankly what it is: the public of this country is sick and tired of inaction. There is business to be done, there are problems to be solved. The business is not done, nor is any solution of those problems recommended, because the government is too weak to do it; and in order to prove to the country that I was not weak I would bring in closure and do the business. Such a course might not be popular with all hon. members, even all those on my own side, but I am only expressing my own view, it seems to me that when you are faced with a situation such as the country is faced with at the present time in connection with the investigation of the Customs department, and regarding serious matters of administration affecting immigration. tariff matters, and all the other problems which exist, there is need for courageous action. We read in the press before the election statements by the government leaders of what they were going to do if only they had sufficient support, things they could not do before because they had to depend upon the support of the Progressives, but when that election was over they would reorganize the government and they would carry those measures into effect. But now we have a stalemate. The government is in the hands of the Progressive members. There is compromise of policy and compromise of principle, and where vigour and initiative are required on the part of the government in relation to important questions, they are lacking in the necessary courage and judgment. The whole situation of parliament is one of drift. The business of parliament and the administration of public affairs could be more ably and capably carried on, I think, if we all went home and left the deputy ministers to act so far as ministerial powers are concerned. For my part, as a young man coming from the west—

Mr. LAPOINTE: How old are you?

Mr. LADNER: I am old enough to vote, and I am also old enough to see the weakness of the government's position. One does not need to be very old to see that. It would be interesting to hear from the government leaders some explanation of why they continue this course of drift day after day.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): The government do not wish to be hard with young men.

Mr. LADNER: They may not wish to be hard on young men, but they are certainly hard on themselves so far as concerns the receiving of popular approval.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, we have to listen to a lot of nonsense.

Mr. LADNER: What does the leader of the House say?

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are hard on ourselves in listening to such nonsense.

Mr. LADNER: Listening to such nonsence?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. LADNER: I would prefer to make statements such as I have made, though the minister may think them nonsensical, than to make promises such as he made, in the most solemn manner, with respect to calling a conference of provincial premiers and then ignoring them entirely without giving any explanation to the House. That is the trouble with a number of our Liberal leaders. They are full of promises particularly before election time, but lack miserably in action when the time arrives to do something in parliament. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have occupied enough of the time of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. LADNER: Some hon. members say to go on. I have enough material to enable me to go on until twelve o'clock, but I do not propose to do so. I hope the members of the government will show a little more of the spirit of the Liberal party I used to read about some years ago, under the leadership of their great chieftain. A situation such as exists to-day would not be countenanced by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and would not have been tolerated by Mr. Fielding. But this government is quite willing to make a deal with the Progressives in order to enable them to remain in power, and to adopt a policy so well exemplified in those classic questions and answers to which I have already referred, the best of which was, "How many miles per member will you give us?"

Mr. F. N. DARKE (Regina): It has been an honour to me, as well as a pain, perhaps, to sit in this House remaining fairly quiet during the past six weeks. I have listened to a great many speeches, some good, some not so good, and some indifferent. I may say, as a business man that during the first part of the debate the speeches appealed to me very strongly indeed. I thought they were on the whole of a very high order. The subject was certainly a debatable one, and the very fact that the government were prepared to submit it to the House indicated that it migh be considered debatable. The debate at the outset was conducted, in my view, on a very high plane. But within the last three weeks the discussion has not been quite so good. I think the reverse should have been the order; we should have the best wine last instead of first. Of course I am not referring to the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Ladner), which was interesting and very informative indeed.

I desire to congratulate the House on the good judgment they have shown in re-electing Your Honour to the Speaker's chair. I do not believe that there is a man in this House or in Canada who could so ably fill the position which you occupy to-night, Mr. Speaker. During the very trying weeks through which we have passed, your conduct in the chair has been fair, reasonable and honourable, and my best wish is that you may continue in that position, and that when the next parliament assembles they will exercise the same good judgment in re-electing you to the speakership. I hope you will continue to fill the chair in this House as long as your health will permit you to do so, which I trust will be a good many years. I wish to ask of you on my own behalf the kindly consideration that you have shown to other new members who have addressed the House for the first time. I must confess that it is somewhat of a fearsome task for an ordinary business man to stand before such an august assembly and address them for the first time. However, I am sure, Sir, that if I should show any western broncho tendencies to strike out both fore and aft, you will apply the curb so firmly and yet so gently that I will not be thrown off my feet.

I observe that our friends on the other side of the House are still afflicted with a considerable amount of gloom. There does not appear to be any ray of light breaking through. In fact, across the way the atmosphere is almost as dense as a London fog.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): There is a good deal of fog around the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DARKE: Probably the fog has blown over from the other side. I will tell my hon. friends across the way that the worst is yet to come. Let them cheer up. Now in order to cheer my friends across the way and lighten the gloom I am going to quote a few figures from a well known publication. I will not burden Hansard with many figures tonight. The observations which I will read were taken from a survey prepared by the Financial Post. I think everyone across the way will recognize the Financial Post, published in Toronto and Montreal, as a very reliable paper. The article reads:

Canada will have greatly increased purchasing power in 1926. A survey of production in 1925 indicates a vast addition to the buying power of the Dominion, in all areas. Figures, based upon the best information show an improvement of something like $300,000,000. Basic conditions throughout the five main marketing areas of the country are such as to warrant the forecast that 1926 will be even a more productive year, and that the spending power of all the five areas will continue to expand.

In the comprehensive survey that follows, an alalysis has been made of the purchasing power of every section of the Dominion. The survey shows the upward tendency in the past few years by a review of basic business and industrial indicators; it indicates the present situation in business in Canada and gives definite promise of greater sales and more profitable productive effort in the coming year.

The 1925 figures of Canadian revenues are the result of a thorough pains-taking survey of Canadian business and productive activities during the past year. The estimate may be accepted as the most reliable figure available. Evidence of the soundness of the methods used in making the estimates is given by the results of the estimates in "The Financial Post Survey," 1925, which proved to be in error only by a slight percentage.

The figures quoted here extend from 1922 to 1925 and include agriculture, forestry, fishing, trapping, mining, electrical power, construction and manufacturing. The total for 1922 was $4,671,856,648. In 1925 it was $5,616,330,000, a total increase of $944,473,352. Taking the two main items, manufacturing and agriculture, we find an increase in manufacturing revenue alone of $404,853,615, and in agriculture of $366,424,000. So that in all these five industries there has been a decided increase. There is not much of the "whisper of death" in that. I have another item here which I took from the Citizen yesterday. It reads:

Hardware Man Sees Big Business Ahead

Retailers' President Thinks Business Men Realize Chances

(Canadian Press)

Toronto, February 16—T. W. Thompson, president of the Ontario Hardware Retailers, addressing the annual convention of that body here to-day, said that Canada "is on the threshold of a business growth such as has never been experienced in this country before, due to the fact that Canadian business men are realizing more and more the vast potentialities of the country."

I do not know whether or not that will have any cheering effect on our friends opposite. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the lamentations of Jeremiah were nothing in comparison with the wailings of a Tory out of office, so that we cannot expect too much optimism from those hon. gentlemen while they remain on the other side of the House.

In the Speech from the Throne a reference is made to the Maritime provinces and I want to say right now that I am particularly interested in that part of the country. I had the honour to be born in that beautiful little island of Prince Edward of which I am and have always been proud, and I have always had a deep interest not only in my native province but in the Maritime provinces generally. Indeed, I told my people in Regina that I was coming to Ottawa to sit in with the representatives of the Maritimes to study their difficulties and to inform them to some extent of the problems which we in the western provinces have also to cope with, and that, if there was any possibility of arriving at a solution, I for one would do my part to help solve the difficulties of the Maritime provinces. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the presentation of their case by their representatives in this House and I am bound to confess that I have not been especially impressed with the solution they have proposed. I do not think it goes far enough. The main solution hon. gentlemen have to offer is that in connection with the Canadian National Railways. Now I have no doubt that freight rates have some bearing on the troubles of the Maritime provinces but I think that the whole problem goes deeper than that. It seems to me that hon. gentlemen will have to look elsewhere for a solution of their difficulties than to the transportation of a few thousand tons of coal.

An. hon. MEMBER: What about the tariff?

Mr. DARKE: I am not referring just now to the tariff. What I have in mind at the moment is the possibility of shipping western grain through the Maritime ports. We should like in the west to see our wheat go through those ports; there is not a man in western Canada who would not prefer to see western grain go out of Canadian rather than through American ports. We are Canadians, every one of us in the west, for as a matter of fact a considerable number of us come from the Maritime provinces as well as from Ontario and Quebec. There is no doubt therefore about our being interested in the Maritime provinces. Indeed, we know more about the east than eastern people know about the west. Many of us were born there and we visit eastern Canada pretty often. But what is the situation? The suggestion has been made that either the government or Sir Henry Thornton should dictate to the railways as to where grain or cattle, for instance, should go on its way out of the country. Well, is the railway the servant or the master of the shipper? Suppose I as a shipper went to the Canadian National Railways to have a train load of cattle shipped through Portland or Boston and Sir Henry Thornton or the managers of the railway should tell me that my cattle must go to Halifax or St. John. What would you expect me to say in such a case? I should say, "If you do not want to carry my cattle to Portland I can get another railway to take them". The important thing is to have shipping facilities provided for transporting our products from our own ports. It is useless asking Sir Henry Thornton to take our wheat to Halifax unless there is adequate shipping to transport it to the markets of the world.

Another point in the matter of Maritime difficulties has reference to coal. The central provinces imported last year of coal and coke —I think it nearly all went to those provinces —$40,000,000. We do not use any anthracite in the west or, if we do, we use very little; we use our own coal. It is not perfectly clean, but we are patriotic enough to put up with some inconvenience and to burn our own Alberta coal. The only suggestion I have heard from the people of the Maritime provinces in regard to the coal situation is that the railways should haul Maritime coal at a loss, that loss to be borne by the Dominion as a whole. Now, a good many members from the Maritime provinces support a protectionist policy, and if it is good business for the people of Nova Scotia and Alberta to pay 25 or 30 per cent more for goods manufactured in the central provinces than they would have to pay for similar goods imported, would it not be reasonable to ask these central provinces to pay more for their coal so as to even things up? But has there been any suggestion from the people of central Canada that they are prepared to accept a duty of $2 or $3 per ton on foreign coal in order to encourage the consumption of a home product? I have not heard any such suggestion and I venture to say that if my good friends from the Maritime provinces were to make that proposal to the people of Montreal or of Toronto they would be turned down absolutely. It is all right for them to take but they are not so ready to give, and until something is done in that direction I do not think that you will get very far on the way to a solution of the trouble. I am not advocating protection, but I suggest that what is sauce for the goose ought to be sauce for the gander, and they might be given a dose of their own medicine. I am in favour of the proposed commission for I am not satisfied that we have all the facts before us. Let us get those facts and if there is anything that the people of the west can do to assist the Maritime provinces in solving their troubles I say that we are with them.

Considerable criticism has been levelled at our Progressive friends because they have seen fit to support the government, and very many unkind and unfair things have been said about them. I like criticism when it is clean and fair, but it certainly is not fair to insinuate that members of the Progressive party have been bought or bribed or that special inducements have been held out to them in order to secure their support. I think that the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) put the matter rather aptly when he said that perhaps it was a choice between evils, and like sensible people those hon. gentlemen have chosen the lesser of two evils. They could see nothing to hope for on the other side while they see at least a ray of hope on this side, inasmuch as, at any rate, we are headed in the right direction. But so far as the suggestion of bribery is concerned, I do not believe there is enough money in Toronto or Montreal to bribe or to buy the Progressive Party. They are supporting the government because they are convinced that the government's policy approximates what they themselves advocate and support.

I am at a loss to understand the point of view of our protectionist friends. In one breath they claim that protection has been the settled policy of Canada for nearly fifty years and in the next breath they virtually complain that the country has been ruined because this government has kept that policy in force. They declare that the Liberal government, just as the Conservatives have done, has carried out a policy of protection. Well, if there has been protection what in the world more do they want? If the Liberals have administered a policy of protection why should hon. gentlemen complain? During the regime of Sir Wilfrid Laurier the country was more prosperous than it has ever been in its history, and this hon. gentlemen must admit. They say of course that Providence was responsible. Well, certainly Providence was partly responsible, because Providence is always on the side of the right. And it is a pretty good thing to belong to a party that has Providence on its side.

My hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) was rather tilting at a straw man this afternoon, it seemed to me, in his denunciation of free trade. I do not believe that you will find very many people in Canada to-day who believe that a policy of absolute free trade is possible in this country. We all realise that with the tremendous burden which the war has entailed, and with a policy of protection already in force in Canada, under which considerable industrial development has taken place, involving a great investment of capital, absolute free trade would be an impossibility and a hardship. At the same time, however, there are industries in Canada the capital invested in which would have served a better purpose had it been used in the development of some of our natural resources, instead of being employed in the production of goods from raw material imported into the country. Western Canada of course is not asking for any policy of protection. We realize in the west that we have to place our goods on the markets of the world in competition with the products of the world. You cannot protect the grain grower, the stock raiser or the dairyman on those western plains. It is impossible.

A great deal has been said about the dairy industry. If any fiscal policy adopted by this government endangers the splendid export trade in butter that Saskatchewan has built up, I would oppose it; and if the imposition of a duty of three or four cents a pound is going to force the home consumer—the labourer, the mechanic and everyone else—to pay that much a pound more for his butter than our surplus production fetches in the markets of the world, I would oppose it, for I do not think it is fair to charge the home consumer more that is obtained in the markets of the world. There is the falsity of protection right through, there is the weakness of the protective policy, it charges the home consumer a higher price for his commodities in the home market than can be obtained for them in the markets of the world. You cannot produce goods cheaply under such a condition as that, and Canada, with her enormous natural resources that must be turned into manufactured articles and sold on the markets of the world, can never meet foreign competition when the labourer and everyone else engaged in their manufacture are handicapped by high cost of living. That is where the shoe pinches the western man.

Not that we are opposed to manufacturing. There is no thought of opposition in the western mind to manufacturing industry. We want to see factories everywhere. But we do not think it is necessary that we should pay from 25 to 35 per cent more for goods manufactured in Canada than our brother farmers across the line pay for similar goods manufactured in the United States. Let me give an illustration of what that means. There is no man in Canada that gets greater service out of a moderate priced truck or automobile than does the western farmer. As a rule he is a considerable distance from the post office, the general store and the repair shop, and this rapid means of transportation saves him a great deal of time when probably despatch is very important to him.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): Does the hon. gentleman know that his predecessor in Regina, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), voted last session against the reduction of duties on automobiles?

Mr. DARKE: I did not know it, and I am not politician enough to excuse wrong-doing or mistakes, not even on the part of my own government or any member of my party. If the hon. gentleman did that, I think he made a mistake.

Mr. CLARK: Was he guilty of wrong-doing?

Mr. DARKE: Perhaps that is overdoing it a little. I will amend that, and say he made a mistake. I do not think the hon. gentleman would be guilty of wrong-doing. The Canadian farmer pays from $250 to $300 more for a Ford car manufactured at Ford, Ontario, than the American farmer pays for a similar car manufactured at Detroit, Michigan.

Mr. CLARK: Does the hon. gentleman say that the Canadian farmer pays $250 more for a Ford touring car at Ford than the American farmer pays for it at Detroit?

Mr. DARKE: Yes, it costs more to the Canadian farmer for a car manufactured at Ford, Ontario, than the American farmer pays for one manufactured at Detroit, Michigan. The duty is 35 per cent.

Mr. CLARK: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend,—

Mr. DARKE: It is all right.

Mr. CLARK: —but I know he would like to be correct. To-day I happened to look up that very matter, and the difference in price does not exceed $150. It may be that the cost of transportation and taxes make up the difference in the list prices.

Mr. DARKE: I think there has been a reduction recently. The $300 difference, of course, would be for the sedan car. At any rate there is a duty of 35 per cent, and the point I make is that the Canadian manufacturer of Ford cars raises his price to the actual amount of the tariff. Now, did it cost that much more to manufacture the car in Canada than in the United States?

Mr. CLARK: Will the hon. gentleman admit that it does cost more to manufacture the Ford car in Canada than in the States?

Mr. DARKE: No, I am not prepared to admit that it should.

Mr. CLARK: Just one more question. Realizing that in the Ford factory in Detroit twenty-five cars are turned out to every one at the Ford factory in Ontario, does the hon. gentleman still persist in thinking that proportionately it would not cost more to manufacture that one car than it does to manufacture one of the twenty-five?

Mr. DARKE: I will give my hon. friend the proof of my contention. The Ford Motor Car Company of Ford, Ontario, was incorporated in 1905 with a capital of $125,000. Not a dollar of new capital has been put into the company since. In the meantime the company paid in cash dividends $11,000 on each $100 share, and that stock to-day is worth $25,000 a share. I ask hon. gentlemen: Is that fair? Those are figures that cannot be disputed.

Mr. CLARK: The hon. gentleman has asked a question. Does he realize that since 1913 the price of those cars has been reduced by nearly 43 per cent, and the price of labour has risen about 200 per cent?

Mr. DARKE: This statement was published in the Financial Post in the edition of late August, or September. I wore out the clipping in my campaign in Regina and it did very good service. The western men would not object so much to a tariff if the manufacturer would not raise the cost of his protected goods to the level of the tariff. If he would say to the western farmer: "We want a tariff to hold your market but we shall not raise the price to the last dollar that the tariff allows," there would not be so very much complaint. But you can rest assured, if the Canadian manufacturer persists in taking advantage of every dollar of that tariff, the western purchaser or any man of common sense will prefer to buy the imported article, knowing that the twenty or thirty-five per cent he has to pay in duty goes into the Dominion treasury to help pay taxes rather than in the form of excess profits into the pockets of the manufacturer. That is the whole situation.

The western man has no objection to industry; we want industry and we are glad to see it thriving. It does my heart good every time I come east to go through Montreal, Hamilton and Toronto and see those immense buildings being erected there. I know western Canada gives assistance in erecting those buildings and I do not begrudge it, but I say: Play fair with that great producing country to the west, the greatest market the eastern manufacturer has anywhere in the world; a market that is continually developing—because it is only in its infancy. The people of the east do not realize the asset they have in that western country. Last year western Canada produced about 400,000,000 bushels of wheat—one article alone. People talk to us about the home market—a home market for 400,000,000 bushels of wheat! How many people would you have to have in Canada to consume that quantity of wheat at an average consumption of six bushels for each man, woman and child? You would require about 70,000,000 people. If we are given a fair chance we can add to the production of western Canada each year more than sufficient to feed the population of Canada. Let me give some figures taken from a very reliable pamphlet issued by the W. Sanford Evans Statistical Service of Winnipeg. Some of the older members will remember Mr. Evans; at any rate hon. members know of him and will regard anything that appears over his signature as thoroughly reliable. I am sorry I have not his 1925 statement, but I will have it in a few days. Speaking of the increase in production from 1920 to 1923, this pamphlet states:

> From 1920 to 1923 there was added to the area under field crops of all kinds in the prairie provinces 7,623,490 acres. . . . The increase over 1920 was 25.2 per cent.

That was at a time when most people in Canada thought we in the west were barely holding our own, a time of very serious depression in the agricultural community. The article continues:

> On this added crop area alone, at average yields, the prairie provinces could feed all Canada with wheat, potatoes and all other vegetables, including peas and beans, and grow all the rye, flaxseed and buckwheat Canada now raises; or, in the alternative, it could fill the total consumption demand for wheat of London, New York, Paris and Berlin.

That was only the increase from 1920 to 1923. What is the use of talking to western men about home markets? It is utterly absurd; the thing does not exist.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) came to Regina during the last campaign, and we are always glad to have the right hon. gentleman come west. We rather like him personally although we have not much use for his policy. His coming west is of great assistance to us during election times. I am perfectly safe in saying that his campaign speech in the Stadium in the city of Regina added at least 500 votes to my majority; so that naturally we are very glad to have him come west at election times. However, he submitted a proposition which the Hon. Charles Dunning called a horse trade; in other words, he said in effect: If you people in the west will agree to a higher tariff on manufactured goods, we shall give you protection on farm products. We looked the animal over and we concluded that he was blind, broken-winded and spavined in both hind legs, so the hon. gentleman took the animal over the Rockies into British Columbia and worked him off on the people of that province. I do not know just what British Columbia will gain by the "critter," I am sure; but I would advise the people of that province not always to take an attitude antagonistic to the prairie provinces. The prairies constitute the best market they have in the world for many of their products, and there is no reason why we should not work together. One of the bright spots during the depression was the fact that we had an all year ocean port at Vancouver for our grain, and this was certainly very reassuring. Regina is about midway between Fort William and the Pacific, and we are prepared and willing to assist British Columbia in getting any equalization of rates in order that a portion of our grain may reach the markets of the world via a Canadian port. As a grain port Vancouver is of great benefit to us, but it is useless to us for stock shipments as the time consumed in shipping via Vancouver would render it impossible for us to compete in the British market.

I notice that our agricultural friends favouring protection are more candid than many manufacturers. The latter have always attempted to argue that an increase in duty does not increase the cost of goods to the home purchaser, but the dairyman argues in favour of a duty in order that he can charge the purchaser in the home market the extra three or four cents for every pound of butter that is sold in Canada. The hon. member for Kings (Mr. Macdonald)—I am sorry he is not in his seat—let the protectionist cat out of the bag nicely the other night, and it stood revealed in all its cattishness. One of his contentions was that if he had had a duty of ten cents a bushel on potatoes in 1924, he could have charged the western farmers ten cents a bushel more for their seed potatoes when they were already paying $1.50 to $2 a bushel. That was his argument in favour of protection, and that, Mr. Speaker, is the only argument that has been advanced in this House in favour of protection—in order that the home market might be protected. What does that mean? It means that the home market would be protected in order that higher prices might be obtained from the consumer. That is the idea, and that is what we object to, and object to in all sincerity. That policy will never build up a united Canada. That policy has built a wall of separation between western Canada and eastern Canada that is daily mounting. It has got so high now that it takes a man of high vision to see over it. That policy has built a wall between the Maritime provinces and eastern Canada. How much longer can that policy go on if we are to remain a united Canada?

I think the time is coming when we as Canadians will have to sit down together and evolve a policy that will be fair to every part of Canada, fair to the Maritime provinces, fair to the east and the central part of Canada, and fair to the west, and in a spirit of friendship and goodwill we must put a tremendous charge of patriotism under that wall that has been built up and blow the accursed thing out of our national existence. Otherwise, it will shatter confederation into atoms. You cannot go on with a policy of that kind and still have a prosperous and united Canada. You cannot have a united

Canada unless there is fair play all around. The discontent in the Maritime provinces cannot be allowed to continue; the discontent in the west cannot go on. You people in the central provinces have acquired eight-tenths of the liquid wealth of Canada. By the absorption of banks and the centralization of big financial institutions you have now in the large cities of Toronto, Hamilton, and Montreal, eight-tenths of the liquid assets of this Dominion. You control all our principal banks and trust and loan companies. We are not objecting so much to that so long as you realize that you are holding those institutions in trust for the people of Canada. The money is not yours; it belongs to the people of Canada, and is it fair and reasonable when the western farmer or producer wants to borrow a few hundred dollars to finance his crop that he should be charged eight and nine and ten per cent when you have millions to loan for stock speculation in the United States and other foreign countries. You will have to realize that you are holding that money in trust for the rest of Canada, and if you are going to play fair, reasonable consideration will have to be given to the outlying parts of Canada

I want to say a few words, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the Hudson Bay railway. That railway has been somewhat of a bone of contention among the people of Canada for a great many years past. The people of western Canada firmly believe that the road will provide a profitable outlet for our stock and for a quantity of our wheat. Let me say right here that it is not going to deprive the ports of Vancouver, Halifax or St. John of one bushel of grain that can be handled through those ports; there is no question about that. The production of western Canada is going to be so great in the years to come that all those ports will be choked. Vancouver was practically choked this fall with about fifty million bushels; they will have to add to their facilities. Not much more than forty per cent of the wheat that goes east goes through the port of Montreal. We have to have an outlet, and unquestionably nature intended the Hudson Bay to be the outlet for the western plains. If this were a new project, if we were asking the country to spend twenty or twenty-five million dollars on an absolutely new enterprise, there would be some reason for turning us down and saying it would be impossible at this time to consider the matter. But the government of Canada year in and year out have promised to build this road. They have had it investigated. I have in my hand a report that was made by a committee of the Senate and presented in this House in 1923. I also have a few extracts from reliable men that I wish to quote:

As far back as 1744, Mr. Dobbs, writing on conditions in the bay and straits wrote as follows: "It is probable that during the whole winter from October to March there is no ice in the strait to obstruct passage into or out of the bay, for a ship which chanced to be closed up with ice in an inlet, by the breaking of ice got out and came through the strait at Christmas without finding any ice in the strait to prevent her passage."

Col. R. H. Webb, present mayor of Winnipeg, passed through the strait in February, 1904, and encountered no ice.

Dr. Robert Bell, F.R.S., credited with seventeen years' experience in northern waters says: "It is impossible that there should be at any time in the twelve months difficulty in navigating the straits for they are upon tide water. . . . . Why, navigation through the straits should be particularly easy, because while there may at times be floating ice, there are no rocks and islands upon which to go ashore."

Captain William Hackland, in Hudson's Bay Company service for 39 years: "Straits never freeze; no reason why steamships should not navigate at any time."

Mr. J. W. Tyrell, geologist, who passed through straits several times, writes: "As to icebergs, they are occasionally met with in Hudson straits being sometimes carried along the north shore by the prevailing current from Davis strait, but they are by no means of frequent occurrence, and not one-tenth as numerous as off the straits of Belle Isle."

Then follows the opinion of Captain Bernier, who has had nineteen years' experience in northern waters, and on whose opinion I place more reliance than on all the rest put together. He says:

The Hudson bay and strait are open to navigation the year around, but as far as the strait is concerned, icebergs block the way in places according where the current into or out of the bay drives them. With wireless stations established so that ships could be directed in their course, the Hudson bay ports would rank amongst the most important on the continent, owing to the very appreciable difference in distance to Europe compared with that of other ports.

In 1924, on his return from the north, he wrote as follows:

The nightmare and terror of the Hudson bay are about passed, and with aids to navigation, wireless, proper ships and proper men, it will be safer than the St. Lawrence, because there are very few shoals and the water is uniform and nearly constant daylight during the summer, which enables a mariner to see around him.

These are not the opinions of some westerner who might be led away by undue enthusiasm; they are the opinions of men of experience, practical men. All that the west is asking at the present time is that the remaining one hundred miles or less be laid with steel and brought into the bay, and sufficient facilities provided in ordet to thoroughly test the practicability of this route. I am satisfied that the additional expenditure necessary would be well justified, for the country has already put $22,000,000 into this enterprise, and surely for the sake of making that investment of $22,000,000 available for earning purposes, we should not hesitate to spend the extra three or four million dollars that is required.

There is no doubt that there is immense wealth in that region. Take for instance, the purchase recently of the Flin-Flon mine, not very far distant from this line of railway. It was sold for close to $4,000,000, and the American company that purchased it is prepared to spend another $20,000,000 on development. Unless the Canadian National railway and the government get busy and get that line into Port Nelson, the Canadian Pacific will be into Fort Churchill first, for they are heading that way as fast as they can. Do not make any mistake; the Canadian Pacific Railway Company do not throw away any money on enterprises of that kind unless they can see results.

Mr. McGIBBON: Is the hon. member speaking with the authority of the government when he says they are limited to three or four millions?

Mr. DARKE: No, I am speaking just as an ordinary business man. I am not in the secrets of the government and do not pretend to know what the government intend to spend; I am only suggesting that amount as being, I think, a reasonable estimate of the amount needed to complete the line to the bay, furnish adequate terminals, and thorourgly test out the road. Already $6,000,000 has been spent on terminals.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is all destroyed.

Mr. DARKE: Oh no, not a bit of it. The work is in perfectly good condition; just as good as the day it was built. A large delegation comprising representatives from Regina and Winnipeg inspected the work last year, and found it in splendid condition. All that is required is to reballast a part of the track, replace the ties, and lay the rails on the remainder of the line to the bay.

I have taken up much more time than I had intended, but I wish to make these few further observations: After thirty-three years' residence in the west I have absolute faith in the future of western Canada. I only wish that more of the people of eastern Canada would come west and see what conditions are there. As a director of the Regina agricultural exhibition I invite hon. gentlemen to come west next year and visit our exhibition. Bring a trainload of your manufactured goods along with you, and meet the farmers of the west. You will find them friendly and open to conviction if you can show that you can produce goods of as excellent a quality as are manufactured elsewhere. Drop off at Brandon, the home of the good Progressive leader, and also at Saskatoon, Calgary and Edmonton. Show the people of the west that you have some interest in them. The west is the finest market that exists in the world, and what we want to do is to try to build up that market in the true spirit of Canadian friendship and patriotism.

Mr. STEWART McCLENAGHAN (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, as a representative of Ottawa I wish, on behalf of my fellow citizens, to extend to hon. members of this House a very hearty welcome to this the capital city of Canada. Coming as you do from all parts of the Dominion we would like you to feel not as strangers within our gates but as citizens of Ottawa, because this, after all, is your capital city as well as ours, and we believe that you share our interest in its welfare, our pride in its beauty, and our desire to make it worthy of this great Dominion. We ask you to convey to your constituents this message, that Ottawa's interests are the interests of the Canadian people, and that anything that tends to improve the architectural and natural beauties of the seat of government is a matter not merely of local but of national concern. We have in Ottawa a city that we are very proud of, and we ask you when you return to your homes to tell your constituents about the beautiful capital that is theirs. We also want you to extol the fine climate we enjoy. We are not ashamed of our winter climate in Ottawa; on the contrary we boast of it. We wish the people of Canada to discontinue the habit many of them have of going south for the winter; we would like them to accompany their representatives to the capital and enjoy the really wonderful winter climate with which we are blessed.

The mayor and the city council have requested me to state that in August next we shall celebrate the hundredth anniversary of the founding of the capital. A great celebration, which is to occupy two weeks, is planned, and we invite every member of parliament when he goes home to talk to his constituents, to tell them about this magnificent city, and try to induce them to come to Ottawa and make our acquaintance. One of the strange things that has impressed me since I entered the House is the fact that every province in the Dominion seems to have a grievance, with the exception of the two old provinces of Quebec and Ontario. They are the only ones who appear to be perfectly happy. I have not heard any representatives from these provinces make any complaint about grievances. On the other hand we have heard all about the woes of the wheat miners of the west, and we have heard all about the troubles, trials and tribulations of Nova Scotia.

An hon. MEMBER: Not yet, only some of them.

Mr. McCLENAGHAN: Yes, we have heard some of them, and I can testify that they were very ably explained. But the point I want to get to the people of Canada is this: I attended a banquet in this city a year ago last spring in celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the birth of the Hon. Thomas d'Arcy McGee, one of the Fathers of Confederation. Now, I happened to take part in the arranging of that banquet, with the result that I read a lot about confederation. As a result of my reading the history of confederation, and after hearing hon. members from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick tell their story, I came to the conclusion, that those provinces had a grievance, a real grievance; and as a representative of the central part of Canada I am going to do all in my power to help them.

Since coming to this House and hearing all these matters it has occurred to me that we shall have to start a second confederation; we shall have to delegate a competent body of men to go through Canada preaching a new confederation spirit. It seems to me that we are not going to get anywhere if there is continual bickering and fighting between the west and the east. The hon. gentleman who preceded me said in one portion of his address that while he was a free trader, yet when it came down to business free trade was a theory, the inference being that from a commonsense view anything else than a policy of protection was scarcely possible in this country. I believe the same idea prevails in the minds of most of the hon. members of this House, but they do not seem to get together. I imagine, however, that if twenty members from the west, including the Progressives, and twenty members from Quebec and Ontario, were to get together some morning and talk these things over, we might arrive at a solution of many of these questions. In this connection let me say that the first speech I ever heard on the subject of protection was delivered by the late Sir John A. Macdonald in the old opera house in this city, and there were a few words in that speech that impressed me most forcibly. The old chieftain during his speech walked up and down the stage, and said: "To get the right idea about the National Policy the people must bear each other's burdens." There is the great underlying idea in a nutshell. Sir John went on to explain what he meant by that. He said. "You people in Ontario may have to pay a little more for your coal, but when you do that you will be helping your brothers, the miners in Nova Scotia. The people of Nova Scotia may have to pay a little more for their flour, but in doing so they will be helping the farmers and millers of Ontario." I wonder if the great men of that time, the Fathers of Confederation, had a broader grasp of this question than we have.

I want you to compare the idea of protection as illustrated by Sir John A. Macdonald with the position taken by the Right Hon. Mackenzie King when he returned to Ontario after his western tour. If my memory serves me rightly, at the first meeting he addressed in Ontario after coming from the west he spoke somewhat after this fashion: "You will have to watch this man Meighen. He has told the people in the west that he is prepared to do everything in his power to help by means of an adjustment of freight rates to bring coal down to Ontario; therefore you people of Ontario want to watch and see that your coal prices do not go up." Compare that attempt to arouse a spirit of antagonism in the minds of the people of Ontario with the breadth of view displayed by Sir John A. Macdonald when he said that we would have to bear each others burdens.

I believe it is necessary that we should all get more closely together on questions of this kind. Those of us in the east are strongly convinced that protection is the policy for this country; there is no question about it. During the election in the city of Ottawa we told the people there were just two planks in our platform. The first plank we put before them was a protective policy for the purpose of safeguarding the interests of the working man and the working woman in this country, as well as the interests of the producer, and for the purpose of preserving the forests, the mines and the fisheries. It was a policy of safeguarding. The other plank was given to us by the people of Ottawa, and I think it was the plank on which we won the election, namely, an absolute want of confidence in the King government. I want hon. members from the west to realize that at the Auditorium here in his own home town the Right Hon. Mackenzie King had one of the largest meetings held in his interest in the Dominion. He did not have as large a meeting as the right hon. leader of the opposition, by five thousand, but it was large enough. At that meeting he said: "I want to get into this next parliament with a clear majority over all. I desire to have a majority of Liberals so that I shall not have to depend on the Progressives." Introducing the English candidate he said, "Here is my friend Mr. Wilson, who entered the Dominion parliament at the same time that I did. We were deskmates together, and got our first inspiration of Liberalism behind the grand old chieftain, Sir Wilfrid Laurier." The next gentleman he introduced was Mr. Chevrier, the then sitting member, whom he referred to as one of the very finest men, a gentleman who had given him great assistance in Ottawa. We Conservatives agreed that the two candidates put up by the Liberals in the city of Ottawa were gentlemen above reproach. We admitted that the Liberals had two strong candidates. Mr. Mackenzie King had lived in the city of Ottawa since 1900; he was known by the people of this city better than by those of any other part of the Dominion. Some of the members of his cabinet have been living here ten and fifteen years. Hon. gentlemen must bear in mind that Ottawa is bilingual and we have a dual seat. The English and French candidates are elected on the same ticket; the elector votes for two candidates. Notwithstanding the fact that this was the Right Hon. Mackenzie King's own home town and that he had two splendid candidates, what was the result? Our whole campaign was conducted purely on policy. We had no personalities. We did not talk about the war in Turkey, about conscription or anything of that kind, because the majority of the votes in this particular riding were English, consequently that kind of talk would not go down. We had to talk straight business, and it was a business election. What was the result, then, in Mr. King's home town, where he and every one of his cabinet ministers were known? We knew them; we saw them driving past in their $8,000 automobiles, and if we did not get out of the way we would be splashed with the mud. The people of Ottawa, knowing Mackenzie King and the members of his cabinet as they did, voted want of confidence in them and turned a majority of 6,000 for the Liberals in 1921 into a majority of about 2,300 in 1925 for the Conservatives. That is something you westerners ought to consider and take notice of.

I have heard some hon. members on the other side refer to William Lyon Mackenzie King, and it sounded something like a high churchman chanting the litany. But we know them all and it does not have any effect upon us. Mr. King is a nice gentleman; we all like him personally, but do not like his policy. The citizens of Ottawa and the citizens of Canada at large claim that the policy inaugurated during the last four years—or the lack of policy—has had a deterrent effect upon business, and that is the reason the people voted against his candidates. They have nothing against the candidates personally. It was a straight want of confidence vote in the King government.

I sat in the galleries when Sir John A. Macdonald was here, and I have heard all the great men in the public life of the country. I am one of the few in this House who had occasion when a boy to talk to the late Alexander Mackenzie, consequently I have seen all kinds of parliaments. I always sat in the men's gallery. I have been watching proceedings in the House for years. The people of Ottawa sit in the galleries, watch the proceedings and listen to the debates, and they generally form their opinion from the knowledge they acquire in that way. The rumour always is that as Ottawa goes, so the Dominion goes. Ottawa went Conservative, and I claim the Dominion went Conservative. There is no question in my mind that the consensus of opinion is absolutely behind our right hon. leader, and what makes me feel so sure of that is the fact that the right hon. leader of our party in the last parliament had a following of a little over 50, but now comes back with 116. The right hon. leader of the government, when the House dissolved, had a following of 117; he now comes back with 101. The Progressives went out with something like 65, and they now return with 24. What would any ordinary man think about that? Would he not tell us that the consensus of opinion of the people of Canada was in favour of the Conservative party and their policy? There is no question about it that the people of Canada are anxious that we should assume the responsibilities of government at the present time.

The Right Hon. Mackenzie King, speaking at the Auditorium last October, made the statement that he wanted to get in absolutely independent of the Progressives. I happened to pick up a clipping from a paper, and it is strange that it comes from Vancouver, dated October 4. It contains the report of a meeting in that city. There were a lot of hecklers present and one of them was heckling Mackenzie King. Mackenzie King stated that the government could have stayed in office—and then a heckler broke in and said, "As long as old Forke helped you," and Mackenzie King replied:

"Old Forke" has given us a lot of help, but he also has given us a lot of trouble. We are asking for a majority large enough to enable us to govern without fear or favour from any party or individual.

How can Mr. Mackenzie King expect to conduct affairs without fear or favour when he has sixteen less followers than he had last session? He is absolutely in the hands and under the will of his master. His master's voice is that of the hon. member for Brandon. That is where the leader of the government sits. You cannot figure it out in any other way. I cannot understand why that hon. member sits on this side instead of going across the floor with hon. members opposite. He should go over there where he rightly belongs, as the actual leader of the government. I hope before the recess is over, Mr. Speaker, you will be good enough to see that the hon. member is given a seat on that side so that we will be able to face him and not have to talk behind his back, as we are doing at the present time. I know there are independent men in the Progressive party and I respect them, but in my opinion there are more independent men in the Conservative party than in all the other parties put together; because when people are good Conservatives they are always independent.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the House adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

Monday, February 22, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

RESIGNATION OF MR. DARKE

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to lay on the table the letter of resignation of the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Darke) which will be published in the Votes and Proceedings.

REPORT TABLED

Report for 1924-25 of the Honorary Advisory Council for Scientific and Industrial Research in Canada.—Hon. Mr. Robb.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONGRESS

RECOMMENDATIONS TABLED

Hon. J. H. KING (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table of the House the authentic text of a recommendation adopted at the sixth session of the International Labour Congress—League of Nations—in 1924, concerning the development of facilities for the utilization of workers' spare time. The proposals contained in this recommendation were considered by the law officers of the crown, and were found mostly to be within provincial jurisdiction. The text of the order in council on these subject matters which was adopted on the report of the Minister of Justice is also being laid on the table.

Copies of this order in council and of the recommendations referred to are being communicated officially to the respective provincial governments.

DEATH OF QUEEN ALEXANDRA

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Leader of the House): Mr. Speaker, I beg to move:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House doth unite with the Senate in an address to His Excellency the Governor General, praying His Excellency to transmit a joint address of both Houses to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, expressing the deep regret and heartfelt sorrow at the demise of Her Majesty the late Queen Mother, in such a way as to His Excellency may seem fit, in order that the same may be laid at the foot of the throne, and that they have filled in the blank space therein with the word "Commons"; and that the Clerk of the House do carry the said message to the Senate.

I will ask my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) to second the motion.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I beg to second the motion, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORTATION OF COAL

SEVEN DOLLAR RATE ON ALBERTA COAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I desire to draw the attention of the government to a telegram which I sent on February 17 to the government of Alberta, to the effect that:

There is danger that the coal rate inquiry under the order in council recently passed may not reach a finding in time for parliamentary action this session, and that any movement of coal would cease should seven dollar rate be suspended in the meantime. Necessity of holding market and satisfying public sentiment and demand was obvious. Therefore recommended that governments of Alberta, Ontario and Dominion guarantee any difference between the seven dollar rate and rate determined by railway commission up to two hundred thousand tons.

I am assured of the sympathetic attitude of the Alberta government. Premier Ferguson has already made public his entire sympathy with the proposal according to to-day's press. I now desire to ask if the House may have the assurance that the Dominion government will co-operate with the two provincial governments in this matter, and immediately make the necessary arrangements with Sir Henry Thornton.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, I think I cannot do better than put on Hansard the wires that passed to-day between the Prime Minister and Premier Ferguson of Ontario. Although I did not see this wire in this morning's papers I understand it appears there:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING,
Prime Minister, Ottawa, Ontario.

Understand that pursuant to order in council passed by Dominion government on application of Ontario and Alberta governments for investigation of coal rates from Alberta and Nova Scotia the railway board has fixed hearing for late in April. Any order made at such hearing will be too late to be of value in relieving coal shortage this winter. If National Railways will pending hearing continue movement coal under present arrangement provincial governments supervision Ontario government will pay one-third out of pocket costs in excess of seven dollars per ton if Dominion and Alberta will each pay one-third. Urgent Ontario consumers have immediate supply. Feel sure you will agree important to encourage development and use of Canadian resources and retain money in Canadian channels. Would appreciate early reply.

G. HOWARD FERGUSON.

To which the Prime Minister forwarded the following:

The Honourable G. HOWARD FERGUSON,
Premier of Ontario, Toronto, Ontario.

Your wire received in which you enquire if the government will pay one-third of the excess cost of the movement of Alberta coal to Ontario pending the report of the investigation to be held by the railway board.

On the 26th of January our government decided to bear a proportion of the excess cost of the transportation of fuel, both east and west, and on that date wired Premier Rhodes to that effect with respect to a movement from his province. We did not notify your government or the government of Alberta on account of seven dollar rate being in effect on the Canadian National Railways at that time.

In the event of the railways discontinuing the seven dollar rate as an emergent situation appears still to exist we will be pleased to contribute one-third of excess cost of movement until the finding of railway board, provided that your government and the government of Alberta will each contribute a like amount.

W. L. MACKENZIE KING.

RATE ON NOVA SCOTIA COAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): Can the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, West Edmonton) now give us the answer which he promised us three weeks ago or, to be exact, on January 28, with reference to the coal situation in Nova Scotia? On that occasion the minister said:

There is still under advisement the matter of the shipment of the 15,000 tons. I have the matter up with the Railway department, and I hope to be able to give hon. gentlemen who are interested and the House generally a definite answer to-morrow.

Will the minister give that answer to-day?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (West Edmonton, Minister of the Interior): I always like to be courteous but I want to draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that I answered that question long ago, when the railway company agreed to increase the 120,000 tons to be banked to 135,000 tons, making an addition of 15,000 tons to be taken from the Princess mine. That was the answer I gave my hon. friend.

Mr. CANTLEY: May I ask another question? Am I to understand that the minister wishes us to consider his reply an answer to my question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: There can be no comment on an answer.

MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS

RESIGNATION OF RIGHT HON. GEORGE P. GRAHAM AND APPOINTMENT OF HON. CHARLES A. DUNNING

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Leader of the House): Mr. Speaker, I desire to inform the House that the Right Hon. George P. Graham has tendered his resignation as Minister of Railways and Canals, and that it has been accepted. I beg to lay on the table the correspondence exchanged between the Prime Minister and Mr. Graham.

I also desire to inform the House that the Hon. Charles A. Dunning has accepted the portfolio of Railways and Canals.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): It may perhaps be premature on my part before having had an opportunity of reading the correspondence just tabled to offer any comment on the announcement of the acting leader of the government (Mr. Lapointe). The event, however, is of such consequence that it seems to call for at least a brief observation. The Right Hon. Mr. Graham has retired, following of course his defeat in the late election, and his resignation is now accepted. I am sure I am not going beyond the demands of courtesy when I say that, aside altogether from the merits of Mr. Graham's defeat in the contest, all of us regret his absence from this House as a fellow member. He has been connected in most distinguished stations for very many years with the public life of this country and has been at all times a popular member of the House of Commons. I stated that my remarks are entirely aside from the merits of the rebuke of the government which was passed by the electors in the late contest, in which rebuke Mr. Graham shared; but I can add this, that if ever there was a defeat of which the causes went to the root of public policy and the demerits of the administration as a whole and were not personal to the candidate himself, it was the defeat of Mr. Graham. I feel that he has taken the right course in offering his resignation and am only sorry that such a good example has not been more generally followed. I again express regret that Mr. Graham has passed from the stage of our public life.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I rise for the purpose of expressing to my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) my deep gratitude for the kind words he has said with regard to Mr. Graham. Mr. Graham is certainly one public man in Canada who has richly earned the affection and respect, I should say the love, of all those with whom he has come in contact. I only hope, indeed I feel sure, that his services to the Canadian people will be continued in some other high capacity.

AUSTRALIAN TREATY

BOUNTY ON BUTTER EXPORTED FROM COMMONWEALTH

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I beg to draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) to an article which appears in Trade Bulletin of February 19 and to ask for some information with regard to the matter dealt with therein.

The Primary Producers News of Sydney, Australia, has the following: As the result of several meetings of members of the Inter-state Stabilization Committee held in Sydney recently, at which the finishing touches were put to the Paterson scheme, Mr. G. Twohill, general secretary of the scheme, was authorized to issue the following notices to all factories in New South Wales:

"I have pleasure in advising that I am instructed to inform you the Australian Stabilization Committee on Saturday last decided to put into operation what is generally known as the Paterson scheme as from January 1, 1926. It is proposed that the levy be 1½d. per pound on all grades of butter manufactured in the commonwealth, and 3d per pound export bounty will be paid on all butter exported irrespective of grade. The 1½d. levy is higher than the 1d. used originally as the basis to illustrate the scheme on the 33⅓ per cent of export. The present day export is considerably more than this, hence to secure the bounty of 3d., a levy of 1½d. is necessary.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that it is hardly permissible to read long articles on the orders of the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Just three or four more lines will complete the item, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would advise the hon. member to reduce his statement to a question and put it on the order paper.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is doubly objectionable when the article read is a telegram sent by the reader himself.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The article in question concludes:

It was deemed absolutely essential to bring the scheme into operation from January 1, and to impose the 1½d. levy owing to the market position in London, where conditions prevailing are very unstable, and as funds accumulate from the levies, the 3d. bounty will be paid.

The question I want to ask the Minister of Agriculture is this: Are the exporters receiving this six cents per pound on the butter that is now coming into Canada?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): May I point out to my hon. friend that according to the statement he has just read that cannot be true, inasmuch as the telegram indicates that they completed the arrangement only a few days ago.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): It dates back.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): My attention has been called to the article which the hon. gentleman has just read. It may or may not be reliable, and in order to make sure the Minister of Finance, I understand, is in communication with the government of the Australian commonwealth to ascertain to what extent it is true. In the meantime our information is that the matter is purely one of private concern and has nothing to do with the commonwealth, although, of course, that does not prevent its being of interest to the Canadian people.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): In view of the coming adjournment may I ask the government a question? Would it be safe for hon. members to make their reservations for the end of the week?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Leader of the House): I would refer my hon. friend to the other side of the House.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Speaking for this side of the House, I may say, without any indication that an adjournment will take place, that I have no objection to the hon. member making his reservation at any moment.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INVERNESS RAILWAY

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I rise to ask whether the hon. gentleman who now represents in this House our newly appointed Minister of Railways would be kind enough to table the two orders in council relating to the Inverness railway. They should be tabled.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Leader of the House): I will direct the attention of the Acting Minister of Railways to the question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who is he?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) will be Acting Minister of Railways until Mr. Dunning enters parliament.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Friday, February 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. C. Elliott for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed motion of Mr. Bird: "That this question be now put."

Mr. STEWART McCLENAGHAN (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned on Friday night I was about to make a few remarks on the question of the tariff as mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, but before doing so I should like first to clear the ground a little. On Friday night the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Darke) spoke of a great barrier being set up between the west and the east, and insinuated that there was a likelihood of grave differences of opinion arising owing to the avarice of the protectionists in the east. A few nights before that the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), spoke of the people in the east looking upon the people of the west as colonials. The hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) speaking in this debate referred to the manufacturers as parasites, bloodsuckers and robbers. Evidently, Mr. Speaker, there is a feeling in the west that there is in the east some sort of a conspiracy antagonistic to the west. Now before we can get this question of the tariff properly before the people of the west, we must try to break down this barrier of misunderstanding that apparently exists. I am not a manufacturer, but I want to say from my experience of some thirty-five years in business as a retailer that I have found the manufacturers of this country, the great big producers, probably the finest class of men in it, and for these gentlemen from the west to have such extraordinary ideas about the ordinary plain business men of the east indicates a very peculiar frame of mind. I have been associated with a great many business organizations and have attended many business conventions, and never upon any occasion have I heard any class of business men in the east, either retailers, wholesalers or manufacturers, reflecting upon the people of the west. We are all proud of the people of the west; we are just as proud of them as we are of our people in the east, because we are all Canadians, and we should approach this question of the tariff purely from a business standpoint I have always felt that the tariff is a question that should be considered purely as a business proposition, and not as a political question at all.

Before leaving this question, I should just like to give the House my ideal of a great manufacturer, and I think hon. members will agree that the majority of the manufacturers in this country belong to his class. Within the last few months in the city of Ottawa there passed from the scene one of the outstanding captains of industry in this country; I refer to the late John R. Booth, probably one of our greatest Canadians. He came to this city a poor man, with just his axe and saw. He started out as a saw filer, then became a mill hand, and eventually started a small mill for himself, and from that small mill there grew the great works that we can see from the parliament buildings known as the John R. Booth industries. I am sure that every member of this House can at once visualize some manufacturer in his own community who has had a similar experience, starting in with practically nothing beyond his own ability and initiative. I believe that ninety per cent of the manufacturers of this country have started from the botton and have worked their way up to be masters of the institutions they control.

I remember hearing the late John R. Booth speak at a banquet held at the Russell House in this city under the auspices of the board of trade. Earl Grey was the guest of honour, and at his side sat the late Mr. Booth and the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. On that occasion Mr. Booth made one of the very, very few speeches of his life. He made only about half a dozen during his whole lifetime, and this was one of them. Here at this banquet, at which probably two hundred of the leading men of the capital were present, each in dress suit, sat at the side of the Governor General of Canada that great democrat, John R. Booth, in his ordinary double-breasted sack suit. When his turn came to speak, he was very, very brief, and the pith of his remarks was this: I want you people to realize, he said, the position of the manufacturer, and to have great sympathy for him, for the manufacturer and the producer is a man whose work should be recognized and who should be sympathized with by every individual in this country. Take for instance the man who goes out into the woods, cuts down a tree, and rolls it into the water. In probably two years it reaches his mill, and is then taken out and put through the sawmill. A part of it is made into paper, another part goes into the planing mill and is made into doors and furniture of all kinds. Such a man, said Mr. Booth—one who is converting the raw material into the finished article—is a great asset to this country. That is the spirit, Mr. Speaker, in which I wish to approach my few remarks about the tariff. I want first to get the members of this House to realize that the manufacturers as a class are some of the biggest men, the broadest-minded men, and the greatest community workers that we have in the Dominion of Canada, or that there are in any country, and when one hon. member says that the manufacturers of this country come whining to the government for certain things, I claim that when they come, they come with a business proposition, and they ask only for what they consider is their right.

I shall speak of the tariff in relation to only one business, and that is the woollen business. I have been mixed up in the woollen business for probably forty years, not as a manufacturer, but as a retailer, handling all kinds of material, and consequently I can speak from experience. The Speech from the Throne says:

> My ministers are of the opinion that a general increase in the customs tariff would prove detrimental to the country's continued prosperity.

That cannot possibly be the case with regard to the woollen industry. The tariff on woollens must be raised in order to induce our manufacturers to stay here and continue in business. The Speech from the Throne also speaks of the appoinment of a tariff board. I have a despatch here from Washington which appeared in the Financial Post, and reads as follows:

[Mr. McClenaghan.]

> Washington.—The plan for a tariff commission outlined by Premier King for Canada does not appeal to those who understand the machinery of the United States Tariff Commission as one likely to succeed.
> The U.S. Tariff Commission serves in the capacity of an expert adviser to the president and his cabinet. As understood here the Canadian commission would not be formed of experts but of representatives of various political and social factions. It would, they submit, not take the tariff out of politics but would merely put it into a political commission.
> If Canada would take a leaf from the experience of the United States in regard to tariff matters, a commission would be appointed to carry on investigations and inquiries in various directions and to give the finance minister expert advice in the framing of his budget as to the effect which certain tariff proposals would have, the extent to which various industries are in need of protection, etc. But if the commission is made a political body it will merely mean that the fight of the tariff will break out in a new place.

I have quoted this, Mr. Speaker, just for the purpose of emphasizing to the government that the business men of this country are hoping that there will not be appointed to this tariff board merely political derelicts, men who were beaten at the last election and are now floating around, but that only outstanding men of ability will be appointed who will give the industrial world a fair show.

Now, speaking about the woollen business I had been buying woollens from the Boyd Caldwell firm of Lanark for thirty years. Last year I had a large contract which required the kind of material they had been making for me for years, but I found the firm had gone out of business. I tried to get those goods manufactured in Canada, but it was impossible. I had to get them from the Old Country. We imported those goods from the Old Country, and laid down here they cost a shilling a yard more, than did the material I had been purchasing from the Lanark firm, whilst in wearing quality they did not approach within 50 per cent the goods produced in the factories here notwithstanding the fact that they cost more. The same experience has been encountered all along the line. I remember the late William Paterson, while he was Minister of Customs, speaking during a budget debate, making the statement: "I am clothed from head to foot in Canadian made garments. The very suit that I am now wearing was made in the town of Lanark at the mill of my colleague, Mr. Caldwell, who is sitting behind me." I venture to say that at the present time there are not 10 per cent of the members of this House, who are wearing garments produced from material made in Canadian factories, the stuff is all imported. All these developments so adverse to Canadian interests have taken place in the last twenty years. Why, in my own place of business and in other establishments whereas formerly 50 per cent of the woollens sold were Canadian, not 10 per cent of these goods sold to-day are of Canadian manufacture. The extra 10 per cent reduction of duty under the British preferential tariff has made it practically impossible for Canadian firms to compete with importations from Great Britain.

In this connection I have a letter that I wish to read. I wrote Mr. Caldwell asking him to give me some idea of the state of the woollen business. Mr. Caldwell is a gentleman who was formerly a member of this House, a Liberal member, and a personal friend of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier when that statesman was alive, and he is well known to a great many people in eastern Canada. The letter in question was addressed to me on January 18, and reads as follows:

In speaking of my own experience, when one of my woollen mills in Lanark was burned in 1917, we were all in a state of high tension to supply the clothing necessary for our soldiers overseas. I gathered all my available resources and rebuilt an up to date factory in the town of Perth, more convenient to the railway than the one destroyed by fire at Lanark. I had faith that if we were successful in the war, the government would recognize the efforts of our people at a critical time, and would do nothing to destroy the investment of any legitimate and useful industry in the country. Unfortunately, my reasoning was not confirmed, for on the change of government in 1921, an extra 2½ per cent preference was given to Great Britain, at a critical time, when all business was upset, and called to the attention of Great Britain opportunities in our market for woollen goods, and again the following year, an additional 10 per cent was granted without investigation as to effect upon Canadian industry especially when the valuation of imported goods was made on the then depreciated currency. It was a hardship to think of closing up our mills and discharging valuable artisans, and see them seeking homes where their work would be appreciated across the line in the United States. As I saw no prospects ahead I closed down all my works and have been waiting to see what is going to be done for this most important industry.

All this has been brought about by the Progressive representatives from the west who were elected as members representing the Dominion of Canada, yet whose minds are provincial, they cannot think only in regard to their own province. It is a common statement that Canada needs population, and great stress is laid upon our efforts to encourage emigration. What employment can we offer? The answer generally is "On the farm". Are we not producing on the farm as much as we can dispose of? Why should we seek to intensify this situation? Must we not develop some other occupation, so that our young men may be able to get work during our long winter months without having to leave the country. Clothing is next to food in importance. It develops our higher intellectual minds and is recognized as a most important profession in any country. Safety in fixed assets must surely be a principle to preserve, and the tariff should be well considered and not treated as a political pawn to catch votes in order to retain power.

Now, that is the opinion of the majority of business men in this country. We want a policy that will adequately protect this and other industries. I am not advocating a policy that will make the rich man richer; what we want is a policy that will give our workmen a chance to live in Canada. The letter continues:

This preference, if it rested on all interests, alike, might not be so objectionable, but many other interests are not affected by it, such as the stove manufacturer, the miller, and many others that might be mentioned, placing on the woollen manufacturer practically the whole load in attempting to express our sentiment to Great Britain, a most unfair piece of business.

There is the opinion of a man well qualified to speak on this subject. As he says here:

I am merely expressing my individual thoughts as a man of over fifty years experience in the woollen business disappointed and distressed to see my investments treated in such a manner for the past four years.

That is the opinion of one of the finest manufacturers that I know of in this country The Boyd Caldwell firm made the best woollen tweeds that were used in Canada. As a man who knows something about the subject I can say that in the case of 75 per cent of the goods manufactured in Canada the clothing was much more acceptable to the people of this Dominion that are the imported goods. They were better calculated to wear, and they were made to suit the climate of the particular district in which they were produced. Consequently the woollen industry is one that should certainly be given serious consideration. I believe that in the last election the late Minister of Immigration (Mr. Gordon) expressed the opinion that this government had not treated the woollen men rightly. I hope that whichever government may be in power—personally I do not believe that hon. gentlemen opposite will be in office very long—it will treat the industrial problems of this country on a purely business basis.

Now with respect to knitted goods. I remember that immediately after the war we were pretty large importers of British knitted goods; Canadian manufacturers, owing to the fact that they had received large war orders, were able to install the very latest machinery, and when the war was over the Penmans, the Ballantynes, and other firms were manufacturing the finest knitted goods in the world. There was no country in the world, not even Great Britain or France, turning out knitted goods that could surpass the goods made by the firms I have mentioned and other Canadian companies. I recall that an agent of one of the greatest knitting firms in Great Britain came into my establishment, and after a consultation with the heads of departments we were able to tell him that we would not give any orders that year. During the course of conversation he said to me "I am having much the same experience all along the line.

I have just been in Montreal and Toronto, and I am very much surprised to find that most of your merchants are able to get all they want from the Canadian mills." Practically, he did not get any orders. But the next year they got the extra ten per cent preference, and they are in here larger than ever. In fact the same agent has a permanent office in Toronto, and is handling the whole of the trade of Canada from the agency there, selling the goods purchased in England, instead of buying goods from the manufacturers in this country. To me it is strange that the government seem to be so anxious to safeguard the payrolls of the artisans in Great Britain instead of looking after the artisans of this country. That is a peculiar situation, and I cannot understand why the government does not treat these questions on a purely business basis.

I turn now to another phase of the question, that having to do with the garment workers, especially in women's apparel. I refer to the French treaty and see what is happening there on account of the peculiar way in which that trade arrangement is applied. The French treaty, entered into so gaily by our treaty makers here in Ottawa, and put into effect in September, 1923, put the finishing touch to the difficulties of the wool cloth manufacturers in Canada. It had two effects. It directly increased the amount of goods made in France and sold in Canada and so replaced goods made by workers in Canadian mills, and at the same time it gave an excuse for Bradford manufacturers, to press for 10 per cent reduction in the duties on cloth from Great Britain. The increased imports of cloth from France under the French treaty, added to the increased imports of cloth from Great Britain, is the last straw. Who can fathom the workings of the minds of those who committed the folly of reducing duties on goods from France at a time when the value of the franc was continually depreciating instead of safe-guarding Canadian workers and Canadian industry by increasing the duties? Sir Henry Whitehead, president of the Bradford Chamber of Commerce, addressing that body in May, 1923, said that they could claim that the 1923 reductions in Canadian duties on woollen goods from Great Britain were solely due to their "direct action." That coincides with what Mr. Caldwell says in his letter, that they were given the ten per cent extra without the knowledge of the manufacturers of Canada.

The low duty rates granted by Canada to France under the French Treaty were put into effect in September, 1923. The total imports of woollen and knit goods into Canada from France in the twelve months ending September, 1923, which preceded the putting into effect of the lower duties, amounted to $1,439,748. For the twelve month periods end-September, 1924 and 1925, the imports from France amounted to $3,246,813 in 1924 and $3,156,234 in 1925, or an average of $3,151,523 each year following the reductions in duties.

Invoices from France are still valued at the exchange value of the depreciated franc for assessing the duty. In other words, the reduction in the Canadian duties doubled the competition from France.

For the fiscal years ended March the importations of woollen and knit goods from France were:

Year	Value
1922	$ 699,838
1923	1,020,122
1924	2,061,935
1925	3,284,976

Here is another Canadian industry in which the merchants of this country are deeply interested, and the principal place of manufacture is Montreal.

Perhaps there could be no better example of the injurious effect of the tariff policy of this government on industry in Canada than what has happened in regard to the importation of women's silk clothing from France.

There are in Canada more than one hundred factories making women's silk dresses. Up until 1921 by far the greatest proportion of the silk dresses and other silk clothing worn in Canada was produced in Canadian factories. In 1921 the value of silk clothing imported from France was approximately $142,000. This was about the time that the fall in the value of the French currency commenced. As the value of the franc went down imports increased as the following statement shows:

Imports of Silk Clothing from France

Year	Value
1922	$187,288
1923	264,958

While it will be observed that the imports in 1925 had increased nearly 500 per cent, it should be kept in mind that these figures are based on the value of the franc at the time of importation and, as the value of the franc dropped from approximately 20 cents to less than five cents, it will be seen that the actual quantity of goods increased nearly 2,000 per cent. As a matter of fact what happened was that a very important industry in this country was practically wiped out.

That this was going on was well known to the Minister of Finance. Deputations, not only from this industry, but from many other industries, pointed out to the government that their business was being ruined, but, owing to pressure brought to bear by the Progressive party, nothing was done. Canada remained practically the only commercial country in the world which took no steps to protect industry against the demoralizing effect of the depreciated European currency.

The effect of this lack of intelligent interest in the industries of Canada was reflected in the functions held within the past few weeks, of which members of this House were observers. At the opening ceremonies of this House and later at the Drawing Room I am told by those who are competent to express an opinion that probably more than half of the gowns worn by the ladies attending these functions were made in France. One way in which hon. gentlemen who may not be familiar with the details of feminine embellishment could select the French dresses from those made in Canada would be by observing that practically every dress which was adorned with beads or other glittering ornaments was French made. The stringing and sewing on of beads, which is largely done by hand, cannot be profitably done in a country like Canada. In France it is done in the homes of the people, is largely carried on by young children and the older women, who, in their spare time, earn a few francs in this way. This work is frequently carried on in homes where poverty and disease exist and can properly be described as pure sweat shop labour. The products of these sweat shops is a pure luxury in so far as Canada is concerned. Even our Progressive friends, I think, will recognize that a tax upon luxuries of this character is more than justifiable. I venture to say that of the ladies who attended these functions those who wore dresses of Canadian made silk and fabricated in Canadian factories were not less attractive to the eye than those who felt that Paris gowns were necessary to show their beauties to advantage. There is no doubt at all that the failure of this government to recognize the demoralizing effect of depreciated currency of foreign countries has led to the ruination of an important industry.

As I have pointed out, work of this particular character cannot be done as cheaply in Canada as it can abroad, primarily because, in most of the provinces of Canada, we have minimum wage laws. In Ontario the minimum wage for women workers in this industry is $12 per week. This is probably more than a whole family of French people would earn in a month. Few, if any, members of this House will take objection to the principle underlying the minimum wage. Particularly, I am sure, no objection will be found by the Progressives, because, in so far as Ontario is concerned, this legislation was developed and extended under the Drury government.

I have referred to the fact that this government failed in its duty in not taking notice of the effect of depreciated currency on Canadian industry. In this regard it will be interesting to observe the attitude adopted in Great Britain, which some gentlemen regard as the home of free trade. I have in my hand an original copy of the instructions to investigating committees under the Safeguarding of Industries Act. These instructions point out that, where owing to unfair competition the products of other countries can be sold at less than similar products produced in Great Britain, steps may be taken to safeguard British industry, and in describing what should be regarded by the committee as "unfair competition" this document in paragraph (5) of section II stated:

> Competition for the purpose of such enquiry is not to be deemed to be unfair unless it arises from one or more of the following causes:—
> (a) Depreciation of currency operating so as to create an export bounty.
> (b) Subsidies, bounties or other artificial advantages.
> (c) Inferior conditions of employment of labour, whether as respects remuneration or hours of employment, or otherwise, obtaining amongst the persons employed in the production of the imported goods in question as compared with those obtaining amongst persons employed in the production of similar goods in the United Kingdom.

But this government, dominated as they were by a desire to retain office rather than a desire to safeguard the legitimate interests of the country, failed in their duty, and allowed this and many other industries to be ruined. Many members do not realize that there has been such a ruinous effect on the dressmaking business of many factories in Montreal and Toronto and that enormous importations from France have been encouraged. It may surprise hon. members to know that at the present time there is a duty of 32½ per cent on importations of silk from France into Great Britain because Great Britain is beginning to realize that she must protect and safeguard her industries. On the other hand, the same article can be brought into Canada under a duty five per cent less than that on importations into Great Britain. That will give the House some idea why the tariff should be treated by experts, by men who are familiar with questions of this kind, so that it may be placed on a purely business basis.

I am now going to speak on a question that has not been discussed very frequently in this House although it concerns one of the greatest businessess we have in this country. For the industry of which I speak it is claimed that it has the largest amount of capital invested; that it employs the greatest number of people; that it pays the largest amount of taxes and that it extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I refer to the retail trade of this Dominion. The condition of the retail trade is one of the best indications of the state of business generally. If the retailers are prosperous, the whole country is prosperous because they are at the point of contact between the manufacturers and producers and the consumers. In 1924 the Ontario government appointed a committee to go through the whole of that province and find out just what was wrong with business because there was a feeling that something was radically wrong. They appointed a committee of the legislature, composed of Liberals, Conservatives, Labour and Farmers. This committee visited every rural community in that province and they reported to the Ontario legislature in the session of 1924. This is what they said about the retail merchants:

4 p.m.

The committee met the members of the Retail Merchants' Association towards the end of November. The trends of the past three years have been decidedly adverse to them. They are competing against mail order business, chain stores and transient traders. High municipal taxes and reduced purchasing power of their customers have involved many losses. (One representative merchant of a town of 7,000 population showed the committee an average mark-up not in excess of his overhead.) The future is less roseate for these merchants than for any other business class. Reasons advanced for legislative consideration in their interest are:

No city, town or village could exist unless it had in it retail merchants carrying permanent stocks of various lines of trade so that the various lines of goods could be secured immediately when required.

In all cities, towns and villages the land and buildings occupied by retail merchants is the most highly assessed, proving that it is expected that they should pay taxes for the privilege of doing business in the municipality, and as they are paying the highest rate of taxation, with a further taxation on business assessment, and income taxes as well, they should not be exposed to the unfair competition of those who pay no taxes whatever or those who pay very little.

Retail merchants located permanently in a municipality can be held responsible for the quality of the goods they sell.

That gives hon. members some idea of the difficulties under which retail merchants labour. At the different conventions of retail merchants held throughout Canada this year this question of the inroads into retail trade in the rural constituencies by mail order houses was taken up and discussed, with the result that at the present time the president of the Retail Merchants' Association, a gentleman from Vancouver, is travelling all over the Dominion and has been recently in Ontario. They are endeavouring to devise some scheme whereby community life will not be disrupted by these large institutions which, except in the few centres in which they are located, pay no taxes to the community, pay nothing for keeping up churches, schools, roads, or anything of that kind, and yet in some cases sell more and sometimes double the goods which the merchants in the community sell. Many men from the west argue that it is a great hardship that the banks are centralizing their business in Montreal and Toronto, and yet in the west the retail trade is developing in the same way. In a number of places where there were formerly ten or fifteen merchants, there are now only a couple, and all those merchants get to do after the mail order houses have taken the cream of the business is done on credit. If the old order of things were in force and the merchants had the same prosperity that they had in years gone by and enjoyed the support of the wholesalers who have been put out of business by the same mail order institutions, we would not hear so much talk about rural credits because people in the rural communities would be able to get credit from the merchants as they did in the early days. To-day those merchants are either bankrupt or they cannot get credit themselves.

The people do not understand the extent of the business that is being done by the retailers. It is estimated that at the present time there are in Canada approximately 140,000 retailers, men who are engaged in the distribution of merchandise to the local consumer. It is estimated that last year these men distributed more than $4,000,000,000 worth of merchandise. This figure has been arrived at by taking the value of goods produced in Canada, adding thereto the value of goods imported, subtracting therefrom the value of goods exported, and adding approximately 20 per cent for distribution and operating costs of the distributors. On this basis, taking the population of Canada as 8,500,000, the consumptive power of every man, woman and child would be approximately $476. In view of the estimate which has been made of the retail trade in the United States amounting to a little over $45,000,000,000, with approximately 100,000,000 of a population, and as their consumptive power is, proportionately speaking, a little less per capita than in Canada, I believe this figure is quite correct.

Compared with the volume of business which is being done by the merchant class, no other part of our commercial life is more important, and yet each factor is of such importance that one is absolutely dependent upon the other, in volume of trade however, that of retail distribution being probably the greatest. In Canada the value of manufactured products last year amounted to $2,500,000,000, and the value of agricultural products to $1,600,000,000 including the value of dairy products. The value of goods exported from Canada to the 30th September amounted to $1,170,000,000 and the imports to $853,000,000, total trade of a little over $2,000,000,000, or about half the value of the goods distributed by the merchant class in this country. This great industry, the retail trade of the Dominion, is handling practically all the goods both domestic and imported that are distributed among the buying public, yet not one cent is expended on it by any government department, although I understand the Department of Agriculture costs the country about $6,300,000 annually; the Department of Labour, and the Department of Trade and Commerce also involve heavy national expenditure. These departments look after the farmers, the workingmen and the manufacturing interests, but to-day there is not a single department at Ottawa to which the retailers of this country can go for help or information. And yet these people do probably the biggest business, pay the greatest volume of wages and have at stake the greatest investment of any of those engaged in the various activities of this Dominion. That is one reason why the retailers at their recent convention came to the conclusion that it was necessary for them to put their case before the government.

In order that hon. members may not be under the impression that this is purely a local affair, I beg to lay before them a few letters from the secretaries of some of our provincial retail merchants associations. These letters, I am confident, will give the House some idea of the serious inroads which the mail order houses are making on the retail business of the Dominion. The first letter I am about to read is from the secretary of the Manitoba provincial board of the Retail Merchants Association of Canada. Under date of January 22, 1926, he writes to me:

In reply to your letter of the 4th.

The mail order houses, such as the T. Eaton Company and Robert Simpson Company, are taking business out of every municipality in western Canada by catalogue without paying a dollar for the right to do business other than what they pay as a business tax in Winnipeg and Regina. The Winnipeg business tax for the T. Eaton Company is 6⅔ per cent on their annual rent, or about $10,000 for the mail order end of the business.

As an example of what some of our country merchants pay to do business after paying taxes on their homes and store property, a merchant at Steinbach, south of Winnipeg, told us he paid $800 on his stock in trade. He did $63,000 business that year. In other words, he paid about 1¼ per cent on his sales. It is estimated that the T. Eaton Company do out of here about twenty million. Their rate for business tax would be about one two-hundredth of one per cent. Everywhere we have it put up to us, "Why not make these people pay on the same basis as we have to pay? They enjoy the same privilege that we do. They get business here; that is all we get. We pay, but they do not."

The prosperity of the Dominion of Canada rests in a large measure in the communities, in their business, social and moral welfare. Any system that lends itself to breaking down community life is dangerous to the body politic. Take away the life of the community and you endanger the life of the nation. These people are not community builders, they are money-makers—they have an object in view—they are achieving that object. They are undermining local business, they are destroying local opportunity, they are taking away the confidence of the customer in the local merchants. They have the people believing that they sell cheaper, but some goods are being bought from them at a higher price than they could be bought for at home.

I should like the House to get this point:

You ask me to suggest something that would benefit the retail trade of Canada. Do what you can to establish a retail department within the Department of Trade and Commerce, devoted to the interests of efficiency in the distribution of merchandise in Canada—some department that can champion the cause of the local retail merchant, the backbone of every progressive community.

We do not want any special post office rates. We rather want the mail order houses to pay their way. We want uniform conditions for all, special privileges for none. We are entitled to no more, we should receive no less.

The following letter is from the secretary of the Saskatchewan provincial board of the association. Saskatchewan is where all the wise men come from, so this should be good reading:

Acknowledging your letter of January 4, we beg to advise you that in our opinion mail order houses furnish the keenest competition which our country merchants have to face, and this competition is without doubt the cause of many merchants in this province going out of business. We fully recognize that the business of catalogue houses is perfectly legitimate, but the consensus of opinion throughout this province is that mail order houses should contribute in some measure to local taxation in the districts in which they do business.

There are many districts where the mail order houses do more business than the local merchant, contributing nothing whatever to the upkeep of the community, schools, churches, roads, and so on; moreover they take the hard cash out of the district, leaving the merchant a credit business. As the mail order house business increases, and it is increasing year by year, we believe the government will be forced to take some action in the matter unless they wish to see country districts depend entirely upon mail order houses and hawkers and peddlers to supply their needs.

We would like to point out to you that the country merchants are not increasing, and we would also particularly point out to you that the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian National Railways publish pamphlets containing lists of business opportunities. They mention hundreds of different points showing that general stores, grocery stores, blacksmith shops, garages, drug stores, etc., are needed at those points. They accept no responsibility for this but these pamphlets are compiled from enquiries they make from the people in the district and retailers are invited at the request of the community to invest their money in opening up, say a general store only to find that 50 per cent of the business in the community goes direct to mail order houses or to hawkers and peddlers.

It would appear that the purchasing public are friendly disposed towards both catalogue houses and peddlers, but at the same time they do desire to have the country merchant with a good stock within an easy distance so that they can patronize him when they do not happen to have the ready money to deal with the mail order concerns.

My third letter is from the secretary of the New Brunswick provincial board, thus showing that the condition extends right across the continent and affects this vast number of retail merchants. He writes to me under date of January 6, 1926:

Replying to yours of the 4th instant, please note that the mail order houses are on the broad road to putting 90 per cent of the country stores out of business, as well as having a most demoralizing effect upon the stores of our towns and cities, from the fact that the mail order houses are cutting prices on standard lines and freight and expressage is paid on parcels over five dollars from these mail order houses.

The new post office regulations are, we believe, more beneficial to the mail order houses than to the local merchants. Our only suggestion for protecting our local merchants in small towns, is the price maintenance plan, which will stop prices being cut on standard lines, and the proposed legislation, which we are working on at the present time, of taxing mail order houses a certain percentage on the amount of money they receive from each town, city, municipality or county.

One instance of unfair competition is the fact that the Canadian National Railways issue passes to the families of employees and the ladies take these passes to go to Moncton, because Eaton's are cutting on standard lines of groceries, cottons, threads, etc., and it naturally pays them to go to Moncton when they don't have to pay railway fare.

We will send you a copy of our proposed legislation regarding the taxation of mail order houses as soon as same is received from our solicitor.

They are trying to have a bill put through the legislature of New Brunswick with a view to remedying this unfair condition. He adds the following postcript:

Since Christmas, four firms in St. John have failed and are in the hands of the receivers. Three of these firms were members of our association and the other was a prospective member.

That somewhat offsets the talk about our "great prosperity". Now let me give the House a letter from the president of the association. He is a prominent Liberal of Vancouver and is now in Ontario. I might say that the Retail Merchants Association of Canada has no politics. I am president of the eastern Ontario branch, and my vice-president is the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Goulet) who is sitting on the other side of the House. It will be seen that we are pretty well distributed so far as our political affiliations go. The president wrote me on February 16, 1926, as follows:

In answer to your enquiry I would say that, as a result of a resolution passed at our last annual convention in Vancouver, B.C., I arranged to make a tour of Canada, to personally discuss the cause or causes of complaints, made to our association, of unsatisfactory trading conditions.

Accordingly, this tour of investigation began early in September at Victoria, B.C., and up to this date (February 12, 1926) I have visited every chief centre almost without exception in all provinces from there to Quebec city.

In the smaller communiites particularly the outstanding cause for complaint was mail order competition for two reasons:—

1. By adopting a policy of featuring well-known branded goods at ridiculously low prices, the impression is created that all mail order goods are sold on the same value basis.

2. Mail order houses take business from the community and make no return in kind as a community contribution as is made by local merchants in various ways.

Based on information obtained from all quarters I am of the opinion that retail trading conditions are most unsatisfactory not only to the trader but to the public in general, and that it would be in the best public interest for the Department of Trade and Commerce to investigate these conditions, in an effort to improve trading conditions and standards of retailing, in order that domestic distribution could be established on a better basis, to the ultimate advantage of producer, distributor and consumer.

That gives some idea of the feeling that prevails throughout the country to-day in connection with one of our biggest businesses, a business that has never been discussed in this House. Now, the farmer goes upon the principle that the bawling calf gets the milk, while the motto of the merchant is to suffer in silence. If the merchant begins to cry about bad business, inside of twenty-four hours the banker jumps down upon him; if the banker does not catch him the wholesaler does, and if the wholesaler does not get after him and he keeps on talking about bad trade he is pretty soon confronted with the landlord. The moral is therefore that, however bad business may be, the merchant must always take the view that it might be worse. This was the advice given to me forty years ago by an old Scotch merchant. On asking me how business was at that time and hearing my reply that it was pretty bad, he said, "Tut, tut! Never say that. Always say, if business is bad, that it might be worse." And that has been my motto ever since; the merchant should always be optimistic whether he feels so or not.

I want now to show that there has been a certain falling off in relation to the Post Office Department. That department, whether it knows it or not, is contributing to the general decline in revenue. I have no intention of reflecting on the Postmaster General, the Hon. Senator Murphy, whom I regard as one of the best members of the cabinet to-day and who has been one of the most efficient administrators of the Post Office Department. But the facts I shall bring to the attention of the House are important. On September 5, 1925, the Post Office Department put into effect a radical change in the parcel post system of Canada by increasing the limit of weight carried by the post office from eleven to fifteen pounds. When this change was made the rates were fixed on the heavier parcels in proportion to the rates previously in effect on the lighter weights. For example, taking the case of a parcel mailed from a point in Ontario to a point in Quebec, we find that whereas the rate for five pounds was 38 cents, six pounds 45 cents, seven pounds 52 cents, eight pounds 59 cents, 9 pounds 66 cents, ten pounds 73 cents and eleven pounds 80 cents, under the new rates twelve pounds cost 87 cents, thirteen pounds cost 94 cents, fourteen pounds cost $1.01 and fifteen pounds cost $1.08.

This increase in weight was of great advantage to the chief users of parcel post, that is to say, the mail order house. On October 1 postmasters were notified of another important change which notification, however, was not given to the public until October 24, or just five days before the election. In this change great reductions were made in the rates and at the same time another fundamental change was made in our system. Instead of rates increasing from pound to pound, making fifteen different rates, according to weight, for any specific destination, the fifteen pounds were divided into five scales of three pounds each. What I want to point out particularly is that whereas, after the increase in the weight limit, to ship a twelve pound parcel from Ontario to Qubec cost 87 cents, under the new schedule the same parcel can be shipped for 65 cents. A thirteen pound parcel heretofore cost 94 cents and is now carried for 75; a fourteen pound parcel which cost $1.01 is now carried for 75 and a fifteen pound parcel which was carried for $1.08 is now carried also for 75 cents. In view of the fact that for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1925, the operation of the Post Office Department had shown a deficit of nearly $1,300,000, what justification was there for a large reduction in parcel post rates? In order to answer this question it might be well to inquire who was to benefit by lower parcel post rates. There is no doubt that among the chief beneficiaries will be those concerns which carry on a mail order business. It is an interesting fact, which may of course be only a coincidence, that practically at the same time as these low rates were going into effect the chief executive officers of the two largest mail order houses in Canada issued certain documents. I have in my hand copies of statements made twelve days before the election by Mr. R. Y. Eaton, president and general manager of the T. Eaton Company, and Mr. C. L. Burton, general manager of the Robert Simpson Company, Limited. Perhaps it was not the intention of those who issued these statements that they should be regarded as political documents. Nevertheless they were seized upon by Liberal newspapers from one end of Canada to the other and used to assist in the election of Liberal candidates. While, as I have pointed out, these gentlemen may not have intended such documents to serve the Liberal party, they had very good reason to make a thank-offering for benefits just received. These articles were published respectively in the Toronto Star of October 16, 1925, by the Eaton Company and in the same newspaper of October 14, 1925, by the Simpson Company.

I would point out that it is rather dangerous turning the mail order business into express transportation. It is injurious to the express companies in this country, and I refer here to the National Express. It is significant that in the United States, where the weight has been increased to something over fifty pounds, the average loss in the Post Office Department in the last five years has been $54,826,400 a year. This would show how important it is for governments to exercise care and caution in dealing with a matter of this kind. I have brought this matter before the government in order to see whether something cannot be done to get the Department of Trade and Commerce to function so that it may be of service to the 140,000 or 150,000 merchants throughout Canada, because I believe that when the people become aware of the fact that this class of our citizens have never up to the present time received any consideration, although they have always cheerfully paid the fifty-seven varieties of our taxes, they will be given a fair show. I hope the government will see its way clear to look into the question of retail distribution and give to the great mass of the retailers proper treatment.

Mr. A. J. ANDERSON (Toronto-High Park): In this, my first attempt to address the House, Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to ask your indulgence as well as that of hon. members while I endeavour to place my views before you. The debate has been rather protracted and our friends across the way have shown an inclination to charge us on this side with obstructing. This is the point to which I wish to address myself at the moment. We were brought here early in January after the government had had over two months at its disposal in which to put its house in order. The government assumed on and after October 29, although its ranks had been decimated, that it had the confidence of the people and of parliament, and had therefore the right to continue in office. Hon. gentlemen opposite called the House to meet on January 7 and, presuming to function, they presented to parliament an Address through His Excellency the Governor General. They knew nevertheless, as events since that time have shown, that there were doubts as to whether they could continue to administer the government, and from the outset they intended to take such a course as would in all probability necessitate their asking for an adjournment sooner or later. Early in September the previous parliament was dissolved and the government advanced reasons why it should appeal to the country. The election was fought on those reasons and in the province of Ontario there was no doubt about what the issue was. Protection was the one vital issue before the country. Our fiscal policy and subjects allied thereto were prominent in the various discussions, not only in the constituency which I represent, but in other ridings in the province of Ontario.

When we assembled here on the 8th of January we naturally expected to have presented to us a Speech from the Throne along the lines of the reasons given by the Prime Minister for the dissolution of parliament in September last. The government were not under the necessity in September, 1925, of going to the people at all. The life of that parliament had still over a year to run during which the government could have continued to function, but the Prime Minister said that he had very grave reasons for going to the country a year or a year and a half prior to the lapsing of the lifetime of the last parliament, and the reasons he then gave are rather interesting in view of what has happened since. He had carried on the government of this country for four years with the assistance of our friends to the left, and he stated very plainly in his election manifesto that on all large questions he had had a big majority and was able to carry on. Then where was his fear? Why did he not continue for the lifetime of that parliament? Where was the necessity for going to the country? The Prime Minister gave as his reason that he wished to be free from the necessity of depending upon our friends to the left, the Progressives, and upon the other groups in this House, that such a situation was irksome to him; he disliked it and wanted to get away from it; he felt he was under their domination, and he asked that the situation be cleared by a general election. It was certainly no compliment to those groups that had been supporting him for him to take that position. It was ungrateful in the extreme. It showed that he had no confidence in them. It also showed that he himself felt that he was not free to go on and legislate as vigorously as he would like. Apparently he wished to bring in certain legislation on which he was not likely to have the support of the Progressives and the other groups who had been giving him their support for four years. Otherwise, why did he wish to go to the people at all? He even mentioned the matters on which he wished to be free from that alliance and in regard to which he required the extra strength increased numbers would give to his own ranks.

Well, he went to the country, and he came back with reduced numbers. Still he felt that he had the mandate of the country to carry on, and the very first thing his supporters did when the House met was to present a resolution in which they asked the House to express confidence in the government—and when I say the government, I mean the Liberal party, and the government chosen from the Liberal party, and none other. I say that the presenting of that resolution was in itself an evidence of weakness. That motion not being pressed, for reasons that were given at the time, the debate on the Address then began and continued for some weeks. In regard to that debate the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Darke), who has I believe within the last two days tendered his resignation from this House, speaking on Friday night last said that he had been very much pleased with the character of the earlier part of that debate. I suppose it was to his liking because during the earlier stages of the debate the Liberals were taking part in it, but the hon. member was not so pleased with the latter stages of the debate because, I presume, the debate was then left to this side of the House. Whether it was that hon. gentlemen opposite could not debate, or did not want to debate, is a matter for them to decide, but in any event the hon. member for Regina was not pleased. Up to two weeks ago the debate had been carried on alternately by the various parties in this House. I do not think anyone could be charged with obstruction there. I consider, Mr. Speaker, that not only has every member of this House a perfect right but it is his duty to express himself in regard to the matters dealt with in the Speech from the Throne, as well as matters that it does not touch on but which he thinks should be contained in it.

In the midst of that debate the Liberal party, through the cabinet and the government, admitted their weakness by asking for a six weeks' adjournment, and that, Mr. Speaker, is the real cause of any obstruction there may be in this House. I did not come here from Toronto for the purpose of adjourning after three weeks' debate. I made all my arrangements with a view to sitting here continuously till the business of parliament was finished, and when the motion for adjournment was placed before us I felt that a great injustice was done not only to myself but to many other hon. members who were similarly placed, and naturally the reasons given for that adjournment were closely looked into. For a considerable time no reasons at all were given why we should adjourn. Later on the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) told us that the condition of the government was precarious, and that it was necessary to appeal to the country for the purpose of reconstructing the cabinet. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the formation of the cabinet is a matter for the Liberal party alone. The government is composed of members of the Liberal party alone, and only the Liberal party is consulted. The members of the cabinet are not chosen from the Progressives, Independents, Labour, or any other group in the House. Cabinet reconstruction is a matter purely political, and solely for the Liberal party to decide. Then why should we who are not consulted at all in the construction of the cabinet have to adjourn the House simply for their convenience? I submit that the adjournment was asked for merely for the purpose of enabling the Liberal party to strengthen their weakened ranks.

I do not know that it is any compliment, in fact, it is no compliment, to the 101 members who have been elected to this House on the Liberal side that the premier and his advisers in the cabinet did not see fit to reconstruct the government from among the members already elected. On the Liberal side there are 101 members who had gone through the general election and won their right to sit in this parliament, and surely if cabinet ministers had been chosen from among them they would have had no difficulty in going back to the people and being re-elected. I submit that it was only fair and right that the Prime Minister and his nearest advisers should have taken that course, and taken it as early as they could. They may say in reply: We could not open constituencies. But that has been done in the past, and members have sat in this House as a result of situations of that kind arising. It was open to the government to do it. They could have strengthened their ranks before the 7th of January. However, they did not see fit to do that. A vacancy did take place by death between the holding of the election and the summoning of parliament. A resignation has taken place since the opening of parliament, and the Prime Minister has been elected to a seat in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): My friends from Saskatchewan seem to be pleased about that. I do not begrudge them any satisfaction they may feel, because during the last six weeks I fancy they have felt very much at a loss for somebody to lead them, and that is no compliment to the Minister of Justice and other ministers who have been endeavouring to lead the party. Certainly hon. gentlemen opposite seemed to experience great relief when the news came from Prince Albert that their chief had been elected, and they are welcome to all the enjoyment they can get out of it.

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that as it has been possible since the 7th of January to fill positions in the cabinet in the way they have been filled, why not follow that up with other resignations in order to elect ministers? As a matter of fact the Liberal party have come to that conclusion. The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Darke) spoke here on Friday night. To-day I understand his resignation is in the hands of the Speaker, the hon. gentleman having vacated his seat, according to the morning papers, to provide a place for Hon. Mr. Dunning. The holding of this by-election justifies the position that hon. members on this side took—that there should be no adjournment for the purpose of filling vacancies in the cabinet, that if the government were afraid of losing their majority in this House they could fill these vacancies one by one. But the government seemingly had no particular fear when they were sustained by a majority of three on the occasion of the first division. On the contrary they were so well satisfied with that small majority that they considered themselves justified in holding on to the reins of office. Under the circumstances why do they not open up two or three more constituencies and proceed at once with the reconstruction of the cabinet? I can see no good reason why they should not do so. We on this side strongly take the ground that we are not responsible for any obstruction that may be occurring here. As I said before I can only speak on behalf of my own constituency, and in taking the stand I am taking I consider I am only performing the duties for which I was sent here. That is a perfectly legitimate position to take, and in assuming that position I do not for a moment consider I am guilty of obstruction.

What has been presented to this House except the Speech from the Throne? The Speech itself is a very meagre proposition. It is but a small meal composed of but one particular fare. Instead of giving us an entire meal the government have only given us a very limited portion. It is not the meal they intended to serve up when they went to the country in the first week in September, not by any means. In fact what the government have submitted to us does not appear to be part of the original meal which they contemplated at all. An entire change in their plans has been caused by the vote cast on October 29. As a result of that vote the Liberal party came back to this House with a membership of 101 instead of 116, and their friends to our left have come back with a membership of only 28, including the Independents and Labour representatives, instead of 66. That result changed the whole situation for the government. The Liberal party not the government—I am going to put it that way—assumed they had the right to hold on to the reins of office. They assumed that in doing so they would have the assistance of these other groups. I am not going to use the word "purchase" in this connection, Mr. Speaker, as that term has been ruled out; but in order to get the support they needed the government placed in the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General a Speech which would naturally appeal to the Progressives, the Independents and the Labour representatives, a speech promising to deal with subjects upon which they were determined to secure some legislation. The members of these groups have some hope of getting the legislation which they favour, which is going to be beneficial to themselves and themselves only, owing to the weakness of the government. Had the Liberal party been as strong in their own right as they wished to be when they caused parliament to be dissolved, the Speech from the Throne would not have been in the form in which it is to-day. It is in that form simply because of the weak state in which the government find themselves as the result of that election. But the government need not have limited themselves merely to indicating in the Speech from the Throne matters of legislation. They could have brought down the estimates, they could have nominated the standing committees and those committees might have been functioning; they could even have introduced bills for the House to consider. We are prepared to go on with the work of parliament; and speaking for myself, had the government, when the motion to adjourn was first introduced, said they were prepared to introduce legislative measures, or bring down the estimates, or work of any kind, I would gladly and willingly have helped them in every way I could. But I will not be a party to a motion to adjourn this House to March 15, or any other date, in order to help the Liberal party with their electioneering programme. My contention is that we were brought here to do business and we should do the business which the country needs instead of adjourning.

The question naturally arises, why did not the government bring down estimates or measures of some kind so that this House might get to work? To this question several answers can be given but I shall limit myself to one. They knew that without their leader, and in their weak condition, they were unable to bring down any constructive legislation for us to consider. That is the truth of the matter. I make that statement regardless as to whether it pleases or displeases hon. gentlemen opposite. They are inefficient, incapable, and afraid. And they are not certain that they are going to continue in office very long; for the moment they bring down legislation that does not meet with the approval of the other groups upon whom they depend for support, that moment they will be in the same position as they were on October 29. The government have been told very plainly by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), by the Labour representatives, and also by the Progressives, that they will receive the support of these groups only so long as they bring down legislation of which they approve.

The Liberal party—and when I use that term I refer to the old party that used to boast of their strength and their brilliance in the days of Sir Wilfrid Laurier—are reduced to this humiliating position; they are going round with hat in hand to the various groups indicated and saying "Please help us out, we cannot do anything ourselves, we are inefficient". That is the position in which they are placed before the country and I make no bones about expressing that opinion. The people of Canada ought to be made fully aware of the pitiable position in which the government stand. I hope the public press will be instrumental in spreading this news far and wide throughout Canada, so that the people will realize how the government are holding on to office without any right, setting aside all proper precedents and making their own precedents, too timorous to allow His Excellency the Governor General to commit them to any very definite undertakings. It is no answer for them, when taunted with the weakness of their position, to say that the right hon. leader of the Conservative party could not carry on any more successfully than they. He should be called upon to form a government, and in the event of his failure to obtain the confidence of the House he could appeal to the people who I am convinced would sustain him. Sooner or later it will come to that, and when that time arrives our Liberal friends will find they are in a minority. They may think that the Progressives are strongly with them. But the Progressives are as conscious as they are that the weakness on the Liberal side is going to be the downfall of that party and of the parties who are co-operating with them—and I hope it will be within a few months rather than a few years.

In reference to the reconstruction of the ministry, I am not very particular who is put into the cabinet; that is a matter for the Liberal party. If they have not men of ability among their 101 members who are capable of handling the departments, it is a reflection upon the electors of the respective ridings as to the character of the men they send here to do the business of the country. I do not know any reason why Mr. Marler, Mr. Massey, Mr. Dunning, Mr. McDougald or any other gentleman whose name has been mentioned in connection with the vacant portfolios should be brought in as departmental administrators and members of the cabinet. Mr. Marler was unable to carry his constituency in Montreal. He went down to defeat, as did three other protectionist Liberals. The name of Mr. McCrea was mentioned in the debate the other day. He ran in Sherbrooke, Quebec, and was defeated, as has been pointed out, largely because he was a protectionist Liberal. There is no particular mourning over his loss, and there is no particular desire to get him into parliament. There is a desire, however, to get Mr. Marler in, who, as I have pointed out, could not carry the constituency in Montreal which he represented for some considerable time. Mr. Massey never has been in this House. He is a man without a home; he cannot get a seat in Toronto or in fact in Ontario. Whether he will get a seat in Saskatchewan where the Prime Minister had to go is a matter for the government to decide; I cannot tell. He is a man without home or friends, yet he wants to get into the government and the government want to bring him in, believing he would be a source of strength to them. Why do they want Mr. Massey? Is it because he has very considerable means, or because he has administrative ability? If his administrative ability is to be taken into consideration, I do not know where it is. The institution which is the basis of the wealth that Mr. Massey and his family enjoy is one that was built up on the protective system in this country, and it is flourishing to-day because consideration was given it in certain fiscal changes that were made in such a way as to benefit that particular concern. In other words, that institution has been the subject of a certain degree of consideration and favour which has enabled it to function and to make a good showing. That opportunity has not been afforded to other manufacturers in Ontario or in Canada generally; and I do not know that there is any very great credit to be given to Mr. Massey. If it had been urged that the credit was due to Mr. Bradshaw, the general manager of that concern, I would have been inclined to agree, because he is a man of very considerable executive ability and should have got the credit. I am not particularly interested in getting Mr. Massey into the House.

Why do the government not open the constituency of North Waterloo, and let the present member for that riding appeal to the people with a view to his inclusion in the ministry? His name has been mentioned. Why do they not open West Middlesex for the gentleman who moved the Address in reply? These gentlemen are men of ability who could presumably go back to their constituencies and be re-elected without much difficulty. But probably not—and perhaps that is the fear; I do not know. Why should any other member resign? Why should the former member for Regina, Mr. Darke, resign in order to bring Mr. Dunning in? The hon. member for Regina felt the necessity of speaking to this House on Friday, because he would have fallen into oblivion if his name had not appeared in Hansard at least once. What will he get for it? I cannot say. Perhaps something will be said about his resignation being purchased, but as the Speaker has ruled against using the word "purchased" in that way I shall be careful to keep within the rule. But the people of the Dominion are very apt to look at the matter in this way: what is there in it for Mr. Darke? Why was Mr. Darke not appointed Minister of Railways? The man who occupies the position of Minister of Railways enjoyed the confidence and good-will of the people of Canada generally. He was a very estimable man. We may differ from him on some political matters but everybody feels that the Right Hon. Mr. Graham was a credit to the House and to the country. He was one of whom everybody spoke well. But does he come within the category referred to by Lloyd George when he said, "When everybody speaks about a politician in a creditable way you must take it for granted that he is a back number?" I would be awfully sorry to think that that applied to the Right Hon. George P. Graham. I do not think it would at any rate. But the government are regarding him as a back number and treating him with ingratitude. If a safe seat could be obtained for him in Canada, he is the man who should have the position of Minister of Railways. Why does the government give the portfolio to the man who is at present Premier of Saskatchewan? I suppose the object is to reinforce the debating strength on the other side of the House, which is no compliment to those who are sitting at present on the other side of the chamber.

Reconstruction of the cabinet is a purely political matter, and I am not going to assist the government in any way in regard to it. I propose to stay here as long as it is possible to discuss public questions. I am not physically able to do very much debating myself, nor am I in a position to supply the necessary information to do it. But I will stay here as long as possible in order that the representatives of the people assembled in parliament will be forced to function in some way.

The Speech from the Throne is a meagre bill of fare. Far from being national in its character, it is purely sectional. It has been framed purely and simply with the object of appealing to the agrarian vote of the prairie provinces of Canada. When you read the Speech and follow up the discussion in this House on the Address you will be convinced more and more that the object is as stated so forcibly by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), in his forcible manner. The matters referred to in the Address are not objectionable in themselves; they are proper subjects of legislation, but it seems to me that a great many other matters which should properly be considered in parliament are not mentioned here. For that reason I say the Speech is not national but sectional and limited.

[Mr. A. J. Anderson.]

My conception of the Speech from the Throne is that it should foreshadow all the legislation the government intends to deal with, matters which the government feels are of prime importance to the country at large and which should be dealt with at the session of parliament in which the Speech is delivered. It is not necessary to mention the particular matters in detail, but the Speech from the Throne should foreshadow as matters of policy the things that should be attended to at this session of parliament. The Speech from the Throne which is now before us, however, is absolutely devoid of policy. A reading of the various paragraphs of that Speech should convince anyone that the government are at sea. They are unable to state what should be stated. They do not know what they want to do; and they are simply bidding for support.

The first clause of the Speech from the Throne gives expression to some platitudes, congratulating the House on the favourable character of the conditions prevailing in Canada. It talks about prosperity. I do not know all the elements that enter into prosperity, but as we pass along the streets to and from our places of business from day to day, certain conditions are apparent to us. The best evidence of prosperity, to my mind, is the distribution of the wealth of the country in such a way that all parts of the population feel the beneficial effects of it. At the present time it seems to me that prosperity is limited largely to those to whom the Speech from the Throne is addressed, namely the Progressives, the agrarians from the prairie provinces. These people may be enjoying prosperity as a result of the kindness of Providence during the last two or three years, although I will give them some credit by saying they are enjoying it probably also as a result of their attention to their own agricultural affairs.

In this discussion about prosperity something has been said as to the large amount of exports and imports and the great increase of trade that Canada has experienced in the last two or three years. Something has also been said about the considerable amount of money that has accumulated in the banks and the trust, mortgage, and insurance companies. That is an evidence of prosperity. It has also been said—quoted, I think almost unconsciously, from a statement credited to Sir Wilfrid Laurier—that if there is prosperity you will find it jingling in the pockets of the people. If that were carried to its logical extreme we would find very little jingling, because there is no jingling in the pockets of a great part of our people, and that is the best evidence that prosperity is not with us. Unemployment is too prevalent to justify our saying that prosperity is here. I represent a constituency which depends absolutely upon industrial, manufacturing, railway and mercantile activities, and which has nothing to do with agriculture except to the extent that any other big city or urban centre has. The western part of the city of Toronto was first formed as a divisional point on the Canadian Pacific and the population there has largely developed as a result of that section being a railway centre. About seventy per cent of the 42,000 people in that section are dependent for their wages, salaries and income upon manual labour or clerical employment. The people in my riding are dissatisfied on account of the extent to which unemployment is rampant in that section of the city, and so long as that condition exists, so long as that jingling does not take place in the pockets of the people, just so long will prosperity not be there.

During the last election my constituents were placed in rather a peculiar position. My opponent was the former Minister of Labour, a representative of the Liberal party, who came before the constituents of High Park as not only the nominee of the Liberal party, but as a labour man, as one who rose from the ranks of labour. To his credit it may be said that he rose from the ranks of labour—from railway employment; indeed, from a very humble position—to probably the highest position the railway men have in their gift. Because of that he was given prominence in a political way and he expected to get the support of the labour people and the railway men in that constituency. He appealed to them on the fiscal policy that is supported by the Liberal party in this House; but what was the result? His policy was regarded as that of the Liberal party which had produced the condition of unemployment in High Park and which was producing so much distress and hardship, and he was very properly repudiated on the 29th day of October last. The policy that was presented by your humble servant was one of protection in order to safeguard the industries of the constituency and of the country and, in doing that, to protect the wages of those who depend upon employment for their livelihood. That position was sustained.

I am quite in accord with my leader that protection, is the proper fiscal policy for this country. Established in 1878, it has gone on continuously. It may be it has not always been the most stable; it has been tinkered with; it has gone up and down, and this has created uncertainty in the minds of those who have capital to invest. The fact that the Liberal party are wavering and have wavered during the last four years in connection with the administration of the fiscal policy of Canada has brought business to the condition in which it is at present. I am not necessarily anxious to see the tariff made as high as some people say it should be, probably as high as it is in the United States. I do not care how high or low it is so long as it gives proper protection to the industries of our country. I want the protection to be sufficient to protect our industries, to protect not only our people who have money invested, but our people who want employment, so that everyone can feel the full benefit of it. Our friends on the left have frankly said that they do not consider it necessary that we should have high protection, or indeed any particular protection. The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Darke) the other night rather qualified that by saying that although he felt free trade was the proper policy for the west, he believed a protective policy was the proper thing for this country under present conditions. That was an admission which I did not expect to get from him, but he made it, and in that he is only frankly stating what I think is in the hearts of many in this House. I had a conversation with one of the members of the Progressive group and if he were free to express himself as he would like; if he were free from the conditions under which he is sitting in this House and the position in which he finds the three parties here, I believe he would seriously consider some scheme whereby protection would be given to industry not only in his own province but in the other provinces as well. There is no reason under the sun why in the prairie provinces, just as in every other part of the Dominion, the natural resources should not be protected in their fabrication into manufactured articles. I believe the agrarians will come to realize the necessity for that.

At the present time the chief natural resource of Alberta is grain; but it is not the only natural resource of Alberta, neither is it of Saskatchewan nor of Manitoba. Let me take the province of Alberta first. Its other great natural resources—coal, oil and gas—are all factors that enter into the production of power, and sooner or later that province will find it necessary for its own economic existence to make greater use of those particular resources than they are now doing. One of the chief natural resources that I have mentioned is coal—and incidentally I may remark that the Speech from the Throne is absolutely silent respecting any national fuel policy.

This is not only of interest to Alberta, it is also of interest to the other provinces, particularly Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia and Alberta have brought their complaints respecting the transportation rates on coal to the attention of this House. The province of Ontario has recently gone through a serious fuel shortage. Quebec has not said much about her fuel supply. But undoubtedly we should have a national fuel policy, for it is neither a transient nor a sectional question. In Alberta no doubt a very considerable amount of coal is not of merchantable quality, but if industry of the proper type and in sufficient volume were established there, a great deal of this non-commercial coal could be used economically to produce electric energy.

I think in the near future we shall find manufacturing industry established in Alberta on a large scale, and then it will come home to those who represent the people in this House and in the local legislature that they should give it greater attention. In Saskatchewan probably they are not as well provided with other natural resources besides coal, but this form of natural wealth could be developed there just as well as in the neighbouring province of Alberta. I believe that within the next twenty-five or thirty years Alberta and Saskatchewan will have such a greatly increased population that manufacturing industry will become quite as important as agriculture. This being so, it seems to me that we might as well begin now to foster manufacturing industry by protecting it against undue competition from United States and other foreign countries. For manufacturing industry cannot be built up in a day, it takes many years; its foundation is adequate protection. When Alberta is asking the rest of the Dominion for particular privileges and concessions by way of railway rates, lower tariff, and so on, it seems to me it is only fair that the people there should do something towards advancing the welfare of the other provinces. The province of Ontario is an industrial province. True, our agriculture is very highly developed and, unlike that of the prairie provinces, is not confined to grain growing; it is mixed farming, and it depends practically wholly on the home market for its success. The farm products of Ontario are almost as great in value as those of the western provinces. But rich as Ontario is in her agricultural resources, I believe its future depends not so much on the foreign market as on the home market, not only in respect of the products of the farm but of the factory. I believe it will develop more and more along the lines of the great republic to the south of us—industrially. This must be so in the very nature of things.

The Speech from the Throne says in general terms that there will be no increase in taxation so far as the tariff is concerned; but that does not necessarily mean very much. True, it is an indication to the Progressives that duties on the commodities they are chiefly interested in are not going to be raised. Of course it does not follow that there will be no variation of tariff duties in response to pressure brought to bear upon the government by its Progressive supporters. But I for one do not think that the Progressives have any great reason to look for much consideration along that line. We in Ontario frankly admit that we want an adequate tariff, and I see no reason why our fellow-Canadians in the western provinces should not consider our needs as well as their own. We in Ontario have been longer engaged in the task of nation-building than our brothers on the prairies. To-day they are represented in this House largely by agriculturists, and they have very frankly told us that they are ready to support anything that will build up this nation. That being so, they are concerned in something wider than the interests of agriculture alone, of buying everything as cheap as they can and selling their products as high as they can. We, in Ontario, are not so largely dependent on the foreign market as are the people of the western provinces. We rely mainly on our home market, and this is affected by the fiscal policy of the United States. In other words, we need protection for our agriculturists and our manufacturers from undue competition from the other side of the line. We have not yet been able to achieve mass production, and until our population has increased very considerably we cannot expect to manufacture on anything like the same scale as is possible in the United States. Therefore there is all the more reason why we should so shape our tariff policy as to adequately protect our manufacturing and other intersts from the undue competition of their rivals on the other side of the line. We adopted our national policy in 1878, and since that time agriculture has prospered, and its wonderful development under protection is a sound reason for continuing a protective policy and so shaping it that our manufacturing industry may be adequately protected from the competition that I have described.

I hold no brief for the manufacturers. I am not in the manufacturing line, being neither the owner of nor a shareholder in a manufacturing establishment. Neither am I engaged in raising farm products. But I am interested in a population of which seventy per cent are dependent upon industry. Those people get their daily living as the result of a prosperous manufacturing industry, and if that industry is not on a solid basis, of course those people cannot carry on. They are the people amongst whom I do business, they are the people who pay my fees and give me a living. In other words, I am speaking rather from the standpoint of the labouring man, the wage-earner, the salaried man, than from the standpoint of any other class in the community.

Now, we find in the Address two matters particularly mentioned, both of especial interest to the west—rural credits and the Hudson Bay railway. Ontario is not clamouring for rural credits, and I am informed by representatives of Nova Scotia that there is no agitation in that province for such a system; nor have I heard any request from British Columbia or from Quebec. There has been no clamouring in New Brunswick, either. There is an agitation in the three prairie provinces for rural credits on the ground that they are not getting money as cheaply or as easily as they think they should. I would suggest that the representatives from those provinces consider for a moment what the people of Ontario and the older provinces had to go through in years gone by when they were pioneers; and the prairies are at present more or less in a pioneer state. They may think that they have gone beyond that stage in their development, but in my opinion they are still pioneers. Certainly their outskirts are still in the pioneer condition. I do not know that there is much difficulty in the most thickly populated districts of the prairies in the matter of securing credit, although I may be wrong in that regard. But so far as the rural districts in the prairies are concerned I should imagine that they are going through now the same stage which the earlier settlers in the province of Ontario had to experience. To-day there is no difficulty in Ontario because there is security to be offered for any credit asked. And security is the basis of all credit. Rural credit in Ontario is just as good as mercantile credit. Any farmer in Ontario who owns a farm and has any particular interest, any equity of redemption in the concern, and who owns any sort of farming equipment fully paid for, has no difficulty in getting all the money he requires either from loaning companies or from banks to enable him to carry on. And he gets it at rates that are perfectly legitimate and fair. The general rate of interest in Ontario to-day is lower than it has been for some time; for in the city of Toronto any amount of money can be obtained at from 6 to 6½ per cent. Not long ago it ran to between 7 and 7½ per cent on first-class realty securities, but now the rate is as I have stated. To-day all our financial institutions are in possession of very large amounts of money uninvested and are seeking for opportunities of investment; and the moment the western provinces attain the position of being able to offer security for the loans they ask they will not encounter any particular difficulty in obtaining the money they require.

Mr. CAMPBELL: There is little difficulty in securing money in the prairies; the difficulty is in the rate of interest.

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): Well, the rate of interest depends on the security offered. In Ontario, if you go to a loan house, a mortgage company, a bank or a private individual and present security that has in it, not the elements of true security but something that involves a risk, then the institution or the individual will say, "I will take your risk, but I want a certain rate of interest." If, however, you can offer substantial security there will be no difficulty in getting a reasonable rate of interest. I do not know what the government has in mind or what our friends from the west propose in regard to the rural credit system which it is intended to bring into force, but I notice according to a statement in the Toronto Globe—and I am not saying that the Globe speaks for the government—that the federal act will provide that loans made under the new system shall rank second only to taxes as a charge against property. No doubt the newspaper in making that statement had some idea of what the government proposes to do. The rural credit scheme which is proposed is apparently some form of loaning by the federal government to the provinces or to those people in the provinces who desire to borrow money. So far as I am concerned I am going to hesitate long before giving my consent to any proposition by which the government will enter into the lending of money, whether it be to rural or to urban inhabitants. That is not one of the functions of government.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Let me point out to the hon. member that the group in this section of the House have never asked the government to advance money directly to the farmers. Indeed, we are opposed to that principle. We are merely asking that the government provide the necessary legislation to allow us to pool our own securities and thereby secure better rates.

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): I am glad to have that statement from the hon. member. If the proposal is merely to pass legislation to provide for the formation of something in the nature of a land bank or some system by means of which securities may be pooled, as the hon. member suggests, then I am prepared to give such a proposal fair and honest consideration, the security being always understood.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is not in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): The hon. member says that that is not in the Speech from the Throne. True; and it is for that reason that I have criticized the proposal. But the member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) has made a suggestion to which I am not averse. I am prepared to give that proposal fair and reasonable consideration. As a result of my investigation into rural credits elsewhere I do not think that the system of government loans to individuals would be satisfactory. The federal government in the United States had a system some time ago of giving assistance directly to the farming community for the purpose of establishing rural credits and it was found to operate unsatisfactorily. To-day the system in vogue there is the operation of land banks, and that is rather along the lines of the suggestion put forward by the hon. member for Mackenzie. In the United States the banking system is different from ours; ours is the branch system, and theirs the unit system. The farmers and others who wanted credit from these small unit banks found it difficult to get the money they required, and it was proposed by those interested that the banks should form an association, each one taking a certain amount of stock and probably the government securing a block of stock also. The association would be practically the same as a company in this country, and it would extend loans to the farmers, taking security from them on their property, the company issuing bonds and selling them in the open market and getting cash in that way together with such money as they might already have on hand. Under this system they could make loans to the farmers at reasonable rates. But everything has not been well with the system and in the United States the experience has been unsatisfactory. I have a statement made by the manager of the National Trust Company of Toronto in his address to his shareholders at the last annual meeting, when he took the view that in this country if the trust companies, the mortgage companies, the banks and the money lenders were given the same status as that indicated in the statement I have quoted from the Globe, namely, that the securities would be a first charge immediately after taxes, then there would be no difficulty in people obtaining loans. In the course of his remarks he says:

> When in 1916 rural credits were heralded by the farming community of the United States, especially that of the west where the agitation for them was most pronounced, they were expected to prove a panacea for all ills. "Dear money" was said to be the cause of all ills, while "cheap money" was to be the cure-all. In less than ten years the farm loan boards of the United States have put out one and a half billions of dollars in mortgage credits—true, at lower rates of interest. Yet, notwithstanding this the farmers in the middle states of the United States are to-day again greatly discontented with their conditions. "Cheap money" has not been a panacea, and they are now calling upon the United States government for relief in some new form. It has been said on more than one occasion that so far as the extension of credit is concerned, the farmers of this continent have not suffered from the want of credit, but rather from the over-extension of credit.

That seems to be the trouble. I cannot get away from the idea that if in the west the lender had the same security and the same means of enforcing payment as he has in Ontario, the western farmer would not find it difficult to get the funds he wants at the price he wants. However, it is a matter I am not averse to consider if the proposal brought down is along the lines of the land banks of the United States.

Denmark is often quoted as a country where low priced money can be obtained by the farming community and the people generally. The position of Denmark is also discussed by the president of the National Trust Company, who very concisely says:

> In the Supplementary Report, dated the 30th of March last, the following appears:
> "In all countries of western Europe, capital is obtainable (for agricultural purposes) at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent, and current money at similar rates."
> This is not in accordance with the information I have received from western Europe. The two countries of Europe in which money on mortgage can be obtained most cheaply are Denmark and Holland. In Denmark, where money is somewhat cheaper than in Holland, the borrowing is mainly done through Danish credit associations. Extended reference to these associations is made in the reports. A borrower on becoming a member of these associations pays an initial charge of 1½ per cent. He then gives a mortgage to the association at 5 per cent interest. The association, however, does not pay him the amount of his mortgage in cash, but as the report points out, pays him in bonds of the association. These bonds are now issued to bear 4½ per cent interest, although when money was cheaper the bonds were issued at lower rates. The borrower has to sell his 4½ per cent bonds in the open market. They naturally fluctuate in price like any other security. I have before me a cable advising that the bonds were quoted in Denmark on January 21st, at from 85 to 87 cents on the dollar. It would therefore appear that a borrower in Denmark who in the third week of last month borrowed $1,000 on mortgage upon which he agreed to pay 5 per cent interest received, not $1,000 in cash, but $1,000 in 4½ per cent bonds, for which he realized from $850 to $870 only in cash. This you will see is a substantial discount which the borrower has to suffer and absorb over the period of his loan. I might point out that last summer the 4½ per cent bonds of the Danish credit associations were selling at from 78 to 80 cents on the dollar, so that the borrower who had to sell his bonds then suffered a still greater loss in discount. I would also point out that the borrower has the right to redeem his mortgage debt in bonds. But here again the price he has to pay for them depends upon the market prices at the time he buys. In view of the facts I have given, it woulld seem obvious that the borrowings of the Danish borrower are costing him more to-day than 5 per cent.

If we are going to establish a rural credit scheme we shall have to be very careful to avoid getting into the rut the Americans and Danes have got into. We want to get away from the unfortunate position in which Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Ontario have found themselves, in trying to provide the farming community with cheaper money. As to the province of Manitoba, the Ontario Loan and Debenture Company, in its annual report dated February 10, 1926, states that the Premier of Manitoba estimates that of $3,000,000 advanced by that province, the loss already sustained is twenty-five per cent of the total, which loss will have to be paid by the people of Manitoba in additional taxes. It goes on:

The cry is still more credit. Those claiming rural credits are moving their base of operations from the province to the Dominion. The trouble in the west has been too much credit on the security available.

Apparently they think that the further they move from the present scene of operations the better they will fare. I am willing to put it on the one and only safe ground, the ground of security. I think it is up to the prairie provinces to see that the laws in those provinces are put in such shape that the man who lends on first mortgage will know he is getting a security where only the municipal taxes are ahead of him, just as it is in Ontario. Until that is done I do not think you can expect anything better. It is up to the people of the west to go to their own provincial legislatures and see that the laws of those privinces, if they are not in such shape already, are put in such shape that the lender will be properly secured and can enforce payment if he has to.

I believe that Saskatchewan has also had some losses. In Ontario I do not know that the losses have yet come to view, but it is perfectly apparent to those who have had anything to do with this form of lending that political influence is very apt to creep in. When a borrower wants a loan he naturally goes to someone who seems to have influence with the party in power, thinking that the party will use its influence with the board that has to do with the lending of this money, and in that way loans are advanced which should not be advanced, and greater advances are sometimes made than should be made upon the security offered. When the government brings down its legislation on this matter I am prepared to give it reasonable consideration, but if it is in the shape of a loan to the farmers along the lines I have mentioned, I hold myself free to oppose it. The Speech from the Throne does not give us to understand exactly what the form of the legislation will be, but it rather gives one the impression that it will be in the nature of a loan rather than of legislation creating land banks or some other organization to give credit.

Now a word as to the Hudson Bay railway. I have no doubt this is a question of very great moment to the representatives from Manitoba and Saskatchewan. It does not appear to be of such great moment to the representatives from Alberta, if I understand their position correctly; nevertheless they are sympathetic to the proposal because they feel that that part of the country is going to benefit as a result of the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. I am prepared to stand behind the leader of the Conservative party in the position he has taken on this question, although I do not think that position is one which appeals too strongly to the people of Ontario. The people of Ontario are strongly of the view that the railway is not going to be efficient, that it will not do what is expected of it. It is regarded in Ontario as doomed to failure, that it will not bring about the splendid results the western provinces claim for it. The people of our province share the views of a prominent citizen of the province of Alberta, Dr. McGibbon, professor of political economy at the University of Alberta, who very recently was asked to address a convention of the Agricultural Society of Saskatchewan. In that address he discussed the Hudson Bay railway, and expressed disbelief in the commercial feasibility of that route. I quote the opinion offered by him:

His contention is that there would be a short open season, coming at a time when export trade was slack; that this would make the overhead charges unduly heavy for maintaining such a route, that only vessels of 17-foot draft would use the port and insurance rates would be too high.

That is the opinion expressed by a professor of political economy after making a complete study of the subject. He is a western man, and I place his opinion against that of Captain Bernier the authority quoted the other night by the hon. member for Regina. Personally I am inclined to accept the view of Dr. McGibbon, unless it can be shown reasonably clearly in this discussion—

Mr. HOWDEN: Do you think the opinion of Dr. McGibbon should be placed alongside that of a man like Captain Bernier, who has spent half his life in the far north?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): Yes, I do, for this reason: Dr. McGibbon is a professor of political economy. His duty is to study the economic questions which affect this country, and he has been studying them from the standpoint of Alberta. On the other hand Captain Bernier is an explorer. He goes through those northern waters in a vessel suitable for making exploration, not in a commerical vessel adapted for the carriage of grain to the markets of Europe.

Mr. BROWN: Where would Dr. McGibbon get his information on this subject?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): I have no doubt he had before him the very evidence that Captain Bernier has given with respect to this matter. However, Dr. McGibbon, as a professor of political economy, would arrive at his conclusions after due consideration of every report he could possibly get. He would not form his opinion from any shallow investigation, but after a proper consideration of every particular feature that might have been presented to him in regard to the subject. I would far rather accept the opinion of a man who had made such a thorough study of the question than the opinion of Captain Bernier.

Mr. HOWDEN: May I ask the hon. gentleman another question?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): Yes, but speak out so that I can hear you.

Mr. HOWDEN: Does the hon. gentleman know that the Hudson's Bay Company for the last one hundred odd years have imported the goods they needed into Canada by that route, and exported their bundles of furs in the same way, in preference to the more southerly route?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): I do not know anything about Dr. McGibbon further than that he is reported to have made, before a convention of the agricultural societies of Saskatchewan, the statement I quoted. He was invited to address that convention, and the gentlemen responsible for extending the invitation to him must have had some respect for his ability and his judgment or they would not have asked him to address them on the subject. I accept what Dr. McGibbon said, and the fact that he is professor of political economy in one of our foremost Canadian universities gives me ground for believing his report and relying upon it.

Mr. HOWDEN: I was not talking about Dr. McGibbon but about the Hudson's Bay Company.

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): There is the trouble. I have some difficulty in hearing in this House, and if I have not answered the hon. gentleman's question directly it is because I did not catch its exact terms.

Mr. BROWN: If the hon. gentleman is relying so much upon the opinion of a professor of political economy let me say to him that most authorities on that subject are in favour of free trade.

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): Are they? That may be, but this opinion by Dr. McGibbon is dead against the Hudson bay proposition.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would the hon. member rather entrust his life and property, if he had to go on such a trip, to Captain Bernier or to Professor McGibbon?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): I would trust my life rather to the man who arrived at his judgment, as Professor McGibbon did, after a profound study of the subject. Professor McGibbon studied not simply the reports of one man, but all the reports he could collect and he has given us his well-considered opinion. Captain Bernier is an explorer, and is prepared, like any other adventurer, to take a chance—the chance I would not take. Professor McGibbon is not taking chances, and I, as a citizen of Canada, am not going to take any chances. I do not want to disparage Captain Bernier; he is doubtless a Canadian of whom we ought to be proud, but he is an explorer and as such would take a risk that you and I would not take. I do not doubt that hon. gentlemen opposite or hon. members to my left would not feel like going to the Arctic ocean and running the risks that Captain Bernier has run, personally I am comfortable enough here. I would rather rely on the studied judgment of a professor of political economy in the province of Alberta than I would on Captain Bernier.

So far as the Hudson Bay railway is concerned, a certain amount of money has already been spent on the line, and the people of the western provinces want the project extended to the bay. I am prepared to meet their wishes to the extent of building the road to the bay rather as an experiment, because we have already spent something like $22,000,000 on the work. My idea is that if we were justified, even to only a small degree, in spending $22,000,000, we will be justified in making a further expenditure of three, four, five or even six millions to extend the line to the bay and find out whether or not the project is any good. But the moment the enterprise is shown to be not feasible or not practicable I shall hold the Liberal party and the Progressives accountable for the advice they have given this parliament in its favour. So much for that. Now the next—

Mr. WARD: Will the hon. member not give some credit to the party to which he belongs for the sum of approximately $20,000,000 already expended?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): The hon. gentleman must understand that a contract was entered into by the Liberal party before 1911 for the building of this line, and the Conservative party were honest enough to try to carry out that contract. They did not believe, like the German kaiser, in regarding contracts as scraps of paper. The action they took was an honest endeavour to carry out the contract into which their predecessors had entered. In any event the Liberals have been in power for the last four years, and why have they not carried out the work?

Mr. WARD: Why was the work on the Hudson Bay railway stopped in 1918?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): The hon. member probably knows that better than I do; I do not know the reason. If the Hudson Bay railway was a justifiable work for the Liberal party to undertake in 1910; if it was a proper work for the Conservative government to carry on until 1918—I suppose the war had something to do with the suspension of the work at that time—why have not the present government made themselves responsible for its continuance and the necessary expenditure of money it involves?

Mr. BROWN: But does not my hon. friend think the Conservative members from Manitoba are entitled to credit or to blame, as the case may be?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): I think the province of Manitoba is capable of looking after itself. All I would ask is that that province give us the same consideration as we are prepared to give them, for instance, in the matter of reasonable tariff protection. If they do that we in Ontario are prepared to do what is right and proper for Manitoba, and by so co-operating each will do its part in building up a united Canada.

Mr. BROWN: But what about the Conservative members for Manitoba?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): Let them speak for themselves. I am here representing the constituency of Toronto-High Park, and it is for the people of that riding that I am speaking here.

In reference to immigration, the Speech from the Throne points out that some arrangments have been made by which assistance is to be given to agricultural and other immigrants coming from the old country to Canada. We are not only to assist their passage to Canada, but after we get them here we will assist them to establish themselves. That may sound all right, but so long as we have unemployment in our country and so long as our own people are going to the United States to obtain employment, I am opposed to such a contract or agreement in regard to immigration. If that agreement had been preceded by some arrangement by which the unemployed in our own country could be assisted and those who have gone to the United States in the last three or four years brought back and put upon the land under the conditions that it is proposed to apply to the British immigrant, then I would be prepared to support it. But as it stands I am opposed to it; I see no reason why we should give a preference to British or foreign immigrants as against the people of our own country. We are suffering from lack of population, yet our actual resident population is going down by emigration as rapidly as we add to it by immigration. The returns show that the number we have brought in has been practically equalled by the number who have left. Our population remains stationary. It is no use spending money to bring people here while our own people are leaving; we may just as well spend our money to keep our own people here.

The best form of immigration is the bringing back of those who have been forced to leave our shores, and the next best is the immigration that we get from the cradle. This is a phase of the question of population that should be carefully attended to; and the members of the medical profession will appreciate that better than I can. When we think of the number of people who are going to the States to find employment, spending their money and their time in the building up of American industries, by investment of capital and otherwise, instead of building up the industries of Canada, we must realize that we are working on a wrong basis. We should begin our work in this connection at home; we should foster our own people, give them assistance and keep them here.

It may be said the Dominion government has no land upon which to put the immigrants; that the lands are largely in the hands of the provinces. The Dominion must have some land, otherwise their immigration scheme is no good. Where do they hope to put the immigrants? Surely they expect to place them on the lands in the western provinces which are still in their hands. The government are giving to Alberta the control of the lands which they now hold in that province, so they will have no land there for settlement. They may have some in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, but I have no doubt Saskatchewan will make a demand upon the Dominion government for the return to that province of its natural resources. Saskatchewan and Manitoba have just as much justification for such a demand as Alberta. After these lands are handed over the Dominion government will have no means of carrying out the immigration scheme. It will be for the provinces to join in this matter; and it seems to me there should be co-operation between the Dominion and the provinces in order that we may retain our population, and work out our own destiny. We should not allow these people to go to other countries. It would be better to put the money into the pockets of the people of our country and let them maintain their families here, than to permit them to cross the line.

In reference to the cradle immigration which I mentioned, I will read from an address given by Mr. Justice Riddell of the Court of Appeal of the province of Ontario. This paper gives the result of an investigation. Mr. Justice Riddell says:

> But the best immigration and the immigration that Canada must in the long run rely upon is immigration by the cradle, and surely that immigration demands and should receive as much care and attention as immigration by the steamship. What would the Canadian people say if one out of every ten immigrants died within a year of their arrival? And yet that is well within the percentage of deaths within one year of their birth of our Canadian baby immigrants. One out of forty dies at birth, 10,000 within a week and 5,000 more within the year.

[Mr. A. J. Anderson.]

And here is the unfortunate part of it.

> Nor does the mother escape; one out of every twenty births means a dead mother. Proper care would reduce the appalling number of 370 dead mothers in Ontario in 1922 by more than three-fourths.

That statement is applicable to, and the percentage would be equalled in, the other provinces of the Dominion.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): My hon. friend has expressed great interest in immigration by the cradle. Would he, in order to assist such immigration, be willing to support a policy of mothers' pensions?

Mr. PRESTON: What has that to do with it?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): That might be a solution, but that money should be first spent upon the people in this country, in order to retain them here, no matter whether they are babes or adults. Any scheme that will lessen the death rate amongst children is a proper one on which to spend money. Any proposition that will save the lives of the children and the mothers is more important to this country than bringing in hundreds of thousands of British immigrants, paying their way and supporting them for a while, which is the policy the Liberal government is offering to the Progressive party and my own party. They are asking us to support such a policy, yet they will not do anything to support or retain the people who are here.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Has the Progressive party ever asked for that policy of immigration?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): I do not know. If the hon. member does not, he should.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I referred to the question of unemployment as it affects Ontario generally and my constituency in particular. Sir Thomas White, who delivered an address recently before the Canadian Club in Montreal, had evidently collected some information respecting unemployment in Canada and I think it is rather useful as it demonstrates that although there is not a great percentage increase in unemployment, yet in many branches of industry the percentage of unemployment is high. He stated that the trade union returns in September, 1925, showed a percentage of unemployment of 5.7. That would not necessarily indicate a great amount of unemployment. It would mean a very considerable amount if the unemployment happened to be grouped in any particular place or places, but if scattered over the whole Dominion, the amount of unemployment would not seem to be very great. When we come to consider specific industries, we find that in many of them the percentage of unemployment is high. The percentages in certain industries are as follows:

Industry	Percentage
Unions in manufacturing industry, grouped	11
Garment workers..	34
Building and construction..	10
Non-ferrous metal, group..	25
Textile and carpet workers..	25

These various groups show a heavy percentage of unemployment and that unemployment will be more or less accentuated in urban centres. The city of Toronto, being the largest urban centre in Ontario, necessarily has a great deal of unemployment and we are suffering because of that. The unemployment situation in Toronto and generally throughout the province is such that it accounts for much of the migration of our people to the United States. Many of them may not be fitted by experience or knowledge for agricultural work, and I doubt very much whether the government is going to succeed in its aim in trying to bring agricultural immigrants from Great Britain. As I understand the matter, Great Britain is an industrial country; agriculturally, it holds a low position. Agriculture in Great Britain is at a low ebb, and that is one of the reasons that has impelled Lloyd George to put forward his land policy in an effort to solve the problem of unemployment. Whether he will succeed or not does not affect my argument. He sees the necessity of stimulating agricultural activity by putting into use land now held as private parks and for other unproductive purposes. This means no surplus of agriculturists in Great Britain, and therefore we are not likely to get many immigrants of that class, for naturally those who are already well established at home are not likely to wish to come here, especially when they read the press and find that a large number of our people are going to the United States for lack of employment here, and that Old Country immigrants have failed in the northwest to get any but seasonal employment extending over three or four months. Moreover, they know that Canada makes no provision for her unemployed—they will not find the dole system in operation here. In view of these conditions in Great Britain it appears to me that the government will fail to induce any of the farming class to settle in Canada. The only immigrants we are likely to receive are the unemployed of the cities and towns of the Old Country. They certainly cannot be numbered among the agricultural class, and I doubt if they are of as good quality as our own unemployed. Rather than spend money to bring such people here why not utilize it to assist our own people? The latest figures of our expenditure on immigration that I have been able to secure are for 1924. In that year we spent $2,417,374, in return for which we received 148,560 immigrants. We lost practically as many of our population by emigration to the United States in that same year. Instead of this negative result, I think it would be much better if we put our business on such a footing that the prosperous condition of the country would not only attract newcomers but would help to retain our own people; and, besides, would cause many of our expatriated Canadians in the United States to return home to share the benefits of steady and remunerative employment.

My hon. friends to my left have suggested that by strengthening agriculture we shall be able to cure all our troubles, both economic and political. I do not think so. Since 1878 agriculture has developed rapidly along sound lines, and in recent years it has expanded even more rapidly owing to the excellent wheat crops of the three prairie provinces. And agriculture has also prospered in the other provinces. In other words, the protection of our manufacturing industries has not hurt agriculture; on the contrary, it has benefited it. As I said in an earlier part of my remarks, protection is absolutely necessary for the greater part of Canada, and consequently we should not hesitate to stabilize our protective policy. In this connection it is interesting to note that of the 148,560 immigrants who came into Canada in 1924, 65,280 settled in Ontario; 7,940 in the Maritimes; 19,979 in Quebec; 21,451 in Manitoba; 13,200 in Saskatchewan; 10,430 in Alberta; and 10,280 in British Columbia and Yukon. The three prairie provinces absorbed 43,081 immigrants or 30 per cent, whereas old Ontario took 65,280, or 43 per cent. It is interesting to analyse the figures a little further. Of that total number of immigrants, men, women and children of the farmer class numbered 56,308. So Ontario took a greater proportion of the total than comprised this class. General labourers numbered 18,337; mechanics, 22,319; clerks, 8,327; miners, 3,372; domestics, 13,865; miscellaneous 26,032. What accounts for Ontario attracting a larger share of these immigrants than any of the other provinces? Simply because it is ahead of the rest of the Dominion, both agriculturally and industrially. This desirable condition of affairs might just as easily be extended over the whole Dominion.

This brings me to the position of the prairie provinces, and I am going to take Saskatchewan as an example, for it has made greater progress agriculturally in the last few years than the other two wheat-growing provinces. In 1925 the field crops of Saskatchewan exceeded the value of those of 1924 by 53 per cent; that is, the purchasing power of the people of Saskatchewan was increased by that percentage. The crop value exceeded even the high water mark of 1919, when high prices prevailed—in 1925 Saskatchewan received for its field crops $363,837,000. At that time its population was 757,510. To-day, allowing for natural increase, it is probably about 800,000. At any rate, putting it at 800,000, that crop return of 1925 represents $454 to every person in Saskatchewan or, to a family of five, $2,000 in purchasing power. Now the question naturally arises, where has that purchasing power been in evidence in the Dominion? It has not shown itself in the province of Ontario and I doubt whether there has been any evidence of it in Quebec. Certainly the Maritime provinces have not benefited by it, if I follow the statements made by the representatives from that part of the country, and the people of British Columbia declare that they have seen nothing of it in that province. Obviously it must have been expended in the prairie provinces. If the prairie provinces, then, have had the benefit of the prosperity resulting from that purchasing power, if it has been confined exclusively to that section of the Dominion, the people there must be in a position to buy more readily than they could before.

The next question therefore is, where are they buying? It is interesting to note that we imported in 1925, of manufactured goods of which we have knowledge, goods coming in through official channels and not in any underground way—and I hope that in this regard the investigation now in progress will reveal something sooner or later—a total of $520,000,000 worth. I have been wondering to what extent the crop return of Saskatchewan is represented in that import value. I have not the figures here, but I am rather inclined to think that a fair percentage of that purchasing power to which I have referred has gone into the buying of goods which have come into Canada, and which are represented by that total I have just given. At any rate, this inference is consistent with the view put forward by the representatives of the prairies, that they are entitled to buy in the cheapest market and are therefore on that principle opposed to any protection being given to the manufacturers of eastern Canada. This, I think, is not an unfair inference, and it is a logical conclusion therefrom that the large proportion of the purchasing power from the crop return of the province of Saskatchewan has gone into the purchase of manufactured goods coming in from the other side.

Mr. MILLAR: Is not the hon. member taking the gross receipts and representing them as purchasing power?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): I am making a general statement. Saskatchewan and the other two provinces have shown splendid crop returns, and whether the money thus acquired is distributed locally or in the world's market it represents so much purchasing power to the western farmer. The crop is worth a certain amount of money and the farmer consumes very little of it, so that what is not used locally is naturally sold abroad. My contention is that this purchasing power should be reflected not merely at home among the farmers and their immediate friends but throughout the Dominion, through the ordinary business channels.

Mr. MILLAR: But a great deal of it goes in expenses.

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): And that is true of all production. But even assuming that a part of that $363,000,000 goes in expenses, it is not all consumed in that way. If it all went in expenses then I would declare that farming was a farce and a failure and did not deserve the encouragement hon. gentlemen ask for it. But I do not agree with that view. I say that farming should be productive, and as a matter of fact it is productive and is adding to the wealth of the country. Now, I do not care how you use that purchasing power, but I do think its effect should be felt not only among the farmers of the west themselves but throughout the country.

An hon. MEMBER: How much of a country would you have if there were no farming?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): I did not hear the question, but as it is received with ridicule on this side I will not stop to answer it. Now, I repeat, that purchasing power has not been reflected in Ontario, and I say that if the agriculturists of the west ask concessions of us, concessions which are not necessarily unreasonable in themselves but which entail a certain obligation in return, and if they are anxious to have us grant those concessions, then they should be as ready to concede to us something for the benefit of our industries in Ontario and in other parts of the Dominion. They should be prepared to concede protection to our industries against the unfair competition that comes from the other side, which, as everyone knows, is quite considerable.

On looking into figures obtained from the Bureau of Statistics, I find that in 1922 the amount of capital invested in Canadian manufacturing industries—for which, as I have before said, I have no brief, being however very much concerned for the men who are dependent upon those industries—totalled $3,125,773,000. Of that sum the proportion invested in industries in Ontario was 52.6 per cent and in the province of Quebec 29.8. So that these two provinces represent 81 per cent of the total capital invested in Canadian manufactures. That being so, are they not deserving of very great consideration from other parts of the Dominion, especially in view of the fact that the agricultural portions of Canada are coming to parliament and demanding concessions which, though not necessarily unreasonable, should be granted only so long as the people who ask for them are ready to give something in return? Those people cannot expect to get what they want without giving a quid pro quo to those who shoulder the burden of taxation in this country. The Canadian manufacturing industry pays the taxes of the country, and not agriculture. It has been said, by some who seem to know what they are talking about, that of the taxation in Canada the three prairie provinces bear about three per cent, leaving aside income tax; and if you take the income tax into consideration then they bear less than one per cent of our taxation. I am not sure that these figures are correct, but they have been quoted authoritatively.

Mr. SPENCER: Does not the hon. member realize that the farmer pays a very large amount of taxation indirectly?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): Yes, so do we. My constituents are all labouring men who have to buy clothes and boots and shoes the same as my hon. friend, and they must also procure for themselves food and other necessaries. They, on the other hand, have no big crop returns. Let the agriculturists compare themselves with the workingmen of the city of Toronto, from which I come, and see what a contrast there is. The workingman in the city cannot raise a particle of food for himself; he does not grow any vegetables, nor does he produce any meat or flour. All these things the city people must pay for, and where will they get the money to pay for them? They are dependent absolutely on industry, and that industry must be protected.

Now who are the competitors of our manufacturers? They are the manufacturers in the United States and elsewhere, and though we should naturally expect the farmers of the west to purchase from our own manufacturers, they unfortunately do not do so. They are purchasing from our competitors. Their money is going to a large extent to the United States to build up industry there in competition against our own manufacturers. We object to that; we say that the farmers of the west should help us if they want us to help them.

Mr. EVANS: Does the hon. member imply that we are evading the tax collector? Or does he suggest that our industry is so impoverished that we cannot pay more than one per cent of the taxation?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto). The hon. member has asked me a very civil question, and I shall try to give him a civil answer. He may not cheat the collector, but I must tell him right now that there are too many in all classes in this country who are cheating the collector, and from the fact that the farmer does not pay income tax and other taxes to this Dominion it is a fair inference that he is not bearing his proper share of the taxation of the country as compared with those who are dependent on industry.

Mr. EVANS: The hon. member infers that that is something peculiar to the agriculturist alone?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): I can only give the general impression that is abroad, and it is quite current throughout the industrial part of Canada that that is so. What we say is that agriculture in this country should bear a larger share of taxation. If agriculture, after all the assistance it has received, is not profitable, what excuse is there for you to come to us and ask us to give further assistance? The agriculturists have received great assistance already.

Mr. FORKE: Whom do you mean by "us"?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): The rest of Canada. I am just as heartily in favour of building up Canada as the agrarians are, and

I want them to work with me, not against me. I think they should consent to industry receiving the protection that is necessary in order to give employment to our workmen, to protect our wage bills, and keep up our standard of living.

I have a few figures here as to the capital invested in industry in the various provinces. In Prince Edward Island, which is a very beautiful agricultural country, but which does not claim any particular progress in manufacturing, we find invested in manufacturing only one per cent of the total capital invested in manufacturing in Canada; in Nova Scotia, 3.1 per cent; New Brunswick, 2.6 per cent; Manitoba, 2.7 per cent; Saskatchewan, 1 per cent; Alberta, 1.6 per cent; British Columbia and the Yukon, 6.5 per cent. The point I wish to make is that on account of the large capital investment in industry in Ontario and Quebec, industries upon which so many of our population depend, these provinces should receive a little more kindly consideration than they have been shown in this debate at all events, and our industries should be protected.

Another matter that has not been mentioned at all in the Speech from the Throne is the development of the water powers of Canada. I feel that we do not appreciate the full value of our water powers. In the province of Ontario the municipalities have combined with the government in the establishment of a public utility system known as the Hydro Electric, which under the extremely capable management of the late Sir Adam Beck attained wonderful proportions. It has involved the investment of a great amount of money, but the improvement it has made in the comfort and home conveniences of our people, and in the cheapening of production and living costs, has made it worth many times over the money we have invested in it. The Hydro Electric system in Ontario has practically reached its limits in regard to available power, and what they are asking now is that the powers on the St. Lawrence river should be developed to make available a further supply of power. I think that request should be granted. It is a matter with which this government has probably something to do, as the St. Lawrence for a certain portion of its length between lake Ontario and Quebec province is a boundary river, and consequently this government is the only one that has complete jurisdiction over it. The province of Ontario, I presume, has an interest in the bed of the river, at least to its centre, the same, no doubt, as the United States would have in the other half. Ontario and the Dominion then have a perfect right to deal with the river because half of it is Canadian, and I think steps should be taken to develop the water powers along that river for the production of electricity, to be added to the power supply of the Ontario Hydro Electric.

The development of the St. Lawrence water powers should not constitute any menace to the province of Quebec or the city of Montreal. Ontario is wedded to the public utility system so far as electrical energy is concerned, while Quebec is developing electric power under private ownership, and apparently very successfully. The province of Quebec has shown in the past that they are determined that electric power shall not be exported from the country. That is entirely in keeping with the policy which we maintain should be followed in respect to industry generally throughout this Dominion. The province of Ontario is fully as anxious as Quebec that power should not be exported, and as soon as the contracts under which the Ontario Hydro Electric system is now supplying electric power to the United States have expired, I am satisfied that no more electrical energy will be exported from this province. All these water powers should be conserved for the Canadian people with the object of adding to the comfort and conveniences of the people of this country, cheapening their industrial costs, enhancing their interests in every way, and with electric power perhaps eventually solving our heating problem. At the present time we are absolutely dependent on coal for heat, but the development of electricity, it seems to me, is going to go a very long way towards solving this and many other of the problems that are facing us at the present time. The water powers of every province in this Dominion should be conserved. There must be great water powers in the west, especially in the province of Alberta, and it seems to me the duty of Albertans in regard to their water powers is just as great as it is in regard to their coal resources. Industry in the neighbourhood of water powers can be carried on much more cheaply than when power has to be obtained from some other source.

Up in northern Ontario we find that the water powers there have contributed very greatly to industrial development. The great Hollinger mine, which is productive of so much wealth to Ontario, and has contributed so much to the success of the Temiskaming railway, which was originally extended north as a colonization road, is to-day investing a large amount of its capital in the development of electrical power in the north. In all parts of this country our water powers should be developed for the purpose not only of assisting industry, but of bringing comfort and conveniences to the homes of the people as well. It is already doing that in Ontario and Quebec, and I presume in other provinces. In any event we should have a policy in regard to the development of water powers in this country. The development of the water powers on the St. John river, for instance, in the province of Quebec has brought to that province an industry which is quite exotic to this country, the manufacture of aluminum products. That industry, which is not indigenous to our soil, was brought to this country solely and only on account of the tremendous water power developed on that river. Now if one water power will cause the expenditure of so many millions of dollars in one industry in this country, I think it is only right and just that we should strive to develop all our water powers. The bringing of industries to this country is another argument why we should have a policy in this country with regard to the development of our water powers. We have heard nothing of that in the Speech, although I think there should have been a reference to it.

Now I want to say a few words upon the coal question; I have already made an allusion to it with respect to Alberta. A complaint from Nova Scotia embodied in a resolution moved by one of the Cape Breton members aroused a discussion in the House which lasted the whole day. The very same day a telegram was read by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) telling us of the condition of affairs in the west. But nothing was said at that time about the situation in Ontario, although that province was then suffering from a scarcity of coal, and a great deal of hardship existed in many Ontario cities and towns. In the city of Toronto hardship was rampant. Only those who required coal and did not have it in their cellars knew what that hardship was. Instead of being able to get anthracite coal from Pennsylvania, as they had been doing, the people in want of coal were forced to make use of whatever substitutes they could obtain. I was particularly fortunate myself as I had laid in a supply early in the season. But my neighbour had not taken that precaution, and he suffered very severely. He was only one of the many hundreds and thousands in the province who suffered distress and hardship as a result of the acute scarcity of coal. Now then, we in Ontario say this: If we ordinarily have to pay $15 or $16 a ton for anthracite coal from Pennsylvania, and there should be a dispute between the coal operators and miners of that state with regard to the wages to be paid, hours of employment, and so on, resulting in a strike, stopping production and involving considerable hardship, we have a right to look for better treatment here than we can get from the people across the line, whether it be operators or miners, who are looking solely to their own benefit. The operators want to get all they can out of that coal, and the miners wish to get the highest wages they possibly can. Their fight is their own fight. I am unable to say which is right and which is wrong; in any event we have no control over that situation. It is purely a United States situation and we are the victims of it. The result is that at this time, instead of paying $15 or $16 a ton for anthracite, we are asked to pay $18 and $20 for substitutes that are not nearly as good. We are penalized by having the price of fuel raised, and I ask, would it not be far better to spend that money in getting coal from Nova Scotia and Alberta and paying the price involved? Because whether we are willing to do so or not we are now paying that price. I am satisfied that the average Torontonian—I will go further and say I believe the average Ontarian—will cheerfully pay the extra amount necessary in order to secure the continuous supply of fuel that he needs. And if we spend that money, our operators and miners in Alberta and Nova Scotia, benefit; the Canadian railways receive the proceeds from transportation; and Canadian railway employees are helped, the labour class generally will benefit, and more money will be spent among our merchants and the people generally. In a word we shall be doing something for the benefit of Canada. It seems to me, therefore, that the agriculturists should consent to the imposition of a duty on coal, thus conserving to the Canadians the full benefit of Canadian coal no matter from what part of the Dominion we receive it.

We should do that, and we should shut out the American supply, because very shortly we are going to be told by the Americans themselves that they will not be able to supply our wants. That supply is not going to go on forever. In the New England states they have suffered from a scarcity of coal the same as we have in Ontario; but the people on the American side have a right to say to the Pennsylvanians or to the Virginians: "Why not give us coal? We are Americans the same as you. We will call upon the federal government to stop the exportation of coal to Canada or any foreign land, if we are going to be forced to starve." As a result that demand will be complied with. The United States government will listen to the complaints that come from their own people; they will not listen to complaints that come from us. Then why not legislate in such a way that we shall conserve to Canadians the full benefit of the coal resources in this country? Not only shall we have a better supply of coal; not only shall we have that supply continuously, but it will mean that the money spent for coal will be spent in this country. The whole trouble is that at present we are allowing too much money to go out of this country.

Let me offer another illustration in support of my argument: The United States has for one hundred and twenty-five years proceeded under a high tariff policy. It has maintained consistently a high tariff policy, and only on one or two occasions have they wavered from it. When they did do so it brought a certain amount of harship, distress, and inactivity of business in the republic. Those periods were very short, however. No matter what criticism we may offer against the United States in many ways, they have advanced under a high tariff policy and they have become the wealthiest country in the world. They are the greatest producers in the world. They rank as high as any other nation in the world, I think, in the producton of wheat and other products. They certainly surpass all other countries in the manufacturing industry, yet they protect themselves by a high tariff, and the results show that in a country like the United States it has been an absolute success. Under the circumstances it is not open for the people of Canada, or of any portion of the Dominion, to say that we cannot do the same. Canada virtually is but starting its career. The United States has not always had a population of 110 millions. We have to-day about the same population as the United States had in 1825 or 1830, but they have made wonderful progress since that time. That progress has been due to the fact that they have, on every occasion, taken the necessary steps to conserve to themselves their home market, and to take priority to themselves over all other nations. They have thus succeeded in organizing a system of mass production in the United States that has enabled them to produce more cheaply than any other country, and that also has created great wealth. To-day they are the greatest exporters of manufactured goods in the world. Their exports are great, and their imports are great also. But their imports are not such as come into competition with their own industries; they are largely imports of articles that they do not produce in their own country.

Mr. BROWN: In order to get the hon. gentleman's viewpoint may I ask him a question. Do I understand that my hon. friend is advocating the imposition of a duty sufficiently high to exclude United States coal, in other words the application of an embargo?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): I would put the duty sufficiently high that we would be able to conserve our resources for ourselves. The extent to which the duty should be raised would be a matter for the much vaunted tariff commission to advise us upon, but it should be sufficiently high to effect the purpose I have mentioned. The duty should be sufficiently high to enable us to retain for ourselves the whole benefit of the coal product of this country, and no higher. If we then pay a little more for our coal the money will be spent in Canada and not spent to keep up American industries.

Mr. MILLAR: Would the hon. member be willing that the people buying coal in Ontario should pay the extra price?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): Certainly. What difference would it make to me? If as a result of this strike I am asked to pay $18 a ton for fuel that ordinarily I get for $15, would it not be far better to say to the mine operators of Nova Scotia and Alberta. "Let me have your coal and I will pay you $18 for it." Would that not be far better? That money would be in Canada, and would perhaps get into the hands of some of the grain growers. I am something like the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) who commenced his address by saying, "I am a protectionist." Well, I am a protectionist along the same lines that he is. I am not in favour of creating many Carnegies and Henry Fords in this country, but I do not know that that is one of the greatest dangers in Canada. I am not inclined to the view held by many people that Mr. Ford is a menace to the United States. I do not think he is. With the great wealth which he has accumulated, with his ingenuity, his courage and his business ability, he is able to distribute benefits, comforts and conveniences and happiness to more people probably than any other man in the United States; and it is chiefly due to the fact that he has been largely protected in the products of his manufacture. I do not think any of those wealthy men accumulate large amounts of money for the purpose of menacing the country in which they live. I do not think it is any sin that a man, on account of his business ability, should acquire more money than I have been able to gather because I have not the ability to do it. Why should I be jealous of him? If I have got the conveniences of life, why should I worry?

I am not strong on the Scriptures, but I think there is a passage which says that it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of Heaven. However, that is his lookout. I am striving along the road, but it is not the road to wealth. I do not think that the wealthy man is a sinner. I do not think that Mr. Carnegie, with all the wealth which he accumulated in the steel business, did harm with it. After he became wealthy he did not die with his money piled up around him, not having done good with it. He spent it in trying to advance the educational interests, not only of his own country but of Canada. He spent it in profusion. I do not think it is true that a few men are being made wealthy at the expense of the many. The statement was made the other day that the Ford Company at Walkerville had a paid-up capital of $125,000.

An hon. MEMBER: Was it not millions?

Mr. ANDERSON (Toronto): I understand the capital of the Ford Company at the time of the incorporation in Canada originally was $125,000. That does not mean that the present company attained the high position it now occupies on that amount of capital. It simply means that the men who put up the money to establish the company had the confidence of the financial institutions of the country to such an extent that they could borrow for the purposes of their industry all the money they required to carry it on. They borrowed to a great extent, and as a result of these borrowings they were able not only to pay back the borrowed money and interest, but to make a profit; and that profit figured on the total money invested was only a fair dividend. When you figured the profit on a capital investment of $125,000 it looked like a big sum; it showed a dividend of $1,100 a share. That, of course, was not taking the money out of the people. It was not the $125,000 that made the profit. It was the large amount of money which was borrowed by the institution that made it. Every man in any industry or business who has not a large amount of his own money necessarily has to resort to borrowing as a means of financing; but if he has the brain power to make the business successful, he will not only be able to repay principal and interest on the money he borrowed, but will be able to make a profit out of it, which, spread over the large amount of money he has borrowed, may not be a very heavy percentage. Ten millions of money invested in a concern might make a profit of one and one-half per cent, but if you spread that over a capital of $125,000 it is a big profit. But that is not the money of the people of the country. In the case of Henry Ford we have cheap automobiles as a result of his method of business, and the people are enjoying the benefit of it. Ford has reduced the prices of new cars almost as low as the prices of second-hand cars. He is doing that, why? Not to put the money in his pocket; that was not his first object. His object was to do a service to the people, and the money comes back to him in the profit he makes on the tremendous output.

I submit we should establish in this country such a fiscal policy as will conserve our natural resources for our own benefit and result in the development and fabricating of those resources into the finished product. There is no reason why we should be producing natural products of all kinds for the purpose of creating wealth among the Americans and others. By developing our resources we are going to increase our immigration and get people in Canada who will not be transients, so that our immigration will not be a carrying system only, but rather a settling policy which will enable us to colonize our country, something which is not being done at the present time.

Mr. W. K. BALDWIN (Stanstead): I congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, on having been chosen to fill the position you now occupy. Your selection for the important office you fill shows the faith that members of parliament have in you. We feel that you are eminently and highly qualified for the dignified position. I next wish to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, on the logical way in which they dealt with the subject. The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe) spoke the French language so fluently and eloquently that even those who could not understand that language felt quite at home and could understand his meaning.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I want to clear up a misunderstanding which occurred the other night. When the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) was speaking I was in a far distant section of the House and asked the hon. member a question. Hon. members on the opposite side made much noise and racket, and said "Shut up, sit down", and all that kind of thing; therefore the hon. gentleman did not understand the question I asked. I wish now to tell hon. members what I was asking. He was talking about this government doing an injustice to the beetroot sugar factories of Canada, particularly at Wallaceburg. I rose to ask him if he knew that in the year 1885, during the heyday of the National Policy, beetroot sugar factories were established in the town of Coaticook in the district I represent, and also in the town of Farnham; and that each of those factories was closed down about two years. I do not say they were closed down on account of Sir John A. Macdonald's policy, but I believe the farmers got sick of drawing their beets when the roads were knee deep in mud. At that time labour was cheap; farmers could get plenty of help, and men only got from $150 to $180 per year. Sugar was selling at nine to ten cents a pound, and yet the factories were closed. I do not say they closed on account of the National Policy; but the hon. member for East Lambton spoke about the factories ceasing to run. I think probably if the roads were as good then as they are now those factories would have succeeded in doing a fine business.

The next member to whom I wish to refer is the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) who answered some questions which I put to him but who refused to answer one. I will tell him what it was. I asked him if in his sojourn south of the Rio Grande his body was so impregnated with venom, poison and spite that he thought he could come to parliament and talk to his colleagues here as he would address a jury trying to convict a criminal for murder. I have listened for nearly seven weeks in this House to the expounders of the other side and to their logic. They first said that it was unconstitutional for the Prime Minister to summon the parliament of Canada in order to choose who should rule this country. These expounders of Blackstone on jurisprudence cited precedents over a period of two or three hundred years in the British parliament. They said that it was unconstitutional for the free and independent electors of Canada to choose their representatives to come to this national capital and, here assembled, to decide who should rule this country. They cited one precedent after another as to the unconstitutionality of the action of the government, but I will not follow that up except to comment on the spite that they revealed in their remarks. The hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White) spoke, and I say, with all due deference to him and his age and experience, that he used language more befitting a rowdy than the polished gentleman which he should be.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw the expression "rowdy."

Mr. BALDWIN: I will do so most generously. Moving down the front row I come to that flowery and gifted orator from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett). I will give him credit for being able to smile at almost anything, for having a great conception of humanity and knowing that you can gain more in this world by smiling than by grouching. Next I come to the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) who delivered a most eloquent speech and whose eyes were closely confined to his work. The next was the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), a polished gentleman, but he like all the rest decided that this parliament could stand only for hours or days. They did not reduce the time to minutes, but they said: You have no right here; your action is unconstitutional. Then the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) made a point-blank bid, stating that this parliament could run for four years or even its full length of time under certain conditions on the part of a group in this House whom I highly esteem. I move down until I come to the vile vituperation of the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) who attacked the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to withdraw the expression "vile vituperation".

Mr. BALDWIN: Thank you very much. He attacked the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), and then he attacked the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) whom he skinned, scalped and dissected. He said that he could not find a particle of the hon. member's being that was fit to deck an outhouse, and I knew what he meant. He next attacked the hon. member for Brandon, the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke), most maliciously and he misrepresented him, saying that he told this House that more dairy products were produced in Saskatchewan than in any other province in this Dominion. I heard the hon. member for Brandon and what he said was that per capita they produced more dairy products than the people of any other province. The hon. member for Brandon is not in his seat and whether he rose or not I do not know, but any child ten years of age would know that Saskatchewan with a population less than one-third that of Ontario or one-half that of Quebec could not produce more dairy products than those provinces.

I do not wish to go further along that line; but when the members of the government rose in their seats to defend the constitutionality of this party in summoning parliament to do the business of the country, I maintain that they were logical and truthful. From what point of view of ethics or equations or anything else can hon. members deduce that 116 is a majority in a body of 245 members? If anybody can answer this question I will not go any further; I will sit down. No one has answered that 116 members constitute a majority in a body of 245. Was it unconstitutional that all opposed to the official opposition could not agree when really and effectively they are thinking along the same lines? A rose will smell the same if you call it by another name. Why could this body of Liberals, Progressives, Independents and Labour men in this House not agree? I have sat in parliament for more than eight years and a cleaner and better group of men than the Progressives never sat in any house of parliament on the face of this earth. The Progressives were assailed from the time they began to form a group in the regime of Sir Robert Borden on the cross benches at the museum, although a more able and eloquent body of men have not come into being in Canada. They were maligned by the Tories in the parliament of 1917 to 1921 and again in the parliament of 1921 to 1925. Dirt enough was thrown at that group to cover them so deep that nothing could resurrect them. They have been maligned, abused in this House, as any fair-minded person knows. Was it unsound for them to come to the party that was nearest to them, to affiliate themselves with the people who were thinking as they were thinking? Was it unsound that the Independent members should affiliate themselves with the group they thought nearest to their ideals? Was it unsound for the Labour representatives to affiliate themselves with the groups that were nearest to them? We were told that we were unconstitutional, and I am speaking particularly to some twenty or thirty of those people who have belittled, looked down upon the people who have opposed them and tried to make them feel insignificant. I have stepped into an elevator and heard one of them say: They have no brains; they have no ability; they have no debating power. I can tell by the physiognomy that such is not the case. Our friends opposite are determined as the devil that nothing shall escape them. The member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) is a very able man. I once remember sitting at a board meeting in Montreal, and he was called in consultation with us for thirty minutes. He only charged $300! I also noticed that when our president called on these men who commanded such high fees they later had to get younger minds to analyse, digest and clarify the subject matter on which legal advice had been sought. Our friends opposite have been vituperative, insulting—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BALDWIN: Thank you, Sir. Surely I cannot call them angelic. This debate has proceeded for nearly seven weeks. Now they are blocking and daring us to put on the closure.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. BALDWIN: Well, I do not wish to give away any secrets, but I may say we have no idea of invoking closure. We won the election of 1921 largely in my province by telling our people about the use of the closure by our opponents. I do not believe that the framers of the British North America Act ever supposed that a government in Canada would send ballot boxes to a foreign country to record the votes of those who had never seen the Dominion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said about the Australian treaty. Why have these great and noble men become all at once so solicitous for the farmer? It is a joke. Their solicitude is simply camouflage to bemuddle his mind and persuade him to vote for the Conservatives so that they may dominate the country. In 1922 and 1923 this House worked assiduously to repeal the oleomargarine law that was put into force by the Conservative government. That legislation worked tremendously against the interests of the farmers. Many precedents were quoted to demonstrate that no country had ever repealed legislation to permit the manufacture of oleomargarine. Butter at that time was selling in this country around 30 cents a pound. After a hard fought battle in 1923, at the request of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) we repealed the act—and only seven members of the Conservative party helped us. Thereupon butter gradually rose in price, but not one of that group over there that go around in their Packards, their Pierce Arrows, their Rolls Royces, and other high-priced cars said a word on behalf of the common people of Canada. Let any of those hon. gentlemen go into any of the poorer quarters of our cities and see the people of small means suffering that the selfish few who are rich may become richer. I am a protectionist—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BALDWIN: I am perfectly happy. I am quite content to stay here till morning if necessary. I am a protectionist, but I am not of the kind that want to raise the tariff. I say to my hon. friends opposite: You are not sincere over there, you dare not raise the tariff. From 1911 to 1921, while you were in power, how much did you raise the tariff? I challenge you to tell me. You are talking everlastingly of high tariff, but when in office you dare not attempt to increase the customs duties. The policies of this government have not injured the country. Facts and figures demonstrate that the balance of trade has turned in our favour, and this has brought our dollar back to par. Someone has belittled this condition of affairs, and has said that there was nothing of advantage to this country from the increase of our foreign trade. The butter business, the cheese business—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BALDWIN: Oh, oh. I am quite conversant with that.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BALDWIN: Those whom the gods would destroy they first make mad. Now, you cannot make me mad, so you may as well keep cool. The mill of the gods grinds slowly, yet it grinds exceeding small.

An hon. MEMBER: Exceeding fine.

Mr. BALDWIN: I thank my hon. friend for the correction. I am trying to keep within the rules of the Chair, but an hon. gentleman in the back benches opposite used very strong language the other day; he said: If you don't get out we are going to push you out. Well, that is a fair sample of those who are condemning group government. Let me tell him and other hon. gentlemen who share his views that this government is going to rule Canada for the next four years. Do not have any doubts about that. Let those who have so villainously attacked the government bear that in mind. The other night while the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) was speaking there was a feeling among some hon. gentlemen that he was rather ill and some expected him to collapse. Happily however the hon. gentleman belies that suggestion; he is apparently quite vigorous and I am pleased to see him looking so bright and charming to-night.

With regard to the tariff, I have not taken the trouble to analyse the figures, but it is significant that whereas between 1911 and 1921 hon. gentlemen opposite did not undertake to increase duties to any extent, for the simple reason that they knew the people would not put up with it, so soon as this government came into power they began howling for protection and higher protection. That shows the insincerity of the opposition. Hon. gentlemen opposite have accused this government of every wrong which could possibly be laid at the door of a party, but they know very well that these charges are without any foundation whatever. The hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) not long ago was provoked to make certain remarks and in the same way I too am provoked to say things sometimes for which I might apologize. I am sure also that some hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House regret many of the speeches that their confreres have made in this debate. I think it is most unfortunate that we should be wasting the time of parliament as it is being wasted at present. Here we have spent seven weeks discussing almost nothing else but the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne and amendments while matters of great national importance are waiting to be undertaken. Why should hon. gentlemen obstruct the business of parliament in this way instead of allowing the House to get down to business? One important matter that should be attended to is the effort to prevent the present diversion of water at Chicago. One hon. member at the last session of parliament spoke about deepening the river to accommodate larger boats, and he made the suggestion that it might be well to make boats that were adaptable to the river. Well, let me tell the House that the Chicago interests pay no more attention to the overtures of the western states, which are working in conjunction with this government to stop this diversion, than they would to the moaning of the winds, and they will continue draining off the water from the lakes until some effective action is taken by this parliament to deal with the matter in co-operation with the United States government. An attempt will be made on the other side to build a canal from lake Erie through to New York and when that is done it will be good-bye to Canada and to Montreal as the port of our ocean steamers.

Hon. gentlemen opposite are obstructing the business of the House and I charge them with keeping people from coming into Canada. Through their "whispers of death" and their

Jeremiah wailings during the past five years they have served to drive untold capital away from Canada, and the gloomy speeches which they have been making in this House and which have been recorded in Hansard have been circulated broadcast not only throughout this country but in other parts of the world as well. But although hon. gentlemen may retard for a time the progress of Canada, nothing that they can say or do will prevent this country eventually from being one of the greatest on earth.

The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) the other night devoted considerable time and attention to the Rouyn railway, which it is proposed to build into the gold fields of Quebec. Why hon. gentlemen should oppose a proposal of this kind, having for its object the development of one of our great resources, I cannot understand. We have been paying $6 a bushel for potatoes in Rouyn gold fields and it is impossible for us to develop our mines without proper transportation facilities when we have to meet such prices. You cannot mine gold or silver unless you can do the work at a cost that will bear comparison with the cost of similar labour elsewhere, and in order to make this industry a success it is necessary to have such transportation as will make it possible to get foodstuffs and other supplies on a reasonable basis. Along with certain other gentlemen I waited upon Premier Taschereau with a view to having some action taken in this matter and I was sorry to see the ex-Minister of Finance throwing cold water on the proposition the other night, after the efforts which the Prime Minister and the government of Quebec have been making to provide transportation into that country. A highly reputable geologist was sent into that country to explore it and his report was quite favourable. I am interested in the concern and you could not induce me to take up any proposition if I did not consider it profitable.

Hon. members opposite, it seems to me, have not yet caught the vision of a united Canada, such as the late member for St. Lawrence-St. George, who sat in this House from 1921 to 1925, pictured to us. I regard him as one of our outstanding Canadians and though he did on one occasion vote against the budget, in the year 1924, he saw his mistake and later rectified it. And as that gentleman showed us, it is impossible for us to have a united Canada without give and take.

So far as the proposed tariff commission is concerned, I would suggest that in addition to manufacturers there should be on that board representatives from various walks of life. I would even include some mother who had raised a number of children and who would therefore know what it was to clothe, house, educate and discipline a family. I would not have only manufacturers who could spend their winters in California, in Florence or in Naples and their summers on the golf links, and have a retinue of servants to wait upon them, living in chateaux and palaces. Any country in which that sort of thing exists must sooner or later sink into the depths of an Ireland or a Russia, if they will not think of the toilers of our land. Do you think for one moment that the brains of the poor are not the equal of those of the rich who are swaddled in eiderdown and fed on luxuries? No public man who has not a heart should be in any government, municipal, provincial or federal, or on any board administering public affairs in this country. Right here I think of two examples. The hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), when he was High Commissioner for Canada, was the means of raising men who had not a dollar to the high pedestal of the councils of men. They have been made rich. He said, if I remember rightly, that he had got through with his lumber product business. We on the eastern coast have to pay our taxes, insurance and overhead, and we have had to ever since the Panama canal was completed. That is what we are suffering, but he gloried in what he was able to do. Then he said that the young ladies were most efficient in that wonderful country to the south. I would ask him why he did not stay in this country. We have wonderful resorts here, a Caledonia, a Carlsbad, we have the springs at the old Welland canal, and they are delightful. People from the south come up there and are delighted. Why don't our people stay at home in our own country and see our beautiful resorts? Then our beautiful maidens would stay here.

The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) has been over at Clifton Springs, New York. He could have found much better springs on the Canadian side, within fifty miles of where he was. But he went to Clifton Springs and watched the trainloads of coal coming to Canada. I pray that Canada with her mountains of coal will develop her own coal resources, and I heartily agree with every member on the other side of the House who has expressed any patriotic ideas in regard to coal or anything else. I agree with every one of them who has expressed patriotism and love of this grand and glorious country. The hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fraser) in an eloquent speech the other night told us of the wonderful mineral resources of our country. If we would only develop them, and as yet we have hardly touched the fringe, we would develop wealth that would make our public debt seem a bagatelle. We have exploited our timber resources, our farming lands, and to some extent our fisheries, but our mineral wealth we have hardly touched. Let us work together and develop these wonderful resources for the sake of this great and wondrous country. Do hon. members realize that more than two-thirds of this country is west of the western border of Ontario? We have members telling us how large their constituencies are. One member the other day mentioned that his constituency was 300 by 600 miles. The hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) compared his constituency with some of the empires of Europe. Let me tell you a little story, and it is true. Last June I was introduced to a German on Bank street, and he told me something of his business. He had met a Canadian in London and Berlin, who had told him of this wonderful country, and he came out here. First he got his Dominion charter. He was told of the great deposits of silica in this country, and at last he found a wonderful silica mine at East Templeton. To show his sincerity he took out a $25,000 insurance policy for the benefit of the company to be; he took out a guarantee bond with a guarantee company for $25,000 for the benefit of the company to be. He went to a man like the late J. R. Booth, who put his hand on the German's shoulder and said, "Mr. Pease, I know something about glass. I sent my son Jackson over to Belgium, and made over a million dollars out of glass". Soon after, I met this young Bavarian and I asked him how things were going. "They are not going at all," he said, and he laid the blame on the public men of this country. He said, "I went down to New York and they said yes, they would finance me. They told me to bring the silica on the boats below the falls of the Ottawa river, and then bring them over here. They told me they would furnish me with one and a half million dollars for this glass factory." It was a factory making bevelled mirrors, automobile glass—expensive plate glass, not common glass. He referred me to one gentleman in this city, a noble old gentleman, a hard worker like myself, but ten years older, though full of pep and ginger and energy. I went and saw him and he said, "I will be vice-president and put forty or fifty thousand dollars in the company. We do not want our money going to the United States; let us keep it here." The next morning I gave the man a cheque for $10,000. Within three weeks, I saw a very substantial man, running up into the millions, one of the members in this House, and I asked him for a cheque for $10,000. It was the member for Sherbrooke, and he said, "I will do it on your reputation." We have now got out our prospectus, and our auditors are Price, Waterhouse and Company. That firm is good enough for me. The foreman, the superintendent, the general manager, the vice-president or the president of your company could not take ten cents worth of merchandise without that firm properly charging it up. I wrote to them and said, "I have put a good deal of money in my life in companies because you were the auditors." I got a letter back on Saturday saying, "We accept with pleasure, although you will not want us this year. We never accept the position of auditors without knowing the members of the board personally, for it is our business to look out for the shareholders." If we had more companies like that Canada would be the gainer, and we should not be troubled so often as we are by crooks, shysters, and hot air artists. There is no place in Canada where we are more troubled with people of this class than we are in this building. I do not know how it is but they swarm through these precincts, and even invade our very rooms. The other day I put this notice on my door: "One hundred thousand dollars waiting for crooks, hot air artists and shysters. Kindly rap before you enter."

Mr. SPEAKER: It would be well if the hon. member would pay due regard to the dignity of parliament and adhere to the king's English.

Mr. BALDWIN: I am very sorry, Mr. Speaker, if I have unwittingly violated the canons of good taste. But the circumstances are such as to prompt me to an unusual display of feeling. Let me say to hon. gentlemen opposite that it would be much better if they entertained the same degree of confidence in this country as does the Bavarian to whom I alluded a moment ago. Let us be true to Canada and to its institutions. As a man who has had a long business experience I would much rather invest in Canadian securities than I would in the securities of any other country.

Now I should like to say something on the subject of our great inland waterway. In New York state they have the Erie canal; and the cities of New York, Portland, Boston and Baltimore are decidedly opposed to the deepening of the St. Lawrence canal. If, however, the movement for the diversion of water from our Great Lakes to the Chicago drainage canal proves successful, what is to hinder our friends across the line from deepening the Erie canal and taking a vast volume of water from the same source, a source in which this country is so vitally interested? And I believe there is a possibility of that being done. And yet hon. gentlemen opposite are spending their time arguing and quibbling here over the emoluments of office! Hon. gentlemen opposite are fighting and trying to upset the government, and allowing the great problems of this country to remain unheeded. If the people of other countries observe that nothing is going on in this parliament but fighting and squabbling we are not going to attract immigrants here to the extent that we should. Of course they will come here to some extent because we have wonderful natural resources in Canada waiting development.

Here is the immigration policy that I would adopt, if I were an immigration agent. I would go to the populous countries of the world and say to them: "Canada is the greatest country on earth. We have cheap lands, and it is even possible that at some time we may have free homesteads again. If you go to Canada you will go to a great country where we have good laws, a beautiful climate with plenty of oxygen in the air and plenty to do. You can sell the products you raise from our soil, fish you take from our waters, and the materials you derive from the mines and forests. You can manufacture the raw materials and ship them, as well as the products you raise, to the markets of the world." I often think of the case of the Mennonites who settled in the west, many of whom became wealthy there. They moved to Mexico, but some of them did not like that country and have returned to Canada. I believe that those who have come back will yet conform to our laws and become good citizens. I hope that every one of them will eventually return.

The problem of immigration has been often to the fore in this parliament. Personally I would not have too many restrictions. I well remember being at Castle Garden, New York, in former years, as well as in Chicago, St. Louis, and other cities. I have seen many people arrive in that country with their entire wordly possessions contained in a red bandana handkerchief, an old garment, or a tin can. To-day many of those former immigrants are occupying positions of the highest character in that great country. I lay the charge against the government that was in power in this country from 1917 to 1921 that they endeavoured to stir up hatred against the Germans. So incensed were they and their followers against the Germans that one gentleman, who is now the Premier of New Brunswick, rose in this House on one occasion and said. "I would not spend a cent to save the last blood of the German empire." It is too bad to see manifestations of hatred of that kind in this country. The Scandinavians make the very best kind of settlers wherever they have gone. They help largely to create the states of Wisconsin, Minnesota, and the Dakotas in the neighbouring republic. Go down to those states and see what they have done. Examine also what the Germans, the Norwegians, the Swedes and the Finlanders have done in the United States. On the other hand consider what has happened in the New England states, largely owing to the fact that their native sons have forgotten marriage, or have too generally adopted divorce. If you travel through the fertile valleys of the Connecticut river you will see farms which have been vacated by native Americans, whose places have been taken by Italians, Poles, and people of other nationalities.

Now, Mr. Speaker, who will develop this country? Will it be those people who are fond of the jazz and go to picture shows? I say no. Unfortunately, we have to the south of us a great and rich country. Since the Civil war many people in the United States amassed wealth but of course others became poor. Canada has wonderful potential wealth which should be developed.

We must admit that every member of this House has been elected by from 25,000 to 100,000 people, and we are supposed to be able properly to represent their views in parliament. When I came to parliament eight years ago I expected to come in contact with many great minds. I am a very modest man myself, and I hope I shall remain so. Even if I became wealthy and accumulated as much money as the Rockefellers and Morgans, I should not be any different from what I am, because it is said that by the sweat of our brow we should earn our daily bread. That is not the exact scriptural quotation, but I think it is near it. To me it is inconceivable that the parliament of Canada should drag along as it has been doing for some weeks. Some people on the other side say, "Get out and have an election." Well, let them talk to the Chief Electoral Officer of the Dominion. If they cannot get any information from him, let them call up the Auditor General, and he will tell them that one quarter of the counties have not been paid their election expenses. It is absolute nonsense to talk about another election before the expenses of the last have been paid.

More than two millions in solid cash have to be disbursed during an election and an army of officials have to be employed.

How many countries of the world to-day are being administered by group governments? Could any hon. gentleman enumerate them? Now in this parliament we find the brilliant men of the great Tory party rising on the other side and advocating either one thing which is nonsensical or another thing which is absurd. But nothing more nonsensical could be suggested than that we should go to the country again. The people would not stand for it. I do not believe there would be a revolution, but the people would not elect anybody who suggested that parliament should dissolve.

We have many good business men in this country. I have a business which is over a hundred years old, and I am getting the largest number of calls for timber that I have had for years; in fact, I am getting so many that I do not answer all the calls to enlarge or build new factories. At present I am running my business from Ottawa and I have not been home for weeks. Now I face a group that want to destroy the country, but they will not have their way. I run down to Montreal, buy my goods, and have them sent home. Of course if I cannot buy as cheaply as a Jew I do not buy at all. That is a compliment to both Jews and Scotchmen. If I have a dollar in my pocket and I cannot see something worth more than a dollar I keep my money in my pocket. Of course if I could see a bargain I would take advantage of it.

When I think of the grand and glorious people I represent, when I think of fifty years of married life on a beautiful farm in a beautiful country with sons and daughters and grandsons and granddaughters around them, I feel my inability to represent them. Now here in this parliament we have the administrators of public affairs being slammed and abused. We have the right temperature in this country with its snow, ice and cold weather to freeze our rivers and lakes, so that we can transport the products of the forest. We do not have too much winter, and I do not want to leave the country in the winter season. My wife goes to the British West Indies, to Bermuda in the winter. She has at other times gone to California, but sees more beauty in the West Indies, more beautiful flowers and very nice people. She tells me Bermuda is delightful.

Many millionaires go to the south. I presume there are more millionaires asleep in the balmy climates of the south than are sleeping in Canada. If I had to go away, I would go north. That may seem strange to some people. The people of the north live on fresh air. The sun, the oxygen and the air would cure almost any malady if taken properly. It is sad to hear people say: "My children are sick and I am worried to death". Oh, that the time would come when Canada would put herself on a par with China and Japan, and employ medical men in this country who would attend to the eyes, ears, noses and throats of the poor people. Those people have raised our population to what it is, but if we continue as we are doing our country will be as bad as Fifth avenue, New York. Twenty years ago Fifth avenue families had but two children. Is there anybody who would laugh when we are appealing on behalf of the poor of the country, in order that they may be clothed, fed, educated and receive medical attention? Is there a person in this country so heartless that he would not endorse a proposition to have medical attendants go about this country, to every municipality, every town and village? It would cost less than it is costing the country at the present time. Every man must feel that we should adopt a policy of that kind in this country and it should be at the public expense. It is well known that the rankest weeds grow in the richest soil that produces the best wheat and potatoes. Young people sow their wild oats and yet they grow up and make the most brilliant sons and daughters and the most useful people on this earth, if they turn back quickly.

I know a great deal about the nefarious work that went on during the last election, and I have some extracts from Toronto papers in regard to what happened in Stanstead constituency, but I will let these heinous things go because the Speaker might call me to order for using unparliamentary language if I were to describe properly some of the things that were done. I have some sympathy with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) because I heard a schoolmate of his, who sits in the far corner of the House, speak about him in his early days. He said that he was maligned in the province of Quebec and that more than one-quarter of a million people voted against him. His name was not mentioned in the constituency which I represent except in one place where it was said, "A vote for Baldwin is a vote against Meighen." In all the other places it was "Vote for Patenaude." I have a number of extracts that I could read, but I will leave them for a later instalment. It has been said time and again on that side of the House that if you include the Patenaude vote, the Tory party have a majority of a quarter of a million over Liberals. That is a mistake; the parties forming the government have a majority of a quarter of a million. The Progressives, Independents and Labour men combined, therefore, have a right to rule. I cannot see any reason why we are not acting in perfect harmony with the constitution, with the wishes of the people, with everything that goes to make a great country. I can see that that side of the House has changed in the last few days from the attitude of the New York curb to a fellowship, a fraternity meeting. The last great gun that boomed out was that of the gallant old gentleman from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) and if I thought more of that bombastic stuff was to be delivered, I would talk for an hour or two longer, but I will wait and see what happens.

An hon. MEMBER: Go to it.

Mr. BALDWIN: I am not directed from that side of the House. The other day in the corridor a big, burly fellow who was walking alongside the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Jones), came up to me and put his clinched fist close to my face. I straightened myself up and went closer to him, saying: "What does this mean?" When he saw that I was not afraid of him he withdrew a little and said: "I wish every damned member in this House that is against Meighen could be sent to Mexico and made a target for the Mexican bandits."

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the expression "damned."

Mr. BALDWIN: It was not a member.

Mr. SPEAKER: It matters not.

Mr. BALDWIN: I will withdraw. The only thing stronger than his language was his whiskey-tainted breath. I also learned that he was a lawyer from New Brunswick. This kind of proceeding will never make this country prosper as it should.

The hon. member for Toronto-High Park (Mr. Anderson) spoke about hydro-electric development and seemed to intimate that no one was making efforts to develop the great water-powers of this country. A company in which I am interested is proposing to develop 50,000 horse-power, and another company to which I belong is going to develop 80,000 horse-power, in accordance with the engineer's report. There has not been a hydro-electric development anywhere which has not had its power sold before the plant was completed. Hydro-electric development is making steady progress throughout this country, and no other country, according to population, is making faster progress than the Dominion of Canada. One would think a man with a great brain and intelligence like the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George would know better than his statements would seem to indicate, because some fifteen years ago, before electricity attained the prominence it has to-day—and it is only in its infancy yet—he obtained control of a company by hook or by crook when he happened to be in the Rocky mountains. There is not a hydro-electric development to-day where the power is not sold with a demand for more, and that is why I am deploring the fighting that is going on in this House when great questions are crying for solution. There is the question of preventing that great country to the south of us from developing water-powers which would carry back the head waters to the city of Quebec instead of the city of Montreal; for even at the present time it is costing a tremendous sum of money to permit seafaring vessels to reach the city of Montreal. Then there is the question of the depletion of our forests, which will naturally lessen the water supply on account of the higher evaporation. There is also the matter of the United States diverting the waters of the Great Lakes to her canals and sewage systems. The settlement of these questions is being delayed on account of the discussion that is going on in this House.

As regards immigration, if hon gentlemen opposite would not say so much about conditions in Canada, as they are doing simply on account of a desire to get into power, many more people would come to this country. Capital is certainly coming in. and I am delighted to see that last week the stock exchange in Montreal—and the same thing is true of Toronto—has become just about independent of the New York stock exchange. Some hon. members opposite are endeavouring to show that we are retrogressing instead of making progress. That is not the case. We have become well known throughout the world as a great nation; we shall continue to be so notwithstanding all the things that are said against us, and this government will continue to work for the greatest good of the greatest number. Mr. Speaker, although you have called me to order, I thank you for your kindness and courtesy.

Mr. E. F. ARMSTRONG (South Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that in my maiden speech I shall not be as entertaining as the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Baldwin). I feel a little timid, but I know that you, Sir, are very sympathetic towards a young member who has had very little experience in public speaking and is addressing this House for the first time. But I am sent here by people of the north. You have heard members from the west, you have heard members from the east, you have heard members from the south, but so far you have not heard a representative from the northern part of this Dominion. I come, Sir, from a new district created by the increased population due to the development of industry in the country between North Bay and Hudson bay. There you have two new electoral districts known as North Timiskaming and South Timiskaming, which now have representation in this House.

I have listened with considerable interest to many of the subjects discussed during the past few weeks, and when I look across at the other side of the House I am pleased to see that four of the young men who left primary schools some twenty years ago are now members of parliament. Two went east and two went west, and now they grace the other side. I, Sir, am a young man who went north because I believed that the march of empire was in that direction rather than east or west. There was a strong inducement for me to go to the United States, but I had faith in Canada—I have still and I am going to stay here as long as I live.

You have heard many excellent speeches on the Hudson Bay railway, Sir. I too, live on a Hudson Bay railway, one of the most romantic railways in the annals of our history, and possibly it may be of interest to the House to hear something about that undertaking. I have heard many references to the railway and to the mining industry which are not accurate. I know that hon. members are interested in the mining industry. I have been to every mining camp in the last twenty years; the only rush I have missed was that into Red Lake the other day, and I would not have missed that thrill if I had not been elected to this House. Twenty years ago the government of Ontario projected northward what is now known as the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway. It was regarded as a waste of public money to build a railway into what many people described as muskeg country. But after the contractors had carried the road beyond the confines of North Bay they ran through the valuable silver formation at Cobalt—a camp that has become known throughout the world as the highest grade in the history of mining. It is going as strong to-day as it ever was. It has already added $230,000,000 to the wealth of this country, and is still producing from $7,000,000 to $8,000,000 a year. The history of the advancement of that country is even more wonderful than the realm of romance. Hon. members may think I am enthusiastic. Well, I am enthusiastic, so much so that I am afraid I shall not be able to tell the story of the romance of the Temiskaming railway as it should be told. That railway has followed the trail that Champlain blazed. And that wonderful road is going towards Hudson bay.

Beyond Cobalt is the beautiful town of Haileybury, which was recently burnt out, but which its enterprising people have rebuilt and improved. It looks across lake Timiskaming, to the purple hills of Quebec. In fact we get our inspiration from that province. Further up you strike New Liskeard, and thence north for eighty miles you have the finest agricultural country in Canada. You will find there as beautiful farms as you have anywhere in old Ontario. Men have gone in there within the last few years and have taken off enough pulpwood from their land to provide them with working capital sufficient to establish themselves as farmers. Then you can drive over a fine automobile road for nearly one hundred miles. In about a year and a half we hope to have a trunk road from North Bay to Cobalt, passing through the beautiful forest reserve of Timagami. I would ask the House, Mr. Speaker, to have a recess not in the winter but in the summer, when we shall be glad to entertain hon. members in the beautiful isles of lake Timagami. That agricultural territory, Sir, is the embodiment of a great principle; the mining industry opened up there has made it possible for people to come in and till the soil with profit to themselves and benefit to the mining population. We are almost a self-contained country. That is the only market the farmers have, but it is a good market. When referring to some statistics recently I noticed that our mining people are paid twice as high wages as they are in the Maritimes. The Maritimes have my sympathy. Many of our finest miners come from the provinces down by the sea.

Passing seventy or eighty miles over that agricultural area is the mining district known as Swastika and Kirkland Lake. Swastika, the magic word, was given to that town by a recent member of this House. Kirkland Lake is only a few years old, and yet it has the highest grade mine on the continent. In the Teck-Hughes, the Lake Shore, Tough-Oakes and a number of other mines we have very rich producers. The Teck-Hughes is producing a millhead of $32. Men interested in mining will understand what that means. We have the highest grade ore coming from that mine. We have silver at Cobalt and gold at Kirkland Lake. I may say that Kirkland Lake is right opposite and on the same belt as the famous Rouyn district. It is just thirty miles from Rouyn, and we hope with the co-operation of the two provinces to be permitted to have a railway connecting fifty thousand people with that part of the province of Quebec. We are a very harmonious people up there, we are on the best of terms with our Quebec neighbours. Fifty per cent of my constituents come from the province of Quebec, and I am glad to represent them. As you go further north some fifty or sixty miles you come to what is known as the Porcupine district. You turn to the left and pass into Porcupine.

Mr. O'NEILL: Hear, hear.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (South Timiskaming): My hon. friend from North Timiskaming will be able to tell you all about his country. I want to tell the House about some of the wonderful gold mines. For instance, take the Hollinger mine that is producing and putting through the mill six thousand tons of ore a day. Last year our gold mines produced about $23,000,000 and this year they have created $30,000,000 of wealth in gold. They are increasing at the rate of 20 per cent per annum so that in the next five years northern Ontario will be producing over $70,000,000 in mineral wealth. To-day we hold the third place in the world in the production of gold and to-morrow, that is to say, within the next two or three years, we shall occupy second place. We shall be beaten only by the mines in South Africa. To the right of this wonderful mining district you have the pulp industry at Iroquois Falls, where every twenty-four hours they produce 600 tons of newsprint, a train-load that goes south to supply the great cities of this continent. And that is only one pulp concern in the north country. Twenty-five miles further up the road you come to the town of Cochrane on the Canadian National railways, which is the best built road, with the easiest grades, on the North American continent. This road does not stop at Cochrane, however; it goes further down over the height of land and passes on towards the icy waters of Hudson bay, and at the Tin Can rapids there is a flow of 25,000 horse-power which is utilized to turn the wheels of the Abitibi mills. There is a wealth of romance in that northern country and I tell the people from the west that if they do not get a hustle on we will beat them to it. Beyond that we have the largest china clay belt probably known to the world, and we have asbestos. A gentleman who came out the other day brought also a very fine sample of coal. We have not much coal but if we can get this commodity in the north country we shall have the greatest industrial centre there that will be found on this continent.

This brings me to the Rouyn railway. I do not intend to dwell on this matter but I may observe that this railway is a branch line commencing 112 miles east of Cochrane and going down to within thirty miles of the interprovincial boundary. The road, when it is completed, will provide a freight and passenger service to the Canadian National railways in the north. To-day they have only three trains a week, so that you can readily understand that at first the service will not be very efficient. If this government could possibly bring about harmony between the two provinces so as to facilitate the building of that short railroad between the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway and Rouyn, a daily service would be provided. Passengers at present embark in Montreal and pass Swastika each day on the trip either way, and if it were possible to have the connection made you would have the best service to Rouyn that could be given. And that service could have been provided without spending one cent of money from the Dominion treasury. That $5,000,000 could have been saved, and in this connection I wonder why the Hudson Bay railway should be mentioned at all in the Speech from the Throne. We have been discussing that railway for weeks and yet we have $5,000,000 being spent on a railway here without any mention of it in the Speech. Why do not hon. members from the west get on to this scheme? Do they not ask themselves how it is that $5,000,000 can be spent on this railway without its being mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, while it is necessary to mention the Hudson Bay railway specifically? Let the government take that $5,000,000 and devote it to the Hudson Bay road. The Hudson Bay railway may have many things in its favour, for our history in the north country has been one of romantic and profitable adventure. There are members here representing the east and the west and those who are in the mining area know that the country stretching north of the western provinces and taking in northern Ontario and northern Quebec, known as the pre-Cambrian area, has been swept clean by the wonderful forces of nature, exposing to Canada the greatest treasure country in the now known world. That may strike the House as strong language, but it is backed up by the best geologists who come to this country.

Now, I represent the people up there and I have come here to put some pep and spirit into the mining branch of this government. I come to offer some assistance to the minister in charge of our mining affairs, because I want some action taken. The people up there want something done, and I am here to urge their needs upon the government. We feel the influence from the west. We want coal and we want fish from the Atlantic. We want those who go down to the sea in ships to send their products to our country. We are in the centre of Canada and it costs us more to live there than it does anywhere else in the Dominion. A ton of coal there to-day cannot be procured at less than from $25 to $30, and you cannot even get it at that. We are the people who stand in need of some action in the matter of transportation for we are the greatest sufferers. We reach both east and west. We gather the sentiments of the people of the west, the people who have certain transportation problems, and we know their political views. And we derive from the energetic and magnificent province of Quebec a good deal of inspiration. We are the melting pot of Canada. The young people of that country are vigorous and they want me to represent their case in parliament and to get the wheels of government moving in their behalf. This is the day of great opportunity. Fortunes and opportunities are passing daily, and I would ask the House to look forward to a great development of that country in the future. A spirit of strong Canadianism is being engendered up there. As I say, we have been called the melting pot of this Dominion, and we look forward with hope to a great development in the not distant future. And I know we shall not be disappointed.

Mr. I. D. COTNAM (North Renfrew): With considerable diffidence as a new member, I rise to address the House on this occasion, but before proceeding to a discussion of the subject under consideration I desire, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate you on your elevation to the exalted position you hold in parliament. The members here, I am sure, all appreciate the grace and dignity you bring to your high and exalted position, the fairness of your decisions and your impartiality in disposing of all questions that come before you for review. I desire also to congratulate some of the hon. members on the Liberal side who have taken part in the various debates which we have so far had in this House, particularly during the earlier part of the session. I refer especially to hon. members from the province of Quebec who have astonished me by the extent of their knowledge of the English language and their proficiency in its use. It has been indeed a great pleasure to listen to those hon. gentlemen speaking in a language other than their mother tongue, and giving expression to their ideas in such well-chosen terms. I listened particularly with a great deal of interest to the address delivered some time ago by an ex-Speaker of this House in the person of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) who, I thought, was uncommonly fair and open minded and who couched his observations in faultless language.

We have a rather peculiar situation in this House at the present time. We came into parliament following a general election on October 29. We know that on that occasion the government of the day appealed to the country after propounding certain principles, certain doctrines and certain policies which they thought should be inaugurated in this country if they were to carry on the business of this Dominion successfully. In the Prime Minister's manifesto delivered on September 6 last, he propounded those questions of policy which he thought should take precedence, and with which he thought this parliament should deal. After the election we find that the remnants of that government came back to this House with a following much depleted. They had been storm-tossed and shipwrecked. The government was decapitated on election day, and although they have since recovered their head, I think the people of this country realize, as do the members of this House as they look across to the other side to-night, that they are indeed a very dilapidated remnant of a government.

Those of us who took part in the election of 1921 will remember that the Liberal party on that occasion appealed to the electors of this country on a very definite platform from that which had been laid down in the convention held in this city of Ottawa in the year 1919. At that convention the Liberal party selected a new leader, the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, and we all know that he was selected as the leader of the party pledged to support a certain platform, certain policies which were enunciated and laid down upon that occasion. The Liberal party appealed to the country in 1921, but I am here to-night to say that they did not appeal to the country on the policies enunciated in the platform of 1919. In my own constituency, the Liberal platform as laid down in 1919 was never once mentioned during the campaign of 1921. During that whole campaign the Liberal party carried on under the name of the late revered leader of the party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whose name was continually conjured up in order to carry the party through. Mr. Mackenzie King, the leader of the Liberal party, was in my own constituency during the 1921 campaign, and while there he failed to discuss the platform or enunciate the policies of the Liberal party; in fact, the Liberal candidate, who afterwards became the Liberal member in this House from 1921 to 1925, although he had been an avowed free trader all his life, when the election of 1921 took place declared that he had changed his policies and that he was now an out-and-out protectionist. The leader of the Liberal party, I say, when he was in my constituency did not discuss the Liberal platform of 1919; in fact, I do not think the Liberals in this House or in the country want to see that platform of 1919 carried into effect at all. Mr. Mackenzie King, when he came to my constituency in 1921—he was then leader of the opposition—spoke of other problems, problems which were more or less local, and which perhaps appealed more or less to the people of that constituency. Following Mr. King during the whole progress of his 1921 campaign, I believe that he conducted it entirely as he did the last campaign, on geographical principles, enunciating, not the policies or principles of the Liberal party, if it has any, but rather the policies which he thought would suit the particular constituency in which he happened to be speaking.

When Mr. Mackenzie King spoke in my constituency in 1921 he took up such problems as these: As hon. members know, he claims to be a very strong opponent of trusts, mergers and combines, although as a matter of fact he was a member of the Laurier administration during a period when there were more trusts, mergers and combines formed in the Dominion of Canada than there had ever been before or since. I notice that in his manifesto at Richmond Hill Mr. King again took up the subject of monopolies, declaring that he was unalterably opposed to monopolies, trusts, mergers and combines in any shape or form. That is all very fine as grandstand play, but what actually has taken place during Mr. King's regime, even within the last year? In my constituency in 1921 he declared that if he became Prime Minister of this country there would be no more bank mergers in the Dominion. He was opposed to mergers then because it happened that at that particular time a merger was being negotiated between the Bank of Montreal and the Merchants Bank, yet we find that in 1924, just last year, there were four bank mergers consummated in the Dominion of Canada without a word of protest from Mr. King or any member of his government. There were amalgamated last year the Bank of Commerce and the Bank of Hamilton; La Banque Nationale and La Banque d'Hochelaga; the Standard Bank and the Sterling Bank; Molson's Bank and the Bank of Montreal; and yet Mr. King says that he is opposed to trusts, mergers and combines in any shape or form.

During that same campaign of 1921 Mr. King declared that if he became Prime Minister of this country he would have an investigation into the affairs of the Riordon Company of Canada. That was a company in which a great many people in eastern Canada were interested at that time, particularly the people of Ontario and Quebec, who had put their money into that corporation expecting that it was an organization which was being fairly and equitably handled, and one in which the shareholders would have a fair chance. The government that went out of office in 1921 found it necessary to take I.O.U's from the Riordon Company in payment of certain business taxes, because the company, owing to the financial position in which they found themselves, were unable to pay those taxes at the time. When Mr. King spoke in my constituency in 1921 he tried by innuendo to make it appear that the Conservative government was in some way allied with the big interests and with the Riordon Company, that there was some secret underhand dealing between them whereby the Riordon Company was exempted from taxation, yet subsequent events proved that the Riordon Company was in a serious financial position at that time, and that it was impossible for them to pay their business profits taxes. Mr. King became Prime Minister in 1921, and from that day to this no one has ever heard anything further from him about the Riordon Company or of any investigation which would disclose the real cause of the failure of that company.

Mr. King went further than that. He said that the government of Mr. Meighen was a government by order in council, that parliament was not consulted, that practically the whole business of the country was carried on by order in council. Of course, he knew perfectly well as every hon. member knows, that no government can carry on in this country without orders in council. I venture to say to-night that the present government; during the last four years, have passed not five hundred, or a thousand, or fifteen hundred, or two thousand orders in council, but probably three thousand such orders. And yet Mr. Mackenzie King said at that time that he was the great protagonist of responsible government in this country, that the people through parliament must be consulted in regard to everything. What do we find to-day? We find that this government—this responsible government of which Right Hon. Mackenzie King is the head—guarantee the bonds of the Canadian National railways for the building of a line of railway costing the people of this country a sum probably in the neighbourhood of three to five million dollars, for which we are directly responsible. They do this by order in council, although Mr. King insisted when in opposition that government by order in council was altogether unfair and should not be permitted under our British constitution.

I wonder if any of the Liberal members of this House have ever read over the platform of the Liberal party as enunciated in 1919 under the caption of "financial conditions and taxation." I should just like to read a little from that platform to-night for their enlightenment, to see if it conjures up any memories of the past when that platform was framed. It reads as follows:

Whereas the national safety demands that the serious financial position of the country should be known and appreciated in order that steps may be taken to cope with the same; and

Whereas on the 31st March last, according to the statement of the Minister of Finance, the net public debt was $1,584,000,000 or roughly, $220 for every man, woman and child in the Dominion, involving an annual interest charge of about $115,000,000 and thus imposing an annual burden for interest on debt alone of $15 per head of the population; and

Whereas the estimated expenditure of the Dominion government for the present fiscal year is over $800,000,000 or roughly $100 per head of the population; and

Whereas the estimated revenue is only $280,000,000, thus creating an estimated deficit of over $500,000,000—a sum equivalent to $62.50 per head of the population—which sum the Finance Minister proposes to obtain by borrowing; and—

Just listen to what they say here:

Whereas national disaster will overtake this country should the present method of financing the country's affairs be continued—

National disaster, they say, is to follow. These were the gentlemen opposite who are telling us to-night that we are the people who are preaching blue ruin in this Dominion; and yet that is what they were saying in 1919—that national disaster will overtake this country. I continue quoting:

Whereas both Great Britain and the United States at present raise more than 80 per cent of their revenue by direct taxation, while Canada raises not more than 20 per cent;

[Mr. Cotnam.]

Be it and it is hereby resolved:

That the serious nature of the country's financial situation calls for the profoundest consideration of all patriotic citizens and the exercise of severest economy by the government;

That increase of revenue must be sought from an equitable and effective imposition and collection of graduated taxes, on business profits and income, applicable to all incomes above reasonable exemptions;

Taxes on luxuries.

That the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance. First: diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people,—

And by the way, the cost of living is five per cent higher than it was when that platform was framed, yet nothing is said about the high cost of living to-day.

Second: reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country.

That, to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat; the principal articles of food; farm implements and machinery; farm tractors, mining, flour and sawmill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber; gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils; net twines and fishermen's equipments; cements and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into the same.

That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reductions should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear, and on other articles of general consumption (other than luxuries), as well as on the raw material entering into the manufacture of the same.

That the British preference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff.

And the Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provisions of this resolution when returned to power.

I am sure it must be refreshing for hon. gentlemen opposite to listen once more to these words, which they surely must have heard in 1919. That suits hon. members from Saskatchewan all right—So impressive is the statement: "The Liberal party hereby pledges itself to implement these provisions by legislation." You would think the proceedings were as solemn as a funeral. And yet to-day when we draw the attention of these gentlemen to their platform of 1919 and the explicit planks they laid down therein, in which they said that national disaster would overtake the then government if they continued on this course, and that we had a national debt of $1,584,000,000, or $220 per capita; to-day when we draw their attention to the fact that the national debt of this country has risen until it is over $2,500,000,000, or $300 per capita, they say that we are crying blue ruin.

Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the House adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Tuesday, February 23, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INVERNESS RAILWAY

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) inquired about two orders in council relating to the Inverness railway. In reply, I have received the following memorandum from the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals:

With reference to Sir Henry Drayton's request that the two orders in council relating to the Inverness railway should be tabled, I may say that there was an order in council passed on the 28th October, 1925—copy herewith—empowering the Minister of Railways and Canals to enter into an agreement with the Inverness Railway and Coal Company to lease, with the option of purchase, the Inverness Railway and Coal Company. In the meantime the railway has been taken over by the Eastern Trust Company. Therefore the authority granted by the said order in council becomes null and void. I know of no further order in council relating to this case.

I table this memorandum, Sir.

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Monday, February 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. C. Elliott for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed motion of Mr. Bird: "That this question be now put."

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the orders of the day—

Mr. SPEAKER: It is too late.

Mr. I. D. COTNAM (North Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, when I moved the adjournment of the debate last night I was referring to the platform enunciated by the Liberal party in 1919, and attempting to show that neither in the campaign of 1921 nor of 1925 did the Liberal party appeal to the people on that platform, but that on the contrary they had made sectional appeals in the various provinces. Yet for the last four years the leader of the Liberal party has preached from end to end of the Dominion what he calls "national unity". Well, up until, say, five years ago who ever heard of national disunity? I submit, Sir, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) by his sectional appeals has had more to do with creating a feeling of disunity and suspicion in the minds of the people than any other of our public men. And he has been obliged to resort to such sectional appeals simply because of lack of cohesion in his own party, which has made it impossible for him to inaugurate a really national policy that would bind together in still closer ties the whole Dominion. He has one policy for British Columbia; another for Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba; east of the Great Lakes he has still another policy for Ontario and Quebec; but when he reaches the Maritimes he has no policy at all. I claim that a government so weak that it has no national policy is not fit to function, and indeed cannot function.

But fortunately for Canada we have the Conservative party, led by my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen). It is a party which stands for a national policy, a policy that will bind together the whole country from the Atlantic to the Pacific; a policy that when inaugurated will give us a basis on which to build a real future for this Dominion. In my view the platform of the Liberal party adopted in 1919 is diametrically opposed to the policy of the party under the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier. That platform can only bring about disunity. Therefore I claim that the policy of the Conservative party is so fundamentally sound that it will prevent the provinces from drifting more and more widely apart. In a word, the policy of the Conservative party is a policy for the whole of Canada. And fortunately we have a leader who is unafraid to uphold that policy in every constituency. Undoubtedly that policy has appealed to the people, as is shown by the results of the recent general election, which returned my party in such augmented strength that it is now the largest in this House. That is because the people of this country have confidence in the policies and principles enunciated by the Conservative party. I believe there was never a finer compliment paid to any leader in this parliament or in any other than that paid to the leader of the Conservative party by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) when she said that she had no confidence in the Liberal party and was afraid that if she voted confidence in them they would not carry out their policies, but that, on the other hand, if she voted Conservative, she believed the leader of the Conservative party would see to it that the policies of his party were carried into effect. That a member of another group in this House had sufficient confidence in this party to believe it would be true to its pledges was a very fine compliment indeed to pay to our leader and to the Conservative party as a whole. If there is one thing more than any other that is undermining public confidence in government in this country to-day, it is the fact that the people have come to believe that our public men are not sincere in the public pronouncements which they make. Lack of sincerity on the part of our public men is doing more to undermine the morale of the electorate of this country than any other single thing and is probably making for a great deal of disunity in this country.

The Prime Minister in his election manifesto issued at Richmond Hill, on September the 6th, declared that this country required certain definite policies to be inaugurated in order that the affairs of this country could be carried on in a businesslike manner. He made it abundantly clear that he was not in favour of group government. He said that his government in the past four years had been futile. He admitted they were unable to meet the situation in this country. He admitted that during the last four years practically all his government had been able to do was to mark time. He said that there were at that moment great national problems pressing for solution which required the hand of a strong and popular government, and it seems rather strange, after those declarations, that hon. members opposite should declare to-day that they are quite willing to have group government in this House. Their forces were shattered on October the 29th as a result of the shock which they then received, and they have not yet recovered from the shock. We have in my profession the term "aphasia." It is a medical term which means inability to speak, or speechlessness, and those of us who have watched hon. members opposite trying to function in this parliament for the last six weeks have realized that they are all suffering from that particular malady.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Would the hon. member give us the term for the opposite disease?

Mr. COTNAM: The hon. member is not suffering from it.

Mr. McINTOSH: Is the hon. gentleman not aware that speech is silver and silence is golden?

Mr. PARENT: That is a gold brick.

Mr. COTNAM: I think hon. gentlemen opposite should be able to give some reason for their speechlessness. I notice that one of the first hon. gentlemen opposite to suffer from that malady was the acting leader of the government (Mr. Lapointe), who, when he was supposed to rise and give us reasons why the government was asking for an adjournment, sat speechless in his seat for a day and a half; in fact, he was never able to rise properly and give us reasons for the adjournment until the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) had come to his assistance and explained why he thought an adjournment was necessary at this particular time. Is it not further an admission of weakness, incompetency and inability to carry on the affairs of this country, not only that this government should ask for an adjournment when members have come here prepared to carry on public business, but that the government have not been able to submit any business to the House? Yet over and over again the attempt has been made to make it appear that we are obstructing business, obstructing the government from carrying on. Is it not a confession of weakness on their part that they are not able to carry on? Is it not further an admission of weakness that although every seat in this House except the Prime Minister's was filled when this parliament met some six weeks ago, the government now finds it necessary to go outside its own ranks to find men it deems to be of cabinet timber? Is it not an admission of weakness that they to-day are trying to find a seat for the Hon. C. A. Dunning in the city of Regina?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Why does the hon. member think it is an admission of weakness for Mr. Dunning to run in the city of Regina?

Mr. COTNAM: I did not say that. I said it was an admission of weakness on the part of this government to go outside their own ranks; they evidently considered they had no cabinet timber within their own ranks in this House.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is there anything unusual in a government strengthening its position at any time it sees fit and has the opportunity?

Mr. COTNAM: I simply repeat that it was an admission of weakness; the government could not find amongst their supporters in the House men of cabinet rank.

I should like to quote a Canadian Press despatch dated February 17, and by the way this was just before the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Darke) resigned, and I am just wondering whether this announcement means that the government was paving the way, trying to make it a little easier for Mr. Dunning to be elected in Regina. The despatch reads:

The Canadian National Railway contemplates an expenditure of $5,896,000 in 1926 on branch lines. This is the estimate brought down by the government and tabled in the House of Commons yesterday.

Between fifteen and twenty branches throughout the Dominion remain incomplete. On seven of these, track will be laid during 1926. The biggest expenditure will be on the Turtleford, Sask., branch, on which about 44 miles of track will be laid and $1,571,000 expended. A million dollars will be spent on the Dunblane-Central Butte, Sask., branch, and $915,000 will be spent on the Rosedale, Sask., branch, which will be practically completed this year.

It seems rather strange the government should be contemplating all this expenditure on branch lines in Saskatchewan at the present juncture, and I was wondering whether this announcement had any bearing on the local political situation in Saskatchewan and particularly in Regina. A little further on the statement says that only two branch lines will not be completed, one of them at Kingsclear, New Brunswick, and the other at Grande Fresniere, Quebec. Evidently they think there is no use for branch lines at those two points. I have been wondering why, in view of the press reports, the government did not bring Mr. Massey into the cabinet. I wonder if they consider that Mr. Massey would not be any great acquisition to the cabinet, or if they believe with the electors of Durham that, as a result of the verdict on October 29, "Massey's in the cold, cold ground".

Another thing which struck me very forcibly was that when the Prime Minister made the appeal to the country, and when he issued that now famous manifesto, he cited certain reasons, or causes, why that appeal should be made. He told us, in effect, that the government found itself in the position where it was marking time. He said that it would be unable, as at that time constituted, to bring down any great measures of reform to parliament. He stated that there were grave and important problems awaiting solution by this parliament, and among those problems he mentioned Senate reform. Now, I think every member of this House will agree with me that Senate reform is one of those hardy perennials that is dragged out in election campaigns in this Dominion. It has been one of the red herrings which the Liberal party has tried to drag across the trail in every election in Canada for the last twenty-five years; and everyone knows that throughout the course of the last election campaign Mr. King himself did not offer one real, tangible solution by means of which he intended to effect the reform of the Senate, only that Providence, in time, might possibly take enough Tories out of the upper house to enable him to nominate Liberal appointees and thereby secure a majority.

We were supposed to have a transportation problem in this country, and during the campaign Mr. King spoke at some length upon it. I do not intend to go into the transportation problem, more than merely to make reference to the fact that during the course of the campaign the Hudson Bay railway was not made an issue by the Prime Minister. It was only mentioned in the province of Saskatchewan, where he promised that if he secured sufficient Liberal representation from that province he would be prepared to go ahead and build the line. Now we on this side of the House are willing to consider the Hudson Bay railway on its merits. We are not opposed to it, not by any means. I think every Conservative member is ready and willing to make a study of the whole problem and is prepared to vote on the merits of the question; but I do say that there is a vast difference between the Richmond Hill speech of the Prime Minister with regard to the transportation problem, and the method of dealing with it as expressed in the Speech from the Throne. If the Hudson Bay railway is feasible, if it is practicable, if it can be built without too great expenditure of public funds, I believe this House would be in favour of the scheme—at any rate would be in favour of ascertaining, beyond all question, whether it is practicable or not. On the other hand, the government has not given any intimation, up to the present time, as to how much it proposes to spend on the project, how much on terminals, and so forth. As yet we have had no intimation from this government on these points, and I was wondering whether the government wished to keep in abeyance any discussion of the railway, or the possible cost of the project, until it succeeds in getting some ministers elected in eastern Canada, and obtaining cabinet representation in this part of the Dominion.

The Prime Minister further stated that we had an immigration problem in this country, and that it would take a strong government to deal with that problem. To my mind it is not nearly as important to deal with the immigration problem of Canada to-day, as it is to find some solution for the emigration problem from which we are suffering. During the four years of the Liberal regime there was an exodus of Canadian citizens from the Dominion totalling probably 500,000 souls. I do not believe that our people are thoroughly alive to what that exodus means. While this government has been juggling with the immigration problem—trying to bring into Canada people who, in many cases, know nothing of our race, our language, our religion or our customs; people whom it will probably take one generation or perhaps two to assimilate into our population—we are allowing our best blood, our very best brawn and brain, to leave Canada, and nothing has been done to check that exodus.

I believe that the fathers and mothers of families in this country have a right to expect that we, through our government shall, as far as possible, develop our own country; that we shall, through the policies inaugurated by the government, endeavour to develop our own natural resources and our own industries, and assist in every possible way, the growth of the agricultural industry. I believe that we should have a policy that will meet the needs of all classes of our people. In a family, say, of five or six children, you will have one boy or probably two who will wish to engage in farming, another who will wish to take up the legal profession, another who may desire to become a physician, and possibly two with a desire to engage in business. We cannot all be agriculturists, and unless there is diversity of employment in Canada, through the medium of a policy such as will develop our agricultural resources and our industries to the utmost and afford employment for our labouring people, we are bound to have an exodus of Canadian boys and girls from our shores.

Some people are inclined, perhaps, not to take that exodus very seriously. As regards my own constituency, however, I take it very seriously indeed. Five years ago we had a very prosperous, industrial town, surrounded by a prosperous, agricultural community. To-day that town—and every village, and practically every crossroads—is mute evidence to the fact that Canadian boys and girls are leaving our communities by the score and by the hundred, and crossing into the United States. I noticed a short time ago that there have gone from the Dominion into the United States during the last four years no less than 3,600 graduates from the university of Toronto alone, and that they are now engaged in employment in the United States. That is an appalling figure. It means that the very best brains of Canada are being attracted to the republic to the south. It is estimated that it requires at least $10,000 to educate every one of these students before they graduate from the university, and when they graduate they cannot find employment and are not finding employment in this country but are going across to the other side of the line. That means that we spend during the four years in the University of Toronto alone at the rate of $10,000 per student to educate the young men and young women who are now leaving us and giving their brains and ability to the republic to the south of us. If that is taking place in the case of the University of Toronto, I think it only fair to assume that there is a similar exodus from other universities to the American side.

With regard to our fiscal trade or policy, Mr. Mackenzie King says that he believes in a tariff for revenue. Mr. Marler says he is an out-and-out protectionist, and he was a member of this government. Some members on the other side profess to be out-and-out protectionists. Therefore, it is only fair to assume that the Liberal party as a whole has no settled or fixed policy so far as the Dominion of Canada is concerned. In my constituency we have all classes of people. We have English, Irish, Scotch, French, German and Scandinavian, and they are all very fine types of people. We are endeavouring, and they are endeavouring, to build up in that section of Canada a strong, self-reliant Canadianism. These people are engaged in the different walks of life. We have many large industries employing a great many labouring men, and we have also a large agricultural section in the constituency. The policy of the government during their tenure of office has not been such as to operate in the best interests of the people in my constituency. The constituency sent a Liberal candidate to this parliament for the last four years, and elected him by a handsome majority. But they reversed their decision on the 29th of October because they were utterly opposed to the policy of the Mackenzie King government. The farmers in my district consider that they have been unfairly dealt with by this government, owing to the fact that when the United States government inaugurated the Fordney-McCumber tariff, under which Canadian agricultural products going to the United States were taxed such a high rate of duty that it was practically prohibitive, this government, instead of taking action to relieve the Canadian farmer from the unfair competition of the American farmer, took practically no action at all, and allowed free access to the Canadian market of the same kind of produce that was being grown by the United States farmers. The farmers of Canada considered it was absolutely unfair that while not a bushel of Canadian wheat could get over that American tariff wall without paying 42 cents a bushel, wheat from the United States or anywhere else can come into Canada on payment of a duty of 12 cents, and that while the Canadian farmer cannot sell his corn in the United States without first paying 15 cents a bushel duty, United States corn comes into Canada free. Canadian wheat flour is shut out of the United States by the imposition of a duty of $2.04 a barrel, whereas American flour can be shipped into Canada on payment of a duty of 50 cents a barrel. The Canadian farmer can sell his hay to the United States on payment of $4 a ton duty, while the United States farmer can export his hay to Canada on payment of $2 a ton. The United States impose a duty on Canadian potatoes of 50 cents a hundred pounds, while potatoes coming from the United States into the Canadian market pay a duty of 35 cents a hundred pounds. If we wish to ship our butter into the United States we have to pay 8 cents a pound, but when the American farmer sends his butter to Canada he can ship it to us on payment of 4 cents a pound duty. American cheese is taxed 3 cents a pound coming into Canada, while Canadian cheese pays a duty of 5 cents a pound when shipped to the United States. The American farmer is protected to the extent of 8 cents a dozen on eggs, while the Canadian farmer has a protection of only 3 cents a dozen against American eggs; and so on all the way down the line. The farmers in my constituency feel that the government of Mackenzie King has been remiss in its duty to the farmers of the Dominion of Canada by not protecting them against the unfair outside competition of the American farmers.

Then, not satisfied with that, this government, without any regard for the farmers of the country at all, decided to negotiate a treaty with the Commonwealth of Australia, with the result that again the Canadian farmer has to compete on an unfair basis with outside products. I do not wish to put on Hansard the terms of that Australian treaty. All I have to say is that the farmers of my constituency and the farmers of the Dominion of Canada consider that it is absolutely unfair and unjust to them. We want to trade with other countries, and are prepared to trade with them, but we wish to trade on a fifty-fifty basis. We want it to be a straight business arrangement. We do not want to make one section or one class of people in Canada pay for certain advantages which we may derive in other markets. We propose that every treaty should stand on its own feet, and that the people of Canada should get a square deal as a whole. In my constituency we had a textile industry, and everyone knows what has happened to the textile industry of the Dominion of Canada in the last four years. Everyone knows that the present government raised the British preference to the extent of 12½ per cent, with the result that British goods produced by the cheaper labour of Great Britain, and also goods that are brought in from France and Germany as well, are coming into our market to compete with our Canadian goods. Why is it that when you walk down the streets of Ottawa and look into the windows and other places you see goods marked, "Made in England"? Why should those same goods not be manufactured in Canada to-day? Why should they not provide work and adequate wages for the labouring men of Canada? Why should not our industries be running full time in Canada to-day, producing textiles and woollen goods for the people of Canada? According to the recognized authorities there are really no physical or climatic reasons why textiles and woollen goods should not be manufactured or cannot be manufactured in this country. Furthermore, if the woollen goods and textiles were manufactured in this country it would mean that our farmers would benefit to a great extent indeed. At the present time the Commonwealth of Australia has about 80,000,000 sheep and we in the Dominion of Canada have probably only in the neighbourhood of 2,500,000 sheep. If the textile and woollen industries were properly protected, it would be possible to carry out a great sheep raising project that would ultimately react to the benefit of our farmers and agriculturists.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Does the hon. member object to Canadians buying goods in England?

Mr. COTNAM: I did not say that.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Do you object to it?

Mr. COTNAM: No, but I believe any treaty entered into by this Dominion should be on a fifty-fifty basis, so that Canadian industry and Canadian workmen will not be penalized for the benefit of industries and workmen of other countries.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Would the hon. member do away with the British preference?

Mr. COTNAM: I would lower it sufficiently that our market would not be flooded with those goods. I do not believe in a one-sided preference. We want an all-round Canadian trade arrangement.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Have the British people a preference against our wheat?

Mr. MANION: Neither have they against United States wheat. It is on the same basis as ours.

Mr. COTNAM: As the hon. gentleman opposite comes from Saskatchewan, perhaps he does not realize the present condition of public affairs in this country, and I am afraid some other hon. gentlemen from the west, while they are honest and estimable in every other way, do not appreciate it. They talk about prosperity; they quote statistics to demonstrate that we have great trade balances and they point to our exports and imports. I prefer to go to the man on the street, the business man, and according to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, if you go to the man on the street, you will not have to quote statistics because he will tell you whether the country is prosperous or not. When I go to the business men of my town, as I did last week, and I ask them if business is reviving, improving, I want to get a candid expression of opinion from them. When they tell me, one after another, that business is in a depressed state, I fail to follow the statistics of hon. gentlemen opposite. In my town at the present time—and it is only an index of other towns in this country—people are living on very low rates of wages. Men are glad to procure a job at any wage and they are asked to go to our lumbering camps at $26 to $35 a month. Out of that they are being asked to pay part of the taxes to keep their children in this country, to pay for rent and fuel and schooling for their children. Yet hon. gentlemen tell us that the people of Canada are exceedingly prosperous. Those are not isolated examples; I can take hon. members to my constituency and show them scores and scores of people who are to-day in that unsatisfactory position. I think it was the hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Bell) who told us a few days ago about the condition of affairs he found in that city. Four years ago you could not find a vacant house in Pembroke and to-day I believe there are from one hundred to one hundred and fifty vacant houses in that town. Still hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that the country is prosperous and that there is plenty of employment. In my town we had a textile industry, a woollen mill which, a few years ago, was running at full blast. As late as 1922 it was employing 110 mill hands with a monthly wage of $6,500. It was giving employment to many labouring men in that town who were receiving fair wages and were able to support their families in some comfort. The British preference came into effect and what was the result? Last year that mill was compelled to close its doors, and the operatives who used to work in that mill are to-day very largely to the south of the line working for our United States neighbours. That is true not only of one textile mill, but of scores of them in this country. In Renfrew, you will find the Renfrew Woollen Mills, owned and operated by Senator M. J. O'Brien. The manager said to us during the election campaign: "We are not making one cent in our industry to-day; we are simply marking time and only succeeding in trading an old dollar for a new one." That is a mill with an immense amount of capital and that is the only thing that is keeping it going. The other day that mill brought in a shipment of Australian wool worth about $72,000, whereas if we were protecting that industry as it should be protected, it might just as well have bought that wool from the farmers of this Dominion. Woollen mill after woollen mill has been compelled to close its doors in this Dominion during the last four and five years under the British preferential tariff.

Mr. McMILLAN: If the government put on a duty, would that help the hon. member's woollen industry in Pembroke?

Mr. COTNAM: The British preferential tariff has been the means of closing down our mills. I am not speaking from a party or partisan standpoint at all; I believe this is a great national question and one of vital interest to our farmers. I believe it would be of advantage not only to the farmers but to the woollen industry of this country if we had a duty on wool, and if the British preference were lowered sufficiently to allow our manufacturers of textiles and woollens to compete on a fair and equitable basis so that they would not have to compete with the cheap labour of England and in some cases, I understand, with cheaper goods still that are imported from France and Germany through Great Britain which is simply the clearing house. We are suffering from that condition of affairs at the present time. I believe the tariff could be so regulated that we could have in this country a splendid industry which would be of vast importance to our agricultural classes, our labouring people and our various industries.

Some hon. gentlemen in this House and during the election campaign have endeavoured to make it appear that the policy of the Conservative party is one of high protection. As I understand it, and as I believe every hon. member on this side understands it, our policy is one of adequate protection whereby the manufacturer, the labouring man and the farmer of this country will be protected against unfair competition from other countries. In other words, it is a policy of Canada for the Canadian people. It is the policy that was inaugurated in this country in 1878 and maintained under the regimes of both the late Sir John A. Macdonald and the late revered Liberal chieftain, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. That policy has been departed from by the Mackenzie King administration during the last four years and they have made no effort to remedy the conditions and evils from which the people are suffering at the present time. We believe under a policy of adequate protection we would weld together the people of this Dominion into one great nation, so that we would not have one section west of the Rockies, another in the prairies, another in central Canada and another in the Maritimes.

We are free to admit that there are difficulties in the way; there are great problems to be worked out if we are to consummate that unity which we are looking forward to. We in the central provinces also have our grievances, although, as you will notice, we are not complaining much, but we are willing to concede something to our western friends in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. We are willing to concede to them anything that is fair and just and right, and we are also willing to make to the Maritime provinces such concessions as are necessary in order to secure to them the rights to which they are entitled. Having all this in mind, we believe that a strong government with an adequate policy which it would not be ashamed to enunciate to the people of Canada; a government ready to make reasonable concessions in order to promote national unity and to realize that vision which the fathers of confederation had of this country; a government prepared to put into force such a policy as is advocated by the Conservative party, as we on this side of the House understand that policy, would in a short time find a solution for the various problems with which this country is faced at the present time and which the government of to-day has failed utterly to find during the past four years.

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): In the early days of this sesion there was cited to the House an authority for the proposition that a ministry must have this quality at least that it can exercise effectual control over the proceedings of the House of Commons; and yet, Mr. Speaker, we hear from time to time from hon. members opposite that we on this side are obstructing the business of the House and of the country. If that be so, and we have a government that can govern and control, why does not that government stop what it calls obstruction? It has the means to its hand but it has as yet shown no inclination whatever to screw up its courage to the required point, even in spite of the rather disastrous defection of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa).

There is no obstruction here; the blame must rest upon the shoulders of the government. It is the government that initiates legislation; it is the government that prepares and brings down for consideration the programme of legislation. We have been told by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) that this government was engaged as long ago as in November last in the preparation of the Speech from the Throne, three long months ago, and yet at this moment we have no indication whatsoever that any legislation has been prepared, and there is no readiness apparent on the part of the government to implement the promises that have been made in that Speech. Surely therefore we must assume that if there is any obstruction it is due to the utter inability of the government, or its refusal to prepare and submit to parliament any such legislation. We are faced now at this stage with the motion which we have under consideration and which has been submitted to this House by arrangement between the government and the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke). I had almost expected, following the repudiations which we heard the other day, that the government would again repudiate the fact that it had by arrangement with the Progressive party introduced this resolution. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) who is leading this House accepts my proposition. I should have thought it was the case, because my hon. friend from Nelson (Mr. Bird), although he denied having any direct connection with the arrangement, did thrust himself and his party into an analogy with the Robin Hood myth—himself the Little John of the piece, and, sitting so close by him, Friar Tuck and Robin Hood from Brandon, not forgetting Maid Marian. They were summoned to some sort of conclave, so he led us to believe, in which the hon. member for Nelson indicated that there was a distressful maiden to be helped—the government of this country. Rather rudely, I thought, the hon. member referred to it as the "under dog." Here, he said, is this distressful maiden; let us to her succour, let us resuce her from the cruel oppression of the High Sheriff of Nottingham; moreover, my merry men all, said he, if we don't do something of that sort we shall be faced with the necessity of voting either confidence or no confidence in the present government, and that is going to be very awkward.

If the government accepts the position I have indicated, we have once again the spectacle of the larger part of the animal being wagged by the tail, and that is probably a very pleasant motion when one becomes accustomed to it, something apparently in this case in the nature of a soporific. The person who is watching these proceedings can sympathize very largely with the government because after all it is in a difficult position. I can imagine the leader of the government saying, "It is very nice, this being in power, very pleasant and very profitable and we like very much sitting here. But, dear me, we have to do a great deal; we have so many people to placate, so many arrangements must be made from time to time, that it is enough to try the patience of any man. There are my allies, the Progressives, who are showing signs of independence. I don't believe I can trust their leaders; I don't believe those leaders can control all the Progressives, for a bit of that sturdy independence declared in this House seems to be manifesting itself just now. They insist on running the whole show. That is one of my troubles. And looking further down the chamber I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). There is an active, live person, a man who insists on being attended to.

Bright and early on the morning of the first day he sat down and wrote two letters, one to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and one to the Prime Minister, asking for certain concessions. He got, direct and forthright by return mail, a square and fair answer from the leader of the opposition. He got no letter from the Prime Minister. Well, something had to be done. The first vote was coming on and he called upon the Prime Minister; and whatever the result of that interview was it was satisfactory for the purpose, for it enabled him to cast his vote as was desired. But there was a second vote coming and still the letter had not come, and in my mind's eye I can see the course that was taken by the hon. gentleman. I can see him walk up to the door of the Prime Minister's sanctum, I can see him ushered in, and I can hear the Prime Minister say to him "What can we do for you to-day?" His visitor answers, "What I want is a reply to that little letter which you promised me so long ago and which has not been forthcoming. We are getting just on the eve of another vote, and I must have that letter." This was on January 28. The Prime Minister says: "Just take a chair and we will attend to that right away." So it is attended to, and I can see the Prime Minister ushering the hon. gentleman out of the room while he says, "Well, will that be all for you to-day? Shall I send it or will you take it with you?" The door once shut and the Prime Minister left alone, his countenance takes on another cast, and I can imagine him saying to himself:

> Yond' Cassius has a lean and hungry look;
> He thinks too much: such men are dangerous.

But the letter is there, the letter with the five items set out in detail. I cannot give them all to the House, but one is an amendment to the Criminal Code. The hon. gentleman has the letter. On the 29th, the vote is about to be taken. He rises in his place, and to make assurance doubly sure places the letter on Hansard, and when the time comes he votes "like a little man." No wonder the hon. gentleman took his seat with a smile of satisfied accomplishment. I wish he were here because I would ask him if he remembers a certain picture that appears before me at the moment—the picture of a pleased looking cat with a great grin from ear to ear, licking its lips and supposed to be saying, "I have eaten the canary."

"That is another of my troubles" says the leader of the government. "But then I have to consider still another gentleman, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). Of course one knows that he is a man of gestures, and I am not particularly concerned when he makes a gesture towards the Conservative party. But one never can tell, so vehement a gesture may he make some day that he will overbalance himself and topple head foremost into the Conservative lobby. That man is not any great comfort to me either. Then I have the protectionists in my own ranks, the free traders and others. Goodness knows I have troubles enough of my own." Then he looks back to those stirring days of September last when he and his party were going forth to battle, and he recalls all the high and noble things that they set forth in their manifesto, all those great questions that would be dealt with by the government whose party was then breaking a lance with the opposition. "Those were high resolves." I can hear him say, "and we determined to do many things. We were going to implement those resolves by action, we were going to be strong for the people. But see the position we are in. We have got to think this thing over. Perhaps we were a bit rash. We need a little more time for consideration. We are not in as easy circumstances as we had hoped to be." And so the desire to do something great and noble gradually passes by.

And thus the native hue of resolution
Is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought;
And enterprises of great pith and moment,
With this regard their currents turn awry,
And lose the name of action.

Mr. Speaker, His Majesty's loyal opposition has another view of this matter. We are not disposed to take the lead of inaction which has been given to us by the leader of the government. We are disposed to go on and discuss the business of the country, the questions that should come before this House. The words of the Prime Minister echo still in one's ears, that one of the great problems facing this country and awaiting discussion in the House was the problem of our railways. It is a very important problem because the people at the moment are staggering under a load of taxation which is built up largely of deficits in the operation of the National Railways. We have turned over the operation of the system to a company, which, periodically turns in its statement of operating income and outgo. But this House has reserved to itself, Sir, one important function in regard to the financing of the system. It does not propose to interfere—it has not interfered, so we are told by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) —with the actual operation and management of the road; but this House does propose to interfere, has interfered, and will continue, I believe, to interfere with the expenditure of money on capital account. One of the most prolific sources of discussion during the last two sessions, and probably before, has been whether or not this House will vote money to build branch lines, whether it will guarantee the bonds to be issued for the construction of such branch lines. Each line, big or small, has had its own special act, and around that act has centered discussion on the merits or demerits of the proposition. I know of no branch line that has been built of recent years at all events, in fact I know of no branch line which has been built otherwise than after the fullest and freest discussion by this House of its merits or demerits.

Well, the right hon. Prime Minister, we recall, was speaking at Richmond Hill on September 5 and uttering these lofty sentiments about the conduct by parliament of the business of the country. But at that very moment he was on the eve of perpetrating by order in council the most outrageous violation of the rights and privileges of parliament. It had been suggested to him or to his government that a branch line might be built from a point in Rouyn township to the National Transcontinental. I must not detain the House with details of the geography of the district. Suffice to say that Rouyn is in the northern part of Quebec and is well known to all members of this House. There runs at a distance forty-five miles north of it and from the west eastward to its terminus in the city of Quebec the National Transcontinental. To the west of it running from North Bay in a northerly direction and then bending to the west is the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway, which ultimately finds its destination at a junction called Cochrane on the National Transcontinental railway. West of Rouyn some fifty-five miles runs this Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway and, if you drew a line directly west from Rouyn you would intersect the latter railroad at a point called Swastika. From Swastika a road has been built under a Dominion charter eastward over part of the intervening fifty-five miles until it strikes the boundary between Ontario and Quebec at a point just twenty-three miles short of Rouyn. So if that road were to be extended that distance it would reach Rouyn; whereas the present proposition is to build a new road forty-five miles in length from the Transcontinental railway down to Rouyn.

Now it is said—it was said by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Armstrong) last night in his very interesting and instructive address on the north country —that this Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway is equipped for the purpose of developing the mining industry in that north country; it has a frequent and perfectly satisfactory service. The Canadian National road in its course westward from the city of Montreal takes that route north from North Bay to Cochrane, and there is a service, passenger and freight, with every facility for handling the mining output of that country. This is not the time, Mr. Speaker, nor is it the place to discuss the merits of the proposed branch line from Rouyn up to the Transcontinental railroad at O'Brien. That is a matter, and of this we complain very bitterly on this side that, due to the action of the present government we have not been permitted to discuss. No opportunity has been given, as there would have been if there had been a particular bill introduced, to discuss this proposed construction in the House and in the committees of the House, or to put questions in regard to the building of this line, or to discuss whether an issue of bonds to the amount of some $5,000,000 should be authorized and would be proper to be added to the outstanding charges of the National railway system. That, as I say, is a matter we have been given no opportunity to discuss at all, and this, Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to discuss, but it is well within the range of possibility that one would find varying opinions in this House on the one side and on the other as to whether this country should go to the extent of a capital expenditure of $5,000,000 on account of this branch line. I do not attempt to be a judge of that question; I might be influenced one way or the other by the discussion of the matter in this House, but the difficulty is that discussion of it has been entirely closed to us by the action that was taken by the government.

Now how was this Rouyn railway arranged for? The government was asked if it would build the line. Who were active in the proposal I am not in a position to say, but it is fair to say that the government of the province of Quebec was very deeply interested. It is fair to say, I think, that the Noranda mines were interested, and whoever else I do not know, but the course of affairs afterwards shows plainly enough that no matter who were the persons interested in the proposal to build this road, at all events they were not parties to whom the present goverment were unfriendly. The government acceded to the request, and I have no particular objection to that, nor could anybody have, if he felt it was a proper request. But did they take the straightforward, the usual and the legal method of putting into effect the building of that line? Did the government incorporate the matter in a bill and bring it to this House for decision, as had been done in every other case within my knowledge? Not at all. The government entered on a course of evasion. It promoted a scheme to get around the law and to deprive this House of its privilege and right of free discussion in the matter. It entered into a scheme to take advantage of a technicality which would enable it to do something by order in council which it well knew it had no business on earth doing at all. This government, Mr. Speaker, lent itself to the promotion of a dummy company. It lent itself to the wiles and arts of the expert corporation lawyer. It lent itself to all the rigmarole of subsidiary companies and figurehead directors. It lent itself to the device of not letting your left hand know what your right hand doeth. It entered into that scheme, that solemn mummery where a board of directors who do not direct, and never intend to direct, and could not direct, were called upon in meeting and solemnly acquainted with the fact that it was expected if this road was built it could be leased and operated by somebody else—that is to say, if those directors ever took the trouble to read the prepared minute that was laid on the table before them they might have become acquainted with that fact. This board swallowed at one gulp, in a hurried sitting—a long, intricate, involved agreement covering four or five pages of Hansard, probably five or six thousand words in length, and just put its name on the dotted line.

I shall deal, if it is at all necessary, later on, with the method which this government undertook to pursue to accomplish its object. It is sufficient to say at this moment, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of my further point, that it is clear beyond peradventure that this government—through the Canadian National Railway—is actually by its own organization constructing a branch line of railroad 45 miles in length from Rouyn to the National Transcontinental railway. That is my premise.

Now why did not the government come to this House in the ordinary way? Because it wanted to build this road for purposes best known to itself. It knew it had not the legal right to build this road, and it determined to build this road without legal authority in any way that it could devise, and because it thought that by laying out and following this devious path of corporation trickery it could circumvent the law and bring itself into the shelter of an act of this Dominion parliament passed in 1915, but which, as a matter of sober fact, I shall be able to show plainly to this House has nothing to do with the case at all. The very words of the agreement which has been placed before us by my hon. friend for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), and is on Hansard, indicate that it was prepared, drafted and finally put into form for one purpose only—I mean outside the purpose of construction—and that was to try and bring itself within the provisions of this act of 1915 to which I have referred. And so it becomes necessary for me, without any particular technicalities, without any particularly fine discussion of points of law, because I do not intend to go into that, to refer to what the government now presumes has been its authority for acting in this matter by order in council as opposed to the usual course invariably followed of submitting branch lines for discussion and decision to this House.

Before 1915 there were government railways. They were governed by an act called the Canadian Government Railways Act. All I have referred to that for is for the purpose of showing that a government railway was defined in that act to be a railroad "under the management and direction of the Minister of Railways and Canals." Then in 1915 the matter of the bill referred to came up in this House. The party then in power in this House was the Conservative party, with the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden leading the government, and the Right Hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, of lamented memory, leading the opposition. The Conservative party had had as a plank in the election this, that all lines privately-owned attached to the Intercolonial railway should be purchased and added to the Intercolonial railway. It had introduced a bill for that purpose, but it had been defeated, and the matter came up in the House again in 1915. Mark this, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members, that that was a well-known and established situation. Everybody interested in the Intercolonial railway knew of every branch line that was in existence at that moment. A bill was introduced. The hon. member for West York adverted to it in his speech the other day, and I do not intend to go into the matter by way of repetition, except to emphasize one or two points. After introducing the bill the then Minister of Railways pointed to the fact that these independent lines exist in conjunction with the government line subjecting the shipper or passenger to a local rate, so to speak, whereas they might have been on a continuous line getting a through rate, and so on. These were reasons that appealed very strongly to gentlemen on the other side, and were acceded to by them as being sound and substantial reasons. When the question came up Mr. Macdonald—as he was then, but now the Minister of National Defence—took part in the discussion. My hon. friend said in effect: Yes, but this applies to the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island roads only. How about the situation if the government takes over the Transcontinental railway line? It was generally admitted that that would create a different situation, and it was finally, definitely and unanimously agreed, and so appears on Hansard, that the legislation of 1915 applied exclusively and only to the Intercolonial railway and the Prince Edward Island railway. One cannot get away from that, and it is important to recall Hansard because the discussion of that time has a distinct bearing on the whole question. Later on the Transcontinental railway did become a government railway, and later on was added to the Canadian National railway system. But my present point is this—that that act of 1915 was passed definitely and exclusively in regard only to the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways. That is the point that is established, and that point I wish to have borne in mind. Where would the other view lead us? Suppose that in 1916, one year after the act was passed, the Transcontinental line had become a government railway; and suppose that the House was met then with the situation that faces us to-day, and that the Rouyn railway was suddenly approved by order in council under this provision, supposedly, of the act of the year before, the act of 1915? Can any hon. member of this House suppose for one moment that the House could be hoodwinked by any action taken under the act of 1915? Of course it could not. I can see Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Mr. Macdonald rising in righteous indignation and describing such action as an outrageous breach of faith, as indeed it would have been. This is 1926, ten years later. Can it be any less an outrageous breach of faith to try and put this thing through in the manner it has been put through to-day, than it would have been under the same act ten years ago? Statutes do not improve or grow, or change with age. It is the same statute to-day as it was then; and it is plainly to be seen that it can not permit to-day what it did not permit in 1915. The Minister of National Defence, at least, was fully aware of all the circumstances of the passing of that act in 1915; and I am perfectly safe in saying that knowledge of the circumstances of 1915 is within the minds of many of the members of the government and hon. gentlemen sitting around them.

Let me look at the matter in another way. The act of 1915 provided for acquisition in two ways. The government might buy or lease a railroad up to the limit of 200 miles in length, and it was quite safe to entrust to the government the buying or leasing of lines up to that limit because everybody in the House knew what those lines were; they were all then in existence and present to the minds of members who were passing the legislation. Another clause which was allowed to be incorporated in the act was to permit the building of new lines but with the limitation that the road yet to be constructed should not exceed twenty-five miles in length. Now let us look at the matter in this way, bearing in mind these two provisions—that the 200 mile railroad was evidently and very plainly—can any member think otherwise?—a road already in existence. The twenty-five mile road was a new road; by the very terms describing it it must be so; it is a road yet to be constructed. There is no question whatever as to the difference in the two classes, and yet this government claims that the act of 1915 enables it, with its own organization, to build a new line right up to 200 miles in length, and not confined to a line twenty-five miles in length, provided only that it does not allow its left hand to know what its right hand is doing. As long as it does that the government can get out of a solemn act of parliament, and take advantage of something it was never intended it should take advantage of. I cannot see any sense in a proposition of that sort advanced by hon. gentlemen on the other side.

But if we look at the matter in still another way we can see the distinction still more plainly marked. Bear in mind always that the Rouyn branch is a forty-five mile branch. There is the plainly marked distinction between the two classes of railway dealt with in the act of 1915. As to the 200 mile railway all that was required for the purchase was that it be reported within a certain length of time to the House. That was quite right because the House in passing the legislation agreed that all of the existing private lines might be acquired if the government cared to do so. But as to the construction of any new line up to twenty-five miles in length the money was to be voted by parliament. That is the precaution parliament took in regard to any new construction. And, moreover, new construction could not by any possibility be deemed to include this forty-five mile Rouyn branch. There was to be in any event no now construction exceeding 25 miles in length. And yet because this government does not find it convenient to act in the proper way—perhaps because it has been too heavily importuned, perhaps I submit to the judgment of the House, because it was afraid and its friends also that in the state of feeling existing in the House the building of the line would not be approved—it has taken this underhand method of which I complain.

Let us look at one other phase of the question and it is this: If the proposition of the government is sound, then parliament must be said to be agreeing, or to have agreed, to a condition of affairs whereby in four of the nine provinces—Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island—the government may construct a line up to 200 miles in length, whereas in the other five provinces of the Dominion it can do nothing of the sort. Can hon. members think there is any sense in that? Does this House legislate in that way? Does this House legislate so its statutes will have unequal operation? Not at all. This House legislates so that there shall be equal operation all through the Dominion, and not that four provinces will get something that the other five provinces will not get. Now, Mr. Speaker, that act was passed for an existing situation, a situation known to every member of the House in 1915. It was never intended to apply to the situation we have to-day, and the government is strongly to be reprimanded for attempting to strain the act of 1915 so as to bring within its purview something that very plainly was never intended to be so brought.

I wonder how members of this House who are interested in the construction of branch lines feel about this arrangement. I ran across one case the other day; as a matter of fact it had to do with a construction attaching to the Intercolonial railway, four miles in length, at a total cost of $40,000, and still that little branch line had its own act submitted to this House for discussion in 1924 and there was a decision in the House on it. I wonder if members who were here at that time remember those solemn discussions in regard to the different lines, and I wonder how they will now picture the members of the government, while the discussion was going on, sitting with their tongues in their cheeks, and thinking how fatuous hon. members of this House were in dealing with these matters. What do my friends the protagonists of the Hudson Bay railway think of this proposition? My right hon. leader has stated that it was estimated that $3,000,000 would be required for the completion of this line of railway. I do not know the particulars of it. But here is a $5,000,000 proposition which does not come before the House at all, slipped in by order in council, the contract let, the work commenced and this House never hears one word about it. That is the difference when the party wanting the road built is a tried and true friend of the government. Those of you who favour the Hudson Bay railway may think you are friends of the government, or the government is your friend, but how you must worry and repine when you think of what might have been done for you and the Hudson Bay railway if the government had only set its expert corporation lawyer to work to get it done.

The matter may be tested in other ways. I do not wish to take up time going into it more fully, Mr. Speaker, but after what I have done in looking at it crossways, or back to front, or upside down, and testing it in the way I have tested it, I do hope it is plain to members of this House and plain to the wayfaring man that the statute was never intended to apply to any such case as the Rouyn railway. The most casual observer would have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the statute was never intended to apply to this railway. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance undertakes to defend the proposal, and how does he defend it? By saying that it was a good line and that it would be a paying one. That has nothing to do with the case at all, that is a matter to be decided by the House of Commons after full discussion and not by the government. But the Minister of Finance goes further and says, "I defend this proposition in this way: I produce for you an opinion of counsel which says that it is all right, and which says that because the railroad has been started, therefore it is a railroad work. True it is not a railway line, but it is a railroad work because it has been started." As a matter of fact it has not been started. But that was one ground on which the opinion was based. Instead of being furnished with the opinion of counsel of the Canadian National Railways in this matter, I would have preferred to see the opinion of the law officers of the crown, of the Minister of Justice and of the Solicitor General, who know the proceedings of this House and who know very well that the act of 1915 has no relation whatever to the scheme proposed to be put through at this moment. But we have not got that. We have the opinion of outside counsel. It is no concern of this House what my view of the legal question may be, but I do disagree with that, and I say that probably counsel is wrong in his opinion, because he has not had the facts placed before him. His opinion is most guarded and is not an opinion based on the actual facts or covering the situation. Moreover, counsel has not been made aware of the basis upon which that legislation was passed, which is set out so plainly in Hansard of 1915, but the members of the Privy Council who passed that order in council knew it, and they had no business to accept an opinion which they knew was based on false premises and does not approve the thing that is here being done. The circumstance which would have affected the opinion of counsel's knowledge of the proceedings in the House, because even in a court of law you may call in, in aid of the construction of a statute, the proceedings of this House. That is a legal proposition that may be disputed, but I maintain that it is sound. However, what matters that to us? Surely you can bring Hansard of eleven years ago into a discussion between members of this House, between the government and the rest of the House, where they are supposed to be acting in good faith and fairly, to aid you in construction of the statute, and certainly members of the government knew what had passed in 1915. But they deliberately shut their eyes to what they knew was the intention of parliament in passing that act. The late Minister of Railways was also in the Privy Council which passed the order in council of September 26, was also in the House when they were dealing with the matter in 1915, as were many others. I have no doubt it was well known, and if it was not well known it should have been. It was part of their function, their duty and their responsibility to know the circumstances under which that act had been passed.

My hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon), in a moment of heat the other day, applied what he thought was a hard definition to something which had been said or done on this side of the House, when he said, "That exemplifies what a Tory is in power". Now, Mr. Speaker, have we within the present knowledge of members of this House anything more arrogant and autocratic than the action of the Privy Council or this government in passing an order in council allowing the building of that line in direct defiance of the right, the duty and privileges of parliament? Talk of arrogance, despotism and autocracy; if we on this side of the House ever wish to practise those principles, we know very well now where to look for a sound example. I stated that I would discuss this procedure in this matter because it was a matter of interest. Perhaps it is more a matter of amusement than of solid food for discussion, but to my mind this is just exactly how the thing was done. Somebody approached the government and said, "We want to build this line". The Government said "Yes, if you wish it we will do it, but how are we going to do it? Then counsel was consulted and said, "It is a perfectly simple matter; all you do is submit it to the House of Commons". It was reported back that that would not do at all, the bill might never pass, and this railway must be built. Then counsel was told by the government, "That will not do, you must out of your brain devise some means by which it can be done, and we will put it through". He goes at it, enters into this scheme and early forms his dummy company. That statement has been objected to by the Minister of Finance, and he says that this is not a dummy company because it was incorporated by stenographers. I am quite aware of the usual course in incorporating companies. The only significance is that the stenographers were all employees of the Canadian National, and the incorporation was done by that railway. It was a dummy company, because it never had any function. It came into existence purely and simply as part of a lawyer's scheme to enable this government to get over the provisions of the act. That is why it is a dummy company. It was incorporated, held its solemn little meeting, and somebody prepared an agreement which it dutifully accepted.

The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) has gone into that agreement in such detail that it is not necessary for me to go through it again, but the only thing about it that at all resembles a lease is that the parties are described as the lessor and the lessee. It is an agreement to build a road. There is nothing else to it. This dummy company—and my hon. friend objects to its being called a dummy company—has never had and will never have a single thing to do with building the road. What happens is just this: My Progressive friends do not like the wiles of corporation lawyers; they perhaps do not like lawyers at all; but surely they will be interested in knowing that even the government of Canada does not mind stooping low enough to take advantage of every device and bit of trickery that can be employed in order to get through something which it wants to get through and which it cannot get through in a legitimate way. All that this agreement provides is that a payment is fixed which covers interest and sinking fund. In other words, the government pays for the road and pays all the taxes and all other possible outgoes. It maintains the road, and the agreement is so carefully drawn that in case there should be a charge of $100 or $200 for preparing the annual statement and nobody knows how it is going to be paid, the government says: We will pay that so long as you keep it down to a thousand dollars. Therefore, there was never an outgo which the dummy company had to make on its own responsibility. It did not even have to be the source of communication in regard to payment of interest on the bonds or the so-called rental because the agreement very nicely provides: Once the contract is signed, we will pay the trustee for the bondholders everything so that you will not have even any trouble in handling the price.

My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, objects to a supposed statement that because stenographers incorporated this company it is a dummy company; he says: "The directors of the company are 'capitalists' and I will prove to you that some of these gentlemen have money." I am sorry for my hon. friend because he was face to face with something that was very hard to explain. It had been mentioned in this House that the road was to be built by capitalists. If so, these capitalists apparently are going into this project just for the fun of the thing. They are not getting a cent; they are not handling a cent; they are not handling a contract; they are not even writing their names on a piece of paper; they are doing nothing, and even the expense of the solicitor in preparing the annual statement is paid by the government. At the conclusion of thirty years when the bonds are paid, the road is simply turned over to the Canadian National Railways and again the Rouyn Railway Company disappears from our ken. It is not a lease; it is just an arrangement to build a railway, in the name of some one else. Putting your property in your wife's name is a difficult matter compared with this, because the government continued in full enjoyment of all its functions, went ahead with its own gang and constructed and is constructing the road. The other day an hon. member asked a question as to whom the railway would belong when finished. Of course, it belongs to the government when it is built. The whole idea is for the government to build and own this railway in spite of the law. A certain portion of the North American people, particularly in the United States of America, are thrilled by, interested in and enjoy thoroughly literature such as that which appears in a book called Get Rich Quick Wallingford and plays such as one called Within the Law. In other words, smart and clever devices thrill a certain portion of the people, but the gentlemen who are responsible for that output of literature and drama have not found anything in the way of devices or smartness equal to what is done, not by Get Rich Quick Wallingford, but by the government of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. MARCIL: The hon. gentleman has evidently given considerable thought to the act of 1915. That was not a mandatory, but a permissive act. The government of Canada at that time took over a number of branch lines in the east and many others it discriminated against and left out. What applied then, I suppose, will apply now.

Mr. GEARY: I am sorry I did not make myself quite clear, and I am glad of the opportunity of making this point as clear as I can. The act of 1915 took care of two independent lines which the government had then in mind to take over.

Mr. MARCIL: There were several lines—a dozen.

Mr. GEARY: There were. That was the point I was trying to make and I am obliged to the hon. member for calling it to my attention once more. All the lines attached to the Intercolonial railway when that act was under discussion were well known to the members of the House who were discussing them. That is why the members of the House were willing to entrust to the government the privilege of buying or leasing any of those lines up to 200 miles in length on condition only of reporting their action to this House. But the House was equally determined that the government railway should not enter into any new construction exceeding twenty-five miles in length and that it should do so to the extent of twenty-five miles only if this House was called upon to pass the money for that construction.

Mr. MARCIL: They were not all taken over. Some lines two hundred miles in length were left out altogether. The Gaspe railway, which is two hundred miles long, was left out.

Mr. GEARY: As the hon. member says, the act was permissive. I understand that since 1915 none of those lines has been taken over, but I do not know anything about that. It was quite within the option of the government to take over those lines existing in 1915 touching the Intercolonial or the Prince Edward Island railway in the four provinces, namely, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island; that is, while the roads were under the management of the government as government railways being operated under the Government Railways Act.

Mr. CAHILL: Does my hon. friend contend that the Rouyn railway should not have been built?

Mr. GEARY: I am not discussing that.

Mr. CAHILL: Does he contend that the road is to cost more under this scheme than it would under any other scheme of construction?

Mr. GEARY: I am not discussing that phase.

Mr. CAHILL: Then what is the complaint?

Mr. GEARY: I have tried designedly to avoid any discussion as to the merits or demerits of the road as a road. I am taking up only the question of the government by order in council doing something which it had no authority whatever to do.

Mr. CAHILL: A question of morals.

Mr. GEARY: As to the chronology of the matter, in some way this became noised abroad and a question was asked in March of last year. In reply to that question the Minister of Railways said that the Canadian National Railways had suggested to capitalists that if they would build this road it might be leased. We know nothing further of it than that. The capitalists did not appear. Certain capitalists, so-called, representing bond-holders, have taken the place of directors, so we are told, on the Rouyn Railway Company board; but as construction men, railroad men, they do not exist. They are used only for convenience as representing the money that has gone into the railway and these people representing the bondholders or trustees for the bondholders are no more capitalists constructing the road than any other purchasers of bonds issued by the Dominion government in respect of construction. That was in March and things were then pretty well under way. Hon. members may draw their own inferences from the state of fact which is disclosed by the chronology of the matter. There is the reply made by the minister. On April 3, 1925, shortly after the minister had spoken, the Rouyn Railway Company was incorporated by the legislature of the province of Quebec. There must have been a great deal of discussion before that; the matter must have been pretty well completed and ready for crystallization if it was not already crystallized. This House was then in session, it sat until June 27, and on April 3 the railway company had got its incorporation. The minister had considered the proposal to build the road and everything was in train to bring the matter before the House for discussion if there was such a great hurry about it. There was sufficient time to have it taken up in the House if the government deemed it so urgent. On June 9 it was reported to the Canadian National Railways that negotiations had taken place with the Quebec government as to its grant of free lands and money guarantee and as to the guarantee with other parties of $20,000 per month. So that the whole thing was ready for consummation and it could have been brought before the House if it had been the intention to deal with it in the normal, legal way, and to have it incorporated in a bill which could be subjected to discussion. Other branch lines were discussed during last session and this one could have been discussed also. But that was not done; the thing was allowed to drag through the summer until the election came on. The election had been in the air and on September 5 the Prime Minister was talking about railways on a high plane while at the same time he knew that he was on the eve of putting through this order in council. And will hon. members recall how busy the government was at that time. Although the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) had been appointed some weeks before that, he did not find it possible even to enter his office, and as a matter of fact he did not do so until the first of November. Yet there was time to put this through. On September 14 there began a series of meetings and there was a great rush. The Rouyn Railway held its famous little meeting at which it was said that such and such might be the case. "Here is a form of lease", they were told, "and if you approve an arrangement can be entered into". And so on. On the 21st the Canadian National Railways met and accepted the proposition and on September 26 the cabinet met and presumably discussed this important matter in its different phases and passed the necessary order in council. That was the time, between September 14 and September 26, when this government was so immersed in political business and election affairs that it could not attend to the ordinary business of the country. So busy were they that the Minister of Customs was unable to enter his office. Still there was time to hold these various meetings, to call the Privy Council together, and to issue a solemn order in council providing that this railway, so much desired by someone, should be put through, denying in this way the right of parliament to discuss the matter on its merits. The general election was little more than a month in the future. Is it not reasonable to suppose that that fact entered largely into consideration?

It is a matter which perhaps it is difficult to bring clearly to the attention of the House. I have endeavoured to assure my hon. friends opposite that I am finding no fault with the acquisition of railways in the four provinces contemplated by the act of 1915; nor am I here finding fault, although there may be room for discussion, with the building of the Rouyn railway. I might or I might not agree with it; I am not given an opportunity to consider the matter. I am simply directing the attention of the House to this one point, that this government which, in season and out of season, has been so indignant over the procedure of the Conservative party on former occasions in issuing certain orders in council, has now had uncovered one of its deeds wherein, to the extent of $5,000,000, it has allowed public money to be spent without giving parliament an opportunity to discuss the advisability of that expenditure; and this, not because there was any hurry, but solely and for reasons best known to itself, with a view to depriving this House of its proper opportunity for discussion. The rights and privileges of the House of Commons were flouted in that transaction as they have never been flouted before. I submit this to the judgment of the House with a good deal of confidence; I submit it to my friends to the left, who are interested in branch lines and who can see for themselves how these things can be done by this government when it suits their convenience. The thing is not only wrong in itself; it indicates what this government will do and must do in the circumstances in which it finds itself. It has existed for four years by barter and compromise and is determined to go through any number of weeks and months by means of subterfuge and barter and compromise once again. The government in justice to itself, to redeem by one grand act all the faults of which it has been guilty, should resign. That would be the one redeeming feature of its career. It has not the confidence of the House; it has not the confidence of its supporters. And surely it has no moral strength or character, for it is prepared to go to any length to retain the place it now occupies.

One looks across at the scattered remnants of the contingent from Saskatchewan and pictures those gentlemen, like the song of the nine little niggers, one disappearing every day. I can see those hon. gentlemen coming to their seats each one looking at his desk-mate and wondering, are you the next? This government has decided to use the fine province of Saskatchewan as a borrow-pit from which it can draw material to shore up up its tottering structure. It is reduced to all sorts of expedients. In the course to which it is condemned it cannot function nor govern. I repeat, it has not the confidence of the House and hon. members by their votes should declare that it has lost also the confidence of the people and should resign from office.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): In rising to say a few words in this debate it is not my purpose to enter into any discussion of the questions generally before the House but to confine myself almost exclusively to the subject which has just been considered by my hon. friend from South Toronto (Mr. Geary), the matter of the Rouyn railway. And at the outset may I say that I have no intention of discussing the advisability or otherwise of building that railway from O'Brien on the Transcontinental to the township of Rouyn. I do not intend to deal with the question whether there should be a railway from that part of the country or whether railway connections should be secured in some other way, because I look on that aspect of the subject as one that is particularly of interest to the province of Quebec, and I have no right and no desire to suggest what they shall do in the matter of providing railway facilities through their own province. The aspect of the subject with which I wish to deal is the relationship of the government of Canada and of the Canadian National Railways to this whole proposition.

My hon. friend from South Toronto, referring to the opinion which the government secured as to whether this railway should be built or not, told us that the Minister of Finance had made the statement in the House the other evening that they had obtained the views of counsel on this matter. In looking through the papers that have been made available I have not been able to find any such opinion. The opinion of counsel may have been asked as to the merits of the question and as to whether the construction of this railway by the Canadian National Railways would be a good thing or not. But I have some doubt on that point. Until I see the documents themselves I will not conclude that the general counsel for the Canadian National Railways gave his opinion in that regard. My view is that the documents in connection with the case, set forth in Hansard, were submitted to him and that he, good lawyer as he is, going into the matter carefully, gave to the government his opinion that perhaps by this circuitous method they might be able to do something that otherwise they could not do and keep within the law. That is about as far as the general counsel for the system would go or could be expected to go in the matter—simply to deal with the legal aspects.

But coming to the position of the government in relation to the case, let us for a moment observe what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) said in his effort to explain and defend the attitude of the government.

> Hon. members will recall that away back in 1922, 1923 and 1924, there were reports of great mineral development in the northern part of Quebec. In 1923 and 1924 particularly, reports came to us of rich finds in that part of the country, and representations were made, not only to the Canadian National Railways, but to other railways, that they should extend a line into that district. In 1924, Mr. Timmins of the Hollinger Mines approached the President of the Canadian National Railways urging him to build a line into that section of the country. A survey was made of it and the railway directors and the president were not satisfied that the building of a road in there would be a profitable venture.

That was after the matter had been before the government and the country during 1922, 1923 and 1924, and again in 1925. Then we find him saying a little further on:

> Shortly afterwards another discovery was made of the Noranda mines and again they were approached to build a road. Representations were such that engineers were sent there to make a very careful survey of the possiblities of that section of country. It was discovered that there were very rich mineral deposits and there was a rush not only of miners, but of railways to get into that district. It is well known that an Ontario railway that has been made very profitable to the province at large by going into the mining country was anxious to build a line.

Now, at this point may I just ask why the government of Canada should have been interested in that at all. It was not a matter for this government, it was not a matter for this parliament. It was a matter between the Canadian National Railways and the government of Quebec. Those who followed the press reports during the discussion of the question will recall that the Premier of Quebec declared the readiness of his government to do what was their right and arrange railway communication for themselves.

But passing from that altogether, let us assume, if we may, that it would have been wise for the Canadian National Railways to have had a branch line into Rouyn district. First, let me say that it was for the parliament of Canada to determine that, having all the facts before it. I am not going into the legal aspects at all, more than to say that before a branch line is built by the Canadian National Railways or for them, creating an obligation on the Canadian people, parliament is the one and only body to decide what shall be done in the premises. But taking the whole scheme as we now have it, and, let me say again, assuming that there was justification for building that railway, let us see what method is followed in providing the means, and so try if we can to get at what the government may term its justification for the course it took. I am going to ask the House to bear with me while I read a few of the extracts that have already been put on Hansard. I do so for the purpose of connecting what I wish to say in regard to this. The first is:

> Extract from minutes of meeting of the Board of Directors of Rouyn Mines Railway Company, duly held in the city of Montreal, on Monday, the fourteen day of September, 1925.

There is just one thing wrong with that. The title should be "The Campaign Funds Company of 1925," not the Rouyn Mines Railway Company; because, Sir, as is disclosed here, and as has been tacitly admitted by the only minister who has so far ventured to offer any reasons whatever for the action of the government, it never was the intention that this company should build or own the railway; the intention was that it should be a branch line of the Canadian National Railways. Then why incorporate this dummy company at all? Simply because in September there was evidently a conviction that a railway must be built at once, and funds must be provided at once, notwithstanding the fact, as the minister has already said, that the whole question had been before the government, before the country and before parliament since 1922. Let me continue this extract from the minutes:

The meeting was informed that arrangements can, it is expected, be made for the lease to His Majesty the King in the right of the Dominion of Canada, herein called the government, of the line of railway intended to be constructed by the company,

And so on. Then I find in the draft lease submitted at that meeting the following recital:

Whereas the lessor was incorporated by an Act of the Legislative Assembly of the Province of Quebec, being chapter 110 of the acts passed in the year 1925, with power to construct and operate the line of railway hereinafter mentioned, and to make the issue of bonds.

And so on. Then follows this recital:

And whereas the Minister of Railways and Canals (hereinafter called the minister) is of the opinion that the said line of railway is a line of railway which can more conveniently and usefully be operated as a part of the Government Railways system and one which may be deemed necessary or desirable for the more efficient operation of the said system.

Let me ask, Mr. Speaker, if it was the opinion of the Minister of Railways and Canals that the railway could be more efficiently operated as a branch of the Canadian National Railways, why did he not come to parliament last session, submit all the facts and ask for authority to build the railway in the manner in which any branch line of the Canadian National Railways should be built? Then follows this recital:

And whereas the lessor pursuant to section 8 of the Act incorporating the lessor proposes to create an issue of not exceeding $5,000,000 of thirty year 4½ per cent first mortgage bonds.

My hon. friend the member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) addressed a question to the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) as to whether this railway was going to cost more built under the present method than if it had been built by the Canadian National Railways in the regular way. Well, I propose to show that the whole purpose of the plan set out in these amazing documents was to provide a means to mulct the country of $5,000,000 to do something that in the end is worth only $2,250,000 and no more. Here is the initial step in the course that the government intended to follow in the name of the Canadian National Railways. Let me read the recital again:

And whereas the lessor pursuant to section 8 of the act incorporating the lessor proposes to create an issue of not exceeding $5,000,000 of thirty year 4½ per cent first mortgage bonds.

What for? What did they want this $5,000,000 of bonds for? Well, in the very next phrase of the same paragraph of the agreement itself, it is set out that they are going to build a railway that they themselves estimate will cost $3,500,000. Yet they are going to issue $5,000,000 of thirty year 4½ per cent bonds which the people of Canada are going to guarantee, and, mark you, we guarantee to pay not only a rental for that railway, interest and sinking fund, all expenses in connection with the flotation of the bonds, the creation of the trust, and so forth, but as well we must absolutely retire the bonds in thirty years. Now what is that other $1,500,000 for? What was this dummy company going to do with it? It is set out clearly: We are going to guarantee $5,000,000 of bonds to construct a line that the Rouyn Railway Company says is going to cost only $3,500,000. Let us see what the Minister of Finance has to say in this regard. Let me say in all fairness to him that in speaking on this question he frankly stated on the floor of the House that he had never even read the lease, and did not know what it contained; he knew practically nothing about it. I am sorry the minister is not in his seat, but I am sure that every man in the House will agree with me when I say that we absolutely accept what the Minister of Finance said, for we have the utmost confidence in his personal integrity, but where the Minister of Finance and every other member of the government is responsible is that they allowed an agreement of this character to receive the approval of the government by way of order in council without apparently knowing what the document contained.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): I did not follow clearly just where the hon. gentleman gets that estimate of $3,500,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is the statement of the so-called Rouyn Mines Railway Company.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): Is it embodied in the document?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes, and here is just another evidence, Mr. Speaker, that we have on the floor of the House this afternoon another member of the government responsible for passing this order in council when he did not know what the agreement contained.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): I do not want to interrupt the hon. gentleman, for I do not believe in interruptions, but my hon. friend well knows that many documents pass the government of Canada the full details of which are not in the minds of the ministers who have to take the responsibility. I am not wishing to shirk one iota of responsibility; I asked my question simply with a view to information, as the hon. member had mentioned the point.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will give my hon. friend the information. Here it is:

And whereas the lessor pursuant to section 8 of the act incorporating the lessor proposes to create an issue of not exceeding $5,000,000 of thirty year 4½ per cent first mortgage bonds (hereinafter called the said bonds) of which it is expected that approximately $3,500,000 will be required to provide for the cost of construction of the said line of railway—

That is the declaration of this so-called company, that they are going to build a railway which they say is likely to cost $3,500,000, and yet they are going to ask the government to provide $5,000,000 with which to do it. The Minister of Finance said that in his judgment the road would cost $2,655,000. I say to the House, assuming the Rouyn railway is a proper line that should be a branch of the Canadian National railway for them to build and operate, the very outside figure the line should cost, if constructed under proper conditions, would be $50,000 a mile, or $2,225,000 in all, because in the construction of that branch line, what is necessary, viewing the matter from the standpoint of practical railway operation? Nothing more or less than the roadbed, with tracks for 45 miles of railway, and a turn-around terminal in the township of Rouyn. The Canadian National have their terminal at O'Brien and all the equipment and everything else that is necessary to operate this road, and all that is required is the roadbed itself of an ordinarily constructed branch line railway capable of taking care of light power and the ordinary freight traffic that will pass over the road. That is the whole story, and when you put the construction cost at $50,000 a mile, or a total of $2,225,000, you have gone the extreme limit.

I pass on. Without labouring the question or boring the House with any more extracts from the lease, if you will look now at page 1184 of Hansard—

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): Does my hon. friend not intend to deal with the provisions against excess cost of construction?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no such provision by the government.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): By the company. If my hon. friend does not propose to deal with that, I ask him if it is not a fact that the engineers of the Canadian National railways will inspect and pass upon every mile of the construction cost.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I have no knowledge what the facts are as to—

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): I am asking my hon. friend if it is not a fact that such a provision is contained in the document from which he is reading.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What the engineer of the Canadian National railway does has no bearing on this at all. The rental for this railway is not based on what the railway is going to cost. If there was a provision in this contract by which this dummy company would build a railway under the supervision of the Canadian National railway engineers, and the Canadian National railway or the Canadian government would pay an annual rental that would retire the bonds necessary to build the railway, that would be an entirely different thing. But it is not a question of what the railway is going to cost at all.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): Will my hon. friend, instead of arguing around the question, deny that there is a provision that the construction of the line by the company shall be supervised as to cost by the engineers of the Canadian National railway?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Let me say again, there is.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): That is all I wanted to get.

Mr. NICHOLSON: There is a provision that the trustee for the bondholders shall have inspections made to see that the funds provided by the trustee for the bondholders shall be properly expended, but there is nothing in this agreement, until it gets to $5,000,000, that protects the Canadian National railways. It is simply a case of the Canadian government giving a blank cheque for $5,000,000 to a dummy company to build a branch line for the Canadian National railway which the dummy company says is going to cost $3,500,000, which the Finance minister says should not cost more than $2,655,000, and which I say any practical railway man will tell you will not cost, if properly constructed, more than $2,225,000. There is the point. The rental is not based on the cost of the railway at all. The rental is based purely on this—I will read the paragraph for my hon. friend and then he will know for himself.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): Reading a paragraph without giving the context and sequence may give a wrong impression.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Paragraph (a) of the agreement reads:

During the first and every subsequent year of the said term such sum as shall be sufficient (in accordance with the terms and provisions of the deed of trust or mortgage securing the said bonds) to pay the interest and sinking funds upon the said bonds for the time being issued and outstanding, and all other monies lawfully payable under such deed of trust or mortgage, including accrued interest on bonds purchased or drawn for redemption under the sinking fund provisions thereof.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): Quite correct, but my hon. friend is forgetting it is all hinged on the question of cost.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, no. Read it.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): It all hinges on the question of cost.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Read it.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): I was listening while the hon. gentleman was reading it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not that part. He has not read that part at all.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If my hon. friend wants me to do it I will read the whole agreement.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): I am not going to say anything more. Go ahead.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Let me read again:

And whereas the lessor pursuant to section 8 of the act incorporating the lessor proposes to create an issue of not exceeding $5,000,000 of thirty year 4½ per cent first mortgage bonds—

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend; I want him to make his speech. But he is harping on the fact that because $5,000,000 is mentioned the cost must of necessity be $5,000,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What I say is that this agreement provides that the rental shall be paid. There is no question in this agreement as to what the railway is going to cost, the amount of money it is going to get. There is a distinct undertaking as to the rental that is going to be paid, and such rental is to be sufficient to pay the annual interest and sinking fund on $5,000,000. There is not one single word in the agreement, from A to Z, that provides for anything else.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): I beg your pardon.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will endeavour to get through before six o'clock, and I hope the minister will take the floor at eight o'clock and undertake to explain this transaction.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): I am not able, so far as I can see now, to go on after eight o'clock to discuss the railway question, but possibly I may see my way clear to do so. I will make a point of studying it, and giving a version later on as to the proper interpretation to be placed on the contract and upon everything else in connection with it.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am delighted to know the minister is at last going to make a study of this contract. I will only say to him that having regard to the financial position of this country it would have been very much better if the minister and the other members of the government had studied it before it was entered into. Now, may I continue. As I said—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is there anything in the lease which prevents the directors of the dummy company issuing bonds for more than the actual cost?

Mr. NICHOLSON: There is nothing anywhere within the four corners of this document.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): If I may be permitted, that is a very adroit question, but it will not work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Tell us what the trouble is.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): In plain English—my right hon. friend knows it better than anyone else in this House—that provision is made for the construction cost.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the difference in the provision?

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): If $5,000,000 is mentioned as the maximum amount for which it can be completed, it does not follow that the cost will be $5,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit me? I know there is provision for supervising the construction cost, but of what value is it unless you hold the directors down against the issue of bonds for more than that amount?

Mr. CAHILL: I rise to a point of order. Is the hon. member for East Algoma making a speech, or is it a debate across the floor? Let the hon. member continue his speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: An hon. member may not be interrupted except with his consent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Had the hon. member (Mr. Cahill) not better sit down?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member who has the floor has the right to refuse to answer questions if he so chooses.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am not finding any fault whatever with the Minister of the Interior injecting himself into the discussion, because I submit that the further inquiry is made the more clearly it will be shown that the government, or at least some members of it, knew nothing whatever as to the character of the agreement into which they were entering, and that is the whole point.

The Minister of Finance, following my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) the other night said that he had never even read the lease. I say you can read the lease from beginning to end and you cannot find anything in it except this provision—that the Canadian National Railways will pay the rental, and will redeem $5,000,000 worth of bonds.

Now, I will give another aspect of that in a few moments. The Minister of Finance stated in reply to the hon. member for West York that the total amount of money that had been spent on this railway up to January 31, 1926 was $130,000. But if you look at the document you will find this:

Extract from minutes of meeting of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway Company.

Held in the Company's offices in the city of Montreal, on Monday the 21st day of September, 1925.

The meeting was informed that the Rouyn Mines Railway Company—

Otherwise "The 1925 Campaign Funds Company"— —has been negotiating for a loan—

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the hon. gentleman? I take exception to a statement of that kind. I do not think that any hon. member has a right to make such a statement and get away with it without some exception being taken. Will the hon. gentleman inform the House where he obtained the information that campaign funds came out of this company?

Mr. NICHOLSON: If my hon. friend will bear with me for just a very few minutes I will state all the facts and then he can draw his own conclusion.

Mr. STEWART (West Edmonton): Drawing a conclusion is quite a different thing from making an alleged statement of fact. I take very serious exception to a statement of that character coming from the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know what rule prevents the hon. gentleman from describing the dummy company in any language he likes, unless members of the House are members of the company.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I will simply read what took place at a meeting of the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways:

The meeting was informed that the Rouyn Mines Railway Company—

And I again designate it as "The 1925 Campaign Funds Company," absolving my hon. friend absolutely from any knowledge whatsoever of what took place or was taking place.

The meeting was informed that the Rouyn Mines Railway Company has been negotiating for a loan through Dillon, Read and Company of New York of up to $2,000,000 to be secured by the pledge of, not exceeding $3,000,000 of its thirty year, 4½ per cent first mortgage bonds—

Now the company issuing these $5,000,000 bonds were just waiting to get their trust deed completed and the trustee appointed in order that those bonds should go on the market. They required, as the Minister of Finance stated in his speech the other evening, $130,000 to carry on their work until January 31, 1926, but they were in such a tremendous hurry for $2,000,000 on the 14th of September that they could not wait until they could get the trust deed completed; they could not wait until the bonds could be put on the market. They had to get a special guarantee from the Canadian National railway board of directors, not from the government of Canada, for $2,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They had the government guarantee.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes. I am coming to that in a moment, and I will show the position the government took in relation to it. Now we come to a meeting held on September 26, 1925 in the office of the Privy Council in Ottawa:

The committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 25th September, 1925, from the Right Honourable the Prime Minister—

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want you to note this. The report is not from the Minister of Railways at all; it is from the Prime Minister acting for the Minister of Railways. And then is set out the whole of the terms of this lease, and a copy of what was presented to this other meeting in the city of Montreal by this railway company, so-called, on 14th September, 1925. And what do we find in connection with that? The Mines Railway proposed to create an issue not exceeding $5,000,000 worth of bonds, and so on; and the position is recited again by which the government of Canada, not the Canadian National Railways, will pay the interest and sinking fund on these bonds. It goes on further to say:

That the guarantee by the Canadian National Railway Company of the loan to the Mines Railway has been agreed upon in the general form hereto attached marked "F".

I submit to my hon. friend that he should review these circumstances. Here is a railway proposition which has been before the people of this country, and particularly before the government of the province of Quebec, since 1922, for the construction of a railway from a point on the Canadian National railway or the Transcontinental railway into the township of Rouyn; a railway that the government of the province of Quebec had a perfect right to construct at any time they desired. The whole matter before the government of Quebec was one of negotiation, as every hon. member who has been following the public affairs of this country knows, between the government of the province of Quebec and the officers of the Canadian National from 1922 onwards. The House of Commons was in session until some time in June last year. These matters were still under consideration, but on the 14th of September a condition of urgency apparently was reached. What was it that happened in the township of Rouyn or in any other part of that north country in September last to make it so urgent that this railway had to be built at once? Does anybody who knows anything about that north country know of anything special that took place? There was nothing more than has been happening from day to day since the mineral discovery was made in northern Quebec; nothing whatever. There was nothing exceptional in connection with the controversy over the question whether the Nipissing Central Railway should build in there, or whether the Canadian Pacific Railway should build. But all at once it became so urgent that a company had to be formed. What was the company going to do? Let me repeat: they were going to build a railway which they themselves said was to cost about $3,500,000. They had bonds guaranteed by this government for $5,000,000, under a lease passed by the order in council on September 26. So urgent was the case that on September 26 they had to do something.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Again let me say they could not wait until they put their bonds on the New York market, could not wait for the trust deed to be completed, but had to go to the Canadian National Railway and get a short term guarantee for a loan of $2,000,000. What were they going to do with it? Work that the Minister of Railways stated in the House the other evening required the expenditure of $130,000 up to the end of January last. Will any reasonable man who knows anything about the borrowing or lending of money believe that the five directors, with a guarantee of $5,000,000 of bonds in their pockets, could not get $130,000 from any bank in Canada, without the necessity of a guarantee from the Canadian National to enable them to borrow $2,000,000 in New York? I will name the five directors mentioned by the hon. Minister of Finance in his speech. They were:

Robert Adair of Montreal; Charles M. Hart of Montreal; Mr. Donat Raymond of Montreal, proprietor of the Windsor Hotel; Mr. Harold Fowler and Mr. Clifton M. Miller, of New York City.

There is no explanation of why this circuitous method was adopted. If the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway felt that it was a good thing that that branch line railway should be constructed and had come to parliament and submitted the matter to us, I for one would have been prepared to examine into the facts and to endorse the proposal if it appealed to my judgment; because I am not one of those who think that the Canadian National Railway should not be permitted to build branch lines. They must build them wherever they are necessary to serve the country and to act as feeders to the National railway. But if they had done that, and if parliament had given them the sanction that it will give in every case where it is necessary, and they had undertaken the construction, what course would they have followed? Is it not a fact that they would have called for tender for the construction of the railway. But what happens under this arrangement? Are any tenders called for by the company?

The next step is that this company is incorporated. It matters not who constitutes the company; it is a dummy from first to last. The whole scheme from begining to end is just a plan to flout this parliament in the first instance. But what happens? The company goes ahead and builds the railway. No one knows anything about it. Then they proceed to the the approving of the trustees and bondholders, and all the vouchers for the work that is to be done are made out here. In other words, this means the turning over of the construction of the forty-five miles to whoever the dummy company might choose as their contractor without competition. It is provided in this agreement—

Mr. CAHILL: Does my hon. friend know who the contractors are?

Mr. NICHOLSON: No, I have no knowledge of the contractors. I am not in the secrets of the dummy company. Neither am I in the secrets of the government, if they know who the contractors are. But let me say that under the provisions of this agreement all these people have to do is to go ahead and build the railway themselves, and to do as has been done from one end of Canada to the other—fleece this country by building the railway and constructing works which cost two or three times what they should. Some day we may have an opportunity of going into that phase of it.

Then I deal with another point. It is being paraded as a protection for the National railways that the government of the province of Quebec is going to provide $50,000 a year; and certain guarantors, who I believe are the officers and directors of the Noranda mine, are going to guarantee $20,000 a year to provide for any possible deficit there might be in the operation of the Rouyn railway. That I think is a fair statement. It is thought that perhaps under normal conditions, and operated as a railway usually should be operated, there might be a deficit, and to provide against that the government of Quebec agrees to contribute $50,000 a year and the Noranda mine agrees to contribute $20,000 a year. But what precaution was taken to make it certain that the guarantors would never be called upon to put up a cent? There is a provision in regard to revenue from freight or traffic. It matters not where it originates, whether in British Columbia, in the Maritime provinces, or any other place, that one-third of the total revenue for transporting freight or traffic from any point on the Canadian National to any point on the Rouyn railway shall be credited to the cost of the Rouyn railway; and vice versa, on traffic originating on the Rouyn railway and destined for points on the Canadian National, one-third of the revenue will be credited to the Rouyn railway. How does it work out? It is impossible to take the whole of the Canadian National railway system station by station and determine what that means. But let us take the city of Montreal as a common distributing centre, and I will refer to three single items to show you just exactly what is meant. Take a carload of sugar shipped from the city of Montreal to the end of the Rouyn railway; the total freight at present rates for a full car loaded to capacity would be $576. The haul of the Canadian National is approximately 700 miles. The portion the Canadian National proper would secure would be $387 and the Rouyn railway $189. The car mileage rate on the Canadian National railway would be 55 cents and the car mileage rate on the Rouyn railway would be $4.20. It is reasonable to suppose a lot of machinery will be shipped into that country if the country develops as we all hope it will. On a carload of machinery shipped from the same shipping centre, Montreal, a distance of 700 miles, the gross charges will be $544. The Canadian National Railways will receive as their share, $362.67, and the Rouyn Mines railway will receive for its forty-five miles, if we assume that the carload is shipped to the end of the line, $181.33. In that case the Canadian National Railways gets fifty-one cents per car mile and the Rouyn railway, $4.03 per car mile. On a carload of groceries shipped from the same centre or an equal distance, the gross charges will be $720. The Canadian National Railways will receive as their share, $480, and the Rouyn railway, $240; or sixty-eight cents per car mile for the Canadian National Railways and $5.44 per car mile for the Rouyn railway.

Let me say in conclusion in regard to that: When you operate a branch line railway connected with any trunk line system, you take into account, first, what the branch line provides and, second, what the trunk line system provides. The trunk line system provides the terminals as the Canadian National Railways have already done at O'Brien. They provide the shops, the supervision, the management, the superintendence, trainmasters, train despatchers and everything else of that kind. The branch line, as I said a moment ago, provides simply the road, passing tracks, and possibly a turning point in the township of Rouyn. In face of that, if you go over the whole list of goods and take for example goods shipped from Toronto, Hamilton, Galt or any of the other manufacturing centres of Ontario; or if you take a carload of coal shipped from Alberta where the haul will probably be two thousand miles; or if you take coal shipped from Nova Scotia—and there will certainly be large shipments of coal into the Rouyn district if it is to be developed, because you cannot carry on a smelting business without coal and coke—what do you find? In every single case the Rouyn railway gets more than eight times per car mile what the Canadian National railway gets, making quite certain from the start that in the construction of this railway neither of the guarantors will ever be called upon to put up a single nickel of the guarantee; they have seen to it that no such thing as a deficit can ever occur, even though only one or two cars of freight move each way each day of the year. Just stop and consider what that means. It will cost $181.33 for moving a carload of machinery; $189 for moving a carload of sugar, and $240 for moving a carload of groceries forty-five miles. Examine the whole document from A to Z; do what you will with it, and you will find it is nothing more or less than a crudely constructed or drawn together camouflage in an effort to delude the people of this country and to secure what the government had in mind, simply the incorporation of what I said a moment ago, not a dummy railway company, but a campaign fund company for the campaign in the city of Montreal in September last.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. G. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to add a word of congratulation to you on your re-election to the position which you so graciously and impartially fill and to congratulate also the mover and the seconder of the Address on their splendid effort in putting before us the government's policy, which has been acclaimed with so much satisfaction throughout this whole Dominion and in western Canada particularly.

I would also congratulate the Conservative party on its choice of leader (Mr. Meighen). It had never been my privilege to listen to the right hon. gentleman before coming to this House. I must say that as a debater he has, I believe, few peers; his sallies are delightfully refreshing. And as for advocating the policy of his party in the country, I do not believe that anyone could do it better than he. But that policy was so unpopular in the province which I have the great honour to represent—I am the first person born within its borders to be elected to this House—that not one of the right hon. gentleman's followers was returned. The leader of the opposition scolds the members from Saskatchewan because of their attitude towards the tariff. Let me say that we from that province are here to put before parliament the views of the people of Saskatchewan, and if hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to look into the record of the election of members to parliament from Saskatchewan since it became a province of the Dominion they will find that the people there have elected only two Conservatives to the House of Commons, one in 1908, defeated in the next election, and another in 1911, also defeated in the ensuing election. The next election after 1911 was held in 1917 and neither Conservatives nor Liberals were returned to parliament from the province of Saskatchewan, all the members being Unionists. In 1921 not a Conservative was returned, and again in 1925 not a Conservative. With 21 seats in the last election 16 Liberals were elected, the number being now 17, soon to be increased to 18.

As regards the tariff in Saskatchewan, our people are predominantly against any increase in customs duties. They sell all they produce in the open markets of the world in open competition and the tariff can do them no good whatever. That is the provincial view. But the people of Saskatchewan are first of all Canadians of the highest type, which they proved beyond the shadow of a doubt in the great national and international tragedy of the last decade. They are Canadians and therefore they will make some sacrifice and concede a tariff to the Dominion so long as that tariff is just and in the interests of the country as a whole. We must use a little common sense in relation to the tariff. When anyone comes to the government and asks to have a duty put on a certain article because he cannot produce that article on such a basis as to be able to sell it in competition with similar goods imported into the country, he thereby admits that he cannot produce it in Canada to sell in any other country. So that when a tariff is given to protect that article in order that it may be sold in Canada to any great extent we must look after the home consumer, who is the only one that can buy that article. Several members of the opposition have said that a lower tariff is driving our young people from the farms to the United States. My view is that on account of too high protection they are leaving the farms because they cannot make a decent living; they are driven to our cities, and when they cannot find employment there they go to the United States. The reason is not too low a tariff; it is too high a tariff.

The right hon. leader of the opposition and his followers have said a great deal about a tariff on butter. If we look at that from a common sense standpoint what do we find? Montreal contains one-eighth of the population of the Dominion, not one of whom makes any butter, but all of whom eat it. Now, as a farmer and rancher, I claim that I have no right to be given a special privilege to charge the people of that city or of any other urban centre in the Dominion more money for what they have to eat.

The right hon. leader of the opposition stated that the press of Saskatchewan is all Liberal. The reason is not that the press of that province has been bought up by big interests; it is that the policy of the right hon. gentleman is not looked on with favour there, and the papers that supported his policy lost their subscribers in such numbers that naturally they died for lack of circulation. In this connection I should like to read a clipping from the Kingston Whig of February 17, 1926:

Politicians and Newspapers

Mr. C. R. McIntosh of North Battleford performed a service for every newspaper when he stood up in his place in the House of Commons on Monday and interrupted Hon. S. F. Tolmie, of Victoria, who stated that Mr. Dunning controlled the newspapers in Saskatchewan, Mr. McIntosh, who owns two newspapers in Saskatchewan, promptly told Dr. Tolmie that no government controlled his papers. It's a habit politicians have—both Conservatives and Liberals—this talking about "controlled" newspapers. We heard a lot about it during Union government days. It's all a myth. The day of the politically controlled organ is gone, never to return. Most newspaper men value their independence as much as a member of parliament does his.

Already this session we have heard a great deal about Maritime rights. The only thing I have been able to gather since I have been in the House respecting Maritime rights is that certain people from the Maritime provinces want a special rate on coal; I have not heard that they want anything else; I think that is their trouble. Just a little common sense there, too, at the present time will help us to fully appreciate the situation. The other day I ascertained that anthracite coal in the city of Montreal was worth to the consumer $26 per ton, while coke was worth $17 per ton. The all rail freight rate, I believe, is $4.50 from the Maritime provinces to Montreal. If the mine operators of the Maritimes cannot pay the freight rate with the prices for coal and coke now prevailing in Montreal, a lowering of that rate will never do them any good.

We have also heard a good deal regarding coal from our Alberta friends. Alberta coal is good coal; no doubt about that. But as a man born and brought up in Saskatchewan, and having lived there most of my life, I can say that in order to keep warm during the winter we have to burn quite a lot of coal. What has been our experience? We buy what is known as Pennsylvania hard coal—when we can get it—at double the price of Alberta coal. I do not think that the people of Saskatchewan have been foolish for thirty years in using Pennsylvania coal by preference. I think Pennsylvania anthracite is usually worth double the Alberta product; and if the coal operators of Alberta are given a special freight rate on coal to Ontario I cannot see that they will ever be able to sell their coal there at an even price with Pennsylvania coal, which they would have to do if they got such a rate.

We have no right, as I see it, to force the railways to grant a special rate on coal. I do not see why the people of the Dominion should pay part of Ontario's coal bill. The suggestion has been made by the government of Ontario, I believe, that a third of the cost over and above the $7 rate be paid by Ontario, a third by Alberta, and the remaining third by the Dominion government. If we start to put a special rate on Alberta coal or on Maritime coal transported to the centre of Canada, then, it seems to me, everybody in the Dominion has the same right to have the coal rates lowered. Not only so, but I have as much right to ask that apples be shipped from Ontario, or lumber from British Columbia or fish from Nova Scotia to Saskatchewan at a special rate as the coal man has to seek a special rate on coal.

Mr. McGIBBON: What about wheat?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Wheat is being shipped on a rate set by statute, which neither you nor I have any right to discuss.

Mr. McGIBBON: The loss is $6,000,000 a year.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): If that is the case, and you will project the wheat rate on the same basis from Fort William to Toronto, it will bring your coal rate to $10.50 a ton.

Just a word respecting our freight rates today. Everybody seems to take great delight in jumping on the railways, both the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific. It will no doubt interest hon. members to know that our freight rates are lower than those in any other country in the world. The freight rate in Great Britain per ton mile is equal to 2.84 cents; in Switzerland to 6.20; in Norway, 4.47 cents. In Australia it ranges from 2.8 in the commonwealth to 3.20 in South Australia, 3.94 in West Australia and 2.79 in New South Wales; in United States 1.116; in Canada 1.019. The Canadian National is .968 cents—the lowest freight rate in the world. And still we ask to have the freight rates reduced here. Hon. gentlemen opposite are always endeavouring to bolster up industry in order to keep people employed in this country. I would like to give them a figure or two regarding the railways. The assets of the Canadian Pacific railway alone in this country are worth more than the national debt of Canada. The payroll on all Canadian railways in the year 1924 was $231,517,863; there was in addition expended in Canada on materials, supplies for the railways, and other expenses, $146,077,729, or a total spent by the railways in Canada in wages and the buying of supplies of $377,595,592. That I claim is an industry that should be looked after by the people of Canada.

The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and his followers went from one end of this country to the other in the last campaign, and they have been talking the same way in this House since they came here, saying that the trade of the country was declining, industry was at a standstill, people were leaving the country, business was not good at all, and yet Sir Henry Thornton picked out that kind of a year to show a surplus of some $32,000,000 in revenue over operating expenditure on the lowest freight rate in the world. Either the right hon. leader of the opposition and his followers were misrepresenting business conditions in Canada, or Sir Henry Thornton must be little less than an angel in their estimation at the present time.

I do not wish to take up much time in this debate, but before taking my seat I wish to say a word or two in regard to what is going on in this House at the present time. The system of government we have in Canada is what we call representative government. Members are elected to this House to represent and voice the will of the people. The people of Canada, through their duly elected representatives, have said that this House should adjourn so that cabinet ministers might be elected to the government chosen by the duly elected representatives of the people of Canada. Every member of this House will have an opportunity to speak to all the measures mentioned in the Speech from the Throne when they are brought down to this House. Then why do the opposition delay? They delay because they are afraid to face the issues in the Speech from the Throne. They will go to any length, moving amendment after amendment, in an endeavour to beat this government so that the measures outlined in the Speech from the Throne shall not become law. They know there are men within their own party who dare not vote against certain measures in the Speech from the Throne, and I want to say through you, Mr. Speaker, to the right hon. leader of the opposition that he who for political advantage endeavours to make impotent the parliament of Canada and flouts the will of the people, as expressed through their duly elected representatives in this House of parliament, will pay, and pay dearly, when the people of Canada have a chance to deal with him.

Mr. BAKER: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? He said it was the high tariff of Canada which was driving people from this country to the United States. If that is the case how is it that the tariff of the United States, which is twice as high as ours, is not driving people from that country to this?

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): If the United States have a much higher tariff than we have, at all events they sell their goods much cheaper, and they can sell their goods in this country much cheaper than our own manufacturers do.

Mr. BAKER: Because they have a higher tariff.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Just to give you an instance, the other evening when the former member for Regina, Mr. Darke, was speaking of the Ford car, he was questioned by an hon. gentleman opposite. Now our tariff on the parts that go into a Ford car is around 25 per cent, and I believe the total amount collected on the parts of a Ford car entering this country would amount to about $25. But the extra cost to us of a complete Ford car in this country is $150. In Saskatchewan we have to pay $150 more for a Ford car than they pay right across the line to the south of us. If the people who want tariff protection in this country would ask only for the tariff protection they need, you would find that that extra $125 paid by the people of Canada for that Ford car would be spent in buying other articles made in this Dominion, thereby helping other industries.

Mr. E. A. PECK (West Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise with some diffidence to address myself to the motion and amendment before the House although I realize that you, Sir, will accord to me the same kindly consideration which you are in the habit of extending to all new members of this House. One may be accustomed to address local audiences, but I realize that now I am a member of and addressing myself to the supreme assembly of this country, an assembly composed of members resident for the most part in the ridings which they represent, assembled here from all parts of the Dominion to deliberate on matters affecting the welfare of the whole of Canada, and, if necessary, to crystallize their views into the form of legislation. It is only natural to expect that a gathering such as this, representing all the various sections of Canada and gathered here from sea to sea, as the scroll over the entrance to this building states, will have divergent views. They represent different interests, different occupations, and necessarily there will be divergencies of opinion. It is our duty when we meet here to discuss fully all the questions which may possibly affect Canada, and to do so there must be the fullest freedom of debate.

The debate on the Address has been a feature of our proceedings ever since parliament was established. It answers a useful purpose. It gives us an opportunity of stating our views and of hearing the views of those who do not, perhaps, agree with us. There should be no limitation of that debate unless limitation becomes really necessary. It has been suggested that by carrying on this discussion we are obstructing, but we are in no way preventing the carrying on of public business. The government has expressly stated that it does not intend to bring down any more business until March 15; and so if we wish to continue exchanging our views we are in no way preventing the carrying on of the business of the country. In that connection I regret to see introduced the amendment calling for the previous question to be put. Under the circumstances it answers no useful purpose. If important measures were being held up by reason of this debate there would be some reason for checking discussion. But no such condition exists; and it is unfortunate that, by reason of that amendment, a suggestion should go forth from this assembly that there should be any restriction of the fullest discussion of public matters.

We have an unusual condition in the present interesting parliament—the fact that the government which is endeavouring to carry on is a minority in the House. In the former House the Prime Minister had a following, I believe, of 125. He expressly stated that he had not a sufficient following to enable him to put into effect the policies which he wished to have adopted. Having gone to the country he comes back with a far less number of supporters—to be precise, only 101—and seeks to carry on. His only salvation is to turn to the members of the Progressive party for support. As has been stated in the House, he has had several interviews with some of the members of that party, and after some discussion a very loose agreement has been arrived at—in fact it is scarcely to be called an agreement at all.

As I understand that agreement, it contains three parts. It starts off with the statement on the part of the Progressive party that it has no confidence in Mr. King's government, and that any support the Progressives see fit to give to the government is not to be construed as an expression of confidence in it. And then, as I gather, another feature of the agreement is this: It is not intended there should be a departure in any respect from the principles to which the Progressive party are wedded. In no way is it to mean an abandonment of the views which the Progressive party have expressed in the House; if any party is to give way it must be the Liberal party. In the third place there is this understanding, I believe, with the Progressive party: It will only support the government as long as the measures introduced are satisfactory to it. That is a very loose agreement. It must be very unsatisfactory to the Prime Minister that he can secure no better treatment from the Progressive party than that which I have indicated. Well might the Prime Minister, as time goes on, say in the words of the psalmist: "I am in jeopardy every hour. Every night I make my bed and water my couch with my tears."

Now, Mr. Speaker, where does this lead us to? It leads us to the conclusion that when the House reassembles on March 15, Progressive measures are to be considered first. The government is to continue to ride in the government car, but the man at the wheel is to be the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke); he is to direct the course which the car will take. Now, I am not going to say that will necessarily be a bad thing. I do not know altogether the views of the Progressive party. Part of my constituency, which was taken out of the former riding of East Peterborough, was represented in the last parliament by a Progressive member, and there are several Progressives now in the present riding, many of whom gave me their support. So far as the Progressive party is concerned I have come to parliament with a fairly open mind. My experience tells me that there are generally two sides to every question; and when I find that the Progressive party was composed in the last parliament of sixty-five members—many of whom had broken away from former political affiliations to assist in forming that group—I cannot but come to the conclusion that there must be something in the Progressive movement. Therefore, speaking personally, I am prepared to give fair consideration to any of the measures that may be introduced on behalf of the Progressive party, without giving any assurance that I will accept them and support them.

But there is this to be borne in mind: the Progressive party does not pretend to represent the whole of Canada. With two exceptions the Progressive members in the present House all come from the western provinces and naturally represent western views. But they are only twenty-four in number, a trifle under one-tenth of the representation in this House, and presumably they only represent about that percentage of the people of this country. It may be said by them that they are endeavouring to represent all the people of this country engaged in agricultural pursuits. Admitting that for the sake of argument, it still follows that they only represent about thirty-four per cent of the Canadian people. Now I want to say something, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the other 66 per cent, composed to a very great extent of persons engaged in manual work, persons who are dependent upon industrial employment to enable them to earn the wages necessary to support themselves and their families. I come from a riding which is about two-thirds urban, and one-third rural, and I desire to speak for a few minutes on the subject of protection, which has been discussed so much in this chamber since we met last month.

I wonder if I might venture to say a word or two about the conditions in the city of Peterborough at the time of the election and for some time previously. There was considerable depression in the city, and to be truthful I must say there were depressed conditions not only in the city of Peterborough but in all other urban centres in Canada, I believe, with one or two exceptions. Yet I realize that these conditions can be improved by the adoption of a better protective system than the one now in vogue in this country. There are several factories in the city of Peterborough which require protection. They are exposed at the present time to undue and unfair competition with foreign goods imported into the country and manufactured under conditions which no respectable workman in this country should be subjected to. The depression at any rate exists, and prior to the election some of those factories found it necessary partly to close down and in some cases to work half time. Many men were out of work and times were very hard in Peterborough. Frequently I would meet a man and he would ask me: "For heaven's sake, can you get me a job?" There was no job to be had for him. I am sorry to say.

[Mr. Peck.]

In connection with and as a result of that condition, many of the people of the city of Peterborough found it desirable to go to the United States and take their families with them. I could give many instances during the few months preceding my election when my attention was particularly directed to that sort of thing. There was one man in whom I was particularly interested, a man I had known for many years, who was born in the county, brought up there, married, with three or four children, a strong, able-bodied middle aged man, able and willing to work. He hunted round for six months but could not get a job. Finally he went to the States, came back to Canada, reported that he had a job for himself and one for his eldest boy. He sold the little house which he had been given time to pay for; he went away, and probably will never return. I met another man the other day and asked him about his boys. "Oh," he said: "My four boys are all gone and I am left alone." I asked him, "How are they getting on?" He said: "They are over in the States and doing pretty well." There are many cases of that kind. The matter became serious, and as the election approached people became aroused and awakened to the condition of things, realizing that the failure to put up a proper customs tariff against the importation of goods which we were capable of manufacturing in Peterborough was causing the trouble in that city. There was no undue or unfair propaganda, as was suggested by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) in this House the other evening. The facts were plain, and the people realized them. There were men out of employment and there were many cases of people going to the States. It was not necessary to appeal to the people; they appreciated the seriousness of the situation. They appealed to me, I may say, to run in the election and to carry their burdens and present them to this House. What happened? The case was very ably presented for the Liberal side by the then member, a man of great ability and force, a man very well known to this House, I dare say, because in the last parliament he was Deputy Speaker. He had been returned for that riding in 1921 with a majority of over 2,000, and he was defeated at the last election by nearly the same figure. He presented all the stock arguments of the Liberal party. He pointed to the fact that the Canadian dollar was worth a whole dollar in New York. He dwelt upon the favourable balance of trade between Canada and foreign countries. He asserted with some force that the government had reduced the taxation of the people. But somehow or other all those assertions did not seem to influence the result; the people were against him. It just shows the folly of endeavouring to prove such and such a thing to be true by statistics. The statistics were there, and his case looked all right on paper, but the machine would not work. The statistics alone did not bring employment to the working people.

And it was not merely in Peterborough that the protectionist principle was adopted by the people. The rural portion of the population in West Peterborough is not particularly antagonistic to the protectionist principle. Nearly half the agriculturists in the rural portion of the riding voted for the Conservative candidate. Not merely West Peterborough, but almost every other riding in Ontario seemed to adopt that protectionist principle and returned Conservative candidates by large majorities. You know, Mr. Speaker, that out of 83 members for the province of Ontario 69 are seated on this side of the House. The same thing happened in other provinces. The maritimes were very strong for the protectionist principle; Manitoba came back into line; British Columbia gave us ten out of fourteen, and Quebec is coming back coyly. That province is Conservative at heart and protectionist, and it will be only a matter of time before Ontario and Quebec are ranged side by side fighting for protection.

I think I have made a case for the consideration of this question of protection. I am not going into details, but particular instances in which protection is needed have been detailed by other hon. members. I wish to point out, however, that apparently the attention of the government is beginning to be directed to the necessity for doing something in connection with this protective principle. During the four years that the present government was in power prior to 1925, the speeches from the throne failed to refer in any way to the tariff question. Now, in view of the discussion and the expression of opinion by the people on that subject, the Speech from the Throne undertakes to deal with the matter in some way, and this particular portion of it begins as follows:

> My ministers are of the opinion that a general increase in the customs tariff would prove detrimental to the country's continued prosperity and prejudicial to national unity.

If that is supposed to indicate that we on this side of the House are in favour of a general increase in the customs tariff, I for one do not propose to accept it. Speaking for myself, I do not know that a general increase in the customs tariff is required. There are in this country certain industries the nature of which is such that they do not require to be protected by a customs tariff, but there are others which should be protected, and I wish to urge that upon the House. The Speech continues:

> They believe—

That is, the ministers.

> —that in the interest of industrial development every effort should be made to eliminate the element of uncertainty with respect to tariff changes.

This uncertainty with reference to tariff changes is profoundly affecting the country. There is a feeling on the part of people engaged in or proposing to engage in industry that some tariff changes may take place which will be prejudicial to the industries which they are carrying on or propose to carry on. We have all heard the views of the Hon. Mr. Dunning, who, I believe, is about to take his place in this House as Minister of Railways and Canals.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Not yet.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, yes.

Mr. PECK: He must be elected, of course. I presume if he is not elected in the constituency which has been set aside for him by Mr. Darke, he will keep on until he finds some place in which he can take shelter. We all know his views, because he came to Ontario during the last election and gave expression to them. He has the satisfaction of knowing that wherever he spoke a Conservative candidate was elected. He expressed the view that there should be a reduction in the tariff and a similar idea was given expression to by the Hon. Vincent Massey—a great friend of the Prime Minister—who, it is suggested, is also going to endeavour to obtain a seat in this House. There is thus the element of uncertainty and there will be continued uncertainty until this policy of protection is fully adopted by the House and steps are taken to put the tariff on a sound footing.

Then this portion of the Speech concludes:

> A tariff advisory board will accordingly be appointed forthwith. This board will be expected to make a careful study of the customs tariff, the revenue to be derived therefrom and the effect of the tariff and allied factors on industry and agriculture.

That, if the expression is not unparliamentary, is simply passing the buck. The matter is to be referred to a commission and everything will consequently be postponed for another year, or possibly longer. I do not think it is the wish of the people that action upon this tariff question should be postponed;

I believe the people want the adjustment of the tariff to be taken up and dealt with immediately. I do not see any reason why a special tariff commission should be appointed. There are in this House members who are capable of serving on committees and making their own investigations, and I have very strong objection to the appointment of a commission by any party if that can possibly be avoided. Hon. members who are here representing the people are an intelligent set of men, and I am quite sure a committee could be selected from members on all sides of this House who would give this matter fair and impartial consideration and within a reasonable time recommend such changes in the tariff as would give effect to the wishes of the people.

In the Speech from the Throne there are many other matters with which I might deal, but I do not wish to do so now because I do not want to get away from the question of protection; for it is important that that matter should be considered in the interest of the people. I have therefore risen to-night to express in a general way my views in this regard and my hope that a matter of such importance to many people in this country will not be side-tracked even for measures of interest and value to the Progressive party.

Mr. MILLAR: Considering that during the years 1914, 1915, 1916 and until March, 1917, the United States were reaping hundreds of millions of dollars of profit by manufacturing munitions for the Allies and had not a man in the field, while during the same period Canada was paying out hundreds of millions of dollars and had hundreds of thousands of men in the field, is it not a little unfair to point to the fact that conditions just after the war was over were better in the United States than in Canada?

Mr. PECK: I do not remember making any comparison between the United States and Canada. I recognize the fact that the United States by reason of their keeping out of the war so long are in a much better position financially than Canada. We must try to overcome that, but we cannot do so by continuing to buy United States or European goods manufactured by cheap labour. The increase in the value of manufactured goods coming into this country was shown in a recent article in the Financial Post. That article pointed out that although Canada was apparently improving in some respects, the quantity of manufactured goods, imported goods, which we could well make in this country, was increasing. If we could arrange to manufacture in Canada the goods which we require for use by our people, this trouble about lack of employment and all the troubles incident thereto would be avoided.

Mr. MILLAR: Was there not in the hon. member's remarks the implication that conditions were better in the United States than in Canada and for that reason our people were going to the United States to seek employment?

Mr. PECK: There is no question that the United States, which is a tariff country, is prospering.

Mr. ECCLES J. GOTT (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, I presume that as a young member of this honourable body, possessing the average degree of cordiality and fellowship, I should be actuated by a spirit of appreciation to offer to you my congratulations on having again been extended the high honour of the speakership. It is a source of personal gratification when one observes a gentleman so competent and possessing such a high degree of dignity acting in a capacity where grace, fairness and despatch are the outstanding characteristics of a successful term of office. I trust that at the end of the session my expression towards you, Sir, may be equally commendatory. I take this my first opportunity of extending to you and through you to the loved ones who share your distinction my sincere congratulations upon the honour that has been conferred upon you by this parliament, the highest honour within its gift. However envious one might be of your personal capacity, I can assure you, Sir, that there is little of this weakness and no animosity, in my makeup and I trust that any breach of the rules of which I may be guilty you will regard as an innocent offence and not as an intentional violation of parliamentary practice. I trust further that as the session proceeds our mutual relations, if I may venture to say so, will strengthen into something like friendship; and I am sure that, whatever happens, the present parliamentary term will be successful at least so far as a strictly impartial guiding of its deliberations is concerned.

I fully appreciate the privilege and the honour which I have, as a result of the last election, of representing in this House one of the most progressive constituencies in Canada. My first desire in representing that constituency in this the fifteenth parliament of the Dominion is to correct certain statements that have come from sources unreliable and incredible, and in doing so I accept as an invitation the remark of the hon. gentleman who leads the remnant of a shattered and discredited government, if it may be called a government, in the person of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), to the effect that lavish expenditures had been made for political purposes in the last election. The wail of a defeated party, it has been said, is always audible and to these lamentations there seems to be no end. I am compelled to conclude that it is not in the interests of the party opposite that their inner activities in the last campaign, their expenditures at any rate, should be revealed at this particular time. Even the Prime Minister—I beg your pardon, I mean the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King—made the charge that financial interests were against him in Prince Albert. But taking a casual glance at the result in that by-election one would wonder just how many financial interests had really been at work there. I believe that the Independent candidate has as much reason to make that charge as Mr. Mackenzie King had. Certainly the Independent candidate did not prove to be much of a politician so far as vote-getting was concerned, but he has the credit of being a better soldier; at least military report would lead the average person to think so. I wonder whether I should be ruled out of order if I offered the Liberal party my congratulations on the marvellous victory it obtained on Monday last, a victory which, according to the newspapers, had the effect of bringing even the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) to life, to lead a demonstration in celebration of the event.

The press of western Ontario a short time ago carried an article which, according to the reports, emanated from Dr. C. C. Ross of Hyde Park, Ontario, on January 10, appearing in the Border Cities Star in its issue of January 11 under the heading:

Charges American gold beat Graham: Dr. Ross bitter at London over defeat of Railway Minister.

"American gold" defeated both Premier King and Right Hon. George P. Graham, in their respective ridings, according to an address by Dr. Cecil C. Ross at the convention of East Middlesex Liberals, held in Hyman hall, London. At the meeting, Dr. Ross was nominated as Liberal candidate for the riding, in prospect of another federal election.

To this I say that the vote in South Essex was not purchasable; the vote in South Essex is not purchasable; and the vote in South Essex never will be purchasable. And if the vote in South Essex were purchasable I can assure you that it is the humble opinion of my constituents, particularly my workers, that I, like poor Burgess, would have lost my deposit. South Essex was not won in a day or a week or a month; it was won by the co-operation of the loyal support of fifty organizations. On January 27 I took occasion to write to Dr. Ross as follows:

Dr. C. C. Ross.
Hyde Park, Ontario.

Dear Dr. Ross,

Have you been correctly reported by the press when they say that you say I defeated the Right Hon. George P. Graham by the use of American gold?

Very cordially yours,
Eccles J. Gott, M.P.

House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ontario.

To this I received no reply; Dr. Ross did not even extend to me that courtesy. Hence I must describe his chatter as leather-lunged political hypocrisy. Now a Detroit newspaper early in February reported Mr. Charles Tuson, a very prominent, highly respected and prosperous business man of Windsor, as having made the statement that money had been expended to defeat Mr. Graham, and I wrote this gentleman under date February 9 as follows:

Mr. Charles Tuson,
Windsor, Ontario.

My dear Mr. Tuson:

It has been reported to me that you made the statement in public that much money had been expended by the Conservatives in South Essex to defeat the Right Hon. George P. Graham—down Amherstburg way.

Is this so?

Very cordially yours,
Eccles J. Gott.

In reply I received the following:

I was surprised to receive the above lines, as you know that I took no part in the last federal elections, here or elsewhere, had not the faintest idea what was going on. I do not know of any moneys being spent by either parties or their agents. I did not make the above statements, and am sorry that any reports that in any way might get into print are not true. I did hear that you worked very hard. This is of course to your credit. We all know that elections cost money for legitimate purposes. We spend too much in Essex county in this way.

That is the difference between writing to a man of ability, capacity and sincerity and writing to what I have termed a political hypocrite.

Now I hold in my hand a copy of the famous Australian treaty which has been discussed at considerable length in this House. I do not intend to go into the details of this treaty but I may observe that it was discussed on several platforms in the south riding of Essex, and on one in particular to which I shall refer in a moment. I hold in my hand a list of comparative duties between Australia and Canada, and they seem to me to be absurd in that they are conducive to making our farmers pay the very highest prices for what they buy and accept the very lowest prices for what they sell. I believe the farmer works longer hours and receives less money for his toil than any other man who labours.

Three weeks prior to the election my worthy opponent asked that there should be no last minute appeals. I am going to submit to the House one such appeal that was issued by him at 6.30 o'clock on the night of October 28, when printing houses in small towns are closed. There is no date to this, but I think hon. members will take my word that it was issued on the 28th.

To Brunner Mond workers:—

Brunner Mond is an alkali concern in the town of Amherstburg, and this appeal was issued particularly to its employees.

The Brunner Mond makes soda ash. Soda ash enters largely into the manufacture of paper. Under the treaty which Mr. Graham and his colleagues concluded with Australia, millions of tons of paper will be sold to Australia, and every ton of that paper sold is just so much work for the Brunner Mond and Amherstburg. Mr. Meighen and his candidates have roundly abused this treaty, while the "outside man," Mr. Graham, has been quietly working for the welfare of his constituency.

Think it over—vote for Graham.

Amherstburg Liberal Association.

Hear about it, Liberty Theatre, Wednesday night.

That was Mr. Graham's last-minute appeal, although three weeks prior he had requested that no such appeal should be made. The people who went to hear the issues discussed at the Liberty Theatre did hear Mr. Graham remark, "We have sacrificed the farmers and their interests in this country for the paper manufacturers." I issued a circular shortly after in this form:

To Brunner Mond workers, fellow electors.

The Brunner Mond makes soda ash. Soda ash is used in the manufacture of glass. Glass factories have closed under the King government. Glass contains 30 per cent soda ash. The Brunner Mond needs protection. What protection they have was obtained from the Liberal-Conservative party. If they desire more protection they are entitled to it. Tariff on glass is essential. Think it over. Don't be hoodwinked. Vote for Gott—a South Essex man for a South Essex seat.

That was the last that the electors of South Essex heard from Mr. Graham. They heard from me the following day as follows:

Amherstburg, Ontario, October 30, 1925.

My dear friend:

It is difficult to convey in words my heartfelt appreciation of your honest efforts and loyal work that did so much to accomplish our brilliant victory yesterday. You have a great deal to be proud of, for in retiring my opponent from South Essex politics, you decisively and convincingly defeated a man who was considered the most prominent and outstanding figure in the Liberal party in our Dominion.

During my incumbency of the office with which the electors of South Essex have honoured me, I expect to enjoy the same hearty co-operation with you that marked our campaign efforts, and to serve your interests in parliament as well and faithfully as you have served mine. I hope to meet you often personally during the next four years, and shall do my utmost at all times to work constructively for your welfare and to show myself worthy of the confidence you have placed in me by an active, honest and faithful representation of the electorate.

With a hearty "thank you"

Now, the electors of South Essex have even heard from me since. On December 21, 1925, I addressed them as follows:

My dear Friends:

As member-elect of the House of Commons for the South riding of Essex, I desire to extend to you my sincere Yuletide greetings, and at the same time thank my friends for the fine endeavour made by them on October 29. True, I may not have been your candidate, but I am your member, and only by conciliation with the powers that be and co-operation with the member-elect can we obtain for a progressive constituency the things we are justly entitled to. Hence I ask your co-operation during my incumbency of the office with which the electors of South Essex have honoured me, as I have no grind to make with those who opposed me, and forgive those who adapt themselves to tactics ill-timed and unbecoming Christian intuition.

I have 6,851 supporters whom I desire to thank for their loyal support, and I expect to enjoy the same hearty co-operation from them that marked our campaign efforts, and to serve their interests in parliament as well and faithfully as they served mine in the campaign.

I hope to meet all the electors personally during the next four years, and shall do my utmost at all times to work constructively for their welfare, and to show myself worthy of increased confidence in the future by active, honest and faithful representation of all sections and classes, regardless of colour, creed or political affiliation.

In thanking you for your valuable assistance, and in kindly expression to those who opposed me, as well as to the 4,000 voters who failed to express themselves by ballot, I would call to your attention the fact that when Premier King dissolved parliament he gave as his reason for not being able to properly conduct Canada's business, that in a House of 235 members there were only 117 Liberal members. In appealing for a more definite mandate, he clearly intimated that unless given more Liberal supporters he and his government would retire from office.

The election resulted in the return of 118 Conservatives, 100 Liberals, 23 Progressives, 2 Labour and 1 Independent. Premier King and nine of his cabinet ministers were defeated. Of the 26 Progressive, Independent and Labour candidates elected, 18 of them denounced the record of the King administration and defeated its candidates, and the Conservative party polled over 200,000 more votes than the Liberal party. Yet all this means nothing to Mr. King, who clings to office in defiance of the verdict of the people and in contempt of the popular will. If, as Mr. King himself declared, he could not carry on the business of Canada with 117 supporters and a full cabinet, how can he hope to carry on efficiently with only 100 Liberals and he and half of his cabinet without seats? The good-thinking Liberals have advised Mr. King to admit defeat, while others advised him to hold on at any cost, which brings a spectacle of shameless usurpation of power, a spectacle the like of which has never been witnessed in any other civilized country in the world.

If another election with its enormous expense is forced upon the people of Canada, do not fail to impress upon the people that Mr. King, and he alone, is responsible. In such event I ask the electors of South Essex to demonstrate their sense of fair play and political honour and decency by registering their emphatic protest against the unconstitutional and high-handed methods employed by Mr. King. By so doing you will at least have done your part in preserving the good name of Canada.

For your convenience and in grateful appreciation of your valued assistance, and in anticipation of the full confidence of all the electors of South Essex, I am appending a statement on the back of this missive of the votes polled in the recent federal election, in the constituency of South Essex.

With a hearty "Thank you" for the fine manner in which I was received throughout the constituency, and with the wish that the Almighty in his wonderful providence may permit—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh!

Mr. GOTT: Anything of a Christian origin seems to provoke laughter in this House, Mr. Speaker.

—you to enjoy a bountiful Christmas season, with a flow of yuletide blessings, and bring you peace now and forever, is the earnest wish of your representative in my Christmas message of thanks and good cheer, in which I sincerely extend to all a Merry Christmas and a Bright, and Happy and Prosperous New Year.

Mr. Speaker, the Australian treaty, along with many other issues and reasons, was the cause of Mr. Graham's defeat. He did not purpose, not for one moment, that the Civil Service Commission would function to the disadvantage of his political standing in the riding. In giving a few details in connection with only one of several cases in South Essex where he was dictator, I desire to submit a letter from C. R. McCallum, of Kingsville. Ontario, and some detail regarding his short-lived connection with the customs service in Essex county.

Having been officially appointed by the Civil Service Commission, before he could be sworn in he was relieved of his appointment through the advice and dictation of Mr. Graham. In other cases, and in not simply a few, Mr. Graham's interference with the Civil Service Commission was as brazen as in this case. These I shall not mention other than to say that in them he showed a defiance of any regulations that might govern the Civil Service Commission. Mr. McCallum is a returned man of excellent standing, fine executive capacity, qualified in every way for the position, and slightly indisposed at times due to war service. I was the recipient of a letter from Mr. McCallum, under date of February 5, in which he states:

Re—Kingsville Customs Appointment

This is a rather complicated affair and quite difficult to explain by letter.

I am forwarding herewith two official documents, the result of marks obtained on the examination, also the appointment, both signed by the secretary of the Civil Service Commission.

I carried out instructions on appointment, and on presentation of same was informed that my duties would not begin until authorization from Minister of the Department at Ottawa had arrived.

Through some reason, the news of my appointment became known, and our friends here became active, by wire, with the result that although I was appointed on June 30th, headed the examination, served approximately three years in France, was rejected on account of a charge by some political henchmen of this district, but the enclosed letters will explain all I think to your satisfaction.

This appointment did not follow the usual procedure, and instead of going through the commission, came from the department by wire, in due time being passed through the usual channels.

Pressing the commission personally for a reason, also the department through the Windsor G.W.V.A., will enclose herewith the letters which are self-explanatory, the charge against me by the department (manufactured for the instance), and also letters from the C.N. and C.P. Telegraph Companies, whose agent I was here. These letters are from the inspectors who personally checked my office at the time I resigned.

You can easily see what becomes of the charges of the department, against the name of a man who had served his country in the time of need; charges that had not the slightest foundation, nothing more or less than a political dodge from beginning to end.

When we fellows enlisted they did not stop to ask what our politics were.

The defeated representative of South Essex, Mr. Graham, with whom I had several interviews, the first one the day that I had been informed that the appointment was made definitely. Mr. Graham said that the Civil Service Commission was absolutely and entirely supreme. The commission and the department usually met and decided on the appointment, but if the commission made the appointment, recommendations or anything else from the department would take no effect.

I immediately produced the result of my marks, also the appointment, and said: "In view of the facts already stated by you with these official documents in your hand, how do you account for another man receiving the appointment?"

Mr. Graham: "Well, the Customs Department have got busy, Mac."

Mr. McCallum: "You have just finished telling me that this could not possibly be done."

Mr. Graham: "But, of course, you understand this is not my department?"

Mr. McCallum: "This may not be in your department, but this is your constituency, and are you aware of the fact that there are hundreds of returned soldiers in South Essex?"

Mr. Graham then promised that he would get in touch with the department, and the Civil Service Commission, and see what could be done.

The next interview I had with Mr. Graham was the day that he was endorsed as Liberal candidate in South Essex.

A fateful day:

He admitted before Lafferty, President of the Windsor G.W.V.A., and others, that according to the evidence produced from Lafferty's files, part of which I herewith enclose, there was no doubt I had been done an injustice, and on arriving at Ottawa he would immediately get in touch with the Minister of Customs and see if he could not have my name cleared of these charges. As usual his actions were conspicuous by their absence.

This was a fine endeavour—quite characteristic of him, though—to try to clear a man of a charge which was manufactured by his opponents. What manner of man is he who can so gracefully clear a man of charges of which he was innocent when these were only in the preferred class and manufactured for the occasion?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the documents in connection with this case, and they show an absolute disregard of the Civil Service Commission as instituted by my worthy opponent, the Right Hon. George P. Graham, and his former colleagues. I have first the time table calling attention to the examination to qualify for permanent appointment to the position of sub-collector of customs and excise at Kingsville, Ontario:

Time Table

Examination to qualify for permanent appointment to the position of sub-collector of customs and excise, at Kingsville, Ontario.

Date: May 29, 1925.

Subjects	Time
General questions	9.00 a.m.—3 hours
Place of examination:
Enquire	A. W. Massey, Esq., B.A., Principal, High School, Kingsville, Ontario.

Civil Service Commission
Examination Branch
May 22, 1925.

Next I have the instructions issued by the Civil Service Commission, all of which were lived up to. Then I have the result of the examination:

Statement of marks obtained by candidate 137 at an examination held on May 29, 1925, in order to qualify for permanent appointment as sub-collector Department of Customs and Excise, at Kingsville, Ontario.

Now taking the different subjects: on general questions the candidate received 72 marks out a maximum of 100. On education and experience he received 85. In the oral examination he received 88, or a percentage of 80.7. He was pronounced to have passed the examination successfully and to have ranked first.

Under date of June 25 I have his official appointment by order of the Civil Service Commission as received by Mr. McCallum in Kingsville on June 26, which says:

Civil Service Commission of Canada

Notification of Report for Duty

Name—Charles R. McCallum.
Address—Kingsville, Ontario.
Department—Customs and Excise.
Branch—Kingsville, Ontario.
Title of position—Sub-collector of Customs and Excise, outport, Kingsville, Ontario.
Duties—As specified in the official definition, and such other related work as may be required.

You have been selected for appointment on probation as shown above, subject to your ability to furnish the commission with satisfactory evidence as to your citizenship, age, physical condition, character and habits. Report for duty at the time and place indicated below, and present this notice to the officer named. Also please note the extracts from the law quoted before.

Place to report—Amherstburg, Ontario.
Person to whom to report—By letter to the Collector of Customs and Excise.
Date to report—Immediately.

The appointment was closed. A few days later Mr. McCallum learned that another appointment had been made. He went to Amherstburg and presented himself to the Collector of Customs to be sworn in, but that official did not have any authorization from the department to do so, consequently he could not swear him in. A few days later, under date of June 13, Mr. McCallum wired to the Civil Service Commission, and they wrote to him under date July 16, 1925, as follows:

DEAR SIR:

In reply to your telegram of the 13th inst. I am instructed to inform you that the Deputy Minister of Customs and Excise has notified the commission that your services will not be acceptable to that department, and the commission has therefore made another assignment to the position of sub-collector of Customs and Excise in the person of Mr. Allan Dorland Pearsall, who qualified for permanent appointment at the same time as yourself. Mr. Pearsall did not serve overseas during the late war, but you were the only successful candidate who did so. Mr. Pearsall was regularly assigned to this position on the 3rd instant.

Yours truly,
C. H. BLAND,
Assistant Secretary.

The Great War Veterans' Association in Windsor pressing the Civil Service Commission for an explanation, the latter communicated with the Customs department, which department, under date of August 1, wrote to the Secretary of the Civil Service Commission as follows:

I am in receipt of your letters of the 21st and 27th ultimo respecting the appointment of a customs excise examiner at Kingsville, Ontario, and the rejection of Mr. McCallum one of the candidates.

You are advised in reply that it was reported to the department that Mr. McCallum was discharged from the service of the Canadian Pacific Telegraph Company for cause, and the department is therefore not prepared to recommend his appointment to a position in its service.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
R. R. FARROW,
Deputy Minister.

Naturally they had to find some excuse. I may say that the G.W.V.A. of Windsor took the matter up on behalf of Mr. McCallum and have proved that the charges were baseless and without the slightest foundation. I present a letter from the Canadian National Telegraphs sent to Mr. L. J. Lafferty, President of the Great War Veterans' Association, Windsor, Ontario, under date August 15, 1925:

DEAR SIR: Further to my letter of recent date in connection with former agent C. R. McCallum.

Kindly be advised that Mr. McCallum was not discharged from the service but resigned of his own free will, not wishing to assume further responsibility as he was not acquainted with the wire work.

Under the circumstances consider he acted very wisely as our system is quite complicated which made him dependent for information from his operator.

Yours truly,

G. R. KERBY,
Inspector.

I have a further letter to Mr. McCallum from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company under date of London, Ontario, September 2, 1925, as follows

DEAR SIR: With regard to your inquiry I am glad to confirm the fact that you resigned the Canadian Pacific Railway Company's telegraph agency at Kingsville of your own free will, and with the object of securing a more lucrative position.

Wishing you future success.

P. G. GALBRAITH,
Telegraph Inspector.

Now it is shown definitely, Mr. Speaker, that the ruling of the commission was overridden by Mr. Graham. It is very easy to make up reports about men. If I were guilty of the things that were said about me in the campaign, some of which have evidently been carried to Ottawa, I would not be worthy of a seat in this honourable body. McCallum was persecuted for political purposes, and for political purposes only, and I think it is the duty of the Civil Service Commission, and also of the Department of Customs and Excise, if they prize honour and virtue in their operations, to rectify the error so grossly made in the heat of a political contest. I trust the Department of Customs and Excise and the Civil Service Commission will note my remarks and take immediate steps to correct the error to the committing of which they contributed thereby preventing the proper functioning of their own express regulations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was not elected to parliament on promises. I told the electors of South Essex that if I had to tell one lie, or make one promise, or purchase one vote, I had no desire to sit in the House of Commons. I said that the only promise I could conscientiously make was that if I were elected I would put forth my best endeavours at all times in the interests of my constituents regardless of colour, creed, or political affiliations; for I believe that a person who has one spark of prejudice in his make-up has no right to aspire to the highest honours within the gift of the people. We have had many promises in our riding from public men in the past. My worthy opponent, Mr. Graham, in the 1921 campaign, promised the onion and early vegetable growers of Leamington and Mersea township protection on their products. Then when a delegation of farmers waited on Mr. Fielding and Mr. Graham at the Prince Edward hotel in Windsor on the 22nd May, Mr. Fielding turned to Mr. Graham and said, "George that is not our policy". I say to this House and I say to the people of this country at large that this is our policy, and when our party comes into power, whenever that may be, legislation will be enacted whereby the necessary tariff can be implemented, and it will not be necessary for a delegation to go to see my leader or the representative of their constituency, if I am sitting member.

I have no apologies to make for the defeat of my worthy opponent. I classed him in the campaign, as I do now as the leading man in the ranks of the Liberal party in the whole Dominion of Canada. I think he stood head and shoulders over the Prime Minister, not only in stature but in capacity and ability, a man worthy of any man's steel, a good all round fellow, with sportsman-like qualities. When he was defeated he wanted to retire. Why should he not do so? I have been connected all my life with those lines of sport by means of which we put on the map our county and the town in which I was born and raised and in which I live—Amherstburg, Ontario. In other words, we have known how to be good winners and good losers. We organized and instituted an amateur county league system of baseball and we tried to instil into our boys a realization of the fact that a dishonest victory was less to be prized than an honourable defeat. Had the Right Hon. Mackenzie King been a member of our league he would have had the same teaching and the people from coast to coast in Canada to-day would not be saying that Mackenzie King was not even a good sport.

My worthy opponent possessed sportsman-like qualities. In addition to that he was straightforward and outspoken, especially when I was not present. He is the possessor of a genial disposition; his character is unsullied; and on the whole he has the qualities which make him a lovable chap—the term I believe which has been applied to him by the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). Mr. Graham was a part of the sporting fraternity in our county, but he was in the county so little that he grew away from the people and they grew away from him. If I am any judge, his absence from this House is conspicuous. I had the unique experience of meeting a lady who was a personal friend both of the Minister of Railways and of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) and she whined because I had defeated Mr. Graham and pined that it was not the Minister of National Defence who had been defeated.

Now I desire to say a word or two about the part of the country I come from, the constituency I have the honour to represent, and the town of my birth. I was born in the town of Amherstburg, Ontario, the oldest town in Canada, how many years ago I shall not say unless requested. Amherstburg is an historic place, being situated eighteen miles south of Detroit, at the foot of the Detroit river where the river enters into lake Erie. It was known over a century ago, in the war of 1812, as Fort Malden, and the block house used by the Canadian soldiers in that war still stands on Bois Blanc island. The very trenches used by the Canadian artillery to repulse the attack of the Americans in that war still hold their grassy mounds at the north end of the town, and in the town there has been preserved on the property now owned by Mr. John Fraser the very stone from which Tecumseh, the great Indian chief, made his last address to his soldiers before he took the Indian trail north of the town on his retreat to Moraviantown, where he was slain. Being historic we still maintain traditions in some sense, for we have to-day a mayor occupying the red chair for the sixteenth year. He is not an old man and may be good for half a century yet, in which event he may occupy that office until the Master calls.

We produce in the town of Amherstburg soda ash; we have the only alkali manufacturing establishment in Canada. We have a $5,000,000 plant which employs 300 men, known as the Brunner Mond Canada, Limited. The employees of this firm are one happy and contented family of devoted wage earners. The plant was constructed during the war and when ready to operate, the government of Sir Robert Borden, with Sir Thomas White as Finance minister, had not placed a tariff on soda ash as promised and 600 men who were then engaged in construction were laid off. Soon a tariff of 12½ per cent was placed on soda ash; the men resumed work and that factory has operated from then until now. It is the bulwark of sustenance for scores of homes in the community, and offers the surrounding farmers a ready market for all produce.

Just recently officials of the Brunner Mond went into eastern Canada to ascertain why certain institutions were not using Brunner Mond products, and the only reason given was that the Michigan Alkali people were underselling our Canadian firm by the smallest kind of margin, due to the fact that the Michigan firm turns out ten tons to every ton manufactured by the Brunner Mond. I am not asking for or suggesting, nor has the Brunner Mond Company done so, a raise in tariff, which would be conducive in my humble opinion to materially increasing their output, giving employment to more men and supplying the Canadian market exclusively with Canadian products, manufactured in Canada, the output of Canadian brain and labour; but what the Brunner Mond Company needs is protection on glass.

The people of Amherstburg are interested in the manufacture of soda ash, which is an indispensable product in the manufacture of glass. Glass contains thirty per cent soda ash. Canadian glass factories are unable to withstand the importation of American glass at a low duty, and are closing, or rather have closed their doors, for the lack of profitable business. Across the river two huge factories employ thousands of men manufacturing glass that is shipped to us for consumption, while our own factories employ but a few men because our government allows the market for its product to be choked by the product of our competitors.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Does the hon. member think that a 35 per cent duty on glass is not sufficient?

Mr. GOTT: I have noticed a disposition on the part of hon. members to my left to interfere with younger members who are making their first speeches. The hon. member who spoke before me was not interrupted; I have not yet interrupted a speaker in this House, and if my hon. friend desires an answer to any question I shall be willing tomorrow to sit down with him and go into the question in an intelligent manner.

This was one of the issues—one of the many issues—that was discussed in Amherstburg during the campaign. Mr. Graham carried the town of Amherstburg, a small town of less than 3,000 souls, in 1921 by a majority of 325. But after the visit of Mr. Duncan Marshall to Amherstburg the town flopped to the tune of 295 the other way. I do not know whether or not the term "flopped" is unparliamentary. Mr. Marshall sought to impress upon the people that the woollen factories of Canada were working night and day, whereas the official report that had the day before been placed in the hands of residents of the town disclosed the fact that twelve woollen factories had closed their doors in Canada during 1924; that hundreds of men had been thrown out of work due to their failure to operate, and that the twelve failures had resulted in a loss to the operators of $1,463,000, whereas others failed without actually going into liquidation and the woollen business of Canada was not in the healthy state in which Mr. Marshall said it was.

My first remark in connection with the railways of this country is that if any one of the 245 members of this parliament is not vitally interested and concerned in the government-owned system, he is not a loyal Canadian. During the campaign I sent out a circular letter dealing exclusively with railways, asking for an understanding on the question, and to-day I say to the nation at large: Let us understand one another on the railway question. At various times I have criticized the waste, the useless expenditures, the pledging of credit and the promise of railway lines where the traffic would not justify extensions. To-day I am opposed to the building of the Hudson Bay railway or any other line while our backs are breaking with a railway debt of $2,056,181,517.70, with the 1925 addition still to be made. It is too late in public life in Canada to place the blame on any party or person. It is not a political question; it is a national problem, the biggest problem facing the Canadian people to-day, and we must grapple with it in a genuine business-like manner or we shall be heading straight towards national disaster. The Conservatives blame the Liberals; the Liberals blame the Conservatives. In one of the thirty-one paragraphs of that circular letter I placed the blame on the shoulders of the Right Hon. George P. Graham, who, when he was Minister of Railways and Canals in the Laurier government, overbuilt this country with railways in anticipation of an immediate influx of immigrants swelling our population, so that to-day we have the railways capable of handling the population but unfortunately we have not the population. I hold in my hand the circular letter to which I refer. It comprises thirty-one paragraphs, but I am going to read just this one:

The Hon. George P. Graham is one of those rare optimists that the returning annual deficit cannot for a moment disturb. You will recall, many of you, that he was preaching optimism when the Canadian Northern lines were being built and the Grand Trunk Pacific was under construction. He has that same optimism. He boasted of it and he ridiculed those business men who counselled caution in those enormous expenditures. The Grand Trunk Pacific, you must recall, was built in part during Mr. Graham's earlier years as Minister of Railways and Canals, under the old Laurier administration. Even in those days Mr. Graham was a successful builder of deficits with the old Intercolonial railroad which ran from Montreal to Halifax. In those days, however, he had not attained the success that he now has achieved as a deficit builder. Three or four million dollars of a deficit per year was his crowning achievement. To-day, he never bats an eyelash with a deficit of $35,000,000 or $40,000,000. And even this amount is modest for there have been expenditures incurred for the Canadian National lines that have not been charged to the railroads, but that are charged to the government as general expenditures.

Still, this deficit builder has been until Saturday hanging on to the reins of office as Minister of Railways after having been swamped in South Essex. The people said: We want no more of your administration; and the voice of our section of the Dominion of Canada spoke very audibly. Four years ago the three seats in this section were held by three cabinet ministers by enormous majorities, namely, the Right Hon. George P. Graham, the Hon. James Murdock and the late Hon. W. C. Kennedy. Since then another seat has been added, and it must be painful—yes, it must even be mournful to the office-holding government, to discern on this side of the House four Conservatives, all with proud majorities. Strange as it may seem, with full faith and confidence they sent an Englishman, a Frenchman, a Scotchman and an Irishman to conduct their business in this parliament. I might add that so far the Irishman has not been out of bounds except on one occasion, and that owing to the fact that he has been seated in this House between two Scotchmen. I took occasion to turn to one of the Scotchmen and I asked him if he knew the difference between a Scotchman and a cocoanut. He advised me that he did not, and I told him that he could get a drink out of a cocoanut. I turned to the Scotchman on my left and I asked him if he knew the difference between a Scotchman and a canoe. He told me that he did not, and I had to tell him that a canoe tipped—sometimes.

A great deal has been said about keeping the railroads out of politics and I believe even this House could agree unanimously on that. There are in my riding five newspapers, three Liberal and two Independent, supposedly and during the campaign they carried advertisements headed: "Keeps the railways out of politics." Naturally I thought some interested citizen had been prompted by independent motives to take the initiative and to write the article; but when I was speaking to the owner of one of the newspapers he advised me that the item was Liberal campaign literature and was being paid for at the rate of $11.10 per insertion from the expense account of the Right Hon. George P. Graham. My advice to the government is to keep the railways out of politics. Perhaps they will not heed my advice because, as a young member, I thought it was my duty to sit, listen and learn for the first session or two and not to give any advice. Then it was impressed upon me that the duty of a back-bencher was merely to make a noise and vote, both of which I humbly plead guilty to.

Having given one piece of advice to the government, I feel at liberty to give them another, namely, to keep Sir Henry Thornton out of politics. I do not know Sir Henry Thornton; I have never met or even seen him; but I know if I had any jurisdiction over him, instead of raising his salary by thousands of dollars and permitting him to attend pink teas and dinners, I would lower his salary by thousands of dollars and put him to work. I see he advised the people of Toronto at a Canadian Club banquet on February 1, which was attended by approximately a thousand people, that we have added to our railway debts in the last three years the very small item of $159,000,000. After citing, according to the newspapers, some other matters, from these facts Sir Henry Thornton concluded that an era of prosperity awaited Canada, in which prosperity the Canadian National Railways would have a share. In order to get a glimpse of this prosperity, it will be necessary for us to get around the corner. That corner will be a hard one to turn and it can be turned only by the undivided co-operation of the people and legislators of this country from coast to coast. I quote from the Border Cities Star of February 2, 1926:

$53,000,000 Annual Loss of C.N. Lines—Thornton Declares Money spent in Past is Gone—Reviews Finances—Sir Henry Says he Will do Everything to Bring Alberta Coal here.

Toronto, February 2.—During the past three years the Canadian National Railways have cost the taxpayers of the Dominion $159,000,000 in direct loss, or, as Sir Henry Thornton, K.B.E., president of the system, declared to the Canadian Club yesterday, "That represents what you may call the out-of-pocket expenses. That is money that has gone out of the window. You can kiss it good-bye. It's gone." This, however, Sir Henry declared, was a different matter from the $100,000,000 a year which in some quarters, he alleged, was stated to be the annual loss.

If Canada had been losing that for the past three or five years, he asserted, the railway and the Dominion would have been "busted" long ago.

Sir Henry was inclined to take a much more optimistic view of the situation, declaring after a review of conditions generally, "We are approaching with considerable rapidity the day when our National System will cease to be a burden on the people of Canada. I have explained to you how our net earnings from operation have jumped from $3,000,000 to $32,000,000 in 3 years. Does not that present to you any encouragement for the future? There seems to me to be only one answer. This property is yours, and it is for you to say what shall be done with that property." With respect to criticism levelled at the management, Sir Henry defended expenditures on advertising and rehabilitation, made a laughing reference to golf courses, and finished by stating emphatically, "We shall continue on our course irrespective of criticism."

That is a defiant attitude which I should not care to assume if I were in his position as a servant of the people of this country. Now I believe in constructive criticism and there is no man in Canada to-day who is beyond the criticism of this parliament if we deem it our duty to offer that criticism. If we have an operating surplus on the Canadian National Railways for the fiscal year 1925—and let us hope that we shall have a large one—then I say that it is a matter more of good fortune than of good management, for from the opening of the year down to the last week in July car loadings showed a lower volume of traffic than during the corresponding period of 1924. Up to that date there had been a shrinkage of 78,454 loaded cars. The railways are the carriers of the commodities which commerce and industry produce, and they had a most discouraging half year inasmuch as there had been a slowing down of production. But with the closing week of the half year came a very favourable change; car loadings began to rise in volume and by the end of November the losses of the first six months had been retrieved and a gain of 37,731 loaded cars was recorded. Not in many years has there been so decided and significant a swing from conditions of depression to conditions of improvement, and as a result of this change let us all hope that when the report is brought down we shall have an operating surplus exceeding that of the most sanguine expectations. But even if we have a large operating surplus, several million dollars will be added to that already staggering, back-breaking railway debt which we as Canadians cannot shirk.

Sir Henry Thornton, the members of this parliament and men of outstanding capacity in Canada generally have reason to be alarmed at the size and continued growth of this debt. When is it going to stop and where will it end? I am not an alarmist, but there is no man in this parliament big enough to solve the problem. I do not think that we should adopt the attitude that everything is all right in Canada in connection with our railways and that soon they will be carrying themselves; I believe in letting the people know just where we stand in the matter. Do not let us try to cover it up, for what is to be gained? Sir Henry Thornton has the biggest task that faces any man in Canada and he needs advice; he needs sharp criticism of a constructive nature; and he needs co-operation on the part of this parliament and of the people in every section of the Dominion. The average intelligent citizen with whom I have conversed believes that if this money that is provided for private cars that are being operated at a tremendous expense could be diverted to the operation of box cars, it would be not only a good policy but a wise and patriotic endeavour, assuming that this could be done as soon as conditions would permit for the good of the system and in the interests of all Canadians who try to muster faith in the system.

I beg to submit a comparative statement of operations of the two great railway systems in Canada as taken from the Border Cities Star of Windsor, which is generally reliable in every respect. I do not propose to make any references to the expenditures at Jasper or Manakin, or to the radio expenditures, to the skyscraper in Toronto or to the Scribe hotel. The Canadian Pacific operates 20,000 miles of track while the Canadian National Railways operate approximately 21,000 miles and the gross receipts of the Canadian Pacific per mile amount to $8,900 while those of the Canadian National Railways are $10,771. The net profit of the Canadian Pacific Railway per mile, however, is $1,829 and the net profit of the Canadian National Railways $788, while the expenditures per mile on the Canadian Pacific are $7,100 and the expenditures per mile on the Canadian National $9,900. I do not know whether this is at present correct in detail but I presume it was correct at the time it was compiled in 1925. Now this is very discouraging to Canadians when they think that 35 cents of every dollar they pay into the Dominion treasury in the way of taxes must go to meet railway deficits.

I desire now to say a word on immigration. The hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott), in moving the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne—and I must congratulate him on the excellent way in which he acquitted himself—made mention of this subject among others. In fact he was so eloquent that once during his oration I closed my eyes and opened them suddenly to make sure that I was not surrounded by gold. He just about had me mesmerized. I should not like to accuse him of resorting to questionable tactics in his campaign, and certainly he won a victory there even though he does not represent the popular vote of the riding. The hon. member refers to the most successful immigration policy of this government. Which policy he means I do not know, but I would ask hon. members on both sides of the House this question: Is an immigration policy that brings immigrants to Canada when we have nothing to offer them a successful policy? Or is an immigration policy a successful policy which brings immigrants to Canada at the expense of the expulsion of our industrial workers? We have an Immigration department, it is true, but I must say it is over-manned; men are stumbling over one another in this as well as in other departments of the government. But the policy of the government has been to bring out immigrants at the expense of our people and to educate them along mechanical lines, and as soon as these immigrants become proficient the government permits them to leave the country for the land of opportunities to the south. The United States spend millions of dollars yearly through their immigration department to keep out undesirable immmigrants. We spend millions of dollars yearly through our Immigration department and have nothing to show for it. We bring in immigrants, and in a very short time many of them are over the line. We need immigrants, we must have them, but not at the expense of our Canadian boys. Get our factories running, conserve our natural resources and manufacture them at home, and soon, very soon, we will have employment for all. Then our boys will come back. Then launch an immigration campaign that will astound the eyes of the rest of the world. Population, and population alone, will solve our problems. The more the population the less the debt per capita; the less the population the more the debt per capita. So if we are to have the 50,000,000 population that my worthy opponent spoke of last session, we will have to wait for years at the present rate of increase.

To-day there are more Canadians in the United States than in the whole Dominion. The census for the city of Detroit alone for last year showed that there were 89,684 bona fide Canadian-born permanent residents, aside from the thousands who cross daily by ferry to work in Detroit factories, while many of the factories on this side of the river are not turning a wheel. And they will not until there is tariff stability. Talk about prosperity in Canada and our boys coming back from the States—some have said in large numbers! Yes, they are coming back. For the first fifteen days of the year at the port of Windsor—and this is the only port of entry I use as an illustration because it is a stone's throw from my riding—there were admitted to Canada—and they were not all Canadians—by way of ferry boat 47, by way of trains 26, or a total of 73. When we make the comparison that I am about to place before the House showing the absolute disparity that exists, those who are responsible for the policy that causes it say we are crying blue ruin, that we are calamity howlers, pessimists. I am not a calamity howler, nor am I a pessimist. I am just optimistic enough to think that a roadster can carry six passengers if they are well enough acquainted. Hence when I tell you, Sir, that for the first fifteen days of this year there were regularly admitted at Detroit from the Dominion 1,375 permanent residents—and the American officers think they do well if they get two out of three—the disparity is patent. During the same period we lost at the port of Windsor emigrants over immigrants 1,302 citizens that there are records of, and how many more crossed over never will be known. But those who assert that our boys are returning in large numbers know little, yea, very little of which they speak. It is not a pleasure for me to cite these conditions; it is rather painful. I think they are disgraceful. Let me quote a paragraph from the Border Cities Star of January 2, 1926:

Detroit Is Mecca For Canadians

The exodus of Canadians to the United States continues with the new year, according to a report by H. F. Hawley, United States consul at Windsor. Applications by bona fide Canadian citizens for legal entry into the United States are piling up rapidly, the consul said. That appointments with prospective immigrants have provided for every minute of his staff's time until February 26. The majority of those who propose departure from Canada by way of Windsor desire to settle in Detroit or vicinity, according to the records.

Now, Mr. Speaker, can you imagine what this means to Canada, losing the flower of her population? And yet we have a government in power that does not even know this is taking place! As to how many Canadians we will lose for the first quarter of 1926 from the port of Windsor alone no person can make even a conservative estimate. Those who left during the first fifteen days of January paid $13,750 to get passports, and the head tax aggregated $11,000 or a total expenditure of approximately, $24,750 of good Canadian money for the mere purpose of our fellow countrymen entering the States to reside there permanently. This is assisting to solve unemployment in Canada! I admit it, Mr. Speaker. It is helping as well our exports. All of these people are heads of families, and their dependents will follow later. Taking their furniture and so forth, their settlers' effects, and averaging them at $500 each, we are losing in wealth $687,500—a mere trifle. I claim this is the greatest challenge to any government or even a professed government that has ever been made. I ask what is being done to meet it.

The hon. member for Queens (Mr. Jenkins) recently said:

I have noticed in the speeches that have already been delivered in this debate that not a great deal has been said by hon. members regarding the particular constituencies they represent.

I did not regard his own statements as being very specific with respect to his constituency. I have the honour, Mr. Speaker, to represent the most southerly section of Canada. I have the honour too of representing Jack Miner, the leading bird naturalist of the world—also Jack Miner's birds. Jack Miner is a good Christian soul, kind hearted and with a very charitable disposition. Through his sanctuary he protects annually more birds than all the paid officials of all the governments of Canada combined.

Mr. JACOBS: He believes in protection.

Mr. GOTT: Apparently. After the hon. member for Queens made that statement I prepared a memorandum of the agricultural situation of my county. Essex county is the southern limit of Canada and together with parts of Lambton and Kent constitutes the northern limit of a prehistoric sea which once covered what is now known as the Mississippi valley, extending northwestward through Indiana and central and northwestern Ohio, and submerging the extremity of southern Ontario known now to Canadians as the "Garden of Canada." All the soils in this extensive region are roughly similar in physical properties. They are all composed of an alluvial deposit, ranging from light sand to heavy clay, but generally of a black silty loamy character and very highly productive. In Essex county there is a wide range of soil. Along the lake Erie shore it is generally of a sharp nature, ranging from sand to gravel. This formation extends northwestward to Ruthven as a narrow gravel ridge to Essex. In Mersea and Gosfield North, the light soil extends in irregular areas northward as far as Albuna and Blytheswood. The soil in this area of south Essex consists generally of yellow sand with only a small percentage of dark coloured sand. From the Canard river to Ojibway, along the Detroit river and extending backward a relatively short distance from the river, there is a very productive black sand area. Similarly in North Essex, along lake St. Clair and extending from Tecumseh to the Kent boundary, there is a general area of sand deposits, irregular in outline and blending with clay, loam and muck in a confusing manner, which consists mainly of dark sand with yellow sand showing in some restricted areas. This is the one outstanding radish belt of the world, and Petite Cote radishes are known all over the continent of North America.

The remainder of the soil, apart from the marsh land reclaimed and otherwise in the Leamington, Canard and lake St. Clair regions, is mainly of a dark loam nature, blending in but few cases into a hard clay foundation. Thus every constituency in Essex county has one of these three types of soil—sand, clay and muck—and every successful project to increase values and improve conditions will benefit everyone. Because of the level land of Essex county, its southern location and the influence of surrounding bodies of water, a climatic condition, and hence, a range of crops, exists which is unparalleled in any other district in Canada. The presence of good roads, of numerous steam and electric railroads and of large consuming centres within a reasonable carrying distance makes this theoretical crop range a practical business opportunity.

With the single exception of Virginia type tobacco, the dark coloured sands of the county will produce exactly the same crops and as profitably, as the lighter coloured sands. The Virginia tobacco industry will therefore remain centred in the lake Erie sand areas, although to some degree there may be possibilities of some development in the lake St. Clair region, particularly in Tilbury North. Burley tobacco may be grown with excellent success on the black sands, gravels and lighter loams, where these soil formations exist, in every part of the county. All our sand soils, properly drained, can grow early tomatoes ten days earlier than the Niagara district and from two to three weeks earlier than the state of Michigan lying directly opposite. Hence Essex country, has this climatic monopoly which will always remain.

Cabbages, spinach, beets, outdoor lettuce, onions, carrots, early potatoes, sweet potatoes, in fact, all early outdoor vegetable crops, can be grown because of this climatic factor to greatest advantage in Essex county. Orchard and small fruits are not so important as they were. Tobacco and early vegetables have proven more profitable and have been gradually supplanting them. However, the sand and gravel soils in the county are excellently adapted for their production and we still have over 5,000 acres of orchards—apples, peaches, plums, pears, cherries and apricots—and over 1,000 acres of small fruits. These are distributed throughout the country, but are concentrated mostly in the riding that I have the honour to represent, the most southerly section of our great Dominion, the progressive constituency of Essex South.

Much of the lighter soils in South Essex are already being intensively farmed, particularly adjacent to Leamington, Kingsville and Harrow. Virginia type tobacco and early tomatoes are the chief crops at present, but smaller areas of all early vegetables are produced. In West Essex, the most intensive cultivation anywhere in the county takes place, bordering the river from the Canard to La Salle. Several crops a year are taken from the soil. Both early and late vegetables are grown, and radishes are shipped in carload lots to the consuming centres. In North Essex very little of the sand land has been used for specialized production of high-producing, profitable vegetable crops for human consumption. No tobacco at all is being grown. All signs point to a development reasonably rapid in this district.

Despite the intensive development of land of this type, there is in Essex county a great deal of land adapted to these highly specialized crops not at present being put to so profitable a use. This is due partly to the fact that the occupiers of the land in certain localities have not developed this type of farming, and it is partly due to the fact that the very high American tariff tends to shut out these commodities from Detroit, the greatest natural market, while a low Canadian tariff on American produce invites unfair competition of southern grown products in our Canadian markets, and this fine industry is blighted materially by unfair and unreasonable competition from American producers. The very existence of the farmers of my constituency depends on a protective policy placing them on a basis of equality.

The organization of the unspecialized districts, to the end that they become specialized producing centres of the most profitable crops for which they are naturally adapted, is quite clearly called for, but in order to provide a continually expanding and profitable market, it is just as clear that tariff revisions must be made concurrently with, if not before, this development. Such a programme would greatly increase production, revenue and land values, and would permit of smaller farms and more inhabitants, thus reducing individual taxation and increasing business generally in all our county urban centres. It would also provide splendid business opportunities for those who held the at present cheap undeveloped land. The winter vegetable industry is entirely a matter of greenhouse production, but is carried on in practically every case in the sand and gravel areas already described. It is concentrated in the Leamington area and extends along the lake Erie front through Kingsville to Harrow. It has been established on a much smaller scale both in the La Salle and the Belle river districts. No section of Canada offers such natural advantages for this industry, and no district in Canada has so developed it on an extensive scale. Our mild and open winters, relatively short period of cold weather, and our ratio of sunshine, are unequalled. Already there are over 300,000 square feet of glass in Essex county, employing some 400 workers, and with a total capitalization of over $300,000. The chief crops grown are tomatoes, both for the Christmas and the Easter markets, cucumbers, lettuce, radishes, and flowers, both cut and potted. This business is decidedly one for the specialist, and in any case should develop slowly enough to ensure stability. But the greatest hindrance to progress is the tariff situation, as referred to in connection with early summer vegetable crops. As the greenhouses must be heated with coal, upon which a tariff is paid, and as greenhouse operation is too expensive at best to compete against southern crops grown outside and by cheap negro and Mexican labour, the situation in regard to tariff regulations is more unfortunate than in the case of early crops; and in both cases, the benefits arising from the importation of American produce are shared neither by the Southern grower nor by the Canadian consumer, but are secured by brokers, jobbers and distributors, many of them foreigners, while the situation at the same time, constitutes the great disability of the Canadian growers of these crops.

The principal crop now being grown on reclaimed marsh lands is late onions, both in the Leamington and Tilbury North districts. This crop also suffers seriously because of the tariff discrimination. Celery, which might be grown to perfection on this soil, is grown hardly at all, largely because of celery importations from Michigan. While there is an embargo on Ontario celery, together with cut flowers and several vegetables, entering United States ports because of the European corn borer, there is no such embargo on American celery entering Canada, despite the fact that ten American states, including Michigan, were excluded from showing corn at the Chicago International Grain and Hay Show in December, 1925, because of their infestation by the European corn borer, exactly as was Ontario. Late potatoes have not been grown largely on our marsh land, but could be produced very profitably if the American tariff had not been made prohibitory for this crop. The eventual development of these crops, together with the reclamation of thousands of acres still lying waste, depends to a considerable extent upon tariff readjustment. The application of labour-saving machinery and the establishment of suitable storage facilities are also important practical factors affecting the matter.

Loam and clay soils constitute at least three-quarters of the soils of the county, and consequently represent rather more than 300,000 acres. The county has the same climatic, geographic and topographic advantages over the remainder of Ontario that it has in the matter of sand and gravel soils. All cereal and grass crops that can be grown anywhere else in the temperate zone, such as wheat, oats, barley, alfalfa, and all the clovers, are produced very successfully. In addition, four great kinds of cash crops are produced which make Essex county distinct from the rest of the province, with the exception of Kent.

Corn has been the chief cereal crop, some 100,000 acres having been normally produced both for feed and as a cash crop. This crop has been recognized as the most valuable cereal produced in America. The yield per acre of concentrated feed is roughly about one ton more than in the case of any other cereal, while a secondary fodder crop is secured almost equal in feeding value to the corn grain yield. As a result, corn land is the highest in price, of any cereal producing land. The Mississippi valley is the great area of corn production in the United States because of its water-land soil and its peculiar climate, and Essex County and four townships of Kent County constitute the only portion of the great North American corn belt located in Canada. The whole basis of agriculture, both as to field crop husbandry and animal husbandry in this vast area, has rested on the corn crop, and in consequence the whole scheme of farming is very different in many particulars from that developed in other crop regions.

Tobacco has been the second most important field crop of Essex County and is rapidly becoming of first importance. There are three types of tobacco—not varieties, for several varieties are included in each general type—which can be grown in Essex to perfection. Since each one thrives best on a different type of soil, tobacco can, therefore, be grown successfully on every kind of Essex soil with the single exception of our relatively small acreages of marsh and hard white clay. Even by soil treatment, the marsh land might produce a fair quality of tobacco. Hence our production of this highly valuable crop depends on our markets and the skill of our growers, and not on soil limitations. Virginia type tobacco must above all, be of high quality. The proper colour and character of leaf can be secured only on a sand light both in color and in physical properties. Only in South Essex, and perhaps on a small scale in North Essex, can this crop be grown. While there is a good deal of undeveloped Virginia leaf land in South Essex, there is much land too heavy in character upon which this type is now being grown. Thus our total county production will not probably greatly increase, because as new land is developed, some of the heavier soils will be discarded for the production of this type. Burley type tobacco gives the best ratio of quality to quantity on heavy lands, gravel, black sands and very light loams. Much of it is also grown on soils too heavy to yield the best results. If the present acreage were distributed throughout South, North and West Essex on the soils most adapted to it, better results would be obtained. Dark, or Green river type tobacco gives the best results on loam soils, ideal corn land being also ideal dark tobacco land. Hence, it can be grown with splendid success in all parts of the county.

Practically all the Virginia and Burley types are consumed by the Canadian markets. We produce in Ontario about all the Burley required, but not nearly enough Virginia, particularly of the higher grades. There is a tremendous market in Britain for the Virginia type, and a relatively small one for Burley. Our total production of Virginia type probably cannot be greatly increased in Essex, although by soil changes, the quantity of high grade tobacco can be greatly increased. Elgin and Norfolk can produce this type on their light sands, however, sufficient to meet eventual market demands. Burley can be increased largely, both as to quantity and quality, in Essex and Kent, and perhaps in Lambton, as fast as an export market is developed. The British preferential tariff is at present causing this development.

The dark type tobacco is in a class by itself. Three years ago, none of this was grown, while in 1924 over 3,000,000 pounds were produced. This type is produced entirely for the British market, the development of which was caused by the British preferential tariff, and this year was the most in demand of any type in the county. The British market absorbs 40,000,000 pounds annually. As it can be grown in all parts of the county on good corn land, it offers the greatest chance of development of all types. The great advantages in producing tobacco in Essex county are our superior soil and climate for this crop, the fact that both home and foreign markets are already established, and the fact that the industry is already concentrated in this county. The chief disabilities are two. The first one is practical, and involves the great skill and considerable investment required to make a start in growing tobacco. The second one is again a matter of tariff discrimination. The American tariff is so high as to absolutely bar our tobacco from the States. Canada has no tariff on American tobacco, but the excise is 60 cents a pound on American tobaccos, whereas it is 20 cents on Canadian, thus in effect giving a 40 cent tariff on the American product. This is of course ridiculous, compared to the American schedule. Moreover, it is impossible to discover just what we do import from the United States. There are some varieties which must be imported, because we cannot grow them, and a low tariff on these kinds is perhaps justifiable. But with proper encouragement we can grow all the Burley and Virginia leaf in Ontario and all the cigar tobaccos in Quebec that our home markets can absorb. And we must take adequate precautions that no dark type or other kinds are shipped in from the States to be reshipped to Europe, thus weakening our growers' export market.

Hence, the total quantity of tobacco imported into Canada is really of less importance than the kind imported. But our Customs department has never tabulated varieties. To-day, no one knows or can find out, except the inspectors involved, what kinds of tobacco or in what quantities Canada imports. Not even the Federal Tobacco division has been able to get this information. It is absolutely essential that the Customs department be instructed to do this. The only way to prevent abuse is to have a direct tariff on tobacco graded according to whether we grow that kind of tobacco, to be paid when the imports are cleared. And there must also be compiled with this an analysis of our imports. The schedule of tariffs must depend to quite an extent upon such an analysis.

The third class of important cash crops grown in this county is canning crops. They are grown largely on typical loam corn land. Essex county is, perhaps, superior to any part of Ontario in producing tomatoes. The Dominion Canners have six factories canning this crop alone. The Heinz and Clark people each have their Canadian branches in Essex county. The Quality Canners have four factories in Essex. In addition, tomatoes, sweet corn, peas, pumpkins, string beans, cauliflowers and some minor crops are canned. There are at least 5,000 acres of canning crops in this county. Some of these products are exported but the bulk are used in the home trade. This industry is profitable for the farmer—more so than corn growing—and it is established in each of the three Essex constituencies. Discriminatory freight rates are the chief obstacles at present to a very great development of this industry. This whole matter is now being dealt with by the Board of Railway Commissioners.

I wish to deal now with the development of animal husbandry. The most important department of animal husbandry in Essex has been the production of hogs. This is true of all corn belts and hog feeding in Essex was directly connected with corn growing. The feeding of beef animals was an important secondary interest. Hog feeding is now likely to decline, while beef feeding has been steadily declining since 1920. Dairy farming has made a steady advance during the last few years. Skilful dairy farming is not so dependent upon the corn crop, is economically more advantageous than any other kind of live stock farming on high priced land, and will probably increase as the other branches of live stock husbandry wane. Poultry raising has especial advantages in Essex county and is steadily advancing in importance.

No county in Ontario has made more rapid development than Essex, thus proving that these natural advantages are being practically developed, as the following figures will show:

Essex county	Relative Standing in Ontario re other counties
Acres of assessed land	419,271, rank 28th
Per cent land cleared..	88.39, rank 3rd
Assessed total value of land.. ..	$38,934,857, rank 3rd
Assessed value of bare land per acre..	92.86, rank 1st

Now, Mr. Speaker, under date of February 15, 1926, I received a letter from Granby, Quebec which reads:

Mr. E. J. Gott,
Room 581, House of Parliament.

Dear Sir,—The delegation of cigar manufacturers who waited upon Messrs Robb and Boivin, February 3, 1926, asked for the following changes.

	Present rates	Proposed rates
Raw Leaf unstemmed ..	40c. per lb.	30c. per lb.
Raw Leaf stemmed ..	60c. per lb.	45c. per lb.
Cigars under $40 per M.	$ 3 50	$ 1 75
Cigars under $110 per M.	6 00	3 00
Cigars under $150 per M.	10 00	6 00
Cigars under $200 per M.	13 00	10 00
Cigars over $200	16 00	12 00
Surcharges on packages less than 10..	1 00	Nil.

Their pretensions are that this will reduce the cost of the cigars to the retailer, will improve the quality to the consumer, thus induce greater consumption, consequently more revenue. Back of all this means a greater importation of foreign leaf. In my opinion it would be more to their credit if they devoted their talents to the improvement of the native leaf. My proposition is that the customs duty on foreign leaf be raised to 50 cents for unstemmed and 70 cents for stemmed.

That the excise duty on all cigars be $1 flat, no surtax.

That the excise on manufactured tobaccos be reduced to 10 cents now 20 cents.

That an excise duty of 10 cents be imposed on all domestic leaf consumed in a raw state, or, the duty be at least equal to the excise duty on manufactured, because leaf now consumed in a raw state brings no bread to labor or revenue to the government.

That domestic leaf be admitted free into all licensed factories. For twenty years I have been working for Canadian tobaccos. I was the only individual in the British Empire who exhibited at Wembley native tobaccos and cigars made therefrom, all other exhibits being by governments. I have predicted, that within ten years Canada will be exporting fifty million pounds to the United Kingdom, because of the increased preference. To attain this we must produce more Flue cured in Elgin, Norfolk, Essex and Kent Counties, where the soil is right and the climate and season propitious.

We must hurry the coming five years. I am sending similar letters to M.P.s for Norfolk, Kent, Prince Edward, Northumberland, Wellington, North and South and Mr. G. Stirling of Okanagan, urging upon all of them to study this matter in the interests of their constituents and of Canada.

Please get them together and talk it over.

Yours truly,

J. Bruce Payne.

Under date of February 17, I wrote Mr. Payne as follows:

Ottawa, February 17, 1926.

Mr. J. Bruce Bayne,
Cigar Manufacturer,
Granby, Quebec.

Dear Sir:

I have your favour of 15th instant re delegation of cigar manufacturers who waited upon the Honourable Messrs. Robb and Boivin on February 3, asking for change in tariff on cigars and raw leaf, stemmed and unstemmed tobacco.

The position you have outlined to me contains views far from those held by myself personally and assuredly by my constituents.

Coming as I do from the leading tobacco producing constituency in Canada it is only natural to expect that I desire all possible encouragement for the industry.

We are endeavouring at the present time to encourage the growth of different grades of tobacco in Canada, the kind which these people in my estimation require most.

If the duties or excise is cut it will be in contravention to the desires and interests of my constituents in whose behalf I propose a change in tariff and excise on all grades.

I am grateful to you for your letter and in return solicit your determination and co-operation in the interests of the tobacco growers of the Dominion of Canada.

Yours very truly,

The tobacco situation directly affects a larger number of people than the vegetable business and is bound to grow increasingly important. There are two distinct phases of the industry in a business sense, one, the domestic market, and two, the export market. For the domestic market, there are two types grown, principally the Burley type and the Virginia type. Canada now produces just about enough Burley for domestic purposes, but not nearly enough Virginia for domestic purposes. For the export market some Burley is required, much fine Virginia and some 40,000,000 pounds annually of the Green river black type.

Due to the increased British preference, Canadian tobacco or tobacco shipped from Canada as Canadian tobacco has a great advantage over American tobacco. By an adequate system of tariffs, Canada can supply all her tobacco for the domestic trade except a few grades, and can become a successful rival of the United States for the British export trade. But Canada is seriously handicapped because of a tariff not properly balanced with that of the United States. In the first place, the American tariff on stripped and stemmed leaf—the commercial grade—is $2.75 per pound, while the Canadian tariff on a similar grade is 60 cents per pound. To make matters worse, Canadian manufacturers can import this tobacco into their warehouses in bond without paying any duty at all until it is manufactured. Moreover, it can apparently lie in this warehouse as unmanufactured tobacco for a long time. In this way it is possible for Canadian manufacturers to lay in a stock of similar grades of American tobacco, which because of the British preference should be cheaper in the field than Canadian tobacco, and hold it as a club to depress the prices of the Canadian product both for the home and the foreign trade. In this way the great advantage of the British preference can be annulled so far as the grower is concerned, and in fact has been so annulled, as the growers' price has not shown the increase justified by the preferential tariff. And this is in face of the fact that already two companies which formerly operated in Kentucky have removed their buying activities from that state to the county of Essex. In short, the only way for the grower to reap the full benefit of the British preference is to have all tobacco imported from the United States subject to a tariff equal to that of the United States.

It is absolutely essential at the present time that every possible encouragement be given the Essex county growers. It is apparent that in order to control the European corn borer, crop substitutes for some 60,000 acres of high-priced land hitherto devoted to the production of corn, must be found. Unless these substitutes are as profitable as corn, farm revenues will be lowered and a very serious depreciation of land values will occur. Vegetables and tobacco are two of the most profitable and logical substitutes affected. The matter, therefore, is one of vital interest; it is, in fact, the most vital question facing agriculture in Essex to-day. Thus Essex county, while relatively a small county and coming but twenty-eighth in point of assessed acres of land, is first in value of land per acre, third in assessed value of total acreage, third in percentage of land cleared, ninth in value of both buildings and implements, fourteenth in value of live stock, and fifth in total assessed values of these various items. Essex county has another wonderful asset in density of population. There are nearly seven thousand occupiers of land and Essex is one of the few counties in which the agricultural population has increased in the last decennial period. Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the adjournment of the debate

Mr. LAPOINTE: Has my hon. friend any further extended remarks to make? I will not object to his moving the adjournment of the debate if he so wishes.

Mr. GOTT: Does the hon. member desire that I proceed?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Not if he has further extended remarks to make.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT—WEDNESDAY SITTING

Mr. LAPOINTE: If the House agrees unanimously, I beg to move:

That when this House adjourns this day it stand adjourned until to-morrow at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the House adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

The House met at three o'clock.

CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN CANADIAN AND UNITED STATES GOVERNMENTS

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, some few days ago I mentioned to the House that we had asked the American government to name a date on which we should, concurrently, table the despatches passing between this government and the government of the United States with reference to the Chicago drainage canal. They have agreed, and have named this as the day for the concurrent publication of the despatches.

In tabling this interchange of correspondence between the government of Canada and the government of the United States with respect to the matter of the withdrawal of water from the Great Lakes system by the Chicago sanitary district, a word of explanation is desirable.

The correspondence covers the permit of the 3rd of March, 1925, issued by the United States Secretary of War to the Chicago sanitary district, and the subsequent exchange of communications between the two governments up to the end of the year 1925.

In my statement to the House of Commons dated January 25 last, mention was made of the permit of the 3rd of March above referred to, authorizing the diversion of an amount of water expressed as not to exceed an annual average of 8,500 second feet through the main and auxiliary channels of the sanitary district. It is believed that the object of the United States Secretary of War in issuing this permit was to legalize under United States law, in so far as a permit of the Secretary of War could legalize it, the withdrawal of a sufficient amount of water to protect the health of the inhabitants of the sanitary district, while at the same time incorporating in the terms of the permit provision for a progressive curtailment of the total waters diverted from the Great Lakes by calling upon the Chicago sanitary district and the municipality of Chicago to install sewage disposal works, to construct a control gate in the Chicago river to control flood flows and to meter the domestic water supply.

While the foregoing outlines the general objectives of the Secretary of War's permit, it was, unfortunately, possible to place various interpretations upon the amount of water which could be diverted under its terms. This uncertainty arose from the phraseology of the permit itself, and from the physical conditions obtaining in respect to the actual diversion.

While all the water carried in the drainage canal is a diversion from the Great Lakes system, yet the waters in the canal are not all diverted in the same manner. Certain of the waters are diverted directly from lake Michigan by the main drainage canal and its auxiliaries. A second manner of diversion is through the disposal of the domestic water supply which is pumped from lake Michigan by the municipality of Chicago and as sewage passes into the drainage canal. The quantity of water so diverted amounts to some 1,200 cubic feet per second. A third manner of diversion has been the reversal of the flow of the Chicago and Calumet rivers, whose waters in the natural state were discharged into lake Michigan, but are now diverted into the drainage canal. This last diversion is estimated to be an annual average amount of 1,300 cubic feet per second.

With the above conditions obtaining it was, therefore, possible to interpret the permit of the 3rd of March as being applicable in any one of the three following manners:

1. That the amount of 8,500 cubic feet per second was inclusive of all waters diverted, regardless of the manner in which diversion was made;

2. That the amount of 8,500 cubic feet per second was inclusive of all waters diverted. with the exception of the water diverted for domestic purposes; that is, a total abstraction of 9,700 cubic feet per second was recognized;

3. That the amount of 8,500 cubic feet per second was applicable only to the direct diversion by the drainage canal and auxiliaries from lake Michigan and was exclusive of the water diverted for domestic water supply and by the reversal of the flow of the Chicago and Calumet rivers; that is, a total abstraction of 11,000 cubic feet per second was recognized.

With the object of securing from the United States government a specific interpretation of the terms and conditions of the permit, this government has exchanged notes with the government of the United States, as a result of which a clear-cut definition has been placed upon the permit. This exchange of correspondence is tabled herewith. The communications from the government of the United States now make it clear: First: That the 8,500 cubic feet per second includes the reversed flow of the Chicago and Calumet rivers, but is exclusive of the 1,200 cubic feet per second pumped for domestic consumption by the city of Chicago; that is, a total abstraction of 9,700 cubic feet per second is recognized; Second: That this total diversion of 9,700 cubic feet per second authorized or recognized is practically the amount being actually diverted at present.

In further reference to the interpretation of the terms and conditions of the permit as disclosed in this correspondence, it might be stated that it is the understanding of the United States government that the gross flow in the canal will be reduced by December 31st, 1929, to 8,000 cubic feet per second and probably to 6,700 cubic feet per second, and the United States government states further that the sewage treatment programme of the sanitary district has been arranged so as to make it possible to effect a reduction to a gross flow of 4,167 cubic feet per second by the year 1935 or before. I might add that it is the intention of this government to follow closely the actual progress which is made in the construction works necessary to enable the proposed curtailment to be realized.

The papers brought down to-day cover the despatches exchanged during 1925 subsequent to the issuance of the permit of the 3rd of March. In January of the present year, as indicated in my statement to the House some weeks ago, the Canadian government, having secured an official interpretation of the United States permit, set forth its position in a comprehensive manner in a further despatch, which included a protest against pending proposals for the construction of a 9-foot navigable channel in the Illinois and Mississippi rivers based upon the diversion of 10,000 cubic feet per second from the Great Lakes through the sanitary district canal. It has been agreed with the United States government not to publish this despatch until the reply is also available for publication.

In conclusion, I might add that while some progress has been made towards bettering the conditions with respect to the Chicago diversion, as will be realized from a review of this correspondence, this government is maintaining the closest possible contact with every phase and feature having to do with the Chicago diversion and will continue to present the Canadian viewpoint with all possible firmness to the United States government. It might be further emphasized that this government has never at any time recognized, in the smallest degree, the diversion, and will continue to protest against the entire principle of abstracting water from the Great Lakes to another watershed.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: What year was that?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Last year, 1925.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the correspondence be printed for distribution?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, it can be printed.

Mr. GEARY: Has the government given any consideration to the legal right of the Secretary for War of the United States of America to give a permit for the diversion of lake water at all?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Well, I would not like to answer that question because the whole matter, as my hon. friend knows, is before the courts of the United States as well as before congress, and it is also being discussed very freely in connection with the hearings at Washington. So far as the Canadian government is concerned that is another matter and I should not like to express an opinion as to whether or not the Secretary for War has the necessary authority to issue such a permit.

AUSTRALIAN TREATY

BOUNTY ON BUTTER EXPORTED FROM COMMONWEALTH

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Two days ago I drew the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to an article which appeared in the press regarding the reported bonus to be paid by the Australian government in connection with the exportation of butter, and was informed that the Minister of Finance was in communication with the authorities of the Australian commonwealth touching the question which is known as the Pattersen scheme. Has the minister any information to give on the subject?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): No reply has yet been received.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Was the communication by cable or by letter?

Mr. ROBB: I will find out and let my hon. friend know just what was done. I am being instructed in this matter by the officers of the department.

SOLDIER SETTLERS' LAND

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. CLARK (Vancouver-Burrard): On the 18th February I drew the attention of the government to a report that fifty families of immigrants had been settled on certain vacated soldier lands, and the Minister of the Interior stated that he would obtain particulars. I also drew attention to a report that these immigrants were being settled on the lands referred to at valuations below those originally placed on them. The minister stated that he also had received complaints to that effect, and would look into the matter and give the House the desired information.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I had the report in question prepared but I missed placing it on the table and it has now gone back to my office. However, I will table it to-morrow.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Tuesday, February 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. C. Elliott for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session and the proposed motion of Mr. Bird: "That this question be now put."

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose last evening—

Mr. MACLEAN (South York): Will the hon. member be good enough to move a little nearer to the centre of the chamber so that we can all hear him?

Mr. GOTT: When the House rose last evening I had just concluded an analysis of the tobacco situation in the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and I must take this opportunity of thanking the leader of the government for the very kind and courteous attention that he gave me during my remarks. Being conversant with the requirements of the electors in my riding and knowing that our national development and progress lie ahead of us, and is not dependent on what we have omitted to do or have done wrongly in the past, let me ask any fair-minded resident of our Dominion if the following comparison of the duties existing between the United States and Canada at the present time is fair to either the consumer or the producer:

	United States Customs Duty	Canadian Customs Duty
Wheat	42 cents per bushel	12 cents per bushel
Corn	15 cents per bushel	Free
Wheat flour	$2.04 per barrel	50 cents per barrel
Hay	$4.00 per ton	$2.00 per ton
Fruits	35 per cent	25 per cent
Potatoes	50 cents per 100 pounds	35 per cent
Butter	8 cents per pound	4 cents per pound
Cheese	5 cents per pound	3 cents per pound
Eggs	8 cents per dozen	3 cents per dozen

Our low duty on eggs permits the egg producer of the western states to ship his cold storage eggs into Canada in open competition with Canadian strictly fresh eggs, and neither the consumer nor the producer in this country benefits. The consumer takes the chance when he goes to the market to purchase a dozen eggs, of getting a dozen cold storage eggs which are worth from 15 cents to 20 cents a dozen less than our strictly fresh eggs.

Cattle	40 per cent	25 per cent
Woollens	100 per cent	27½ per cent
Silk fabrics	55 per cent	15 per cent
Woollen hose	75 per cent	25 per cent
Blankets	75 per cent	22½ per cent
Alfalfa and alsike	4 cents per pound	10 per cent
Tomatoes	½ cent per pound	30 per cent
Beans	$1.05 per bushel	25 cents per bushel
Oats	15 cents per bushel	10 cents per bushel
Barley	20 cents per bushel	15 cents per bushel
Tobacco	From $1 to $3 per pound	40 cents per pound and permitted to remain in bond for a period of two years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose just for a moment, to take up a subject which is a very strong one—one, I believe, which would easily bring tears to the eyes of the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon). That might be impossible, but it would bring tears to the eyes of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell)—I refer to the question of onions. Canada has reached a position where an exportable surplus of onions can be developed.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. members to preserve order so that the hon. gentleman who has the floor may be distinctly heard.

Mr. GOTT: I say that Canada has reached a position where an exportable surplus of onions can be developed each and every year, if business principles and good judgment be applied to the operation of the industry, and if the necessary precautions be taken to safeguard it at all times—and when I say that I mean 365 days of every year. This industry is one which is assuming considerable proportions in the riding I have the honour to represent. At this very moment, growers in western Ontario who have been marketing onions all winter, are faced with the situation that they are receiving approximately $1.10 per hundredweight—or 60 cents per bushel—with a possibility of having to dump the onions out on the field in thirty days because of the approaching arrival of new ones from Texas, California and other western states.

This situation is discouraging to the growers in our part of the country. It is a disadvantage in the extreme, but it could be prevented easily if the government would protect our growers, from the standpoint of selling in the fall at harvest time, from the direct competition of the so-called Spanish onions, which are put on the market at prices equal to any prices that our domestic onion dealers are quoting. This competition from Spanish onions continues throughout the winter. Then in the spring the local onions stored and carried over the winter are faced with refusal at city markets because of the coming in of the new onions from Texas and California. If the United States has a large surplus so that the prices there to the grower are low—sometimes they are invoiced as low as 50 to 75 cents per bag—not bushels but hundred pounds—paying a duty of 16 cents—they can land them in Toronto, Montreal and the Maritimes as cheap as, if not considerably cheaper than the western Ontario growers can. This is discouraging to the grower who, if he seeks to take a bag of onions into the United States, is compelled, regardless of the prices at which they are selling, to pay a duty of $1 per bag.

The state of New York in 1925 produced twice as many onions for the fall market as any other two states in the union. New York is much closer to eastern Ontario, Quebec, and the Maritimes, than is western Ontario, hence the freight rates fully compensate for the duty of 30 per cent, as the duty is usually based on a very low billing. The production of onions in western Ontario could be materially increased if the market could be stabilized, but there is no money in onions at 30 or 40 cents per bag; and the Canadian people are big enough that they do not want to buy onions at 50 cents per bag if it means the annihilation of an important Canadian industry.

American grown onions when imported into Canada are billed so low for customs purposes that the duty gives very little protection to Ontario growers, while on the other hand Canadian growers of onions are barred from the adjacent United States markets of Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, Chicago, Milwaukee, Indianapolis, Columbus and Cincinnati, because of the fixed duty of $1 per hundred pounds imposed by the United States government. We are barred from the United States market while at the same time our onion market is taken from underneath our feet by onions from Spain, the West Indies and the United States; yet our government, not knowing that such is the condition, sits idly by. If the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), is in his seat, and if he will arouse himself for a short time, I will submit to him a few constructive points relative to the preservation of this one industry in Canada—in South Essex at least, where an onion shed is now under construction by the government for the storage of onions until the surplus stock of American, Spanish, and the West Indies onions is off our own market. I will say to the hon. minister, that South Essex does not want an onion shed built for one, two, or a few political favourites. They want protection of their product to assure them of our own market, in which they can dispose of their own product at a reasonable and profitable figure.

The proposed construction of an onion shed at Leamington—which, by the way, has been started and is now under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture—was a costly, vote getting, experiment. The onion growers voted strongly—and I trust the Minister of Agriculture will observe the term "strongly"—against the government candidate, the Right Hon. George P. Graham and the government's proposal to build an onion shed instead of giving them protection on their product. Protection, not an onion shed or onion sheds, is what my constituents desire. I am inspired to try to impress upon the hon. Minister of Agriculture, if it be possible, the fact that he can, by almost a stroke of the pen, preserve an important industry in western Ontario which to-day is not receiving fair play.

Let me make one or two constructive suggestions. First, there should be adequate protection on all vegetables, principally onions, raised in Ontario, or in any other part of Canada, protection equal in every respect to that accorded the United States vegetable raisers, so that the barrier to our vegetables seeking markets would be equalled by the barrier the American growers encounter in trying to reach our market. Second: The development of export market facilities and the methods of handling our vegetables, so that we can dispose of our exportable surplus each year, thereby providing a safety valve for any seasonable surplus that we may have from time to time. As an instance, I would mention that during the winter of 1924-25, sixty-seven car loads of onions were exported to Cuba from Ontario and Vancouver, and forty-two car loads of British Columbia onions to the Orient.

In this connection, I might state that under date of February 16, Mr. G. E. McIntosh, Fruit Commissioner, received the following wire:

Chatham, Ont., February 16, 1926.

Mr. G. E. McIntosh,
Fruit Commissioner,
Department of Agriculture,
Ottawa Ont.

Wire collect names and addresses several reliable, aggressive exporters onions to Cuba and West Indies market. Heavy importation Spanish onions during past five months have taken place of large amount domestic onions with resulting considerable surplus our onions.

If 20 to 50 cars domestic onions could be exported, a fair market might be provided for remainder onions. About 25 cars freshly regraded onions are available at $1.25 per cwt. f.o.b. Western Ontario points and growers pressing to sell.

Sgd. Bruce F. Bradley.

This wire was not despatched by any person animated by political affiliations. It presents the actual condition in western Ontario to-day, as set forth by a man who thinks we should at least be entitled to our own market so long as we do not exploit it to the disadvantage of the general public.

Thousands of farmers in the United States —vegetable raisers, tobacco raisers, and all classes of farmers—would be glad to come to our district if the market for the vegetables they could grow were other than it is at present; and I beseech this government to co-operate with us in this respect in the interests of the people whom I have the honour to represent, before it is too late. The industry is well worth preserving; the farmers of South Essex have hundreds of thousands of dollars invested in it.

In 1924 Canada produced 31,218 tons of onions. Of that amount Ontario produced 23,844 tons, and the riding I represent produced over one-half of the total production of the whole Dominion. For the period of four months of the year 1925 we exported 9,116 bushels of onions at a value of $7,979, and imported for the fiscal year $401,814. I obtained these figures from the report of the Ottawa Fruit Commissioner, Mr. Fulton. We can produce onions, the best in the world, sufficient for the consumption of the whole Canadian market, and have thousands of bushels for export purposes, if this or any other government will only give us a chance to see what actually can be done.

I plead for fairness to all classes. I submit that when we remedy this difference in tariff we shall at one stroke put ourselves on the way to improve our transportation, immigration, emigration, agricultural and general business conditions. If we do not raise our tariff to meet that of our closest competitor we shall be steering straight into disaster.

[Mr. Gott.]

American potatoes and other vegetables have been permitted to drive Canadian produce from the market. Our home-grown vegetable and fruit stocks are allowed to decay, while the market is supplied from the United States at one-third the duty at which we can supply their market. The loss to Canadian growers amounts to millions of dollars annually, and the industry is blighted by unnecessary competition. The preservation of our market garden industry means increased buying powers to the extent of millions of dollars for large sections of Canadian people, to the ultimate benefit of the entire country, while the consumer, as well as the producer, will reap the profit.

I desire, Mr. Speaker, to submit a statement of farm produce imported into the Dominion of Canada from the United States for the year 1924, as follows:

Apples	$ 775,819
Applies dried	56,407
Pears	566,634
Peaches in cans	201,630
Peaches raw	403,312
Cherries	83,349
Grapes	661,443
Strawberries	785,150
Plums	303,495
Butter	783,488
Eggs	2,508,383
Cheese	318,981
Lard	1,144,141
Pork	5,134,061
Beef	33,943
Mutton	250,692
Tomatoes	964,055
Potatoes	451,449
Cabbage	187,677
Onions	434,548
Other vegetables	1,396,080
Corn	bushels 14,120,962
Tobacco	pounds 16,848,439

Total foodstuffs imported, $494,349,000.

In the recent campaign I stood for six points, namely:

1. To reduce our national debt and lessen the burden of taxation by strict economy in every department of government.

2. To stop the alarming tide of emigration by encouraging the development of Canada's great natural resources and give employment to Canadians at home.

3. To adjust the tariff so as to give reasonable and just protection to Canadian farm and garden products, in order that the Canadian farmer and every man who labours may obtain the highest prices for the products of his toil.

4. To develop a sane immigration policy, with the view of building up Canada as a great and prosperous nation within the British Empire.

5. To conserve Canada's raw materials and manufacture them at home, thereby giving employment to hundreds of thousands who, through the exportation of same in the raw, follow it to the factories in search of employment.

6. To adopt at all times a conciliatory and constructive mode of procedure on matters pertaining to our national welfare; and to represent all the people regardless of colour, creed or political affiliation.

I quote from the Mail and Empire of September 12, 1925:

Australia Booming

On Wave of Prosperity, Sir James Elder Says

Toronto, September 12.—Illuminating figures showing what protection had accomplished in Australia and other parts of the British Empire were imparted yesterday at the exhibition directors' luncheon, at which Sir James Elder, Trade Commissioner for Australia in the United States; Hon. J. F. Cahan, M.P.P., member without portfolio of the cabinet of the Nova Scotia government, and Ben Smith, a member of the British Labour party in the House of Commons, spoke.

Sir James Elder said he was certain that Australia would be an exhibitor at the 1926 exhibition. Unlike Canada, he said, Australia was now riding on the crest of a phenomenal wave of prosperity, and the wheels of industry were spinning as never before, so much so that the people of Australia were fast being relieved of the heavy burdens of taxation. Protection had been the one cause of Australia's wonderful success in the interchange of trade with other countries.

Sir James declared that during the past three years Australia had reduced her war debt by over $110,000,000, while the aggregate Federal debt had been decreased to the extent of $2,000,000,000. Australia had not only reduced her public debt, but the government was seized of the importance of relieving the people of heavy income taxation and four reductions had been made since 1914, the present tax being on the basis of pre-war days, plus 20 per cent and further reductions were contemplated in the very near future.

I have been asked by members on this side of the House where I stand on the question of Maritime rights. I have heard the question very often asked in this chamber: What are Maritime rights? I quote a reprint from the Montreal Herald:

Halifax Elevators Lie Idle as Bulk of Grain Crop Shipped by Way of the United States.

Not one bushel of the 24,095,814 bushels of Canadian wheat exported to Great Britain this year has arrived at one of empire's most important ports.

I realize from that article what Maritime rights are, and I say to this House that I stand for Maritime rights just as I stand for Alberta coal for Ontario. I stand for Canada for Canadians. I stand for a national fuel policy which, I believe, would be a wise and patriotic policy, one conducive to the exclusion of millions of tons of United States coal annually from Canada and one that would keep at home millions of dollars every year to help to turn the wheels of Canadian industry.

Much has been said in this House about precedents. I have heard more precedents mentioned since the opening of this session than in all the rest of my life. Let me quote a living precedent, one which stands out in the world to-day as a beacon—the United States of America. The United States is the richest country in the world. It is the most highly protected country under the sun. Its workmen are the best paid men on earth and its commodities are sold at prices as reasonable as those of any country. Only when Canada adopts measures similar to those adopted by the United States in regard to the tariff, shall we prosper. Protection brings capital investment, industry, employment, wages and competition. Competition brings prices within the reach of the working man and, above all, presents us with the means of preserving the essential of nationhood—our manhood. Protection brings industry and one industry brings another. The protective tariff develops home industries and these industries promote others, giving employment to working men, wages to local families and contentment in the home. They give custom and profit to local business, and the prosperity of the manufacturers and of business concerns generally provides freight for the railways, which again employ more workers. All these combined furnish a better home market to the farmers who are sadly in need of a more extensive outlet for their products.

This is the policy which the Conservative party stand for and which will be put into operation at the earliest opportunity after they have come into power. Like 115 other members on this side of the House, I was elected on a protective policy. I represent a progressive constituency and a farming community, and speaking for the farmers of South Essex, whose very existence depends upon protection and whose progress has been very seriously hampered by unfair competition, I stand behind a leader whose policy it will be to promote such conditions as are vital to the welfare of that constituency among others.

There are 116 members on this side who are united behind one leader with one policy and one principle that of a unified Canada. That leader is courageous, outspoken, straightforward and honest, and 116 men are pledged to him both in heart and in mind. With confidence they stand behind him ready to assist in the passing of legislation by means of which every section of the country and every citizen of this Dominion will be benefited, regardless of their political affiliations or their standing in their respective communities. That policy is a policy to build up Canada and to elevate the morale of our citizens, and that policy will be acceptable, I am sure, to every section of Canada. Our policy is one of adequate protection to all classes, a policy which will be conducive to Dominion-wide prosperity on the farm, in the factory and in the home; and in that policy lies the only solution for the problems of our war and railway debts and the exodus of our boys and girls to the United States. In it lies the solution for the problems also of our present ruinous taxation and the burdens under which the Canadian people are labouring to-day. Our policy offers to this country an aggressive and economical government under stable and fair conditions by means of which we may all achieve prosperity, stimulating immigration, bringing back our people from the United States, expanding our revenue and reducing our taxation. For if we are to prosper as a nation we shall do so not by looking backward and attempting to retrieve the mistakes of the past, but by looking forward and making a gigantic preparation for the things that are to be done.

Mr. A. U. G. BURY (East Edmonton): I have taken the liberty of breaking what I understand to be an unwritten rule, namely, that when members address the House they should do so from their own seats. I am speaking from the seat of another member in order to save the strain on my own voice and the strain on the hearing powers of hon. gentlemen, who I assume—though possibly the assumption is gratuitous—will want to hear what I have to say whether they agree with it or not.

We are drawing to the close of what must be in the memory of even the oldest members of this House an extraordinary experience, perhaps one of the most extraordinary chapters in the history of parliamentary procedure. The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Kennedy) in the course of an excellent address, dropped, like Silas Wegg, into poetry, and expressed the hope, in the words of Burns, that some god might give either to the House or to some party in it, possibly to hon. gentlemen opposite and to the government, a vision of themselves as they appeared to others. I want to try in a few minutes to answer that prayer, and as a kind of deus ex machinâ to show to hon. gentlemen opposite, and especially to ministers on the treasury benches, how they and their actions, during these weeks that have passed since we gathered here as a parliament, have appeared to a humble back-bencher of this House.

At the call of the acting government we assembled on January 7. The first message which we received was from the crown through the lips of the Speaker of the Senate. We were told in that message that it did not please His Excellency to state to the House the purposes for which parliament had been summoned until a Speaker should have been elected. We returned then to this chamber and did what, so far as gentlemen on the opposite side and the government are concerned, was the only proper and efficient piece of business which they have accomplished in the past weeks: I refer, Sir, to your election to the chair of this House. I would give the government more credit for that but for the fact that there is a lurking suspicion in my mind that they did it rather under the influence of that law, the only law they appear to know, the law of inertia. You, Sir, had been elected as Speaker in the previous parliament and it was the easiest thing for the government—although of course they received the hearty concurrence and unanimous approval of all members of the House—to yield to the force of that law of inertia, which is the law of their being, and follow in the footsteps of the previous parliament.

The day following we attended in the Senate chamber to hear the Speech from the Throne. We expected that it would be a speech setting out, as on the previous day it had been stated it would, the purposes for which this parliament had been summoned. We knew what those purposes were, because the Prime Minister had himself drawn up and published in the Ottawa Journal of November 5 the reasons that should govern him in bringing parliament together. The government met as soon as possible after the election, said the acting leader of the House (Mr. Lapointe), and having considered the situation the leader of the government tendered his advice to His Excellency. And what was that advice? In a statement which he issued and which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of November 5, the Prime Minister stated:

> After several interviews with His Excellency at which the position brought about by the recent general election was fully discussed and all alternatives presented, I have taken the responsibility of advising His Excellency to summon parliament for the earliest practicable date—

—For what purpose?

> —in order to ascertain the attitude of the parliamentary representatives towards the very important question raised by the numerical position of the respective political parties.

That was the advice tendered by the Prime Minister to His Excellency, and His Excellency accepting it, parliament was summoned accordingly. We then attended in the Senate chamber to hear the Speech from the Throne, and some of us expected to hear a statement along the lines of that published by the Prime Minister himself on November 5 as it appeared in the Ottawa Journal. What as a matter of fact did we hear? We heard something absolutely different; we heard a Speech from the Throne prepared by an acting government which assumed that it would continue in office and which came down in the normal way to carry on the business of the country during the session. There is no doubt as to the attitude of the Prime Minister; there is no doubt as to the attitude of members of the government and their followers, on this point. Not merely did the leader of the House endorse this statement of his leader published in the Ottawa Journal, but he said on the very next day, the day we heard the Speech from the Throne:

We say we were justified in retaining office and summoning parliament—

For what purpose?

—to ask for the decision of this parliament as to who should be its executive.

That is why we were summoned. Then again the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) on January 11, followed exactly the same line. He said:

The question before us was a very simple one. It was whether the government had the right, first of all, to meet parliament; and, secondly, whether the government was justified in asking the members of the House of Commons—

To do what? To consider a Speech from the Throne with a full-dress programme of legislation? No. But——to decide whether the government should remain in power or whether another administration should be formed.

Again the Solicitor General adopts his leader's position at page 61 of Hansard where on the same date, he is reported as saying:

After the elections the Prime Minister took the following position: This government will remain in power until parliament meets. . . . Now the Prime Minister had to face a novel situation, as I have tried to prove, and not only a novel situation, but a difficult situation. A man with ordinary conceit might have thought he had enough experience, enough judgment, enough personal perspicacity to advise His Excellency, but the Prime Minister took another stand. He said, "It does not belong to one man in Canada, no matter how exalted his position may be, to decide a situation so novel and so difficult. I will have the greatest, the highest and the most competent tribunal of the land to decide it, and instead of giving my own personal opinion I shall ask the two hundred and forty-five representatives of the people to make the decision."

Was the Prime Minister justified or not? Well, had hon. gentlemen consistently followed the principles laid down in the statement published in the Ottawa Journal of November 5; had they consistently followed the statements and arguments of their own speeches; had they consistently observed their position as they themselves over and over again in no ambiguous terms described it, I for one, whether it was constitutional or not, would have had no fault to find with them. But they did not. Knowing very well what that position was, that they were to meet parliament and put before it as its prime business —as its only business until that was cleared away—the question: Who is to govern this country; what government is to be the executive of this House—knowing that that was the position, they never say a word about it in the Speech from the Throne. What was the kind of Speech from the Throne some of us might have expected under the circumstances?

Let me analyze the actual Speech for a minute. It starts with a few paragraphs that are innocuous—perfectly natural and perfectly proper; a paragraph of welcome; a paragraph referring to the lamentable death of Queen Alexandra; a paragraph recording the appointment of a member of the government as president of the sixth assembly of the League of Nations; a paragraph of congratulation on the growing prosperity of agriculture and trade. All of those were perfectly proper

But how should the Speech from 4 p.m. the Throne then have continued?
Surely it should have proceeded, along the lines of the Prime Minister's own statement in the Ottawa Journal, to say that his ministers had advised him to summon parliament and submit the question which the electors, he said, had not already settled on October 29. But in the Speech from the Throne there is not a word of the purpose for which parliament was summoned. This is what follows: Legislation regarding proposed reduction of taxation; regarding reduction of expenditures; regarding consolidation and co-ordination of departments; regarding simplification of forms of public accounts; regarding measures to obtain settlers and encourage those who have left the land to return; regarding special arrangements for settling crown lands; regarding rural credits; regarding the appointment of a tariff advisory board—which was to take place at once; regarding a trade agreement with the British West Indies; regarding the Hudson Bay railway—which was to be completed at once; regarding the appointment of a royal commission on Maritime rights; regarding the transfer to the province of Alberta of its natural resources; regarding the amendment of the Dominion Elections Act, and the estimates for 1926. Yet the government comes to this parliament and says, "Gentlemen, we do not know who the country wishes to govern. On October 29 the issue was not settled." We say it was. We say the ordinary elector on the street knows it was. We say that if at any period of parliamentary history the electors of any country told any government they had lost their confidence, the electors of this country told this government so on October 29. But I accept for the time being the premiss of the Prime Minister; I will suppose he is correct in saying that the electors had not decided that point on October 29. What follows? He says: "Since the electors of this Dominion did not decide that on October 29, I am going to leave it to the members of the House to decide." But instead of coming here and leaving the members of the House to decide untrammelled—leaving them in the same position as the electors were on October 29—as he should have done, he brings down a full-dress Speech from the Throne packed with prospective legislation.

It is done, and it cannot be undone. But it is setting a precedent which is extremely pernicious. I want to make that point very clear to hon. gentlemen on my left. I have the highest regard for them, and the fullest belief in their integrity and purity of purpose. I know some of them personally. I do not believe they recognize and realize all that lay by way of implication in the—I dare not say, dishonest conduct of the government. What does it matter if we cannot say it here? They can say it outside—I repeat, I do not believe they recognize and realize all that lay by way of implication in the conduct of the government in professing to leave this matter in the hands of parliament as it was on October 29 when the electors, the Prime Minister said, failed to give a sufficiently articulate and distinct and pronounced judgment. No, instead of that we find this state of affairs.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BURY: Certainly, sir.

Mr. MacLEAN: (Prince) Can he quote a precedent where parliament was summoned without a Speech from the Throne being brought down?

Mr. BURY: I am glad the hon. gentleman has asked me that question. I did not suggest that this parliament should be opened without a Speech from the Throne, and had he been following me as he should if he desired to use his opportunities to the best advantage, he would have known that I suggested that the Speech from the Throne should follow the present speech for the first four or five paragraphs, but when it came to lay down the policy and proposed legislation of the government it should have halted and left it to this parliament—as the Prime Minister said it was summoned to do—to settle the question the country had failed to settle on October 29. He did not do that.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): When would the hon. gentleman suggest that the remainder of the Speech be brought down?

Mr. BURY: I will answer that, Mr Speaker. Surely the hon. gentleman will not be troubled by precedents? Why, the argument of the Solicitor General was that the position was so extraordinary, so novel and so difficult that precedents were not on the page at all. We could not look at them; for there were none to look at. We had to let the flexible, pliable constitution of the British Empire adjust itself. It was a thing of rubber or wax; it could be adjusted to any emergency, and we were to adjust it to this emergency. I suggest that common sense and honesty would have adjusted it in this way, by bringing down a Speech from the Throne along the lines that I have mentioned. That would have been honest and straight; it would have been according to the position of the Prime Minister himself, and then when parliament had decided which government was to hold office, another Speech from the Throne could have been brought down, if you choose, setting out the legislation proposed.

I will deal with that later on. But just here, may I say that the argument of the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) amply bears out my position? What was that argument? It was this: He impressed upon the members of this House and more particularly upon hon. members to my left, that this party was guilty of a heinous offence. Why? Because it brought in an amendment which, had it passed, would have rendered the Speech from the Throne a farce, nugatory, abortive. In other words, his argument was this: A Speech from the Throne has been delivered by His Excellency; the Conservative party have brought in an amendment which, if it passes, will make it impossible to carry out or even consider that Speech; then another government will have to come into power and another Speech from the Throne will have to be delivered. I asked him the question: Supposing this motion of ours had not been proposed at all; supposing on the very first day, when the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) brought forward his resolution, we had said, "All right, put it to the House," and the motion had been voted down—and the Minister of Justice did not know which way the House was going to vote; the House was to be perfectly free; he could not tell what the result of his own motion was going to be—what then? Would not the very same result have followed the defeat of that motion; and the minister admitted it would. The very same results would have followed as would have followed the carrying of our amendment. The head and front of our offence therefore is this, that we introduced a resolution which prevented the government from introducing a resolution which, if it had been defeated, would have made the Speech from the Throne a farce. That is what follows.

The next phase was that the Minister of Justice rose in his seat and sought to justify the action of the government. The argument he used was this: This is not an abnormal situation; it has occurred over and over again in British parliamentary history; we have precedents for what we have done. And he produced his precedents; but the trouble about them was that although they were very good as precedents, they did not precede this particular situation. They were like the address, which any members of this House who have read that amusing story The Lunatic at Large, will remember was given by the lunatic to the lady whose sympathies and help he wished to enlist in his attempt to escape from the asylum. He told her that he had been at one time a clerk in holy orders and that his permanent address was: "care of the Archbishop of York, Bishopthorpe Palace, Yorkshire." The next time the lady met him she taxed him with the fact that her letters had all been returned with the endorsement "Not known," and she asked him if the address he had given her was a real address, "Oh, yes" he said, "it is a real address, but the trouble is it never was mine." Well, the Minister of Justice gave us precedent after precedent, and the only trouble was that the precedents did not fit. Precedents? A plague on the precedents! There is no precedent in British parliamentary history that is on all fours with the situation with which we were faced when we came to this House on January 7th. You may find a precedent for a party that has not a majority continuing in office; I grant you that. It may be you can find a precedent for a party with only the second largest group in the House continuing in office; suppose I grant you that. But that was not this situation. Shall I tell this House what this situation was? A Prime Minister with a majority in the last parliament over all other parties combined in this House, a small but actual majority; a Prime Minister—and here is the second phase of the situation—who goes up and down the country telling the people he cannot govern with a small majority over all other parties combined; who says there are great issues and great political measures that must be passed if the country is not simply to continue marking time; who says that if he does not get a majority over all other parties combined he will not consent to continue to hold office but will go back to the country for what is absolutely essential, a majority of Liberals over all other parties combined. The third phase of the situation is a Prime Minister who, going with that programme and with those professions to the country, is turned down by the electors and comes back to the House, not with a majority over all other parties combined, but with a minority under all parties combined of about 43, if my recollection is corect. And that is not the only thing. With nine cabinet ministers slain, including the Prime Minister himself. This, forsooth, is retaining the confidence of the country! I am carried back in thought to those halcyon days of freedom, the days of the cane and the imposition,—the dirty inky fingers, the tousled hair and the pain and penalties of learning Southey's Battle of Blenheim. I remember the scene. Old Kaspar sitting in front of his cottage in the evening sun, with his little granddaughter Wilhelmine sporting on the green, and Peterkin her brother finding a skull by the river in the ground that had once been the stricken field of Blenheim, bringing the skull to his grandfather and asking, "what does it mean?" The old man told him that it was a relic from the field of Blenheim, and described how thousands of men lay rotting in the sun the day after the great battle; and this is the moral of his story:

> But things like this you know must be
> After a famous victory.

On the 29th day of October I can imagine the Prime Minister and his lieutenants and henchmen looking down over the stricken field as it lay, after the ballots had been counted in that great election, and I can imagine him telling the tale of the skulls—one, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, and then, more wistfully, nine—his finger falling most tenderly on his own. I can picture him as, his indomitable spirit rising within him, he turns to one of his henchman and cries: "Graham, what do you call it? Defeat? Not defeat Graham! Things like this you know must be after a famous victory." If that is the right hon. gentleman's conception of a victory, God save us from a defeat.

Hardly had we adjusted our minds to this argument of precedent when lo and behold! the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) rises in his seat to tell us that the situation was so novel and abnormal that no precedent could be found for it, and we had to manufacture precedent ourselves. That was his position absolutely. The British constitution, however, he said, was so flexible, so pliable, that it could adjust itself to any emergency and he cited, by way of proof of that, instances in British history of two kings, one a king who had lost his country because his subjects—shall I say, his constituents?—got so utterly disgusted with him they told him they did not want any more of him. I appreciate the analogy. I think it was a wonderful piece of intellectual effort on the part of the Solicitor General to discover the analogy and the precedent. Then he went on to tell us of the other precedent, of the king who lost his reason—a more important thing, reason, although the reason may not have been of the highest quality; still it was all he had. I wonder if the right hon. gentleman will fear a Greek bringing him a gift? If not, I, as a very humble back-bencher on this side of the House would venture to offer a third precedent, that of a king who lost his head, which he could not get back. And so we have the four kings, as we have in Scottish history the four Marys. We have the king who lost his country, the king who lost his reason, the king who lost his head, and the King who lost his seat, all triumphant examples of the flexibility of the British constitution, and its power of self-adjustment to any emergency however novel or great. Well, if the Solicitor General is right in his argument, what becomes of the argument of the Minister of Justice? The lean non-precedent kine of the Solicitor General have eaten up the fat precedent kine of the Minister of Justice; yet are they none the better favoured therefor. Ultimately, Mr. Speaker, the House voted after all, under the tactics and manipulation of hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches, that this was a genuine government, and that it was fit to function. We on this side of the House bowed to the will of parliament and said, "Very well, proceed to function." To our amazement, at once a look of pain, of disgust, of horror, and amazement passed over the faces of hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches. They said, "Heavens! How can you expect us to function? We cannot function without a six weeks' adjournment. We are not a government; we are only a relic of a government, a remnant of a government, a dilapidated derelict of a government. We have no head, or arms, or feet; we are only the trunk of a government." Some hon. gentlemen opposite sufficiently conversant with English parliamentary history might say, "We are only the rump of a government. You cannot expect us to do anything." No, I do not know that I expect the rump of a government to do anything except to sit still; and I think they have done that admirably.

May I give this House an incident in British parliamentary history, that is not uninteresting, nor is it quite irrelevant? In the early eighties the leader of the Irish Unionist party in the House of Commons was Arthur MacMorrough Kavanagh, the lineal descendant—the real lineal descendant and not a bogus claimant—of one of the old tribal kings. He had a beautiful place. He was very wealthy. But God had seen fit that he should be born without arms and without legs. He was the type of being of whom one might say in the words of Portia to Nerissa: "God made him, and therefore let him pass for a man." He might have shut himself up as a recluse in his beautiful home, but he chose to knit his teeth and plunge into public life to serve his people and his country, and he went to parliament and became, and acted for some years as, the leader of the Irish Unionists in the House of Commons. He was carried, like a sack of potatoes, by his valet or footman to his carriage, from his carriage to the train, from the train to his yacht in Kingstown harbour, from his yacht in the Thames to the terrace of the House of Commons, and thence he was carried and put down, like a sack, in his corner seat in the chamber, from which for years he led his party. If this trunk of a government had the head that crowned, and the spirit that animated the misshapen body of Arthur MacMorrough Kavanagh they would never have asked for a six weeks' adjournment, they would have gone on with the business of their country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to a subject with which I wish to deal at some length. In my first speech I—shall I say threatened, or shall I say promised?—that is according to the attitude of mind of hon. members—that I would deal with the question of Alberta coal, which is such an important question in the province from which I come—

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Under our constitution is it not proper to allow the majority, even constituted as this one is, to rule?

Mr. BURY: My hon. friend has missed the point altogether. I am taking the Prime Minister on his own ground. His argument is: "I went to the country on the 29th October for a verdict. I did not get my verdict. I ought to go to the country again, but it is too expensive. I will as the next best course go to the representatives of the country in parliament and ask them to say what the country did not say." He should therefore have put this question to us here in parliament, without a King's speech which contained a programme of legislation; that was absolutely inconsistent. What he has done is done. He has got his following in this House by means that I, at least, if I were in his position, would not stoop to use. The hon. Minister of Agriculture makes an observation which I did not catch. I am sure, however, that it is on a par with the other remarks which have fallen from him.

Now, I said that I would address myself to the question of Alberta coal, and the movement of Alberta coal into the central parts of this Dominion. Members of this House who are not too far removed in years from their school days—I do not say their college days but their school days—will remember the romance attaching to the parentage of Thomas à Becket. His mother, like the lady in the Bab ballads, was a Saracen maiden and his father, Gilbert Becket had met her while serving overseas. When the armistice, or whatever it was called in those days, was signed Gilbert Becket returned to his own country of England. The lady was naturally lonely and decided to follow him. But the trouble was she knew only two words in English—the name of the capital city "London," and his own christian name "Gilbert." However, by dint of calling out "London" long enough she got to England; and then by calling out "Gilbert" long enough on the streets of London she finally came across her warrior and they were married, and gave birth in process of time to that great ecclesiastic, who became such a thorn to his king, Thomas à Becket. I am reminded of this incident because prior to the 29th October my constituents dinned into my ears two words, "Ontario" and "coal." On the 29th October I succeeded by virtue of these two words, Ontario and coal, in capturing the seat of East Edmonton. My constituents sent me here with these two words as the chief words in my vocabulary, and told me to come here and effect a union between Alberta coal and the Ontario housewife—not a temporary liaison, as the Minister of the Interior apparently desires, a kind of emergency union while the legitimate spouse of the Ontario housewife, American anthracite, happens to be out of the field, or away from home. I would not tolerate that, and I am amazed at a man like the Minister of the Interior, brought up in a proper home like myself and with all godly influences around him, from his childhood, suggesting such a thing. Nothing less than a legitimate, permanent, stabilized, undivorceable union—if you can get such a thing—between the great coal mines of Alberta and the housewife of Ontario will satisfy us in the former province.

Now, what are the facts in connection with this question? The first is the fact that in Canada—I am sorry to trouble the House with statistics; I, myself, hate them. I can never remember them, and I do not think they do much good—we have one-sixth of the known coal measures of the world. In Alberta we have 85 per cent of the known coal measures of Canada. We have therefore in Alberta 14 per cent, roughly speaking, or one-seventh, of the known coal measures of the world. There seems to be no reason why, with those enormous coal resources within our province, we should not be using our own coal, rather than spending on American coal the millions of dollars we are sending out of the country at present.

On the other hand, Ontario is virtually without coal. It would almost seem as if there were a Divine purpose in that, and that there should be a union between the two parties, the one supplying what the other lacks. At any rate, that is the view we take in Alberta. By reason of that, attempts were made at various times by those who are interested in the Alberta coal, the Alberta government and the private operators, to make experimental shipments and to capture the Ontario market for the Alberta operator and the Alberta mines. I am not going to do more than briefly sketch these attempts, but I do so because I want this House to realize the enormous amount of labour, energy, time and money that have been expended in the attempt to get Alberta coal into the Ontario market: I do so because, if we are now to lose this market, the whole of that expenditure of time, money, energy and thought will be lost, and we shall have to do the same thing over again to re-capture what we now have. These efforts in brief were as follows: in 1922, the very day Premier Ferguson took office as Premier of Ontario, a conference was held in the city of Edmonton between the Canadian National Railway officials, Sir Henry Thornton, the Canadian Pacific Railway officials, the Alberta government and the Alberta operators, with the result that an arrangement was reached by which 6,000 tons were moved at a secret rate. The arrangement at first was to move 4,000 tons, but the amount in fact moved was 6,000. I do not know whether I am at present authorized to divulge what that rate was, and, being in doubt, I will not divulge it. It was a low rate. Then in 1923, private interests attempted to continue this movement. The Edmonton Journal and the Ottawa Journal between them—and the greatest credit is due these and other journals in the matter—arranged for a trial shipment of one car to Ontario for demonstration purposes, and domestic consumption in small lots. In the same month another car was shipped by the Edmonton Journal, the Toronto Star and the London Free Press; later the same month a third car was shipped by the last-named papers, and in the early spring several cars were shipped by the Alberta government to the Ontario government. On all these cars the full freight rate of $12.70 demanded by the railway was paid. The Ontario consumer got the coal at considerably less than that rate, because the coal was donated, and the difference between what they paid and the amount of the freight rate was borne by the Alberta government, by the coal operators and by the newspapers themselves. That shows you that this was not an attempt on the part of those interested in the Alberta coal movement to saddle the whole burden of the experiment on the governments. The authorities and individuals mentioned did yeoman work, heroic work, in trying to capture a market in Ontario for Alberta coal, and they are merely asking now that what they commenced, and what they possibly succeeded in accomplishing, shall not be allowed to slip away and become of no avail.

Attempts were made following that initial movement to get the federal government to take action. I should like to review briefly what those attempts were. A letter was written by the Trade Commissioner of Alberta to the Minister of the Interior in April, 1924, regarding a proposed shipment of 200,000 tons. On May 7 a further letter was written by the commissioner to the same minister, and there were interviews at Ottawa. Finally on the 17th July, after considerable correspondence and a number of interviews, this House voted $200,000 for the purpose of assisting a test movement of coal from the province of Alberta to the province of Ontario. I have copied from Hansard the particulars of that vote. I am not going to trouble the House with it beyond saying that it refers practically entirely, excepting a reference at the end, to a shipment of Alberta coal. The Minister of the Interior said:

There is a demand at present from western Canada—

[Mr. Bury.]

Western Canada mark you——for a trial shipment, and while I have put this sum in the estimates for the purpose—

That is for the purpose, according to the language of the minister, of shipping Alberta coal to Ontario.

—I am doubtful whether under existing conditions we can carry out the experiment.

But $200,000 was voted by parliament, earmarked for that purpose. Now what happened? After that vote nothing was done until August. In August there was a conference at Edmonton between the Minister of the Interior, Sir Henry Thornton, the Trade Commissioner of Alberta and the Premier of Alberta on the subject, at which it was decided that it was then too late to do anything, although $200,000 had been voted on July 17 for that express purpose. The decision to do nothing then was due to the imminence of the grain shipment, and perhaps to other reasons; but the further decision was arrived at that the shipments should commence May 1 of the following year.

On September 3 we have the next stage in the movement. An order in council was then passed on the recommendation of the Minister of the Interior providing for the payment of a portion of that $200,000, namely $20,000 to the miners of eastern Canada. Still nothing was done to assist the Alberta coal movement, although $180,000 lay in the hands of the government ear-marked by parliament for that purpose. On February 25 the order in council which had allocated and paid over the $20,000 of this money to the eastern mines came for the first time to the notice of the Alberta authorities, and they naturally protested. The result was an interview given by the Minister of the Interior here in Ottawa to some of the Ottawa papers. The interview reads:

The proposal, said the Hon. Charles Stewart last night, originated among the mine owners of Nova Scotia.

But I have just read to hon. members from Hansard a statement in which the Minister of the Interior explained the vote of $200,000 and justified it to parliament as being for the purpose of assisting the movement from the west. In anything I am saying I am not in the least out of sympathy with the claim of the east for assistance. I am only dealing with the action or inaction of the government, or of the Minister of the Interior—although I do not think he is personally to blame; I think there was some other influence operating behind him to explain his inaction in respect of the Alberta movement. I simply want to show that the people of the west, the coal interests in Alberta, and the people in Ontario who want the movement fostered and helped have been receiving no assistance whatsoever from the government. The minister said:

> The proposal originated among the mine owners of Nova Scotia, but I was successful in having $50,000 of the $200,000 specially allocated for Alberta coal.

Where and when? The minister does not say. He continues.

> The Alberta interests never made a demand for any portion of the money.

The Alberta government and the coal commissioner had been bombarding him with letters and telegrams, and holding interviews with him, and he had gone to Edmonton and had had a discussion in the August following the vote. Yet we have this statement that the Alberta interests never made a demand for any portion of the money and that if they had done so, it would have been ready for them. That is the next stage in this history of inaction. Ultimately, however, certain shipments were made with the details of which I am not going to weary the House except to say that in 1925 the proposed shipment was reduced from 100,000 tons to 25,000 tons. No actual shipments however were made, nor was anything done, until late in June, 1925, when the rate inquiry came up and Sir Henry Thornton stated in essence: There is a rate inquiry pending, and I am not going to move any coal subject to any check-up, because I am not going to have my books produced for the purpose of a check-up; but since I refuse a check-up I am going to move this coal at a cost of seven dollars a ton. Thus the moving of coal at seven dollars a ton commenced, and I understand 75,000 tons of coal in all have to this date been shipped under that arrangement. That is the position in which the matter stands at the present time.

The attitude of the government has been, as I have described it, extremely unsatisfactory. Hon. members must remember two things: First, that the railroads had stated that they could not move coal at less than nine dollars a ton, $12.70 a ton being their regular freight rate, but they consented to move it at seven dollars a ton subject to a check-up, provided that the government of Alberta and the federal government undertook to pay the difference of two dollars a ton. The attitude of the Prime Minister on that when he came west was: The whole thing is "a huge fake." He did not damn it with faint praise; he damned it by the loudest kind of reprobation and absolute repudiation. On the other hand the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) took the view that it was a matter as regards which the federal parliament should do everything possible to assist Alberta coal to capture and hold the Ontario market; that if necessary for that purpose, an adequate tariff should be imposed upon United States coal; that in any event, after the freight rates to be fixed upon this coal had been ascertained, it might be necessary, and if it were necessary the government should hold themselves prepared, to make some contribution to such freight rates for the desired purpose.

What are the arguments in support of this policy? The first is of course the economic argument. In dealing with that may I refer for a few moments to a report of the standing committee on Mines and Minerals to which this House referred a resolution passed on March 19, 1923? This appears in the Journals of the House of Commons for 1923, in volume 60, appendix 6:

> Ordered that the following resolution be referred to the said committee—

That is the committee on Mines and Minerals.

> That, in the opinion of this House, the time has arrived for Canada to have a national policy in relation to its coal supply and that no part of Canada should be left dependent on a United States coal supply, and that the whole question of fuel supply for Canada together with the question of costs, transportation, desirable interprovincial action and other means whereby Canada may be self-sustaining and self-supplying as regards fuel, and to inquire into the necessity and possibility of supplying substitutes for coal be referred to the standing committee on Mines and Minerals and that the said committee report to the House.

In the third and final report of that committee, at page 7 of this appendix, there is to be found this statement:

> Your committee has heard much evidence from various parts of Canada on every phase of the questions submitted to it in said resolution.
> One statement may be made without any hesitation, that is, that it is absolutely necessary that every step possible should and must be taken at once by Canada through its government, its transportation companies, its coal operators and manufacturers of other fuels, to make Canada independent of all other countries for its fuel supply.

That is the economic argument, which was adopted, enforced and emphasized by the report of the standing committee of this House on Mines and Minerals in 1923. Surely there is no need to labour that argument. Ontario has hitherto been dependent upon the United States for her coal supplies. May I give the House just rapidly a few of the statistics dealing with this matter? In 1924, Canada imported from the United States 16,379,337 tons at a value of $64,236,409, and that does not include the freight paid to United States railroads. Such freight therefore must be added to these figures which represent only the value of the coal at the pit mouth. In 1925, for the calendar year, Canada imported from the United States 15,726,394 tons at a value of $53,754,212. The Ontario imports from the United States are as follows:

1925..	11,283,179 tons

In addition to these there were imported at the head of the lakes:

1924..	2,171,032 tons

In all, I think it would be safe to say that every year this country pays to the United States for coal or in freight rates to United States railways for hauling it, the sum of very nearly $150,000,000. It is because of that, and because of the wisdom of retaining this huge amount of money in Canada that we are urging this policy upon the government. The Minister of the Interior said very wisely that in his view coal was almost as important to this country as bread. Therefore we should be economically independent in regard to that commodity which is the very life—the very breath of our industries; and we should retain in this country the enormous sums of money which we are now yearly pouring into the United States.

There is in the evidence given in the Appendix No. 6 already referred to, a statement made by Mr. Butler who, I think, was for five years Deputy Minister of Railways and then for three years head of one of the largest industries in this country. He speaks of the appalling waste in connection with our coal shipments. The actual word in the text is "appealing" but I suppose it is intended to be "appalling." At page 184 of this appendix this statement appears:

> The appalling figures of our coal and coke imports show that it is well worth while to take steps to stop this drain on our earnings. In the four years 1919-20-21-22, we imported 75,381,359 tons of coal at a cost of $320,232,459. In addition we imported 2,237,853 tons of coke at a cost of $18,558,468. Incidentally, had the tonnage of coke been made in Canada, the by-products would have been worth not less than the cost of about 700,000 tons of coal. The average cost per ton of the coke was $8.29 and the average cost per ton of coal, all grades and sizes, $4.25.

So that the actual value of the by-products of coke made in America and imported into Canada, which by-products remained in the United States, was nearly $3,000,000. We have had recently a very vivid illustration of the importance of the economic independence of Canada in the strike which for months tied up the coal fields to the south of us, upon which Ontario was dependent. Had this been a hard winter, who can tell what severities and sufferings the poor of Ontario would have had to undergo as a result of the coal shortage due to the strike in the American fields? But someone says, "Do we not have strikes in the Canadian fields too? You cannot eliminate strikes." My answer to that is this: If we do have strikes in the Canadian coal fields they may be largely because of lack of work and because of poverty of pay, inasmuch as the men are working only in a kind of seasonal and spasmodic employment. But there is something else to be remembered. If there are to be strikes in the coal fields, then let us have them in Canada where we can do something to remedy them. A strike in the American coal fields is beyond the power of this government, or of this House or country to remedy, whereas a strike in our own fields—and we have had an instance of it in the east—is within the powers, the diplomacy, the statesmanship and common sense of Canadian business men and Canadian politicians to settle.

What is the other argument for this movement besides the economic one? It is the retention in this country of the enormous amount of money which we are annually pouring into the United States without any benefit whatsoever to ourselves. Just think; $150,000,000 going out of this country every year into the United States and nothing to show for it in Canada except a product which you could get from Alberta and the Maritime coal provinces.

The next argument is that of population. We have heard in this House how important this matter is. And so it is. To my mind increased population is the solution for the troubles of this country; population is what is going to make the Canadian National Railways pay and what is going to lighten the burden of taxation which is making living in this country so hard for so many people. We in Edmonton have in a kind of microcosm the same problem which we have in Canada as a whole. I told the House in my first speech that we were so sparsely populated in Edmonton that we had about 2⅓ or 2⅙ persons to the acre. We have public utilities extending over 27,000 acres with only 60,000 people to bear the burdens incidental thereto. We can therefore never lighten our burden of taxation in the city of Edmonton unless we fill up the great spaces in that city and have more than two persons to the acre. The same thing is true of the Dominion; we shall never make the Canadian National Railways pay, and so lighten the burden of taxation, until we have a population commensurate with the enormous public utilities which we have established at such great cost and which involve so much in the way of upkeep.

And how are we to get the population? Well here is one way; increase the industries of the country; and in one specific direction, increase the activities in the coal mining centres of Alberta. Do you know that at present the coal mining industry of Alberta just employs about 12,000 miners; that is to say, it supports 12,000 families, assuming every miner to have a family. Now what would happen if the Ontario market were captured for these mines? Instead of 12,000 miners we should have 44,000 employed, supporting 44,000 families. Is it not worth making an effort to bring that about and so solve the population problem, in that district and to that extent at least?

I heard the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), whose profession I infer is an easy one, say that the whole trouble was that there were too many coal miners; and I think I have heard the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) say that there is over-production. What an argument to be used in a country which is crying out about the necessity for getting more people! Hon. gentlemen say we have too many mines and not enough work; we must shut down the mines, and discharge the men; and at the same time they are putting millions into a huge machine working to get people to come out to this blessed country of ours for the work that is waiting for them on the streets of our cities and in the farms in our agricultural districts. It is a farce. But for the look of perennial youth on the faces of gentlemen on the treasury benches I should imagine that they were contemporaries and collaborateurs of the late lamented W. S. Gilbert or of the late "Lewis Carroll," because some of their projects and their proffered solutions for the problems with which we have to cope are Gilbertian or might come out of a book as quaintly paradoxical as Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. What remedy is there in closing down the mines or in preaching over-production? It is just about as good a remedy and as effective a solution as that made by the Hatter at the Mad Tea Party, when he interrupted, "I want a clean cup; let's all move one place on." No one got any benefit from that except the person right up at the top. There was a clean cup above him and he got it; but so far as the others were concerned they simply moved up from one dirty cup to another. And the remedy which hon. gentlemen opposite offer for our population problem is just about as sane; when they preach over-production and talk about closing down the mines they are suggesting something as ridiculous as anything that ever appeared in the craziest phantasm of any humorist such as Gilbert or Carroll.

Now that is the third argument, the argument in regard to population. Before I close on this point may I say that in my native country—at least they say it was there—there was a lunatic asylum, or a place where they ministered to the mind diseased, if you choose to put it that way, in which the medical superintendent had a simple way of finding out whether a patient had recovered his senses. In a large room were several basins each fitted with three taps. These taps were set running and the patient to be tested was told to fill a basin. The waste pipe was left open. Some of the patients after noticing that their basin did not fill would turn on all the taps until the water was flowing in with its full force. If they did nothing more they were brought back to their rooms as still mentally unsound. If a patient, however, after observing that the basin was not filling, suddenly reached for the plug and put it into its hole the attendant would say to him, "You are all right, my man, you can go out; you are cured." In this country the government and other institutions are pouring out millions of money to secure immigrants. Yet so far they seem never to have thought of putting in the plug. The only way to put in the plug is to see that every man who is willing to work has an opportunity to get it, and to make conditions such for the farmer that he will be happy and satisfied with farming and disinclined to leave Canada, and that his sons will not want to abandon farming for some other occupation—perhaps less honest.

What are the objections to this movement of Alberta coal? Only two. One is that it is not suitable to the Ontario consumer. Well, I heard that objection during the course of my campaign, and sometimes under rather ludicrous conditions. The Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) following his leader, the Prime Minister, had damned the whole proposition of a movement of Alberta coal to Ontario as a huge fake. He had not used those words, but his leader had, and he himself had discountenanced the movement . In consequence, the Liberal candidate running in my riding had, of course, to follow suit. He got up on the platform and suggested that Alberta coal was no good for Ontario. The gentleman who made this statement was Mr. McLennan, the candidate for the Liberal party. Here is the answer which appeared in the Edmonton Journal of the next day:

The reason why the Alberta coal question is so unsettled can be fully realized now when Mr. A. R.

McLennan, Liberal candidate for East Edmonton, one of our own citizens, after living here for twelve yers, makes statements as follows:

"The general opinion seems to exist among the coal men of the city that Alberta coal is not adapted, with one exception (the Lakeside coal), to the Ontario market."

Then follows this comment upon that statement:

This statement in view of the facts is so misleading that we, the undersigned, wish to place the facts before the public. Below is a letter from a customer of a car of coal sold by Mr. McLennan in his own home town in Ontario two years ago for one of the undersigned local mines:

GLENCOE, ONTARIO, Sept. 19, 1923.

CROWN COAL COMPANY LTD.,
Edmonton.

DEAR SIRS:

We understand that from October 1 for one month the freight rate on coal will be seven dollars a ton. If so, please ship us two carloads of coal, egg size, and two carloads of lump coal. Ship one car of each kind as soon as possible at the low rate, and the other car of each kind at the last of October. We might say that the coal we received from you was most satisfactory in every way.

Thanking you for past promptness and trusting to get the same in future.

Yours truly,
MOSA & EKFRID CO-OPERATIVE CO., LTD.
J. S. MCALPINE, Mgr.

Can there be any doubt in Mr. McLennan's mind or anyone else's as to the fitness of Edmonton and Clover Bar coals for Glencoe, Ontario, Mr. McLennan's old home town?

We the undersigned have never received one complaint from Ontario customers but have hundreds of unsolicited letters as above.

It is up to you, Mr. McLennan.

In other words, the very man who two years before had sold Alberta coal to Ontario consumers, and knew how anxious they were to obtain it—that they were in fact asking for further shipments—gets up on the platform, and because his leader had told him the movement was a fake, and because his running mate in West Edmonton as Minister of the Interior had discountenanced it, in the teeth of his own knowledge, states that, in his view apparently, Alberta coal is no good for Ontario. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have here letter after letter from various coal companies in this very province, some of them of very recent date, written in reply to my personal inquiries, and every one of them testifying to the fact that the coal is excellent, that it is comparatively smokeless, and gives great heat. All the writers are concerned about is that they cannot get enough of it. I might perhaps read a few of these letters. The first is dated January 20, 1926:

5 p.m.

All the shipments of Alberta coal we have had so far have arrived in good shape, and while the most of it has been delivered to our customers direct from the car, we did stock and hold two cars this summer from about August until November and found very little if any depreciation.

As to quality and adaptability, all those who bought this coal were entirely satisfied with it, and wanted to get more of it, but as our requested allotment was cut in two we could not supply the demand.

We have recently tried to get more but are advised that as we got our full share in July we cannot expect further supplies until some new arrangement is made.

Here is a letter also dated January 20, 1926:

Our shipments have been most satisfactory in every respect.

We had a shipment of twenty cars last August, and we sold every ton of it direct from the cars. We have another shipment of five cars on our siding now, which is also all sold, and we are delivering it as fast as we can.

We could have handled a great deal more of it, but could not get it. Both shipments arrived here in first-class condition, and most of the second shipment went to customers who had some of the first lot. We have had a good many of our customers tell us that they would never use any other coal if they could get Alberta, and a lot of them have been quite enthusiastic about it. In most cases they seem quite surprised that there is no smoke from this coal.

We would be very pleased indeed if we could get more of this coal at once. We could handle a lot of it yet this season if we could have it shipped now.

Here is another letter of the same date:

All the coal received was excellent burning coal and gave very good satisfaction.

There are too many of these letters for me to trouble the House with them all, but they all are along the same line. I have the assurance of the Alberta Fuel Commissioner and of the Alberta coal operators with whom I have corresponded that they have not on file a single letter that is not equally appreciative of the quality and heating power of this coal.

The only remaining question is this: Assuming that Alberta coal is all that it is described to be, assuming that the Ontario consumer will have his or her needs perfectly met by this coal, is it possible to carry it economically from the Alberta mines to Ontario? On that question there was at one time considerable doubt. The railways said that their proper freight rate was $12.70—the same rate I believe as they charged for wheat. Then they climbed down to $9, saying that this figure represents the actual operating cost. Sir Henry Thornton, as I have already mentioned to the House, rather than have a check up of the actual cost, said, "I will carry 25,000 tons at $7 per ton," and since that offer and its fulfilment he has carried two further shipments of 25,000 tons in each case, making a total of 75,000 tons in all carried at that rate.

The question of the cost of carriage has been gone into already in some measure by the special committee appointed by this House. I do not want to weary the House to any extent with that inquiry except to say this, that the evidence goes to show that $7 could be made to pay not merely out of pocket costs, but also something towards interest on capital charges or overhead. On pages 231 and 232 of Appendix No. 6 to which I have already referred, Mr. Mallory, the director of the Bureau of Statistics of the Canadian National railway, computes the cost of haulage thus:

	Per Train Mile
Repairs to track and structure..	36.2 cents
Equipment repairs..	140.6 cents
Transportation..	156.1 cents
	332.9 cents

Then he adds 10 per cent for contingencies, or 33.29 cents per train mile, bringing the total to 366.19 cents per train mile. I may mention that he is in error in his addition in one figure, that, namely, of transportation, which according to his own details should total 156.1, whereas he makes it total 166.1. That makes the true total as I have already given it, 366.19 cents per train mile. He takes the double distance then from the coal fields to the Ontario market, charging the full rate for returned empties the whole way, making 4,252 train miles at 3.66 cents, and that works out at $15.77 per ton. But the train on which he bases his calculation is only an 1,800 ton train. The tons he is working with are gross tons, and he is giving the same rate for returned empties as he gives for the full train load. My suggestion is that if concessions and allowances be made on the points which I have mentioned, the actual rate per ton on a 2,000 ton train would be $7,778, and if a 2,300 ton train were hauled, $6.75 per ton or less, and if a 2,500 ton train were hauled, $6.23 per ton. Even on that I am allowing 100 per cent for returned empties.

On page 237 of the same appendix hon. members will find set out the tonnage which can be hauled along the different divisions of the line from Coalspur to Toronto, and if the House will give me leave I will hand that statement in for insertion in Hansard. It will be noted that the gross ton is 2,240 pounds as against the net or short ton of 2,000 pounds. The statement is as follows:

	Gross tons
Coalspur to Main Line..	1,750
Main Line Junction to Edmonton..	2,300
Edmonton to Tofield..	2,000
Tofield to Wainwright..	2,000
Wainwright to Biggar..	2,300
Biggar to Nutana, (Saskatoon Yard).. ..	3,700
Nutana to Watrous..	3,250
Watrous to Touchwood..	2,800
Touchwood to Melville..	3,400
Melville to Rivers..	3,100
Rivers to Transcona..	4,500
Transcona to Redditt..	3,300
Redditt to Sioux Lookout..	3,300
Sioux Lookout to Armstrong..	3,300
Armstrong to Nakena..	3,000
Nakena to Hornepayne..	3,000
Hornepayne to Foleyet..	3,000
Foleyet to Capreol..	3,000
Capreol to Parry Sound..	2,750
Parry Sound to Toronto..	1,900

The main point is this: There is only one stretch, from Coalspur to the main line, where one engine cannot haul more than 1,750 tons. On all the rest of the line, from the main line junction right down to Parry Sound, one engine can haul, according to the grade, at the very least 2,000 tons, and in most cases 2,750 tons, and up to over 3,000 tons.

Looking at it in another way, Mr. Butler at page 175 of the Appendix states that the average earnings of the Canadian National for 1922 were $4.29 per freight train mile. Taking the distance from Edmonton to Toronto as 2,108 miles, a coal train from Edmonton to Toronto obtaining the average freight earnings of $4.29 per mile would earn $9,043.32. If you add 60 per cent for returned empties, which is what I contend to be a fair rate for returned empties, you get a total of $14,469.30, or about $6 per ton on a train of 2,375 tons.

The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland), than whom no member of this House either in the last parliament or in this has taken a more intelligent or active interest in this matter, has set out at page 121 of the same Appendix a detailed statement of what has been estimated to be the actual out of pocket costs, computed on a most generous scale, of the haulage of a coal train carrying 2,370 tons from Alberta to Toronto, and he has ascertained it to be approximately $4.62 per ton. Any member of the House who is desirous of looking up the particulars can get them in Appendix No. 6 at the page I have mentioned.

But even if the railway could not haul coal from Alberta to Ontario at $7 per ton for out of pocket costs, surely it would be worth while for this Dominion government to grant a subsidy, at any rate until the movement had become established, a market created and a volume of freight developed, because it stands to reason that the more coal that is produced in Alberta, the cheaper will the coal be at the pit mouth. The trouble with the ordinary coal miner is this, that he is not working regularly. I have here statistics as to the number of days' work done per year by the coal miners of Alberta, and it works out at about two or three days a week. In this same Appendix Mr. Macaulay, one of the officials of the Drumheller mine, brings out in his evidence that one of the arguments which the coal miners put up to the operators continually for a rise in wages or for the maintenance of the existing rate of wages is this: that they are not getting regular work; that they have to make enough in one day to keep them living for two, three, or sometimes four days. It stands to reason, therefore, that if you increased the production of the coal mines and gave the coal miners regular employment, they would be prepared to work at a lower rate of pay. It stands equally to reason that if there were a volume of output established from the Alberta mines greater than at present, the coal operators would be content to take a smaller profit on each ton of that output. In point of fact I consulted one of the operators in the Edmonton field, and put that question to him straight. I said this: "Assuming you could get what you want, namely the Ontario market for the Alberta mines, do you think I am safe in assuring the House that the profit of the coal operator and the rate of pay of the coal miner would be reasonably reduced, so as to bring the price of coal at the pit mouth considerably under what it is at present?" He said: "You are perfectly justified in making that statement. What the exact amount of reduction would be I am not prepared to say, and you have no authority to say, but you are at liberty to state that there would be a considerable reduction." Now surely, possessing this great transportation system which we have established, it would pay us, for the purpose of keeping in this country the enormous amount of money that we are pouring into the United States, and for the further purpose of increasing the population in the province of Alberta, to subsidize if necessary, at any rate for a certain period, the transportation of Alberta coal.

There is one other argument I should like to mention, and that is the argument of the unity of this great Dominion. Shortly before 1906, that great tribune of the people in Britain, Joseph Chamberlain, resigned his position as Chancellor of the Exchequer, and went out preaching his gospel of imperial federation and the closer knitting together of the integral parts of this great empire of ours. He preached that we must have not merely a sentimental tie binding the Dominions to the Motherland, but an economic tie as well; there must be such trade relationships between the different parts of the British Empire that the bond of union shall not be merely a sentimental attachment, but also an economic, industrial and profitable one. The same thing is true of Canada. We are a great federation of provinces. In seeking to unite this country we must not depend entirely upon the natural instincts of race and a common allegiance to one parliament and to one crown. We must see to it that every part of this Dominion of ours is economically knit with every other part, so that the well-being of the heart may permeate and pulse to the remotest part of the body. And I say here is one concrete way in which you can show the western provinces of this Dominion that west and east are one, and that we do not have to wait to that day before west is no longer west and east no longer east, but west and east are one country, with one purpose, and with one great economical and industrial life. I am stressing this point for one reason, with which I shall close.

> Till earth and sky stand presently
> Before God's judgment seat

At an outlay of great time, great trouble, much thought and much money, Alberta has captured, or is capturing, the Ontario market. She has been able to do so only because of the strike in the anthracite mines of the United States. Now I want to put this question to hon. members of this House: The strike in the United States is over. Very soon American coal will be knocking at the gates of Ontario. We have no assurance that the coal movement from Alberta will not stop—at least we had no assurance until the other day. The promise and the pledge and the whole attitude of the Minister of the Interior was that this was only an emergency measure. Even now the last word we have from the government, its eleventh or twelfth hour repentance on this point, is its pledge that it will pay the difference between the seven dollar rate and the actual cost of transportation, or the rate that shall be struck as a result of the inquiry of the railway board, and that only as an emergency measure. What assurance then have we that when the American anthracite industry gets going again and American coal comes knocking at the gates of Ontario, or at the head of the lakes, the government will not say, "The emergency is over, and we are not going to continue helping the transportation of coal from Alberta any longer." I would ask this House to remember that the American coal operator will use every ounce of power and every available resource, will make every conceivable sacrifice, to get back into this Ontario market. He will cut his coal prices to the quick; he will cut his transportation prices to the quick; he will try to shove out Alberta coal in so far as it is in here already; and if this government proposes to take the position that the moment the American coal industry is able to supply the Ontario market, the emergency will no longer exist; that its promise will be at an end, and that its subsidy or guarantee to the railroads will be withdrawn, what will happen? All our labour will be lost. American anthracite will come flooding into Ontario again. The Alberta mines will again be reduced to the position they were in when I was campaigning in my election: three mines in the mountains shut down—Cadoman, Luscar, and Mountain Park—and other mines working only part time; every mine in the town of Beverly closed except one, and it only working part time. That is what will happen. Is this House prepared to countenance that when through a kindly Providence—if I can call it a kindly Providence—and the strike of the American coal miners, we have got our feet into this market?

I for one shall continue to protest against any inaction on the part of the government, or any failure on its part to keep us where we are and to assist us in endeavouring to get a greater share of the market than we now have. That is the point to remember. The only promise we have from the government is the promise of an emergency measure, and what the House wants to establish and to make the government realize is that it ought not to be an emergency measure but a permanent policy on the part of the Canadian parliament; and that if the American operator with his anthracite coal comes knocking again at the doors of Ontario or the head of the lakes we shall say to him: "Our own kith and kin first." The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is no longer in his seat. If he were I should remind him of the argument he used when the question of the Australian treaty and its extension to New Zealand was before the House. At that time he was asked the question, "What consideration did New Zealand give for the extension to her of the privileges of that treaty?" and he rose with sublime indifference and said, "I do not know; but I know it is all in the family." Is there any reason why it should not be a case of, "all in the family" in this instance also? If this government is prepared to give concessions to New Zealand without consideration should it not a fortiori give concessions to Alberta for consideration?

The last plea and the last ground on which I leave my appeal is that this House, this government, and this country should see that we do not slip back into the position in which we previously were. With great toil, trouble and expense we have got our feet into the Ontario market. The government should take all necessary steps to ensure that our position in that market is maintained and extended. I am prepared further if need be, to take this position: that the duty on American coal shall be made sufficiently high to ensure that American anthracite shall not be sold here at a price with which the Alberta coal cannot compete. Our dumping clause is a farce. There is nothing in it to prevent United States operators from dumping their anthracite coal into Ontario at a price which would make it impossible for Alberta coal to compete or for the Canadian National railways to transport Alberta coal at any reasonable rate. I wish to make my plea on this particular subject because I foresee that if something is not done in the immediate future a danger faces an industry which is vital to the western province from which I come.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): For nearly seven weeks, Mr. Speaker, the House has been detained here by a rump of a government, the members of which have shown their incapacity to govern or to control this House, yet they have not the good manners to resign. They have, Sir, called parliament together, presented a Speech from the Throne, and started a debate which they are unable to control. They voted for an adjournment and a holiday which they have been unable to get, and now we see them adopting more or less of a side-line in the amendment of the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) to help them out of the hole in which they have got themselves.

In the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne I believe it is the privilege of every member of this House to lay before parliament and the government any pleas that he may wish to make on behalf of his constituents and the country. It is also his privilege, if I understand our constitutional government correctly, even to carry that so far as to move an amendment to the Speech from the Throne in order that he may the more forcibly bring matters to the attention of parliament and place the members of this House on record. The member for Nelson in addressing this House was exercising his right, but when he made the motion which he did, a motion which by the very nature of it precluded every other member of this House from moving an amendment, to my mind he was exercising a right in an arrogant manner; he was proceeding not in accordance with the true spirit of parliamentary privilege. Representing as I do a constituency in the province of Ontario, I resent that infringement upon my liberty as a member of parliament.

I was sent here with the expectation on the part of my constituents that I would contribute something toward the solution of the questions which are before the country. This very resolution has to a certain extent precluded me from doing that. If the hon. member for Nelson and his leader—as I believe we must exclude the rest of his party—have no more interest in the affairs of this country than to vote themselves a holiday and an indemnity, their constituents made a very bad choice in their election, and in my opinion the hon. gentlemen should go back and ascertain whether their constituents are willing to uphold their action in that respect. The member for Nelson and his leader were either acting on behalf of and with the knowledge of the government, or they were not. If they were acting on behalf of the government—and I for one believe they were—they are being used as the tool of a government which had not backbone enough to take that action themselves. If they were not acting on behalf of the government, they were applying a gag to this House, something which no member of the Progressive party would do if he lived up to his principles. If the government were not in league with the member for Nelson and his leader they might possibly be excused. If they were in league with him, I say they are adopting a cowardly policy in order to apply a form of closure on this House, a thing which they had not the courage to do themselves. Again, if they were not in collusion with the member for Nelson, then the condition we have in this House to-night is this: that the government, or the supposed government have delegated their authority to the Progressive group and are no longer in control of the legislation of this House.

I ask the Minister of Justice how it is that he has delegated to the member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) the right which is inherently his to control the legislation of this House? I ask him, and I ask the party behind him, would the great Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who led that party to probably the greatest point in its perfection, ever have submitted to such a humiliating position? In effect, the leader of the government is playing the role of a political Lazarus and is begging a promise from the political Dives, the member for Brandon. He has lost control of the House and of the legislation. Nobody knows that to-night better than the Progressive group. This parliament has been in session seven weeks, and what has been our duty and how have we performed it? What is the duty of the government at the present time? Is it not its duty to bring in legislation dealing with the great questions which are before the country to-day? We have nothing but a blank Speech from the Throne which has, in the opinion of everybody both in this House and out of it, been introduced for the one purpose of obtaining the support of the Progressives. I ask that group to-night, is there one of them who thinks the government have forecast that legislation as a matter of policy? Do they think the government did so because they were convinced it was in the best interests of the country? Or do they think it was simply in order to obtain the support of the Progressive group to my left? The question whether legislation is to be introduced in this House on its merits or on the ground of political necessity is a serious one. I ask them further this afternoon, in view of the history of the last seven weeks, whether they think this government can pass that legislation.

Mr. BROWN: Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: The hon. member for Lisgar says, yes. I might answer him in the language of the late Minister of Finance when he said once in this House that he had not found so great faith, no, not in Israel. The members of the Progressive group know perfectly well that this government is not in control of the House, but that the party under the leadership of my honoured leader (Mr. Meighen) is. Not only does this House know it; the country knows it, and it will not be very long until this government, that knows it just as well, will vacate the treasury benches and my honoured leader will carry on as head of the government. When he takes his seat to your right, Mr. Speaker, this country will have at the head of its government not only a man with a policy that will cure its present ills, but a man that has the courage to put that policy into effect. That is something which is absolutely lacking in the government of the day.

In my opinion the solution of the ills of this country to-day can be summed up in a very few phrases:

1. We must have greater industrial prosperity.

2. We must have more men at profitable work.

3. There must be a diminution of taxation.

4. We must have greater markets for our agricultural people.

Those four things contain the remedy for the ills from which this country is suffering to-day. Over four years ago this government were called to the council chamber to sit down as a board of directors to administer the affairs of this great Dominion. For four years they have been doing that, and what has been the result? They have crippled the industrial life of Canada; they have failed to lower the burden of taxation; they have failed to solve the transportation problem; they have sacrificed the agricultural people and they have crucified the labour people on the altar of incompetence and drift.

In that indictment I want to look at their record and the condition of the country to-day. I will take up first the matter of taxation. I find on looking up the consolidated revenue of Canada that this government has taken on an average four million dollars a year out of the pockets of the people of Canada more than was taken during the last year their predecessors were in office. I find that the taxation to-day stands at the enormous figure of more than $627,000,000 or about one-quarter of the total income of this Dominion. That includes of course municipal and provincial taxation. I find that they have failed to keep pace with the other countries of the world; that the United States has reduced its taxation three or four times, bringing it from $54 down to $27 per capita. I find that Australia has proceeded along the same lines, until to-day her taxation is only about twenty per cent greater than it was before the war. I also find that New Zealand has balanced her budget and has to her credit some millions of pounds. Consequently I say to this government that although they have taken more money out of the pockets of the people, their extravagance and incompetence have been such that they have failed to govern this Dominion properly and to restore in Canada that measure of prosperity which other countries enjoy.

For the benefit of my friends from the west I am going to review the taxation of this country. I have in my hand a detailed statement of the consolidated revenue of Canada and I find, for example, that there were collected in round figures, $233,000,000 in customs and excise taxes, $56,000,000 in income tax, $2,700,000 in business profits tax and $32,000,000 in postal tax. I am stating this only on account of the attitude my hon. friends have taken in this House when they have approached members from Ontario and Quebec—an attitude not of one who is pleading a cause, but rather of one who approaches with a stiletto in his hand and a gun on his hip. I feel it is my duty as a representative from Ontario to show these people just who pays the bills. The income tax payments are, in round figures, as follows:

Ontario	$26,000,000
Quebec	20,000,000
Saskatchewan	891,000
Alberta	1,189,000
Manitoba	3,500,000

Thus a large part of the income tax was paid by Ontario and Quebec, by the good old province of Ontario that never grumbles at anything, that is to-day quite willing to pay an additional sum of money in order to get Alberta coal, that is willing to put her hand into her pocket in order to pay to move the coal or whatever is necessary from the Maritime provinces so that we may solve their problems. We are not a selfish people. We believe in a united Canada; we believe in helping the west and the east; but we do not like my hon. friends to put a stiletto into the industries of this country and ruin the market that we ourselves have largely built up. We want to live and to let the others live. No man in this House would more gladly and willingly than I, sit down at a table with my friends from the west or the east and try to solve their problems, even if a bigger tax has to be imposed upon the province I represent or the province of Quebec. There are certain geographical conditions that handicap the people in different parts of this country. I for one believe that the people of the west and the people of the east have both to be helped, and possibly through putting our hand into the national treasury and paying a part of their freight from both ends. Let us therefore clear the decks of that; there is no misunderstanding in that regard, and I am simply putting this before the House to justify the province from which I come.

Let us take now the postal revenue. We collect in round figures $32,000,000 in postal revenue to which the provinces contribute as follows: Ontario $13,000,000; Quebec $5,000,000; Manitoba $3,000,000; Saskatchewan $2,000,000 and Alberta $1,000,000. Next let us take the business profits tax. Of $2,700,000 odd collected, Ontario paid $1,500,000; Quebec $695,000; Manitoba $137,000; Saskatchewan $51,000 and Alberta $48,000. Next I take the revenue of the Department of Customs and Excise. What do we find there? We find that of $233,000,000 collected Ontario contributes $96,000,000; Quebec $90,000,000; Manitoba $11,000,000; Saskatchewan $2,000,000 and Alberta $5,000,000.

Mr. BROWN: How does the hon. member arrive at these figures?

Mr. McGIBBON: I will tell my hon. friend in a moment. Now I realize that this statement is not exactly fair to the west, and I do not want to be anything but fair. Much of the customs duties collected in Quebec and Ontario passes on to the west, but these are the figures that I have obtained from the Bureau of Statistics. Let us suppose however that on a per capita basis every man in the three western provinces paid a sum equal to that contributed by every other individual in the Dominion, the amount paid by Saskatchewan would be only $13,000,000. So much for the analysis of these taxes.

I want to say a word or two now about the income tax, and probably I shall be maligned for what I shall have to say in this regard. I believe the income tax is the most unfair tax which the people of this country have to bear. And why do I say that ? I have here an analysis of the income tax paid in Canada and I am going to quote from it, not in order to disparage any class of our citizens but merely to state an argument. I find that the salaried people paid $62,000,000 —I am giving the figures for the last five years—out of a total of $177,000,000, while the manufacturers paid $56,000,000; the merchants $43,000,000; professional men $11,000,000, and farmers $3,000,000. You will observe at once that the salaried class shoulders by far the largest proportion of this taxation, and I contend that in addition to paying his own tax the man on salary helps to pay everybody else's, for he belongs to the class of people who cannot pass their income tax on to anyone else. The business man, the manufacturer and other classes of our citizens are able ultimately to pass the cost of their business on to the consumer, and among the consumers are the people on salaries. I say therefore that there should be some modification in this tax so as to make it bear more equitably on the people of the country.

Let me point out something to my hon. friends from the west. I have here a statement showing the per capita wealth of every province in the Dominion, and while I will not weary the House now by reading it I will hand it to Hansard. According to this statement the province of Saskatchewan comes first, Alberta second and Manitoba third. Bearing this in mind, let us see what the per capita taxation in the various provinces is. The income tax in Prince Edward Island amounts to 44 cents per capita; Nova Scotia, $1.56; New Brunswick, $1.90; Quebec, $7.99; Ontario, $8.40; Manitoba, $5.37; Saskatchewan, $1.07; Alberta, $1.83. So that the provinces in which there is the largest per capita wealth pay the smallest per capita taxation.

Let us take the postal tax. I find that Ontario pays $4.21 per capita; Saskatchewan, $2.95; Alberta, $2.97; and Manitoba, the highest of the lot, $5.60. I believe that taxation based on the per capita wealth of the country is the fairest, because in that way you more evenly distribute the burden.

Mr. BROWN: Where were those statistics secured?

Mr. McGIBBON: From the Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. BROWN: When they were compiled no account was taken of the mortgage indebtedness of the three provinces.

Mr. McGIBBON: With due deference to my hon. friend, I have a little more confidence in the head of the Bureau of Statistics, so far as these figures are concerned, than in the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), and when I am told by the bureau that these figures are correct I accept them. In any case, there is mortgage indebtedness in every province, so that there is no argument in that. The point is that the people in the west have the largest per capita wealth while they pay the smallest per capita taxation.

I beg now to place on Hansard the following tables:

The House met at three o'clock.

CUSTOMS INQUIRY—COMMITTEE

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (St. Henri) presented the second report of the special committee appointed to investigate the administration of the Department of Customs and Excise as follows:

The special committee appointed to investigate the administration of the Department of Customs and Excise beg leave to present the following as their second report:

Your committee request that they be granted leave to sit while the House is in session.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

P. MERCIER,
Chairman.

He said: I beg to move that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

SHELLING OF SCHOONER EASTWOOD

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May I call the attention of the government to a despatch from Lunenburg, N.S., dated February 23:

According to a statement made here to-night, by B. B. Cann, of Yarmouth, owner of the rum-running schooner Eastwood, alleged to have been shelled about a week ago, while anchored twenty miles off Long Island by the United States cutter Seneca, he is preparing to register formal protest at Ottawa with the Canadian government.

Mr. Cann said: "I would not consider myself a patriotic citizen unless I registered a protest against this sort of treatment. I will surely make a formal protest to the government at Ottawa. I intend to fight this case to the very limit, not because of the damage done to my vessel, nor the expense to myself, but because I, as a Canadian, will not stand idle and allow any foreign country to treat the Union Jack as a joke when it is hoisted on the mast of a British merchantman.

Is it the policy of the government to permit the use of the British flag to shield rum-runners who are carrying on a business that may be regarded as a series of unfriendly acts towards a neighbouring nation?

Hon. J. A. ROBB: No.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps the Minister of National Defence will tell us where our trawlers are now?

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): I do not know to what class of vessels my right hon. friend refers. There are no trawlers in the service of the Canadian government. There are fishing vessels—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Fishing vessels?

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough)): —owned by the parties engaged in fishing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the Canadian navy consist of fishing vessels?

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): No, and the Canadian navy does not consist of trawlers either.

SOLDIER SETTLERS' LAND

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): With reference to a question asked by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Clark) yesterday, I wish to say that it is expected that approximately fifty or sixty British families will be settled in the Fraser valley this year, on lands held by the Soldier Settlement Board. Some of the lands were never occupied by soldier settlers. In other cases, the soldier settlers occupied the land for a very short time. Only a few locations have been lately abandoned. Very few of the farms in question were foreclosed because the soldier settlers were not able to make their payments. That is the answer to my hon. friend's question.

Mr. CLARK: May I remind the minister that the vital point of the question was, whether the lands are being turned over to the immigrants at values lower than those originally placed on them for soldier settlement?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I asked that question, and in some cases they are turned over at a lower value. In the majority of cases, however, they are turned over at the value at which the soldier settler was placed upon the land.

UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): I desire to ask the Minister of the Interior a question respecting unemployment. I have mentioned the matter to him, and I merely ask the question in order to clear up what is apparently a misapprehension. I have received the following telegram from Blairmore, Alberta:

At a largely attended meeting of the above local it was unanimously decided to bring the matter of prevalent distress in this district to the attention of both provincial and federal authorities. Owing to the mines not working very much for the last few years and not more than two days per week since last August with a spare working crew to share in on that many of the people are in dire circumstances and this meeting requests both federal and provincial authorities to take a hand in this critical state of affairs and come to their assistance by providing work if possible and financial aid where work is not possible.

JOHN A. MCDONALD,
President.
WILLIAM OAKES,
Financial Secretary.
D. A. HOWE,
Recording Secretary.

Apparently, Mr. Speaker, there is a misapprehension as to the assistance to be extended and the amount to be contributed by the provincial and federal authorities, and if the minister would make a statement I think it would do much to clear up any doubt that may exist on the matter.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I would prefer that the Minister of Public Works should make any statement on this matter as he is Acting Minister of Labour. I may say, however, that the allocation of the amount payable in such cases is one-third of the excess of the cost of the relief work having to be done in the particular season in which such work may be necessary. With reference to the relief itself, it is then a clear third. The procedure is this: A request as well as a statement of cost will be furnished by the provincial government and the statement will be checked by officers of the federal government.

Mr. BENNETT: The federal government is not to take the initiative in any of the work?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, the provincial government will take the initiative.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT

REVALUATION OF LANDS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Will the Minister of the Interior inform me if it is the intention of the government at an early date to undertake a revaluation of soldier settlement lands? I press this question at this time because I have had communications from a number of returned men in my riding who are thinking seriously of abandoning their farms this spring for the reasons that their lands were purchased at boom prices, one hundred to two hundred per cent above present day prices, and they feel they cannot afford to hold them; and for the further reason that a number of immigrant farms are being handed over to immigrants at greatly reduced prices.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): I am informed by the Soldier Settlement Board that a survey was made in one or two cases this year. The report is not available at present but will be in a day or two. When it is received the department will recommend to the government measures to be taken with respect to revaluation, and whether or not it should be universal or only in part. I will make a statement to the House at the earliest possible date.

TRANSPORTATION OF COAL

SEVEN DOLLAR RATE ON ALBERTA COAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): I apologize to the House for asking a second question. It has been announced that the government propose to bear one-third of the cost, beyond $7 a ton, of transporting coal from certain points in Alberta to Ontario. Some of the collieries are located on the Canadian Pacific railway at points not reached by the Canadian National railways. I have been asked if the aid given by the government would be equally available for collieries not located on the Canadian National but on the other road.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, there will be no discrimination so long as the coal comes through to central Canada.

FORT ALEXANDER INDIAN RESERVE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. THOMAS HAY (Springfield): I should like the Minister of the Interior to inform the House if a surrender to the government has been made of that portion of the Indian reserve lying south of Winnipeg river and what the purpose of the government is with respect to the land so surrendered.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Is my hon. friend referring to the Alexander reserve?

Mr. HAY: Yes, the Fort Alexander reserve.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, there was an application by a pulp and paper company to purchase a certain portion of the reserve. I do not know whether the band has voted upon it or not. I will ascertain and let my hon. friend know.

AUSTRALIAN TREATY

BOUNTY ON BUTTER EXPORTED FROM COMMONWEALTH

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Will the Minister of Finance tell me whether any reply has been received from the government of Australia with regard to the reported payment of a bonus of six cents a pound on butter by the stabilization committee in Australia?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): I was just going to send a memorandum to my hon. friend, but since he has asked the question, I will tell him that there is no reply from the government of Australia. Indeed, there is no government subsidy, but I have a telegram from the Canadian Trade Commissioner at Melbourne who advises us that the scheme is purely voluntary, not government controlled. The producers of all states excepting Western Australia and Tasmania have become parties to this arrangement but they are not large producers. The scheme also raises the price to local consumers by three pence per pound above the export London parity; that is they charge their own people three pence per pound more than they charge for export, and the memorandum from the department says that because it is under the Pattersen scheme and a voluntary arrangement they come under our dumping clause and the Customs are so ruling. The Australian agreement provides that the rates thereunder shall be subject to the provisions of the Canadian customs tariff. With reference to the importation of butter into Canada from Australia, if the import price is less than the home consumption value it is liable to the special or dumping duty. The dumping clause, which is section 6 of the customs tariff, provides in effect that in the case of articles exported to Canada, of a class or kind made or produced in Canada, if the export or actual selling price to an importer in Canada is less than the fair market value in the country whence exported to Canada, there shall, in addition to the duties otherwise established, be levied on such article a special or dumping duty equal to the difference between the export price and the price for home consumption. The special or dumping duty shall not exceed fifteen per cent ad valorem. As the scheme in Australia raises the price to local consumers by three pence a pound above the export London parity, butter from Australia imported into Canada will be subject to the provisions of the dumping clause. The official in my department holds that there will be a dumping duty of approximately fifteen per cent on any butter that enjoys that privilege.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I might point out that the article which I read the other day did not state that the bounty was paid by the Australian government, but the question which I asked a moment ago was whether a bonus of six cents a pound was to be paid on butter exported from Australia under this scheme of the Australian stabilization committee.

Mr. ROBB: There is a voluntary arrangement and under that arrangement they have apparently placed the matter under our dumping clause.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Six cents a pound?

Mr. ROBB: Something like that.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Does the minister state that the dumping clause can apply on a percentage basis to an article imported under a duty of so much a pound?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see how it can.

Mr. ROBB: That is the interpretation of the commissioner.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Wednesday, February 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. C. Elliott for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed motion of Mr. Bird: That this question be now put.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): When the House adjourned yesterday I had drawn attention to the amendment of the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird). I pointed out that his amendment was an infringement on the liberty of the members of this House. I had pointed out also that it either had been moved with the consent of the government or without it; that if it had been with the consent of the government they were hiding behind a cowardly attack which they were unable or had not the courage to make themselves. I had referred to the fact that the government had either been willing or unwilling that the hon. member for Nelson should move this amendment and that if unwilling themselves to move the amendment they were foregoing their prerogative in regard to directing the legislation of this House. In that case I had pointed out that if they no longer were able to command and direct legislation in this chamber, it was their duty to resign.

I wish to point out at this stage something that is very important to the present argument, and that is that we have in power a government who appealed to the people of Canada in October last and who were utterly defeated; that the Prime Minister and eight cabinet ministers were sent to the guillotine, and that in no less than four provinces in this Dominion there is no representation in the goverment. Moreover, they are being kept in power to-day by a party that were not and could not be elected as supporters of this government, and consequently I ask them: By what right do they still linger upon the treasury benches? I had also drawn the attention of the House to the fact that the difficulties confronting this country to-day could be solved by having more work, a greater number of men profitably employed at work in order that they should help to bear the burden of taxation and provide freight for our railways, et cetera, and also greater markets for the products of our farms. Along with this I suggested the necessity of a reduction in taxation and I analysed the consolidated revenue of Canada on a per capita basis showing how much each province was paying. This brings me to the question of the railways which, to my mind, is, with the exception of the war, the greatest problem that ever confronted Canada. Let me repeat what I said yesterday afternoon that the railway question for the east and for the west is one that must receive the consideration of this House. I am one who believes that money will have to be taken out of the public treasury to help to reduce freight rates from the two extremities of this country, but I wish to register my emphatic protest against the method that has been employed in the past of getting reductions in freight rates. I must congratulate members from the Maritime provinces on the very impartial, judicial and forceful way in which they have presented their case to this country. They have made out an especially good case and I was very much surprised at the reply which the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) made to them. After they had pointed out that they had borne their share in building the Canadian Pacific which did not go into some of the provinces, in building the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific which gave them very little benefit and in constructing the canals of this country from which they also derived very little benefit, when the hon. member for Lisgar got up to reply, he went out into the garbage heap and produced the old argument that he was willing to give them more freedom of trade. They asked for bread and he was not prepared even to give them a placebo.

That brings into review the whole transportation question. We have been developing in this country some three methods of transportation. We have at the present time a western outlet for the prairies. This outlet, as every hon. member knows, has been increasing in value during the last few years and, in my opinion, when the great yellow, brown and black races that are eating less rice and more wheat than ever before, get thoroughly converted to a change of diet, the western route is going to be one of the great exits for our wheat. We have also been developing a system of inland waterways. We have built the Sault canal; we have spent millions upon the Welland canal and, to my mind, all these things are a mistake if we do not carry them to their logical conclusion and make it possible for ocean-going vessels to reach the head of the lakes. The deep waterway system is one which should be continued and pressed to an immediate conclusion. That is all the more important when we consider the large volume of our grain that is going via Buffalo to the Atlantic coast, and it is also important because the power that can be developed along that route will be sufficient to pay interest on the investment.

We have before this parliament a fourth route and that is the Hudson Bay route which has been put into the Speech from the Throne, as I said yesterday, as a means of seducing and getting support from the western Progressives. While I believe all hon. members on this side will be prepared to look at that problem on its merits, I do not think they will find very much merit in it when they are finished with it. If I might make a suggestion to the government, it would be that they make a present of this road, on which we have spent some $14,000,000 in construction and some $6,000,000 in terminals, to the Manitoba and Saskatchewan governments, and throw in three or four million dollars to complete it. I believe this country would be infinitely better off in the end if that suggestion were carried out.

Having prefaced my remarks on the railway question to that extent, I want for the benefit of my good Progressive friends from the west to review the rate question as it pertains to them and to the people of Ontario. On looking up the rate question I find that the rate per ton per mile in western Canada is eighty-seven cents while in eastern Canada it is $1.17. I also find in reviewing returns on grain that were made to this House a year ago, that the operating costs for 1923 were 126.14 per cent and for 1924, 126.96 per cent, producing an operating loss in the first case of $6,088,499 and in the second, of $5,812,016. Had that same quantity of grain been carried the same distance on United States lines, our western Progressive friends would have had to pay $34,000,000 more in freight than they did. In other words, the farmers of western Canada have an advantage over the farmers of the United States equivalent to $34,000,000 in carrying that quantity of grain that distance. In looking over other returns that were made to this House last year I find that there was a deficit on our railways in the Atlantic region of, roughly speaking, $3,500,000. In the central region there was a net revenue of $16,400,000 while on the United States lines the net revenue was $5,700,000. In the western region there was a deficit of $1,124,000. What are we to deduce from these figures? Simply this, that the central region is carrying the great burden of taxation in connection with the railways so far as freight is concerned, just as I pointed out yesterday that they were carrying also the great burden of taxation in every other direction. I am not objecting to reduced freight rates either in the east or in the west; I want to be perfectly fair and to be well understood in that regard. I said yesterday that the central provinces were quite prepared to share that burden, and I say so again to-day. But I want to register my protest against a system that penalizes the middle for the benefit of the two extremes. I say that this money should be taken boldly out of the treasury for the national good and every citizen in Canada should contribute accordingly to that end.

I was astounded when the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) rose in his place early in the session and charged the government with directly interfering with the railway commission; and I was equally astounded to learn that they had interfered by legislation with railway rates. That is not their prerogative; there should be a freight rate in this country that would allow not only the east and the west but central Canada as well to do business. I submit therefore that the proper method is to take boldly out of the treasury the money that is necessary to recoup the railways for any loss they might suffer in the matter of reduced freight rates. How can we expect the national railways to pay when members in this House advise, and the government act upon that advice, that they be made to carry goods below cost? Day after day we have seen hon. gentlemen getting up in their places and asking the government questions in regard to freight rates, and day after day we have heard the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) agreeing to use his good offices with the Canadian National Railways in the matter. Do we ever hear similar suggestions being made with reference to the Canadian Pacific Railway? Yet the government would have us believe that the Canadian National Railways are out of politics.

For the information of our good Progressive friends let me analyze the railway debt. We have invested in the Canadian National Railways over $2,000,000,000 according to Mr. Bell's report of March 25. On the basis of population Ontario's share of that would be $685,000,000, but if we take as a basis the rates of taxation I have already given its contribution would be two and a half times that sum. We built out of the revenues of the country the National Transcontinental Railway at a cost of $170,000,000 and Ontario's share of that, according to population, was $15,000,000; but actually it amounted to $27,000,000. I could go on if necessary and show what proportion of the cost of that railway was paid for by the western provinces, but possibly I have pursued the argument far enough. We have also invested in the canals of Canada $362,000,000 of which Ontario's proportion would be $120,000,000.

On consulting the records of parliament I find that this country has loaned to our western friends through the Seed Grain Relief Act something like $16,300,000 of which the sum of $4,300,000 remains unpaid. I find further that we spent on the Royal Canadian Mounted Police down to 1920 the vast sum of $35,000,000. I say therefore that when you balance up the accounts between east and west and take the contributions of central Canada into consideration you will find that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec have borne the heaviest part of the burden.

[Mr. McGibbon.]

Now we have heard hon. gentlemen getting up day in and day out and telling us how conditions have been improving in Canada. At the same time gentlemen from the extreme east as well as from Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, Winnipeg, Edmonton and the far west have been pleading in this House to have proper freight rates put into force in order to facilitate the movement of coal so that the labourers of these various places may be kept from starvation. So far as the unemployment in these places is concerned, I believe that these gentlemen are right. In the month of January of this year, according to the statistics of this government's own Department of Labour, there were 50,000 people more out of work than there were in the month of December, and this unemployment is widely distributed; it begins at the Atlantic and goes clean across the continent. Every city in every province is faced with more unemployment now than it had to cope with during the month of December. I would direct the attention of the Labour members of this House to a letter written by Mr. Thomas Moore, which contains some interesting statements. It is not necessary for me to explain who or what this gentleman is; he is well known to every member of the House. He is here discussing the situation as it exists here to-day in Canada and the causes thereof, and in relation to unemployment he draws the distinction between a revenue tariff and a protective tariff. He says:

> Do Canadian workmen want to make sure of the closing of Canadian factories and of further unemployment? If so they will naturally support a tariff for revenue only.

He then points out that the tariff for revenue as it is applied in England merely taxes the goods they do not produce there such as sugar, fruit and so on, and he ends by saying:

> The choice for Canadian workers is between more imported goods and greater unemployment and made in Canada articles and greater oportunities for work at home.

Do the Labour members of this House think that Mr. Moore knows what he is talking about when he says that the very foundation of the Labour market is a protective system? I also have in my hand the draft of a speech delivered by Mr. Stanley Baldwin, Prime Minister of Great Britain, in which he discusses the results of the Safeguarding of Industries Act passed by the Imperial parliament. Let me read to the House the instructions given to the committee by the board of trade regarding the application of the act. The committee were instructed to report on the following:

> First, whether the applicant industry—

That is, the industry applying for more protection, because that is what it really amounts to.

—is, by reason of the volume of employment engaged in the production of the goods to which the application relates, or by reason of the nature of the goods produced, an industry of substantial importance.

Now I want the House to note this:

Second, whether foreign goods of the class or description to which the application relates are being imported into, and retained for consumption in, the United Kingdom in abnormal quantities.

Then follow these further instructions:

Third, whether the foreign goods so imported are being sold or offered for sale in the United Kingdom at prices which are below the prices at which similar goods can be profitably manufactured or produced in the United Kingdom.

Fourth, whether by reason of the severity and extent of such competition employment in the manufacture or production of such goods in the United Kingdom is being, or is likely to be, seriously affected.

Fifth, whether such exceptional competition comes largely from countries where the conditions are so different from those in this country as to render the competition unfair.

Then this note is added by the board of trade:

Competition for the purpose of such inquiry is not to be deemed unfair unless it arises from one or more of the following causes,—

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that these causes decidedly apply to Canada to-day.

Depreciation of currency operating so as to create an export bounty.

Is not that the great handicap that the shoe industry, the woollen industry and other of our industries are under to-day?

Subsides, bounties or other artificial advantages.

Is not that the very same thing that the member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) called attention to this afternoon? Is it fair for the dairymen of this country to be subjected to the competition of Australian butter producers not only under the unequal terms of the Australian treaty but under the further disadvantage that their rivals are receiving a bounty of six cents a pound on the butter they export? These are the instructions that were given by the British Board of Trade to those administering the provisions of that special legislation passed to protect the industries and the workingmen of Great Britain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has indicated the attitude of Mr. Baldwin, the Conservative Prime Minister of England. Would he point out to the House the position taken by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, leader of the Labour party of Great Britain?

Mr. McGIBBON: I leave the hon. member to look after his own. I am looking after the workingmen of my constituency. It is my constituency, as I stated yesterday, that this government by its policy has crucified the labouring men of Canada. The greatest crime that can be charged against any government, Mr. Speaker, is that by its policies it makes it impossible for the people to live in their native land. I contend that this government by its policies has driven out over five hundred thousand of the best workingmen of Canada.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Does the hon. gentleman contend that the government has done so by heavy reductions of the customs duties?

Mr. McGIBBON: I say partly yes, partly no. It has brought about these deplorable conditions by putting our workingmen up against the competition of the sweatshops of Europe without any protection. Let me refer a little further to Mr. Baldwin's speech. He analyzes the results so far of the operation of the Safeguarding of Industries Act, and points out—I wish the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) were in his seat to take note of this—that the act has been the means of creating new industries in England. He states what we all know to be the case, that before and during the war optical instruments, lenses, X-ray equipment and similar goods had to be procured either from Germany or the United States. When I went to the front, Mr. Speaker, I was forced to buy a set of American-German field glasses because they could not be procured either in Canada or Great Britain. Mr. Baldwin points out that the operation of this act has resulted in industries of a scientific nature and very important to Great Britain being established, industries which are now employing tens of thousands of people who otherwise would be idle. I would ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) if he knows this to be the fact, that when war broke out the great textile industry of England was in jeopardy because it had been relying on Germany for its dyes. The British government spent tens of millions of pounds in scientific industrial research in order to discover the formula for those dyes, and to-day the textile industry is no longer dependent on outside sources.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask another question? Has the hon. gentleman any means whatever of protecting the actual worker in this country against the cheap labour that is being imported from European countries?

Mr. McGIBBON: Certainly I have. If the hon. member will only vote with us and turn this government out, we will put in a government that will protect our workers against that cheap labour.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. gentleman is not offering a bribe?

Mr. McGIBBON: Well, if the hon. member considers any proposal to ensure feeding the wives and children of our workingmen a bribe, I say yes. That is what I am here to accomplish, Mr. Speaker, that is what I am making this speech for—to effect such a change as will bring back the labouring men of my constituency, who have been driven out of their homes and their country by the policies of this government.

Now, Sir, what else has this government done to bring about unemployment? It has raised the cost of the workingman's daily bread higher than it has been for some three or four years, and at the same time it has cut down his wages so that he can hardly make the two balance. I have right in my own constituency—and a similar condition prevails in other constituencies, as the member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam) said recently—men engaged in the hard and laborious lumber industry who are working for twenty-five to thirty dollars a month, and trying to keep their wives and families on those wages. I ask the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre if he thinks he could do so. Clever and all as he is, I will wager that he could not.

Now, what is happening to our labouring men? As I said, half a million have been driven out by the policies of the government. What would that half a million be worth to Canada to-day if we had them here and a government in power with a policy that would ensure them employment? Five hundred thousand people working at $1,000 a year would mean a lot of money, and that money would be spent in this country, and every man and woman in the country would derive a certain amount of benefit from its expenditure. That would help to solve our national railway problem, to a certain extent, at least; it would help to pay the national debt of this country, and help us to bear the great burden of taxation that is driving the people of this country almost into the earth. While on this subject I might quote the ex-Minister of Finance, the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), who a year ago made the statement in this House that there was being brought into this country $700,000,000 worth of goods which we had the machinery and the workmen here to make ourselves. Let us analyze that for a moment. When I say that labour accounts for 70 per cent of the cost of the manufactured article, I think I am well within the mark. Now 70 per cent of $700,000,000 is $490,000,000; $490,000,000 would pay $1,000 a year to 490,000 men; it would give employment to nearly half a million men, and we could provide that work for them if we would only do what any patriotic, reliant, self-respecting people ought to do, give employment to our own people by making the goods we need at home.

Now I want to leave the labouring man for a moment and go to some other parts of my constituency—but no, I will finish him up while I am at it. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), if he will go back to his constituency and laugh at those who are trying to get bread for the labouring men of this country, is not worthy to represent them in this House. I have in my hand a brief analysis of the shoe industry in this country, and I take this up because it relates to industries that are located in my riding, industries which are more or less dependent on the shoe and leather industry in this country. I want to bring to the attention of the House this fact, that this government has lowered the duty on boots and shoes to such an extent, and by treaties and other means has so wiped out the protection we had against the depreciated currencies of other countries, that our own industries can hardly live. The French treaty came into force, I think, in 1922, and I want to give the House a few figures to show what effect it has had upon industry in this country. I have a statement here from the Bureau of Statistics showing the importation of boots and shoes into this country during the last five years. In 1921 and 1922 practically none were imported, but for the following years the importations were as follows:

	Pairs, Men's sizes
1923..	264,124
1924..	329,158
1925..	306,041

Nothing in 1921 and 1922, but in the next three years we imported nearly 1,000,000 pairs. Now let us look at children's sizes. The same conditions existed in 1921 and 1922, but in 1923, after the French treaty had come into force, our importations were as follows:

	Pairs, children's sizes
1923..	57,040
1924..	131,481
1925..	145,537

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Did these boots come from France? Is that the implication? What was the source of origin?

Mr. McGIBBON: It is pretty hard to trace the origin, but a lot of them, we suspect, were made in Belgium, Germany, and France, shipped to England, and then came into this country under the British preference. Right here let me say that I do not believe in continuing the British preference in the manner in which it is operating to-day. I do not believe in taking the bread out of the mouths of Canadian workingmen and giving it to the Englishman, the Frenchman, the German, the Belgian or anybody else.

Mr. McMILLAN: Does not the hon. member know that letting these goods come in cheaper is putting the bread in the mouths of our workingmen, rather than taking it away from them?

Mr. McGIBBON: No, I do not know anything of the kind, because it is not true; but I do know it makes more profit for the middleman, and puts our own men out of work.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Does the hon. member not admit that these importations put boots and shoes on our workingmen's feet?

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not think they would put them on their heads. If I might digress for a moment, that puts me in mind of the man who came to this country and went into a butcher shop and bought a couple of pounds of beef. He asked how much it was, and the butcher told him fifty cents. "Why" said the man, "I could buy that at home for a shilling." "Then why didn't you stay there," said the butcher, "and get it for a shilling?" "Well," said the man, "the trouble is I could not get the shilling."

I want to give now a few figures as to our importations of boots, shoes and slippers with felt uppers. Here again we imported practically nothing in 1921 and 1922, but for the following years the figures are as follows:

	Pairs, with felt uppers
1923	151,858
1924	221,680
1925	408,590

Let me give you next the boot and shoe imports from the United Kingdom, and this is where we suspect that German, Belgian and French goods are getting into Canada from the United Kingdom:

	Pairs
1922	342,000
1923	653,000

Is it any wonder that the boot and shoe industry of this country is being put out of business? Is it any wonder that the workingmen of this country whom my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre is supposed to represent, are walking the streets to-day through our sending our money over to England, France and Germany, and feeding the workingmen of those countries in preference to our own? I am one of those who believe in this species of Canadianism, to feed our own Canadians before we feed Germans or Belgians or anybody else, and that is the spirit I am trying to get over to the House this afternoon, because upon the shoe industry are dependent many others which have been adversely affected. We had in this country four years ago fifteen large tanning industries; how many have we to-day? Six. Nine out of the fifteen have been put out of business. Why? Simply because the importations of leather goods which have been coming into this country under the policy of this government have made it impossible for our own industries to get prices at which they could continue to operate. In my home town we had two of the largest tanneries in the British Empire. They were putting through 3,000 sides of hide a day. What have we got to-day? For four years they have not put through a single hide. One of the firms has torn down its buildings; the other is closed indefinitely. The result is that hundreds of workingmen who are dependent for a livelihood on these two industires have been driven out of the town and district, and in some cases out of the country, in order to secure employment and provide bread for themselves and their families. My sympathy goes out, first and always, to the man who gets up before daylight and toils all day in order to provide a living for himself and his family. I say that any government that deprives that man of his living and takes the bread out of the mouths of his family and himself, is going to be opposed by me.

Now let me deal with the woollen industry —and I hope to be in a better position to satisfy the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), as to the origin of the goods to which I have been referring. The woollen industry received the first blow from the Liberal party shortly after its return to power in 1896, when it introduced the British preference. It has been receiving blows time after time ever since, until to-day over twenty establishments that were engaged in it are out of business. To my mind, Mr. Speaker, that industry is quite important, to this country, for many reasons. In the first place, these factories are using up the natural wool of this country, and are in a position to use it in different localities, because over sixty per cent of them are scattered through the small towns and villages all over the country. This industry, I say, received its first blow after the change of government in 1896, and since the revision of the tariff made by the Laurier government at that time no less than eighty-eight woollen mills have gone out of business in Canada. Now how does that affect the farmer? The result is shown by the fact that there are no more sheep in this country to-day than there were thirty years ago.

An hon. MEMBER: Not as many.

Mr. McGIBBON: The number is practically the same. I want to tell my hon. friend the member for Winnipeg North Centre, who is supposed to represent labour here but who, I think, misrepresents it, some of the difficulties that these men are up against. They have to compete, for instance, against lower wages and longer hours in the Old Country; they have to compete against inferior working conditions, and a lower standard of living; and then in the case of France and Germany they must compete against the evils of a depreciated currency, exemplified in the case of France by the falling in value of the franc from about 20 cents to 4½ cents. Many of the importations of which I complain, I can tell my hon. friend, came not from England directly but from France under the French treaty. I have the figures and I will give them to my hon. friend.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are we to understand from the hon. gentleman that the hours of labour are longer in Great Britain than they are in Canada?

Mr. McGIBBON: The hours of labour of workingmen? Yes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to have the exact figures.

Mr. McGIBBON: I can tell the hon. gentleman that the statement is a fact. Everybody knows that the British labour men work longer hours than they do in Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Great Britain, I said.

Mr. McGIBBON: Yes, Great Britain. Now, I wish to give some figures with respect to the woollen industry. First I will enumerate our importations under the French treaty which came into effect in September, 1923. I ask hon. gentlemen to listen to the facts with respect to this industry. In 1922, that was before the French treaty which this government negotiated came into effect, we imported $699,000 worth of woollen goods. In 1923 our importations of woollen goods amounted to $1,020,000. In 1924 they had risen from $1,000,000 to $2,000,000, and in 1925 had grown to $3,284,000. Is it any wonder that there is no work for our woollen mills in this country? I have dealt with the results of the French treaty. Now let me take up the importations of cloth from Great Britain. The figures are as follows:

1921..	13,000,000 yards
1922..	27,000,000 yards
1923..	28,000,000 yards
1924..	30,000,000 yards

Showing in those four years an increase in the importations of cloth from Great Britain from 13,000,000 yards to 30,000,000 yards. Again I ask, is it any wonder that mill after mill in this country has had to close its doors and that the workmen have been turned out on the street? What has been the result? That our money has been sent over to help pay the wages of workingmen in Great Britain and France. I repeat, if that is the species of patriotism favoured by the government, and by its followers in this House, then I am glad that I do not belong to the Liberal party.

Now I want to take up another branch of the subject. As hon. members of this House know only about 15,000,000 pounds of wool are grown in this country, whereas about 70,000,000 are consumed. Formerly the importations were very large. When our mills were working at full capacity we had large importations, but those importations have been decreasing year by year while importations of manufactured articles have been increasing. Let me give some figures to illustrate my contention. For the first four months of 1923 we imported $7,210,000 worth of raw wool to be manufactured in this country. In 1924 the importations had fallen to $4,150,000, and in 1925 to $3,615,000. Here again we see a great loss to the manufacturing industry. We see the workmen of Canada deprived of their living, deprived of their wages, and in many cases forced to leave this country to get employment elsewhere. I ask hon. members is that a policy that appeals to their judgment having regard to the best interests of the workmen of Canada? I should like to carry that argument a little further. How are the railways of this country affected? In 1923 there were 11,000,000 pounds of raw wool and other materials carried by the Canadian railways. In 1924 the amount had fallen to 7,000,000, and in 1925 to 6,000,000 pounds. I ask hon. members, what do we gain by crucifying our industries, turning our working men out on the street, and sending our money to Great Britain, or France, or Germany and importing goods from those countries? I hope the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) will answer me on that point.

Now, I am going to touch on the agricultural side of the question for a moment. The question has been debated so much and so often, that I do not pretend to add anything new to the discussion. I do wish, however, to put some figures on record. For instance, the dairy industry alone represents an investment of $35,000,000, and the production has a total value of $218,000,000. There are 1,284 cream factories, and 1,351 cheese factories, in operation. The dairy cattle number approximately 2,280,000, and the proportion of revenue from this source employed by the provinces was in 1924 as follows:

Ontario..	$444,208
Manitoba..	161,913
Saskatchewan..	281,992
Alberta..	200,672
Quebec..	241,000

Or a total of $1,453,368. Now, what has this government done for that industry? I am not adding anything new to the discussion when I repeat what the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) said the other day that the government has practically, by the Australian treaty, cut the throat of the dairy industry of Canada. The hon. gentleman gave us some figures showing that the exports of butter from this country to Belgium had dropped from 750,000 pounds to a bare 5,000 pounds. He also told us that under the French treaty three years ago we had sold $17,000,000 worth of goods and that our sales had dropped to $11,000,000. The imports two years ago were $12,000,000 and they had been raised to $18,000,000. But the part I want to emphasize is that no butter, condensed milk, meat and so on, had been sold at all. Our agricultural market in France had been absolutely obliterated, and nothing but a paltry $2,000 worth of lard got into that country over the tariff barrier which this government erected. I ask you, Mr. Speaker and this House, is there any man representing an agricultural district here in Canada, particularly a dairying district, who can justify that treaty, especially when you remember that the only way in which we got any return was by a reduction in the duty on silks and on champagne and spirits, which are now relics of bygone days. And this is the government which during the election of 1921 came out as the champion of the common people. They take the taxes off the rich and put them on the poor. Let us carry that a little bit further. The results of the Australian treaty have been pretty well placed on Hansard, but I am going to put some more on record. It has already been explained that we brought into Canada over 4,000,000 pounds of butter the first two months of this year, but I want the House to listen to the vast importations of goods which have taken place in the last two months. In the month of January this year we imported into Canada 85,000 dozen eggs. In the month of February, up to the 24th, a little over three weeks, the importation had risen from 85,000 for a full month to 618,000. We imported into Canada 2,500,000 dozen eggs in the shell during the last year, and 750,000 pounds in a frozen condition. The great importations of butter and eggs have been mentioned. I have in my hand a letter from Alexander D. McGillis and Company, Montreal, which reads:

> It is quite evident that without the New Zealand and Australian butter our market would be soaring around the 60 cent mark, and that but for the new Australian treaty, there would be a profit to the Canadian dairying interests of at least three cents per pound more than is being realized.

I am sorry the Minister of Agriculture is not in his seat, because the difference between 60 cents and the 40 and 45 cents which we are getting to-day is the loss the farmers are suffering under this treaty. I would not want hon. members to think that I have exhausted all the sins of omission and commission of which the government has been guilty. I think I could easily talk for a week and then not be able to enumerate them all, but I have tried to lay before the House a few of them as they affect my constituency in particular and the country in general, because I consider it my duty to plead in this parliament the cause of the workingmen and the farmers of my district.

The following is a comparative statement of Canadian and United States duties on agricultural products:—

I desire to say a word or two about immigration. I was going to address my remarks to the Minister of Agriculture, but it is hard to tell what departments these ministers represent to-day. This government lost the greatest opportunity that ever came to it or will ever come to any government in the world when it lost the benefit of the advertising got through our Canadian troops in France. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) looks over at me. I say again, Mr. Speaker, that this country will never be in as good a position to take advantage of an immigration policy as it was at the close of the war. Every man who was over there knows that the Canadian army was looked upon as an army of rich men. This country was looked upon as a regular gold mine, not altogether without some justification, because our men, while not being paid very high rates, were receiving much higher rates relatively than the men of the other armies. But what was more important than advertising the country was the fact that they spent their money and spent it lavishly, and the attention of the whole of Europe was focused upon Canada for some years. What has happened? This government has let that golden opportunity go by, and to-day we are in the humiliating position that more people are leaving Canada than are coming here. It is doubtful if we are holding our natural increase, although we are bringing people here at considerable cost.

I have in my hand the Canadian book on Immigration and Colonization, and I am going to read a sentence from it and then by way of comment read quotations from American newspapers and other sources. The first is taken from a report of Mr. Wallace, I think the United States immigration agent in Dakota, who points out certain advantages enjoyed by the Canadian farmer. He says:

> The Canadian wheat farmer enjoys substantial advantages over the American producer in the matter of yields, land values, the quality of wheat he produces and the lower freight rates from points equally distant from markets.

Again I direct the attention of my Progressive friends to the lower freight rates. That is the argument put up by the American commissioner, Mr. Wallace. Now what has happened to our American immigration agencies? Well, Mr. Speaker, we had a number of American immigration agencies in the United States and a large number of them have been closed but not all. I have a quotation from one of the American papers giving the reason. One of the offices which was located at Omaha has been closed, and this is what the American paper said:

> Emigration to Canada has fallen to such a point that the Dominion government has just closed a number of its land offices in the western states. The menace no longer exists.

The menace of American farmers going into Canada no longer exists. The paper proceeds:

> The Omaha office is one of those just closed. It was opened in 1896. In 28 years the Omaha office alone sent 50,000 American settlers across the line who carried with them in cash, household goods, implements and live stock $53,000,000.

That office is closed and the menace no longer exists, and why? They give the answer:

> Money stringency and tremendous taxation are some of the factors that have stopped the flow and the drain has now ceased.

That is the way this government has handled immigration from the United States which has been coming here for thirty years. It has dwindled to nothing through the extreme taxation this government has imposed upon the people. Now the offices have been closed and the immigrants are going out of the country faster than we can bring them in. How can this country ever become prosperous unless we have a government with a policy that will keep its own people and find employment for them instead of spending millions to bring people from Europe?

I have already spoken probably too long and I do not want to take up any more of the time of the House. In conclusion, let me say that what this country needs to-day is a government with courage, a government with a policy and with backbone to put that policy into force. It needs a government with an appreciation of the fact that when this country borrows money, that money must be repaid; that when prosperity comes, it must bring greater remuneration to the tillers of the soil. It needs a government that can find within the borders of Canada work for labouring men at a wage sufficient to enable them to make a living, to support their families and to prepare for their old age. Such a government will be formed in the very near future by the right hon. the leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Meighen).

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to prolong this already too long debate, especially when our hon. friends of the Tory party opposite are crying for closure in order to stop them from continuing this useless talk—although they could bring the debate to an end at any time by keeping their seats and allowing the vote to be taken. My only purpose in rising is to say a word about the Rouyn railway question, which was raised in the House by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) a few days ago. My hon. friend was discussing the Rouyn railway and complaining about the method of construction. Since that very important line of railway, and also an important town and mining district, are in my riding, it is only fair that I should detain the House for a few moments in order to say a word or two on the subject.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, the Abitibi district is one of the finest colonization districts in Canada. It is peopled by the best colonizers that we have ever had for a timbered country—the only people, in fact, who will at any time colonize our northern timbered districts of eastern Canada. There are in the neighbourhood of 30,000 sturdy French-Canadians in that country who are making a magnificent showing in developing the territory along the Transcontinental railway. In 1924, when the Rouyn district began to open up, when the mines were proven to be very good prospects, I interviewed the Minister of Railways and asked him if it would be possible to connect up the Rouyn district with the Abitibi district, the distance being only some forty-five to fifty miles. The Minister of Railways informed me that no action could be taken by the minister or by the government except at the instigation of the board of directors. I interviewed Sir Henry Thornton and some of the directors and I also interviewed the Premier of Quebec. Sir Henry Thornton, as I recollect, told me that he would not be responsible for undertaking any new construction in Canada unless it could be shown that the line would be profitable or that he would be reimbursed in some way by a subsidy for the period of time at the beginning of its operations when the railway might not be profitable. His officials investigated the possibilities of the country and the feasibility of building a railway, and they were satisfied that there would be a profitable business in the very near future. Mr. Taschereau was also anxious to see a line built in from the Abitibi district in order to link up the agricultural district with the mining district. The agricultural district had become developed to the point where the people were ready to export a certain quantity of their product. As they are far from the central markets of eastern Canada, if a market could be found in the upper part of Quebec it would be profitable to both the mining and the agricultural districts. They negotiated with the province of Quebec first for a land grant, but Mr. Taschereau had apparently made up his mind that there would be no more land grants. They continued negotiations until Sir Henry Thornton and his board were able to get from the Quebec government a grant of $50,000 a year for the first five years of operation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has that guarantee been given yet, or is it still to come?

Mr. CAHILL: It has been given.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the thirty per cent regulation apply to that also?

Mr. CAHILL: I do not know about that. I understand, and I believe my hon. friend will bear me out, it is a common regulation between companies under an agreement of this kind.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not with a mileage like that. It means the guarantee is worth nothing.

Mr. CAHILL: The Quebec government are to give a grant of $50,000 a year and the Noranda mines have guaranteed $20,000 a year for the first five years, making altogether a guarantee of $350,000 which Sir Henry Thornton will get from the Quebec government and this company in lieu of any loss in operation and the expense of constructing the road. Instead of condemning Sir Henry Thornton and the government for this deal, my hon. friend from West York should commend them for making a deal that will save to the Canadian National Railways $350,000 in the next five years.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think I once mentioned the name of Sir Henry Thornton. My whole point was whether the country had a right to believe in the word of the government. Apparently it has not.

Mr. CAHILL: The whole thing seems to hinge on, I was going to say, hair-splitting—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, common honesty.

Mr. CAHILL: —but perhaps that is not the word. I will say that the whole thing seems to hinge on a technicality. My hon. friend is raising a point on a technicality when the result of whatever he claims is wrongdoing, if any, is to save to the Canadian National Railways $350,000 in the next five years. It ill-becomes my hon. friend to condemn that action when he cannot point to any previous arrangement whereby the Canadian National Railways were reimbursed by any provincial government in the Dominion. That the territory is good was proven by the fact that the Ontario government were willing to build a railway into it. They had a charter to build and they were anxious to build. The Canadian Pacific will, I believe, build into the territory, and I hope they will. I also hope the Ontario government will eventually construct a railway in there. I would be glad to see all three of them build railways into that territory, because the construction would be warranted. But the Quebec government had spent millions of dollars in colonizing the territory along the Transcontinental railway at not one dollar of expense to the Dominion government while we were spending considerable sums of money in attempting to colonize other parts of Canada. The Quebec government brought these people in, opened up roads for them, built bridges and developed the country far beyond anything else that has been developed in Canada during the same period.

I would like to have the hon. member for West York pay a visit to the Abitibi country and also the Rouyn country and see for himself the benefits that will accrue to that territory by the construction of these railways. I am sure that if he did, instead of criticizing, he would commend Sir Henry Thornton and the board of directors for the action they have taken. The work is necessary, and the only point of difference between my hon. friends opposite and hon. members on this side is the method by which it was done. The only means by which the Canadian National Railways could get an offer of $350,000 was that which they adopted, and it was under a statute passed by my hon. friends opposite. Now they quarrel as to which statute should be adopted, the one passed in 1919 or the one passed in 1915. That point is of no concern to the people of Canada, except that the method adopted is one by which the people will save $350,000.

Mr. GEARY: Does my hon. friend wish to give the House to understand that the grant of $350,000 is conditional on this matter being put through not in the House but by order in council?

Mr. CAHILL: My hon. friend knows very well that the Canadian National Railways could not ask the Quebec government to construct a line of railway in that province.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why not?

Mr. CAHILL: When the people of the province of Quebec are shouldering their part of the responsibility for the Canadian National Railways why should they be asked to contribute to the construction of a branch line in that province when we are building branch lines all over Canada at the expense of the Dominion? Why should the people of Quebec be made to pay the shot in this case? That seems to me the whole burden of the grievance of my hon. friends opposite.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Can the hon. member point to anything in the lease between the government and the Rouyn company that indicates that the Canadian National Railways are building the railway?

Mr. CAHILL: I have read neither the lease nor the agreement, but if I did and did not have more information on the subject than my hon. friend I should be ashamed to make any statements in this House in regard to the construction of this railway such as he has made. He made the statement, only last night I think, that no tenders were called for, whereas as a matter of fact tenders were required. The contract was let to Messrs. Chambers, McQuigge & McCaffrey and Foley Bros., all respectable people, whose head office is at 611 Excelsior Life Building, Toronto.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I rise to a question of privilege: I did not say that no tenders had been called for. The statement I made was that under the terms of this agreement there was no obligation on the part of the Canadian National Railways to call for tenders and that the road was being built by a dummy company.

Mr. CAHILL: It would not matter much whether it was being built by a dummy company or by a loud speaker company; that would neither help nor hinder the work. The fact is that the railway is necessary and that it is being built at the lowest possible cost. The Canadian National Railways have been assisted by the government of Quebec and the Noranda mines to the extent of $350,000 to reimburse them for any losses in operation in the next five years, and I am sure the people of Canada will approve of that kind of railway construction at any time, in any part of the Dominion, especially when the Canadian National Railways are being protected as they are in this case.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If I follow the hon. gentleman's argument, he thinks that it was unnecessary to come to parliament in this instance because the road was necessary. Well, is it necessary to come to parliament only when the road is unnecessary?

Mr. CAHILL: I did not say anything about the necessity for coming to parliament; I was leaving that argument to my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the point.

Mr. CAHILL: That point does not enter into it at all. The Canadian National Railways, under a statute passed by the Conservative government between 1911 and 1921, were at liberty to construct the railway in this way and apparently it was a distinct advantage to them to do so inasmuch as they got an advantage of $350,000. Evidently they considered that worth while and they came to the government for its sanction and obtained it. The railway will be constructed and will be of great benefit not only to that part of the province of Quebec but to the Dominion as a whole.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it would be entirely wrong for the Canadian National Railways to apply for a subsidy direct to the government of the province of Quebec, how is it right for them to get it indirectly?

Mr. CAHILL: Being wrong in asking and wrong in getting are two different things. I do not think it would be wrong for the Canadian National Railways to look for assistance from any province if they could get it, but what province could justify giving it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The virtue of the action of the Quebec government is in getting the thing done through a dummy company?

Mr. CAHILL: I am not interested in how they do it so long as the road is built. The road will be of advantage to the district and of advantage to the Dominion as a whole, and the people will approve of its construction especially when the Canadian National Railways are to be reimbursed to the extent of $350,000.

Mr. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): The volume of congratulation to yourself, Mr. Speaker, has been so extensive, so general, so sincerely expressed by the many members who have spoken on this occasion that perhaps nothing can or should be added to it. In fact it is possible that it may be detracted from somewhat by over-repetition. I however desire to associate myself with and to concur in what has been said so kindly regarding you, Sir, and to thank you for your kindness to me when a new member of the last parliament. I fully appreciate the consideration and the encouragement you showed me among other new members then, and the same consideration and encouragement which you are extending to the new members of this parliament.

Before proceeding with my address I want to refer briefly to the argument of the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill), who seems either accidentally or deliberately to have avoided the real point of the dispute in this matter. On this side of the House we feel that this railway should have been built in the same way as any other and that the same proceedings, with the approval of parliament, should have been followed as in the case of any other branch line of the Canadian National Railways. A special bill should have been introduced and discussed in the House, and parliament should have been consulted as to the course to be adopted. I can see no difficulty, I can see no obstacle, I can see nothing to prevent the Canadian National Railways from getting all the benefits which they have derived in connection with this undertaking by taking the proper open daylight course such as they ought to have taken. But the difficulty is that we apparently have launched upon a course of procedure quite the opposite to that which should have been followed. We are embarking upon large capital expenditures in connection with our National railways without consulting parliament and without obtaining the proper authority, and that is what we complain of on this side of the House. We do not suggest that the railway was unnecessary, that it will not be of advantage; we object to the method that was adopted to secure its construction and the deception that was practised upon parliament.

We are considering a motion in connection with the Speech from the Throne, and the presentation of a Speech from the Throne necessarily suggests a consideration of the conditions under which that Speech is introduced. —the conditions as they exist in the government, the conditions as they exist in parliament, and the conditions as they exist in the country as a whole. And I think we are all agreed that at this time these conditions are peculiar; they are indeed exceptional. They are conditions such as have not occurred before in the history of Canada and such as we hope will never occur again. What are the conditions in the present situation? We have a Speech presented to the House of Commons through the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General by a government without a head—a headless, spineless skeleton of a government. We have this Speech presented to us for consideration by a government supported by a minority party in this House, and the Speech deals in the most casual and superficial way with the important issues that were discussed during the campaign.

Let us make a brief review and see if we can arrive at an accurate estimate of present conditions. The last parliament consisted of 235 members. The government of the day was supported by a majority over all other parties and groups. It is true it was a small majority, but it was a reliable majority. The official opposition consisted of 51 members. The group to our left numbered between 60 and 70 members, all of whom were friendly to and were really allies of the government. The Prime Minister decided to dissolve parliament, although it had more than one year to run. Speaking of conditions as they then existed, he said at Richmond Hill:

> That brings me to the situation with which at the moment the government is faced. As a government we can carry on until 1927 if we so desire. As I have already said, I have not the least doubt we shall be able to command such support as we all along have had in the House of Commons at another session; but shall we be able to do more than that? That is the question I have put to everyone of my colleagues in the government and to not a few of the members. It is a question I now put to you who have honoured me with your representation in the House of Commons. It is a question I put to the electorate of this country. Is it sufficient that as a government we should continue in office, drawing our indemnities and salaries as members and ministers and enjoying the other fruits of office when great national questions press for solution, with which for want of an adequate majority in parliament we are unable to cope.

And he added:

> I would say, further, I do not believe that any of the four can be dealt with effectively by a government which is not supported by a substantial majority in the House of Commons. Group government and minority government may be inevitable in transitional phases of our political history, but neither is the kind of government wherewith to achieve great reforms. In both Great Britain and the United States the electorate has shown within the very recent past that it wishes no more of either form, that what each believes the existing situation requires is a national party representative of all parts of the country, sufficiently strong in the representation it sends to parliament to ensure the carrying out by the government of its plans and policies.

A few days later, after dissolution had taken place, he said:

> If we were again faced with the situation that confronted us in the last four years, I should ask for another dissolution of parliament to get this matter straightened out, until we got a majority sufficient to meet the country's needs.

Then he proceeded:

> Parliament was dissolved because the government felt it could not bring in reforms, could do no more than draw salaries without a clear majority. If we should ever be faced again with conditions such as obtained in the last four years, I would not hesitate to again call upon the Governor General to dissolve parliament, and would continue until some party secures a majority to enable it to carry on the affairs of the country.

So, Mr. Speaker, we had an election called by the Prime Minister at his own time and on terms which he himself laid down specifically and clearly. By his declaration on that occasion he entered into an implied, if not an expressed, contract with the country that if those conditions were not met he would no longer attempt to carry on. Well, Sir, we have had that election, and the conditions laid down by the Prime Minister as the only conditions upon which he would continue to hold office have not been met. Notwithstanding this fact, in the face of his failure to secure the endorsement of his government at the polls, which he said was absolutely essential to him and his party, he stills clings to office. The election has demonstrated that we have a government absolutely unable to carry on—and worse still, without the moral courage to resign.

What is the position of our friends to the left? They have been returned as a party of only 24 members. To-day the Progressive and the other minority groups are sitting on the safety valve of public opinion, and the inevitable explosion will destroy them and their allies. But what is the position of the official opposition, Sir? It has come back with its membership more than doubled. From the way the people voted is not their intention perfectly clear? I submit there is no doubt whatever that the government got its mandate on October 29—not to carry on, but to resign.

If the government expected to be supported in the new parliament they should have laid down conditions something like the following before they decided on dissolution: We have at the present time a majority in the House of Commons. We are going to dissolve parliament because we cannot carry on successfully. If we get a smaller representation in a larger House as a result of the impending election, we will endeavour to carry on. Instead of not believing in group government, we will perpetuate it—we will perpetuate minority government. No, Sir, the people never voted for minority government; indeed they never voted for government by any combination of minorities. Their intention was perfectly plain. But what has happened? Instead of a government with a clear mandate, and with a strong majority to carry out that mandate, we have a Liberal-Progressive-Labour-Independent government attempting to carry on. We have a government that cannot function. On this side of the House we have the largest party, and according to all well-established constitutional practice, we are entitled to be called upon to form an administration. We have a deadlock parliament, we have an anxious people, all because this government took a false step, and refuse to abide by the conditions which it imposed in the election, and because it refuses to recognize the verdict of the people on the 29th of October last.

Then, Mr. Speaker, this House is called and parliament meets, and precedents are cited as to the course we should adopt. The volume and the tenor of the precedents cited are all in the same direction. The government and those supporting them say: We will sweep away and disregard all these precedents. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is the only way for the government to deal with these precedents—just sweep them aside—for if the government paid any attention to them, as they were all against them, they would be unable to carry on. Then they say: We will make our own precedents. Mr. Speaker, we have gone out into the wilderness, and we are now wandering there; this parliament is not getting anywhere, this government is not getting anywhere, and we will not get anywhere until we return to the safe, straight path of constitutional practice as shown in the precedents of the past. Some of our friends tell us: Use your common sense. Very good advice, of course. Well, my common sense tells me that this government was defeated on the 29th of October; I think the common sense of most members of the House leads them to the same conclusion, and the common sense of the Canadian people undoubtedly leads them to that conclusion.

The Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) seemed to fear the consequences if the government resigned; he was fearful as to what might happen if the leader of our party were called on to form a government. Fear, Mr. Speaker, is not an attribute of a strong man. The Solicitor General is not a weak man; he is strong, but his fear in this instance seemed to be almost as great as his fear during the last campaign of the consequences of the next war with Turkey. But his fear was just as groundless. I am sure that nothing serious would have happened; on the contrary, advantage to Canada I think would have resulted from the government having resigned and the leader of this party having been called on to form a government.

That brings me to a consideration of the Speech itself. It is a rather remarkable document. It is in some respects more like the last will of a dying testator, a will that had been brought about by influences imposed upon that testator, and a will that shows that some of the property or assets had been overlooked, because we have no reference in the Speech to the question of Senate reform—surely, a very valuable asset to the Prime Minister in his campaign in some parts of Canada.

Some paragraphs of the Speech from the Throne are not open to any objection whatever. There is one referring to the death of Queen Alexandra, the bereavement in the royal family. The royal family occupy a very high, a very exalted place in the esteem and affection of the Canadian people and of the British people in all parts of the empire, and it is perfectly fitting and proper that there should be a reference in the Speech to this bereavement. The crown of the King of England rests very securely upon his head, notwithstanding the convulsions of the late war, and British institutions are as firmly established, in fact, perhaps more firmly established than they were before that catastrophe which shook the world to its foundations. Britain is paying her debts, even if she does not collect her own from those who are indebted to her. She is reducing her taxation and continuing to hold her place of leadership among the nations of the world in the conferences of the League of Nations. The Prince of Wales, noble representative of the royal family, visiting outlying parts of the empire and distant parts of the world, is carrying with him the goodwill and sympathy of a mighty empire, and begetting for himself and for that empire sympathy and goodwill in all parts of the world. In some respects he is perhaps the best ambassador the British Empire has.

5 p.m.

The Speech refers to the growing prosperity of Canada, a subject upon which there has been a good deal of controversy, one in respect to which there is considerable difference of opinion. The Speech, however, does not, as is usual, express any thanksgiving to the Almighty for contributing to this increased prosperity. Perhaps that was deliberately omitted, perhaps it was intentional, because if proper credit is given in that direction there is very little credit left for any other source.

Reference is also made to our export trade. Of course, it is desirable to have a large export trade, providing it is an export trade of the right character, providing it is not an excessive export trade of the raw materials which should be retained and manufactured in Canada. We have, of course, a large export trade of agricultural products, due to good crops and to good prices, for which this government is not entitled to the slighest iota of credit. But it is entitled, Mr. Speaker, to criticism for not having adopted a policy that would retain for development in Canada the largest possible amount of our natural resources, and that would not permit the export of these natural resources until they had been finished as far as possible.

There is also a reference to the increased earnings of our railways. These, of course, are encouraging, and they are due in no small measure to the excellent crop to which reference has been made.

Reductions in taxation are mentioned, but I think the Canadian people when they look around will have difficulty in finding in a practical way any reductions in taxation in Canada. Our record in that respect does not compare favourably with that of the adjoining country or of other countries of the world. We have all the taxes that we were paying when this government came into power, and we have in addition some new ones, and we do not see much sign of relief.

The next subject that I shall deal with is immigration. Mr. Speaker, the history of the last four years in this important field, so far as Canada is concerned, has been one of disappointing failure. It is really a tragedy when we think of it; when we attempt to review it; when we think of what has happened and of what might have been. The four years during which it should have been easy to get the most desirable immigrants from Europe have been allowed to pass with a minimum of accomplishment in this direction. Following the war, conditions, as we all know, were unsettled in Europe. Expert workmen were prepared to leave their shattered homes and seek employment and occupation in other countries, particularly in Canada. Yet these have not been secured to this country. We have not been able to get the numbers of immigrants which other parts of the empire have obtained. We have not been able to settle these people on our lands, and have not been able to get any adequate or proper return for the many millions of dollars we have expended in this direction. There are too many agencies, too many branches, working in connection with this immigration question. What we need is a consolidation of these efforts. What we want is a policy such as was outlined from this side of the House the other day by the hon. member for Victoria, B.C. (Mr. Tolmie), a policy that I am sure must commend itself to all who have made a study of this important question. We need all the immigrants we can get from the British Isles. They at least understand one, and in some cases two, of our official languages. They are familiar with our institutions, and with our habits, they can readily adapt themselves to conditions in Canada. We should adopt, as the hon. member for Victoria, B.C., said, a colonization scheme that will settle these people upon our lands.

But the saddest feature of it all, Mr. Speaker, is the emigration of our people during these years to the United States of America. Over 500,000 of them have gone to the neighbouring republic, and what is the use of bringing immigrants from Europe to Canada at great expense when we fail to adopt a policy that will retain our own Canadian people, and provide them with work and wages in our own country. That, I think, is the saddest part of this whole question. And yet we on this side have been imploring, even urging, the adoption of a policy which will give these men employment in Canada, that will give them work and a pay-roll, that will stop this leak of our best young men to the country to the south of us, and at the same time will assist in solving our railway problem and our industrial problem.

The next item in the Speech from the Throne with which I will deal is rural credits. And here I wish to point out that this question has been pressed upon the government by those who have been particularly interested in it for some years. But it has been evaded by the government. They have trifled with it; and last session we had the farce of legislation presented for our consideration which simply had the effect of assisting the provinces to do something which they already had the power to do. Of course nothing came of it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think we must go back a bit and consider the provisions of the British North America Act in connection with this matter. The Fathers of Confederation had a conception as to a division of powers between the provinces and the Dominion, and that act provides that the provinces shall deal with matters of local concern and with property and civil rights in their respective jurisdictions. We have in several of the provinces legislation dealing with this question of rural credits. I submit that it is one primarily and principally, if not exclusively, for action by the provincial government. The conditions in the various provinces differ, and the laws regarding real property, of course, are different in the several provinces, or at least may be so. And all the Dominion should be asked to do is to pass any enabling legislation that may be necessary to permit individual corporations, or the provinces themselves, to deal with this matter in the light of their local conditions, with a view to their local requirements, and in harmony with existing legislation upon the subject. Funds should not be provided by the Dominion government for this purpose. If such action is taken we shall have difficulty and we shall have conflict of jurisdiction. Furthermore I submit that if we enter into this field we shall necessarily have to create a new organization and incur much added expense. Therefore, my contention is that we here should only pass such enabling legislation as may be necessary to empower the provinces to deal with this question themselves.

Then, Mr. Speaker, the next subject dealt with in the Speech is that of the tariff, a very large, a very wide, a very complicated subject. But it is not necessary for us on this side of the House to say much upon this question. The Canadian people know where we stand; they know what our policy is. We went to the country boldly and fearlessly upon that policy with 51 followers and we came back with 116, a magnificent endorsement of our fiscal programme, which after all was the leading issue in the late campaign. Hon. gentlemen opposite picture us as a high tariff party. They did that during the campaign, and if the result is as I have stated it to be, then it is pretty clear evidence to me that the Canadian people are very generally in favour of a fairly high tariff at this time. But the Speech from the Throne contains all sorts of meaningless expressions, such as that a general increase in the customs tariff would prove detrimental to the country's continued prosperity, and prejudicial to national unity. Well, Mr. Speaker, with me agriculture comes first in this country. There is no occupation that is attended with greater hazard, and where the returns for the industry employed in that occupation are smaller than they are in the case of agriculture, and I contend, Sir, that we have ample evidence before this House at the present time—and have had it for months, yes for years—that this industry needs additional protection. I contend, Sir, that there is ample evidence before this House, and has been for months—yes, for years—that this industry needs additional protection. If anything were needed to convince us of that, it is the representations that have been sent to the government on behalf of the different agricultural societies in this country from time to time as to the effect of the operation of the Australian treaty. That treaty, which was brought into force on the 1st of October, 1925, and was subsequently extended by order in council to apply to New Zealand, I opposed when it came up in the House. I felt it my duty to do so in the interests of agriculture. I foresaw that under its provisions the dairy industry would be seriously affected by the imports that would inevitably follow, and the happenings of the last few weeks have abundantly established the soundness of that view. We have an import into Canada of over 2,000,000 pounds of butter from Australia, and that has had the effect of depressing the price of butter to the Canadian farmer at a time of the year when his cost of production is greatest and the cost of production in Australia is low. In other words, this competition takes place when it is summer in Australia and winter in Canada.

I think I should put on record a comparison between the rates of duty prevailing against Canadian products and those against foreign products that come into Canada. Under the provisions of the Australian treaty butter comes into Canada under a duty of one cent a pound, but Canadian butter going into Australia faces a duty of six cents a pound. Cheese from Australia comes in free, while Canadian cheese going into Australia pays six cents a pound. Eggs come from Australia free of duty, but meet a duty of eighteen cents a dozen if we send them from Canada to Australia. Fresh and smoked meats coming from Australia to Canada pay one-half cent a pound, but if we attempt to send those articles to Australia we are met by a duty of five cents a pound. We must bear in mind that in connection with butter and perhaps other farm products of Australia there is a bonus, or something which is the equivalent of a bonus, either from the public funds or from other sources, for their export to Canada. The handicap under which this Canadian industry is placed, therefore, is apparent; there is an unfair advantage in favour of its Australian and New Zealand competitors, and the failure of the government to take into consideration the prime duty of protecting the agricultural interests of this country is a matter for censure.

The United States tariff against Canadian products should also be considered in this connection. Wheat going to the United States pays 42 cents a bushel. Our duty against American wheat is 12 cents a bushel. Corn going from Canada to the United States pays 15 cents a bushel, but United States corn comes into Canada free. Wheat flour pays $2.04 a barrel going to the United States and 50 cents a barrel coming into Canada. Hay going into the United States pays $4 a ton, but American hay coming into Canada pays $2 a ton. Fruits pay 35 per cent going into the United States and 25 per cent coming here. Butter pays 8 cents a pound going to the United States and 4 cents a pound coming to Canada. Cheese pays 5 cents a pound going to the United States but only 3 cents a pound coming to Canada. Eggs pay 8 cents a dozen going to the United States but only 3 cents a dozen coming here. I contend that this is unfair and unjust and that the interests of agriculture in this country are not being looked after and protected by this government as they should be. I wish to point out the policy of this party as expressed by our leader, that when he comes into power the very first schedule of the tariff to be raised will be that relating to agricultural products.

It was said that the issue in the province of Quebec was low tariff. The address of the member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Doucet) indicates that there was something low in connection with that campaign—and it was not the tariff; I think it was the tactics that were low in the province of Quebec. I regret very much that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has not seen fit to rebuke the statements or utterances which have been placed on Hansard by some of his followers in that province, and I ask him to do so at the first opportunity. If he does so, his eloquent speeches in other parts of Canada in favour of the union and the necessity for national unity will have very much greater effect.

Now Mr. Speaker the question of the tariff opens up a very wide range of discussion, and we will of course have an opportunity of dealing with the subject when the budget is brought down. The only other matter to which I wish to give some consideration at this time is the proposed appointment of an advisory tariff board, which was referred to in the Speech from the Throne. What is to be the scope and power of this board? Is it simply a device to enable the government to sidestep this question in the House of Commons? I submit that before any tariff board is appointed this House should decide the principle upon which that commission is to undertake the investigation. Are we to have a tariff that is framed on a protective basis, as we advocate it should be? Are we to have a low tariff, or are we to have a tariff for revenue? Before this tariff board is appointed and called upon to function, these questions and principles must be decided in the House. Let me refer to two incidents which I think are very important in this connection. The first is the resolution passed by the legislature of Saskatchewan in the year 1923; and I think it is relevant now in view of the fact that the gentleman who has been premier of that province has become a member of the government. I refer to the Hon. Mr. Dunning. The resolution that was passed on March 1, 1923, in the legislature of Saskatchewan reads:

> Resolved, that in the opinion of this assembly, it is the duty of the government of Canada to introduce legislation which shall have for its effect the following:
> (1) An immediate and substantial all-round reduction of the customs tariff.
> (2) The reduction of the customs duty on goods imported from Great Britain to one-half of the rates charged under the general tariff, and that further gradual uniform reductions be made to the remaining tariff on British imports that will insure complete free trade between Great Britain and Canada.

That was the view of that gentleman at that time. I think I should refer to the speech of the Prime Minister in this House on the budget on May 15, 1924. Speaking on that occasion, shortly after the passing of the resolution to which I have referred, the Prime Minister said:

> No more tariffs based on the principle of protection—as set forth in the resolution of the Tory party, moved in this debate too late to be accepted—but a tariff based on the principle of revenue.
> That was "our policy" in the past—the Laurier-Fielding policy. The words can have no other meaning. That is our policy to-day—the policy of the Liberal party—proceeding step by step towards the goal of greater freedom in matters of trade, never imposing a duty for protection's sake, but always acting on the principle or the basis of a tariff for revenue and revenue only. I repeat this statement in the hearing of hon. members and before this country, this is the position of the Liberal party. We believe in proceeding step by step. We believe when it comes to a question of imposing a duty in having duties framed on a tariff for revenue basis and not on the basis of protection.

That is the statement of the Prime Minister in this House as recorded in Hansard. What is the statement now? What is the position of the government now? Is it still the same? Are they opposed to protection? Is their tariff to be one on a revenue basis? These questions must all be determined before any tariff commission can properly function.

Our position on this matter is perfectly clear. We say that the tariff should be distinctly protective in its character—protection for agriculture, for industry, for labour, for all the interests of Canada on a fair, sound and reasonable basis. That is the policy outlined by my leader; that is the policy for which I stand. That is the policy to which I proclaim my faith and in which I say that the people of Canada expressed their faith on the 29th October last.

Some reference has been made to trade treaties and these have been so ably dealt with by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) that it is not necessary for me to go over them again. I desire, however, to point out that in every one of those treaties there has been a substantial loss of revenue to Canada; there has been a substantial decrease of exports to the countries with which those treaties have been made, and there has also in every case been an increase of imports from those countries to the detriment of Canada. We import annually at least $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 worth of farm products that should and could be produced and provided by the Canadian farmer for the Canadian people. We import annually at least $500,000,000 of manufactured products that could and should be produced in Canada for the benefit of the Canadian people. As a matter of fact the government has been tinkering with and nibbling at this tariff until it has unsettled industry and caused capital to lose confidence and to hesitate to embark upon new enterprises. It has closed factories and converted others into simply distributing depots for the products of other countries. It has driven hundreds of thousands of our good Canadian artisans and workmen to go unwillingly to the United States to seek and find there employment which was denied them but which should have been provided for them at home. I again proclaim my faith in my leader and his policy, in the protective policy which he has laid down and which has been so splendidly approved and endorsed by the Canadian people. When a tariff commission is appointed I hope it will be appointed under his leadership, his auspices, and that it will have a protective basis to work on. Why have we delayed so long? We have been told that this was coming. For three or four years the creation of such a commission has been talked about, and all that time there has been uncertainty and inaction. I strongly suspect that this suggested tariff commission is just a device to evade a fair, square, honest dealing with this important question owing to the peculiar complexion of this House and owing to the fact that the statements of policy on the part of the government are so conflicting, confusing and contradictory that it does not know what course to take in this matter.

The next question I want to deal with is the Hudson's Bay railway. The remarkable feature of the Speech from the Throne in its reference to this matter is its intimation that this important railway is to be constructed forthwith—right away. It cannot wait. But all the reasons that now exist for the construction of the Hudson Bay railway existed for four years in the last parliament; all the pressure that could possibly have been brought to bear on the subject by those interested was applied during that period. The Hudson Bay railway is a project in respect to which we have had a great deal of discussion and debate and upon which there is conflicting information and difference of opinion. Personally I am not satisfied that this railway should be completed, but apparently it is of great importance to the western provinces. They seem to be vitally interested in it and to have faith in it, and I would go a long way toward doing anything reasonable, anything proper, anything calculated to give them a measure of relief, providing that it could be done consistently with the financial resources of this country. But we are at this time under a very heavy burden in connection with our railway commitments, and we cannot lightly or without sufficient information embark upon any enterprise that will mean a large expenditure of money. We are entitled to know in this House whether this means an expenditure of $3,000,000 or $30,000,000. Does it mean simply the completion of the railway to the Hudson bay, or the completion of extensive and expensive terminals? Does it mean extensive dredging, lighthouses, wharves, elevators and all those costly additions that go to make a port on the Hudson bay and to make navigation possible? The House should be informed by the government what this "forthwith" commitment means, and whether it is $3,000,000 or $30,000,000.

Now I have given this matter my best thought and attention and I am going to make a suggestion. As I say, the western provinces are deeply interested in it and I should like to see their hopes realized. I understand that between $20,000,000 and $25,000,000 have already been invested in that enterprise and the government is considering turning over to the western provinces their natural resources. Why can we not turn over the Hudson Bay railway to those provinces along with these natural resources? Let them take the $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 which we have put into it. Let us say to them, "We make a present of this to you and we hope the enterprise will be a success. Do the best you can with it." And let us incorporate in this House a company, not a dummy company, and capitalize it for what has already been spent in this investment, together with such other sum as may be necessary to complete the undertaking, and hand that capital over to one, two or three of the western provinces as they may care to take hold of it among themselves. If the three of them will not join, then give it to two, and if two of them do not care to undertake it and one will, let that one have it. Let them construct the railway and contribute on their part such capital as may be necessary for the purpose and contribute to any deficits there may be in connection with the operation of it in proportion to their holdings in it; and let them share the profits in the same way. In that way the western provinces would secure the construction of an enterprise in which they are vitally interested. They would have as a free gift the millions of money already contributed by Canada, and they would control the operation of the road on such a basis and with such rates as would be to their advantage. I offer that suggestion for consideration and I sincerely hope that in any case some way may be found that will meet the views of the west without committing us to any large expenditure at this time.

The Speech from the Throne suggests the appointment of a commission to deal with Maritime rights. This government has what I would call a commission policy: it seems that when anything troublesome or difficult arises the government appoints a commission to deal with it and thereby to gain time for itself. It was my pleasure this summer to visit the Maritime provinces and I endeavoured as far as possible to improve the time I spent there by becoming familiar with their problems. I want to testify to the kindly hospitality of those people and to their loyalty, their patriotism and their devotion to Canada as a whole. They have, as they feel and sincerely believe, some grievances and those grievances are in my opinion capable of adjustment to the satisfaction of the Maritime provinces and to the advantage of the Dominion at large. I am extremely sympathetic with their situation, and after listening to the addresses of the gentlemen who represent the Maritime provinces in this House, I submit that we do not need any commission to find out what those grievances are and what the people down there desire by way of remedy. Their difficulties are in part similar to the difficulties that are to be encountered in the rest of Canada; for one thing they are suffering for a want of reasonable protection in connection with some of their industries, as they have said. Their other troubles have largely to do with railway rates. They are able to explain the situation, they are able to state quite clearly just what is wrong with the Maritime provinces; and surely a government that had in the last parliament sixteen supporters from the province of Nova Scotia does not need to appoint a commission to find out what their grievances are, what disadvantages they are under, and what remedies they require.

The Speech from the Throne is remarkable for some things which it does not contain as well as for what it does contain. It does not contain anything that is in the nature of a policy to deal with the coal question as it affects the whole of Canada. This question has been discussed at different times in the last two or three years and the Canadian people have arrived at the point where they want to use Canadian coal. And they are prepared to pay a little more for Canadian coal than for American coal. The people are sick and tired of all this jockeying, of all these strikes, and of the fluctuations in price and supply and, as I say, they are willing to use the Canadian product even at a little greater cost to themselves. The government have known this and yet they have brought down no policy. I submit that it was their duty to do so, and I venture to say that the policy as outlined by my leader (Mr. Meighen) is the one which, in harmony with his other proposals, will bring about the use of Canadian coal by the Canadian people. Let us protect the east and the west from the handicap of distance as we protect the manufacturer from the handicap of mass production and cheap labour abroad, and as we should protect the farmer from the cheap products of other countries. It is just an application of that general all-Canadian policy which, if it were properly worked out, would I am sure solve our difficulties. There would be no trouble in getting a coal supply in Canada for all our requirements, with advantage to the Canadian people and to Canadian labour.

Nothing is said in the Speech about the very important question of hydro-electric power on the St. Lawrence. This has been before the government for consideration for some years and I press again, as I have done on previous occasions, for a bold, courageous dealing with the matter and for immediate action, so far as it is within the power of the government. In connection with the Chicago water steal, we are writing letters but we do not seem to be getting anywhere, and on behalf of all interests along the St. Lawrence river I urge the government to take every possible measure that it can to prevent further injury to the ports and the navigation interests of Canada. One would have thought, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the information which the government had and of the disclosures which have been made that something would have been said in the Speech from the Throne about the frauds practised upon our customs revenue, and that the government would have taken measures to prevent their continuance.

There is also, of course, Senate reform, which is conspicuous by its absence. The country anxiously awaits the policy and the attitude of the government in this connection.

It is true that we have a supplementary Speech from the Throne, as it were, in answer to a question put to the government by an hon. member—we are to have old age pensions. I think Canada can well allow old age pensions to stand over for a while. This policy would probably entail an expenditure of twenty-five or thirty million dollars per annum and I submit this is not the time to impose on the country such a heavy financial burden.

Now, Sir, I claim to represent labour in my constituency, both organized and unorganized. If I understand the attitude of labour, it is favourable to a revision of the tariff that will ensure employment of our own people at home at remunerative wages. The member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) got into discussion with the member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) this afternoon, and I think both hon. gentlemen claim to speak exclusively for labour. I wish to put on Hansard a letter which recently appeared in an Ottawa paper, written by E. E. Sheppard, of North Bay, and leave those two hon. members to deal with it. It is dated February 9, 1926, and is as follows:

Sir:—As an ardent advocate of the principles of Labour, I wish to protest at the course now being taken by two gentlemen in the House of Commons who presume to speak for Labour. Some years ago in the province of Ontario we had certain gentlemen who claimed they represented Labour in this province. They affiliated themselves with other political bodies for the purpose of creating a Government in this province. This association did Labour in this province inestimable harm. Labour is suffering to-day from the effect of it. And it is with this thought in mind that I wish to raise my voice in protest to the course now being pursued by Mr. Woodsworth and Mr. Heaps.

I believe those gentlemen owe their seats in Parliament not so much on account of any great policy they have proposed or advocated in the interests of Labour as to their ability to capitalize, or cash in, on the misery and disappointment brought about by their own mismanagement of the Winnipeg strike, and that prejudice rather than good judgment is the guiding spirit of their present course. And should they continue to follow this course Labour in justice to herself should absolutely disown them.

My objection to those gentlemen is that they have associated themselves with a low tariff government and with the grain growers' movement in the west, which was a blow at the very heart of Labour. Either the Progressive movement politically in this country must be smothered or Labour will be forced backward until a condition of serfdom will eventually absorb the working classes. There is no common ground on which Labour can meet the Progressive on his present policy.

Is it not a fact that Labour's ambition and principle is to provide the members of the various crafts with remunerative employment, with a chance to earn a livelihood in their own country, by developing the talents that the Lord endowed them with that they are entitled to life, liberty and pursuit of happiness? But instead of proposing or supporting a policy of this principle, the two above named gentlemen go along with our friends the Progressives, who, unable to make progress themselves in their daily occupations, are determined to hold back every other element in the country.

How can Mr. Woodsworth or Mr. Heaps look honestly into the faces of the fathers and mothers in their own constituency and tell them they are using their positions as members of parliament in supporting a policy which denies Canadian sons and daughters an opportunity to develop in their own country their inherited talents?

They support a policy which will deny the Canadian an opportunity of selling his products in a foreign country, because of that country's tariff against us, and which will allow the foreigner the right to dump his excess production in the Canadian market, thus either forcing the Canadian out of employment and to emigrate to a foreign country, or of accepting wages which do not permit him to maintain the standard of livelihood aimed at by Canadians.

E. E. SHEPPARD.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he knows the writer of that communication?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I have just given his name and address.

Mr. HEAPS: But does the hon. gentleman know him personally?

Mr. MANION: I do, Mr. Speaker. He is a conductor on the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway.

Mr. HEAPS: I may inform the hon. member for Leeds that the constituency which I have the honour to represent—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEAPS: I may state that I have received several resolutions from my constituents approving of the stand I have taken in this House.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): The sentiments contained in this letter express exactly my own sentiments, and also, I think, the sentiments of labour in the constituency of Leeds. If my hon. friend will investigate, I think he will find that the writer, in fact, expresses the sentiments of labour throughout Canada. I resent the claim of the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) to speak on behalf of labour in the constituency of Leeds. I purpose to represent their interests in this House to the best of my ability.

In concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, may I again refer to the peculiar conditions in this House? The government gave its solemn undertaking that if it did not obtain a majority of the members returned to this House it would not attempt to carry on. In direct violation of that undertaking and in face of the verdict of the people it is still attempting to carry on. The eyes of the people are upon this government and this parliament. The people are anxious and alarmed. They desire—they demand that this political paralysis shall cease. They cannot understand why a small and discredited minority can combine with other minority groups in this House to defeat their will. During the last few days we have heard of the probability of closure being resorted to by our friends opposite. Well, Sir, this so-called government cannot closure the thoughts of the people. Let me tell hon. gentlemen sitting on the treasury benches that the people, including many of their own followers, are very much dissatisfied with the effort of this impotent, headless, spineless skeleton of a government to cling to office, and are insistently demanding its resignation. For they realize there can be no improvement in national conditions until this enfeebled government either resigns voluntarily or is driven from power.

We all desire, Mr. Speaker, a united Canada. We desire that Canada shall be united in bonds of sympathy from one ocean to the other. We desire that goodwill shall prevail. We desire that there shall be a common understanding and a common undertaking. We all deplore the dangers of sectional policies and of sectional appeals, and there will be no restored confidence, there will be no improved conditions in Canada, until we return to the administration of our affairs on the principles of responsible government.

I submit, in conclusion, that the Conservative party, the largest party in this House, has the policy and the programme that will unite Canada in one common bond of sympathy, in one common undertaking, and that the resignation of this government and the setting up of a government under the leadership of my hon. leader will restore confidence in Canada as nothing else will. I claim, Mr. Speaker, that he is entitled to lay his platform, his programme and his policy before this House as the leader of the largest group in the House, and that if that policy does not meet with the approval of this House, as I am sure it will, he is entitled to appeal from this House to the Canadian people, and I say here and now that that is the proper course to adopt, and I can promise you, Sir, that we will abide loyally by the decision of the Canadian people.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, as one of the members from the city of Toronto I wish to say that in none of the nine provinces are you more honoured and respected than you are in the province of Ontario. You, Sir, have devoted your life to the public; you have graced many spheres of activity, and it is no wonder that you are honoured and respected in the province from which I come. In the constituency of Toronto Northwest, which I have the honour to represent, many veteran soldiers reside; the Christie Street hospital is situated within its precincts. The soldiers there recall that you gave your only son—a splendid young man—at the age of eighteen years to the service of his country. He could not get to the front too quickly because he thought the war would be over before he had done his part, and he went to the front as a lieutenant. When he succumbed to injuries received on the field of battle it was a great loss to Canada that such a gallant young type of Canadian should fall for his country.

I regret, as one of the members from the Toronto district, that the late Minister of Railways and Canals, Mr. Graham, has not been more generously treated by his party. In Mr. Graham the people of this country had a public servant who served the citizens of Canada with fidelity and with zeal for the public welfare. We in Toronto have learned to appreciate the worth of Mr. Graham because he was largely responsible for the solution of the viaduct problem on our waterfront, having given us a great deal of help to attain this end in the parliamentary session of 1924. I do not think it creditable to the party system of government that he should have been treated in such an unsportsmanlike manner.

We on this side of the House are a very happy family. We have a leader that every Conservative member and every Conservative, I believe, in the country, is proud of. He has given his best years and his great talents to Canada's service and given them in unstinted measure. Owing to his devoted service in behalf of Canada, and as a result of that generous public service, he is to-day a comparatively poor man, and I resent a statement in a paper in my own city—a city in which there is no bigotry but rather a manifestation of real public spirit—in which it attacked the leader of our party. When the Conservative party wants a head it will not go to the Evening Star, a newspaper which has been the hangman and undertaker for every party it has supported or is supporting. This is the same journal which tried to crucify Sir Adam Beck and the hydro-electric movement in Ontario. It is the same which ridiculed the late Sir James Whitney. It did its best to wreck the Hardy-Ross government, and with its championship of reciprocity in 1911 it helped to defeat the late revered leader of the Liberal party, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, a statesman whose name will always be respected in Ontario. The same paper went over to the Conservative party and forced its views on Sir William Hearst in reference to the Ontario Temperance Act, in an attempt to solve the temperance problem. I am grateful that I am not indebted to it for any support. The Toronto Evening Star also forced itself on the Raney-Drury government—the so-called Labour-Farmer government—and you all know what happened to them.

I wish to refer to a statement made in this House a month ago as to a statement alleged to have been made with respect to the soldiers by the premier of the province of Quebec, the Hon. Mr. Taschereau. I was sorry the hon. member made the statement, because Mr. Taschereau is one of the most progressive premiers in Canada. He is a great Canadian; he has always shown himself to be a fair-minded and honourable man and has invariably received a hearty welcome when he visited the city of Toronto. I learned with sorrow that Mr. Taschereau was quoted, or misquoted, as saying in a public statement that 60,000 Canadians were buried in France because the head of the majority group in this House, the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, had signed the Military Service Act. I come from a city which sent 60,000 soldiers to the Great war. These men enlisted and went to the war, but not under the Military Service Act; ninety-nine per cent of them went voluntarily to the front. Five thousand soldiers from the city of Toronto are lying dead in Flanders' Fields. There are few of 60,000 who enlisted under the Military Service Act buried in Flanders or in France; very few of that glorious 60,000 were conscripted. I am very sorry to see that statement appear in the press, because it is not correct.

I do not see very many of my Progressive friends here to-night. This afternoon they all walked out of the chamber—all but one or two. I say that their free trade policy has been responsible for the exodus which has occurred from the Dominion of Canada during the past few years. The only difference that I see between a Liberal and a Progressive is what I would call a distinction without a difference, or a difference without a distinction: after all it is the difference between Tweedledum and Tweedledee. A Progressive is only a Liberal in a hurry. He wants to go ahead with a hop, step and a jump, as we see by the policy of that group in regard to the Hudson Bay railway, marketing, transportation, and so on. I think the group system of government in this country has failed. It is now a relic of the past, and I hope that in a very few years, or—better, in a very few weeks or months—we shall be able to restore to the country government by party, responsible government by the people, for the people and of the people. The London Times, commenting on the late election in Canada, says:

> "Things have changed since the 29th October. The first few days of the session have sufficed to prove to Mackenzie King that the Progressives are in reality an advance wing of the Liberal party, or so he told the electors of Prince Albert; while a sufficient number of Progressives who have scrambled back to safety have found it convenient to postpone that infusion of moral courage and idealism so long as the necessity to face the electors again is postponed at the same time."

That is correct. Let me point out to the Progressives that just as Izaak Walton was the author of The Compleat Angler, so Mackenzie King is the author of The Progressive Angler; and he is something of a fisherman himself. There are many good sportsmen among the different groups in the House, but as an angler for Progressives, Mackenzie King has few equals. He uses different bait to catch different fish. He used the waters of the Newmarket canal for some of his fishing, but when that canal ran dry he transferred his angling to the Hudson bay. The bait he uses in the angling works admirably; in one catch he has landed the whole species of the Progressive group. There is no use in anybody else attempting to equal him as an angler for that type of fish. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) tried to fish in those waters and had about landed five, but they soon got off his hook and line, never to return. I told him he could never catch any fish in those Progressive waters. A fisherman from the Drury government, Manning Doherty, tried his hand at the so-called fishing in the Progressive waters, but he did not catch a fish during the whole four weeks he was here. A very fine young gentleman, the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon), whom everybody likes and respects, said that I was the Tory of Tories on this side. I admit I am a Tory of the old school. I would not call myself a Progressive; I would not be so vainglorious as to do that. For that matter I do not see why the members at the other end of the chamber remain in that corner of the House, because their proper place is on the other side. There is no use in their playing "puss in the corner" down there any more. I am a Tory of the old school; a Tory I was born and a Tory I will die. I am not a Tory here to-day and away to-morrow; I will be a Tory for the rest of my days, and I am endeavouring to do what I can for a good cause. I say to my hon. friends in the Progressive group that I, as one of the humble members from the Toronto district, stand by my principles whether in office or out of office. I would rather see the Conservative party out of office than see them violate the principles which the Conservatives stood for in the country—the same policy from coast to coast, the policy of protection for every native industry. I would far rather see the Conservative party stand by its principles than make any bid for the support of hon. members to my left, who are so far apart from us and from our principles. I would rather see the party stay in opposition until doomsday than go into office as a result of the abandonment of its principles. I have no desire to see it go into office in violation of the principles upon which it was elected.

I come from the province of Ontario, which is paying forty-four per cent of the taxes of the Dominion, as I will show in a few minutes when I read the return. Ontario finds itself in a very peculiar position without a single cabinet minister. The capital of this country in my opinion has been transferred from Ottawa to west of the Great Lakes. The late Sir Wilfrid Laurier used to- say that Ottawa was the Washington of the north; to-day Regina has become the capital of the country and the Washington of the north. Saskatchewan is contributing in taxes $3.76 per head of population, or one-eighth of one-per cent of the total contribution—and has become the capital of the country. Ontario is contributing $52.21 per head of population, or 44¼ per cent of the total, and the province of Quebec contributes $52.24 per head of population, or 35½ per cent of the total contribution. These three provinces in the centre of the Dominion are paying their share of the taxes. We have west of the Great Lakes the leaders of the three groups. We have the new Minister of Railways and Canals, (Mr. Dunning), the young Lochinvar who has recently come out of the west. He is at the head of a large spending department, although he has very little work to do because Sir Henry Thornton, the great Pooh-Bah, is the head of the department, not the Minister of Railways or the railway commission. We have from west of the Great Lakes, representing a western constituency, an estimable gentleman presiding over the Public Works department. We have also the suave Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) representing a western constituency. What have we in Ontario? Not a single minister sitting in the House to-day in this so-called government. We are supposed to have responsible government, but the old province of Ontario, which is suffering from a great many economic ills, is unrepresented in the cabinet. Why do the government not get a minister from Ontario? Why are they afraid to appoint one or two cabinet ministers from that province? We are in the seventh week of the session, and if that is the form of responsible government Ontario is to have I say there is a dark day dawning for the government. However, that seems to be the best they can do for Ontario.

I have a question on the order paper asking for the total revenue of Canada from all sources up to date, being information similar to what was brought down last year. This is a return showing who pays the taxes of Canada. It has been prepared very carefully by the Bureau of Statistics after three months of trouble in getting returns from all the provinces and municipalities. Let me explain that it takes about $346,000,000 collected by direct taxation to operate and maintain per annum the affairs of this country in all the different departments over a period of twelve months. Where does this cash contribution of $346,000,000 come from? It comes from direct taxation such as the income tax, sales tax, customs and excise taxes and many taxes like that. I do not refer to the $29,000,000 collected by the Post Office Department because that is a public utility and those who use the utility pay for it. Starting at the Maritime provinces, let us see what, taking the cash contribution and deducting the subsidy which each province gets, is the rate per capita contributed by the people of each of the nine provinces towards the government of this country:

Prince Edward Island—
Cash contribution..	$450,100 64
Subsidy..	421,051 98
Net contribution..	29,048 66
Population..	109,078
Contribution per head of population..	26½ cents

Then we come to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, those provinces that are setting up Maritime rights and that have some rights:

Nova Scotia—
Cash contribution..	$7,375,545 77
Subsidy..	661,866 66
Net contribution..	6,712,679 11
Population..	523,837
Contribution per head of population..	$12 81

Or a little less than two per cent of the total cash contribution.

New Brunswick—

Cash contribution	$7,363,859 26
Subsidy	666,765 76
Net contribution	6,697,093 50
Population	387,876
Contribution per head of population	$17 26½

Or a little less than two per cent of the total cash contribution.

Quebec—

Cash contribution	$125,619,285 34
Subsidy	2,256,419 88
Net contribution	123,352,865 46
Population	2,361,199
Contribution per head of population	$52 24

Or 35½ per cent of the total cash contribution. Then we come to Ontario, unrepresented as it is by cabinet ministers:

Ontario—

Cash contribution	$155,936,028 09
Subsidy	2,642,611 68
Net contribution	153,293,416 41
Population	2,933,662
Contribution per head of population	$52 21

Or 44½ per cent of the total contribution.

Manitoba—

Cash contribution	$18,055,350 58
Subsidy	1,485,118 56
Net contribution	16,570,212 02
Population	610,118
Contribution per head of population	$27 15

Or 4¾ per cent of the total cash contribution. Then we come to Saskatchewan that has great representation in the cabinet, that is going to give us a new order of affairs in this country and solve all the ills known to our people.

Saskatchewan—

Cash contribution	$4,753,158 39
Subsidy	1,901,061 00
Net contribution	2,852,097 39
Population	757,510
Contribution per head of population	$3 76

Or one-eighth of one per cent of the total money required to carry on the government of this country.

Alberta—

Cash contribution	$6,757,816 30
Subsidy	1,651,536 60
Net contribution	5,106,279 70
Population	588,454
Contribution per head of population	$8 67¾

British Columbia—

Cash contribution	$26,420,460 93
Subsidy	738,816 66
Net contribution	25,681,644 27
Population	524,582
Contribution per head of population	$48 95½

I might say right here that British Columbia contributes more to the cash contribution support of this country than the three prairie provinces combined. The same ratio holds good as regards the postal revenue.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Will the hon. member not admit that a large portion of the taxes paid by Quebec and Ontario are passed on to the prairie provinces by being added to the prices of the manufactured goods they buy?

Mr. CHURCH: Not so. It would take me an hour to explain that. We are paying a large proportion of the taxes of the people of the west. Ontario pays $52.21 per capita while Saskatchewan pays $3.76, Alberta, $8.67¾, and Manitoba, $27.15. These figures were not prepared by me; they were prepared in answer to a return by the Bureau of Statistics after three months' work and they are bringing these figures up-to-date for the last fiscal year. The figures I have cited are for 1924.

We have heard a great deal about the exodus of our population, the export of raw material and power and how that great loss to the country is connected with unemployment. There is one feature of the export problem which has, so far as I have been able to find out, never been touched on in this House. I refer to the export of the brains of the country, and that is far more important than material things. One of the main things that helped Germany to become the great industrial power she was, was scientific research. The German student is a department of the state to-day, he is conscripted often in the summer time to work in the laboratories in order to help in developing the resources of the country. He thus earns a living while helping to develop the country. As a student of technical education he helps scientific research. Let us take for example a young student like Dr. Banting and think of all he did for humanity and civilization just by studying and working in a laboratory. He started in a very small way and he often met discouragement, as every poor student does. If we should take a leaf out of the book of Germany for a national policy in regard to our students and, instead of letting them in the summer time work at such menial jobs as cooks and waiters and in other poorly paid positions of that kind, we should secure some of them for four or five months to help in the development of our resources, and the carrying on of national research. We would thus be doing something to develop Canada for the benefit of future generations.

The hon. member for North Renfrew (Mr. Cotnam) the other day said that 3,600 students from the University of Toronto have in recent years gone to the United States. His figures are not doubted because the matter has been referred to during the past few months in a series of articles in the Toronto University Monthly by many graduates and others, including one by Professor Thomas Loudon, on university and other matters. It is pointed out that in the departments of chemistry, electrical engineering and mechanical engineering of the School of Science, many young graduates and scientific men are going to the United States. It is all very well to lose raw material to the United States, but the greatest loss to Canada is the export of the brains of our youth. In the University of Johns Hopkins to-day there are such wonderful men as Dr. Thomas Cullen and Dr. Lwellwyns Barker, who are graduates of the University of Toronto. McGill, Queen's, Laval and other universities of the different provinces have similar graduates in the United States. The men at the head of the medical profession in many of the universities in the United States are Canadians who left here for that country and are to-day in prominent positions in their profession. What we need in this country is to do something in national scientific research and to show its necessity for safeguarding and expanding the industries of Canada, and for the development of the native industries and of the products of the sea, forest, soil and mine.

What is Canada doing? We are spending a lot of money, it is true, but very largely our efforts consist in nothing but talk and we are getting no results. The Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, Prime Minister of Great Britain, recently declared that while science might not save industry in the Old Country it could act as a shock absorber to carry England through. The "shock absorber" he said, was such scientific development as would permit the gradual transfer of an industry from one phase of usefulness which was past to another era which was just dawning. In an address to the alumni of the University of Toronto Professor J. C. McLennan, of that body, recently made some striking remarks. I quote:

He recalled that the C.P.R. had placed orders for more coal burning locomotives and then he reminded his audience of the oil fuel car that had gone across the continent in 68 hours. "Are the locomotive works in this country putting in shock absorbers?" he asked.

A new type of gasoline which is just now being put on the market will revolutionize the type of motors being used in automobiles. The vast future in the use of nitrogen was also discussed. The whole industry had been revolutionized by new scientific discoveries. They were pressing hard on the Chilean nitrate industry, but he feared that Canadian farmers do not make as much use of artificial fertilizers as they should. They are content with 13 bushels of wheat an acre when they might be getting 40 bushels.

There was also a change ahead for the artificial ice industry forecast by the latest development of individual refrigerators using ammonia.

If business is not associated with scientific men then that business is going to the wall.

The National Research Council can keep industries and all associations informed of what is going on if they gather about it. It can show the time to draw in one business and expand on another. Any banker should know how the aspects of any industry are going to be affected by future scientific developments.

This shows us something of what can be done if only the government will institute proper inquiries into all these departments of our activities. Yesterday the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton) made some reference to the diversion of water at Chicago, and here again the government is betraying an utter inability to cope with the situation. This is a most important matter for the lake towns and the ports on the Great Lakes. It has been estimated by the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario that there has been an annual loss to Canada as a result of this diversion of water from the lakes of $35,000,000 a year and I am bound to say that I am not at all satisfied with mere protests on the part of the government. The Americans never pay any attention to such protests; they will continue to ignore them. This treaty was solemnly entered into between two nations, Great Britain and the United States, and Canada is not even a party to it. The International Deep Waterways Commission acts as intermediary between the two countries in the observance of the treaty, and in this connection I would point out, in reference to the question which was put by the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) yesterday, that the Secretary for War in the United States has no power in the matter. He is a ministerial official, his position being analogous to that of the Minister of Public Works in this country. The harbours and the Great Lakes are under his control and all expenditures for public works are made under his direction. He is not mentioned in the treaty nor is Chicago a party to it. The amount of water to be taken from the lakes for given purposes is clearly set out in the treaty, so much for Canada and so much for the United States, and not only are they taking the allotted 10,000 feet in Chicago but they are now drawing off as much as 16,000 feet. And in addition to that they are securing from the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario 10,000 or 12,000 feet on a contract which has still four or five years to run.

Now what I object to particularly in this matter is the fact that private citizens of this country are going to Washington and interviewing the President of the United States in regard to the treaty. I consider it a piece of impertinence for any private citizen of Canada or any private organization here to wait upon the United States authorities, going over the head of the British government, the Canadian government and the British Embassy at Washington and ignoring the Canadian government without even making representations to the minister or government here. These deputations are interviewing the United States cabinet and are appearing before the Rivers and Harbours committee of congress and before the Senate, altogether to the prejudice of the whole case so far as Canada is concerned. The case for this country, not only in its legal aspect but from the standpoint of the facts in dispute, is being seriously prejudiced by these unauthorized and self-appointed ambassadors and it is high time that the government of Canada bestirred itself. Something more than weak protests is called for. I think this Dominion should appeal to the British government to bring the United States to time, and forward its bill to that country for the $35,000,000 damages per annum which it has lost during the past seven or eight years as a result of the diversion of water from the lakes and collect the same as reparations through the British government. That would represent some $300,000,000 which this country ought to receive in compensation for that loss, and I strongly urge upon this government that an effort be made without any delay to have the treaty strictly enforced through the British authorities. I repeat, the government of Canada should file its bill with the British government for damages sustained and should take steps to collect the money in the proper way. The diversion of water has been wholly illegal and it has resulted in serious injury to Canadian interests and reparation is due this country. The onus for the enforcement of the treaty rests on Great Britain and not on any individual in this country, and we can collect the money through the good offices of the British government, deducting the amount which the government of the Old Country is paying, $500,000 per day, to the United States as war debt.

As a humble citizen of this country I am very much concerned with the view which the people of the Old Country have of us as Canadians. They are asking where Canada stands in its relation to the British Empire. It was announced in a newspaper the other day that London feels that the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King is playing a poor second to the United States isolation policy, and the statement has been made that Canada must sooner or later decide to live up to her responsibilities as a member of the British Commonwealth or declare herself independent of the royal navy. Now we have a Department of External Affairs in this country which costs the people of Canada about $100,000 yearly, and what that department does I confess I do not know. What, for example, has it done in connection with this very subject I have been discussing, the diversion of water at Chicago? And what action did it take the other day when a British ship was fired on a number of times by a ship bearing an American flag beyond the three mile limit? And there are American gunboats on the Great Lakes to-day often entering Canadian harbours also enforcing the revenue laws of the United States in the vicinity of Detroit in contravention of the Rush-Bagot Treaty of 1817 and 1842. Where is the Department of External Affairs when all these things are occurring? It seems that we also in this country are content to sponge upon the hard earnings of the British taxpayers for the maintenance of our maritime freedom, and we forget the plight that this country would have found itself in during the late war if a German fleet had sailed up the St. Lawrence or attacked Halifax or St. John. In such an event what would have happened to Halifax, St. John, Boston and New York? The British fleet to-day, Mr. Speaker, constitutes the real league of nations, while the League of Nations is only a debating society and the results are of little or no value. So far as Canada's contribution to maritime freedom is concerned, we have two toy ships. Where are those ships? Off the bay of Fundy? No; they are locked up in a garage in Halifax. Is that a self respecting policy for the people of Canada to be proud of, a people who did so much in the late war, in the darkest hours of the empire, in giving of its best blood to the defence of our liberties? Are we prepared to depend altogether upon the British fleet without contributing to its upkeep? We have not spent a cent for the purpose. I doubt whether Mr. Mackenzie King was ever authorized by his cabinet to take the stand which he is reported to have taken in regard to the Locarno treaty, and I think the papers should be brought down and the whole matter discussed. This country should follow the lead of Premier Bruce of Australia, and also of New Zealand, and shoulder its part of the burden of defending the empire, with a proper contribution to the British fleet. We talk about our nationalism, but we are not a nation; we are part and parcel of the British Empire. Why, all the toy navy we have consists, as I have said, of two small boats which are locked up in a garage at Halifax.

The British people are practical; the Canadian people are not. The British House of Commons met at noon, and the Address was adopted the following day at six o'clock. If this government had been prepared the first day of the session to bring down its programme and introduce its bills the Conservative party would have been ready to discuss those measures. The leader of the government should have followed the excellent example set by Premier Ferguson in the Ontario legislature. In the opening days of the session he brought down ten or twelve of his most important measures and they were given a first reading without delay. If this government had adopted a similarly businesslike course, in my opinion this debate would not have lasted very long.

In the session of 1922 I introduced a resolution for the adoption of a national coal policy, so that every pound of coal used by Canada would be mined and coked under the British flag. At the time I was laughed at by certain hon. members and by some of our newspapers for what they termed the ridiculous policy of attempting to displace Pennsylvania coal in the central provinces. But I have lived to see my policy endorsed by the country. Our people now realize that the American mine owners could freeze us out in one winter. I was surprised to hear my hon. friend from Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) say last night that he does not burn Alberta coal but likes Pennsylvania. Well, Toronto wants to burn Alberta coal. The House may be interested to learn that yesterday, as early as from eight o'clock on in the morning, over five hundred people lined up in the city hall, Toronto, to place orders for Alberta coal. All the available supply was soon exhausted.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Will the hon. member tell the House why it is the people of Toronto cannot get more Alberta coal if our railways are still running?

Mr. CHURCH: I cannot. The hon. gentleman from Melfort will have plenty of opportunity after I sit down to develop his ideas on the subject. So far as I am concerned, this national fuel policy is not going to be laughed out of court by Sir Henry Thornton or anybody else. Sir Henry Thornton's banquet jests on the feasibility of our establishing a national fuel policy may be received as gems of wisdom by his admirers, but they are not so regarded by our serious-thinking, half-employed, soft-coal-burning citizens. It seems to me he might have given the matter more thought. He may think that some of us are seeing visions and dreaming dreams when we say that eventually the eighty million dollars that is paid annually by Canada to purchase coal in Pennsylvania will be kept in Canada and divided forty million dollars to Nova Scotia and forty million to Alberta; we do not share his skepticism.

In my opinion coal should be carried on the same preferential rates that are granted grain and flour, and I confidently believe the time is coming when this will be the case. Coal is one of our most important native industries. Unfortunately to-day, by reason of the industrial equilibrium having been disturbed by the war, our coal industry is not in the flourishing condition it should be. Four sessions ago I urged that subsidies and bonuses should be given to the Alberta and Nova Scotia mine owners, but the Prime Minister moved to strike those words out of my motion. What happened three months afterwards? The Minister of Finance brought down a proposal to grant a subvention of two hundred thousand dollars subsidy and bonuses to assist the Alberta and Maritime coal industry, thereby accepting the principle of bonuses and subsidies. In this connection it is interesting to recall what Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin, the British Prime Minister, has done for the coal industry of the Mother country. Six months ago he was faced with the spectre of a social revolution. To save England from this horror he put through the British House of Commons a bill granting the coal industry subsidies which, according to a recent statement by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, have already involved an expenditure per annum of $210,000,000. But the people of Great Britain consider this is not too much to save a native industry. Would it not be far better for us to adopt the British policy and so put this important Canadian industry on its feet, and at the same time make ourselves independent of the United States for our fuel supply? It would be well to do this even if the Canadian National Railways should lose a few dollars here and a few dollars there. Later a profit would ensue.

In my view it is just as necessary to use the tariff weapon to protect our industries from unfair, unjust and inequitable foreign competition as it is to call out the militia when the country is threatened with invasion from a foreign foe. In a word, we should have a national policy in peace as well as in war. We should protect our industries —agricultural, manufacturing and mining—and we should also protect our workmen from all evil effects of dumping. Consequently I do not want to see this national policy laughed out of court by Sir Henry Thornton. I should like to know if the Canadian National system belongs to the people of Canada, or to Sir Henry Thornton. Should it not be used to develop our sparsely populated Dominion?

Or is it considered more important that it should be run solely for profit to satisfy the ambition of its president? Is present profit its sole aim? Or is not the development of our vast Dominion its sole object? Let me ask the House, was the Canadian National system taken over by the nation to bring about economic annexation to the United States? Or rather was not the initial objective to seek a means for distributing necessities and providing transportation to encourage an ever-increasing and contented people? We must realize that a country known to possess a real winter for fully one-half of the year cannot expect to grow if the statement is once noised abroad, and is based on fact, that no reliable source of fuel is assured its settlers. In short, Sir, if a country does not grow can its revenue be expected to increase?

So I say, Mr. Speaker, that the time has come to put an end to all these banquets, and to get down to business and solve this question in the manner I have indicated, by bonuses and subsidies and utilizing the national railway. In war time the railways were mobilized to defend our land; why cannot we use the railways in times of peace to help solve the problems of the west and of the Maritime provinces. Sir Henry Thornton's last banquet jests may be received as bits of wisdom by his admirers, but by the serious-thinking, half-employed, soft-coal-burning citizens of Toronto, his jests are viewed differently. The light, shallow consideration given by him to a great national industry and necessity plainly reveals the small extent of his vision.

Would any business man make money unless he first invested his capital, unless his capital was first of all seemingly lost? Could there be a harvest unless the seed was first buried, and apparently temporarily lost? Could a man have energy for work and toil for profit unless he "loses" the time for rest and the cost of other necessities? Even if a great national railway does not show a sufficient profit for the first year or two to banquet all and sundry every few days, and laud its president as a great financial wizard, would not the added indirect industry and development of a great country bring returns in the near future, some ten, some twenty, and some a hundredfold?

The time has come for the government of Canada to go into this matter. The government have already adopted a coal policy. They accepted my national coal motion subject to an amendment, and the government were beaten on their amendment by a vote of 82 to 81. But what have they done since? Have they worked out a coal policy? No. Why should Ontario have to pay a cent to bring coal from Alberta? Ontario is paying enough taxes now, 46 cents per head of population. Why should Alberta have to pay for sending its coal down here? Have not preferential rates already been accorded the west on grain and flour? That is a very important industry, I admit, but why should not another Canadian industry, the coal industry, receive the same treatment? The people in the central provinces of Canada are looking for the government to do something to save them from the extortion of the coal barons of the United States. In my constituency in Toronto, Earlscourt, which is a soldiers' constituency, there are twenty-two widows of returned soldiers in one block. They are mostly poor people; their pension does not maintain them, and many of them have to work for their living. When the people who are poor come to buy coal, some of them have to buy it in bagsful, and they have to buy this American rubbish, full of dust and stone, at the rate of $20 a ton when they buy it by the bagful. It is pure robbery and extortion. Where is this celebrated Combines Act that Mr. Murdock introduced some years ago? What has become of it? Who is Minister of Combines in this country to-day? Hon. gentlemen opposite said in the election of 1921 that the Conservative party was the party that represented the big interests in this country. The Conservative party does not represent the big interests. We represent no big interests. Some of us have suffered in the battle against the big interests, and are prepared to suffer again. It is time, Mr. Speaker, for the government to bestir themselves. Instead of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) rising in his place every day on the orders of the day and giving an answer which is not an answer at all, let him get after these Yankee extortioners who are charging $20 a ton for a lot of American rubbish that yields $7 and $8 a ton to the American millionaires over in the United States. It is time the people of Canada went on a strike against buying Pennsylvania coal, but some of our National railway officials in this country are apparently prepared to go on buying Pennsylvania coal, enriching the coal barons of the United States, and giving traffic to the Pennsylvania Railway, and they do not care a rap for Alberta and Nova Scotia. Who is the responsible minister of the crown who will bring in a bill of indictment against these coal barons and take action against this extortion in the sale of coal. Down in New Jersey they have appointed a coal commission to secure and regulate a coal supply and to supply coal to consumers at a reasonable price. It is time Canada did something like that, but I have very little confidence in the president of the National Railways or the railway commission doing anything to solve this problem. It is time the government worked out a coal policy through a commission, and then we would get some results.

I wish to say a few words on immigration, because this is one of the great problems of Canada to-day. We are supposed to be launching on a great immigration policy, but, Mr. Speaker, we have no Minister of Immigration in this country. Our annual estimates amount to $346,000,000, and of this amount only $2,500,000 is spent on immigration, and only a little more than we spent thirty years ago. Everybody is asking what is the matter with Canada? Canada was first in the Diamond Jubilee procession, but what has happened since? Australia is worsting Canada now and is doing window dressing in the matter of immigration, and Australia and New Zealand are getting the cream of the immigration from the British Isles to-day. Immigration is one of our big problems, and yet we are spending on it only two and a half million dollars. I contend that with one million and a quarter men out of work in the Old Country, the first thing we should do is to stop the exodus from this country to the United States, and then get back as many of the men who have left us as we can. We can help to do this by developing our raw materials, and manufacturing them in this country. There is no use in a lot of members of the Canadian Manufacturers Association meeting in the city of Winnipeg and urging that we spend $50,000,000 on immigration unless we first have a business-like plan and put it in charge of a business man. Without a plan for immigration you might as well throw the money you are going to spend into the waste paper basket. There are in the United States to-day 100,000 men of the Canadian Expeditionary Force who fought the battles of this country. They had to leave Canada—Toronto, Hamilton, London, Brockville, Belleville and many other cities—and go to the United States because they could not get employment in this country. Whoever heard of the Grand Army of the Republic in the country to the south having to leave the United States to look for a job? The Grand Army of the Republic ruled the United States for fifty years after the Civil War, and presidents, state governors, and all the high officers in all the states were chosen from the Grand Army. No, Mr. Speaker, they did not have to leave their country to look for work, but 100,000 of the men who fought our battles have had to leave this country in search of employment across the line. We must repatriate these men; that must be part of our immigration policy. Secondly, let us close our doors and stop any further exodus and get back our men. Let us provide work for the people of this country by developing our raw materials. Over $7,000,000 worth of asbestos, for instance, is taken out of the bowels of the earth in Quebec, and manufactured in the United States into finished products worth over $70,000,000. We ship this asbestos from our country, a large part of it in the crude state and some of it in a semi-crude state, to be manufactured in the United States, building up their big cities in Indiana, New York, and other large cities in New Jersey and Michigan. As I pointed out last session, we export thirty-six minerals to the United States to be refined there and give employment to United States workmen. The first thing we must do is to inaugurate a proper national policy for the development of our raw materials, to provide work for the people in this country; next, bring back as many Canadians as we can who have left this country to get work in the United States; thirdly, let us stop the exodus from this country, and when we have done these things, Mr. Speaker, let us launch upon a great immigration scheme in the Old Country. There is no overseas dominion that should not help in giving employment to these men who are out of work in the Old Country, our own kith and kin, when work can be provided for them if we would only develop our own raw materials, and, Mr. Speaker, I would point out that it is under the free trade policy which hon. gentlemen to my left advocate that these men are out of work in the Old Country to-day, with many of them taking the dole, unemployment insurance, and all that. There is no oversea dominion that should not become the land of opportunity for the people of the Old Country, our own people. For unless the British Empire redistributes its population we are done as an empire.

9 p.m.

We have never had a proper immigration policy in this country. It may be asked, "What is wrong?" I will tell you what is wrong. We are not getting value for our money from the present Department of Immigration. An intending emigrant gets in touch with an agent, and communications are exchanged with the department at Ottawa, but from six to nine months elapse before there is a definite reply from this country. In the meantime the farmer, if such he be, has given up his lease and got in touch with an agent representing the Australian government, and he goes to that country. It is the Australian commonwealth which is getting the cream of the business and is receiving the tide of emigration to-day. What did a British minister say to the British House of Commons the other day? He predicted that Australia, which has a population according to the last census of 6,000,000 souls, will in the next ten or fifteen years increase its population to from ten to twelve millions of people. But Australia has closed the door to indiscriminate immigration. The Commonwealth of Australia is going to be a white man's country, and by its restrictions in that respect is taking a leaf out of the book of the United States. In the country to the south of us when it was revealed in a census that only 48 per cent of the population were of Anglo-Saxon birth they decided that they would close the door to all except selected immigrants. Australia is going to do the same, and the Australian government are going to see to it that the white race shall rule over there. Right Hon. Mr. Bruce is following the example of the United States, and enforcing the policy of selected immigration.

In this connection I wish to refer to the importance to the Maritime provinces of the right kind of immigration policy. Let me say that the natural market for many of the products of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick is the British Isles—everybody knows that. Continentalists may argue that the proper market for this country lies on this continent, but I maintain that it will be infinitely better for the people of the Maritime provinces to sell their products to Great Britain. The products of the fisheries of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick should be carried on British vessels to the British market by a fast freight service. The two provinces named, as well as the rest of the Canadian provinces, suffer from inadequate representation in the emigration offices in London. The High Commissioner for Canada is carrying out the same policy as in the past, but the whole system at present in operation in London is wrong and has always been wrong. The position of high commissioner should not be simply one of a semi-diplomatic or social character. The high commissionership should be regarded in a very large degree from a business point of view, it should be a business position, and the high commissioner should act in friendly co-operation with the representatives of the several provinces. The office which he fills should not be a sort of gilded ornament, set apart from that of the agents general of the nine provinces in isolated and lonely splendour. All should work together loyally and unitedly. The money now spent by the Dominion on immigration should be distributed to better advantage and payment made by results, and the onus of getting these results should be placed upon the provinces. Such results could best be secured by appealing to the people in Great Britain likely to be attracted by the special conditions existing either in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, portions of Quebec and Ontario, and parts of British Columbia. There are special districts in some of these provinces which are likely to appeal to certain British people accustomed to certain climatic conditions and possessing a certain amount of capital. The people to whom I have reference may not be wealthy, but many are fairly well off. They are looking for future homes in a climate and amid surroundings somewhat similar to those which they enjoy in the Old Land. I am told that thousands of families moderately well off, fond of living near the sea, would gladly settle in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick if the charms of these provinces were properly represented to them. The policy which I am advocating, in my opinion, can be so applied as to bring great prosperity to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. It would be equally advantageous to other provinces in the Dominion.

I believe the principles of protection can be so worked out under a true national policy as to cause the life blood to flow with renewed vigour through the heart of the Dominion. If the Dominion be built on the great principles of protection and our motto be, "Each for all and all for each" nothing can stop our advance with great strides along the path of prosperity. The question of immigration is to be discussed later on in the session when I shall have something more to say. There has been a lot of bad advertising in the Old Country which has done us no good. I have in my hand a clipping from the Herald of London, dated January 23, 1926, which makes serious statements with respect to Canada, charging broken promises and making other complaints. I have other clippings of a similar tenor from other papers. I shall not read them, but will content myself by handing them to the Minister of Immigration.

I was sent here to fight for protection. I am not here to try to argue protection out as a question of percentages. I am here to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered to the saints in truths of the good old national policy. I believe that the truths of protection and these truths alone, point the way to salvation for all the people and provinces of this country. I want to say a word about a national policy for automobiles. Conditions in Canada at the present time are enough to make a Canadian disown his country. Will this state of affairs never stop? Is it not possible to create, keep and maintain an industry of any kind in this Dominion? I am afraid we are becoming the five, ten and fifteen cent country of the world. I believe that the protection of a customs tariff should compel the manufacture of automobiles in this country. Canadian automobile plants should be something more than places where American-made parts are assembled in a so-called Canadian-made automobile. I have looked over the records of the Bureau of Statistics and I find that the value of the American automobile parts imported into Canada in the last year of record was $20,000,000; the wages paid to American workers who made these parts on the value of the imported products, I have figured out by a mathematical calculation as $6,000,000. This total would have provided work and wages for 4,000 Canadians at a wage rate of $30 per week. I believe that protection is not a question of percentages.

I have already said I was not here to discuss percentages but the principles of the protective system. I believe that in the case of the motor industry principles of protection should be so applied as to make that industry thoroughly Canadian. The principles of protection, properly applied, would enable the Canadian manufacturer to have the Canadian market to himself. They would compel the Canadian manufacturer to meet the demand of the Canadian market with automobiles made in Canada from A to Z, from Genesis to Revelations. There were sold in Canada in the last year of record automobiles manufactured in the United States to the amount of $15,000,000. If the Canadian automobile industry was really a Canadian industry, and not an American owned, and largely American operated industry, this country would have a supply of Canadian made motors for use at home and for export abroad as good as any in the world. Canadians now spend $71,000,000 in the purchase of motors cars. I get this report from the Bureau of Statistics. It also shows that the value of imports of automobiles into Canada from the United States in the calendar year 1925 was $13,000,000, and of auto parts $20,000,000. In this connection I would like to put ten or twelve lines of figures on Hansard. The figures are:

Year	Number	Wages
1923..	318,098	$579,002,686
1924..	329,563	547,215,700

The estimated number of parts and accessory factory workers in 1924 was 300,000. The annual production of motor vehicles in the United States, including production of plants, located in Canada, making motor vehicles of United States design, was as follows:

Year	Number	Wholesale Value
1923..	3,694,237	$2,276,399,270
1924..	3,243,285	2,011,038,288

The production of motor cars in Canada in 1924 was valued at $88,480,418, and the exports of motor cars from Canada to all countries in 1924 amounted to $26,509,393. Canada's total imports of motor cars in that year amounted to $9,641,309. By adding together production and imports and subtracting exports we arrive at an estimate of apparent consumption, which is the nearest figure to sales that is available. By a calculation of this kind it will be found that the apparent consumption of motor cars in Canada in 1924 amounted to $71,612,334. This matter has been referred to by the hon member for Halton (Mr. Anderson) whom I do not see present. He came out for lowering the duties on automobiles, and the hon. member for Toronto West Centre also refers to it in the Orange Sentinel. I had better give the words used by the hon. member for Halton in this House in the session of 1923. At page 2841 of Hansard of May 17 of that year the hon. member said:

> As I have previously stated, I am not a high protectionist, and I think there are some industries in this country which possibly are too highly protected. One of these, I think, is the automobile industry. This industry is making rapid strides in Canada and in the last year this country, a country of nine million people, exported half as many automobiles as did the United States, with a population of 110,000,000.

The hon. member for Toronto West Centre said in an editorial in the Orange Sentinel headed, "Reduce the Duty on Motors":

> Whatever else may be done with the customs tariff at the next session of parliament, there should be a substantial reduction in the duty on motor cars. It is clear from the prices quoted in the United States and Canada that the Canadian manufacturers are charging "all the traffic will stand." The duty of 35 per cent is more than protection. It is in part a government subsidy to the makers of automobiles.

As long as the motor car was purely a luxury that only the rich could enjoy, there was not much reason for complaint. But the motor car has become a necessity in business and professional life, and those who are thus compelled to buy one should not be forced to pay excessive profits to the manufacturers. A certain type of car that sells in the United States at $1,875, costs $3,100 in Canada. That is altogether too wide a spread, and is not warranted by any factor in the trade. The American makers have larger production, it is true, but they pay higher wages, and there is no reason why their raw materials, are any cheaper. The makers of motor cars in Canada are soaking the public unduly, and it is the duty of the government to lower the tariff, and in that way inject a little competition of American firms that will bring down the prices.

Then the Textile Journal says:

We presume manufacturers in every line—with the possible exception of the automobiles, in which we think there is an exorbitant protection, are suffering along the same lines.

These automobile manufacturers do not know any politics. The automobile is their politics. In 1921 a great many went over holus bolus to the Mackenzie King government, and a great many gentlemen want to swing over to our side now. They swing over like a pendulum on a change of government. But I predict that the automobile industry, like the coal industry, will become a native industry, with the resources we have in this country. We will make the parts and put into the motor car every article that is used—iron wood, glass and everything else. We will make all the materials used in the manufacture of automobiles and motor trucks. We should have a national policy which would raise up a tariff against the United States so as to require every car and motor truck to be manufactured in all its parts in Canada, and thus give employment to thousands of men.

With regard to this particular industry there was a division in this House on the question and some hon. members on this side voted to reduce the tariff, namely the hon. member for York Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) the hon. member for Kingston City (Mr. Ross) and the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Jones); the then hon. member for St. John and Albert, Mr. Baxter, and others. I voted against the resolution to lower the tariff, because I did not believe that that was the solution. I believe the motor car industry should be a Canadian industry and we should have such a tariff as would cause every car and motor truck sold in Canada to be manufactured in our own country. Canada has become a great exporting country for automobiles, as the following table of exports will show:

The United Kingdom	$5,575,000
East Africa	135,000
South Africa	2,480,000
British India	2,043,000
Ceylon	231,000
Straits Settlements	478,000
Australia	6,115,000
New Zealand	4,680,000
Argentine Republic	1,413,000
Belgium	201,000
China	135,000
Cuba	89,000
Japan	227,000
Mexico	153,000
Netherlands	240,000
Dutch East Indies	676,000
Spain	153,000
Sweden	545,000
Uruguay	174,000
Venezuela	70,000

Total exports of automobiles were $27,246,000. Motor trucks were exported to a total value of $5,496,000. In addition we exported automobile parts valued at $4,162,000. We can very readily establish this industry in Canada. If we have such a large export trade in automobiles we can make the industry a key industry in Canada. I picked up a pamphlet of the Department of Trade and Commerce yesterday, and it says that the Canadian automobile is getting a great market in the West Indies and also in other parts of the world. By protection you can compel the United States people to have the parts made in Canada instead of in the United States, and the profits would thus come to Canada. The Canadian manufacturer has a preference over his competitors in Great Britain and other British countries. We can readily solve that problem if the government will do its duty. The profits paid by American companies are exorbitant. Look at the Ford Company and see the profits which they made. A committee on agricultural relations was appointed by this House in 1924 and evidence was taken before it which showed the profits made by that company. According to the evidence submitted at that time, page 981 of the proceedings of that committee, the Ford Company of Canada was formed in 1903 with a nominal capital of $125,000, of which $62,000 was paid up in cash. The balance of the stock was issued, I think, to Mr. Ford and his associates for their patent rights on the Ford car. At page 997 an official of the company says that no fresh money was subsequently taken in as capital, that the increased capital all came from earnings. The capital at that time was $7,000,000; cash dividends paid were $10,000,000; surplus and present worth, $12,500,000. That means that $29,500,000 had grown up from the original investment of $125,000. In a recent issue of the Financial Post of Toronto an item regarding the Ford Company of Canada says:

During the past week Ford of Canada sold at 498 at New York and there has been a bid of 500 with no stock offering on the Toronto exchange. This is a new high for these shares. Last January and again in March they reached 485, but have been down around 450 since then, the last sale being at 450 on Nov. 6. No reason is advanced for the activity in the shares unless it is expectation in the way of melon splitting. Shareholders have not been overburdened with dividends of late years, the company having paid but 10 per cent in 1924 and a similar amount in 1923. Earnings justified a greater payment. In 1923 they were $5,106,197 and 1924, $3,719,187, while the 10 per-cent dividend took $700,000 each year. Surplus to-day stands at $19,609,861. It is interesting to review the dividend position of the shares since the company was organized in 1906 with $125,000 capitalization, reorganized 1911, $1,000,000 capital and again 1916, $10,000,000 capital, $7,000,000 issued.

Some melon,—to raise the capital from $1,000,000 to $7,000,000 at one issue. Talk about keeping the farmer on the farm; how are you going to do that unless you give him good roads, radials, motor cars and so on? It should be noted that there is an excise duty of 5 per cent on motor cars in the United States, and when our customs officials collect the 35 per cent duty on imported cars they add 5 per cent excise tax to the sale price in the United States and use that as the value for duty purposes. This in reality makes the duty approximately 37 per cent of the price in the United States. There is in Canada in addition a sales tax of 5 per cent based on the duty paid value of the car and an excise tax of 5 per cent on the duty paid value up to $1,200 and 10 per cent upon any value in excess of $1,200. Take the case of a car which costs $985 in the United States; when the duty sales tax and excise taxes which I have described are added, the cost of the car in Canada becomes $1,487.66. That same car is priced at $1,506 in the city of Toronto; the difference, I presume, would be the freight Detroit to Toronto. That, I may say, has reference to a car that is to-day being assembled in Canada. If the individual purchases the car in the United States he has to pay that 5 per cent excise tax before he gets it from the dealer, and a $985 car with that 5 per cent excise tax in the United States added would cost $1,545.27 by the time he landed it in Canada.

I would like to give the prices of automobiles in the United States as compared with the prices in Canada:

[Mr. Church.]

	United States Price	Canadian Price	Percentage Increase
Ford touring car..	$ 375	$ 520	38.6
Ford Tudor sedan..	580	755	....
Ford Fordor sedan..	660	895	....
Extra for full balloon tires.	25	50	....
Chevrolet touring car.. ..	525	730	....
Chevrolet coach..	735	1,015	38
Essex coach..	895	1,225	37
Maxwell sedan..	1,095	1,535	40
Chrysler sedan..	2,170	3,025	40
McLaughlin-Buick coach.. .	1,295	1,820	41
Oldsmobile coach..	1,075	1,495	39
Oakland coach..	1,215	1,695	39
Hudson coach..	1,345	1,840	37
Overland touring car.. .. .	495	710	40

Canadian prices are from 37 per cent to 41 per cent higher than United States prices.

Talk about these dividends; the stock of the Ford Company from 1905 has been nothing but a gold mine. They have paid dividends as follows:

Dividend Payments

	Per cent	Amount
1905	6	7,488
1908	10	12,500
1909	25	31,250
1910	100	125,000
1911	100	125,000
1912	500 (stock)	625,000
1913	20	150,000
1913	33 1-3 (stock)	250,000
1914	10	100,000
1915	110	1,100,000
1916	600 (stock)	6,000,000
1917	5	350,000
1918	5	350,000
1919	35	2,450,000
1920	15	1,050,000
1921	30	2,100,000
1922	30	2,100,000
1923	10	700,000
1924	10	700,000

The total cash dividends to date have been $11,451,000 and to the total stock dividends $6,875,000, a total of $18,326,238. Capital stock is now $7,000,000. At $500 per share—that is this article says the price—the capital stock would be worth $35,000,000. The investment of $125,000 the company has paid in cash dividends $11,451,238 and their capital stock is now worth on the market $35,000,000. In other words, if a man had invested $1,000 in stock of the Ford Company on the formation of the company he would have drawn in cash dividends $90,000; his stock at the present market price would be worth $280,000, making a total of $370,000 from an investment of $1,000. I do not wish to say much about this industry because there may be another opportunity of discussing it. I predict that we will make this a native industry and apply the national policy to it, with resulting benefit to the farmer as well as to the artisan in the cities and towns.

I am going to conclude with a few words about the railway situation in this country. The situation is not altogether an inviting one. If hon. members will look at the last blue book signed by Mr. Graham Bell, Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, pages 8 and 9, they will find a statement of the system from a financial standpoint. I am a public-ownership man and I do not think anybody ever doubted where I stood in that regard. I will read just three paragraphs of this statement in order to show the financial position of this particular company as regards its capital and to show that some adjustment must be made of these conditions if the system is to be placed on its feet:

Financial Reorganization

In his commentary on the year's operations, Sir Henry Thornton, president and chairman of the National Railway board, again refers to the all-important question of capitalization, and reports that active consideration is being given to the policy to be followed in connection therewith "and the extent to which, if at all, advances made and capital held by the government should be written down to a figure commensurate with the earning prospects of the property." The president and chairman adds that the problem is proving both difficult and complicated, but it is hoped shortly to be able to present to the proper authorities a consistent scheme for consideration.

This question of financial reorganization of the Canadian National system is one of the most pressing problems that to-day confront the management and the government. The greater part of the Canadian National mileage was formerly privately owned. Due to over-expansion and to conditions due to the war, these railways found it impossible to carry on and were taken over by the government. Had the railways been obliged to liquidate their affairs, readjustment of capital charges would have taken place at that point. Less drastic methods resulted in the transfer of these railway properties to the government of Canada, and with them the heavy capital charges which private ownership had found it impossible to carry.

The next paragraph in the report refers to the funded debt of the National railways. One-half of this funded debt consists of guarantees and loans by the government of Canada and the other half is money lent by private people. The part advanced by the government does not pay dividends; it is a frozen asset. The other part does pay dividends. I want hon. members to listen to these two paragraphs because they constitute the whole key of the transportation problem as affecting the National Railways:

The Funded Debt

The long-term funded debt of the Canadian National Railways is given in the balance sheet as $2,056,181,517.70. Of this sum $913,913,082 was supplied by the investing public, and two-thirds of this debt due the public is guaranteed by the Dominion, of which it is, therefore, a contingent liability.

Forming part of the long-term funded debt are advances totalling $560,397,957.64 by the Dominion government to railways now included in the National system. On this immense sum interest amounting to $130,157,922.28 has accrued. This the railways have not been able to pay, and accrued interest has been added to principal, though in such cases it is not compounded. Thus the total advances, including interest, now amounting to $690,555,949.92, as indicated in the balance sheet.

Included in the $2,056,181,517.70 given as the sum of its long-term funded debt in the balance sheet is an item of $451,712,484.98, which represents the amount Canada has spent in the construction, maintenance and operation of former Canadian Government railways, such as the Intercolonial, the Prince Edward Island railway, eastern branch lines and the Transcontinental, the eastern division of the projected Grand Trunk Pacific. It has not been the practice to reckon interest on these advances to the original Canadian Government railways, so that the item referred to is exclusive of interest. The inclusion of these advances on appropriation account, Canadian Government Railways, among the liabilities of the Canadian National lines is entirely a bookkeeping requirement rendered necessary by the fact that a corresponding item is included among the investments in road and equipment on the asset side of the ledger. It is well, however, to point out that this item of $451,712,484.98 is not a liability of the Canadian National railways, though it is money which the Dominion has put into railways apart altogether from the properties taken over by reason of the failure of private ownership.

Interest Charges

The question of interest has been referred to. Owing to the varying practices in the financial operations of the respective systems which make up the Canadian National lines, this question of interest of itself presents difficulties when the possibility of uniform financial practice is being considered. As already stated, no interest is reckoned on appropriations to former Canadian Government railways, for the construction of which there were no public borrowings. Nor is interest accrued on the amount due the government for unpaid interest on loans and advances, which amounted to $130,157,992.28 on December 31, 1924. The above sum represents simple interest on the $560,397,957.64 advanced by the government to former privately-owned roads. In 1924 alone the accrued interest on this account amounted to $31,271,043. Five years ago the corresponding item was $14,346,831.69.

Interest due the public cannot be deferred as is interest due the government.

You cannot defer interest due to the public in the way you can stand the government off and compound the interest. You have to pay the investing public interest on their investment.

If not earned it must be borrowed; and, if borrowed from the public, interest on such amount is compounding from year to year. Last year (1924) fixed charges due the public amounted to $38,361,704.14; for 1920 the corresponding item was $31,055,318.28. Interest charges due the government and the public combined, which amounted to $45,402,149.97 in 1920, had grown to $69,632,747.14 in 1924. Including the Central Vermont, the total interest charges last year were $70,759,016.23. The rapid growth of interest charges emphasizes the importance of the examination of the capital structure of the Canadian National railways to which Sir Henry Thornton has referred.

I read those remarks for one reason only: They show the capital invested in the National railway system is over $2,000,000,000, two-thirds of which is principal and interest compounded which has not been paid and which is owed and guaranteed by the government of Canada and the other one-third due the investing public which has to be met. I want to point out to those who operate the National railways that I do not believe that the two railways should be combined because that is exactly what the late Lord Shaughnessy wanted. Co-ordination is nothing but combining the National system with the Canadian Pacific and that is exactly what the Canadian Pacific wants, because I read the address in 1922 of Lord Shaughnessy to his directors.

I say that the time has come when a stop should be placed on Sir Henry Thornton and his board so that they cannot continue spending millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money without the sanction and authority of the high court of parliament. We had Sir Henry Thornton purchasing the Scribe hotel in Paris with funds advanced by the directors without the consent of parliament, and we had an example given by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) and the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) in regard to constructing the Rouyn railway in Quebec outside of the authority of the general Railway Act and over the head of the railway commission and parliament. Who is Sir Henry Thornton, head of the National Railways? Is he above the parliament of Canada? What function does he perform in the government of Canada? I thought the government of Canada, under the British North America Act, consisted of the Governor General, representing the King, and two houses of parliament, known as the Senate and the House of Commons. But apparently we have now four chambers in this country: The Governor General, the Senate, the House of Commons and the House of Sir Henry Thornton. He has taken the place of the press, who are supposed to be the fourth estate. The time has come to restore responsible government in this country. We have a railway commission which is supposed to be over all the railways in Canada. This parliament in 1917 appointed three gentlemen to make a survey of all the Canadian railways and to advise what should be done in connection with the millions of dollars spent by the people of this country in railway construction. They consisted of Mr. Acworth, general manager of the Great Western railway in the Old Country, who died last year; Mr. A. H. Smith, president of the New York Central, and the very able chairman of the railway commission of that year, an expert on railway matters, now the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). They were appointed as experts to make a survey of the railway systems of this country and to try to co-ordinate them and to reduce the debt. What happened? They made a report to this parliament and the report was adopted. What was the key recommendation they made? That they should call in all the paper charters throughout Canada and start all over again, and that no charter should be issued or granted by the Railway committee of this House until it had first been reported upon by the railway commission.

Was that course followed in the case of the Rouyn railway? There is no doubt a railway there was necessary, but that is not the point. We are not objecting to the railway; the railway was not a luxury, but a necessity. We have an able premier in Quebec who is capable of taking care of the development of the resources of that province. I have nothing to say about that point at all; what I am criticizing to-night is the power of Sir Henry Thornton to take upon himself to create a dummy company because that is all it is. Every lawyer knows what is called a dummy company and what is meant by dummy directors. What I want to find out is where the railway commission of this country was when all this was going on. Where were the plans of the railway? What is the railway committee of this House for? That committee met last year for the consideration of various branch line bills which were referred to it and it sat for weeks, so that the government had all the time they wanted in which to bring this bill before the committee. But no; the money has been spent by Sir Henry Thornton over the head of parliament. With Sir Henry Thornton necessity seems to know no law and no one knows where he will stop. Just contrast the Canadian Pacific Railway with the Canadian National. Last year the Canadian Pacific went behind $13,500,000 in receipts while on the other side of the ledger they effected economies in operation to the extent of $14,000,000 so that they were able to pay dividends to their shareholders. And what did the Canadian National Railways do? They spent about $112,000,000 in new capital while they went behind many millions of dollars. It is true that they have figured out a surplus of some $30,000,000 but if you take into account all the fixed charges as set out in the report of the Deputy Minister of Railways, which I hope all hon. members will take the trouble to read, you will find that the situation is by no means so optimistic as that. After making allowance for interest compounded on all the frozen assets you will find that there is no surplus at all.

I remember that when first I became interested in politics, when I was speaking for a member running for the Ontario legislature in one of the ridings of Middlesex, the then provincial premier, Hon. G. W. Ross, claimed that Ontario had a surplus, and the main issue in the election was that surplus. I was in the parliament buildings one day after addressing the people of Middlesex and Mr. Ross said to me, "Never mind talking about the surplus; come to the building and I will show you the surplus in the safe." Well, I went in order to get this tangible proof; I wanted to see the gold in the safe. He said, "Never mind the surplus now. You are a doubting Thomas. Have a cigar and forget it." I think it is pretty much the same in regard to this surplus which is claimed in connection with the National railways. If I had my way, so far as these branch lines are concerned, I would build them on the principle of the Progressive free trade law of supply and demand. I would want to know first whether the particular road was necessary and where the receipts would come from and I would let the law of supply and demand take its course. And that is the way I would build the Hudson Bay railway. That is purely a provincial railway and it should be constructed by the provinces themselves. Ontario had to build the Temiskaming railway and the proposed road to James bay and the western provinces should also build their own roads. Why does not the government follow the advice of the commission which was appointed in 1917? We have the benefit of the advice of the British and American experts who have assured us that we should catch up with our railway arrears before going ahead building new branch lines, but Sir Henry Thornton does not seem inclined to follow this advice. If he were left alone he would build a branch line to the North Pole. We had anywhere from ten to twenty bills brought down last year for branch lines, many of them purely provincial in their nature. What is the Guysborough railway in Nova Scotia if it is not a provincial road? And who by the greatest stretch of imagination can regard the Hudson Bay railway as an undertaking for the general advantage of Canada? But Sir Henry Thornton is in favour of the Hudson Bay railway and of the Guysborough railway and of other branch lines that are purely provincial. And why not? Sir Henry talks about politicians. Well, it seems to me that if he were less of a politician and more of a railway man and an economist this country would get greater results from the National railways. I am opposed to the policy of the government in regard to the building of the Rouyn railway. I believe that parliament should have voted the money.

Last year, $75,000,000 was voted for betterments and improvements in connection with the Canadian National and branch lines, and this in the dying hours of the session. Where does the money come from for all these undertakings? How are the people in this country to meet all the expenditures of this government in connection with such enterprises as the skyscraper on Yonge street in Toronto? The government are going to grant a subsidy of $296,000 a year to a company to build that skyscraper when, right across the street, there are three other large buildings, one of which, belonging to the Canadian Pacific Railway, according to testimony given before the court of revision in the city of Toronto, is not returning 3 or 4 per cent on the money invested in it. The Royal Bank building, it has also been shown, pays less than 3 or 4 per cent while the same is said to be true of the Dominion Bank. Yet we find Sir Henry Thornton, unknown to the parliament of Canada, undertaking this very large expenditure in connection with that skyscraper in Toronto. The original scheme of 1925 had fallen through but certain gentlemen got busy around the corridors here a few weeks ago and a new arrangement was entered into, so that the government will now pay a rental of $296,000 per annum for the use of two or three storeys. In ten years they will have paid for the building twice over. And the government are doing this notwithstanding the fact that there is 700,000 square feet of floor space in various buildings in Toronto which could be utilized to advantage. What the people of Toronto want are necessities not luxuries—a post office and custom house first. Let the government centralize their offices in Toronto and in that way effect economies, instead of renting space on the ground floor at $2,400 a foot per annum. In conversation with an official of the Pennsylvania railway last summer I was informed that both in Philadelphia and in New York the railways were eliminating a good many of their uptown ticket offices and getting the public to buy their tickets at one central office. They are closing down as many ticket offices as they possibly can in the United States and effecting many economies and the same is true of economies effected in operation by the Canadian Pacific Railway in this country. In this way they are able to pay dividends. Why cannot the Canadian National Railways do the same and stop spending money as they are in expensive capital investments?

I am now going to take up a matter which I trust will be referred to in this House later on. The House of Representatives of the state of Michigan are meeting to-day at Lansing to pass a certain agreement made between Sir Henry Thornton, on behalf of the Canadian National Railways, and the legislature of the state of Ohio for the removal of certain tracks passing through the city of Detroit. As hon. members know, the Grand Trunk Railway has certain interests in Michigan and a meeting was held in the city of Detroit the other day to solve this problem. The governor of the state of Michigan, Hon. Mr. Groesbeck, summoned Sir Henry Thornton a month ago to his office in Detroit and there intimated to him quite clearly that the Canadian National Railways would have to get out of Michigan unless they gave up their existing right of way there. The governor of Michigan simply bluffed Sir Henry Thornton, for the state and federal courts have held that the Grand Trunk Railway has a perpetual franchise granted by the state of Michigan. What happened? Acting independently of this parliament and of the railway commission, Sir Henry Thornton has given up a valuable right of way on Woodward avenue in Detroit, in length corresponding to Yonge street from the waterfront to St. Clair avenue, of a potential value, according to the competent authorities in Detroit and many local real estate authorities there, of anywhere from twenty to thirty million dollars. The state legislature is meeting to-day in Lansing, having been summoned by the governor in special session to validate the agreement. Has any counterpart of that agreement been placed before this parliament for ratification? No. We are not even consulted.

Now, let me give the House the terms of the agreement entered into between Alexander E. Groesbeck, Governor of Michigan, on behalf of the state, and Sir Henry Thornton, directing executive of the Canadian National Railway, on behalf of the railway, with respect to the removal of Canadian National Railway tracks on north Woodward avenue, and the surrender of a charter enjoyed by the company in perpetuity:

1. That the Canadian National Railway would deed to the state of Michigan a valuable strip of right of way some twelve to fifteen miles in length between the northern borders of Detroit and the city of Pontiac so that a certain street widening undertaking might be undertaken, and that the Canadian National Railway would accept instead a certain much less valuable right of way.

2. That the Canadian National Railway pay to the state of Michigan taxes of about—

The taxes up to the present are $25,000. The courts, both state and federal, as I have already said, have decided that the franchise is perpetual. What has Sir Henry Thornton agreed to? He has signed, sealed and delivered an agreement to pay——$225,000 a year instead of $25,000 a year, the amount paid for the past twenty-five or thirty years on the line in question, the larger amount to cover the cost of the new right of way to be given by the state.

The third clause of this "showdown" agreement provides:

That the Canadian National Railway forever thereafter pay to the state of Michigan a tax commensurate with the value of the right of way in point, the initial amount to be $200,000 a year, based on the assessment.

Sir Henry Thornton's concession of one of the most valuable rights of way owned by the Canadian National Railways in any part of the territory traversed by that line between Detroit and Chicago, and his surrender to Governor Groesbeck of the perpetual charter which became the property of the Canadian National Railways with the acquirement of the old Grand Trunk lines, is generally regarded in Detroit as an epoch-making event in railroad policy. It is apparent that the city of Detroit and the administration at Lansing have had many experiences with the Canadian National Railways similar to the experiences of Toronto and Ontario. In Detroit, as in Ontario, Sir Henry Thornton has stood in adamant determination against all proposals looking to the relief of congestion, the protection of life by the elimination or guarding of level crossings, the construction of a new station—Toronto's old union station is a palace compared with the present Detroit station. As a result of the triumph of Governor Groesbeck over Sir Henry Thornton, hon. members will not be surprised to learn that the expectation of those close to city and state administrations is that the vigorous assertion of public rights will result in remedies for all these difficulties with the Canadian National Railways. After all this, the House perhaps will deem it quite natural that the state of Michigan is going to make Sir Henry Thornton electrify the system.

The special charter surrendered by Sir Henry Thornton was not long ago interpreted by the courts as a perpetual one, and as such it limited the taxes payable to the state by the Detroit, Grand Haven and Milwaukee, the Canadian National Railways subsidiary concerned in the deal, to $25,000 a year. Now the company will be obliged to continue the payment of the $25,000 a year and in addition to pay $200,000 a year until the cost of the right of way to be handed over to the company by the state is liquidated. And then, according to the agreement: "The said railroad company shall become subject to the general railroad tax laws of the state," which means that a tax of probably upwards of $200,000 will annually become due and payable. The value of the charter being surrendered would be difficult to determine. It limited the taxes of the Detroit, Grand Haven and Milwaukee to $25,000 a year. Capitalizing the difference between that amount and the amounts that will now have to be paid would give the charter in point of value so many millions of dollars that to count them would make one dizzy.

And what did Governor Groesbeck undertake to give Sir Henry Thornton in consideration of these valuable concessions? The agreement reads:

> In view of the foregoing, the legal abandonment by the state of any right to take over the property of the Detroit Grand Haven and Milwaukee by condemnation or otherwise will be assured to the company.

That was all, and the deal, tremendous as it is so far as financial considerations are concerned, is but the beginning, Detroiters say, of a plan to demand genuine service from the Canadian National Railways, and to extract from the company every last penny of taxes on all lines and properties.

It is evident, Mr. Speaker, that under the new agreement all Grand Trunk rights in the state of Michigan can be expropriated at any time. The Grand Trunk formerly had a perpetual charter, but this they have now surrendered, and the state of Michigan can come along at any time and expropriate the railway, which they had no power to do before. I might mention that the value of the real estate involved is worth from 20 to 30 millions: that is the potential value of the right of way given to Michigan. One of the little things in this connection that the people of Detroit have in mind is a scheme to force the company to install a new type of electric power car, operated by a Diesel engine, with crude oil for fuel, the object being to insist that the Grand Trunk which enters the city at strategic points render a suburban service commensurate with the size and growth of Detroit. I understand that Ottawa and many other cities are also agitating for this new type of power car. Mr. Speaker, I place the onus on the railway commission of this country for having allowed the president of the Canadian National Railways to give up this very valuable charter right sweeping to one side the Railway Act and all the decisions of the courts which protected that railway for all time to come, and subjecting itself to the laws of the state of Michigan and to these increased taxes. It has been done entirely without the authority of parliament, just as was this skyscraper proposition and the Rouyn railway that was mentioned the other day, and if this kind of thing is allowed to go on we might just as well say that there is no such thing as responsible government in this country. No wonder the National railways are running behind. I hope the day will never come when any member of the government or any member of this House or anyone outside will try to interfere with the administration of the National railways, which should be run from the commercial aspect. The president of the road is appointed to manage the railway and he is given a free hand, but he is not empowered by parliament to go over the head of parliament and the railway commission and spend millions and millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money on capital account without the representatives of the people being consulted.

Mr. FINLAY MacDONALD (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, as one of the new members of the House may I be permitted to join in the general chorus of congratulation to yourself on your re-election to the high office of Speaker? Long before I was elected to parliament I knew you by reputation; I had heard of your fairness, ability and impartiality. Since I have been in the House I have had opportunities of observing these things for myself, and I have learned that your decisions are always just and, particularly so far as the younger members are concerned, tempered with mercy. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that that fund has not been exhausted, because it is within the bounds of probability that I shall make a draft or two upon it before I sit down.

I believe the advice usually given to the younger members by older and more experienced parliamentarians is that during their first session at least they should preserve a discreet silence. That, I think, is very good advice, because naturally a new member coming to this House feels himself somewhat under restraint, feels himself sitting in the seats of the mighty for the first time, and naturally he should give himself an opportunity to get more or less acclimated to the somewhat rarified atmosphere of this chamber. That admonition I would be only too glad to heed; I would be only too well satisfied to preserve a silence during my first session in parliament, but unfortunately, possibly because there have been so many new members and all have evidently felt the urge to deliver their message to the House, the advice has been more or less disregarded; the new members, comprising probably half the membership of the House, have nearly all contributed to the current political literature of the country. That may have been partly due to the uncertainty prevailing in government circles and to the uncertain future of this parliament. Possibly they have felt that if they did not deliver their message at this session there might be no other opportunity of doing so.

A particularly gratifying feature that I think distinguished all the speeches was that members coming to this House spoke as representing the whole of Canada, realizing that when they took their seats in parliament they no longer represented merely the restricted areas that elected them, but every part of this great and glorious country. We have been enabled to bring to the attention of this chamber the various problems that are troubling different sections of the country, and although I come from Nova Scotia I feel that I should take as deep an interest in the problems of the western country as in those of my own province. I have been particularly pleased since coming to this House to find such a sympathetic and hearty response from the representatives of the other provinces, particularly those of the west, who have been always ready to hear and to consider the problems of the Maritimes. I might refer to the admirable speech of the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Church), and particularly to the speech delivered by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross) a day or so ago, in which, although representing a western constituency and feeling his chief interest bound up in western affairs, he said that he was prepared to consider sympathetically those Maritime problems that we are bringing to the attention of this House.

This problem that goes by the name of Maritime rights has been before the House on several occasions. Many hon. members on both sides have indicated their willingness to help in the solution of Maritime province problems, but they have all said they want to know exactly what those problems are. They want us to condescend to particulars, as the lawyers say; to tell this House what our troubles are down there, what the causes may be, and what parliament should do to provide a remedy. Possibly there is some ground for the criticism that we have not been definite enough in outlining exactly what it is that bothers us in the Maritimes; and in the time that I shall trespass on the patience of the House I hope to give hon. members as clear an idea as I can on these points: First, what the present condition of the Maritime provinces is; secondly, what in my opinion the causes are, that have led to that condition; and thirdly, what remedy should be applied.

I should like to impress upon hon. gentlemen the seriousness of the situation in the Maritime provinces; I refer now particularly to the province of Nova Scotia. I am not so well conversant with the problems of the other two Maritime provinces, but I do profess to know something about those of my own province of Nova Scotia. This matter of Maritime rights is not political propaganda. It is a movement on the part of the people of that section of the country, originated for the purpose of getting clear of certain disabilities under which they labour, disabilities which must be removed if we are not to fulfil the destiny that was predicted by the opponents of confederation—that we would become mere hewers of wood and drawers of water for the other provinces.

I am not going to delve very deeply into statistics. Like my hon. friend the member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury), I have not very much confidence in statistics, because you can prove nearly anything by figures; but I am going to use them slightly for the purpose of bringing home one or two points that I shall have to make. In the first place I want to tell the House something about the present condition of the province of Nova Scotia. The matter has been before the House on one or two other occasions, but I do not think hon. members yet have a very clear idea of the desperate condition in which that province now finds itself. The debt of Nova Scotia has been multiplied by ten during the last twenty-five years. In 1900 its liabilities amounted to $4,059,517, but on September 30, 1925 they had reached a total of $40,130,119. In 1900 the funded debt of the province was $3,776,033 and in 1925 it was $35,267,927. That progress has been accelerated during the last three years. From 1922 to 1925 we have gone in debt in Nova Scotia at the rate of $5,000,000 a year. The debt of a province is not a very serious thing if the value of its assets continues to advance proportionately. But such is not the case in Nova Scotia. We find our debt increasing, we find our assets diminishing and our sources of wealth growing less year by year. Our revenue in the province is chiefly derived from our coal. In 1921 we produced about 5,734,928 tons of coal. In 1923 the production amounted to 6,597,838 tons, and in 1925 it dropped to 3,842,166 tons. In addition to the fact that our debt has increased, our chief source of revenue has been falling off at an alarming rate. Our second great source of wealth in Nova Scotia is our fisheries. In 1920 they were worth $12,742,459; in 1922 they had dropped to $10,209,258, and in 1924 to $8,777,251. These statistics, which are all that I am going to quote, will give hon. members some idea of the present financial position of that province. In addition to that, Nova Scotia has suffered, just as all other provinces of Canada have suffered, from an exodus. I have no statistics on this point, but I do know from actual observation that in my own city of Sydney the passports issued by the United States consul have amounted to about 500 a month. This is a heavy drain on the manhood and womanhood of our part of the country.

When we entered confederation Nova Scotia was represented in this House by twenty-one members. To-day we have but fourteen. During the past year, in the industrial centre which I have the honour to represent—situated in the richest mineral county in the whole of Nova Scotia—we had nothing but destitution and suffering, soup kitchens and bread lines. About a year ago that matter was discussed here in parliament and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Duff)—I am sorry he is not in his seat to-night, because I am going to have something to say to him—made certain statements regarding that condition of affairs. What I have said will give hon. members of this House a glimpse of conditions that prevail in Nova Scotia. Now what are the causes? A great many people attribute the present condition of affairs in that province to our union with Canada. At the time of the union Nova Scotia was in a very prosperous and happy condition, a condition which has already been described by previous speakers in this House. Its ships sailed the seven seas, and its large mercantile establishments and warehouses played an important part in the commercial life of that province. There was, as hon. members are aware, great opposition to confederation in the province of Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia was forced into confederation because the two provinces of Quebec and Ontario were deadlocked. They could not get along combined and they could not get along separately; so that outside territory had to be brought in to solve their legislative troubles. In order to bring about a solution we say that Nova Scotia was sacrificed, and we have been paying for that union ever since. So bitter was the opposition, generated no doubt by the method that was adopted to force that province into confederation, that for years after the consummation of the union, on the first of July in every year the opponents of the union hoisted their flags at half mast. That opposition has not yet died out. Twenty years after confederation the Right Hon. W. S. Fielding, then Premier of Nova Scotia, swept the province on the cry of repeal. Major Hume Cronyn, an exceptionally well qualified man to judge, formerly a member of this House—he attained the reputation of being one of the ablest men who ever sat in parliament,—was a member of the Duncan commission and he was sympathetic towards the wants of the Maritime provinces. In his report he says:

> Let us consider but two of these consequences.

I am going to read just now this particular reference to the major point I am discussing.

> We in Ontario are accustomed, if not hardened, to the accusation made in the prairie provinces that the east treats the west unfairly; but the sense of grievances unredressed which prompts this charge is as nothing to the depth of feeling which exists in the Maritimes against the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec. That resentment is of old standing and one of its causes is the belief that the Atlantic provinces were more or less cajoled into confederation by promises and alluring prospects which have failed of fulfilment. It is indeed not going too far to say that the tie of sentiment which binds Nova Scotia to the Dominion has worn very thin.

I do not know that the hon. members are particularly impressed with the seriousness of the situation. It is just possible that they may ridicule the feeling that exists in Nova Scotia and pay no attention to the warnings that may be given to them. But I wish to read for the information of the House a telegram which appeared in the Ottawa Journal the other day, dated Amherst, February 18:

> The possibilities of commencing a secession movement in the Maritime provinces were to-day informally discussed by a handful of local business men, headed by one Walter H. Tennant, a prominent manufacturer of this town. It was stated that a meeting to formally debate the topic would be called at an early date, and Mr. Tennant was authorized to secure a speaker and arrange the details of the meeting.

I desire to read another letter which appears in the last issue of Toronto Saturday Night, dated Truro, February 3, as follows:

> To the Editor of Saturday Night.
> I read your editorial in Saturday Night, and while I am a Maritime man I agree with nearly everything you say. To my mind it is the greatest folly to try and force western grain through Maritime ports. On every million bushels so shipped Canada has to pay at least $50,000,000 in extra haulage. Maritime people are accustomed to say,, "Let the country pay as long as we get the benefit," but that is no argument and should not be considered. As you say, water will seek its level, and so this grain trade will and should find its way to the seaboard by the shortest and cheapest route no matter whether through Canadian or American ports.

But, Mr. Editor, let me say that the Maritime provinces can never attain their utmost prosperity in Canada. Just as sure as the sun will rise to-morrow morning, so certain it is that we will some day be affiliated in some way with the United States. That is our certain destiny. We have sent from these provinces the very best of our manhood to that country, and the majority of those who remain are looking with longing eyes in the same direction.

C. P. BLANCHARD.

I am not reading that because I have any sympathy with the views therein expressed. Many of us are Canadians and hope to remain Canadians, but we would not be doing our duty to our fellow Canadian citizens if we failed to call attention to these indications of the trend of feeling in the Maritime provinces. If an agitation or movement of that sort starts, it is difficult to say just where it will end. Although it may lack leadership just now, no movement fraught with such hope for success would lack that leadership very long.

I do not for one think that confederation is the sole cause of our present problems in Nova Scotia, but confederation, the union of Nova Scotia with the rest of Canada, let loose in that province certain economic forces that are largely responsible for those problems. The two provinces of Quebec and Ontario were very much larger and wealthier than the little province of Nova Scotia. Very shortly after confederation the competition from those upper provinces wiped out the industries of the lower provinces, and the wholesale offices and business concerns of the upper provinces very speedily put out of existence all the commercial houses of Nova Scotia. To-day you have in the Maritime provinces a market of a million people, practically controlled by the two provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Surely it is worth while for Quebec and Ontario to make some sacrifice in order to retain that market, and that sacrifice we are going to ask them to make.

Certain other results followed from that union, possibly the most important of all being the draining of the financial resources of Nova Scotia to the central provinces of Quebec and Ontario. Twenty-five years ago we had in Nova Scotia half a dozen banks—small ones, it is true, but each serving certain business interests in a restricted area. The bankers of those days were like country dealers; they knew all the resources of their customers, whose friends they were, and they were able to advise their customers on all matters of interest to them. But what has happened? To-day we have not one bank in Nova Scotia. All our banks have been merged, gobbled up, and their headquarters moved to Toronto or Montreal. The result of this—and I venture to say it is largely the cause of the agitation for Maritime rights—was disclosed when a year or two ago an attempt was made by various municipalities to make those banks pay a fair rate of taxation. It was then learned that all the savings deposits in those banks were transferred to headquarters in Montreal or Toronto and invested from there. In that way practically all the financial resources of Nova Scotia have been drained out of that province and are managed to-day from Montreal or Toronto by this small number of wealthy men who, it is alleged, control all the financial interests of Canada. I have no doubt hon. members have received this extract which I hold in my hand from an address delivered by the general manager of the Royal Bank of Canada at its annual meeting in which he paid particular attention to this idea and set forth the benefits to Canada of having big banks with branches spread throughout the country. That may be all right in theory, but in practice it has been fatal to Nova Scotia.

Following our money went our industries. The greatest industry we have to-day in eastern Canada is the British Empire Steel Corporation, and it should be a purely local concern. It was started in 1893 when all the little mines in the county of Cape Breton were merged in the Dominion Coal Company. From that a still larger merger was effected in the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, and two or three years ago the British Empire Steel Corporation was formed, the headquarters of that institution being moved to the city of Montreal. The result is that we have the principle of absentee landlordism in our greatest industry in the east. We have had trouble recurring every year. Why? Because the executive of that corporation are a thousand miles away from the men who earn their money for them. We think if we had a local executive rubbing shoulders with the men and entering into their interests, a great deal of the cause of all this trouble would be wiped out. I had as one of my opponents in the last election the labour leader, Mr. James B. McLachlin, who contested that constituency on no other ground than opposition to the Besco. He did not receive a vote apart from those of employees of that corporation, yet he polled 3,600 votes.

A third cause, which is possibly as important as any, was the fact that we had in Nova Scotia a local government that had long outlived its usefulness, that had existed there for forty-three years with no other purpose and aim than to keep itself in power. It became at last nothing more or less than a sort of glorified Tammany organization. It paid no attention to anything except fixing its own political fences, building its own organization from the small municipal corporation and town meetings up to the government of Halifax itself. I was never so impressed with the uselessness of that organization as when I met a number of our Progressive friends and found out at a conference just what Alberta was doing. Labouring under greater handicaps than I think we have in Nova Scotia, they sent out a trade commission with the result that they are getting year by year in the other provinces a larger market for their coal. That is due to good salesmanship and to giving to the people of Alberta proper government. No such effort as that was ever made by the local government of Nova Scotia.

We do not want any commissions in Nova Scotia; we know exactly what we want down there and there is a fairly strong determination on the part of the people of that province to get it. This Maritime rights matter is not Tory propaganda at all, and I cannot put it more concisely than it was put by the late Premier of Nova Scotia—a Liberal premier remember—Mr. Armstrong. About a year ago conditions then were not as desperate as they are now, but they were nevertheless, as Mr. Armstrong said, very disturbing and very alarming. He headed a delegation of business men from the whole province, Liberals and Conservatives joining hands and coming to Ottawa to lay their case before the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of Canada. Some result followed in an increase in the duty on slack coal and a reduction on bituminous coal. It was of some benefit, but it did not meet the needs of the province, and I cannot do better than read to the House the summary of the memorandum presented by Mr. Armstrong to this government. I ask the House to bear in mind the fact that this was a Liberal premier who knew the circumstances of his province and who was asking for certain reforms. The summary reads:

The deputation, to summarize their representations, can only repeat that the condition of the allied coal and steel industries in Nova Scotia, and the varied interests that are dependent thereon, is truly desperate, and they can see no hope of relief from present difficulties, nor any hope of permanent prosperity in Nova Scotia unless remedies are applied by the government, which alone has the power to take the necessary action.

It is not possible to exaggerate the calamitous consequences to Canada should coal mining in Nova Scotia be permitted to decline until it should play no important part in the fuel supply of the Dominion.

Not only would absence of native competition against imported coal eventually raise the price of coal in Canada, but a state of abject dependence upon another country for an indispensable material, would become permanent after Nova Scotia had ceased to give eastern Canada some measure of self-reliance in coal supply.

We believe the government recognizes this fundamental necessity to maintain the allied coal and steel industries, and therefore ask that the requests contained in the foregoing memorandum be granted. Briefly summarized these are as follows:

1. Revision of the customs tariff upon coal to include:

(a) Adjustment of the duty on slack bituminous coal to at least the present duty on round bituminous coal, and inclusion under the same duty of anthracite dust and screenings.

(2) Imposition of the duty upon coal used in steel making and metallurgical processes, now exempt from duty.

(c) Amplification of the subvention upon rail carriage of Nova Scotia coal to include water carriage beyond Montreal, and of railway fuel now exempted from the subvention. Raising of the maximum amount of assistance on any given freight rate from the existing limit of fifty cents per ton to one dollar per ton. Extension of the subvention for a period of years.

(d) Assistance in establishment of coking plants using Canadian coal for manufacture of domestic fuel.

Last year the government prepared a bill for the production of this fuel but it did not present it to the House. We hope that this year this government will have courage enough to bring it down, and we promise it very cordial support, at least from the Nova Scotia members. What is wanted, in the second place, is:

A revision of the customs tariff upon iron and steel and their products, in which consideration will be given to the difficulties now hampering the steel works in Nova Scotia, which include the following:

I need not go into that because a discussion of the point will be more appropriate when the budget debate comes up. I want however to bring home to the government just what we are asking for in Nova Scotia. Where can we look for redress, Mr. Speaker? We have three members from Nova Scotia supporting the present government, one of whom is the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) and another the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), who addressed the House a few days ago and rather ridiculed the idea that has been put forward by the Maritime righters. The hon. gentleman made an excellent speech, which I listened to with great interest from beginning to end. It was what might be called a fighting speech, and a fighting speech is one that is distinguished by courage. And I must say that the hon. gentleman from Queens-Lunenburg on that occasion displayed considerable courage, courage which at times rose almost to the pitch of recklessness. I admired his speech very much, I say; but it seemed to me that the hon. gentleman must be a somewhat credulous person. He made a lot of statements which I have no doubt he heard and accepted in good faith but which were rather startling, to say the least, to anyone acquainted with the facts. The first statement of his which struck me was this, that only after the Tories came into power in 1911 did we have any trouble in the Cape Breton mines. I may inform the hon. gentleman that since 1867, since confederation in fact, we have never had any trouble in Cape Breton, we have never had any strikes, lockouts, riots or anything else, while there was a Conservative government in power. Another statement the hon. member made which requires correction was one which was often repeated during the last local election, namely, that the Tories of Nova Scotia advised the miners to stay out on strike and fight and that the matter would be straightened out and the miners would be helped when the Conservative party came into power. There is absolutely no justification for any such statement as that; it had its origin in the editorial room of a discredited Grit paper in Sydney. No Conservative speaker of any standing and no Conservative newspaper ever directly or indirectly held out such an inducement as that.

The hon. gentleman said he was opposed to higher coal duties. He has, I suppose, a perfect right to his own opinion, but I do not think he fairly expresses the public opinion of Nova Scotia. He was against the Canadian National Railways buying Nova Scotia coal if they could get cheaper coal elsewhere, and in that, I suppose, he was simply following out what the government said when they gave, through the Canadian Press, on May 29, 1922, the following statement:

> Preference was given to Canadian coal, but where American coal, including duty, could be delivered at certain Canadian points more cheaply than Canadian coal, the railway management took the attitude that they would continue to purchase to the best advantage.

That is not the wish of Nova Scotia. Another bit of wisdom that dropped from the lips of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg was that he thought the government interfered too much in private business. I have heard that remark before. I have only to say that while I have not been in this House very long, yet after listening to the charges made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), and hearing some of the evidence given before the Customs committee, now investigating those charges, I have come to the conclusion that the government is not interfering quite enough in some private business. However, I suppose that depends on the point of view.

We have another representative from Nova Scotia in the person of the hon. member for Antigonish-Guysborough, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald). Of course, unfortunately for us he does not now represent a coal county; but in 1921 he was running an election in a coal county, and we have on record the promises and pledges that he then made to the constituents of Pictou riding. He promised if elected to move a resolution for a higher duty on coal, and on iron and steel; that he would secure them lower rates on the Intercolonial from New Glasgow and Pictou to Montreal; he went further, he said he was going to take the Intercolonial away from the Canadian National Railways. In moving terms he pictured the destitution and sorrow that had visited the homes of the miners in Pictou county, and he led them to believe that his return to the House of Commons as their representative would result in a golden era —their dark and desolate homes would be flooded with sunshine. A short time ago we had that hon. gentleman declaring in this House that he was not now in favour of a higher duty on coal or on steel. The hon. gentleman, apparently recognizing and remembering the promises he made in 1921, and no doubt having in mind the sign that is posted up on most industrial institutions throughout Nova Scotia, the sign of "safety first," did not go back to the county of Pictou for re-election, but sought a comparatively safe refuge in Antigonish-Guysborough.

I am afraid we cannot look to hon. gentlemen opposite for any remedy for our ills. I have before me a copy of the bill that they introduced last year to encourage the production of domestic fuel from coal mined in Canada. I hope they will reintroduce it this session and place it on the statute books. But our main hope must depend on the great consideration and keen sympathy that we have received from our Progressive friends. I trust that when they come to prepare the budget for the government—as prepare it they will—they will crystallize into legislation in a practical form all the promises they have been making to us. I envy them the proud position they occupy in this House. But more than anything else, I envy them their apparently unquenchable optimism that, despite their knowledge of the many unredeemed promises of this government, they are really going to get what is now promised them in the Speech from the Throne.

I have in my hand certain resolutions passed by the agricultural societies of Nova Scotia. In addition to the mining and fishing population we have a very fair number of people engaged in agriculture. The present provincial government has already devoted some attention to local affairs. One of the much needed facilities we desire to have provided is a cold storage system extending throughout the province. But probably it will be more appropriate to discuss this question when the budget proposals come before the House.

I do not think I have anything further to add, Mr. Speaker, than this: I should like the House to understand that the situation in the Maritimes is really serious. A movement is on foot down there that will have disastrous results for the Dominion unless this government wakes up to the gravity of the situation and brings in some ameliorative legislation that will go far to remove the disabilities that I have brought to the attention of the House.

On motion of Mr. MacNutt the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the House adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

Friday, February 26, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BRANCH LINES—STATEMENT OF WORK AND EXPENDITURE

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): I desire to lay on the table a report in duplicate of branch line construction expenditure as follows:

Summary of work done and actual expenditure to end of year 1925, also during the calendar year 1925, on the various branch lines of the Canadian National Railways, authorized to be constructed under chapters 14-32 inclusive of 14-15 George V, and chapters 5 and 7, of 15-16 George V.

Also detail of expenditures incurred and work done, as well as estimate of expenditure proposed during 1926. This statement is intended to replace the provisional report, with estimated expenditure, previously made by the management in order to comply with the requirement of the act as to return to parliament, which report was brought down Tuesday, February 16th, by Mr. Lapointe.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does my hon. friend include in that report expenditures on the Rouyn railway?

Mr. ROBB: I have not read the report. It came over from the department and I tabled it.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

Annual report of the National Gallery of Canada for the year 1925.—Hon. Mr. King.

LOCARNO TREATY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Can the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) tell me when the correspondence relating to the Locarno treaty will be laid before the House?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Leader of the House): Correspondence with the British government is still being exchanged. We are asking permission to make the whole correspondence public but we have not yet been able to secure it. We are still communicating.

FORT ALEXANDER INDIAN RESERVE

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Yesterday the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Hay) asked a question with reference to the sale or lease of the Fort Alexander Indian reserve to the Manitoba Pulp and Paper Company. I find that on the 30th day of January, 1923, the Fort Alexander band surrendered an area of 520 acres in the extreme southeastern portion of the reserve, for lease to the Manitoba Pulp and Paper Company, Limited. The lease subsequently issued for a period of ninety-nine years, at an annual rental of $1,040. On the 23rd day of January this year the band surrendered for sale to the Manitoba Pulp and Paper Company, Limited, an area of 390 acres, in the same part of the reserve, at a price mutually agreed upon of $40 per acre, cash. Of this area 304 acres are embraced in the portion previously surrendered for leasing. This land was originally leased and later sold to the Manitoba Pulp and Paper Company, Limited, as a mill site in connection with the extensive operations which this company proposes to carry on in that section of the province of Manitoba. All financial transactions in connection with this matter have been promptly carried out as agreed to. Both surrenders referred to above were approved by a majority of the voting members of the Fort Alexander band.

EMBARGO ON GRAIN SHIPMENT

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): I desire to ask the Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Robb) a question arising out of a letter which I received from the secretary of the village of Kelvington, Saskatchewan, dated February, 22, 1926. Kelvington is a village on the Canadian National railway in northern Saskatchewan. For a couple of months past there has been an embargo on the loading of grain and shipments out of this point have been at a standstill, with a few exceptions where carload lots have been shipped out on a permit. He further complains that at Rose Valley, their nearest competitive point, the Canadian Pacific Railway have been handling grain right along, resulting in many farmers who would normally haul to Kelvington going to Rose Valley. There has been shipment of grain on the Canadian Pacific railway while there has been an embargo on shipment by the Canadian National railway. He further points out that all the grain shipped via the Canadian Pacific railway is routed through Quebec, and that the Canadian Pacific Railway have put into effect a reduced rate to the city of Quebec. My informant wishes to know if the government have any information to give us on this matter, and if they are in a position to say why it is the Canadian National Railways are not permitted to ship grain to the city of Quebec as well as the Canadian Pacific Railway, and why there is this discrimination. Has the minister any information?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Railways): My hon. friend knows as well as I do, and as all hon. members in this House interested in the grain trade know, that due to the congestion in the elevators there has been an embargo on the shipment of grain both to the Pacific coast and to the Atlantic coast. I am not sure that a very great quantity of grain is en route to Quebec, because the last reports I had of the elevator in Quebec just after the close of navigation was that very little space was available. I shall, however, direct the attention of the operators of the Canadian National Railways to the matter and try to get my hon. friend a more definite reply on Monday.

Mr. CAMPBELL: A great deal of the grain in that particular section of the country is damp and tough, and if it is delayed very much longer in transit to the port, very serious loss will ensue to the farmer.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has brought up a new question, that of damp grain. That feature of it was brought to the attention of the Department of Trade and Commerce some time ago by the grain commission who stated that the yards at Fort William were congested with damp grain and that unless some method was adopted of drying that grain before the weather began to get warm, there was danger of damage to the grain. I immediately communicated with Mr. Beatty of the Canadian Pacific and Sir Henry Thornton of the Canadian National asking them to co-operate with a view to drying the grain at Fort William and I understand that they are now doing so.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): In regard to that, may I suggest to the minister that the drying of grain at Fort William depends on the facilities there for drying it, that is, on the number of hospital elevators that exist there and there might be a shortage of the facilities if a great flow came.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask the Minister of Finance how many departments he is acting minister of now?

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

INVERNESS RAILWAY

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): May I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce in his capacity as Acting Minister of Railways (Mr. Robb) if he would be so kind as to table the correspondence in connection with the Inverness railway.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Railways): If there is any correspondence I shall be glad to table it.

AUSTRALIAN TREATY

BOUNTY ON BUTTER EXPORTED FROM COMMONWEALTH

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I know the Minister of Finance is a very busy man, but I should like to ask him if any reply has been received from the government of Australia regarding the bonus on butter to which I directed his attention yesterday. If not, would the minister place before the House the nature of the communication sent by this government to the government of Australia?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): I think my hon. friend must have misunderstood me as I never said that we had communicated with the government of Australia. We communicated with our trade commissioner at Melbourne, Australia, and I gave my hon. friend the information yesterday. I notice Hansard got the wrong interpretation to the answer.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I would like to direct the minister's attention to the statement made by the Minister of Agriculture on Monday last that he understood the Minister of Finance was in communication with the government of Australia in regard to the matter.

Mr. ROBB: With Australia. We have a commissioner there who acts for Canada.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Thursday, February 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. C. Elliott for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed motion of Mr. Bird: "That this question be now put."

Mr. G. T. MacNUTT (Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address this House for the first time with no small degree of diffidence. Due, however, to your charm of manner, your dignity and the courtesy that you have shown to other new members who have preceded me, my task is made very much lighter. May I too, even at this late date in common with many other hon. members, convey to you my sincere felicitations on your elevation to the honourable and exalted position of chief commoner in this the fifteenth parliament of Canada?

Having listened with a great deal of pleasure throughout this debate to hon. gentlemen from all parts of this vast Dominion who have discussed questions of paramount importance to this country, I have observed that many new members have taken the opportunity of giving some of the impressions they have gained since coming into this House. May I be permitted to refer to a matter that impressed me perhaps more than any other, and in doing so, I wish it to be distinctly understood that it is not my intention to cast any reflections upon any party in this House nor to read a lecture to any hon. members. May I refer to what I think is altogether too common in this House and that is the too frequent interruption of hon. members who are addressing this assembly? In my judgment the dignity and prestige of parliament is very much impaired by this practice. It is unfair to the hon. gentleman who is addressing the Chair. It is unfair oftimes to the hon. member who makes the interruption which is not infrequently of a kind intended rather to embarrass the speaker than to edify the House. It is unfair to you Sir, as the Speaker, whose duty it is to endeavour at all times to maintain the dignity of the House. We have come here from different portions of Canada to try to solve problems of tremendous gravity which confront us today, and I do not believe the Canadian people have sent us here to practise what I may be permitted to term sledge-hammer politics. This, the first and highest court in this country, is a good place in which to practise the golden rule and it should be the endeavour of every hon. member to maintain as far as possible the dignity of this House.

During the past week the Australian treaty has been debated at great length in this chamber. The county of Colchester, Nova Scotia, which I have the honour to represent, is largely interested in the dairy business and I may be permitted to make a few observations concerning this treaty, which is of considerable importance to that county. Since coming here some weeks ago I have received very many letters from my constituents with reference to butter that has been coming into the province of Nova Scotia and forcing down the price of local butter to the farmers in the county at a time of year when it costs them more than at any other period to produce this commodity. These letters are not all from Conservatives, many of them coming from Liberals, and this will show that the question is not one of party. It is a matter of bread and butter to the farmers of that province. If the valorization scheme which has been proposed in Australia becomes law the dairy business in my province will be immediately ruined. The Pattersen scheme, which seems to be receiving a great deal of support in Australia, is not unlike the valorization plan in certain features, a plan which has worked to the advantage of the Brazilian coffee growers. It is proposed to levy a tax of 2 cents per pound on butter made in the creameries of Australia and to use the proceeds of that tax to pay a bonus of 6 cents per pound on each pound of butter exported from the country. How the Australian consumers will view this proposal we are not told though we can easily imagine what their attitude will be towards it. What concerns us in Canada is the fact that the Pattersen scheme makes it possible to lay down Australian butter in this country at 6 cents per pound less than its actual market value. In other words, a bonus of 6 cents per pound is provided to enable the Australian dairyman to undersell his Canadian cousin right in his own Canadian market. In the interests of the automobile business and of other manufacturers who are building up a good trade in Australia, it might have been necessary for our government to offer that country some inducements. But what were our farmer members doing to allow their interests to be sacrificed in such a manner? Is it more important to retain a party in power, or to preserve the interests of so very important a business as dairying in Canada? A few days ago when I expected to address the House on the Australian treaty I found that by agreement between the whips I was unable to take part then, and in the meantime I have taken the trouble to wire to one of my friends in the town of Truro, which is the county seat of Colchester, for information regarding the imported butter which was coming into that town. I am going to read to the House the information I got on the subject. I have the telegram here and as it is rather lengthy I have condensed it in order to make it more understandable. Now the freight rate on butter from Australia to Halifax is $1.75 per hundred pounds, while the rail freight from Halifax to Truro, a distance of 62 miles, is 41 cents per hundred pounds. The total cost of delivering Australian butter from that country to Truro is 2.16 or less than 2¼ cents per pound. Let us see what the farmers in that province are paying for the transportation of their products. My information is that it costs 20 cents per can for the railway transportation of 25 pounds of cream from Brookfield to the Truro creamery, a distance of eight miles, and the average test of this cream being 27 per cent butter fat, this can would give 6¾ pounds of butter, thus making the transportation charges to the farmer over a distance of eight miles approximately 3 cents per bound for his butter, while as I have said butter can be shipped from Australia to Truro at 2¼ cents per pound. The government should endeavour to stop the importation of butter from Australia and New Zealand at the present time because this butter is forcing the price of the local product down to a figure which returns no profit to the farmers. One good feature of the treaty, as I understand it, is that upon six months' notice from the government it may be cancelled. Well, surely enough has been shown in this debate to prove that the treaty is most injurious to the farmers of the country, and there should be no hesitation about cancelling it.

I have observed throughout this debate that hon. members from all parts of Canada have invariably discussed the questions which most interest them in their individual constituencies in their own provinces. Now I have the pleasure this afternoon of following the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald) who addressed the House last night in connection with Maritime rights, and I do not offer any apology for considering, for a time at least, this important question which transcends every other question not only in the province of Nova Scotia but in the Maritime provinces generally. Before proceeding however I want to offer my thanks to and express my very great appreciation of the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) who gave us such a splendid address a short time ago, for the compliment he paid me in reading to this House a manifesto issued by myself to the electors of Colchester county on September 26, 1925. I deem this a great honour, an honour which I believe no other gentleman in this House has thus far enjoyed this session. Let me state here on the floor of this House for the benefit of the hon. member that I stand here prepared to fulfil every pledge that I made to my constituents during that contest. The hon. member read portions of that manifesto, which is as follows:

> In accepting this nomination I wish to make it plain that if I am elected I will not be a political partisan.

Surely that is preferable to being a died in the wool partisan. Again:

> I will stand four square for the rights of Nova Scotia and the rights of the Maritime provinces.

Does my hon. friend see anything very wrong in that?

And again:

> I will stand four square for the rights of Nova Scotia and the rights of the Maritime provinces, and if the time should ever arrive when I must choose between the interests of my party and the interests of my native province, I pledge my word to the electors of Colchester and the people of Nova Scotia that the interests of my native province will always come first.

That was the platform I presented to the people of Colchester on October 29; that is the platform upon which I stand on February 26. I may go further and say that we have 23 members from the Maritime provinces on this side of the House who have subscribed to the same manifesto, and until our honoured leader refuses to implement the promises he made to the Maritime provinces, we intend to support him.

I think it was my good friend from Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) who stated recently that Maritime rights were nothing more than Tory propaganda. I hold in my hand the manifesto issued by my opponent in the county of Colchester. I wish the House to remember that he is a very clever barrister. The manifesto is very long and I shall detain the House with only a few extracts. He tells the people of Colchester:

> It is generally recognized that business conditions in Nova Scotia have been particularly unsatisfactory because of the great burdens placed upon our people and upon the natural industries of the province by the customs tariff devised by previous Conservative governments and since maintained in varying degrees by succeeding administrations.
> Just grievances also exist in railway matters created by previous Conservative governments and in justice to our people and the province such grievances must be righted.
>
> The farmer, lumberman and fisherman have been sacrificed, indeed every person other than half a dozen factory owners, specially privileged and subsidized by the customs tariff are feeling the pinch and finding it difficult to make ends week.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacNUTT: An hon. member opposite says, "Hear, hear." In the course of my remarks I shall deal with the half dozen "privileged factories" in my county to which the manifesto refers.

The young people are being forced by conditions in Nova Scotia to go to other parts of Canada and to the States in search of a livelihood.

I appeal for your support on a platform of Nova Scotia rights—

Nova Scotia rights, not Maritime rights.

—and a customs tariff suited to the peculiar needs of the province.

Those are the essential parts of the manifesto issued by my opponent to which I wish to draw the attention of the House.

Now let us for a moment look at the results of that manifesto. In 1921 the county of Colchester was represented in this House by a Liberal. In the October election—I do not wish to speak in any boastful spirit—my Liberal opponent, a good friend of mine, a very clever lawyer and a young man of unimpeachable character and great promise, barely saved his deposit; sixty-six per cent of the votes were polled for me. I think the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Doucet) gave the House particulars of the votes polled in the Maritime provinces last October. I wish, Sir, to give hon. members the figures for Nova Scotia. The Conservatives polled 125,656 votes; the Liberals, 92,737; Labour, 3,617, or a majority for the Conservatives of 30,000 over all other parties in the province.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Is the hon. gentleman including in the Conservative total the votes cast for himself?

Mr. MacNUTT: No. The figures I have given show approximately a majority of 30,000 for the Conservatives over the other two parties.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: My hon. friend does not understand my question. Is he including in the Conservative total the votes cast for himself in the Colchester election?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Why not?

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I thought he said he was not a Conservative candidate.

Mr. EDWARDS: You only thought you thought.

Mr. MacNUTT: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the acoustic properties of this chamber are so bad that I could not hear the hon. gentleman clearly. If he has any doubt as to where he will find me, I may tell him that he will not have long to wait. For the first time since confederation the number of Liberals elected in Nova Scotia was below the double figure. The Liberal party in that province was then annihilated and brought to the lowest depths in its history. I do not think any stronger evidence can be found of the great discontent prevailing in Nova Scotia against the Liberal party than is disclosed in the election returns which I have just given the House.

During the contest the leaders of the two great national parties visited the province. They both brought messages to us, and the vote recorded on October 29 tells how the people were impressed by those messages. The leader of the opposition had a message of hope and cheer for the Maritimes. He recognized the rights of those provinces in confederation. He sympathized with them in their handicaps and trials, and he had concrete proposals to make, enunciating a Canada first policy in connection with all that enters into the life of the country. Mr. Meighen assured the people of the Maritimes that he is with them in all their just demands, and he pointed out at Halifax and elsewhere, that the whole of Canada must share the geographical disadvantages under which we labour. A few days later the Prime Minister came to those provinces and delivered, if I remember correctly, three addresses. I had the privilege of hearing him at one of those meetings ask the now famous question: "What are Maritime rights? Tell us, so that we can deal with them." This, Mr. Speaker, only a few short months after a delegation, 220 strong, consisting of Liberals and Conservatives, had visited Ottawa at their own expense—at enormous expense on the whole—to impress on the government the rights demanded by those provinces. Following the visit of those two leaders, and the definite pronouncements which were made by them, the people voted, and upon that issue alone was the vote polled in that province. It is pleasing indeed, Mr. Speaker, to know that after five years of agitation with other provinces of the Dominion we are receiving sympathy and the expression of a willingness to help us, as has been shown by the addresses here of many hon. members since the House opened. Since coming to this House I have been told by an eminent lawyer that no contractual rights the Maritime provinces enjoyed have been taken away from them. A strict reading of section 145 of the British North America Act might possibly afford some ground for that contention. But while it may be argued that the building of the Intercolonial railway may have been in accordance with the strict letter of the confederation pact it cannot be disputed that it was not in accordance with the spirit of that pact. Now, since some hon. members during the past week have stated that they were still endeavouring to ascertain the Maritime viewpoint I wish to be permitted to enlarge a little on the question of the confederation pact which was so ably dealt with by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith), and other hon. gentlemen from the Maritime provinces. I ask therefore to be permitted to read again section 145 of the British North America Act which is thus worded:

Inasmuch as the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have joined in a declaration the construction of the Intercolonial railway is essential to the consolidation of the union of British North America, and to the assent thereto of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and have consequently agreed that provision should be made for its immediate construction by the government of Canada:

Therefore, in order to give effect to that agreement, it shall be the duty of the government and parliament of Canada to provide for the commencement, within six months after the union, of a railway connecting the river St. Lawrence with the city of Halifax in Nova Scotia, and for the construction thereof without intermission, and the completion thereof with all practicable speed.

That is the letter of the confederation pact. Does any hon. gentleman here believe that those great Maritime province men who figured among the Fathers of Confederation would have agreed to enter into that pact with the mere promise that two streaks of steel should be laid from Halifax to the St. Lawrence river, through some five hundred miles of wilderness between Moncton and Quebec?

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to demonstrate the spirit of that confederation pact, and I want to read a few of the pledges which were given at the time of confederation. They have not previously been given to this House. The hon. member for Cumberland referred to one speech of Sir George Etienne Cartier. I wish to give a quotation from another of that statesman's speeches. Sir George, who was the leading delegate from Quebec at the conference which decided the union of the provinces of British North America in 1864, and which later resulted in the formation of this Dominion, made a speech at Halifax on September 12, 1864, on the necessity of having Nova Scotia in the union. I want hon. gentlemen to mark that without the consent of Nova Scotia at that time there would have been no confederation to-day. This is what he said, speaking for all the delegates:

I have heard since I have been in Halifax, the objection thrown out that you will be absorbed. It will be very easy for me to dispel such fears. I answer them by a question. Have you any objection to being absorbed in commerce? Halifax through the Intercolonial railway, will be the recipient of trade which now benefits Portland, Boston and New York.

If you are unwilling to do all in your power to bring to a satisfactory consummation this great question, you will force us to send all this trade which you ought to have, through American channels. Will the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick be better off because they are not absorbed by commerce or prosperity? It is as evident as the sun shines at noon that when the Intercolonial is built—and, it must necessarily be built if the confederation takes place,—the consequences will be that between Halifax and Liverpool, there will be steamers almost daily, leaving and arriving at the former. In fact it will be a ferry between Halifax and Liverpool. Let me assure you the promises we make in sincerity and good faith—in urging union upon you—we are doing that which will be for your happiness and prosperity.

That, Mr. Speaker, will be found in Whelan's account of the conference, at page 26; the volume is in the library of this building. That speech was sanctioned by all the members of the conference and was officially repeated in all the important cities of the four provinces. Is that not a binding condition of confederation? Is that not a compelling statement?

May I go further and refer to the Speech made by the Hon. George Brown, who spoke at that same conference as follows:

But far in advance of all other advantages would be this, that union of all the provinces would break down all trade barriers between us, and throw open at once to all a combined market of four millions of people. You in the east would send us your fish and your coals and your West India produce, while we would send you in return the flour and the grain and the meats you now buy in Boston and New York.

That will be found in Whelan's account of the conference, at page 36. There, Mr. Speaker, you have a definite pledge that Ontario and Quebec would take our fish and our coal. As I sat in my seat a short time ago listening to hon. members representing colliery towns of Cape Breton asking this government to bring from the province of Nova Scotia three or four carloads of coal per day for the next sixty days, in order to relieve the suffering in those colliery towns, I could not but think of those great men of other days and what they would have thought if they had been sitting in the gallery of this House and had heard the government refuse to carry that coal from Nova Scotia at a rate which another portion of this great Dominion is now enjoying. We have honoured those great men by erecting monuments to their memory, and they stand outside of this House to-day as silent witnesses of those promises made at the time of confederation. The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) has repeatedly told this House that the government is powerless to lift a hand in order to allow that coal to be moved from Nova Scotia, that the government cannot say a word to the management of the Canadian National railways. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if that position is a tenable one? I ask the members of this House, comprising 245 business men from all parts of this Dominion, would any one of you employ a manager to manage your business and you not be permitted to have some say regarding the managing of that business? Again, Sir Leonard Tilley at that same conference said:

The delegates of the lower provinces are not seeking this union.

You will find that at page 84 of Whelan's account of the conference. Sir George Etienne Cartier at a banquet given in 1864 to the conference enlarged on his Halifax speech as follows:

Canada has population and territory sufficient to make a great nation in course of time. But she wants what the Lower Provinces possess—an outlet to the sea. As the Lower Provinces now stand, they are comparatively weak and powerless—and the wealth, labour, and industry which Canada possesses, go, in a great measure to enrich such cities as New York, Boston and Portland. This must continue to be the case until the intercolonial railway, of which we have ever been an advocate, shall be built; and as soon as the Colonies are confederated, the construction of that work will undoubtedly commence.

Later, at Montreal on October the 28th of the same year, at a banquet, he said:

I must repeat to you what I stated while in the Lower Provinces, that while we possessed the personal and the territorial elements which go to constitute a nation, we were wanting in the maritime element. During six months of the year we had to knock at the door of our neighbour in order to carry on our trade. This cannot be tolerated. This confederation must be carried out.

Again:

With our prosperity we are enriching the American states, whereas we ought to be enriching our own states. We ought to be enriching such harbours as St. John and Halifax.

He said that what Canada wanted was an outlet to the sea, which the Maritimes possess. We all know that one of the greatest problems which had to be settled after the conclusion of the Great war was that all the hinterland countries of Europe were demanding corridors to the sea.

I would also like to refer to what Mr. John A., afterwards Sir John A. Macdonald, speaking at Halifax at the same time, said:

I don't hesitate to say that with respect to the Intercolonial railway, it is understood by the people of Canada—

That was Quebec and Ontario:

—that it can only be built as a means of political union for the Colonies. It cannot be denied that the railway, as a commercial enterprise, would be of comparatively little commercial advantage to the people of Canada. Whilst we have the St. Lawrence in summer, and the American ports in time of peace, we have all that is requisite for our purposes. We recognize, however the fact that peace may not always exist, and that we must have some other means of outlet if we do not wish to be cut off from the ocean for some months in the year. We wish to feel greater security—to know that we can have assistance readily in the hour of danger. In the case of a union, this railway must be a national work, and Canada will cheerfully contribute to the utmost extent in order to make that important link without which no political connection can be complete.

That will be found at page 45 of Whelan's account of the conference. I have many other references to what took place in those days, but I shall not weary the House with them. I have quoted enough to show that it was not the laying of two streaks of steel between Halifax and the St. Lawrence river that persuaded those great Maritime men to enter the union. It was those commitments, those sacred pledges, that persuaded them to enter. Those pledges could not be embodied in the British North America Act, but they form a part of the compact just the same. We in the province of Nova Scotia, if we have one thing more than another to boast about, and that we are always boasting about, it is the brainy men we have produced. We have given to this parliament three prime ministers. We have produced more college professors than any other place of its size on the North American continent; in fact, the only thing we are exporting to-day is brains. If these brainy men of the Maritimes of that day drove a hard bargain in regard to having the traffic of this country routed east and west, we must accept it. But we are told that in taking over the Grand Trunk Railway we have taken over their terminals at Portland and elsewhere. In my judgment Canada should not own and operate railways in a foreign country. Its lines in that foreign country should be disposed of, and our own railways made use of, according to the terms of the confederation pact.

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), at very great length, endeavoured to show this House that all our railway ills were brought upon us by the Conservative government. We do not care which government was responsible, but we do know that this Intercolonial, which was dear to the hearts of the Maritime people, has been obliterated; by an order in council passed by this government on the 4th October, 1922, it was taken away from us, attached to a take-over corporation, given another name, and its rate-fixing given to a commission. I submit that no government has the power to change the name of that railway and destroy its identity without our consent or without seeking permission to have the British North America Act repealed. I have searched the records since coming here, and I have been unable to find that any such petition has been presented to the Imperial throne.

If the British North America Act can be changed by order in council at the will of this government, then we ask that an order in council be issued forthwith restoring to Nova Scotia the twenty-one members we had at the time of confederation. We have fourteen members now, and at the rate we are losing them it will not be very long before we shall have a baker's half dozen. Has the British North America Act, the rock upon which this vast Dominion stands, become a mere scrap of paper? The greatest war this world has ever seen—and we hope the greatest war that we may ever see—was over what was considered a mere scrap of paper. Coming to this House a short time ago I was very much impressed with an inscription over the front entrance of this magnificent building. You have all seen it; it reads:

> The wholesome sea is at her Gates,
> Her Gates both East and West.

Does that inscription, carved deep into those massive stones over the entrance to this building, mean anything, or does it not? Is that province by the sea in the east, that province that is called the long wharf of Canada, to be used only in time of war and forgotten in time of peace? We have never shirked our share of the Canadian burden and never withheld our support from national enterprise. It was loyalty to British traditions and the desire to weld together the separate provinces of the British Dominion that made us eventually subscribe to confederation. When we find that confederation has strengthened the position of other provinces and weakened our own, does true patriotism demand that we should applaud? True patriotism begins at home. We cannot be patriotic Canadians without first being patriotic Nova Scotians. We cannot be patriotic Nova Scotians and not first seek to promote the welfare and the interests of our province. Rather, should we not insist that our provinces receive the benefits from confederation commensurate with those obtained by others? We cannot be expected to love the idea of unity better than our own hearth stones. Nova Scotia is our home. It is the land we love, the land of our fathers, and what a glorious heritage we have as Nova Scotians: wealth of sea, of forest, of mine, of fertile lands, and, better than all, a spiritual heritage from our fathers—God-fearing, thrifty, courageous pioneers. We in turn have accepted the responsibilities of the development which they began, but we are not developing. We are no longer thrifty. That once prosperous part of Canada, we regret to inform the House, is withering up. Many hon. gentlemen who preceded me have shown this House what a happy, contented and prosperous people we were when we became a partner in confederation. After the signing of the pact of 1867—and I do not believe this fact has been presented to this House yet—a petition bearing the signatures of 30,000 Nova Scotians was presented at the foot of the throne, praying that our province be not included in the confederation. Those great men who at that time took the petition to England were asked to return; we were advised to try it, and if it did not work satisfactorily to come back with our grievances. It has not worked out satisfactorily, Mr. Speaker, but we have never gone back. It is now up to this parliament, representing the people of Canada, to say whether we shall go back or not. We know what our rights are, and we may go to the highest authority in the empire to obtain them if necessary.

Is it possible that a question so vital to a portion of the Dominion is to be placed in the hands of a commission, as proposed in the Speech from the Throne? The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) has well said that where a canker exists in any portion of the Dominion it affects the whole Dominion, and it is the duty of the government to seek a remedy. During the sessions of 1924 and 1925 the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) warned the government what was going to happen down by the sea if no attention was paid to these warnings. History tells us that Nero fiddled while Rome burned. In the Speech from the Throne we are promised a commission to investigate rights that are already known. Conditions are too serious in those provinces to-day to have such matters as that hung up indefinitely in the hands of a commission. We do not want a commission, we want clear-cut, definite action. We want the repeal of the act which took away from us the Intercolonial railway, we care not what government passed it. The Intercolonial must be restored to its original status and used for the purpose for which it was built. We want to know if the Maritime provinces are partners in confederation or not. No longer are we going to tolerate the spectacle of empty harbours, idle elevators and rusting rails, while the immense trade of Canada is diverted over the territory and through the ports of a foreign country.

The constituency which I have the honour to represent is a railway centre, and hundreds of railwaymen have been driven out of that county on account of the policy inaugurated during the past few years by this government. Many men who were formerly conductors are now working as brakesmen, engineers have been put back as firemen, and these in turn have driven others out of the service, due to this policy of north and south instead of east and west.

We are told to-day by many that our geographical position is against us, but our geography is the same to-day as it was at the time those sacred commitments were made. We are pleased indeed—and I referred to this before—to hear so many expressions of sympathy from all portions of this House. We have already been invited by the Progressive group to join them in caucus and we have done so in order that they may be able better to understand our difficulties. I believe also we shall have the support of hon. members from that great province of Quebec, separated as we are by an invisible line, and knowing that what will benefit us will in like measure benefit them. I was pleased to hear the kind words expressed by you, Sir, in reference to Maritime matters a few days ago at a luncheon given by you, which I had the honour and privilege of attending. I can assure you that Maritime men who were present on that occasion were deeply moved by the sympathetic words expressed by you, and I for one wish that your voice could be heard to-day on the other side of this House.

At a meeting recently held in the city of Montreal, of the Shoe Manufacturers' Association, the Hon. L. A. Taschereau, Premier of Quebec, spoke as follows:

> "I believe," says Premier Taschereau, "every Canadian, whether he be in British Columbia, or Quebec, or Ontario, should join with the Martime provinces to give them what is necessary for them to live and thrive. They need cheap transportation. That perhaps was not the letter of the confederation pact, but it certainly was the spirit when the Intercolonial railway was built. Speaking as a Canadian, as a citizen of the province of Quebec, I have no hesitation in saying that it is the duty of those who govern Canada today to see that this important part of Canada (the Maritimes) is looked after and is satisfied."

Premier Taschereau thus gives a straightforward endorsement of the principal Maritime claims. He presents the issue to the Dominion government as one calling for action, thus seconding with all the weight attaching to his position, the decision of the Winnipeg conference, which called upon Ottawa to take whatever measures are necessary to place the Maritimes on all fours with the other provinces as regards opportunity for advancement, and a fair share of the benefits flowing from national policies and membership in the Canadian family.

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) some days ago endeavoured to show that the Conservative party between 1911 and 1921 had done nothing for the Maritimes and that all that had been done was done by the Liberals. It seems very strange that with the record of the two parties before the people in the recent election, the Liberal party should have been annihilated. The people of those provinces are not easily hoodwinked by false propaganda. I also wish to call the hon. member's attention to the fact that the Intercolonial railway was made a part of the Canadian National Railways on January 29, 1923, by an order in council passed on the fourth day of October, 1922. This order in council reads as follows:

> That the Canadian National Railway Company has been brought into existence by virtue of an order in council passed the fourth day of October, 1922, whereby certain persons were nominated directors of the company.

Note the date—October 4, 1922.

> That it is expedient to terminate the authority of said persons to act as general manager of the Canadian National Railways and to trust in lieu thereof the management and operation of the said railways to the company.

That is the record of how the Intercolonial railway as a unit of the Canadian National Railways was placed in the Canadian National Railway Company. That is the manner in which the King government by formal action alienated the control of the Intercolonial from the people of the Maritimes and placed that control in the hands of the Canadian National corporation, the president and directors of which dismembered the Intercolonial and gave the most profitable part of it over to the central region which they formed. When the King government came into power in 1921, the Canadian Government Railways, including the Intercolonial, were subject to the control of the responsible department. The Board of Railway Commissioners at that time had actually no power to fix rates on the Intercolonial, but in January, 1923, the King government made the Intercolonial a portion of the Canadian National railway system under the control of the corporation of which it was made a part. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg complains that the Conservative party was the originator of all our railway wrongs which appear to trouble him. Supposing, for the sake of argument, that that were admitted; what about the King government condoning those wrongs for four long years? Why did not some member of that eminent body of Nova Scotians known as the "solid sixteen" stand up for Nova Scotia rights in 1923 and tell the Prime Minister, when his order in council was in the making —"it shall not pass."

The hon. senior member for Halifax has referred to the statement of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg that the talk about Maritime rights was nothing but Tory propaganda. I think it was the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Pettit) who asked the question: If it was Tory propaganda, why was the appointment of a royal commission mentioned in the Speech from the Throne? I do not think the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg, if I remember correctly, answered that question. If this is Tory propaganda, so-called, I want briefly to refer to a manifesto issued to the electors of Nova Scotia prior to the provincial election in that province in June, 1925. This manifesto was issued by Premier Armstrong, then Liberal premier of that province, on the 6th day of June, 1925. Let me read that portion having reference to Maritime rights. He said:

> The government is pledged and determined to have the grievances of our province in its relation to the Dominion, removed, and all its just claims conceded—ascertained by adequate inquiry, as prepared and presented. I shall be able to secure favourable consideration for it from the present government and parliament of Canada.

Again on the 25th day of June, the morning of the election, there appeared the following in heavy type in the Morning Chronicle:

> So I appeal to Nova Scotians to stand shoulder to shoulder on this issue of supreme importance and to join with me in demanding from the federal government and parliament, prompt and adequate redress of wrongs that have far too long been endured.

And so on. If the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg calls Maritime rights Tory propaganda, what, may I say, does he call this manifesto issued by the Premier of Nova Scotia during that contest in June last?

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg also referred to a Tory senator having moved a woollen mill from Amherst to Truro. I knew the statement was incorrect at the time but I do not approve of interrupting any member who has the floor. However I have a thorough knowledge of every factory and business firm in the town of Truro and I knew that no such thing happened. The Stanfields acquired the woollen mills at Amherst and ran them successfully for a number of years until the Liberal government came into power in 1921 and began tinkering with the tariff. At that time the company employed 200 men while to-day there are two employed, a night and a day watchman. This statement can be verified by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith), and the fact is known to everyone from the Maritime provinces If the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg wishes to try his future at making cloth I can guarantee him that he will be able to buy this plant at a very low figure. The great firm of Stanfields' is a household word throughout Canada from the Yukon to Sydney and it appears in practically every wardrobe in this country. That industry during the last year has been running four days a week, the first time in its history that this has been necessary; and not only has it been operating four days a week but it has been employing from 150 to 200 hands fewer than in former years.

Some hon. member made the statement in this House the other day that we from the Maritime provinces were not here as suppliants asking for alms. That is well put; we do not ask for anything to which we are not entitled. We ask, nay we demand, a fulfilment of the pledges of confederation, the promises which constitute the unwritten terms of the British North America Act, promises which form an integral and essential part of the pact, whether they were embodied in the act or not. I have been asked by some of my friends, what do the Maritime provinces want? I answer that we want to be able to sell our products to the people to whom under confederation we should be able to sell, the central provinces of Canada. I think it was the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) who a few evenings ago said that he was endeavouring to get the Maritime point of view. He said:

> I have been honestly anxious to get the Maritime point of view. . . . I would like to concede to them a right for which the members at present representing the Maritime provinces seem to have made no demand, namely, the right to trade more freely with the world. I think if they would recognize that right and assert it, we in the west would be willing to concede it, to them, and that would go a very long way towards solving their difficulties.

The hon. member for Lisgar is very magnanimous; he is ready to supply us with a remedy for a grievance which he thinks we ought to have, in addition to those we have already stated to the House and the country.

Let it be understood that we in Nova Scotia have no objection to better trading terms with the rest of the world. But in view of the fact that all other nations practically have raised their tariff against us, how in the name of common sense can we, lowering ours still further, trade with the rest of the world? The hon. gentleman must remember that a solid sixteen from Nova Scotia were sent here on Maritime rights in 1921 and the result of their four years' effort was merely to raise the cry suggested by the hon. member for Lisgar. It is hard to understand his willingness to offer us something our people turned down when they defeated all but three of the solid sixteen from Nova Scotia.

There are in my judgment two fundamental requirements to meet the Maritime situation: first, Quebec and Ontario should be a market for our coal, steel, fish and other products which we can sell in those provinces; and secondly, the export and import trade of Canada should be made to flow east and west on the Canadian side of the line. It is not many years ago since the people of Vancouver decided that their claim should be recognized for a port there for the shipping of grain. Many members no doubt recall the great difficulty which the people of that city had in securing for the port of Vancouver the necessary terminal facilities for the handling of grain. When the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) finally succeeded in getting the first modern grain elevator constructed there, it was christened "Stevens' Folly". Railway officials said that grain bottoms would never go to Vancouver for wheat. But within one year from the construction of "Stevens' Folly" the people there had the happy experience of seeing from twenty-five to thirty ships waiting in the harbour to load up at the elevator. That is only a few years ago and millions of bushels are now pouring through that port. I was informed the other day that in one year 51,000,000 bushels had been shipped through that elevator, and the result is that the city is forging ahead by leaps and bounds and its people are enjoying an era of great prosperity. The same result can be accomplished in Halifax. Within three years we can have millions of bushels pour in through that port every month and Halifax harbour can be made the terminus of a great shipping fleet plying between this port and Great Britain. There is to-day a great and widespread national sympathy with the claims of Maritime Canada. This portion of the Dominion has broken down the walls of its isolation and has emerged as a partner in confederation. On the floor of the Winnipeg conference Maritime rights was the greatest topic of discussion; the Maritimes held the centre of the national stage. Such Dominion-wide recognition as this has put heart into our leaders in the Maritime provinces.

Canada has invested something like two billion dollars in railways running east and west. These were built to keep Canadian traffic in Canada, to develop trade with the empire and to build up the seaports of Canada. Deficits of from fifty to seventy millions a year is the price being paid for that idea. Yet here we have the stark fact that notwithstanding this colossal investment, Canadian traffic is not being kept in Canada. The traffic that should be going over our own railways, helping to build up our own ports, is prospering ports under a foreign flag.

In 1918 the old elevator at Halifax handled 4,700,000 bushels of grain; in 1919, 3,825,000. The new one could easily handle from eight to ten million bushels in the next few months. I wish to give the government credit for that magnificent elevator. If you tell us that the facilities there are not sufficient to handle more than one steamer at a time, we say: Give us better facilities. We have one of the finest harbours in the world. We are two days nearer Europe than the American ports. We can carry grain from that port—and the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) will bear me out—at two cents per bushel less than from Portland and other American ports. The parliament and government of Canada and the Canadian National Railway authorities are bound by the statutes of the country to route Canadian traffic over our own territory and through our own ports.

Five years ago, four years ago, to mention Maritime rights was to provoke a storm of disapproval throughout the country. Maritime rights were thought to be merely a sectional agitation, and people in other parts of the Dominion said so. But that is all changed to-day. The Dominion is built upon the national policy of east and west traffic and trade. To reverse that policy and abandon that principle would lead to the disintegration of confederation. That policy, Mr. Speaker, is being reversed. The east and west principle is being abandoned. If this reversal and abandonment is persisted in it will surely force the Maritimes away from the rest of the Dominion. That is as certain as that the sun will rise to-morrow.

The Maritime movement is not a secession movement; it is the very antithesis. It is a great movement, having for its object the betterment of Maritime conditions and therefore closer union of all parts of the Dominion.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that so far as our ports are concerned and the recovery of traffic now so largely diverted to American channels, this parliament is bound to recognize that this is a national rather than merely a Maritime province issue. East and west there is a strong and growing sentiment—immensely stronger the past few months, and I am afraid much stronger since we left the Maritimes some seven weeks ago —demanding the keeping of the pledges given and, indeed, the contracts made when the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern were built. We are in earnest in endeavouring to lay these matters before parliament. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald) last night tried to bring home to the House the gravity of the conditions in Nova Scotia, to contradict the assertion that the voicing of Maritime grievances is not Tory propaganda. We are striving to convince hon. members of the seriousness of the situation, and we hope the House will not entrust this matter to a royal commission. We want parliamentary action.

I say in all seriousness, Sir, and with all the emphasis at my command, that if the unwritten letter of the confederation pact cannot be carried out—which would make us a prosperous partner of the Dominion—then no objection can be raised to permitting us to deal with whoever we can, relieved of the restrictions which now surround us in this regard.

Mr. W. A. BOYS (North Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I claim the indulgence of the House for but a few moments and for two definite purposes? It is not my intention to take part, at this juncture at all events, in the discussion of the general topics which have been engaging the attention of the House for some time, but to deal in the first place with an article which appeared in the Toronto Star this week; and in the second place to have a word or two to say regarding the question of so-called obstruction in the House by this party.

It perhaps is usual for whips to be seen and not heard, and having not infrequently to restrain utterances on both sides of the House, it is well that they should not themselves be loquacious, but I feel the matters I am about to deal with warrant the breaking of that rule so far as I am concerned. On Saturday last an article appeared in the Toronto Star intimating that from fifteen to twenty members of this party in the province of Ontario were ready for open revolt. I saw the article, but, like many other things I see in the Toronto Star, I felt it was unworthy of attention. But when last Tuesday I found upon the front page in glaring headlines and occupying about three columns of that paper a repetition of the thought in exaggerated form, I felt as whip of the party, knowing something of its membership and of the feeling of its members in the House of Commons, that I should not let the article go unchallenged. I do not intend for one moment, Mr. Speaker, to weary the House by reading the article in full. I shall content myself with a few quotations, and in regard to these I shall have a few observations to make. The article is headed:

[Mr. MacNutt.]

Prominent Tories fan the flames of revolt against party leader.

Many Ontario members would desert Meighen if another leader was seen.

Talk of corridors.

Then comes the article:

Special to the Star by a staff reporter.

Ottawa, February 23.—There is many a rift in the Conservative lute at Ottawa. . . .

It may soon be that those who are unflinchingly loyal to Mr. Meighen's leadership will be no more than a corporal's guard. This grave disaffection in the Conservative ranks is the talk of the corridors. The advent of Mr. Dunning is like the arrival of Blucher at Waterloo, and many Conservatives, chagrined at seeing their mirage of victory recede, do not hesitate to grumble openly. One anti-Meighen man said yesterday: "There are at least twenty-five Ontario members who would "rat" from Meighen at a moment's notice if they had anybody to "rat" to. Two prominent Conservative members went down to Toronto the other day to fan the flames of revolt."

I observe that the article comes from the pen of a "staff reporter". I think I know who he is, Mr. Speaker, and if my information is correct, I want at once to say that he is not a member of the press gallery. My knowledge of the members of the press gallery would lead me to the conclusion that there is not one of them who would be guilty of the scurrilous and malicious article containing the references which I have quoted. And I think I may say, Sir, that there is not a member of the House on the Liberal side or in the Progressive ranks who would subscribe to one item or one tittle of what I have just quoted.

I give a flat denial to these two particular statements: That one member said, "At least twenty-five Ontario members would 'rat' Meighen." No Conservative nor in my opinion any other member ever made such a statement. I give an equally flat denial to the statement that two members of this party went to the city of Toronto, there to fan the flames of revolt against our leader. I say again, Sir, that as whip of this party and mingling with the members in the present House as in the last, there is not the slightest doubt but that there is absolute unity and solidarity in that party behind our leader. This is no flattery. This admiration, this esteem, is born of the indomitable courage, the indefatigable efforts, the outstanding and conspicuous ability displayed by the right hon. gentleman ever since he became our leader. The article in question can only be characterized as absolutely malicious, scurrilous and slanderous, and without the slightest foundation and this is known to every member of the House regardless of party. Hon. gentlemen who sit opposite may not agree with our leader, they may not agree with the policies he advocates, but I venture to say there is not one of them who does not know full well from what he has seen in this House that we on this side are absolutely behind him.

Sir, concluding what I have to say on this point, I desire to make one or two other observations. Those of us who were in the last parliament recall the severe defeat that our party suffered at the general election in 1921, when we assembled here, a small group of fifty. We remember the conspicuous efforts and ability and the unvarying courage displayed by our leader during the four years which followed; and when we recall those experiences and reflect on what took place on October 29 last, we see the vindication of the efforts of our leader during those years. I could go on, Mr. Speaker, dilating with the greatest ease upon the acknowledged capacity of our leader, but I do not think repetition will make the case any stronger. I can only say that everything I have said I believe to be the truth; and I am convinced that the opinion I have expressed here, so far as our loyalty to our leader is concerned, is shared by every fair-minded member of the House.

We have heard something about obstruction. I should like, Sir, to put the position of this party in that connection as definitely and clearly as I can before this House and the country. Some members of the government seem to think they are offering to the country some excuse for the utter helplessness of their position by attributing it to what they call obstruction on the part of the opposition. A moment's thought will make obvious the absurdity of such a claim. Surely there cannot be obstruction unless something is being obstructed. What then is being obstructed? What is there requiring the attention of the House at the present time? Nothing in the world except the completion of the existing debate, and the thought of an adjournment with a holiday.

As plainly stated in an interview given by the leader of the opposition on the 18th instant, this party is continuing the present debate for two purposes. First, in order that the House may be in session to support and make effective the very important work of the committee investigating customs charges and, second, to enable discussion, which must in any event take place at some time, to be disposed of. As an instance I might mention the presentation of the case for the Maritime provinces, which has been so ably put forward by the member who has just taken his seat (Mr. MacNutt) and by other members from those provinces on this side of the House. It is idle and useless to try to persuade the people of Canada, and especially those of the Maritimes, that this work is not better than wasting our time on a holiday.

Just as soon as the government demonstrate that they are ready to proceed with business, we are ready to proceed as well. As indicated in the speech delivered by the member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) as long ago as the 17th instant, we are not anxious to delay, but rather anxious to proceed, to deal with any business the government can propose. Let the government abandon the fatuous idea of an adjournment to which they have not now and never had any right, and they will find us prepared to proceed at once from this debate to other business of more importance. In that way we will stand by and strengthen with the arm of parliament the committee of investigation which is carrying now so large a share of the work of this House, and in that way as well we will show the country that we mean to work, and do not mean to be drawing our indemnities when merely marking time. The government therefore have the solution in their own hands.

To that, Sir, I should like to add another observation or two. If the Prime Minister had been particularly anxious to secure a seat and to take his place in this House, I think he could have done so long ago. We are led to believe that he may be here next week. I do not know myself when he will be entitled to take his seat; I have heard next Wednesday or next Thursday. I want to say that as far as we are concerned we propose to continue the discussion in connection with this debate until the Prime Minister takes his seat in the House and gives hon. members some business to do on behalf of the country. We will not ask him to do that the first day he arrives; we will give him one, two or three days if he wants to make up his mind and bring down his legislation. If at the end of that time he has no legislation to offer the House for its attention we are prepared then, upon receiving that admission, to consent to an adjournment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Some statesmanship.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Toronto-Scarborough): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address a few remarks to the House I would be remiss in my duty, perhaps, if I did not say something to you, Sir, commendatory of the great example you have set to the younger members. First of all, in order to make the Liberal party understand that the rank and file of our party—in fact its entire membership—want to get down to business I will just add the word "amen" to all the tributes that have been paid to you, Mr. Speaker.

With regard to the tribute paid to our leader by the whip of this party some few moments ago, let me say that in the opinion of the people of the constituency from which I come Arthur Meighen stands on a pedestal which will never be reached by anyone else in our day and generation. On every platform in the city of Toronto and throughout the province of Ontario where it was my pleasure to address an audience, one of my first remarks, Sir, was that at the head of the Conservative party we had leadership of which we were mighty proud, and whenever I expressed that sentiment, at all my meetings, ranging from little groups of a dozen to one that I recall on convention night numbering some 1,200, I heard from all quarters of the hall a mighty hurrah and hear, hear, for the leadership of the Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. But, Mr. Speaker, in contrast to that, let me draw the attention of the House just for a moment to what happened down in my constituency when the name of the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King was mentioned to an audience. Not quite so good. Mr. Speaker, my constituents have no confidence in the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King. My constituents have no confidence in this Liberal administration, they demonstrated that not very long ago, and the degree to which it was demonstrated might be reviewed for just a moment.

I will ask the members of this assembly to go with me back to the days of 1921, when the Conservative party were not just as strongly in favour with the people of Canada as they are to-day. I had a very large constituency then known as East York, a constituency which gave to this Dominion some years ago a Liberal Prime Minister in Alexander Mackenze, a constituency which in 1921 gave to me the largest Conservative majority in Canada, and that majority only 6,500. But, Mr. Speaker, after four years of administration by the Liberal party, after four years of observation of their actions in this House of Commons and of their want of public policy, that constituency although it had been annihilated by redistribution, still had a remnant left in about its centre which I contested in the last election, and that remnant which was changed in name, changed in boundary, and reduced in numbers to perhaps about one-half, gave to me a majority of 14,500. I do not say that in any bragging sense, because I am not a politician, I hope; I am just an ordinary kind of business man, but I want to say that if the boundary line of East York constituency had been left where it was in 1921, instead of having a majority of 14,500, I might have had 20,000, and if you go to the country this June I will have 30,000. The reason for that jump is that not far away from where I live, at Richmond Hill, there was a speech made on the 6th of September last, wherein William Lyon Mackenzie King, the hon. Prime Minister of this country, said: "We possess the confidence of this country to a degree greater than when we took office." He got an answer on October 29th, but not being satisfied with that answer he suggested that we who also got our answer on the 29th of October should come here and decide what then should be done. If, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party had come to this House of Commons and had enunciated in the Speech from the Throne what they enunciated throughout the length and breadth of this country as their policy—with the exception of the war with Turkey; I do not think that should be in the Speech from the Throne—if that policy as outlined in the Speech from the Throne had been in accordance with what they enunciated during the campaign to the people of Canada, instead of being, as it is, a handout to the Progressive party, the probability is that I for one would not have taken any of the time of this assembly on this particular occasion. But as it is, Sir, I am justified in saying a few words, in explanation perhaps to my constituency, which will let me out, as it were, for expressing my viewpoint on this occasion.

The government has brought down a Speech from the Throne in which are mentioned matters which were being asked for by the membership of the Progressive party. Then in a subsequent amendment to the Speech from the Throne the government made certain concessions to those members of this House who are known as Independents, those members who usually sit on the cross-benches—and I wish they were in their seats because I have something to say to them. I remember the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) saying to me the first session I was here, when we were talking about mankind in general and certain men in particular, "Beware of any man that wears a No. 6 hat." He said, "If you will examine into humanity of all kinds, you will find and phrenologists will tell you that the man who wears a No. 6 hat has probably got his brain a little warped." I am not suggesting that the members who sit along the cross-benches over there are warped in their brains at all, but I sometimes think their judgment is badly warped, and when I see in this chamber the statesmanlike look of that hon. gentleman from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), when I behold him strutting up and down this hall, I do not know for whose edification unless it be for the edification of the Fourth Estate, represented by the press gallery, and perhaps the Fifth Estate, the public galleries in this House. And when I think of his attitudes and his meanderings around this chamber I often think our friends of the Fourth and Fifth Estates in the galleries here must be glad that there are guards on the door in the event of our all taking to that kind of fox-like movement around the chamber. But I have got away, Mr. Speaker, from what was on my mind.

This Liberal party which was condemned at the polls told the people of Canada that they were going to meet parliament; and had they met parliament fairly and honestly they would have got their decision. But when it came to getting a straight want of confidence motion before this House by our leader, the words were so twisted by the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) to make our friends of the Progressive party believe that it was not a want of confidence motion at all, that in the final analysis we found them using that excuse to keep this remnant of a government in power. To my mind, Sir, that is a straight case of this Liberal administration flouting the will of parliament. First, they flouted the will of the people when they did not resign on October 29th, or shortly thereafter, and now in their Speech from the Throne they have flouted the will of parliament.

Our friends the Progressives, by reason of the fact that in their constitutional platform they want some of these handouts which are mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, find themselves unable to be honest with themselves, unable to be conscientious, but, thinking of their constituents, and considering the possibilities of coming back here again, they think they had better accept the lesser of the two evils and keep this party in power. We were told by the Prime Minister in that speech of September 6th, or whatever the date was, that with a majority of one they could not carry on and could not solve the great national problems which are to-day waiting for solution in this country. I say to these hon. gentlemen: How are you going to do it with a minority of fifteen? You are fifteen times worse off to-day than you were at that time, and you do not know it. But you are going to wake up some of these days; when public opinion gets roused to a certain pitch, you will find you can no longer remain in the seats which you now occupy and then you will realize that it is time to get out, but you ought to know it now. If the Liberal party want to remain as a party in my lifetime, and to again come into power, the best thing they can do now is to square themselves with the people and resign. That is my opinion and the opinion of a great number of people in Canada. If with a majority of one and a bloc of sixty-odd to help them when they needed assistance, they could not perform the executive or legislative duties demanded of them by the country in the four years gone by, much less can they do it now, in my opinion.

The Speech from the Throne has been enlarged upon by several members of the government and that is the reason why I wish to say a few words in regard to it. It has been enlarged upon by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) and I am glad he is here. I am going to say something nice about the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) in a few moments and I hope he will come into the chamber. The Minister of Agriculture discussed the Speech from the Throne. He spoke about railways, and if I remember correctly he said, "Sure we gave Quebec five million for a harbour, gave Montreal a large sum for a fine bridge, gave the city of Toronto a viaduct, and we are going to give it a Canadian National Railways building at the corner of King and Yonge streets. Now come on you chaps and be fair with us; give us the Hudson Bay railway." That is the idea of the Minister of Agriculture—give them public works. The Minister of Public Works was not so very far behind when he spoke about the gift of potato houses down in St. John.

I am going to give a few of the reasons why I am satisfied that the lack, on the part of the Liberal administration, of a policy for the solution of the problems which are pressing on the people of Canada to-day, accounts in a large measure for the present condition of the government. I will also give a few reasons why any policy that they may enunciate will not prove a success, but will result in failure and will be of no benefit to the country. I take for my cue in that connection words which, one or two evenings ago, fell from the lips of the Minister of Public Works. He said "Why, the Tory party are becoming greatly enamoured of the people of the United States." I hesitate to compare our people with the people of the United States. I hesitate to laud the people of the United States, because I feel that on the whole we have a far better race of people on this side of the boundary line than they have on the other side. I feel that we have better opportunities in practically every field of activity in Canada than they have in the States. But he says the Tory party is becoming enamoured of the people of the United States. Perhaps they have pretty good reason to be, if we look back over the last thirty-five years, and take notice of all the Canadians who have gathered together their flocks and herds and everything belonging to them and gone over to the States. We will probably find as many Canadians in the United States to-day as we have in Canada, and that fact is worrying the people in the constituency from which I come. Why is that the case? One reason why such a condition exists is that God did not make all men alike. All of us do not want to go to Saskatchewan to work in the wheat fields; some of us desire to engage in other vocations than that of farming. There are many of us who do not want to grow wheat or other grain, and there are those of us who do not want to go into the bowels of the earth to bring forth ferrous and non-ferrous metals. Some of us want to attend a technical school perhaps, to obtain an education such as we can get in Canada—thanks to our excellent educational institutions—so that we may be fitted to earn a livelihood. But under the policy enunciated by the Liberal party, we find we have to go into the field of larger activity in the country to the south of us, to find our vocation, and that has been the history of Canada since confederation under Liberal administration. There is one feature which appeals to me when I read the policy of the Conservative party and that is that that policy is calculated to make work for the miners, the labourers, farmers and people of all the different classes.

With regard to the imports and exports of Canada, the Minister of Public Works said, "Some people would say it was unhealthy to have a favourable trade balance". That is not correct. A favourable trade balance is a very healthy sign, but that trade balance must not be the result of the exportation from this country of raw materials, which do not embody the handicraft of the artisans of our country. If we have a favourable trade balance from the export of manufacturers, I would say that that was a healthy condition for Canada. But Mr. Speaker, take the records of the last few years and see what they disclose. Take one commodity by which, in the preceding generation, the trade of the country was measured, the commodity of iron. I have here the figures of the importations into this country of iron in the raw state; that is iron ore and metals which constitute the raw material with which the men and women of Canada work to produce manufactured goods. We find the importations of the raw materials were 39 per cent of the total imports for the calendar year 1923; 33 per cent for 1924, and then in 1925 they dropped to 29 per cent. The exact figures are as follows:

Imported into Canada for Consumption

There is a drop in the importation of raw material. But what have we to say about the Liberal policy, and what is happening to imports and exports in this country when we come to the manufactured goods? Of manufactured goods, engines, boilers and so on, our importations were:

These importations represent work done by foreign artisans, and I make a plea this afternoon for the 60,000 people in my riding who have found work in the shops and factories of the city of Toronto close by. I see a few of the Saskatchewan members in their seats, and I ask them to bear with me when I put to them fairly and frankly this question: Is it not far better that importations of engines and boilers, which in 1923 amounted to $8,000,000 worth, should drop to $4,000,000 rather than rise to $12,000,000 as they have done in the last three years? Does not the difference between those two items mean work for the people of Canada? We are willing to do something for Saskatchewan; we are willing to do something for Nova Scotia; we are willing to do something for any of those people who are asking for free trade; but let them give us a fair deal. We want work for our people. Let me tell the members from Saskatchewan something and particularly the Prime Minister who is about to represent the constituency of Prince Albert. It is not many years ago when single men were very much in the majority in Saskatchewan; but now you are becoming a little more civilized or up-to-date; you have got a wife; before you are much older, you will have a family and before a generation passes you will find, as I said before, that God did not make everybody alike. You will find some of your children wanting not to grow wheat, but to start some kind of a factory in order to make something for the rest of the people unless they migrate to the United States or some other country where these goods are made for them. It is not very many years ago when Ontario had a population of only 750,000, but the people did not pay all their attention to growing wheat, although they can grow as fine wheat as can be grown out in the west; they diverted their attention to other lines of activity. If you want a uniform, united race of people on this northern hemisphere, one way to bring that about is to establish factories, not only in Ontario and Quebec, but out in the west. If you do not establish them, you are going to have a great deal of trouble building up a united race of people working in all kinds of occupations throughout the whole of Canada.

From 1923 to 1925, importations of machinery jumped from $28,000,000 to $30,000,000 and automobile parts from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 worth. That is taking work away from our people and it is not a healthy condition for Canada. This condition of affairs does not exist merely in regard to the ferrous metals; the same situation prevails in regard to the non-ferrous metal group. For the information of hon. members, I should like to place on Hansard this table showing the importations of raw materials:

Importations of raw materials (Non-ferrous metals)

These are raw materials used by our artisans to make into finished products for the people of Canada, and this shows that they are being imported in a lesser degree as one year succeeds another while this administration stays in power. Hon. gentlemen may be surprised to learn that we have to import wood in the raw state, but there are some grades of wood which we have to import. I will ask hon. members to put side by side, wood manufactured and wood in the raw state coming into this country and they will find that while the grand total is about the same, the condition as regards dollars and cents is reversed.

Commodities imported into Canada

	Twelve months ended December
	1923	1924	1925
Wood, unmfd., total..	$11,850,818	$9,954,608	$9,751,676
Wood, mfd., total.. .	7,756,688	7,795,353	8,448,319

This means that every time the United States or any other country imports an increased quantity of raw material, it imports an increased quantity of man power to manufacture that raw material into finished goods.

Mr. EVANS: Would the hon. member be in favour of placing a duty on raw material that can be produced in this country and abolishing the drawback?

Mr. HARRIS: If the hon. gentleman would put that into two questions, I would answer them. I do not know why the string of the drawback should be attached to the other question, but I know if an export duty on raw material would provide work for more people in this country, I would be the first one to be in favour of it.

I should like to discuss the export side of this picture. I have shown that while imports of raw materials have decreased, imports of finished goods have increased, although the grand total is about the same. Imports of that material which means work for our people have decreased and imports of that material which drives our people out of employment have increased. On the other side of the picture we find that in 1925 exports of goods manufactured of iron are about the same as in 1923, but exports of some manufactured goods have decreased considerably. When I look at this government, although there is not much to look at just now, it always seems to be a sort of treaty-making government. The treaty-making portion of it is not in the House at the present time.

I was interested to hear the Minister of Public Works say something about New Zealand extending a very substantial preference on many important Canadian products. Among them he mentioned wrought iron tubing with a preference of 20 per cent, wire with a preference of 10 per cent and so on. In conjunction with that, it is interesting to note that the policy which is being pursued by the Liberal party has had this effect on the industry which makes tubing pipe and wire. Whereas an amount of $2,000,000 worth of tubing and pipe was exported in 1923, that has dropped to $1,400,000 in two short years. In the case of wire, the exports in 1923 amounted to $2,117,000, and in spite of this great New Zealand preference that we are getting the exports have dropped to $1,041,000. So much for exports of iron in the manufactured state. We have had a great increase in exports in some other lines, and in almost every instance a study of the situation will reveal that the increase in exports is the product of those workers who go down into the bowels of the earth and bring to the surface our wealth in nickel, gold, silver, copper and the other non-ferrous metals. It is nice to have these people in Canada to make more consumers for our foodstuffs, but hon. gentlemen from the northern part of this country will proably bear me out when I say that if you go down into the mines you will find the majority of those people not speaking our native language and not Anglo-Saxons. I suppose if we consider them as so much milk put into the churn, some day they will come out as cheese, but it is not good Canadian cheese. They are not just the people we want to have in this country. We need to have them to consume what we produce, but we want others besides. We want to provide work in this country for the artisans who are waiting to take hold of the raw material that is produced from the earth and to convert that raw material into the finished product. Now the exports have increased and we are glad to note this fact, but the increase has been largely in raw material. I have some figures here which I shall ask the permission of the House to put on Hansard without my going to the trouble to read them, so that they will be available to any hon. member who is interested in these statistics. I know they are interesting to my constituents, and it is just as well for us to have these figures on record.

Exports of raw materials (Non-ferrous metals)

	1920	1921	1922	1923	1924	1925
Aluminum	$ 5,680,871	$ 4,417,999	$ 1,188,808	$ 2,506,182	$ 3,225,479	$ 5,135,366
Copper	12,973,464	12,748,082	5,853,819	7,328,574	11,204,615	12,095,478
Lead	1,193,14[illegible]	525,656	1,718,967	2,366,467	3,961,202	10,368,130
Nickel	9,039,22[illegible]	5,405,29[illegible]	2,689,70[illegible]	8,880,64[illegible]	9,388,511	10,174,245
Gold silver	20,539,005	14,548,566	11,526,593	17,111,98[illegible]	29,304,937	41,536,736
Zinc	940,082	963,962	2,448,741	2,136,885	2,553,733	5,344,060
Total	$50,375,787	$42,609,556	$25,426,631	$40,330,738	$59,638,484	$84,654,015

For the business year ending March 31, 1920, our exports in lead amounted to $1,193,000 and by 1925 they had jumped to $10,368,130. That is excellent; but the workmanship that brought that raw material to the surface was not supplied by the artisans of the constituency from which I come. The work was not done by that class of our citizens who, when this country finds itself in international difficulties, are ready to come to its help. As the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) pointed out last night, on one short street in Toronto there are to be found twenty odd war widows who, had their husbands been saved to them, would now be taken care of through the work which these men could be engaged in in our factories where this raw material, if this government would only do the right thing, would be manufactured. That is the class of people on whose behalf I am making this appeal this afternoon. They are the people who when the empire is in danger are ready to march shoulder to shoulder with good Canadians from the west and east to the defence of our liberties. Now that we are enjoying peace why can we not give work to these men to enable them to maintain their families? This country owes them that much, and the only way this duty can be discharged is for the Dominion to adopt the policy which has been enunciated by the leader of this party from time to time.

Of nickel in 1922 we exported $2,689,000 worth, and that had increased to $10,000,000 odd in 1925. Gold and silver jumped from $14,000,000 in 1921 to $41,000,000 in 1925. Zinc, which was $950,000 in 1920 and $963,000 in 1921, had increased to $5,344,000 odd by 1925. In short, the grand total of our exports of the raw material which a kind Providence has placed at our disposal had increased under this administration from $42,000,000 in 1921 to $84,000,000 in 1925, just double. I have no fault to find with this except the one that I emphasized a few moments ago. I can picture one engineer directing the efforts of thirty or forty gang bosses, and thirty or forty gang bosses individually directing the efforts of one hundred or more men each, men of the type who live on sauerkraut, macaroni, onions, garlic and rye bread. But what about the engineering type? Are we to have only one engineer to a thousand of the other sort? Not necessarily, if you go one step further and take that raw material as it comes from the bowels of the earth and put it through all the various stages of manufacture at the hands of our artisans who are waiting for work in this country.

We have also in Canada a wonderful wealth in wood of all kinds, but in this direction too we are rapidly slipping behind. Our exports of raw wood and wood products for the business year 1921 amounted to 61 per cent of the total of $116,000,000 and in 1925 they had jumped to 71 per cent of the total of $109,000,000. I want to put on Hansard now a table of the exports of wood and wood products:

Exports of Wood, Wood Products

	1921	1924	1925
Raw..	$116,260,591	$126,946,062	$109,093,950
Manufactured.. ..	75,256,371	48,551,833	43,543,234
	$191,516,962	$175,497,895	$152,637,184
Pulp..	71,552,037	46,173,796	41,565,241

I wish it were possible for my voice to carry to the man who looks after the lead pencil factories, as he sits in his easy chair—I refer to the Prime Minister of this country. If my voice could reach him now I would tell him that in Newmarket to-day these very people are anxious of this fact, that whereas in 1921, 39 per cent of the grand total of our exports of wood and wood products manufactured, totalled $75,000,000, to-day the exports in wood and wood products manufactured have dropped to 29 per cent. The employment figures in relation to these exports have declined from $75,000,000 in 1921 to $43,000,000 at the present time. Now that is a condition which will not be remedied so long as we have in power a party that cannot enunciate a definite policy. The leader of that party declared before the election that with a majority of one in the House his government was just able to drift, and now with a minority of fifteen one wonders what they expect to do. Nevertheless they are remaining in office. I ask in the name of the people of Canada that this administration have the common decency to resign and get out and allow another party to take over the reins of government. I say this not merely because we are Conservatives and want to get the sweets of office; not at all. I can tell hon. gentlemen that it is a softer job being in opposition, if they only knew it, so far as the individual members are concerned. That is not the reason why there should be a change of government. The young people of Canada are emigrating because they cannot find work in this country and I can think of some of my friends in Pittsburgh at this very moment. There are thousands of these young people in the United States to-day who are saying to us, "When in heaven's name will you give us a change of government?" I know that if this government got out it would be the greatest boost this country ever had. The younger generation in Canada are full of enterprise and enthusiasm, but this enterprise and enthusiasm are being repressed, and the people are being prevented from taking hold of this young country to bring about that period of prosperity which we should have in Canada.

I have spoken of the ferrous and non-ferrous metal group, and while I do not want to weary the House with figures I desire to refer briefly to a group which was mentioned the other day, the non-metallic materials. Let me consider for a moment one in particular which has been discussed a good many times in this House; I refer to asbestos. Asbestos exportations in the raw state have been going on to an alarming degree, between $7,000,000 and $9,000,000 worth of this product a year having left the country; and these exportations keep up that pace. Now if a real progressive policy were put into force—I am using the word progressive in the true sense—a policy which would tend to encourage the manufacture of that material at home, instead of the figures being what I am about to quote—and hon. gentlemen may obtain them from the journals of the House if they care to look into the matter—they would be altogether the other way. Away back in 1920—not very long ago—$232,000 worth of manufactured asbestos was exported. The period I am dealing with, as hon. gentlemen who have had any business experience well know, was a period of business depression and readjustment in Canada, and many people lost a lot of money. In 1921 it climbed to $321,694, but in 1922 it dropped to $153,000; in 1923 to $81,000; in 1924 to $64,000; in 1925 to $47,000. Down, down, down, and out, is what is happening to this particular line of Canadian industry. In order that hon. members may have the convenience of consulting these figures in tabular form, I ask leave of the House, Mr. Speaker, to put this short statement on Hansard:

Exports (Non-metallic Minerals)

	1920	1921	1922	1923	1924	1925
Asbestos..	9,000,172	12,955,083	4,787,030	7,188,933	8,742,626	7,790,088
Manufactured..	232,316	321,694	153,830	81,507	64,462	47,349
Raw..	8,767,856	12,633,389	4,633,200	7,107,426	8,678,164	7,142,739

I ask hon. members to consider seriously where we are heading. I ask it in all sincerity because I am going to give them now a grand summary of the whole situation in percentages which can be readily grasped. I ask hon. members to consider where we are heading under an administration which glories in the fact that our exports are a good deal above our imports, that even with the United States for the first time for a long while there is a change in our business dealings. I hesitate to again say anything about the United States, but I am using that country in this analysis for the reason that its people are mostly Anglo-Saxon like ourselves and have the same traditions behind them. They are not very far away from us—as I said before many of our boys and girls are over there. In a word, we are very much alike. And we are neighbours. There is only an invisible line separating us—very much invisible at the present time under the customs administration. That does not seem to reach my hon. friends opposite. I repeat, the line between Canada and the United States at the present time is very much invisible under this administration. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) in the course of his speech the other day attempted to put us in the position of saying that it was an unhealthy state to have the trade balance with the United States in our favour. Let me say, Sir, that I am not criticizing the fact that the balance of trade is in our favour. I admit it is a healthy state; but it is only so when our exports show within themselves the handicraft of the Canadian people. We resemble the United States in many respects, but we have not exhausted our raw materials as they have. We have not as yet expended ourselves in the exportation of raw materials to a degree which might be termed as the riotous exportation of the substance of this great country which divine Providence has put in our charge. But if our friends opposite continue in office, I am afraid it will not be very long before they will have such a charge laid at their door.

Now, Sir, I will ask the permission of the House to put this table on Hansard:

	Raw Materials				Partly Manufactured				Fully Manufactured
	Imports		Exports		Imports		Exports		Imports		Exports
	Can.	U.S.	Can.	U.S.	Can.	U.S.	Can.	U.S.	Can.	U.S.	Can.	U.S.
1922.. ..	28.9	46.4	44.5	39.1	9.6	15.6	14.5	11.1	61.5	38.0	41.0	49.8
1923.. ..	28.4	48.3	44.7	36.3	9.7	18.8	16.2	12.5	61.9	32.9	39.1	51.2
1924.. ..	28.4	44.6	43.4	35.7	11.2	18.5	16.8	14.1	60.4	36.9	39.8	50.2
1925.. ..	27.7	49.2	44.7	39.3	10.8	18.3	15.1	13.5	61.5	32.5	40.2	47.2

It will be seen that in proportion to the grand total our imports of raw materials in 1922 were 28.9 per cent, while those of the United States—and I ask hon. members to note this particularly—were 46.4, or nearly one-half their total importations, whereas ours were but one-quarter of our total. At once the comment naturally arises, it is our duty as soon as we possibly can to get to the position where our importations of raw materials will steadily arise and our importations of manufactured goods as steadily decline. But what has happened in the four years of this administration? This brings us right to January 1, 1926. We have slipped, it will be observed, 12 points, from 28.9 in 1922 to 27.7 in 1925. Has our sister country to the south of us slipped to the same extent? No. She has a protective policy which invigorates and gives new life to industry and encourages it to manufacture raw materials of all kinds into finished products. She has risen from the position of 46.4 in 1922 to the enviable position of 49.2 in 1925. She has imported more raw materials and less manufactured goods, with the result that not only are more and more of her people finding work, but many of our own people have been forced during the last four years to go to the United States for a livelihood.

Hon. members will note with interest the comparative figures in regard to partly manufactured imports and exports for the four years as between this country and the United States. They will notice with regret that while our position is virtually stagnant the United States has jumped from 15.6 to 18.3.

Coming to the figures for fully manufactured goods, do we find that the United States is importing more and more of the workmanship of southern Europe, of Switzerland, of Belgium, of France, of Great Britain? No. We find that its imports of 38 per cent in 1922 have dropped to 32.5 in the course of four short years, while we find ourselves importing to the tune of 61.5 per cent.

What is the significance of these figures, Mr. Speaker? In my opinion, it is that our artisans, if this condition continues, will have to go elsewhere for a livelihood. I say it is time to call a halt, it is time for us to take hold of ourselves and apply a definite, fixed, determined policy that will stop the efflux not only of our raw materials but of that other still more valuable material—our trained young men from such great institutions as the Toronto technical school which is a stone's throw from where I live. The men trained in these schools are in effect being exported every time we allow this condition to get out of balance, and it is getting more and more out of balance as one year succeeds another. I should like to say this to the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps): If he is sincere in his desire that the artisans of this country shall have the fullest opportunity to make a living in this country I do not see how he can sit on that side and support such an outfit as we on this side see in front of us, an outfit whose only virtue—no, it is not a virtue; far from it—is to cling to office and let the public be———hon. gentlemen know what I mean. Mr. Speaker, commercial travellers are continually crossing the international boundary line between Canada and the United States. They bring their goods to us, they come to our offices; we do not know the difference between them and some of the travellers for our own concerns. But the time is coming when, if our own industrial concerns are to stay in buisness, the protective feature of the customs tariff must be strengthened in order that they may be able to withstand the competition from which they are now suffering.

I notice that the Minister of Public Works is now in his seat. I have already paid some attention to the remarks he made on a former occasion during this debate, but I should like him to take notice of the points I am about to stress. The people on the western prairies are not all Doukhobors going around in their bare feet, as we were once led to believe by newspaper stories and caricatures. Such Doukhobors as are left in the west, as well as the people of other nationalities there, are becoming more and more Canadianized and are anxious to act as true Canadians should. That being the case I for one expect them to support a policy which will provide employment for every class of wage earner in this country. I would also inform the Minister of Public Works, who the other night had so much to say about the exodus from this country, that I have here a publication issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce in which there is a very significant statement. But before bringing that statement to the attention of the House I should like to say to the people of Saskatchewan, through their representatives in parliament: You want to be a little careful about putting all your eggs in one basket. Do not think too much in terms of wheat. You may find in some of your families those who will want to engage in some other occupation.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is the hon. gentleman aware of the fact that we are producing more butter per farmer to-day in the prairie provinces than is being produced in Ontario?

Mr. HARRIS: I am very glad to hear that, but I would suggest to the hon. member that if this treaty-making government is kept in power much longer they will soon be out of the butter business.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is the hon. gentleman aware that the price of butter in Canada to-day is higher than it has been since 1921?

Mr. HARRIS: I am aware of the fact, but I was not talking about butter, I was talking about bread for our people. If I remember correctly, on a previous occasion during this debate the butter minister rose in his place and read a document—

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Order.

Mr. HARRIS: He rose in his place and read a little document which our friend from Rosetown (Mr. Evans) does not think very much of. It has to do with the dumping clause which he is going to put into effect. Now, I was saying, when my attention was diverted, that the people of Saskatchewan should not think too much in terms of wheat. Let me make the quotation from the government blue book to which I referred a few minutes ago. It is as follows:

> If the average export price of wheat in 1925 had been the same as in 1924, the total value of Canadian exports would have shown a decrease instead of an increase.

I should also like to say to our Saskatchewan friends that we all rejoice at the fact that in the west they have had three fairly abundant harvests. But they should bear this important point in mind: If they retain all their eggs in one basket they will not be in very good condition when a bad season comes. Now, what will happen if a season of scarcity or famine should overtake our land?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HARRIS: The hon. Minister of the Interior laughs; I shall have to have something to say to him later. When I used the word "famine" I used it in a figurative sense. The possibility of a crop failure must always be borne in mind; therefore I say to our friends in Saskatchewan that they should not keep all their eggs in one basket.

I ask hon. members to consider seriously the policy which will stimulate industry in this country and give our workingmen a chance to live. We should all do our best to help industry along. There is one industry in Winnipeg with which I am associated to a certain extent. A million dollars have been spent upon it in the last two years. We should all be glad to see industries spring up; I should like to see them established throughout the length and breadth of the west. If there is an industrial development of that character, then in the event of a failure in one line of activity the people can turn their attention to another. The fiscal policy of this country should be so framed as to give employment to our people and make them satisfied and contented.

I am glad the Minister of the Interior is in his seat and I hope he will stay here. I wish he had been here in 1912 when they were talking about a tariff board. I shall have something to say on that this evening, if you will now call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HARRIS: At six o'clock I was endeavouring to point out where we were heading in our national affairs, particularly if we continued in the direction in which we have been going during the last three years. We are asked by the so-called administration at this time to consider the Speech from the Throne, which they would like the country to believe is going to solve some of the difficulties under which we are labouring at the present time. True, we are making progress, because Providence has seen fit to place in every one of our provinces resources of one kind or another, the use and development of which will enable us to live and to make progress.

It is suggested that we are going to deal with the situation which I had in mind previous to six o'clock by giving Canada a tariff board. The expression "tariff board" sounds very well coming from the Liberal party. The Prime Minister at Richmond Hill on September 6 stated that he was not going to protect the industries of Canada. What is he going to do? He is going to "safeguard" them. To use his own words, "the safeguarding of our established industries against conditions elsewhere which may be prejudicial to their well-being and development." That is a sort of hair-splitting between protection and safeguarding, in my opinion. But the Prime Minister does not stand alone in this proposition. At page 247 of Hansard the Minister of Agriculture said:

> Why, there is hardly the splitting of a hair between an advisory tariff board and the tariff commission that my hon. friends opposite are agreeable to.

[Mr. Harris.]

Thirteen years ago, on February 6, 1912, the Conservative party introduced a resolution to give Canada a tariff commission. I imagine I can see the Minister of Agriculture making a great ado about the Liberal party giving Canada a tariff board to safeguard our industries, although, commenting on the difference between an advisory board as proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite and the tariff commission proposed by the Tory government, he says it hardly amounts to the splitting of a hair. But out in the prairie provinces he will take credit to the government for its course in this respect. I am glad he is in his seat now, because it fills up the vacant space along the front row.

I should like to go over a few of the features of this tariff board, and at the same time I should like to ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) if he can remember thirteen years ago. Of course that is not very long for a young man such as the minister. I suppose he can remember that on February 8, 1912, he voted against the creation of a tariff commission. Does he carry in his mind the words falling from the lips of his deskmate for the time being over there, as reported on page 247 of Hansard, that there was not the splitting of a hair's difference between a tariff commission and an advisory board? I am quite sure the Minister of Justice will consider, along with the Prime Minister, that the safeguarding of the boot and shoe industry would be a pretty good thing for Canada at the present time. If someone would prompt his memory a little and tell him we have a boot and shoe industry in Canada, it might do some good.

Another feature of the tariff board which the minister stressed was that it must function as soon as possible. That prompts the suggestion that the government should withdraw the motion to adjourn until the 15th March and go ahead with business of the country. We are ready to do business. If the government want to function, why do they not start and do it? Discussing the tariff commission or tariff board the Prime Minister at Richmond Hill said that the Tories were going to set up in Ottawa another board that would cost this country a good deal and they were going to shift the responsibility over to the tariff commission, while the Liberal party wanted to accept parliamentary responsibility in the administration of our tariff affairs. The Prime Minister is not alone in this; he has with him the Minister of Agriculture, who the other night told the House that this proposed tariff board would have tremendous responsibility. In this connection I want my hon. friends from Quebec to note what I am saying, because in a moment or two I am going to say something that refers particularly to them. I am emphasizing now the responsibility of this proposed tariff board. The Minister of Agriculture said:

> Nevertheless I think we can find men to act on such a board who will do their duty regardless of consequences.

Big men are wanted, mighty men are wanted, men who will asume some responsibility so that this government can hide behind that tariff board every time they want to give tariff concessions to some of their friends in this country. The idea is not that this government will assume the responsibility, but that they want to shift the responsibility on to what the Minister of Agriculture is wont to call big men. Why, he says, I think I would rather have a seat in this government than a seat on that board. I wonder why?

Perhaps there is another reason why the Minister of Agriculture would rather sit in this government than be on that board. He knows in his heart of hearts—and he gave expression to this the other evening—that forty per cent of our goods are on the free list. He says a little further down:

> We have a large free list and a great many people are wondering why many of the articles it covers should not bear a certain measure of taxation.

Why is he not a little more honest; why does he not say "a certain measure of safeguard"? Why does he not go a little further and say "a certain measure of protection," and then go a little further and stand up on the platform at Regina and say what he says in this House of Commons? When the Saskatchewan members, that fine looking group of men led down here by the Minister of Agriculture, review his statements with regard to this tariff board, I think that attitude will be one that they will hesitate to follow.

The Minister of Agriculture is not alone in this. This many-sided minister, the Minister of the Australian treaty, Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb), and so on, was in this House in 1912 and he voted against this tariff commission. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald), who has been conspicuous by his absence a good deal lately, was in the House at that time and he voted against the tariff commission. I mentioned the province of Quebec a little while ago. We all have a great deal of admiration and respect for the name of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I ask my hon. friends from Quebec—and I am glad there are at least half a dozen of them here—to consider what that great chieftain had to say about a tariff board, because when he discussed that matter in the House of Commons in 1912—and the Speaker himself will recall that he too voted against it, although I would not like to charge him with that—instead of calling it a tariff commission in accordance with the heading of the bill as it was introduced in this House, he called it a tariff board throughout almost the whole of his remarks. Like the Minister of Agriculture he knew what it was. A few of his remarks in this connection might be interesting. As reported at page 2874 of Hansard of 1912 the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier made this statement:

> There is such a thing as an act and an ulterior motive to that act not to be found within the four corners of the act itself.

Has the Minister of Justice an ulterior motive in his mind? Is it the question of boots and shoes in Quebec that is behind this tariff commission? If it is not, before this adjournment is granted we might get a little explanation. I do not want to be misunderstood as regards my position in this matter. I am firmly convinced, and the longer I stay here and have an opportunity of glancing now and again at the record of what is going on in this country, the more convinced I am that it is absolutely necessary, if we are to reach our destiny and hold ourselves together as a great people in this part of the northern hemisphere, that we should have protection in this country. Sir Wilfrid Laurier said a little further on:

> The more we proceed with this tariff board—

Not tariff commission.

> —the more it becomes apparent that we are moving in a vicious circle.

I wonder what kind of circle the present government are moving in? They are not getting anywhere. If they want things to go ahead a little in this country, I would advise them to quit moving altogether unless they move across the floor of this House, because that is the only movement that will be of any use to Canada at the present time. This board of 1926 is one that is going to advise the ministry, that is what is left of it. I suppose it will be the ministry that will have the gaps filled up during the next few weeks, but we shall have to wait until those gaps are filled. This is what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said about the 1912 board:

> To say that under such circumstances the commission should be simply under the jurisdiction of the minister is not in accordance with the conception of the feature of the commission which would give it its greatest usefulness.

In other words, if it is going to have a usefulness, it cannot be under the minister. Yet the board which Sir Wilfrid Laurier condemned in 1912 is to-day being adopted by the Liberal party. I want my hon. friends from Quebec to understand that there is no bigotry on the part of the people of Ontario with regard to them. On every platform on which it was my privilege to say a word, I was careful—and I did not need to be careful because I did it spontaneously—to say that in Canada to-day we have a fair province known as Quebec inhabited by people who were Canadians long before some of the rest of us were here, and their views and expressions of opinion should be taken into consideration in connection with everything of a national character and of interest to any of the people of Canada. That is the extent of the bigotry in that part of Toronto from which I come, which is known as Toronto-Scarborough. In every Orange hall in my riding where I have been asked to speak as a guest I have said that in the province of Quebec there were Canadians who anteceded by many generations the membership of some of these institutions. But I have yet to discover within the confines of any of these institutions or clubs any bigotry towards the province of Quebec. I say that in passing just to assure hon. gentlemen from that province that I have not been criticizing them. I am not criticizing them when I repeat the words of their late chieftain and urge the members from Quebec to be consistent in this House. I can imagine hearing some of the followers of Sir Wilfrid Laurier shouting, "Vive the Laurier policy", and I would ask them to read what their chieftain had to say in his day and generation and to act accordingly. I want to assure hon. members from that province that in the part of the country from which I come we have a great regard for the people of Quebec. We know that their ancestors were here before ours and hon. gentlemen will be here when some of us have gone to the United States to find jobs because they make it impossible for us to get them here.

Hon. gentlemen from Quebec realize that no other country will afford them the same freedom to observe their traditions, and we realize that growing up side by side with us are also our friends from Saskatchewan who no doubt are all true Canadians. We are all building up a strong race of people in this country and it is just as well for us to realize this. But I wonder how the people of Saskatchewan feel about the tariff board? Are there any disciples here of "Red Michael" from Red Deer? If there are, have they read the statesmanlike speeches that fell once from the lips of Red Michael Clark? It was not my pleasure to know that gentleman personally but in my mind's eye I can see him in this House at the present time instructing one of these young sprouts from Saskatchewan. Well, Red Michael said in his day that it was the business of parliament to get at the facts for itself. Imagine, said Red Michael, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Churchill, Mr. Law, Mr. Lloyd George or Mr. Asquith being told that they should appoint a commission to do those things which it was essentially the function of the government to do. I know one thing, and that is that when our friends from Saskatchewan come to talk in Regina in the course of the next few weeks there will be very little said about the tariff board, for I understand that tariffs are an abomination to the prairie provinces.

The tariff board proposal of 1912 was defeated not by the party that introduced it in the House of Commons, but by a Liberal majority in the Senate, and I would ask the members from Saskatchewan and other remnants of the Liberal party to listen to what their chieftain of that day had to say when the proposal was finally rejected. This is what he said:

> For my part I shall be glad to share the responsibility with the Senate of killing this bill. If the result of this motion is that the bill is to be killed I say to my honourable friend that it would not be an unmixed misfortune; on the contrary, in my judgment, it would be an unmixed blessing.

These were the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and to-day we find the man on whose shoulders his mantle has fallen going in the opposite direction.

We had some issues in the last election apart from the tariff question: we had the questions of transportation and immigration and the proposal for Senate reform. And in the Speech from the Throne, while there is not a great deal said about transportation, there is reference to the Hudson Bay railway. I do not know how far that undertaking can be considered a national one or how much policy there is behind it, but the government is dealing with the Hudson Bay railway in the same way as it deals with everything else. Instead of announcing a public policy they are giving the people public works in order to remain in power. This is a public works government rather than a public policy government; that is the conclusion to which I have come after watching the manoeuvres of hon. gentlemen opposite during the last four years and more particularly in the course of the last four, five or six weeks. Having failed throughout the past four years to give our Progressive friends what they wanted, the government now find themselves unable to remain in office without making some concessions, and so they have had to hand a few apples to the representatives from the prairies. Somebody spoke of it as berries the other night, but I prefer to say apples; there are not many apples on the prairies. They are obliged to give the Progressives what they want.

I should like to read two verses which have been composed under the title Perspicacity. They explain what I might call the perspicaciousness of this particular administration; and when I read them my friends from the west will see their significance. During the last four years they have been inhaling the perfume from the lilac bush and have been wondering how the apples they had in mind would grow on that shrub. Here are the verses:

Willie King and Robert Forke,
After four years of stormy weather,
Said Willie King to Robert Forke,
"Let us go to the people together."
And Robert drew back in great surprise,
"You're a stranger, Sir," said he,
"And I will give you our support
When apples grow on a lilac tree."

After that there was an election; the second verse follows:

And Willie felt very sad at heart,
The Progs were the only one,
And Robert felt quite remorseful
At the terrible wrong he had done.
So bright and early after election morn,
Robert was quite surprised to see Willie King's wrecked cabinet
Tying apples on a lilac tree!

Here on this sheet I hold in my hand, Mr. Speaker, you can see a picture of a boy tying apples on the lilac tree. That, to my mind, illustrates the perspicaciousness of this government, and I think I might well call them the perspicacious government.

Besides the Hudson Bay railway the government are going to do other things; they are going to appoint a royal commission to take care of the Maritime provinces. From my own observation during the last ten years I would say that the Maritime provinces have been bedevilled with royal commissions. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, I have sometimes thought that we should change their name and call them, the royal commission provinces? No wonder the people of the Maritime provinces rose in their might at the last general election and sent to this House such a fine body of men to firmly entrench themselves behind the right hon. leader of this party. I had no idea there were such outstanding men in the Maritimes until I saw them in this chamber.

The problems of the Maritime provinces cannot be solved by appointing a royal commission. We have arrived at the stage where prompt action is necessary to handle the situation. Perhaps one of their biggest problems is transportation. If this government could bestir itself in connection with the Rouyn railway, should it not be able to do something for our friends in the Maritime provinces? Coal is one of the principal industries of the Maritimes, and I am given to understand that one-fifth of the people are dependent on it, while twelve per cent of the revenues of Nova Scotia are derived from coal mining royalties.

I was glad to hear the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. MacDonald) last night refer to the Duncan report. Let me tell my hon. friends from Nova Scotia that a majority of the people of Ontario with whom I have come in contact are ready to endorse the views set forth in the addendum to that report by Mr. Hume Cronyn. We in Ontario are anxious to do everything we possibly can to help our friends in the Maritime provinces. Not because Stanfields woollen industry operates down there, not because they are such a find lot of people in the Maritimes. When I was down there last January I was very well pleased with the people I met. When I remember them and the raven-haired, bright-eyed lassies I saw in Charlottetown, Pictou and other towns, I am very much disquieted to read in the newspapers that the businessmen of the Maritimes are discussing the possibilities of breaking away from the Dominion. This can point to only one thing—something is radically wrong down there. Unhappily for this country, the government is not big enough to grapple with the situation, and while they are wasting time doing nothing something of grave consequence to confederation may happen. The hon. member who preceded me this afternoon said this is a government that fiddles with royal commissions while the businessmen of the Maritimes talk secession.

Undoubtedly the time demands action. One compelling reason for the government to be alive to its responsibilities is the serious decline in the coal industry of the Maritimes. In 1913 out of a coal production of 7,000,000 tons, 2,000,000 tons was consumed in St. Lawrence ports; in 1923 this quantity had shrunk to 1,500,000 tons; in 1925 the production was cut in half, with a consumption in those ports of only 807,505 tons. The people of the Maritimes won this market for their fuel, and should be protected against the coal of West Virginia, which is mined more easily, due to the absence of gas, the natural drainage of their mines and the absence of submarine workings. The coal operators of Virginia have the further advantage of being able to transport their product into the St. Lawrence ports at a very cheap rate. We must resist this invasion of the Nova Scotia coal market and help our people by taking requisite tariff measures. I am convinced that if the industry is allowed to decline much more it will be completely prostrated. Something definite must be done. Now, Nova Scotia coal is a pretty good article. Records were kept of tests made in 1914 and 1915 of 1,750,000 tons of coal and it was found that 8,480 pounds of Nova Scotia coal would do the same unit of work as 9,680 pounds of West Virginia coal. In other words, the Nova Scotia product was 14 per cent better than its foreign rival.

How are we to help out the situation? The Conservative party is determined that there shall be no interference with the railway commission, whatever may be the inclination of our friends across the way. Those of us in the Conservative party, if we find it necessary to help out the situation in the Maritimes or in any other part of the Dominion by giving assistance on long-haul freight costs, are willing to go ahead boldy and take the people into our confidence, and I believe they will be solidly behind us. We are also courageous enough to be prepared to take the same course if it is necessary to revise the import duties on soft coal in order that this great industry shall not be irretrievably ruined by ruthless foreign competition. I am sorry the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) is not in his seat, for I am sure I should like to hear his views on this subject. In any event I think the people of Nova Scotia have more faith in the Conservative party than they have in our friends opposite to relieve them of the serious disabilities they are now labouring under. Where is the resolution moved by the Minister of the Interior last session for the launching of a coking scheme to supply central Canada with domestic coke to be produced from Nova Scotia coal? We have never heard anything more about it. In my humble opinion it was nothing else but a political gesture in an effort to avert the indignation of the people of Nova Scotia. If this government was really serious in putting forward that proposal why are they not now giving the people where I come from the benefit of such legislation? We want coke or coal to keep us from freezing. I say this in all sincerity. Last Saturday night, although I happen to be the director of a coal company that distributes 15,000 tons a year, I did not have a pound of anthracite coal left in my cellar, and I was obliged to burn coke. That is the situation generally in Toronto. I am glad to be able to get coke to keep my furnace going, and I wish Nova Scotia coke was available in greater quantities, for I would be very glad to have it. That same night I happened to be in the home of the president of that company and I heard him tell his manager over the telephone: "If any of your neighbours are in need or distress, send your men into my cellar where there are ten or eleven tons of anthracite coal. Take it bag by bag and let these families have it to keep them from freezing. I hope by next week we shall be able to get a further supply into our yard." That illustrates the condition with respect to fuel in the city from which I come. That is why I make an appeal—not so much on account of Nova Scotia, although I sympathize with that province in every way—for the adoption of such a policy as will ensure a proper fuel supply within the confines of this country. I appreciate the necessities of Nova Scotia, but I say to my hon. friends from that province that Alberta is farther away from the market of central Canada than they are. I can understand the criticisms which have been indulged in in regard to the amount of expenditure upon the canals of Ontario, but I say to my hon. friends that before very long they will rally to our aid and help us to secure the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway. When that project is an accomplished fact our canal system will be able to transport barges carrying 10,000 tons of Nova Scotia coal. That is what we are going to see in the next twenty-five years. But my hon. friends will have to lend their assistance in getting the canal system improved. When that time comes we in Ontario are going to use Nova Scotia coal for coking purposes and the resultant coke for domestic heating. That is what I hope to see accomplished as soon as we oust this government and replace them by men who are animated by the desire to develop Canadian industries.

But, Mr. Speaker, the coking scheme that we heard so much about at one time has fallen by the way, and it is not the only scheme which has met that fate. I remember hearing the Minister of the Interior state last year that the government hoped to have a shipment of Alberta coal in May or June, when there would be plenty of rolling stock available and larger cars might be had, for the purpose of making a real test of the actual cost of transportation of this fuel. I am sorry the Minister of the Interior is not in his seat so that I might inquire of him what has become of that policy. Is there any record of its having been carried out? No, we have sat here this session and heard the Minister of the Interior answering questions with respect to Alberta coal, and you will find that he has passed on to the province of Alberta the onus of taking that action which the situation calls for. Later on he proposed that the matter be left to the Alberta government, but some hon. members interjected, "no." Afterwards the Minister of the Interior gave this advice to Alberta: "Go down to the railway commission and present your case to them. They are the people to tell you what the actual cost is of hauling Alberta coal to the central provinces in Canada." That is a beautiful example, to use the language employed on the hustings, of "passing the buck." That is what the present government are doing to ascertain the cost of hauling Alberta coal to Ontario.

We should like to be able to burn coal from Alberta in the province from which I come. The province of Alberta is ready to produce 14,000,000 tons of coal yearly. I am not saying that all this coal should be brought to Ontario, but I do desire to emphasize a statement which I made this afternoon: if a proper policy was adopted in this country it ought to be feasible for some of our industries to establish themselves in the vicinity of Edmonton where their power wants could be supplied from the adjacent coal fields and where they could engage in manufacturing without being subjected to undue expense in the matter of fuel. It is not so long since the city of Winnipeg was using American anthracite coal altogether. Now it is consuming large quantities of Alberta coal. One hon. member from Saskatchewan the other evening—I think he is occupying his seat now, but I was sorry to observe the brand of Canadian patriotism he displayed—said that one ton of American anthracite was worth two tons of the Alberta fuel that they were burning. Suppose that is the case, is it not far better to burn two tons of Alberta coal than to bring in one ton of American anthracite? That money would go to help the people who are now engaged in the coal mining industry in this country and vastly to increase the number so employed. The Dominion government, as I understand, receive a royalty from the working of the Alberta mines, and they ought to be the very first to encourage the mining industry in this country.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Did I not hear my hon. friend a few moments ago bewailing the fact that there was no anthracite coal in his own cellar?

Mr. HARRIS: Yes I was bewailing the fact, and I will indulge in further bewailing if it will do my hon. friend any good. My reason for that bewailing is that this inert, inefficient government have not seen fit to tackle in a proper way the question of a national fuel supply. Had this government risen to the necessities of the situation they would have given the necessary assistance, when it became apparent that there would be a scarcity of fuel, so that Alberta coal could have competed successfully with imported American anthracite. Then there would have been no shortage of coal in the central provinces of Canada this year. I am satisfied if that had been done, Alberta would have shipped the coal we needed to us and thus met all our requirements. We use only seven per cent of the total amount of American anthracite coal which is mined. We are dependent upon the American supply, 75 per cent of which is furnished by line companies and 25 per cent by independent companies. These independent brokers of the companies, sitting at Buffalo, are anxious that we shall continue buying supplies of anthracite coal, so that they can clear a profit of from ten to fifteen cents a ton commission on every ton they sell, and that 15 cents commission is being collected by brokers living in the city of Buffalo, not in the city of Edmonton. Let us shift that over from Buffalo to Edmonton; let us shift it on to Canadian soil.

Mr. Speaker, if the Liberal party were sincere in their desire for an adjournment, they had the means at their hands to force an adjournment; they could have put on closure if they were sincere and wanted to proceed with the business of the House, or they could have withdrawn the adjournment motion and gone ahead with public business. We on this side are willing to go ahead and do business. If they want to fill up all these vacant portfolios in the government, they should listen to the words which fell from the lips of the Prime Minister at Richmond Hill on September 6th, when he said: It is not a question of ability; we have lots of ability in the rank and file of the Liberal party. If that is the case, why do you not fill up our front row with men sitting around you, from your own ranks? Is there not enough ability among the 101 members who fill the treasury benches without having to go outside for ministers? When I was a boy we used to say of anything petty, it is small potatoes. With all respect to the hon. ministers of the crown I say that, in the eyes of the Canadian people, more and more each day they are being regarded as very, very small potatoes. As I sat here and saw the government properly peeled by the member from Calgary, properly baked by the members from Nova Scotia within the last day or two, French-fried by the hon. member for Kent, N.B., hash-browned by the members from Montreal, scalloped by the members from British Columbia, boiled and parboiled by the members from Toronto, mashed by the member for Fort William, creamed a little bit by the members of the Progressive party and the Independent and Labour groups, and finally put through the mincer by the right hon. leader of this party, as I saw all this I could not help thinking that this group of small potatoes opposite who pretend to call themselves the government of Canada to-day are one indigestible mess whom the people of Canada consigned to the incinerator on October the 29th last. I ask them, therefore, in all sincerity to have the common decency to resign and let others take their place who are ready to carry on and to give Canada stable government.

The Prime Minister at Richmond Hill said:

> Next to be considered is the question of ability of the government.

Mr. Speaker, look at our front row, I ask the hon. Minister of Public Works, where is the ability of this House?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Over here.

Mr. HARRIS: Have another dream, brother, and wake up. If, Mr. Speaker, the ability of this House is over there, why do they have to go outside their own ranks to find someone with ability enough to fill the vacant seats in the government? I say, Mr. Speaker, that any one of the 116 men on this side of the House, with the exception of myself, has ability enough to fill a seat on the treasury benches.

An hon. MEMBER: Where are they?

Mr. HARRIS: Most of them are here to-night. You never saw finer looking specimens of men in your life. Analyse the achievements of these hon. gentlemen; that is all you need to do to find out where the ability is in this House. The Prime Minister drew from among his own ranks a Minister of Immigration and Colonization, Mr. Gordon, before the last election. I wonder where he is now? Away back in a snowbank in Peterborough. He also drew from the ranks of his own party the Hon. Mr. Marler. Where is he now? Is he here? He also drew from the ranks of his own party the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon), and the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin). Then he drew from the ranks of the big interests the Hon. Vincent Massey. Where is he to-day? Like "Massa," he is in the cold, cold ground. The people of Canada saw to it that he did not get into the government ranks, and in my opinion he never will.

9 p.m.

The Prime Minister at Richmond Hill, on September the 6th last said:

> As far as the country is concerned, I believe we possess its confidence to-day to a greater degree than at any time during the last four years.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the people of Canada did not believe it. They do not believe it yet, and the longer hon. gentlemen opposite sit on the treasury benches the worse it will be for their party when the people are appealed to again. Can there be any doubt that the federal administration is steadily declining in public confidence? The government's majority of one in the last parliament has slid down to a minority of fifteen. The Prime Minister said at Richmond Hill that he could not accomplish reforms without a majority. Now that his party has lost its majority of one and is now in a minority of fifteen, how are we ever going to get any legislative reforms of any kind so long as hon. gentlemen opposite stay in power, just sit tight and draw their salaries? Yet the government through the mouth of the Prime Minister has said that Canada needs to-day firm, constructive government in order to carry forward great reforms. Mr. Speaker, you cannot carry forward great reforms with a minority group.

In conclusion, I say that this government, being unable to move forward as the requirements of a young, strong and virile country like Canada demand, a government which, in addition, does not command the confidence of the people—I say that in making any attempt to move at all, and in moving without the people of Canada, they, in the words of Emerson, are marching out into the night.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, at this late stage of the debate let me add my congratulations to those already offered you on your re-election by this House as its presiding officer. I congratulate you, Sir, not only on again being elected Speaker, but on being thus relieved from taking any active personal part in the performance now being put on in this House by the government, which, in view of the lofty sentiments which we hear voiced by you, Sir, at times from your position of neutrality, could not fail, I take it, to meet with your disapproval and which I am convinced your good judgment would have advised against. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the government, in associating itself with the majority of the members of this House in again selecting you as Speaker, has performed the only commendable act to its credit during this session—indeed, one of the few creditable performances throughout its whole career. I venture to say that in your long experience as a member of this House—as a private member, as a cabinet minister and as first commoner—you have never witnessed such a spectacle as the one which now confronts the House of Commons and the people of Canada, the spectacle of a government defeated at the polls clinging to office for the spoils and emoluments of office. That is the only reason for its existence at the present time. The government admits, through its leader, that it can do nothing but draw salaries and annex emoluments, but notwithstanding that admission it pursues its course of hanging on to office for what is in it, namely the emoluments of office.

A government in such dire straits is truly a pitiable spectacle to the electors of this country. Does anyone challenge that statement? Do the government deny that that is their purpose in holding office? They do not and cannot deny it, because it has been proclaimed by their leader. Mr. King admitted it in his election manifesto last fall, wherein he set out the government's position before the electors of this country. He made it quite clear that his government for the past four years had failed to function to the advantage of Canada. His exact words have been quoted in this House on more than one occasion, but it seems to me that what was said by the leader of the government at that time in putting the government's case before the people is too important to be lost sight of for one moment in considering the situation which confronts the people of Canada to-day. He did not make this statement only once; he repeated it a number of times. He referred to the impossibility of carrying on under the circumstances. At Kentville, Nova Scotia, on September 18, he predicted that the opposition could not expect to elect any members in that province, and from that time on, at different places throughout the country, he predicted victory for himself. He was so confident that he gave up all dependence on the group that had kept him in office during the preceding four years. He burned his bridges behind him; he had no further use for the support which he had received during that period. What is he quoted as saying on September 9, at Erindale, Ontario, as reported in the Mail and Empire of that date? I read:

> If Premier King at the coming election is not returned with a stronger majority than he has had during the past four years he will not hesitate to ask again for a dissolution of parliament. This was his statement at the Parker Picnic here this afternoon. "You can never get the big problems solved unless you have a majority strong enough to allow you to act without fear or favour. If I were faced with the situation of the past four years I should ask for dissolution again."

I wonder if he is able to act now without fear or favour? Is his government able to function without favour from any other group? Again at Regina on the 29th of September he is reported in the Moose Jaw Times-Herald as saying:

> His government had the difficulty of financing and also of carrying on a government without a majority in the House. It had been a government by compromise. It had been necessary to go gingerly and not as far as he would have liked in some directions.

The government would be remembered as a government of large majorities as the records of the votes in the House would show.

> He was convinced that a government without a large majority in the House could not govern Canada with all its problems.

I should like to know where his large majority in the House is to-night.

> If the government had possessed a large majority it would not have been necessary to appeal to the country and an election would not have been held until 1927. Realizing that the country was faced with problems which could be solved only by a government with a majority in the House of Commons, decision had been made to appeal to the people.

I do not think those problems have been settled, and he has not a government with a majority in the House. The government's position has not been improved; it has been made infinitely worse. The all-important pronouncement and definition of policy was made by the Prime Minister in his opening speech to the electors on September 6, when he said:

> As a government we can carry on until 1927, if we so desire. As I have already said, I have not the least doubt we shall be able to command such support as we have all along had in the House of Commons at another session, but shall we be able to do more than that. That is the question I put to everyone of my colleagues in the government and to not a few of the members. It is a question I now put to you who have honoured me with your representation in the House of Commons. It is a question I put to the electors of this country. Is it sufficient that as a government we should continue in office drawing our indemnities and salaries as members and ministers and enjoying the other fruits of office when great national questions press for solution, which for want of adequate majority in parliament we are unable satisfactorily to cope with.

What is his position to-night? What is the government's position to-day in this House? Are they satisfied to remain in office and draw their salaries? What more can they do? I think I am justified in the statement I made in my opening remarks that this government's sole function here is to draw salaries. They have nothing else in sight. The Prime Minister in his election manifesto admitted he had been able to do nothing in the four years, and his situation to-day is infinitely worse; his position weaker than it was then. The quotation continues:

All-sufficient as these reasons may be for not attempting another session of parliament before a general election, there are other reasons of even greater weight. I refer now to all important national problems that are pressing for solution and which cannot be solved in a parliament constituted in the manner of the parliament elected in 1921 or by any government which does not commanl a substantial majority in the House of Commons.

I wonder if he calls a majority of one a substantial majority?

Let me recall what I said a moment ago—as a government we can continue to hold office; we could I believe so arrange our sessional programme as to continue to command in the House of Commons a support equal to that we have had during the last four years, but I doubt if we could do more than that—almost we would be reduced to marking time. This is not a moment in our country's affairs at which to mark time. It is a time to march forward.

The government has done a lot of marching forward since September last.

He cited four reasons why he considered there should be an appeal to the polls. The necessity of dealing with problems of transportation, immigration, fiscal questions and Senate reform. These were questions, the Premier argued, which ought to be handled only by a House of Commons fresh from the people and with a mandate to carry out their will. I do not believe, he added, that any one of the four can be dealt with effectively by a government which is not supported by a substantial majority in the House of Commons.

In view of that pronouncement by the leader of the government, the Prime Minister of this country, what excuse has the government for continuing in office? The excuse was removed by the election. The Prime Minister admitted that the government's position was untenable and impossible, and he was right in that statement. The position was impossible then; it is impossible to-day. It is impossible to do anything but mark time and draw salaries, and apparently this government is quite content to do that. When the Prime Minister admitted that his position was impossible, what was the complexion of the House, a House with 235 members? There were 120 Liberals, 65 Progressives and 50 Conservatives. In other words, there were 185 supporters of the government and 50 opponents, and yet according to the Prime Minister's admission, the government's position was impossible. There is no use in quibbling over names and saying that 120 were Liberals and 65, Progressives. I say without fear of contradiction there were 185 supporters of the Prime Minister and his government. There is no need to call these members Progressives—"a rose by any other name would smell as sweet." The government had a majority of 134 in the House not including the Speaker, and yet they could not carry on, could not solve the problems awaiting solution. Those majorities of from 130 to 135 were composed of two parties whose platforms were identical. Those were the days when the Prime Minister thought a good deal of the Progressive party. I should like to quote from a speech delivered by him at Brandon on the 7th October, 1924, to an audience which consisted largely of his Progressive allies and in which was the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). The Prime Minister was on his way east from a by-election in the constituency of Yale, B.C., in the fall of 1924 and at that time he thought a good deal of his Progressive friends. He had a session of parliament coming on and it was up to him to be good to the Progressives. This is what he said:

"If," he said, "the forces of those who think Liberally and Progressively are united from the Atlantic to the Pacific, there is going to be a long term of Liberal-Progressive administration."

That is the keynote—a long term of office just as it is to-day.

"But if divided, we come to face the forces of high protection which are never divided when the need arises, then we may have an even longer period to regret the mistake, we have made. Division in our forces is likely to mean victory for the party of Arthur Meighen." "We are told," added the Premier, "that what has been done by this government in the way of tariff reduction has been done under pressure of western Progressives. That is not true. It was done because we are seeking to carry out honourable promises we made to the people of Canada and to put into practice the Liberal platform of 1919.

Which not so long before he had described as merely a chart. The ink was scarcely dry on the report of that speech at Brandon when we had the Prime Minister down at Massey Hall, Toronto, announcing that the time had come to pause in tariff cutting. He was addressing an industrial constituency in Toronto, and free trade, Liberal-Progressive ideas, were not so popular in Toronto as they were in Brandon. Those were the Prime Minister's sentiments in the fall of 1924, when he needed the support of the Progressives.

But with that session over and a general election on, how the sentiments of the government towards the Progressives changed! What did Mr. King say during the election campaign? At Kentville, N.S., on September 18, 1925, the Prime Minister stated:

Premier King declared he did not in the least doubt the government would get a majority in the next parliament. The Progressive party had practically disappeared. In Ontario it had left the field: in the west Mr. Crerar, former leader of the Progressive party, had said that so far as the Progressive movement in western Canada was concerned it only meant forming a group that is standing in the way of the interests of the west itself.

No need for the existence of a Progressive party. That is very different from what he said in Brandon just a year before. He goes along to Moose Jaw, where on the 30th of September he is reported as saying:

He spoke of Robert Forke, Progressive leader, as with Scotch determination, holding aloft the flickering torch, hanging on to the last gasp—

I wonder who is hanging on now to the last gasp—and the last gasp is pretty nearly here.

—but what advantage could there be to the west in the return of a small group of Progressives?

Most insignificant persons.

It would have to operate very differently from the way it had operated in the past, he sharply added, if it was to have any influence. "You will not be able to find a man by the name of Progressive in 1930" said the Prime Minister.

He is going to exterminate them altogether. That was on the 30th September and a couple of days later out in Calgary the Prime Minister made this statement:

"Whatever unsefulness the Progressives might have had," Mr. King stated "that usefulness was at an end." He admitted their motives might have been right, but their methods were wrong. They adopted too much the "holier than thou" attitude.

Kind words for his allies. That was October 2, and three days later he said at Edmonton:

The Prime Minister spoke of his majority of one in the last parliament. "Why," he said, "if I went out for dinner, my majority would be gone."

This shows his true estimate of his friends of the Progressive party, what sort of people he thinks they are, of what worth they are, what principles they hold.

When he formed his administration, however, he had felt he would get sufficient assistance from the other side of the House to enable him to carry on. "There is an indemnity of $4,000" he had thought "and they would think twice before voting us out."

That indemnity of $4,000 was going to keep those Progressives supporting Mr. King. That is what he said, not what I say. He continued:

The reason for the Progressive movement is gone, so far as federal politics were concerned.

I wonder if the government think the reason for the existence of the Progressives on earth to-night is gone. I rather think they are pretty thankful to have the Progressives here and helping them on a number of occasions as they have done since the beginning of this session. On the 6th of October the Prime Minister is quoted in the Edmonton Journal as saying:

The Prime Minister reviewed the action of the government in going to the country at this time stating that the need for a bigger majority in the House was the prime factor in reaching that decision. He appealed to the west to refuse allegiance to Progressive members whom he described as the "holier than thou" group which would get no sympathy or consideration for western problems from the rest of the House of Commons.

That is the Prime Minister's estimation of his allies, the Progressives. It is wonderful what some people will stand. That was the 6th of October. The next night at Saskatoon he made almost equally contemptuous references to them. He was interrupted by a statement that the Progressives had kept the King government in power. This is where he reached the depth of ingratitude:

"No Sir, and they never did," Mr. King shouted back.

I wonder what he would shout back to-night. He did not say "they never will". That was the night of October 7. At Melville, Saskatchewan, the next night, October 8, Mr. King's contempt for the Progressives was even greater; he spoke of them as being in the nature of outlaws in parliament, that they included the Ginger group. They would not stay put. He said:

They are simply helping to make the west ridiculous.

Who are they making ridiculous to-night, I wonder? These were Mr. King's sentiments in regard to the Progressive party during the election campaign just over, but he was not at that time contemplating a long period of Liberal-Progressive administration. He was through with the Progressive party, having thrown them overboard. But the government does not talk that way to-day of their allies; as a matter of fact the government is begging the Progressive party for its life. The government is down on its knees to the Progressives: what for? For the good of the country? No, but so that members of the government may reap the benefits and spoils of office. The leader of the government admitted on going to the country that this was virtually all that he had been able to do in the past four years, and he made it plain that without a substantial majority this was all he could hope to do in the future. And now hon. gentlemen opposite are begging the Progressive party to allow them to live in order that they may continue, as he said, to enjoy the spoils of office.

This government cares no more for any group or party, except the Liberal party, than it cared for the Progressive party last fall when the election was on and when the Prime Minister told the country what he truly thought about them. This government will use any group or member for its own purposes and then cast off that group or member like an old shoe when its purpose has been served. That is not too strong a statement to make. Is it not a fair description of what the Prime Minister himself did last fall to the Progressives? Did he not kick them out? I have just read to you what he said about them; they were outlaws, a holier than thou group: "They are simply helping to make the west ridiculous." Could anyone be more severe or more contemptuous than that? And then imagine a government whose leader gave voice to such sentiments being now beholden to those very same people about whom these words were used, beholden to them for its very existence and for its salary—for that is what it amounts to. They are willing to draw their money in that way.

When the Prime Minister at Richmond Hill used the words I have quoted he could then command a majority of between 130 and 135 in this House, and even then he pronounced his position hopeless. Well, if it was hopeless then what is it to-day? What was the result of the election When the government was seeking a mandate from the electors it had far greater support than it has now; it has many less Liberals and Progressives now, if we are to make a distinction between the two parties, than it had at that time. To-day there are in this House fewer Liberal-Progressives and fewer Progressive-Liberals while there are far fewer out and out Liberals including cabinet ministers. But to-day we have in this House a great many more Conservatives than there were in the last parliament; we have over 100 per cent more than we had at that time, when the leader of the Liberal party declared that party's position to be hopeless. I ask again, if it was impossible for him and his colleagues then to do more than draw their salaries and enjoy the sweets and emoluments of office, what can they do to-day under the circumstances in which they find themselves? Instead of 235 members there are now 245 in parliament. And what is the situation? There are 116 Conservatives, 101 Liberals, 24 Progressives, 2 Independents and 2 members calling themselves representatives of Labour; and the government instead of having a support of 185 members has only 129 all told. It lost 56 members as a result of the contest. From a majority of 135, which the Liberal leader before the election considered hopeless, it has dropped to a possible majority of 13 at most including the Speaker. That is, if anything, more than hopeless.

Was the Prime Minister dissembling when he made it appear that to remain in office only to draw salary and indemnity was something distasteful to him and to his colleagues? Well, I may be pardoned for saying that actions speak louder than words. How can hon. gentlemen hope to accomplish more than they were able to do in the last parliament? Was the Prime Minister sincere or was he merely bluffing when he took that high moral ground? What must one infer from his course since the election? About the only line of support which the government failed to lose in the election was the so-called Independent support. The Independents in this House are no more independent than they were in the last, and if possible less so. But they have moved over to the government side so as to be with as well as of the government.

The King government was defeated at th polls on October 29 as everyone knows; Mr King knows it and so do his supporters. Yet he and the remnant of his cabinet continue to cling to office for the sake of their salaries and emoluments. If I am not stating the case correctly I want to be contradicted; I want some member of the government or some supporter thereof to give to the House some reason why the government should hold on to office except for what is in it for them personally. And at that, it is not my own diagnosis of the case; it is that of the Prime Minister of the country. That is what he said about himself and his government; he declared before the election that they could do nothing else with the majority they had then. And that is why they had an election· otherwise there would have been no necessity for an election until 1927. The Prime Minister could have remained in office and continued to enjoy the emoluments of the position but in effect he said that he was ashamed to do so especially in face of the problems of magnitude that were before the Canadian people for settlement. He did not have the nerve to stay longer in office and take the money he was drawing. He threw the Progressives into the discard and went to the country for a clear majority of Liberals. And you know where he landed.

If anything further than the count of ballots were required to convince hon. gentlemen opposite of their defeat, then what has occurred in this chamber since the beginning of the session is surely enough to convince those who are most reluctant to admit it that the King government is defeated. Parliament has been in session now practically two months, and what has been done by the government? They have done nothing but draw salary. That is the whole head and front, first and last, of the government's existence. The House has been in session two months and they have simply drawn salary.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): And got majority votes.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Would the Minister of Public Works call any one of them an adequate majority such as his leader declared was necessary if his government was to function,—a majority without which he would be ashamed to remain in office? I should think the government would be positively ashamed to refer to that majority vote, considering where they got it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): If I may interrupt my hon. friend—I do not feel the government should be ashamed. It was a vote of the people's representatives in this House.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I wonder what the hon. member means when he says, "considering where we got it?"

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): As the Minister of Agriculture is at last taking an interest in what I am saying, I will tell him where he got his majority. He got it from the "outlaws" in parliament.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I object to that term.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, that is not my description of the Progressive party; it was given to them by the Prime Minister. The Minister of Agriculture asked me where they got their majority. I reply, they got it from the people whom the Prime Minister described as outlaws, as the "holier than thou" group—a group that "was simply helping to make the west ridiculous."

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is from some Tory rag.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): That is typical parliamentary language from the Minister of Agriculture. I once heard him describe a bill that he had introduced in this House—as he waved it over his read—as a "rotten old bill." I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that in referring to any members of or any parties in this House I would not use the language employed by the Prime Minister on the hustings when referring to the Progressives. But they are the party that gave the government its majority. And he having so described its members, I think it is not unreasonable for me to say that the government ought to be ashamed to accept a majority at their hands.

The government is really asking too much of hon. members in expecting them to support this address and then go home in order that it may have a respite until March 15. I admit that a member's personal convenience should be the last thing to be considered where the public interest is concerned. But this request of the government is not to further the public interest, it is simply an attempt to secure a political advantage so that it may renew its rapidly waning strength.

Before the report reached Dawson City that parliament would meet on December 10 I had intended to wait until travel became more comfortable and the risks were a little less, but when I found that that was the date set for the opening of the session, I came out to the coast as fast as I could, at great personal inconvenience and some risk not attending the journeys of other members to Ottawa, only to find on reaching Vancouver that parliament would not meet until January 7. We have been in session for nearly two months, and with absolutely nothing done we are asked by the government to pass the Address and go home again. What for? That the government may pull off some by-elections that it should have had out of the way before the House met; no doubt about that at all. If the Speech from the Throne which the government brought down soon after the opening of parliament really originated at the throne we might be constrained to give some heed to it, but when we realize that it is only the speech of this government placed in the hands of His Excellency, it does not make a very deep impression on most of us, particularly those who have listened to four speeches from the throne written by the same hand in the past four years. What did those four speeches amount to? Political humbug. That is an expression which I think the Minister of Agriculture might approve of. They were mere effusions of words, followed by nothing in the way of legislation or policy that has been of any benefit to the country.

I ask members of the House and of the government to go back with me over those four speeches from the throne and see if they can recall any national good that has emanated from them. Let me direct the attention of the House to some of those nostrums of former days. The first cure-all for the country's ills was a wheat pool. Most of us remember how the government heralded that as a masterpiece of statesmanship. The leader of this party and his supporters warned the government and the Progressive allies that the legislation would be abortive. As a matter of fact it was quite unnecessary to warn the government, for its members knew just as well as did the opposition that the legislation would be futile. The government did not intend by that legislation to control the price or the marketing of wheat; it intended to control certain votes in this House, and to this extent the proposal served the government's purpose for the time being—to fool the Progressives and keep the administration in office. That legislation was laughed out of court. But the government had survived the session of 1922, and the salaries and indemnities were safe. The next bid in the Speech from the Throne for the support of the Progressives was a promise to introduce legislation to control freight rates on the Great Lakes. That legislation was so abortive that another session over and another indemnity annexed, the government did not wait to have the legislation wiped out by the courts. It proved so disastrous to Canadian business that the government had to invite foreign shipping to ignore it, even to promise them indemnity from prosecution for violating its terms. Those are two fair samples of the statesmanship of this government.

Looking over those speeches from the throne, we find running through some of them the question of immigration. Usually they are going to embark on an aggressive policy to bring more people into this country. Immigration is one of the four great problems that the Prime Minister told his audience at Richmond Hill required an adequate majority to deal with. What was the government's proposal in regard to immigration in the Speech from the Throne of 1922? Let me quote the paragraph dealing with it:

> Now that the blessing of peace is with us a renewal of efforts to bring in new settlers must be made. My government are fully alive to the importance of this question, and will use every reasonable endeavour to attract to our country people of the most desirable class, with particular regard to settlement on our undeveloped lands.

They promised action in 1922. We will see how far they progressed. In 1923, a year later they told the House:

> The matter of securing an increasing flow of desirable settlers to develop the large areas still available for cultivation in Canada has had the serious consideration of my advisers. Additional advertising and general publicity campaigns have been launched in Great Britain and in the United States and, as opportunity offers, will be extended to other lands from which a suitable class of settlers may be attracted. In other particulars, the activities of the Department of Immigration and Colonization are being expanded.

That was in 1922 and 1923. But if you go to the Speech from the Throne of 1924 you will find the government has given up the question of immigration altogether. It did not give it a line that year, and if you look at the Speech from the Throne in 1925 you will find the same state of affairs; the government has nothing to report to parliament, nothing to report to the public, as to its progress in inducing desirable settlers to come to this country. And it is not to be wondered at when statistics inform us that from 1921 to 1925, the population of this country, if anything, notwithstanding the number of immigrants that had been brought in, was almost at a standstill. We have lost almost all of them one by one. And in the Speech from the Throne this session the government, having dropped the subject for two years, has the temerity to tell the House this:

> With the improvement of conditions throughout the country—

I wonder what the improvement of conditions was. Is this an allusion to the government's majority now?

> With the improvement of conditions throughout the country the government have formulated and put into operation a comprehensive immigration plan.

That would lead to the opinion that the government had been acting in the matter. If that comprehensive immigration plan was working during the years 1924 and 1925, the government overlooked any mention of it in the Speech from the Throne:

> My ministers desire it to be known that the Dominion welcomes settlers of the classes which can be absorbed into our population. Regulations have been simplified, transportation rates greatly reduced, and the care of settlers to destination and during early settlement given every attention. Measures will be taken to further the retention on the land of our existing agricultural population—

I wonder how the government is going to do that—> —to encourage the return to rural parts of urban dwellers possessed of agricultural experience, and the repatriation of Canadians now living in other countries. Special arrangements will be proposed for settlement on crown lands.

That is a pretty picture—a very desirable state of affairs. But instead of the government going home for a rest until March 15, it would be much more interesting for the members of this House if it would declare what that immigration policy is, how far it has progressed, and how successful it has been. The government would have us believe that that policy has already been inaugurated, and is now bringing in settlers. One has only to refer to the various speeches from the throne inspired by this government to realize how futile it is to expect anything tangible from the present administration, no matter what may be contained in such speeches.

In 1923 the government heralded its proposal of Great Lakes freight rate control. We know what happened to that. The government promised in that speech:

> A bill will be submitted to you to safeguard the interests of consumers and producers from undue enhancement of prices or unfair restriction of trade by combines, monopolies, trusts, or mergers.

What has become of that promise? I wonder how many "combines, monopolies, trusts, or mergers" have been brought to book by that legislation of the government? That is an achievement that was starred in the Speech from the Throne in 1923. Now, what is the next item in that Speech:

> It having been represented that an amalgamation of interests of shipping companies and vessel owners upon the Great Lakes has operated to control freight rates and insurance upon grain shipments in a manner which has deprived agriculturists of much of the benefit to which they were entitled, as well as led to discrimination against Canadian ports and harbours, a royal commission has been appointed to investigate and report upon this alleged combine.

The government investigated all right, but the investigation cost this country a lot of money and was productive of no good; none whatever. In the same year the government forecast its French and Italian treaties, the results of which have been depicted to this House. It managed to make treaties with both of the countries referred to, with the result that there was a lessening of Canadian business.

In 1924 the government announced in the Speech from the Throne a policy of rigid economy—rigid economy to the extent of being able to reduce taxation, rigid economy to the extent of postponing the construction of public works until a reduction in taxation had been effected. That was in 1924. There was no election on that year. In 1925 the government came back with an admission that rigid economy would not suffice. It had to cast economy to the wind because an election was coming on, and the constituencies looking to the election had to be satisfied. A glance at the estimates for that year shows that the government had given up its policy of rigid economy.

And then there was in 1925 a wonderful gesture against the North Atlantic steamship conference. I will not delay the House by making any detailed reference to that subject, but the government's performance in connection with the North Atlantic steamship conference was a fair sample of all that has been emitted in various statements and speeches from the throne.

In 1925 the government made an enormous grant for the purpose of making more effective its precautions against smuggling, and what do we find has happened? The government has banished the best inspector from the biggest port in the country, and has taken the mounted police away from the Quebec border. That is a sample of the government's precautions against smuggling.

In 1925 the government went to the extent of putting in the Speech from the Throne a very significant gesture against the Senate of Canada. It was going to amend the British North America Act; it was going to call a conference of representatives of the provinces and arrive at legislation to reform the Senate by way of amending the British North America Act. That again was only a gesture. Just before the election came on the government was driven to admitting that it was not going to do anything of the kind. It was simply going to wait its time, and when vacancies occurred in the Senate it would replace Conservative senators by Liberal senators. That represents the government's wonderful reform of the Senate. If the truth were known I think the government's retreat from its position in regard to Senate reform was due to saner counsels which came from its supporters in the great province of Quebec. Those supporters were not going to stand for any interference with the constitution of this country and the powers of the Senate. The Prime Minister had to make himself very plain on that matter before election day.

The legislation foreshadowed in those speeches from the throne and in government pronouncements which was designed to obtain support included, for instance, legislation for the extermination of combines, legislation for rural credits, Senate reform, and the alternative vote. Now what became of all those gestures? Just such results as they were intended to produce, and that was nothing in the way of reform or advancement. Those gestures were intended just to make a noise to distract public attention from the fact that members of this innocuous government were getting away with their salaries and giving the taxpayer nothing in return except the necessity of paying more taxes. That is the only reason these items were included in these speeches from the throne; they served their purpose to distract public attention, and to get votes in this House. Why should members of this House at this time seize upon this Speech from the Throne as an excuse for bolstering up an expiring government—no, not an expiring government, but an expired government. You, Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, if my memory serves me right, advised a member who had not been over-complimentary in his reference to the government to speak gently. I suppose your advice was given on the old principle that we should speak no ill of the dead.

Probably the government gesture on the alternative vote was the best of the lot. In 1924, the government went so far as to announce as its considered policy the introduction of legislation putting into effect the alternative vote in single-member constituencies. That was to become the law of the land; it was announced as the considered policy of the government. That decision was arrived at by a government composed of men of mature years, and led by a premier who must have formed his opinions after careful consideration. But what do we find? After going so far as to put it in the Speech from the Throne, which the government would have the country and the members of this House to-day take as a reason for giving the government support, what did the Prime Minister say in Saskatoon on the 7th of October last, when asked by a person in the audience, "What about the alternative vote?" Less than a year had elapsed since the Prime Minister included the alternative vote in his Speech from the Throne, and in reply to the question he said, "I am coming to see more clearly that the alternative vote will help to perpetuate the group system, and I believe the group system of government bad." I wonder what had come over him to change his opinion in regard to the alternative vote? He thought enough of it to put it in his Speech from the Throne less than a year before; he regarded it then as legislation necessary for this country, but now he admits that he considers it bad. If he considered it bad during that election campaign, I say it is only fair to believe that he considered it bad at the time he put it in the Speech from the Throne, and therefore it must have been put there for some ulterior motive.

There is no more reason to suppose that this Speech from the Throne will crystallize into legislation of benefit to Canada than the preceding Speeches of this government. Why should members of this House seize upon the visionary promises of this government as contained in the Speech from the Throne as an excuse for helping this government to prolong its existence?

One thing this session has developed is what some newspapers have described as a pinch hitter—a pinch hitter in the person of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin). If an air of self-assurance, positive statement, and finality of dictum indicated strength, then this government would be easily victorious, but no one knows better than the Minister of Customs that he is vainly trying to sustain and revive a lost cause. Probably that is saying too much; I will take it back. It is not a lost cause; this government never had a cause. This government is and never has been anything but an aggregation of office holders. It has no principles and no policy; it exists merely for the purpose of holding office. In the words of its leader, it is able only to mark time and draw its salaries. Those are the words of the leader of the government, not mine. Some of those who heard the performance of the Minister of Customs will not soon forget how, when he thought the hour was at hand when he and his colleagues could no longer cling to office, he came to this chamber, probably after an interview with his invisible leader and with his real commander, the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), and solemnly announced to this House that a vote of want of confidence was not a vote of want of confidence, and that a want of confidence motion was not a want of confidence motion, and that if the opposition amendment were defeated, the government would not consider the vote as a vote of confidence in the government. And so he furnished a nominal excuse, a poor excuse I admit, for some members of this House who had already expressed want of confidence in the government for voting confidence in it; for that is what it amounted to.

Just to show how circumstances alter cases, the Minister of Customs, representing the government pronounced that that motion was not a motion of want of confidence, and therefore, if the amendment had carried, he would have pronounced it to be not a vote of want of confidence. Contrast that with what took place at Saskatoon on October the 7th, when someone in Mr. King's audience wanted to know if the Progressives had ever been given an opportunity to vote for an appropriation for completion of the Hudson Bay railway. "Yes," said Mr. King, and he went on to say:

> A Progressive motion for completion of the road had been submitted to the House as an amendment to Supply, which was a non-confidence motion. As a result the motion was voted down. To have voted for it would have meant voting for the defeat of the government.

Well, in what respect did that motion differ from the amendment of a few days ago, except that the latter was an amendment to the Address? In what respect did it differ from the motion which Mr. King properly referred to as a motion of want of confidence? Was the pledge of the Minister of Customs kept? It was not kept for five minutes. It was never intended to be kept. Why do I say that? What is Mr. King quoted as saying, immediately after the vote was announced, on being asked for a statement of his views? "No statement by me is necessary," he said, "Parliament has spoken." How, then, did he regard the vote? Did he not regard it as a vote of confidence? What is the meaning of those words: "Parliament has spoken?" In effect the Prime Minister says: Parliament has expressed its confidence in my government, and my colleagues and I are justified in clinging to office for our salaries, notwithstanding our defeat at the polls. By the grace of that majority of three the ministers are continuing to draw their salaries and the taxpayers are putting up the money. Parliament has spoken, and the ministers here to-night have said they are not ashamed of that majority. Parliament did not speak very loudly; it spoke in hardly more than a whisper. None of the ministers would go so far as to say that parliament spoke with no uncertain sound. I wonder if it spoke loudly enough to quiet the consciences of those members of the House who, although expressing no confidence in the government, voted confidence in it? For that is what it amounted to. Why vote confidence where members have no confidence?

If it was not for the purpose of securing a vote of confidence from parliament, why did the government call parliament to meet on January 7? For nothing else has been attempted by the government, and now, on the termination of this debate, we are asked to adjourn to the 15th of March. Why was parliament summoned? Surely not to ascertain whether the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) was desirous of continuing the King government in office! If that were all—and that is all that has been done—it was a great waste of time and money. The government can always be sure of the support of the hon. member for Brandon, although perhaps after the unkind and ungrateful remarks made by the premier about the Progressives during the election campaign, it was necessary for the hon. member for Brandon to come down and show the public that he could not be driven out of the ranks of the Liberal party or away from their support, no matter what might be said about him or his colleagues.

The situation is incomprehensible. If the conduct of the government were courageous we could admire it. I do not think it is courage, it is just nerve. To use a slang expression, it is "crust", and if it were parliamentary I would say it was gall. I admire the government's gall for hanging on to office under the circumstances. Its supporters early in the session quoted what they said were precedents for the proposal to adjourn—instances were where new governments had been given time to organize. This is not a new government; it is an old, dilapidated government. If this is a new government, then the defeat of the old government must be admitted. If it was not defeated, what became of it? It is still here. Then it is not a new government and it has no right or fair claim to ask this House for time to organize. It is simply carrying on. The government denies its defeat. The leader of the government has a resolution on the order paper to-day declaring the government undefeated and entitled to carry on. At the same time he says, "Pass the Address and let us adjourn till the fifteenth of March. Why? Because we are unable to carry on and want to organize"—truly an incomprehensible state of affairs. The government wants to go into dry dock for repairs, as a matter of fact, to patch itself up, to gain strength. What for? The better to fight its political battles, the better to oppose us on this side of the House; and yet it complains because we decline to be a party to that performance.

The government seems to have lost all sense of propriety, if it ever had any, and it never showed much evidence of it. In asking the House to support the Address and requesting hon. members to go home till the fifteenth of March, the government did not realize that it could no longer apply the steam-roller tactics of former sessions, when the Prime Minister and the member for Brandon, with a majority of 100 or more, could put through any absurd proposition they chose to introduce. In the language of the comic papers "them days are gone forever" when the government had a majority of 135; now they can succeed only in drawing down their salaries and indemnities, and this they apparently propose to continue to do to the exclusion of all else.

The government was beginning to promulgate through the hon. member for Brandon the idea that we might as well adjourn and go home till the fifteenth of March because we had nothing to do. That was the burden of the song of the hon. member for Brandon. But that idea was suddenly and very effectively dispelled by the startling speech of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), disclosing as it did the shocking state of affairs in government circles. Since that speech was made no one can say that there is no business to be done by parliament or no work for parliament to do between now and the fifteenth of March. If parliament does nothing else but stand by and strengthen the hand and lengthen the reach of that committee investigating the Customs department the members of this House will have done their duty. This is no time to go home; it is a time to stay here and attend to the country's business.

Although I am fully convinced that the government has in some members of the Progressive party staunch and firm supporters, I must say I was surprised when a member of that group went so far as to move the previous question, the effect of which would be to bring this sitting of the House to an end as soon as the present debate was over. In short, the effect was to curtail this debate and prevent the moving of any further amendment. I should not have been so much surprised if that move had come from hon. gentlemen who admit that they are members of the Liberal party, but I was surprised to see it come from allies of the government when the effect of the motion is really to weaken the committee inquiring into the charges against the government. As a matter of fact it was playing into the hands of the smugglers, because every ounce of weight we take away from that committee is to the advantage of lawbreakers and those who are robbing the treasury of this country of its just due. One very useful result, from the government standpoint, of the moving of the previous question has been that for a time at least it prevents the taking of a vote of want of confidence. The government is saved from that little formality for the time being.

If anything further were needed than what is now taking place in this House and before that Customs committee to convince the House that serious matters await attention and that problems of vital interest and importance demand solution by parliament, let hon. members look at the order paper. What does it disclose? True, Mr. Speaker, it is barren of government business, but it is bristling with important matters brought forward by private members. It contains inquiries on a good deal over a hundred subjects, entailing some five or six hundred questions on matters of importance to the public. It contains resolutions on over a hundred subjects, many of which entail or should entail legislation, and yet we are asked to adjourn parliament and go home until the 15th of March as if there were nothing to do. Take the very first question:

1. Was $100,000 paid by the government to Bonanza Creek Gold Mining Company in 1924?
2. If so, why was such sum charged in the public accounts as cost of administration of Yukon Territory?
3. Who are the officers of Bonanza Creek Gold Mining Company?
4. Where is head office and place of business of Bonanza Creek Gold Mining Company?
5. On the advice of whom with knowledge of Yukon affairs, if anyone, did the government act in consenting to payment of said sum?

Last year on the discussion of the estimates I asked for information about that item of $100,000 appearing in the public accounts as part of the cost of administering the Yukon, and the government told the House that they did not know anything about it; they did not know how that $100,000 got out of the treasury. They did not tell the House and they have not told the House yet. It would be more in keeping if the government explained that item of $100,000 than if it went home and did nothing until the 15th March. It is only a paltry $100,000, a small item compared with those we heard about from the hon. member from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) as not going into the treasury when they should have, but ten of those $100,000 items make $1,000,000. That $100,000 item is the interest on $2,000,000. The taking of that amount out of the treasury means that the public debt, the burden of the taxpayers, has been increased by that amount. What is that $100,000 for? Was it to reward some political favourites, or was it to pay for improprieties on the part of the Liberal government and charged up to the cost of administering the Yukon territory? A good deal has been put upon the old Yukon in the way of cost of administration, but this time the Yukon is not guilty. That item has no more to do with the cost of administering the government of the Yukon territory than it has to do with the cost of administering the government of Nova Scotia.

The Yukon was a bonanza for the Liberal government's favourites. By a coincidence gold was discovered in the Yukon in 1896, the same year that the Liberal party came into power. About the time the Liberal party got into the saddle the news of the gold strike reached Ottawa, and the government of that day did not overlook any opportunities for rewarding political friends in connection with that gold discovery. The then Minister of the Interior was Sir Clifford Sifton, and if rumour is correct the same gentleman to-day is one of the close advisers of the Prime Minister of this country. He was on the job as Minister of the Interior in 1896 and succeeding years, and it may interest the House to know some of the history which led up to the payment out two years ago of that $100,000 item.

The mining laws confined the right of persons wishing to take up land for mining to certain limited small areas, in many cases to 100 feet square. That was not enough for some people; there were there people who, realizing their opportunities, and in distortion and in some cases in violation of existing mining laws, came to Ottawa and got grants miles square—in one case of an area of forty square miles right in the heart of the mining lands. Such grants were made to political favourites in Ottawa. In the case connected with this item of $100,000 the government by a distorted administration of the mining laws gave up some five miles of immensely rich mining ground right in the heart of the Klondyke placers. They did not give merely one; they gave them by the dozen here, there and everywhere. This particular grant was known as the Matson and Doyle grant, but they were merely figureheads. They had no claim to a hydraulic concession; they got no hydraulic concession; the power behind the throne got it. Another particularly nefarious grant was one known as the Bronson and Ray grant made to friends of the government at Ottawa. This was never operated and never intended to be operated by them and it should never have been granted.

The action of the government of that day displeased not only independent people in Yukon, but partisan Liberals. There was almost a riot over it. The government of the day, when they had given away practically all the available land known to be rich in mineral wealth, evolved a scheme which they called the Treadgold concession, by which, instead of allowing lapsing claims to lapse to the crown and be relocated and reworked by miners, they allowed them to lapse into what was known as the Treadgold concession. That was the last straw. The people assembled in mass meetings and elected delegates to come down to Ottawa to talk to the government. They did not elect Conservatives, supporters of the opposition; they elected well-known and prominent Liberals to come to Ottawa and ask the government to call a halt, to keep its hands off those mining lands, to turn back its greedy adventurers who were grabbing for themselves the public domain in such shameful manner. So loud was the protest of the people that the government was forced to drop, to annul, to give back to the public that Treadgold concession and to prevent the delegates from returning and making any report that would be damaging to the government of the day, both the delegates were put into good, fat government jobs and the people of the Yukon knew them no more. The storm of protest was so great that the government was forced to take action, to set on foot an inquiry into its own action in dealing with its lands. The inquiry took the form of sending a judge of the Exchequer court into Yukon to inquire into those cases. In this particular case, the particulars of which I propose to give to the House the concessionnaires, the grantees, were clever enough not to be put on the defence, and instead of being made defendants they filed a claim against the government. Not satisfied with what they had got in the way of plunder, they filed a claim for the moderate sum of $17,600,000 damages against the government, and this is what the judge of the Exchequer court had to try on coming to the Yukon.

As the hour is late, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move the adjournment of the debate before proceeding to discuss what took place at that time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is not quite twenty-five minutes after ten and my hon. friend has plenty of time to go on.

Mr. MANION: With the permission of the House I would point out that a number of gentlemen who desire to hear the hon. member would like to catch the trains to Montreal and Toronto at eleven o'clock and I suggest that the minister move the adjournment. The hon. member would speak only for half an hour longer in any case.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Stewart (Edmonton) the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

Monday, March 1, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

ALLEGED FRUIT COMBINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Labour whether the interim report of the commissioner who is investigating the alleged fruit combine has been followed by a final report and, if not, if he anticipates the issuance of such a final report.

Hon. J. H. KING (Acting Minister of Labour): The final report has not yet been made. As my hon. friend will understand, the case is at present being prosecuted in court and there will be no report until the court action is completed.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Friday, February 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. C. Elliott for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to His Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed motion of Mr. Bird: "That this question be now put."

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned on Friday evening, I was endeavouring to convince the House and the government that by a glance at the order paper they would see that there were many important matters to engage our attention to much better advantage than by closing up and going home until the 15th March. My particular reference was to the very first question on the order paper involving an item of $100,000 which disappeared from the public treasury during the year 1924 in a most mysterious manner, so mysteriously indeed that when the estimates were being discussed last year, the government could not tell the House what had become of it or how it had got away. I was endeavouring to give hon. members an insight into the way in which the government of that day had handled the mining lands of Yukon. When bona fide miners and prospectors were limited by law to an area for their mines of 100 feet square, 250 feet square, 500 feet in length, political favourites of the government located at Ottawa were able to get grants of miles square plastered right on to the mining lands of Yukon Territory, thereby depriving independent and industrious miners of any land at all or of an opportunity to reap any benefit from their arduous trip into that northern country and the struggle they were making against the obstacles of nature.

This item of $100,000 had to do with one of those indefensible grants. It was a grant covering some five miles of ground right in the heart of the Klondyke placers, a grant issued in violation of law, in disregard of mining regulations, and obtained by fraud connived at by the government and the government's officials on the ground; otherwise the grant never could have been made. Great public indignation was aroused by the government's conduct in regard to these matters; delegates were sent to Ottawa to protest, and ultimately the government was moved to send into that territory a judge of the Exchequer court to make an inquiry into the numerous and well-founded complaints. The holders of this particular grant, not wanting to be put on the defensive, filed a claim against the government for damages amounting to some $17,000,000 in connection with the government's treatment of them and their bogus grant. Instead of meeting that claim fairly and squarely the government, perhaps being unable to do so as it had been a party to the fraud on which the grant had been issued, filed on its behalf against these claimants an untenable defence. It set up the plea that the grantees had no miner's license and that if they had a miner's license it was invalid. That was a plea that never could succeed. But the judge sent in to try those cases did not inquire into the merits of this case. When he came to the coast he found, unfortunately, that he had a very short time to live, and in every case that had come before him wherever possible he gave judgment in favour of the government of the day. In this case he gave judgment in favour of the government dismissing the claim on the ground that the grantees of the concession had no miner's license and were therefore not entitled to come to court. The case was appealed, and beginning as long ago as 1908 it found its way up through the courts to the Privy Council, ultimately coming back for trial to the Exchequer Court of Canada in 1914.

But something had happened in Canada between 1908 and 1914. The political wheel of fortune had made a turn and a Conservative government was in power. The Liberal government that had granted these nefarious leases was no longer in power to defend its work or to settle with the people who now claimed damages from it. The matter remained dormant from 1914 for ten years, nothing being done. The leader of this party (Mr. Meighen), when this matter was under discussion while the estimates were being considered last session, recalled that he had been approached for a settlement of this claim, but he saw in it nothing but a huge swindle, a gigantic fraud, and he referred those claimants to the court. He said: If you have any claim against the government, go to the court and secure what is coming to you; the government will make no settlement. So from 1914 to 1924 not a move was made. By 1924 the wheel had taken another turn and the Liberal party was again in power at Ottawa prepared to do business with its friends the holders of the concession. What happened? Was the case tried on its merits? No; they made an agreement with the claimants; they went into the Exchequer court, and without a trial they consented to a judgment against the government for $100,000. Because it was a judgment of the Exchequer court, that sum of $100,000 was picked out of the public treasury and handed over without a vote of parliament and without being subject to sanction by the Auditor General. I say that in taking that $100,000 as they did, they performed as neat a bit of official burglary as probably has ever been pulled off in this country. If the claim had merits, why did the government not ask parliament for a grant? They would have had no excuse to give to parliament for any such grant, and no matter how big the government's majority might have been, I do not believe even its majority in the last House of 100 to 135 would have been a party to giving away that sum of $100,000 to those claimants without a trial.

That is a bit of business which this House could very well inquire into even yet. It is true that the money is gone and cannot be recovered, but the public would be interested to know what sort of government we have had for the past four years. Having seen a Liberal government administer that mining camp in the north I can quite well believe that this government kept the Royal Canadian Mounted Police off the Quebec boundary during the past few years, for the people with whom they were dealing in the north in relation to these mining concessions were the same sort of people against whom the government should be defending the country along the Quebec boundary. In those days the mounted police in Yukon were a mixed blessing. They were charged with the disposal of criminal matters and they did it well, but I say that they were a mixed blessing for the reason that they protected not only the independent crook but the official crook as well. If the same thing had taken place on the American side they would have been minus a few mining inspectors and recorders. Had they been on the American side, Liberal officials in Yukon Territory would have been put on a raft and sent down the Yukon river. And that would have been too good for them. The mounted police were there to protect the just as well as the unjust and the public hand was restrained. I say therefore that we should know more about how this $100,000 was lifted from the treasury. It appears as an inconspicuous little item in the Auditor General's report, a grant to the Bonanza Creek Gold Mining Company charged up under the head of cost of administration in Yukon Territory. As a matter of fact it had nothing whatever to do with the cost of administration of that territory; it was merely a grant to some political concern, or to cover up the tracks of a Liberal government, to pay for improprieties on the part of Liberal officials. And in face of such transactions as I have undertaken to disclose the government says, "What does that matter? Leave us in office." That is the government's plea to this House to-day —leave us in office.

If you go through the order paper you will find lots of items just as important; yet the government says, let us go home until March 15. I see an election petition set out on the pages of the order paper and perhaps the House would not be wasting time if it moved to that order of business and dealt with it. It must be disposed of some day, and why not between now and March 15? Why should we not proceed with the business of parliament? Why should it be held up on the excuse which the government has given us in regard to by-elections? The most important by-election of the lot has been held while the House has been in session and it has not interfered with the session nor did the session interfere with that election. Why therefore can the government not proceed with the others? Since October 29 the government has had practically four months in which to complete its by-elections. It had almost two months before the House met and two months would have been sufficient in which to have all the by-elections held, before meeting parliament. Surely no one is innocent enough to think that the government was deterred by any scruples as to the constitutionality of holding by-elections before meeting parliament, before coming here to get a mandate from the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) to carry on, and before getting the vote which the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) undertook on behalf of the government not to regard as a vote of confidence.

It was all just a bit of very poor acting. The by-elections were not held before parliament met for the reason that the government was afraid to hold them; it could not make the arrangements to get the vacancies. The government never expected a majority in this House of less than twelve or thirteen. They did not think their majority would be one or three; they expected to put on a demonstration of strength before going to the country in the by-elections. Instead hon. gentlemen opposite gave an exhibition of weakness, great weakness. What is the state of affairs in the country while the government has been putting on this performance in parliament? Is the country prosperous? Prosperity has been just around the corner every time we have had a Speech from the Throne from this government, but it has never arrived and never will so long as the present administration holds on to office. There is depression in business in Canada, there is great unemployment. What is the state of affairs in the Ottawa valley to-day, and where can a man or a woman seeking work get employment? Who is doing any work in the vicinity of this city or in the Ottawa valley outside the great army of civil servants? And what does the government offer to remedy this condition? It offers free fares to immigrants to come to increase unemployment, fares to be paid by additional taxation on the people who are here and taxation on the immigrants after they get here; for someone has to put up the money to pay these passages. The government is offering these people free fares and five year jobs to help bring about prosperity in Canada. I wonder if hon. gentlemen have ever considered giving unemployed Canadians guaranteed jobs for five years. Why should not the Canadians be entitled to the same treatment? Would it not be well to take some of these out of work people in Nova Scotia and put them on a model farm in the west, giving them free transportation and guaranteeing them five years' employment? That would be much better than bringing in people from northern Europe. Every one of these Canadians is worth five immigrants and there is no reason why we should not keep them here.

When we look at the trade returns of this country we get an idea of the opportunities that are going by the Canadian people. We find last year that we imported no less than $115,000,000 worth of foodstuffs, practically all of which we could produce at home. For instance, we imported from the United States such commodities as flour and fish. Imagine Canada importing flour, fish, eggs, cheese, meat and lard when she could be self-supporting in all these products. And with our ability to grow wheat, and considering the fact that Canada is a great wheat-exporting country, is it not astonishing to find that we imported from the United States in one year $10,000,000 worth of flour and breadstuff? Nevertheless that is what the statistics show. They show further that we imported from the United States $9,000,000 worth of lumber of which $5,000,000 worth consisted of rough sawn material, which is the lumber we specialize in. We imported $9,000,000 worth of paper and nearly $1,000,000 worth of paper pulp. We also imported $23,000,000 in fresh fruits, $16,000,000 in dried fruits and $6,000,000 worth of preserved fruits, with Canadian fruit going to waste. Of milk and milk products we imported $3,000,000 worth, while dairying is one of our chief occupations. The same thing is true in regard to manufactured goods; we find that of clothing, boots, shoes, hats and hosiery, we imported last year goods to the value of $23,000,000.

It is up to this government to remedy that state of affairs, to so legislate regarding trade and commerce that that $115,000,000, or the bulk of it will be kept right here in Canada. It can be done, it should be done. True, this government, through its leader, admitted its inability when it went to the country last fall; he said that it could only mark time and draw salaries unless it had a greater majority of Liberal supporters. Well, where is the government to-day? Can we hope for any solution of our national problems by this government? It has, as I say, admitted that it is unable to solve those problems. What excuse is there, then, for this government to cling to office, outside of its salary cheques? And are its members content to stay here to draw their salaries? Last fall when the Prime Minister went to the country he said he was ashamed to stay any longer and draw the emoluments of office. He appealed to the electorate. Where did he land? He said: This is a time to march forward, not to mark time. What can we hope from the government now but marking time?

There is another item in the Speech from the Throne which perhaps is calculated to bring prosperity to Canada. I do not say whether it is a good proposition or not, but I do say that the House and the country should be given more information about what the government is going to do. I suppose the projected work is destined to help the ports of Vancouver, Victoria, Prince Rupert, Halifax, St. John, Quebec and Montreal. The government is proposing now to spend $50,000,000 to complete the Hudson Bay railway. I do not think the government will deny that that is the expenditure involved. True, no member of the government has told us yet how much is to be expended on this account, but surely the completion of the railway will cost that much, for it will also mean building an artificial harbour at Port Nelson, a fleet of icebreakers and of specially constructed ships to navigate the straits; all this will cost a large sum of money; it cannot be done simply by inserting a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne that the work will be undertaken. In this connection, I quote to the House a newspaper item that caught my eye the other day. As I say, the Hudson Bay railway may be a necessary public work for the Dominion, but, I repeat, the government would be better occupied giving this House and the country particulars respecting this undertaking than attempting to adjourn the House until March 15. This item is from Regina, Saskatchewan, under date of February 5:

> The board of directors of the Saskatchewan Elevator Company met to-day and approved the building of a 900,000 bushel storage addition to the Saskatchewan Co-operative Elevator Company terminal transfer elevator at Buffalo, New York. The addition will give the company 2,000,000 bushels of storage space at Buffalo, and a total storage capacity at the head of the lakes and Buffalo of 17,100,000 bushels. The contract for the foundation work for the new structure has been let to the D. E. Horton Construction Company, Buffalo. The addition will be completed early in July.

This action on the part of the Saskatchewan Elevator Company is not calculated to increase the use of Canadian ports, and yet the people around Regina are among those in the west who are advocating the completion of the Hudson Bay railway. I wonder what they have to say about this increased elevator capacity at Buffalo. Why should they add 900,000 bushels capacity to the elevator there if the grain is to get an outlet through a Canadian port? If the grain growers of Saskatchewan prefer Buffalo and New York to Vancouver and the St. Lawrence, is it likely that they will use the Hudson Bay route in preference to the American route? I do not think it is reasonable to expect that they will.

Another indication of the unsatisfactory condition of affairs in Canada to-day is shown in the volume of settlers' effects that have been taken out of the country in the last three years; their value amounted to $26,000,000, as against a value of incoming settlers' effects of only $18,000,000. That is an indication of the so-called "prosperity" spoken of in the Speech from the Throne. In the past four years we find that 460,000 immigrants came in, while 456,000 walked out—ran out, as an hon. member suggests. Those people were forced to leave Canada to gain a livelihood; they would have preferred to remain here if they could have found work. The bulk of the half million or so we lost were our own Canadians, compelled to leave their native land because there is no employment for them here. Yet we talk of free fares for immigrants and five-year jobs!

I repeat, Sir, the House is entitled to require from the government information as to what is proposed to be done to complete the Hudson Bay railway, whether the country is to be asked to put up $50,000,000, $40,000,000, $30,000,000, $20,000,000 or whatever the contemplated expenditure may be. We should have this information now, not after March 15. For the government to say that the Hudson Bay railway is to be completed "forthwith" means nothing from this government. It has used that term before.

Speaking of taxation, how can Canada hope to get or hold immigrants, or even to retain her own people here when the scale of taxation in the great prosperous and populous democracy to the south of us is so much less than it is in Canada? It cannot be done. The newspapers told us late last week that the United States income tax reduction bill has been passed into law. What does that mean? That some $350,000,000 of taxation is cut off the taxpayers' bill. It was small enough before in comparison with ours. It means that some 2,300,000 Americans have no income tax to pay. That is good business for the United States, but it is pretty hard on Canada. To-day the United States income taxation is not more than one-fifth of what we have to pay. That being so, how can we hope to make any success of an immigration policy? How can we hope to hold our people or to get fresh capital or even to hold the capital that is here?

The worst feature of the whole situation is that there is no prospect of an early change. We cannot hope for any betterment of conditions from this government. That is my opinion of the administration. But let me quote someone whose views should have more weight with hon. gentlemen across the floor; I quote the Prime Minister himself. He gave the public that opinion—he made that admission when he appealed to the country last fall. He said if he had been able to solve the problems of the Dominion with the majority he had in the House at that time he would not have gone to the country until 1927, but as it was hopeless to attempt to do so with the parliamentary support he then had, he put it up to the people to help him out with an adequate majority. So I think I am justified in saying that the worst feature of the situation is that there is no immediate prospect of a change for the better. Unfortunately there may be a prospect of a change for the worse. The fiscal problem was one of the four great problems that the Prime Minister in his manifesto said he could not solve. It has not been solved yet. He gave up governing the country on September 5 last because he could not solve those problems. What is he holding on to office for to-day? What is there in it for the country? What is there in it for him and his colleagues except their salaries? The mere fact that the King government is in office effectively prevents any revival of business activities in Canada, for under its unstable management and its unscientific tinkering with the tariff capital will not take a chance in enterprises that would restore prosperity. With this government tariff-tinkering to catch votes in certain localities, with its promises of special legislation calculated to secure a vote here and a vote there, do you blame capital, Sir, for not branching out? Do you blame capital for preferring to sit tight? That is the state of affairs in this country to-day, and, Mr. Speaker, the government might as well face the music now as just a little later on.

What is the need of an adjournment? This House is practically complete. There is a member here for every constituency, except Regina. A member has been sent here by the electors of each constituency of Canada, and it is the duty of the government with the material at hand to carry on. It would be different if there were eight or ten vacancies and the government asked for an adjournment to fill the vacancies. They might very well say they should get it at the hands of parliament, but with every constituency represented, the people having made a complete answer to the government's appeal of last fall, why adjourn the House to enable them to patch up—to make repairs? If we were adjourning to fill vacancies that would be public business, but if the government creates vacancies by inducing some of its supporters to resign, that is not public business. It is a political manoeuvre and nothing else, and we should not be asked to become parties to the government's political manoeuvering. That has nothing to do with the business of the country. The government cannot get any more supporters in the House by by-elections. That is a physical impossibility. The Prime Minister selected a bomb-proof dugout in Prince Albert, where he had no chance to lose, but there are not enough Prince Alberts to go around. The government's candidates are going to be opposed and some of them are going to be defeated, perhaps all of them, and the government will then be worse off than it is to-day.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Great optimism.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Why not go on as the government is now constituted? Why make a bad mess worse, and with nothing to justify the government's course in hanging on, which it is doing, with no known precedent to sustain it? Talk about cricket; the leader of the House (Mr. Lapointe) had the temerity to stand up in the House and say that the opposition was not playing cricket. They admit that with a full House they are not able to carry on. They want us to give them till the 15th of March to get stronger, so that they can do what? Take a firmer hold on their offices and the emoluments with which the Prime Minister was not satisfied—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is that the reason you are stopping the adjournment?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Is that a serious question coming from the Minister of the Interior?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Quite serious.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The minister asks, is that the reason we are stopping the adjournment? This opposition declines to be a party to the adjournment, because it is not in the public interest to adjourn. The government can cite to the House no reason for adjournment in the public interest. If they can they have not done it yet. All the Minister of Justice, the leader of the House, said was " We want time to hold by-elections" to play politics to strengthen us. Yes, to do what? "To fight you, the opposition," and then they complain because we will not be a party to that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would not let them get stronger, either, if I were you.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nobody else will.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is an awfully good reason, though.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): They want to take a firmer hold of their salaries and the emoluments of office, but so far as solving the great problems of the country goes, the Prime Minister admitted he was unable to do that. He could not do it with 134 or 135 majority. How can he do it with the following he has at present in this House? Oh, but he does want to be Prime Minister, and his colleagues want to remain in office. He admittedly is hanging on to office for what there is in it. I do not want hon. members to feel offended when I say these things, because I am only repeating the words of their leader.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Do not worry about that. You have repeated the statement forty times.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): On Friday night I quoted the Prime Minister's words, and the Minister of Public Works objected to the expression used by the Prime Minister which I quoted.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The way you quoted it.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The Minister of the Interior says "The way you quoted it." Now, hoping I may be able to suit him and his colleagues, I will take occasion to quote it again before I am through and perhaps this will suit him better.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Make it fifty times.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): When I quoted the uncomplimentary, unkind, ungrateful, contemptuous and hostile remarks of the Prime Minister about his faithful and long-suffering allies, the Progressives, led by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke), the Minister of Public Works objected to the term, and what was the term used? The term used by the Prime Minister was that the Progressives were outlaws in parliament. I do not wonder the Minister of Public Works objected.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Will the hon. member tell us what he is quoting from when he makes that statement?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I will do that, too. In quoting those numberless statements, contemptuous statements by the Prime Minister in regard to the Progressives, I was quoting from such journals as the Ottawa Citizen, the Regina Leader and the Canadian Press, right clean across the continent from Vancouver to Halifax.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Newspaper statements do not stand now.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was at several meetings and there was nothing like that.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Does the Minister of Agriculture, or the Minister of the Interior, or any other member of the government deny the reports? Do they pretend to say that the Prime Minister did not make use of those words?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was at three of the Prime Minister's meetings in Saskatchewan, and there was nothing even resembling such statements as have been made by my hon. friend.

Mr. MANION: He said it in Ontario.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Perhaps the hon. minister expects the Canadian Press to be doubted. Perhaps the minister expects the public to take his word, or that I will, against all those Canadian Press reports. He does not contradict me seriously. He does not mean it.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am only speaking of what I know, having attended three meetings.

Mr. CLARK: How many meetings did he hold, and did he make the same speech at every meeting?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): When I quoted the Prime Minister's references to the Progressives, on Friday night, the Minister of Agriculture interjected "That is from some Tory rag," and he thought he had disposed of it. I wonder if he would call the Manitoba Free Press a Tory rag. I will read what the Manitoba Free Press says about him.

> If Mr. King, as a result of his organization, is not able to produce a government with more decision and punch than the one that appealed to the country on October 29, then it is not worth while going ahead with the proposition. If that is the kind of government that reappears after the recess of parliament, the end will not be far out of sight. Something a good deal better is required. The country is not hankering for a general election, but it will not be satisfied with a process of backing and shuffling at Ottawa that has for its object the keeping of a certain set of politicians in office.

That is not exactly a Tory rag. It is a good Liberal organ, talking about the Minister of Agriculture. It refers to the Minister of Agriculture as one of the set of politicians in office, and that, Mr. Speaker, is the whole head and front of the government's case, to hang on to office. They cannot get away from it. As a matter of fact, this government has sunk to such depths that the Free Press cannot follow it any longer. It wants something better than that set of politicians in office. The government that went to the country in October is the same government, it is composed of the same gentlemen who occupy the treasury benches to-day, and the Free Press says we have got to have something better. But the prospect of producing something better is certainly not very bright. The public mind is simply shocked at the lack of self-respect exhibited by this government. It is admittedly, through the mouth of its Prime Minister, hanging on to office—for what? For the loaves and fishes, for the spoils of office, for the salaries and emoluments. The Prime Minister admitted that there were great problems pressing for solution, and that he could not solve them; he could only mark time and he and his colleagues draw their salaries and enjoy their emoluments. I ask them to-day, what do they propose beyond that? What accomplishment can the country hope for beyond that? I think I am justified in using that language; as a matter of fact, it is not my language, but the Prime Minister's own. If any hon. member disputes that I refer him to the files of the public press. Look over the files of the Regina Leader; I did that myself this morning. I have quoted Canadian press despatches of the Prime Minister's speeches, some from Liberal and some from Conservative papers, also, despatches carried by the Canadian Press, which is an impartial service sent to all the newspapers of Canada. I was not quoting editorial comment, but simply news items.

Mr. Speaker, the government's plain duty is to hand in its resignation. As some objection has been taken to my quoting the Prime Minister's remarks in regard to the government's allies to my left, I might as well pursue that theme a little further. The Minister of Public Works said, "I object to that term," referring to the term "outlaws in parliament." Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister would not use that term to-day to the Progressives in this House; he would not dare to do it, but he had no use for them then. He thought he was through with the Progressives. He never thought he would have to go to them with his hat in his hand, begging for the continuance of his political life. But there they are, begging to be allowed to continue to draw their salaries. The Prime Minister admitted that that was all he and his government could do, and now he is begging for support from the people, the Progressives, of whom he said, "They will think twice before voting us out and so relinquishing their $4,000 indemnity." That is the way he sized up the Progressive party. That is worse than if he had said they were purchasable by legislation, which is not parliamentary.

I say again, that no government having branded certain members of this House as outlaws, as a holier-than-thou group, as a group that thought more of its $4,000 indemnity than it did of its independence, as a group whose usefulness was at an end, as a group that had practically disappeared, as a group that was standing in the way of the interests of the west, as a group that was simply helping to make the west ridiculous—I say that no government that has branded a party in this House in those terms can retain its self-respect and accept favours at their hands.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask a question? Is the hon. member serious in making the dozen or two statements he has just made, as to the exact words of the Prime Minister?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He said it over and over again.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, when an hon. gentleman rises in this House to ask a question, it is rather a strange thing the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) cannot let the hon. member answer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The leader of the opposition will not interfere with his answering. If there is anyone in this House who interferes constantly, it is the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart).

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The whole onslaught is being directed against the Minister of the Interior and the government. The Minister of the Interior will take care of himself as well as the government. All I am asking the hon. gentleman, and I hope this time he will at least give me a direct answer, is this: Is he honest in attributing all those adjectives he has just used to the Prime Minister of Canada? Does he infer for a moment that the Prime Minister made those statements at any public meeting or at any place, with the single exception of the first statement? That I have not contradicted, although I have very grave doubts whether it ever was made.

[Mr. George Black.]

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Will the minister repeat the statement he admits the Prime Minister made?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The statement that—I do not admit any statement. I said I had grave doubts whether it was authentic.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Tell us that one.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Will hon. members give us a chance, because before the session is over you will perhaps be glad you did give us an opportunity to speak. My question was this: Does the hon. gentleman want this House to believe that the ten or a dozen adjectives he has attributed to the Prime Minister were statements made direct by the Prime Minister at any time?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): When the Minister of the Interior got up to catechize me—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I got up to ask the hon. member a question.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I take back the word catechize because I would not allow him to catechize me. The minister asked me if I was serious in quoting all these adjectives, with the exception of the first statement, and I asked him what he means by that first statement which he accepts.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I made it very clear that I did not accept it.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you and the House must be impressed with the frankness of the minister after having heard him say, as he did in plain language just a few minutes ago, "with the exception of the first statement." He had evidently something in his mind. What statement was it he accepted? When I asked him to tell me which one it was, he says now he does not accept anything. I say this in reply to the Minister of the Interior: I am quoting from Canadian Press reports of the Prime Minister's campaign speeches across the Dominion of Canada. I have quoted from papers regardless of their editorial political leanings. I have quoted from despatches sent out by reporters who attended the meetings at which the Prime Minister made these statements, and who telegraphed them to their papers. Furthermore, I do make them seriously, and I make them expecting them to be believed, knowing they are believed by the Minister of the Interior himself.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I must object to that statement. The Minister of the Interior does not believe them.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Well then, all I can say is the Minister of the Interior is softer than I took him for.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You will probably find out before you get through with him.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): He might not want to believe them. I can quite believe that the Minister of the Interior, the Prime Minister, and every other member of the government, would wish the Prime Minister had never said these things.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I ask another question? Will the hon. gentleman give us the papers from which those quotations were made?

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I shall have great pleasure in looking up all the references and giving them to the minister. They cannot be expunged, they cannot be wiped out; I am quite safe in giving them to him. They can be found in the files of all the newspapers of Canada, in the library of this parliament, in newspaper offices, in the archives.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I only want the quotations.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I hope to assemble a large number of them for the edification of the Minister of the Interior. I will undertake to do that just as soon as I get through. I am not surprised that the minister is shocked, not surprised that he objects to these statements.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not shocked; I only want the proof, that is all.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): It was one thing when the Prime Minister, thinking that he was going to persuade the country to his views, thinking that he was going to get a majority of his own supporters, denounced the little group on which he has been depending for the past four years for the existence of his government—that group that he thought was going to be wiped out. But it is not so pleasant when he finds to-day that more than ever he is under an obligation to, and even under the thumb of, the Progressive group and the Progressive leader. I wonder if the Minister of the Interior will say that the press reports of the premier's manifesto delivered at Richmond Hill were not correct?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I never said so.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Will the Minister of the Interior say they are correct?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was not there; I did not hear the speech. I want to make it clear to my hon. friend that I am not raising any objection to any statement he is going to make about the Richmond Hill speech. My objection is rather to the other statement.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): I do not take the interjection of the Minister of the Interior as one of unqualified approval, though he says he does not object. I wonder if the minister objects to the press reports of the premier's speech at the Parker picnic, at Erindale, Ont. on 9th September, when he is reported as saying, although perhaps he did not say it:

> You can never get the big problems solved unless you have a majority strong enough to allow you to act without fear or favour. If I were faced with the situation of the past four years I should ask for dissolution again.

I wonder if the Prime Minister would not like to expunge that statement? I wonder if the Minister of the Interior would not prefer to have that statement unsaid just as much as he would the unkind remarks made by the Prime Minister against the Progressive party.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, I am not raising any objection to that statement. There was no reflection on a Progressive member or anyone else in that statement.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): No, Mr. Speaker there is no reflection on a Progressive or anyone else; but there is a definition of the government's policy and the government's stand which the administration does not dare to take to-day. Does the government say that the big problems of Canada can be solved by it?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): Then it would be refreshing to see some headway made. We have been here nearly two months, and as yet there has been no business submitted to the House. The only thing submitted to parliament has been the Speech which the government placed in the mouth of His Excellency, but it does not foreshadow anything of substantial benefit to the people of this country. No, the Prime Minister says: You can never get big problems solved unless you have a majority strong enough to allow you to act without fear or favour. Has the government got a majority now strong enough to enable it to act without fear or favour?

Was the Prime Minister correctly reported in the Moose Jaw Times-Herald of 29th September when he is alleged to have said at Regina:

> He was convinced that a government without a large majority in the House could not govern Canada with all its problems.

Well, now we have got a government without a large majority in the House, and there is an admission by its leader that it cannot govern Canada with all its problems. If it cannot why is it hanging on to the treasury benches? What does it hope to do? What is the alternative?

If the government had possessed a large majority it would not have been necessary to appeal to the country, and an election would not have been held until 1927.

The government went to the country because the situation was hopeless; it could not get ahead. But what can it do to-day?

Realizing that the country was faced with problems which could be solved only by a government with a majority in the House of Commons a decision had been made to appeal to the people.

Well, the people gave the government its answer. It gave my hon. friends across the way their answer, and they are not willing to take it. What was the sense of appealing to the people—prefacing the appeal with the statement that the situation as it was then was hopeless —if on coming back to a worse situation the government is going still to hang on to office? I say that the pronouncement made by the Prime Minister for his party to the public of Canada ought to be taken seriously, and ought to be adhered to by the Prime Minister and the government and by their supporters. It should not be lost sight of for one minute, and for my part I do not propose to allow the government to lose sight of it for very long. The Prime Minister further said:

4 p.m.

Is it sufficient that as a government we should continue in office drawing our indemnities and salaries as members and ministers and enjoying the other fruits of office when great national questions press for solution, which for want of adequate majority in parliament we are unable satisfactorily to cope with.

If that was the position of the government when they had a majority of 134 members what can it do to-day when its majority has been reduced to one varying from one to ten? Am I unfair when I quote the Prime Minister as making that statement? The Prime Minister asked:

Is it sufficient that as a government we should continue in office drawing our indemnities and salaries as members and ministers and enjoying the other fruits of office when great national questions press for solution—

The Prime Minister was not satisfied that the situation was sufficient. That is the reason he went to the country. I ask the Minister of the Interior is he satisfied that it is sufficient to-day? If it is not sufficient why do not hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches comply with the verdict of the people and get out? Surely the people asked them plainly enough to go. The Prime Minister predicted that he could continue to hold office. Here is what he said:

Let me recall what I said a moment ago—as a government we can continue to hold office; we could I believe so arrange our sessional programme as to continue to command in the House of Commons a support equal to that we have had during the last four years, but I doubt if we could do more than that—almost we would be reduced to marking time. This is not a moment in our country's affairs in which to mark time. It is a time to march forward.

How much marching forward could he do? It was evident he could stay in office no longer, and so instead of waiting until 1927 he dissolved parliament and went to the country. And now he is worse off than he was then. Yet now he and his colleagues are satisfied to stay here and draw their salaries and indemnities and enjoy the sweets of office. How are the government going to get away from that stand, except by admitting that it is willing now to stay and do what the Prime Minister was ashamed to do at the time referred to. I should like to hear how the government get around that situation; I should like to hear how any explanation can be given that will compare the situation in September last with the situation to-day to the advantage of the government. Let the government, for once in its life, be candid and deal with the situation. Let it show the House how it is going to improve the situation which the Prime Minister complained of. How is the government going to solve the four great problems selected by the Prime Minister—transportation, immigration, the fiscal question and Senate reform? If the government could not deal with these problems during the past four years, how is it going to do so to-day? In what way has the government bettered its position? That, Mr. Speaker, is the government's whole impossible case as stated by its leader, and its whole unthinkable plea is, "Let us stay in office."

I have just had placed in my hands a copy of a paper which, no doubt, has some standing in this House with certain members —I refer to the Grain Growers' Guide. In its issue of Wednesday, October 7, 1925, that journal published the following statement:

Mr. King Offers Bribes

Realizing that he will lose considerable support in the eastern provinces, Premier King is employing desperate tactics in an effort to win Liberal seats on the prairies. During the past four years he employed every art to lure the Progressive members into the Liberal camp. Last fall he toured this country gently wooing the electors, but he made no impression. Last week, however, on Tuesday evening at Neepawa, Wednesday evening at Regina, and Thursday evening at Calgary, he adopted a species of bribery. He urged the electors to abandon the Progressive candidates and elect Liberal members to parliament, holding out a promise that if this were done he would be able to fulfil his pre-election pledges on tariff reduction, the Hudson Bay railway and others. He has stated that the Liberal party, with 117 members in parliament, had but a majority of one, and consequently, could not fulfil its pre-election pledges. "It isn't that the government does not want to do the things you want," declared Mr. King, at Neepawa. "You don't make it possible for us to do them," he said, and he pointed out that the only way by which the government could carry out these pledges was by having a clear working majority of staunch and reliable Liberal members.

Not Progressive members. The government has not a clear majority of staunch Liberal members. Therefore it follows as a natural course that it cannot carry out its pledges, and if it cannot carry out its pledges why does it wish to continue its miserable existence in this House? The government's plain duty is to hand in its resignation to His Excellency and to advise him to call upon the leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Meighen) to form a government. When that is done business will revive and the exodus to the United States will stop. Immigrants will find a country able to assimilate them and give them remunerative and satisfactory employment. There will be no need to bait them here with free fares and a guarantee of a five-year job. Canada will attract population on its merits just as people are now attracted to the United States, and there will be no necessity for artificial inducements to lure people to come to this country. Canada will awake from her four years of stagnation and confidence will be restored. The government of the country will again function in a dignified and efficient manner after nearly five years of worse than marking time while, as Mr. Mackenzie King puts it, he and his colleagues have been drawing their salaries and indemnities.

Mr. I. D. MACDOUGALL (Inverness): Mr. Speaker, if your native modesty rises not in revolt against the many eulogies sounded in your favour by hon. members, may I, the youngest member of this House, youngest in years and in parliamentary experience, be permitted to add my humble tribute to those so eloquently expressed by previous speakers in this debate? My observations in this House lead me to affirm that you, Sir, possess all the requirements, all the attributes, which should properly distinguish one in the dignified and exalted position which it is your privilege to occupy. In honouring you this House has done honour to itself.

Before entering upon a discussion of the legislative programme outlined in the Speech from the Throne, let me state that it is not my purpose to indulge in carping criticism, or with bitter invective to upbraid the Liberal party or any other party. True, hon. members are not of one mind politically; we differ in our judgment as to methods and policies; but fain would I believe that there is a common ground, a plane far exalted above the somewhat sordid level of party politics, upon which we the representatives of the Canadian people may meet and agree. May we not of this fact make common cause, that irrespective of political affiliations we all desire to serve and advance a great, a common country, to which we owe a mutual allegiance and a mutual love?

To my mind, there is in this country a question more important than any or all the specific measures outlined in the Speech from the Throne, aye, more important than any amendment that could be suggested to that Speech. That question is whether or not the spirit of confederation is to endure in this land, or whether it is to be supplanted by sectionalism and selfishness bearing in their wake, as they inevitably must, disintegration and political chaos. Liberals, Conservatives, Progressives or Labour—all will admit that confederation was a great ideal—a goal worthy of the far-seeing and patriotic men who consummated it; but confederation was born of good faith and a sincere desire among the provinces to help bear one another's burdens. It is this spirit of good faith, unity, co-operation and sympathy between the provinces that the people's representatives in parliament must ever jealously guard, cherish and foster. Unless the provinces, the integral factors of Canadian union, are willing to work together in peace and harmony, Canada cannot achieve its highest political destiny; confederation itself may not endure. In order to prevent illwill and suspicion in the relations between the provinces, the federal government must be in a position to mete out even-handed justice to every province in this Dominion. If there is in the minds of the people of any province or provinces even a well-grounded suspicion that their rights are not being protected and their interests not being fully represented in this government, a situation fraught with dangerous possibilities to Canadian unity may well develop. To guard against any such fatal consequence, the federal government, which is supposed to be a government of all the people and for all the country, must be able to comply with two important conditions—conditions without which that spirit of co-operation and goodwill so essential to national unity cannot be maintained. These conditions are, first, the representation of all the provinces on a fair basis in the cabinet councils of this government; secondly, the ability of this government to formulate a legislative programme suited to the needs and requirements of every province in this Dominion; not specially designed to catch the votes of a particular group or to placate a particular section of this country. The present government, and it is not my purpose to abuse or to deride it, is clearly incapable of supplying either of these two conditions, without which unity and goodwill cannot prevail between the provinces of Canada. Take the matter of cabinet representation. We find to-day that four important provinces in this Dominion, and one of the four the most populous, have no minister—no voice whatever in the cabinet councils of the government. Is that a situation that makes for goodwill, sympathy and harmony between the provinces? Nor is this government free; not even its most enthusiastic supporter would contend for a moment that it is free to bring down a legislative programme suited to the requirements of the whole country. This government can bring down only such measures as it thinks will meet with the support of the Progressive group in the House. In order to retain power it must always trim its sails to catch Progressive breezes. It cannot bring down legislation which it may think necessary in the interests of all the people of Canada and of all the provinces. As has been said in this House, the government can act only by the grace and with the permission of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke); unless his spirit moves it, it cannot move at all.

Now this country requires stable government; it requires a government capable of taking forward steps. There are great problems crying for solution in Canada to-day; the problems mentioned by the Prime Minister at Richmond Hill are just as acute at the present moment as they ever were! For nothing has been done by this government to solve those problems since the Prime Minister made his announcement at Richmond Hill. Consequently this country demands a government which will be able to make some progress in the interests of the people as a whole. In face of this situation, with our people clamouring for action on the part of the government, we have in power an administration which is transfixed, motionless, and incapable of motion, like Joshua's sun in Ajalon. A striking exemplification of the impotency, I might add the political and moral cowardice, of this government is to be found in its unwillingness or its inability to formulate a national fuel policy for this country. This is a question of great national importance, which vitally affects the industrial and commercial welfare of all Canada. If our country is to attain that proud position industrially and commercially of which it is certainly capable, our government must take immediate steps to make Canada independent of foreign countries in the matter of its fuel supply. If we do not do this we must be content to remain a vassal state in respect of industry, manufacturing and commerce. It is impossible to over-estimate the importance of coal in the industrial development of any nation. Students of economic history have attempted, and successfully attempted, to explain the growth of such countries as England, Germany and the United States in wealth, in power and in population, solely in terms of their coal industries. Writing on this very subject Professor Van Hise of Wisconsin university in a book entitled The Conservation of the National Resources of the United States, says in respect of coal, to which he attributes the industrial and commercial supremacy of that country:

> Coal is by far the most important of all the mineral products. Next to coal in importance is iron. These two are of much greater consequence than all the other mineral products combined. The existence of extensive coal and iron fields has profoundly influenced modern civilization. The greatest commercial nations are England, America and Germany and each owes its industrial greatness to its extensive coal deposits.

Indeed, coal and iron may be described as the twin foundations of modern manufacturing industries and of commerce. They are at the same time the principal source of national power, wealth and population. In this respect England furnishes a very apt and at the same time a very striking example. In the century from 1600 to 1700, when England depended principally upon agriculture, and, a little shipping and commerce, the population increased by only 25 per cent; and from 1600 to 1760, while England in the latter part of that period still depended primarily on these three activities the population increased by 35 per cent. About the year 1760 there occurred what students of industrial history are pleased to term the industrial revolution; this was a revolution in methods and practices based fundamentally upon the use of coal in industry. If we take the 150 years from 1760 to 1910 we find that the population of England increased not by 35 per cent, as in the previous 160 years, but by 455 per cent. We find that even to-day England attaches great importance to its coal industry. This is shown by the fact, that the British government classifies it as one of the key industries of the country, and it may be of interest to certain gentlemen who are disciples of the Manchester school to note that as a key industry, whenever England's coal industry becomes threatened by outside competition, it can be immediately protected by a duty of 30 per cent. Similar tendencies showing the importance of coal in national development can be discerned in the industrial history of Germany and the United States, where in both cases a marked increase in national wealth, power and influence is found to have resulted from the development of their extensive and important coal resources. Knowing that the industrial and commercial supremacy of England, America and Germany is largely due to the fact that these countries wisely conserved and used their great coal resources and so maintained their independence of foreign countries in the matter of their fuel supply, it is certainly logical to contend that if Canada is ever to attain that "place in the sun," industrially and commercially, which a bountiful nature ordained to be ours, this government must take immediate steps to formulate a national fuel policy. There is no good reason why in the years to come Canada should not occupy an important, if not a pre-eminent, position in manufacturing, in commerce and in industry. We cannot do this if we continue to be as we are at present, dependent upon a foreign country for our fuel supply.

Now I wish, Mr. Speaker, to lay before this House the situation which confronts the Alberta and Nova Scotia coal operators, but not in any partisan spirit, for this is a real national problem which should be solved by the government. Our chief manufacturing provinces are Ontario and Quebec, situated in central Canada. On the other hand, our coal deposits are situated in the extreme east and west in the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Nova Scotia, and to some extent also in New Brunswick. Up to the present time the central provinces have been depending principally, if not entirely, upon the United States for their supply of both anthracite and bituminous coal for domestic and for steam purposes. Last year, taking into account the amount of the American coal used for coking, the importations of United States coal into central Canada amounted to 15,000,000 tons. Which means, Sir, that 120,000,000 good Canadian dollars were sent to the United States to provide employment for their miners. And while this was going on, the miners of Alberta and Nova Scotia in many cases were walking the streets in search of employment and their families were threatened with starvation.

I have tried to point out from the industrial history of other countries the great importance that we should attach to formulating a national fuel policy. But aside altogether from that consideration, we may approach it even from a selfish point of view. If the provinces of Ontario and Quebec say that they should purchase their coal where they can get it cheapest, I want to show them that they can no longer continue to rely upon the American coal operators and expect to get their fuel at the same prices as they have been paying in the past. In other words, I want to show briefly the tendency in prices of American coal in the future as I see them. Let me take the anthracite supply first. The householders of Ontario and Quebec have been depending almost entirely upon American anthracite for their domestic needs. Those of us who have given any study to the coal industry of the United States, know that competent geologists estimate that the present available supply of their anthracite coal will be practically depleted within the next quarter of a century—for no longer than twenty-five years at most will the provinces of Ontario and Quebec be able to obtain American anthracite coal. But long before that time elapses, perhaps within the next decade, the United States will not be producing enough anthracite coal to satisfy their domestic demand, and if the people of the central provinces continue the present policy of depending upon American sources of supply for their domestic fuel, they will find that within the next decade American anthracite will be a luxury and that they will have to pay the price of a luxury to obtain it. I venture the prediction, that within the next ten years the people of Ontario and Quebec, if our government does not bestir itself and formulate a national policy to enable them to get Nova Scotia and Alberta coal, will have to pay for whatever American anthracite they can get, not $17 a ton as at present but more like $25 or $30 a ton. I might point out that at the present time two of the anthracite coal areas which were important sources of supply, the Carbondale and Scranton districts, have already petered out.

When we come to bituminous coal, we find there are also certain tendencies which should convince one that the price of American bituminous coal will be on the upgrade in the years to come. Sixty-five per cent of the American bituminous coal which comes into the St. Lawrence market in direct competition with Nova Scotia and Alberta coal, is from the unorganized coal fields in the United States. As hon. members know, there was a time in the history of this and every other country when workingmen were denied the right to organize and to deal with their employers through collective bargaining; but that day has passed. Public opinion to-day grants to labour the right of collective bargaining. The fight is going on in those unorganized coal fields of the United States on behalf of the men to get this right acknowledged by the operators. And I venture to say that within the next year or two, those unorganized fields, which, now supply sixty-five per cent of the American bituminous coal coming into direct competition with Nova Scotia and Alberta coal, will be organized. The result will be that these men will rightly demand the same scale of wages and the same working hours that obtain now in the organized bituminous coal fields of the United States. That will increase the price of American bituminous coal, and the American operator sending his product into the St. Lawrence market will pass that increased cost on to the consumer in Quebec and Ontario in the form of a considerably increased price for his coal.

Nova Scotia at the present time is suffering from a very severe and, I might say, very unfair competition in the St. Lawrence market. When we realize that in the United States they have a bituminous coal area of 496,700 square miles, we must appreciate what Nova Scotia is up against in trying to help in giving Canada a national fuel policy. Then again. the majority of the coal fields in the United States are inland, while many of our workings in Nova Scotia are submarine. Everyone acquainted with coal mining knows that it is much more difficult to operate a submarine mine, because you have very heavy costs for pumping and haulage which you do not meet with in inland mining.

There is another point to which I wish to refer in respect to Nova Scotia. Before 1914 the Nova Scotia operators were fairly well entrenched in the St. Lawrence market. They lost that market in 1914. Why? They lost it principally for patriotic reasons. The coal companies had a fleet of their own boats carrying coal from Sydney, Cape Breton, to Montreal. The government of Canada commandeered that fleet of boats for war service. The result was that the Americans, who did not become a belligerent nation until 1917, were able to take advantage of this position and become strongly entrenched in the St. Lawrence market, and to-day the province of Nova Scotia is suffering on account of its patriotism. Talking of patriotism, I may say in reference to the miners of Nova Scotia, who have been given some advertising throughout this country, and who are sometimes depicted as lawbreakers, that the town of Glace Bay, the largest town in the province of Nova Scotia, having a mining population exclusively, was the only part of Canada where the government had to seriously consider the idea of stopping voluntary recruiting, because the miners were enlisting in such great numbers. I wish to state that in 1914, before the war broke out, and before an unprecedented demand for coal developed, the output of the United States annually amounted to about 400,000,000 tons. When the war broke out there was an unprecedented demand for coal. The coal industries of England, of Germany, of France, and to some extent of Canada, were demoralized by the exigencies of the war. The United States therefore, which did not become a belligerent nation until 1917, was in a position to take advantage of this unprecedented situation in the world coal trade, and coal mines were opened up in that country which in normal times would never have been opened at all. The result was that while they were producing 400,000,000 tons in 1914, in 1920, after the war was over, they were producing 900,000,000 tons. They more than doubled their annual output. When the coal trade returned to normal a great many of those small operators who had not made a very heavy investment in plant, saw that they could not compete with their larger competitors, hence they adopted a system of mining known as stripping, by which, instead of attempting to recover all the recoverable coal such as is done by the coal operator in Alberta and Nova Scotia, they resorted to a system of taking out the cheapest coal they could get in the mine and letting the rest go, and in some cases coal obtained in that way has been coming into competition with Nova Scotia coal in the St. Lawrence market. Nova Scotia is being subjected to very unfair competition by the United States coal industry. Then we also have distress coal coming into Canada. Everyone familiar with coal mining costs knows that it requires a great deal of money to keep a large coal mining plant idle for one day. Evidence given before the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States in 1921 was to the effect that when a large coal mining plant was idle for one day and worked the next day, the cost of the idle day would increase the cost of the coal the next day on which the mine worked by seventy-five cents a ton. In order to avoid that loss American operators tried to work their mines as regularly as possible, and they found it good business sometimes to sell some of their coal at cost, or a little below in order to offset the expense of an idle day. The coal obtained in that way is termed distress coal and in some cases it comes into the St. Lawrence market and competes with Nova Scotia coal.

Mr. BALDWIN: Does not the hon. gentleman consider that it was a great blunder for the government to commandeer the fleets of boats of the coal companies of Nova Scotia, and thus prevent them from shipping their coal to the St. Lawrence market?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: If my hon. friend thinks that it was a great blunder for the government to support the allied nations in that war then, perhaps, it was wrong.

Mr. BALDWIN: My hon. friend did not answer the question.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I wish to point out what the gaining of the markets in central Canada for Alberta and Saskatchewan coal would mean to those two provinces. We find that in 1922 the coal mines of Alberta worked only 237 days. In 1923 they worked 227 days. In 1924 they worked 228 days. In Nova Scotia in 1923 the coal mines worked 250 days, and in 1924 only 202 days. If this government would formulate a policy by which Alberta and Nova Scotia coal could be obtained to supply the fuel requirements of central Canada, the wages of workmen in the Alberta field could be increased by about $500 a year, and the wages of miners in the Nova Scotia coal fields, on account of the continuity of employment that would be provided, could be increased by about $400 a year. That would go a long way to prevent any industrial unrest in those two provinces. Speaking of Alberta, although they are now producing yearly only 5,000,000 tons of coal; with their present equipment and plant they could produce a yearly tonnage of 12,000,000, if they had a market for it. That means that they could increase their output by 7,000,000 tons. Averaging that coal at $5 a ton, if the Alberta operators could get access to the central markets, it would mean that $35,000,000 more would be spent in the province of Alberta. In Nova Scotia we are producing about 6,000,000 tons of coal annually. With the present development of our coal industry we could very well produce 10,000,000 tons of coal a year. That means that we could increase our present output by 4,000,000 tons, or, averaging that coal at a cost of $5, we could increase our circulation of money in the province of Nova Scotia by $20,000,000. I think if that were done we would hear less about the grievances of the province of Nova Scotia, and Maritime rights than we do. What is the remedy for the situation?

I think my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) and I would agree upon the remedy to be applied; at least we would have agreed some years ago, but I do not know whether we will to-day. I think the minister, in addressing the miners at Stellarton in 1921, gave them at least a part of the remedy when he told them that if his government came into power and he were elected they would put a real duty upon American coal. I think he added, in very pathetic language, that they would thereby create conditions in the mining towns of Nova Scotia which would bring the sunshine of prosperity to every miner's home. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that those conditions have not been created. Perhaps there may be some reluctance on the part of my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) to take that stand in this House to-day in respect to increased protection on American coal, but for my part I have no reluctance whatever. I am not afraid to take that stand just because certain men may have studied the principles laid down by Adam Smith, John Stuart Mill, Ricardo and others, for I consider it to be the solution of a problem of vital importance in this country. Some people may think that in order to give us fair competition in the markets of central Canada, the duty on American coal will have to be made very high. I have had an opportunity of studying coal mining costs in Nova Scotia, and it is my opinion that if this government would take a fearless stand, something along the line the Minister of National Defence advocated in 1921, and would increase the duty on American soft coal from 50 to 75 cents a ton, would put a duty of 75 cents a ton on anthracite screenings, and 50 cents a ton on American anthracite, and then use a portion of the revenue so derived to establish in Montreal and Toronto coking plants for the coking of Nova Scotia and Alberta coal, by that means we could give to the householders of Ontario, Nova Scotia coke, eight tons of which is equal in fuel value to twelve tons of American anthracite.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member has referred to production costs. May I ask what is the cost per ton in the mines of Nova Scotia?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Of course, I can give my hon. friend privately the information he desires, but I do not think it would be fair for me to publish the costs of these mining companies. That is a thing for this government to go into if they intend to follow the steps I am suggesting.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Do I understand that 75 cents per ton would cover the difference between the cost of mining in Nova Scotia and the cost of mining in the Pennslyvania fields?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: It is my opinion that a duty of 75 cents a ton on American bituminous, 50 cents per ton upon anthracite, and 75 cents per ton on anthracite screenings, would put us in a fair position to compete with American coal in the markets of central Canada.

So far as Alberta is concerned, what they require is a reduced freight rate which will enable them to ship their coal into the markets of central Canada, and I want to say to the representatives from Alberta that I for one am very much in favour of seeing the Canadian National Railways establish such a freight rate as will enable the operators in Alberta to ship that splendid coal into the markets of central Canada to help supply the Canadian fuel demand there. But so far as Nova Scotia is concerned, we require an increased duty. Then if the government gave a subsidy, or assisted, in the erection of coking plants in Toronto and Montreal, by getting a sale for the by-products we could sell that coke at $12 a ton, which is considerably less than the consumers in central Ontario are now paying for American anthracite, and as I said before, eight tons of the Nova Scotia product has a fuel equivalent of twelve tons of American anthracite.

So far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned, Mr. Speaker, this is our principal demand. One-fifth of the entire population of Nova Scotia depend directly upon the coal industry. If that coal industry is allowed to languish because this government is either afraid or unable to formulate a national fuel policy which will give us access to the markets of central Canada, then the industrial pulse of the province of Nova Scotia must continue to beat very feebly. I do not see why we should not get the sympathy, even of those who are professed free traders. We were promised when we entered confederation that we would find a market for our Nova Scotia coal in central Canada, and if we are going to be precluded from selling our coal there, the one chief benefit we were to derive from confederation will be lost, and no longer will it be reasonable to expect that the province of Nova Scotia will continue to carry her share of the burden as a factor in the Canadian union, if she is not going to be given a fair deal, and if her chief industry is to be allowed to languish.

Reverting to the subject matter of the Speech from the Throne, the opening paragraph seeks to convey the impression that Canada is enjoying prosperity in a very bountiful degree. Should this paragraph be read by the sorrowful Canadian contingent who during the last four years were compelled by the fell clutch of circumstance to seek employment in a foreign land, they may well realize the feelings of Tantalus, rich, and in the sight of abundance, but yet eternally starving. It is true that Providence has given us a bountiful harvest, and perhaps it is in keeping with the principles of "divine right", to which this government seems to adhere, that they, having no good works of their own to commend them, should arrogate to themselves the good works of the Creator. We may leave this paragraph in the Speech from the Throne for the edification of the credulous.

In its next paragraph the Speech informs us that the government has decided to put into effect a comprehensive immigration scheme for Canada. When one reflects upon the efforts made by this government in the past to give us a comprehensive, or any other kind of an immigration scheme, and the dismal failures which have resulted, we can hardly be expected to be optimistic about this new venture of this government. I understand that in the comprehensive scheme suggested by the government they intend to guarantee to emigrants a free passage to this country and five years' employment. That is a very nice thing for the emigrant. But we have in this country thousands of unemployed walking the streets of our city and looking for employment. These Canadian citizens have borne the "heat and the burden of the day"; they have contributed their share of taxation to the public coffers, and surely if the government can be generous enough to guarantee five years' employment to emigrants they should try to do something for the unemployed within our own gates.

With respect to rural credits I will discuss that question when it comes up. I want to say, however, without hesitation, that I am absolutely in favour of the principle of rural credits for the farmers of this country, and I should like to see it extended also, if possible, to those engaged in the fishing industry. Some hon. gentleman saw fit to condemn the rural credits system of Denmark. I am mindful of the fact that two commissions which visited Denmark also condemned the rural credit system in force in that country. A third commission, however, was unanimously in favour of the scheme. It pointed out that a rural credit scheme was adopted in Denmark in 1894, when the exports of farm products from the entire country amounted to only $34 per capita. In 1917 the exports of farm products from Denmark amounted to $119 per capita, and a great deal of this increased output was due to the operation of a wise system of rural credits.

With respect to the completion of the Hudson Bay railway, my attitude is this: If I can be convinced that the completion of that road is necessary, that it will help to build up the great Canadian west, and that the cost will not be excessive, I shall certainly be only too glad to give my support to the project. At the same time I will expect that when we from the east present the demands that we intend to present with respect to the construction of branch lines which are necessary to the development of the eastern part of this Dominion, we shall receive the same sympathetic measure of support from the representatives of western Canada as we are ready to accord to the Hudson Bay railway under the conditions I have mentioned.

A royal commission has been promised to inquire into the rights of the Maritime provinces. When I listened to that promise in the Speech from the Throne I felt that those men who inaugurated and are now strongly supporting the Maritime rights movement in those little provinces by the sea should be congratulated. At the inception of that movement they were ridiculed by the Liberal press of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. They were depicted as calamity howlers, blue ruinists, and purveyors of pessimism. New adjectives of a highly coloured nature were coined and flung at their devoted heads. The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) himself, following out the old policy of the Liberals in Nova Scotia, declared in this House that there were no such things as Maritime rights, and that the whole business was Tory propaganda. It seems strange that the present government, composed of very eminent men, should go to the trouble of appointing a commission to investigate a matter which is nothing but Tory propaganda. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the present government have recognized the fact that the Maritime provinces have rights. As to the appointment of a commission of inquiry, however, I want to tell them that on October 29 the people of the Maritime provinces appointed their own commission. That commission now sits within the four walls of this chamber. I want to make this further statement to the government: that while the solid sixteen that represented the province of Nova Scotia in the last parliament sat silent in their seats from 1921 to 1925, although there were Maritime grievances to be remedied, the commission appointed on October 29th last have no intention of remaining passive and submissive; they will take every occasion to press in the strongest possible manner the claims of the provinces they represent.

I may as well tell hon. members frankly that we have a bad situation down there. I have tried to deal with the coal situation which is, perhaps, the chief problem this government should endeavour to solve, at least so far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned. Our people are leaving; they are getting discouraged; they find it impossible to earn a living. Our industries are languishing. There is urgent need that some solution of the problem be found. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) said, referring to secession, that he did not think such a movement would find support from a corporal's guard in Nova Scotia. I sincerely hope that it would not, because I do not preach nor do I agitate secession; but I want to tell the House plainly, frankly and fearlessly that something must be done by this government to give the Maritime provinces those rights to which they are entitled as integral factors of Canadian union. It would be with "footing slow and sad reluctance" that we would turn our back on the great work commenced in good faith by our fathers in 1867. And before any such desperate measure is thought of or suggested, much less acted upon, in the Maritime provinces, the government should give a sympathetic ear to the people of the Maritime provinces, who are just as desirous as any other portion of our population to see that a united Canada is built up upon the firm foundations established by the Fathers of Confederation.

5 p.m.

We understand from the Speech from the Throne that the government intend to appoint a tariff commission. I understand very readily why they are taking that course. The government want that commission to find some policy for it. This government have no policy on the tariff question and they are afraid to have any. As I listened to some hon. gentlemen opposite declaring for protection, while others pronounced for low tariff and some for no tariff at all, I wondered what the result would be if by a miracle the hundred gentlemen sitting opposite became endowed with the gift of divers tongues and sought one after the other to explain the Liberal tariff policy. We should have a confusion before which the confusion that raged round the Tower of Babel would fade forever into insignificance. I suppose it was because the Liberal party have been hopelessly at sea on the tariff question since 1921 that their honoured and distinguished leader saw fit to frame a chart to try to guide that party.

But when we contemplate the situation in their ranks on that policy, when we remember the diversity of opinion expressed by their own members, and when we reflect on what happened on October 29, we must come to the conclusion that, in spite of that chart prepared by their leader, "the mists are around them and the fog."

In conclusion, although the Liberal government has no mandate to bring down any Speech from the Throne or to formulate any policies after its decisive defeat on the 29th October last, I would point out to the leader of the House (Mr. Lapointe) that he and his government have no mandate even from the Liberal party itself, to bring down the measures announced in the Speech from the Throne. I would like to ask him, since he is in his seat: Where and on what occasion during the last election did he ever get up before his compatriots in Quebec and say that the policy of the Liberal party was to restore to the province of Alberta its natural resources? In what part of Quebec or of eastern Canada was that question ever discussed during the last election? Did he ever discuss before his electors in Quebec the question of rural credits or the completion of the Hudson Bay railway? How does the government know that the rank and file of the Liberal party are in favour of the policy outlined in the Speech from the Throne? The Liberals who were elected in Quebec were elected to solve the problems which Mr. King, the Prime Minister, said at Richmond Hill were pressing upon this country so severely. There is no mention of those problems in the Speech from the Throne. The government have thrown overboard the principles of the Liberal party and have seen fit to try to implement the principles of a small group in this House who, although they are eminently respectable and intelligent, and for whom I have not an unkind word, nevertheless must realize that they represent in this chamber but eight per cent of the Canadian electorate. I wish to say in conclusion that the people of Canada will not long continue to tolerate in this country a situation in which the tail wags the dog.

Mr. H. B. SHORT (Digby-Annapolis): Mr. Speaker, as one of the new members from Nova Scotia, may I along with my predecessors be permitted to extend to you my felicitations and congratulations upon your reappointment as Speaker of this House? I have been very much impressed with the fairness and dignity with which you administer the affairs of your high office and the courtesy that you always show to new members.

I have been designated by hon. members opposite as one of the Maritime righters' group. They may call us what they like, but I support the policy of my right hon. leader, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) who, when the campaign opened last September, declared he realized that the Maritime provinces have their problems; that they had not received a fair deal from the late government, and that he was ready if he came into power to solve those problems even if it were necessary to take from the revenue of this country a sufficient sum to do so. Contrast this statement with the one made by the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister of this Dominion. Speaking at Kentville, Nova Scotia, he asked the audience: "What are Maritime rights?" He said: "If I knew what they were I would try to right them." Is it possible that he did not know? If he did not, he had for two years in this House sixteen members from Nova Scotia known as the "solid sixteen," and for three years he had fifteen members from that province. If the Prime Minister did not know what those problems were, surely those members who were sent to parliament as representatives from Nova Scotia should have told him. They certainly were, to use a slang phrase, not on to their job; they must have been asleep at the switch, because according to the records I have failed to find that one of those gentlemen during the term of their office from 1921 to 1925 ever stood up on the floor of this parliament and had anything to say about the needs and wants of Nova Scotia.

What those problems and rights are is well known. Under confederation we were conceded certain rights which have never been given to us. The question of Maritime rights was not the only issue in the late election in Nova Scotia. The tariff was also a most important issue, and the policy on this issue as laid down by my right hon. leader was declared on every platform by the eleven members who were returned as his supporters on this side of the House. We in Nova Scotia realize that if we are to make any progress we must have an adequate tariff, a tariff sufficient to protect the industries of our province. Two of our great industries there are steel and coal, from the latter of which the province derives its greatest revenue, and unless these industries are protected and fostered we cannot succeed and be prosperous. We must have a market for these, and that market is the Canadian market. If we cannot get our coal into the central provinces of Quebec and Ontario, we cannot expect to prosper. Why is it that our Canadian National railways cannot haul coal from Nova Scotia to Quebec and Ontario when United States railroads can haul the same kinds of coal from Pennsylvania and West Virginia to those points? The distance is no greater from Nova Scotia than from the points named, and I am of opinion that if the management of our National railways were anxious for business and if the government of this country desired to assist Nova Scotia, a way out of this difficulty could be found. Arrangements have already been made with the National railways to have 25,000 tons of coal hauled from Alberta to Ontario at seven dollars a ton. But when an arrangement on the same mileage basis rate is asked for Nova Scotia to haul coal from Sydney to Montreal to relieve distress in that district, what are we told? We are told that the management of the Canadian National Railways cannot do so. This is one of the Maritime rights. If the Canadian National Railways can haul Alberta coal into Ontario for seven dollars a ton, why cannot the same mileage rate be granted to Nova Scotia? This can and should be done and it is the duty of the government to see that our province is treated fairly in this respect.

We have in Nova Scotia another great natural industry, one which I am surprised to find is not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, namely, the fishing industry. I am proud to say that I have been connected with that industry for the past thirty years, and I feel therefore that in whatever I say on the subject in this House I know whereof I speak. In the constituency of Digby-Annapolis, which I have the honour to represent, we depend very largely—in fact one section of my constituency depends almost entirely—upon the fishing industry for a revenue. I am surprised that the Prime Minister, when he framed this Speech from the Throne, should have overlooked this important industry, because it employs in Nova Scotia alone some 25,000 persons, and in the whole of Canada some 70,000 persons. There is invested in vessels and equipment about $50,000,000, and the industry produces in wealth annually between $40,000,000 and $50,000,000. Surely therefore it is an industry that should receive some consideration from the government. It has not made the progress which would have been possible had it received from this and previous governments the assistance to which it is entitled. It is capable of wonderful development and instead of producing $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 per annum of wealth to this country it should, and indeed could, produce double that amount. If the government will give more attention to fostering this great industry and assisting in its development in every way I am sure the expansion which I have stated as possible will be realized.

What we need now is an improvement in breakwaters along the coast to provide facilities for the fishermen to prosecute their vocation. We need also further markets for these products and cheaper transportation to these markets. True, the home market has shown a considerable increase in the last few years. This is due partly to the advertising propaganda which has been carried on during the past two years in which the government has borne half of the expense and the dealers the other half. While the amount expended has brought good results, I have no doubt that if double that amount is spent in judicious advertising in the future, to bring this great food product to the attention of the public, a much greater demand will be created, and that will go a long way towards putting the industry on a more prosperous basis.

The people of Canada should eat more fish, as it is one of nature's best foods. The consumption of fish per capita in Canada is 21 pounds per annum, in the United States 18 pounds, and in England, where more fish is eaten than in any other country except Japan, it is 54 pounds per annum. If we could only induce the Canadian people to eat as much fish as they do in England, say 54 pounds per capita per annum, we should be able to find a great outlet for our fish products and at the same time furnish a cheap, nutritious and palatable food for the country. This can be done if the government will only give to the industry that assistance to which it is entitled. The government should look at the matter from a national point of view and try by means of adequate and proper advertising to induce the people of Canada to eat more of this food product. If this were done it would be better for the country and it would provide us with an outlet for a wonderful Canadian product.

It is a well known fact that fish is one of the most helpful and nutritious foods known to man. If we could create a further market for our fish it would stimulate the industry and give increased employment to our fishermen, thus keeping our own folks at home rather than having them leave our shores to seek a livelihood in foreign countries. While our home market has shown some improvement in the past year or two, I am sorry to say that our export market has hardly held its own; as a matter of fact, I do not think we are exporting as much fish to-day as we did some years ago. The American market, to which certain sections of Nova Scotia have always had to look for an outlet, is practically closed to us to-day because of the Fordney tariff, and it is only when there is a scarcity in the United States of certain varieties of fish that we can ship our product into that country, because they are themselves large producers and exporters of this commodity. Of course, we send shellfish there such as lobsters, scallops and other varieties of that class, inasmuch as there is no duty, the reason being that the United States do not produce a sufficient quantity of this class of fish to provide their own markets. On all other varieties however they have a prohibitive duty, and, as I have just said, it is only in times of scarcity there that we can get our fish into that market. The Fordney tariff is so framed that it practically shuts us out and we have to look to other markets for an outlet for our dried and pickled fish, principally the West Indies, South America, the Mediterranean and other places.

This government, I think, should do everything possible to assist the industry in increasing its trade with foreign countries by having our trade agents in those countries put forth every effort to secure orders for the Canadian producers, at the same time educating the fishermen of Canada in improved methods of curing fish for export. At the present time, I regret to say, our dried and pickled fish for export does not compare favourably with the same class of fish produced in Norway and other countries, and it is the duty of our government to give all the instruction they possibly can to the industry so that the Canadian product when exported may receive as good a price as is obtained for the same class of product put up in Norway and other fishing countries. In the green state our fish is equal to that produced anywhere else in the world.

We have in this country a market that is capable of great development for fish, both fresh and frozen. I find according to statistics compiled by the Fisheries department that the amount of fresh and frozen fish shipped from the Maritime provinces last year to Quebec, Ontario and points further west was 42,000,000 pounds. Yet the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), speaking some days ago, made the statement that only about one per cent of the fish produced in Nova Scotia was sold in Canada. Let me examine the facts. Since the figures for 1925 were not available I have secured from the department the figures showing the total catch of all kinds of fish, except shellfish, for 1924 in the province of Nova Scotia. The total catch for that province was 195,823,300 pounds and of this amount 42,000,000 pounds of fresh, frozen and smoked fish were shipped to Quebec, Ontario and the west. It must be remembered that that 42,000,000 pounds would represent at least double that quantity, or about 80,000,000 pounds, because a large proportion of the product is converted into finnan haddies and fillets, and 50 per cent is lost in processing. The consumption of Nova Scotia fish in Canada is therefore at least 30 per cent of these varieties alone. In addition to this a considerable quantity of pickled and salt fish is sold. Now, what becomes of the statement of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) that only one per cent of the Nova Scotia catch is consumed in Canada? If the hon. member's statements regarding the other matters in Nova Scotia which he spoke of are no more correct than his statement with regard to our fisheries, which he claims to have some personal knowledge of, what credence can the House place in his entire speech?

Now, Sir, I want to show the House what handicaps we have to overcome. Yet under these adverse conditions we have been able to market 30 per cent of our catch in Canada. If we are given the transportation rates that we are entitled to, and the government give the attention it should to the fishing industry, you can readily see what a wonderful expansion is possible. I think the hon. gentleman must have been speaking of his own constituency when he stated that Canada used only one per cent of the catch of Nova Scotia, because it is from his constituency that most of the fish is exported. But there are other sections of Nova Scotia which also produce large quantities of fish, and a substantial proportion of it is sold as fresh, frozen or smoked in the Canadian market. What we require to increase this business is better transportation facilities, cheaper freight and express rates, and a government that is ready and willing to assist the industry in every way possible.

When the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Cantley) was addressing the House recently he quoted some freight rates to show how Nova Scotia was discriminated against. Now I want to show the discrimination against our province in the way of express rates on fish as compared with similar rates in effect from the Pacific coast. The express rate on carloads of fish from Vancouver or Prince Rupert to Winnipeg is $3.59 per 100 pounds net weight. The distance from Vancouver is 1,465 miles and from Prince Rupert 1,785 miles. But the express rate from Halifax—I might say that this rate is practically the same from all other points in the province—to Winnipeg is $8.05 per 100 pounds gross weight, or $10.06 per 100 pounds net weight. This is a further discrimination against Nova Scotia. The carload and less than carload rates are based on the gross weight and 25 per cent is added for package and ice. The mileage from Halifax to Winnipeg is 1,993. This rate constitutes a difference of 146 per cent over the rate from Vancouver and Prince Rupert to the same point. Do you wonder, Sir, that we are discontented when we realize the unfair way in which we are treated in transportation matters? Let me quote another comparison. The express rate from Vancouver or Prince Rupert to Chicago is $3.93 per 100 pounds net weight. The distance from Vancouver to Chicago is 3,224 miles, and from Prince Rupert, 3,596 miles. The express rate from Halifax and other points in Nova Scotia to Chicago is $4.30 per 100 pounds gross weight, and $5.37 per 100 pounds net weight. The distance from Halifax to Chicago is only 1,669 miles. The difference against us there in favour of the Pacific coast is only 195 per cent! Do you think, Sir, that we can prosper with such unjust discrimination against us in express rates on our fish? And this discrimination goes on all down the line, it applies on our shipments to Toronto, Ottawa, Montreal, Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia. For instance, the percentage against us to Boston compared with the Pacific coast rate is 325 per cent. How can we ever expect to build up an industry in the Maritime provinces in the face of such discrimination?

Off the coast of Nova Scotia we have the greatest fisheries in the world. Our ports are so much nearer the fishing banks than those of the United States that we may reasonably look forward to the time when the fishing ports of Nova Scotia will be the bases from which vessels will operate and supply the fish markets of this country as soon as the government gives us the assistance that our industry is entitled to. The total value of the fisheries of Canada for 1924 was $44,534,235. Of this amount our exports represented $30,925,769, the balance of $13,608,466 being the value of the fish sold in Canada; in other words, as I have just stated, 30 per cent of the total value of our fish production found a sale in the home market. If we could increase domestic consumption to 50 per cent of our total production, it would stabilize the industry wonderfully, as there is no market like the home market. This increase would take place if the government would help develop our fisheries as it should. But, Mr. Speaker, very little attention has been given to our fishing industry by the government of the Dominion. One of the reasons for this comparative neglect is, I think, that usually the Minister of the Department of Marine and Fisheries has been selected from one of the inland provinces. As a rule such a man is not conversant with the needs and requirements of our fishing industry. I have always felt that the department should be presided over by a minister from the Maritime provinces, preferably Nova Scotia. Do you know, Sir, that Nova Scotia has not had a minister in that department for some thirty years? I think Sir Hibbert Tupper was the last member from Nova Scotia to preside over the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and that must be thirty years ago, or more. A man from the Maritime provinces is naturally familiar with all the local facts of the industry. I have no fault to find with the present minister (Mr. Cardin) but I understand he is a lawyer from the province of Quebec, and therefore he could not be supposed to have very much knowledge of the fishing industry.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend will allow me—does he not recall that Sir Douglas Hazen, a lawyer from New Brunswick, was Minister of Marine and Fisheries for many years?

Mr. SHORT: I have not any fault to find there—but he was another lawyer. I claim that the department should be presided over by a man who has some knowledge of both the marine and the fisheries end. I think that is only logical. We would not expect a clergyman or a lawyer to know the different kinds of fish or what the requirements of the industry were.

Mr. STORK: The hon. member has given certain comparisons of express charges from the Pacific coast and from Nova Scotia, claiming unfair discrimination in favour of British Columbia. May I ask from what authority he is quoting his figures?

Mr. SHORT: You will find all those rates on file with the Board of Railway Commissioners. I want to put on Hansard a little of the earlier history and also of the present history of the fisheries of Canada. About no industry, not even the fur trade, is the early history of Canada, and for that matter of the North American continent, so closely entwined as about the fisheries. Indeed a study of the development of the fisheries of the world involves in a large measure the history of man. How and when fishing began we can only conjecture, but our earliest records indicate that fish formed an important portion of the good of man in the very early days. The application of the net to fishing is older than recorded history, so that we have no knowledge of who invented it. It seems quite probable that it was the spider's web anchored in the air to catch passing flies that first suggested to reasoning man the application of a similar method for the capture of free swimming fish. Fishing even with gill-nets and seines was a common method of making a living in the days of our Saviour and it was from amongst the fishermen of Galilee that He drew several of His most notable apostles.

It is an old truism that from the earliest days fishing has been the parent of navigation and the mother of commerce. Fishing was first confined to the inland waters and the estuaries of streams, but it was early learned that fish dried in the sun and air will keep for any length of time and could be transported to distances from the coast. It was this fact that gave a tremendous impetus to fishing and to navigation. To supply the growing demand fishermen went farther and farther from the shore, to do which better boats were needed, and these were supplied. So that as early as the 12th century hardy fishermen from around the bay of Biscay and Norway were voyaging yearly as far eastward as Iceland, and tradition leaves little room for doubt that long before Columbus discovered America these fishermen were visiting the coasts of what are now Canada and Newfoundland for fish. In any event one of the first things that followed the discovery of North America by the Cabots was the establishment of an important fishery there. Each year vessels from France, Spain and other European countries came across in the spring to the rich fishing grounds off our coasts and left in the fall loaded with their dried fish. The first exports from what are now the New England States were dried fish and it may safely be said that the trade and commerce of that whole region was founded on fish.

Our sea fisheries may be broadly cast into two divisions, the inshore and the bank fisheries. The former is engaged in by the fishermen living all along the coast, who operate in boats, and fish anywhere from ten to twelve miles from shore and the latter by vessels. The catches of the inshore fishermen and of the steam trawlers operating on the banks go to supply the fresh fish markets, as well as those for cured fish, while the banking vessels' catches are practically all cured for foreign markets. Important as it is that our offshore fisheries should be developed and expanded, it is for obvious reasons more important from a national standpoint that our inshore fisheries should grow. To enable this to be done, however, it is essential that the demand for fish in our own country should be continuously increased.

The difficulties in the way are numerous and great. Our country is one of vast distances and comparatively small and scattered population. Our first large centre of consumption, Montreal, is about a thousand miles from the seaboard. Extremes in climate prevail, which necessitate adequate and rather expensive facilities for transporting fresh and frozen fish.

The asset Canada has in her fisheries is as a general thing far too little appreciated. Practically every mile of her coastal fisheries on both sides abound in different varieties of food fish of first quality. In addition to the Canadian waters of the Great Lakes there are a vast number of wonderfully productive areas such as lake Winnipeg, lake Winnipegosis and Lesser Slave lake, which cover an area of over 220,000 square miles. Not being very familiar, however, with our inland and Pacific coast fisheries I shall confine myself to the Atlantic coast. In addition to the gulf of St. Lawrence, which is potentially one of the richest fishing areas in the world, the various fishing banks on this side of the Atlantic are adjacent to the Atlantic coast of Nova Scotia. Such names as the Georges, Brown's Bank, Roseway, LaHave, Sable Island, Banquereau, Misaine, St. Pierre and the Grand Banks are amongst the most productive fishing areas the world has known. Owing to their proximity to our Canadian ports fishing thereon can be carried on more economically from such ports than from any others. For instance the distance from Canso to Sable island bank is 88 miles and from Halifax it is only 159 miles, while from Boston it is 470 miles. Again the distance from Halifax to the centre of the Grand Banks is 588 miles while from Boston it is 928. It will be realized that a vessel operating from a Nova Scotia port, particularly when engaging in fishing for the fresh fish trade, can produce much more fish in the same time owing to the shortness of her voyages to and from the fishing grounds.

Now, we have heard a great deal in this debate about rural credits for farmers in the west. What about extending the same credits and on the same terms to the farmers of the sea? I refer to the hardy fishermen of this country of ours. Why are they not entitled to the same consideration in the way of government credits as is given to the farmers of the west, so that they may be permitted to build boats and buy engines and equipment, in order to carry on their vocation and earn an honest living for themselves and their families? The fisherman is just as much in need of assistance of this kind as is the farmer of western Canada, and if the government decide that any system of credit is to be given to the farmers of the west I hope and trust that they will also make the necessary arrangements so that the fishermen of our country may participate in these same credits.

A great deal has been said about the prosperity of our country, and the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg has stated that Nova Scotia is prosperous. That may refer to the county of Lunenburg where they depend for good or bad times upon the fishing industry almost wholly, and where the fishermen were fortunate enough to have a good catch the past season and receive for that catch a very high price, much higher than they at first anticipated. I am sorry the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg is not in his seat, because I would have liked him to hear the remarks I am going to make. The Lunenburg fishermen are the greatest traders there are in the province of Nova Scotia, and they always get the highest price because they produce the class of fish that is required by certain markets. These fish are mostly sold in Lunenburg under the co-operative plan, and the fishermen are traders enough to realize the fact that the dealer has got to come to them and pay them their price, unless they are forced to sell. The price of the Lunenburg catch this year started at $6 per quintal, but the Lunenburg fishermen decided not to take that price and held on until the dealers paid them $8 per quintal. It is said the dealers who bought at this price are not going to receive a new dollar for the old one, but be that as it may I am glad the fishermen got their price.

But, Mr. Speaker, Lunenburg is not the only county in Nova Scotia. I can quite understand that there is prosperity there, but there are other sections of the province that are not prosperous—in fact, that are now and have been for some time past suffering from depression, and there is a great deal of dissatisfaction and discontent in the province of Nova Scotia. Why, Mr. Speaker, if Nova Scotia were in the prosperous condition that the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg would have this House believe, and if the government had dealt generously and fairly with that province, why was there such a change in the minds of the people of Nova Scotia from 1921, when they sent a solid sixteen for the King administration, and on October the 29th last only three of them survived? This, I think, is conclusive evidence that the people of Nova Scotia were more than dissatisfied with the late government, who during the four years of their administration neglected this part of the country in a most shameful manner, and the first opportunity the people had to record their votes at the polls they did not hesitate to show this government what they thought of them.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Were the people of Nova Scotia satisfied in 1921 when they returned a solid sixteen?

Mr. SHORT: They evidently were dissatisfied then, but they are much more so now.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: They did not return the solid sixteen this time.

Mr. SHORT: They sent a solid sixteen in 1921 and expected something of them, but what did they get? Not one of them stood up in this House and opened his mouth for the province of Nova Scotia. During the whole four years they were here they were nothing but voting machines; that is all they were. But the members now on this side of the House from Nova Scotia are not going to be mere voting machines. We are here to look after the interests of Nova Scotia, and we are going to do it. One of my Progressive friends the other day said that he was sick and tired of hearing about Nova Scotia, and I told him, "You have only commenced to hear about it, and if we are here until next summer you are going to hear more about Nova Scotia every day we get an opportunity."

The time has arrived when the people of Nova Scotia will no longer be satisfied with any government that will not deal fairly and squarely with them, that will not treat them as an integral part of this great Dominion and see to it that the promises made to us under the terms of the confederation pact are carried out. We must, Mr. Speaker, be given a fair share of the shipments of the western wheat that now go through foreign ports. It was intended when the Grand Trunk Pacific was built, at such a tremendous cost to this country, that Canadian products handled by this railway should be shipped through Canadian ports. Why should this country spend hundreds of millions of dollars of the people's money in building a railway to carry freight to be shipped out of foreign ports? It has been stated that geography was against us in the Maritimes, that freight must be shipped by the shortest haul. Geography was not against us when the Great war was on. What would Canada have done then had it not been for the ports of the Maritime provinces, where it was necessary to assemble ships to carry our troops overseas? Not only troops, but freight also was carried to the Maritimes and shipped from there. If these ports were necessary to the country then, why are they not just as essential in times of peace? The geography is just the same now as it was when we entered into confederation, and I say to this House that we will not be satisfied in the Maritimes until we get our share of Canadian products shipped out of our ports during the winter season at least. This talk about not having the ships available for the business is all nonsense. Ships will always follow the freight. If the management of the Canadian National Railways were at all anxious to carry western products to the Maritimes for shipment overseas, the ships would be forthcoming, but the fact of the matter is the management of the railway is wedded to Portland and other American ports, and just so long as the people of this country will stand for it that is the way our freight will be routed. But I can assure this government that the people of the Maritimes do not propose to stand for this sort of treatment any longer. The time has arrived when they demand that they get their fair share of the country's business.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. SHORT: Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was discussing the position of the Canadian National Railway. I want to read a few extracts from a bulletin issued by the Railway Users' Association of Canada in connection with this railway, and also quote from a speech delivered by Sir Henry Thornton, president and general manager of the Canadian National Railways, before a convention of the Western Retail Lumbermen's Association in Winnipeg on January 28. Sir Henry on that occasion is reported to have made this statement:

He emphasized the fact that the Canadian National Railway was ready to support anything that would move the grain through Canadian ports, explaining that it was to its advantage having no interest in Buffalo or any other United States port.

I should like to know how Sir Henry could make such a statement, in view of the fact that the Canadian National Railway has a contract with the White Star Dominion line by which the former undertakes to deliver as much tonnage as possible to the vessels of that line at the port of Portland, Maine.

[Mr Short.]

In giving evidence before the select committee of the United States Shipping Board at Washington, Mr. D. O. Wood, Foreign Freight Traffic Manager of the Canadian National Railway, said:

The traffic which comes through the port of Portland is, I should say, without going into exact figures, possibly 80 or 90 per cent of Canadian origin.

The port of Portland has been practically built up by the Grand Trunk Railway, and largely, from Canadian traffic. * * * There are other lines coming to Portland, of course, besides the White Star Dominion, but we have no contract with them; they come there because we were instrumental in the early days in having them come here by trying to help them fill their ships as far as we could.

If that service were not there I do not know where it would be; most likely it would come to St. John, N.B.

In another part of his evidence Mr. Wood states that,—"this contract may be terminated on six months' notice, such notice to be given prior to March 1st of the calendar year."

I think, Mr. Speaker, it would be good business on the part of this government to have that contract cancelled, because it is certainly not in the interests of Canada, and not at all in the interests of the Maritime provinces. A statement is then given in the bulletin referred to of the amount of Canadian grain that had been shipped through Canadian ports and through American ports:

For the crop year ending August 1, 1924, the clearings from the undermentioned ports were as follows:

	Bushels
Canadian Pacific ports, via Vancouver..	53,809,505
Canadian Atlantic ports, Montreal via St. Lawrence..	63,568,444
St. John, N.B...	9,412,231
Quebec, via St. Lawrence..	2,309,412
Halifax, N.S..	302
Total Canadian Atlantic ports..	75,290,389
United States Atlantic ports:
New York..	63,091,140
Philadelphia..	23,204,838
Baltimore..	14,989,417
Norfolk..	12,568,440
Portland, Maine..	7,713,330
Boston..	7,173,269
All other United States ports..	12,318,903
Total United States Atlantic ports.. ..	141,079,337

In 1919-20 the shipment of Canadian oats via United States ports was 5,802,538 bushels, but in 1923-24 it was 16,856,865 bushels.

The amount of all kinds of grain exported from Halifax during the crop year of 1919-20 was 2,695,677 bushels. In 1922-23 the amount of all kinds of grain shipped via that port was 203,831 bushels, and in 1923-24 the amount of all kinds of grain shipped via that port was only 342,404 bushels.

These figures tell a story that should cause every thinking Canadian to stop and consider the direction in which he and his country is being carried. The increasing costs of ralway service in Canada is not only diminishng producton and causing people to emigrate, but it is diverting what tonnage this country continues to produce, to the railroads of the United States at the nearest crossing point on the boundary. The Canadian National Railway cannot afford to carry grain from Montreal to Halifax, a distance of 841 miles, or to St.

John, a distance of 481 miles; but it can carry Canadian grain from Fort William and the bay ports and other lake ports, to the boundary at Niagara, which is practically the same distance from Fort William as is Montreal, from where the railroads of the United States carry it to Philadelphia, a distance of 416 miles, to the amount of 23,000,000 bushels a year, and to Baltimore, a distance of 600 miles, to the amount of 15,000,000 bushels a year, and even to Norfolk, a distance of 860 miles, to the amount of 12,500,000 bushels a year. No wonder that the press of these three cities are loud in their praise of Sir Henry. We cannot find that there has been any credit given in the papers of these cities to an official of any other Canadian road in this matter. Since Sir Henry has had charge of the Canadian National Railway, the Canadian people's road has carried practically no grain, and very little tonnage of any other kind, to any Canadian port outside of Montreal and Quebec, and to these ports a constantly diminishing quantity.

This is a paragraph which I should like the House to note:

If the port of Halifax had a railway system that pulled as hard for it as does the Western Maryland and the Pennsylvania railroad for Norfolk, Baltimore and Philadelphia, it would be one of the largest ports on the Atlantic coast. (Norfolk has an elevator capacity of only 750,000 bushels, while Halifax has a capacity of 1,500,000 bushels.)

But it must not be overlooked that the Pennsylvania railroad has an exceptional advantage in that Sir Henry Thornton got his start in the railroad business with that company. For twenty years he was in its employ. He began with it in 1894 as an engineer, and rose gradually until he was General Superintendent of the Long Island railway, a subsidiary of the Pennsylvania railway system. In 1914 he was taken to England by the Great Eastern railway. From there he came to Canada.

This may explain why Sir Henry Thornton is not sympathetic to the Maritime provinces, and why we get none of that grain there. The facilities at the port of Halifax are certainly much better than those at Norfolk, where 12,500,000 bushels went in 1924 as against 342,404 bushels to Halifax. Does the country wonder why we in Nova Scotia are dissatisfied? Do hon. members think we are going to stand for that sort of thing? I say, no.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): Is my hon. friend not aware that at no time in 1924 was there any elevator at Halifax where grain could be handled?

Mr. SHORT: There has been a grain elevator at Halifax for years.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): Not operating.

Mr. SHORT: The same elevator is there that was there in 1920. It was dismantled not in 1924, but only last fall. It was dismantled in 1925, if I read the press correctly.

Mr. Speaker, it is proposed, according to the Speech from the Throne, that a royal commission be appointed to look into the affairs of the Maritimes and report to this House. We want no commission to tell us what is required to bring prosperity to this part of the country. The Maritimes are represented by twenty-nine members of this parliament, who know thoroughly the conditions there and who are in a much better position to advise the government than any commission that can be appointed. Why waste the country's money on needless expenditures of this kind? We have no faith in commissions of this sort; they will not satisfy the minds of the people. The country has already had too many commissions and too little action.

Conditions in Nova Scotia are serious and are getting worse instead of better. Why, Mr. Speaker, every time the census is taken we lose representation in that province. During the last redistribution we were the only province in the Dominion that lost any of its members, and we lost two. In the last House our province had sixteen members; now we only have fourteen. If we were as prosperous as the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) would have us believe, why did we lose two members in the last redistribution? If something is not done to improve the situation we will go on losing in membership until we have only a handful of representatives coming to this House from that section of this country. Conditions are getting alarming in Nova Scotia, and it is absolutely necessary that the government of this country do something to right our wrongs and give us a chance to take our proper place along with the other provinces of this great Dominion.

I have in my constituency other industries than the fisheries, of which I spoke at length this afternoon. I refer to agriculture and fruit raising, particularly apples. A very large section of my constituency, known as the Annapolis valley, is devoted to apple-raising, but I do not propose to weary the House at the present time with any further remarks in connection with those industries. At some future day I shall have something to say with regard to them.

Mr. J. L. CHABOT (Ottawa): Mr. Speaker, I trust that I am not too late at this date in the session to tender you my sincere felicitations upon your election as first commoner in this land. It is an honour shared equally by you and by this House, an honour which gives us both pleasure and pride—pleasure from a contemplation of high achievement recognized; pride because I see in you, Sir, the embodiment of those lofty traditions of public services so richly contributed to the history of this nation by the race to which you and I belong.

I rise to express as briefly as, I trust, will be consistent with lucidity, my determination not to support the motion of the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird). In so doing I am fortified by a knowledge that I am in harmony not only with the overwhelming opinion of this country, but with the view held openly by many, and secretly by some, of the majority of the members of this House. The reason for want of confidence in this ministry is neither invisible nor obscure. It is found in four years of cynical betrayal of the platform and pledges by which this government gained power. It is found in the economic dislocation which can be directly traced to the record and policies of this government since 1921. It is found in the humiliating spectacle of the disembodied entity calling itself the cabinet, which lingers on the treasury benches at the present time. What has been the political history of this country during the past five years? In 1921 hon. gentlemen opposite came into office upon certain definite and specific pledges to the people of this country. They said that they would remove the burden of taxation which was then paralysing our industrial life; they said they would reduce the high cost of living bearing down upon the masses of our people; they said they would settle our transportation problem and solve our immigration difficulties; and they said they would give us a new fiscal creed. They were to bring back what they called the golden era of Laurier and make us all happy and rich.

There have been five years of opportunity for the fulfilment of these pledges, five years in which all the rest of the world has recovered from the devastating effects of the war. They were five years which saw this country blessed with some of the most bountiful harvests in her history, five years which saw this government with an enormous majority in the House of Commons to give effect to its policies and its programme. Yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, what has been the government's record? Did it reduce taxation? Did it reduce escapable expenditures? Did it reduce to any appreciable extent the high cost of living? What was its contribution to the solution of our transportation problem, of our fiscal problem, and of our immigration problem? The answer is embodied in the public records of this country. It is that taxation is almost precisely what it was in 1921; it is that this ministry launched the country, with almost profligate abandon, on a series of unjustifiable expenditures. It is that the cost of living, according to the reports of our Labour department, has actually increased; that our transportation problem has not improved; that fiscal tinkering has produced widespread depression; and that our immigration is but a fraction of the emigration from Canada to the United States.

This government's record in regard to expenditures alone invites the severest condemnation. During the past five years nearly every nation in the world has reduced its taxation indebtedness. England, borne down by vast commitments, paying heavily for defence, and with an administration that encircles the globe, has paid her expenditures, reduced her debt by hundreds of millions, and reduced her taxation again and again. Australia, since the armistice, has reduced her debt by more than $300,000,000 and greatly reduced taxation; and little New Zealand, the Union of South Africa and even the little Irish Free State have all been retrenching, reducing taxation, balancing their budgets and giving the masses of their people a decent chance in life. And during the past five years the United States has actually reduced its public debt by over $2,000,000,000; it has cut its per capita taxation from $55 to $27; and although it has reduced taxes again and again, although the income tax in that country was before but a fraction of ours—not more than one-fourth—that country has just adopted a new scheme involving a further reduction of $350,000,000 a year, at the same time exempting vast numbers of the lower salaried people from taxation. To be correct, I believe that 2,300,000 Americans will now be freed from the obligation of paying income tax.

What in the meantime has been the record of Canada? While our competitors have been retrenching, Canada has gone on in a career of extravagance which has done violence to the development of the country. Wharves and sand-bars like Belle River; Scribe hotels in Paris; Union club buildings in London; a Prince Rupert elevator whose only service will be to compel our railways to haul grain 190 miles further than necessary; millions for a new harbour at Quebec city, when the present harbour is not being used to its capacity; a million dollar elevator at Halifax which has not yet seen a bushel of grain: these, with a store of other things almost equally unjustifiable, tell the story of this ministry's regime.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): Is the hon. member opposed to the building of the elevator at Halifax?

Mr. CHABOT: I hope it will soon be in proper use for the benefit not only of Halifax but of the whole Dominion. Finally, there is the incomprehensible promise of the Hudson
