Bay railway. This government knows that there is an overwhelming opinion in this country against the completion of that project. It is aware that outside the provinces of Saskatchewan and Manitoba there is no support for it at all. But notwithstanding its knowledge of these facts, notwithstanding the fact that the Liberal party is itself divided on the question, Mr. Mackenzie King, with an effrontery almost unparalleled in our politics, went to Saskatchewan last year and offered the Hudson Bay railway as a bribe for its support.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is the hon. member opposed to the promise his own leader made that he would build that railway at a certain cost?

Mr. CHABOT: I will answer that question in a moment to the satisfaction, if not of the hon. member, at any rate of the majority of people. Mr. King did not say he would complete the road because he considered its completion to be in the national interest; he did not say he would complete it even though he knew the country could not afford it. What he said was, "Send me enough supporters, give your votes to the Liberal party, and I will build you the road".

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. CHABOT: I do not recall the dates or the places, but I am quoting from some of his speeches.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): From what paper?

Mr. CHABOT: This was a speech he made in Saskatoon.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): What paper is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. CHABOT: It makes no difference; I am giving the facts.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It makes this difference, that you are not quoting the truth.

Mr. CHABOT: The statement has been made in this House several times and has never been denied so far.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): It is denied now.

Mr. CHABOT: If the hon. member denies it I will bow to his superior knowledge.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I will get you the paper.

Mr. CHABOT: This was nothing short of a brazen bribe to the electors of the west, and to-day unfortunately this government has come to parliament and asked it to pay the piper. I should like to use another expression, but I am afraid I might be called to order. That and that alone is the source of the Hudson Bay paragraph now in the Speech from the Throne.

I shall be told perhaps—and I will now answer my hon. friend opposite—that my party too is pledged to the completion of the Hudson Bay railway. My answer is, it is pledged to nothing of the kind. My right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) told the people of the west something that can be subscribed to by every citizen in the country. He said to them, fearlessly and frankly, and he has since repeated the statement in this House, that if it could be shown that the Hudson Bay railway could be completed at a cost of three or four million dollars, then, in view of the money already expended, he would favour the completion of the road. If on the other hand investigation showed that the cost should be much greater than that, that it would run into tens of millions of dollars, then in the view of my right hon. leader the financial condition of the country would not permit of completion of the project at the present time. I ask the House to contrast that declaration of policy with the course pursued by the leader of this government. On the one hand we have a candid statement based on national considerations, Canada's financial capacity; on the other hand, a declaration that amounts to political barter, based upon continuation in office, with no limit or check or guard whatever in respect of cost. So, Mr. Speaker, despite the cry of the people for taxation relief, despite the undoubted hardships being suffered in many parts of the country, we are being committed to a project which, according to a statement that this government placed on Hansard two years ago, will cost at least $22,000,000. For what? To take care of ten ships at Port Nelson! Such are some of the causes of the high taxation which burdens us to-day.

The members of the government tour the Dominion and tell the people they have decreased the national debt. We know they have done nothing of the kind. True, with juggled figures they have tried to convince the House and the country that our railway debt is not a part of our national obligations, and by omitting this portion of our indebtedness they show a reduction of the national debt. But once we cut through this sophistry, once we have regard to the self-evident truth that we are just as much responsible for the obligations of our national railways as for any other portion of our indebtedness, then the clear disturbing fact stands out that Canada owes more to-day than she owed in 1921 by scores of millions of dollars. In this connection let me quote the actual figures—which may be verified by reference to the books of the Finance department—to demonstrate that the statement made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) recently was not altogether in accordance with the facts. In 1920 the national debt was $2,248,868,623; in 1921, $2,340,878,983. On Canadian National Railway account: cash loans $109,662,000; guarantee of bonds, $50,000,000; redemption loans, that is of debt both from cash loans and guaranteed issue proceeds, $56,392,626. I may say that the statement which the hon. Minister of Public Works made with regard to the guarantee of bonds and redemption of loans was correct as far as it went, but it was somewhat incomplete. In 1924 the national debt was $2,417,783,000. The railway account showed about $23,000,000 for cash loans; $72,500,000 for guarantee of bonds, and about $11,500,000 for redemption loans. In 1925 the national debt was about the same; the cash loans amounted to almost $10,000,000, guarantee of bonds, $81,000,000, and redemption loans $24,007,000.

It must be observed that in 1922 the King government was responsible only for the last quarter of the fiscal year. They were, however, responsible for the final readjustment of the figures, which showed guarantees of $61,000,000, and debt retirements of about $48,000,000. In short, we find $12,000,000 added to the national debt in contradistinction to the previous year, when a surplus of $6,000,000 of loans was retired as against the bond issues. In 1924-25 as a result of the government's necessities, characteristic weakness and obliquity, we find $118,000,000 that ought to have been added to the national debt is left unaccounted for. Full play is given to the farce. Endorsements, we are told, are not liabilities. Yet at the present time this same government is providing through its agents the Canadian National Railways executive, for a radical writing-off of the railways' swollen capital account. The following table gives details of the $118,000,000:

1924:	Bonds guaranteed..	$72,500,000
	Less redemption..	11,000,000
	Balance..	$61,500,000
1925:	Bonds guaranteed..	$81,000,000
	Less redemption..	24,000,000
	Balance..	$57,000,000 odd

In the view of those who know the situation, there is no room for dispute or argument that the whole of this sum must be added to the national debt if we are to be honest with ourselves. But it is idle to expect a frank admission of the real situation from this government—just as idle as it is to expect that a hardened criminal with the evidence overwhelmingly against him will admit his guilt; rather will he strenuously maintain his innocence.

The government tells us, too, that it has reduced taxation. What taxation has it reduced? Will any hon. gentleman of the other side of the House say that he was liable for less tax on his income this year than on the same income in 1921? Was there any reduction of the sales tax? The only decrease was effected in this way: The government took off one year what they added to the sales tax the previous year; one year they increased the sales tax from 3 to 6 per cent, and then later they brought it down from 6 to 5 per cent. Wherein, then, was taxation reduced? Of course, I know some hon. gentlemen opposite will say: What about tariff reduction? Is not that reduction of taxation? They have been telling us for years that the tariff is a tax paid by the consumer, and is responsible for the higher cost of living. Let me put this question to them: If as you tell us the tariff is a tax raising the cost of living, how does it happen that the tariff reductions you boast about have not reduced the cost of living? Surely no hon. member will gainsay the fact that food and drinks—whether they involve spirituous inspiration or not—fuel, rent, light and help are not as high to-day as they were three or four years ago? I know the upkeep of my establishment in Ottawa and in the country is just as costly now as it was four years ago. What less taxation is being paid by the consumer? I leave that problem to my friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). If he finds it too difficult, and can secure no enlightenment from his colleague who once sounded the "death knell of protection," I advise them both to seek assistance from the comrade whom they expect to join them on the treasury benches, the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). The demonstrable truth Mr. Speaker, is that this government has failed to deal with taxation, just as it has failed to deal with every other major problem before the country, with the consequence that to-day Canada, despite her vast resources, despite her favourable situation, despite the fact that she pays less for defence than any self-governing nation on the face of the globe, is among the highly taxed nations of the world. Let us look at the facts; they are positively startling. The figures

I have before me are taken from the official public accounts and are as follows:

	Receipts for total taxes
1917	$232,000,000
1918	261,000,000
1919	312,946,000
1920	349,746,000

During the succeeding four years, with the King government in office, the receipts were:

	Receipts for total taxes
1921	436,292,000
1922	382,271,000
1924	406,581,000

The average was $407,059,000, or $118,000,000 more than the average for the four years of the Meighen regime. In other words, Mr. King and his associates had that much more per annum than had his Conservative predecessors, and to precisely that extent the opportunity was theirs to make immense saving. But instead of saving, they proceeded to spend public money on an unparalleled scale. There is another factor which must be brought into the reckoning. During the four Conservative years preceding 1921 special war taxes in the way of imposts on income were as follows:

	Special War Taxes
1918	25,000,000
1919	56,000,000
1920	82,000,000

Following 1921, when our Liberal friends came into power, they amounted to:

	Special War Taxes
1922	$177,484,000
1924	182,036,000

The King government actually collected $529,601,176 in the form of special taxes more than did the Meighen government, and yet it did not cut taxation by a penny. Not the slightest effort was made by Mr. King and his associates to avoid this terrible showing. They had from the outset appeared to be callous to public necessity, to the urgent need of a really grave situation, to every consideration of prudence and expediency and the need for the most rigid economy. What they gave the country was an orgy of expenditure, and to keep up the pace they had to extract more money from year to year for the purposes of the public service.

The official figures themselves give proof of that beyond a doubt. The Liberal government which took office in 1921 was in a peculiarly favourable position to apply a policy of drastic retrenchment which would have led to a substantial reduction in the burden of taxation. The country had just emerged from participation in the Great war. Vast economic disturbances had been caused by that war. Inflation followed by deflation had all but shattered the fabric of commerce. Readjustment on a comprehensive scale was everywhere made necessary. The need for readjustment was general. The public mind was prepared for changes. No government ever came into power under pledges of economy with such a favourable opportunity to make good. We may now calmly measure what actually took place. Once in control of the reins of power, all promises to relieve the popular load were forgotten. Instead of cutting down the outgo, the King government added to it. Instead of reducing taxation, official records show that the government took additional hundreds of millions out of the pocketbooks of the people. There was a little saving effected by whittling at the civil service. Imagine attempting to economize at the expense of the poor civil servant! They were always ready to indulge in petty economy, but the faucet was open wider than ever before and the broad result was as indicated. That is one of the main reasons for the exodus to the United States. That is one of the reasons why since this government took office half a million of our people have been forced to seek a livelihood under a foreign flag. High taxation, allied with tariff tinkering and tariff threats, has strangled Canadian industry, with the result that our young men, young men whose ancestors have been rooted in this Canadian soil for centuries, have been compelled to become exiles in the republic to the south.

When they came into office in 1921 hon. gentlemen opposite declared that they would solve our population problem. Immigrants were going to flow into the country. But what has been their record since then? In 1921, the year that my right hon. leader was Prime Minister, 148,000 immigrants were brought into Canada and 72,000 persons left Canada for the United States—a balance in Canada's favour of 76,000. In 1922, the first year that hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, immigration to Canada dropped to 89,999, and 46,810 persons left Canada for the United States. In 1923, after the effects of tariff tinkering and tariff threats began to be felt, and when continued denial of taxation relief began to strangle business, immigration to Canada dropped to 72,887, while 117,000 persons crossed to the United States—a net loss to Canada of 45,000. In 1924 immigration rose to 148,000, but emigration to the United States rose to the terrible figure of 200,690—a net loss of 52,000 for the year. Last year immigration was 111,362, while 102,000 persons left Canada for the States.

Thus in four years we find that while this government was spending something like twelve millions of dollars to bring 422,000 persons from Europe, 466,511 persons left Canada and crossed over to the United States. Canada, in truth, was made into a second Ellis Island for America, and, in addition, tens of thousands of native born Canadians, descendants of families that have been in this country for generations, were forced to abandon this soil. And furthermore, from 1921 to 1925 this government introduced at least a dozen measures with regard to immigration, and changed ministers, I think, on three occasions, on the assumption, I presume, that variety is the spice of life. The figures regarding immigration I take from the Canada Year Book. The emigration record is of those who paid the head tax upon taking up residence in the United States, and that does not by any means account for them all.

Since this House has met, hon. gentlemen have never tired of telling us how prosperous the country has become in recent months, and they point to our growing exports as evidence of that prosperity. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that the value of our exports is increasing, but if the figures are closely analyzed some qualification is found for our confidence; for analysis shows that, apart from a bountiful crop, the greatest increase has been in our rich possession of raw materials, our pulpwood, our nickel, our copper and our asbestos. We are simply selling our estate. We are shipping our raw products out of the country, and the American people, who are our chief competitors, are refining them and taking the profits, thereby giving work to their people, paying wages to their workmen, providing purchasing power for their communities, markets for their farmers, traffic for their railways, freight for their harbours and ports. In the meantime Canadians are compelled to leave home to secure employment, Canadian home markets are diminishing, Canadian purchasing power is decreased, Canadian railways are producing deficits, and Canadian ports go without traffic. Too much export trade of that kind is not a good thing, in my humble opinion, for this country; yet that with the other facts that I have cited constitutes the fruits of five years of this government. Summed up, they have been five years of violated pledges and broken promises, Let me mention just a few of those promises, Mr. Speaker, promises which they intended carrying out in their four years of administration, but not one of which has been redeemed.

[Mr. Chabot.]

For instance, they promised to reduce the cost of living, to reduce taxation, to reduce the debt, to solve the transportation problem, to increase immigration, to settle the question of the ownership of the natural resources, to secure lower freight rates on the ocean for cattle, to formulate a national fuel policy, to secure wider markets for Canadian products, to establish a government wheat pool, and last, but not least, to reform the Senate. On many occasions during the last campaign the Prime Minister raised his eyes and his hands towards heaven and offered thanks to the Almighty for taking to his bosom some of our very much esteemed and invaluable Conservative senators, thereby creating vacancies in the Senate, which the Prime Minister with great alacrity filled with some of his true, faithful and devoted supporters. That is how far Senate reform has gone up to the present. Personally I do not think it requires very much reform, and I am sure my hon. friends from the province of Quebec will agree with me at least on that point.

Instead of the government redeeming those promises, we have had five years of the most wanton extravagance, five years of failure to reduce the debt and taxation, five years that have seen increased living costs, impotence to deal with the transportation questions, incapacity to deal with our fuel problem, depopulation of the country, and an entire failure to grapple with the major questions that imperatively challenge solution. And why? Let me quote just one reason among many—and this, Mr. Speaker, is from the Ottawa Journal, one of the best edited, most logical, and most reliable newspapers published in this country; I always like to give credit where credit is due. It says:

> The King government has been lamentably lacking in constructive genius. It has either not had a definite grasp of the country's vital needs, or it has not had the skill to grapple with them. The only other alternative is that it did not care. The two outstanding needs were, as the bulletins of the leading banks have put it, reduced taxation and immigration. No other government in our national history had had a finer opoportunity to demonstrate capability in these regards than has the government.
> If a government is not to be judged by performance, either positive or negative, how else is it to be judged?

That is why, Mr. Speaker, neither this House nor the country has faith in the remnant of this ministry. That is why I should like to have been able to vote for a no confidence amendment.

What is the present position? The party which is claiming the right to rule is in a minority in this House and in this country.

I hate to repeat that, it has been said so often before, but sometimes by dint of repetition a wonderful effect can be produced. That minority I think would have been still greater had the government not appealed to the country on a policy of longitude and latitude, resorting in the province of Quebec to those tactics which were described here the other day by the hon. member for Kent, N.B., (Mr. Doucet), and stooping in the west to the almost equally reprehensible tactics of offering bribes, like the Hudson Bay railway.

While I am on the subject of electioneering tactics let me say, Sir, that it was not alone in the province of Quebec that the Liberal party sought to fan racial hate in order to promote its cause. Here in the capital of Canada I was made the target of abuse, was denounced as a traitor to my race, because, forsooth, between 1914 and 1918 I held certain convictions as to how best to strengthen my country's arm in the war. As a French- Canadian who is proud of his origin as a Canadian, who cherishes the traditions and history of the old province of Quebec; as one who for a generation has lived in harmony and friendship with his English-speaking fellow citizens, learning to admire their generosity and their tolerance, I sincerely protest with all the strength that I can summon against such blows at the unity of this country.

Here may I address a word to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), the leader of the Independent group in this House? What that group lacks in quantity it probably makes up in quality, because I have great admiration for the hon. gentleman. He is very clever, very versatile, and possesses a great deal of erudition, but so far I have yet to learn what policies he has been promulgating and advocating in this House, as well as any definite policies which he may have fought for during the last campaign. But of one thing I am certain, that although he appears here in the role of the leader of the Independent group, he is really a Liberal, and I think it is about time he ceased masquerading as an Independent. I am sorry he is not in his seat at the moment. I am not going to say anything that would injure his reputation in any way, but he proudly told us not long ago that he came from Liberal stock, that he was born a Liberal. I think, Mr. Speaker, he is living a Liberal and will die a Liberal unless in the meantime his conscience is stricken and he seeks conversion. After reading the speech which he made in this House some time ago, I am convinced that the hon. gentleman is now undergoing a process of political evolution, and he seems to be coming our way. If he does, I am sure he will be well received, and he will find a haven of rest and of happiness in our midst. As for the Labour group and the hon. gentlemen who compose it, I am not prepared to comment upon what they have or have not done since the session began, until I become better acquainted with them—and that will be a privilege—and with their methods and their policies. I can assure them that the pleasure for the present is deferred only.

But, Sir, I must return to this government. There it sits mutilated and formless in body, without control of its own actions, the admitted puppet of an outside force. What is there to suggest, to make one even hope or suspect, that anything of strength, or vigour, or clear purpose can emanate from a ministry in such straits? Do my friends of the Progressive party honestly believe that this government is in a position, or ever will be in a position, to put through any sort of programme? Does anybody in this House, knowing all the circumstances, seriously suggest that this government has the capacity to govern? Do the members of the Progressive party believe that this ministry, which failed to give them certain things when it had a majority of 100 to back their giving, is going to make good that failure now when they have not a majority at all? Anybody, Mr. Speaker, can write cheques. But what I suggest to my Progressive friends is that they are taking cheques from this government when there are not any funds in the bank. They are being deceived more completely now than they were after 1921.

No, Mr. Speaker, this government cannot and will not govern. It may prolong its death for a few months longer; it may succeed through desperate expedients and ingenious subterfuges in usurping office for some time yet—but its end is inevitable. It has irrevocably lost the confidence of the people of this country, and every day it defies public opinion will but add to the completeness of its impending collapse.

Mr. J. R. O'NEILL (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, it was never my ambition to be classified as a diatribist, but in spite of the Fabian policy of this administration, certain questions and certain considerations have been brought up for discussion, and in the interests of my constituency, in the interests of the greatest riding both actually and in potentia, in this great Dominion, I feel I should be derelict in my duty if I failed at this juncture to speak as the trustee of the principles of the good people of North Timiskaming who paid me the high compliment of sending me here. Furthermore, in view of the fact that I have not sufficiently mastered the language of our compatriots I shall confine myself to the use of the mother tongue, looking forward of course to the day when by study and application I shall be in a position to reciprocate the courtesies extended by them in the adoption of the English language for use in this honourable House.

Before proceeding further, Sir, by way of felicitation, I would make certain observations relative to your honourable self, personally as well as ex-officio. As a refreshing change from the atmosphere of inter-partisan dispute, of sectarian recrimination and reproach, of inter-racial guttersniping, of the indiscriminate and promiscuous use of the argumentum ad hominem, with nevertheless all due regard for the rules of this honourable House, I occasionally turn to the pages of Parkman, and in the transition, I have observed, Sir, with what facility, being within the shadow of the Speaker's chair, I enter into the esprit of an elder day—my point being, Sir, that you are not only a splendid specimen of our present-day compatriots of Norman extraction, but also to me, you are redolent of our grand and romantic Canadian past. Your experience as an outstanding Canadian citizen; your association with our great Canadian leaders and statesmen; your personal role in the political life of our country, and greatest of all your personal sacrifice in the interest of our country—which sacrifice, I am sure is ever kept fresh in your heart by the excursions of memory across the sea to the grassy barrows of perhaps the happier dead—all these influences have indeed a mellowing, an endearing effect, as has the patine of time on a work of art.

Such is my tribute, Sir, and following the analysis, I would ask in the interests of our national pride and national unity, why not say henceforth, ex uno disce omnes? With common traditions and aspirations, with this great Dominion as a common heritage, won and held by sacrifices in common, why should the people of Canada, faced with the same great problems, not stand united and mindful of their glorious past, united and fully cognizant of their great future?

This young and aspiring nation is at this very moment hungering for unity and for a great national policy, and I submit, Sir, the National Policy of Sir John A. Macdonald is the sangrail of Canadian destiny. I have great respect for the past, Sir. I love the past. I maintain we should profit by the accumulated experiences of the past. Holding to the true fundamental philosophy of conservatism, I have in these days a tender regard for the views of Edmund Burke, whose works are unquestionably among the greatest exposition of the philosophic basis of conservatism ever writtten, and who looked upon "society as a partnership between those who are living, those who are dead, and those who are yet to be born". But it was said "For him the present ceases to be merely the heir of the past, and becomes its slave". In stating that the National Policy of Sir John A. Macdonald is the panacea for all our ills and woes, I would not fall into Burke's alleged fallacy, but with all due regard for national evolution and development, with full consideration for every occupation and every interest, I say, Sir, I stand for the adoption of the principles as held by the Conservative party to-day.

In this connection, it might be well to quote Sir Lionel Phillips who had such broad experience in a country which, like our own has as its primary industries, agriculture and mining. I deliberately and purposely link those industries with reference to Canada, since there is no gainsaying their paramount importance. After stating that farming stands in the first rank as the industry to foster—he would not favour the Australian treaty—he goes on to say:

> "Whether any other occupations should be protected or not depends upon the extent to which they benefit the country, the number of people they employ, the conditions under which they operate in comparison with the conditions ruling in a competitive country. Every case differs and, for a well founded judgment to be formed, must be investigated separately and all the factors reviewed. Cheapness is not the sole gauge, for it is obvious, if all the commodities used in a country were imported, its inhabitants would earn nothing and could not pay for them. Assuming, however, some of them possessed accumulated funds and invested them abroad, the country would suffer, because the profits earned, though brought to the native land, would again be exported for investment abroad and the fertilizing value of the working costs in producing the commodities would always benefit the places where they were spent. Labels, loosely used, like those of "free trade" or "protection", do infinite harm, because they become political cries, and the masses who know nothing of the subject, range themselves under the one or the other, following, like flocks of sheep, their respective leaders. Politics again—hateful politics—uses in a question of vital consequence, mean phrases like "Your food will cost you more" without answering the pertinent rejoinder "How will our earnings be affected?"

No reference in this, hon. members will note, is made to the preponderating argument—the full appreciation and proper exploitation of the natural resources of our wonderfully gifted country.

A moment ago, Sir, I remarked that this young and aspiring nation is hungering for a great national policy. I say further that this young and aspiring nation is calling for a leader who will, without fear or favour, consistently carry out this national policy to its complete, logical and just end.

You will recall, Sir, my submission was that this national policy is the policy of the Conservative party in Canada to-day, and my further submission, is that the man who will, without fear or favour, consistently carry out this national policy to its complete, logical and just end is, beyond a shadow of doubt, the present leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Meighen), for the moment the party in opposition in this House. I am not one given to apotheosis and I made the statement with full premeditation, deliberation and sincerity. Wherefore, let us scrutinize the statement and examine into my ratiocinations in this regard. Does this admiration spring from sickly sentimentality, from the exuberance of a novice, or from the enthusiasm of a hero worshipper? Not at all. It is merely a straight cool, businesslike appreciation which, if adopted by the nation, would be in the national interest. I reach my conclusion as follows: In the great north country, a new country just opening up, just coming into its own, anyone interested in public life is confronted with an unusual number and variety of problems such as labour questions, colonization and settlement difficulties, and all the problems of farming, mining, prospecting, transportation, industrial establishment and expansion. In other words, as I stated on a previous occasion, if we consider the anomalies and complexities of our every day commercial, industrial and agricultural life, politically and economically North Timiskaming is a typical slice of Canada to-day.

My experiences and disillusionments in connection with municipal, provincial and federal activities have been such as to thoroughly convince me that in the final analysis politics is nothing other than a clash of interests, and I am sure every hon. member has reached the same conclusion. In other words, it is safe and logical for me to generalize and to state that in the whole arena of Dominion politics we have nothing but a clash of interests. I ask: What characteristics must be pre-eminent in the leader who would successfully meet the present day situation? What virtues, if not courage, candour and consistency? I defy any hon. member or any reflective observer in the Dominion of Canada to deny that these are the outstanding virtues of the right hon. the leader of the Conservative party in this country to-day. Has he not a name for steadfastness and integrity? Of all the ingredients of leadership and statecraft he has admittedly an abundance. He has never derogated in his conception of duty from the great traditions of his predecessors, particularly Sir John A. Macdonald. His views have attained that clear and practical precision incident only to an accurate mind. With conditions as they obtain to-day, to be a leader, and for the sake of independence and knowledge, one must lead virtually the life of a slave and an ascetic. Thus I say that his very aloofness and his penetrating analytical mind are phenocrysts of character and ability respectively, in these days of self interest and over-reaching. In these days, I repeat, when politics is but a clash of interests, the leader of the Conservative party stands, after trial by fire at the hands of factions, friends and foes, beyond the reach of vested interests or privileged class, having demonstrated to this generation that he possesses that combination of moral excellence and intelligence which Canada desires in her public men. Once he is known in his true light to the Canadian people, the first turn in the political kaleidoscope, to use a borrowed plume, will restore to him the full and generous confidence of the electors of this country.

Now, Sir, assuming that the opinion of a new member—a milk white hind on the political lawn—corresponds with or more closely approximates the opinion of the man on the street in commenting on the present situation in this House, I wish to make the following observations: To my mind this rash government or aggregation, forgetful of the past, have in assuming office measured accurately neither public opinion nor practical politics, while the Conservative party, true to their fundamental principles, have been cautious in deference to the old adage "fools rush in where angels fear to tread." It goes without saying in the opinion of the intelligent electors of this country we are certainly on the side of the angels. Furthermore, if I were asked why we were not reinforced by the various vines and weeds which now alone sustain the crumbling ruins of Liberalism, I should say most unhesitatingly that the answer must be arrived at by psychological analysis, and the mere fact that we did have the proffered assistance and co-operation of a certain number strengthens my argument, since I found it impossible to have my theory square with their sterling qualities as I knew them individually. Their refusal or inability to sit in with the Conservatives was due to what I should term their urban complex, meaning by this a more or less morbid pathological mental process resultant mostly from that diffidence, that timidity, that self-complacency, that parsimony, that narrowness, that simplicity, incident to rusticity. Due, I say, to this urban complex, the poor mind conjures up werewolves and hobgoblins at the very mention of industry or big business. As the Indian babes of yesteryear were frightened to slumber by the mere mention of the white bugbear, so the white bugbear who has replaced the savage on the plains shivers to sleep at the very thought of the dragon of industry. My contention is that in this frame of mind—and because of another outstanding characteristic that thrives in the same mental soil, their gullibility —they shrank in terror from the cool, consistent, logical Conservative party, albeit the latter having a monopoly of the intelligence of this House, and instinctively threw themselves as suppliants before the gates of the decadent Liberal party.

This of course implies not only a psychological similarity but two other notions. There is, by reason of intrinsic gullibility, the natural susceptibility to being taken in by a wolf in sheep's clothing; then, most important of all, is the Platonic element. We are forced to recognize the theory that the souls animating the frames of the various individuals in question had previously hobnobbed in some pre-natal sphere. Is it any wonder then that the sensus communis of this nation became spontaneously convulsive at any suggestion of alliance between the Conservatives and at least a certain element of the Progressives? I might remark that I have a great regard and a tender affection for the soil myself, and in making this analysis there is one other fine distinction I always draw, and that is in the aforementioned type, the term is properly spelt "pharmer," indicating as well, a class, presumably from within their own ranks, who would exploit the honest farmer. As to the shrewder and more independent members in the general consolidation, I should say the motivation was rather based on opportunism, with the same higher elements coming into service in the obtaining of the personal mandate—I mean at the source of power. However, no thinking man in any camp will quarrel with the view that the net and final result of this alliance will be the demolition of both Liberals and Progressives as distinct parties.

This brings me to a consideration of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. This heterogeneous government, formed to support a policy of laissez faire, before their leader has found sanctuary in this House, comes before parliament with a minimum of practical programme. A programme has been formulated in which we have on the one hand a well prepared morphia as an anaesthetic to western passion, and on the other hand the indication of a certain amount of rhetorical sympathy with the east; and last, in the addenda, a sop to Cerberus. I refer to the decretals from the acting leader of the government (Mr. Lapointe) following the obsecrations of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I have certain more or less pronounced and definite views on the various items in this so-called programme, but I should prefer on the whole to bide my time and refrain from expressing those views until I shall have had the benefit of the opinions and perhaps of the more mature judgment of other hon. members. This is not to be interpreted as a confession or indication of weakness but rather a desire on my part to study the problems from various angles, and to have my say in committee. I have said that my reason for taking part in the debate at this particular time was the fact that certain matters had come up affecting my riding. There are a great many questions under consideration just now of interest to the country as a whole, but we have had no opportunity to discuss these problems for the reasons that the government has presented nothing to parliament upon which parliament can take action. I should like however to discuss for a short while a matter of grave concern to the taxpayers of Canada and one which is agitating the minds of the people in the north of this country just now: I refer to the question of the Rouyn railway. And in this connection I want to tell the House that whatever I may say to-night on this subject is merely en passant, since, so far as any action is concerned, we are completely hamstrung, so to speak, by a motion which has been introduced by an hon. member who, by this very motion, defeats the objective he is supposed to have had in mind.

I sat in this House and heard the Argus-eyed member for Brandon state in his usual Laodicean manner that the railway problem was one which had been laid on the doorstep of Canada prior to the advent of the Progressives to parliament, the remark implying that naught could go wrong now that they were present. Yet here we have the exposure of a case indicating a wanton disregard of the authority of parliament, involving a complete subversion of principle, a clear case of suppressio veri, an act, I say, of wanton insolence committed in open defiance not only of parliamentary jurisdiction but of public law. In face of all this, what is parliament to do? There is not a peep out of hon. members to our left, confessedly demons for righteousness. I maintain, Sir, that unless the members of the agrarian group and the so-called independent members in this House wish to be classed before the electors and the taxpayers of Canada as a mere fungus growth on the outskirts of this crafty administration, as accessories after the fact, in this Rouyn railway procedure, their better judgment should prevail to the extent of having the motion of the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) withdrawn so that we can come to a point where the representatives of this House will have a showdown on this question.

The Rouyn railway affair is unquestionably another Scribe hotel deal and one equally physiognomical of this government. Before I proceed to review what has been said in the matter, or to make further investigation, I wish to make my position clear, although, as in the case of members who have already spoken, my premises may be utterly disregarded in press reports. In the first place, I approach this question strictly from the standpoint of a federal representative in the interests of the taxpayers of this country, in the interests of the well wishers of the Canadian National system; and in the second place I have no desire to interject myself in any way into the interprovincial controversy. Nor have I taken cognizance of the contentious utterances of provincial political protagonists. I am absolutely in favour of a railway into the Rouyn district but I stand for a right location and a proper method of procedure. It is hardly necessary for me to review in detail the exposures made of the way in which this matter has been dealt with. The House will remember how much the ratepayers of this country owe to the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), whose energy, diligence and scrutiny are responsible for the exposé of the nefarious and extravagant Hotel Scribe transaction, and that hon. gentleman has again shown his sense of duty as a member of His Majesty's loyal opposition in giving to this House and to the tax-burdened citizens of Canada the benefit of his observation and of his critical analysis of the financing of the Rouyn railway, which he has proved to have been another flagrant violation of principle and utter disregard of the authority of the people's representatives in this House. I would direct the attention of the House to references in the press of February 19. We find, in spite of the hon. member's declaration that he was treating the subject strictly from a federal standpoint, Le Canada of that date containing the following:

L'honorable J. A. Robb dissipe les nuages légers accumulés par Sir Henry.

The honourable J. A. Robb dissipates the light clouds piled up by Sir Henry.

La Chambre qui est honnête, après tout, a compris les explications du ministre des Finances et n'attachera pas d'importance à la dernière tentative des bleus à déprécier le gouvernement dans l'estime des indépendants.

The House of Commons which after all, is honest, understood the explanations of the Minister of Finance and will not attach any importance to this last attack on the part of the blues to depreciate the government in the esteem of the independents.

I leave it to the judgment of the House whether the so-called "refutation" did justice to the Minister of Finance, or in any way dissipated, "the clouds that were wracked up by the hon. member for West York." I find La Tribune of Sherbrooke of the same date, contained the following:

Sir Henry Drayton attaque la construction du réseau de la Rouyn, en faveur de l'Ontario.

Sir Henry Drayton attacks the construction of the Rouyn railway, in favour of Ontario.

After the definite announcement by the hon. member for West York that he was dealing with the question strictly from the federal standpoint and attacking only the method adopted, this paper attempts to lead its readers to believe that he is taking up the case in favour of the province of Ontario! Le Soleil, of the same date, refers only generally to the question, devoting itself mainly to the advance issue of the Dunning propaganda with respect to the millions of dollars to be spent in the construction of railroads in Saskatchewan. That programme, however, was submitted to the House in the estimates and provided $6,000,000 odd for the construction of 168 miles of railway—practically the same amount as is involved for the construction of only 45 miles of railway into the Rouyn district. I find Le Devoir, also of the same date, refers to the argument of the hon. member for West York and sums it up in this manner:

Le gouvernement a observé la loi en tous points.

The government has observed the law in every point.

It is because the stand taken by the hon. member for West York was so represented to the country by the press I have quoted that I stated at the outset of my speech that I am taking the matter up in the interests of the taxpayers of the Dominion, not by any means for the purpose of introducing any provincial issues. Those hon. members who had not the pleasure of listening to the member for West York no doubt have since read his speech in Hansard and have familiarized themselves with the main points of his argument and the principal exhibits. As I said, following his arraignment of the facts, we had a few weak, evasive remarks from the Minister of Finance, which were hailed by some of the press favourable to the administration as dissipating all the clouds piled up by the hon. member for West York. As a matter of fact, the hon. minister timorously and repeatedly refused to discuss the essential points of my hon. friend's argument on the ground that he was not a member of the legal profession.

The hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary), in his usual clear and masterly style, demonstrated that the authority of parliament was essential for any such undertaking, and that its will had been flouted and the law disregarded by the government in the Rouyn transaction. In this connection I may refer to the Ottawa Journal of October 24, 1925—a newspaper to which, as the hon. member for Ottawa has said, the taxpayers are indebted for its exposure of this scheme. When the question of railway financing came up in parliament the Journal of June 27 and June 28, 1923, dealt with it under the heading:

> New act is blank cheque to C.N.R. Meighen suspicious of railway financing.

Its criticism was in reference to Bill No. 244, to amend the Canadian National Railways Act, which bill finally passed the Commons on June 29, 1923. When the bill came before the Senate, Senator Belcourt, although a supporter of the government, took strong exception to it and promptly moved the following amendment:

> Nothing herein contained shall be construed as granting power to guarantee any securities, the issue of which has not been authorized by parliament.

The amendment carried, and as it was near the closing day of the session, the Commons accepted the amendment. Thus it would be technically illegal for the cabinet to guarantee the bonds offhand. What the King cabinet has done, therefore, in the Rouyn railway transaction is to dodge the statute by authorizing the National Railways to become responsible for the payment of bonds without the government actually using the word "guarantee".

The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) in the course of his speech referred to the contract itself, and suggested that an investigation from this angle might throw some light on the lupus in fabula. He brought out the importance of section (D) paragraph 10 of the Privy Council's report, whereby it was agreed to allocate as operating net earnings to the Rouyn branch 30 per cent of the gross earnings received by the Canadian National Railways from traffic destined to or from points on this particular branch. Following this, the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) admitted that he had read neither the lease nor the agreement, and he frankly stated that he was not interested in how the transaction was carried out so long as the road was built. I quote from page 1319 of Hansard. I submit, an exceedingly vicious locution in the mouth of the member representing those most vitally interested. I am sure the hon. member will be the most indignant man in this House when he obtains a true knowledge of the facts.

Eventually in the course of this discussion the great Sir Henry Thornton is trotted forth, and in an interview to the press endeavours to water down the significance of the issue, hoping thus perhaps to stifle inquiry and discussion. And yet the Conservative party is accused of dragging the National Railways into politics! What does Sir Henry Thornton state?

> Montreal, February 24. By Canadian Press.
> Sir Henry Thornton affirmed that while the financial arrangements had been made, thus far no money whatever had been drawn out under the banking credit provided.

Does any hon. member think for a moment that Sir Henry Thornton would have us believe that the contractors and engineers have been up in that country all these months living on the wind? Why, the original locating survey would alone entail an expenditure of at least $250,000. Must we conclude that the cost is being met, as was that of the Hotel Scribe, out of Canadian National Railways' current revenue? Again, in the same interview, Sir Henry states:

> The engineers and auditors of the National system have got a vigilant eye on the whole transaction, and the administration assumes entire responsibility.

Hon. gentlemen will recall how the same knight and staff kept a vigilant eye on the Hotel Scribe transaction, and with what result. I quote from the discussion in the parliamentary committee of that day. The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) said:

> The committee learned one thing, namely, that this was not the way to buy property and the committee also recommended that no such purchase can be made in future.

The hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), on March 12, 1924, at page 267 of Hansard, speaking on the Address, said:

> I think the president of the Canadian National Railways is to be congratulated upon the success which he has achieved. He is making good. Of course he makes mistakes as do other people, one of those was in connection with the purchase, or the manner of purchase of a certain hotel in the City of Paris.

We have had nothing from the hon. member for North Waterloo in connection with a similar case, the Rouyn railway.

The then Minister of Railways, Mr. Graham, speaking on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne on March 18, 1924, admitted in this House that the manner of acquiring the Paris building was a mistake, and he had no hesitation in saying so, yet he tolerated and was party to a similar deal in connection with the Rouyn railway.

I ask hon. members of this House and the taxpayers of this country also to note that the engineers and auditors of the National system, under the same chief, kept a vigilant eye on the construction of the Long Lac cut-off. Is there any hon. member of this House who is prepared to state that there was not a difference in the amount as submitted in the original estimate and the sum involved in the final settlement with the contractors in that case? There is an investment shown in capital account of $2,826,583.05—29.4 miles costing over $96,000 per mile. That vigilant eye must be like the glass eye of a certain mine captain who was too lazy to go down the shaft ladders to inspect the development, so he adopted the practice of regularly lowering by a string his vigilant glass eye to peer into the stations and drifts and thus make sure that the work was progressing in the interests of the investors.

In referring to the Rouyn railway question, Sir, I feel that I am labouring in vain, since under the motion submitted by the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) we are completely strangulated; parliament is unable to take action on this problem; yet I am sure the people I represent demand action; they demand immediate investigation of the whole feature. What assurance have we that the road will be constructed at a reasonable price? Is the country not naturally suspicious, having in mind the Hotel Scribe transaction? That was a clear case of the railway management setting out to make a large capital expenditure without having first secured the authority of parliament to do so.

On the very same grounds the Rouyn railway procedure may be criticized. This is nothing short of a circumvention of the statutes and of the will of the peoples' representatives, and a means of shredding away the authority of parliament and nullifying its check on capital expenditure. Why was it not over and above board? It was not a question of time. The hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) admits the question was on the tapis not only for weeks or months but for years. I am sure the majority of hon. members are thoroughly convinced of the importance of developing our mining industry and would have given the problem favourable consideration. Then the estimate of cost could have been made and given to the public, following which our Canadian financial houses could have made a bid for the bond issue. Four and one-half per cent 30 year government guaranteed bonds are, I believe, at a premium in Canada. Here we have an appropriation, or what is tantamount to an appropriation, of $5,000,000 for the construction of forty-five miles of railroad, and the total estimate brought down and tabled in this House for the construction of western branch lines of some one hundred and sixty-eight miles amounts to somewhere in the vicinity of six million dollars. This, as I stated, is the advanced edition of the Dunning campaign literature.

I would refer to the Rouyn railway question more or less from the local angle. The question naturally asked in the north country is: Why was the original scheme not carried out? We know that the people in the riding of Pontiac are most interested in having that road constructed through the fertile valley of the Hurricanaw from Amos, the natural point of departure—the original scheme as proposed to the provincial government at Toronto. I gathered this from my own observations and readings from the press. I have had no interviews or discussion of this topic with any provincial authority, but the original plan was to have a road built down from Amos, along the valley of the Hurricanaw river, to meet the mineral belt that runs east and west, and also to extend the line over to Rouyn, some twenty-eight miles, and there join the extension of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway. From that point the road was to be built on to Grand Lake Victoria, to handle the timber and other resources in that particular area. I have here a clipping from Le Soleil,—I mean the Toronto Star, the Le Soleil of Ontario—of April 23, 1925 which, quoting a statement of Premier Ferguson's reads, in part:

> The officials of the Canadian National Railways, Mr. Dalrymple, who is one of the vice-presidents, and Mr. Hungerford, who is another, discussed the whole project with our commission in Montreal and Mr. Robb, who is another vice-president, and Mr. Young, one of their staff, saw me about it, and they left me with a plan as to how we were to get into Rouyn, and they wanted joint terminals established with us. I have letters from Mr. Young written on behalf of the Canadian National outlining the whole scheme, and urging us to come in there. Those are the facts.

The scheme I refer to was the construction of a road from Amos at right angles to the mineral belt, thence eastward to Rouyn, there to join the extension of the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway and continue to Grand Lake Victoria, the proposed terminus of a third railway. Reference to the last is aside from the question, and I would not wish to have any misunderstanding in regard to the matter.

On March 2, 1925, the Hon. Mr. Perrault said:

"It is a matter of life or death for the district," declared the minister; "at any rate as for Rouyn. I had hoped that the Canadian Pacific Railway would have continued its lines to Rouyn and thus open a promising colonization area, for there is splendid agricultural land in the region as well." It was also hoped that the Canadian National railways would build from the Transcontinental line to Rouyn, a distance of forty-four miles.

The Timiskaming and Northern Ontario railway was also mentioned, but the minister refrained from mentioning the newly proposed Abitibi-Southern railway. Railway legislation, he said, is urgent, for without railways the mines cannot be developed.

I submit that in building the road from O'Brien the worst part of the country has been selected. If Sir Henry Thornton is not adopting the role of the shoemaker who in the early stages of the play Julius Caesar led the people about the streets of Rome to wear out shoe leather, then I am forced on to the other horn of the dilemma and must conclude that coercion has been brought to bear on him in this matter. I cannot put my own personal opinion against his railway experience or the advice of his officials, but I maintain that the logical route for the Rouyn railway was from Amos and thence eastward, but in building from O'Brien the road passes through some two and a half townships of sand, and then approaches the mining area at right angles. To get to any centre of importance a local train must be operated from O'Brien to Amos. That is another case of where traffic will have to be bolstered up to give the people some sort of notion that good service is being rendered by this end of the National railways.

Now what chance has that forty-five miles of railroad, even from O'Brien to the present centre, of paying? We have in that very same type of country a railroad with a mileage, regardless of yards and sidings, of some 460 miles, the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway built by the province of Ontario at an expenditure of some $32,000,000. That road serves the Cobalt camp, the South Lorraine camp, and all the agricultural area in the vicinity of New Liskeard and Englehart. It serves the Kirkland lake and Porcupine country, the Abitibi district,—and the Abitibi Pulp and Paper Company alone gives the road a traffic of $1,500,000 a year, but with all these sources of traffic the net return to the provincial treasury is about $750,000 per year. That is regardless of carrying charges, for no interest is paid on the original investment, and there is no capital repayment. In 1922 the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway brought in a revenue for the provincial treasury of $712,000; in 1923, $836,000; 1924, $839,000; 1925, $786,000. This, Sir, as stated, was without any provision being made for capital repayment or the payment of interest. This road was built primarily, of course, for service, and there is no question that the province of Ontario is reaping great benefit from the building of the road through other departments, chiefly, Lands and Forests, and the colonization and opening up of the country. But when the province of Quebec wished to accomplish the same objective, apparently they used the Canadian National Railway system as a catspaw.

The Nipissing Central railway was prepared, under federal charter, to extend their road into Rouyn, a distance from the border of some 28 miles. Of course, the story of the holdup in this connection is quite familiar to the members of this House. However, they have no desire to antagonize the province, but are willing to co-operate with the Canadian National railway authorities and give service and help open up that wonderful mining country which is merely an extension of the great belt extending through Manitoba, Ontario and on into Quebec.

I stated, Sir, that with all these sources of traffic the Temiskaming and Ontario railway could show a net revenue of only some $750,000 to $850,000 per year. I do not wish to cast any reflection on the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway Commission or on the operation of that particular railway, because I believe it is operated as efficiently as any other road in the Dominion, the operating ratio for 1925 having been 80 per cent. The road serves some 250,000 people. Now with traffic running all one way on the Rouyn branch, with nothing grown in the country or manufactured to be shipped by return, it is only reasonable that those at the back of the Rouyn scheme should insist that the 30 per cent clause be inserted in the agreement. On that account I am inclined to believe that Sir Henry Thornton was coerced in this particular deal. There is no question about it, when it comes down to the annual repayment on the $5,000,000, the people of Canada will have to bear the brunt of the repayment of $306,957.70 a year, being equal annual instalments for thirty years, at 4½ per cent—annuity bond. And there is nothing in the agreement to show that the Canadian National railway will own the road at the termination of the thirty years.

There are a great many other considerations in connection with this particular project, but since we cannot take any immediate action on the matter I have touched only lightly on the subject, and shall wait until the strangulating motion of the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) shall have been withdrawn or properly dealt with before dealing further with the Rouyn railway.

I would like to refer to the great question of immigration and the colonization of that north country. In reviewing the work of the committees that have dealt with this question in the past two or three years, I notice that Mr. Black, one of the officials of this government, calls attention to the fact that the north country is suitable only for Canadians, for good axe men. Nevertheless, the government have insisted on bringing into that north country, very much against the wish of the settlers there, Europeans and foreigners. I maintain that that great north country should be preserved for settlement by the young men from the older provinces, particularly Ontario and Quebec, and this could very well be accomplished by a concerted effort on the part of the municipal, provincial, and federal authorities. If our young men in a municipality in the county of Lanark, for example, were assisted by their own local municipality, by the county, and as well by the province and the Dominion, and given an opportunity to settle in that north country and kept together, they would have the same opportunities and achieve the same results which our ancestors achieved in this part of the country in years gone by. I quote from the Illustrated Weekly Journal, Canada, under date of January 30, 1926:

There is no firmer believer in the future of the northern portions of Ontario and Quebec than Dr. C. V. Corless, the general manager of the Mond Nickle Company, and he has on more than one occasion in the past been at pains to expose some of the erroneous notions held regarding them.

Not long ago he pointed out that the area surrounding Hudson bay occupied fully 90 per cent of all Canada east of the western plains. He then predicted that this great "pre-Cambrian shield" would find its greatest economic future in mineral resources, but at the same time expressed his opinion that the ultimate foundation industry for a new country was farming. Developing this view in an address at Toronto the other day, he held that in the pre-Cambrian region there was room in the fertile intervals for an agricultural population of well over a million, and the natural situation was well adapted for the interchange of agricultural products with the near-lying mineral deposits and forest industries. Dr. Corless thinks there is danger of paying too exclusive attention to the agricultural west, to the neglect of the mining and lumbering regions of northern Ontario and northern Quebec.

In the matter of colonization and work done in the north country I would at this juncture pay tribute to the administration of the Conservative party in the province of Ontario under the leadership of the Hon. G. Howard Ferguson. I would go further and say that in these days when material considerations are given the greatest prominence, it is pleasing to refer to the racial unity and religious harmony which prevails in Ontario and which has been the direct result of the efforts of the present provincial administration.

There is another question to which I would refer offhand. It is a matter of meta-politics and should be of interest to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). I refer to the question of dual citizenship. So many of our young Canadians go to the United States and when asked to swear allegiance to the American flag, do so unquestionably with a mental reservation, and it occurred to me it would be interesting to hear a discussion of the old question of dual citizenship.

Now I should like to deal at some length with mining questions as they affect northern Ontario. Few not directly connected with the mining industry really appreciate its true importance in industrial life. Few realize how much industrial life is dependent upon mining and even how much directly and indirectly the present day cost of living is traceable back to mining. A great work has been accomplished in northern Ontario by the provincial Department of Mines and particularly by the present minister; and that hon. gentleman's good work is felt throughout the whole Dominion in the realm of the mining industry. I should like to quote an extract, in connection with the general awakening of interest in mining, from the Monetary Times of January 15, 1926.

Mining Investments

The great record of Canadian mining in 1925, and the handsome profits derived from some mining securities, is enticing to the investor. Mines have had a bad repute because of shady methods pursued by some promoters and the lack of knowledge on the part of the investor. But where the investor has had a real run for his money he has, on the whole, no cause for complaint. At the recent annual meeting of the Canadian Institute for Mining and Metallurgy, John A. Dresser, Montreal mining engineer, gave the following practical suggestions for putting a mine property through the development stage:—

"After assuring yourselves regarding his title of ownership and making a satisfactory preliminary contract with the prospector, examine the property. Do this thoroughly and with an entirely open mind in which neither wishes nor prejudices have any place. It is a business opportunity that it would be either a serious mistake to miss, or a disastrous one to engage in ill-advisedly. At this time it is relatively easy to be impartial. But after one has become an owner and has expended money, thought and labour upon a property, it is much more difficult for him to be a really impartial judge of it.

"In the first instance, it is often an economy to employ a reliable prospector or mine foreman to make a preliminary examination in order to learn if the property is worth the expense of a technical examination of greater cost, and perhaps to get it into condition to make an engineer's examination useful. But in any case, neither buy a claim nor make any serious expenditure without really learning all that can be learned about it. Careful and competent inspection is a form of insurance that you cannot afford to do without in mining.

"In the course of a number of such efforts, you will find a claim that proves good—claim that with more time and care and money will become a mine. This period may be described as a period of absorbing interest, both financial and otherwise.

"When it becomes apparent that your claim has established merit, and there is reasonable promise, if not actual assurance, that it will make a mine, it is time to consider the disposition of it, and how to realize on the operation.

"Rarely, if ever, should a development, or exploration syndicate, however successful, attempt actual mining. If the pioneer work has been complex, and of a kind to require critical care, much more is this true of the organization and operation of a mine.

"Under favourable circumstances, the novice, for the exploration syndicate may still be a novice in mining, may operate a mine, even at a profit. But in many cases the life of the mine depends on its management, and experience is essential. In any event we may rest assured that the maximum profit can only be obtained by exercising the maximum skill and this should be looked for in an experienced mining company."

There is, of course, the possibility of "grubstaking" a prospector and sharing in his success—if he is successful. Prospecting is generally thought of as an enterprise for individuals, but some of our large mines maintain forces of prospectors, while there are other companies and syndicates which do nothing else. Again, a proven and producing mine becomes an investment, in fact it is about as safe a stock as you can buy, for with an ascertained volume of ore the only uncertainties are in regard to market prices and mining costs, and similar uncertainties face an enterprise of any kind.

The prospector plays the same part in the success of the mining industry as the man who wore the steel helmet did in winning the war: both bear the brunt without receiving proper appreciation. To me the prospector is at once an interesting and a romantic character. A true prospector must be both practical and visionary. His make-up partakes of the nature of poet, seer, philosopher and businessman—these to a greater or a less degree respectively according to his original temperament. Leagues away from the noise of cities and the general activities of men, he navigates the rivers and lakes, meanders through the avenues of gothic spruce, over rocks and plains, sleeping under the starry heavens, oblivious of the lapse of years that eat away a dreamer's life. Greek-like he loves the rosy-fingered dawn and the beauties of nature. But Aurora is cold and irresponsive, like her prototype in this world of the flesh, when he is broke and without a grubstake. Unless he makes a sale the prospector has no income. To anyone interested in mining—and every true Canadian should be—I say: "Your best bet is to sit in with the honest prospector." And there are hundreds of them in the north country, the best fellows in the world. It has taken them years of hardship and sacrifice to learn the game, and now with the great impending boom you have an opportunity for tremendous profit at a very small outlay. Help the prospector buy his grubstake, and help him do his assessment work, to show up his holdings to advantage, and when the deal goes through you and your descendants for the next three generations will be sitting pretty.

I would refer, Sir, to other general topics of importance to the north country. As to labour I represent a great many miners,—men from all parts of the continent and all parts of the world—Irishmen, Cornishmen, men from Nova Scotia. And here I would remark that there must be something radically wrong with the mines of the east when those chaps found themselves compelled to set up the disturbance they have done in the past. On the general questions of interest to labour I am prepared to support any measure brought down and submitted in workable form; but as regards the standing of the independent groups I submit, that on this short island portage known as life a man's reach should not exceed his grasp. Something definite, something tangible should be accomplished.

With further reference to protection and in connection with the woollen industry, I was interested and ironically amused to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. McClenaghan) in connection with the nemesis which had overtaken a woollen manufacturer who had throughout the years stood for the a priori dogmas and principles of free trade.

Questions such as rural credits and railway rates will unquestionably come up in committee form when there will be an opportunity of fuller discussion. At this particular stage of the debate I have other references to make in connection with the general development of the country. I would refer again to the mining industry and particularly to the mining of iron. A proposition was submitted by the provincial authorities in regard to the beneficiation of iron ore. From reports, however, we see that our iron ore development is not going ahead, but foreign deposits are still being operated to the disadvantage of the workers of this country and our great natural resources. I should like to quote an extract from the Canadian Mining Journal of February 12, 1926:

Still Buying Abroad

The United States Department of Commerce reports that in the month of November, 1925, the exports of primary forms of iron and steel to Canada amounted to 58,826 tons, which was forty per cent of the tonnage exported in that month. Japan came second, but took less than a quarter of Canada's purchases.

The great bulk of these materials could have been produced in Canada in works already established and by workmen already trained and ready, and most of them would have been produced at home if special inducements were not offered to buyers to procure them from abroad.

These special inducements are of two kinds, those that are normally offered by manufacturers in every country who are desirous of increasing their export trade. and those that are offered by our own government in the way of exemption from duty, or admission upon payment of duties, below normal or average rates, or the return of duties, when the materials are used in favoured industries.

The rates of duty on the steel imported into Canada from the United States in November, 1925, varied from 5 per cent to about 20 per cent. On nearly 20,000 tons there are two rates, distinguished by arbitrary units of size or weight. Material in one form may pay the equivalent of 20 per cent while material of exactly the same kind, shape and purpose may be required to pay only 10 per cent. And as has been noted, some sorts are on the free list and pay no duty at all, while others have 99 per cent of the duty remitted if they are used for certain specified purposes. If they are used for any other purpose, even though it may be equally essential to the comfort and happiness of some class of the people, no refund can be obtained.

We have great workable iron ore bodies through the north country, and co-operation by the federal authorities in this respect would give us an opportunity to call upon our coal miners for further supplies, give work to the men in that part of the country and at the same time develop the industry in both the east and the north.

I note in the Speech from the Throne a reference to the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. Naturally, we maintain that the first railroad that should reach the Hudson Bay or the James Bay country is the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario, which is now some sixty-five miles south of that point. But I look upon this great body of water in the north country as a national heritage, and the development of mines and power and other natural resources on and back from the shore line will bring about a great deal of inland navigation and traffic which will redound to the benefit of those roads. In saying that I should support the completion of the Hudson Bay railway, I do so with certain reservations as to the amount involved and the plan to be submitted, but it is my opinion that in ten years' time we shall have not only one railroad but three or four railroads to the Hudson Bay area.

Another great question in our northern country is one very closely connected with successful colonization. I refer to the construction of roads. Under the former Conservative administration a certain amount was allocated for expenditure in each province on roads to be built at the discretion of the provincial authorities. Under the Progressive regime in Ontario none of that money was spent in the northern country. I submit that development in Ontario has reached a point as a result of which the area referred to heretofore and very often in this House as the "hump" will shortly become the connecting link between the east and the west. The time is ripe for the construction of a national highway through the great clay belt, and a grant in that connection would be in the interest not only of the immediate district and the settlers there but of Canada as a whole. Money spent in this way would show up to great advantage, and the saving made in the construction of such a proposition as the Rouyn railway could be used in this way to advantage in building up traffic for our national railways along the route.

In conclusion, Sir, I submit that the present administration is not in the confidence of the people of this country, but, compromisers and trimmers, they and their works shall be swept away by the confluence of public opinion and national resolution at no distant date—swept, I say, into oblivion, like autumn leaves on a swollen stream.

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR CLOSURE

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Leader of the House): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of moving the adjournment of the debate. But before doing so, I desire to give notice that at the next sitting of the House, before the order of the day for resuming this debate is called, I shall move that the present debate, namely the debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Elliott for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed motion of Mr. Bird "that this question be now put" shall not be further adjourned. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am glad to see that my right hon. friend is welcoming his child with delight.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

Tuesday, March 2, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

OBJECTIONABLE PRINTED MATTER

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. S. C. MEWBURN (East Hamilton): I desire to direct the attention of the Acting Postmaster General to the following communication which I have received and which speaks for itself:

Don't you think that something should be done to prevent publications such as the Evening Graphic, the Daily Mirror and the Detroit Times coming into Canada? I am informed that the sale of the Mirror in Hamilton is no less than 5,000 copies daily, and they charge two cents for the dirty sheet. Spend a few minutes in looking over these publications. All publishers of decent Canadian newspapers would be glad to have such salacious sheets suppressed.

Will the Acting Postmaster General be good enough to look into this matter and see whether something cannot be done to suppress this obscene literature?

Hon. GEORGE H. BOIVIN (Minister of Customs): We have already received several complaints concerning the Daily Mirror. These complaints have been investigated by our censor and an order goes from the department this afternoon banning this newspaper in Canada. As regards the others, an investigation will be made and if the censor deems it advisable the same action will be taken.

RUMOURED REDUCTION IN AUTOMOBILE DUTIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): I wish to lay before the government a short telegram which I have received with reference to the tariff on automobiles. I realize of course that no statement can be made on the matter at this stage but I want to bring it to the attention of the government. The telegram reads:

Rumours of reduction in tariff on automobiles seriously hindering sales here. Our members anxious to learn if any truth in report and desire to point out disastrous effect if dealers are not protected on cars in stock and if tariff is reduced on used cars allowing Americans to flood market.

This telegram is dated Fort William, March 1, and is signed by O. G. Sturdy, secretary, Lakes Head Motor Trades Association. I simply submit it to the government for consideration at the proper time.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

ADMISSION OF GERMANY AS PERMANENT MEMBER OF COUNCIL

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): Next week there is to be a meeting of the council of the League of Nations at Geneva and a special meeting of the assembly for the purpose of making Germany a permanent member of the council of the league. At present the council consists of four permanent members and six other members selected by the assembly from time to time. I see by the press that an effort may be made at this meeting in Geneva to further increase the permanent members of the council, but this cannot be done without the approval of the assembly. I should like to ask the acting head of the government the names of the delegates who will represent Canada on this occasion, whether any, and if so, what instructions have been given them regarding the admission of Germany to the council and also regarding the question of further increasing the permanent members of the council in case it comes up for discussion in the assembly.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Leader of the House): As my hon. friend has said, the Secretary General of the League of Nations has requested the various members of the league to send delegates to a special meeting of the assembly to be held on March 8 for the purpose of considering the request of Germany for admission to the council of the league. The Canadian delegates are Senator Dandurand, leader in the Senate, who was president of the assembly last fall, the High Commissioner for Canada in London and the Commissioner for Canada in Paris, with Dr. Riddell, who is already in Geneva, as a substitute. It seems to be the general opinion everywhere that Germany should be admitted as a member of the league, and even given a seat on the council. As my hon. friend has said, proposals have been made for the appointment, as permanent members of the council, of two or three other nations, Spain, Brazil and Poland having been suggested. The matter was discussed with Senator Dandurand prior to his departure for Geneva, but of course whatever may be my opinion or the opinion of other hon. members it is preferable that the formal applications of these nations be placed before the assembly before any private views are expressed in regard to them. It is understood that communications will be exchanged between our representatives there and this government, but the matter of making public all the information that may come to the government is, I think, somewhat delicate. I have noticed, as hon. gentlemen may have noticed also, that both in England and in France the government have declined to state their opinion on the matter at the present time. My hon. friend may be sure that the views expressed in Canada by those who are especially interested in questions appertaining to the League of Nations, the views of such organizations, for example, as the League of Nations Association, as well as of private individuals, will be given the most serious consideration. If I were free I might say that my opinion coincides with that of my hon. friend, but I am not free to say so. However, everything will be submitted to the delegates there and the views of Canada will be represented.

EXCESSIVE MOISTURE IN WESTERN GRAIN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): On January 22 I drew the attention of the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce to the fact that owing to congestion in the elevator at Fort William a considerable quantity of damp grain was likely to spoil. I want to ask now what special measures have been adopted by the department to prevent loss of western grain because of excessive moisture, and what progress has been made.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): This morning my hon. friend advised me that he would ask this question, so that I am in a position to put on Hansard a statement of the measures which the government have taken to take care of damp and tough grain in elevators and in transit. After my hon. friend on January 22 had directed our attention to the serious situation on account of the large amount of tough and damp grain on hand, and following the statement I then made, I obtained a report from the chairman of the grain commission, dated January 28, who advised me that a statement prepared that day showed that of 5,000 cars in the yards at the head of the lakes the Canadian Pacific Railway had 87 with damp and 1,177 with tough grain; and the Canadian National 170 with damp and 923 with tough grain. He further advised me that the terminal elevators were picking out the damp cars billed to them so that they might be taken in and dried. He assured me that every effort was being made to take care of tough and damp grain so as to minimize the danger of loss.

Following that, on February 20, the secretary of the grain commission, in a letter directed to the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, advised the department on the situation. In order that the House and the country may have the benefit of this information, I crave indulgence to place the letter on Hansard:

Dear Sir:

Tough and Damp Grain

Owing to the large amount of tough and damp grain now in store in public and private elevators throughout the western grain inspection division, as well as considerable quantities in transit railway yards, country elevators and in farmers' hands, the board had several meetings with interested parties regarding the drying of this grain.

The drying facilities throughout the western inspection division are practically all operating to their full capacity in the drying of damp grain, with the result that most of the damp grain now in store in the elevators will be dried before the opening of navigation.

Under the provisions of the tariff governing the public terminal elevators operating in the western inspection division, tough grain is received from November 1 to April 1 under the same terms and conditions applying to straight grade grains. Such tough grain, therefore, as may be in store at the present time must be allowed to remain in store in its present condition, unless it should become heated, in which event sections of the act relating to out-of-condition grain (130 to 139) must be complied with.

After reviewing the whole situation very carefully the board is of the opinion that all tough and damp grain now in store in the elevators can be taken care of, providing the drying of same is proceeded with immediately, the elevators equipped with drying facilities utilizing same to their full capacity, but there is a danger of the grain now in box cars, both in transit and in railway yards, and that yet to be marketed, going out of condition, if we should experience an early spring.

At the present time the elevators have sufficient tough and damp grain in store to keep their drying facilities working to full capacity continuously from March 1 to the opening of navigation.

The only way in which the drying facilities can be used to the best advantage is to allow the public and private elevators to dry, with the least possible delay, all tough 3 northern and lower grades of wheat now in store, and in addition all tough, coarse grains as may be advisable, so that these facilities will be available at the opening of navigation to take care of grain which is in danger of going out of condition and which cannot be unloaded at the present time.

The board's reason for recommending the drying of only 3 northern and lower grades of wheat is that under section 96 of the Canada Grain Act, the last paragraph under the heading, "Spring Wheat", 3 northern and lower grades which may be dried, may be graded in such regular grades as the inspector determines, whereas, in the drying of 1 and 2 northern, the inspector, in his discretion, issues a certificate for dried 1 or 2 northern, which only commands the price of 3 northern wheat.

Then, on the recommendation of the Board of Grain Commissioners, this order in council was passed on February 26:

The following regulations made by the Board of Grain Commissioners for Canada, pursuant to sections 20, 87 and 140 of the Canada Grain Act, chapter 33, 15-16 George V, are hereby approved:

(1) All public and private elevators in the western grain inspection division, except those public and private elevators situated at Vancouver, shall proceed to dry, according to the drying facilities in the elevators in which such grain may be stored, all tough 3 northern and lower grades of tough wheat, and, in addition, all tough, coarse grains as may be advisable.

(2) On all tough grain dried, the elevators shall be entitled to deduct 4 per cent from the amount as shown on the outstanding warehouse receipt to cover loss in drying.

(3) This order in council shall be effective the first day of March, 1926, and shall be subject to such regulations as the board may provide under subsection 1 of section 87 of the Canada Grain Act, to ensure the proper carrying out of this order.

(4) The Board of Grain Commissioners, owing to the urgency of the situation, is empowered to make regulations for the handling of such tough and damp grain, under the provisions of section 87, effective on the publication of such regulations, without requiring to submit such regulations for the approval of the Governor in Council.

In addition to that we have, at an expense of $942, provided additional drying facilities at Moose Jaw.

GERMAN REPARATIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, may I ask whatever hon. gentleman now represents the Secretary of State what progress is being made in the payment of claims for German reparations? I have had complaints recently from people whose situation is serious. They seem to think that no progress is being made at all in securing payment of their claims. I am emboldened now to make my request because during the latter days of the last session of the late parliament the government, we understood, were in a position to deal with the matter and were talking of introducing a bill.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Leader of the House): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Secretary of State at the present time is the Postmaster General (Hon. Mr. Murphy) who is a member of the second chamber. I shall be pleased to call his attention to the remarks of my hon. friend, and I am sure the latter will receive all the information he needs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: At some time

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed from Monday, March 1, consideration of the motion of Mr. J. C. Elliott for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to His Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed motion of Mr. Bird: "That this question be now put."

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Leader of the House): Mr. Speaker, this House has been sitting since the seventh day of January. It was summoned at the earliest possible date after the general election for a special purpose, namely to settle the situation created by that election. On November 17 the Prime Minister (Mr. King) issued a statement giving the reasons why parliament had been summoned for that date, and I am going to read just a few words from that statement. He said:

> Once the question of party majority is settled, an adjournment of parliament can be made to enable whichever party may be entrusted with the duty of carrying on the government time within which to conduct the necessary by-elections and have in readiness the further work of the session.

He also added:

> The interests of the country will therefore in no way suffer if, as soon as parliament meets, the question of majority support is decided and an adjournment is then made to permit of the party enjoying the support of the majority in the House of Commons making the necessary arrangements for the continuance at the proper time of the work of the session.

It was well understood and discussed in the press all over Canada that when this question was settled there would be an adjournment of the House for the purpose already mentioned. On the 8th of January, the day following the opening of parliament, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) challenged the right of the government to summon parliament and carry on the administration. This motion was voted down after a somewhat extensive debate, and on the 18th of January the hon. member for West Middlesex (Mr. Elliott) moved the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. This debate went on for a certain time, and on the 26th of January, when the debate was being adjourned, the right hon. leader of the opposition, as may be seen in Hansard at page 473, said:

> While this motion is not debatable, certainly we ought to be closing this debate and not dragging it along at such great length with such extended speeches.

The right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), on the 28th of January, as will be seen at page 496 of Hansard, inquired from the government whether it was true that there would be an adjournment of the House, and he added:

The consequence of the intimations has been that members of this House have not been able to make their arrangements for the session, or the bringing down of members of their families who intend to be here should the session be continued. There has been a constant disarrangement of the programme of very many hon. members of parliament. I think the government should intimate now—in fact it should have done so sooner—whether it proposes to ask for an adjournment of the House for any considerable period of time; if so for what period, and when.

Answering my right hon. friend I said, for the purpose of his friends making their arrangements accordingly, that there would be an adjournment of six weeks, and that a motion would be presented to the House for that purpose. A notice of motion was immediately given, and on January 28th, when the debate was adjourned, my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), who was then leading the opposition, said:

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) as leader of the House how long it is intended to prolong this debate and, I may say, obstruct the progress of business. Can my hon. friend give to the House any indication of when we may expect it to close, in order that hon. members may adjust themselves to this rather strange and unusual position of a government obstructing its own business?

Relying on these statements, Mr. Speaker, a motion was presented to the House for the purpose of securing an adjournment of parliament for a period of six weeks, but immediately this motion came before the House it was fought and opposed from all angles by hon. gentlemen opposite. Still it was voted on and approved by a majority of the members of this House. Then hon. gentlemen opposite, instead of voting the Address, as they had appeared so anxious to do, resumed the debate, and my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), on February the 8th, one month after the opening of parliament, moved an amendment which would have had its proper place in the budget debate. That amendment was voted down, and my hon. friend from Nelson (Mr. Bird) then moved the previous question.

In the course of the debate on the motion of my hon. friend from Nelson, as well as on the motion of my hon. friend from South Oxford, we heard statements at different times from hon. gentlemen opposite that they would debate this Address and would speak as long as was necessary to prevent an adjournment being granted. I say, Sir, that this was frustrating the will of parliament; it was treating with contempt the decision of the majority and the supremacy of this legislative body.

Hon. gentlemen opposite refer to us in terms of contempt as a remnant of a government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear. They know those words have been repeated every day. The terms do not change very much. The government is described as a remnant of a government, as a rump, or a trunk and other expressions of that kind; but, Sir, such as it is, this remnant, this rump, this trunk, has beaten hon. gentlemen opposite every time we have been given the opportunity, and this has happened on eight different occasions this session—and nine, if I include the vote this afternoon. Obviously they do not seem to realize that when they belittle opponents who beat them at every corner and at every opportunity, they but accentuate and demonstrate and exhibit their own weakness. They have lost their own time; they have lost our time, and they have lost the time of the country. They could not defeat the government. I challenge them to defeat us now; they cannot defeat us.

Mr. MANION: Wait till the next election.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Wait till the next election? But we are in parliament just now. This is the explanation, Mr. Speaker, why we have been so tolerant, so patient, allowing the opposition of hon. gentlemen opposite to wear itself out, to disappear of itself, of its own futility and meaninglessness. But, Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the chief whip of the Conservative party (Mr. Boys) on Friday afternoon was a bold and brazen challenge which we cannot ignore. The majority of the members of this House must rule, and the majority of the members of this House will rule. The will of the majority of parliament has been asserted in two main and glaring instances. First, it declared that the government was justified in summoning parliament and in carrying on the administration; second, that this parliament should adjourn for a certain period of time for the purposes which were submitted to the House.

4 p.m.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No, I have only ten minutes more. My right hon. friend knows well the rules of which he is the father.

The attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite has been one of contempt for parliamentary institutions, and they have the unenviable responsibility for the feeling in the minds of many people which such contempt spreads throughout the country. I was sorry when I heard my eminent friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) use in the course of his speech the following words:

> I can tell him that so far as I am concerned, he will have to change the rules of the House to prevent my obstructing, in order to prevent the forcing through of any such measure as that.

I was sorry for my hon. friend, for whom I have the greatest respect and admiration, because that statement was certainly not worthy of his high reputation. What are laws and what are regulations if not an expression of the will of the majority? And it is setting a pernicious example and giving a nefarious excuse to would-be lawbreakers when political leaders challenge the will of majority and try to smuggle through their own defeated persons and opinions.

Last year a committee sat for the purpose of revising the rules of parliament, and one of the decisions of that committee was that the length of speeches in this House should be restricted to forty minutes, except those of the two leaders. That recommendation was unanimously adopted by the committee and reported to the House. The leader of the opposition, when the report came up in the House, said that unfortunately it came up too late in the session, but he was giving his support to those rules, and he would see to it that they would carry after the election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What?

Mr. LAPOINTE: My right hon. friend may deny the statement but he can read Hansard. I will not cite any newspaper extracts. If that was his opinion, what can we say about my right hon. friend who resorts to tactics that he himself thought should be suppressed? What is to be thought of the logic of the statement of the chief whip of the opposition when he said: We are prolonging this debate because there is no business before the House. We will wait until the Prime Minister is back in the House and if he has no business after one day or two days, we will vote and we will adjourn. We will cease obstruction, for the very reason for which we obstructed. Have you ever seen such logic? I was not surprised that the chief whip seemed uneasy when he was reading that carefully prepared statement which had been placed in his hands. How can it be otherwise when statesmanship, broad vision and public interest are to give way to spite, disappointment and narrow partisanship? The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George discovered something else. He said: The acting leader of the government is responsible because he made a motion for the purpose of giving precedence to the Address. Let him withdraw that motion and proceed with business. Is that Tory loyalty when those gentlemen are out of power? When has the House refrained from moving the Address for the purpose of discussing the legislation announced in the Speech from the Throne? It is the first communication of the sovereign and it is always given first consideration. The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) cited a case in 1884 when the consideration of the Address was postponed from day to day on account of a vote of censure regarding affairs in the Soudan war. This was so exceptional that Bourinot and May have recorded it. In the same way this year something exceptional was moved in this chamber before the Address was considered. It was the motion of my hon. friend. In the British House of Commons the Address is voted after a very few days of debate. In 1882 the British House of Commons considered the Address from February 7 to February 18, and it is the longest case recorded in Bourinot. It is preposterous on the part of gentlemen who have a standing in this House to suggest that the Address be withdrawn for the purpose of considering the legislation announced in the Speech from the Throne. Before the Address is voted the House is not properly organized to function. We have no Deputy Speaker, and you, Sir, have been a martyr to your duty as Speaker.

I repeat, the majority in this House is going to rule. We are not those who can be intimidated or discouraged. The majority of the people of Canada, whether you call them Liberals, Progressives, Labour or Independents, have intimated that they do not want the right hon. gentleman as Prime Minister of Canada and we shall see to it that their will is respected and that my right hon. friend does not reach the goal of his ambition. Hon. gentlemen have wasted nearly two months in futile, dull, uninteresting debate, and if I may be permitted, with all due deference, I may say a debate prolific only of abuse, denunciations and very feeble, auxiliary gibes and jokes. The power to decide is in the hands, not of those whom my right hon. friend would like to have as judges, but of those whom the people have elected as judges. His argument is based on what should be done. My argument is based on what has been done.

Since the date of the general elections, the Conservative party has gone through three successive periods. First we witnessed a Niagara of vehement enthusiasm which gradually decreased in intensity; second, we were subjected to bitter criticism, sometimes verging on insanity, and, third, some gentlemen of the Conservative party—I do not mean in the House—have suffered from an epidemic of political hysteria. The frenzy of part of the Tory press of Canada to-day is the comic relief of our current politics. Let me tell them once and for all that we are not going to let anybody shout us out, or abuse us out, or even chloroform us out by meaningless and tiresome speeches. We are going to carry on this administration in the interest of all the people in Canada and not merely of some private business. Many forces are exerting themselves against us and are resorting to spectacular publicity. They are active in our province, but we are there blocking the way and we dare them and their plutocratic methods to defeat us. While they are whining and whistling, Canada is going ahead, Canada is entering upon a new period of not only recovery but of prosperity, as all the statistics of trade, employment and public finance demonstrate eloquently. We are going to carry on; we are going to appeal to the best, not to the worst of men, not to their hatreds or their passions. We are going to appeal to unity and harmony in this country, and we shall be victorious.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The acting leader of the government has delivered himself, I hope to his own satisfaction, of a speech evidently quite carefully prepared over a long period of time—

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is another one of the right hon. member's mistakes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —the purpose of which, so far as I could judge, was to crowd as many of the offences which he charged against us as could possibly be crowded into the compass of his own twenty minute speech. In the course of his preparation there was one resource which he very distinctly omitted. While emphasizing the determination of his government, which he himself calls a trunk, a chunk and I know not what, to carry on by force of majority—which, by the way, is not its party's majority at all—he became very enthusiastic over the rule which he now invokes. Hon. members who were within parliament prior to four years ago will remember that, of all hon. gentlemen opposite in numbers then almost what they are to-day who condemned this rule, its principle, its initiation, its application, who condemned it day and night with bell, book and candle, the most vociferous was himself the then hon. member for Kamouraska. He declared that the application of this rule was the gag and the disruption of a free parliament. As time is very precious I cannot quote much of what he said. If I could quote it all, I would piece together from the speeches of the then hon. member for Kamouraska, the present Minister of Justice, a better speech than he delivered this afternoon but one wholly on the other side of the case. He said on the 16th April, 1913, when this very rule was under review:

> I wish to enter my solemn protest on behalf of my constituents which I have the honour to represent in this House against this infamous proposal of the government.

This infamous proposal which he now adopts as his own in the House to-day:

> When I hand over my mandate to them, I will be in a position to say: "You are free citizens and you have returned a free representative; I was desirous of fulfilling my duty, my whole duty; but it happened one day that brute force prevented me from doing so, I was gagged.

Who is the parent of brute force this afternoon? Who is the gagger now? He continued:

> But, Mr. Speaker, there still remains with us two sources of energy which cannot be gagged; faith in the righteousness of our cause and the nobleness of our aims.

At another point he declared that by this rule parliament had debased itself and that mails or mail bags could be robbed, and all sorts of crimes could be committed. The people's representatives could never intervene; the freedom of parliament was gone. The hon. member was not alone in that respect. The hon. member who now sits behind him stood up and in a voice full of pathos declared that he was sorry to have to admit that he rose for the last time in a free parliament, that parliament had been robbed of functions of which it had boasted for generations. There was scarcely an hon. gentleman opposite, indeed not one of those who were in the House at that time, who did not denounce the closure rule, denounce its principle, its application and everything about it, and declared that it was alien to British institutions. One after another rose in his place and said: "The Conservatives want to restrict trade and now also they want to restrict discussion. We are for freedom on both counts of the indictment, and in the cause of freedom we are prepared to suffer and die." The hon. member will recall those words from the mouth of the then member for Red Deer, who excelled in eloquence, if not in vituperation, those who represent the Liberal party to-day. Now they have abandoned both free trade and free discussion.

I do not object to closure. I believe the closure rule is essential in all free parliaments. This doctrine I preached in 1913, and this doctrine we on this side of the House sought to drive home to hon. members opposite. This doctrine they repudiated and they declared that parliament debased itself by the adoption of such a rule. Has any explanation come from the Minister of Justice this afternoon of his change of front? Is there anything left for this government to swallow of all its professions throughout all its history?

The closure rule has been open to adoption by hon. gentlemen opposite from the beginning. By the rules of the House we always loyally abide. By this rule, as by every other rule, we are prepared to abide. What is to be thought of a leader of the government who, afraid to use the rule, afraid to resort to perfectly proper remedies at his disposal, sits in his seat for days and weeks, and complains of members on this side of the House?

The hon. minister comes forward and tells us, "Oh, we just called parliament together on the 7th January for one purpose and only one purpose, namely, to find out which party had the confidence of parliament, whether the government of the day or some other party. Is that why they called parliament? Does the leader of the government reaffirm now his statement that that is why he called parliament together? He told us when parliament met that such was the reason. Why then did he put a long succession of misrepresentation and deceit in the mouth of His Excellency in the form of an Address, if parliament was called together for the sole purpose of deciding who was supreme in parliament? If the minister now speaks the truth, that purpose should have been the sole constituent in the Speech of His Excellency presented to the House of Commons. That was what ought to have been the sole feature of the Speech, but the hon. gentleman knew that if he came honestly before this House and stated the purpose of calling the session he could not get a majority in this House. The hon. members knew that on the record of their four years they could not get a majority in the House, and the hon. Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) admitted this truth in one of the debates in the House this session. After all these blandishments have been held out by way of bribe and nothing else to hon. members to my left—matters that were entirely foreign to the purpose of calling parliament together—the Minister of Customs, speaking for the government, knowing well that on their record they could not be sustained, looked across to hon. members to my left and said: "If you vote with us on this vote of confidence you do not vote support of us or approval of us on our record." And furthermore, he declared that the government would not accept the vote as one of confidence entitling them to the rights of a government at all. By that assertion a farcical and artificial loophole was offered to hon. gentlemen, through which they could escape and through which they could, to the satisfaction to the government at least, justify the support of the administration. By virtue of such conduct they have gathered round them the support, temporarily, I hope, of the hon. members to my left, and not one of those hon. members will rise in his place now and say that for any other reason on earth he supports this government at this time.

This government, the moment they faced a motion of confidence, declared that those who would vote for them would not be voting confidence in them at all. On the assertion of the Minister of Customs on behalf of the government it was to be no vote of confidence. Can any member of the government dare say that parliament has voted confidence in them to this day? The government is directing its efforts now to see that the House gets no opportunity to vote on the question of confidence. The government invokes what it declared for ten years to be an infamous closure rule, in order to make sure that parliament never gets an opportunity of voting want of confidence. In this they have the "co-operation" of at least certain hon. members to my left. In this they have the active "co-operation" of the hon member for Nelson (Mr. Bird). After resolutions expressive of what we believed to be fundamental faults in government policy were disposed of, this House was about to have presented to it, as hon. gentlemen knew, as the hon. member for Nelson knew, as every member of the Progressive party knew—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. BIRD: The hon. gentleman did not know any such thing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman from Nelson did not know what?

Mr. BIRD: Did not know what the right hon. leader of the opposition alleges.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The leader of the opposition has not stated yet what the hon. member for Nelson knew. He rose before I said it. This was part of the "co-operation." Through the press of this country we had informed this House more than once that a vote of want of confidence would be moved, and even the name of the mover was given to the press. If hon. gentlemen did not know it, then they are using the word "know" in a sense never before understood in parliament. Right on the eve of the motion, when indeed the member who was about to make the motion was on his feet, the member for Nelson stood up and forced himself on the attention of the Speaker, in order that what we are told was the avowed purpose of calling parliament might be frustrated; in order that hon. gentlemen would not be in the position of having to vote yes or no on the question of confidence. The debate has been prolonged, so hon. members opposite complain. They say that as long ago as January 28 or early in Februaary I asked why the government did not get on with business. Certainly I did, and I have asked that question ever since. We on this side have appealed to the government to bring some business before parliament. We have offered, and the government has known that we have been prepared all these weeks, to come to a vote on the Address provided only there was some business for parliament to transact.

The closure rule is all right; it is perfectly defensible, justifiable and necessary. But never in the history of any parliament was closure adopted for the purpose of giving its members a holiday. Those who stoutly resisted this rule when applied only for the purpose of learning the will of parliament on absolutely essential legislation, only for the purpose of getting the decision of this House on important legislation submitted by the government; those who fought day and night to prevent the application of closure for such purpose, come into parliament this afternoon and call upon all their own followers and their allies to the left to stand up and support closure in order that parliament may adjourn.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Support parliament.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Support closure, in order that parliament may adjourn. The Minister of the Interior does not like the expression because it is the truth. Now what position is the government in?

An hon. MEMBER: A good position.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government is in a good position just as a criminal about to be electrocuted is in a good position when he takes the chair.

Serious charges are to-day levelled against the administration. Serious charges are under review before a committee of this House; serious charges have been levelled across the floor in respect of malfeasance of office by this administration. And while one set of these charges are under review by a committee of parliament this government forces closure in order that the work of that committee may be rendered null and void. This parliament, at the instance of the government, denudes that committee of all power to enforce its decisions; it leaves the committee stranded and helpless without our moral support and at the mercy of witnesses who may defy its will. For this purpose closure is applied. Charges of defiance of parliament have been levelled against the administration supported by indisputable evidence, supported by their own orders in council—a defiance of parliament as illegal, as utterly indefensible, as brazen as anything that any government in any country in the world ever dared to perpetrate. These charges have not even met with a meed of attempted defence at the hands of any member of the government; and while the administration is in that position its leader rises and, without offering any defence whatever, calls upon a majority in this House, composed of his supporters and his allies, to vote parliament into an adjournment while they themselves proceed with the project which they have undertaken by means of these illegal steps and in contempt of the will of this House.

Is this parliament to sit idly by as a mere spectator while the government dips its hands into the treasury and takes out millions for the execution of projects which parliament has never authorized and does not authorize to-day? Is closure to be applied in order that the control of parliament over the treasury of this Dominion shall be ignored and be no longer effective? I want to know where the defenders of parliamentary rights are this afternoon. Where are those who once talked for days and nights about the "rights of parliament," who indeed have so deported themselves in this House that one would be led to believe a government should be not the initiator of legislation but a mere committee to carry out the specified will of parliament as expressed in resolutions? Where are the defenders of parliamentary rights now? Hon. gentlemen to my left have sat by and voted for the administration while the administration, by devious, indefensible, illegal means, has defeated the will of parliament and defied its rights. Does anyone for a moment suggest that this government had any justification in the world for ignoring the parliament of Canada last session and projecting this Dominion into an enterprise in the district of Rouyn to the extent of $5,000,000?

If so, I should like to ask hon. gentlemen to my left, and hon. gentlemen opposite as well, this question: why did we debate in parliament, not through one session but two, projects precisely similar in character though of far less importance because far less in cost? Why did we debate them in this House, compelling them to run the vicissitudes of the House of Commons and the perils of the Senate, if the government could simply have turned their backs upon us and through orders in council, contrived by clever American lawyers, have devised a means of defying the Commons and Senate both?

The only defence in respect of this flagrant disregard of the rights of parliament comes from him who is all the time preaching that politics must not be dragged into the railways, but who seems to believe that the converse is entirely justifiable, that the railways may at his single will be dragged into politics. Is it to be said that because some lawyer is able to devise a scheme whereby parliament may be ignored, whereby a bond issue or a construction contract can be labelled a lease, then a government guilty of yielding to a proposal of that kind is nevertheless entitled not only to the support of this House but to closure in order that its desires may be gratified? Yet such is the position in which this government finds itself this afternoon. Parliament, at its instance, is voting closure for the purpose of an adjournment; closure for the purpose of giving the House a holiday; closure for the purpose of robbing the most important committee which has sat here for twenty years of all power to do its duty; closure for the purpose of shielding the government from attack on charges of defiance of parliament as grave as ever were laid at the door of any administration. For these purposes closure is invoked this afternoon. The majority will of course impose its rude will over the minority. But this government will pay a penalty not only for its tragic record in the past but for its blunder of today.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I do not intend to occupy the full twenty minutes which has been allotted to hon. members who wish to speak, but I desire to say a few words in regard to the position which the Progressive party holds in this House. We have sat here patiently listening to long, shall I say sometimes tiresome, speeches—I think I may justly describe them thus—and we have heard a great many things said about the Progressives. We have been told what the Progressives have done, what they have not done, and what they are likely to do in the future. I must say that I am astonished whenever I hear the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) speaking of co-operation with the Progressives. How can hon. gentlemen expect any co-operation with the group in this part of the House in view of the language which they have used of hon. members in this corner during the past month? Let them read Hansard for that short time and see the terms which hon. gentlemen to my right have applied to the Progressive members during this debate. I will give you a few samples. I listened last night to a wonderful speech from an erudite member representing a cultured constituency in New Ontario.

Let me quote a few sentences from Hansard which he uttered last night:

> Their refusal or inability to sit in with the Conservatives was due to what I should term their urban complex, meaning by this a more or less morbid pathological mental process resultant mostly from that diffidence, that timidity, that self-complacency, that parsimony, that narrowness, that simplicity, incident to rusticity.

This is terrible, Mr. Speaker! It is the worst that has ever been said about us. But he is young yet; he will learn better after a while. I read in a newspaper that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) in his youth drove a team of oxen, and was so close to agriculture that he even used language now and again that would certainly not be considered parliamentary by yourself, Sir. I do not know what we may expect from agriculture when we get a minister of railways in his seat who is imbued with "that narrowness and that simplicity incident to rusticity." I am curious to know what large city in his constituency the hon. member comes from. I must confess I do not know very much about that part of the country, but I should be surprised to learn that there are as yet any very large urban centres there. However, this is by the way. I did not intend to refer to it, but I was asked by hon. friends to my right to give quotations of remarks about the Progressives that had been made by representative Conservatives.

Now, what is the situation? The members of this House did not create it; the people of Canada created it. I have heard members on both sides blame the third party for the situation which confronted us at the opening of parliament. I may be wrong, but I make the guess that had there been no third party the situation would not have been any better than it is, because I am inclined to believe that two parties would have been so evenly balanced that it would have been very difficult for either to carry on the business of the country. Hon. gentlemen to my right have spoken as if they had a majority in this House. They have even said that the government had no right to function. Well, if that is so, which party had the right to take office? That is what I should like to know. Hon. members to my right apparently take it for granted that they have a right to form the government. But they have not a majority of this House. What would have happened had the government been defeated? Could the right hon. leader of the opposition have carried on?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. FORKE: We know perfectly well he could not. He would have had to appeal to the country. Can any member of this House say to-day what would happen if we had a new election?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. FORKE: They think they know, but they do not know. I prophesy to my friends from the province of Manitoba that they will never have seven Conservatives from that province within a generation.

Mr. MULLINS: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. FORKE: I know the peculiarities of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins). If he will come up to my room after a while I will try to convince him that I am right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman remember—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman remember—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I understand the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) allows the question that the right hon. gentleman is trying to put?

Mr. FORKE: Oh, yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am asking the hon. member if he recalls his prophecies in the last parliament?

Mr. FORKE: I admit, Mr. Speaker, that it is very foolish to prophesy. But I am not discouraged. I would turn to hon. gentlemen opposite and prophesy, too, that there are not going to be very many Liberals from Manitoba after the next election. But there are going to be a great many more Progressives. While I am in the prophesying mood I will go a little further: After another election we are going to see this corner of the House filled up with just as many Progressives as were returned to the last parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FORKE: My friends may laugh, but I ask them to remember when that time comes what I am now saying. When we came to this parliament we found no party had a majority in the House of Commons over all other parties. Consequently the first thing we had to do was to find out which party was likely to be able to secure a majority of the members. We voted first of all upon the question: Had the government a right to call parliament together? The government was sustained in that division. The position taken by the Progressives was largely influenced by the legislation we are interested in. We have heard "bribery" mentioned by the right hon. leader of the opposition. He has used that word again and again. It is an ugly word, and I do not like it at all. Bribery has never been practised in this House so far as we are concerned. Can any member on either side of the House assert that I know anything about bribes? I defy any member to make such a statement. A legislative programme has been set forth by the government. Surely we have common sense and good judgment enough, notwithstanding our "rusticity", to understand just exactly what that means. We believe it is a programme in the interests not only of our own constituencies but of the whole Dominion. So why call it "bribery" because we accept that programme? The right hon. leader of the opposition talks about co-operation. I wonder if he would not have been willing at the commencement of the session to co-operate with the Progressives if he could have done so. I would not blame him. It would have been all right on his part and quite honourable. Then why throw innuendoes across the floor at those who have co-operated? Why blame them? I think what was done was perfectly honourable on all sides. We have decided to support the government in their legislative programme, and shall do so until that programme is put through.

Now, we have heard a good deal about the government defying the will of parliament. I say the government has not defied the will of parliament. Parliament can defeat this or any other government any day it likes, and once parliament has made up its mind against the government it can no longer remain in office. Then why all this talk during the past six weeks about the government defying the will of the people? We have heard somewhat similar criticism of the Progressives for the course they have taken this session. I want to tell hon. gentlemen, no matter on which side of the House they sit, that when they talk in that strain they are not insulting members of the Progressive group, they are insulting the constituencies that sent those members down here. Those constituencies have confidence in the members they elected to this House. I believe that every action we have taken this session is perfectly legitimate and perfectly honourable, and I hope that what we have done will enure to the benefit of the whole Dominion.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (South Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, seldom if ever in the history of parliamentary government in Canada has any parliament been called upon to meet conditions similar to those which have confronted this parliament from the first day of the session down to the present time. These conditions make it abundantly clear that this so-called government has so far not been able to function as a responsible government. Let me say further that this government cannot function as a responsible government in the future, and never can function as a government capable of administering the public affairs of the Dominion of Canada.

Hon. gentlemen opposite two weeks ago realized, probably as no government has ever realized before, the imperative necessity of finding in some form or other a plan which would save them from complete ruin. Of one thing they were certain; of one thing they were sure, that a vote of want of confidence they could not and dare not attempt to face. Something had to be done and that something had to be done quickly. At a given moment all eyes on the other side of the chamber were focussed on the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird), who quickly rose in his place and fulfilled the fondest hope of hon. gentlemen opposite by moving the previous question, thereby extending the stricken, helpless and hopeless condition of hon. gentlemen opposite for two or three weeks longer. I say further that the government, as indicated by their course yesterday and to-day, still feel the strain of their position, and how could it be otherwise? This much comfort they apparently take to-day, that when the motion came before this House last night it synchronized entirely with what is commonly discussed in this parliament as the fifty-day clause, through which indemnities of $4,000 a year have been made safe for hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ROGERS: There is nothing out of order. Now, Mr. Speaker, the fifty days were up and we had the motion as presented to-day by my hon. friend who leads the House (Mr. Lapointe). My hon. friend has been talking about obstruction, and I want to say here and now that my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) and those around him on this side of the House have never undertaken to obstruct hon. gentlemen opposite. Let me say further that if we had wanted to obstruct it would have been impossible to do so, by reason of the fact that there was nothing before the House to obstruct. Hon. gentlemen opposite could not and dared not bring any measure before this parliament for consideration.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): How could we do it until the Address was passed?

Mr. ROGERS: Is that all my hon. friend knows of the rules of parliament? Let me point out to my hon. friend what he could do. He certainly is very lacking in knowledge of parliamentary procedure. The day the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne came to this House, my hon. friend's leader rose in his place and made a motion, as follows:

Hon. Ernest Lapointe (Leader of the House): I move, seconded by Mr. Macdonald (Antigonish-Guysborough)

Seconded by my hon. friend.

—that the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both Houses of parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business of the House except government notices of motion and introduction of bills, until disposd of.

Now Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen on this side took no objection to that; we wanted to proceed with the business. There are many motions promised in the Speech from the Throne—government notices of motion—

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): You agreed to that resolution.

Mr. ROGERS: Of course we agreed to it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): No other business could come before the House until the Address was disposed of.

Mr. ROGERS: With the exception of government notices of motion. Where was the notice of motion in respect to the Hudson Bay railway? Why was that not brought down for consideration? This House was here for business.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): We will bring it down.

Mr. ROGERS: Why did the government not bring down a notice of motion in respect to rural credits, which is a very important matter? Why was not a notice of motion brought down in respect to a commission to be appointed to inquire into Maritime rights, in my hon. friend's own province? Why was that motion not before the House?

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): The notice is on the order paper; let it stay there.

Mr. ROGERS: That is what the hon. gentleman wants; he is afraid to bring it before the House.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): My hon. friend will see whether we are afraid, when we get this House started.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend acts that way.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. ROGERS: Now, Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House are quite prepared to deal with private bills and questions. We have now almost a book with 180 questions and fifty or sixty or seventy resolutions, and we on this side of the House are prepared to consent at any time to go on with those matters and get them out of the way. But hon. gentlemen opposite have not, since the opening day, dared to take the opportunity of bringing any measure before this House. That is the trouble with hon. gentlemen opposite; we have been here for nearly two months and not one item of business has been brought down.

My hon. friend the leader of the government spoke about this question of adjourning and he said that we on this side of the House had obstructed by speaking too long on the Address. I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, what else we were to do in order to grasp the opportunity which we had of exposing to the intelligent people of this country the weaknesses and the helplessness of hon. gentlemen opposite. Notwithstanding that, we were prepared at any moment and at any time to take up any business brought before us. The fact that we have been carrying on in addressing this House for some time means no additional expense to the country, whether we continued to expose the conditions which we met here, or whether we were prepared to support an adjournment.

Still more amazing, Mr. Speaker, was the statement of my hon. friend who leads this House to-day in coupling the present closure with the closure brought in by the Conservative party in 1913. I want to point out to this House, and particularly to my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough (Mr. Macdonald)—who I am sorry to see has left the chamber because he needs a little light on some of these important questions—the difference between the situation that existed then and that which confronts us to-day. Some one has argued that the closure measure of a few years ago was the reason why we had a closure motion before parliament to-day. But, Mr. Speaker, to mention the closure of that time in comparison with the closure measure of to-day is nothing short of an insult to the intelligence of the Canadian people. Who is there in Canada that does not know that unpreparedness for war cost Canada untold millions in treasure and many thousands of priceless lives? The Conservative party believed in 1913 that there was danger, and serious danger, and hence our naval proposals were brought before parliament. We were met with the argument that our naval proposals were submitted to the House under false pretences, that we had put in the mouth of His Royal Highness the Governor General assertions that were absolutely unfounded in fact, when we placed in the Speech from the Throne the assertion that a condition of things existed in Great Britain which made it imperative that the naval forces of the empire should at once be strengthened. On this line of argument parliament was kept in session for days and months until the government were finally obliged to bring down a closure measure. Unfortunately for Canada, the Liberal Senate defeated our naval proposals, and for so doing Liberal senators and the Liberal party in Canada received the applause of the enemies of Great Britain and her dominions. I should like to support that statement by an extract from one of the leading papers in Germany, which, dealing with our proposals at that time, said:

> Whatever may be decided upon later, the actual decision of the Canadian Senate means at any rate a heavy moral and material loss for the defence of the empire, for Mr. Borden's promise has been foolishly enough counted on. His offer made an enormous impression on the whole world. Mr. Churchill pointed out this fact, especially in the well-known memorandum of the admiralty. This impression will not only be destroyed, but people will everywhere obtain the conviction that England cannot depend on such help from her colonies. "By rivals and enemies," says the Morning Post to-day, "the decision will be eagerly welcomed. By friends it will be regarded as ominous." The impression must inevitably be created that the solidarity of the empire is a myth, and that those powers which would like to see the overthrow of British naval supremacy need not be discouraged in their efforts by the thought that their challenge would be met by the united resources of the Mother Country and of every one of the daughter states.—

Those were the conditions, Mr. Speaker, under which we brought down our naval proposals to parliament, and in connection with which closure was introduced, and no one will say that those conditions are at all comparable with the conditions to-day.

Before I conclude, I want to address a word or two to my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke), who was good enough to speak of conditions in the province of Manitoba, from which I come. I want to tell the hon. member for Brandon that as long as he lives he will never again sit for a constituency in the province of Manitoba in this parliament of Canada. Notwithstanding the combined support that he had in the last election, with the Liberal party united with the so-called Progressive party, his majority under those conditions was rather limited, and it will be entirely wiped out upon the next occasion.

Let me bring to the attention of the House a statement made by the Prime Minister in respect to his majority in the last House, and I bring this forward simply because it accounts to some extent for the atmosphere that is to be found in certain quarters of this parliament. The Prime Minister is reported as follows:

"If I went out for dinner, my majority of one was gone." When he formed his administration, however, he felt he would get sufficient assistance from the other side of the House to enable him to carry on. There is an indemnity of $4,000 and he thought the Progressives would think twice before they voted against it.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the Prime Minister had in his mind when he said that, but he said something more. The question was asked him:

What about the Progressives helping you?

And Mr. King replied:

Let me answer that clearly. When the Progressives take the attitude that they will support us when we do what they want, and we can go to blazes when we do not, you cannot get very far that way. You cannot get anything done in parliament under those conditions.

Now let me read something that my hon. friend from Brandon had to say in respect to the Prime Minister. Speaking in the city of Regina on September 7, 1925, he said:

The Prime Minister Mr. Mackenzie King, is urging the western provinces to send to parliament numerous representatives as members of his party caucus on the ground that that would be the best method of obtaining the necessary changes in government policy. This proposal is an invitation to keep his party in office, and in return to receive such reforms as the party caucus may concede. The irrefutable answer to his plea is written in the record of his party, whose recurring failures to redeem his election promises and to implement his political platforms are matters of public record.

Just one more reference, and this is a statement made by the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King, who, speaking at Moose Jaw on September 30, said:

The Progressives had an opportunity to elect a government in 1921, but in 1925 they had no such chance. Consequently there was no reason for waste of votes on them. Why waste time and effort on a party that can't form an administration? Mr. Crerar admitted the Progressives could be only a sectional party. Other leaders were abandoning them. The light of Mr. Forke was the flickering torch of Liberalism. All the influence he wielded came from association with other parties in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker, the flickering light of the torch of the hon. member for Brandon has grown strong in the interests of the Liberal party in this parliament. He is as certain to vote Liberal as my hon. friend from Antigonish-Guysborough; he is quite as safe, quite as sure; he always has been, and always will be. But that is his business, and not ours. I simply want this parliament to know the facts and to understand the conditions. The information may be helpful to hon. gentlemen opposite, and I hope they will take full advantage of it.

I am told my time is up. In conclusion, let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the time is not far distant when we shall find hon. gentlemen opposite in the position to which they were relegated by the electors of this Dominion on the 29th of October last.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, twenty minutes is not a very long period in which to make a defence, if defence were needed—and I do not think any defence is required—of the action of the government in calling parliament and the steps it has taken since that date. One could not help being interested in the debate that was being carried on in this House although a great deal of it consisted of severe criticism of the government of to-day, criticism that was unwarranted, in my opinion, and that at times descended to what I would call back-door or back-yard discussion, rather than that of gentlemen in this House of Commons. Let me rehearse very briefly why parliament was summoned. The leader of the House (Mr. Lapointe) gave us a resumé this afternoon of the reasons for convening parliament. It was convened for one primary purpose that the opposition have consistently, in and out of season, ignored, and that was to establish whether or not the opposition or the government who are now in office were to carry on the business of the country. The acting leader of the government enumerated this afternoon the various steps that were taken. The newspapers of the country made very clear to the members who were assembling the purpose for which they were coming, and hon. gentlemen opposite acquiesced to a very large extent in the arrangement that was made for the purpose of establishing what should be done in a critical situation such as this. But there is one thing that the oppostion have not learned and that I doubt they ever will learn, namely, that there are changing conditions in this Canada of ours and that those new conditions must be met. They fail to realize that those conditions have arrived already.

What is the situation? We, of course, in order to carry out the traditions of parliament had to bring down the Speech from the Throne, and an opportunity was given to hon. gentlemen to discuss it. A motion was placed on the order paper for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not parliament would vote a recess to enable the government to carry on the by-elections necessary to fill vacancies in the cabinet. What has happened since then? Notwithstanding the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite desisted from discussing the Speech from the Throne and sat silent for three days accusing the government of the day of obstruction, they saw fit to thwart the expressed will of parliament when it voted and carried by a majority the motion for the adjournment of this House until the 15th March. By no process of reasoning, by no camouflage, can they make members of the House or the people of the country believe that from that date to the present they have not been obstructing the clear will of parliament. I am satisfied, after watching affairs very closely, that is exactly the position in which the opposition find themselves to-day. There is no doubt they have made it difficult for the government to fill up the treasury benches; but this government will fill the treasury benches, will be ready on the 15th of this month, and will bring down its programme of legislation. This government will from time to time fill up the treasury benches and it will carry on the affairs of this country so long as it has a majority in this House.

The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has complained that the committee that are investigating the customs charges cannot function. The government are not preventing that committee from functioning; the members are perfectly willing to sit, and only for eight days will there be any break if there is a break at all in the investigation that is going on. The government are anxious and willing for this investigation to go on and have nothing to hide in connection with it. If there are guilty people who happen to be attached to the civil service of this country or in the government, let them be punished. This government will move neither hand nor foot to prevent a full and complete investigation. We welcome it and we hope hon. gentlemen opposite are as anxious and ready to welcome this investigation as the government of to-day are.

The leader of the opposition also challenges us in respect of the Rouyn railway. What is wrong with the process that brought about the construction of that railway? He knows perfectly well when he challenges us, as other hon. gentlemen know, that except under the authority of a vote of parliament we cannot construct railways in the western provinces because the act does not permit that. The act specifies only that the government of the day have authority to proceed in Quebec and the Maritime provinces with respect to railways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about the Lockeport line and the Guysborough line?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have not time to deal with them but there are a few things I want to say about the Rouyn railway. If my right hon. friend wants to investigate the Rouyn railway ample opportunity will be given him to investigate every phase of it to the utmost extremity. He knows quite well that it is his privilege to investigate that or any other railway. There is a committee of the House for that purpose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How can this House—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have only twenty minutes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member not permit a question?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will not. I have only twenty minutes to speak and I have a number of things to say to my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will not do any good.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Perhaps it will do some good before I get through. As this railway transaction has been challenged by some of the most eminent members of the legal profession in this House, I have gone to some trouble to ascertain whether anything illegal has been done in connection with it, and I am free to say to hon. gentlemen that not a single thing illegal has been done and, further, that we shall welcome the fullest kind of investigation. The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) challenged the contract by saying that an arrangement had been entered into with the Noranda mines that they had never been called upon to fulfil. I have not time to go into that. He also challenged the fact that 30 per cent of the proceeds of the railway line were to be applied to the Rouyn railway. There is nothing unusual in that. The arrangement in respect to the Quebec and St. John railway is on the basis of from 40 to 60 per cent and the arrangement with respect to the Vermont Central and the old Grand Trunk is on a basis of 40 to 60 per cent. Therefore if anything is wrong with this it is to the credit of the negotiators who carried through the deal. Very little has been said about the contract in connection with that railway. Seven or eight contractors bid on unit prices and the contract was let to the lowest bidder. I should like to have time to go into this railway question to-day because the contract is manifestly fair to the people of this country and the Canadian National Railways who will profit by the arrangement that has been made. Moreover, the Quebec government is putting up a guarantee of $250,000 which will be paid at the rate of $50,000 a year for five years. No, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing wrong with the Rouyn railway in any particular. The whole transaction was carried out legally for the purpose of reserving to the Canadian National railway business that was rightfully theirs rather than diverting it from that railway to competing lines which are not entitled to that business.

It is rather a strange coincidence that the Canadian National Railways should be the institution that is constantly being picked out by hon. gentlemen opposite for criticism. Why? Are they not satisfied with public ownership? Are they not satisfied with the administration of Sir Henry Thornton? I can point to the press of the country that supports them which is entirely satisfied with Sir Henry Thornton and his management. Something was said the other day with respect to his administration in connection with building golf links and installing radios in passenger cars on trains running across the country. That railway is progressing; it is making headway. Let it be to the eternal credit of this government that they were able to discover a man of the calibre of Sir Henry Thornton who has done away with the deficits, to say nothing of meeting the fixed charges, until to-day he is in the proud position of having a balance of $32,000,000 over and above his operating expenses, and points with pride to a period not less than three years away when this country will be able to say that the National Railways have reached a point where they are able to pay their way and have become a great asset to the people of Canada. Continual carping and criticism of the Canadian National Railways, the first venture in public ownership of people of Canada and one that we all devoutly hope will be a splendid success, comes with poor grace from hon. gentlemen opposite.

Many things have been said in criticism of this government. Why, hon. gentlemen have been talking about their campaigns, the addresses they gave to the electors, and the Lord knows what. I do not wonder that some of the electors were bewildered and befuddled, if hon. members gave them the kind of addresses we have heard delivered in this House during the last four weeks. The Creator has been called upon to witness all the rascality and impotency that these hon. gentlemen have attributed to this government. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) has called this a ramshackle government. I want to point out a few of the things we have been able to do, and one of the things we are particularly proud of is the success of the Canadian National Railways. Then the right hon. leader of the opposition and his associates have been going up and down the country claiming that this government have made no reduction in taxation. I challenge the leader of the opposition, and I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to deny that within the last four years we have reduced taxation by $112,000,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, no.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, we have, Mr. Speaker. I challenge hon. gentlemen to deny it. Do you ever hear them speak about it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Am I challenged? The minister said he challenged me.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The hon. member will have his chance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I will not.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I make that statement and I make it advisedly, and I will go further. Statements have been made about the reduction of the debt of the United States. I say that per capita the government of Canada have been able to reduce the taxation of the country to a greater extent than has even the far-famed President Coolidge.

Mr. LADNER: Where are the reductions?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend asks: where are the reductions? I shall be glad to give him details of the reductions when the time comes in connection with the budget.

Mr. LADNER: The income tax?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I quite understand that hon. gentlemen opposite do not like these statements.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Because they are not true. That is the reason we don't like them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Because they are not true?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will be glad to prove my statements to the satisfaction of my hon. friend, though that will be a pretty hard job, I admit. I will tell my hon. friend something more. The total disbursements per capita in Canada show a steady decline. They are as follows:

	Per head
1922..	$51 85
1924..	40 16
1925..	37 53

Is not that a reduction?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about the railway debt?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is always anxious to drag in the railway. The railway debt, as he knows, has been segregated by the government and kept in a separate item.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And he will drag it in and compare it with a period when we were not operating the railways at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Absolutely, I have heard him, and have read his speeches.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Never.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Let me give the House one or two figures with respect to this matter.

We have heard a great deal about Australia, and what it costs for government there, and how much they have reduced the cost in Great Britain and in the United States. I think the people are entitled to know where we stand in that respect and what the total taxes in the country are. My hon. friend leading the opposition to-day gave the figures as of a year ago, and I propose to give them as of to-day and I propose from this time on to repeat this statement, because hon. gentlemen opposite never think of these figures, pass them up if they can, and give us fictitious figures instead. The figures are as follows:

	Taxes
	Canada	Australia	Great Britain	United States
Federal	37.62	42.26	79.00	29.22
Provincial ..	5.16	15.86	....	8.51
Municipal ..	23.33	11.56	18.12	29.66
Totals.. ..	66.11	69.68	97.12	67.39

I commend these figures to the consideration of hon. members opposite and ask them to check them carefully; if they do they will find them correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, they are not correct.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What else has the government done? Have you ever heard any members of the opposition telling you how the Canadian dollar had risen in value since the government came into office? Not very often.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about the Brazilian dollar?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The Brazilian dollar has nothing to do with it. I am talking about the Canadian dollar. May I refer to the trade returns? Hon. members boast very much about the trade returns, and they boasted about the trade returns during the war period. The war is over and in the balance of trade Canada in 1921 was $29,000,000 to the bad, as were the Canadian National Railways, under the leadership of the hon. gentleman who sits opposite. What are they to-day? In 1922, we had $6,000,000 on the right side of the ledger. In 1923, we had $142,000,000 in our favour, in 1924, $165,000,000 in our favour, and in 1925 we had $392,831,447 in our favour.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about 1920?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There was a fair balance in that year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Bigger than ever my hon. friend had.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, for the simple reason, as my hon. friends know, it was the end of the war period and there was need of a great deal of shipping for reconstruction in France and elsewhere. My hon. friend will not deny it. If he were the leader of the government to-day how proudly he would point to those figures. He would make the very roof ring with exultation at what his government had been able to do. How delighted he would be to exhibit a record such as this, because he cannot show it in any government he ever had the honour to lead. Some hon. member on the other side of the House, I think one of the members for Ottawa, was depicting the terrible straits to which the government had reduced the country by the treaties it had negotiated. It is not necessary to discuss the Australian treaty and all the dire things the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) said about it. He declared we should have a brick for brick tariff on agricultural products. I would advise the hon. gentleman to examine the figures. His tariff, he thinks, would suit us admirably and would bring back all the people who have gone from Canada to the United States, but I would point out that with four exceptions there are heavier duties on agricultural products coming into Canada than on those going into the United States.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What are they for?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I will give them. I commend that statement to my hon. friend's attention. If he looks up the tariff he will find that the tariff on onions is higher, and that the tariff on butter and eggs is also higher. We have the single exception of wheat which does not count at all. Some hon. gentleman said the other night that we imported flour—the idea of a country like Canada importing flour! Of course, we do; very small quantities, it is true, but we import almost every commodity into Canada.

I will not go into the details of the Australian treaty, but I might tell my hon. friend, notwithstanding the statement he made the other day that the treaty would have a disastrous effect on butter as marketed by the farmers to-day, that in the city of Ottawa butter is dearer at the present time than it has ever been since 1920, and my hon. friend was in office at that time. The member for South Oxford tells us that there are millions of pounds of butter coming from New Zealand and Australia and that some cheese has arrived in his constituency, but apparently it has not depressed the price of our own product.

We are warranted in taking the position we do with respect to closure on this occasion. We are warranted in sustaining parliament when parliament decided by a majority vote in this House that a certain procedure should be taken. That is our answer to the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) as to why at this moment closure is applied. It is applied because they and their followers have been attempting to defy the will of parliament clearly expressed.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): As I have barely twenty minutes in which to address the House I shall not endeavour to cover completely the speech of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), but there are a couple of points in that speech to which I should like to refer for a moment if I may.

In the first place the minister, in regard to the Rouyn railway, suggested that we could investigate the matter in this House or in a committee of the House. I submit however that as this railway was incorporated as a private concern in the province of Quebec we can do nothing of the sort. A fact that has often struck me is this, that invariably in this House, the shadier the deal the more certain is it that my hon. friend will be put up to defend it. As I said last year, the hon. gentleman looks more respectable than anyone could possibly be in real life; he fairly oozes respectability. Whenever therefore there is a shady deal of any kind to be defended he is always put up on his feet to defend it.

I want to touch one other point mentioned by the minister, and that is in regard to taxation. He said that this government had reduced taxation to a considerable extent. Well, in the first place it has not done so; but even if it had reduced taxation it has cut down business ten times more than it has effected such reduction.

Sir, we have had in the last few hours the amazing and amusing spectacle of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who has been described by his admirers and his followers as the tribune of the people, the apostle of Liberalism, the defender of free speech, rising in his place and clamping closure on the debate which has been going on, notwithstanding that this procedure has been condemned not only by him, as my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) has pointed out, but by most hon. gentlemen opposite, as an infamous gag, an instrument of autocracy, gag law, and generally as the quintessence of Tory autocracy. Yet, as I watched the vote being taken, the only hon. gentleman who had the decency to blush, as supporters of the government one after another swallowed themselves once more, was my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon), a gentleman who probably blushes as little as any hon. member in this House.

This act of closure is, Mr. Speaker, the culminating act of a series of humiliating retractions, of flagrant violations of promises, and of a wholesale swallowing of so-called Liberal principles on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. I remember that as a boy I once went to a circus where I saw the performance of a sword swallower, but the ability of that man to swallow swords was nothing compared to the ability of this government to swallow its principles and its promises. The government has long since cast aside practically every one of its professed principles, just as it has broken all its promises; and now this last flimsy principle among all the principles of Liberalism, namely, the principle of free speech, of which hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken so much, the government has sacrificed on the same altar at which they are all worshipping to-day, the altar of power at any price, even the price of Canada itself.

We have had for four years the spectacle of a government recanting all its promises and its principles. Let me mention a few of these recantations. The tariff plank of 1919 is burned; Senate reform, of which hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken so much from one end of Canada to the other, is forgotten; national economy, of which they have made a great boast, has been replaced by the political pork barrel; trusts, combines and mergers, of which Mr. Mackenzie King and Mr. Murdock talked so much, are merely given a new title,—they are now called monopolies by land and sea; the cost of living, over which Mr. Mackenzie King has literally fumed for the past seven or eight years, has gone up instead of down; free speech is now wiped out by closure; and national unity is eliminated, sacrificed on the same altar. Why, speaking of national unity, it seems to me almost a sacrilege for some of my hon. friends opposite, although by no means all of them, to use this phrase at all after the very wicked and vile methods which were adopted in the province of Quebec by some of them in the last election, methods which showed that they were more anxious to defeat my right hon. leader than they were to advocate such policies and defend such principles as they knew were vital to the prosperity of the people of that province. And the result of these various recantations to which I have alluded has been that we have had serious business depression in this country, marked unemployment, and an appalling exodus of our population such as we have never before experienced in the history of Canada. So much are these facts recognized by the people of the Dominion that on October 29 the government was overwhelmingly defeated, the Prime Minister and eight of his ministers being completely rejected. The Liberal party had 200,000 votes less than this party, and to-day in this House they have fifteen members fewer than we have on this side. At the present time four provinces in this great Dominion are without representation in the cabinet, and we have the humiliating spectacle of the province of Ontario, the greatest province in Canada both in point of wealth and in the matter of population, without a single minister in the government, while the little province of Saskatchewan has a representation of three. Yet the Minister of Justice declared a few minutes ago that we were obstructing parliament. Why, Mr. Speaker, the government has been guilty of a far more serious obstruction than the obstruction of parliament, even if that charge were true in respect of this party: the government has obstructed the will of the people. That is what my hon. friends opposite have done. We have obstructed, it is true, but we have obstructed not any business of parliament—there has been no business before parliament to be obstructed—but the efforts of the government to vote itself a holiday.

What was the reply of the people on October 29 to the Speech which had been delivered by the Right Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King at Richmond Hill, in which, for a few brief moments, he played the part of a sportsman, when he declared that he would not come back to parliament and attempt to carry on unless he was in a better position from a parliamentary standpoint than he had been in the past to implement the promises he had made the country? What was the reply of the people to that speech? Their reply was to wipe out altogether not only the Prime Minister himself but his ministers in the province of Ontario and in various other parts of the country as well. Yet to-day, in face of this unequivocal verdict of the people on October 29, Mr. Mackenzie King says that he is going to carry through a great deal of legislation forecast in the Speech from the Throne,—a Speech which, by the way, ought never to have been introduced at all if the government had been really sincere in its announcement that parliament would meet merely for the purpose of ascertaining what party should govern.

Mr. Mackenzie King had in the last parliament, between 1921 and 1925, 80 per cent of the members of the House of Commons, including the sixty-five Progressives who voted in support of the government on every vital occasion. What is the situation to-day? To-day he has, including the three or four groups outside the Conservatives, only 53 per cent of the membership. And yet, although in the last parliament, with such support as I have indicated, he found it impossible to go on with the Hudson Bay railway, to give Alberta her resources, to bring in rural credits, to enact the single transferable vote, or to carry out one single promise of all the multitude of promises he had made to every section of the country, to-day he declares his intention of undertaking all or most of these things. If he could not fulfil any of these promises or institute any of these policies with 80 per cent of the membership of this House, how on earth is he going to do so with 53 per cent of the members? If he could not carry on with majorities ranging from 77 to 116 between 1921 and 1925, figures which I have taken the trouble to verify, how will he carry on with majorities of from 1 to 10 as they have had this session? That very fact, Mr. Speaker, that his majorities to-day range between 1 and 10, is the most outstanding proof that we were absolutely right in saying that he and his party were indisputably defeated in the country on October 29.

The present situation would be a laughable and hilarious farce were it not so tragical from the standpoint of the people of this Dominion. Notwithstanding all this, however, the hon. member for Brandon gets up in this House and votes for closure in order to keep this ragged remnant of a government in power, this alleged government which since coming into office has broken every promise it ever made to western Canada itself. My hon. friend (Mr. Forke) is apparently still willing and happy to accept that same useless coin, that same gold brick which he got from Mr. Mackenzie King in the past. In other words, Sir, his political partisanship is so strong that he prefers to see Mr. Mackenzie King in power rather than see the policies carried out which he stands for in the west. His independence, Mr. Speaker, is only a mask, and everybody knows it is only a mask, just as they know that Mr. Mackenzie King has been the greatest failure as a political leader that this country has ever produced; just as they know that he has been the greatest master of political dodgery in the history of the Dominion, so much so that to-day, instead of being spoken of in many circles as the leader of the Liberal party, he is spoken of as its misleader.

Now, what are the purposes of this closure motion that the hon. member for Brandon so loyally supported a little while ago. It is true we put on closure in the past on important questions such as the naval policy of the Dominion, the Canadian Northern railway purchase, and the railway incorporation. But those were all important questions. What are the purposes, I ask again, of this closure motion? They were mentioned by my leader, but I shall enumerate them again. The first is a desire for a holiday—that the members of this government may go home and laugh in peace and quiet at the country which they are betraying instead of serving. The other purpose is to close up the customs investigation, which of course will help all the lawbreakers, the smugglers, the thugs and the thieves to join them in their laugh at the expense of the people. And yet my hon. friend from Brandon stands up and trails along behind them with a large portion of his group. By his attitude he aids and abets those purposes, in fact, to use a term current among lawyers, he is an accomplice before the fact in this case.

We also are tired of the debate; we are tired of the way in which things have been dragging along while we have been trying to spur this government into action, but we felt it a duty we owed to the committee appointed by this House to keep members sitting here in order that we might at least give them moral support in their investigation of the charges made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) who is endeavouring honourably and honestly to save tens of millions of dollars that the people are now being robbed of by those who are breaking our customs laws.

I well remember, Sir, a book I read many years ago by Victor Hugo, in which he describes a man whose cheeks when a boy had been slit by some human monster so that the poor fellow appeared always to be grinning from ear to ear, and he was exhibited throughout Europe as the "laughing man." Well, to my mind this is nothing more than a laughing government. We have had the House sitting for almost two months with the members on this side, as my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior said, telling the government their faults and their failures in every accent from every section of the country. What have we had in reply? Nothing but laughter. Certainly no defence because there is none; our accusations are true. This attitude of laughing instead of acting is in keeping with the whole record of the government for the past four years or more. Why do I say that, Mr. Speaker? Because they have laughed at everything worth while that has been proposed. They laughed first at the promises of Mr. Mackenzie King, their own leader—they laughed at the platform of 1919; then they laughed at the people for allowing themselves to be duped by that platform and the promises of Mr. Mackenzie King; they laughed at the appalling unemployment of our Canadian working people; they laughed at the appalling exodus of our Canadian-born; they laughed at a real Canadian policy of "Canada for Canadians" which we tried to persuade them to adopt; they laughed at our proposal to inaugurate a national fuel policy—to use Canadian coal on Canadian railways, and Canadian coal in Canadian homes; they laughed at our policy of using Canadian-made products rather than imported goods; they laughed at all our great national problems instead of trying to solve them; and finally, Mr. Speaker, they have been laughing at the people of Canada ever since October 29, when the electorate gave a verdict against them, which verdict they have been ever since ignoring instead of accepting.

An hon. MEMBER: We are laughing at you.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MANION: I do not know the concealed gentleman who says he is laughing at me.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Interruptions from outside the House are not allowed.

Mr. MANION: I agree with you, Mr. Speaker; interruptions from behind a curtain are the "courageous" remarks that some type of men like to make. Now, in their laughter at all the various propositions that have been put before them and which I have just enumerated, the government will be joined by all the thieves and thugs and smugglers who will thus get a respite, because the Customs committee cannot function properly unless the House is sitting. They are going to get a temporary or permanent respite because, I repeat, the Customs committee cannot deal effectively with any recalcitrant witnesses unless they have at least the moral support of the House.

But I want to remind the government of the old saying—those who laugh last laugh best. And the people are going to have a last laugh, because ultimately they are going to rid themselves for all time of this odious government; they are going to send Mr. Mackenzie King and the member for Brandon—as mentioned by the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) a moment ago—and a number of their friends to that place where weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth prevails instead of laughter. Sir, at one time in the English House of Commons a leader was impeached if he took a vicious or disloyal attitude that was detrimental to the country, which he was supposed to serve. I think the last impeachment took place about a hundred and fifty years ago. It seems to me it is quite possible we may have to re-establish that old practice in Canada, should it be the only way open to us to get rid of a Prime Minister whose mind is impervious to any realization of defeat and whose character is impervious to any appreciation of fair play and sportsmanship—a man who is so impervious to this quality that he is to-day retaining the reins of power long after the people have shown him that they recognize the failure he is, long after they have shown him that they no longer retain any confidence in him.

Closure at this time and under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, simply adds another to the long list of charges against this makeshift of a government, and it is going to be only another reason why the people will amply revenge themselves when the time comes against an administration which has been such a failure in grappling with the great national questions that urgently demand attention. Mr. King and some of his political accomplices will be sent to the political wilderness directly the people get an opportunity. That opportunity will come shortly, and when it does come, the people will correct the error they made during the last election under the impression that the province of Quebec was voting on the issues of the day.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): You have your chance out in Regina.

Mr. MANION: I will probably be out there myself before long to help my party. I hope so. The people will try to correct the error they made in thinking the province of Quebec was voting on the issues of the day instead of against an old conscription law that has long been obsolete, and against an imaginary Turkish war. My hon. friend speaks of Regina. Well, I notice that the Prime Minister goes to Prince Albert; he does not dare open a constituency nearer home. This great province of Ontario, as large in area and as important in population and resources as any other three, or probably four, provinces, with the exception of the province of Quebec, is to-day in the disgraceful position, from the standpoint of the government, of having no representative in the cabinet. The Prime Minister goes to Saskatchewan to get a seat, but he did not dare open any in the province of Ontario. When the next election comes, no matter what happens in the province of Quebec—and what I have said of that great province is not in derogation of it, for I have the greatest respect for its people, but I have little respect for some of the Liberal leaders who have misled them—I say, that in the next election, no matter what way the people of Quebec vote, their fellow-citizens throughout the rest of the Dominion are going to raise up such a hurricane of indignation against this government as will sweep out Mr. Mackenzie King, the member for Brandon and his other supporters and sweep into power the Liberal-Conservative party.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: I hear one of my hon friends laughing somewhat loudly at that. I do not wish to be offensive, but there was a poet some time ago who referred to "The loud laugh that spoke the vacant mind." I say that, I repeat, with no desire to be offensive in any way. I repeat that the electors are going to put into power the Liberal-Conservative party, standing for a stable tariff policy for all the people of this country; for a sane, economical railway policy; for a lower taxation policy and for a progressive immigration policy in Canada. Those policies are the foundation stones upon which the greatness of Canada must be built, and they must be held together by the cement of fair dealing between the different sections of Canada. The country knows that this government will not put those policies into effect; the country knows also that those policies are absolutely necessary. With the exception of the government itself, everyone knows that this is what we must have in order that we may join up with those advancing, progressive and prosperous nations in other parts of the world.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): In rising to make a few remarks on this occasion, Mr. Speaker, I do so with the view of justifying my actions in this House during this session of parliament.

An hon. MEMBER: It cannot be done.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Possibly not in the eyes of some people, but it can in the eyes of the electors whom I have the honour to represent. I am not concerned with what the Liberals said against or in favour of the closure; I am concerned with the conditions as they exist to-day, and I say that if the electors of this country are going to be subjected to obstruction in this House for weeks and weeks, consisting largely of reiteration of what happened during the campaign, of what the political leaders said or did not say during the campaign, or what they said that they should not have said, I am afraid the electors will lose confidence in our parliamentary institutions.

What is the duty of a member? The first duty of a member is to his electors, in my opinion. When we came down here no party had an absolute majority over the others, and we had to consider what course we should follow; we had to form a plan of action in order to be true to the principles upon which we were elected. I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, the principles upon which I was elected. I was elected to come down here to force the two parties which have existed since confederation to put their promises into effect. I happened to be in Montreal two or three weeks ago, and while there a man said to me, "What do you wild westerners want?" To which I replied: "We want what both political parties have been promising us for the last twenty-five years." Is it too much to expect? That is what I ask. The Hudson Bay railway; rural credits; the return of their natural resources to the western provinces—those are all in the Speech from the Throne, and those are the promises made by both political parties for years, on public platforms, in this House and everywhere else.

We came down here and the government presented His Excellency's Speech. The return of the natural resources to Alberta was mentioned in that Speech; the completion of the Hudson Bay railway was mentioned, as well as the question of rural credits. What is left for us to do? I am not partial; I am not here to defend the Liberal party or praise the Conservative party; I am here to defend my actions and I can defend them before my electors.

What was there to do? The Speech from the Throne was drafted by the government, because it was presented by the government. The Speech from the Throne was acceptable to the Progressives and they voted against the amendment of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen). The Independent members also accepted the Speech from the Throne in voting against that amendment. The right hon. leader of the opposition accepted the Speech from the Throne, because in moving his amendment he used the words "that the following be added," and my understanding is that when you add anything you accept what is already there. My knowledge of English may be limited, but that is my understanding of the word "add" and I do not think anyone who understands the English language can take any other meaning from it. Then, if the government accepts the Speech from the Throne; if we accept it and the leader of the opposition accepts it, what is there for us to do? Have we done anything wrong? Where is the bribe? I have not seen any bribe, and I do not know of any. I have acted according to my conscience and according to the expressed desire of my electors. That has been my only ambition in this House and will be my only ambition as long as I have the honour to represent a constituency in this parliament.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I said some two years ago, and I repeated it in this present parliament, that the speeches should be curtailed to the shortest possible time. I am rather glad to see this closure; I would like to see closure applied quite often when there is obstruction, and I think the government would be justified—if they are going to be a government—in showing some backbone and saying, "We are here with certain measures which we have mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, and the moment obstruction looms up we are going to put on the closure." That is the stand I would take, whether the right hon. leader of the opposition headed the government, or whether the present government remained in power. The people expect results, and not wind; three, four and five hour speeches are going to cause people to be disgusted with the members of parliament and with our parliamentary institutions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is just one remark the hon. member for Rainy River made which I think he will correct at the first opportunity. He said that the Progressives voted with the government during the last parliament and during the last session. I want to be fair, and I am sure that if the hon. member will look up the records he will find that he and his party voted with the Liberals to defeat the Progressives oftener than we voted with the Liberals.

Mr. MANION: Will my hon. friend permit me an interruption? The hon. gentleman forgets that I said "on all vital matters." And may I add, just in a word, on all matters where there was any doubt of the government carrying the vote.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I will leave it at that, and I say again that the Conservatives voted oftener with the Liberals than the Progressives did. I mention this because I am sure the hon. member for Rainy River wants to be fair, as he is always fair.

Mr. HEENAN: Will the hon. member permit an interruption? The hon. member designates the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) as the member for Rainy River, and the hon. member for Fort William evidently desires to be the member for Rainy River, and accepts that designation. I would just like to correct that error.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am very glad of the correction.

Mr. MANION: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am sorry. The hon. member (Mr. Manion) represented Rainy River last year, which was the reason for my error. It is a good thing to change a constituency sometimes.

Now Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay the House any longer. In closing I appeal to the government and to every member of this House: when the House meets again on March 15, let us have a programme.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I mean a programme of legislation; let the government present the legislation. I may make a slip in the use of a word once in a while; I did not mean that exactly. It does a man good, Mr. Speaker, to see the opposition laugh, because they have been so solemn the last few days that one would think they had a funeral on hand. In fact, the Manitoba Free Press stated that the committee of strategy of the Conservative party was in distress. I wonder if the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) has received an S.O.S. call from them, and whether he has sent relief?

Let us forget our political strife. Let us try to work in harmony, because it is the only way we can get anywhere. If hon. members are going to rehash that old political stuff across the floor of this House, the country is going to suffer, and the members who are here are going to suffer at the next election.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. E. M. MACDONALD (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to occupy very much of the time of the House in discussing whether or not the closure rule should be applied at this stage of the debate. I am sure every hon. member realizes that the debate on the Address has already occupied an unprecedented time; that every subject possible has been brought to the attention of the House by hon. members who have spoken, and that there is no justification or reason why the House should be further delayed from proceeding at the proper time to take into consideration the government programme and to have it crystallized into legislation.

Hon. gentlemen who spoke this afternoon said that this resolution should not be adopted, first, because it only meant that there was going to be a holiday. It will not be any holiday for the government; we expect that every day between now and the fifteenth instant will be taken up in serious consideration, in meetings of council, of the legislation which we propose to submit immediately after parliament resumes its sittings. That legislation which is stated in the Speech from the Throne will be made ready at the earliest possible day for the consideration of the House.

It has been suggested that the committee which has been working so steadily will have its operations interrupted. I have had a long experience in connection with investigating and other committees and such a suggestion is purely imaginary. If the committee continues to sit as it has been doing during the past weeks, there will be seven days on which it will sit between now and the 15th of March. Up to the present there has been no refusal on the part of any witness to answer questions put by the committee and there is no indication of any such disposition on the part of any witness who has been summoned. My hon. friends know very well that in accordance with the practice that has existed for all time in parliament, the plenary power of parliament to deal with persons who refuse to answer questions extends to detention only during the sitting of the House, so that this theory that the committee is to be hampered in any way is a delusion and a figment of the imagination put forward solely to formulate some excuse for further delaying the business of this country.

My right hon. friend is worried because we have applied to him and his colleagues a weapon which he placed in the rules of the House. Why should we not do so? In 1913 that rule was placed there in the form of an amendment to the rules by my right hon. friend in the midst of a debate on a certain subject. That amendment to the rules was not made after full consideration of the rules at the proper time, but the government of the day, intervening in the debate which was before the House, framed the rule and had it passed by the majority at that time. It is an accepted situation not only in Canada but in every English-speaking parliamentary body that where obstruction exists or appears in the form in which it appears in this House, that rule should be invoked in the public interest in order that the business of the country may be carried on.

I turn my attention to a matter which has been discussed frequently by my colleagues from the Maritime provinces; and for various reasons I want to refer to that question as it has been presented by some of my hon. friends. The matter first came to the attention of the House when the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith) delivered an address early in the debate and quoted what he said was the bill of rights of the Maritime provinces, the first one being:

> The restoration of the integrity of the Intercolonial railway, with the western terminus of the system re-established at Montreal.

It will be noted that my hon. friend is not very clear in his statement whether or not it is intended that the Intercolonial should be detached altogether from the Canadian National and run by the government as a separate entity, or whether it should be run as one of the divisions of the Canadian National Railways. The difference between the two is very important and it is desirable that it should be defined in order that the House may recognize it. I understand my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) is opposed to either of those things being done. As a Maritime man I believe the Fathers of Confederation, when they placed in the British North America Act provision for the construction of what was known as the Intercolonial railway, intended that that railway should be operated for all time in regard to both through and local rates in the interest of the Maritime provinces on account of the fact that they were distant from the central part of Canada. I know for fifty years this parliament and public men on both sides of politics have recognized that as being the manner under which that railway should be operated, and it was so operated until 1918. I have under my hand the order in council, passed on the 20th November, 1918, which took that railway away from the position which it then occupied, by which they removed Mr. Hays and Mr. Brady, who were general managers respectively of the eastern and western lines and the order proceeds:

> And His Excellency the Governor General in Council, is further pleased to order and declare that the persons, from time to time comprising the Board of Directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, shall be and they are hereby appointed a Board of Management of the Canadian Government railways, and are hereby given the powers vested in the General Manager under the general regulations of the Canadian Government Railways adopted by order in Council of the 22nd January, 1914, (P.G. 184).

Mr. Hanna came in and took charge of the railways, and by a subsequent order in December the name of the company was changed and these directors were styled the Canadian National Railway directors. My hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Cantley) became one of the directors of the railway in conjunction with Mr. Hanna, and my hon. friend from Pictou and Mr. Hanna brought into effect these railway rates which have been in existence, with some amendments, since that date. All these rates in force on the Canadian Government railways to-day, so far as they apply to the Maritime provinces, were brought into effect when my hon. friend for Pictou was one of the directors of the company. In order that there might be no doubt about that, I wired to Mr. Dalrymple, the chief traffic manager and vice president of the Canadian National, and this is what he said:

> Many changes have been made in downward direction in Maritime rates since 1921 including building material, iron and steel articles, lumber, potatoes, grain and grain products and fertilizers. Rates between Prince Edward Island and mainland have been placed on main line basis; export and import via Halifax placed on St. John basis; reductions in class rates between Maritimes and points west of Montreal.

Those have been made since Mr. Hanna retired and since my hon. friend retired as one of the directors of the company, and since Sir Henry Thornton came in. I did not hear my hon. friend from Pictou, or any of those gentlemen previous to 1921 raising their voices in objection to the system of rates. We hear it now. At the instance of this government at the present time an investigation is going on for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not the discriminatory rates should be removed. For the information of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Quinn), let me state that when his party were in power down to 1921 there was discrimination against St. John and Halifax in favour of American ports in regard to grain passing through Canada. That discrimination was removed two years ago by Sir Henry Thornton, and to-day grain can be carried to Halifax and St. John, although it is a longer distance, at exactly the same rates as to Portland and Boston. That objection has been removed. Last year objection was made to the construction of proper elevator facilities.

Mr. SMITH: Before the hon. gentleman leaves the Intercolonial—

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): I object to interruptions. I have only twenty minutes to speak.

Mr. SMITH: I would like to say—

An hon. MEMBER: Sit down.

An hon. MEMBER: Order, order.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): I am mentioning these facts to show the House that I agree that there are matters to be investigated and considered, but in regard to the question of coal duty I desire to remind my hon. friend that the miners of Cape Breton have passed a resolution objecting to any increase in the coal duties.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: When?

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): Two or three months ago.

Mr. MACDOUGALL: Have you a copy of the resolution?

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): No. My hon. friend knows it was passed just before the beginning of the negotiations with the Besco Company.

[Mr. E. M. Macdonald.]

Mr. MACDOUGALL: I would like to see a copy of the resolution.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): I can get it for my hon. friend. The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis (Mr. Short) addressed the House on the subject of the fisheries down there. I sympathize with him in full in regard to all those matters he mentioned. I think that industry deserves the greatest possible encouragement from all parts of Canada, but it is rather difficult for the government to make people eat fish if they do not want to. However, we are ready to do anything in our power to assist in the transportation of fish and the development of that industry. But let me call attention to a resolution which was passed in the provincial legislature, moved by the Conservative leader, Mr. Corning, on April 23, 1923. I would like to put this resolution on Hansard. I quote a portion of it:

Whereas, the spirit of the confederation compact with respect to the Intercolonial Railway, now a part of the Canadian National Railway system, has been violated and Nova Scotia as a province of Canada is not receiving fair and equitable treatment with respect to freight rates, railway, shipping and other matters on which the province's economic development depends.

And whereas, handicapped by high freight rates and our remoteness from the populous centres of Canada, Nova Scotia cannot compete in Ontario and Quebec with the farm or forest products of those provinces.

And whereas, the markets of Nova Scotia are now being invaded with the surplus farm, dairy, orchard and industrial products of Ontario, Quebec and other provinces which offer no reciprocal markets for the similar products of this province.

And whereas, Nova Scotia as a part of Canada is supporting the policy and practice of heavy protective duties, mainly for the advantage and benefit of the manufacturing and farming communities of Ontario and Quebec thereby increasing the cost of living in this province without any commensurate benefit to our people.

And whereas, Ontario, Quebec and the western provinces are indifferent to the development and use of the Canadian Atlantic ports, and the policy of the Canadian National Railway is diverting Canadian commerce and shipping traffic through foreign ports to the detriment and injury of the Canadian Atlantic ports and at the sacrifice of Canadian economic independence.

And whereas, confederation has hindered the natural development of this province, impairing its markets at home and abroad and compelling increasing thousands of its most thrifty citizens to emigrate to other lands.

And whereas, the burden of taxation, federal and provincial, has become intolerable to the people of Nova Scotia who have to bear their full share of heavy tariff duties and the loss from the operation of huge railway systems, which railways are building up the commerce of American ports at the expense of the Canadian Atlantic ports and the Intercolonial Railway.

And whereas, Nova Scotia if an independent, self-governing British dominion, would be able to protect its farmers, fishermen and industrial workers through tariff measures and trade treaties, thus preserving its home market and furnishing employment to its people and profitable investment for capital and build up the enterprise and population of this province,

Therefore resolved, that in the opinion of this House a vote of the electors of Nova Scotia should be taken by way of referendum for the purpose of ascertaining whether the people of this province favour its withdrawal from confederation and the reconstitution of Nova Scotia as an independent, self-governing British dominion.

That was the Conservative policy in Nova Scotia in 1923. The resolution in amendment moved by the then leader of the government set out the policy of the provincial government, on that subject.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: You drove them to it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): I propose also to put on Hansard the amendment to the Corning resolution adopted the same day by the Nova Scotia legislature:

Whereas it is the declared and well considered policy of the Liberal party in Nova Scotia, while asserting and upholding constitutional rights and the fullest autonomy for the province, to promote and strengthen the unity of our country;

And, whereas, the Liberal party, as the historic party of progress and reform, fought and won the battle of responsible government, against all the odds of privilege and reaction, and as a party opposed to the last resort the unjust terms of confederation forced upon this province, the crippling effects of which still cause unrest, discontent and a strong sense of grievance among the people;

And, whereas, in the opinion of this House, the final adjustment of those terms must be pressed upon the federal government until full justice is secured and ample redress is made;

And, whereas, it has been and is the policy of the Liberal party in Nova Scotia to advocate and support a Customs tariff which bears lightly and equitably upon the people, for the relief of the burden of taxation and the encouragement of trade and industry; and to that end it gave its whole-hearted support and advocacy to the reciprocity agreement of 1911, which beneficent measure for the freedom of trade and the relief of taxation, the Conservative party and its leaders opposed and succeeded in defeating;

And, whereas, that reciprocity agreement, negotiated by a distinguished Nova Scotia statesman and Liberal leader, would have been of immense advantage and benefit to the people of Canada and especially those of this province and would have materially contributed to the amelioration of the difficulties and the removal of the disadvantages imposed upon the industries of Nova Scotia as a constituent part of the Dominion;

And, whereas, this House has already taken active measures to secure concerted Maritime action to the end that discriminations in freight rates, the operation of the Intercolonial Railway in its relation to the commercial and industrial prosperity of Nova Scotia, and the enterprising development of Maritime ports may be speedily adjusted—a consummation there is every reason to anticipate will be accomplished through the new administration at Ottawa which has taken definite steps to restore the constitutional rights of which these provinces were deprived by the former federal government;

Whereas there are growing evidences, under the Liberal administration, of industrial revival and increasing confidence in returning prosperity which is being steadily encouraged and vigorously stimulated by the efficient methods and sympathetic attitude of the federal government toward this section of the Dominion, in its endeavour to administer in an enterprising and successful way the tremendous railway undertaking which it inherited from its predecessor in office;

Therefore resolved that this House, recognizing that the factors which have militated against the complete development of this province, have been and are beyond the control of this legislature, and are largely the outcome and the results of action taken at confederation and of policies pursued thereafter by the Conservative party and its leaders, which the Liberal party opposed and resisted through its representatives and by all constitutional measures, place on record its strong and unshaken faith in the future of Nova Scotia and its confidence in the good will and the earnest desire of the present federal government to co-operate, in the most generous spirit, in safeguarding the rights and promoting the welfare of the people of this province;

Further resolved that this House record its firm determination to maintain, as its paramount duty, the historic policy of the Liberal party and of the government, of loyalty to the best interests of Nova Scotia;

And further resolved that this House, while recognizing the importance and value of the measures already taken by the present parliament of Canada to deal with the problems mentioned in this resolution, reaffirm its determination to exert its full powers and influence in expediting the necessary action to improve and cheapen the means of interprovincial transportation, to enlarge the commercial opportunities of the people, and to develop and expand the foreign trade of Canada through Canadian sea ports; and to the end that Nova Scotia may profit in fullest measure from the advantages of its geographical position and natural resources, urge the renewal of the efforts to secure by negotiation a reciprocal trade agreement with the United States, and freer access to the markets of the world for the products of the Dominion.

Then in 1925, one year ago, the provincial legislature of Nova Scotia passed a resolution from which this is one quotation:

Resolved that in the opinion of this House the Governor in Council should proceed with the least possible delay to prepare or cause to be prepared a statement of the particulars in which the interests of Nova Scotia have been prejudiced by the economic system of the Dominion of Canada, and should make application to the government and parliament of Canada for appropriate redress and equitable remedies.

A commission was appointed in July last by the then provincial government which was not allowed to function by the new government. The present Premier of Nova Scotia, in an Address on the Speech from the Throne, announced that they proposed to submit to the legislature a resolution setting out the grievances of that province. Hon. members are not all at one on this subject. Take Mr. McCurdy, Minister of Public Works in the government of my right hon. friend—

An hon. MEMBER: Where is he now?

Mr. MACDOUGALL: He is in the Liberal party.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): In a manifesto issued some time ago he said:

And first let me speak of the so-called national policy or system of protection, under and by virtue of which it is certainly true that the manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec have fattened and grown rich, even although they are now passing through a lean period.

We who live in Nova Scotia must pay the tribute to Ontario and Quebec exacted by the so-called national policy, but when we come to a question of protecting our interests and our ports, that we are told is another matter.

And he goes further and says in a letter:

The present customs tariff of Canada protects principally the manufacturers of central provinces who, taking advantage of it, raised their prices to the point that the cost of living of our people and the production costs of our natural industries are so great that our producers cannot compete successfully in foreign markets with the producers of other countries where living and production costs are lower.

That is the statement and the position taken by the Hon. Mr. McCurdy.

An hon. MEMBER: He is not a Conservative.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): You had better go and tell him that. Then again he reiterates on another page:

We believe that the policy of protection as applied to Nova Scotia to-day constitutes a burden which is crushing us.

That is the position taken by Mr. McCurdy. Mr. McCurdy has a right to his opinion, just as much as my hon. friends. He has a right to express his views in regard to these matters, and his views differ somewhat from those expressed by my hon. friends. It seems to me that the attitude of the government that a commission be appointed in order to arrive at just what the difficulty in the Maritime provinces is, is a reasonable one. My hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) made the suggestion that the matter might be inquired into by a committee of the House. That is well worthy of consideration. But here we have these varying and different views as to the real situation and the cause of it. On the one hand hon. members want more duty. On the other hand one of their confreres in the legislature of Nova Scotia declared quite two years ago that protection was injuring the Maritime provinces, and moved a resolution that a plebiscite should be taken to ascertain the feeling in that province.

Mr. QUINN: Did you not ask for duties on coal and steel?

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): My hon. friend knows that I have a record of which I am not ashamed, and I am here to say that as a Nova Scotian and a Maritime man I stand firmly for everything that will make for the progress and the prosperity of that part of the Dominion. In my judgment, the intention of the Fathers of Confederation in regard to the Intercolonial railway should be clearly recognized and carried into effect, in the interests not only of the Maritime provinces but of the Dominion as a whole. I realize that the Maritime provinces have been handicapped by difficulties which deserve the fullest consideration of this House, and something must be done to remedy the situation. But we must proceed in the proper way. We do not want hysterical speeches by hon. gentlemen who one year fix coal rates and two or three years afterwards come to parliament and apply to have these rates altered. We do not want them calling themselves Maritime righters and on the vital question of railways standing behind the leader of the opposition, who is opposed to the Intercolonial being put back in the place where the people of the Maritime provinces want it. That is not the way to get results. Those of us who are anxious to see that part of Canada make progress must look at the facts. There are differences of opinion and there is no reason why these differences should not be inquired into. The government is sympathetic to difficult conditions wherever they exist in any part of this Dominion, and are anxious to devise and to find and apply whatever remedies can be found to make for the unity and upbuilding of Canada.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): We have had something in the nature of a confession from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald), when at the outset of his statement to-night he declared that the ensuing adjournment would be no holiday for members of the government inasmuch as they would require all the time at their disposal to prepare legislation for submission to parliament when it meets again.

Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): To perfect legislation, I said.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend forgets that besides the members of the government there are in this House possibly 230 hon. gentlemen for whom it will be a holiday, and a holiday to which we object, which we do not ask for, which we do not desire and for which the country will have to pay. It has been charged by the opposition in this House for the last four or five weeks at least that the government had no business to lay before parliament and was not ready to do business. It has been intimated for weeks now, at least since the motion was made for the adjournment, that those on your left, Mr. Speaker, were prepared to get down to business and to vote on the Address at any moment the government would come forward with business to be done. But until this moment nothing has been brought forward by the government, and the government now seeks an adjournment practically for its own purposes to prepare legislation against the re-assembling of parliament on the 15th. I for one take no exception whatever to the present motion of the government for the application of that parliamentary rule which we know as closure. I was one of those who in the year 1913 voted against the introduction of that rule, but after reflection during the intervening years—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, Oh.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friends laugh, but their reflection has taken place only in the last twenty-four hours. In a few hours they have made a complete change of front. After reflection, I say, I have come to the conclusion, which I state wholly on my own authority, that no large deliberative body can operate satisfactorily without some form of closure. I do not believe that the proceedings of this parliament can be properly carried on now or in the future without the reasonable application of the closure rule. All the proceedings in the parliament of Great Britain are conducted practically under closure. It is not formally moved in that House for the reason that there is no necessity for so doing; the rule exists and the Prime Minister merely gives notice that at such and such a time on a certain day the vote will be taken, and the vote is taken accordingly. Closure is the rule in the United States House of Representatives, and it is also in our book of rules in this parliament. It should be a rule generally accepted and generally adopted if we in this parliament are going to transact properly the necessary business we are called upon to transact at every session.

Now I do not know that I have any protest whatever to offer. I feel rather like congratulating the government on the step it has taken to-day in moving this motion of closure. It is the first sign of life the government has exhibited for many weeks. It would have been far more to the credit of the government had it taken this step four or five weeks ago; the present departure suggests not only here but in every part of the country that the government has been driven into a corner and as a last resort has adopted rule 17 which has all the time been on the rule book of the House of Commons. I cannot say I commend the courage of hon. gentlemen opposite in this respect. But there are two kinds of courage, it is true: There is that courage that springs from confidence and from manly gallantry, and there is the courage born of fear. Everyone knows that even a coward driven into a corner will show fight; we know, everyone knows, that even a worm will turn if trodden upon. And if I cannot congratulate the government upon the courage it has displayed in this parliament I can at least say that I am heartily glad that as a last resource it has through courage born of fear brought in this measure of closure.

There is no doubt,—you realize it, Mr. Speaker, every thinking man in this House realizes it, and the electors of the Dominion realize it—that for the past eight weeks we have had something like a parliamentary fiasco in the House of Commons. I am not going to place the blame or responsibility for this situation on any party in this House. I am candid enough to say that in my opinion it has resulted from the election held on October 29 last. But this parliamentary fiasco might have been avoided, it should have been avoided, and it would have been avoided had the Prime Minister of this country taken the course he should have taken, and which in his Richmond Hill speech he promised to take, when he knew the result of the electoral vote on October 29. All our troubles have their starting point in the unwarranted resolution of the Prime Minister to retain office. From that point our difficulties began to arise and, as time went on, to accumulate and to become greater and greater, until at this moment we have what I know I am within the judgment of the House in describing as a practical parliamentary deadlock. I have spoken privately with many hon. members in every quarter of the House, thinking, intelligent and reasonable men. In private conversation in the lobbies or in the rooms of this building there seems to be unanimity of opinion upon this point, that present conditions are not satisfactory, and that they cannot be made satisfactory; that there is only one solution of our present trouble, and the sooner that solution is brought about the better it will be for parliament and the Dominion. That solution is a speedy appeal to the electors of Canada.

I do not say it in any language of disrespect, but I tell the government that it has become a by-word and a jest in every city, town and village of the country. Serious people from one end of the Dominion to the other of every shade of political opinion seem to unite in this view, that a situation exists in this House of Commons to-day which can be solved only in one way—by an appeal to the court of last resort; by another appeal to the electors.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You have had two chances to do that.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Let us examine the situation without passion or excitement or ill-feeling.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is no passion at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have a government supported by a hundred of its followers, faced by an opposition of 116 intelligent, able, capable, resolute men, an opposition convinced that it is right, and determined to oppose this government because it confidently believes the government is wrong. Then we have another group, or rather several groups, making up a membership of 29. These hon. gentlemen, although divided among themselves, at the present time accord a very general support to the government; but never up to the present moment have they had an opportunity of expressing their confidence, or lack of confidence, in the government. This lack of opportunity has been brought about simply through the skilful manœuvring and the finesse of the government. True, there was an opportunity in the early days of the session when a straight want of confidence motion was moved, and when a test of strength might have taken place; but no, it was not permitted; a minister of the crown to relieve the government of its difficulty and embarrassment, had solemnly to inform hon. members of the Progressive party that the government would not treat a favourable vote on that motion as a vote of confidence; in short, the minister had to plead with the Progressives to secure their support and avoid a decision on a straight vote of confidence. Since then we have never had an opportunity of moving one; by closure and by moving of the previous question we have been denied that opportunity.

Now, I think everyone must realize that the tenure of office of a government situated as this is is precarious in the extreme. What assurance is there to us or to the people of Canada of any permanence about the situation, or that we will get anything but haphazard, and sectional legislation at best? What assurance have my hon. friends of the Progressive group that this government, which for four years has resolutely denied their demands, and which now through force of political expediency says, "Hold on, support us, and we will grant your demands"—I say what confidence can the Progressive members have in such a pledge? What confidence can my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) have in a promise made under such circumstances? He has the honour of a front seat and is looked upon as an out and out supporter of the government—though by the way a few months ago he actually opposed a minister of this government and defeated him. Why is he now one of their supporters? Simply by reason of the fact that he has induced the Prime Minister to write him a personal letter—promising to do what? To amend the criminal code, to amend the Naturalization Act, to amend the Immigration Act—to amend three acts which this government had resolutely refused to touch through the course of four sessions. Why is that promise made now? Simply political expediency again. A government that has to stoop in that way, that has to hold out blandishments and allurements to those hon. members in the left hand corner of this House and to make other promises to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, cannot be more than temporary and makeshift at best.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if the situation is as I have pictured it—and I do not think I have overdrawn it—if my statement meets with the judgment of hon. members, reasonable men in every quarter of the House, what is our duty under the circumstances? Shall we allow the disrespect—the growing disrespect—throughout Canada of parliament and parliamentary institutions to continue and to gather force? Or is it our duty as good, loyal Canadians having respect for this Chamber and for our parliamentary institutions, to seek to solve the problem, no matter if the solution be difficult? It will not be difficult in this case, Sir. My hon. friend the leader of the government (Mr. Lapointe) stated this afternoon the absolute determination of the government to continue in office. I suppose he spoke with the authority of his leader, the Prime Minister of this country. In our Prime Minister we have, unfortunately, a man who looks upon himself as practically indispensable in the councils of the Dominion. No man is indispensable in any country. We all pass out of this sphere in course of time and our places are very readily filled; nobody is indispensable. But to continue, I fancy, is the resolution of the Prime Minister. He has resolved to hold on to the salaries and the sweets and the emoluments and the honours of office which he pictured in his Richmond Hill speech last September. I ask again: What is our duty under the circumstances? If the government would resign the problem would be solved and an appeal to the people would take place immediately. But the resolution of the government, as expressed to-day, is that it will carry on. Well, then, I appeal to my friends of the Progressive group, I appeal to hon. members who have the interests of this country at heart, who are able to look a little beyond the success or failure of political parties as represented in this House, to weigh the matter and inquire of themselves what is their duty. This afternoon I heard my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Forke) say to the House that the Progressive party had no fear of an election, that they would come back stronger than ever before. That being the case, they have it in their power to-night to solve this situation, they have it in their power this very night to force an appeal to the electors of the Dominion and break this deadlock which is so injurious to parliament and so injurious to the country. Will my hon. friends of the Progressive party rise to the occasion? Will they at this critical moment say: We will stand with you and make the appeal; we are not afraid of the electorate. They profess that they are not afraid of such an appeal. The only party evidently that is fearful of the electors is the government of the day.

Now I have made my appeal and in a closing word I say: We have on this side a united party, convinced that we are right, ready to stand up and vote on this question in order to solve this problem, to cut this Gordian knot by an appeal to the electors of Canada. I ask those of the Progressive party who are above partyism, who look to the present and to the future of this great country as the main theme in this debate as the great issue before us—I ask them whether they will join us and send this whole question back to the people for a solution at a general election.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the speech to which we have just listened is a new evidence of the fact that dreadnoughts are not dangerous. As I am rather a new member in this House, a friend of mine asked me the other day why I spoke without notes the last time. I said that was very easy to explain, because I have my inspiration just in front of me; the present opposition is composed of "can't believe" men. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) can't believe that he is not the Prime Minister of this country; he can't believe that his child, the closure, is no longer under his control. That is why he is so sad about it. The hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) can't believe that he is no longer the Minister of Public Works and the superintendent of all public buildings in Canada. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Flemming) can't believe that he is not the Minister of Railways.

An hon. MEMBER: Where are your notes?

Mr. POULIOT: Notes? Well, this time the pictures of the members of the opposition are on my notes. The hon. member for Hants-Kings (Mr. Foster) can't believe that he is not Minister of Agriculture, and the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) can't believe that he is not the Deputy Minister of Agriculture. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Garland) can't believe that he is not the Minister of Health. The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) can't believe that he is not the Solicitor General. The hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) can't believe that he is not a church minister. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) can't believe that he is not the twelfth apostle. The hon. member for St-Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) can't believe that he is not speaking any more. The hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Doucet) can't believe that he is not a great man. The hon. members for St. Antoine (Mr. Bell) and Mount Royal (Mr. White) can't believe that they were in favour of Mr. Patenaude. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) can't believe that he is not the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) can't believe that he is not a Mussolini.

Sir, I have just returned from my constituency where I was yesterday, and my constituents said to me that I had forgotten to say something very important in my last speech in this House. They thought I should have repeated what my opponents, Mr. Patenaude's friends, told me during the last election, namely, that I should have crossed the floor of the House and grasped the right hon. leader of the opposition by the throat. I like to acquaint the members of the House with the kind of campaign carried on in my constituency, which I did not mention in my last speech. My hon. friends on the other side of the House are bad losers; they always raise the cries of prejudice and hatred, and when they lose they say we are doing it.

I have been in politics for several years. I started to fight for the Liberal party in 1908 at a big meeting which was attended by our late beloved leader Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and since that time I have never in my province heard a single Liberal speaker say that we should vote against the Ontario people or against the Protestant people. Quebec people are fair. But when the Conservatives lost, what did they say? They said, "Alas! we have lost the election because the Liberals raised the cry of prejudice." I remember also that in Quebec it used to be said that Laurier was against the French-Canadians, but in the English-speaking provinces the same Tories advised the electors to vote against Laurier because he was too much French-Canadian. In 1911, Mr. Speaker, in the province of Quebec, the Tory candidates used the same tactics as in the last election. They said then that they were as much against Borden as against Laurier, but when they were elected, were they free and independent? No; they voted as genuine Tory members. It has been the same all the time, and I think it time this was stopped.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we sometimes hear that Quebec will become Conservative again. The Quebec people have too much honour to elect any more Tory candidates. In 1917 what did we see in Ontario papers? We saw it stated that "Quebec must not rule," and that "only a solid Ontario could defeat them." That is what we saw, and it was signed by the Tory candidates in the holy city of Toronto. They took the responsibility of that slander against my native province, and is there now one member on the other side of the House who will dare repeat it? This is real prejudice, and it is the first time in the history of our country that a party has slandered a province just for the sake of power. There were cabinet ministers who put their names to those infamous libels against my province, which appeared in every issue of those papers, not for one day only but for three weeks during the election, and the members of the Union government at that time were responsible for it. Those people who say that they love Quebec would have stopped that sort of thing long ago had they been sincere. My friends on the other side of the House are surprised that we are on good terms with our friends from the prairie provinces, but the Conservatives made an alliance with the Liberals who betrayed Laurier in 1917, and now they are allied with people who insult the province of Quebec every week in this dirty paper, the Orange Sentinel. If I were the leader of a party, Mr. Speaker, I would not accept as my supporter a man who would defame 2,500,000 people who are honest and deserving of better than that.

May I read something now from the Orange Sentinel, a paper whose editor is a supporter of the right hon. leader of the opposition in this House. I am the more glad to read this because it is in an article praising the defamation of the French-Canadians of Quebec by the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. Doucet). I do not mind the Orange Sentinel, Mr. Speaker, because as soon as the orange is peeled, anybody can see that it is rotten. It says:

> No conquered people have ever been treated with such exceeding generosity as the French in Canada. But if they presume to dictate their will to all the other provinces, they will discover that they are unable to do so.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: I hear some hon. members opposite pounding their desks. Will any hon. gentleman opposite rise and say that Quebec is not doing her duty? Does the right hon. leader of the opposition approve of those gentlemen opposite pounding their desks as I read? To continue:

> Quebec must take its place with the other provinces of Canada and observe the terms of our constitution if the people of that province hope to preserve the special privileges they enjoy, and exercise their proper influence in the government of the country.

I see the hon. member for Kent, N.B., laughing. I should like his electors to see him now. I think they would change their representative at once. I have no doubt he will be the next editor of the Orange Sentinel.

May I also quote from the last issue of the Orange Sentinel, under date of February 23 last? In an article headed, "The Service of the Orange Order in Canada"—evidently the readers of this paper are living on an orange diet—I find this:

> Frequent attempts to place the French language on an equality with English as a medium of instruction have also been successfully defeated. The Orange Order has saved the educational system of Ontario from becoming completely Romanized and bi-lingualized. It has helped to keep Ontario English-speaking, British and Protestant.

Is not this religious and racial fanaticism of the worst kind? Is there a member of this House who can approve of these dirty things being said against the province of Quebec? I am sorry the editor of this paper is not in his seat. I do not think he has any friends now in the House, or if he has, they are not courageous enough to stand up and take the responsibility for what he has written in this dirty paper. Perhaps his absence is explained by the fact that he is now writing another article similar to these I have quoted.

Mr. Speaker, I have just come back from my constituency. I have seen my friends there, and I have asked them what they thought about closure, and the unanimous answer was: "We are mighty glad. Give them what they deserve. We are well satisfied that you shall use against the right hon. leader of the opposition the weapon which he himself forged and used against the beloved leader of our party in 1913."

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to quote from the speech made by Sir Wilfrid Laurier on April 9, 1913, when closure was first introduced into this House. He had a vision of the future, and referring to the present leader of the opposition, then the Solicitor General, he said:

> My right hon. friend has not forgotten the words of Shakespeare:
> —this even handed justice
> Commends th' ingredients of our poison'd chalice
> To our own lips.
> The poison that he offers to us to-day will come to his own lips at some future day. We are in the minority; we can be gagged; we can be prevented from expressing our opinions; they can trample upon our rights. But, Sir, the day of reckoning will come, and it will come as soon as we have a dissolution of the present parliament."

Mr. Speaker, the day of reckoning has come, and it is to-day. Neither the right hon. leader of the opposition nor any of his cabinet ministers of 1921, nor any of the cabinet ministers of 1917, if they are still supporters of the right hon. gentleman, will ever get more seats for their party than they have to-day in the province of Quebec. In the last campaign we had Jacob and Esau in the province of Quebec; the hand was the hand of Patenaude, but the voice was the voice of Meighen. But the people of the province of Quebec cannot be fooled any more, and so long as our friends on the other side of the House continue to insult the French-Canadian people, as they do daily and weekly in their papers and in their conversation, their party will have no chance in the province of Quebec, where there is no greater insult to any man than to say he is a Tory.

Mr. A. E. ROSS (Kingston City): Mr. Speaker, the plenteous showers of congratulations which have fallen upon you during the past two months must now be accompanied by universal regret that it has fallen to you, one of the most highly respected first commoners in the history of our country, to preside over the most unconstitutionally founded parliament, the most futile and the most insincere parliament in our history. It is a parliament, Sir, without a head, a parliament without a policy, and a parliament existing for one purpose only. The reasons for the statements, Sir, are very well known. For four years the country has entrusted the administration of its affairs to the Prime Minister and his government, in order that he might implement the promises he made during the election campaign. For four years we have had parliaments of barter and trade, parliaments which have existed for nothing else than to sacrifice policies for power. This government, Sir, arranged an opening, but it staged an auction sale. This government brought in a Speech from the Throne, but they destroyed every principle, every law, which made the Speech from the Throne possible. They moved an Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, but they destroyed the spirit and the soul of parliament. This action too was taken under the influence of the Prime Minister, who on October 1, 1925, at Moose Jaw made these remarks:

> There was one thing which as a person grew older, he realized more and more and that was that one of the fine things which the men of the old parties had handed to their sons was the desire to fight for the freedom of the institutions which their fathers had helped them to establish.

Yes, they moved an Address but they destroyed the institution which their fathers by sacrifice and service had established in this country. The institution which we have always looked up to perhaps more than any other has been that of the recognition that a government not elected at the polls should retire. On the 29th October of last year this country spoke with a strong, certain, clear and distinct voice and it said: We do not want the Mackenzie King government. I am not concerned whether they call the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) or the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) or anybody else to form a government; the one voice spoken by the country on the 29th October last was: We do not want the Mackenzie King government. The country rejected him; his own constituency, a constituency that had been carved and strengthened for him, a constituency patched and quilted as an easy seat for him to lie down upon, rejected him. The voice surely was strong enough to demand the retirement of such a leader.

If he did not care to accept that step of retirement, another step was open to him and that was to accept the first seat offered.

A number of seats were offered to the rejected Prime Minister but none of them he accepted. Nature came forward and gave an opportunity but to that opportunity he had not the courage to rise. After an interval the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Goulet), we are told, was called but the bargain did not go through. We are told that the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) came down. We can imagine this member once elected as a Labour Progressive, having served in that legislature under the Minister of Labour, very talkative but with very little action, saw his opportunity, when the Minister of Labour was defeated, of having the office offered to him. He came to Ottawa quite expecting an offer to be made to him, but we are told the offer made was: What would you think of giving up your seat for the Prime Minister? That was not accepted. If the Prime Minister had not the courage to accept any of these opportunities or to make a challenge again, why should he take the seat nearest to the North Pole for an election? Why should he run away so far that it would be impossible to follow him? No, Sir, he lacked courage to come to grips just as the party lack courage to-day to come to grips. They could not be screwed up to put the first motion to restrict debate in this House,—no, the burden was laid upon one who was aided and abetted in his election by this government.

Does the opinion of such members as the member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) justify the support of the government of to-day? Let me read a few extracts from Hansard of last year. In the debate in regard to a motion brought forward by Mr. Knox, Mr. Knox made this statement:

> A party like the Liberal party which has made no further advance, during the four years in which it has held office, to carry into effect its platform and published policy, will certainly not be received with open arms by the thinking portion of the electorate, especially in that part of Canada lying west of the Great Lakes.

Additional interest will be found in the remarks of the reverend gentleman, the hon. member for Nelson who, on that occasion spoke about the government as follows:

> Now, where does the Liberal party stand in regard to the Hudson Bay railway? Who knows, who can tell? Nobody.

Then he goes on to say:

> There is some paralyzing influence within the ranks of the Liberal party which makes it impossible to proceed with this venture.

I might add to this the remark of another member of the Progressive party who are now coming forward in support of this government. During the same debate a reference was made to a former Liberal government, and this was said:

> Hon. Mr. Graham: That was a good government.
> Mr. Forke: They have been living on their reputation ever since.

These are the opinions of this government who for four years failed to do their duty and brought about the predicament in which this parliament is to-day. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) made interruptions about the election in Regina. Why Regina? Why is an election to take place in Regina? Why is an outside member to be called to the support of this government? In the 100 members across the way was there not one supposed to be capable or efficient to be put up as a minister for this dying and dead government? Not one. One can imagine the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) wishing that he had not taken the platform he had in the last election, thinking if he had not been an Independent he might be absorbed to-day; but having denounced this government, refusing to run as their candidate, he sees himself passed over to-day by a man from Regina. The chief whip (Mr. Casgrain) and the hon. member for St. James (Mr. Rinfret) would be available as cabinet material. Why are they passed by? The hon. member for Labelle would have gladly stepped into the vacant place. Was he not supposed to be fit or efficient? The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would gladly have come in now that they have agreed to wipe out these awful and outrageous resolutions in regard to naturalization and the Criminal Code. The hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) would offer himself. But out of the 100 members sitting on the opposite side who were elected in the last election, not one is considered efficient or suitable for the vacant place.

What is a closure for? It is to stop debate in order to proceed with some business. Never was closure adopted but a government had some important measure to bring immediately before the House. Who ever heard of a closure in order to go off and take a holiday? This is the most unconstitutional parliament that any person ever heard of. A closure for a holiday! What is the holiday for? An adjournment for six weeks! Then why accept two weeks or a week and a half? If six weeks were necessary, why take one and a half weeks now? If one and a half weeks are sufficient now, why was it thought necessary to take six weeks before? This is the position we are in. The whole thing is ridiculous. The stand of the government is ridiculous and childish. This adjournment is to rig up an old waterlogged, storm-ridden ship, foundered upon the shores and upon the rocks, and to bring out an old despised pilot, that pilot who, we heard last session, was to be thrown overboard. The ship, storm-tossed and wrecked is now to be taken into dry dock, a few planks put in it, and a little bit of stern and stem constructed. Why is it necessary?

We are told that in the old ancient city of Troy there was an image called the Palladium —that is, a wooden image in the fortress of Pallas Athene. There were two themes about it: it was supposed to prevent the destruction of the city, and it was supposed to be sent from heaven. This holiday to-day is to find the palladium of the Liberal party, this heaven sent palladium that will save it from destruction, and the holiday is for no other purpose. The Minister of the Interior tried to remind us to-day that this was a new era. I do not think any person will object to that. It certainly is a new era in the political life of this or any other country. It is an era marked by destruction of principle, and it is an era where we have an exhibition of the Minister of Justice standing up in this House and defending principles which he sought to tear down some years ago. If this is a new era, do principles of right and justice change? No, principles cannot change with regard to right and justice.

I would like to draw attention to some further remarks by the Minister of Justice in 1913. I should like to place two passages on Hansard, because I think the remarks would correspond with the remarks he would make now, if he spoke from his heart. The then hon. member for Kamouraska, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) said:

> The resolution which we are asked to pass will put in the hands of some ministers a dangerous weapon. That weapon will be still more dangerous when such ministers owe their position to lobby wire-pulling, to services of a suspicious character, to a deep knowledge of intrigue. These ministers may then without apprehension purchase padlocks or mail bags for several generations, they may appoint to positions of public trust—

Mark this now, in the face of what is occurring at the present time.

> —blackmailers and perjurers as a reward for their work in election time, because they will be in a position to apply the infamous gag which they are preparing for the purpose of preventing any criticism of their misdeeds. Freedom of speech will be reserved exclusively to the men in power and subject at all times to be denied to others. Freedom which is granted only by way of sufferance is really not freedom.

I would like to quote a few further remarks by the Minister of Justice from the same speech, which fit in at this time most aptly. He said in regard to closure:

> It is the result of a fit of bad temper; it means the sacrifice of one of our most beloved franchises for the purpose of giving a new lease of life to a discredited administration.

Now in the face of those remarks, I quite agree with the Minister of the Interior (Mr Stewart) that a new era has arisen when the Minister of Justice, having conscientiously made these remarks some years ago, to-day brings forward the same measure which he thought was so damaging to parliament in the past.

The Minister of the Interior in this debate referred to the fact that the matter picked out by the opposition was always the National railway. Well, it is the purpose and the function of the opposition to criticize, and to criticize severely, any departure which directly or indirectly comes under the direction of this parliament in regard to their actions, and why should we not criticize the National railways? Have we not had the experience of the Scribe hotel? We were told by their own Minister of Railways that it would be the last thing of this nature that would occur. But following that immediately came the purchase of the corner of King and Yonge streets in Toronto, and now comes the Rouyn railway. What is the object of it? If they want to bring the freight out, they have only one of two ways to do it. They have to bring it out by Quebec, or by Cochrane and then over the Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railroad. If their profession of economy is sound and is to be followed, the natural course would be to go by the shortest route, and that would be by the present Temiskaming and Northern Ontario railway.

The Minister of the Interior says: "Look at our trade returns and statistics in this prosperous country." The people of this country are crying out for a change. Men are unemployed; women and children are hungry, and all that the Minister of the Interior and this government have to offer to them are trade returns and statistics. People who are hungry are looking for some further signs of prosperity than trade returns and statistics.

I started out with the statement that this was a discredited government. There are many signs which show that they were discredited and that they should not be in the position which they occupy to-day. At the front we always took it as a good sign when the message went out that the trenches were solid and sound and there was a possibility of retaining them. The trench holders then stood in their positions, and it is the same in the matter we are considering now. Once the report goes out that the country is prosperous and that this government is going to be sustained, the seat holders on the government side remain there, but what were the signs last October just before the election? Never in the history of any country did we see such a rush for cover as we saw among the supporters of that government, indicating its instability and impossibility of their retaining power.

Mr. J. A. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Mr. Speaker, even at this late stage of the debate, when time is so precious, it would be remiss on my part if I did not seize the opportunity, owing to the old friendship which exists between you and myself and between your family and mine, to offer you my congratulations on the great honour conferred upon you by this House. For the first time in the parliamentary history of Canada the Speaker has been elected to the chair of this House for a second term, and it was the recognition of your eminent qualities, Sir, that brought you this honour. Your friends back in Montreal, your native city, have followed your career with pride and they look forward to further honours being bestowed upon you by your grateful country. Their desire and their hope is that you will long live to serve this Canada of ours. Your mature judgment and the great qualities which qualify you for the position that you occupy with so much credit to yourself and to this House should, in my opinion, be made use of to a greater extent, and it is unfortunate that our constitutional rules will not permit you to advise the various parties in this House how they should carry on the business of this country. If it were possible for you, Mr. Speaker, to lend the benefit of your experience to these parties, you would no doubt tell the opposition that they have been absolutely wrong in obstructing the business of parliament for so many long weeks. You would tell them that they have been forfeiting the confidence of the people of Canada and losing the esteem of their friends by hindering the government from getting down to the important business that waits to be done.

The opposition are losing their friends steadily, and we have only to refer to the newspapers of the country of very recent date to find proof of this statement. If we look at yesterday's Gazette, of which the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White) is editor, we shall see that this paper blames the opposition for the manner in which they have been obstructing parliament. Yesterday morning's Gazette had this to say:

> Can the opposition grant an adjournment under the conditions set forth in Mr. Boys' statement without acknowledging the government's right to govern and thereby condemning the "obstruction" of which the government have complained so bitterly? It looks very much as if the Boys offer comes down to this, that Mr. Mackenzie King can have his adjournment if he is prepared to admit that he has no right to it. If that be good strategy it is certainly not good logic, and it will not impress the public who are becoming mightily out of temper with the House of Commons and its windy futility. There is some strange mystery behind the declaration of the chief whip, which mystery is only partially dissipated, if at all, by the first part of Mr. Boys' address, which may be summarized in the words—Master, go on, and I will follow thee to the last gasp, with truth and loyalty.

A reference to last night's Star also confirms the opinion that the leader of the opposition is losing another friend, if ever he could count upon the Star as a friend. We in the province of Quebec had not the honour of greeting the right hon. gentleman during the last electoral campaign although we were mystified for a considerable time by his continued absence from that part of the country. He passed through the province of Quebec on his way to the Maritimes and on returning he again came through the province, but he did not honour us with a visit. It was only when the by-election came on in Bagot that, ignoring the advice given him by his friends at that time, and realizing then that Canada was not so large a country after all and that it was possible for him to visit every section of it, the right hon. gentleman entered the province and visited the county of Bagot where many of us had the pleasure of receiving him. The reception given him in that county belied the advice he had got from his friends, for it was quite charming; the people of Bagot were delighted to see him. But they did not have any more confidence in my right hon. friend after his visit than before, as is evident in the fact that the hon. member for Bagot sits on this side of the House. Mr. Fauteux, the Conservative candidate in that by-election, suffered his eighth defeat, and when the elections come around again in the province of Quebec he will suffer his ninth or possibly his tenth defeat.

So that if we consult the newspapers of Quebec we shall see that the conduct of the opposition so far in the present session is being criticized; hon. gentlemen opposite are being censured for holding up the business of the country. The French newspapers of the province are blaming the right hon. gentleman and his followers for all these weeks of obstruction, and rightly so. The only reason the leader of the opposition has advanced for this obstruction is the desire of the opposition to allow the committee investigating the charges in respect of the Customs department to continue functioning. But as the acting leader of the House (Mr. Lapointe) pointed out this afternoon, no witnesses who have so far appeared before the committee have shown any desire to refuse to answer any questions put to them, nor have any witnesses failed to appear when summoned. I will go further. A great number of the employees from the various departments will appear before the committee, and if the House does take a recess, as it will, it will be an easy matter to examine these government employees in the interval. They will not dare to refuse to appear before the committee and the few days during which this House will be adjourned can very well be occupied in examining these particular witnesses. So that this excuse for not agreeing to an adjournment does not hold and the opposition deserves censure on that ground.

I stated a moment ago that hon. gentlemen opposite were losing their friends. The parliamentary correspondent of the Montreal Star last evening wrote an article against the leader of the opposition. The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said that on his side of the House there was a united party. If that is so, we on this side do not understand why the editor of the Montreal Star, one of the supporters of the right hon. leader of the opposition, should write in his paper only yesterday an article against him. During the present session that journal has at least shown itself friendly towards the right hon. gentleman, but last night it contained the following article:

> Conservatives in those days were not Bagot-chasing. When they answered, "Ready, aye, ready" to the bay of the lion, they did not go to Hamilton and recant.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) does not seem to have any too great a liking for his right hon. leader. We all remember the speech he made in Toronto. We in the province of Quebec have great respect and admiration for the hon. member. When he came to Montreal from the province down by the sea we welcomed him with open arms—just the same as the county of Bagot welcomed the right hon. leader when he mustered up courage enough to come into the province. He is one of the front-benchers of the opposition. I have noted with much surprise, Mr. Speaker, that the official opposition is referred to as the Tory party. The Conservatives of Quebec do not call themselves Tories; the only association we have with the Tory party in that province is a souvenir of the burning of the houses of parliament in Montreal. They are known by several names—the Liberal-Conservative party, the National Liberal-Conservative party, the Unionist party; but in Quebec our good honest Conservatives will not allow anyone to call them Tories. As I said, this very important member of the Conservative party apparently has not much love for his right hon. leader. His speech in Toronto soon after the election shows it. He said in the House the other day that he would explain that speech, but if I be not mistaken, Mr. Speaker, he failed to remember his promise. We are anxiously awaiting his explanation of how he can be a member of such a united party in view of his Toronto speech against his leader. Rumour hath it that a sage from the west, the member for one of the Winnipeg constituencies, likewise does not regard his leader with any great affection. Rumour hath it likewise in the corridors—and the vehement denial by the chief whip of the Conservative party would lead us to believe that it contains an element of truth—that all is not love and loyalty in reference to the procedure of the Conservative party in the present debate. Of course, we do not know whether that is so, but there is no smoke without some fire.

We were very much surprised that in this free country the chief whip of the Conservative party, a party that is in a minority in this House, should try to lay down the law to the government and dictate what should be done in this House. The hon. gentleman on Friday afternoon said that his party in its might and strength had decided to allow the Prime Minister on his return to the House one day, two days, or possibly three days to announce whether he had any business to bring down, and if he acknowledged his unpreparedness, why then the official opposition, in the greatness of its heart and with that spirit of charity which the Conservative party has always admitted to be one of its distinguishing characteristics, was willing to allow the Prime Minister the recess which he has been asking for. Naturally, Mr. Speaker, it raised our ire to think that the hon. gentleman in such bold terms should try to dictate to the government. Since the opening of the session the Conservative party has been seeking to defeat the government, but in every division so far they have not succeeded. This very afternoon they tried once more, but they failed. And they will fail in every other vote this session. The government is to be commended for the firm stand it took this afternoon in moving the closure. The government is in power, it commands a majority in this House; and it is the majority that rules. Therefore the government did quite right in taking this course and has the unanimous endorsement of its supporters. We want the business of the country attended to.

We do not protest and brag about being a united party. It is not necessary. There is no question about our unity. We stand firmly behind our leader. There is no criticism of him, there is no desire to displace him. We stand enthusiastically behind him. We believe that the best interests of Canada will be served by the Liberal party, and we will support the Prime Minister to the very limit of our strength so that the business of the nation may be proceeded with and Canada may enjoy that prosperity which she deserves.

Hon. S. C. MEWBURN (East Hamilton): I am sure, Sir, that you, in common with all the other members of this House irrespective of party, will join in wishing our youthful member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers)—young in years but old in parliamentary experience—many happy returns of this his sixty-second birthday.

This, Mr. Speaker, being my first offence this session, I hope you will bear with me with your usual courtesy and kindness. I feel that instead of joining with the 239 members who have tendered their congratulations to you on occupying the chair again, I should extend to you my very heartfelt sympathy on the trying ordeal you have been subjected to while sitting through the many weeks of this burlesque show.

In the early stages of the debate there were some interesting and dramatic events, particularly when our good friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) did everything but turn handsprings up and down the centre of the chamber. I wish to congratulate, Sir, the acting leader of the party to your immediate right on having regained his nerve. We were worried about him at the end of last week, but he was apparently strengthened over the week-end sojourn by the coming dominator of the party, that fresh breath from Saskatchewan, the new Minister of Railways and Canals. He has apparently been in consultation with these gentlemen outside of the House, who told him to forget all about his opposition to closure, to bring it in and have done with it. I congratulate him on regaining his nerve, and if he had only had the spunk to do it three weeks ago he would have received greater admiration and respect from all in this House.

It seems to me, Sir, that this debate has been threshed all over, from the North Pole to the South Pole; the whole compass has been boxed. We have heard about everything from coal to Chinese eggs, and still we are here, having accomplished nothing. Two hundred and forty-five able-bodied men, elected on October 29 last to represent constituencies throughout the whole of Canada, were called here at the suggestion and on the orders of the present acting leader of the government, or the Prime Minister that was—and will be again in a few days. For what purpose? I am wondering what the people of Canada are thinking. We have been here since January 7 and have accomplished nothing. What is the reason for that? I know every member to your left, Sir, comprising the Liberal-Conservative party, 116 in number, came here on January 7 with the full intention and the honest desire of carrying on the business of this country and fulfilling those duties for which they were elected. We have been prevented from doing so by the egotism, the incompetence and the irresponsibility of that party which might well be called from now on the Liberal-Progressive-Labour-Independent party. It is a wonderful alliance; extraordinary bed-fellows, and how long will it last? That is the question the people of this country are asking.

Coming to the Speech from the Throne—and I do not wish to take up much time with it—the Speech delivered by His Excellency on January 8 sets forth the programme or suggested programme of the strap-hangers or the hangers-on of power in this country. The acting leader of the government to-day informed us—and I think had the audacity to try to give out to the people of Canada—that the only reason why this parliament was called together on January 7 was to prove to the people that his government had the right to carry on and function. That being the case, why does he insult the intelligence of the people and of the members of this House by bringing down a Speech from the Throne in which it is stated, among many other things:

> Our manufacturing and related industries throughout the Dominion have experienced a development not enjoyed in many years.

Surely one does not have to travel very much about the country to know that that is not correct. Then the Speech goes on:

In the opinion of my ministers the improved conditions warrant further substantial reductions in taxation.

Further, among other things—and I do not wish to quote them all—I find the following:

Measures will be taken to further the retention on the land of our existing agricultural population, to encourage the return to rural parts of urban dwellers possessed of agricultural experience, and the repatriation of Canadians now living in other countries.

When our good Canadian citizens, who have been forced by this government to leave the homes of their birth and adoption and go across the border, read that in the press, their first answer is, "What is the good of going back to Canada? We will return to Canada just as soon as we can get work, as soon as we can get on the pay roll there, and not before."

Then, Sir, further in the Speech I find:

To this end a measure will be introduced offering wide facilities for rural credits.

I do not wish to take up the time of the House to-night by referring to that extraordinary measure. We all know how a year ago, in the dying days of the session, the government decided to bring in a rural credits bill to satisfy some of our friends from the west. They had promised it all session. During the last week of that session a bill was forced through this House authorizing the expenditure of some $10,000,000 of Canada's money, with the government praying to the Lord Almighty that the Senate would kill it, which they did. Now we have the same promise again. I have an open mind on the question of rural credits, but I do say with all sincerity that I think the time has passed when any great facility should be adopted for a rural credits scheme in this country. If any such bill is brought in I hope and trust that the government will get beyond those ideas suggested in the bill brought in last year. I hope that the loan corporations of this country which includes mortgage companies, trust companies and insurance companies, which have met and are meeting the situation; which have been the backbone and the strength of the development of the whole of this country, including the west—will be brought into consultation to give some practical views and the results of their experience as to the working out of this problem. They were refused permission to give evidence before the committee a year ago, and I think that was a great weakness on the part of the government.

The next thing I notice in the Speech from the Throne is that a tariff advisory board will be appointed forthwith. It is not a tariff board, but a tariff advisory board. We all know what a joke that will be; a lot of gentlemen appointed, drawing large emoluments from the crown and going round the country advising the government on this and on that. I think the suggestion of the right hon. leader of the Conservatvie party, expressed in his resolution of June, 1925, sets out distinctly what he means by a real tariff board, which is what we need in this country.

Another thing I notice in the Speech from the Throne is this:

My government propose to submit provisions for the completion forthwith of the Hudson Bay railway.

Well, Sir, these are very important matters which the government, in the Speech from the Throne, led us to believe they were prepared to submit to this House, but we have not heard a word about them. We have gone on debating the Speech from the Throne, looking daily for some effort on the part of the government to bring down some of these measures and thus implement their promises. I am not appealing to my hon. friends to my left, but surely after four years' experience they must know—it must have been demonstrated to them beyond question—that this government is absolutely impotent, absolutely unable to function, and that there is very little likelihood of their fulfilling the promises they have held out to the members of that group.

I do not propose to take up much time going into a lot of other details. I could speak for some time, but it seems to me that what the people of this country are interested in are four vital things, and the first and dominating one is the fiscal policy of Canada. I say, the fiscal policy of Canada—not a tariff policy, but the fiscal policy; and when that fiscal policy is settled and stabilized and has become permanent, when it has got away from being a political football, then the people of this country will be encouraged and will be able to function and expand as they ought to do. I concur entirely with the remarks of the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) when he described what was meant by protection. I think his words are well worth repeating. Referring to the tariff he said:

Sir, to me those are words only, purely a matter of terminology. There is no such thing as high, low, or moderate tariff. Those words are relative terms only, and indicate no principle. You may have a duty that is higher than a protective duty; you may have a duty that is lower than is a protective duty; but the policy of the Conservative party has never been any of these. The word—to be used in describing the policy of the Conservative party is a simple word—"protection." Its meaning is clear. It is unmistakable, understandable. It does not mean a tariff that gives a bonus to a farmer or to a manufacturer. It does mean a tariff that gives to each a fair chance to compete under the unfair conditions which he is obliged to meet.

In that I entirely concur. I say that that is what the people of this country want to know, and the sooner they know it the better.

The next thing they are interested in, and it is something everybody is interested in, is the question of taxation. If the government have any sincerity, let them announce when they come back on the 15th of March, or as early as possible, that the taxation is going to be reduced, and let them state positively and in unmistakable words what that reduction is going to be. If they reduce the taxation, they will automatically be compelled to cut down the lavish expenditure that has been going on in this country for years. If a person's income is reduced and he cannot get credit, he has got to retrench. But the difficulty with this government is that it is not only Liberal in name, but liberal with the taxpayer's money beyond record.

The next thing the people of this country are interested in is the railway problem and immigration. Every one and each of these is an enormous problem that requires to be solved in this country, and it seems to me that the members of this House ought to be virile enough and strong enough to get together and face these problems and try to settle them. I do not think there is any problem a Canadian cannot manfully face and manfully solve.

My hon. friend who spoke just before me, the hon. member for Laurier-Outremont (Mr. Mercier), seemed to be very much perturbed. He referred in his opening remarks, Mr. Speaker, to your great parliamentary experience, and I agree with him. With your ideals of British traditions and parliamentary practice, he said that if you had had your way you would have taught the members sitting to your left to stop obstructing parliament and let the government carry on. If I know you, Mr. Speaker, I know what you, with your unbiased mind, would have done if you had had your way, and it would have been to ask the government who are now hanging on to office to immediately resign.

The hon. member was very much interested in trying to draw a herring across the trail when he referred to the hon. leader of the Conservative party. I want to say to him, and I say it here in all sincerity: Give us an opportunity, go to the country, let the people speak at an early day, and then the hon. member will soon learn that the Liberal-Conservative party are a unit, wholly and unreservedly behind their present leader. Go to the country, and you will not see the same stalemate after the election that exists now in this parliament.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): Mr. Speaker, in common with speakers on both sides of the House who have preceded me in this debate, I wish to tender to you my sincere congratulations. Coming as you do from an eastern province down by the Atlantic coast, you understand our problems, and I know that you will be sympathetic towards them and fair with the members from that part of the Dominion as they endeavour to present these problems to parliament.

I am not here to attempt in any way to criticize our friends on the opposition side for the attitude they have taken in this debate. They are free to choose their own course, and if the course they have adopted appeals to them as the right course, they are, of course, at perfect liberty to adopt it, and it remains for the people of this country to pass judgment on them at a later date. I have been delighted with the number of speeches that we have heard from all parts of the Dominion. I do not know that the time of parliament has been altogether wasted. I think the views that have been presented have been presented in good faith by the members representing the different constituencies. I believe that each member has come to this House with the object of representing his district to the best of his ability, and of presenting to parliament the difficulties that confront his constituency, and of seeking, if possible, a way in which those difficulties may be overcome.

Some hon. gentlemen who have taken part in this debate have taken very strong objection to the course which the government has pursued. They have criticized the Prime Minister very severely and said that he has not dealt fairly with the people or fairly with parliament in not having a seat in this House before parliament was summoned. This may or may not be correct, but there is one thing I can say: The Prime Minister in adopting the course which he did possibly has not taken the best course from a political standpoint, for I believe it might have been more to the advantage of the Liberal party if he and his ministers had been elected to parliament and had their seats in this House when parliament met. If it was political advantage they were looking for, perhaps that would have been the better course, but I think the Prime Minister and the government acted fairly with the people of this country and with this House in meeting parliament and allowing the elected representatives of the people to pass judgment on who should rule.

Our friends on the opposition side seem to be very much peeved that the Progressive party has supported the Liberal party during this session. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that we are here to criticize each other's actions. The members of the Progressive group have a perfect right to use their own judgment and support in this House whichever party and whatever policy that appeals to them. As the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) stated on one occasion, the policy of the party was far more important than the party itself, and if the policy of the Liberal party has appealed to our Progressive friends and they have supported the government, I do not think it comes with good grace from any member of this House to criticize them for the action they have taken.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) the other night, when the hon. member for Nelson moved the motion which is now before the House, seemed to be very much annoyed that he did not have the opportunity of moving what he called a motion of direct want of confidence in this government. He attempted to the best of his ability to secure the floor on that occasion and to address the House. I think his intentions were to move a straight want of confidence motion. Perhaps that matter is worth looking into just a little further.

First we can ask ourselves: What was the object of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) in attempting to move a want of confidence motion in this House? I think there was something behind the apparent object of defeating our friends on this side and forcing them from the government benches. If we look into British history and British parliamentary procedure we find that an hon. member who moves a want of confidence motion and is successful in having that motion carried is called upon by His Majesty the King—in the case of Canada, by His Excellency the Governor General—to form a ministry. It looks to me as if the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, had in view not only the object of defeating the government and forcing the Prime Minister and this cabinet from the treasury benches, but he also had the idea of forcing the leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Meighen) from his position as leader and having the Governor General ask my hon. friend to form a government and carry on the business of this country. If my hon. friends will read British parliamentary procedure they will find that is the course which has been adopted. I have no quarrel with my hon. friend's ambition, but it is only fair in passing to make this comment and I am not surprised that my hon. friend was so disappointed when he found that the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) had the floor and he was prevented from moving that want of confidence motion which he so much desired to move.

The question of Maritime rights has been brought up at different times, and I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to hon. gentlemen representing Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and our own province who have spoken in regard to that question. Our hon. friends criticized the Prime Minister for stating that he did not know what Maritime rights were, and former members in this House were criticized for not, during the last four years, presenting to this government Maritime rights and emphasizing what those Maritime rights were. Our friends have brought to the notice of the House one particular instance and that is the question of the Intercolonial railway. They have centred all their efforts on the question of the Intercolonial railway and have claimed that the withdrawal of that railway from the Canadian National system will solve the difficulties of the Maritime provinces. At least they seem to think that is one of the main questions and that would be the great solution.

We on this side of the House have been charged with doing nothing during the past four years with regard to that same question. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) to-night brought very forcibly before the House which party was responsible for the condition that we have in railway matters in the Maritime provinces and for having the Intercolonial railway made part of the Canadian National system. He pointed out that in 1918 under an act of the then government the Intercolonial was brought into the Canadian National system, and that prior to this government assuming power in 1921 no effort was made by our friends who were supporting the party which they are now supporting over there to have this matter put right. It is only fair to members from the Maritime provinces who were in the last parliament to state that one of the very first things we took up when the 1922 session opened was the question of Maritime rights. I think our friends on the other side of the House should be the last men to come to this parliament or to go on any platform in this country and state publicly that the Liberal party is responsible for the situation down there.

What happened when our friends took charge of the Intercolonial and made it part of the National system? The first thing was to take the general manager from Moncton and to transfer the head offices from Moncton to Toronto. In 1922 I remember our meeting in the reading room in this parliament building and drawing up a memorandum which we presented to the Minister of Railways and the president of the Canadian National Railways, making the distinct request that the first thing we required was the return to the Maritime provinces of a general manager at Moncton. We made that request unitedly. The Minister of National Defence neglected to emphasize that to-night, but he was one of the prime movers in that matter and the memorandum was drawn up and signed by every Maritime member with the result that we have the general manager returned with head offices at Moncton. We had put in charge there as general manager, Mr. Brown, a Maritime man who, we claimed, knew Maritime questions, was sympathetic with Maritime conditions and would give us a better service than we had when the management was in Toronto. The moment we got the general management back to Moncton we had an improvement in conditions and I wish to place on Hansard some of the improvements that took place. Some hon. members opposite the other day charged this government with increasing rates and with making no effort to have a reduction in rates. As was pointed out by the Minister of National Defence to-night the question of reduction of rates was taken up immediately after this government came into power. Prior to that time there had been an increase and no effort was made to have a reduction. I have in my hand a letter which I should like to read in full in order to show that this government took action immediately, but as we are limited to twenty minutes I am going to read part of it and ask that it be put on Hansard in its entirety, because it emphasizes very clearly the facts I wish to emphasize. The letter, which is dated February 11, 1925, is as follows:

A. E. MacLean, Esq., M.P.,
Room 409, House of Commons, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,

Referring to telephone conversation of date, when you requested to be advised briefly and in a general way as to reductions made in freight rates on the Atlantic division of the Canadian National Railways since the rates reached their peak in 1920:

The first decrease was effective January 1st, 1921, when the rates in eastern Canada were reduced from 40 per cent to 35 per cent over the rates in effect prior to September 13th, 1920. The next general decrease was effective December 1st, 1921, when the rates in eastern Canada were again reduced to 25 per cent over the rates in effect prior to September 13, 1920.

Effective August 1st, 1922, the following reductions were made affecting rates in eastern Canada:

(1) On forest products; building material (brick, cement, lime, plaster); potatoes; fertilizers (other than chemical): ores; pig iron; blooms; billets; wire rods; and scrap iron, the rates were reduced to 17½ per cent over those in effect prior to September 13, 1920.

(2) On coal, other than anthracite, all increases provided for effective September 13, 1920, were rescinded.

(3) A reduction was made in the rates on traffic between Maritime province points and points west of Port Arthur and Fort William.

Up to this time, the freight rates between points on Prince Edward Island and mainland stations on the Canadian National Railways had been on a somewhat higher basis than the rates between points on the mainland, and there was also an additional charge to cover cost of transshipping from standard- to narrow-gauge cars, or vice versa. In 1923, as a result of representations before the board by yourself and Mr. J. J. Hughes, a revision was made in the freight rates as affecting Prince Edward Island, with the result that the rates between points on the Island, and also between the Island and mainland points, have been reduced so as not to exceed the rates on the same traffic for the same distances on the mainland. With respect to class rates between Island territory and points in Quebec and Ontario, these were revised placing the Island territory bounded by Borden, Summerside and Charlottetown on the same basis as Halifax, and the balance of the Island territory on the Mulgrave basis, which brought about reductions in these rates. The various changes that were made at this time resulted in quite substantial reductions in the aggregate.

The next change that particularly affected the Atlantic division of the Canadian National Railways was a reduction of approximately 10 per cent on all class rates between points in the Maritime provinces, and between Maritime province points and stations in Ontario, which was made effective April 14th, 1924.

The general basis of freight rates has not been reduced subsequent to the date last mentioned although there have been numerous reductions made covering various individual rates and traffic movements since that date. By this I mean that rates on certain commodities between specific points have been reduced to assist in the development of business and to provide for new markets, but it would be a matter of some labour to go through all the tariffs and give any detailed statement of these changes.

I might also mention that in January, 1925, as an emergency measure, a tariff was issued covering the movement of potatoes from Maritime province points to western Canada at substantially reduced rates for a limited period to assist in the marketing of the surplus that was on hand in the Maritime provinces at that time.

I trust that this information will serve your purpose, but if there is anything further you require, I shall be glad to hear from you.

Yours truly,
W. E. Campbell,
Chief Traffic Officer

Hon. members will note that the rates reached their peak in 1920. This letter shows that these reduced rates became and were effective only at the request of Maritime members and it is very unfair for the hon. member to charge us with doing nothing in that regard. I am not saying that those rates are as low as they should be; I hope we will get further reductions and I am willing to join with any Maritime members in seeking for a further reduction in rates and for justice so far as justice can be done for the Maritime provinces. I do not however think that the whole question of reduction of rates will solve our difficulties in that connection.

Another statement was made that when the Prime Minister went to the Maritime provinces he made no attempt to solve their difficulties and offered them no relief. The right hon. leader of the opposition went down at the same time and openly acknowledged, I think, in his first speech in Nova Scotia that the National Policy had not been beneficial to the Maritime provinces, and that he was of the opinion that a high tariff was not in the interests of the Maritime provinces, and of Nova Scotia particularly. He said, "To offset that, we will give you something else; we will give you a subsidy on freight rates, and if that will not do we will give you something further." In the last contest the gentleman who opposed me took a very decided stand on this question of freight rates. His whole contention was that the rates from western Canada were too low, and that the products of western Canada were displacing the farmers' products in the Maritime provinces very rapidly. The whole theme of his argument was that the western people were given a preference over the people of eastern Canada, and it was charged that in the introduction of the Crowsnest pass rate that we had sacrificed the Maritime provinces for the western provinces. If my hon. friend's contention is right that the Maritime provinces were affected by the cheaper rate from western and central Canada which allowed products to come in to the Maritimes, the suggestion made by the right hon. leader of the opposition to subsidize freight rates east and west of the Maritimes would only make our difficulties down there ten times worse, that is, if the contention of the gentleman who opposed me is correct.

Mr. PRICE: Will the hon. member state what the leader of the opposition said on that occasion? Do not deal in innuendoes; give us facts.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): My hon. friend will have a perfect right to discuss that matter any time he likes. He will find in the newspapers what the right hon. leader of the opposition said, and I do not think he will deny my statement. I think the gist of his remarks was to the effect that the National Policy had not been altogether beneficial to the Maritimes, and to offset this effect which the National Policy had on the Maritime provinces he would supplement out of the treasury of the Dominion the rate on the Canadian National system from western and central Canada to the Maritime provinces and vice versa.

Mr. PRICE: May I ask—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. PRICE: I want to point out that the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. PRICE: He dare not say it—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. PRICE: The hon. gentleman is misrepresenting what the leader of the opposition said.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. PRICE: Absolutely misleading—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): I will give my hon. friend (Mr. Price) a chance to discuss the question in this House any time he wishes but not now.

Mr. PRICE: Give the facts.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): Mr. Speaker, I understand that my time is up. I thank hon. members for their courteous attention.

Mr. R. K. SMITH (Cumberland): My purpose in participating in the debate at this juncture is to register a vigorous protest on behalf of the Maritime provinces, and particularly the province of Nova Scotia, against the cessation of governmental activity because of the very serious situation existing in the Maritime provinces this very day. Before, Sir, taking up that matter, I want to refer for a short time to some of the remarks made by the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald).

Let me say first, Mr. Speaker, that I bow very low to his long public record, his long parliamentary experience, his position as a minister of the crown in this so-called government, and to his seniority. But I take issue with him firmly and absolutely on some points he raised in his address this evening. I take issue with him also Mr. Speaker, in regard to some of the statements he made during the election of 1921 and his refusal, when he had the opportunity in this parliament, with a solid sixteen from Nova Scotia behind him, to implement the solemn promises he made to the electors of Pictou county in 1921. As he has seen fit to quote me, which is his perfect right, I see fit Mr. Speaker, to quote some of the remarks made by him in 1921 and to ask this House and this country, and particularly the Maritime provinces, to say whether any of the promises and the pledges he made in 1921 were carried out by him on the floor of this House.

An hon. MEMBER: Did he go back to Pictou?

Mr. SMITH: No, he went to Antigonish-Guysborough for a very good reason. He told the electors in the county of Pictou in 1921 that if they elected him to parliament and the Mackenzie King government was returned he would bring hope and sunshine into every home in that county. But the hope and sunshine did not arrive in that county, and the result was that he crossed the border and went to Antigonish-Guysborough, and I presume he told the electors of that county that he would bring hope and sunshine to every home in that county. In the town of Stellarton, just a few days before the 1921 election, the hon. Minister of National Defence said:

> I shall, when at Ottawa, insist that they take up and deal with the question of old age pensions and with the matter of unemployment insurance.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that the labour representatives are not in the House at the present time. This promise of old age pensions bears some relation to the promise of the Prime Minister in the supplementary Speech from the Throne. If either one of the Labour members were in the House at the present time, I would ask him, and I believe this House has a right to know, what was promised with respect to old age pensions. What was promised by Mr. King to the Labour members as an amendment to the Criminal Code of Canada? What was promised by the Prime Minister to be brought down as amendments to the Naturalization Act and the Immigration Act, and other assistance they were demanding for the cause of labour?

I am in hearty accord with a great many of the policies which labour is advocating. I do not think they have been treated fairly in the past. I received a great measure of support from them in my constituency in the last election. I believe when we are in a financial position to carry out further reforms that it will be our duty to carry out those reforms. But in regard to old age pensions, Mr. Speaker, the people who would be entitled to receive them will have starved or have left the country before they can benefit by such a provision. It is not fundamental legislation so far as labour is concerned. You must first provide work for the labouring classes of this country, or they will not live until they get to the age at which they would be entitled to a pension. The fundamental question so far as labour is concerned to-day is that we should inaugurate a policy in the Dominion of Canada that will provide them with work so that they may keep themselves and their families from starvation.

I said I would refer to the distressed situation in the province of Nova Scotia. This government decides to have a recess, suspending the country's business and thus making a mockery of our parliamentary institutions, in order to go to the country for the purpose of patching up its shattered forces. Do the actual facts bear out the flattering remarks that appear in the Speech from the Throne in regard to this prosperity which it is alleged exists in this country to-day? I have in my hand a telegram sent to-day from Sydney Mines to the hon. member for Cape Breton North-Victoria (Mr. Johnstone) which reads:

> Conditions at Sydney Mines rapidly approaching crisis. Sixty four hundred dollars subscribed jointly by coal company, United Mine Workers and citizens exhausted. Have no information when work shall be resumed at collieries.

Listen to this:

> Five hundred and fifty families in dire distress. Citizens can do no more and felt government assistance absolutely necessary to deal with the situation. Copy of this sent to Premier.
> M. DYER, Mayor.

In face of the fact that 550 families in Cape Breton island are in dire want, the House of Commons, for the pure purpose of political expediency, decides that it must have a recess in order to enable the government to elect ministers to fill the gaps which are so pronounced on the opposite side.

Mr. McMILLAN: Where is your great Messiah in the Rhodes government?

Mr. SMITH: I can tell the hon. gentleman a lot about the Rhodes government. That government found conditions, bequeathed to them by a Liberal regime, which it will take a considerable time to clean up. But they will be cleaned up, even after forty-three years of trespassing on the rights of the province of Nova Scotia. Moreover, the Rhodes government would never grant any charter such as the late Liberal government of Nova Scotia gave to the British Empire Steel Corporation which created in Nova Scotia a monopoly that has caused considerable distress in that province, and particularly the distress to which reference is made in the telegram I have just read from the mayor of Sydney Mines.

It is fitting at this time to ask what policy will be for the general good of labour, a policy which is fundamentally sound and not one that will provide the working men with something to which they are entitled but which they will never receive for the reason that their days will be cut short by the distress in which they are living at present. I am glad to see the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) in the chamber; I believe he is a champion of labour. I hope he will represent labour in this House. I am informed, and he will correct me if I am wrong, that in the election he opposed a candidate of the very government which he is now supporting. Well, if at that time he opposed a candidate of the government he must surely have been opposed to the policies of that government, and what is responsible for his changed attitude since he has come to this House. I know not.

Mr. HEAPS: I also opposed a Conservative.

Mr. SMITH: That brings up a question which I intended to refer to later. It is not the question whether Conservatives or Liberals should be in power at this time. Mr Mackenzie King issued a manifesto to the people of the country in October when he asked them to return him to power upon certain policies which he submitted to them. What was the result? Leave out of consideration for the moment the Conservative party, the Progressives, the Labour and Independent members. What was the result, I ask? The people decided against Mr. Mackenzie King in the proportion of 101 candidates elected in his party to the rest of the membership of this House of 245. In view of this decision Mr. King had only one plain duty, and that was to resign. The issue was not whether the government should corral enough support from independent sources to enable it to carry on; that was not the issue at all. The issue was very clearly stated by Mr. King at Richmond Hill and throughout the Dominion; he said, "I want the electors to give me a sufficient majority to warrant me in going back to parliament and putting into force those policies which I have not been able to make effective so far because of the meagre majority I have at my command." I say, therefore, to my hon. friend from North Winnipeg that it is not a question of his being opposed to the policy of the Conservative party or the policy of the Liberal party and having to choose between the two. No; that is not the question. His constituency, I presume, sent him back to parliament to oppose the King administration, as did all the other constituencies represented in this House by hon. gentlemen in all quarters who were elected in opposition to the government; and the government has no right to accept, nor is it just in accepting, the support of either Progressives, Independent members, Labour members, or any other faction in this House. The people, I repeat, decided against the King government, and Mr. King, if he wanted to keep faith with them, would not now accept support from these sources, for the constituents of hon. members who were elected in opposition to the government and were returned to parliament for the express purpose of opposing the government, and they should oppose it, irrespective of what the policies of the Conservative party may be.

The Speech from the Throne promises the building of the Hudson Bay railway. Now we from the east have little knowledge of that undertaking; we do not know what it is going to cost nor whether it will be under the control of the Canadian National Railways or not. Has any report been received from Sir Henry Thornton and his engineers on this project. We should like to know these things. We want to know whether there is going to be set up in this country a distinctly dual system of governmental control of the National railways. As matters are now, I for one have not been made acquainted with the intention of the government in this respect. Is this new railway to become a part of the Canadian National system, or is another Canadian National system going to be brought into being entailing high paid officials and all the inevitable paraphernalia of such a system all over the Dominion? These are some of the things we want to know before committing ourselves to such a gigantic project as the Hudson Bay railway, and we are entitled to have that information. The people should know all about the matter before being asked to undertake this project.

Other questions are dealt with in the Speech from the Throne such as rural credits and various other matters which have been carefully gone into by hon. gentlemen who have already spoken. There is, for example, a proposed commission to inquire into Maritime rights. As I said in my maiden speech in this House, we do not need a commission to ascertain what these rights are; we know what they are and we are here to insist upon their recognition.

Reference was made to myself a few days ago by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) who observed that we Maritime righters were not in our proper place when sitting on the left of the Speaker. I want to ask the hon. gentleman where we should go to have Maritime rights recognized. Certainly not to the Mackenzie King government. We sent a delegation of 200 to Ottawa a year ago to urge recognition of our rights without any benefits. We sent 16 representatives in 1921 to support the Liberal party, but our cause was not recognized, and in 1925 they do not know what Maritime rights are. I extend my heartiest congratulations to the hon. member, he is the sole survivor of the virtually extinct species of Liberalism from the province of New Brunswick in this House. Might I say while on that question, Mr. Speaker, that in Nova Scotia to-day the parties in both houses of parliament, local and federal are made up of one Labour member, six Liberals and fifty Conservatives. The hon. member no doubt will receive the reward he is entitled to and be asked to accept a seat in the cabinet now to be reconstructed. New Brunswick is too important a province to go without representation in the government, and I have no doubt that his past services to the party and his ability merit that reward.

Referring again to the hon. Minister of National Defence I would ask him—if he were in the chamber—why the Guysborough railway was not built under the same procedure as the Rouyn railway. The Liberal party made great claims down in Nova Scotia with respect to the building of the Guysborough railway, and said they had done everything in their power to get the road built for the benefit of the people in Guysborough and the adjoining counties. But evidently they did not do everything in their power, because I understand that a certain act was placed on the statute books in 1915, and according to the way they dealt with the Rouyn railway, I believe they would have been able to pursue the same procedure to bring about the construction of the Guysborough railway. But I do not admit that they were really entitled to build the Rouyn railway in that way, nor do I admit they they could have built the Guysborough railway by following a similar course. But having taken the wrong course in that case, they could easily have repeated the wrong and built the Guysborough railway, instead of bringing in a bill to authorize its construction, which bill they knew was a sham because it would be and was rejected by the upper chamber.

Mr. L. LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains). (Translation): Mr. Speaker, allow me to make a few comments in my mother tongue —were it but to assert again the principle, already acknowledged long ago, of the use of the two official languages in this country—that tongue of which André Chénier was able to say: The most beautiful language born on human lips.

I am happy, Sir, to take part in this debate and support, as a member of the Liberal party, the so dignified, tactful and energetic attitude taken by the acting Prime Minister, the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). It really is a pleasure to assist in the efforts made by all the members of this government and I shall add, moreover, in the offorts made by our congenial colleagues in this House, the Progressive members. I cannot, however, pay the same compliment to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and to his followers who, for weeks, have been obstructing legislation and will have to answer to the people of Canada for the enormous expenditure which, each day, they are the cause. Where are these gentlemen who, in the course of the last electoral campaign, proclaimed themselves the champions of economy? I ask you, Sir, were they sincere? Were they in earnest when they advocated economy and when, to-day, they confine themselves to obstruction which threatens to become everlasting? That is why the government has thought fit to take energetic means, and I deny the leader of the opposition's right of being shocked with regard to this measure since it is his own child. He was its father not under similar circumstances as do now apply to it; but he was the author of it at a time when all men having the interest of their country at heart, wished to protest as to Canada bleeding itself to death in order to participate in the wars of the empire; he was its father at that time just as he charged, this afternoon, the hon. Minister of Justice of being the father of the measure to-day.

I must congratulate the Minister of Justice who in a way comes forward as the standard bearer of the rights of the people in this House. He is the bulwark of these rights because knowing himself well supported by us, he wants to put an end to this deluge of words characteristic of an incompetence unsurpassed but by its own insignificance.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot refrain from pointing out to the energetic and strong stand taken by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). I am happy, although not always agreeing with him in his views and principles, to offer him this sincere mark of my admiration, and to observe that he has lost nothing of his eloquence and energy of days gone by, that this eloquence also is still persuasive and fiery and can only find its equal but in his high intellectual culture.

When I speak thus, when I express myself frankly, clearly and precisely, I know I am voicing the general feeling of my county. Have we not obtained in this House, the sanction of the people through the unquestionable majority we repeatedly have been registering up to this day? Are not the people backing us up? Is not the established authority of this country supporting us, and does not the majority of the representatives of the people constitute the established authority?

That is why, to-day, we are fearless in suppressing the unceasing obstruction of those who oppose our measures. We are in duty bound to govern because the people, through their representation in this House, have decreed that we were the government. This is why we have no fear in saying: desperate diseases require desperate remedies.

I state that it is absolutely wrong for the opposition to have, week after week held this House in suspense, when the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) stated a short while ago, that the opposition had no desire for a holiday, I was in no way astounded, as the opposition has been enjoying a holiday for already five weeks. And when the hon. member further stated that after giving it serious consideration he had changed his mind, I would ask him to also return to his first love, to the sacred ties of the Liberal party whose cherished aims are the country's happiness, prosperity and glory.

I was listening, a few moments ago to the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn). Hamilton! The prophetical word of to-day, since it sums up the new political policy of the right hon. leader of the opposition. Hamilton! The famous Hamilton speech! which, thank God, the province of Quebec did not swallow down at the last election in Bagot. And how could they believe in that speech when the most intimate satellites of the leader of the opposition were criticizing him throughout Ontario? It is not necessary to name these members, however, beneath the velvet paw we felt the claws of these satellites of the leader of the opposition.

I do not wish, Sir, to further impose on your kindness. Allow me, by the way, to add a few words with reference to the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) who, the other day, in this House, made a speech lasting five hours and a half. His attitude seems somewhat strange, especially when one beholds him sitting on the same row as the right hon. leader of the opposition, he who always acknowledged Mr. Patenaude as his leader in the province of Quebec. The same remark applies to the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White) whose newspaper so strongly condemned the attitude taken by the opposition these last days. I trust that the high ideals of these two hon. members will have a beneficial influence on the opposition.

In closing my remarks, Mr. Speaker, allow me to state that I rose not to harshly criticize the opposition, but because the interest of the country at large demanded it, and because we need, we on the government side, to reorganize the cabinet, to complete our legislation and bring it down before parliament in order to carry out our sessional programme. That is what the people demand of us, to-day, and that is why I have taken part in this debate.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my hon. friends opposite on the courage they have displayed in moving closure. It is a courage, of course, born of necessity, but nevertheless I congratulate them because it indicates a recognition on their part that closure is an efficient instrument in the hands of a government to permit public business to be transacted. I have nothing to say as to the reasons why they have changed the views they held in days long since passed. I feel that it is not to be held against those who govern that they see fit to change their minds and adopt more modern methods when they have seen the error of their ways and realize the virtue of that to which they were opposed.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that it must be rather difficult for the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird) to contemplate the situation which has arisen. There are two forms of closure. The closure that we have in this House dates back in the British House, if my memory serves me right, to 1858, but long before that, for three centuries, there was a form of closure known as closure by debate, whereby a member moved the previous question and that had to be disposed of. It is true that members might speak on it, but that was closure by debate. Now we have in this House the beautiful spectacle of the hon. member for Nelson conceiving in a moment the happy idea of availing himself of the rules, making it known to my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe)—who received the intimation with pleasure, if not with gratitude. And when it was known that the hon. member for Nelson proposed to do this, everyone on the opposite side of the House expressed his pleasure and admiration at the genius of the hon. member in discovering this method of terminating the debate. When this closure by debate was proposed, smiles adorned the faces of my hon. friends opposite, who looked so sad in days past—the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) for example, when he saw this debate dragging on. When I saw the smile on his countenance my heart rejoiced within me, but now what have we in the way of gratitude?—"A lively hope of favours yet to come." Imagine if you can, Mr. Speaker, anything more cruel than to see the hon. member for Nelson called upon this afternoon to vote for closure by force or by majority as against that closure which he proposed, by debate. I have seen some amusing spectacles in my time, but never one more amusing than the way in which the hon. member faced the bullets of the enemy and rose like a hero to cast his vote. Such a man is fit subject indeed for an epic poem.

So closure by force, by brute force, by majority, has taken the place of that other closure by debate about which, in days long since past, my hon. friends to the left used to proclaim so loudly. And my hon. friends from Winnipeg! Oh, dear; closure by force; free speech; the gag! Is it possible that they have forgotten the closure by debate and are now no longer against closure by gag? New times, new manners, new methods, new morals.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the debate to which we have just listened has not been wholly without merit and without benefit to the state. We have heard many things we would otherwise not have heard. We have heard of the difficulties that confront the people of the lower provinces in carrying on government, and I am sure no one in this House who has listened to the tale which has been unfolded has not been stirred in his heart and made willing and determined to do what he could to better their conditions. I would be recreant to the country from which I came and in which I was born if I did not feel deep sympathy. I count it the only merit I have that I was born in the lower provinces. When I think of the contributions which those provinces have made to this House, to this country and to public service; when I think of the contributions hon. gentlemen sitting on this side of the House are making to-night and which they have made in their speeches during the last few weeks, I cannot help thinking that there must be, in the intelligence, enterprise and industry of the Canadian people, the skill and power to evolve some scheme which will bring peace, happiness and prosperity to these provinces which are now suffering. I do not for a single moment think—nay, I do not even suggest—that there are in this House, even on the government benches, men who would not better these conditions if they knew how, if they could conceive some method by which that could be done. These conditions can only be improved if we bring to bear upon their improvement a clear conception of the desirability of maintaining confederation as it was originated, by a system of compromises. After all, compromise government is what must be resorted to by all parties if we are to govern and rule. When I find one of the provinces of this Dominion represented in this House by men of the talent and calibre and capacity to think and speak that we have heard during the last few weeks, then I say if for no other reason this debate has not been in vain.

But, Sir, there has been one other matter brought up in this parliament that I regard as of paramount importance. It has been shown beyond peradventure of a doubt that there has been abuse of the powers which are falsely alleged to rest in certain parties with respect to the construction of railways. I cannot read the statutes as carefully as I have endeavoured to read them, the statutes of 1915 and of 1919, and believe for a single moment that the hon. gentlemen who constitute the government of this country will, when they soberly and calmly consider the matter, regard the action that has been taken with respect to the Rouyn railway except as an open defiance of the power and authority of parliament.

Mr. Speaker, it strikes further than the mere construction of a railway. It is not a question of whether or not you may construct forty-five miles of railway in any province; it is whether or not the money of this Dominion shall be expended without the authority of this parliament. I understand that my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) said this afternoon that they were not in the least concerned or worried about that, because the proceeding was regular in form in every particular, and had behind it the sanction of high legal authority. But, Sir, may I remind you of a matter of which you are well aware; when the great Gladstone had to appoint to the Privy Council a judge, and the statute said that those eligible for the position should be men who had held high judicial positions, Sir John Collier, an eminent legal practitioner, a man whose capacity was undoubted, was appointed to the Court of Common Pleas, and then, after he had remained there a few days, sent on to the Privy Council. Public opinion on the matter in England was so strong that Mr.

Gladstone had to apologize, in almost abject terms, to the British people for having thus violated the sense of a statute. The statute of 1915 was passed long before the Canadian National system was created, long before we had an amalgamation and consolidation of government roads. Yet that statute is resorted to to justify the passing of an order in council declaring that a branch of railway not yet under construction to be in the interests of the people of Canada, to be operated as part of the government system of railways, a system, Sir, which no longer exists, because there is no longer a government system of railways—the system of railways we now have is the Canadian National system; its name, its power, its corporate rights being determined by statute. Despite the provisions we have inserted in our statutes to protect the public exchequer, we are now told it is in the public interest, not that a branch line should be acquired, but that a branch line should be built and then acquired by a form of lease that is nothing better than a bond guarantee. Under these circumstances I say parliament should be consulted.

I am not concerned about the construction of the railway. I believe it is essential that that road should be built into that country, in order that that great mining camp, the richness of which we do not yet know, should be developed. I believe in all that; but, Sir, I am vitally concerned, and every man in this House must be vitally concerned, that parliament's rights and powers should not be abrogated, and that defiance should not be flung at this parliament by any set of men however eminent they may be. It is for that reason I ask my friends carefully to consider the situation, and if for no other reason this debate had dragged along, it would have been justified on that ground alone, and the position we have taken would have been vindicated. I ask hon. gentlemen to consider these statutes, that agreement, that lease, and the order in council,—by which hon. gentlemen opposite, when they have read it for the first time, will have learned how easy it is to make a lease into a bond guarantee and how facile indeed are the conditions that have been inserted by men who do not practise their profession in this country to see to it that this Dominion, with all its power and might and financial resources, is put behind an ordinary harmless lease by the government of a branch line not yet built—I ask the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) calmly and carefully to consider this agreement in the light of the statutes, in the light of their plain meaning. It is true that in a court of law Hansard is not to be quoted as an authority, but it is clear that the statute of 1915 applied only to existing lines, branch lines in the lower provinces and Quebec. The very terms of it will abundantly make that clear.

Sir, I have a suggestion to make to my friends opposite with respect to the Canadian National Railways, and this gives me an opportunity to do so. If I venture to criticize the Canadian National Railways, I am told that I am an enemy of its president. If, on the other hand, as a shareholder of the Canadian Pacific railway I attend its meetings, I am not criticized for exercising my right as a shareholder. Mr. Speaker, I am a shareholder to-day in the Canadian National railway system; I in common with every member of this House am a shareholder in that road. We people of Canada are the shareholders, and how may we express our criticism of the conduct of that road unless we are afforded an opportunity to do so? I deny, Sir, the right of any person to say that it is high treason or lèse majesté for any member of this House to criticize the chief executive of that system. I hold I have a right as a shareholder to point out conditions as they arise, suggest remedies, and offer criticisms. That is all I claim. The real weakness of the Canadian National railway system to-day is that there is no provision for a meeting of its shareholders. With every other corporation there is an opportunity afforded for men to meet together and criticize and discuss the corporate actions of the executive. But no such power is here, and we have no body of directors except those appointed by the governor in council, and that body of directors happens to be a perfectly useless body, composed of men selected for political services. I do not for a moment say that the party who sits to your left, Mr. Speaker, would not do the same; I am not that sort of man at the moment, but I do desire to point out that the board of directors we now have is a board of directors wholly unequal to the task imposed upon them by law of determining matters of interest to the railway.

Mr. Speaker, I have a suggestion to make; it may or may not be constructive. My proposal is that we should have nine directors of the Canadian National system, one from each province in this confederation, little and big, Prince Edward Island having one, Ontario and Quebec each having one, and one only, making nine in all, because the Canadian National system functions in every province in Canada. I suggest to you, Sir, that these nine directors be elected on a joint ballot of this House of Commons and the Senate and of all the legislatures of all the provinces of Canada.

Mr. MERCIER (Laurier-Outremont): Unwieldy.

Mr. BENNETT: It would not be the least unwieldy because we would profit by continuity of service, with three directors say, retiring each year, as they do on the Canadian Pacific. They would be elected free from political direction and control, because, by a joint ballot, with the ballots written or printed, you may be able to get and would in time be able to get men of light and leading and of business capacity who would give that support to the chief executive that the duties of his office require. I make that suggestion; it may not be worth anything, but I have given it after time and attention spent to ascertain some method whereby the shareholders of the Canadian National Railways, the people of Canada, might be able to make their voice felt in its management, and criticize without being held to be enemies of the system. I regard that as fatal alike to the successful administration of the property and to the interests of the Canadian people. So upon that ground, too, I submit, Mr. Speaker, we have been justified in maintaining this debate.

But there is one reason that I cannot appreciate; there is one action that has been taken that I find it difficult to follow. When was this closure moved? It was not moved until the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Boys) said that when the Prime Minister came into the House we would adjourn. Since when did my hon. friends to the right desire to keep the Prime Minister out of the House? I know what was bothering my hon. friends opposite. They knew perfectly well that if the Prime Minister came into this parliament by the front door, with the Speech from the Throne not disposed of, he would have so many explanations to offer, so many Richmond Hill utterances to explain, so many Moose Jaw speeches to reiterate, that my hon. friends who sit to my left might desert him in a body and he who came in at the front door might ignominously go out at the back. I cannot but congratulate my friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) upon the skill and enterprise that he has shown in leading this House through the chaos that has developed during the absence of the Prime Minister, but never was his skill greater or his touch finer than when he saw to it that the closure was moved before the Prime Minister entered this House. Can one imagine the look on the faces of hon. gentlemen to the left listening to the explanations given to those who are no longer "outlaws", no longer outcasts, but have become the bosom friends of the Prime Minister? Do you remember, Sir, the great recantation of Galileo when he said: "But the world still goes round"? I can fancy the Prime Minister, after he had made his great recantation, after he had forgotten his Richmond Hill, Moose Jaw, Calgary and Edmonton speeches, resuming his seat and looking disgustedly over at the twenty-five or thirty members who sit to our left, thinking of the day when he would get along without them and saying: "They are still outlaws". Can you imagine that, Mr. Speaker? Nothing was finer than the courage which kept out of this House, until the Speech from the Throne was disposed of, the medium of communication between the Sovereign and this House.

But that is not all. Why, we have my friends to our left telling us of the glories of democracy and what they must do to maintain their high ideals in this House. I put them this question: In a moment or two you will vote. By your votes if you unite with us you will give the sovereign will of the people once more an opportunity to express itself at the polls. By voting with my hon. friends opposite for closure by force and not by debate, you will say: We have wrung from these people that which in days gone by they opposed and they who were our enemies have now become our friends. How long do you suppose you will be useful after your usefulness has gone? It is difficult to understand intelligent, high idealists, as my hon. friends to the left are, concluding that they will be more useful than an old shoe after they have served their purpose. Why, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice in moving the closure saw in a moment that he had put them into the position of voting to closure their own motion. He can hereafter say: "It was your act, not ours, because without you we could not have done it."

But there is something more important I say to my hon. friends to the left and it is this: I ventured to say it when I first spoke in this House, and I repeat it. What think you, after all, you are doing with the great democratic institutions of this country? If to-day because you have power, authority and weight in numbers and are able to throw yourselves into the balance to save our friends to the right from being destroyed, what do you think you have done to democracy? You have sacrificed your principles. You say not, but the very moment you wring from men by force that which is not supported by the voice of the people, you have done an injury to democracy. The cry of my hon. friends to the left has always been: Let the will of the people decide. The people have never had an opportunity to decide on the measures my hon. friends are now compelling this government to give them in order that it may remain in power. No longer can my hon. friends to my left be true to their great traditions and high ideals and still support this administration. I say to them: To-night you have your chance, and if you let it go it goes forever into the darkness of the night. But I hope the light has come and we shall find my hon. friends to the left voting not with the goats but with the sheep.

Mr. C. R. McINTOSH (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the splendid address of the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) I am convinced that the time has about arrived for us to have another vote in this assembly, but before that vote takes place I would crave the attention of not only yourself, Sir, but the members of this House. The hon. member for West Calgary intimated that the Prime Minister would be kept from appearing in this chamber for a certain number of weeks. The Prime Minister of Canada, for we actually have a Prime Minister of Canada, will be in this chamber a few weeks hence. We all know how he was elected by one of the most splendid majorities in the history of Dominion politics. Before the Prime Minister comes into this assembly—and he will come in by the front door—he will be in good hands because he will be in the hands of the people of the Dominion of Canada.

The hon. member for West Calgary touched on the question of the Canadian National Railways. I have no doubt about the future of the Canadian National Railways. A railway that belongs to the people of Canada, a railway that showed an operating profit four years ago of $2,000,000, three years ago of $20,000,000, two years ago of $17,000,000 and this last year of $32,000,000, or an increase in surplus in four years of from $2,000,000 to $32,000,000, has certainly a splendid future before it if the people of Canada will give it the backing it ought to have. I congratulate the hon. member for West Calgary upon one special point he made in connection with the Canadian National Railways. I believe the railway board should be a representative one, representing every province in Canada, because in that way we can get better results in the days to come.

One of the opposition speakers, I think it was the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Smith), referred to the question of Maritime rights and endeavoured to show that the Liberal party and those who support it do not know what those rights mean. That is just the point: I do not believe the people of the Maritime provinces themselves know what they want. The people of the west do not know what the Maritime provinces signify. The people of Canada as a whole do not, but the policy of this government is to appoint a royal commission and have the matter investigated in order to give the facts to the Canadian people. Let us go to work and solve that problem for the benefit of a United Canada.

Mr. PRICE: What about the royal commission—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McINTOSH: The hon. member used the expression, in connection with an hon. member on this side of the House, that he was the sole surviving species of Liberalism.

Mr. SMITH: In this House, I said.

Mr. McINTOSH: That is what I said. When we have in my hon. friend the sole surviving species of Liberalism, especially when the species is an outstanding one, we can have great hope for the future. Liberalism will grow and develop, and if it will propagate ideas it will save Canada just as much as any other party in the future.

The same hon. gentlemen stated that the Mackenzie King administration lost the support and the confidence of the Canadian people on October 29. From a purely political standpoint there may be some truth in that argument; but this is a day of co-operation, and from the standpoint of political co-operation, from the standpoint of party co-operation in this House, there is nothing in the argument. Time and again during the last two months this has been demonstrated. After all the addresses we have heard, after all the speakers we have listened to—and they have been many and splendid—I have thought of an expression which was used in the early days of Canadian development. When the Canadian Pacific railway project was in its early stages; when there was doubt whether the road would be built, and when it was thought that if built it would be a failure, that financially it would not be what it ought to be for the Dominion, leaders on both sides of politics in those days were decrying the proposal. Many prominent Liberals and Conservatives thought the Canadian Pacific railway might not be a success. Others thought otherwise. The Hon. Edward Blake, in an article on the Canadian Pacific railway, concluded with the statement that the Canadian Pacific railway when it would be built would be lost in a sea of mountains. That is, that when the Canadian Pacific railway should wind its way from east to west, from our great chain of inland seas, lakes and rivers across the great divide between Ontario and Manitoba, over the prairies and on to the Pacific coast, it would be to a certain extent a failure on account of the mountains between the prairies and the coast. So to-day in listening to the many addresses in this House I have thought that hon. members of the opposition and their arguments have been lost, if not in a sea of mountains, in a sea of majorities.

An hon. MEMBER: Where are they?

Mr. McINTOSH: Now, what about majorities in connection with the work of the House since this session opened? Parliament was convened on January 7 and officially opened on January 8. The first real debate we had in the House was on the question of the right of the government to carry on. Our opposition friends said: "You are violating all the principles of parliamentary procedure, all the principles of parliamentary life, all the rights of parliament." They said that the Liberal government was not a real committee of the House and consequently was not competent to carry on. That debate lasted a week, and upon its conclusion the government had a majority of three, the vote being 123 to 120. That is one majority in which the contention of our friends opposite was upset. Then another majority was given on February 1, when the protectionist amendment of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) was lost on a vote of 125 to 115, being a majority of ten against the loyal opposition of the day. Then we had another vote on February 2, on a motion to adjourn the debate. That motion was negatived by a vote of 124 to 114, another majority of ten. We had another vote on February 2 to adjourn the House, the government being sustained by a vote of 119 to 118, a majority of one. Then on February 5 we had two votes in connection with the adjournment to March 15. On one vote the figures were 119 to 112, a majority of seven. Then we had the vote on the main motion, and the figures were 120 to 112, another majority against the opposition in this House. Then on February 8 we had the Speaker's ruling upheld by a vote of 87 to 71, the government having a majority of sixteen. On February 16 the Australian treaty amendment, as it might be called, was defeated in this House by a vote of 119 to 108, a majority of eleven, and then we had the closure motion upheld in this House to-day by a vote of 108 to 95, one of the best majorities we have had during this session. The fact that our majority was thirteen will not prove unlucky, because politically the number 13 is said to be a very lucky number. The result of the different votes in the House gave the government a majority on the different dates as follows:

	Government majority
January 15	3
February 1	10
February 2	10
February 2	1
February 5	7
February 5	8
February 8	16
February 16	11
March 2	13

In all we have had a majority of 79, or an average majority on every motion brought up in the House of approximately nine.

Then we have our opposition friends going around the country and talking in such a way as to create the impression that they should constitute the government. Why, if they organized a government and the right hon. leader of the opposition became the leader of that government to-morrow, co-operatively speaking, having regard to the majorities I have mentioned, he could not hold office. The consequence would be that there would have to be another general election, and if there were another general election the chances of the Conservative party would not be improved.

An hon. MEMBER: Let us have it.

Mr. McINTOSH. You will get it when the time comes. In respect to the question of closure, I believe that the introduction of closure at the present time can be justified. This House has been in session for two months. We have talked and talked. I believe the general opinion of the country is that all parties in this House have talked too much during the last two months. I believe the wish of the people of Canada and the verdict of the people of Canada, if you could get it, would be for this government to get down to business.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McINTOSH: My hon. friends on the other side pound their desks, but I know the thought I am giving expression to is the one that they have in common among themselves, and with their co-operation and the co-operation of all parties it may not be a difficult matter to get down to business. I believe the majority should rule, and since I have proved that on every occasion when the vote was taken in this House the ministerial party have had a majority, we have a perfect right to introduce closure, to put the clamps on the opposition and to say: "Now is the time for this parliament to clear the decks for action, bring down the programme of the government and introduce legislation to carry out that programme."

There is another reason why the closure should be upheld at the present time. I believe the Speech from the Throne involves policies which will redound to the glory of Canada, and when we analyze the programme question by question we shall find that the legislation which it foreshadows will prove, when enacted, the best that has been passed in this Dominion during the last quarter of a century. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) not very long ago, in referring to this portion of the House, characterized it as the Saskatchewan colony. Well, I am proud to belong to the province of Saskatchewan; I am proud to come from that sunny part of the Dominion, the land of the west where Canadian development is taking place on such a large scale and where perhaps the destiny of Canada lies to a greater extent than in any other part of the country. Let me tell the right hon. gentleman that, whether the Saskatchewan members constitute a colony in this House or not, that colony has performed a very useful service in supporting this government. Without the support of the members from Saskatchewan it would not be possible for the government to carry on to-day, and I believe that with the combined efforts of Quebec and Saskatchewan, two of the banner provinces of Canada, we can go forward and realize those high ideals of Liberalism and national progress which will make Canada a great and prosperous nation.

Before I conclude there is just one point I wish to touch upon. From the standpoint of colonial development Saskatchewan has proved most successful. The old Tory idea of colonial development was that Canada existed for the profit of the Motherland; it was a land of snow and ice and of forests, and in the early days at any rate the prevalent notion among Tories was that Canadian development was synonymous with the profit of the empire. We have got beyond that stage of thinking; we are to-day a free nation within the British Empire. Canada, if it is properly developed, has a great future before it. Tories of old had the idea that she would never enjoy the political rights which are hers to-day; but Canada has gone on and prospered, and I believe that the province of Saskatchewan will play an increasingly important part in the future development of this Dominion.

In closing, may I express the hope that after this test vote is taken to-night and we return to our homes for a week or so we shall come back later on prepared to enact such legislation as will be a credit to this House and to the country as a whole.

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): In the midst of this river of discussion, "a little nonsense now and then is relished by the best of men". I have heard so many members on the floor of this House say that their homes are in the province of Nova Scotia that I have naturally recalled the occasion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's first visit to the west. He was entertained at Ladner's Landing, on the delta of the Fraser, by a warm friend of my own named William Ladner. In the course of that function, acting as host, he told the gathering which included Sir Wilfrid and another good friend, Mr. D. C. Fraser, afterwards Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia, that if they wanted to see the finest country in the world they had only to go outdoors, where they would behold land, that would produce 14,000 bushels of wheat to the acre. Mr. Fraser at once declared, "We had some liars in Nova Scotia but I never knew that any of them had settled here."

In my opinion the application of closure in this discussion has not come before its time. Many of us consider that it was due weeks ago; but possibly it is well that hon. gentlemen opposite have been allowed to go the limit, in an almost continuous exhibition of their policy of obstruction,—a scene, tragic to the Tory party,—a scene deeply expressive, in almost every Tory countenance, of those momentous words, "so near and yet so far". You, Mr. Speaker, may be able to recall the famous expression of a one time respected member of this House, uttered in true Irish brogue, that a Tory out of office was like a she bear deprived of her cubs. Well, Sir, this House has fully demonstrated that the Tory party, at bay on the floor of parliament, is even worse than that. But every unjust accusation, every epithet hurled across the floor in their desperation, both ungenerous and uncalled for, has been met by that feeling which is conscious of the right and that quiet dignity of reserve which will always appeal to the best judgment of the House and of the country.

To think that the once great Conservative party, that party which has always plumed itself on the possession of a monopoly in its loyalty to the crown, is now represented by a class of men in this parliament who make themselves ridiculous by refusing to allow even an expression of thanks to the crown for the gracious speech which His Excellency has been pleased to convey to us. At all times it is the duty of every member to uphold and maintain the dignity of parliament. We have seen too much in the public press. Too much has fallen from the lips of hon. gentlemen opposite, who by their words have shown themselves unworthy of those they would revile. Never was any body of independent representatives less open to such sordid charges. These men from the west, both Liberal and Progressive, represent the very soul of honour and they have the highest conception of the duties and responsibilities of their position. As befits the great section of the country from which they come, they are not narrow or circumscribed in their opinions; they are like the rest of us here, endeavouring to do their duty, and in doing so they ally themselves with men of vision, men of high purpose, that together we may maintain Canada on that great highway which will lead to a just realization of the possibilities that lie before us.

Sir, the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) pulled off a good joke the other night in his reference to Mr. Mackenzie King's ability as an angler after Progressive support, and also to the unavailing efforts of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Rogers), and to the fact that the Hon. Manning Doherty had been down here for a whole month fishing and never got a bite. The hon. member gave Mr. Mackenzie King credit for being the only expert angler in the bunch. But, Sir, one weakness of the hon. gentleman's reference lies in the fact that he did not go far enough; he did not complete the picture; if he had done so, the mystery would have vanished, and the whole picture would be as clear as the noonday sun. When these hon. gentlemen were busy fishing they were not fishing for themselves, they were fishing for their leader, the right hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen), and in their sport they mistook the calibre of their game. They thought the Progressives were men of their own calibre, and so they loaded their hooks with Arthur Meighen-Hugh Guthrie-Bob Rogers-Manning Doherty bait. But it was the wrong kind of bait. No wonder they dropped their fishing in disgust. They now know to their sorrow that they might have fished till doomsday and never have caught any of the fish they were after with that bait. Mr. Mackenzie King had nothing to do with the fishing. His only duty was to provide the right kind of bait. It was the leader of the House (Mr. Lapointe) who loaded his hook with the right kind of bait, with "Mackenzie King bait," otherwise known as the "best-interests-of-Canada" bait. And he went off in his own jolly way, and by his continuously overflowing good nature was able not only to squash the opposition but to captivate this House so that he has to-day behind him and across the way more loyal support than any government has had in years, a support that will be continued so long as the government do their duty. It is the earnest hope, it is the feeling deep down in the heart of every member on this side of the House, including the members of the cabinet, that the government will go forward and do their duty—do it as they have done in days gone by, with honour to themselves and benefit to the country.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Bird), which was agreed to on the following division:

LOCARNO TREATY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, now that we have the Prime Minister with us—whom I am happy to welcome to this House—I should like to put a question to the government. During the recess a Canadian Press cable appeared in the press in the following terms—I quote this from the Montreal Gazette of March 9:

Labour members of the House of Commons heckled Lieut.-Col. L. C. Amery, Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, at to-day's session concerning the publishing of the dominion's opinions in regard to Locarno treaties. Colonel Amery fenced his questioners skilfully, and stated that publication must depend somewhat on the feeling of the dominions themselves. If the dominions were willing he must then consult with the Foreign Secretary.

Colonel Amery finally announced that the treaties would be fully discussed at the Imperial Conference to be held in October leaving the impression that he had little intention of revealing beforehand what had already passed between Whitehall and the dominions.

The Prime Minister was not in the House at the beginning of the session when I requested the leader of the House, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), to have this correspondence laid on the table as soon as possible, to enable intelligent consideration of the question by the members of this House. Later on, if I remember rightly, the hon. Minister of Justice stated that the government had not yet heard from London whether or not the correspondence should be published. If this despatch gives a correct resumé of the answer of the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, it would appear that the objection has come from some of the dominions, although neither Canada nor any other of the dominions is mentioned. I should like to ask the Prime Minister, if he has no objection, to enlighten the House on the subject, so we may know whether or not the objection has arisen in London or has come from some of the overseas dominions that the correspondence should not be revealed to the so-called sister nations before it has been looked into by the small close chamber in London, next fall.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before I reply to my hon. friend's question, perhaps I may be permitted to thank him for his cordial words of welcome?

I anticipated that this question might be asked to-day, and having in mind the importance of avoiding any misunderstanding with respect to the answer to be given, I deemed it advisable to communicate in the first instance with the Prime Minister of Great Britain and intimate to him the reply which the government intended to make to the question should it be asked. As the hon. member has just stated, my colleague the Minister of Justice informed the House that we were in communication with the British government and had requested that we should be permitted to bring down the correspondence. The British government thought it unwise to have the correspondence produced. Under the circumstances it seemed to our government advisable that the reasons therefor should be expressed in terms to be agreed upon between the British government and ourselves.

I shall therefore ask the House to pardon me if I read the reply which I propose to make to my hon. friend's question, and which reply in form and substance is that agreed to by the Prime Minister of Great Britain and myself:

Following the request made in parliament for publication of the correspondence exchanged between the British and Canadian governments on the subject of the treaties of Locarno, including the preceding negotiations, the adoption of the treaties and any exchange of views upon the adhesion of the dominions, we advised the British government that the Canadian government was prepared to accede so far as any communications on its part were concerned, and asked to be informed of the views of the British government as to the publication of its despatches. We are informed by the British government that they do not see their way to consent to the publication of their despatches, as they were of a detailed character, covering many phases of the negotiations and in many cases containing confidential information as to the views of foreign governments. The British government considers that the publication of this correspondence would be prejudicial to future free interchange of opinion, whether with foreign governments or between the different governments of the empire. Without prejudice to the position that in general it is advantageous to make public as much as possible of such exchanges of opinion, we are prepared to agree that in this instance the objection of the British government to the publication of despatches embodying conversations with foreign governments is well taken. The British government has agreed to the publication of that part of the correspondence which relates to the proposal to hold an Imperial conference in October, 1926.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Can I secure from the government to-day any statement as to its policy with respect to adherence to the Locarno treaty?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I think on reflection my right hon. friend will perhaps agree that it would be better to take up the Locarno matter at a stated time, and that time some time other than that at which the League of Nations is holding its assembly in Geneva. I do not know that my remark applies so much to a statement of the government's policy as it does to possible debate and comment that might arise upon it, and for that reason I intend later in the day, should we reach Motions, to ask my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) not to proceed with the first motion standing in his name. As my right hon. friend well knows, the conference at Geneva is not likely to occupy more than a few days longer, and I think it is inadvisable that any comment should take place either in this House or in the press of the country at the present time which might directly or indirectly have a bearing upon the proceedings there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am in entire agreement with the Prime Minister as to the wisdom of deferring discussion in view of probable differences of opinion that would occur. I cannot see the bearing though of the present critical situation at Geneva upon the announcement of the government's intention, because doubtless the British government knows the government's intention in that respect—at least, I presume it does.

BUTTER TARIFFS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria, B.C.): Mr. Speaker, while the tariff on butter entering Canada from the United States is some 4 cents a pound, I noticed in the press recently that the United States has raised the tariff on butter entering from Canada from 8 cents to 12 cents a pound. What does the government intend to do under the circumstances?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the price of butter in Canada to-day is higher than it has been for some years, and the tariff against United States butter has not been altered for some years.

CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. EDMUND BRISTOL (Toronto East Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the government and the House to a short quotation from the Buffalo Evening News in reference to the diversion of water by the Chicago authorities, containing an attack that is apparently being made on this government and the Dominion in respect to the matter. Under date of March 10 the following despatch was sent from Washington:

> A resolution offered by Mr. Gorman recites that "the government of Canada and certain Canadian water-power interests had erroneously contended that the water is unlawfully withdrawn."

They are undertaking an investigation according to this paragraph:

> A joint resolution providing for an investigation of the right of Chicago to divert water from lake Michigan was introduced in the House to-day.
> The investigators would be empowered to inquire into the activities of public officials and their associates who are "directly or indirectly receiving remuneration from Canadian authorities for disseminating false propaganda against Chicago's diversion of water."

The despatch continues:

> "The report is current," the resolution said, "that this erroneous Canadian propaganda is being disseminated and kept alive in the United States by public officials, who themselves or through professional and business associates are receiving remuneration for their services from water-power and other interests of Canada.

Will the Prime Minister or the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) enlighten the House with respect to this matter?

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, I have not had my attention directed to the article in question, but I can assure the House that so far as I am aware no officials of this government are giving out any information whatever. If the officials of the American government are in receipt of moneys from water-power interests in Canada, I assure my hon. friend that this is certainly not with the knowledge or consent of this government.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): With further reference to the question of the hon. member for Toronto East Centre (Mr. Bristol), I should like to ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) in view of the fact that Canada is as much interested in the diversion at Chicago as are those states which are fighting Chicago before the Supreme Court of the United States, and in view of such statements published in the press as those quoted by the hon. member for Toronto East Centre, has the Canadian government any representative present at these proceedings to look after Canada's interests and to see that Canada also backs up the opposition to the steal which Chicago is carrying on?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We cannot be officially represented, but we are watching every move that is made. The government is being kept fully informed of all the proceedings whether before the Supreme court, in congress or elsewhere, but we are not offically represented.

PERSONNEL OF CABINET

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister, now that he has returned—and whom I am also pleased to welcome with a welcome which will be all the more sincere if we are able to get the information I ask for—if he is able to tell the House now the intention of his government or rather of himself with respect to the filling of ministerial portfolios, and especially as to whether Hon. Mr. Marler, Hon. Mr. Massey and Hon. Mr. Sinclair are still members of his government, and if not, when they ceased to be such. Not omitting the particularity of that question, I wish to add the general question again, what does the government purpose to do with regard to the vacant portfolios?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I first of all should like to thank my right hon. friend for his welcome. If it is pleasing to him to see me back, I can assure him it is also very pleasing to myself to be sitting opposite to him again. In regard to the question which my right hon. friend has asked, he will probably have observed that the government is proceeding fairly rapidly and fairly satisfactorily with the filling of the vacant portfolios. I am pleased to be able to stand here as one minister of the crown, who, having been defeated, has been again returned. I hope that to-morrow it may be possible to announce that another minister has been returned; if not to-morrow, possibly a week hence. Within a fortnight I hope it will be possible to announce that a third minister has been returned. I believe there are five vacancies altogether, or rather that at the beginning of the session there were five vacancies, the remaining two, namely the portfolio of Minister of Trade and Commerce and that of Minister of Immigration and Colonization we hope will be filled in due course. I might say to my right hon. friend that at the time of his administration, just prior to the time at which the present government took office in December, 1921, there were eighteen portfolios which had been filled by ministers. We thought it advisable to reduce the number of portfolios, and that number was reduced to sixteen. We have felt that this is an opportune moment to make a further reduction in the number of portfolios, and a reduction will be made from sixteen to fourteen. It is intended to have the Department of the Secretary of State assigned to the hon. the Minister of Justice. The Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and Health will be assigned to a minister in charge of one of the other departments of the government; of this I shall make a further announcement later.

With respect to the ministers without portfolio who have been mentioned by my right hon. friend, I would say that none of the ministers without portfolio continued to be members of the government for any length of time after the recent general election. Before this parliament met all the ministers without portfolio had requested that they should no longer be invited to come to council, and they have not been so invited since parliament has been in session. The one exception I should make respecting the sending of notices to Privy Councillors other than those with or without portfolios is that of the Minister who formerly held the position of Minister of Railways and Canals, the Right Hon. Mr. Graham. I have asked Mr. Graham to consent to continue to be present at the proceedings of council, and this request he has kindly complied with. I think I have answered my hon. friend's question. If there is any point I have omitted I shall be glad to endeavour to supply the information.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want to be quite clear. I understand from the Prime Minister that the three ministers without portfolio referred to have not been members of the government since the general election?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING I would not say since the general election; I would say that subsequent to the general election and prior to the meeting of parliament they retired from the government as ministers.

TRADE TREATIES

EFFECT OF DEPRECIATED CURRENCIES OF FRANCE AND BELGIUM

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask if the government has recently passed an order in council, the effect of which is to bring France and Belgium in the class of Germany and Russia with respect to depreciated currency. Then I want to ask if that has any effect on the trade treaties with France and Belgium.

Hon. GEORGE H. BOIVIN (Minister of Customs and Excise): In answer to my hon. friend I would say that no order in council has been passed by this government concerning any importation of goods from France or Belgium since I have become a member thereof. A memorandum was issued by the Department of Customs on the 15th of February giving effect to the provisions of subsection two of section 40 of the Customs Act. This subsection provides that in connection with goods imported from countries where the value of the currency is substantially depreciated, the value for duty purposes shall be the same as the value of similar goods manufactured in England. If they are not manufactured in England then the value is to be that of similar goods manufactured in a European country where the currency is not depreciated. The only instructions given by the department to our officers throughout the country were to consider as substantially depreciated the currency of those countries which has been reduced in value more than 50 per cent.

Mr. LADNER: Mr. Speaker, if I may ask another question, is there not an order in council of February 12 bearing on this question?

Mr. BOIVIN: No.

GERMAN REPARATIONS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on March 2 the hon.

member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) inquired about the payment of claims for German reparations, and I promised to supply the information to him. I have asked the Acting Secretary of State to prepare a memorandum on the matter, which I desire to read.

On the 2nd of March, Sir Henry Drayton (p. 1493 of Hansard) inquired in the House of Commons what progress is being made in the payment of claims for "German reparation."

There is a great deal of public misunderstanding respecting reparation. The term "reparation" is very loosely used. In fact it is used by many persons as a term to describe different subjects which have no relation to one another.

Under the treaty of Versailles it was provided:

1. That a clearing office would be established for the purpose of disposing of prewar debts between Canadians and Germans;

2. That Canada might retain and liquidate German property in Canada, the amount thereof, after specified deductions, to be credited to Germany on the claim which Canada has against Germany for reparation;

3. That owners of Canadian property in Germany which was sequestrated or dealt with under German war legislation should be compensated, and that the amount of compensation should be charged against the proceeds of German property in Canada. All claims of this nature have been paid. These payments, no doubt, are in the minds of those who speak about reparations and their payment.

4. The treaty further provided that Germany should pay Canada reparation for losses sustained during the war by the civil population in Canada. This reparation is to be paid to the Canadian government, and not to Canadian individuals who suffered loss. It was originally intended under the treaty that the losses sustained by the civil population should be the measure of the amount which Germany should pay to the Canadian government. It is not contemplated by the treaty, and it never was intended, that individual claimants should receive any payment. The claims were filed in the first place for the purpose of enabling the Canadian government to ascertain how much Germany should be called upon to pay Canada. However, they were never used for this purpose, because the amount to be paid by Germany to Canada was otherwise fixed, at the Spa conference and at the Imperial conference in London.

The proceeds of the liquidation of German property in Canada cannot, however, be used to pay the war losses of individual Canadians, although this is the idea that many people seem to have.

There is no relation whatever between the first three of the above subjects and the last. The clearing office, German property in Canada, and Canadian property in Germany are dealt with in two associated parts of the treaty which have no relation to claims of the civil population in Canada for war losses. Although these claimants have no claim against any fund or against any government, in England they were allowed "compassionate compensation."

In December, 1921, Chief Justice Sir Douglas Hazen was appointed commissioner to investigate the claims for losses by the civil population which had been filed, and to report to the government thereon.

Neither at that time nor at any time since was any money voted or otherwise provided for the payment of these claims, and there is no fund available now.

Sir Douglas Hazen did not report thereon. In 1922 the late the Honourable Dr. Pugsley was appointed commissioner. He died without making a report. Mr. James Friel, K.C., of Moncton, was subsequently appointed, and he is now considering and dealing with these claims.

At the last session of parliament a resolution was introduced as the basis of a bill to provide that the moneys accruing to Canada under the London convention of 1924, which adopted the Dawes plan for payment of reparations by Germany, should be set aside to be distributed amongst those claimants to the extent of the amount found for each by the Canadian commissioner. This resolution was not adopted by parliament and was withdrawn. Payment of the claims might have been provided for in this way, but parliament did not see fit to provide any money for payment, and no payment of the claims can be made except from moneys voted by parliament for this specific purpose.

SHIPMENT OF CATTLE TO GREAT BRITAIN

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette): In view of the fact that a number of the regular boats carrying cattle have been taken off, I would like to ask if the government are making any provision for cargo space for the movement of cattle from Canada. The situation is very serious, with large numbers of feed cattle ready to move. A number of these boats have been put into drydock by the regular lines, and I think the government should do something to facilitate the movement of cattle.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): If I understood my hon. friend aright, he was asking with regard to additional space being provided for the shipment of our cattle. One boat, the Ontario, has been equipped with fore-decks capable of taking care of over one thousand head of cattle. It left just a week or ten days ago with the second load for the United Kingdom. There is another boat that has been launched, but with the exception of these two I do not know of any additional space that has been made available as a result of our friendly intervention.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—THREE RIVERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I would like to ask the Acting Minister of Railways and Canals a question having regard to an item appearing in the paper to the effect that the Canadian National railway was securing entrance to Three Rivers, and that that entrance was to be got through the incorporation of a local company in Quebec. I rise to ask whether the same machinery that was devised for the purpose of misleading this House in connection with the Rouyn railway is to be applied in this case.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend has not only asked a question, but has attempted to give an answer. I am advised that a private company has made application to the Quebec legislature for a charter, and advised also that the Canadian National Railway board is not in any way interested in that charter.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. L. H. JELLIFF (Lethbridge) moved the second reading of Bill No. 4, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the second reading carries, the Minister of Railways or someone else should tell us what this bill means.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is a private bill.

Mr. ROBB: I am asking that it be referred in the usual way to the standing committee on Railways. Perhaps the hon. member in whose name the bill stands will give an explanation.

Mr. JELLIFF: This bill provides for the construction of certain branch lines in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan by the Canadian Pacific Railway. The first line contemplated is one from a point at or near Duchess or Rosemary on the Empress line of the Canadian Pacific in the province of Alberta. The second line contemplated is a branch from Rosetown in the province of Saskatchewan to a point on the Pheasant Hills branch at or near Keppel or Perdue. Clause 2 of the bill provides for an extension of time within which to commence and complete the line from Asquith on the Pheasant Hills branch northwesterly to Cloan on the Wilkie branch, in the province of Saskatchewan. I would like this bill to be given its second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

PRESIDENT OF THE LETHBRIDGE STAKE

Mr. L. H. JELLIFF (Lethbridge) moved the second reading of Bill No. 11 to incorporate the President of the Lethbridge Stake.

He said: This bill, as the first clause indicates, is for the purpose of forming a corporation sole under the name and style of the President of the Lethbridge Stake of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, generally known as the Mormon Church The territory of this church is divided into certain districts called "stakes", which correspond with the dioceses of other denominations. The position of president of the stake corresponds very closely to that of a bishop in the other church denominations. The idea of the bill is to incorporate the president of the Lethbridge stake as a corporation sole in order that the properties of the church which are used for religious and charitable purposes, may be unified and administered to the better advantage of the organization. I would ask that the bill after receiving its second reading be referred to the select standing committee on Private Bills.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

GOLD COMMISSIONER G. P. MACKENZIE

Mr. BLACK (Yukon):

1. What wild lives have been conserved to date as a result of the government's removal of Gold Commissioner Mackenzie from Yukon and the creation of a new government job for which $8,000 per annum is paid?

2. What protection has been afforded the natives of North West Territories by the same?

3. Why was the sum of $5,750 paid to Gold Commissioner Mackenzie by the government in 1923?

4. Why was such sum exempted from income tax?

5. Why are amounts paid other government employees as living allowance not exempted from income tax?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Impossible to answer definitely. Mr. G. P. LATE GREGORY DOYLE, D.C.M.

Mr. LADNER:

1. Was the late Gregory Doyle, D.C.M., while in a dying condition removed from the Shaughnessy Military hospital to the Vancouver General hospital?

2. Did the said Doyle die within two or three days after such removal?

3. Was the late Gregory Doyle a veteran of the South African war and the Great war and also in receipt, at the time of such removal, of a pension on account of a disability suffered in the Great war?

4. Is it the intention of the government to make an enquiry into case of the said Gregory Doyle deceased?

5. Has the government given notices for the removal of other ex-service men in the Shaughnessy Military hospital to the General hospital or is it the intention of the government to remove for reasons corresponding to those of the late Doyle any of the men now in the Shaughnessy hospital to the said General hospital?

6. Is it the policy of the government to remove from the military hospitals of Canada to other non-government institutionss men who served in the Great war and who are suffering from a war disability but who have an illness which cannot be directly attributed to war service?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD:

1. No. 2539 former Private Gregory Doyle, L.S.H., applied for treatment at Shaughnessy hospital on December 27, 1925. He was admitted for observation and was found to be suffering from nephritis, a condition in no way attributable or related to his military service. Being ineligible for treatment by the department, arrangements were made for his admission to the Vancouver General hospital to which he was transferred on December 30. At the time of his transfer he was not critically ill, he did not undergo hardship nor suffer in any way because of the change, had his condition been sufficiently serious to contraindicate transfer he would have been retained in the Shaughnessy hospital. He was conveyed to the Vancouver General hospital by the department. Dr. Wallace Wilson who had attended him at Shaughnessy hospital continued to do so after his transfer. While in the Vancouver General hospital his condition became serious and resulted in his death on January 4, 1926.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Yes, (i) for an old fracture of the right thigh caused by a gun shot wound in the South African war, and, (ii) for hemiplegia, attributable to service in the war 1914-18.

4. Full reports have been received, they do not indicate grounds for further inquiry.

5. When a pensioner who is ill applies for treatment and there is a possibility that his illness is attributable to a war service disability, it may be necessary to admit him to hospital for observation to establish a diagnosis. When the condition is diagnosed and the disability is not related to military service, the department is without authority to provide treatment. In such circumstances it is the responsibility of the pensioner to make his own arrangements for further necessary treatment, but, it is invariably the practice of the department to undertake arrangements for his admission to a local General hospital.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—INDEBTEDNESS

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:

1. What was the funded and unfunded debt of the Canadian National Railways and affiliated companies as of the first of January in each of the years 1923, 1924, 1925 and 1926?

2. How much of the said debt at such times represented obligations of the system, (a) to the government; (b) to the public?

3. What was the amount of floating or undistributed indebtedness not taken into capital account on the first of January, 1926?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. The long term debt of the Canadian National Railway system was as under:—

December 31, 1922—
Debt to public...	$ 804,503,144 06
Debt to government, including interest...	574,550,601 37
Total...	$1,379,053,745 43
December 31, 1923—
Debt to public...	$ 823,099,056 10
Debt to government including interest...	666,539,749 52
Total...	$1,489,638,805 62
December 31, 1924—
Debt to public...	$ 913,913,082 80
Debt to government including interest...	690,555,949 92
Total...	$1,604,469,032 72

The figures as of December 31, 1925, are not yet available but approximate figures will be furnished very shortly.

The foregoing statement does not include investments in road and equipment, Canadian Government Railways, which, on the dates mentioned, stood as follows:

December 31, 1922... ...	$442,195,400 22
December 31, 1923... ...	447,643,526 03
December 31, 1924... ...	451,712,484 98

To offset the inclusion of this investment among the assets the above amount is included with the liabilities in the Canadian National Railway balance sheet. However, it is not an obligation of the Canadian National Railway Company, is non-interest bearing so far as the railway is concerned, and is not included in the item: "Debt due to government, including interest," which has to do only with advances to former privately owned railways.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE OIL BURNERS

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Is the Government aware that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine have ordered the conversion of four ships operating on the Pacific coast into oil burners?

2. In authorizing or approving of the abandonment of coal as fuel for these ships has the government taken into consideration the injury to the Vancouver island coal industry?

5. In accordance with the pledge given by Mr. King that the "coal industry of the Pacific coast would be investigated and careful consideration given to its claims." Has any such investigation been made? If so, when was the report made, and by whom?

The special committee on National Railways and Shipping during the 1925 session of Parliament unanimously reported in favour of voting $668,000 for the Canadian Government Merchant Marine for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1926, included in which was an item of $50,000 for converting four steamers operating in the coastal trade between Vancouver and California to oil burners. It is estimated that this alteration will result in the saving of approximately $13,000 per steamer per year in operating expenses.

2. The amount of coal consumed by the four steamers per annum is so small that there should be no material injury to the Vancouver island coal industry.

3. None; other than protection afforded by the present contract with the Imperial Oil Company.

4. From the Imperial Oil Company which is the only company with tanks on Canadian National property for handling the oil. The maximum price in the contract is considerably below the market price and there are certain clauses in the contract protecting the management against a decline in the market; that is, the management have a low maximum price which is reduced if the market drops but does not advance if the market goes up. It is considered to be detrimental to the public interests to disclose the price.

5. The Department of Railways, or the management of Canadian National Railways have no information concerning any such pledge. Question contains alleged statement of facts and is therefore not in accordance with the rules.

VANCOUVER GRAIN EXPORTS—PERMIT SYSTEM

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Having reference to the export of grain via Vancouver, is it necessary before such grain can be shipped from points in the prairie provinces for the shipper to secure a permit?

2. If so, from whom is such permit obtained?

3. Upon whose authority has the "permit system" been inaugurated?

4. Is such permit system operated under the provisions of the Canada Grain Act and by authority of the Board of Grain Commissioners?

5. With the existing elevator capacity at Vancouver why has it been necessary to enforce the "permit system" during the months of December and January?

6. Is it the intention of the Government, through the Board of Grain Commissioners, to insist upon the said permits being secured before grain can be exported via the port of Vancouver?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. Under present conditions it is necessary, before grain can be shipped from points in the prairie provinces, for the shipper to secure a permit. A sufficient number of permits are issued by the railways to shippers including individual farmers, to permit of the port of Vancouver having sufficient grain on hand at all times to enable capacity unloading.

2. Permits are only obtainable from the railway companies.

3. In 1923, the first year that grain started to move to the port of Vancouver in any volume, there was no permit system, with the result that in a few weeks both railroads were badly congested by cars under load at the coast and in transit which made it necessary to place an embargo until the accumulation was cleaned up. As a result of this the railway companies thereupon decided that, owing to the limited facilities at Vancouver, it would be preferable to handle the movement of grain to that port under permit system and this system was put into effect by both railways in 1923. In view, however, of the criticism against this system the railroads, in the fall of 1925, decided to abolish the permit system and again accepted shipments for that port without any restrictions whatever. Early in November, 1925, the railways were faced with a large accumulation of cars under load for the port of Vancouver. Many of the cars contained out-of-condition grain, only a limited number of which could be unloaded and treated daily in the elevators, owing to the drying facilities at this port being limited to 60,000 bushels per day. In view of this critical condition and after canvassing the situation, the railroads decided to place an embargo, effective Nov. 14th, 1925, on all grain destined to Vancouver, and in the meantime the board understands resolutions were passed by several interested public bodies, requesting that the railroads reinstate the permit system to govern the movement of grain to the Pacific coast. The railways, therefore, reinstated the permit system last December.

4. No.

5. In December, 1925 and January, 1926 the movement of grain into the port of Vancouver and the exports from that port were the heaviest in the history of the port. The railway companies issued a large number of permits with the result that, according to information received by the Board of Grain Commissioners, there were over four thousand (4,000) cars under load en route to Vancouver on February 1st, 1926, in addition to which the elevators at this port are practically filled. Many of the cars now under load contain tough and damp grain, which grain can only be unloaded by the elevators at Vancouver at the rate of sixty (60) cars per day. Therefore, until the present accumulation has been reduced, the railways have been compelled to curtail the issuance of permits covering the movement of grain to the coast.

6. The Canada Grain Act does not give the Board of Grain Commissioners any jurisdiction over the issuance of permits by the railway companies.

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

(a) Twelve; (b) eleven of these vessels are capable of carrying coal or grain through the canals to head of the lakes on a limited draft of fourteen feet. Mr. DOUCET:

1. Is it a fact that time served by officers of Canadian Expeditionary Force on active service during the great war who were not then on the permanent force but who are now on the permanent force, was not credited to them on time necessary to serve before automatic promotion? If so, why?

3. Is it a fact that time served from date of being gazetted to permanent force is credited to officers on time necessary to serve for automatic promotion when time served by them on Canadian Expeditionary Force on war service in France or other actual theatre of war before being so gazetted is not credited? If so, why?

4. Is it a fact that officers promoted from N.C.O. rank in permanent force receive higher pay than Canadian Expeditionary force officers now in permanent force not promoted from permanent force? If so, why?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD:

1, 2, and 3. Under the King's Regulations and Orders for the Canadian Militia, 1917, only such time as an officer has actually served in the permanent force from the date he is commissioned may be counted for the purposes of automatic promotion. Automatic promotion, i.e. promotion governed solely by length of commissioned service, is confined to certain officers known as "classified officers" such as district officers of the Royal Canadian Artillery, ordnance executive officers of the Royal Canadian Ordnance Corps, quartermasters, etc.

4. Officers promoted from the ranks, while holding the rank of lieutenant, receive 40 cents per diem more than young officers on first appointment. The rates of pay for ranks above lieutenant are the same. Officers who are selected for promotion from the ranks to fill certain appointments for which they are specially fitted by long experience and training are usually men of middle age with family responsibilities. Other gentlemen appointed as lieutenants are young, unmarried and have yet to undergo training and experience to qualify.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SALARIES

Mr. MAYBEE:

1. How many officials of the Canadian National Railways were drawing salaries of ten thousand dollars or more before the amalgamation of said railways?
2. How many officials of the said Canadian National Railways were drawing salaries of ten thousand dollars or more during the year 1925?
3. Where and in what capacity are such officials serving?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

The Canadian National Railway board and management urge that it is not in the public interest, and would be detrimental to the Canadian National Railways to publish the information asked for by the hon. member for Northumberland. It suggests comparisons between salaries paid certain officials prior to amalgamation of the National Railways, and those paid since consolidation. Question No. 3 is particularly objectionable from the standpoint of good management, in that the publication of such information might give rise to jealousies within the staff which would not be conducive to loyal and efficient service. Further, the information desired is such as is not required from any other railway in Canada and would place in the hands of the Canadian National Railways' chief competitor information which as regards other lines is not available to the Canadian National management.

ALIEN ENEMY PROPERTIES

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. Who is the Custodian of Alien Enemy Property in Canada?

2. When was the present incumbent of the position appointed?

3. What remuneration does he receive for his services exclusive of allowances for personal expenses?

4. What have been the total amounts received in cash by the Custodian of Alien Enemy Properties on account of properties disposed of or partially disposed of since such custodian was first appointed?

5. What has been the cost of administering such properties as have come within his jurisdiction?

6. Are there any properties yet undisposed of? If so, has any valuation been made of the properties and what are the estimated sums to be received for same?

7. What claims have been received by the Custodian of Alien Enemy Property for compensation for losses incurred during the Great War and properly coming within the provisions of the regulations governing such compensation?

8. What has been the total in cash of such claims?

9. Have any of the claims been settled? If so, give a list of the claims with the firms or individuals filing same?

10. What basis has been taken upon which to settle such claims as have been disposed of?

11. Have any claims been refused? If so, what are the reasons on which refusal was based?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. The Treaty of Peace orders in council declare "the Custodian" to mean, in respect of the time prior to the date of the orders, the Minister of Finance and Receiver-General, and from the date of the orders the Secretary of State of Canada. "The Custodian" is charged with the administration of enemy property in Canada.

2. The Honourable Charles Murphy, Acting Secretary of State, was appointed on the 13th of November, 1925.

3. Nothing.

4. Total amount received on account Real Estate from 1-4-20 to 31-1-26, $362,103.60.; total amount received on account Securities Capital and Income from 1-4-20 to 31-1-26, $12,826,511.48.

5. It is impossible to state accurately the cost of administration. The staff engaged in the custodian's office deals with not only the administration of enemy property but also with the clearing office and with internment operations. Down to the 1st of April, 1923, it is impossible to apportion the expenses of the office between these duties. Since the 1st of April, 1923, the administration of enemy property has been charged against commissions received, interest upon interest which is not credited to the enemy property, and other profits of the office, and amounts to $118,-687.08. Other items of expenditure which are chargeable against enemy property are taxes, insurance, legal expenses and travelling expenses. The following amount shows the total of these expenses since the establishment of the office $264,573.57.

6. There are properties still undisposed of, consisting of real estate and securities. The undisposed of real estate has been valued, and amounts to $78,856.17. The undisposed of securities have not been valued; in fact it is not possible to value them. Many of them are worthless. The bulk of them are not quoted on the stock exchange, and it is impossible to place any value upon them.

7. Claims have been received by the custodian for compensation under the provisions of Article 297 of the Treaty of Versailles and the corresponding sections of the other Treaties. The claims are as follows:

2. In view of the fact that there were many Canadians on the President Roosevelt is it the intention of the government to tender some suitable form of recognition of such an outstanding act of heroism on behalf of the people of Canada as a token of appreciation of so valiant an act and one worthy of the best traditions of the sea and good sportsmanship?

The road having, meanwhile, changed hands that order in council became non-effective.

MR. PRESTON ELLIOTT

Mr. HUBBS:

1. Is Mr. Preston Elliott, former member of the House of Commons, in the employ of the Dominion Government?

2. If so, in what capacity, at what salary, and when was he appointed?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

CANADIAN BRIGADIER-GENERALS

Mr. EVANS:

1. How many brigadier-generals have we in Canada?

2. How many of them are drawing pay—and how much?

3. How many brigadier-generals were there in 1913?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD:

1. None. There was never a substantive rank of brigadier-general in the Canadian militia, but a temporary rank of brigadier-general only which was abolished by General Order No. 151 of 1921 (Order in Council P.C. 1758 dated 30th May 1921). There are, however, 60 colonels in Canada (13 on the active list, 35 on the reserve of officers and other reserve formations and 12 on the retired list), who now hold the honorary rank of brigadier-general, which, with few exceptions, was granted them in lieu of the temporary rank of brigadier-general held by them during the war, authority for which is also contained in General Order No. 151 of 1921, above quoted.

2. There are 8 officers with the rank of colonel who held the temporary rank of brigadier-general in the field during the war and now hold the honorary rank of brigadier-general, drawing pay of their respective appointments as follows: 6 District Officers Commanding who hold the temporary rank of

Colonel Commandant whilst so employed and are paid $6,570 per annum. 1 Deputy Chief of the General Staff who holds the temporary rank of colonel on the staff whilst so employed and is paid $5,840 per annum. 1 Assistant Adjutant and Quartermaster-General of a Military District who is paid $5,200 per annum.

3. None.

PROVISIONS FOR EX-SERVICE MEN

Mr. LADNER:

1. Has the government received a complaint from the Great War Veterans' Association of British Columbia or any other province to the effect that strict adherence to the letter of the regulations and a mass of red tape are robbing ex-service men of their rights and breaking the promise Canada made to her soldiers?

2. Has any complaint been made by the said Great War Veterans' Association with respect to, (a) the development of physical troubles which the men attribute directly to the war but which they are unable to prove to the satisfaction of the authorities, (b) veterans broken in health and pocket without money to pay for medical attention and unable to take care of their families?

3. Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation by way of amendment to the Pension Act or otherwise, (a) to provide greater latitude on the part of departmental officials to deal with needy sick and meritorious cases, (b) to broaden generally the provisions of the law so as to enable our military hospitals or like institutions to receive and treat our ex-service man or woman applying for treatment, who, having been honorably discharged from the army, navy or air force, is suffering from an illness which may possibly be attributed to war service and to allow such ex-service man or woman to remain in such institution until fit to be discharged or until the departmental officials are able to prove that the illness of such man or woman is not attributable to war service?

4. Is it the intention of the government to make any amendments to the Pension Act during the present session?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. No.

2. Witnesses who have appeared before the several committees of parliament appointed to deal with questions relating to pensions and re-establishment, and certain of those who were heard by the royal commission which made inquiry into these matters, have suggested that medical treatment should be given to ex-service men for every disabling condition irrespective of war service relationship. The records show that parliament has always deemed it wise to impose as a condition of eligibility for treatment that there be a relationship between the disabling condition and the war service of the applicant.

3. The regulations presently in effect extend to ex-service men all the benefits for which, in the considered judgment of previous parliaments, provision could be made. They compare most favourably with those available in other countries. The regulations of the department provide that treatment without pay and allowances may be given when, in the opinion of the physicians of the department, there is a possibility that the disability may be connected with service, although definite relationship cannot be shown. As a safeguard of the rights of individual applicants provision has been made in the Pension Act for appeals from decisions concerning eligibility for pension or treatment, and for meritorious cases outside the act.

4. The pension law has been reviewed and amended by parliament during every session since 1919. The governing principles are now definitely established, and it is not intended to introduce further amendments except to effect minor changes which experience may show to be necessary.

6. Why was a new position of "preventive officer" created in the city of Brantford at the end of October, 1925?

2. No.

Since January 1st, 1923, Norrona and Swedish News, Winnipeg, have each received $14.00 for the publication in those papers of notice of tenders for Section 7, Welland Ship Canal.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SUPPLIES

Mr. MACDONALD (Richmond):

1. What quantities and descriptions of material were bought for the use of the Canadian National Railways during the year 1925?

2. What portion of said goods were iron, steel or metal products and what textiles?

3. From whom were said goods purchased and at what prices?

4. What quantities of fuel and lubricating oils were purchased by the Canadian National Railways, where these purchased; what prices were paid, where was delivery made to the railways?

Hon. Mr. ROBB: The Canadian National Railway board and management hold strongly that it is not in the public interest, and would be injurious to Canadian National Railways, to bring down information such as that sought by Mr. Macdonald and having to do with the purchase of materials and supplies. Even were it a proper principle to adopt, it would be a matter of great difficulty and expense to compile such a statement. In addition it is information which conceivably, might result in increased prices of material and supplies, and consequent increased operating cost of the railway. It has been found that commercial houses and industrial organizations tendering on railway requirements hesitate to submit their best prices when there is likelihood of the same being divulged.

WELLAND CANAL

Mr. PETTIT:

1. On what basis were the contracts let for the construction of the various sections of the New Welland ship canal with respect to wages prior to 1st April, 1925?

2. Were not the tenders for those contracts made and accepted on that basis?

3. When and to what extent were those wages subsequently reduced and at whose instance?

4. Who got the benefit of the reduction, the government or the contractor and in what way and to what extent?

5. Was there any refund or rebate to the contractor and in what way?

6. Are not ordinary labourers now working on the present Welland canal paid 38 and 40 cents an hour and how does the Government differentiate between those labourers and the ordinary labourers on the new ship canal who are only paid 25 cents an hour?

Hon. Mr. KING (Kootenay):

1. Four contracts for the construction of various sections of the Welland ship canal made prior to April 1, 1925, are still current. These contracts all contained fair wages clauses providing that the mechanics, labourers and other persons performing labour in the construction of the works were to receive such wages as are generally accepted as current from time to time during the continuance of the contract for competent workmen in the district in which the work is being performed, or if no rates were current in the district, then fair and reasonable rates. In the contract for sections 1 and 2, which was made in 1921, and in the contract for sections 3 and 4, which was made in 1922, it was provided that in the event of a dispute arising as to what were the current or fair and reasonable rates of wages, they should be determined by the Minister of Labour, whose decision should be final. The other contracts for sections 7 and 8 empowered the Minister of Labour at any time and from time to time to determine for the purposes of the contract what were the current or fair and reasonable rates of wages for the workmen employed.

2. Yes.

3. On May 1, 1922, certain reductions were sanctioned by the Minister of Labour in the rates of wages which had previously been in force on Sections 1 and 2 of the Welland ship canal. These reductions were based on an inquiry into the current wages conditions in the district. On June 1, 1923, the rates in effect on Sections 1, 2, 3, and 4 were increased by the contractors five cents an hour, which increase was subsequently confirmed by the Minister of Labour, excepting as to carpenters, in respect of whom a further increase of five cents an hour was provided in accordance with the rates current in the district. On April 1, 1925, certain reductions in wage rates were sanctioned by the Minister of Labour amounting in general to five cents per hour. These reductions were based on an enquiry into the current wages conditions in the district. The revision of wage rates which was made in 1922 and in 1925 was made on application of the contractors; the revision which was made in 1923 was made on application of the employees.

4. The contracts with the government for the several sections of the Welland ship canal were made on unit prices for the work of excavation, etc., which was involved. The benefit of wages reductions inured, therefore, to the contractors, and the benefit of wages increases to the workmen employed.

5. No.

6. Ordinary labourers employed on the present Welland Canal are receiving rates of from 30c to 40c an hour, varying somewhat in different localities. These rates have been in effect for a number of years past. The minimum rate of wages of ordinary labourers employed on the Welland ship canal construction is at present one of 35c an hour, based on current wages conditions in the district.

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will the government as set out in the Railway Act direct the Railway Commission, under the Railway Act, to enforce the Railway Act and grant the Maritime provinces mines equality of treatment as to special rates for coal similar to that given Alberta in carrying coal to central Canada, and enforcing the Railway Act, which provides that the railway commission of its own volition must see that there is as to rates equality of treatment between localities and that rates must be just, fair, reasonable and equitable as between localities with no unjust or unfair discrimination as between the carrying of coal from Alberta to central Canada, and the rates from Nova Scotia?

2. If not, why, and will a coal inquiry be instituted, and when?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE: By order in council P.C. 226, February 13, 1926, the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada has been requested to immediately inquire into and report to the government upon, the question of the cost of transportation per ton, in full capacity train load quantities, of seasonal movements of coal from the producing points in the Maritime provinces to selling points in Quebec and Ontario. Mr. ROBINSON:

1. In view of the fact of there being a great number of Canadian citizens residing in the cities along the international border, and working in the United States, has the government taken any steps to secure from the government of the United States an agreement that will crystallize into law the present neighbourly understanding as to labour along the border?

2. If so, what negotiations have been carried on and with what results?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

1. No. The present neighbourly understanding continues to be neighbourly and, as it has continued for many years and as there has been no marked change in the attitude of the United States government, it has not been thought advisable to raise any question concerning the matter. At various points along the international boundary between the Atlantic and Pacific it has been the custom for workmen to reside in one country and work in another. This custom has been so long recognized as to become established. If an attempt were made to establish by law or formal agreement what is now recognized as established by custom it is thought that serious difficulties might arise.

The city of St. Boniface is not large enough for self contained letter carrier delivery service, and has been given the privilege of this service only because it is attached to the Winnipeg organization from a letter carrier delivery point of view. at Petrolia, Ontario, and Oil Springs, Ontario, made by Mr. Russell of the Finance department in the year 1924.

Hon. Mr. ROBB: I do not rise to offer any objection to this motion but I would point out to the House the attitude taken by a previous Minister of Finance under similar circumstances, an attitude which I consider sound. I have before me a memorandum to the effect that in the session of 1912 Mr. Maclean, then member for Halifax, having moved for certain correspondence in regard to cement was informed by Mr. White, afterwards Sir Thomas White, at that time Minister of Finance, that it was not customary for the department to give information that might be regarded as confidential. In that connection Sir Thomas White said:

In connection with this, I might say that I am advised by the Customs department that it regards as confidential any letters or correspondence from business firms relating particularly to their own business, and dealing with such matters as, for instance, cost of production. I think I should be able reasonably to satisfy my hon. friend from the public file, but I would like to ask him if he desires correspondence that might be reasonably regarded as confidential, on the ground that I have mentioned. I am told that in the department it has been customary not to give out such reports.

I offer no objection to the present motion provided it is understood that reports that may be considered confidential will not be tabled.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. STEWART: Practically all the documents that have passed between the governments are down, having been produced for the most part last session. Some which were not brought down last session have been tabled at this session, the single exception being in the case of such documents as we have not received the permission of the United States government to table. They are only one or two recent despatches.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am pointing out, Mr. Speaker, that the documents are all down with the exception of those for the tabling of which we have not received the permission of the United States government.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES AT MONT-JOLI

Mr. DOUCET moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between railway employees of Mont-Joli, Quebec. and the Department of Railways.

Hon. Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend has only to read his own motion to observe that it involves a great deal of work that is quite unnecessary. I do not know whether he wants to go back to the date when the charter was asked for, or how far back he would go in placing a limitation on the extent of the correspondence he desires.

Mr. DOUCET: I shall be glad to confer with the Acting Minister of Railways with a view to limiting the time in relation to the correspondence to be brought down.

Mr. ROBB: In the meantime let it stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stand.

CUSTOMS PREVENTIVE SERVICE

Hon. Mr. STEVENS moved:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Prime Minister and any and all other persons during the year 1925, having reference to the prevention of smuggling.

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN: If I may be allowed a word with the unanimous consent of the House, I would make an appeal to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) in regard to a few of the motions which he placed on the order paper long before the appointment of the committee now investigating the administration of the Department of Customs and Excise. As the hon. member knows, the original documents have been produced before the committee and it will be absolutely impossible for the officials of the government to copy them. I would ask the hon. member if he would not be disposed to drop those motions in regard to which the original papers have already been produced before the committee. As regards the other motions, they will of course carry without objection on my part.

Mr. STEVENS: It is of course out of order to discuss motions of this kind, but having gone carefully through the list I may say that there are one or two which I am prepared to drop. As to the other motions, there is no reason why the documents should not be brought down. In the case of the motion we are now discussing I understand that copies of the correspondence have been made, so that they can be tabled; and in connection with most of these motions copies are available. I know that of my own knowledge. There is therefore no reason why they should not be tabled. The first motion is one of importance and the correspondence is not voluminous.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As the motion relates to correspondence between the Prime Minister and "all other persons," I might remind my hon. friend that both the originals and the copies are now before the committee. I will have to get back the originals from the committee and supply the committee with further copies. They have all the correspondence at the present time.

Mr. STEVENS: That is just what I have pointed out already. There are two sets. A couple of stenographers could make the copies in an hour or two.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend wishes to have additional copies to those already produced to his committee, there is not the slightest objection to complying with his request. It is only a matter of extra work.

Mr. STEVENS: That is all.

Motion agreed to.

CUSTOMS SEIZURES AT ROCK ISLAND, QUEBEC

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of all official records, documents, letters and telegrams in connection with and having reference to all seizures made at Rock Island, Quebec, during the year 1924, giving the names of the persons involved and the value and the amounts of the seizures, together with all particulars of the settlements effected in each case.

Mr. STEVENS: Dropped.

CUSTOMS SERVICE MONTREAL—DUNCAN REPORT

Hon. Mr. STEVENS moved:

For a copy of report of Walter Duncan on the administration of the customs service at the port of Montreal, made during the month of December, 1925, together with a copy of all testimony and documents in evidence received by the said Mr. Duncan, also interim report covering eleven definite charges of irregularities including perjury, forgery, theft and other offences committed by one Bisaillon, and also charges implicating other officers of the crown in serious offences, inefficiency and dereliction of duty.

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN: Mr. Speaker, I ask that this motion be transferred to the order Notices of Motion, so that it may be debated.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to meet the minister part way in this matter. I would suggest that the words:

Together with a copy of all testimony and documents in evidence received by the said Mr. Duncan, be struck out. That is, the report should be produced, but not the evidence.

Mr. BOIVIN: Mr. Speaker, I merely ask something that is within the right of every member of this House. If a member desires to debate a motion for the production of papers he has the right to ask that it be transferred to the order "Notices of Motion". I have made this request, and do not want to break the rule by discussing it now.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not objecting. I do not know why the minister is getting excited. I withdraw my suggested amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Transferred as per agreement.

Mr. STEVENS: I have no objection at all.

MR. J. E. A. BISAILLON

Hon. Mr. STEVENS moved:

For a copy of all documents on file in the Department of Health, the Department of Customs and the Department of Justice, having reference to the activities of J. E. A. Bisaillon in connection with the enforcement of the Narcotic Drug Act, including the documents, charges, testimony, judge's summing up, in reference to the case of Rex vs. Lortie, St. George, et al.

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN: With regard to this motion, I make the same request as I did with respect to the preceding one—that it be transferred to the order Notices of Motion.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, with all due deference, I submit that this request of the minister's is most unusual, and is not fair. I should like to have your ruling, Sir, on the rule which is invoked by the minister. I confess I have not looked it up lately.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the case immediately preceding this there was unanimous consent to the minister's request. Unless there is unanimous consent here, the hon. Minister of Customs will have to give notice of motion.

Mr. BOIVIN: But, Mr. Speaker, all I ask is for permission to debate this motion. I want to give to the House the reasons why the motion should not be agreed to without amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the House that motions for production of papers are not debatable. If the hon. member who has put the motion on the order paper does not agree to its being transferred as requested by the Minister of Customs, it would be better to allow it to stand.

Mr. BOIVIN: It may stand, Mr. Speaker, until the end of the session, but it will have to be debated before it is voted upon.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have not agreed that it stand at all, Mr. Speaker. If the government want it defeated, let them defeat it. We are prepared now to press the motion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, may I call your attention to rule 38 which provides:

All such notices when called shall be forthwith disposed of; but if on any such motion a debate be desired, it will be transferred by the clerk to the order of Notices of Motions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is meant by, "be desired"? That does not mean that a motion is to be transferred at the caprice of any member of the House.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The Minister of Customs said that he wanted the motion debated.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very good. But to say that something is desired does not mean that merely because one member desires it he may transfer and postpone any motion. It means that the motion may be so treated if the House or if the hon. member making the motion desire it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Do you mean that the majority must desire to debate any motion? Well, well.

Mr. STEVENS: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think the invoking of rule 38 is a most unusual procedure and not at all in harmony with the rule as generally interpreted. The rule unquestionably is intended to apply to the circumstance where the member moving the motion wishes to debate it. If he desires that his motion for the production of papers shall be simply passed without debate, it is his option to place it under the other order with an asterisk attached—a course which in the seventeen sessions that I have been in the House has been followed without variation.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, may I direct your attention to the first part of rule 38, which says:

Notices of motion for the production of papers which the member asking for the same intends to move without discussion, shall be marked by him with an asterisk—

I take it therefore that the remainder of the rule refers to the mover of the motion, and unless he wishes it to be discussed it is not to be discussed.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. STEVENS: There is no question about that.

Mr. SPEAKER: Since rule 38 is invoked the request of the hon. Minister of Customs bears a different aspect. Rule 38 reads:

Notices of motion for the production of papers which the member asking for the same intends to move without discussion, shall be marked by him with an asterisk and shall be placed by the clerk on the order paper above "Notices of Motions," under the heading "Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers." All such notices when called shall be forthwith disposed of; but if on any such motion a debate be desired, it will be transferred by the clerk to the order of Notices of Motions.

The question is whether the expression, "be desired," refers to the individual member moving the motion, or whether it is to be interpreted as an order from the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Or as coming from the mover, referred to in the first part of the rule.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my humble judgment the same principle should apply here as under rule 37, section 4, dealing with questions, reading as follows:

If a question is of such a nature that in the opinion of the minister who is to furnish the reply, such reply should be in the form of a return, and the minister states that he has no objection to laying such return upon the table of the House, his statement shall, unless otherwise ordered by the House, be deemed an order of the House to that effect and the same shall be entered in the Votes and Proceedings as such.

The same principle applies in this case. It is therefore my ruling that the hon. Minister of Customs is entitled, under rule 38, to have this motion transferred as a debatable motion.

Mr. STEVENS: Do I understand, Mr. Speaker, your ruling to be that if an hon. member places a resolution under the order, Notices of Motions for Production of Papers without debate—

Mr. SPEAKER: With an asterisk.

Mr. STEVENS: —that it is competent for any other member to suggest that such resolution shall be transferred to another order under which it is quite possible he will have no opportunity of having his resolution passed at all? Let me point out, Mr. Speaker, before you actually give that ruling, that the very purpose of securing the production of papers would be defeated by that process. It would be competent for myself or any other member of the House to raise this question from time to time upon the motion for production of such papers as we might have a desire to delay, obstruct or prevent. The one outstanding rule of this House— and I think of all other parliaments similarly constituted—has been that orders for the production of documents and papers shall be passed forthwith, and that the papers shall be produced with all reasonable expedition. I think, Mr. Speaker, that before any definite ruling is made upon this question, greater consideration should be given to it and a further opportunity for discussion of the point of order. In my estimation it would be a very, very serious precedent to establish.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not find any reason for looking to precedent when the letter of the rule is so clear:

All such notices when called shall be forthwith disposed of; but if on any such motion a debate be desired, it will be transferred by the clerk to the order of Notices of Motions.

As it stands, the motion before the House is not debatable, but the House might decide by its vote that it should not be passed. The rule does not say "the minister of the crown" but we all know that these papers are sought from the crown, are in the possession of the crown and have to be tabled by the crown. This is the gist of my ruling. If a minister of the crown states that he would prefer to have such a motion made a debatable motion, I cannot do otherwise than grant the request.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, just to understand your ruling, inasmuch as you have used the expression "if a minister of the crown desires", may I ask if Your Honour holds that a minister of the crown in relation to a motion for the productons of papers has greater rights than an ordinary member of the House, or does your ruling apply to any member?

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not like to decide hypothetical cases; when cases arise I will pass on them. For the moment I refer the right hon. gentleman, who is an authority on parliamentary procedure, to subsection 4 of rule 37, which gives to the minister of the crown the exclusive right of not answering a question, and of asking that it be made an order for return, so the same principle may be applied in the present case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And by implication, inasmuch as the minister alone is given the right under subsection 4 of the previous rule and is not mentioned at all in the next rule, the obvious and necessary inference is that he has no such right under rule 38. I take the ground that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) is right and that no single member or minister of the crown has the right to defeat the purpose of rule 38. But certainly if a minister has that right, everyone else has the same right.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, when I first came to this House there was no such rule allowing a member to put an asterisk before a motion for the production of papers so there would not be any debate. The motions were alike. This was done to expedite matters and to avoid debate on motions which are clearly non-contentious. As soon as such a motion is moved and it appears that a debate is necessary,—for instance, when papers are asked for which are confidential in their nature and the production of which would be detrimental to the public interest,—surely there must be objection to the motion and as soon as that objection is raised and a debate is desired it is necessary to transfer it because, when a motion appears with an asterisk, it is supposed that everyone is in favour of it. I think this is clear.

Mr. STEVENS: No, the motion with the asterisk could be rejected; the House is not bound to accept it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: But I have no right to give the reasons for which I oppose the motion, because it is undebatable. That is why it should be transferred.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? He says the purpose of the asterisk is to make the motion non-debatable. If any single member of the House can transfer it to the debatable column, how does an asterisk make it non-debatable?

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is how it was before; they were all debatable, and this was done simply to expedite matters. It is very seldom that these motions are debated, but in cases such as these where confidential documents are asked for we have to give our objections, and we cannot give them on a motion which is not debatable.

Mr. MANION: I would like to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that the rule distinctly states that the person who must decide whether or not the asterisk is to be placed there is the mover of the motion.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, so far as the asterisk is concerned.

Mr. MANION: It says that a motion for the production of papers, which is intended to be without discussion, shall be marked with an asterisk. If we are to draw an inference, the last part of the motion should refer also to the mover. The rule says:

All such motions when called shall be forthwith disposed of.

That must refer to the mover, because the first part refers to him.

Mr. LAPOINTE: If I have reasons to give, how can I do so?

Mr. SPEAKER: I have given my ruling.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, it is with very great regret indeed that I would suggest an appeal from your ruling, but I frankly state to you as my reason for doing so—does the Minister of Customs desire to make any comment?

Mr. BOIVIN: The Minister of Customs does not desire to make any comment, and he does not think the hon. member for Vancouver Centre has any right to comment upon a ruling of the Chair.

Mr. STEVENS: I am within the judgment of the Speaker of the House whom I presume to be Speaker, and not my hon. friend the Minister of Customs. I was observing, Mr. Speaker, that it was with extreme regret that I questioned your ruling and that I desired to appeal from it. I merely wish to say in doing so that my reason for making the appeal is that if this ruling is to be followed in the future, it simply means that the value or merit of rule 38, which is based upon long experience and which makes the notices of motion for the production of papers non-debatable, will be entirely vitiated at the caprice of any minister of the crown. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, another reason for appealing against the ruling is that you have stated that a minister of the crown—.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. STEVENS: I will be through in just a moment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman has the right to appeal from a ruling, but he cannot make a speech on the ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Speaker having decided that a motion for the production of papers could, under rule 38, at the request of the Minister of Customs, be transferred to the list of debatable motions, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) appeals from the ruling. Is it the pleasure of the House that the Speaker's decision be sustained?

Ruling sustained and motion of Mr. Stevens transferred to the order Notices of Motion.

PREVENTIVE SERVICE APPOINTMENTS

Hon. Mr. STEVENS moved:

For a return showing a list of all appointees to the preventive service since June, 1925, whose salary or expenses were paid out of the vote of $350,000 included in the supplementary estimates of 1925, together with the names of all those who recommended these persons, and also a copy of all correspondence having reference to those who were so appointed.

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN: I ask that this motion and, in order to save Your Honour reading them, several of the other motions that I will indicate, be transferred.

Mr. SPEAKER: The last one is carried.

Mr. BOIVIN: I was on my feet, Mr. Speaker, trying—

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not see the hon. member. Would the hon. member give the numbers of the motions that are to be transferred?

Mr. BOIVIN: Nos. 10, 11, 12, 13, 18, 22 and 23.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is ordered that said motions be transferred to the list of debatable motions.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, are we to understand that without the calling of the motions, without the motions having been moved, the minister can rise in his seat and transfer these motions?

Mr. SPEAKER:: I can call them; it is only a formality. It is, of course, more regular to call the motions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps we might know what are really called. It seems to me we are getting a little outside of what we have been discussing. I hardly think it is quite the thing to do.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have read motion No. 11. That is transferred, also No. 12.

CUSTOMS ADMINISTRATION—R.C.M.P. REPORTS

Hon. Mr. STEVENS moved:

For a copy of all reports made from time to time during the years 1922, 1923, 1924 and 1925, by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in reference to dishonest practice and inefficiency on the port of customs officers administrating affairs at the port of Montreal.

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN: I ask that this motion be transferred.

Mr. SPEAKER: Transferred.

Motion transferred.

REX vs. J. F. SIMONS ET AL

Hon. Mr. STEVENS moved:

For a return showing copies of all testimony and exhibits in connection with the case of Rex vs J. F. Simons et al.

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN: I ask that this motion be transferred.

Mr. SPEAKER: Transferred.

Motion transferred.

TARIFF ADVISERS

Mr. SPEAKER: Sir Henry Drayton moves:

For a return showing what appointments, if any, have been made under vote No. 346 of the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1926, reading as follows,—

"346. To provide for salaries and expenses of the advisers engaged in tariff enquiry. Payments may be made notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act or regulations thereunder, $30,000."

Also, for a return showing payments made under the authority of such vote, and for what purposes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Dropped.

Mr. ROBB: I can give my hon. friend the answer now if he desires.

Motion dropped.

SMUGGLING—APPOINTMENT OF OFFICERS

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence and other papers relative to the appointments made under vote 493 of the supplementary estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1926, under the item reading as follows,—

"Amount required to create positions and make appointments of officers for the prevention of smuggling and to investigate reported frauds against the revenue, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act and the said positions and staff so appointed to be wholly excluded from said act; also to provide for expenses of such officers and for the purchase or charter of vessels and for the purchase or hire of automobiles to be used in the prevention of smuggling or other offences against the revenue laws, $350,000."

Also, for a return of all appointments made under the authority of such vote, giving the names of the appointees, dates of commencement of their duties and when same ceased and the previous occupations of all appointees.

Also, a return showing all payments made under the said vote and for what purposes.

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN: I ask that this motion be transferred.

Mr. SPEAKER: Transferred.

Motion transferred.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL PASSED IN 1925

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York) moved:

For a return of all orders in council passed in the calendar year 1925.

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would ask my hon. friend if he really desires all that he is requesting here. As my hon. friend knows, there are a great many orders in council that are purely routine orders, having to do with regulations, promotions, transfers of land, property, and so forth, and to bring down all that is asked for here I am afraid would mean a very large and quite unnecessary expense. If my hon. friend would indicate the orders he has in mind there would be no objection.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: One difficulty, Mr. Speaker, is that unfortunately I am not endowed with the gift of mind reading. I made this motion because I have great difficulty in finding out what the government is doing. However, I make this suggestion: In order to facilitate matters I am perfectly willing to go through the list with the Clerk of the Privy Council and to indicate those orders that can be brought down. That procedure would cut out, I should think, a very large proportion. I frankly tell my right hon. friend I do not know what orders he has been passing. I know that he has passed a considerable number, and there may be more.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure my hon. friend knows me well enough to understand that if he had asked to see all these orders he would have been welcome to do so. I can promise him that I will take pleasure in putting the orders at his disposal.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am perfectly content to let the motion stand. I will follow up the suggestion of my right hon. friend. I will go over the orders in council and indicate what should be brought down.

Motion stands.

ADMINISTRATION OF VANCOUVER HARBOUR

Hon. Mr. STEVENS moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, affidavits and documents of all kinds passing between W. H. Morrison of Vancouver, B.C., and the Minister of Trade and Commerce or any officer of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and the Minister of Justice or any officer of the Department of Justice, and having relation to a certain statutory declaration filed by the said W. H. Morrison, in reference to the administration of the harbour of Vancouver. Also all correspondence between the aforementioned ministers or their departments and A. Manson, Attorney General of British Columbia, in relation to the said statutory declaration.

Hon. Mr. ROBB: I offer no objection to the passage of the resolution except to remind my hon. friend of the exception made in the case of a previous resolution with respect to anything of a confidential nature.

Mr. STEVENS: I know of no papers that would be of that character, and certainly the rule in such cases should be respected.

Motion agreed to.

FRANK WILKINSON OF BEEBE PLAIN

Hon. Mr. STEVENS moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters and telegrams between the Minister of Customs or any officer of the Customs department and Frank Wilkinson of Beebe Plain or Beebe Junction, Quebec, during the years 1922, 1923, 1924 and 1925. Also copy of all correspondence between special officer McNamee of Montreal, and the Minister of Customs or any officer of the Customs department in reference to the seizure of a car from one Frank Wilkinson.

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN: I ask that the motion be transferred.

Mr. SPEAKER: Transferred.

CUSTOM SEIZURES AT BEEBE JUNCTION, QUEBEC

Hon. Mr. STEVENS moved:

For a copy of all official records, documents, letters and telegrams in connection with and having reference to all seizures made at Beebe Juncvtion, Quebec, during the years 1922, 1923, 1924 and 1925, giving the names of the persons involved and the value and the amounts of the seizures, together with all particulars of the settlements effected in each case.

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN: I ask that this motion also be transferred.

Mr. SPEAKER: Transferred.

EMBARGO UPON PULPWOOD

Mr. ARTHURS moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams or recommendations relating to an embargo upon pulpwood or to a proposed export duty upon pulpwood shipped from Canada, such order to apply to correspondence, etc., subsequent to January 1, 1921.

Hon. Mr. ROBB: I imagine that the tabling of the report of the Pulpwood commission should satisfy my hon. friend and save very much work. I will be glad to consult with him in regard to the matter.

Motion stands.

DUTIES ON NEW ZEALAND IMPORTS

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, or other records between the government of Canada and New Zealand relating in any way to the passing of an order in council by the government of Canada under date of September 26, 1925, whereby the Canadian customs tariff on agricultural products from New Zealand, when imported into Canada, was greatly reduced, and in many instances entirely removed.

Hon. Mr. ROBB: I offer no objection to the passage of the resolution except to point out the error in the last six words reading as follows: "and in many cases entirely removed". The duty has not been removed "in many cases".

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried with that excision?

Mr. ROBB: I am only making that observation.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried.

PENALTIES FOR UNDERVALUATION

Hon. Mr. STEVENS moved:

For a copy of all correspondence between the Victoria Lumber & Manufacturing Company or any solicitor or agent of the said company and the Customs department, Ottawa, in reference to machinery imported from the Diamond Iron Works, Minneapolis, together with copy of all reports in regard to the investigation of these importations, also a statement showing the amount of penalty duty imposed for under-valuation, also copy of evidence that the Diamond Iron Works submitted in rebuttal of the charges preferred against them. Also copy of the settlement made showing when the sum in settlement was finally paid.

Hon. Mr. BOIVIN: I ask that this be transferred.

Mr. STEVENS: I would simply say to the minister that the resolution has nothing to do with the inquiry at all.

Mr. BOIVIN: I would like to have the motion slightly amended, but I cannot do that without discussing the motion and that is why I ask to have it transferred.

Mr. STEVENS: It is done every day. This is simply a process of obstruction.

Motion transferred.

APPOINTMENT OF TRADE COMMISSIONERS

On the motion of Mr. ROSS (Kingston):

For a return showing the names of all appointees as trade commissioners, of all dismissals and resignations from such positions, and also a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents connected with the same appointees, dismissals and resignations, during the years 1922, 1923, 1924 and 1925.

Hon. Mr. ROBB: I notice that the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Ross) is not in his seat. Some days ago I gave him certain information which I think satisfied him, and we might let this motion stand until that is confirmed.

Motion stands.

EMPLOYMENT OF MILITARY OFFICERS

Mr. DOUCET moved:

For a return showing:—

1. The numbers of each of the following: lieutenant generals; major generals; colonels commandant; colonels; lieutenant colonels; majors; captains; lieutenants; non-commissioned officers of each rank; privates at present or at the latest date at which the information is available, in the employ of the government of Canada in the permanent force, including civilian employment and the Air force, (a) at headquarters at Ottawa, (b) at each military district in Canada.

2. How and where each is employed, appointment, regimental, staff or otherwise.

3. The amount paid each annually (a) in cash, (b) amount given to each annually by way of allowance, showing details of allowances.

4. The amount deducted from or charged to each annually on any account (other than penalties) showing details of deductions.

5. Those employed as instructors, with the rank of each and where employed.

6. The number of persons instructed from August 1, 1924, to August 1, 1925, the rank of each, the course given each and where each instructed.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD: I am instructed by the officers of my department that to provide this return in regard to the first four items would involve going over a list of about 3,500 men, and in regard to the sixth item it would involve a statement in regard to 35,000 men. If my hon. friend will confer with me I shall take pains to ascertain the exact information he requires, and I would ask that the motion stand.

Motion stands.

WINNIPEG STRIKE

Mr. WOODSWORTH (for Mr. Heaps) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, reports, orders in council, and other documents relating to the use of the military or civil forces in connection with the Winnipeg general strike of 1919.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In reference to this resolution, I want to move that it be transferred to debatable motions. I wish to have it debated.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the desire is expressed generally by the House—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is the desire of hon. members it may be transferred.

Motion transferred.

PRICE OF NEWSPRINT

Hon. Mr. STEVENS moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, documents, etc., passing between R. J. Crombie of the Vancouver Daily Sun, Vancouver, British Columbia, and the Prime Minister of Canada or any other minister of the crown, or any officer of the government and having reference to the price charged in Canada for newsprint and the price at which Canadian newsprint is sold abroad, together with all documents and reports made to the government in regard to the same during the years 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925 and to date in 1926.

He said: At the very courteous request of the Minister of the Interior I ask that this motion be allowed to stand.

Motion stands.

STOUFFVILLE POST OFFICE

Mr. LENNOX moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, relating to the post office at Stouffville, Ontario.

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE: I assume that what the hon. gentleman wants is the correspondence relating to the construction of a post office building and not to postal matters generally.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

COLONEL ROBERT INNES

Mr. CASGRAIN (for Mr. McIntosh), moved:

For a copy of all accounts submitted to the government by Colonel Robert Innes, in connection with his visit to India, together with a copy of all telegrams, correspondence and other documents in connection with the same.

Mr. BOYS: I ask that this motion be transferred to the list of debatable resolutions.

Mr. SPEAKER: Transferred.

ELECTRIC MACHINERY MANUFACTURING COMPANY, MINNEAPOLIS

Mr. FOSTER moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, affidavits, reports, communications and documents of all kinds passing between the Electric Machinery Manufacturing Company, of Minneapolis, Minnesota, and the honourable the Secretary of State or any officer of the Department of the Secretary of State or any other departments of the government or any officers of any other departments of the government between the 11th of November, 1919, and the present time.

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE: In order to obviate the transfer of this order along with several others following, up to and including No. 66, I would ask that they be allowed to stand. In the meantime I shall communicate with my hon. friend with a view to having the motions changed somewhat so that they may pass. As they are drafted it would be almost impossible to answer them.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall all the hon. member's motions stand?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, Mr. Speaker, down to 66 inclusive.

Mr. FOSTER: The minister says it would be impossible to answer them. What am I to understand that to mean?

Mr. LAPOINTE: They are objectionable in their present form. They ask for an indefinite series of correspondence between six named persons and various departments of government. The motions should relate to some definite subject and if the hon. member would state just what he has reference to in the matter of the correspondence the information could be brought down. In many cases in the departments correspondence is indexed and filed under the subject matter and not under the name of the correspondent. It would be very difficult indeed to give all the correspondence my friend wants in the form in which his motion is drafted. Furthermore, he asks for all correspondence exchanged since 1919 by the firm of Henderson & Herridge, Ottawa, with every department of the government, without mentioning the subject matter. It is almost impossible to give that information.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—DETROIT FRANCHISE

Mr. BOYS (for Mr. Church) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams, reports, agreements, contracts, letters and all other correspondence between the Honourable Alexander Groesbeck, Governor of Michigan, or any other person or persons, and Sir Henry Thornton and the Canadian National Railways, or any officials thereof, relating to the giving up of valuable charter considerations and rights of way to the state of Michigan by the Canadian National Railways and The Detroit G. H. & M. Railway, a subsidiary—and the agreement to pay $225,000 taxes a year to the state of Michigan. The surrender of valuable franchise owned in perpetuity in the centre of Detroit by the Canadian National and The Detroit & G. R. M. Railway, and also relating to the use of the Brush street (C.N.R.) terminal in Detroit.

Hon. Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, I have a memorandum from the management of the Canadian National Railways saying that such correspondence and other documents as can be brought down without prejudice to the situation as between the Canadian National Railways and the state of Michigan, will be produced.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What does that mean?

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, I know of no rule whereby a motion can pass subject to a qualification. Now that we have this new rule that anybody can transfer debatable questions, I think it would be much better to have this motion so transferred.

Mr. ROBB: I do not object to having it transferred.

Mr. SPEAKER: By unanimous consent, transferred.

MR. H. BOULAY

Mr. CULLIGAN moved:

For a copy of any letter or letters written by Mr. H. Boulay, of Sayabec, county of Matane, to the Minister of Militia and Defence at Ottawa, on January 18, 1918.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the House, I should like to call the attention of the hon. member who is making this motion to the fact that he must indicate what the letter he requires relates to. The documents in the Department of National Defence are indexed under the subjects to which they relate, not under the names of the individuals who happen to write to the department.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

CANADA AND IMPERIAL FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. WOODSWORTH moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, Canada should refuse to accept any responsibility for complications arising from the foreign policy of the United Kingdom.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, this is the motion to which I made reference earlier in the afternoon. I spoke to my hon. friend about the motion before coming into the House, and I understood that he would be agreeable to allowing it to stand, for the reasons I have already mentioned, namely, that remarks made in the course of debate would almost certainly be cabled to Europe where their bearing might not be understood; it would be inadvisable to incur a risk of the kind while the League of Nations in its assembly at Geneva is considering matters of British foreign policy and of great international import. My hon. friend was quite agreeable to the motion being allowed to stand, seeing that it is first on the order paper and will likely come up again in the near future. He desired I should give him an assurance that there will be no commitment made between now and the time when the motion is discussed. I am pleased to give my hon. friend the assurance, that there will be no commitment by the government which will prove embarrassing to him or to the country.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I saw the hon. member rise to make his motion. I was just going to add my word to the Prime Minister's expressing the hope that the motion be allowed to stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, stands.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY

On the motion of Mr. MILLAR:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government of Canada should seriously consider the advisability of completing the Hudson Bay railway line to Port Nelson in the year 1926.

Mr. MILLAR: Dropped.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

LEGAL MINIMUM WAGE

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, a wage sufficient to provide for a reasonable standard of living should constitute a legal minimum wage.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to take up the resolution standing in my name on establishing a national system of banking, but certain members of the Progressive party who wish to discuss the question are not prepared to go on with it to-day. So I have passed on to this resolution relative to a basic wage. My idea in bringing the resolution before the House is that we should make statutory the guarantees of the Peace treaty. Let me read a clause from that treaty dealing with this matter:

Holding as they do that labour should not be regarded merely as an article of commerce, they think that there are methods for regulating labour conditions which all industrial communities should endeavour to apply, so far as their special circumstances will permit. Among these methods and principles, the following seem to the high contracting parties to be of special and urgent importance.

And among others we find:

3. The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life, as this is understood in their time and country.

I take it, Mr. Speaker, that most of us have given a great deal of thought to the provisions of the Peace treaty of Versailles as they relate to international boundaries. We have perhaps not recognized so clearly that the treaty refers just as definitely to certain industrial relationships and that we, as one of the signatories to the treaty, are under obligation, as are the other signatories, to carry out the clauses with regard to these industrial relationships. I can hardly hope that to-day there may be a discussion sufficiently full to lead to the adoption of so far-reaching a reform as the one which I am proposing, but I could hope that we might at least have this matter referred to our standing committee on Industrial Relations, and that a report could be brought in as to how we in Canada could best carry out the purposes of the treaty. This is one of those rather complicated questions in which the relative jurisdiction of the Dominion and the provinces is concerned. I do not know whether there has been any definite pronouncement with regard to just how far the carrying-out of this particular matter lies within the jurisdiction of the federal authorities, but we ought to have definite information with regard to that matter. It is clearly stated in this clause that labour is not a commodity. So far in Canada, as elsewhere, we have followed the principle that labour is a commodity. We buy and sell labour in the open market; we give labour what it is worth, as we say, just as we would hire a machine for a certain purpose. We base the returns to labour very largely on what the industry will stand, rather than on what the labourer requires. If we are to carry out the purposes of the treaty we must reverse entirely the principle on which we have been working in this country, and recognize another principle, namely, that a reasonable standard of living is a first charge on industry. Let me repeat that. We shall have to very clearly recognize that other principle, that a reasonable standard of living is the first charge on industry.

Although this question is comparatively new here in Canada it has been under discussion for a number of years in other parts of the world. As early as 1907 Judge Higgins, of the Australian Federal Industrial Court declared that a minimum wage was essential in industry, to allow a standard of living which would give reasonable comfort and supply the normal needs of an average worker regarded as a human being living in a civilized community. In 1909 he led an investigation into the cost of family budgets, and constructed the first budget upon which a general minimum wage might be based. I hold in my hand a bulletin of the New South Wales board of trade, in which I find a report containing a statement of the principle which I would like to have adopted by this House. Part of this report is as follows:

The fixation of the living wage in New South Wales is, by section 79 of the Industrial Arbitration Act, 1912, as amended, committed to the New South Wales Board of Trade.

"79. (1) The board of trade shall, from year to year, after public inquiry as to the increase or decrease in the average cost of living, declare what shall be the living wages to be paid to adult male employees and to adult female employees in the state or any defined area thereof.

And again, in clause 2.

No industrial agreement shall be entered into and no award made for wages lower than such living wages.

That is, if we adopted the principle which I enunciated a few minutes ago it would become criminal to employ a man or a woman for less than would provide a decent standard of living, and this standard of living would have to be determined in some way by boards formed for that purpose. In Australia a few years ago we had a report of the royal commission on the basic wage.

Mr. GEARY: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Certainly.

Mr. GEARY: If the hon. member approves of it being made criminal to pay low wages, what has he to say about allowing goods to come into Canada which are the product of low wages?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think in that case, Mr. Speaker, we should have to carry out the policy of the British Labour party, and put on a boycott of goods which were produced under unfair conditions. That was the policy of which I spoke in this House last year.

Mr. GEARY: What form of a boycott?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I beg your pardon?

Mr. MEIGHEN: How was the boycott to be enforced?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think the suggestion offered—again I am referring to the British Labour party—is not a bad one, that we should insist that the standards advocated or set forth by the League of Nations and subsequent conventions should form a standard to which any nation desiring to belong to the civilized community should conform. Then we would insist that any nation which did not conform to these standards should be boycotted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the question; the question is, how was the boycott to be enforced?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not prepared to answer that at a moment's notice.

Mr. GEARY: The hon. gentlemen never thought protection as being a help, did he?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No, I do not think protection would answer the purpose; we would have to go further than that. I would agree to protection, but it is the protection of the worker and not the protection of the industry, which is a different matter.

Mr. GEARY: It is the same thing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is not the same thing. If I could be sure that so-called protection would protect the worker, I might be led to look a great deal more favourably on what has been termed protection, but in some of the most highly protected industries in the United States we find the lowest paid labour.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Just as a matter of information, might I ask the hon. gentleman if he would advocate the prohibition of goods entering Canada from countries where the standards of wages were lower than the standards of wages in Canada?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think this matter would have to be taken up in a large way. There would have to be understandings arrived at through an international body such as the League of Nations. We cannot deal directly with this nation and that nation. It is a matter of our trade with two or three or four different nations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why cannot we? If we want to put a prohibition on southern cotton, for instance, because the negroes work cheaply, we can do that. Why not do it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think it would have to be part of a larger scheme and not simply picking out one industry or one nation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why not deal with them all?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Before we prohibit cotton, should we not first learn to grow cotton in this country?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think this discussion is going to get us very far along the line of a basic wage. I would urge that before we deal with other countries, we must have in Canada a wage which forms the basis for a reasonable standard of living. I can quite understand that if we get that we can then deal with these other problems which have been proposed.

Mr. BAKER: If we have a high standard of wages in Canada in order to maintain a proper standard of living, how are our people going to get work when goods are allowed to enter this country from countries where low wages are paid?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: There will be difficulties along that line. We should recognize to-day that we are facing world competition with many nations living on very low standards. There is the other side of the question, however, I might remind the hon. gentleman, that very frequently high wages are quite compatible with great efficiency, and I am inclined to think that those industries which pay decent or even high wages are in the long run going to win out.

I should like to refer to the report of the Royal Commission on the basic wage in Australia. I must admit that legislation has not so far been enacted along the lines of the report of this commission. This commission was appointed by the government of Australia on December 8, 1919, to report on the minimum or basic wage, to ascertain what was a fair basic wage, how much the sovereign had depreciated in value during the war, and how the basic wage should be adjusted to the current cost of living, and in future be adjusted according to changes in the cost of living from time to time. The appointment of the commission had been announced by the Prime Minister, Right Hon. W. H. Hughes, on October 30, 1919, in the following statement, and I should like to call the attention of the House to this statement which seems to me to contain a great deal of what I am pleading for this afternoon:

> If we are to have industrial peace, we must be prepared to pay the price, and that price is justice to the worker. Nothing less will serve. We have long ago adopted in Australia the principle of compulsory arbitration for the settlement of industrial disputes and of the minimum wage. The cause of much of the industrial unrest, which is like fuel to the fires of Bolshevism and direct action, arises with the real wage of the worker—that is to say, the things he can buy with the money he receives. This real wage decreases with an increase in the cost of living. Now, once it is admitted that it is in the interest of the community that such a wage should be paid as will enable a man to marry and bring up children in decent, wholesome conditions—and that point has been settled long ago— it seems obvious that we must devise better machinery for insuring the payment of such a wage than at present exists. Means must be found which will insure that the minimum wage shall be adjusted automatically, or almost automatically, with the cost of living, so that within the limits of the minimum wage at least the sovereign shall always purchase the same amount of the necessaries of life. The government is, therefore, appointing a Royal Commission to inquire into the cost of living in relation to the minimum or basic wage.

When that commission was appointed it was decided to determine reasonable standards of comfort, not by reference to any one type or group of employees, but by reference to the needs which are common to all employees, following the accepted principle that there is a standard of living below which no employee should be asked to live. I shall not detain the House with any detailed account of the report of this commission, which I hold in my hand, but I may say that there is a very good summary of it published in our own Labour Gazette of April, 1921.

Here in Canada we have made a beginning along the line of the minimum wage, at least in so far as female labour is concerned. In Canada minimum wage bills for female workers were introduced in 1916, and have been enacted to date in seven provinces. In both Canada and the United States there is still very little legislative protection for unskilled, underpaid and unorganized male workers, but the principle is accepted. The proposal to have a minimum wage has been adopted so far as women workers are concerned, and further than that, we are quite accustomed to the methods by which that minimum is determined. In seven of the provinces we are now actually carrying out this work, and it would not be very difficult to extend the methods already adopted and apply them to male labour.

We have one example in Canada of the principle being applied in the case of male labour, and that is in the province of British Columbia, which in a great many respects leads the rest of Canada—I say that for the benefit of my neighbour here (Mr. Neill). Let me quote from the Labour Gazette of January, 1926:

> The only previous Canadian legislation was contained in an amendment to the British Columbia Coal Mines Regulation Act in 1919, providing for the establishment of a Coal Mines Minimum Wage Board, but no such board was ever established under the act. The Alberta Factories Act also was amended in 1918 to provide that "no person shall be employed by any employer in any factory, shop, office or office building at a wage less than $1.50 per shift." With these exceptions, however, no minimum wage law applicable to men was in existence.

There follows in another section of this issue of the Gazette a summary of the British Columbia Male Minimum Wage Act. It provides for the establishment of minimum wages for men employed in nearly all types of industry, the minimum rates to be fixed by the Board of Adjustment under the Hours of Work Act, 1923, which provided for an eight-hour day. The original bill as introduced by Major R. J. Burde provided for a minimum wage for all workers, but later he accepted representations that the bill as it stood would be difficult to apply in practice, and substituted a new bill designed to apply only to workers in the lumber industry. The Minister of Mines desired to have the new bill enlarged to include the coal mining industry, but opposed any further extensions, which he considered would make the act too sweeping and tend to destroy its effectiveness. The legislature, however, decided in the end to accept other amendments restoring the general character of the act and making it applicable to every class of occupation with the exception of those mentioned in the last section of the act. The last section reads as follows:

> This act shall apply to occupations other than farm labourers, fruit-pickers, fruit-packers, fruit and vegetable canners, and domestic servants.

Mr. BAKER: Does the hon. member not think it would be better first to provide work for our unemployed, and discuss the matter of wages afterwards?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think it is highly desirable to find work—

Mr. BAKER: First.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But I submit that one of the surest ways of providing work is to increase the buying power of the people. If we had a larger amount distributed in the form of wages there would be before long a greater demand for consumable commodities, and the wheels of industry would once more be set to work

Mr. MEIGHEN: How can work be provided by an increased buying power simply for foreign goods?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The right hon. leader of the opposition suggests that that is the way the principle must work. That does not follow at all. In any case, if we do buy foreign goods we must pay for them by goods we produce and this probably means increased production. The purchase of foreign goods thus provides wider markets for our own goods. There is no doubt about that. If goods come in goods must also go out.

Mr. BAKER: That is theory not practice.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Some hon. gentlemen seem to think that we must act in a haphazard way that defies all theory. To me, however, it seems that good practice must be founded on sound theory. No one will doubt that if we find markets for Canadian made goods we must receive goods in return.

The further question then confronts us as to how we shall determine what a basic wage really is, and what efforts have been made in other countries along this line. I have in my hand a copy of the United States Department of Labour Statistics containing a "tentative quantity and cost budget necessary to maintain a family of five." There is a very interesting study made here by experts as to how this ought to be made up, and I should like to read just a few paragraphs as they may indicate the line along which the experts are working. I quote as follows:—

After long consideration, it was decided to use as a working basis a budget level which can be best expressed perhaps by the phrase "a standard of health and decency." This phrase is not entirely precise in meaning. No phrase of the kind can very well be wholly satisfactory. The budget herewith suggested is intended to give to the average family, consisting of husband, wife, and three children, below the age of 14 years—

(1) A sufficiency of nourishing food for the maintenance of health, particularly the children's health;

(2) Housing in low-rent neighborhoods and within the smallest possible number of rooms consistent with decency, but with sufficient light, heat, and toilet facilities for the maintenance of health and decency;

(3) The upkeep of household equipment, such as kitchen utensils, bedding, and linen, necessary for health, but with no provision for the purchase of additional furniture;

(4) Clothing sufficient for warmth, of a sufficiently good quality to be economical, but with no further regard for appearance and style than is necessary to permit the family members to appear in public and within their rather narrow social circle without slovenliness or loss of self respect.

(5) A surplus over the above expenditures which would permit of only a minimum outlay for such necessary demands as—

(a) Street car fares to and from work and necessary rides to stores and markets;

(b) The keeping up of a modest amount of insurance.

(c) Medical and dental care;

(d) Contributions to churches and labor or beneficial organizations;

(e) Simple amusements, such as the moving pictures once in a while, occasional street car rides for pleasure, some Christmas gifts for the children, etc;

(f) Daily newspaper.

I quote further:

It needs to be emphasized that the budget level adopted in the present study is in no way intended as an ideal budget. It was intended to establish a bottom level of health and decency below which a family can not go without danger of physical and moral deterioration. This budget does not include many comforts which should be included in a proper "American standard of living." Thus no provision is directly made for savings other than insurance, nor for vacations, nor for books and other educational purposes. On the other hand, a family with the items listed in this budget should be able to maintain itself in health and modest comfort. It would have a sufficiency of food, respectable clothing, sanitary housing, and a minimum of the essential "sundries".

After going into further details there is given a summary of the budget which I shall not read to the house but which I should like to have placed on Hansard:

There is also in my hands another budget prepared by the Visiting Housekeeper Association of Detroit, and I should like to have this likewise placed upon Hansard:—

Visiting Housekeeper Association, Detroit

2.1 per cent increase in food since July 1925.
1.54 per cent decrease on entire budget since July 1925.

We had a few years ago, to be exact in 1922, a careful study made of the minimum standard of living in Canada by Arthur Martel, at that time vice president of the Trades and Labour Congress of the Dominion. He gives a budget in the February number, 1922, of the Canadian Congress Journal, and says:

In March, 1921, the cost of the above budget was $1,744.38. This figure is only $1.70 greater than the cost of a Workingman's Standard of Living in Philadelphia at March, 1921, prices, "Prepared by the Citizens' Business Bureau of Municipal Research."

We have had still other budgets prepared in Canada. One is contained in the little government publication Household Cost Accounting in Canada published by the Department of Health in 1923. And recently there has been issued, after very careful study, a cost of living budget by the Canadian Railway Employees Research expert, Miss Margaret S. Gould. I may say that the method of obtaining this budget was slightly different from the other; The investigator went across the country making actual purchases at the various shops of the articles needed. Thus there was a closer approximation to what was necessary. The average yearly cost of this budget for the Dominion at the present time was found to be as follows:

Food	$ 639 04
Clothing (Annual replacement)	452 91
Rent, light and heat	565 50
Household equipment (annual upkeep)	68 59
Cleaning supplies	44 10
Miscellaneous: Health, insurance, laundry, car fare, recreation, etc.	432 43
Total annual cost for worker's family of five persons	2,202 37

Miss Gould says:

It must be understood and remembered that this is a minimum standard budget. There are many items, especially in the realms of clothing and household equipment, which justifiably might be included. No annual holiday is provided for, and no allowance is made for savings, while the amount of insurance may be deemed insufficient to give adequate protection. On the whole, the budget attempts to lay down a basis of healthful living from which no worker can afford to swerve, without causing incalculable danger to the present and future wellbeing and health of himself and family. Establishing this minimum basis, the budget is constituted as a guide toward an ever-improving standard. As wants are filled, new needs progressively are created.

The report is contained, let me say, in the Canadian Railway Employees' Monthly, of February 1926.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: When the House took recess I was giving some of the budgets which had been prepared to show the amount necessary in order that a family might maintain a decent standard of living. Perhaps it might be of interest to give the figures with regard to what employees in this country are actually paid. In the Canada Year Book, 1924, at page 707, we find the wages in the Canadian manufacturing industries in 1921 and 1922 were:

The average earnings of the 74,884 salaried employees covered in 1922 were 1,787 of the 387,689 factory hands, 937, and of the two classes together, $1,075. In 1921 salaried employees averaged $1,819, wage earners, $996, and all employees, $1,133.

The number of male workers reported increased in 1922 by 3.5 per cent, while the number of female workers was greater by 11.1 per cent. Out of every 1,000 persons employed by manufacturers in 1922, 755 were male and 235 were females: in the preceding year the ratio was 778 to 222.

With regard to the female employees, at least in seven of our provinces there is provision for a minimum wage, but so far, except in British Columbia, there is no provision for minimum wage in the case of male employees. Now, it may be said that there is a very wide discrepancy between the amounts that are considered necessary for a decent standard of living and the amounts actually paid. That is true, and the community is undoubtedly carrying the burden. People of small wage manage to get along—some of them at least—by immense sacrifices to themselves and to their children, entailing a tremendous burden upon the community. I am going to read to the House a paragraph or two very typical of the descriptions which are given of the condition of the poorer families of Canada round about Christmas time; we find similar cases in almost all our large cities. The one to which I refer is taken from the Toronto Daily Star of Monday, December 14, 1925. It reads

Largest Weekly Wage $24 Since Man Started To Work

"If I could make $20 a week regularly I would be happy."

A sick and doleful man, tossing restlessly underneath soiled bed clothes. His feverish eyes turned in the direction of his wife, who was standing silently in the far corner of the damp and dim little room. She gravely nodded her corroboration.

"Yes," she said, "we could do nicely on that."

It didn't seem much to ask of the world—$20 per week for a man slaving in a tannery.

"I once earned $24 a week for awhile," reflected the sick man, as if that time were the financial oasis of his life, when it was all smooth sailing.

Five To Support

But with five people to support, rent to pay, doctor's bills to meet, food to buy it could hardly be called a princely allowance.

This is another of those families that have never got out of the mire. There are three little girls in the family, all, from outward appearances, in various stages of anemia. There was also a little brother, but he died.

It is not to be wondered at if they do look like children whose parents have been skating on thin ice. The $24-a-week days are a thing of the past, and now the father's total earnings for a week cannot be more than $18, and generally he loses two, or perhaps more, days a week. If he loses two his wages are $12. His rent is $5. Divide the balance by five and you get $1.40. With five people getting no more than that each week somebody has to go without.

Behind In Rent

Sometimes they get three months behind in the rent, and then it takes them a great deal longer to recover. Invariably they are in debt with the doctor, paying him off sometimes at the rate of 50 cents a week.

This is a typical situation for one of the families on the list of The Star Santa Claus Fund. It is not an isolated case; quite the contrary. There are thousands like it.

The record in any city of any size would show thousands of cases very similar in character to this. That is what it means to the family living on low wages. Just think what a great burden this entails on the community at large. I believe that any medical man will bear me out—and there are a very large number of medical men in this House—that to no small extent the patients in our hospitals coming from the poorer homes in our cities are there because of the lack of proper care at home. Those who have had anything to do with poor relief in our cities know what large sums are given by the various institutions and societies and by the churches toward the support of the people who are obliged to live below the line. I know of one society in my own city which has had to consider seriously the question whether or not it was right to supplement by charity the wages paid to the working people there—wages that are altogether inadequate to support them in anything like a decent standard. We have also the same testimony from our prisons and penitentiaries. A considerable number of the inmates of these institutions were tempted to crime simply because they had to keep themselves on less than would maintain a decent standard of living.

I remember some years ago trying a little experiment of my own. I requested the health officers to give me a spot map showing the location of the contagious diseases in my city over a number of months. I then went to the associated charities and asked them to prepare me a similar map showing where their cases requiring relief were located, and I asked the juvenile court for a spot map indicating in what districts cases of juvenile crime were prevalent. I placed these maps side by side and I found that they were almost identical in detail. I do not know which is the most fundamental—the want of health, or poverty, or juvenile crime, but I would say that the three were closely connected. And the worst is not the effect on the individual or even on the individual family but the effect on the younger children and the coming generation. If we give less than a decent standard of living we simply mortgage the future generation.

Objections to anything like a minimum wage come from two sources. There is sometimes objection on the part of labour itself. It is feared by some labour leaders that the minimum wage might tend to become the maximum, and that, I think, might be a real danger if we proposed to fix a minimum wage in every industry. But I am not talking of a minimum for each industry; all I advocate is a basic wage that would apply to all men, a wage below which it is not safe to allow any family to live. There is also an objection from industry; we are told that industry cannot bear the burden. Well, I suggest that so long as we have such accumulation of wealth as we have in this country we need not worry a great deal about this matter. So long as there are a few people who possess large fortunes while the masses in Canada have comparatively little there is no reason why these masses ought not to have their standards raised. You have but to glance at the income tax returns to realize the very unequal distribution of wealth in Canada, and so long as industries are earning large dividends, so long as our financial institutions are prosperous, there is no reason whatever why individual workmen should subsist on low standards.

In my opinion any industry that cannot pay its employees a decent wage is parasitic, and that industry might just as well pass out. Surely if an industry is worth carrying on it ought to afford a decent living to the people who are engaged in it. As I said a little while ago, we ought to regard wages as a first charge on industry. As it is to-day, we consider interest as a prior charge; rents are regarded as a prior charge and we have profits in various forms as a prior charge as well. We must reverse this way of thinking, and recognize that wages, which mean the very life of the employee, ought to constitute a first charge on industry. As a matter of fact we do not treat our employees on as good a principle as we do the lower animals, for we have on the statute books laws for the prevention of cruelty to animals. A man is not allowed to work a horse and not give it proper food; he is not even allowed to keep a wild animal in confinement without adequately caring for it. Yet we have many people in this country who are working for anything but an adequate wage, a wage which would enable them to provide even the barest necessities of life. We ought surely at least to go as far as that.

It is said that dreadful things may happen if this or any other reform, for that matter, is carried out, but I would point out that no dire results have attended the minimum wage for women. It may be that certain employers have been unable to engage the girls they would have liked to employ, and it may be that the costs of production have been somewhat increased and, of course, passed on to the public. But we are coming to recognize that on the whole no serious results have ensued from the enactment of minimum wage laws for women. Why therefore should there be any danger in enacting a similar law for men who have families to support? I am again speaking of a basic wage; I am thinking of those classes of men who generally have been unable to organize themselves into trade unions and who therefore are the most helpless in our community life.

Perhaps I might pause for a moment to answer a little more fully a suggestion that has been made, that in the event of a minimum wage law being carried into effect there might be a danger of there not being enough work available for those seeking employment. I would call the attention of the House to a very interesting treatment of the Economics of Unemployment by Mr. J. A. Hobson, the well known British economist. In this book issued about a year or so ago he takes the point of view that on the whole the present organization of industry has really allowed for an altogether undue proportion of savings, which have been put into fixed capital—that is to say, into factories, railways and so on, and that whilst undoubtedly this great piling up of capital that has gone on in the past has conduced to build up our present civilization, the time is about come when this is in danger of becoming top-heavy, and when, if we wish to save this system, we shall have to alter it very materially.

His line of reasoning is something like this. Supposing we have a factory turning out $100,000 worth of goods, and supposing $50,000 worth of that output is paid in the form of wages or for raw materials—I am not giving exact proportions; this is simply to illustrate—the owner of the factory is able to retain for himself $50,000. He does not spend that foolishly on himself, as a good many who are opposed to the system imagine he does; he puts the greater part of it back into the business. He does it because he follows tradition; he does it because his competitors are doing so; he does it because of the very necessity of his growing trade. Therefore he puts a good portion of his profits back into his business, and next year, we will say, with his enlarged factory he turns out $200,000 worth of goods. Now he is able to retain a half of that, $100,000, with which he builds new factories. This process continues until on all sides we have very large and extensive means of production. Ultimately he seeks investments abroad, and the same process is repeated there. One hundred or one hundred and fifty years ago this capitalist system, control of factories in the hands of the few, came into existence, and undoubtedly it has produced most remarkable results in the extension of factory and railway investments all over the world.

But the point is that now we have set up factories in China, in India and in other places, all organized on the same principle, all turning out huge quantities of goods for which markets have to be sought. Mr. Hobson has come to the conclusion—and without doubt he is one of the leading economists in Great Britain—that there is an altogether undue proportion of what is produced put into fixed capital. The workers have not sufficient purchasing power to buy back what they have produced. He suggests that if a larger proportion were put into commodities we would start industry going again. I am giving that theory for what it is worth. It is not altogether the theory that I should like to advance, it is not altogether the theory that is held by the group which I represent, but I give it because it comes from a man of undoubted authority in the economic world.

I think there is one particular in which he is correct—that the ownership of the means of production being in the hands of a few has, as Keynes clearly pointed out in his book, The Economic Consequences of the Peace, enabled capitalists to retain the greater part of the cake which they and the workers in the community have been producing. That has been going on for a good many years, and it has been satisfactory perhaps from the world's standpoint for some time, but we are fast coming to the point where those countries which formerly were the markets for our goods are now becoming our competitors in the manufacture of similar goods. In a word, we are being thrown back upon ourselves, and it is well worth our considering whether from the larger economic aspects we would not, as Hobson has suggested, gain by distributing a great deal more in the form of wages and services than we are doing at the present time.

However, I am not arguing from the larger economic aspects of the question. I am trying to look at the situation from the standpoint of the individual family and of the groups that to-day are living on too small a wage. I would ask that to-night this House should in some way provide means for the discussion of this question and for the carrying out of the avowed purposes of the clauses in the Versailles treaty. Perhaps I may be permitted to quote to the government from a document that I have been quoting to the House pretty regularly at intervals for the last four years. The National Liberal convention in August 1919 put itself on record with regard to labour and industry as follows:

> Resolved that the committee recommends that the National Liberal convention accept in their entirety as a part of the Liberal platform in the spirit they have been framed and in so far as the special circumstances of the country will permit, the terms of the labour convention and general principles associated with the League of Nations and incorporated in the conditions of peace.
> These methods and principles for regulating labour conditions so set forth in the treaty are as follows:
> 1. The guiding principles that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.
> 3. The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life as this is understood in their time and country.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that in presenting this resolution and asking that the guarantees of the Peace treaty should be made statutory, I am simply asking that the programme of the Liberal party—now the government of this country—should be carried out.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I am glad by seconding this resolution to be associated with the subject matter of it. If I had any fault to find with it, I would say that it hardly went far enough. It is too academic in its character:

> That, in the opinion of this House, a wage sufficient to provide for a reasonable standard of living should constitute a legal minimum wage.

I would have preferred something a little more mandatory, or a little more suggestive of action being taken by the government to carry out the purpose of the resolution. I do not think that any employer or any representative of an association of employers, however reactionary they or he may be, could have any objection to the passage of this resolution worded as it is.

I take exception somewhat to the remarks of the introducer of the resolution about there being some dubiety as to whether its subject matter comes under the jurisdiction of the Dominion or of the provinces, for I think that was thoroughly threshed out some four years ago. The question arose then more particularly in connection with the eight-hour law, and it was, I think, decided on the very best obtainable legal authority that it was entirely a matter for the provinces, coming under that section of the British North America Act which gives to the provinces exclusive jurisdiction in dealing with civil rights.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the hon. gentleman if this is not a somewhat different proposal?

Mr. NEILL: I think the reference then made covered this branch too, although I would not be dogmatic about it. Now, in British Columbia we are particularly sympathetic with this resolution for three reasons: first, on general principles; second, because we have already taken steps in this direction; and third, because we hope that this may be a solution, or at any rate a partial solution, of Asiatic competition.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, oh.

Mr. NEILL: My hon. friend laughs because he thinks I could not go very far without bringing in the Asiatics. But perhaps he will allow me to say it is a much more important question in British Columbia than it is in his province. While we hope we may be able to deal with the question of further Asiatic immigration by imposing effective restrictions, the economic competition of those who are already here can, we think, be most suitably met by some legislation along the lines of a minimum wage bill, because if a minimum wage is imposed, the desire to employ this cheaper oriental labour will cease and possibly will lead to its ultimate elimination.

Now, I am proud to think that the minimum wage bill was introduced in the British Columbia legislature a few months ago by Major Burde, M.C. who represents Alberni in the local House, being part of the riding which I represent in this House. I am not at all afraid of the suggestion made this afternoon, more or less implied perhaps, of the economic ruin and distress that would follow the introduction of legislation of this kind even if it were made universal in Canada in its application to-day. That has been the cry all down the ages. I have read of the terrible prophecies of ruin and financial disaster made in the vicinity of Manchester, when many years ago it was proposed that children under the age of twelve should not work more than twelve hours a day in the factories. A few years ago in British Columbia when the minimum wage measure for women was introduced ,these same prognostications were made; we would lose our business; we would lose our trade, and inasmuch as that act applied only to British Columbia—we were practically pioneers in that line—the other provinces would get ahead of us in every form of industry. None of those dreadful things happened. As a matter of fact the act was administered in a very moderate and reasonable spirit. Moreover, the people against whom or concerning whom it had to be administered, that is the employers, were also moderate and reasonable. Probably ninety per cent of the employers wanted to and did treat their women employees decently and gave them a sufficient wage; it was only the ten per cent who wanted to sweat their women employees at that time, but it is through minorities such as that that these things spread, because people must meet their competitors or go out of business.

So it was found that this act did not work in an unjust way at all and it did not prove to be an undesirable factor in the economic situation. There was one result, however, which was not anticipated; they ran up against the law of supply and demand. It was found that when times were good the wages of these women easily and naturally ran ahead of the legal minimum wage, but when times got bad the law of supply and demand began to operate and it was very hard to enforce. the act. Certain of the employers would take advantage of it, either by frankly telling their women employees that they would have to take less wages or be fired, or they would pay their wages by cheque and make them hand back a certain portion, which was put into some fund, ultimately going back to the employer. On the whole, however, it has been a very good thing, in that it provided for these women a reasonable living wage.

As regards this minimum male wage law introduced into British Columbia last fall I would like to quote a few of the leading politicians of that province from both sides of the House. Hon. T. G. Coventry, a Conservative, supported the bill. Mr. C. McRae, a Liberal, who said he was speaking on behalf of the lumber manufacturers, ended with these words:

> The lumber manufacturers are willing that the industry should be manned only by white labour, and they wished to keep it free from an influx of orientals.

He welcomed this bill as a step in that direction. Brigadier-General Odlum, a Liberal, said that the wages paid in the printing industry would stagger the previous speaker, but despite the high wage the industry was making good progress and a very good class of employee was being attracted to it. He added:

> I support the bill because the lumber industry is one in which orientals are largely employed, and any movement for the reduction of their numbers in our industries is worthy of support.

Then another gentleman, Mr. Bruhn, a Conservative, stated that he was absolutely in favour of the bill, and that he could see no danger in such a bill if carried out under a just and fair board willing to judge each case on its merits both as regards industries and the working man. A vote was taken, and the bill passed the third reading by a majority of 39 to 3. The House there is divided almost evenly between Conservatives and Liberals, with a few Labour members, so that it will be seen that the bill passed almost unanimously. The three who voted against it were composed of one Conservative, one provincial party member and one member whose politics I do not know.

I would like to point out another feature. I have the act in front of me and it is a very simple one indeed, composed of only a few sections. It gives power to the board to establish a minimum wage. It was based very largely on the act passed a few years before—in fact it was based almost entirely on the act providing a minimum wage for women employees. Each industry had a minimum wage, and one board was established, the minimum wage board. They took evidence from the various industries, hearing both employers and employees, and with very little friction and expense they were able to arrive at a decision in each industry which

I think was never appealed from by either side. It was found to work out most satisfactorily. There is a provision in the act for revision from time to time, and I want to point out that the minimum wage for men is going to be operated under that same board, possibly enlarged somewhat, so there will be no confusion and no upsetting of industry, and I think the results will be arrived at easily and acceptably to both sides.

We have heard a great deal about the exodus to the United States and we have heard many remedies proposed to rectify that condition. Did it ever strike hon. gentlemen in this House that a good way to keep an employee is to pay him a better wage? If I have ten men working for me and I am afraid my competitor is going to steal them, the chances are that they will stay with me if I raise their wages and make their conditions more comfortable. I think it was Henry Ford, when he found business getting slack and it was suggested that he cut down wages, who said that they were not getting enough, and he raised their wages with satisfactory results to himself. I am not afraid of the argument that has been advanced, that we will come in contact with the cheap labour of other countries. I think it has been proved that competent labour with the aid of machinery can easily outclass cheap foreign labour. I recall a case a number of years ago when certain manufacturers in India asked for what I suppose we would call protection against a similar class of manufacturers operating in Great Britain. India produces a great quantity of jute, which was manufactured by some manufacturers there, and if I am not mistaken they paid their men a wage equivalent to seven cents in our money. That jute was also shipped to Scotland, to the city of Dundee, where it was manufactured into garments appropriate for India, by fairly well paid British labour. Those garments were shipped out to India, entailing a long water and rail haul, and were able to compete so successfully with the Indian manufacturer on the spot with his extremely cheap labour that they were compelled to seek protection against the Scottish manufacturer. I think it will always be found that well paid, machine-aided, intelligent white labour can successfully compete with the cheaper forms of foreign labour.

I hope this resolution will pass. It is certainly very moderate in its terms and is only an academic expression of our opinion. I think we might well do it if only to make a gesture at least towards fulfilling our obligations to labour as expressed in the treaty of Versailles. Perhaps we forget sometimes that during the war there came a crisis in which the attitude of labour was, we thought, somewhat uncertain. What labour did or thought or said in that crisis was of vital importance to the British Empire and to the successful termination of the war. Labour threw its weight solidly with us in the war, and in return it was acknowledged in framing the treaty of Versailles that some resolution or convention should be adopted recognizing the part that Labour had taken in the war. A number of conventions were adopted, very few of which, however, have been followed up by legislation by the various signatories to the treaty. This is one of them, and I suggest we would not be going very far if we accepted this resolution in recognition of our obligation to labour under that treaty.

Mr. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): In rising to say a few words in support of this resolution, I observe that it calls for a wage sufficient to provide for a reasonable standard of living to be adopted as the legal minimum wage. That seems to me to be getting into the field of provincial rights. It would be difficult, I am sure, to find either in any of the provincial Houses or in this House any man who would say that a fair and reasonable wage should not prevail, and it is not difficult to get resolutions along that line passed, but very little in the way of results follows from the passing of these resolutions unless they are backed up by legislation, such as we have in Ontario, and a minimum wage board is appointed. Like my good friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), I moved a resolution on the floor of the Ontario legislature in 1924, which read as follows:

> Resolved that it is the opinion of this House a clause shall be inserted in all contracts made by the government for the sale of timber or pulpwood, or for the development of water-powers, providing that the wages to be paid by the concessionaire shall be not less than the wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out. And when renewals or transfers are made or where the terms embodied in contracts now in existence are not fulfilled, the government shall avail itself of the opportunity to insert such a clause.

To that resolution an amendment was moved by the premier of the province, adding the words:

> —in so far as due regard to vested rights and justice may permit.

As we had no desire to do anything to hurt vested rights or justice, we let the resolution go through with that amendment, but notwithstanding that the resolution was carried by the Ontario legislature and thereby became an order of the House, although there have been some timber contracts and water power leases made since then, I am informed that this clause has not been included in any of them, I mention that just as an illustration of how resolutions of this kind passing the House promiscuously will accomplish little unless they are backed up by legislation, except, of course, that they do serve to express the opinion of the House.

I shall not take up the time of the House further, because I think my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre has covered the ground very fully. In order to get somewhere —because there is a question here of disputed jurisdiction and authority—I think the government should accept the suggestion made by my hon. friend and refer this matter to the committee on Industrial Relations. I realize, of course, it is difficult to refer a matter to a committee which is not yet in existence, but probably the leader of the government can find some way of deferring the discussion or adjourning the debate until after the committee has been constituted, and then this question could be referred to that committee.

Hon. J H. KING (East Kootenay): I do not think any of us will take exception to the wording of the resolution proposed by my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth):

> That in the opinion of this House a wage sufficient to provide for a reasonable standard of living should constitute a legal minimum wage.

As my hon. friend has outlined to-day to the House, during the negotiations preceding the Versailles treaty, when the representatives of the different nations assembled in solemn conference were trying to arrive at resolutions or formulae that would improve conditions in the world, much time was given in trying to realize the desire and hope that out of that great conflict there would come better conditions for Labour. That conference did express the firm desire that in the different countries concerned this principle should prevail:

> The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life as this is understood in their time and country.

That is from article 427 of the treaty. My hon. friend to-day has kept his wording pretty much within the limits of the principle there laid down. It is true that in the Dominion of Canada this question is not a new one. In seven of the provinces we have the principle accepted and a minimum wage law applied to certain classes of female workers. Among those provinces we find both the older and the new provinces—Nova Scotia, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta and British Columbia. British Columbia has gone probably a little further than the other provinces, for not only have we a minimum wage for certain classes of female workers, but we have also gone into the field of male workers, particularly in the lumber industry.

But the question is, how shall we arrive at our object, and what are our powers? A reference was made to our courts and in June last a decision was given which set out the powers relative to hours of labour in industrial employment. The judgment set out that the legislative authority on this subject belonged to the provinces, that if the power to legislate for an eight-hour day is vested in the provinces, presumably the latter are wage matters. That having been decided by our courts and the provinces having already moved in the matter, and having set up minimum wage boards dealing with certain classes of labour, the field is cleared to some extent. It is, I think, conceded on all sides that this is a provincial problem. Personally I do not think there would be any harm—in fact much good might come from the suggestion of the mover of the resolution in this respect—in an adjournment of the debate, and later, when the committees are formed, a reference of the resolution to the committee on Industrial and International Relations. It is a subject that would stand inquiry and investigation by a committee of this House, although this parliament would not necessarily be committed to legislation along those lines. Our committees are not yet constituted, but they will be within a few hours, and I would suggest that that course be followed. I now move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

FUEL SUPPLY

MOTION FOR COMMITTEE OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton) moved:

> That in the opinion of this House, attention be given to the development of the coal resources of Canada, and the delivery of this product at the lowest cost, in order to meet the urgent need for this fuel for manufacturing and domestic uses; and
> That a committee composed of members of this House be appointed to investigate our present sources of supply of anthracite and bituminous coal. The dependability of such sources, and whether the prices paid by the Canadian consumer is fair and reasonable, and to also inquire as to the methods of mining and delivering Canadian coal in the best and cheapest way to all parts of the Dominion, for the purpose of giving employment to our workmen, freight to our transportation companies, and thus effecting a saving of money now spent for this commodity in other countries.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution is one that deserves the consideration of every member of this House. There is no question as to the need of the development of our coal resources. Next to the United States, Canada has the largest coal reserves in the world. Their exploitation is in its infancy. The extremes of our east and west have large coal fields. Central Canada, the area where the need of coal is acutely felt, holds the key to the situation. This area, comprising all the province of Ontario and that part of the province of Quebec from the Ontario boundary east to Montreal, is the centre of the Canadian manufacturing and population density. Its main source of fuel for a long time has been the coal fields of the United States, which are nearer to it by rail and water routes than the coal fields of western Canada, or those of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in the east. We have only to look for a few minutes at the facts contained in the Statistical Year Book to convince us that the coal mines of Canada contain an unlimited supply of fuel suitable for our needs, and that the only problems to be solved are those of transportation and the regulations governing the mining and handling of this product, including its proper standardization and analysation. The Canada Year Book at page 26 contains the following statement:

Canada's coal resources are only now being exploited to any considerable extent, the estimated total reserves available amounting to one trillion, two hundred and thirty-four billions, two-hundred and sixty-nine million, three hundred and ten thousand metric tons, approximately one sixth of the world's reserve; over eighty-five per cent of the Canadian reserves are in Alberta. The total estimated reserves constitute one-quarter of the amount of coal available in North and South America.

Then again on page 62 this statement appears:

The anomaly of this situation is heightened if we consider that Canada's present coal consumption is about thirty-five million tons annually as against reserves of one trillion, two hundred and thirty-four billion two hundred and eighty nine million metric tons, sufficient for an unthinkably long period at the present rate of consumption. The coal production in 1923 amounted to 16,990,571 tons, valued at $72,058,986, or an average of $4.33 per ton. This represented an increase of 1,833,140 tons or 7.8 per cent in quantity as compared with the previous year. The production was obtained by mines in which were employed on the average of 30,300 men at a wage cost of approximately $42,321,990.

Referring to the production during 1923, Alberta held the first place among the coal-producing provinces with an output of 6,854,397 tons; Nova Scotia followed closely with 6,597,838 tons; the output of coal from the mines of British Columbia and the Yukon amounted to 2,823,619 tons, while Saskatchewan mined 438,100 tons and New Brunswick 276,617 tons. During 1923, 22,687,320 tons of foreign coal were imported into Canada. Had four-fifths of this amount of coal been obtained from Canadian mines, over $100,000,000 would have been left in Canada. Thirty-five thousand men would have had employment at a cost of some $50,000,000, and our railways would have benefited by the additional traffic. Canada spends annually from $120,000,000 to $135,000,000 for coal produced outside her own territory.

I am well aware that efforts have been made by former parliaments, both local and federal, to deal with the Dominion fuel situation. A committee composed of members of this House, was appointed in 1923, and a committee composed of members of the Senate was appointed in 1923 for the purpose of investigating this matter. Although they gathered a lot of information, no definite action has been taken. It might be well to place on record a few of the findings of these different committees, and in order that we may appreciate the fact that the only source of information we have through the Printing Bureau is found in the report of the two committees in question, which I intend to refer to, I will read the following letter from Mr. Acland, King's Printer:—

I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 11th instant and to enclose herewith a copy of the report of the special committee of the House of Commons on mines and minerals, dealing with the question of the Canadian fuel supply. Also a copy of a report of the report of the special committee of the Senate on the same question. These reports are dated 1923, and are the only ones in our possession dealing with the fuel question.

Now if we will look at the report of the select standing committee on Mines and Minerals of the House of Commons, page 7, we find the following statement:—

Your committee has heard much evidence from various parts of Canada on every phase of the questions sumitted to it in said resolution. One statement may be made without any hesitation, that is, that it is absolutely necessary that every step possible should and must be taken at once by Canada through its government, its transportation companies, its coal operators and manufacturers of other fuels, to make Canada independent of other countries for its fuel supply. The economic question alone should move all Canadians to put forth every exertion to attain this object. Canada cannot for long continue paying to foreign countries millions of dollars yearly for fuel and hope to maintain its economic independence. One has only to consider this for a short time to see where such a condition will ultimately land us. Yet another consideration along this line is the fact that the United States, our chief source of supply, could not last year give Canada the usual supply, and many cases of extreme hardship and suffering were brought to the attention of the committee through lack of domestic fuel. No fault, however, can be found with the United States Fuel Control Board for this shortage, as they treated Canada fairly, but a note of warning was sent out by the fuel board last winter, which should be taken to heart by Canadians. That was in effect that Canada could not hope in the future to get the usual supply of anthracite from the United States.

Your committee is able to point out from the evidence adduced that Canada has ample resources of coal for all purposes for ages to come. The chief sources of supply are in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Alberta and British Columbia. One fact struck your committee very forcibly, that is, that a large percentage of the population of central Canada have strange delusions regarding Canadian coal; they think we have no suitable domestic coal. What is wanted in this connection is propaganda, an advertising throughout Canada of the true value of Canadian coal and in this connection your committee would like to point out that up until two years ago the fuel needs of Winnipeg were supplied to the extent of 85 per cent by United States anthracite. Through the continued efforts of the Alberta government and coal operators 90 per cent of the Winnipeg coal needs are now supplied from Alberta.

The committee goes on to emphasize the fact that the time has come when the government should act in connection with this matter and take immediate steps to bring about a remedy for the situation complained of.

The special committee of the Senate appointed to inquire into the matter of the fuel supply of Canada, in their final report make these statements:

There is an abundance of evidence to the effect that the coal areas of Canada, east and west, are sufficient to supply the fuel needs of our entire population for an indefinite period of time. In other words there is no shortage of coal in Canada, neither is there a lack of developed mines. A large percentage of the collieries now in operation—more particularly those in western Canada—are capable of increasing their output to a very considerable extent with little or no capital cost, and would undoubtedly do so if markets for their increased output were available. In the coal fields of the east, the situation is somewhat different. Many of the mines of that area would not be able to increase production to any material extent without the expenditure of very large sums of money on capital account.

As regards Nova Scotia coal your committee are of the opinion that central Canada in the future may be able to secure a much larger share of its requirements of bituminous coal from that source provided navigation, storage, handling and shipping facilities west of Montreal are improved.

Your committee is impressed with the necessity of having this phase of our fuel problem more thoroughly investigated and recommends that the Dominion Fuel Board should continue its investigations along this line.

They continue to emphasize the fact that immediate action should be taken and make statements such as this:

To a certain extent anthracite coal may be regarded as a luxury, and the sooner the public realize this fact, the less danger there will be of being haunted by the nightmare of a coal famine.

During the recent emergency period considerable anthracite coal was imported from Wales and Scotland and is still being brought in. The Fuel Controller of Ontario gave evidence to the effect that this coal is of the highest quality and is worth at least $3 per ton more than the ordinary grades of United States anthracite. To the extent that this British coal is imported, our dependence on United States anthracite is lessened, and ocean tonnage for our exports is increased.

[Mr. J. E. Armstrong.]

This report merely emphasizes, as I said before, the fact that the government should take immediate action along the line of trying to solve this very important problem. The Dominion Fuel Board created by the Canadian Government has done much useful work, but their powers are limited. Premiers of provinces and fuel controllers in those provinces have made an earnest effort to solve the fuel question. Members of parliament and senators have met with fuel controllers in the different provinces for this same purpose. I will not take up the time of this House reviewing the work already done, but the facts are that no definite action has been taken by any government and we are still dependent on our southern neighbours for our winter warmth and our industrial fuel.

It is highly desirable that a policy should be adopted which will ensure Canada against dependence upon the present precarious source of her fuel supply. It is a matter that vitally affects every home in Canada and every industry in Canada, hence every member of parliament should be actively interested in it. It is not for any one group or party in this House to undertake to solve the problem, nor is it a question for provincial governments alone to deal with, although they can materially assist. The Dominion government cannot shift the responsibility to local governments; local governments could not control the situation and months and years would go by with nothing accomplished. We have just passed through a crisis in relation to the coal question which might very easily have become a calamity. The Dominion parliament must recognize the importance and seriousness of the Canadian coal situation and regard it from the standpoint of a national emergency. If parliament will form a committee composed of eleven members of this House, one from each province, two from Ontario and two from Quebec—these provinces, owing to their large population, being the most vitally interested—and will give that committee a wide scope in their investigation of the problems outlined in my resolution, I am firmly convinced that parliament could be supplied with important data regarding this problem. This committee should frame recommendations for a national fuel policy to be considered by the Canadian and provincial governments, with their experts on transportation and co-related activities, before any definite action be taken.

It would be the duty of this committee to consider the various phases of the fuel situation, as it affects producers and consumers. The rights of the consumer must be adequately safeguarded. No company should be able to palm off low quality fuel, or give stones to those who pay for coal. The most pressing need of this industry to-day is transportation. The Dominion government will have to take responsibility in this matter.

I am fully persuaded that with a proper policy of co-operation and the working out of a programme of transportation such as this committee would present to parliament, a solution of this problem could be reached. Failure to grant the request will mean years of delay. In order that a satisfactory settlement of this question may be brought about, co-operation between the local and Dominion governments must be attained, and the basis of all arrangements should be mutual confidence and mutual goodwill. I am fully persuaded that with a proper policy of co-operation between the local and Dominion governments and between the public and the industry, this problem can be solved with mutual advantage to all. Unified control is the most economical method—the only method, in my opinion—of supplying the central provinces with fuel from the east and west. For instance, if the mine owners are at liberty to increase the price at the mines beyond a reasonable amount, or the transportation companies raise their rates, then the whole structure falls.

The fuel controllers in the different provinces will be useful witnesses as to actual conditions. The premiers and ministers of mines of the various provinces should have an opportunity to express their views before the committee, as well as other prominent men who are interested in this problem. The meetings of this committee should not be held especially for the cross-examination of witnesses, but to receive information tendered in a co-operative spirit. In other words, the committee in making this inquiry is seeking no victims for its wrath but seeking information as to the probable trend of the coal industry, the methods needed for its protection and advancement, and the possibilities which the future may hold for its development. The committee in preparing its report for the government should have the views of a number of leaders in this industry and those connected with transportation companies.

In the second paragraph you will notice I ask that the committee investigate our present sources of supply of anthracite and bituminous coal, the dependability of such sources and whether the price paid by the Canadian consumer is fair and reasonable. This will be an easy matter for the committee to handle, and one in which the officials of this government would be asked to assist, along with the officials of our local governments. With the enormous supplies of bituminous coal, coal that belongs to the people of Canada in our eastern and western provinces, we can depend upon a supply of domestic fuel. Bituminous coal is the only heat producing material of which we have an adequate supply to provide for a long time in the future. Our people should also remember that anthracite coal can no longer remain the mainstay of the Canadian household. Even if the supplies were continuous, it is insufficient. The output of the anthracite mines has remained stationary for many years, in the face of a growing population dependent upon it, and during the last ten years the price has nearly doubled, adding to the domestic fuel bill of the people of the United States an amount estimated at forty million dollars a year and many millions to the fuel bill of the people of Canada. Within the next ten years we must replace a large part of our present anthracite coal supply with some other form of heat. Sooner or later we must learn to manage without anthracite, and the sooner we learn to use other fuels the better. Competition must be introduced into an industry where monopoly is threatened. Fuel oil has during the last few years promised an avenue of escape, but at best this can only be temporary. We must look elsewhere.

I have in my possession enough material to convince any serious-minded man that the Canadian people have passed through a serious crisis owing to the shortage of coal. We must remember that eastern Canada's present annual coal requirements amount to about twenty million tons, and if it were transported from the west it would be equivalent to transporting an additional 600 million bushels of grain from west to east. Arrangements for the transportation of this immense quantity of coal could not be made in a few months. Could Canadian coal be utilized we would help Alberta and Nova Scotia and save for Canada annually very large sums which now go to the coal barons of the United States. The last part of the resolution reads:

And to also inquire as to the methods of mining and delivering Canadian coal in the best and cheapest way to all parts of the Dominion, for the purpose of giving employment to our workmen, freight to our transportation companies, and thus effecting a saving of money now spent for this commodity in other countries.

The latter part of this paragraph is an accepted fact, providing that we can solve the first part, that is, to inquire into the methods of mining and delivering Canadian coal in the best and cheapest way to all parts of the Dominion. A plan to assure purchase of stated amounts of Alberta coal and to bring it to central Canada at a rate that will allow of an attractive selling price for home or factory is conceded to be the need of the hour. This is a problem to which the Alberta and Ontario governments are giving their attention. They cannot definitely settle it without the aid of the Canadian government. One of the first questions that should come before the committee is the question of water transportation of coal from Nova Scotia to Quebec and Montreal, including loading and unloading facilities at the points named.

Another matter that should receive the early attention of the committee is the handling of Alberta coal by lake and rail. I have given a great deal of personal attention to this phase of the question and believe that I am in a position to place before the committee indisputable statements that will completely change the preconceived idea that we must look to the railroads alone to solve this problem of transportation. The railroads will be expected to handle the coal from the Alberta mines to the head of the lakes, under improved transportation facilities. By the use of car tipples coal can be unloaded into boats at the rate of forty cars per hour, and if the capacity of the cars is from 50 to 75 or 100 tons a boat will be loaded in a few hours. The machinery for the unloading of coal from cars into boats has been greatly improved during the past few years and the likelihood of loss through the disintegration of coal has been largely eliminated. The coal is taken from open cars to a closed vessel and not exposed again or jarred as it would be over the railroad, owing to the starting and stopping of the trains. This coal if taken to Ontario ports by boat could be unloaded by the most improved machinery very quickly, and at a tremendous saving to the people.

I am credibly informed that coal can be loaded at Port Arthur and Fort William, and delivered by boat to such ports as Midland, Owen Sound and Goderich on lake Huron at less than one dollar per ton; that the same coal can be delivered at Sarnia, Wallaceburg, Windsor and lake Erie ports at $1 per ton from Port Arthur and Fort William; and at Hamilton, Toronto and Kingston at a little over $1 per ton from the same ports. Midland is 90 miles from Toronto by rail and cars can be loaded direct from the boat. Other ports could be used in a like manner for inland delivery.

Consider the tremendous saving in freight, why should this not be investigated? And what better means of investigation than by a committee composed of members of this House? This proposition will require the expenditure of public money for the building of the car tipples and unloading devices, and perhaps the fitting up of some of our merchant marine vessels to carry the coal. We have spent millions, yes, tens of millions of public money, in building public docks, piers and elevators, for the handling of grain. Why not a little to help bring Alberta coal to Ontario and Nova Scotia coal to Quebec? Private individuals or companies will not undertake this work, nor will provincial governments do it. It is for this government to undertake it, and the committee will show the way.

Let me give you a few facts to support my arguments. Ninety per cent of the people in the state of Michigan burn bituminous coal similar to the Alberta coal. Boats from Toledo and Cleveland supply nearly all the ports between Detroit and Duluth in the United States, and even carry coal to Port Arthur and Fort William. Twenty-six million long tons of coal were carried by boat up the lakes from Cleveland and 28,000,000 tons were carried by boat from Toledo.

The Pringle Barge Line Company, whose headquarters are at Cleveland, Ohio, carries all the coal used by the Imperial Oil Company of Sarnia, the Morton Salt Company of Port Huron, the Edison Electric Company of Port Huron and the Diamond Crystal Salt Company of St. Clair. These four firms use in excess of half a million tons of coal per year, and each of them is equipped in a crude way for unloading to their docks and sometimes the boats are delayed. Mr. Pringle says that he has a contract running over a term of years with these firms, and for the purpose he is having one of his boats equipped with a self-unloading conveyor so that he can go to any port and unload his own boat.

This conveyor system installed in the boat seems to be an excellent plan, as no further equipment on the dock is necessary to unload vessels. The conveyor bucket system does not break the coal up nearly as much as using any other type such as clam shell.

The Morton Salt Company of Port Huron, Michigan, make this statement:—

The cost of unloading boats depends on the style or shape of the boat. For instance, we use a Mead-Morrison unloading rig with a three-ton clam. We have unloaded some boats for less than 3 cents a ton; others have cost as high as 5 cents or 6 cents, due to the trimming necessary to transfer the coal to where the clam could get at it. Then, the size and style of the unloading rig have a lot to do with it, and if an automatic trimmer is used, it reduces the cost materially, for the greatest cost is in the trimming.

Mr. Thomas Draper, Port Huron, Michigan, well posted in these matters, says:—

Last week while in Cleveland I had an interview with Mr. J. P. Doyle, Sales Manager of the Pittsburg Coal Co., Cleveland. This firm is one of the largest distributors of coal in the United States, having fleets of tow boats and barges on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers and also many boats on the Great Lakes. Mr. Doyle stated they generally load their boats with the car dumpers which are installed at the different lake Erie docks and they unload with the McMyler whorlies. These are of all sizes, from 2½ to 5 ton. He showed me several statements where vessels of 5,800 to 6,000 tons were unloaded to cars or docks at an average cost of 9 cents per ton. These whorlies swing on a radius of about 54 feet. He further mentioned that at Algonquin and Soo docks, where they unload a great deal of coal, they use 2½ ton whorlies which they run almost constantly during the 24 hours, and at these busy points the cost of unloading is about 7 cents per ton. I have further information that most of the stone boats unload very much cheaper than this by means of a conveyor system the same as the Pringle Barge Lines are installing for the coal trade in the St. Clair river. This latter plan does not require any machinery on the dock as the boats can run it into any dock and unload with their own machinery.

The railroads claim that the lowest rate coal can be carried from Alberta points to points in Ontario is $9 per ton. The National Railways this year agreed to bring 25,000 tons at $7 and did bring 18,000 tons, which was distributed to about 180 different localities in Ontario and shipments were then discontinued until after western grain had been moved. However, the lake and rail haul is feasible, and it would, of course, be cheaper than all rail. Port Arthur and Fort William are about 1,200 miles from Edmonton, while Toronto is 2,000, and coal ought to be carried to the head of the lakes for three-fifths of the through rate. Taking $9 as a basis, I consider that coal should be carried to the head of the lakes for $5.40.

In regard to cost of the lake haul, United States coal is now carried from lake Erie points to the head of the lakes at 60 cents per ton, exclusive of 5 cents for loading and 10 cents for unloading. Iron ore from Duluth to lake Erie ports is carried at $1 per long ton of 2,240 pounds, and as most of the vessels carrying ore down the lakes return light, a one-way cargo at $1 per ton evidently pays all expenses. The grain rate from Duluth to Buffalo is 1½ cents per bushel or 50 cents per ton.

I am advised by marine experts that if $1 per ton were offered on coal, Port Arthur or Fort William to Georgian bay, Windsor or lake Erie points, it would be the best paying freight on the lakes and be very attractive to vessel owners. From the figures I have it may be assumed that a rail-and-water rate on Alberta coal should be less than $7 per ton, made up as follows:

Edmonton to Port Arthur..	$5 40
Loading to boat..	10
Boat charge..	1 00
Unloading..	10
Total..	$6 60

I have gone very thoroughly into loading and unloading methods, and can report that up-to-date coal dumpers, including graded trucks, capable of dumping 2,000 tons per hour could be installed at a cost of from $400,000 to $500,000, and these would dump gondola or any kind of open cars. There are already a number of ports on Georgian Bay, as well as Sarnia, Windsor and some lake Erie ports, that are equipped to unload coal.

I have obtained information with regard to the loading system of the Hocking Valley Railway at Toledo, where two coal tipples last year, up to December 11th, transferred from cars to boats more than 8,000,000 tons of coal. Each of these tipples has a capacity of 2,000 tons per hour rating on 50 ton cars, but this is greatly increased when they dump 60, 70, 80, 90 or 100 ton cars, as they take no longer to dump than 50-ton cars. On this average for the season, it costs less than 5 cents per ton to transfer from cars to boats. During the loading of the steamer Henry Ford at the Baltimore & Ohio docks in Toledo recently, the actual time of dumping a large gondola car was about one and a half minutes, and it takes about the same time to handle the cars on and off the tipple, so that the capacity of this tipple is about 40 cars per hour.

We collect $135,000,000 of Canadian money and send it to the United States for coal. What do we get for it? Then we collect from our people another $135,000,000 to send again to the United States next year. And so the grind goes on while our miners and their families are starving and our resources lie undeveloped.

Would not this Dominion government be justified in spending a million dollars in equipping two unloading docks at Port Arthur and Fort William, and another million for large gondola cars for the special coal traffic? This would mean increased labour for Canadian railroad men, Canadian steamboat employees and Canadian coal miners of the West. The latter would have an all the year trade, instead of for only a few months as at present. If this arrangement could be worked out, the mine owners would soon reduce the cost of mining, for their overhead would then be spread over an entire year instead of a few months as at present, and the miners would take less wages for steady work all the year round.

Our western provinces have learned the lesson of carrying anthracite coal by lake and rail to Winnipeg and the west. It was like carting coal to Newcastle as the great province of Alberta is practically undermined with coal. Ninety per cent of the coal now used in Winnipeg comes from Alberta. And then in the east we have the province of Nova Scotia which has enormous mines of coal capable of supplying the eastern provinces for ages to come.

We might well ask: If grain and cattle can be carried at preferential rates from the western provinces, why cannot coal be granted the same rates?

Let me quote the Montreal Star of February 6, 1926:

Winnipeg, Man., Feb. 6th. Roughly speaking one and a half per cent of the 195,637,112 bushels of grain shipped by the Canadian Pacific Railway since the opening of the season, August 1, 1925, to January 31, 1926, went by the all rail route or exactly 3,182,198 bushels. About one-eighth or 30,216,134 bushels travelled out through the port of Vancouver and all the remainder, or fully 85 per cent, was shipped via Fort William. Figures to this effect were issued by the Canadian Pacific transportation department.

This is an interesting statement, proving the advantage of lake as well as rail transportation. If grain can be so carried, why not coal? The same boats could be used for both. If 75 per cent of the wheat can be carried by lake and rail, why not coal?

Mr. MANION: Has my hon. friend any figures on the cost of handling coal from the head of the lakes to lake Huron and other ports?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I have given that information in a definite statement to the effect that it should not cost one dollar per ton to all the ports along lake Huron, and that it should not exceed one dollar a ton to all the ports along the St. Clair river and lake Erie. Coal could be taken through the canals to Toronto for very little over one dollar per ton. Does that answer my hon. friend's question?

Mr. MANION: Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): The manufacturers of the United States and Canada have partly solved their fuel problems by transferring the business of supplying power from the industrial manufacturers to the great electric power companies. The result of this move has been highly satisfactory. The great electric companies can manufacture and deliver power far more economically than the industrial plant because of the magnitude of their operations. Many of the great power companies in the United States are deeply interested in the coal mining business.

In the United States to-day there is a movement towards consolidations within the industry. Within the past few weeks a merger of fourteen big coal properties in eastern Kentucky, southwestern Virginia and west Virginia has been formed into a $10,000,000 combination—small compared with other mergers, but a straw which shows the direction of the tide.

Then there is a growing tendency in the United States for the users of coal to make sure of their own supply. It is apparent all along the line, from steel mills to the latest combinations, that of electric companies which produce electricity by the use of coal. This may in the near future bring about a complete dismemberment of the industry and its apportionment in amounts large and small to the industries to which it furnishes power.

Another question we should take into consideration is that industrial expansion in the United States is making a problem of transportation. The western states are becoming more industrialized and populated. These states in the future will require more coal and will be up against a similar problem to that of Canada in transporting fuel long distances.

It is possible that the consumption of coal could be reduced by extending hydro electric power to replace some of the present uses of coal. But it must also be taken into account that the hydro electric situation in the province of Ontario is acute, and that in the near future, unless the coal users can take off the peak power, there will not be sufficient available power, especially in western Ontario. For some years past the Hydro Electric Power Commission of the province has had under consideration the building of coal burning plants in order to assist in furnishing additional hydro electric power. Should the manufacturing industries of Ontario increase their output to any great extent within the next year or two, the hydro electric power situation would become more serious and the commission would be compelled to establish coal burning centres in order to supply the needs of the people and their industries. The water power used in 1924 in Ontario represented 7,800,000 tons of coal, which would have added to the complicated fuel situation if coal alone had been the source of power.

The Dominion government at the last session passed an act granting a subsidy on coke manufactured from Canadian coal. While this legislation has only been taken advantage of to a limited extent, it is a question that should be considered by this committee.

Nearly all the large coke producing plants in the cities of Ontario and Quebec at present use United States bituminous coal. I have asked several gentlemen connected with these firms why they are not using coal from Nova Scotia or the west. Their answer has been that they have not been able to obtain a sufficient supply from Alberta at prices which they considered reasonable; and from what I can understand the coke producing plants, such as the gas companies in Quebec, Montreal and Ottawa claim that the coal produced in the province of Nova Scotia contains too much sulphur for them to manufacture a suitable gas to be consumed in the cities before mentioned. This question should also be investigated, as it has been a somewhat easy matter for the sulphur in natural gas to be eliminated before it is passed on to the consumer. This condition might be overcome in a similar way by the gas companies.

In several of the states of the Union gas companies have been active in developing the coke market. If this product is skilfully produced, handled, sized and marketed, coke can be sold at nearly the same price as anthracite. If the full possibilities of this market in our cities were developed and the proceeds of coke sales deducted from the cost of gas, the consumers of gas would be greatly benefited.

The Nova Scotia coal has I understand, received several criticisms at the hands of the gas companies in Montreal, Quebec, and some Ontario cities, owing to the fact that the gas has a large amount of sulphur in it. In western Ontario we produce natural gas in large quantities.

A few years ago the gas company that supplies most of the small cities in western Ontario with gas, installed a purifier near the source of production of natural gas. This purifier has been capable of eliminating practically all the sulphur from the gas, adding greatly to the comfort of the users of this product. I have wondered why the cities using Nova Scotia coal could not carry out a similar idea in regard to the eliminating of sulphur from the gas produced from Nova Scotia coal.

There are world-wide symptoms that competition in the business of mining and supplying coal for industrial and domestic uses is producing many evils and that some measure of public regulation is necessary. I am convinced that before the Dominion government can get command of a proper supply of coal from both the eastern and western provinces it will be necessary to receive from the local governments of these provinces some definite assurance that the coal mined for sale in the central provinces shall be of a certain standard and carefully analyzed, that these standards shall be regulated and complied with by the mine owners, and that regulations of the most stringent character shall surround the mining and delivering of this coal. Some effort should be made to stabilize these industries and see that the people in the central provinces are supplied with the best grades of coal available at the lowest possible cost. The coal mining and coal distributing companies could continue to operate and compete much as they do now, but their market should be stabilized and the public should know the name and grade of coal they are using. In this way profiteering could be controlled.

The transition of central Canada from the using of anthracite coal to bituminous coal as its source of domestic heat can thus be brought about. It seems almost inevitable therefore that as we shift from hard coal to coke and bituminous coal that we should learn to buy coke by measure and not by weight. This is a question that will require legislative action. Coal has been almost exclusively sold by the ton. It is the method to which we are accustomed, and it would inconvenience us to be forced to change it. But if the idea which I have suggested should be carried out, it would be found that the capacity of coke to absorb moisture is so great as to make it practically impossible for anyone to sell it by weight with commercial honesty. Let this investigation have as its aim a desire to help and not to criticize. These should be some of the purposes of the inquiry.

While it is true at the present time many homes in Eastern Canada are being heated by by-products taken from crude oil, the time is not far distant when commercial conditions and costs will outlaw these products as not economically serviceable for heating purposes. When that time comes the western states will be as badly in need of coal as central Canada is now.

Another important question for the committee to investigate would be an anti-dumping law, as to whether it would stabilize the Canadian industry by eliminating the bargain sale tactics of the coal exporters of the United States. Another question to be investigated would be the wisdom of revising the scope of the Dominion Fuel Board, giving it a national viewpoint instead of a sectional one as at present. Make it or somebody responsible for the development of the policy which the government would enunciate. Give this board a commercial object instead of a technical one; make it the distributing centre for educational work. Hydro electric has been devolved into what it is in Ontario under provincial control. A Dominion fuel board should be able to function likewise and show equally profitable results on a fuel policy.

We as legislators have a vital interest in this question, and it is the duty of every member to lend a helping hand in order that this committee should proceed with its labours with despatch and a determined effort to solve this great problem. The citizens of this Dominion are tired of paying the United States $120,000,000 annually for fuel. There are people, and I believe them to be in the majority, who have expressed themselves very strongly, that they do not believe in sending millions of dollars into American coal fields and leaving our own mines undeveloped, thus increasing unemployment in our own Canadian mining districts. These same people have a strong desire to use Canadian as well as foreign capital to develop Canadian industries and to utilize as much as possible Canadian raw material, Canadian labour and Canadian transportation in the developing of the same. By following out some of the ideas which I have suggested the time is in sight when the present demoralized condition in the coal industry will end.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I am very much interested in the question now before the House, first of all by reason of the discussion brought about by some of the representatives from the Maritime provinces. Among the grievances to which they drew the attention of this House was the question of their coal mines, and the necessity of having this parliament or someone do something for the development of those mines. No sooner did I hear their speeches than I addressed myself to a very prominent gentleman in Nova Scotia. I am not going to name him to-night but later on I may do so after obtaining his consent. I told him something that had been impressed upon me in connection with what Ontario had done in the way of producing electrical energy from water power. I gave him something of a suggestion which I made to Ramsay MacDonald when he came into office in England a few years ago. During the course of some correspondence I had with Mr. MacDonald I suggested that if he could not produce electrical energy in England for the industries there was another thing he could do, and that was to generate electrical energy by batteries of boilers at the pit heads. He could produce in this way electricity by steam and distribute it all through the kingdom. He was impressed by that idea, but other work came along; he had to assume a great responsibility when he became Prime Minister and he passed this question on for the time being. But Mr. Baldwin, when he came into power, took up this proposal of generating electrical energy by steam plants at the pit heads, and he is going to make a great success of it.

This gentleman in Nova Scotia to whom I wrote replied to my suggestion last week. He said, "I have long thought of that, and we should have had it years ago. We have not got it yet, but have wasted our time trying to develop electrical energy from the watersheds of Nova Scotia, which do not amount to anything." He said they had spent thousands and millions of dollars in trying to develop water power from those useless watersheds. But this gentleman did not say he was prepared to take it up. However, I made that suggestion to him and I make it now to the people of Nova Scotia. What Nova Scotia ought to do to-morrow is to say that it is going to develop enough power by steam plants at the pit heads to supply every farm and city house with light and every industry with energy. They could develop that power almost as cheaply as it is generated by water power in Ontario, and in that way they could make themselves independent of all the world, so far as power is concerned. I believe this gentleman is thinking it over now and talking about it with some of his friends. I went on to tell him that everyone knew they had great coal mines in Nova Scotia, but that they had made a mess of them to date. I suggested that those coal mines be nationalized as water power has been in Ontario. The moment that is undertaken the people of Nova Scotia should get in touch with the other provinces. I make this pledge on my own account and for my own province of Ontario, that we are ready to-day to make a contract with the coal mines of Nova Scotia for a large amount of coal, provided Nova Scotia mines it and gives employment to her own people, with fair pay and good houses to live in, and provided the coal is delivered in the season of navigation by boat to Toronto, not only for Ontario but for Quebec as well. We are the two nearest provinces, and I think I could almost pledge that Quebec would join with Ontario to-morrow in making contracts with Nova Scotia for a supply of coal for these two provinces. And what goes with it? If you undertake to mine the coal and have it ready for sale, you can do another thing. Coal is worth twice what it is worth to-day if you coke it before you ship it. The by-products from the treatment of coal to-day are of enormous value, with the dye industry and several other industries dependent upon them. Nova Scotia could get on her feet immediately if she started to develop what she has got at home. She has enough coal at home to supply all the demand of Ontario and Quebec for years, and Quebec and Ontario are ready to buy from her. But she has to find out what she can do. She has to make negotiations with these two provinces west of her, and I believe Nova Scotia will be able to ship this year sufficient coal to Ontario and Quebec to supply the whole demand of these two provinces. But the coal must be moved during the season of navigation. It is no good to bring coal from Nova Scotia by train when you can bring it at one-third the cost by water.

Do you know what science is doing to-day with frozen rivers? Science is finding a way that will enable us within five years to keep open the Welland canal and the Soulanges canal for at least ten months in the year.

Mr. ROGERS: And the Hudson bay?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I will leave that to the hon. gentleman; it is his favourite topic. I have my information from scientific men, and the experiment is being carried on to-day in connection with the gorge at Pittsburg. We can bring all the coal we need in Ontario and Quebec from the Martime provinces by water, and that is the cheapest transportation in the world.

As to bringing coal from Alberta, I believe in that, but that is a larger proposition. It involves part water transportation and part rail. There is a solution, but I am not going into it now. I am simply calling the attention of the House and the country to what can be done by co-operation between Ontario and Quebec and the Maritime provinces, involving the making of a decent contract for next winter's supply of ocal—and of course any contract we make with our sister province we must stand by, because as soon as the United States find that these two provinces are getting together with Nova Scotia they may lower the price of American coal. It is by the provinces standing together and being Canadian, and helping out Canadian industries that we shall achieve a solution of this problem. I ask the Prime Minister, now in his place here in the House, and we are all glad to see him here under certain conditions—I think that is the feeling of the whole House—to give a lead on this question and at least appoint the committee that has been suggested

Speaking of committees, here we have been in session for two months, and we should have had parliamentary committees already working on a number of things—on this coal problem, on the banking problem, on the railway question and other problems. But we have not done it. I am not in favour of this parliament being sent back home after passing a little bit of legislation. I am in favour of this parliament here and now tackling these problems, including this one of fuel supply, and especially of coal. The committee suggested by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat ought to be appointed to study this question, to go into all the details and get the people together. Let them invite the province of Nova Scotia to come up here, to meet not only this parliament but the people of Ontario and Quebec who are organized under their respective governments. The Premier of Ontario to-day is in correspondence with the fuel committee of this government and is taking up the question of providing Ontario with coal. I am quite sure Quebec would do the same thing; in all probability she would negotiate with Ontario for the supply of the coal she needs from the mines of Nova Scotia.

Nova Scotia, to begin with, ought to nationalize enough of her mines to do this very work. Cut the profiteering out of the production of coal, and put that saving into the reduction of the price of coal. That is the way you can bring relief. Instead of allowing big fortunes to be made out of it, produce the coal at cost; do what Ontario has done in the production of hydro-electric energy. If we do that, and if we appoint this committee—I am going to ask the Prime Minister to pay attention to this suggestion—instead of appointing a commission to investigate the grievances of the Maritime provinces, let him here and now appoint a committee which will study this fuel problem and find a solution for it. I hope he will take the suggestion that has been made by the previous speaker. I urge him to say right now that within a day or two or within a week he will be prepared to nominate a committee of from seven to eleven—for that is quite sufficient—men who will study this question in committee every day that they can give the time to it, and call witnesses. If that is done, I believe in six weeks we can have a real solution. It is all very fine to get us here and read extracts about what can be done and about what different people say. I am not criticizing the previous speaker at all, but the thing for parliament to do is to act and get the evidence, and when we get the evidence, to make a report. Let that committee be made up of men from all sides of the House. Do not make it a party question at all, but a national question. Let parliament find a national solution for this national problem, and if we solve this problem we shall be able to solve many others. I urge the Prime Minister before this debate is over to tell the House that he is prepared to take the responsibility of naming a committee that will investigate this problem, and will call together representatives of the miners of Nova Scotia and of the operators of the mines, and representatives of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, and later on deal also with the question of bringing Alberta coal to the relief of Ontario, so that we can make ourselves independent of our neighbours to the south. They have shut us out of everything. They are taking our raw products over there and manufacturing them. Let us keep our own industries at home, and supply ourselves with our own materials, and when we begin to do that we shall see Canada go ahead and prosper once more.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Coal and the transportation of coal to central Canada is always a very interesting subject in this parliament, and a great deal has been said about it; but I imagine there is no subject we discuss here about which there is more misinformation then there is upon the coal problem of central Canada.

Let me say at the outset on behalf of the government that we will welcome an investigation, because it will clear up, I think, a great many of the misconceptions that exist with respect to this question. I do not know that I can agree with my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) that the time has arrived when the coal mines of Canada should be nationalized, but undoubtedly a great deal of information can be gathered by the committee that will be helpful in arriving at a solution of this problem.

No one will deny, Mr. Speaker, that if it were possible to supply the whole of central Canada—and I do not say it is impossible to do that—with coal from eastern and western Canada, it would go a long way to solve some of our most difficult problems. The department over which I have the honour to preside have been giving a great deal of attention to this question, and they have tried on various occasions to find, I do not say a complete solution, but a partial solution of the difficulty. One of the things we have always endeavoured to keep in mind is the fact that after all the consuming population have to pay for the coal consumed. Coal is almost as great a necessity in a cold country like this as bread, and any increase in price will have a detrimental effect upon the consumer. It must always be borne in mind, as my hon. friend has said, that the development of water power has cut into the whole consumption tremendously. If it were not for the development of water power in central Canada, a great deal more coal would be consumed here, and as Canada continues to grow the development of water power will still further cut into the consumption of coal in this part of the country. The recent development in oil burning devices has also had its effect in the domestic field; it has still further cut down coal consumption not only on land but on shipboard. A great many steamships which formerly burned coal are now using oil; so that substitutes have undoubtedly usurped to a certain extent the place which coal used to occupy.

However, that is all beside the question. My hon. friend has raised the issue whether something cannot be done whereby the consuming population in Ontario and Quebec can be served by the coal mines of Nova Scotia and western Canada. This winter, owing to the strike in the United States, it has been possible to move seventy-five thousand tons of bituminous coal at the rate of $7, and I think without any increase in price to the consumer, which is the important thing after all. The feasibility of transporting western coal by rail and water has not been demonstrated to any considerable extent, and I rather welcome the suggestion of my hon. friend that we should go into an investigation of the possibilities of that method of bringing down Alberta fuel.

With respect to the movement of bituminous coal from Alberta to Ontario, that has not been investigated to any considerable degree. If this coal can be moved by rail and water, and it can be done, there is no question about the possibility of making it an active competitor with the American fuel. As regards the movement of bituminous coal from Nova Scotia, there is no question in my mind that if better methods were employed —some method such as suggested with respect to the loading and unloading of this fuel say at Montreal where it would have to be transshipped into smaller vessels—this coal could be transported, at least to the city of Toronto, in competition with the American product. I may say this to my Nova Scotia friends: Our investigation has shown us that while there is very great difficulty ahead of the transportation of Nova Scotia coal as far as Toronto, and further westward, and the supply of the surrounding market from Toronto, there is no problem connected with the moving of Nova Scotia coal to the province of Quebec. When the shortage period existed there was always one hundred thousand tons of banked coal in the dumps at the city of Montreal. It never has been a problem to bring coal to Montreal from the coal fields of Nova Scotia. The serious problem was the interruptions that were continuous owing to strike conditions in those fields; and as hon. gentlemen well know, when a market is temporarily lost it turns to a new source of supply and it is difficult to get that market back again. With the addition of the subvention of fifty cents a ton which we gave two years ago, coal was moved westward from Montreal as far as Brockville, if I remember rightly, and then into the northern portions of the province in open competition with the American fuel. So I see no serious difficulty in supplying the eastern portion of Ontario with Nova Scotia coal if the supply remains uninterrupted.

It is useless to say that there is nothing to be learned in connection with this fuel problem. I agree with my hon. friend from East Lambton that there is a great deal to be learned, and I rather welcome the suggestion of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) that the committee should investigate the whole question—the question of transportation, the question of costs, and so on. Of course we are going to have an investigation so far as transportation is concerned before the Board of Railway Commissioners, when experts will disclose the results of their inquiries. No doubt that investigation will be thorough and far-reaching, and the reports of the railway commission on the matter should be worth a great deal to us, as to the prices which are charged for the movement of this commodity.

Unfortunately, we have an interruption just now in the movement of coal from western Canada owing to the fact that we do not appear to be able to agree as to just what price should be charged, or on what basis the adjustment should be made. The government of Ontario, the government of Alberta, and the federal government were prepared to pay any amount that was found to be in excess of the rate of $7 per ton for the movement of Alberta coal to Ontario. The railway company had moved seventy-five thousand tons at a rate of $7 per ton during a period of crisis or emergency, but they undertook to prove that it could not be profitably done for less than $9 per ton. However, by way of compromise, Sir Henry Thornton agreed with us the other day that while the rate should be fixed at $9 a ton, he would be prepared to refund to the three governments concerned any amount less than $9 a ton found by the board when they brought in their report. So far I have not had confirmation from the other governments concerned with respect to this movement, I do not know whether it is going to be carried out or not. It is a fact that next month the hearing will take place before the railway commission when evidence will be presented on behalf of the operators in the mining industry from both ends of Canada as well as on behalf of the railway companies. The railway board will bring in a report on the question of the rate to be charged for the haulages of this commodity. There is a very wide field to inquire into, including mining costs, the difficulties that from time to time crop up between the operator and the employee, and the question —and I think it is very important one—of the cost of distribution. This is something that would stand a considerable amount of inquiry throughout the central region of Canada, because if the cost of distribution say from the car to the consumer amounts to practically the same as the cost of mining the coal and putting it on the car, it would seem to be just a little too much for that service.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would the minister be prepared to give this committee power to investigate the mining cost, and how would he give the committee that power?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The committee might very well have the power to investigate mining costs. I think it is rather an important factor, because we must bear in mind that they mine coal under more favourable conditions in the United States. I think I am safe in saying that in nearly every bituminous mine in the United States they mine their coal one dollar cheaper than we mine ours, and that is a very important factor in costs. Officers of the Department of Mines who have to do particularly with fuel will be prepared, I am sure, to come before the committee and give them very enlightening information. So far as the distribution cost is concerned, we have little or no information because we did not investigate that end of it. I think it is worthy of consideration, though, because it is an important factor.

It seems to me that we need not worry a great deal about the provision of a continuous supply of anthracite coal for the central region of Canada. I think we have gone far enough in the investigation of the production of coke to prove that we will have a substitute that will supply our needs throughout the whole of central Canada. At the plant in Hamilton they make a very splendid quality of fuel. There was a time, only about two years ago, when it looked very doubtful whether that plant would succeed. It is now a great success, and there is no reason why plants cannot be established in all the large centres where there is a market for the gas that will be produced and manufactured, say in this city, in Montreal, in Toronto, Quebec, Sherbrooke; in fact, in any large centre that is capable of using a reasonable supply of gas. There is no reason why the bituminous coal of Nova Scotia cannot be manufactured into high grade coke and sold for domestic purposes; thus supplanting at least three-fourths of the supply of the anthracite coal now coming into this market.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In connection with what the minister is saying in reference to the gas plant—and I am in sympathy with much of what he has stated—does he propose to bring in similar legislation to that brought in last year, which would have made it possible for these plants to be operated, but which legislation was unfortunately withdrawn?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is a matter that will come up later. I am not prepared to speak about it to-night, except to say that I think some further technical investigation will be carried on along the lines that we have now adopted for the treatment of this coal, and I am confident it will demonstrate that a product can be manufactured which will be quite as acceptable as that from high grade bituminous coal from the United States. That has been the practical difficulty so far, and we have been bending our energies to the solution of that problem. If that problem can be solved, there is no reason, to my mind, why plants cannot be established in this city and every city eastward without any assistance in the world. I think I am safe in making that assertion, but I do say that at present they are under some handicap in comparison with the high grade fuel manufactured into coke in the Hamilton plant to-day. If it is possible to effect carbonization at lower temperature which would produce gasoline, our whole problem would be solved and we would have a much cheaper fuel. Instead of turning it into gas, we would turn it into gasoline and oil. Hon. members will see how important a part technical investigation and research play in these important problems so far as the fuel supply of Canada is concerned. It is along those lines we are bending our energies, and I am confident that with a little further investigation of the bituminous fuel of Nova Scotia they may discover a much higher grade of bituminous coal than they are using at the present time. However, as I said to my hon. friend, that is a matter that will come up later; it has no direct bearing on this question.

Mr. CAHAN: Just what does the minister mean by the statement that they may discover a higher grade of coal?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am told that there are possibilities of a higher grade of bituminous coal yet untapped in that province that can be mined and brought into the market. I have no inside information as to that, but that is the information I obtain from that quarter. Quite apart from the investigation that will be held by the railway board, I can see a splendid opportunity for the committee to obtain information that will be valuable in the solution of this very important question, and I welcome the suggestion of my hon. friend.

Mr. NEILL: The minister has talked about the solution of the question by the manufacture of coke in cities where there is a market for gas. Will he consider the subject of coal mines located in British Columbia where we have no local market for gas, and what could be done for those mines? Would he not consider further investigation along the line of finding a carbonization at a lower temperature which would produce gasoline which would be a solution of the question?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In Germany they have carried this problem a little further than in any other country in the world, but they have not as yet, nor have they in the United States, nor have we who have been working along these lines, been able to say that we have a commercial process. We are all hoping, however, that we will discover a commercial process in low temperature carbonization. Then instead of having gas we will have gasoline and fuel oil. I say therefore, Mr. Speaker, that we welcome the suggestion of a committee for the discussion of the matters I have outlined, leaving the question of rates for investigation before the railway board. However, there is no objection to the committee delving into that if they can be of service and bring to light any new information in connection with the matter.

Hon. EDMUND BRISTOL (Toronto East Centre): There is no question that a committee of this kind would be of great value and would result in benefit to the country. So far as coal mining in Nova Scotia is concerned, the miners there labour under a great deal more difficulty than the miners in the United States, because they have to go under water one or two miles, and it takes six or seven men to take out a ton of coal as against two men in the United States. That is one of the reasons why I fancy Nova Scotia requires a certain amount of protection in reference to coal mining, because unquestionably the cost of mining coal in Nova Scotia is at least two dollars more per ton than it is in Pennsylvania. When the minister said there should be an investigation into the cost from the car to the consumer, I think he struck a very important point, because when you come to Toronto I do not fancy you find any Nova Scotia coal being sold. The dealers there no doubt get their coal from the United States, and they have their methods of distribution and sale in Toronto It is hard to break into a proposition of that kind when the United States can beat us by $2 a ton on the price of coal.

As regards western coal, about which we hear a great deal to-day, every one, irrespective of politics, is anxious to see Canada use its own product and thereby become independent of the United States. If a scheme for the utilization of Canadian coal could be successfully worked out, as I believe it could, we should have $100,000,000 more distributed in Canada instead of being sent to the United States to help to develop that country. It is, however, a matter of some doubt as to what the quality of this coal would be upon delivery. Whether the transportation would take from its value is a question to be considered, and there are other problems of importance to be taken into account in connection with the proposal. In my humble judgment the most important thing for this country is to turn all its available water power into actual energy. It is an established fact that 1,000,000 horsepower is equivalent to 13,000,000 tons of coal so that it can readily be seen what the available electrical power in Canada would mean to the development of this country.

I will not discuss just now the question of Niagara development, in regard to which I have a resolution on the order paper. Possibly it is not desirable that I should deal with that matter at this juncture, but I would point out that, according to the advice of engineering experts, there is about 3,000,000 horse power available for division between the province of Ontario and the state of New York. You can realize, when you think of the enormous waste of power which is going on from day to day, from hour to hour, what it would mean to the working population of Canada and to everybody interested in the province of Ontario if this power were utilized. On the basis of thirteen to one, it means that 39,000,000 tons of coal per annum are being wasted at the present time.

The beautification of Niagara Falls is a problem which can be carried out, and it is one of great importance not only from the point of view of the scenery but for the purpose of preventing the destruction of the falls themselves. So far as Quebec is concerned, I do not think it will be questioned that that province possesses the greatest available water-power of any country in the world, particularly in proportion to its size. In the St. Lawrence there is within sixty miles of Montreal, 2,750,000 available horse-power which is not being used. There is a great area of level land in that vicinity where there could be built another city the size of Montreal and there is no lack of power capable of development. The sooner Ontario and Quebec realize their potentialities in the matter of water power, and turn that power into an active force, the sooner they will acquire something of great value not only to the provinces themselves but to the nation.

I sometimes regret that this water power does not belong to the Dominion, in view of our tremendous national debt, but at all events I am sure we are all glad to know that the province of Quebec possesses a resource which if properly developed would prove of the greatest value to her. We in Ontario hope to get a share of the Niagara Falls development and we hope also to share in the St. Lawrence development. Every day we allow all this water to flow unharnessed we are sacrificing something of great national value. The suggestion has been made that if we sold power to the United States we should thereby do a great injury to this country. Now we have been trying for some time to get United States factories to operate in Canada and it is not any consideration of power that prevents them from doing so; it is a question of the tariff, of which we have had considerable discussion during the past year. We have factories in Canada, and if the tariff were where it should be those factories would be working to capacity and others would be established as well. We are buying coal from the United States and I cannot understand the argument that if we sold them power which we could turn off at will we should run the risk of going to war with the United States. That there should be any danger in selling to the United States power that we cannot at present use in this country is something I cannot understand. I appreciate the argument that we do not want to sell power to United States factories, but there are cities across the line which use power for a great many purposes apart from the operation of factories, and in any case the chances are that by the time we could develop our power in Canada it would be needed in this country for light, heat and power.

I am glad that we have found coal in the northern part of Ontario and I believe that in the coming summer the people of that province will be surprised at the high quality of it and the great value it will prove to them. I trust that the committee will be appointed; I am sure that it would be of great service.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): In the years that preceded the war Canada attracted considerable attention throughout the world because of the assertion that had been made in this House and elsewhere that this was a cheap country to live in. That statement is no longer perfectly true. In listening to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) this afternoon while he was discussing the cost of living, my memory went back a few years to an occasion when I had the pleasure of meeting in Montreal the President of Brazil who was then on a visit to Canada. In discussing the condition in Brazil and Canada respectively, he made the statement that the three problems that had to be solved in this country, if we wanted to make Canada a cheap place to live in, were those relating to fuel, clothing and food.

To-day the citizens of Ottawa are paying from $19.50 to $20 a ton for Welsh coal, and $17 for what is called newly mined anthracite coal which is supposed to have come from the mines in Pennsylvania since the strike there was settled. This coal is of an inferior quality; most of it is slate, and it does not give the most satisfactory results. Fifty years ago, away back in the National Policy debates, this coal question was discussed and a duty was imposed under the National Policy itself, on coal coming from the United States, for the purpose of helping the miners of Nova Scotia. This question has remained with us ever since, and it is to-day one of outstanding importance with the poor consumers of the country who comprise the majority of the people. The consumer must overcome the cost of fuel, but matters instead of improving are going from bad to worse. We have been told session after session that the miner is poorly paid and poorly clad and that charity must be raised throughout the country to assist him and his wife and children. And all this notwithstanding, the price of coal keeps going up. There is a gap between the cost of production of coal in the mine and the cost to the consumer. What is responsible for that? That is a question which might well be looked into. Two or three years ago we had two committees sitting, one in the Senate and the other in the House of Commons, investigating the coal question, and we have to-day a standing committee on Mines and Minerals which is waiting for an opportunity to tackle the problem.

This is one of the most important questions that could be dealt with by this House. We have in Canada a long winter of from five to six months; it is particularly severe in eastern Quebec, in northern Ontario and in the north generally. No greater boon could therefore be conferred on this country by parliament, nor could parliament sooner earn the everlasting gratitude of the Canadian people, than by bringing about a solution of this problem. We are sending $100,000,000 a year to the United States for coal while we are ourselves in possession of an enormous supply of both black and white coal. Hon. members who have spoken have referred to the water powers of Ontario and Quebec. These water powers are yet undeveloped; certainly they are not developed to the extent that they should be, and a great work remains to be done at Niagara Falls. Considerable activity is also in progress in the lake St. John district where hundreds of thousands of horse-power are being developed.

The coal question will remain with us for a long while to come. We may develop this white coal—this hydro-electric power—but we must still rely on coal. As the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) recently stated, coal has a double value; not only has it a value as fuel, but an even greater value for its by-product of oil, which every day is becoming more and more important, until eventually I imagine it will exceed coal itself in importance as fuel.

I for one, Mr. Speaker, would be delighted if this motion moved by the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong)—who already has several times spoken on this question in past parliaments, if my memory serves me rightly—were referred to a select committee for thorough investigation with a view to reaching a solution of our fuel problem, for

I think no more vital question could be settled by this parliament.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly encouraging to hear members from Ontario devoting time to the question of Nova Scotia coal. I was particularly interested in some of the advice given to the coal operators of Nova Scotia. We were told of the advantages which would accrue if the mines of that province were nationalized. Well, the fact is that those coal mines have been owned and controlled by the provincial authorities for sixty years or more. It is true they are leased by the provincial government to private companies who operate under license and subject to royalties payable to the province. I do not think that at the present time any one in Nova Scotia is prepared to advocate that the government of Nova Scotia should operate those mines.

From some of the remarks made it might be gathered that we in Nova Scotia are somewhat backward in our coal handling methods. Well, I may tell the House that boats have been regularly discharged at the port of Montreal at the rate of over one thousand tons an hour. Steamers have been regularly coming to the port of Montreal from Sydney during the summer months with eight thousand tons of coal each, and arriving at six or seven o'clock in the morning they have been able to leave again the same evening. They are loaded at the Cape Breton ports at about the same rate. So I do not think very much improvement can be effected in the rapid turning round of coal tonnage at either one end or the other.

Reference has been made to the conditions under which we operate our coal mines, and the remarks are very close to the facts. The cost of operation in practically all our Nova Scotia mines is very much greater than it is in a large proportion of the American coal mines. And the reasons are not far to seek. Briefly, it is due to the fact that our coal seams are fairly high-pitched, and a good many are submarine, involving very serious water problems. Taking Nova Scotia mines as a whole, you will find that the quantity of water pumped per ton of coal raised runs from 2½ to 7 tons. So it is quite as much a pumping problem as it is a mining problem.

Then our coal in practically all our mines gives off large quantities of inflammable gas. During the short recess I returned to Nova Scotia and a few days ago I was down one of our oldest and deepest collieries, the Princess at Sydney Mines, which was opened originally in 1863 and has been operated for practically fifty years, during which time some ten million tons of coal has been mined. Now, to-day we are passing through the workings of that colliery 45,000 cubic feet of air a minute to give the necessary ventilation. On Friday last, which was by no means a summer day, the temperature was 72 degrees in the working levels.

Now, one hon. member referred to the suitability of Nova Scotia coal for the production of gas, and intimated there were difficulties in its use because of its high sulphur content and the purification process which this involved. Well, practically all bituminous coal used for gas production, if it is high in volatile matter—as it ought to be if it is to be satisfactory for that purpose—usually contains very considerable amounts of sulphur, some coals more, others less. I have under my hand a piece of coal taken from the Princess colliery within the last three days at a point two and a half to three miles from the shore where there was a fourteen hundred foot cover between it and the ocean bed. I have not a complete analysis of this coal, but I know it will run about .68 per cent in sulphur—less than three-quarters of one per cent. That coal is quite satisfactory for gas making, with very little purification. Therefore the presence of sulphur should not present any great difficulty in the adoption of this coal for gas production.

The hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) referred to low temperature distillation. That, of course, as he said, has not yet been developed to the point where it can be considered to be entirely satisfactory. Great things are looked for in that connection, but until desirable results are obtained we can continue to produce, as they have been producing in Hamilton and also in Sydney, a domestic fuel from Nova Scotia coal—or from any fair quality of bituminous coal—which will replace with advantage any anthracite coming into this country to-day. It will give a very much better class of fuel than can be imported either from the United States or from Great Britain. I have already referred to the question in this House. There is no possible reason at all why Canada should be dependent on any foreign country for the prime necessity of fuel.

Forty or fifty years ago over a thousand vessels per year were loading coal in the port of Pictou for United States ports, and about 750 vessels in Sydney. Why did we lose that trade? Simply because the Americans put a duty of $1.75 per ton on our coal, and under that policy they developed the enormous coal industry which they have to-day, and which has supplanted our own industry in their markets. From that country we have brought in about 17,000,000 tons of coal, both bituminous and anthracite, during the last few years. Reference has been made to the coking of coal at Hamilton. We made in Canada last year 1,471,116 tons of coke and imported 825,000 tons. For the making of coke we used of Canadian coal 660,000 odd tons, and of imported coal 1,500,000 odd tons, or a little more. Why? Simply because we have not a proper national policy so far as coal is concerned. If this country is content to remain dependent on a foreign country for what is a prime necessity both for domestic use and manufacturing purposes, it will not be very long until Canada is brought up with a round turn and finds itself in serious difficulties. All that can be cured by a very simple method, the same method as that adopted by our friends to the south, with results such as I have referred to.

I have briefly referred to the difference in the cost of producing coal in Nova Scotia as compared with the United States. The same thing, to a very large extent, could be said in regard to the cost of producing coal in Alberta. At Drumheller I saw one day a few years ago some 9,000 tons of coal loaded and despatched. That coal came from quite a number of collieries, but I venture to say that the entire cost of installation of the collieries producing that 9,000 tons of coal per day was not greater than the amount expended in one colliery in Cape Breton producing about 500 tons a day. I am referring to the hoisting plant, the pumping plant and the ventilating plant. I have already made some reference to the expense regarding ventilation, and the enormous volumes of air which must be driven through these collieries to make them safe from gas. I have also referred to the amount of water that requires to be pumped. These are factors we have with us all the time and of course as our mines get older and deeper that cost will increase. Coal costs a little more to-day than it did yesterday.. to-morrow it will be a little higher than to-day, simply because additional air has to be forced in; additional airways have to be constructed; additional roadways have to be built and additional wire rope has to be put on. In the colliery to which I referred a moment ago there are 27,000 feet of wire rope on the hoisting engine drum. Figure out what that means, and the distance we are hauling it. Why are we doing it? We are doing it because it is undoubtedly the best coal in the Dominion of Canada. It is the oldest colliery worked by the General Mining Association of London, which took that property over from the Duke of York in 1826. Just a hundred years ago to-day these collieries first operated, and I hope they will go on for a long time yet. I am certain they will, so far as quantity and quality of the coal are concerned. The old Sydney may not extend undersea to Newfoundland; but after a descent of seventy feet to the pit bottom I went seaward well on to three miles northeastward to the Newfoundland shore. Could I live long enough I might dig my way through coal a considerable portion of the way to the shore of the ancient colony.

I am glad to have this opportunity of supporting the proposed resolution which has been submitted by the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) in regard to a committee. I hope that committee will be appointed, and I do hope also that when the committee meets and returns an answer to this House in regard to what the difficulties are and what can be done as to the further development of the coal industry not only in Nova Scotia but in the other provinces which have large supplies of coal, some action will be taken which will result in Canada being made entirely independent of any source of foreign supply. I think that could be done within ten years.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for East Lambton, who brought forth this resolution, deserves considerable credit for doing so. I want to say to him, however, that I have little faith in the appointment of a committee by this House. The text of the resolution is practically a declaration in favour of a national coal supply, and this question has been before this House since 1922, when I introduced a similar resolution. We have all the information now about the resources of this country; we have all the facts and figures. The coal question is 95 per cent a question of transportation, and this parliament has made nothing but a football of the whole problem. The municipalities have now taken the matter in their own hands and Alberta coal has found a market in Ontario, as has coal from Nova Scotia and Wales. Five hundred thousand tons of coal were imported into Montreal last summer from Wales, in view of the contemplated strike and the expected coal shortage. Nova Scotia and Alberta coal have scored a triumph in Ontario. The time has come when this parliament and the provincial legislatures should decide on legislation grading coal, and no longer allow the American railways, the American coal trust, the American coal barons and the American capitalists to sell rubbish and cheap stone and dust for $15 and $20 a ton in the large centres of this country.

We have a railway commission which is supposed to regulate the railways of its own volition; the commission is not supposed to wait until the damage has been done. By the Railway Act the railway commission is sworn to do its duty, and one of the main clauses of that act provides that the railway commission, of its own volition, shall go up and down this country and see that there shall be no unjust, undue and unfair discrimination between provinces or between localities as to rates and tolls. This exists to-day. If we had an absence of unjust, unfair and undue discrimination in the carrying of coal from the Maritime provinces, Alberta and Wales the coal problem would be solved. Where has the railway commission been during the last four or five years? It has done nothing to solve Canada's national coal problem or check things up.

This resolution asks for a committee. We had a committee appointed in 1922, 1923 and 1924, and that committee made a report. Sir Henry Thornton and all his experts appeared before the committee and it was proved that $7 was a fair rate for the carrying of coal from Alberta, and it was laid down that Nova Scotia should get similar treatment. It was also stated that coal should be brought from Wales and the Maritimes, which would benefit the Canadian National Railways and enable the merchant marine to use some of the boats which were scrapped and tied up to the dock for certain months of the year. What became of that report? The government accepted the resolution which I had before the House in 1922 but struck out the last and most important clause in favour of an embargo; a clause which said that every pound of coal used in Canada should be mined and coked under the British flag, whether in Alberta, the Maritime provinces or Wales. The report of the committee of parliament was accepted by parliament in 1924, but up to this hour not one thing has been done to carry it out. On the government of the day is the responsibility for this coal embroglio which we have in Canada, a country which has spent two billions of dollars on the National railways. Where are they to-day, and where is the railway commission? They are sitting down and doing nothing, letting Canada become the happy hunting ground for the coal barons of Pennsylvania, who can call a strike in twenty-four hours and freeze this country out. On the government of the day is the responsibility There is no use in the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) getting up in the House day after day and telling us what has been done about coal. Nothing has been done about it, except to make a political football of it and shunt the problem off on the provinces of Ontario, Alberta and Nova Scotia, Cheap American rubbish has been sold as coal in Toronto at $20 a ton in bag lots. An investigation has already been asked for in this House, but nothing has been done. What has become of Mr. Murdock's Combines Act? Why have there been no prosecutions; why have you not got after the American coal barons in order to protect the working classes in the constituency I come from, which is a workingman's constituency? Where are the two gentlemen from Winnipeg representing Labour in this House? What have they to say about conditions in the larger centres in this country where people are lined up at the coal offices all winter to try to get coal, and all they can get is cheap American rubbish?

Sir Henry Thornton is responsible very largely for not having solved this problem. He was before the Railway committee in 1923 and 1924 and agreed to this $7 a ton rate. Why should Ontario pay one dollar a ton for the province of Alberta to advance her coal to central Canada Alberta is asking us for one dollar a ton to-day to pay the freight charges; to-morrow it will be Nova Scotia and New Brunswick asking us to contribute one or two dollars a ton. The thing is inequitable. The Canadian National railways are carrying grain and flour at preferential cut rates eastbound, and Ontario and central Canada have to bear their share of the charges. Why cannot coal be carried at preferential rates? The Canadian National Railways can help develop Michigan and Illinois, as I pointed out in the House the other evening; they can help develop the state of Maine and other states over the line, but when it comes to solving a national coal problem in this country—oh, no; that is a different state of affairs. The action of the railways in raising the rate on Alberta coal from $7 to $9 is but one more victory for the United States coal barons, under the present administration we have at Ottawa. That is what it is, and that is what Canada thinks. The people of Ontario are disgusted at the way this coal problem has been treated by this House, by the railway commission, by Sir Henry Thornton and the Canadian National Railways, and by the Canadian Pacific Railway. We were told in the Railway committee that $7 a ton was a fair rate for bringing Alberta coal to Ontario, that it would meet all charges. That was more than $2 a ton higher than the rate for carrying grain and flour eastbound, and now the rate is to be raised from $7 to $9 a ton. The railways might just as well quote a rate of $20 to $25 a ton to Ontario. The people of central Canada now know where the railways stand on this question. They have decided to do nothing to solve this problem and provide Canada with a national coal supply to make us independent of the United States. Canada's railway system, according to statements of railway magnates the past few days, is not to be used for the creation of a Canadian market for the output of Canadian coal mines. Our railways are to be preserved, as they have been in the past, to make Canada the happy hunting ground for the coal barons of Pennsylvania, and that is what this country will be no doubt so long as this government continues in office.

What are Canada's freight rates for, if our railways are to be used to advance the prosperity of Pennsylvania instead of Alberta and Nova Scotia? We have always had in my opinion a political rate structure in this country. The basis of our rate structure was the Crowsnest pass agreement, and the rates have been constantly changed, new rates being put on and others taken off. The railway commission has absolutely fallen down and failed to carry out its statutory duties under the act and regulate freight rates in this country. Sir Henry Thornton has also fallen down, and is very largely responsible for the fiasco he has made of this coal situation.

I endorse the stand taken by Premier Ferguson of Ontario in refusing to have the people of Ontario taxed one dollar a ton to bring Alberta coal down to this province when Ontario is already carrying the peak-load of taxation in this country, from 45 to 46 per cent of all the taxes. Central Canada is already paying in freight rates to give the prairie provinces preferential rates on grain and flour. Ontario might as well ask Alberta to pay two or three dollars a ton for the carrying of grain and flour down here, because the prairie provinces, through the decision of the railway commission, with the approval of this parliament, have placed on Ontario and central Canada extra tolls for the carriage of grain and flour at cut rates.

In my opinion there is no use appointing a committee to make another political football of this question. There is only one way to solve the problem, and that is by adopting a national policy. See that every pound of coal used in Canada is mined under the British flag, whether in Wales, the Maritime provinces or Alberta. Secondly, place an absolute embargo on American coal, and adopt a national policy for the development of our own coal mines. In addition, help the industry by bounties, subventions and bonuses. In the Old Country the government under the Right Hon. Stanley Baldwin voted in bonuses $210,000,000 last year to help the coal industry, and I venture to say that it will have to spend $300,000,000 to put that native industry on its feet for 1926. This parliament should also be prepared to help along similar lines our native industry. We should adopt a national policy. In 1923-1924 $200,000 in bonuses was voted to help bring Maritime and Alberta coal to central Canada. That bonus should be increased. It should run into two or three or five or ten million dollars if necessary. That amount could be well spent to put this native industry on its feet in Alberta and the Maritime provinces.

Let us utilize the National railways and the merchant marine. What are the National railways for if not to solve some of the great problems that confront the people of this country? So, while I appreciate the motive of the hon. member who has brought forward this resolution, I can tell him from practical experience that if a committee is appointed you will never get a solution so long as this government remains in office. They have made a political football of this problem; the railway commission has fallen down and so have the National railways. The people of this country are disappointed with the administration of the National railways to-day. In the early months of spring and summer thousands of cars lie idle at the head of the lakes and many boats of the merchant marine are tied up at the docks doing nothing which could be used in helping to bring coal to central Canada from Alberta and the Maritime provinces. The whole problem is one of transportation, and you will have to get somebody else to handle the problem before you get any solution from the powers that be in charge of the National railways and from the railway commission. They have increased the rate on Alberta coal from $7 to $9 a ton to give the Pennsylvania coal barons more and more business in Canada. By that act they are continuing to preserve Canada as the happy hunting ground which it has always been for the Pennsylvania coal barons and American coal trusts.

Mr. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce): I am not going to take up the time of the House at any length, but I want to make an observation on this interesting question of fuel and how best we can use our own coal and cease using foreign coal. Hon. members have asserted that we are more and more becoming the victims of the American coal barons. Statistics do not prove that to be correct. There has been a general improvement in the use of Canadian coal for the past four years. In the year 1920, we imported into Canada 4,912,000 tons of anthracite. In the year 1924, when there was no strike, we had substituted other fuels for coal and imported only 3,908,000 tons, an improvement of a million tons with respect to anthracite. In the year 1920 we imported 15,900,000 tons of bituminous coal, whereas in 1924 our importations dropped to 12,578,000, an improvement of over 2,000,000 tons reduction with respect to bituminous coal.

Certain hon. members who have spoken in this House in the past have tried to point out that there was a fuel problem in Ontario this winter. I contend that there was absolutely no fuel problem; there was all the fuel that was necessary for the province of Ontario at all times, that is, provided the people were satisfied to use substitutes for anthracite. Let me say that I consider the American anthracite strike was a blessing to this Dominion, for it taught our people the absolute necessity of not being dependent on anthracite coal, and the possibility, referred to by hon. members here to-night, of burning substitutes such as coke. Now as a citizen of Canada and as a householder I am prepared to say that four years ago I personally became converted to the use of coke, and intend to burn it in future in my own household. For no matter what some people who always use anthracite say, we can make good coke in this country from Canadian coal. What we need in the central part of Canada, so far as domestic fuel is concerned is a little education to teach our people that they can successfully use Canadian coke made from Canadian coal. The people of the city of Toronto to-day again are being offered American anthracite coal, and they are buying it again, simply for the reason that during the past twenty-five years they have been educated to burn that type of coal. One of the things I should like to see the government undertake is an educative programme, to teach our people that coke made from Nova Scotia coal is a better domestic fuel than anthracite from American mines.

I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, that if there is one thing that is necessary it is that our people should have some protection on grades of coal which is shipped into Canada from the United States. We receive anthracite coal at times of strike that is from 25 to 30 per cent slate, consisting largely of dust that is unburnable. It is nothing more or less than the clean-up of the American coal heaps. I do not think the government should allow that condition to obtain any longer. I believe there should be a direct inspection of the grade of American coal at all times, and that in the meantime only the better grade of soal should be allowed to enter Canada. I would even go further. I am of opinion that the amount of anthracite coal imported into Canada from the United States at the present time, totalling probably four million tons, could very well be left in that country provided we could take immediate action for the establishment of coking plants to use our Nova Scotia coal. Not only that, but we have some of the best coking coals at the foothills of the Rocky mountains that there are in this continent, and coal from western Alberta can be coked successfully and sold for domestic use in the prairie provinces in the event of the people there not wanting to burn lignite coals.

There is one other question. The world is entirely over produced in coal to-day. Over production due to the war time trade is the great problem in the United States. Over production in Alberta is admitted by the representatives of that province in this House to be one of their problems. If we are going to successfully operate the coal mines in this country to the maximum production, it will certainly be necessary to have some control of the number of mines that are operated. If Ontario is able to take two or three million tons of Alberta coal, the mining of that quantity is only going to mean a scramble to open new mines to the detriment of those already in existence. That is one of the questions that a committee appointed by this House should very carefully study. I have been in conversation with hon. members opposite who have spoken on the question, and I am quite in accord with some things they have told me—I refer to men from the Maritime provinces. I am told that there are mines there that are not efficiently operated or possibly cannot be efficiently operated. Why cannot we have a complete analyses of the whole question of coal mining in Nova Scotia and Alberta? Why cannot efficient mines be operated to their full capacity? I believe that the people in Ontario and Quebec, if they feel that Nova Scotia and Alberta as provinces are giving them the most efficient mining possible, will be willing to pay a little additional for fuel from those provinces. They will not hesitate to pay an extra dollar or two per ton for coke made within our own country; they will gladly co-operate in doing so. But, Mr. Speaker, there is a feeling throughout the province of Ontario among coal users, that Alberta coal costs too much at the pits' mouth, and that Nova Scotia coal—due to expensive methods of mining, due to the great depth and the amount of water that has to be pumped—costs too much at the mines' mouth, and that the users in Ontario are being asked to absorb a cost that is altogether out of line with the cost of coal in the United States. In this connection let me give you just one or two figures that were compiled by the Fuel Board. Pocahontas coal is a high grade bituminous coal which is sold in the United States for domestic purposes. Pocahontas coal can be laid down in Toronto for $9.75, whilst coal from Alberta costs $4 at the mines, and $7 a ton for freight to Toronto, making $11 in all. The people of Ontario feel that if they could get Alberta coal for anything like the same price, heat value considered, or within a dollar or two, they would be quite satisfied to use the domestic fuel; but until the mines of Alberta and Nova Scotia have been brought to a greater state of efficiency, we should not ask the Ontario user to pay an additional $2 or $3 a ton for his coal.

In supporting the motion before the committee I am going to say that I think it is important for two or three reasons. With regard to the movement of western coal, I agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat, and with the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) that Alberta coal can be transported more cheaply than the National railways are prepared to admit. I am afraid that railway men do not know a very great deal about their own business. In arriving at the cost of transportation they have a system of figuring up how many tons of freight they carry a given number of miles. They estimate that so many billion tons of freight are moved for so many miles, they take the total cost of their own system, they divide these billions of tons into billions of dollars, and then they give as the result a cost so much per ton mile to move that freight. I contend that system is not a correct system. I maintain that the National railways and the Canadian Pacific railway have a definite fixed overhead, and like any manufacturing business that can throw an additional twenty-five per cent volume into its operations, it automatically lowers the overhead and reduces the cost. If the Canadian National railways and the Canadian Pacific could haul five million tons of coal from Alberta over their systems, they would thereby reduce their overhead, and could carry coal for less money. I think coal can be carried from Alberta to Fort William at the head of the lakes for $3 to $4 per ton; and with the steamship equipment which we have it can be moved to Goderich, Kincardine, Sarnia, and other ports on the Georgian Bay for $1 a ton. From these points there radiate lines of the National railways over which the tonnage would go at reasonable freight rates to serve the whole western part of Ontario. Therefore I think there are two things which the committee should certainly look into. First, the committee should consider whether or not the mining business in Alberta can be so arranged that the greatest efficiency will obtain in the production of coal, and that there will not be too much overlapping by the opening of new mines; and secondly, the question whether or not the Canadian National railways can transport Alberta coal to the head of the lakes, and thence by boat to central Ontario ports, for less than seven dollars a ton.

I would suggest that in the public interest we should start a publicity campaign in Ontario and Quebec to teach our people that our own coal coked is a better domestic fuel than anthracite.

Mr. MARCIL: How would the price compare with American coal?

Mr. MALCOLM: Coke made from American coal was sold last May around ten dollars a ton wholesale in Toronto, and anthracite was sold about the same price. There is one thing which it is always rather difficult to understand. We are constantly talking about the resale or retail price of anthracite and the wholesale price of Alberta coal. Anthracite coal, Alberta coal and every other coal as the Minister of the Interior said, are sold at a great advance over the wholesale price. The cost of distribution of coal to-day is one of the most serious factors the coal user has to face and the committee could well investigate that feature. With the information we have in our possession, compiled by the Dominion Fuel Board, I would like very much to see a committee formed to deal with this important problem, and endeavour to ascertain how we can best secure Nova Scotia and Alberta coal for domestic use in Ontario.

With regard to the use of coal in Ontario, we in Canada produce about 13,600,000 tons of coal, and we import about 16,000,000 tons. Hon. members speak as though we bring all our coal from the United States. We are now using almost 50 per cent of Canadian coal. The question of bituminous coal or steam coal for the province of Ontario is a very serious one and manufacturing businesses are involved to such an extent that it is doubtful whether they can pay the price for coal brought from Alberta. American coal is landed at some points in Canada at five dollars a ton, and is landed in Toronto at five and a half dollars a ton, which is about the cost of transporting Alberta coal to Ontario, and before we exclude American steam coal from the market we would have to consider other matters in connection with power and with our industries where cheap coal is an important factor. The investigation of that question would take a great deal of time before the committee, and probably occupy a good many sessions of parliament.

The hon. member who spoke a short time ago mentioned the question of salt. That is a commodity that is used in the everyday life of Canada. It is brought into Canada from all parts of the world. We are not like China in that we do not put a tax on salt. It is allowed to come into Canada free and is also refined in Canada. The cost is purely the evaporation cost, and it takes about two-thirds of a ton of coal to make a ton of salt. If you exclude the American bituminous coal you are going to double the price of Canadian made salt. That is a question that would have to be considered. Therefore, I think we can well afford to leave out the question of industrial bituminous coal in the meantime. If we can succeed in dealing with the domestic fuel problem and can educate our householders to use domestic coal or coke made therefrom in the Dominion, we have gone a long way towards solving our fuel problem.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MANION: What is the business for to-morrow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: To-morow is government day. We purpose taking such motions as may be on the order paper and then to proceed with Supply. We will take up first the estimates of the Department of Customs, and if we do not occupy the entire day with those estimates, we will take up the Department of Public Works.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.08 p.m.

Tuesday, March 16, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That the select standing committees of this House shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT PRESENTED

Report of the Soldier Settlement Board of Canada for the year ending December 31, 1925—Hon. Mr. Stewart.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER

ELECTION OF MR. WILLIAM DUFF, QUEENS-LUNENBURG

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to join my congratulations to those of other hon. members upon Your Honour's re-election as Speaker of this House, a choice which was received, as was to have been expected, with most gratifying unanimity.

As Your Honour is aware, rule 13 of the House provides that at the commencement of every parliament, as soon as an Address has been agreed to in answer to His Excellency's Speech, a chairman of committees of the House shall be elected who shall serve as Deputy Speaker. I have no doubt that after a continuous, and—may I add?—exemplary, uninterrupted occupancy of the Speaker's chair for a period of seven weeks, during which time the debate on the Address has been carried on, Your Honour will look not without favour upon the exercise by the House of the power given it under this rule. I hope that the name I am about to propose as that of chairman of committees may also be cordially received by hon. members in all parts of the House.

The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) has had an experience in this House of some nine years. As hon. members who sat with him in the last and the preceding parliaments will know, he possesses the many qualifications which eminently fit him to serve in the important capacity of Chairman of Committees and Deputy Speaker. In the discharge of the important duties of this joint office he will bring a knowledge of the rules acquired by careful observation and study and in no small measure by practical experience; he will bring not less a disposition to be fearless and impartial in the exercise of an authority which in its character is essentially judicial.

I have therefore great pleasure in moving, seconded by Mr. Lapointe,

That William Duff, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Queens-Lunenburg, be appointed chairman of the committees of the whole House.

Motion agreed to.

IMPERIAL CONFERENCE 1926

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table copies of correspondence between the governments of Great Britain and Canada relating to the proposal to hold an Imperial conference in October, 1926.

PRIVY COUNCIL DECISION

RIGHT OF APPEAL IN CRIMINAL CASES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask if the federal government is taking any action in regard to the recent decision of the Privy Council in the Alberta appeal case? Is section 1025 of the Criminal Code to be set aside by that decision? And is the right of appeal in criminal cases to be entirely at the discretion of the Privy Council?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The judgment has just been received by the Department of Justice, and I would not like to make any statement or comment before having an opportunity of reading and considering it.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports in the Dominion, including pay for overtime of officers, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act, and temporary buildings and rentals, $6,723,815.

Hon. GEORGE H. BOIVIN (Minister of Customs and Excise): Mr. Chairman, while the entire estimate for the outside service of the Department of Customs and Excise is included in vote 349, amounting to $10,884,390, I think it would be better, if the committee would agree, to take up the different items separately, discuss them as they are reached, and after each separate item has been approved, have one formal vote adopting the whole resolution. I really do not understand why it has always been the custom to have all the items of the Department of Customs and Excise estimates embodied in one vote, but we have followed the usual custom this year making it much easier to make comparisons with the items required in previous years.

Before going into the details I desire to say that it is not through any spirit of bravado that I happen to be the first minister to present his estimates. I at once ask the committee to grant me the indulgence which is usually given to a new minister submitting his estimates to the House for the first time. That does not mean, however, that I am not prepared with the aid of my officers to give to the members all possible information, and if there is any information that I do not have available at the moment, the members of the committee may rest assured that I will do my best to get it for them. If they insist on the information, there will be no attempt on my part to press the item until such information has been brought down. It is true that an inquiry into the administration of the Department of Customs and Excise is being carried on and there is a rule of the House that provides that matters pertaining to a committee cannot be discussed in the House until that committee has made its final report. I think, however, it will be possible for hon. members to ask such questions and for me to give such answers in connection with the estimates as will give this committee all the information required, without in any way referring to what is going on at present before the customs investigating committee. The only information, perhaps, that I cannot give definitely will be concerning the organization of the preventive service staff of the Department of Customs and Excise. I want to say very frankly to the committee that the preventive service staff, organized under the vote of $350,000 which was included in the supplementary estimates of last year, has not been entirely satisfactory. Hon. members will ascertain that only about $35,000, or one-tenth of the amount voted, has been expended. I thought it better to spend little than to expend a very large amount and get no results. I am asking for a re-vote of the same amount this year, with the intention of expending it in the same careful and cautious manner, and if it is impossible for me to describe exactly the plans I have under consideration for the reinforcement of that staff, it is because I desire to await the outcome of the customs inquiry and to follow in so far as it may be possible the suggestions which may be made by that committee. I am sure that the work of the committee will not be wasted effort, and that the suggestions received from the committee both as to possible amendments to the Customs Act and as to the reorganization of the preventive service staff will be enlightening, and that it will be possible for us to adopt them in many respects. With these few preliminary remarks, and asking once more for the indulgence of hon. members I would suggest that we proceed, Mr. Chairman, to consider the item you have just read.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the House that the resolution be considered item by item?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take it, Mr. Chairman, that we all agree with the minister that that is the only thing to do. We always have done it; sometimes we do the right thing, and I think we had better continue to do so. Just at the commencement and before discussing this item I would like my hon. friend to give me all the information he can in connection with the salaries. The first item is, I suppose, the one we will take up, amounting to $6,723,815, and it deals with the salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports in the Dominion, including pay for overtime of officers and so on. I notice there is an increase in that particular item. I would like the minister to give the House some information as to how he finds these services, and if there are any changes which he desires to make, as well as his observations on the reference there made to the Civil Service Act, in connection with employees.

Mr. BOIVIN: The words "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act" do not apply in any sense to the appointment of the employees. The salaries paid out of this item of $6,723,815, which shows an increase over last year of $271,447.61 are paid to civil servants in the outside service but all appointed by the Civil Service Commission. The words "notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act" refer only to pay for overtime. The officers for overtime work are chosen by the department and the overtime salary is paid without reference to the Civil Service Act. The overtime rate is 50 cents per hour on week days and 60 cents per hour on Sunday. The Sunday and much overtime labour of customs officers is repaid by the railway or steamboat companies that take advantage of the services of these officers.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Do they pay the civil servants direct?

Mr. BOIVIN: No. The officers are paid by us, and the company is billed by the department for the overtime. None of our officers are ever obliged to work overtime on Sunday but those who do so voluntarily and willingly are paid.

Additions to staff under this item account for the sum of $59,210, but that amount is offset by the decrease in salaries to promotions, retirements and appointments of senior officers whose positions are taken by new men or by men promoted from an inferior rank so that in reality the additions to staff mean an increase of $1,880. The statutory increases provided for by the Civil Service Act, with which all the old members of this House are quite familiar, account for the sum of $169,530.

Another increase in this item is for contingent expenses. They are increased by about $97,492.61. The major portion of that amount, about $60,000, is made up of overtime salaries and special salaries paid to watchmen for boats at Halifax, Windsor and other ports, but specially at Halifax, where all boats coming into the harbour laden with liquor must be placed under guard by the department, and the officers must be paid for watching the boats. While the amount, $97,000 may appear large, I should state at once that this amount like the overtime paid to our officers on Sundays, is reimbursed to the department by the owners of the boats and schooners requiring the services of these watchmen.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take it from what my hon. friend says that he has some new regulations in connection with this particular branch of the department's work. He tells us that there is a substantial increase in this connection. I assume that must be because we have some change in the regulations. My hon. friend shakes his head. If there is no change in the regulations, why does the amount go up so much? Perhaps it would be more convenient if my hon. friend would give the committee just exactly how the item is made up, so that we can see where the increases come in, and how the expenditure compares with last year.

Mr. BOIVIN: The total salaries amount to $5,753,815, as compared with $5,579,000 last year; that is, the difference in total salaries is about $175,000. As I stated before, the statutory increases account for $169,530, and the additions to the staff, very few of which were made, are almost entirely compensated by the decrease in salaries paid to the new appointees.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is it convenient at this point to give the additions to the staff?

Mr. BOIVIN: The net additions to staff are 48 men, receiving salaries amounting altogether to $59,210. The total number of officers paid is 3,583. The total amount paid in salaries is $5,753,815.

Mr. MANION: What were the 48 additions?

Mr. BOIVIN: New officers were appointed at different ports where the work had become so heavy that the inspectors requested additions to the staff and a few new offices were opened.

Mr. RYCKMAN: At what places?

Mr. BOIVIN: A new office was opened at Malagash, near Amherst; there was an addition of one clerk and three typists to the Montreal office; another customs excise officer at Berthierville; an additional officer required for preventive work to take charge of office during the absence of the sub-collector at Quebec; a new outport was established at Cowansville, and a new officer appointed there; an additional officer for supervising the trans-shipment of goods at Beauceville; six customs excise examiners appointed at Bridgeburg; one at Fort William, one at Ingersoll, one at Whitby, seven additional officers at Windsor, one at Calgary, one at Lethbridge, one at Abbotsford, one at Nelson, British Columbia, a female examiner at New Westminster, and two additional men for the Pacific highway at New Westminster.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As I get it there are three new offices?

Mr. BOIVIN: There are three new offices.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Just in connection with the matter of offices, I wonder if my hon. friend has considered the question of the multiciplity of office. That is something that has a great deal to do with the very matter the committee is now considering, and that is the question of properly collecting our customs. I think it is pretty well notorious that the way to get goods in at valuations which do not jibe is to multiply the offices. I wonder if my hon. friend has ever considered whether it would not be a right thing to decrease the offices and adopt rather the standard of the United States in this regard where their offices are merely a fraction of ours, having regard to the activities carried on. Would it not be better to do that instead of further increasing offices, the only effect of which is to make it just that much more easy for importers to get their goods into this country at an improper valuation and on an improper basis?

Mr. BOIVIN: I agree entirely with what my hon. friend says. In fact I might perhaps give a list of some of the offices that we have already abolished. We have abolished more offices than we have created.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would my hon. friend give the names of those abolished?

Mr. BOIVIN: There were three officers employed at Baddeck. It was found that these officers stationed at that place could not perform their work effectively and the positions were discontinued.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the office at Baddeck closed?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, there is no one left there now except possibly a preventive officer. At Barrington Passage the postion of customs excise examiner has been vacant since the appointment of Mr. Gray as collector. That position, instead of being filled, has been discontinued. The position of customs excise examiner at Bridgewater has been discontinued; the position of customs excise examiner at Digby has been discontinued. The officer stationed at Point Acone, North Sydney is no longer required there for the entering and clearing of vessels, and that office has been discontinued. The position at Port Maitland, Yarmouth, has been vacant for some time and has been abolished. The position of a part-time officer at Stanhope, near Coaticook, has been discontinued. In addition to the foregoing an office has been closed at New Richmond, in the county of Bonaventure, which does not appear on this report.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: So far the offices closed have been in the Maritime provinces. Cannot we get anywhere else?

Mr. BOIVIN:: New Richmond and Stanhope are in the province of Quebec.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They are all in Nova Scotia, with that exception. What offices has my hon. friend been able to close in Quebec and Ontario?

Mr. BOIVIN: Up to the present time I have closed no other offices in Quebec or Ontario. With the exception of the dismissal of a few dishonest employees—and I may say there are very few in comparison with the number of officers in the service of my department—I have not attempted to make any radical changes. It must be remembered that I took over the administration of the department on or about the first day of November. Very shortly after that it was announced in the press that this parliamentary inquiry into the administration of the department would take place soon after parliament met, and I considered that it was my duty to refrain from making radical changes until the Customs committee had completed its labours and had given the House the benefit of its recommendations. I have always felt that the minister of any department, especially the Minister of Customs, was not only the servant of the crown but the servant of the people. I have always considered that the peoples' wishes could best be expressed by the voice of their representatives in parliament, and I will wait for the judgment of this House on the report of the Customs committee before I make any serious change.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does that not apply to Nova Scotia?

Mr. BOIVIN: The changes made in Nova Scotia were made before I came into the department, but during the present fiscal year. Most of them were due to positions having been vacant for a long time. Instead of filling them it was decided to abandon them. I do not think that anyone has suffered in any way. The only complaint that I have so far received concerning Nova Scotia is, that some of the officers appointed there have not been supporters of the present government, and some of my political friends have felt unkindly towards the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend is not very complimentary to his friends. They appear to feel that the Civil Service Commission only does its duty if it appoints Liberals. I want to make a comment or so upon this increase. The increase this year in this one item is $271,447.61. In the entire vote, No. 349, it is $376,761.33. In the same item last year—I mean the partial item, the one we are on now, not the entire one—the increase was $566,673.41. The year before it was $138,910. No doubt these constant or rather startling increases of cost are all in pursuance of the much vaunted policy of economy of the government. The general estimates came out yesterday, but with that thoroughness of political preparation and publicity characteristic of the government—I have always complimented it on that; it is the only respect in which I have known it to be thorough in anything—the estimates were preceded by the announcement of a great saving to the country. I think one paper, very faithful to the administration, has the saving at $24,000,000. Looking, though, at the summary at the commencement of the estimates the reduction of the main estimates of this year from those of last year is $5,652,672.66, a trifle over five and a half million. And now we have merely this year's main estimates as against last year's total estimates, including all the supplementaries. Last year's supplementary estimates aggregated $9,387,426.97. On the assumption that this year's will be no more, we have already in the estimates for the present year, instead of a decrease from the year before, an increase of approximately $4,000,000.

But the assiduity of the government in presenting appearances did not end there. I have not been able to find anything in the estimates at all to cover any one item in the Speech from the Throne of all the numerous berry-patches there presented to hon. gentlemen to my left. There is nothing at all to correspond with the programme as to rural credits. There is nothing to correspond with the promise as to old age pensions. How many millions are to be required for each of these? Why are they not in the estimates? No doubt the ingenuity of the Minister of Customs has advised the government already to keep those out of the estimates, to present them in bills and make them statutory, and thereby keep up the pretence of a reduction while the actual fact is that the country is being loaded with millions more, untold millions more, this year over the year before.

What will be provided in the supplementaries in respect of public works, harbours, rivers and the like is only yet to be conjectured. But assuming that they will not exceed last year, they will not be very far from last year's figures. We will have this year over last year a total of approximately $4,000,000 in the estimates alone. We will have the whole of the rural credit venture and the entire old age pension venture in addition. In these latter respects the future mortgages far exceed the present commitments in amount. This is the direction in which the government is travelling. There may be merit in this course or that, but there is no merit in travelling this course and then endeavouring to make the public believe that vast sums of money are being saved. The mortgage is increasing and multiplying year by year. It may be the price the government had to pay. It may be that they could not maintain themselves in power at any cheaper quotation. This may be the best they could do in the present market as it stands, but while they have to go in the market and pay, do not let them be proclaiming through the press that they are saving this country millions, when the poor country is being mortgaged in order that the government may gratify their own ambitions.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Coming down to the express item under consideration, the minister told us there was an addition of seven officers at Bridgeburg. I should like to know what they are for and what they are doing.

Mr. BOIVIN: There are six customs excise examiners appointed for the purpose of fixing what we call Tyden seals on cars travelling through Canada in bond. There was also one stenographer—

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Is the business so much greater this year that they require seven new men at a point like Bridgeburg?

Mr. BOIVIN: The chief inspector reported that it was absolutely necessary for the security of the revenue.

In reply to the remarks made by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) in so far as this item is concerned, I say that not a single officer in the entire list was added upon the recommendation of any member of parliament or any member of the government. In every case the vacancy was reported upon by the chief inspector or by the inspector of the district and in every case the appointment was made by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. GOTT: How about the Kingsville appointment?

Mr. BOIVIN: I am not aware of an appointment there but I am now told that it was made by the Civil Service Commission. I might say to my right hon. friend that one reason why my Liberal friends in Nova Scotia considered a few Liberals should be appointed, is that all Liberals holding provincial positions in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have been dismissed and replaced by Conservatives within the last few weeks.

Mr. HANSON: Not all, but soon.

Mr. BOIVIN: Not all, but soon! I think "soon" has already arrived, if reports received are true. This is undoubtedly why our Liberal friends from Nova Scotia really think that once in a while a Liberal should be appointed by the Civil Service Commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if the minister could tell us whether the government of Nova Scotia has as yet been able to catch up with defaulting employees of the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. HOCKEN: Liberals.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: They were all Liberals—not one Conservative there.

Mr. BOIVIN: Catch up with defaulting employees in Nova Scotia?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. BOIVIN: It is not necessary to catch up with them. They have dismissed them all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. CAHAN: Is the minister serious in that statement?

Mr. BOIVIN: Certainly—absolutely serious.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nonsense.

Mr. BOIVIN: Officers occupying quasi-judicial positions, such as sheriffs and others, have in certain cases, I am told, been dismissed. There is no civil service commission in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I may say that the minister's statement is very wide of the mark and I would ask if that is his justification or the justification of the government in appointing Liberals to places where the service is not required?

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not want to get into an argument concerning the statement I have made. I am perfectly willing to accept the statement of my hon. friend who lives in that part of the country and admit that a few Liberals may have been retained in office by the provincial government. A few Liberals have undoubtedly been appointed by this government in Nova Scotia. The extra watchmen on the preventive service staff at Halifax do not come under the Civil Service Commission. They were recommended by our Liberal friends from Halifax.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): They are not appointed through the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. BOIVIN: No, they are temporary employees who are not on regular duty, who are employed only seasonally, when the regular men who are supposed to do the overtime work are unable to do it.

Mr. HANSON: The minister said that certain quasi-judicial officers, such as sheriffs, had been dismissed by the new government. Can the minister give me the name of a single sheriff in that province who has been dismissed by the new government?

Mr. BOIVIN: No.

Mr. HANSON: There has not been one.

Mr. BOIVIN: No, I frankly admit I did not hear any name.

The CHAIRMAN: I think we are getting some distance away from the item.

Mr. FOSTER: Can the minister give us the name of one sheriff in Nova Scotia who has been dismissed by the Nova Scotia government? He has made the statement that practically all of them were dismissed. I do not think it is a fair statement to go to the country because it is not true.

Mr. BOIVIN: Not in Nova Scotia.

Mr. FOSTER: Nor in New Brunswick either. Not one-tenth or one-twentieth of the officials have been dismissed in Nova Scotia.

Mr. BOIVIN: I hope my hon. friend will allow me to refer him to the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), who told us that those who had not gone would go soon.

Mr. HANSON: Quite right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have not gone yet?

Mr. FOSTER: But the statement—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must call the attention of both the minister and the hon. gentleman who has just spoken to the fact that we are going beyond—

Mr. BOIVIN: I am sure, Mr. Chairman, you will allow me to apologize, if an apology is necessary, to my hon. friends from Nova Scotia whom I may have offended. I will admit that I relied only on verbal reports and that I should not have introduced that subject here, although I was led astray by a remark made by the leader of the opposition concerning my Liberal friends and the appointment of Liberals. It was not my intention to divert the attention of the committee from the item before us and I certainly am sorry if I have not been fair to the new governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Mr. HANSON: Have any representations been made to the minister with respect to the necessity for new officials on that part of the coast line of New Brunswick bordered by the gulf of St. Lawrence? St. Pierre and Miquelon are very close to that border and the information I have is that immense quantities of liquor are being brought from those French islands to ports on the gulf of St. Lawrence with practically no let or hindrance. So far as I know the department over which the minister has the honour to preside has not appointed a single new preventive officer in that locality and there is no prevention of the smuggling of liquor from those points. I should also like to know how many female examiners are paid under this vote and where they are located. Are they part of a flying squadron? At the port of St. Stephen we have had visits on occasions from some of these female examiners and they throw great trepidation into the heart of the ordinary housewife who walks across the bridge from time to time.

Mr. BOIVIN: These ladies in the department bear the title of female searchers. There are three in British Columbia and six or seven in Ontario. There are none now in the Maritime provinces, but an application has been made for the appointment of one at St. Stephen. This application is now pending before the Civil Service Commission, by whom the appointment will be made.

Mr. HANSON: The department has made an application?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, for the appointment of an officer there.

Mr. HANSON: To be located there permanently?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: What about my question as to the appointment of more preventive officers on the New Brunswick coast bordering on the gulf?

Mr. BOIVIN: That matter is under consideration, and I am glad my hon. friend has brought it up. Our preventive service has been very weak on the coast of not only New Brunswick, but Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. Perhaps even before the committee has made its report and we have the advantage of its recommendations, it may be necessary to strengthen our force on the shores of the three Maritime provinces. I hope it will be possible for us to co-operate to a certain extent with the administrators of the provincial laws in an effort to put an end to rum-running and to protect not only the federal revenue but the revenue of the different provinces concerned. There has always been some difficulty in making arrangements with provincial governments for the protection of liquor revenue because the provincial governments making seizures have always claimed the right to sell the liquor and to retain the proceeds. This deprives the federal government of the duty or excise tax, as the case may be, on that liquor. We do not generally pay awards to our informers until the duty or excise tax, as the case may be, has been paid. For that reason the question is a difficult one to adjust. We have had conferences recently with Mr. Paton of Prince Edward Island who, if I remember correctly, is chairman of the Prohibition Commission there. We have had frequent conferences with the president of the Quebec Liquor Commission concerning the matter, and I hope very shortly to be able to devise some way which will be acceptable to the provinces and also to the department so that the officers of the two governments may work together in close harmony.

Mr. HANSON: What arrangements have been made with the provincial authorities, say in New Brunswick, with respect to appointing liquor inspectors under the prohibitory laws? I think an arrangement has been entered into, and if so, I should like to know what it is. I know some are clothed with the authority of seizure officers.

Mr. BOIVIN: The only arrangement that has been made is that in the three Maritime provinces—I think this applies equally to the three—not all the provincial officers, but a few of them, at the request of the mayors of their cities, or the provincial government, or the chairman of the prohibition commissions, or whatever organization is functioning, have applied to us for what is commonly called a writ of assistance. This is the appointment of a preventive service officer without pay, giving to the local officer the same power and authority, in so far as searching, arresting and seizing are concerned, as our own officers have.

4 p.m.

Mr. HANSON: Do these officers to whom these writs of assistance go from time to time make any report to the Customs department, or do they report to the bodies under whose immediate jurisdiction they are? If they do not, why should some steps not be taken to see that liquor illegally smuggled into the country and seized by these officers with the assistance of these writs pays revenue into the Dominion treasury? That is a vital point that should be looked into. No doubt a very large revenue is lost to the country by reason of that fact.

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not get the exact sense of my hon. friend's question.

Mr. HANSON: If I understood the minister's previous remark correctly, liquor seized by these officers who are primarily prohibition inspectors, is confiscated after judgment by a proper tribunal and it is condemned either to be destroyed, or as in the case of New Brunswick, to be handed over to the New Brunswick Liquor Commission. If that liquor is properly handed over to the commission it is sold to the vendor. Does that liquor so seized and handed over in the way I have described pay excise to this government?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes. All liquor which is sold by the respective commissions pays excise to this government, and it is a well known rule that liquor which does not produce at least the amount of the excise or customs duty when it is offered for sale for beverage purposes, is destroyed. No seized liquor is sold to these respective commissions as potable liquor unless it pays at least the amount of the excise or customs duty as the case may be. We have always insisted that this liquor shall pay customs or excise duty to the government exactly as my hon. friend has suggested, but the difficulty arises from the fact that the provincial governments claim that they pay the salaries of these men; that the proceeds of seizures made by these men all go to the federal treasury, and that the only advantage they get out of it is that they get their liquor for the price of the duty instead of having to pay the duty plus the cost which is very small. They claim they do not receive enough out of the proceeds of the seizures to cover the salaries of their men. They also claim that they are doing our work, and that therefore we should contribute in some way to the payment of the salaries. That is the question we are endeavouring to adjust, instead of making them customs preventive officers without salary at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Mr. Chairman, I understood the minister to say that seven new officers had been appointed at Bridgeburg, six of whom were car sealers. My impression is that some years ago—I do not know whether it obtained last year—only two car sealers were maintained at Bridgeburg, one of whom operated during the day and the other during the night. Why was it necessary last year to appoint six additional men? Could we have the report of the inspector making this recommendation, and his name?

Mr. BOIVIN: They were appointed upon the recommendation of the chief inspector, Mr. E. S. Busby. I do not happen to have the report with me, but I will be very glad to have a copy made and either place it on the table or hand it to my hon. friend.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Are these men employed at Bridgeburg, or do they cover the district around Bridgeburg?

Mr. BOIVIN: They are all appointed and paid and considered to be officers of the port of Bridgeburg, but I am told by the deputy minister that some of them, although they do not reside in Buffalo, perform their duties there.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And Black Rock?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand that formerly the American railways used to contribute to the expense of maintaining these officials, they being employed for the convenience of the companies. Are they still contributing to the expense?

Mr. BOIVIN: The department pays salaries direct to the men, but the money is reimbursed to us by the American railways.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And there is no additional cost to the country by reason of the employment of these six men?

Mr. BOIVIN: No.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is what I understood.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to call the attention of the government to the low salaries paid the very efficient staff, from the head down, of the Customs department, at the port of Toronto. Excellent service has been given by the staff to the business men of the city and I wish to take advantage of this vote, as I have done on former occasions, at the request and on behalf of the business men of Toronto, to impress upon the government the necessity of providing a new and modern customs house to facilitate the work of these officials and to take care of the volume of business carried on at this port. The city of Toronto for a great many years past has been clamouring for a new customs house. Towards the $346,000,000 paid to administer our national affairs the city of Toronto contributes $94,000,000, and of this amount about $60,000,000 represents customs duties. This department and the post office should be operated for the benefit of the people. I do not know of anything that more retards trade and commerce than the difficulties that our business men have to overcome to get their goods through the customs house, due entirely to the absolute lack of proper facilities. This difficulty becomes acute at Easter and Christmas, when it is of the utmost importance that our merchants should be able to get their goods passed with a minimum of delay. I bring this matter to the attention of the minister at the request of the business men of Toronto, who have written me to lay before him the difficulties under which the customs officers labour. We have a very fine body of men in the service and they work very long hours for very small pay, but they are sadly handicapped through lack of adequate facilities. I hope a better day is dawning for them. The minister's predecessor visited Toronto and met some of our representative business men. They do not take their politics too seriously, business is business with them, and they want to do their business with the Customs department in the most modern and efficient way. The old customs house at Yonge and Front streets, one of the finest types of architecture in the city, was torn down some years ago but it has never been replaced. In 1917 the city sold to the government a site on Front street for $110,000—a cut rate—in order to encourage the government to give Toronto proper customs house facilities, and the old customs building was torn down. This new site is ready on the south side of Front street between Yonge and Bay streets. I venture to say that if we had a proper building for the transaction of the department's business in the city the customs receipts would be increased at this port to the extent of seven or eight million dollars. Under the present very unsatisfactory conditions I am sure that there is a considerable loss of government revenue. To make the situation worse, the income tax collection was transferred to the Customs department by the late minister, thus still further congesting the work of the local officials. To look after this income tax collection, then located on Lombard street, it was decided on removal and so an office was established at 54 Wellington street west, but although the government went to an expense of about $3,000 a year the building has never been occupied. Now it is proposed to erect a skyscraper at Yonge and King street, and to pay upwards of $290,000 in rentals. Part of the space, it is said being required to house sections of the customs service. With offices scattered all over the city there is not only great waste in extra rental charges, but there is a substantial loss to the government in earnings, and a substantial loss of time to the officials and the business community. This condition of affairs is no longer to be trifled with. During the late campaign in the Toronto district I noticed the billboard announcements of some of the Liberal candidates displayed an invitation to "vote for So and So the Liberal government candidate, and he will get you a new customs house and a new post office." But I do not think party politics should be mixed up with this vote.

The following resolution passed by the Liberal associations of Toronto is of interest:

> Be it resolved that the attention of the right hon. the Prime Minister be called to the fact that the present customs house is not only wholly inadequate to care for the business that passes through it, but that it is also an eye-sore to the people of Toronto, and a liability that is as a millstone around the neck of the Liberal party in Toronto.
> And be it further resolved that not only in the interests of good government but in the interests of common decency the Right Hon. Mr. King and his cabinet associates be asked to delay no longer in according to the people of Toronto what in simple justice is their right, a new and adequate customs house.

That was a resolution passed by the central Liberal executive of Toronto. I will not take very much of the time of the committee, but I think it is my duty to bring this matter to the attention of parliament, especially when we are getting a revenue of $60,000,000 from customs in Toronto. The Toronto Liberal executive also said:

> Toronto does not expect favours.

Of course we do not get any favours. Forty-six thousand dollars is all we get out of a vote of 346 millions for maintenance of the whole country. The Liberal executive were right when they said in their memorandum to the premier:

> Toronto does not expect favours. If it ever expected them it has long since passed that stage. But Toronto does expect that its necessities will be cared for at least in some measure. And a new customs house or federal office building is an absolute necessity. Let me point out to you that the customs receipts of Toronto amount to $60,000,000 a year, or more than a million dollars a week, out of a total for the Dominion of $133,000,000 a year, and that the headquarters for the customs house here is a ramshackle old shed of a building with two warehouses half a mile distant from it that cannot and should not be called upon in the matter of accommodation to house the millions of dollars worth of merchandise yearly passing through them and none of these buildings are suited to the requirements of a town of 50,000, much less a city of half a million people.

Then it was pointed out that while Toronto suffered under such disabilities, just so long would the Liberal party in Toronto find itself without representatives in the federal parliament. Those are the opinions expressed by resolutions and deputations of Toronto Liberal organizations. There is, in fact, no customs warehouse in Toronto; a lot of the goods are down at the Union station, out on the pavement and in various old rented shanties, and there is no place to house them. This is a public utility and should be operated as such. There is nothing which retards trade, both retail and wholesale, more than the inadequate way in which this public utility is operated. No concern under private ownership could live twenty-four hours if it was conducted in this manner, and treated its patrons as the citizens of Toronto have been treated.

I have a table of receipts here which I will not read but which shows that Toronto contributes over 45 per cent of the total customs revenue.

The late Minister of Customs and his predecessor went to Toronto and saw the actual conditions. A site was purchased from the city at about one-third of its value over twelve years ago. This lot was situated on the south side of Front street, and was bought in 1917 for $110,000. I venture to say that the increment to the government from that lot would amount to over $400,000 at the present time, so that as a real estate speculation they have made over $300,000 by that purchase. The new building was not erected because war broke out, but the war has been over for some years, and that excuse will no longer serve. The time for talk has passed and the time for action has arrived. The work of the customs in Toronto is spread out around the old Union station, the new station, the docks, and all along the waterfront to West Toronto, a distance of several miles. That is surely no way to conduct such a business. No regard should be taken of the way the city votes; this public utility should be operated from the commercial point of view.

I do not wish to criticize the young minister, because he has done just as well in this connection as his predecessors, and he has not been very long in office. I would be the last to say anything against him, but he knows something of conditions in Toronto. He has been up there and I believe in the short time that he has been in office he has become well acquainted with those conditions. It is not a question of spending money but of giving adequate service; the people of Toronto will pay for it anyway. They have to in part. They will pay two or three million dollars which is to go to the Hudson Bay railway, and they will contribute revenue to provide customs houses, post offices, branch lines and so on throughout Canada. According to the free trade law of supply and demand as understood by the Progressive party, Toronto would have the greatest customs house in the country if that doctrine prevailed.

But we do not want any favours; business is business, and I do not see how the government can expect to hold this large business in the key city of Canada, so far as customs is concerned, without doing something to relieve the conditions which exist there today and to give an adequate service with a proper plant.

Mr. MULLINS: The hon. member has made some reference to the Hudson Bay railway. I may say that there is a suffering people in the west asking for a Hudson Bay railway, and that is more necessary than a customs house in Toronto. The customs house is not necessary; we can come to it later. The item in the estimates covering the Hudson Bay railway is absolutely necessary, and should not be referred to in that way.

Mr. CHURCH: Well let the provinces pay for it. It will bring out the ice crop.

Mr. GOTT: The hon. Minister of Customs stated a few moments ago that the appointment at Kingsville, Ontario was made by the Civil Service Commission. I desire to submit a letter in this connection under date of February 5. This is rather a complicated affair, and quite difficult to explain by letter.

I am forwarding herewith two official documents, the result of marks obtained on the examination, also the appointment, both signed by the secretary of the Civil Service Commission.

I carried out instructions on appointment, and on presentation of same was informed that my duties would not begin until authorization from Minister of the Department at Ottawa had arrived.

Through some reason, the news of my appointment became known, and our friends here became active, by wire, with the result that although I was appointed on June 30, headed the examination, served approximately three years in France, was rejected on account of a charge by some political henchmen of this district, but the enclosed letters will explain all I think to your satisfaction.

This appointment did not follow the usual procedure, and instead of going through the commission, came from the department by wire, in due time being passed through the usual channels.

Pressing the commission personally for a reason, also the department through the Windsor G.W.V.A., will enclose herewith the letters which are self-explanatory, the charge against me by the department (manufactured for the instance), and also letters from the C.N. and C.P. Telegraph Companies, whose agent I was here. These letters are from the inspectors who personally checked my office at the time I resigned.

[Mr. Church.]

You can easily see what becomes of the charges of the department, against the name of a man who had served his country in the time of need; charges that had not the slightest foundation, nothing more or less than a political dodge from beginning to end.

When we fellows enlisted they did not stop to ask what our politics were.

The defeated representative of South Essex, Mr. Graham, with whom I had several interviews, the first one the day that I had been informed that the appointment was made definitely. Mr. Graham said that the Civil Service Commission was absolutely and entirely supreme. The commission and the department usually met and decided on the appointment, but if the commission made the appointment, recommendations or anything else from the department would take no effect.

I immediately produced the result of my marks, also the appointment, and said: "In view of the facts already stated by you with these official documents in your hand, how do you account for another man receiving the appointment?"

Mr. Graham: "Well, the Customs Department have got busy, Mac."

Mr. McCallum: "You have just finished telling me that this could not possibly be done."

Mr. Graham: "But of course, you understand this is not my department?"

Mr. McCallum: "This may not be in your department, but this is your constituency, and are you aware of the fact that there are hundreds of returned soldiers in South Essex?"

Mr. Graham then promised that he would get in touch with the department, and the Civil Service Commission, and see what could be done.

The next interview I had with Mr. Graham was the day that he was endorsed as Liberal candidate in South Essex.

He admitted before Lafferty, president of the Windsor G.W.V.A., and others, that according to the evidence produced from Lafferty's files, part of which I herewith enclose, there was no doubt I had been done an injustice, and on arriving at Ottawa he would immediately get in touch with the Minister of Customs and see if he could not have my name cleared of these charges. As usual his actions were conspicuous by their absence.

Mr. Chairman, on the 23rd of February last I produced all the documents in connection with the appointment of McCallum, his dismissal, and the appointment in his stead of a man from Kingsville.

Mr. MANION: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister a condition which exists at the head of the lakes. Perhaps it hardly fits in under this item, but it is just as appropriate under this item as under any other as far as I can see, so I do not think it is out of order, Mr. Chairman.

There is at the present time at the head of the lakes a bus line running from Port Arthur to Duluth, a distance of something over 200 miles. That bus line has a passenger service each way daily, but for some reason, owing to a provision in the Customs Act—I do not know when it was introduced—these busses cannot carry anybody on the Canadian side; that is, a man, woman or child cannot get on one of these busses at the head of the lakes and get off before reaching the international boundary. If the bus permits such a thing to happen, it is apparently breaking a law which brings these busses under the same control as applies in the case of passenger and freight boats on the Great Lakes, which are not permitted to call from one Canadian port to another. Apparently the same law applies to the bus lines as applies to the steamship lines. I do not know of any reason in the world why that law should apply to bus lines, but such I believe is the case. The fact remains that a man, woman or child living in Fort William or Port Arthur, or a farmer out in the country, cannot get on one of these busses and go for any distance less than the 55 miles to the international boundary. If anyone wishes to make a shorter trip, he must hire a special car, if he has not a car of his own. It certainly seems a ridiculous proposition that these busses should be running to and fro daily and yet the farmers in the neighbourhood and the citizens of Fort William and Port Arthur who have not automobiles of their own should not be permitted to use these busses and travel any distance they wish, twenty-five or thirty or forty miles without the bus breaking the law. I remember laying this matter before the then Minister of Customs last year or possibly two years ago. I have also written recently to the present Minister of Customs, but he has not had time to deal with the matter. Certainly it would appear to me to be reasonable to permit these busses to handle Canadian traffic at least until a Canadian bus line is established. The present bus lines are managed by American companies, and until such time as there is a Canadian bus line competing—and I would certainly favour a Canadian line—it would appear to me that the present restrictions should be wiped out and the people allowed to take advantage of these busses travelling to and fro daily.

I appeal here to the minister to look into this matter thoroughly and endeavour to have the difficulty straightened out. Just the other day I received, as I am sure my hon. friend from Port Arthur (Mr. Langworthy) did also, a resolution passed by the Port Arthur Chamber of Commerce, and in the past I have received various other resolutions along the same line advocating this change. It is possible there may be some slight damage done to the Canadian National Railways, which have a line to Duluth, but it is such a roundabout line that it is not fair to ask anybody to use that line unless he has no other way of going. The Canadian National Railway runs a service only three days a week to Duluth, and one has to leave at four in the afternoon and does not get into Duluth until eight o'clock next morning, changing at Fort Frances at two in the morning. The bus service is much more convenient, leaving at nine or ten in the morning and getting into Duluth at five or six in the afternoon, after a very pleasant trip along the lake shore, which by the way is one of the most beautiful automobile drives on the American continent. Last year over 5,000 American cars crossed the bridge at the international boundary and entered the Dominion, and this traffic is increasing very rapidly every year. I again urge the minister to look into this matter thoroughly and endeavour to straighten out this ridiculous law or regulation which prevents the use of these bus lines by citizens of Fort William and Port Arthur and by the people in the surrounding farming country.

Mr. BOIVIN: Just a word in answer to my hon. friend. I received his letter this morning, and I have already given instructions to the officers in my department to investigate and see if something cannot be done to meet his wishes. The great difficulty in connection with that bus line is the fact that they are using American busses that have not paid duty, and if we met my hon. friend's wishes we would be allowing American manufacturers to use in Canada American busses for commercial purposes without duty having been paid upon the value of the bus. There should, I think, be a provision in the law by which part of the duty might be collected in a case of this kind, but I fear that to open the door and give this particular bus line the permission requested by my hon. friend would be creating a precedent that might work havoc perhaps to many Canadian lines operating in other parts of Canada. However, I will look into the matter, and if it is possible to do so, my hon. friend's wishes will be met.

Mr. MANION: I had never heard before the argument my hon. friend has just made, but even if it is as he states, and I accept his word at once, I would point out that there is no other bus line in competition in this case. I do not think there would be enough local traffic on the Canadian side of the line to permit this bus line to pay any part of the duty, because a large proportion of the farmers in the surrounding country and of the citizens of Fort William and Port Arthur have cars of their own, and only a very small proportion would use this bus line. I think a temporary ruling might well be made to permit this bus line to carry local traffic until such time as a Canadian bus line is established.

Mr. GEARY: May I ask the minister if in estimating his expenditure for salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports in the Dominion, he includes in that amount moneys which are subsequently paid back to the department?

Mr. BOIVIN: Oh yes.

Mr. GEARY: The Auditor General's report indicates that there is an amount of $22,000,000 which, though included to the credit of the Receiver General originally, was subsequently refunded by the department independently of the Receiver General as drawbacks of customs, excise refunds and similar items chargeable to revenue. I would like to ask the minister if this item gives credit for any part of that sum.

Mr. BOIVIN: No, this item does not give credit for any part of the drawbacks returned.

Mr. GEARY: I was thinking of salaries.

Mr. BOIVIN: There are no salaries returned.

Mr. GEARY: I wonder if that is the case. It says in volume I of the Auditor General's report that this $22,000,000 was subsequently refunded as drawbacks of customs, excise refunds and similar items chargeable to revenue. Then I am to understand from the minister that salaries in no case are included in the amount?

Mr. BOIVIN: No.

Mr. GEARY: And if you get a refund from a boat company, for instance, this year for last year's payments of customs officers it is not credited in the item?

Mr. BOIVIN: No amount received by any boat company or railway company appears or is credited in any way to this vote. The item referred to by my hon. friend in the Auditor General's report is the item covering customs duties drawbacks, that is to say money paid back by the department to those persons who have paid duty to us, but who have a right to reclaim that duty under the drawback clause in the case of materials imported and afterwards exported in manufactured form from Canada.

[Mr. Manion.]

Mr. GEARY: As I understand it generally, the matter comes down to this: The $6,723,815 for salaries this year includes an amount for Sunday service which ultimately will be refunded?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Mr. GEARY: Will it be refunded in the same fiscal year, or is there a balance over from year to year?

Mr. BOIVIN: The difference is that the refund instead of being made by us, as in the case of the drawback, will be made to us and sometimes in the next fiscal year.

Mr. GEARY: It will be, but I should think there would be a credit for it in that amount.

Mr. BOIVIN: It goes to the credit of revenue, and not to the reduction of salaries. It will be found in the revenue account of the Auditor General's report. It is accounted for in the Auditor General's report, but not credited to this item.

Mr. GEARY: What is the amount that will come back?

Mr. BOIVIN: I am not sure, but perhaps a million and a half.

Mr. GEARY: And there is nothing in the way of salaries at all?

Mr. BOIVIN: No.

Mr. CHURCH: May I ask the minister if he will state what he proposes to do in the matter of the Toronto customs house?

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend knows there is no place in Canada I would rather visit than Toronto, especially when the hon. gentleman is there, because he always extends such a hospitable welcome. Since I took over the department I have not had occasion to visit Toronto. Let me say that is not my fault, it is my misfortune. I intend to go just as soon as I possibly can, and investigate the customs conditions there. I know from reports I found on file in the department that the conditions in Toronto are not what they should be. I agree entirely with what my hon. friend has said concerning the necessity of improving the customs accommodation in Toronto. I am not, however, going to agree with him when he says that we shall lose revenue in Toronto if it is not improved because I know the city is going to keep on growing, and the people there will meet their obligations in any event.

But I do agree with my hon. friend that they deserve better customs accommodation. Requisitions have been made by our department to the Department of Public Works for improved customs accommodation. I am going to take it upon myself to bring the hon. member's remarks to the attention of the Minister of Public Works, because his department is responsible for the erection of these buildings. I do hope that my hon. friend's wish may be granted, at least in part, before another budget is presented.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I understood the minister to say that he anticipated a refund to the department of something approximating a million and a half dollars on account of salary refunds specially covered under this item. Where would it be possible for us to get the details in connection with the refunds from year to year?

Mr. BOIVIN: I think they should appear under sundry receipts in the revenue account of the Department of Customs in the Auditor General's report. Of course the refunds for the present fiscal year, which has not quite expired, will only appear in the next report of the Auditor General. Those that do appear in the report tabled a few days ago would be for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1925. They are the amounts paid by the railway companies for sundry services of the officers, the amounts paid by the boat companies and the amounts paid by the owners or masters of schooners, and ships of all kinds in the different harbours of Canada that are under care of our watchmen as well as the services of all the men employed for sealing cars in transit and in bond through Canada.

Mr. HANSON: With respect to the situation at Halifax to which the minister referred where watchmen are required for steamers and schooners loaded with liquor, how long has this situation been going on, and why is it these men are termed temporary employees? Because it seems to me that is not a seasonal occupation, it must be an all-round occupation, especially since the Volstead Act came into force in the United States. Therefore it seems to me those selected for this work should be men of a very high standard, and I see no reason why they should not be appointed by the Civil Service Commission, instead of being appointed, for instance, at the request of the late lamented Mr. Finn. I would not expect that we would have a very high type of watchmen appointed by that gentleman. I am not making any great reflections on him, but having regard to what we who were in the last house all know, I think it would be very dangerous to have appointments made in this way. Is the minister giving any consideration to the question that these men should not be temporary employees, but should be highly efficient employees. I can conceive where there could be a great injustice done to the public revenue if the men appointed to do this work were not of a high type. I should like to know how many men there are, when the system began to grow up, and if the minister intends to continue it?

Mr. BOIVIN: It is impossible to tell my hon. friend exactly how many men are constantly employed there. I think there are about twelve whose services are available when required. It is true that boats laden with liquor go to Halifax quite frequently, but it is not a regular traffic. There are certain times—and I think I can say it does not only depend upon the season—when there are many boats in the harbour and they have to be watched and guarded. There are other times when there are no boats at all and frequently the regular staff can do the work, do it efficiently and do it well. In fact it is only when they are overworked that the regular staff, appointed by the Civil Service Commission, allow these extra watchmen to be employed.

Mr. HANSON: Are they appointed at the request of the collector?

Mr. BOIVIN: I think a list of names is supplied to the collector by the department here at Ottawa. I remember having seen some correspondence between the collector and the department wherein the collector suggested the names of some men who should be added to this list. I cannot exactly remember by whom the other names were suggested—

Mr. HANSON: Make a guess.

Mr. BOIVIN: —but I am positive they were not suggested by the former member for Halifax, to whom my hon. friend has just referred.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In connection with these officers for whose services refunds are received, what class of officer is covered in this particular grant? Is it just watchmen at the outports and the employees in the railway terminals or outports, who look after the sealing of cars and does that work involve one-fourth of this total item?

Mr. BOIVIN: No, I do not want to say that the entire amount that I mentioned a moment ago is refunded for moneys paid out of this particular item. I am not even positive that the total refunds that we receive from the railway companies and the steam boat lines for all expenses out of any of the items included in the estimate 349 amounts to one million and a half. I would say that the amount refunded from the moneys paid out of this particular vote would be a little less than one-half million dollars. The balance would be paid out of the other items. The railway companies do not pay the salaries of all the men employed in and around the railway. Many men who are placed there for the convenience of the railway company are paid by the railway company, and on the other hand there are many customs employees placed there for the convenience of the public whose salaries are not refunded.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The officers who are placed there for the convenience of the railway company are sent there at the request of those railway companies, I presume, in order to facilitate the passing back and forward of the traffic. With regard to the question raised at Bridgeburg, and the addition of seven men for sealing purposes, were these officers placed there at the request of the railway companies? Was there a very great increase in the volume of business passing through the terminals that made it necessary for the railway to ask for the appointments, or are these a class of officers whose salaries the railways do not refund?

Mr. BOIVIN: There is not a very large increase of traffic through that port, but I am told the inspector found the work was not properly performed, and the railways found that their trains were delayed. It took too much time to seal their cars, and they preferred to have their own men and to pay the extra expense in order to expedite their trains.

Mr. HANSON: Who is collector of customs at Buctouche and how many officers of the department are there residing between Point Escuminac and Cape Tormentine on the St. Lawrence? That would take in the outports of Shediac, Cocagne, Buctouche and Richibucto. I suggest that would be a good ground to look into in connection with the traffic I have referred to.

Mr. BOIVIN: That would be under the port of Moncton.

Mr. HANSON: Moncton or Chatham?

Mr. BOIVIN: Chatham, I think. Mr. McInerney is a sub-collector replacing Mr. McMinn at Richibucto. At Buctouche, there is a sub-collector, Mr. A. Legere. He is the only officer on the regular staff at that point. It may be that we have a preventive officer there but he is the only regular customs officer at Buctouche and Mr. McInerney is the regular officer at Richibucto.

Mr. GOTT: What was the essential qualification in connection with the appointment of the excise officer at Kingsville?

Mr. BOIVIN: I am sorry I cannot give that information. The officer at that point was appointed by the Civil Service Commission about two months before I took over the department. I am informed that a returned soldier was appointed there. I am sure the Civil Service Commission were under the impression they had made an excellent appointment. Complaints were lodged against the appointee. The appointee was dismissed, and the Civil Service Commission were asked to appoint another man. I was not in office at the time, and I have no knowledge of what the essential qualifications were.

Mr. GOTT: No. Mr. Pearsall, who was appointed permanently, was a son of the president of the Liberal Association of the town of Kingsville, not a returned soldier.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am willing to stand corrected. I am informed by my deputy that the appointment was made by the Civil Service Commission on July 15, 1925. His name is A. G. Pearsall.

Mr. GOTT: Is it on file that he is a returned soldier? I understood the minister to say that.

Mr. BOIVIN: I was under that impression. I did not say that it was on the file. I will look up the documents and speak to my hon. friend about it again, and ascertain whether any misrepresentation was made. If any misrepresentation was made it is not too late to have it corrected.

Mr. GOTT: I understand the Great War Veterans' Association at Windsor took it up at the time on behalf of Mr. McCallum.

Mr. BOIVIN: I will look into it.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Why was Mr. McCallum disqualified?

Mr. BOIVIN: My officers tell me it is absolutely impossible for them to tell from memory exactly why he was disqualified, but the matter will be looked up and the information will be given to my hon. friend.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Before the estimate is passed?

Mr. BOIVIN: I would not like to make that promise—I hope my hon. friend will not exact it—but before all the estimates of the department are passed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that would be a safe promise.

Mr. RYCKMAN: It appears from what we have before us that an estimable man, a returned soldier, who headed the examination with the highest number of points, was appointed by the Civil Service Commission to the position. It is a case of this man first and the rest nowhere, and then the son of the president of the Liberal Association is appointed in his place, and the minister in the House and his deputy cannot give us any reason to-day why it was done.

Mr. BOIVIN: I thought my hon. friend would be less exacting than that from a new minister. I was not in office when the dismissal was made. I know nothing about it. I could not know the question was going to be asked. If I had I would have brought the information. I promise my hon. friend I will get the information, bring it down and hand it to him or lay it on the table before I ask that all of my estimates be passed.

Mr. GOTT: I rise to submit this letter despatched from Ottawa to Mr. McCallum on July 16, 1925:

Dear Sir:

In reply to your telegram of the 13th inst. I am instructed to inform you that the Deputy Minister of Customs and Excise has notified the commission that your services will not be acceptable to that department, and the commission has therefore made another assignment to the position of sub-collector of Customs and Excise in the person of Mr. Allen Dorland Pearsall, who qualified for permanent appointment at the same time as yourself. Mr. Pearsall did not serve overseas during the late war, but you were the only successful candidate who did so. Mr. Pearsall was regularly assigned to this position on the 3rd instant.

Yours truly,
C. H. BLAND,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. BOIVIN: That clears up one point. The letter from the deputy minister states clearly that he was not a returned soldier.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does it not also prove that this man was dismissed at the instigation of the Customs department at Ottawa? According to the statement read by the hon. member for South Essex, before any appointments were made by the Civil Service Commission they had to have a consultation with the head of the department. I should like to know from the minister whose will prevails on occasions like this. It is quite evident in this case it is not that of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BOIVIN: I can speak only for myself and for what has taken place in my department since I took charge. I do not know of anything in the Civil Service Act which gives me the right as head of the department to dictate to the Civil Service Commission whom they shall appoint. I have never made any recommendation. I do not think I have the right to recommend, and if I did, I do not think they would be obliged to follow the recommendation. It is true when an officer is appointed by the Civil Service Commission, if he is not acceptable to the department, if, for reasons given, the department do not want to avail themselves of his services, if he cannot perform the duties which are expected of him, if he is incompetent or if serious charges have been laid against him, the officer may be dismissed, but not in favour of someone else.

Mr. GOTT: Would the minister consider a charge made in the heat of a political contest a serious charge?

Mr. BOIVIN: That would all depend on the charges and by whom they were made.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Does the minister tell us seriously that neither he nor his deputy who sits with him nor his assistant deputy knows why Mr. McCallum was disqualified or discharged?

Mr. BOIVIN: Of course I do not know because I was not there. The deputy tells me that at the present time it is impossible for him to definitely remember.

Mr. NICHOLSON: We have this fact, that as recently as last July the deputy minister, the head of the department, in the case of an officer newly appointed who had all the qualifications called for by the Civil Service Commission, finds it necessary to ask for his removal and does not know the reason why. A customs officer is not removed merely at the whim of some individual who says: I want him removed. Surely after such a short time as has elapsed the deputy minister must recall the reasons for asking for this man's removal

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps I can help the minister a little.

Mr. BOIVIN: I wish the hon. member would enlighten us.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would be a great mistake to waste much time in looking up the record because I think everybody knows what happened. There was a proper examination; the proper man was appointed—that is, the man who easily headed the list, unless what I heard in that riding is absolutely wrong; unless the returned soldiers' organizations are absolutely misinformed. He was not given a chance to look at the department. That appointment was made in the ordinary way by the commission, but it did not suit politically in connection with the election. It was necessary to look after the son of the chairman who was running that riding, and the man who was appointed never had an opportunity of showing whether he could do the work or not. He was never taken into the service at all. There was no delay; there was no necessity for anything to be done in the way of finding out whether or not the man was any good. He was not politically right. He had no chance of making good. He was simply "canned" before he entered the service. I do not think my hon. friend will be able to find in the department much information that will show anything else. I know that was never denied in the riding and I happened to be there for a couple of days. I do not know whether my hon. friend thinks he can find something, but I can save him the trouble. Of course that is the sort of thing that is done every now and then—I am not blaming my hon. friend—by this government; it is their practice. They say that they cannot get along at all with Civil Service Commission appointments. When it does not suit them to take such appointments, they do not take them; they simply say: This man or that man will not do. They may quarrel with the colour of his eyes or the record of his grandfather or grandmother or something like that which has nothing whatever to do with the matter.

5 p.m.

Mr. JACOBS: They may quarrel with the colour of his politics.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is absolutely right. I accept, in the spirit in which it is offered, his suggestion which is absolutely correct.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not admit that.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): It would be an easy matter for the deputy to furnish the committee with this information at the next sitting.

Mr. BOIVIN: Certainly.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Why not say that that will be done, and the matter could be closed?

Mr. BOIVIN: I have already promised on two or three occasions that that will be done.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): But I listened to the minister and he gave those who inquired to understand that he would furnish them with the information before the items of his department were disposed of.

Mr. BOIVIN: I meant as soon as possible, but of course I expected we would have to hold over one item until to-morrow.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I congratulate my hon. friend on the progress he is making. We have received from him the first item which goes to make up this total, namely the item of salaries amounting to $5,753,815. Will the minister go on with the rest of the details?

Mr. BOIVIN: The rest of the details are contingencies.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much?

Mr. BOIVIN: The item is made up of salaries and contingent expenses. The contingent expenses are composed of the overtime paid to the men, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act. In addition to that there are the rentals.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is hardly a contingency.

Mr. BOIVIN: It is included in this vote as a contingency.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much for temporary buildings and how much for rentals?

Mr. BOIVIN: The contingent account for the first six months of 1924-25 is $484,658; based on that, for the entire year it will be about $969,000. For 1925-26 the contingent expenditure was $523,936, which proportionately for the entire fiscal year would be $1,048,000. The increase for the first six months of 1925-26 over 1924-25 is therefore $39,278.09, which appears to be normal, as it is accounted for by actual increases of $16,450 for overtime at Halifax, $4,000 for overtime at Windsor, Ontario, and $12,550 distributed over other ports throughout the Dominion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How much of that is in rentals and how much in temporary buildings?

Mr. BOIVIN: That unfortunately I do not happen to have at hand. Under the system of accounting in the department the amount is not divided. The items would have to be picked out and it would require a certain amount of calculation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can my hon. friend tell me what buildings he is now renting? Take Toronto, for instance.

Mr. BOIVIN: I think there is a little misunderstanding in the mind of my hon. friend concerning rentals. There are very few rentals. Most of the rentals are paid by the Public Works department. My hon. friend knows that the customs rentals for all the larger offices throughout the country, as well as the buildings occupied by the customs when they cost more than $5,000, are rented or erected by the Department of Public Works. It is only the little buildings at the outports costing less than $5,000 that are built by the Customs department; and it is only when the rental is proportionately small that it is paid by the customs at all. We have a few leases for small quarters, but all the large rentals are paid by the Public Works department. So I think I am quite within the mark when I say the rentals would be less than $40,000 a year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A discussion takes place every now and again, Mr. Chairman, the underlying idea being that we should have some definite information of the cost of civil government. For instance, the votes for salaries should be grouped. I think that is something that my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is of opinion ought to be done. It is something which his predecessor, Mr. Fielding, on one occasion at any rate, said ought to be done. But I observe that we still have the vote in the usual form. I quite agree that for purposes of comparison it is advisable not to depart from your system of bookkeeping, that it well may be necessary for comparative purposes to maintain figures set up in the same way that these are set up, but it would be a very excellent and a very proper thing to get our salaries collated so we would know what it is costing us to administer our civil service. Of course, just at present everybody is aware that there is no way of arriving at that information. We have lump votes here and lump votes there, and those votes not only are to be found in different places entirely uncorrelated one with the other, having regard to salaries and the like, but they also contain other items that on their face do not show the proportion covered. I wonder if my hon. friend has considered at all in connection with his department how much is entirely salaries, how much is entirely contingencies, how much is entirely rentals, and the like?

Mr. BOIVIN: I can give my hon. friend the exact amount of the salaries paid out of this vote.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should like to have that information.

Mr. BOIVIN: In every item I can give the exact amount of salaries. Where the trouble comes is in overtime, travelling expenses and small rentals, which are grouped together in a contingent account. If my hon. friend happens to have in his hand the Auditor General's report for last year he might look, for instance, at part D on page 53. There he will find the entire salaries and contingencies paid out of this same vote for that year. Of course my hon. friend knows that we try to keep the bookkeeping uniform as much as possible. He will find in the same item—salary paid to the sub-collector, bonus, office rent, postage, telephone rent and petty expenses totalling $1,746.01. Of course, each item is detailed, the exact amount is given, but it would be necessary to pick out the small rentals in order to give the total asked for by my hon. friend.

Mr. MORAND: Mr. Chairman, to come back to Windsor for a moment, I would like to ask the minister how many officers are employed at the port of Windsor, and the number of outports.

Mr. BOIVIN: The outports of Windsor are Belle River, Sandwich and Walkerville.

Mr. MORAND: Are there no sub-ports to those again?

Mr. BOIVIN: No. The total number of employees at the port and sub-ports is 123. The total salary paid to those employees this year is estimated at $206,125, an increase over 1923 of $7,530, or an average increase of about $60 per employee.

Mr. MORAND: Were seven new men employed there this year?

Mr. BOIVIN: At Windsor seven additional officers were required, some for use at the ferry and some—the number is not given—for sealing cars At the port of Windsor itself, if I remember correctly, there were two new appointments. I am told that of the seven referred to, four were employed sealing cars and three at the ferry.

Mr. MORAND: What cars were those?

Mr. BOIVIN: Cars going through Canada in bond over the Michigan Central have to be sealed. The salaries of those employed in fixing the seals are paid by the government, but we receive a refund from the railway company.

Mr. MORAND: Some of those officers are paid overtime, I believe. Is that overtime paid by the government or by the ferry concerns which require these men for overtime periods?

Mr. BOIVIN: There would be about $41,000 paid in overtime at Windsor—an increase of $8,000—and of that amount about $10,000 would be refunded by the railway companies.

Mr. MORAND: Could we have a list of the different companies who refund this overtime? I do not mean the amounts, but I would like to know the names of those who have employed these men overtime.

Mr. BOIVIN: The principal company would be the Michigan Central Railway, but there would also be the Pere Marquette, the Canadian National, the Canadian Pacific, and the ferry company when employees gave overtime service for their convenience.

Mr. MORAND: Do any of the export docks there pay for overtime service?

Mr. BOIVIN: No. There is no overtime paid to us by any of the export docks and there is no overtime paid to our employees on any of the export docks.

Mr. MORAND: By whom are they paid for overtime?

Mr. BOIVIN: Overtime is paid for services rendered before eight o'clock in the morning, after six o'clock at night, and on Sunday. Any services rendered by our officers outside of regular hours have not been charged to us, and therefore we have received no refund from the owners of the docks.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): How many employees has the department at Sarnia?

Mr. BOIVIN: Thirty-eight.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): And the total amount paid?

Mr. BOIVIN: The total amount paid to the 38 employees in 1925-26 was $54,540. We estimate that this year they will receive $60,285.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): And what is the amount of overtime at that port?

Mr. BOIVIN: The overtime paid at the port of Sarnia amounts to about $15,500.

[Mr. Boivin.]

Mr. RYERSON: Will the Minister of Customs tell me the number of employees of the Customs department at the port of Brantford, and whether there have been any additions to the staff during the year 1925, either through the Civil Service Commission or as preventive officers?

Mr. BOIVIN: At Brantford there are 22 employees. They were paid last year $39,390, and will receive this year statutory increases amounting to $450. A preventive officer was appointed at Brantford; he has nothing to do with the Civil Service Commission, and is not an officer of the port of Brantford.

Mr. RYERSON: What recommendations were made for the appointment of the preventive officer at Brantford? Was there a demand for his appointment from that locality?

Mr. BOIVIN: I think that information was given to my hon. friend yesterday in reply to a question. He will find it in yesterday's Hansard.

Mr. RYERSON: I did not ask that question before. This is the first time I have asked it.

Mr. BOIVIN: Does my hon. friend refer to the appointment of Mr. Cummerford?

Mr. RYERSON: That is the name.

Mr. BOIVIN: Mr. Cummerford is not assigned to duty at the port of Brantford only, but covers the district as well. He is a member of the special preventive force, reporting directly to Mr. Wilson, who is chief of the special preventive service staff here at Ottawa. I cannot say at the moment, whether the recommendation came from the inspector or the chief preventive officer or from some person in Brantford, but I shall be glad to get that information for my hon. friend.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I would like to inquire from the minister as to the number of employees there are on the Queenston-Lewiston bridge.

Mr. BOIVIN: At Niagara Falls there are 65 employees, and on the Queenston bridge there are four customs excise examiners.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): How many of them are employed on the bridge at night?

Mr. BOIVIN: I am afraid it would be very difficult to give my hon. friend that information without communicating with the collector in charge of the port.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): My reason for asking the question is this: When I was home during the last week I saw an article in the newspaper to the effect that during one evening, when there was only one man employed on the bridge, four trucks had passed over the bridge in the face of the officer and had got clean away without ever making any report to anybody at the port. I sent a copy of the newspaper clipping to the deputy minister to inform him of what was reported. It seems to me in view of what is happening throughout the country that it is a very serious thing that four loaded trucks should pass over a bridge in the face of an officer, make no report, and get clean away with four loads of smuggled goods.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend is quite right when he says that he sent a newspaper clipping and reported the incident to the deputy minister. The deputy minister informed me of the occurrence and told me he was having the matter investigated. I am very grateful to the hon. member for bringing it to our attention. I hope he will realize that it is not with my consent and approval that these things are being done. There are abuses throughout the country, but with a service of about five thousand men, they cannot all be perfect, and it is only by following up these cases when they are reported to us that we can weed out those who are not worthy of being in the service. My hon. friend can rest assured that the moment the guilty parties are found their services will be immediately dispensed with.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): My reason for speaking to the minister now is that I understand it is the common practice at that particular bridge to keep only one man there all night, and that is what I want to bring particularly to the minister's attention. If that is so, I want to say that the United States government never allow their end of the bridge to be without at least two men, one to protect the other. At our end of the bridge there is a barrier which is thrown down at night to prevent just such a thing happening. What happened in this particular case was this: A car comes in, the barrier is raised, and the man deliberately backs his car in and prevents the barrier from going down, and then four trucks immediately pass over. That is what actually happened, and it was probably due to the fact that we had only one man on duty there all night, doing two men's work.

Mr. BOIVIN: The matter has been brought to the attention of our district inspector and I can assure my hon. friend that hereafter, within two or three days, there will be more than one man continuously on duty at that bridge. I thank my hon. friend for having brought this matter to my attention.

Mr. SMITH: I understood the minister to say some time ago that an official had been appointed at Malagash during the past year. Malagash is in Cumberland county, not near Amherst as I think the minister stated. I should like to find out what this officer's duties are and his salary.

Mr. BOIVIN: When I said near Amherst, I meant it was a sub-port or preventive station under the port of Amherst. J. G. Train is the name of the employee. He was appointed on September 9, 1924, and has the rank of customs excise enforcement officer. He is 43 years of age, and gets the enormous salary of $200 a year.

Mr. MORAND: Has there been a new appointment made at Tilbury, or has the old appointment been renewed? What port does that come under?

Mr. BOIVIN: Does my hon. friend refer to the position occupied by W. A. Hutton?

Mr. MORAND: Yes.

Mr. BOIVIN: His services terminated on December 2, 1925. The vacancy has been reported to the Civil Service Commission, and I understand is now being advertised, but no appointment has yet been made.

Mr. MORAND: Who is acting there at present?

Mr. BOIVIN: One of the relieving officers appointed for such work in the district pending the appointment of a permanent official.

Mr. MORAND: Who were the actual relieving officers appointed in the port of Chatham, since that time or just prior to that time?

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not think there were any, I am under the impression that Mr. Mackenzie from the port of London is at present relieving officer at Tilbury.

Mr. MORAND: Would the minister give me the definite information to-morrow, if he can?

Mr. BOIVIN: I certainly will.

Mr. MORAND: Because I am under the impression that an appointment has been made since that time, although I may be wrong.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend will have the information to-morrow.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Under this one item of salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports of the Dominion, temporary buildings, and so on, there has been an increase in two years of $924,253.41. Has there been a corresponding increase in the revenue of the department of Customs and excise that would justify an increase in salaries, leaving out altogether the preventive service, of approximately $1,000,000?

Mr. BOIVIN: I shall include the preventive service in the figures I am about to give to my hon. friend. They will show complete revenue and expenditure for the past four years:

1921-22
Revenue..	$233,359,133 30
Expenditure..	7,523,575 48
Cost of collection per cent..	3.22
1922-23
Revenue..	$279,229,466 71
Expenditure..	7,202,106 37
Cost of collection per cent..	2.58
1923-24
Revenue..	$298,721,419 55
Expenditure..	7,435,931 59
Cost of collection per cent..	2.49
1924-25
Revenue..	$249,786,807 83
Expenditure..	7,698,175 79
Cost of collection per cent..	3.08
1925-26 (9 months)
Revenue..	$268,518,930 23
Expenditure..	7,300,008 62
Cost of collection per cent..	2.71

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the figures my hon. friend has been giving are inclusive figures.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, I gave the customs and excise figures up to 1925 and then for the nine months of 1925-26 the figures are for customs, excise and income tax.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The figures would have more interest if they would just show what the customs revenue is when we are considering these customs expenses.

Mr. BOIVIN: These are not only customs expenses but excise expenses as well.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is true.

Mr. BOIVIN: The salaries of the excise officers throughout the country are paid out of this vote.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This covers sales tax just the same, but there have been such changes made in the sales tax that it is pretty hard to make any comparison.

[Mr. Morand.]

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I should like to inquire from the minister if it has not been the custom to figure customs by itself in the blue books ever since 1867, when they began to keep a record—

Mr. BOIVIN: Certainly.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): —of the cost of customs collection alone. What has been the cost of collection of customs for the last three or four years?

Mr. BOIVIN: We can give to my hon. friend the exact customs revenue. We can give him also the exact excise revenue and the exact sales tax revenue. It is impossible to give him the exact cost of collecting each of these revenues because the figures showing the cost of collection are grouped together. If my hon. friend will secure a copy of the annual report of the Department of Customs and Excise, which I laid on the table a few days ago, he will find the information.

Mr. GEARY: I do not like to have the minister jumping from one subject to another, but may I go back a moment to the question I was asking a short time ago. I understood the minister to state that in connection with these salary items there would be a refund of probably a million and a half.

Mr. BOIVIN: I corrected that. I said that applied to the salaries paid out of the different votes in the Dominion, not out of this particular item. I think I said that the last refund of salaries provided by this particular vote was $400,000 in round figures, or less than half a million. That is the amount indicated as the refund for the last fiscal year. I am sure that I said that the total refunds on money expended for salaries amounts to about a million and a half.

Mr. GEARY: As I look through the Auditor General's report, I find that the revenue in the Customs and Excise department is 292 million odd. That will be found in volume 2, part D. But I see no item there that would include refunds. I see the items, "customs duties", "excise duties", "excise taxes", "income tax", "business profits tax", "casual revenue",—$400,000—and "fines and forfeitures." There is no place there for such an amount in the preceding year. I wonder how it got back into revenue.

Mr. BOIVIN: If my hon. friend will look at part D, page 8—

Mr. GEARY: That is what I have.

Mr. BOIVIN: —he will find the casual revenue received by the department. The total casual revenue on page 8 would be $400,924.59.

Mr. GEARY: Yes, that is it.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am told by my deputy minister that that is the amount reimbursed to us by the railway companies.

Mr. GEARY: I understand that, but the point I am making is that it is too small an amount, in view of the hon. minister's statements as to a million and a half this year, or when reduced, as he later states, to $769,000, whereas last year it was only $400,000 altogether.

Mr. BOIVIN: There is certainly some other item or account under which refunds of salaries and other amounts paid back to the department are accounted for. I shall get the information and give it to my hon. friend tomorrow if possible.

Mr. GEARY: And the minister will be good enough to indicate the amount for the year 1924-25.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If the matter is just left in the way my hon. friend puts it, it appears to me that perhaps fairness is not being done to his department. This is looked upon as a matter of revenue purely and simply. It is something that is not taken into consideration when arriving at the figures showing the cost of collection. I admit it is merely a summary and he can only give a rough estimate, but if he is right in his idea that there is perhaps a million and a half of salaries altogether repaid to his department, and if that merely comes in as revenue instead of as reduction of the cost of running the department, it is manifest that the department is not getting credit for nearly the service given to the country and the ratio of cost. I should think the subject would be well worth looking into.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend is perfectly right. I am informed that in previous years the department was authorized to credit to its expenses the refunds made to it for salaries. The vote that was formerly asked for was in reality the net amount of the vote actually expended by the department for the collection of revenue. Under instructions from the Auditor General the new system has been adopted. Now every dollar expended must be voted by parliament, and the refunds made must be credited to revenue.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The auditor may be right for the purpose of bookkeeping in connection with the matter of salaries themselves, but if it is done in the department that way, as a matter of fairness to the officers of the department I should have thought the items coming in would have been applied in connection with salary lists, and that the general public would not have been given credit for those items as they are when it comes in as casual revenue. That may have something to do with the matter. It may be my hon. friend's accounts this year have been unusually swollen by reason of that fact. I was looking back at the vote of 1921-22, when we were told we were horribly extravagant in connection with the administration of this department.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend says "hear, hear." I am afraid he must of necessity vote against this item, because we were told we were extravagant in connection with this very vote of salaries and contingent expenses in the different ports of the Dominion, and the vote then was $1,234,000 less than the public are asked to pay this year. It may well be that the new ruling of the Auditor General accounts for something of that.

Mr. BOIVIN: It accounts for about $20,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would have thought my hon. friend has rather in his opening taken away from himself that defence, because he pointed out that the increases—

Mr. BOIVIN: For last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: —for last year were very small, but perhaps it might have come in the year before, when there was about half a million of an increase. It may be that that was when the direction of the Auditor General was putting the department in an unfortunate position. It is the sort of thing we should know about at once, because on the face of it, it now looks as if the public were being asked to pay for the same services much more money than they ought to pay, particularly when the government are so fond of telling us that they are reducing the cost of living, the cost of the public services and the like, so that the dollar to them is worth far more than it was in 1921. If I were to adopt just what these hon. gentlemen say themselves, their extravagance on the face of it is perfectly appalling in connection with this item, because not only is the vote swollen by $1,234,000, but the dollar is worth so much more. My hon. friend will remember that when we started discussing this item he was able to show economy because older men had been retired and new men had been appointed. My hon. friend shakes his head. I think he will find that is what he pointed out. I think he will find that he stated in connection with these additions to the staff that forty-eight men were appointed at a cost of $59,210 and that by reason of retirements and the like there was economy in other directions, the net increase being thereby reduced. If I am wrong in that I want to be put right at once, but that is my recollection of what he said.

Mr. BOIVIN: I will correct my hon. friend. I said that the net additions to the staff accounted for an increase of $59,210. Decrease due to promotions, appointments and retirements filled by lower paid men, amounted to $57,330. There was also a statutory increase of $169,530.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

THE INTERPROVINCIAL AND JAMES BAY RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. GEORGES PARENT (Quebec West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 5, respecting the Interprovincial and James Bay Railway Company.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the hon. gentleman kindly explain the bill?

Mr. PARENT: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentlemen would probably get the best explanation by reading the bill, which speaks for itself.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is it?

Mr. PARENT: I believe if the bill is referred to the committee on Railways and Canals full information could be given to the satisfaction of hon. members. The bill only asks for an extension of time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the explanation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Mr. GEARY: Mr. Chairman, before recess the Minister of Customs and Excise was good enough to intimate that he would supply particulars of the amount which will be refunded to the department in respect to Sunday work and so on performed by his officials for the accommodation of certain companies. He suggested at first that the amount would be probably a million and a half, but subsequently he made it $700,000 odd. However, I did not understand him to say that he could furnish particulars; I should judge that the amount must be at best an estimate. I call his attention to the fact that the same item apparently occurred in 1924-25, and that the only amount in the Auditor General's statement of revenue that would appear to cover such transactions is an item of $400,000 under casual revenue. The minister is to get those figures to show how the estimate for the present year is made up.

I call my hon. friend's attention to the first page of the Auditor General's report where reference is made to the custom that has existed for some time of the retention of certain moneys by the department to pay drawbacks, and so on, from revenue. The amount of such moneys in 1924-25 was $22,500,000—I am giving round figures. The Auditor General says that the general summary of revenue does not include this item of $22,500,000——which, though included in the revenue deposits to the credit of the Receiver General in the first instance, was subsequently refunded as drawbacks of Customs, Excise refunds and similar items chargeable to revenue.

The minister states that no refunds of wages are included in that $22,500,000. The Auditor General says this retention is——in accordance with a long standing custom. This custom has been brought to the attention of the House of Commons in previous reports.

May I ask the hon. minister whether he has considered it a desirable state of affairs that $22,500,000 should be received and credited to the Receiver General and disbursed by the Department of Customs and Excise, but not through the ordinary course of vouchers, checked and approved by the Auditor General? It just occurs to one that when there is a sum of $22,000,000 odd available by the department to pay drawbacks and refunds, it would be well that that sum should pass through the ordinary system of accounting by the Auditor General. I do not suggest anything wrong at the moment, but it does provide a fruitful field for favouritism and that sort of thing in the refunding of moneys, unless we have a close check and a properly audited voucher system for that amount.

Then I draw my hon. friend's attention to the fact that the figures he gave me for 1924 and 1925, receipts $249,000,000, disbursements $7,700,000—again I am using round figures—which show the percentage of cost to revenue as 3.08 per cent, cannot be made up by a reference to the Auditor General's summary on page 30, part D, volume II of his report. I judge that in that amount one will find $22,000,000, the sum which I have referred to just now. If that is so, I would point out that $22,000,000 should not be credited to revenue there because it is to be paid out again, and if it is taken off the figures which my hon. friend has given, his percentage of cost to revenue suffers a slight increase. If I am right in my contention that result follows. The point of my remarks is simply that my hon. friend may be doing himself an injustice in charging as salary an amount which includes payments which are to be returned. On the other hand I should like again to draw his attention to the point raised by the Auditor General, referring to the custom of disbursing $22,000,000 otherwise than through the ordinary channel. My last point is the combination of the previous two, in the statement showing the percentage which he gave me. I hope I have made myself clear.

Mr. BOIVIN: The hon. member has made himself quite clear. The first knowledge I had of this contention on the part of the Auditor General was when I saw the report to which my hon. friend has referred. The matter will be taken up with the Auditor General and discussed with him. I think it will be a very difficult matter to have the Auditor General initial and approve all the vouchers for cheques for refunds. We have a drawback staff which has to go to the factories of the different firms claiming drawbacks, and it is only there that the actual amount of merchandise imported from other countries and used for export can be determined. All the payments are made from the department here after the drawback claims have been received and checked over by our officials. Whether or not it would be feasible to have a further check by the Auditor General, and whether or not it could be done rapidly enough to not interfere with trade and commerce is a matter that I will not say is under consideration but that I will take under consideration at once. I think he is quite right about the disparity between the net revenue shown in the Auditor General's report and the gross revenue given by me to the committee this afternoon. The gross revenue of $249,786,807.83 shows the percentage of cost of collection to be 3.08. That is not the percentage of cost of collection to net revenue, but those figures show the actual cost of collection of the revenue. I realize that my hon. friend is perhaps more correct than I am if it is desired to show the exact cost of collection of net revenue.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before passing this item I would like to draw my hon. friend's attention to one matter which we have not yet covered, in connection with the retirements, the amount of pensions which we are paying to men who have been retired, the amount of bonuses and the like. That, in one sense, no longer appears as a cost in connection with this department, but it nevertheless is a cost in connection with the staff of the department. I would like to ask my hon. friend about that now.

Mr. BOIVIN: I could get a list showing the retirements, if that is what my hon. friend desires. I want to thank my hon. friend for the point he made in my favour just before adjournment. I agree with him and I thank him for his remark that it is perhaps a little unfair under the system now employed by the Auditor General to make us show as expense moneys paid out in salaries which are eventually refunded to us by other parties.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly there is some change to be made in one direction or the other. Surely the logical thing is to show that not as actual revenue but as something which is going to decrease the cost of the department.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kings): Mr. Chairman, before the item carries I would like to refer again to the question of preventive officers, which was discussed to some extent this afternoon. I might say that around the coast of Prince Edward Island the preventive officers would have to be very numerous to be of any value. I suggest to the minister that a better way, indeed the only way to get results with a coastline such as that of Prince Edward Island, would be to prevent the stuff from leaving the ships. The vessels lie a few miles off the coast, which contains innumerable bays and creeks and rivers and inlets, and in order to prevent material being landed you would have to have preventive officers everywhere. The practice has been, as I understand it, to look after it to some extent by one patrol boat, but it is utterly impossible for one small boat to look after such a coastline. The result is that the traffic is in and out all the time, with perhaps three or four or five vessels close to the coast all summer. It has created a very bad condition there; liquor is very cheap at the vessel, and four or five fellows put up a few dollars each, send out a motor boat and get a case of liquor. That sort of traffic is very heavy, and we have as well the bootleg traffic. Taking all things into consideration I do not see how the Customs department can have any success whatever in stopping the landing of that liquor unless further patrol boats are put on. I do not think enough preventive officers can be put around the coast to prevent it from coming in, and I would like to suggest to the minister that one patrol boat is certainly not sufficient.

Mr. BOIVIN: At the present time we have in Prince Edward Island two boats, the Margaret and the Buzz. Two boats are not sufficient. It is impossible to place a preventive officer on every creek and inlet on the shores of that island. It is our intention to provide protection there by more patrol boats. I will not say they will be purchased; it may be that they will be leased, if good boats can be found for the purpose of trying out the system, without entailing too large a capital expenditure.

Mr. MANION: In regard to offices rented in the customs building in various places, are rentals allowed by the Public Works department, for example, to the Customs department for the use of these offices?

Mr. BOIVIN: There is no charge made by the Public Works department to the Customs department for these offices.

Mr. MANION: The buildings are in charge of the Public Works department? It is the other way?

Mr. BOIVIN: There is no charge either way.

Item agreed to.

Salaries and travelling expenses of inspectors of ports and of other officers on inspection, preventive service, and in connection with the Board of Customs; the latter including salaries of $1,500 for the chairman, $1,000 each for three members and $500 for the secretary, $854,065.

Mr. MANION: Why the increase in this item?

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend will notice the increase is very small as compared with the increase in the previous item. This increase is due entirely to what is known under the Civil Service Act as the statutory increases. I can give the exact number of officers promoted, if my hon. friend insists.

Mr. MANION: No, but I find myself wondering sometimes why it is that year after year ever since I have been here, and I have been here nearly ten years now, we get the same story to explain these increases—statutory increases. Do the statutory increases go on indefinitely? That is what puzzles me at times. Suppose we should last another hundred years; will these keep on increasing year after year?

[Mr. Macdonald (Kings).]

Mr. PARENT: I hope the Civil Service Commission will be dead by that time.

Mr. MANION: I hope this government at least may be dead by that time, because I rather think that a lot of these increases are due to this government, and not to the Civil Service Commission at all. It is simply a case of passing the buck to the commission, I am afraid. Would the minister explain whether these statutory increases are going on for all eternity?

Mr. BOIVIN: I will do my very best. I will say at once that I had been just as much puzzled as my hon. friend ever since I came here until the matter was explained to me the other day. I do not know whether I shall be able to make myself clear to my hon. friend because the man who explained it did not make himself quite clear to me. I am told that on a certain date every employee blanketed into departments by the Civil Service Act and all employees employed after that date, go into the service at a certain minimum salary. That salary is gradually increased over a period of years and finally reaches the maximum salary. Like my hon. friend, I believed that some day we would reach the happy time when, with those at the top retiring from the service and being replaced by others starting at the minimum figure, we could administer the service without further increase. We could arrive at that point and the service would adjust itself in that way, however, only upon two conditions. The number of employees must not be increased, and the salary scale must not be changed. The reason why "statutory increases" is invoked every year to explain increased estimates is that requests are constantly made to the Civil Service Commission for re-classification and increases in minimum and maximum salaries. I know I have not been clear, but I have done the best I could.

Mr. MANION: I presume the minister has explained it as well as he knows how, but I think I know as much now as I did when he got up; I confess I do not know very much about it now. It is a very difficult thing to explain. If it were not for the fact that I would be afraid of being misunderstood in this city of civil servants, I would be inclined to ask if none of them die, but being in this city I would not ask that, because some of the press might say I was wishing for some of them to die off. It does seem strange, however, that in every department every session there are these same salary increases, and the same explanation.

Perhaps it will come in handy next year, when we are in power, to offer the same explanation, but I confess I find the explanation rather difficult to believe at times.

Mr. BOIVIN: I want to assure my hon. friend that the civil servants who are dead will not blame him for his remarks—

Mr. MANION: I am not afraid of them.

Mr. BOIVIN: Let me also say that when his party does come into power in the far and distant future, there will be statutory increases in the estimates to explain.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Do they think they ever will get into power?

Mr. MANION: Not with the help of my hon. friend.

Mr. BOIVIN: Perhaps they will, when the civil servants are all dead.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government is so close there now that the minister has the vision splendid. I want to make a comment on one or two interruptions as well as on the words of the minister. In the first place, the practice of attributing everything to the Civil Service Commission—

Mr. BOIVIN: We are not doing that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was not the minister, but the hon. gentleman to his right. I expected the minister to rebuke him, but he remained strangely silent. The Civil Service Commission has as much to do with these statutory increases as they have to do with the sun spots—just as much.

Mr. BOIVIN: Except that they make the classifications.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is the law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is the law, certainly, but the law is not what the minister explained. The law does not compel the government to give any increases whatever. The law simply places within the discretion of the government certain limited increases which they may apply or not apply, and the intention of the law was that the government would apply them as a reward for assiduous service to the public in the capacity in which the civil servant might be. Consequently, the application of these increases is entirely within the discretion of the administration, and they are responsible for each and every one applied. The power is theirs, but I am afraid the increases have become more or less automatic, and I do not know how it is ever going to be anything else if the practice of this government is followed. They have taken a certain group of civil servants and have increased their salaries by a very large percentage. They first of all adopted one limitation, and when that did not suit them, they put the increase upon another basis, and then when both failed to meet all the cases they wanted to cover, they abandoned all limitations and gave increases to everybody. Having pursued that course, I do not see how the government is in a position to deny almost anything to the civil servants underneath. Consequently, the automatic principle applies, and away goes the statutory increase every time; all limitation is abandoned. But there is no mystery about it all. Nor is there very much hope in the words of the minister when he says that the time may come some time when those who go out at the far door, the large-salaried men, will be so numerous that the amount saved in that way will offset the statutory increases, and that we will thus get to a point where the expenditure for salaries will be stationary. There were just as many old men when this law was enacted as there are to-day. There were just as many men fit to be retired the first day this law went into effect as would be retirable next year, or ten years from next year. Consequently there is no hope that the increased retirements later on will have any more effect in offsetting the statutory increases than those retirements have to-day. The only way it could be offset would be either to abolish the power or to restrict the application of the power by some system of discrimination. I do not really see that it is much good to give statutory increases while they are automatic. If they are to apply to everybody why, of course, they are no incentive to service at all. If everybody is to get them, then service does not make them any more helpful to the man who works than if he did not work at all. He might as well be talking to the girls around the corner as working if he is going to get his statutory increase just the same. What I want to impress on the minister is this: he must take the responsibility for the statutory increases himself; he cannot shift it upon the statute, much less can he shift it upon the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. ROBB: I agree with much my right hon. friend has said, but surely he will not blame this government for the statutory obligations that we found when we came into office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are not obligations.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, they are obligations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, no, they are not.

Mr. ROBB: Just prior to the last general election there were a number blanketed into the service and given a standing, or a grade or salary, by the Civil Service Commission. They might start at $700 and would run up year after year until they came to a thousand. We had these obligations upon us.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, you did not. The obligation is not there. It is only a power in the government to grant an increase but there is no obligation to apply the power.

Mr. ROBB: They are put into a class and they get the increase automatically until they reach the maximum of that class.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister read the statute?

Mr. HANSON: Has there been a reclassification of the civil service every year? The minister rather pointed to that fact, but is there such a reclassification? In the short experience I have had here I have heard of the efforts made by civil servants to get themselves reclassified. They are naturally ambitious to get into a higher classification, and I have no doubt that constant effort is being made by various civil servants to attain that end. Now, has it become the practice under this government to have a reclassification every year, and does that account for the increase?

Mr. BOIVIN: No. There has been no general classification since the government came into power, but there are partial reclassifications every year. The most frequent reclassification is a reclassification increasing the minimum and maximum salary of a certain class of employees.

Mr. HANSON: That has not had much effect in raising this item?

Mr. BOIVIN: No, and I agree with what my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition has said concerning the right of the government to refuse to give the statutory increase to the employees.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. BOIVIN: The government is empowered to do that, but the government led by my right hon. friend did not refuse to do it. I am very sure my right hon. friend did not say he would refuse to do it when he spoke at the Auditorium on the eve of the last election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not refer to the subject at the Auditorium, save to correct just a few foolish rumours circulated by the friends of the minister. But I am aware, distinctly aware, that in cases we did refuse the statutory increase, and that I did myself, so that the minister will have another apology coming in addition to that of this afternoon

Mr. BOIVIN: In my department, when the inspector makes a report that an officer's conduct is only fair, no statutory increase is given to him, but where his conduct and efficiency is better than fair he is given his statutory increase.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps my hon. friend, since we are getting into this kind of experience—trying to find out what the other fellow did, and matters of that kind—would turn his attention to another direction and explain why it is, if things were done so loosely under the former administration, with no refusals to increase here, there, and everywhere, he has got to ask for $232,000 more for his department than was asked under the former administration? That would be very much to the point if he would do it.

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not accuse the last government of such terrible looseness, I said that the last government—and I am not blaming them for it—gave the statutory increases to all employees who were worthy of them. We have been doing the same thing. But my right hon. friend is certainly not referring to the proper item, because the total increase in this item is only $40,816.

Mr. MANION: That is since last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am taking my hon. friend back to the time when, as he says, the former administration did not stop increases. I am going back to the year 1921-22.

Mr. BOIVIN: That is too far.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: To 1921-22, four years ago, is that too far? It is the last year to which we can go.

Mr. BOIVIN: That is not too far but my hon. friend will admit that at that time the bonuses paid to the civil servants were voted separately and did not form part of the item that the hon. member brings into comparison with this vote.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There was a bonus, there is no question about that; but the bonus falls very far short of making up this increase, which roughly speaking, is something like 40 per cent in this vote. Now as to the vote asked by the Conservative administration, I am taking the year I have mentioned, but I could go farther back and get a lower amount; I could go back to 1921, which was our last complete year. But I am not doing that; I am taking a year in which this government had to do with three months of the preparation of the costs, a year in which they submitted estimates which they claimed were our estimates. I can make the position much worse if I take 1921, but I do not do that; I am minimizing the situation as much as I can, and I find that under this vote all that was asked in 1921-22 was $621,380, whereas to-day we are asked to pay $854,055. There is an increase of $232,675 on an item of $600,000 odd. Perhaps it would be much better if my hon. friend, instead of going into ancient history, would explain why it is we have an increase of that kind in the period of four years.

Mr. BOIVIN: I want to assure my hon. friend that I do not want to go into ancient history; I would be perfectly satisfied to explain the increase for the present year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend cannot take it coming and going, just when it suits him to take it. I am quite sure he would be quite content to take all the estimates without any explanation at all.

Mr. BOIVIN: Oh, no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would not blame him in the slightest for being so content. But, Mr. Chairman, here we have an increase during the lifetime of this government—I have not figured it out, but it must be 40 per cent—in a mere matter of administration and that applies to a government which is making all kinds of extravagant claims to economy. Now the best way to test this claim is to test it right in connection with this particular vote we have before us. What excuse is there for this "government of economy" increasing that vote 40 per cent? It is not a matter of ancient history, but I am trying to see where we are going to wind up. Has my hon. friend reconstituted his board of customs?

Mr. BOIVIN: No we still have the same board.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are there any new jobs in the board of customs?

Mr. BOIVIN: Messrs. Farrow, Blair, Breadner, Taylor and Wilson are still the members of the board.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If there is no increase in the number, why is the vote changed? Why is the $1,500 put in?

Mr. BOIVIN: There is $1,500 which is paid to the chairman of the board. If my right hon. friend will refer a few years back he will find this same vote in the estimates of previous years. It was taken out when the salaries of the deputy ministers was raised to $8,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister show where it ever was in?

Mr. BOIVIN: It was in before. I have not the estimates for former years at hand.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I cannot see it.

Mr. BOIVIN: When the deputy minister was receiving a salary of $6,000 he was given an allowance of $1,500, as chairman of the board of customs. When the salary was raised to $8,000 that $1,500 was withheld, but the allowance made to the other members of the board was still paid. Mr. Breadner does not receive any salary as a member of the board of customs but his salary is $10,000. The other members of the board of customs receive $1,000 allowance as members of the board and the chairman receives $1,500.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So that he gets $9,500?

Mr. BOIVIN: He will get that amount if this item is passed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought it was an increase, and ventured to say so, but the minister's first words intimated that it was the same as it always was.

Mr. BOIVIN: I did not mean to do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is an increase of $1,500—from $8,000 to $9,500. Last year this item was out. I have the estimates of previous years before me, but not the whole of them, I have last year's estimates and I do not see such figures at all. The item reads:

Salaries and travelling expenses of inspectors of ports and of other officers on inspection, preventive service, and in connection with the board of customs.

The details are not given, but at any rate this is an increase over last year of $1,500 for one official. It all indicates the process by which the quarter million was arrived at in the three years.

Mr. MANION: Do I understand the chairman of the board of customs receives $9,500?

Mr. BOIVIN: The deputy minister of the department is at the same time chairman of the board of customs. If my hon. friend will look at the salaries paid the deputy ministers of the different departments he will find several of them receive a salary of $10,000 a year. Some receive $8,000 and some $6,000, depending upon their years of service. The number of years of service of the present deputy minister should qualify him for the higher amount. The commissioner of taxation, the deputy minister of finance, and the deputy minister of justice are receiving $10,000 or more. Having seen my deputy at work and appreciating his devotion and ability, I thought it only fair to give him the same salary or very nearly the same salary as the other deputies were receiving.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was going to ask about how long the minister expected that it would take to get all of the others up to this amount?

Mr. BOIVIN: Some of them are above that now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know, the process is on.

Mr. BOIVIN: No, the process will depend on the years of service, and perhaps some of those there now, under the system referred to by my right hon. friend, will have retired before the others advance. We hope some day under this regime, and perhaps later on under the regime of my right hon. friend, that we will reach that point where there will never be any more statutory increases, where every public servant will be perfectly satisfied with his position, where everybody will be completely remunerated, and everybody will be perfectly happy.

Mr. MANION: It would be the last thought in my mind to say a word against my hon. friend the deputy minister of customs, for whom I have the utmost respect. I have had dealings with him in an official way, and have every respect for him; this is not a personal reference to him. But I do say that a salary of $8,000 a year for a deputy minister, unless for some special cause, would appear to me, where it is a life job, as a deputy minister's job is, to be a pretty fair salary. Lawyers, doctors or other professional men--and most of them, with the rare exceptions of the very outstanding men in the profession, have at least as great a training as a deputy minister would have—would be quite satisfied with a life annuity of $8,000 a year. I notice that whenever there are any positions open, even if the salaries are about $4,000 a year many lawyers, doctors and other professional and business men are quite ready to apply for them. I do not believe in being niggardly in regard to salaries paid to public officials. I believe we should pay men from whom we get good work a reasonable salary. At the same time I repeat that $8,000 a year, generally speaking, without some special cause, should be a pretty reasonable salary for a life position for a deputy minister, and I am of the opinion that it is about time for this parliament to put down its foot and say that such and such a figure, whatever we consider is fair, should be the figure above which deputy ministers will not go. The matter is well worth consideration, because, with all due respect to the gentleman who occupies the position, and again pointing out that I am not saying or implying anything against him, because I have the utmost friendship for him, I believe that $9,500 a year for a life position with regular holidays is a fairly heavy salary for this government to pay, considering the heavy burden of taxation from which it is suffering.

Mr. BOIVIN: In the first place there is a great difference between an annuity and the earning of a salary as it is earned by the gentleman who occupies the position of deputy minister in the heavy Department of Customs and Excise. Statutory holidays are unknown to him. He works every night and every legal holiday, and his vacations are few and far between. He is obliged to do this to keep up with his work but he does it willingly and apparently with pleasure. It is because I have seen him at work that I placed the amount in the estimates for him. I thought he was entitled to this increase. I agree entirely with what my hon. friend has said concerning the size of the salaries paid to the civil servants. It may be that some of them are receiving too much. That does not apply to the deputy minister of my department. This increase is due him; I do not see why it should not be made. He has, I forget how many years of service, but he has been in the department almost since the year I was born. He has been and is an effcient and faithful servant. I am only doing justice in making his salary almost equal to those of several other deputy ministers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The real trouble in connection with salaries of deputies is not what my hon. friend is talking about at all; it is the manner in which this government have handled the question. They did not approach the question from the point of view of work, merit or the like.

Mr. BOIVIN: I did.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am speaking about why we find ourselves with a general run of deputy ministers' salaries raised from $6,000 to $8,000 and $10,000. It is not so very long ago when they were lower even than the figures I have given. The policy was introduced into the House by the then Minister of Finance, the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, that just so soon as a deputy had been so many years in service, irrespective of his office, irrespective of the amount of work, irrespective of his attainments, irrespective of anything except length of service, he was to be put into the higher register, and he was so put. The position I then took is very much the position my hon. friend takes to-day. I then pointed out that Mr. Farrow under that rule was being passed over altogether, not because he was not doing the work—he was doing far more than most of the rest—not because he was not worth the money—he was worth far more than most of the rest—but simply because he had not happened to hold that particular position for a certain length of time. As a matter of fact he was discriminated against. Anything I am saying now has nothing to do with the immediate vote to the deputy of this department, who certainly deserves just as much credit as the deputy of any other department, but it has to do with the general scale of increases put in for the reasons they were put in. The reason was a false one; it was entirely an error and it is costing the country a great deal of money.

Mr. BOIVIN: That is why I did not make the increase that way.

Mr. NICHOLSON: This discussion has revealed very clearly a situation with which parliament will have to deal sooner or later, namely that because the salary of a deputy in some other department has been raised, the salary of this deputy must be raised. Prior to that, in connection with the general increase of 40 per cent that has taken place, as the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) has pointed out, we get the statement that the government is simply impotent in the hands of the Civil Service Commission or is surrounded by conditions with which it cannot cope, and consequently these increases go automatically into effect. The question the taxpayers are going to ask is: What are we here for? Do they send members to the House of Commons and do they have a government in office merely to act as a group of automatons to register decisions that someone else makes? Are the people who are paying 25 per cent of their gross revenue in taxes to be told from year to year as these increases continue to go into effect that the government and parliament are helpless; that there is no means by which we can check these continually advancing outlays; that the government is faced with a debt that is burdening the people to a point where business, industry and everything else are being strangled, and yet the government and parliament seem to be utterly helpless? The government say: We can do nothing; it is true we have increased this one item by over $200,000 in four years, but this is solely because of a condition with which we cannot cope. Where can we get a minister, who will say: I will manage my department as a business institution and bring the cost of it down to where it should be as a business institution? That is what the country is expecting this government and this parliament to do now. The people expect at least some effort to be made to bring down the total cost of government in this country, and we are not going to do that by the process that has been outlined this afternoon and evening—by simply saying: Somebody else did it, and I am following suit.

9 p.m.

Mr. BOIVIN: If it is possible to do that in any department, it will be done in mine. The cost of administering the department will be reduced, but it will be reduced by doing away with unnecessary employees. I shall never stand for a policy which will not give a fair and living wage to the man who earns it in either the Department of Customs or any other department. I will be frank with the committee. If there is anything I dread it is a dismissal. Nothing is more difficult for a minister to do than to say to an employee of a department: You must go; there is no more work for you here. In my department at the present time there are several vacancies for which money is being voted to-night, and I give the committee my promise that if I remain in the department most of those vacancies will not be filled, and the money voted this year in connection with them will, I hope, remain in the public treasury.

Mr. MANION: Why not leave it out of the estimates, and if another government comes in let them worry about getting it in again?

Mr. BOIVIN: I am not making any provision for any government of which my hon. friend might be a member because these estimates will certainly not apply. I made no change because I am a new minister in the department and some of my ideas and desires concerning economy may be altered before I get through the year. I am leaving the estimates for the different positions that are vacant and I am asking for an increase in the preventive service vote. I want to follow the direction given me by the House when the Customs Inquiry committee has made its report. I do not say that I can do so in every respect; but I shall do the best I can to follow the will of the House, to economize and to keep down expenses in the department. I have a department in which it is very difficult to keep down expenses. Every dollar voted for my department is for contingent expenses or salaries. There are no contracts to be given, no rentals to be paid. It is not a spending department but a great collecting department, and if members of parliament desire to have the revenues properly collected they must provide the staff and means whereby those revenues may be collected.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I did not suggest that any man should work for less than a living wage or salary.

Mr. BOIVIN: If the hon. member will allow me to interrupt him. I do not think I said that, but possibly the tone of my voice —which will not appear in Hansard—might convey the impression that that is what I meant. I do not wish to reflect upon my hon. friend from East Algoma in the least, I know that he did not intend to make such a suggestion, and if my remarks were worded in a way to convey that impression, I hasten to withdraw them.

Mr. NICHOLSON: My point is simply this, Mr. Chairman. The whole discussion with regard to this and the previous item simply implies that the ministers are confronted with a condition that they cannot cope with—these increases must automatically go on. Now, my hon. friend has given evidence at least of a willingness to economize; he says there are a number of positions in his department that he is not going to fill. This is a splendid place to start to economize, and if the minister as a further earnest of his intention will simply say to the committee now how much of this item he desires to have dropped, I have not the slightest doubt in the world that the committee will accept his proposal. That is the point. The taxpayers expect us to find some means of cutting down the national expenditure.

Mr. MORAND: What proportion of this $854,065 is salary and what proportion is travelling expenses and contingencies?

Mr. BOIVIN: The salaries of the inspection staff of 120 officers represent $324,435, and the board of customs staff of 97 employees working here in Ottawa account for $291,765. The balance is made up of travelling expenses, contingencies and salaries of the members of the board of customs.

[Mr. Boivin.]

Mr. MORAND: What part of the $40,000 increase is for salaries and what part is for contingencies?

Mr. BOIVIN: The statutory increases represent $9,120. Additions to the staff, including the amount referred to by the right hon. leader of the opposition a moment or two ago for the chairman of the Treasury Board, represent $22,080. The decrease of $3,390 is due to promotions and appointments where vacancies are filled by lower paid employees. So that the additions to the staff cost $18,690, and the statutory increases, $9,120.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder how my hon. friend really thinks we can justify passing this vote. Usually estimates are not put through because somebody may want them, possibly at some future date; they are voted because they are needed. Estimates are also passed because the accredited minister states on his responsibility that he wants the vote. My hon. friend to-night on his responsibility as a minister has stated that there are many cases where he hopes the money will never be used at all. That is, in the judgment of the responsible minister of this department the committee is asked to vote money which, he says, ought not to be voted. Of course, I can quite understand certain government supporters being prepared to vote for anything, but I wonder what their allies who have been saying so much about economy think of their vote for an estimate in face of a declaration by the responsible minister that that vote is not necessary. I think my hon. friend, who says he is out for a compaign of economy, owes it to himself not only to pick those items out, but to indicate the positions that he thinks he can dispense with, and reduce his vote accordingly. If he does that he is in a position to carry out his views as head of his department, and he puts this committee in the proper position of voting supply that the responsible minister asks for. As this stands at the present time, so far as I am concerned, I cannot support the vote.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am very sorry, Mr. Chairman, if this vote has to go through without the support of my hon. friend. I am not prepared to reduce the vote at the present time, and I have already told the House very frankly why. I have been in the department only about four months and a half. I do not know the first thing about my department, and no minister can master all its intricacies in less than a year. What I do know is that work in certain branches is being done by a staff which is reduced below the number provided for in the estimates. I have not been asked by anybody in the department for the positions, but I have been asked for them by certain people outside. I have mentioned the matter to my deputy and he tells me that we can manage to get along as we are for the present, and until there is reorganization. No harm will be done by leaving the vote as it was last year, that is to say, providing salaries to pay the same number of employees. If the argument advanced by my hon. friend is right, no head of any department would be a responsible minister. Every minister asks for a certain amount more than he expects to use. There is no obligation upon the minister to spend it. My hon. friend knows that when he was Minister of Finance he did not draw from the public treasury every year the full amount of money that he had voted for his department for the purposes of expenditure. Seeing that he is guarded by the Civil Service Commission, surely the committee can trust a responsible minister of the crown and give him authority to expend a few hundred thousand dollars for the proper administration of his department if he deems it advisable to use the money. If because he promises economy and says that he is going to do his best to show satisfactory results, he is to be put in the humiliating position of having to ask for a supplementary vote, I do not think the committee would be fair to the minister. I do not pretend to have sufficient knowledge to reduce the vote now. I hope that next year I will be able to reduce many of my votes and still give efficient service to the country If I cannot do so I shall give the House the reason.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend dodges the issue entirely. It is perfectly true that no minister says he is going to spend all the money, and it is perfectly true that every minister ought to effect all the economies he can, but it is also perfectly right to say that no minister ought to ask this House to spend money which he thinks ought not to be spent. That is what my hon. friend has said, that so far as he is concerned he things it ought not to be spent. Yet he asks this House to vote it. This is the first time I have ever known such a thing to be done. Many votes are made which are not used; they are made in contemplation of use, because the minister believes they will be necessary. They are not made in the knowledge on the part of the minister that they ought not to be used. The minister here—and it may be that he does not know much about it; I am not blaming him for it at all—has information that it is not necessary.

Mr. BOIVIN: I did not say that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I certainly so understood my hon. friend.

Mr. BOIVIN: I want to make that correction. I said that I personally did not know enough about the department to reduce these votes, that I had mentioned to my deputy one or two of the vacancies, and that he had told me that we would be able to get along without filling them for the present. I want to learn how long I can refrain from doing so, and I can only find out by putting the vote in the estimates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We will take this diminishing protestation, but Hansard will show what was said. We will say it was only a few cases, and perhaps my hon. friend would like to get it down to two or three cases.

Mr. BOIVIN: Not at all. I would like to put it up to forty cases if there were forty vacancies, and I hope there will be forty by the end of the year. I hope I will be able to cut down the staff by at least forty without impairing its efficiency and without overloading and overburdening them with work.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As I was saying, the quantity is diminishing and I do not know whether or not it will further diminish. It has reached this point, that there were certain vacancies in connection with which the service, as my hon. friend finds it, does not require any further appointments. My hon. friend said not so long ago—that may shrink also—that the request to fill these vacancies came from the outside, from people wanting jobs. He received no request from his department at all. On the other hand the department was quite willing to go along without filling them.

Mr. BOIVIN: I have been so busy with other matters that I have not had time to sit down and discuss this question with the head of the department. I cannot give a better reason. We have had the Customs inquiry. That has meant the preparation of all those documents required for it. I was in attendance at council almost every day before the opening of the session, and the work that I have had to perform since I entered the government has been such that I really have not had time to discuss the matter with my officials. That is one reason why the vacancies are not filled and why the item is not reduced. If I had had time to discuss the matter, and the heads of the departments had agreed with me, I would have been only too glad to cut down the estimate as my hon. friend suggests.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hy hon. friend puts it in an entirely different way now. I have to take what he says, and I think he is giving us the real situation now. I am going to meet him. Often we say things which perhaps we ought not to say, and I think perhaps his present statement—widely at variance as it is with the former one—is correct. However, I would press this further point. Why is it that he wants to get further tied up, and brings his estimates on first, when he does not know anything about them?

Mr. BOIVIN: I told my hon. friend the reason when I introduced my estimates this afternoon. The Customs investigating committee is at work in another part of this building and I am greatly interested in following its deliberations. I do not want to discuss the question in detail at all but I may say that the attorney in charge is to-day going over evidence submitted to him by the department, and taken by one Inspector Duncan at Montreal. Next week we are promised that wholesalers and business men from all parts of Canada will be here to give evidence; we are promised that we will have in a week or two evidence that I have never yet heard or seen, and I would like to be in attendance then. I do not mean to insinuate that the sessions of the committee are not interesting. They are not interesting to me to-day because the evidence given is that which I have already read. When new evidence comes before the committee I would like to be there, and that is why I asked that I be allowed to go on with my estimates first, thinking that the House would allow my estimates to go through after discussion and allow me to return to the committee.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend now gives me a reason. I thought it would not make much difference when he was away; he did not tell me about the question of evidence, or if he did I do not recall it.

Mr. BOIVIN: I did not give that explanation; I merely referred to the matter in a general way.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The probe is going on to-day and my hon. friend is not there. He is away from it and apparently satisfied to be away, so perhaps he would be satisfied to be away for some days. My hon. friend says he has made no progress, but he has put through nearly $7,000,000 in estimates. A million must be very small in the sight of my hon. friend, if that is the way he looks at it. I am just going to say one thing further to my hon. friend, and he can give us the information or not as he likes, because in view of his last statement I personally do not think he is in a position to do so. If however he should be able to give us the information I think the House should have it. I would like to know what these vacancies are which he hopes never to fill.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Just a moment, Mr. Chairman. The hon. minister, with his deputy beside him—and I take it that in reality the deputy is the administrative head of the department—stated clearly that there were vacancies in the department; that he had discussed this with the deputy or the officers of the department, and those officers agreed with him that it was unnecessary to fill those vacancies until there was reorganization. Is it the purpose of the minister to have a reorganization which will increase the staff or a reorganization which will leave it as it is now, or one which will reduce it? If it is a reorganization which is going to leave it as it is, he has said—and it is stated that his deputy agrees with him—that it is unnecessary to fill these vacancies. If that is so, why vote money, if the vacancies are not to be filled? There is another point on which the minister might give us some information and that is as to how long these vacancies have existed. If the department can go on week by week and month by month with certain positions vacant it is evidence that they simply have that many superfluous officers somewhere. With his deputy beside him now, he might tell us what is in his mind with regard to this reorganization which is to take place, and which will decide whether these vacancies are to be filled. I would like to ask again if it is to be a reorganization which will increase the service or one which will decrease it and make it more effective.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am going to give my hon. friend a frank answer. I had hoped that the preventive service of my department would be vastly increased.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If my hon. friend will just pardon me, on the opposite page of this estimate there is an entirely separate vote for the preventive service.

Mr. BOIVIN: I think I know as much about my own estimates as my hon. friend. He need not get excited. I want to be polite to him, but I think I am entitled to the same politeness.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The minister said he knew nothing about his own department.

Mr. BOIVIN: I said I was not entirely familiar with my department. I did not refer to the estimates. I was about to say to my hon. friend that I had hoped—I did not say I would—greatly to increase my preventive service staff. What I want to convey is the idea that if the service is increased and makes many seizures, if it does the work and sends in the reports I hope it will send in, it may be necessary to fill some of these positions in the inside service to handle the work here.

Mr. BOYS: My hon. friend has told the committee that there were a number of vacancies. Can he tell us how many vacancies he does not expect to fill, and about what the salaries of these officials would amount to in a year?

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not think I can give that information to my hon. friend offhand The hon. member for West York asked me to produce a list of these vacancies, the places where they existed, and the salaries paid before the vacancies occurred, and I undertook to do that. I do not think I could give definite information to-night. I would say that there are eight or ten vacancies. My idea of economy—I will be frank with the House—is to avoid filling vacancies when it is possible. I dread to reduce salaries or to dismiss employees but I am not anxious to make new appointments.

Mr. BOYS: If the minister is directing the latter portion of his remarks to myself, that is not at issue at all, because I am not suggesting either that salaries be reduced or that employees be dismissed. The minister made the frank statement that there were a number of vacancies he did not intend to fill. I do not suppose he made that statement at random; I suppose he made it knowing what he was talking about. I presume he has some idea of how many vacancies there are he does not intend to fill, what the positions are, and the salaries attached to them. If there were only two or three of them I would not bother my head about them, but if there are twenty or thirty vacancies that the minister does not intend to fill, I think the item should be reduced by a substantial sum, and I think we ought to have that information before we are asked to pass upon this vote.

Mr. BOIVIN: I told my hon. friend in my discussion with the hon. member for West York, when he asked how many vacancies there were, whether four or five or two or one, that I was only sorry there were not forty, but I did not desire to suggest in any way that that was the number of the vacancies. I believe that the number of vacancies in the department at the present time is eight or ten. I do not promise that all of them will not be filled, but I do hope that five or six of them will not. Most of them are clerk positions where the salary would be about $1,200 a year. The saving is not very large, but it is a beginning.

Mr. MANION: I was listening some time ago to the minister speaking in reply to the hon. member for West York. He has pointed out what is quite correct, that he attempts to be perfectly courteous to us all, and I have no criticism to offer of him in that regard. At the same time, there were two or three statements which I think require some elucidation from him. In the first place he pointed out that a minister in his position could not give his promise, or his word of honour, as he expressed it, that he would attempt to cut down the expenditure of his department by three or four hundred thousand dollars, but he forgets in making that statement that he belongs to the most promising and the least fulfilling government that has ever existed in this Dominion of Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Don't limit it.

Mr. MANION: Probably I should not limit it to Canada. His leader travelled from one end of this country to the other in 1921 and promised everything on earth to every section of the country. This parliament is now being held together by a system of promises, because the whole Speech from the Throne was a bundle of promises, and that is what is holding this government in office to-day. The minister, when he says this vote is going to carry whether my hon. friend from West York likes it or not—

Mr. BOIVIN: I did not say that.

Mr. MANION: Oh yes, I listened very carefully.

Mr. BOIVIN: I said I would be sorry if it had to carry without his support.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend is very smooth in changing fronts, but put it that way if you like: he will be sorry if the vote goes through without the support of my hon. friend from West York. That simply means: If you and your party oppose it, all right, we are going to pass it anyhow. That simply means, when you carry it a little further that instead of having regard to the 116 members on this side of the House and the 101 members on that side of the House, the Minister of Customs is so sure that these various promises made by his leader and himself and the other members of the government are going to succeed in keeping my friends to my left in line, that all these votes are going to carry whether this side of the House likes them or not. Certainly that is not very complimentary to my friends to my left, and if I were one of them I think I would resent that attitude on the part of any minister.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: I do not blame my hon. friends for laughing, because my hon. friends to my left have shown no resentment at anything yet done by this government. They have accepted the promises of the government, and promises is all they have received, but I certainly should feel like resenting that attitude on the part of a minister who a short time ago went down to Montreal and in a speech of threats and promises as to what the government were going to do if the Progressives did not support them—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: I do not know upon what the minister bases his certainty that my hon. friends to my left are going to support him. Suppose we move an amendment to cut down this item in accordance with the suggestion of the minister himself; taking his own figures, ten or twelve vacancies at $1,200 apiece would amount to about $15,000. Suppose we moved an amendment to reduce the item by that amount. A few minutes ago the minister said he would not submit to this vote being cut.

Mr. BOIVIN: I did not say that.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend changes his tactics very often; he has changed them seventy-five or a hundred times to-night already.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Make it a thousand.

Mr. MANION: I would if I were the Minister of Agriculture; I would not care how far I went in that case, because he never cares where he goes or what he says. But I am not the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. RINRET: You would like to be, though.

Mr. MANION: Suppose we make up our minds to move to cut down this item by $12,000 or $15,000. If that motion is made, I hope that some of my friends to my left —there are not many of them left in the chamber just now; I do not know whether the discussion has had anything to do with that or not—will show that they really believe in the economy which they have talked about so much. I hope the hon. member for Bow River, whom I see in his seat, and for whom I have a great admiration—for his ability, not for the way he votes—will stand by some of the professions he made in past years in favour of economy, if such a motion is made. I remember hearing him last year, and I used to admire him so much—he was not so much to the front then as he is now, but sat back a little farther—I remember how he would stand up and tirade against the present Prime Minister, and never in all my attacks on the Prime Minister, and I will admit I have been fairly severe at times, have I attacked him so wickedly or viciously as the hon. member for Bow River used to. He would stand up and advocate economy, which he said he believed in, and I think he really does believe in it. Well, if we make a motion here to cut down this item by about $15,000, in accordance with the minister's own figures, I hope the hon. member for Bow River will have the courage of his convictions and stand up here like the good man he is and vote with us to cut down this item by the amount which the minister himself admits is unnecessary.

I am going to show the hon. member for Bow River just how futile are all the excuses given by the minister for these different increases in expenditure. He made the excuse here that practically all the increase in this item of $40,000 was due to statutory increases, and then when he was giving the details a few moments ago he said the statutory increases out of the forty thousand amounted to, I think, $18,000. Was that right, or was it $12,000? Which is it?

Mr. BOIVIN: About that.

Mr. MANION: He first said that this whole forty thousand was practically due to statutory increases. Then when he was giving the details he points out that the statutory increases really amount to $12,000 out of the forty thousand. I do not know what the other twenty-eight thousand consists of. I listened to the minister attentively and I do not know what it is for; it certainly is not for statutory increases. But let me turn to the next item—and I ask the Chairman's permission to refer to it; I am not going to discuss it. Turn over to the next item, which amounts to $480,000, as compared with $455,- 502 last year, and there is not a dollar of wages in it at all. It is made up of:

Printing and stationery, subscriptions to commercial papers, flags—

I wonder which flags?

—dating stamps, locks, instruments, etc.

It has nothing to do with wages. I went through the items very carefully and I do not find a wage of any kind. The whole item amounts to $480,000, $25,000 more than the item last year. Is the minister going to claim that this is connected with statutory increases, that printing and stationery, subscriptions to commercial papers, flags, dating stamps, locks, and instruments, have anything to do with statutory increases? In other words the minister in the few months in which he has been in this government has learned all the tricks of the trade adopted by the group he is associated with. You cannot depend upon a single promise of this administration to cut down the taxation of this country. They never live up to their promises. They promise everything in the shape of taxation reduction and give none, except where they cut down business so much that the taxation is automatically reduced. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to move an amendment to this item. I am going to move that it be cut down by $15,000, and then we will find out how hon. gentlemen to my left react.

Mr. BOIVIN: Does my hon. friend desire to have the vote taken on that immediately?

Mr. MANION: I am not in any hurry.

Mr. BOIVIN: Would my hon. friend like to have a reply to his remarks?

Mr. MANION: Oh, I am not very particular—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: —but if it eases the mind of my hon. friend I should be very glad to listen to it.

Mr. BOIVIN: It will not ease the mind of "your hon. friend" at all.

Mr. MANION: Then I do not know why I am asked the question. Go ahead.

Mr. BOIVIN: I fear I might possibly be called to order by the Chairman unless I have my hon. friend's consent.

Mr. MANION: Perhaps if my hon. friend is called to order I shall be afterwards.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend was right when he said the Speech from the Throne contained many promises. All Speeches from the Throne contain promises.

Mr. MANION: Never so much as now.

Mr. BOIVIN: All Speeches from the Throne composed by my hon. friend's friends contained promises to be broken. The Speech from the Throne composed by this government contains promises to be kept.

Mr. MANION: They never were in the past. It would be something entirely new if they were now.

Mr. BOIVIN: I have enough confidence in our friends who sit to the left of my hon. friend, to think that if those promises are put there to be broken they will not be very long supporters of our party.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Hear, hear.

Mr. BOIVIN: The Speech from the Throne meets with their approval, and it is the intention of the government to implement it by legislation. Now, if my hon. friend desires to reduce the vote by $15,000, if he wants to tie my hands, if he wants to make it impossible for me to appoint a certain number of employees in a department which is now being attacked for not giving sufficient and efficient service, I am quite willing; but I do not think the people of Canada will be. What the people of Canada want, if anything, is a larger expenditure for a more rigid collection of revenue.

Mr. MANION: More efficiency.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend is right. No one desires more efficiency than I do; no one desires more honesty than I do. I can tell my hon. friend that I am going to do my very best to give honest administration to the department and the country; but if I am to be hampered—my estimates reduced—

Mr. MANION: Does the minister suggest for a moment that a $15,000 cut out of 8½ million dollars or nearly nine millions will hamper him?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Why $15,000?

Mr. MANION: Because I took the figures of the minister himself.

The CHAIRMAN: Is the committee ready for the question?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before you put the question, Mr. Chairman, I should like the minister to take himself seriously for a minute and not to play mock heroics—because that is what he is doing. He talks about the necessity of the customs service being strengthened. It ought to be. The preventive side of the customs service ought to be strengthened, there is no question about it. This vote has nothing whatever to do with the preventive side at all. The minister wants to do this and everything; he wants to be so clean, so pure, so holy, so godly. But if he does, why does he not want to do simply what he thinks ought to be done—take this amount off? We are simply in this instance taking the minister at his word, that is all. We are prepared to take more of a chance with him than apparently he is willing to take in the case of his own words and his own judgment.

Mr. BOIVIN: That may be true.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is playing mock heroics when he says that a cut which ought to be made here according to his own judgment, and the judgment of his deputy, has anything to do with the preventive service of the country.

Mr. BOIVIN: I will explain to my hon. friend how it has something to do with it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wish you would.

Mr. BOIVIN: The amendment was moved more for the purpose of attempting to embarrass the government than it was for the purpose of cutting off $15,000 that may not be spent anyway. This item is the one from which the salaries and travelling expenses of the inspectors of the department are paid. The larger the service throughout the country, the more inspectors we shall need and the better the inspection service must be and I am sure, knowing my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) as well as I do, that he is not going to press the amendment to a vote.

Mr. MANION: Let me just say a word in reply to the minister. He said the amendment was moved to embarrass the government. It was done for no such purpose; it was done for the purpose of testing the sincerity of the Minister of Customs and Excise. The hon. gentleman pointed out again and again how anxious he is to cut down the expenditures. He said there were possibly twelve or thirteen employees he could dispense with. I take his own figures, and I am testing him out to see if he will act on his own statement. If he is so anxious to cut down the expenditure he will accept a reduction which should have no effect whatever on a vote of approximately nine millions. If the minister is sincere in all his assertions that he wants economy, that he is going to try to have economy, and has no intention to put a number of new men in positions which he thinks are unnecessary, then he will accept an amendment for a reduction of $15,000 which I would have made $50,000 if I were trying to embarrass the government. I put it at this figure because the minister practically asserted again and again this evening, that he could cut out probably much more than that, but he could cut out that much without embarrassing the department at all.

Amendment (Mr. Manion) negatived.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Now that the House has satisfactorily swallowed the protestation of the minister, and he has practically swallowed himself, I may point out that he has told us one thing I was not sure about before. We are told that we are now on preventive service, and I would ask the minister whether any of the salaries here covered are salaries of officials who are at present under suspicion or suspension.

Mr. BOIVIN: No, the salary of any official who is at present under suspicion or suspension is covered under the second item on the next page, which reads:

To provide for expenses of maintenance of revenue cruisers and for preventive service.

The present item merely covers the preventive service staff here and the inspection officers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are any of the people who come under this item covered by the Duncan report?

Mr. BOIVIN: No. Some of those mentioned in the Duncan report are paid out of the first item passed this evening, and others mentioned in the same report are also paid out of the second item on page 62. Those are regular preventive service men.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous—Printing and stationery, subscriptions commercial papers, flags, dating stamps, locks, instruments, etc., for various ports of entry, express charges on samples, stationery and legal forms, legal expenses, premiums on guarantee bonds, and uniforms for Customs officers, $480,000.

Mr. FORKE: We are very proud, Mr. Chairman, to see you where you are, but I am going to give you a little word of advice at the start; you will have to speak a little louder.

The CHAIRMAN: I shall be very glad to oblige my hon. friend.

Mr. MANION: Could the minister explain why there is an increase of $25,000? He cannot explain it on the ground of statutory increases.

Mr. BOIVIN: The best explanation is that we tried to meet my hon. friend's request two or three years ago and we cut $100,000 off this item. We found that we had cut off too much, and we are obliged to ask that one-quarter of that amount be added to the vote for this year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the expenditure last year?

Mr. BOIVIN: I have here the chief accountant's memorandum on this particular item, which reads:

The expenditure for the first six months of 1924-5 was $201,920.31. Proportionately for the entire year the expenditure should have been approximately $404,000, whereas it actually amounted to $455,502.28, a difference of $51,500.

For the first six months of 1925-6 the expenditure was $227,097.44, which proportionately would be $454,-000 for the entire fiscal year, which is approximately the total expenditure of the previous year.

The increase for the six months 1925-6 over 1924-5 is $25,177.13, which is accounted for by payment in 1925-6 of guarantee bond premiums, covering the last half of 1924-5, $10,090, for which similar payment did not occur in 1924-5; and payment of printing and stationery accounts of 1924-5, $21,145, which did not occur in the previous year. These two amounts total $31,235 increase, which is reduced to the difference of $25,177.13, being lesser general expenditure during the year 1925-6.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The description of the item would indicate that a good deal of the money was spent on office supplies, guarantee bond premiums and uniforms. Would the minister divide the sum into major items? We do not want the smaller items; but give us a general idea of how it is spent.

Mr. BOIVIN: The largest amount generally expended under this vote is that paid to the Canadian Bank Note Company of Ottawa for excise stamps. The amount paid for the printing and excise stamps is approximately $165,000 per year. That is one of the largest amounts. All the forms used in the service are printed by the Department of Printing and Stationery, but they are charged to the Department of Customs and cost over $100,000 per year. At all the ports where we have officials in railway stations, on trains and at points of vantage, they are uniformed. The uniforms are purchased by the officers themselves, but they are paid for by the government in the form of an allowance of $37.50 per annum. A uniform is supposed to last for two years. This item amounts to $58,961.50. Freight and express charges amount to approximately $17,000 and guarantee bond premiums, $8,000. The other amounts are very small.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): What about legal expenses?

Mr. BOIVIN: The legal expenses are not large. There are certain court costs in connection with actions taken by the department. If my hon. friend will look up the Auditor General's report, part D, page 126, he will see the expenditure in connection with a similar vote for the year 1924-25 when legal expenses amounted to only $245.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think when the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) asked the minister as to the reason for the increase and pointed out that it could not be a statutory increase, the minister said that was quite true; there were no statutory increases, but the trouble was that he had tried to do what the hon. member wanted him to do, namely, to economize and that there had been a cut of $100,000 in the vote. Am I right in so understanding the minister? Because I am afraid he will have to fall back on the old statutory increase; there was no cut in the vote last year.

Mr. BOIVIN: If my hon. friend desires to say that the vote last year is the same as the vote this year, he is right. What I said was that the amount estimated for this item for 1924-25 was reduced by $100,000 over that of the previous fiscal year, 1923-24, and we reduced it too much. Since that time we have been trying to get along but we find that it is absolutely impossible to meet expenses without increasing the vote. We are not puting it back to the figure at which it stood before; we are increasing it by nearly $25,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend certainly gave me the impression that he had made a cut last year; that he had tried to cut off $100,000—

Mr. BOIVIN: I have not yet been given an opportunity to make any reductions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: —and therefore there had to be an increase this time. There certainly was not a reduction under the vote of the year before. In 1921-22 I find it was the same old story. The vote in 1921-22 instead of being larger is smaller; it was only $423,000 while the vote to-day is $480,000.

Mr. BOIVIN: What was the vote in 1923-24?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have just the vote for 1921-22. I keep to that year because it was the year so often talked about in the country by my hon. friend and those with him as the year of the high water mark of extravagance from which my hon. friends were to work down. I find instead, however, that they are always working up. The vote under this head in 1921-22 was $423,000. My hon. friend must get some other excuse. I think he will have to get a third one.

Mr. BOIVIN: I told my hon. friend that in 1924-5 this vote had been reduced by $100,000 from that of the year 1923-24. Since that time it has not been increased and we find that we must increase it in order to prevent asking for supplementary estimates every year. I am glad my hon. friend pointed out that even to-day it is only $55,000 larger than it was in 1921-22, because that is the admission he has just made. At that time we did not have, as we have now in the Department of Customs, the collection of the sales tax and all the other added forms of taxation. We had not started the inspection of all firms owing sales tax, and as my hon. friend knows, the sales tax is not even yet entirely collected on every line of business. It was not all collected by my hon. friend and his government. My officers are tracing people every day who are not paying and who should pay sales tax. That means all kinds of expenditure, and so when my hon. friend says that the item is only $55,000 more than it was in 1921-22, I think he is paying us quite a compliment.

10 p.m.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is extremely ingenious, but the trouble with him is that he always forgets the facts.

Mr. BOIVIN: He is always ready to stand corrected.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I hope my hon. friend will be a little more careful with the facts. The sales tax was in operation for two years at that time and moreover it was being collected on far more articles than is the case to-day. My hon. friend knows that or certainly he ought to know it.

Mr. BOIVIN: It was not all collected.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not all collected now. The minister is not collecting anything more by reason of the increase under this particular item. He knows that in connection with his sales tax where he gets anything more is through his travelling auditors. But I do not care which item that comes under; the point is that there was a larger field of work to be done in connection with the sales tax in that year than there is to-day.

Mr. BOIVIN: But it was not done.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend may say that it was not done, but it was done fairly well and if we look at the arrears which we have had under this government in connection with the sales tax, we shall have a job to find anything much worse done—favoured people here and favoured people there, suits here and no suits there. All my hon. friend has to do is to go through the returns I had made two years ago in this House to know the absolute truth of what I am saying. The fact is that the vote was less then. I have been trying to find the year to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. BOIVIN: That is 1923-24.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps my hon. friend has it.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am sorry to say I have not. I have a statement by the chief accountant which I can read to my hon. friend. I may have been misled.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is right. His government did put on $100,000 for the sake of taking it off afterwards.

Item agreed to.

To provide for expenses of maintenance of revenue cruisers and for preventive service, $376,510.

Mr. MANION: How much of this was spent last year?

Mr. BOIVIN: I think the total amount.

Mr. MANION: I suppose there were the usual statutory increases?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, they amounted to $6,960. The rest is for the expenses of the cruisers.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will my hon. friend please give the committee a list of the cruisers and their headquarters?

Mr. BOIVIN: We have now the following cruisers and patrol boats:

Name	Headquarters
Cruiser Margaret,	Gaspe, P.Q.
Cruiser Grib,	Halifax, N.S.
Patrol Boat Madeline A,	Barrington, N.S.
Patrol Boat Buzz,	Charlottetown, P.E.I.
Patrol Boat Bernie,	Eastern Harbour, N.S.
Patrol Boat Cheticamp,	Cheticamp, N.S.
Patrol Boat G.,	Yarmouth, N.S.
Patrol Boat No. 1,	Port Daniel, P.Q.
Patrol Boat No. 2,	North Sydney, N.S.
Patrol Boat No. 3,	North Sydney, N.S.
Patrol Boat No. 4,	North Sydney, N.S.
Patrol Boat No. 5,	Richibucto, N.B.
Patrol Boat No. 6,	Sydney Harbour, N.S.
Patrol Boat No. 7,	Port Hood.
Patrol Boat No. 8,	Boulardie, C.B.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Are those all the boats we have at present?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:: What boats, if any, have we doing similar work on any of the Great Lakes?

Mr. BOIVIN: We have none.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is there any patrolling of exports from Belle River and adjacent places?

Mr. BOIVIN: No, they are not patrolled.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:: Are they patrolled in any other way?

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes they are carefully watched and an export entry is taken for every shipment of goods received, with the name of the boat and a description of the cargo. That information is given to an American officer in accordance with the terms of the treaty with the United States concerning smuggling.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Since when?

Mr. BOIVIN: Since about September, 1925, when regulations were made under the treaty. Some slight changes have been made in the instructions issued to the officers since the regulations were put into force. We have endeavoured to prevent export entries to Mexico or Cuba when the liquors were to be loaded at a lake port. These export entries were never accepted, but were replaced by new export entries prepared and signed by a duly authorized agent of the shipper at the port. My deputy has now issued instructions that the export entry or entries showing the United States to be the ultimate destination of the goods must accompany each shipment from the time it leaves the distillery in Canada.

Mr. MORAND: When was that regulation made?

Mr. BOIVIN: If my hon. friend is referring to the regulation forbidding the exchange of export entries, it was issued on February 13.

Mr. MORAND: Are there no regulations as to the size or the kind of boats by which these shipments must be consigned?

Mr. BOIVIN: No. The only clause in the treaty is that we shall not allow shipment of any kind of liquor from a lake port on a boat which cannot reach the destination to which it is cleared.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Is there any patrol preventive service on the Pacific coast?

Mr. BOIVIN: On the Pacific coast we have a rented cruiser which is operated by the department in the same manner as our patrol boats on the Atlantic. There have been complaints of smuggling in British Columbia, and I think the service will have to be improved there by the addition of other patrol boats.

Mr. JACOBS: Why do you not use the Canadian Merchant Marine for that purpose?

Mr. BOIVIN: Those boats are too large.

Mr. McGIBBON: How many seizures have been made on the Atlantic?

Mr. BOIVIN: Some of our boats have been very successful. The Margaret, for instance, has made several seizures, and several of the other patrol boats have reported infractions of the law to preventive officers on shore and thus enabled them to make seizures. I am frank to admit, as I have already done to-day, that the preventive service is not what it should be. I am not getting the results that we would like to get from it. I hope by closer co-operation with the provincial authorities to do much better.

Mr. McGIBBON: Can the minister give the committee any idea of the number of seizures?

Mr. BOIVIN: The number of seizures of liquor smuggled in from the ocean to the Maritime provinces during the open season last year was about forty. There should have been a great many more.

Mr. HEAPS: There is one question I would like to ask the minister. If I understand these estimates correctly, in the two columns it just shows the estimates for the fiscal year. Is it not possible to have another column showing the amounts spent during the last fiscal year?

Mr. BOIVIN: In making up the estimates we have followed the usual custom, and the amount expended during the last fiscal year has never appeared. My hon. friend will find, however, that the expenditures detailed in the Auditor General's report correspond exactly with the votes in the estimates for the previous year. He can find in the Auditor General's report under the same number a description of the expenditures made under each item voted last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, the year before.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, the year before. There is always an intervening calendar year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is nearly right; he is only out a year this time.

Mr. BOIVIN: It is only a slip of the tongue.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has made the same slip several times before. A person trying to follow the books would be hopelessly lost if he followed my hon. friend's directions. I wonder if the minister, in the course of his investigation, found out the number of ports to be looked after, the ports of export in the neighbourhood of lake St. Clair and the St. Clair river—Detroit, Windsor and so on?

Mr. BOIVIN: I have not. That would come not under this item, but the next one. What I am willing to offer my hon. friend is this: I will get a complete list of these ports which should be watched by preventive officers, and I will not ask to go any further to-night. After we have passed this item of $376,510, we shall let the remainder stand for further discussion. I will have the list of outports to-morrow.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take it the suggestion is that we stop business now?

Mr. BOIVIN: No, just pass this item and then take up another department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I see no reason why we should drop this and go to something else. We allowed the government to take up estimates to-day without a motion, and I see no reason why the government should now call some other estimates, just for the purpose of obviating a motion. That can be the only reason.

Mr. LAPOINTE: No. If my hon. friend will permit me, we desire to have at least one other department go on with its estimates Thursday and Friday. It may be necessary to ask the Minister of Customs to be in the House all day Friday and even Thursday, and it would hardly be fair to start other estimates on those days. If my hon. friend will allow the Public Works estimates to get down to-night so that my colleague the Minister of Public Works will be able to go on with his estimates the latter part of this week if necessary, I think everything will be all right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Frankly, I do not remember any particular reference by the government as to what they intended to take up. I am perfectly content, however.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes, we mentioned Customs and Public Works.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. MANION: I do not wish to doubt the minister's word, but I certainly was in the House and I do not remember the Prime Minister mentioning Public Works.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes. It is in Hansard. The Prime Minister said:

> To-morrow is government day. We purpose taking such motions as may be on the order paper and then to proceed with supply. We will take up first the estimates of the Department of Customs, and if we do not occupy the entire day with those estimates, we will take up the Department of Public Works.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then under those circumstances I have no right, of course, to object, but if we do that I would suggest that we rise now. We have done pretty well, and these two items are so closely connected one with the other that I think we should now rise, report progress and then call an item in Public Works to accommodate my hon. friend.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The consideration of this item will be suspended, that is all.

Item stands.

Public Works—public buildings—Nova Scotia: Halifax—Bellevue building—improvements and repairs..	$ 4,000
Halifax Immigration building—payments to Department of Railways and Canals for accommodation..	25,000
Halifax Quarantine station—repairs and improvements..	5,000
Halifax Rockhead hospital—repairs and improvements..	2,250
North Sydney—Quarantine station—alterations and repairs..	2,350
Pictou—public building—addition and repairs.	9,000
Stellarton—public building..	10,000
	$57,600

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have now a suggestion to make to my hon. friend. I do not think this is a very serious item, so I think we could pass it now, and adjourn. That would probably save time.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—WEDNESDAY SITTINGS

Mr. LAPOINTE: Mr. Speaker, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Robb:

> That on Wednesday the 17th of March and every subsequent Wednesday until the end of the session the House shall meet at three o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. LAPOINTE moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What business to-morrow?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Private members' day to-morrow.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

Wednesday, March 17, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

LEGAL MINIMUM WAGE

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the following motion made by Mr. Woodsworth on Monday, March 15: "That in the opinion of this House a wage sufficient to provide for a reasonable standard of living should constitute a legal minimum wage" be referred to the select standing committee on Industrial and International Relations.

He said: This was the understanding at the conclusion of the debate on that motion on Monday last.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): There does not seem to be any reason why I should object. One cemetery is as good as another, and this one seems equally acceptable to the mover of the motion and to the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is my hon. friend the guardian of the cemeteries?

Motion agreed to.

CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, reports and orders in council, relating to the diversion of the waters of the Great Lakes by the Chicago drainage canal, including all communications with the government of Great Britain, the British ambassador at Washington, D.C., and the government of the United States.

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENIZE KING: Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to the adoption of the motion provided it is understood that if the correspondence includes certain documents which the United States may object to having brought down, they will not be produced.

Mr. CHURCH: Mr. Speaker, it is true that some of the papers have been brought down, but none of the correspondence with the British government has been produced. This is the most important part, because Canada is not a party to the treaty. I would like to have tabled the correspondence of the government of Great Britain on this question.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY EMPLOYEES AT MONT-JOLI, QUEBEC

Mr. ALEXANDRE J. DOUCET (Kent, N.B.) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between railway employees of Mont-Joli, Quebec, and the Department of Railways.

Hon. Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, on Monday last I directed the attention of my hon. friend to the fact that this order would date back almost to confederation, and asked him to limit it in some way.

Mr. DOUCET: Mr. Speaker, had I not had my time taken up in the Customs committee I would have interviewed my hon. friend. I would ask for the correspondence dating from May 1, 1923.

Motion as amended agreed to.

EXPORT DUTY ON PULPWOOD

On the motion of Mr. ARTHURS:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams or recommendations relating to an embargo upon pulpwood or to a proposed export duty upon pulpwood shipped from Canada, such order to apply to correspondence, etc., subsequent to January 1, 1921.

Motion stands.

6. The number of persons instructed from August 1, 1924, to August 1, 1925, the rank of each, the course given each and where each instructed.

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) suggested to my hon. friend that he should indicate more in particular the information he wanted, inasmuch as the motion as it stands would involve a great deal of research and copying. Perhaps my hon. friend would let the matter stand until he has a chance of conferring with the minister.

Mr. DOUCET: Stand.

Motion stands.

PRICE OF NEWSPRINT

On the motion of Mr. Stevens:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, documents, etc., passing between R. J. Mr. STEVENS: In connection with this resolution, Mr. Speaker, I understand that certain matters have been undertaken by the government which the passing of this resolution might adversely affect, and I would therefore suggest that it be dropped for the time being.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Motion dropped.

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that the minister desires to know the subject matter of the letters referred to. These letters are indexed according to the subject matter in the department, and perhaps the hon. member would indicate what the subject matter is.

Mr. DOUCET: On behalf of the hon. member for Restigouche-Madawaska (Mr. Culligan), may I ask that the motion stand until he is here.

Motion stands.

IMMIGRATION PERMITS

On the motion of Mr. Morand:

For a return giving a settlement of all permits issued by the Minister of Immigration, under section 4 of the Immigration Act, showing the names of all persons permitted to enter Canada under the said section during the years 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925; the occupations and former residences of all such persons; the dates and places of entry into Canada; the duration of their stay in Canada as allowed by such permits and whether still in Canada; and if so, their present places of residence; and if not now in Canada, the dates and places when and where they left Canada.

Right Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not think there will be any objection to this motion, but in the absence of the minister I would be obliged if it could stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

Motion stands.

REPORTS OF HON. WILLIAM PUGSLEY

On the motion of Sir Henry Drayton:

For a copy of the report or reports, finding or findings, made by the late Honourable William Pugsley, in his capacity as custodian of enemy property, or any other capacity while in the pay of the government of Canada, since his retirement as Lieutenant-Governor of the province of New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE: May I ask my hon. friend to let this motion stand, as I should like first to communicate with the Secretary of State?

Motion stands.

TAXATION IN CANADA

DUPLICATION AND DEMAND FOR REDUCTION

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved:

Whereas it was deemed necessary and expedient to impose an income tax by the parliament of Canada as a revenue measure growing out of the war and to temporarily invade the former exclusive field of the municipalities to collect this form of taxation.

And whereas such taxation has led to duplication and there in an urgent demand for reduction of taxation and to restore to the municipalities their former exclusive rights and prerogatives to this form of taxation. Therefore this House will support the government in any immediate measures it may take to give effect to the principles of this resolution and so reduce taxation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, at the request of some of the municipalities I am bringing up this question of taxation. Formerly, income taxation was imposed by the municipalities and provinces alone, but in 1917, during the stress of the war, the federal government initiated income taxation. It may have been a necessity during the war, but it was generally hoped that as soon as the war was over, in view of the increased burdens imposed by the war upon the municipalities of this country from coast to coast, and in view of the further fact that the federal field of taxation was unlimited, this form of taxation would be left as formerly to the municipalities and the provinces.

The main problem before this country to-day, Mr. Speaker, the one that is discussed upon the public platforms, in the press, by boards of trade, chambers of commerce business men and the working classes generally, is taxation. We spend many days in parliament here, but very seldom do we devote an hour or even half an hour to the most important question before this country to-day, taxation, which affects every man, woman and child in the country. Taxation, immigration, and the taking care of the deficits on the Canadian National Railways are three of the most important problems which the people of this country are facing at the present time. It was hoped, and indeed intimated by the late Minister of Finance and by the present Minister of Finance, that the conference between the federal, provincial and municipal authorities on the question of taxation would result in some equitable, fair and just division of the field of taxation in this country, so that further taxation might be placed on those who were best able to bear it, and that a fair, just and equitable system of taxation would be worked out in which the federal, provincial and municipal governments would each do its part.

I admit that the duties of the government are not at all light; the responsibilities are very heavy and their duties onerous. It is the desire of all good citizens to pay their fair share of taxation. I think it is the wish and the endeavour of every honourable man to do what he can in this respect. The hope was entertained that when the conference on taxation took place the government would endeavour to do something for the struggling municipalities of this country. It is too bad that this hope has not yet been realized. We were told in the last parliament that the question of unemployment was solely a matter for the municipalities to deal with; that the federal authorities had nothing to do with unemployment. Let me point out, Mr. Speaker, that meeting the needs of the unemployed and dealing with many other matters entail a heavy burden on the municipal councils of cities and towns, and on the county councils as well. Not only have they to meet the distress resulting from this cause, but they have to maintain hospitals, care for the sick, and provide for many other burdens. Surely it was not within the minds of those who drafted the British North America Act that such a heavy burden should be thrown on the municipalities of this country from coast to coast.

So I say that in 1917 when the federal authorities invaded this income tax field of taxation formerly occupied by the municipalities, they went a little too far. However, the federal government having pursued that course, the hope was entertained that such action could only be temporary, that when the war was over, or within a few years afterwards, it would find some more equitable and just system of taxation as a result of which the municipalities would have restored to them the revenue from income taxation exclusively—which prior to that they have always enjoyed. As I figure it out, 80 per cent of the income tax is paid by persons with fixed salary—the small man, the consumer; perhaps it would be fairer, to say the middle-class people of this country. If you refer to the reports of the assessment commissioners of the cities and towns of Ontario, giving the population and the income assessment in each case, and the average tax payable per capita—and I have returns from twenty-six municipalities in my possession—you will find that the great bulk of the income tax levied by civic and the federal authorities is collected from those whose income is fixed and can be readily ascertained, and whose position leaves no possibility of escape from such taxation. I may say that the power of direct taxation on real estate and income is limited in the case of municipalities by the British North America Act. On the other hand the Dominion has eleven different methods of direct and indirect taxation. Surely therefore, it can leave to the municipalities the undivided enjoyment of the revenue from income tax which, in the case of the Dominion, has been felt as a great added burden and double-header tax throughout Canada and has not given the yield it should have done. This is apparent when you remember that whereas the revenue from the Dominion income tax at one time amounted to $119,000,000, it fell last year to $46,000,000. The eleven different methods of federal taxation now in existence can be enumerated as follows:

1. Customs tariff.
2. Excise taxes on various commodities, such as automobiles, matches, cigars, wines, beverages, and so forth.
3. Income tax.
4. Tax on sales.
5. Tax on licenses.
6. Taxation on corporations and companies.
7. Tax on cables and telegrams.
8. Railway and boat tax.
9. Stamp tax on checks, drafts, bills of exchange, notes and stock transfers.
10. Stamp tax on money orders, letters and post-cards.
11. Stamp tax on receipts.

From the foregoing eleven sources the Dominion collects about $346,000,000 of direct and indirect taxes in the country. The income tax has a super-tax feature of taxation as well. It is stifling enterprise and imposing a heavy burden on the people. In my opinion we should reduce the income tax and the super-tax to the United States level, thus encouraging capital to invest in Canada and making an economic surplus available for the development of the country, and increasing the revenues of the country.

The present method of taxation is far from equitable. The tax is levied on some and not on others; there are a great many people who escape entirely and who are not called upon to pay any income tax at all. I know of a case in Toronto where the man enjoys an income of from $50,000 to $60,000 but escapes with the payment of a very small income tax. In connection with his year's operations he voted himself a bonus of $100,000 and by calling it a bonus, not income, he escapes by design. That is one way of escaping taxation. Nobody objects to paying a fair share of taxation. It is the duplication and inequalities that make people dissatisfied, combined with the failure to allot an exclusive sphere of taxation to the respective authorities—the Dominion, the provinces, and the municipalities.

At present there are $931,512,900 of war bonds outstanding which are free from taxation. Why cannot part of this be commuted and this vast capital put back into circulation and into economic and industrial development, thereby creating another source of revenue to the country? Canada is the most over governed country in the world. There are two houses of parliament for the Dominion; two legislative bodies for certain of the provinces; and innumerable municipal councils.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): May I ask the hon. gentleman who imposed upon the Canadian people the bodies of which he complains?

Mr. CHURCH: I cannot say our constitution does. The hon. gentleman has been in the House longer than I have and I will leave it to him to give that information. These taxes were said to be necessary during the war. I am not making any criticism because of their imposition.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I am referring to the institutions which the hon. gentleman mentioned. They have been imposed upon Canada by the British North America Act. We cannot amend them as conditions are at present, so they will continue to be with us until such time as this parliament has the right to amend the constitution.

Mr. CHURCH: The British North America Act has nothing to do with this method of collecting taxation. The municipalities ought to have the field to themselves. The hon. gentleman wants to amend the British North America Act, but it will be a very sorry day for this country if his method of amendment goes through. It will be good-bye then to the province of Ontario, to property and civil rights within the provinces, to vested rights, to the rights of minorities, and to everything else in this country. That is my opinion. However, that issue is not relative here.

Public bodies all over Canada are complaining about the heavy burden of taxation which is in force to-day. In this connection let me quote the following from a speech by Sir Herbert Holt:

> In his address at the annual meeting of the Royal Bank of Canada Sir Herbert Holt said that taxation in Canada has reached the point where it is retarding the growth of national wealth, increasing the cost of production, decreasing demand—and with it profit and wages—and withdrawing money from productive use. He says the country is over-burdened with government, and the enormous expansion of the public debt is a matter of grave misgiving. Canada is over-governed and over-taxed, and the one is the natural corollary of the other. The political diseases from which we suffer have been diagnosed long ago, not only by business men, but by the ordinary voter as well. Administrative extravagance and incompetence have been in the saddle too long.

Then, too, Sir Thomas White in a speech before the Canadian Club at Montreal expressed himself as follows:

> Foremost among our problems of to-day is the problem of our public indebtedness. The net direct public debt of Canada is seven times what it was before the outbreak of war. One favourable feature is that it is principally held by our own people. Another is that it is funded and that consequently our currency is not depreciated. This is the reason why our exchange has been well maintained.
> The inherent soundness of our financial position is best illustrated by the fact that the Canadian dollar stands at par. We are virtually upon a gold basis and at any time could resume specie payment. Personally I have no criticism for our not having taken the final step in resumption. It is better to wait until the action taken is clearly interpretive of actual and probable conditions of our exchange.

Sir Thomas White added:

In addition to our Dominion direct debt there is the heavy outstanding indirect liability upon guarantees of issues of the railway companies now embraced in the Canadian National Railway system and for the annual deficit from that system which is owned by the Dominion.

Heavy Taxation and Enterprise

More serious even than this is the effect of our heavy taxation upon the spirit of enterprise in our people. The heavy supertaxes upon income deter men of initiative and constructive capability from embarking in new enterprise in which if loss is made it must be borne by themselves, while the gain accrues in such large proportions to the public treasury. The withdrawal of such large sums as are collected annually in income taxation from the capital fund available for new enterprise constitutes a serious hindrance to the launching of new undertakings by the people of Canada. The result is that our people are not participating to the extent they should in the development of Canadian industry and commerce.

Problem of National Economy

Connected with this problem of taxation is the problem of national economy. This must necessarily relate to controllable expenditure. Governments are blamed universally for their extravagance, but the fault partially lies back of governments and parliaments, with the people themselves.

We shall get economy in all governments when the great mass of the people are so imbued with the spirit for economy that they will not support needless expenditure. You are not likely to get this condition until our public agencies, such as the press, actively take up the question and bring home to the conviction of the people the consequences of indifferences or lethargy or even hostility in the matter of public economy.

That is his opinion of the income tax. I was referring to the decrease in revenue from taxation. The revenue from income taxes levied by the Dominion of Canada has fallen from $119,000,000 four years ago to $46,000,000 last year. That shows two things—rich men have learned how to evade payment, and incomes generally have seriously declined.

I will refer to what has been done in England and the United States in regard to the income tax. At the present time the Mother Country is paying $500,000 a day to the people of the United States as war debts. They are carrying the burden of the debt of the war in many ways, and the payment of $500,000 a day to the United States is one of the heaviest for the Old Land. The conditions in Canada of course are not similar. Lord Churchill, Chancellor of the Exchequer, introducing his budget speech in England, said:

The main grounds of British policy has been threefold: first, to balance the budget out of revenue; secondly, to reduce the debt; thirdly, to reduce public expenditure, and in consequence to remit taxation. We had either achieved or made progress towards all these objects. From 1920 onwards we had balanced our budgets. We had reduced our debt from the peak of which it stood in 1919 (not in nominal figures but in facts) by over £736,000,000, and we had reduced our real annual interest charge by over £70,000,000 a year. Expenditure had fallen from £1,655,000,000 in 1922 to less than half that figure now, and taxation had been reduced by over £300,000,000 a year. This year's budget alone reduced taxation by £32,000,000 in a full year. Except the United States, Holland and Switzerland, we had the lowest bank rate in the world.

That is what they are doing in the Old Country, notwithstanding the fact that they are paying their war debts to the United States every day when other countries are not paying them. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has come along with another reduction in the British income tax in his budget. It may be that the income in Great Britain per thousand is higher than in Canada, but as I say the commitments are different and the conditions are different. Not satisfied with that, the United States of America have made their third cut in five years in the income tax. The last budget brought down shows a reduction in the income tax and the nuisance taxes, as shown by the following despatch:

Washington, June 30.—After to-morrow midnight there will be no tax on a movie that costs you 50 cents or less, no tax on telephone or telegraph, candy or a variety of commodities, such as X-ray films, hunting knives, riding habits, stilletos, smoking stands, hunting garments, etc.

These so-called nuisance taxes have been wiped out, as also have taxes on all amusements, jewelery, automobiles and every form of petty nuisance tax.

They have reduced the income tax under the Mellon plan. A comparison of the United States and Canada's income and taxes is very interesting. The figures are as follows:

Tax on Earned Income—Married Man, No Children

Net Income	Actual 1924 U.S. Tax	Proposed 1926 U.S. Tax	Canadian Tax
$ 3,000	$ 7 50	None	$ 40 00
4,000	22 50	$ 5 54	80 00
5,000	37 50	16 88	126 00
6,000	57 50	28 13	178 50
10,000	207 50	101 25	619 50

I will read the following paragraph which gives details of the United States taxation reduction bill signed recently by President Coolidge:

Washington, Nov. 6.—Taking its first official action on the new tax reduction bill to-day, the ways and means committee of the House, fixing income and surtax rates, destroyed the basic character of the Mellon plan of tax reform as it has once more been presented to congress. A revenue cut of $200,000,000 was agreed upon.

Concessions made on both sides insure a non-partisan report of the bill but a unanimous report is almost certainly impossible.

To-day's decision of the Ways and Means committee may be summarized as follows:

Normal rates—1½ per cent on first $4,000; 3 per cent on next $4,000; 5 per cent on balance.

Surtax maximum—20 per cent.

Exemptions—Raised from $1,000 to $1,500 for single men, from $2,500 to $3,500 for married men.

Retention of earned income deduction of 25 per cent up to $10,000.

Estimated revenue reduction—$200,000,000.

The Mellon proposals discarded are as follows:

Normal rates—1 per cent on first $3,000; 2 per cent on next $4,000; 3 per cent on next $4,000; 5 per cent on the balance.

Exemptions the same as at present.

Elimination of earned income deduction provision.

Estimated revenue cut—$140,000,000.

That is the plan President Coolidge adopted the other day.

Now I come to our tax, and I will quote an article from the Simcoe Reformer, a paper which refers to the paying of taxes on taxes. Not satisfied with having municipal taxation we have a federal tax as well. You pay on what you do not earn, and that is the most inequitable tax that can be imposed. The article in the Simcoe Reformer reads as follows:

Paying Taxes on Taxes

To abolish an existing anomaly whereby Canadian people are paying taxes on taxes is the purpose of a resolution which T. L. Church, M.P., proposes to introduce in the House of Commons. The present Dominion income tax law provides for payment of taxes on gross income, less certain deductions which, however, do not cover the amount already paid or to be paid to the municipality, nor the taxes already paid on account of the home occupied by the taxpayer. Mr. Church calls for the abolition of the tax in toto, but as this tax is a big source of revenue for the administration of public business, it is unlikely that his demand will meet a favourable reception. That portion of his resolution which deals with the method of applying the tax should, however, be promptly dealt with. In the average individual case the difference between a tax on gross income and that on net income would not be large, but it is sufficient to excite much resentment among Canadian taxpayers. Taxes are already high enough without having to pay taxes upon taxes.

According to the text books on economics the principles on the basis of which taxation should be fair and just are as follows:

1. Equality or ability to pay.
2. Certainty.
3. Convenience.
4. Economy.

According to Andrew Mellon, Secretary of the United States Treasury, the principles of taxation are:

1. It must be scientific.
2. It must not disturb business.
3. It must get the most money with the least annoyance.

When he found that this income tax was eating into business and industry, he set about reducing it. Our income tax fails on all these aforesaid principles and grounds and it is unfair, unjust and inequitable. The chartered banks under the present law make no return of the amounts they have on deposit. It is impossible to understand exactly what the income tax law is to-day; it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to make up one's income tax bill, and a professional man experiences the utmost difficulty in making out his income tax form. Since this law was first put into force in 1917 exceptions and provisos have been made to every clause and the whole thing has become very complicated; in fact making a will is a simple matter in comparison with filling out an income tax form for the federal government. Therefore, if this tax is to be continued, the legislation and various acts should be consolidated, but it would be better if the tax were reduced or eliminated altogether. By increasing taxation from other sources the government would collect more in the long run and this form of taxation could be handed back to the municipalities.

Another feature in which this form of taxation is unfair is that the rate is the same on earned income as on dividends, and there should be a difference. In respect to dividends corporations are required to pay from 10 to 10½ per cent on profits realized in excess of $2,000, while shareholders are relieved only from payment of the normal tax.

Just to show how the small man and the man with the fixed salary are paying the greater part of the income tax, I may say that the total assessment from the inception of the income tax in 1917 to the end of 1924 was $267,004,599, while the amount collected during that period, exclusive of penalties and interest, was $265,228,674. That shows that the tax was collected from those whose income was known. As to those whose income was not known and who could evade the tax, that is another matter. According to the return made by the minister the government cannot find out the numbers of those with incomes of $1,000, $2,000, $3,000 and so on up to $100,000. All that information is a matter of bookkeeping; it is in the accountants' books throughout the country in the various taxation districts and is not available. The assessment commissioner of Toronto, in his report which was issued last month, gives the numbers of those with incomes of $1,000 up to the highest income on which the city collects taxes. He has found that there are seventy-six incomes over $50,000 and 29,781 incomes less than $1,000. From his tables I make the calculation that eighty per cent of the income tax is paid by those who have fixed salaries, including of course the lower salaried men.

The present Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) has not been unmindful of the injustice of this tax and I think he has been doing what he can to remove the burden of taxation from the breakfast table and from those least able to pay. I hope he will consider the economic principle of taxation of the ability of the average man to pay, a principle that is neglected in this method of income taxation, as I think I showed a few minutes ago. I pointed out that by these eleven federal forms of taxation $345,000,000 had been collected from the people, eighty per cent of it being taken from the small wage earners, and as to the income tax the man with a fixed salary pays, while some jobbers and others with large incomes are not paying anything at all. I know of one gentleman in Toronto—I sat on a board of directors with him—who is said to have an income of a million dollars and was not paying a cent of income tax, and yet he is occupying one of the highest positions in the country.

Why should this double tax be collected by the Dominion on the first of May and then about the same time by the municipalities on the 15th of May, making it a double-header tax on the fixed wage earner at the same time who is moreover paying taxes on taxes, taxes to the Dominion on the amount of money he pays to the municipality?

The other day the editor of the Grimsby Independent was sitting in his office thinking on political economy and taxation and this is what he says:

Discourse On Taxes

Grimsby Editor Tells a Few Plain Truths to All and Sundry

Grimsby—Editor of the Independent puts on his thinking cap and hands out wisdom so that he who runs may read—

A good many municipal authorities have the idea that a grant from the province or from the Dominion relieves the municipality of just that much expenditure. But it does not. All government money is the people's money, and our old friend, Mr. Ultimate Consumer, supplies it all in some way or other. This problem of taxation is one which requires much intelligent thought on the part of all citizens.

I understand the minister the other day met a deputation of the retail merchants who are complaining very bitterly about the burden of taxation that they are paying under the eleven different forms which I have set out to-day. I believe they went into the matter very thoroughly, pointing out that the federal income tax was not a tax which should continue and they presented him with a memorandum on the subject. I will not go into the memorandum to-day because time will not permit, except to say that it proves conclusively that this tax has been a failure and that by redistribution of the other ten existing forms of taxation we would collect more than is collected by this income tax.

Since this tax has been imposed central Canada has been paying the greatest proportion of it. Of the $57,000,000 collected in 1924 the amounts collected by provinces are as follows:

Prince Edward Island..	$ 38,000
Nova Scotia..	847,000
New Brunswick..	767,000
Quebec..	20,148,000
Ontario..	26,059,000
Manitoba..	3,526,000
Saskatchewan..	891,000
Alberta..	1,189,000
British Columbia..	3,930,000
Yukon..	69,000
Total..	$57,466,000

The municipalities of the country are to-day facing a situation that it is becoming increasingly difficult to cope with. The tax rates of Ontario municipalities have risen from 12 to 14 mills on the dollar, which they were before the war, to 28, 32, 36 and 38 mills on the assessment, some of them just three times what they were before the war, the reasons being increased costs of labour and materials and money, the higher cost of living, better living conditions, the eight-hour day and many other matters like that brought about since the war. For these and many other reasons which I have not time to discuss now, I trust the income tax will be discontinued by the government and handed back to the municipalities where it always was, or that the minister in his budget will make reductions and thus give relief.

The municipalities have only a limited field of taxation whereas the Dominion government can levy taxes in ten or eleven different directions. Surely the Minister of Finance (Mr Robb) can relieve the burden on the Canadian people in the matter of income tax. I know that he is doing the best he can but it is obvious that something more must be done. The income tax is one form of taxation that has proved a failure: the government has not been able to collect the tax from those who can best afford to pay it; it is being collected from the poorer and the middle classes. The wage earners have to bear the brunt of this tax, which is unfair and unjust. It is easy for the officials of the government to get after the poorer classes and those in the middle walk of life inasmuch as they can go to the office of the business employing these people and ascertain just what their wages are. It is therefore the people who have a fixed income that are always subject to direct supervision. In the case of the others to whom I have referred there are many ways of escape.

In conclusion I beg to move this resolution, which I trust the House will adopt. This field of taxation was formerly the special prerogative of the provinces and the municipalities and I think they should once more have the right to collect income tax, particularly, as I have pointed out, in view of the fact that their field is so limited. Moreover, increasing burdens and responsibilities are being placed upon the municipalities. For example, they are being called upon to provide for the unemployed, while soldiers who do not benefit by the pension provisions of the Dominion become a charge upon the municipalities. Hospitals and charities of various kinds have also been shouldered upon the municipalities, who to-day are bearing the peak load of taxation. I regret that the conference between the Dominion and the provinces and municipalities proved abortive but I trust that something will be done this year to relieve the situation. If the income tax cannot be entirely wiped out, at least the government might reduce it by fifty per cent, and put this country on the same basis as the United States so far as this particular branch of taxation is concerned. In the United States the income tax has been reduced three times in five years so that to-day the people over there are well off in this regard in comparison with Canadians. If the government could see its way clear to reduce the income tax to the extent I suggest, it would be the means of stimulating business and increasing production, and would help very materially indeed to solve the unemployment problem, and the $45,000,000 which the treasury would lose could be made up in other directions.

4 p.m.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend (Mr. Church) has presented his argument in a very fair manner, as he always does, and I thank him at once for his kind personal reference to myself. If there is any man in public life who requires a little comfort once in a while it is the Minister of Finance of the government of the day.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): He is standing it all right.

Mr. ROBB: Of course I am speaking of governments in general. There might be another government to-morrow. The Minister of Finance is obliged to find revenues for the administration of the affairs of the country and to provide for the deepening of harbours, for the erection of public buildings, for increased salaries, and all the rest of it. No later than yesterday the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church), who has so eloquently pleaded this afternoon for a reduction in the income tax, pleaded with equal ability for expenditures in the city of Toronto and for increased salaries to the employees of the country. Clearly, I shall have to have a half hour's quiet talk with my good friend to see whether he can offer me some recipe to enable me to meet the two demands he has made.

I know, of course, that taxes are never popular. Everyone likes to have his taxes as low as they possibly can be, and there are a great many people in Canada who are trying to dodge taxation. There are also methods provided whereby they can do so; we ourselves provided such methods during the war. At that time everyone was keyed up and we were all anxious to finance our share of the obligations of the war. We therefore issued a considerable quantity of tax-exempt bonds, which to-day are held for the most part, not by the ordinary taxpayer whom we can get at, but by rich people who could and should contribute to the revenues of the country. They have these tax exempt bonds stored away and are thereby enabled to evade taxation.

My hon. friend is quite correct when he says that the income tax and other taxes which the people of Canada are to-day paying are the result of the war. We went into the war to the limit, assuming great obligations, and although, as my hon. friend says, the war has been over for some years we must not forget that the expenditures incurred during that time have still to be met. In that sense, therefore, the war will not really be over for Canadians for some time to come. I do not suppose that there is an hon. member who would stand up in his place in this House and advocate a repudiation of the obligations which we undertook in the war. Well, we require money not only to meet the interest in our war debt but for pensions and many other expenses which are directly attributable to the war. For instance, it is reckoned by officers of the department that of the estimates now before the House fifty-eight per cent is required to provide for statutory and war expenditures. Hon. gentlemen will therefore observe how difficult it is for a government, let it economize how it will, to make both ends meet and to provide for the requirements of the country. And everyone who has confidence in this country will admit at once, I am sure, that there are certain undertakings which it is necessary that we should carry out.

My hon. friend referred to the conference held a few years ago in Ottawa between the Minister of Finance of the Dominion and the treasurers of a number of the provinces. Not all, but most of the provinces were represented at that conference, and while there was a difference of opinion upon some issues, I think we were unanimous on one point, and that is that both the Minister of Finance for the Dominion and each of the provincial treasurers were fairly well disposed to maintain the policy of "what we have, we hold." The provincial treasurers were all anxious to retain their taxes and I was equally anxious to hold on to the taxes in the federal field. It is true, as my hon. friend said in his concluding remarks, that the provinces have incurred considerable expenditure in recent years. This is due to the condition of the times. The automobile has brought about an increased expenditure in most provinces through the construction of better roads—for good roads are expensive. Many of the provinces have spent a good deal of money on the improvement of their highways, and this of course, involves taxation. I am glad to say, too, that there has been an improvement in our system of education; most of the provinces are paying more for education to-day. Many of the municipalities are also paving their streets, erecting public buildings, and doing other things that are adding materially to their expenditures, so that the provinces and the municipalities unquestionably have increased burdens to bear. But none of the provinces or municipalities have any war obligations to discharge. The obligations of the war are upon the federal treasury, and we of the Dominion parliament, having a desire to provide for the expense of the war and the carrying on of the affairs of the country, must consider very carefully what taxes we can dispense with. I notice in the argument of my hon. friend that he did not challenge the right of the Dominion government to impose an income tax. That question was challenged by a minister of one of the provinces, who claimed that under the British North America Act the provinces alone could impose income tax. The question was decided in a judgment rendered by the Privy Council in the case of Caron vs. the King in 1924, and for the information of hon. members I shall place on the record the headnote of that judgment:

The parliament of Canada had power under section 91 head 3 of the British North America Act, 1867, to enact The Income War Tax Act, 1917 and amending act, of 1919, whereby every person residing or ordinarily residing or carrying on business in Canada is rendered liable to pay income tax; and a minister of the government of a province is liable under the acts in respect of the salary and sessional indemnity payable to him under statutes of the province.

The Income Tax Act of 1917 was first introduced by Sir Thomas White in July of that year. It might be interesting to hon. members to have on the record the opinion of Sir Thomas White, who was Finance minister of the day. Sir Thomas White was not only a good Finance minister, but a good lawyer and a well posted legal authority as well, and had very decided views on taxation problems as between federal and provincial governments. Sir Thomas, in presenting that bill, made these observations, which I find on page 3760 of revised Hansard of 1917:

Mr. Chairman, the enactment of the Military Service bill which has just passed through the House will result in material increase in and acceleration of the war expenditures of the Dominion.

By that bill, provision is made for calling an additional 100,000 men to the forces of Canada. In view of the expenditure involved, and in order to maintain the credit of the Dominion, it is necessary that we should adopt further taxation measures. Apart from this necessity from a financial standpoint, there has arisen, in connection with the Military Service bill, both in this House and in the country, a very natural and, in my view a very just, sentiment that those who are in the enjoyment of substantial incomes should substantially and directly contribute to the growing war expenditures of the Dominion.

In view of these considerations, I desire to-day to lay before this committee proposals for a national measure of income taxation. I may say that the adoption of such a measure is a distinct innovation in federal fiscal legislation. Hitherto we have relied upon duties of customs and of excise, postal rates and other miscellaneous sources of revenue. It is true that since the outbreak of the war we have adopted the Business Profits War Tax Act which is a measure of direct taxation akin to income taxation, but not so wide in its scope. As the members of the committee are aware, the Dominion government, under the provisions of the British North America Act, is empowered to raise revenue by any mode or form of taxation, whether direct or indirect. On the contrary, the provinces, and, by consequence, the municipalities which derive their taxation powers from the provinces, are confined, in the raising of their revenues, to measures of direct taxation. For this reason, since the outbreak of the war, I have hesitated to bring down a measure of federal income taxation. As I have stated, the provinces and the municipalities are confined to direct taxation, and I have not regarded it as expedient, except in case of manifest public necessity, such as I believe exists at the present time, that the Dominion should invade the field to which the provinces are solely confined for the raising of their revenue.

It will be observed that Sir Thomas White hesitated to bring down that measure, but having the responsibility of providing for the maintenance of our army at the front and for the interest on the debts which had already accrued, he saw the necessity of entering the income tax field and thus providing revenues for carrying on the affairs of the country.

I have sometimes heard Sir Thomas White criticized for having, when he was financing the war, exempted so many from taxation through tax-exempt bonds. I was never disposed to find much fault with that, because we were living alongside of the United States and they as well as most of the countries in the war at that time were providing tax-exempt bonds. Sir Thomas, having the responsibility of raising money, adopted those measures which were adopted by most of the other countries. So I say here to-day that I am not challenging the policy of Sir Thomas White. Had I at that time the responsibility I have to-day, and under similar conditions, I do not know that I could have done much better.

Mr. MANION: I would like to ask my hon. friend a question. Is it not also true that in the United States there are many states and municipalities which have the right even to-day of issuing tax-exempt bonds?

Mr. ROBB: I am coming to that in a moment, but the fact remains that in financing the war we did provide a means for many people to evade taxation. We have tax-dodgers in this country, as they have in other countries. I am told of a method of evading taxation which is not novel to this country but was borrowed from the United Kingdom, whereby certain companies were organized to enable people to escape taxation. Notwithstanding all that, the people of Canada very cheerfully and willingly contributed to the public exchequer for the carrying on of the war, and the revenues which we have derived from these various taxes have helped materially in providing the interest on the war debt and the pensions we are now paying.

My hon. friend a few moments ago made some reference to the changes in the revenues derived from these sources of income. I have before me now the figures. The revenues from that source in 1918-1919 were $9,349,719.-80; in 1919-1920, $20,263,739.91; in 1920-1921 $46,381,824.31; in 1921-1922, $78,684,354.80; in 1922-1923, $59,711,538.37; in 1923-1924, $54,204,-027.99; in 1924-1925, $56,248,042.82. These figures may be found in the Public Accounts, at page 47.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): In what year was the maximum amount received?

Mr. ROBB: The maximum was received in 1921-1922. That, I imagine, would be due to the addition of some of the revenues from some of the previous years, when there was a change coming in concerning the business profits tax and the income tax. Some of the taxes which formerly went into the business profits tax might have come in the income tax.

Mr. GEARY: If I might ask a question, why does my hon. friend give the years as "1922-1923" and so on?

Mr. ROBB: That is the way they are listed in the public accounts, from which I am quoting.

Mr. GEARY: Will the minister tell me why that is? It is the annual calendar year.

Mr. ROBB: The fiscal year ends March 31, and I refer to this year, for instance, as 1926-1927.

Mr. GEARY: I see what you mean.

Mr. ROBB: In addition to the income tax, we have other special war taxes that were imposed under the legislation of 1915. It is not necessary for me to enumerate all these special taxes, but the total revenue derived from these so-called war taxes—so-called war taxes, let me repeat that—in the last fiscal year was approximately $147,000,000, while during the same period the expenditure on account of the war was approximately $167,-000,000; so these taxes imposed for war purposes last year were, in round figures, about $20,000,000 short of providing for the total obligations arising that year out of the war.

It may interest hon. gentlemen, in view of statements that have been made from time to time as to the cost of collecting the income tax, to know that the Commissioner of Taxation, Mr. Breadner, advises me that the cost of collecting the income tax has during the past five years averaged two and two-thirds per cent.

While we all admit that Canada has more taxes than we would like to have, and more taxes than we had prior to the entry of Canada and of the whole world into the war, nevertheless Canada is not taxed to a degree that would induce any of our citizens to leave Canada and go and live in some other country. Indeed, the taxation in Canada compares favourably with that of almost any other country in the world where the people enjoy the same comforts. I have here a newspaper reference to the comparative taxation of Canada and other countries. I shall not read the article, because hon. members read the papers just as I do, but if they will refer to the Ottawa Citizen editorial column of March 13, 1926, they will find there a comparison of the per capita tax paid by Canada, Australia, Great Britain and the United States. It is estimated that the total per capita tax paid in Canada, and this includes, I imagine, federal, provincial and municipal taxation, is $66.11; in Australia, $69.68; in Great Britain, $97.12; and in the United States, $67.39. In other words, the per capita tax in the United States, the country where they boast much of reduction of taxation, is $67.39, as compared with $66.11 in Canada.

Mr. MANION: May I ask my hon. friend a question in that regard? I do it for information, because that statement has been put out two or three times, and I fear it is wrong.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is right.

Mr. MANION: What I was going to ask is this: How is it that the per capita tax in Canada is only $66 when the tax collected by the federal government alone amounts almost to that? Where do the provinces and the municipalities come in?

Mr. ROBB: I am speaking of the taxes imposed. I have here a statement which has been sent to me by a firm—I do not like to give the name, but if any hon. gentleman is interested I will show him the letter in confidence. It is from a firm of high-class attorneys and counsellors-at-law in New York city, and they provide me with this information. It came about in this way. Their attention had been directed to the grumblings of some Canadians over the duplication of taxation in Canada, and they said: You people in Canada do not know anything about taxation. Here is the information they give me as to the taxation that would be imposed upon a gentleman residing in the city of New York. He would be subject to:

1. Federal income tax.
2. New York state income tax.
3. Local real estate taxes.
4. Local taxes upon certain kinds of personal property.
5. Special tax laws, for instance, the tax on motor cars, motor boats, and so forth.

In addition to the foregoing, all individuals there indirectly pay various forms of excise taxes, taxes upon theatre tickets, taxes on club memberships, taxes upon automobiles, and so forth. Then in addition to that, there is another tax which their heirs cannot escape after they are gone; that is, the inheritance tax. Some of our provinces have an inheritance tax, but we have no federal inheritance tax like they have in the United States. In the United States they not only have a federal inheritance tax, but many of the states also impose an inheritance tax, and a resident of New York city, or rather his estate, would have to pay not only a federal inheritance tax, but the New York state inheritance tax and the inheritance tax of any other state in which he held property.

Mr. McGIBBON: Would it not be much fairer to compare the ratio of taxation with that of income? Upon that basis does not Canada stand fourth of all countries in the world?

Mr. ROBB: That is a debatable proposition. Having placed these figures on Hansard, I come now to something that may be perhaps a little more hopeful. If hon. gentlemen will follow the estimates as presented to parliament, and the expenditure as found in the public accounts, for the different years this government has been in power, they will find that each year there has been a reduction in the estimates presented to parliament, and a reduction in the expenses incurred. We have reduced some of the so-called obnoxious taxes, and we have made certain exemptions. When Sir Thomas White brought in some of his obnoxious taxes, the sales tax, for instance, and excise taxes, certain exemptions were made, and from year to year we have added to the list of exemptions. On certain foodstuffs we have reduced the sales tax, and on certain items we have removed it entirely; we have cut it in two on boots and shoes, and the finances now are in such shape that I hope to sit down with the officers and be able to work out something that will give a little relief to the people in the way of taxation. I do not say that that relief will be in income taxation; I do not say it will be in the sales tax, but I do agree with my hon. friend from Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) to this extent, that in so far as we are able we must from year to year try to reduce taxation, and particularly try to get away from these so-called obnoxious taxes. But we can only do that if we have the support not only of those who sit on this side of the House, but as well of hon. gentlemen opposite in effecting economies. It is no use to preach economy one day, and the next day to urge expenditures in different parts of the country.

I repeat that there are certain expenditures that must be carried on. Not long ago I had a conversation with the president of one of the largest banks in the country; perhaps I am betraying no confidence when I say it was with the president of the largest bank in Canada. He said: "Mr. Robb, I think we have carried this economy idea to an extreme. I think it is reasonable that the government should provide certain expenditures for carrying on the affairs of Canada and developing this vast country." So that is the policy of the government: to economize where we can but not to the extent to discourage the development of our country and the opening up of new territory.

Mr. CHABOT: From 1921 to 1925 the revenue from special war taxes was about $535,000,000 more than it was from 1917 to 1921. What attempt was made by the government during that time to economize with a view of reducing taxation and the cost of living? The minister spoke of economy. Well, the government had an increase in the revenue there, from that source alone, of over $500,000,000 in those four years. I fail to see what attempt was made to reduce the taxation of the national debt at that time.

Mr. ROBB: Answering my hon. friend's very fair question—and I observe that he not only puts a question but attempts to answer it—if he will refer to the public accounts, audited by the Auditor General, he will discover that the expenditure has decreased year by year since 1922.

Mr. MILLAR: In connection with the levying of income tax, has the government considered the advisability of collecting the tax for a period of three, four or five years? If that were done it would be possible to provide for what we might call a lean year out of the profits of the good years.

Mr. ROBB: There is something to be said for my hon. friend's suggestion. I may say that the officers of the department have had that matter under consideration and study. Their objection to the proposal is that there is no finality. The system has not been satisfactory in Great Britain. They have there, I think, a three-year period, but it has not been as satisfactory as they would wish. Consequently they have recently been considering the adoption of the Canadian method, which is operative each year. I may say this to my hon. friend, that I have had some very lean years.

Mr. MANION: I asked the minister a question as to the issue of tax-free bonds in the United States both by municipalities and by states. He said that he would deal with the question but omitted to do so. May I ask if the minister has any information on this subject?

Mr. ROBB: I have information that they are even now in the United States issuing some tax-free bonds, but I am not prepared to admit that it is a wise policy in these days of peace.

Mr. MANION: I was not discussing that point. I merely wanted to know if that was not true, and whether the minister had any information on the subject.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I largely sympathize with the motion made by my hon. friend (Mr. Church), in favour of a reduction in taxation. The minister spoke of the enormous burdens that have to be met in this country, and pointed out that the revenue from income tax goes in a measure to meet these obligations. Now, I want to point out—I have done so before, but I am going to do it again—that we are wasting over $200,000,000 a year by maintaining a duplicate system of railroads in this country. I read in the evening paper that the new Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), says that he is going to maintain the two systems in spite of anything. He does say that he hopes to get a reduction of duplicate services; but I want to take this occasion, as representing the views of the Canadian people, to point out that they feel the enormous burden of our income tax. If that is so, it is up to the government of to-day to begin to reduce that burden and to deal with the railway question and the waste of $200,000,000 by unnecessary duplicate services. I hope the minister will pay attention to the fact that the Minister of Railways makes the announcement in western Canada to-day that he is going to maintain the two railway services notwithstanding the cost to the country which they involve.

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, contrary perhaps to your expectation, I do not rise to give support to-day to the remarks of my hon. friend from South York, although there is a great deal to be said for his contention with regard to waste by way of duplication in the two railway systems in Canada. I should like to make one or two observations on the subject of taxation now before the House. I think all of us receive from time to time many copies of resolutions passed by various public bodies and others asking that certain taxes shall be completely wiped out. Some ask that the income tax be discontinued, others say that the sales tax should be discontinued; and we are quite unable in many instances to judge for ourselves, as between the varying claims, just what we should do. It is true, of course, that taxes are always irksome. Anything that takes money out of our pockets is very unwelcome indeed.

As I see it, Sir, and I have had some experience in the matter of municipal taxation, there are really only two principles upon which the system of taxation can be based. The first one, and perhaps the fairest, if it can be applied, is to tax according to the service that is given by the expenditure of the moneys raised by way of taxation. That would be the ideal way, the fair, and the just way, if it could be properly applied at all times. In the municipality we can do that to some extent. Taxes collected from the ratepayers are expended on education, fire protection, police protection, and so on. So that there we have developed perhaps to the greatest degree the principle of taxation according to value given. The other principle is to tax people according to their ability to pay, and it seems to me that so far as federal taxation is concerned, that is the principle that should be followed. Perhaps I might qualify that statement. If it were possible to pay the expenses incidental to a national debt caused by the war by taxing those who made money as a result of the war, it would be a very good thing indeed. I am not sure that it is possible to do that. Now, then I say that the income tax is right in principle. The man who earns a great deal of money, who makes a great deal of money by reason of the opportunities provided by this country, can very well be called upon to contribute a portion of his gains to the expenses of the country.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the small fellow?

Mr. EULER: I am coming to his case in a moment. While I agree in general with some of the observations, and should like to see the income tax reduced if it were possible, I must disagree with my hon. friend (Mr. Church), who suggested that the collection of income tax should be left to the municipalities rather than to the federal government. Probably I am going to get in wrong with my own municipality when I say this, but I believe that since large incomes are made—I am referring particularly to the larger incomes—largely because of the opportunities presented by Canada as a whole, therefore it is fair that the federal government should take a fair proportion of those earnings. If the principle is correct it seems to me it is then pretty much a matter of how the taxation should be applied. I should like to see taxation, the income tax and other taxes, made as little irksome as possible. There is room for improvement as far as the income tax is concerned and as regards some of our other forms of taxation. So long as I have been a member of this House—certainly so long as the nuisance taxes have been in existence—I have protested against the imposition of such taxation. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Finance knows that; I think his predecessor knows that also.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): What do you mean by nuisance taxes?

Mr. EULER: I mean such taxes as the stamp tax, the tax on checks, the tax on receipts, and all that sort of thing. I see no excuse for the imposition of these taxes; they are just about as inconsistent as the old window tax we used to read about in our school histories. There is no reason for this method of taxation except that it is one means of getting money without any regard as to whether it is got fairly or not, and it imposes inconveniences not justified by the results. I wish the minister could see his way clear, when he brings down the budget, to say "I am going to wipe out the stamp taxes and what are known as the nuisance taxes."

If you make your income tax too high, there is the constant temptation, as we see from day to day, to evade that tax, and I am sure the minister is losing millions of money that should fairly be paid into the treasury if it were possible to collect all the income tax that should be collected. Sometimes a tax will defeat itself. Perhaps I am out of order when I say that I would give as an instance of that in certain forms of excise tax. If you make your excise tax on alcohol—although I have not that particularly in mind—or on tobacco and cigarettes too high, you simply defeat the purpose of the tax altogether and encourage bootlegging and smuggling.

Mr. LAPOINTE: You are right.

Mr. EULER: My hon. friend says the middle man pays the most of the taxes. I do not know what he means by that. Perhaps he refers to the man who earns in excess of $2,000, up to $4,000 or $5,000. While I do not question that, I think it is true that the great majority of the working men of Canada under the present law do not, except perhaps indirectly—I suppose they do indirectly—pay a very great proportion of the income tax, and it should be so. I judge that most of the working men, the artisans and others, do not earn a great deal in excess of $2,000 a year, the amount which is exempt under the present law, and if they have a family of children they have an another exemption of $500 for each child. So that I believe after all most of the income taxes are paid by those who can fairly well afford to pay. At the same time I would have no objection if the sum of the exemptions were somewhat increased, possibly to $3,000.

Something has been said about the overlapping of taxation. I think the fact that three different bodies have the power to tax incomes is absurd in the extreme. That municipalities should have the power to tax incomes, that certain provinces should have the power to tax incomes, and that the federal government again should have the power to tax incomes seems absurd and entirely unfair. I do not know what the remedy is. I do not know whether it is necessary to amend the British North America Act in order to correct that evil, but if so perhaps it might be worth well to do such an unprecedented thing as to change that act.

Something is said about the fact that the United States have been cutting their income tax, and that because they had done so we also should do it. I grant that it is very desirable, if the United States by cutting their income tax are creating a condition which operates against us so far as business is concerned, that we should follow their example if we can, but we must consider this: If the same conditions obtain in Canada as obtain in the United States, then we can follow their example, but not otherwise. Fortunately for themselves, they are a wealthy nation and they have been able to reduce taxation, but I do not know whether that is possible in Canada. We must find the money to pay our obligations. The Minister of Finance has given us some encouragement to expect something in this regard. In all these proposals to reduce or abolish the sales tax, the income tax, or some other tax I have found a great dearth of practical suggestions as to how these taxes are going to be replaced by something else, and yet that is necessary.

I desire to make one or two suggestions. I spoke of one already, and that is the abolition of what I call the nuisance tax. We ought also to abolish what is known as the supertax—the tax upon a tax. That seems to me unfair. The income tax could also be somewhat simplified again. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance a question. Perhaps the former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) would take it upon himself to answer, because it was under his administration and that of his predecessor that the law was framed. My question is, why are speculative profits not taxable? As I understand the law, it is only the income a man makes from his regular business and from dividends and interest receipts that is taxed. A speculator buys a stock upon margin and invests a small amount of money, if you can call it an investment. He puts up perhaps $10,000, and by a fortunate turn in the market makes another $10,000. In that investment there is no labour involved, and that $10,000 unearned profit is free from income tax. I could never see why the profits earned in speculation should not be more justly taxable than the income earned by a man's own efforts.

An hon. MEMBER: Would you give him back his losses?

Mr. EULER: If he loses money in business, he does not get it back either. It would be fair to make some provision for losses sustained; say for example a business man has a large profit in some one year and in the next year he may lose just as much as he realized the year before; yet he pays taxes on the profits in the year when he is least able to pay. I know by experience—at least by having my attention drawn to it—that in the year 1920, for example, some manufacturers were very successful and made big profits. However, the next year they suffered very heavy losses—just as heavy as the profits made the year before—and yet in the year in which they lost their money they had to find money to pay the taxes on the profits made the year before. They were not one cent ahead on the two years but, had to pay the tax just the same. I understand that in England—and I am open to correction on this—the period during which the income taxes shall be calculated shall be a four year period.

An hon. MEMBER: Three.

Mr. EULER: I think the principle is entirely sound, and we have now had the income tax in operation sufficiently long that we should be able to adopt that principle.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What would my hon. friend say in regard to profits made out of bootlegging?

Mr. EULER: I think I would take them all. I believe absolutely in the soundness and the justice of the income tax. I also believe that it should be reasonably applied and not made any more irksome than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I stated in the House the other day that I thought the income tax was one of the most unfair taxes that we had to deal with. I am still of that opinion because the basis of all taxation ought to be its fairness. I should like to draw the attention of the member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) to the fact that in the last five years—I am speaking from memory now and I put the figures on Hansard the other day—the salaried class, who cannot evade the income tax, have paid about $62,000,000 out of $170,000,000 odd collected. There is one class in this community who cannot evade payment of their taxes. They not only have to pay their own income tax, but, as everybody knows, they have to pay a large share of other people's taxes which are passed on to them in one form and another and I am not finding fault with that. I think it is the legitimate process of business to pass the taxes on, but the fact remains nevertheless that the salaried class in this country to-day is being punished the most by this tax. They cannot evade it, and I hope the Minister of Finance will give this matter at least part of his attention. They have to pay their own tax, because their salary is on record, or reported by their superiors; and the income tax of others is passed on to them and they have to pay indirectly.

Mr. EULER: I quite appreciate what the hon. member says and I agree with him there is a difficulty in that direction. Does he regard that as a sufficient reason for abolishing the tax entirely, and if so, what would he suggest to take its place?

Mr. McGIBBON: I am not advocating abolishing the tax; I am speaking about the unfairness of the tax as it is at present applied. There is no question that the tax is being evaded. It has been stated this afternoon that victory bonds which are tax free are largely held by rich people. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and I am sure the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) know that to-day men can invest their money in stocks from which they receive a fairly good interest and yet escape the income tax because that tax is paid at the source. If I understand the application of this tax correctly, we do not apply a double taxation and to-day we have the wealthy class buying stocks that are as good as gold and that pay good interest, and thus being exempt from this income tax. We have also dozens of organizations, holding companies and such like, as a result of which men of wealth and means have their incomes exempted from taxation. Those are some of the unfair ways in which this tax is applied.

The income tax to-day has a very great effect in increasing the cost of living so that the poor man and the salaried man are hit in still another manner. What are we getting out of this tax? We know the tax received from the larger incomes has been decreasing every year and that will probably continue in an increasing degree. On the other hand the one class in this country that cannot evade the tax is being punished more severely every year. This country cannot carry on business and at the same time have a higher rate of taxation than that which exists in the country to the south of us. Taxation is more or less dependent upon business. If you have no business you are not going to pay taxes, while if you make the country more prosperous, incomes will increase and you will be able to collect a larger amount of revenue from the different sources of taxation. The present application of this tax is unfair to the majority of our citizens, it is increasing the cost of living and it is one of the greatest hindrances to business in Canada.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the hon. gentleman consider the possibility of a super tax on incomes earned in Canada but enjoyed by those resident outside of Canada?

Mr. McGIBBON: I do not know whether there are many in that class or not, but I see nothing wrong with the suggestion. If people are making their money in Canada and do not think this country is good enough to live in, if it is possible to tax their incomes, I would do so. As the hon. member for North Waterloo said, there are other methods of evading this tax. For instance, I think it is a fact that if a man so wishes he can go on the stock market and buy good stocks for which he does not need to pay outright even if he has the money to do so, and if I understand the application of this tax properly he is not taxed on such holdings. A man can also buy stocks which have a real value, which are non-dividend paying, but which will increase and are bound to increase in value in the next two or three years, and that profit is not taxed. Therefore, I say that application of this tax as it is enforced to-day is not in the best interest of this country. I am not advocating the abolition of the tax, but I think it could be enforced in a manner that would be much fairer to the Canadian people and that would produce a greater revenue for the public treasury. I am offering these suggestions to the minister, and I hope he will take into consideration the salaried people who cannot evade the tax and who are indirectly paying a considerable amount of the other taxes.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I want to place myself very solidly behind income taxation as a principle. I agree with the statement that the only principle of taxation is ability to pay, and the intention is that the income tax should be levied upon those who are able to pay. I agree with the statement that in its application it has not always worked out fairly, but I am glad the hon member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) has not advocated the abolition of the tax. I was under the impression from remarks he made in this House on a former occasion he was advocating the abolition of the income tax. I agree that there are some things in which its application is unfair. Undoubtedly those who are living upon fixed salaries are in a different position from others in that it is hard for them to evade this tax, because the amount of their income can be readily ascertained and they are in all cases compelled to pay according to the amount.

I will offer one or two suggestions as to the system we might adopt. A distinction should be made between earned income, that is income derived from salaries or income actually earned in the conduct of business, and income derived from investments. On the one hand you have a salaried man depending upon a fixed salary and paying his regular tax every year. He passes away and those who are dependent upon him are deprived of that source of income. Another man who is perhaps living upon the proceeds of investment passes away and yet the income goes on, his family receiving the same income as they did while he was alive.

Some attention should be paid to incomes derived from stocks in any corporation. As has been pointed out, under the present system the taxation is collected at the source. Objection is sometimes taken that the income tax handicaps industry, and I believe it would be well if in order to get rid of that objection, industries as such should not be subjected to this taxation, but that it should be levied upon individuals. I know the amount is much more easily collected at the source as is the case to-day, but I do not see any reason why a wealthy man who is drawing large dividends from stocks should be exempted from paying income tax on that amount. I would prefer that the tax on industrial corporations should be abolished and should be levied entirely upon the individuals. The most equitable way would be to have the tax levied over a period of three or four years. Not only is it true in business, but it is eminently true of those who make their living from farming that there are sometimes very lean years. A farmer may have a good crop one year and be in a position to pay a tax while the next year he may be in no position at all to pay a tax. The result is that he may pay much more than he would be really entitled to pay if the tax were extended over a three-year period. I appreciate the objection that might be raised by the officers of the department that it would be difficult to apply such a system, but if it could be applied, there is no question as to its fairness. I do not think it is necessary to lay emphasis upon the fact that the income tax increases the cost of living, for all taxes do that. I do not see any reason therefore for distinguishing between this and any other form of taxation from the standpoint of the cost of living.

Mr. McGIBBON: Does the hon. member think that the sales tax contributes very much to the cost of living?

Mr. BROWN: To some extent all taxes must have that effect. Hon. gentlemen talk about taxes being a levy on capital, but all taxes are in some measure a levy on capital. We are taking something out of our pockets when we pay taxes, and therefore we have that much less with which to carry on business.

Considerable stress has been laid on income tax as an inequitable levy. The hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) dwelt upon this point. It seems to me that his argument would have had a great deal more force had he not suggested that the right to impose an income tax should be abandoned by the Dominion and left to the municipalities. If the income tax is unfair when levied by the Dominion, it is certainly just as unfair for the municipalities to impose it.

I would point out one respect in which, as I suggested a year or two ago, there might be some redress in the matter of income tax. I refer particularly to the tax as applied to farmers. Now, the farmer and his wife are one body working together, and their income is considered a joint return for purposes of taxation. In the case of people in some other walk of life, however, although husband and wife may have separate incomes they are allowed two exemptions. I admit that if the farmer's wife derives an income from some source outside the farm it is considered as separate from her husband's, but no matter how hard the two may work together on the farm, their income is treated as a joint income when it comes to paying the income tax. There are many men in other walks of life who enjoy a good income themselves while their wives are also in receipt of a fair competence, and they are entitled to two exemptions. My contention has always been and is now that the income of the wife for purposes of taxation should be considered jointly with that of her husband and be subject to one exemption, and this in every case.

Mr. J. L. CHABOT (Ottawa): I just want to comment briefly upon a question I put to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) when he was discussing the matter of taxation in a general way. The minister has been kind enough to send me a copy of the public accounts, to enlighten me as to the reduction in expenditures by the government during its tenure of office between the years 1921 and 1925, and I am bound to say that during that time the government has failed to deal satisfactorily with taxation, notwithstanding the wonderful resources of the country, notwithstanding our favourable situation, and notwithstanding the fact that Canada pays less than any other country in the world for self-defence. My figures are also derived from the public accounts. I claim that from 1921 to 1925 the government has actually collected in the form of special taxes the sum of $529,601,176 more than the government preceding it did during a similar period. In 1917 the special war taxes amounted to $16,000,000; in 1918, $25,000,000; in 1919, $56,000,000, and in 1920, $82,000,000. Let us compare that with the revenues derived from the same source in the Liberal regime for three years. I have not the figures for 1921, but in 1922 there was collected $177,484,000; in 1923, $181,634,000, and in 1924, $182,000,000 odd. Notwithstanding these enormous collections the government did not reduce taxation by a cent, and I simply want to express the hope now that if hon. gentlemen opposite retain power for any length of time —as I am sure they will not—they will make an honest effort to reduce expenditures and thus reduce taxation.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the hon. member taking into consideration the value of the dollar in the respective periods he has cited? That is an important factor.

Mr. CHABOT: That may make some difference, but it cannot account for the large increase in revenue from 1921 to 1925 over the preceding four years.

Mr. HEAPS: In 1920 the value of the dollar was 41.1.

Mr. CHABOT: The Canadian dollar was never as low as that.

Mr. HEAPS: I am speaking of the purchasing power of the dollar; that is what we have to consider.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) objected to the income tax on the ground that in some cases it was being passed on. This may be partly true of course, but I can think of no other tax that cannot be passed on while this one can be passed on only to a limited extent. As pointed out by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown), the farmer in many cases pays in lean years for that which he has reaped in fat years, and others may be able to show that in some respects the tax militates against them in the same way. Judging by the remarks of some hon. gentlemen, there seems to be an impression that this is a new tax, but I was surprised to read recently that it was proposed over a hundred years ago. The Reverend Henry Beeke, professor of modern history at Oxford from 1801 to 1813, who was frequently called into consultation by Pitt, proposed this form of taxation at that time. He wrote a book entitled Observations on the Produce of the Income Tax, in which he claimed that the tax was based on moral equity and political wisdom. I believe the income tax has come to stay. It has been known for over a hundred years, and it is one form of taxation that is levied on those who are able to pay it. I believe it should be kept in force.

In Canada we have no means of knowing how much income tax the individual pays, but in the United States, until a short time ago at any rate, the figures were published. I believe a change has been made recently, so that the returns are not now made public, but statistics are available to show how much was paid by various individuals in the year 1923. I quote the following:

> These returns have to do with the year 1923 and present many curious features. For instance, Douglas Fairbanks put up $225,000 as his yearly share, while the greatest international banker in the country, J. P. Morgan, paid $98,000. Jack Dempsey's share was $90,000. All of which goes to show that from a financial standpoint it is far better to be a movie king than a financial king, and it is almost as lucrative to be a "pug" in the first flight. President Coolidge paid a modest $6,600, while the Ford family contributed $19,000,000. John D. Rockefeller, Sr., paid $124,000 while John D. Jr., paid $7,425,000.
> Andrew W. Mellon, Pittsburgh, Secretary of the Treasury in the Coolidge cabinet, appears to be the richest man in public life in that country, as he paid in 1923 the sum of $1,173,000 in income taxes. William Wrigley, Junior, of Chicago, contributed $865,000 as his share of the income tax in 1923, while his corporation paid $649,000.

We should not forget that money must be raised and the business of the country carried on. Canada was spending hundreds of millions of dollars in the Great war while the United States was selling munitions to the allies and filling her coffers with that money, and that is one reason why at present we as Canadian people must expect to pay a heavier tax than is paid in the United States. We should not object to this; we favoured carrying on the war; we favoured putting in our last dollar if necessary to win the war, and now we have to pay the price. We have not the figures for Canada, but if they were available they would show that the large sums are paid by the rich. If they are not collected from the rich they must be collected from the poor, which would form a very heavy tax. The sums which I have quoted, spread over the masses of the people of the United States, would add greatly to the cost of living.

In a discussion such as this reference is frequently made to the fact that the producer of grain or cattle—in a word, the farmer of Canada—pays a very small share of the income tax. Objection should not be taken to that, for the reason that he is not paying because he is not making any money. If he were making money he would as readily contribute his share to the upkeep of the country as any other class. He has no objection to paying according to his ability to pay, but owing to the fact that the prices of farm produce dropped very suddenly after the war while the prices of other commodities were reduced very very slightly or not at all, the farmer was the first to suffer. It may be admitted that he made money easily in many cases during the war, and I think I may further admit that when he was making money easily, in a great many cases he was just the same kind of simple person we find in the city; he spent his money just as easily. If those who live in the cities think the farmer spent his money too freely and expanded too much, they are blaming him for the same mistake they themselves made and will perhaps make again. For the last four or five years the income of the farmer has been very small, and in many cases he has had to live on his capital. He is worth less now than he was worth five years ago, yet he is making as little complaint as possible. He is carrying on and keeping his land in a good state of cultivation so that when the opportunity comes to produce a crop and take his stand with other industries and pay his share of taxes, he will be able to do so. I think that is all you could expect.

It may be contended—and I have heard it stated—that the fact of so many farmers not paying income tax is evidence that they are shirking their duty, that they are either putting in no statements or making false statements. I do not for one moment think that that is correct. You will find people in every walk of life with so little honour and so little patriotism as to put in a false statement or bring about an adjustment of business whereby they would be relieved of paying income taxes, but I do not think they are any more numerous among the farmers of the country than among the professional and industrial people. It is simply that the farmer has not the money, and until he reaches the point where he is able to pay, I think it better for even those industries of Canada which are paying the large proportion that they should carry the burden for the present. The producer of grain and cattle will thereby the sooner reach a position to purchase the manufactured goods of these companies.

Objection is sometimes taken to this tax, because there is a little difficulty in making out the income tax statement. I am inclined to think that the benefits accruing to the agricultural class—speaking of that class only, because I believe they are the greatest offenders in not keeping proper books—the advantages they get from that training and from being compelled to keep books will repay for the inconvenience and sometimes the small cost they are put to in securing the services of those competent to make out the statements. As time goes on they will find less difficulty, and many of them now know where they are making and where they are losing money, largely because they have been compelled to keep some records. I believe they will derive considerable benefit from that.

If the income tax can be simplified or reduced in proportion as other forms of taxation are reduced, I would be very glad, but since it is the fairest form of taxation and cannot be passed on, I would be very sorry indeed to see it abolished.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few words to say in regard to this matter. I am entirely in accord with the principle involved in the income tax, and I think it would be a very great mistake to abolish that tax as one source of revenue to the country. Adjustments may be necessary in order to make it more equitable and fair, but I would be absolutely opposed to its abolition.

There is no doubt, as the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) has said, that the burden of taxation on the municipalities is at present extremely heavy. Speaking for the rural districts I can say that today the taxes on farms and farm property in eastern Ontario amount practically to a rent, and are bearing very heavily on the people. We must have a better system of roads than we formerly had, and the costs of education are much higher than they were a few years ago.

Mr. BROWN: Would the hon. gentleman tell us about what the ordinary tax is on a well equipped, hundred acre farm?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I think on a good, well equipped farm of one hundred acres the tax would probably be between $250 and $300. I would not like my hon. friend to take that as definite, because there would be a very great variation, but the tax is heavy and there is no question that in Ontario—and I presume it is much the same in other parts of the country—municipal taxation has increased tremendously in the last eight or ten years. So I think my first statement may be taken as fairly correct, that a great many people in the country districts regard the present taxation on farm property as practically equivalent to a rent.

I have just one or two observations to make with respect to the remarks of the last speaker (Mr. Millar), as well as those of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb). I agree with the last speaker that the farmers of this country will be as willing to pay their share of taxation, whether it is income tax or any other tax, as any other class of the community. No other class of our citizens will play the game any fairer than the farmers will. It is true, I believe, that they are not paying very much in income taxation, and the reason they are not doing so is because they have not the income, and the reason they have not the income is to be found largely on the other side of the House in the policy pursued by the present government and backed up by hon. gentlemen to my left. I want to suggest this further thought, that if the government persists in the course which it has indicated a tendency to follow and submits to further dictation from these so-called free traders from the west, I do not think they will get any income tax from farmers in any part of Canada, because they are exposing the farmers of Canada unjustly to the competition of the world, and are not giving them a fair deal and a fair opportunity to make an income on which they might pay some income tax.

The figures presented by the Minister of Finance as to the amount of income tax collected in the last three or four years are very suggestive. I recall that prior to 1921 the Liberal party in this country were very loud in their condemnation of the Conservative government on account of the so-called war taxes, income tax and other taxes.

Mr. EULER: The Union government.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Well, the Union government; that will bring my friend nearer to the condemnation. So strongly did the Liberal party feel in regard to this matter that in their platform of 1919 they put in a special clause condemning the government for non-enforcement of the income tax law. The convention on that occasion said:

This convention condemns the government because it has not enforced the income tax law in such a manner as to make it produce the revenue which such a tax should produce if properly collected.

I gathered from the Finance minister's remarks that he is not getting all the money he should from the income tax at the present time. His figures show that in the last three or four years there has been a steady diminution in the amount that has been collected in income tax. That must mean one of two things; either the government must be condemned for non-enforcement of the income tax law, for inefficiency in collecting the tax, or else the lessened revenue from the income tax is an indication of the extent of that prosperity which the government has been talking about as existing in this country and growing greater year by year. One would naturally suppose, if the country was becoming more and more prosperous as the years go by, that the amount derived from income tax would be increasing each year; an increased revenue from that source might be taken as a fair indication of prosperity. But taking the minister's own figures, I say we must conclude one of two things, either that there is gross inefficiency in the enforcement of the income tax law and the collection of the income tax, or else if they are collecting all they should collect, the reduced revenue from that source is an indication of lessened prosperity in this country as compared with a few years ago.

Mr. ROBB: I would like my hon. friend to remember that we have extended the exemptions under the income tax law.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I do not think those exemptions would materially affect the figures which the minister gave. While it is true there have been exemptions in regard to the income tax which might contribute to a diminution in the revenue from that source, it is not true of the special war taxes that were imposed away back in 1917, and since. The Conservative and Union governments were very roundly condemned for the amount of money they were collecting from the people in those ways up to 1921, and while promises were made before the election of 1921 that a change of government would mean a material reduction in taxation along those lines, the fact remains, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Chabot), that in the next four years the government which had promised relief to the people in reduced taxation from these sources collected something over $500,000,000 more than was collected by the Union and Conservative governments.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): In considering the increased taxation following 1921, has the hon. member taken into consideration the large borrowings that were necessary to make up for the lack of taxation in the years previous to 1921?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I did not understand from the arguments advanced and applied all over the country that gentlemen of the party to which my hon. friend belongs thought there was any lack of taxation in those years. I thought they were all complaining that the taxation was entirely too heavy.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Perhaps the hon. member did not understand my question. I asked if he took into consideration the immense amount of money raised by way of loans previous to 1921 on which this government had to pay interest raised by way of taxation.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I think the governments previous to 1921 paid their way pretty well. I know that previous to 1921 they had to meet, and did meet, obligations amounting to many, many millions of dollars, which their successors in office did not have to meet. There were many things arising out of the war which called for enormous expenditures under the former government, which expenditures this government did not have to meet.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Did you meet those expenditures by taxation or by borrowing?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): By both.

Mr. EULER: Were they not largely capitalized, loans raised on which interest had to be paid later on?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is very true. They were largely capitalized, but if you compare the expenses for the four years previous to 1921 with those of the four years after 1921, I say that in the former period there were expenses of a special nature which had to be met by the government of 1917-1921 which did not have to be met by their successors in office, and that therefore their successors in office should have been in a position to implement the promises they made previous to the election of 1921 and reduce taxation all along the line, especially along those lines which they so roundly condemned at that time. But as a matter of fact there has not been amelioration in the slightest degree since they came into office.

I think the income tax as such is a legitimate source of revenue, and one to be generally approved. The only question I believe in the minds of members of this House is as to the best method of applying it. I for one am strongly in favour of the income tax if it can be justly arranged. I believe there has been a fair attempt made by all parties in this House to fairly adjust that tax. It is a comparatively new source of revenue so far as this country is concerned, and it is quite possible that it is open to a good deal of improvement. I think, however, there is a general disposition among the people of this country, irrespective of the party to which they belong, to continue the income tax and see that it is properly and fairly adjusted and applied. It is a source of revenue which I think we shall have to continue, and it is only a question of the best way of continuing it.

I presume we must take into consideration one thing in connection with the income tax; we must take into consideration the fact that there is a similar tax in effect across the line. We must, it seems to me, be somewhat influenced by that tax whether we want to be or not. We cannot afford to have in Canada an income tax very much higher than a similar tax in the country to the south. We may have one somewhat higher, but we cannot afford to have it very much higher. We must endeavour to follow their line of taxation to some extent although not to the extent, perhaps, of following it figure for figure.

I think this tax is a source of income which has quite properly been brought into effect and should be continued. I do not think any censure is due the government that introduced this tax in the first place. When it was introduced benefits were given to certain people which were not extended in later applications of the tax. But it was a new principle in this country and perhaps mistakes were made in that respect which would not be committed if in the light of our present knowledge we were now adopting an income tax for the first time. At any rate, the principle of the tax is right, in my estimation, and the tax should be continued as a legitimate and proper source of revenue to the country.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (North Winnipeg): I have just one or two observations to make on this particular question. Having had a little municipal experience prior to my coming here, I have a good deal of sympathy with the motives which actuate the mover of this resolution (Mr. Church). There is hardly a municipality in this Dominion to-day that is not complaining about the burden of taxation; there is hardly a province that is not making the same complaint; and I think everybody is advancing the same complaint against the Dominion government. I regret sometimes to see the rather partisan spirit which characterizes discussions of this character, and I have no wish personally to display any of that spirit. I think it makes very little difference whether we have a Conservative government or a Liberal government in office; the question of taxation has got to be met; revenue must be raised to meet the necessary expenditure, and the question arises what is the fairest method to adopt. Personally I know of no fairer method of raising revenue than that based on the ability to pay, and the income tax meets that particular requisite.

Now, I want to deal more particularly with the resolution which has been placed before the House, and especially one particular part of it. The motion wishes "to restore to the municipalities their former exclusive rights and prerogatives to this form of taxation." This is the first time I have ever heard it stated that the collection of income tax was the exclusive prerogative of municipalities. If I understand anything about municipal government in Canada it is a fact that municipalities receive their charters from the provincial government, and that the rights of municipal taxation are distinctly set forth in those charters. That is true of the city of Toronto; it is equally true of the city of Winnipeg in which I am interested. The government of Manitoba has been asked for a number of years to allow the city of Winnipeg to levy a local income tax. Each year the request was made it met with refusal until a couple of years ago, when the provincial government itself imposed an income tax in Manitoba. I say that for all purposes of taxation a local income tax is bound to be a failure. It cannot be a success because it is far too restricted in its area; and if you tax a man who is living in a certain municipality he will probably move over into the next municipality where there is no such tax in force. If I understand the taxation law in effect in the province of Ontario this particular tax is not an income tax, it is an optional form of taxation. For example if a person, say, in the city of Toronto, has a certain amount of property, and is liable on real estate assessment as well as for income tax he pays the tax which happens to be the higher of the two.

An hon. MEMBER: That is not the case.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. HEAPS: I understand the law to be that if this real estate tax is higher than his income tax he would not pay income tax.

Mr. EULER: That is not the law in other municipalities in Ontario.

Mr. HEAPS: Perhaps it is the case in some and not in all. One of the difficulties of creating local forms of income taxation, is that you do not secure uniformity throughout the province. Thus if you give local authorities the right to levy taxation you are going to have a dozen or two different forms of income taxes within the provincial area making it almost impossible to have an equitable application everywhere within those limits.

Now what would happen if this motion were to carry? It would entirely do away with $56,000,000 of revenue. How is the government going to replace this revenue? Where would it get the money to do so? I do not think the government can get along without this very substantial sum of money. Now the Minister of Finance claimed that 58 per cent of the money expended by the federal authorities was uncontrollable, leaving 42 per cent capable of being controlled. If you take away $56,000,000 it means that you remove 33 per cent of the money available for controllable expenditure, making it almost impossible for the government to function properly. Now, let us see what our financial situation is. Compared with the period prior to the war the national debt has more than trebled. In pre-war time, I believe, the interest alone on the national debt amounted to $35,000,000 per annum, but that interest to-day amounts approximately to no less than $135,000,000 annually. If I am correctly informed no part of the capital expenditure which goes to make up the national debt has yet been liquidated—I mean to say that part which arose out of war conditions. Therefore, if you are going to reduce your taxation and allow the national debt to stand where it is, how are you going to solve the problem which exists in connection with it? The national debt is a very serious problem, and it will have to be dealt with by the present government or some future administration. Some way must be found by which to reduce our national debt. Australia is reducing its national debt, so is Great Britain, but Canada is not. Whatever government is entrusted with power this issue will have to be fairly and squarely dealt with. And when I speak of reduction of the national debt I mean some large and substantial reduction. It is in that way that relief from taxation will come to us. I do not know how this reduction can be brought about. Certainly you are not going to do it if you reduce the income tax in the way suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Church). In my estimation there will have to be more taxation in some form or other before the national debt can be brought to the figure where it ought to be at the present time.

There is another problem which ought to be dealt with, and that is to define clearly the sphere of activity as between the Dominion and the respective provinces. A little while ago a conference took place at which it was hoped some solution of the problem might be reached. That conference, however, proved abortive, a fact which is much to be regretted.

I agree somewhat with the statement of the mover of the resolution as to the machinery of government in Canada. I believe with my hon. friend, that Canada is over governed at the present time. We have in the provinces what we might call nine states, and we have in the Dominion one super state. I do not know exactly how we are going to reduce the governmental machinery, but in Australia a strong movement is on foot for the abolition of some of the state governments and to hand over the authority now exercised by the parliament of those states to the federal parliament, as well as to grant a larger amount of authority to the municipalities. I think one of the states of Australia has passed a resolution along that line, and it has gone so far in Australia that one of the federal ministers has suggested that a plebiscite be taken to ascertain whether the people are in favour of the abolition of the state governments. I suggested last week at a meeting I addressed in my own city that it might be desirable to reduce the number of provincial legislatures in Canada. That will mean an amendment to the British North America Act. I can understand the difficulties and I can understand some of the feeling of certain hon. members in this House towards a move along that line, but I suggest, as a step in that direction, that there should be one legislature for the three prairie provinces, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, where their problems are almost identical. I do not know whether it would be possible at the present time to have one legislature for Quebec and Ontario.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Why?

Mr. HEAPS: I am not going into that question just now. But I think it would be possible to have one legislature for the three provinces down by the Atlantic, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, and that might be a step in the right direction whereby we might get more centralized government. I think one of the things we are suffering from in Canada at the present time is that we have either too much authority or too little authority. It is always a question of passing the buck, if I may use that term, between the provinces and the Dominion government, and I think it would not be a bad move at all if the British North America Act were so amended as to give the three provinces one legislature, with the consent of the provinces of course, and reduce the number of provincial legislatures from nine to five.

While I have a good deal of sympathy with the motion of the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church), I do not think I can support it, for the reasons I have outlined, because after all I do not recognize that this sphere of taxation is the exclusive preserve of the municipal authorities. I think it ought to be the preserve of the Dominion government, and then it might at some time be advisable for the Dominion government, being the central authority for the collection of the taxes, to remit a certain portion of the money collected for taxes to the provincial authorities, and they might in turn, if they saw fit, hand back some of the money to the municipalities. I think the method in the state of Wisconsin is that the state collects the income tax and remits a portion to the county and also to the municipality.

At the present time in Canada there are as many as two and possibly three collections of income tax. There is too much duplication. If the matter were centralized in one authority, which should be the Dominion government, and the Dominion government were to hand back some of the money collected to the provinces, it would be a far better method of dealing with the resolution than that proposed by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest.

Hon. EDMUND BRISTOL (Toronto East Centre): I do not propose at this time to make a lengthy speech on this important matter of the income tax, but I would like to call the attention of the government to the fact which is well known, namely, that we have been losing during the last four years about 500,000 of our young men and women, born possibly in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Two factors operated in taking these people away. First, there was the lack of work in these provinces, occasioned by the tariff policy and the higher wages necessarily paid in the United States, and second, there was the very important fact that the income tax paid by people in the United States who earn incomes up to $10,000 is very small in comparison with what young men and young women earning from $1,200 upwards in this country have to pay. In other words, Canadians who want to work here as stenographers, or in other small positions, earning from $1,000 to $3,000, pay $30, $40 or $50 as against a payment of $7 in the United States. I really think those members of the community, who are trying to make a living and get ahead in this country and who cannot get as good wages here as in the United States, should receive from any government in power in Canada every possible encouragement along that line.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): Without going into the question at length, I desire to make one or two observations. In relation to the resolution itself, and the remarks of my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) as to whether the tax had been looked upon as a special preserve of municipalities, I think what the hon. member who moved the resolution had in mind was this—and I believe is the fact—that prior to the war no income tax was levied by any except municipal authorities. There had been no federal income tax, with the possible exception of British Columbia, and I am not certain with regard to that. No provincial income tax was levied prior to the war. There is a very good reason for that, and a very definite reason why this form of taxation should be the preserve of the municipalities. Neither municipal bodies nor provincial bodies have the right in Canada to levy indirect taxes. They must secure all their revenues by the method of direct taxation, while the federal authority is the only one that has the right to levy anything in the character of an indirect tax. Prior to the exigencies of the war I think it was generally looked upon as the right of municipalities to levy income tax. I do not know the situation in Manitoba or any of the other provinces, but so far as Ontario is concerned my hon. friend is entirely misinformed when he intimates that it is optional with the taxpayer whether he shall pay his taxes on assessed value or on his income, whichever is the higher. The fact is that if he derives an income from taxed property he pays a tax on that property and does not have to pay a second tax.

Mr. HEAPS: Is it the same in all municipalities?

Mr. NICHOLSON: That is the law in Ontario, and it must be applied in the same way in all the municipalities. You cannot apply it one way in one municipality and differently in another.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the city of Toronto a special charter, or does it come within the municipal law of the province?

Mr. NICHOLSON: It comes within the municipal law. Every municipality comes within the municipal law. I think I am right when I say that. What the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) said with regard to the incidence of taxation touches the base of the whole thing. I think one of two principles should apply. Taxes should be paid in accordance with the service rendered, or in accordance with the ability to pay. The difficulty in relation to the latter tax, however, is that of collecting the tax from those who have the ability to pay. If it were possible to levy a tax and be sure you were at all times getting it from those who had the ability to pay, and if the income tax could be collected from those who have the ability to pay and that class alone, then it would be a perfectly fair and equitable tax, but so far we have not found a method by which that can be done.

In its general incidence there is nothing that has had such a blighting influence on business in this country as the income tax. In the main it is being paid, although we have not the opportunity of finding out who the particular individuals are who pay it. We have an opportunity of finding out the classes who pay it, and in the main it is being paid, as my hon. friend from Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) said, by the salaried class in this country. They are paying very much the larger proportion of the taxes. There are very definite and good reasons for that. For instance, it was shown here clearly by my hon. friend, speaking on this subject before, that the part of Canada where the greatest individual wealth is in proportion to the whole class of people, pays the smallest amount in income tax. The provinces west of the Great Lakes are the provinces where the greatest average wealth prevails, but they pay the least by way of income tax. We need not assume, from that, however, that the people west of the lakes are tax-evaders because it is quite reasonable to assume, from the character of their location, so many people in the prairie provinces being of the farmer class, that they have an average income that is fairly substantial but that does not come within the scope of the income tax law. On the other hand in the other provinces that are more industrial, people are divided into two classes, namely, those who pay income tax and those who do not.

Coming for a moment to the incidence of this tax in relation to business and to one or two observations that have been made, let me refer to what the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Brown) said as to a farmer and his wife not being in the same position as a business man and his wife. There is not the slightest difference whatsoever. The wife of the business man is just as much a partner in that business and in spending her life to assist in that business as is the wife of the farmer or of the mechanic. Her position is exactly the same, and she gets no extra exemption unless she has a private income.

A great misapprehension seems to prevail in connection with the fact that taxes are not paid on dividends earned from business. There is the point where the tax injures business perhaps more than anywhere else. If a group of men have their business in an incorporated company, what happens? Ten and one-half per cent of the total income of their business goes in income taxes. If they distribute a sufficient amount of the earnings, if there are any, for them to live on, that amount is also taxed under the surtax and supertaxes which prevail and which in reality are the heavy portions of the tax. Let me give one or two illustrations that have come under my observations—and this has regard to the advisability, if the Minister of Finance can work out such a scheme, of taking a group of years instead of an individual year as the period over which the income tax should be levied. One particular case that came under my observation was of a group of men in business who in two years, 1920 and 1921, the deflation years, lost so much money that they had to go to the bank and borrow over $100,000 in order that they might be able to carry on. They have been paying interest on that money ever since. In 1923, 1924 and 1925 the business has been coming to a point where it is commencing to return a small amount of this money, thus enabling them to pay off what they had previously borrowed, but the income tax collector comes along and collects income tax just the same, with the result that on the money they have borrowed they are paying not only income tax, but interest to the bank. That is one of the most unfair phases of the income tax and one phase of it that more than any other is doing injury to business in this country.

As a general principle, looked at from the theoretical standpoint, the levying of income tax from those who are able to pay it is a fair method of taxation, but as it has been worked out in this country it is not a fair method of taxation: it is doing injury to business, it is placing a burden upon a particular class that cannot get away from it. That is one reason why we are having such great difficulty in getting back to normal conditions. My opinion is that the question of the country's indebtedness should have been taken hold of resolutely and determinedly after the war period was over and after the time had passed when we were getting our men back into civilian life; the war debt should have been consolidated and the special taxes applied to a reduction of that debt instead of carrying on as we have been doing. Notwithstanding what the Minister of Finance has said about reducing expenditures, he knows that may look very well on paper; but when the question comes down to what the national debt is to-day as against what it was in 1920 or 1921, he knows the gross obligations of the people of Canada are much greater to-day than they were in 1920 or 1921. We should consolidate the war debt, earmark the special taxes to take care of it, keep the general expenditure within the general income of the country, and then we shall find some way whereby these taxes may be reduced.

Mr. CHURCH: In view of the promise of the Minister of Finance to take up the matter in the budget, I ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

CANADA-WEST INDIES TRADE AGREEMENT

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee tomorrow to consider the following proposed resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to introduce a measure to approve of the agreement dated the sixth day of July, 1925, between the government of the Dominion of Canada and the governments of certain of His Majesty's colonies in the West Indies, which agreement is termed "Canada-British West Indies-Bermuda-British Guiana-British Honduras Trade Agreement, 1925," and to provide:—

1. That after the said agreement is brought into force, and so long as it remains in force, goods mentioned in the said agreement, the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies parties to the said agreement, which are conveyed without transshipment, except transshipment at a port of any of the said colonies, by ship direct into a sea or river port of Canada, shall be admitted to Canada at the rates of duties provided in the said agreement.

2. That the tariff concessions covered by the said agreement to be extended to goods the produce or manufacture of any of the said colonies shall be so extended with respect to any one or more of the said colonies which may have ratified the said agreement on and after a day to be fixed by proclamation of the Governor in Council, which proclamation shall be published in the Canada Gazette.

3. That subject to the provisions of the Customs Tariff, 1907, the Governor in Council may, by order in council, extend the said advantages to goods the produce or manufacture of any British country.

4. That the operation of all laws inconsistent with the giving to the provisions of the said agreement and of any act that may be founded on this resolution their full effect shall from time to time be suspended to the extent of such inconsistencies.

5. That subject to the ratification of the said agreement by the various colonies which are parties thereto, and to the fulfilment of their undertaking to make the contributions on their behalf as specified therein, the Governor in Council be empowered to make such arrangements as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the said agreement relating to the establishment of steamship services between Canada and the colonies concerned, and any expenses incurred in carrying out the said agreement shall be defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for that purpose.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

AGREEMENT TABLED

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House, I desire now to lay on the table copies of the Canada-West Indies trade agreement, both in English and French, so that hon. members may have an opportunity of looking over it before the motion comes up for discussion. Copies are now available in the distribution office.

ADVANCES TO SETTLERS ON CROWN LANDS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (for the Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved that the House go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize advances to settlers on crown lands, and to provide:—

1. That for purposes connected with settlement, the minister may make loans to settlers on the basis of improvement of land and farm buildings erected—(a) to a settler who is a Canadian citizen as that term is defined in the Immigration Act, an amount not exceeding $1,000, (b) to a settler other than a Canadian citizen an amount not exceeding $500.

2. That settlement loans under the proposed legislation shall not exceed the sum of $5,000,000 in any fiscal year, and shall be paid out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund.

3. That Settlement Loan committees may be established anywhere in Canada to report upon and recommend to the minister the suitability of a settler, and of any parcel of crown land, and to advise the minister as to the amount of loan to be made and how it should be expended, and such committee shall consist of not less than two nor more than three persons in the employ of the Dominion government or of any provincial government, such persons to be nominated by the minister, one of whom shall be the Dominion lands agent or the provincial crown lands agent, as the case may be, for the district in which the settler is located, and no salary or remuneration additional to that which he otherwise receives shall be paid to members of such committee.

4. That no settlement loan shall be made unless recommended by a Settlement Loan committee, and unless approved by the minister, nor until the applicant has been recommended by a committee as a suitable settler and the land as suitable for settlement for agricultural purposes, and all settlement loans shall be expended under the direction of the minister.

5. That no settlement loan shall be made upon the security of improvements upon any provincial crown land, unless the province by appropriate legislation, has provided that the improvements upon the security of which any such loan is made shall be subject to a first charge for the amount of such loan with interest, and that no patent shall be issued for the said land until such loan with interest is repaid in full.

6. That the payment of principal shall be made in annual instalments extending over a period of not more than ten years from the date the settlement loan is made, the first payment to become due and payable two years from the date of the settlement loan, provided that the settler may at any time repay the whole of the settlement loan with interest to date of payment, and all loans shall bear interest at the rate of five per cent per annum, payable on the respective dates upon which instalments of principal fall due.

7. That when a settlement loan has been made upon the security of improvements upon Dominion crown lands, the patent shall not issue until the loan and all interest charges thereon have been paid in full.

8. That if a provincial government, not having suitable crown lands available, acquires by purchase suitable lands for settlement under the provisions of this legislation, the minister may pay to a provincial government a sum not exceeding one-half of the interest on the purchase price of such lands, reckoned at five per centum per annum, for a period not exceeding two years from the date of settlement.

9. That the Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the minister, make regulations to carry out these provisions, and the minister shall make an annual report to parliament of all operations under the proposed legislation.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Who is the Acting Minister of Immigration?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Hon. Mr Stewart.

Motion agreed to.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (for the Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved that the House go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend The Soldier Settlement Act, 1919, and to provide,—

1. That notwithstanding anything in the act, the board shall be empowered upon the application of a settler who has agreed to purchase any land from the board, who has not abandoned his land, whose agreement with the board has not been terminated or rescinded, and who has not repaid his indebtedness to the board, and where there has been a decrease or depreciation in the market value of such land not the result of neglect or mismanagement on the part of the settler, to make provision for the revaluation of the said land.

2. That application for revaluation shall be considered only when made by a settler residing on and himself farming the said land, and shall be submitted to the district superintendent of the Soldier Settlement Board for the district within which the said land is situated.

3. That the application shall be supported by affidavit on forms supplied by the board setting out the original purchase price of the land and the value of improvements effected since the establishment of the settler thereon, and by a written statement of the settler setting forth his belief as to present value of the land and his reasons therefor, and the names and addresses of any persons whom the settler proposes as witnesses to the present value; and the district superintendent shall consider the application and material in support and make report and recommendation thereupon to the board.

4. That if the board and settler agree upon the amount of depreciation in value of the said land such amount shall be credited by the board to the settler's account as on the standard date in 1925 and upon the settler's account being so credited, the balance then owing to the board by the settler for all purposes shall, at the discretion of the board, be consolidated and deemed to be the settler's principal indebtedness, and the total cost of the property may be amortized over the remaining period of the loan.

5. That the minister may appoint district arbitration committees having jurisdiction in such soldier settlement districts as may be necessary, each committee to consist of three members, one of whom shall be an official of the Soldier Settlement Board and one a representative of the Veterans' organization in the district; and the members of the district arbitration committee when appointed shall have all the powers and authority of a commissioner under the Inquiries Act, and expenditures necessarily incurred by any district arbitration committee shall be paid out of moneys appropriated from time to time by parliament to soldier land settlement.

6. That if the board and settler do not agree upon the amount of depreciation in value of the said land the board shall refer the matter at issue to the district arbitration committee for determination, who will thereupon fix a convenient time and place for hearing. Upon the hearing of all evidence submitted the committee shall decide upon the question in dispute, and its decision shall be final.

7. That the district arbitration committee shall forthwith forward a copy of its decision to the board and if it be found there has been a depreciation in the value of the land purchased by the settler from the board, not resulting from neglect or mismanagement on the part of the settler, the amount of such depreciation so found shall be credited by the board as provided by resolution No. 4 in respect of amount arrived at by agreement.

He said: His Excellency, the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of of the House.

Motion agreed to.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Hon. J. H. KING (Kootenay, Acting Minister of Labour) moved that the House go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting Old Age Pensions, and to provide,—

1. That the Governor in Council may make an agreement with the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of any province for the payment to such province quarterly of an amount equal to one-half of the net sum paid out during the preceding quarter by such province for pensions pursuant to a provincial statute authorizing and providing for the payment of such pensions to the persons and under the conditions hereinafter specified and regulations made under the proposed legislation.

2. That every agreement so made shall continue in force so long as the provincial statute remains in operation or until after the expiration of ten years from the date upon which notice of an intention to determine the agreement is given by the Governor General to the Lieutenant-Governor of the province with which the same was made.

3. That before any agreement so made comes into operation, the Governor in Council shall approve the scheme for the administration of pensions proposed to be adopted by the province, and no change in such scheme shall be made by the province without the consent of the Governor in Council.

4. That all sums payable to any province in pursuance of any such agreement shall be payable from time to time on the certificate of the Treasury Board out of any moneys belonging to the consolidated revenue fund of Canada not otherwise appropriated, and the Governor in Council may borrow from time to time such sums as may be required for the purpose of making such payments.

5. That provision shall be made for the payment of a pension to every person who, at the date of the proposed commencement of the pension:—

(a) is a British subject, or, being a widow, was such before her marriage;

(b) has attained the age of seventy years;

(c) has resided in Canada for the twenty years immediately preceding the date aforesaid;

(d) has resided in the province in which the application for pension is made for the five years immediately preceding the said date;

(e) is not an Indian as defined by the Indian Act;

(f) has not made any voluntary assignment or transfer of property for the purpose of qualifying for a pension.

6. That the receipt of a pension shall not by itself constitute a disqualification from voting at any provincial or municipal election.

7. That the maximum pension payable shall be two hundred and forty dollars yearly, which shall be subject to reduction by the amount of the income of the pensioner in excess of one hundred and twenty-five dollars a year.

8. That provisions be made as to the credit to the pension authority of the annual value of a pensioner's residence, and the recovery of pension payments out of deceased pensioner's estate, and for the distribution of pension burden among provinces by proportionate reimbursement or proportionate reduction where the pensioner resided in more than one province or transfers his permanent residence to another province, and for ceasing payments where he transfers his residence to some place out of Canada, and the revival of his rights upon again becoming a resident of Canada.

9. That no pension shall be subject to alienation or transfer by the pensioner, or to seizure in satisfaction of any claim against him.

10. That on or before the thirtieth day of April in each year, the Minister of Finance shall make a full report to parliament of the operation of the agreements made pursuant to the proposed act, and of the moneys of Canada paid to the provinces under each of the several agreements entered into pursuant thereto.

11. That the Governor in Council shall have power from time to time, on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, and with the approval of the Treasury Board, to make regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of the proposed act, with regard to the pensions herein provided for, and such regulations shall be published in the Canada Gazette, and be laid before parliament.

He said: His Excellency, the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): It is not customary to debate matters upon motion to proceed into committee on a subsequent day, but as these matters are of immense consequence, perhaps the government could at least give this modicum of information. I should like if the government could give us an estimate of what the resolutions on the order paper just read will cost the revenue of Canada. I do not expect a close estimate at all, but say within a hundred million dollars.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I will be very glad to furnish the information we have to-morrow when we go into committee, as is customary.

BILL AUTHORIZING TRANSFER OF PUBLIC LANDS TO ALBERTA

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (for the Minister of the Interior) moved that the House go into committee at the next sitting of the House to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved,—That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that the agreement dated the ninth day of January, 1926, made between the government of the Dominion of Canada and the government of the province of Alberta, respecting the transfer of public lands in the province of Alberta, be approved, the following provisions to form part thereof:—

(a) That the school lands fund to be transferred to the province as in the said agreement provided, and such of the school lands specified in section thirty-nine of The Dominion Lands Act, chapter 20 of the statutes of 1908, and amending statutes, as pass to the administration of the province under the terms of the said agreement, shall be set aside and shall continue to be administered by the province in accordance, "mutatis mutandis," with the provisions of sections thirty-nine to forty-two of The Dominion Lands Act, for the support of schools organized and carried on therein in accordance with the provisions of section seventeen of "The Alberta Act," chapter three of the statutes of 1905, and

(b) that any interest in any lands included in the parks or forest reserves in the said agreement referred to, may, with the consent of the province, be disposed of by Canada for any purpose other than the purposes specified in the said agreement, and

(c) that nothing in the said agreement or in any subsequent agreements or statutes such as are therein provided for, shall in any way affect the rights or properties of the Hudson's Bay Company as contained in the conditions under which that company surrendered Rupert's Land to the crown.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

DATE OF THE BUDGET

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if my hon. friend the Minister of Finance could tell us when he is contemplating bringing down the budget. Perhaps it will be next week.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Not until after Easter.

CANTEEN FUNDS DISTRIBUTION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Some time ago the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) made inquiry about the distribution of the canteen funds as follows:

I should like to ask the government what has been done in regard to the distribution among the soldiers of the canteen fund amounting to $2,000,000. It is nearly a year now since parliament passed an act in respect to this matter, and voted the sum of $800,000 to the province of Ontario as its share. As yet, however, no commission has been appointed for that province and apparently none will be for some time, although there are many men in need of relief owing to unemployment and distress. Will the government later on in the week state the cause of the delay, and inform the House as to the nature of the existing situation?

My hon. friend reminded me to-day that no answer has been given as yet and I am sorry for it, because I was given a statement by the minister reading as follows:

1. In pursuance of the Canteen Funds Act all provincial governments were invited on October 16 last, to make appointments of provincial boards of trustees for the purpose of receiving and administering the share payable to such provinces.

2. The following provinces have made appointments and the moneys have been duly paid over—British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia.

3. The Ontario government has not yet made any appointments but as soon as notification has been received that appointments have been made the share payable to the province of Ontario will be remitted.

Mr. HANSON: Would the minister state the names of the appointees in the various provinces? I am only interested of course in New Brunswick.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will get the information for my hon. friend.

SALE OF AUSTRALIAN BUTTER

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): I desire to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question. I have received a communication in regard to this matter which reads as follows:

I understand that Australian and New Zealand butter is being sold in Canada in such a way that the consumer thinks he is getting the Canadian made product. I am informed that one of the government inspectors in western Ontario said that butter from Australia and New Zealand is being sold in London and St. Thomas in the same wrappers that the dealers formerly used in wrapping Canadian butter, the only difference being that the registration number is not printed on the wrapper of the imported article. Thus suppose the creameries were wrapping butter under a wrapper with "Rose Brand" on it the creamery has now to place their own registration number on it, namely, 860. But if we wrapped Australian butter we could use the same wrapper except that we would eliminate the registration number 860.

I desire to ask the government if they have issued instructions to their inspectors to tell vendors of Australian butter that they may use the same wrappers as heretofore, but that they must ship in plain boxes and not use the creamery registration number either on the boxes or on the wrappers.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): That is rather an involved question to answer offhand with respect to Australian butter, and if my hon. friend will place it on the order paper I shall be pleased to explain the matter fully.

PRIVILEGE—MR. WOODSWORTH

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise to a question of privilege. My attention has been called to misleading reports of an incident that occurred on the night the House adjourned. The story was first published, I believe, by the Toronto Mail and Empire, and has since been added to and embellished by other papers. A typical account is given by the Daily Intelligencer of Belleville of March 6, where I note under the motto "Let there be harmony in things essential—liberty in things not essential—charity in all," there is an editorial dealing with "Ottawa's unholy trio." Attention is called to—

> The most remarkable and illuminating spectacle of three anti-British members of the Commons, Messrs. Woodsworth and Heaps of Winnipeg, and Bourassa of Montreal, remaining sullenly seated while the national anthem was sung in the House.

Later on the article goes on to say:

> It was South Hastings' member who started the loyal anthem and prayer for His Majesty as the House was recessing. W. Ernest Tummon, M.P., as all Canada knows by this time, is a singer. ..... As the critical moment approached—

I do not know what critical moment is referred to.

> —some one said: "Come on, Ernie (they call him that) start 'The King'".
> He did. It was a notable event. Many said they never remembered the national anthem being sung in the House before. Everyone at once got to his feet, even the galleries joining, in this tribute of respect to His Majesty, except the unholy trio.

Hon. members will recall that in connection with the divisions, there was considerable confusion, various groups singing rival songs such as "Alouette", "There's a long, long trail awinding" and so on. Not being a singer, I did not participate in this, but I was in conversation with my neighbour the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). I remember that I became conscious that the tune was "God Save the King" but I paid no attention. For me it was part of the exuberant but rather undignified performance. I think I was not far wrong as I have since been informed that after "God Save the King" was sung a group of members on this side of the House started "O Canada", during the singing of which many members on the other side left the chamber. Personally I attach no significance to this. There was general confusion; the House was dispersing. I may say however that the report was quite inaccurate for my colleague from North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) was standing while the national anthem was being sung.

An hon. MEMBER: He was not.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The hon. member for Labelle informed me the other day that he was absolutely unaware that the national anthem was being sung. No one who knows the animation with which the hon. member for Labelle enters into conversation will say, in the words of this editorial, that he was "sullenly seated". It would seem that prejudice had distorted the vision of some reporter. I should like to state that whether I participate in any ceremony or not I try to show reasonable respect for those who do. May I add, there are various ways of showing patriotism? At any irrelevant moment when someone calls "Come on, Ernie", I do not propose to click heels and come to a salute, or to do any other form of goose-stepping.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Is it permissable to ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think I have made my statement.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Will the hon. member state to the House—?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—DETROIT FRANCHISE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): I wish to object to the motion for the production of papers in reference to the surrender of certain valuable Canadian National railway franchises on the right of way of the Canadian National Railways and the Detroit G.H. & M. Railway being transferred from motions for the production of papers to notices of motion. This means that this cannot be discussed this session.

I should like to call the attention of the Acting minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Robb) to the following despatch:

> Michigan legislature will approve Thornton "Sell out"
> Lansing, Mich., Feb. 3.—Formal approval of an agreement reached between Gov. Groesbeck and officials of the Canadian National Railways regarding moving certain tracks of the company to make room for the "wider Woodward avenue" link connecting Detroit and Pontiac. Michigan will be asked at a special session of the Michigan legislature which will convene February 16. Certain changes in the method of highway financing will also be considered. Formal call for the session was issued to-day by the governor.

Will this agreement be laid in full before this parliament for its approval and consent as is being done by the party of the first part, the state of Michigan, in asking the state's approval in the session of the legislature which has been specially called? If not, why not, and will parliament be asked to consent before this agreement is passed as Canada is the party of the second part?

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Railways and Canals): The question asked by my hon. friend involves some legal technicalities. I shall refer it to the management of the National Railways and give my hon. friend an answer as early as possible.

ACOUSTICS OF CHAMBER

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I wish at this particular time to make a vigorous protest against the way in which business is being done while questions are being asked on the orders of the day. The whole thing to us in this part of the chamber is a dumb show. We know nothing about what is going on; with the exception of the speech delivered by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), I do not know anything that has been transacted in this House since prayers have been read.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. FORKE: It is all very well for hon. gentlemen in the front benches who seem to think they are conducting the business of this country and that none of us has any say in the matter. I think I made this request very courteously before. There may be a lack of attention on the part of those who are taking part in the proceedings; but one reason why so little attention is being paid and there is so much murmuring and talking is that when members are unable to follow what is taking place, naturally they lose interest and murmuring and talking begins. I make this request quite courteously that hon. members will try to speak just a little louder in asking and answering questions. The government members on the front benches are just as guilty as any other hon. members. I hope hon. members will take this request in the spirit in which it is made. I notice in the Journal to-day that even members of the press gallery who are supposed to have hearing capacities far beyond those of the ordinary mortal are unable to hear what is going on in the House.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I have observed lately some very severe and not very thoughtful criticism of the same character as that advanced by the leader of the Progressive party just now. I think all should remember that this House is far beyond the ordinary dimensions of a speaking chamber, and to raise one's voice continually to a high pitch is not a very pleasant process, and not one that a person is likely to indulge in. We all suffer just the same as the hon. member for Brandon and hon. members further down. In fact on Tuesday last when I asked for an explanation of a bill from a front bencher of my hon. friend's party, I was unable to hear his reply.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): The whole trouble is this wide space in the centre of the chamber. I trust that plans will be made for the reconstruction of this chamber on the principle of an amphitheatre for debate rather than a Gothic cathedral.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

The House in committee of supply, Mr. Duff in the chair.

To provide for expenses of maintenance of revenue cruisers and for preventive service, $376,510.

Hon. GEORGE H. BOIVIN (Minister of Customs and Excise): Mr. Speaker, this item which is subsection 4 of vote 349, was under discussion and had been debated at considerable length the other evening, when hon. members on the other side of the House very kindly consented to allow a change of departments, and passed an estimate of the Department of Public Works. I hope that very little further debate will be required. In the course of that debate several very legitimate requests for information were made by hon. members on the other side and this I promised to give as soon as possible. If you, Mr. Chairman, will allow me to refer to the items passed without re-opening them, I will be glad to do so now. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) made an inquiry concerning the bridge at Niagara Falls, and referred to a letter which he had forwarded to the deputy minister.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The bridge at Queenston, not at Niagara Falls.

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, that is the bridge. That matter has been investigated and I am sending to my hon. friend the report of the investigator. It will be seen that the facts as submitted by the hon. member are absolutely correct, with the exception that the four cars in question were headed from Canada to the United States, instead of from the United States to Canada. That is not an excuse, and I am not urging it as such. There should be an export entry for any goods exported from the United States; those cars should have reported at the customs, and there was only one man in charge at the time. I am glad to say that the deputy minister yesterday forwarded to the collector of customs and excise at Niagara Falls, Ontario, the following telegram.

You are instructed to assign two officers to night duty at Queenston bridge on and after the 18th instant.

The hon. member for East Essex (Mr. Morand) made an inquiry concerning the appointment of an officer at Tilbury, Ontario, and in reply to his question I informed him that Mr. W. A. Hutton and terminated his services there on December 2, 1925 and that I was under the impression that a relieving officer was in charge of that port. Upon investigation at the department I find that Mr. M. W. Richards was appointed by the Civil Service Commission and took charge of that port on January 5, 1926. I will send over to the hon. member a copy of the advertisement for the position and a copy of all the correspondence exchanged between the Civil Service Commission and the department in connection with the appointment.

The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) asked to be supplied with a list showing the retirements under the Civil Service Superannuation Act of 1924, in the Department of Customs and Excise. I have had the list prepared, and am handing it to my hon. friend. It includes both the inside and the outside service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The question was as to any retirements at all; I did not specify those under any particular act.

Mr. BOIVIN: This includes everything. Then there was an inquiry made by the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott) concerning the appointment of an officer at Kingsville. I have here and will send to the hon. member a copy of the correspondence in connection with the appointment at that place. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) urged the granting the privilege to a bus line operating between Fort William and Duluth to take passengers for local points in Canada. The matter has been very thoroughly investigated. There is no provision in the Customs Act or in any of the regulations thereunder whereby it would be possible for the department to permit a foreign bus upon which duty has not been paid to engage in local traffic in Canada. In other words, unless there is a payment of duty upon the vehicle it is impossible for the department to allow that vehicle to be used in Canada for commercial purposes.

The hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) inquired concerning the appointment of some new officers at Bridgeburg. I promised to supply him with a copy of the report made by Inspector Busby, concerning the necessity for the appointment of these officers, and that report is ready.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I was quite satisfied with the minister's statement, but I will be glad to see the report.

Mr. BOIVIN: The hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) made a request concerning the net customs and excise revenue as shown in the Auditor General's report for the year 1924-1925. A statement has been prepared but we have not yet secured completed particulars concerning the refund of salaries paid out of the different items in the vote under consideration. I will have that information mailed to the hon. member at a later date. I am sending over to him now a complete statement of the customs and excise revenue for 1924-25, showing how the net revenue is arrived at and the difference between the gross and the net revenue.

Mr. GEARY: Does that give me information as to what account that is to be found in in the Auditor General's report?

Mr. BOIVIN: That is indicated in the statement. The only other request was from the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), concerning the ports, outports and preventive stations on the Great Lakes that should be patrolled so far as exports are concerned. It is very hard to differentiate between those that should be patrolled and those where no patrol is required but I have prepared a complete list of the ports and outports and now send it over to my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does that include the peripatetic ports of export?—if I may so use the word.

Mr. BOIVIN: I will take the risk of saying, yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can my hon. friend give me a list of the peripatetic ports of export?

Mr. BOIVIN: That is just exactly what I have stated I was unable to do. I may tell my hon. friend that all those ports—I do not dare repeat the word for fear of mispronouncing it—are included in the list.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Chairman, this new method of supplying information may be quite satisfactory to the members who asked the questions dealt with; I hardly think it will be equally satisfactory to those who heard the questions asked but still have no information as to what is contained in the statements.

Mr. BOIVIN: Most of the information was given the other day. Only copies of the reports and correspondence were required. Some are too lengthy to be placed upon Hansard, but if the hon. member for South Oxford would like to have information about any of these reports or letters, I shall be very glad to have the documents returned to me and I shall then read them so that they may be printed in Hansard.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, to save the minister the trouble of reading this list, I would suggest that it be handed to Hansard with the consent of the committee.

Mr. BOIVIN: I hope the Chairman will consent.

The statement is as follows:

Mr. BOIVIN: After this laudable effort to make progress, I suppose this item will now be allowed to pass.

The CHAIRMAN: Carried.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Copies of several of the letters I notice are marked "confidential." Is that quite in order? Would the minister want them to be quoted in any way?

Mr. BOIVIN: All reports passing between the Civil Service Commission and the department are marked and considered as confidential; but I can see no objection to these being used.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Or comments made upon them?

Mr. BOIVIN: I know of no reason why they should not be used and commented upon. The word "confidential" merely appears on the copies because they happen to be exact copies of the originals, but it was not placed there for the purpose of preventing my hon. friend from using them in any way he sees fit.

Mr. McGIBBON: Before the minister leaves that subject, I should like to bring to his attention the inconvenience that Canadian citizens often have to suffer when returning from a visit to the United States. I would call his attention particularly to the action of his officials at Bridgeburg. In the last year or two I have had to bring to the notice of the department a number of occasions when Canadian citizens have been detained in a rather high-handed and ruthless manner by the officials and put to a great deal of inconvenience. Perhaps he will inform the committee what instructions his officials have in that regard?

Mr. BOIVIN: I can assure my hon. friend that the officers of the Department of Customs have always been instructed by the officers of the department here to treat not only home-coming Canadians but persons from all countries entering Canada with the utmost possible courtesy. It is quite possible —I am not disputing what my hon. friend says—that there has been a lack of courtesy and perhaps actual rudeness on the part of some of our officers. Two cases of that nature, and only two, have been reported to me since I took charge of the department. An investigation was made, a disciplinary warning was given to the officers concerned and the inspector communicated with the persons who had complained of discourtesy and made the required apologies. If my hon. friend can give me the name of any officer who has failed in his duty in this respect, I shall be only too glad to investigate. It is possible, however, that the blame is not entirely on the officers of my department. In one or two other cases reported, officers of the Immigration department had lacked tact and courtesy. If my hon. friend will either himself or through any of his friends give me specific cases, I promise that they shall receive prompt and thorough investigation.

Mr. McGIBBON: Mr. Chairman, I simply bring this matter to the attention of the minister because on a number of occasions I have had to bring to the attention of the department complaints by home-coming Canadians, who, although they carried letters of identification in order to avoid that very trouble, were detained, some of them for hours, some of them for days, and treated in a rather rude manner. The minister will find those letters in the department.

Mr. BOIVIN: If their right to enter Canada was questioned in spite of the letters of identification which they carried, they were undoubtedly detained by the officers of the Department of Immigration. We have no control whatever over those officers, but I will bring the matter to the attention of the Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization (Mr. Stewart). There is no more excuse for the immigration officers than there would be for customs officers to be discourteous to home-coming Canadians.

Mr. MORAND: Mr. Chairman, as I notice the Minister of Customs is very anxious to save money, I wonder if he has ever thought of the feasibility of combining the immigration and customs officials at the port of Windsor? We have there two different sets of officers, under two different departments, doing work that could easily be done by the same men. I do not want to see these men put out of employment, but it seems to me that in course of time, instead of appointing new men under two different departments, the work could be combined and done quite effectively by one set of men. That would also save a lot of trouble to the people passing backwards and forwards between Detroit and Windsor, many thousands of whom are crossing every day. I was just wondering whether this had ever been thought of, because it does seem to me that is one place where something could be saved.

There is another thing that strikes me particularly with regard to that port, where we have a very large customs entry. I am told, and I believe I am credibly informed, that when an officer at that particular port requires even a whisk, it is necessary for him to send in a requisition to the department at Ottawa, and wait perhaps two or three weeks for authorization to buy a small article of that kind. I think a small amount of petty cash should be kept on hand at the local office for this purpose, to save the time of the officers filling in requisitions for small articles of this kind.

Mr. BOIVIN: Answering the last question first, I might tell my hon. friend that the custom which he complains of is one that has existed almost from time immemorial in connection with all customs ports. It has always been necessary for the officers requiring supplies to send in their requisitions to the department at Ottawa, and either have the supplies forwarded to them from Ottawa or obtain authorization to purchase. The suggestion made by my hon. friend is well worthy of consideration, and it will be considered not as regards supplies of value or importance, but for the petty articles such as whisks, hammers, brooms, and other supplies, that may be required. I think a small cash allowance could be given to the local officers for this purpose.

We have often seriously considered the combination of the services of customs and immigration but it has been found practically impossible to do this at the larger ports. The duties of the two sets of officers are entirely different. Their responsibilities are entirely different, and their training requires to be entirely different. It is true that the practice has been adopted and this economy effected at very small frontier ports where very few people cross the boundary, and where there is only a small quantity of goods to be examined. There are some small ports where part of the officer's salary is paid by one department and part by the other. The officer reports to both departments. It has been found impossible so far, in connection with the larger ports, to combine the officers doing the two different kinds of work in the same department.

Mr. HANSON: I thought it was the well established view of the department that that should be done as far as possible. I remember a case in the province of New Brunswick not very long ago where an official of the Immigration department was let out on the ground that his services could be performed by an officer of the Customs department. I have in mind the port of McAdam, which is quite an important port of entry on the frontier between New Brunswick and Maine, where there are two sets of officers, and where I fancy the work of the immigration officers occupies only a little time morning and evening when the trains are coming across the frontier. I do not see any reason why in the course of time these two positions should not be more or less amalgamated and the same officers perform both services. The customs work at that point is no doubt more important than the work of the immigration officers, but a very considerable saving could be effected there, and I hope the minister will take that into consideration.

Mr. BOIVIN: The matter will receive further consideration when the session is over; of course, it will be impossible to consider it at the present time. The information my hon. friend has just given to the House is absolutely correct. The officer in question was removed and his duties were assigned to the officer representing the Department of Customs at that port. This action confirms to a certain extent the statement I made a moment ago regarding the smaller ports where one officer was charged with doing both customs and immigration work.

Mr. HANSON: I would like to ask a question which perhaps does not come under this particular item; but I am sorry I was not here when the estimates were before the House a day or so ago, with reference to the preventive service in the bay of Fundy. What boats are employed there, how large are they, and is it the intention of the government to augment this service. The reason I ask is that one day in the month of October last I had the duty to perform of going to the island of Grand Manan to assist in the happy return of my hon. friend the member for Charlotte (Mr. Grimmer), and on our way out, I was in the pilot house of the steamboat, and the captain pointed out to me three boats in the distance which he said, and I have no doubt he was correct, were rum runners which had been located there for several weeks, plying their illicit traffic with the people on shore without let or hindrance by any officer of this government. I had it in mind at the time to communicate with the department, but under the stress of the election I did not do so. I would point out to the minister that practically during the whole of the summer and autumn season of 1925 bootleggers were in the bay of Fundy plying their illicit traffic, delivering their goods, taking the money of the people, and so far as those from whom I inquired knew, there had not been a single vessel or boat of the customs preventive service in the bay of Fundy waters during that whole period. These people were not in any way interferred with, and they were in those waters till the autumn gales came on. Now that is something that should not continue. Possibly this statement of facts, or what have been detailed to me as facts, will enable the department to give some consideration and attention to that sheet of water next year, for certainly something ought to be done there. I happen to know, not from personal knowledge, but from information that has reached me, that there is a considerable volume of illicit liquor smuggling on the bay of Fundy coast, and no doubt the revenues of this country have in that way been deprived of very large sums of money. Some of this liquor is destined for conveyance to the neighbouring state of Maine, some of it is for local consumption, but I imagine that the most of it is for export, because we are rather a sober people down in that part of the country. I hope the minister will give this matter his attention, and that in the spring season now opening this situation will be looked into and this evil remedied.

Mr. BOIVIN: When these estimates were last before the committee, I myself stated that we were not satisfied with the preventive service that we now have on the coasts of the three Maritime provinces. The nearest boat we have to the bay of Fundy is one mentioned in the list which I gave to the hon. member for West York on page 1634 of Hansard. Patrol Boat G, with headquarters at Yarmouth, Nova Scotia. It is impossible for that boat to carry on a patrol service in the bay of Fundy as it should be carried on but I promise the hon. gentleman that the service will be improved during the present season. I would go further and tell him that if he has any information which might lead to the conviction of the men involved, in addition to the information he has just given to the House, I should be glad to receive it confidentially. If that information can bring about a prosecution it is not yet too late to institute proceedings.

Mr. FOSTER: What special instructions are given to the customs officers at the various ports on the Atlantic coast of the Maritimes in regard to smuggling operations? Are there any special instructions beyond those contained in the general clauses of the Customs Act?

Mr. BOIVIN: The preventive officers—in fact all the officers of the department having power to make seizures—are given instructions in advance to seize and detain goods they may catch persons in the act of smuggling, goods which may have been smuggled into Canada. In addition to the general instructions concerning the seizure of goods which must be reported to Ottawa, special instructions were issued by the department on July 3, 1925, after the Customs Act was amended last session. The memorandum reads as follows:

There is printed herewith copy of an act to amend the Customs Act assented to by parliament on the 27th of June, 1925. This act provides for the repeal of sections 206 and 219 of the Customs Act, and the substitution therefor of new sections bearing the same numbers wherein provision is made for imposing heavier fines and imprisonment for the offences of smuggling and of keeping or selling goods unlawfully imported, with further provision making it an indictable offence to smuggle goods or keep or sell unlawfully imported goods of the value of $200 or over. In respect of the latter offences you are instructed that in all cases where you are satisfied the goods were smuggled for personal use and not for business use and it is a first offence, not to commence any proceedings by way of indictment without first communicating the fact to the department and awaiting instructions. In all other cases proceedings are to be taken forthwith.

That means that the deputy minister with the authorization of the then acting minister, sent instructions to all collectors in the country that whenever smuggling, or keeping smuggled goods of a value of more than $200 for commercial purposes came to their attention they were to prosecute before the courts at once without communicating with headquarters at Ottawa.

Mr. FOSTER: Let me put this case to the minister. Suppose a customs official is advised that a ship is in the harbour with liquor on board which is intended to be landed, and in view of that information he went elsewhere looking for liquor to be landed at another cove some miles away where there was no liquor and none expected to be landed. It was not certain that the landing was to be made at the latter spot; on the contrary the officer knew it was not expected there. If such facts as these were brought to the attention of the minister would he consider the advisability of dismissing the officer for acting in such a manner?

Mr. BOIVIN: If the name of the officer and the circumstances are given to me the matter will be investigated at once. Should the facts prove to be as stated by my hon. friend, I have no hesitation in saying that the officer will be dismissed at once.

Mr. MARCIL: Reference was made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) to smuggling operations from the island of St. Pierre and Miquelon that are going on. I shall not startle the minister or any member in this House by saying that smuggling from these islands has been carried on ever since the islands became the property of France. They constitute the paradise of the smuggler at all times. Those smuggling operations have always been going on and will continue, I suppose, for some time to come And here let me say that the liquor which comes from those islands is not of the worst character. It comes from France and has an established reputation. I understood the minister to say that further efforts would be made to strengthen the preventive service in the Maritime provinces. I wish that when doing that he would give his attention to the Quebec side of the gulf of St. Lawrence where we have a peculiar state of affairs in the county of Bonaventure, and especially in the county of Gaspe. I am sorry His Honour the Speaker is not here at this moment because he would support what I am saying. The dividing line between the counties of Bonaventure and Gaspe is Pointe Macquereau supposed to be at the end of the baie des Chaleurs. Beyond that the gulf of St. Lawrence begins. Ten miles from Pointe Macquereau opposite Newport, in the county of Gaspe vessels from St. Pierre and Miquelon come and station themselves—three miles from the shore and ten miles from the dividing line referred to—and carry on their business. Fishing boats go out at night, or whenever the opportunity is afforded to them, bring in liquor and land it as best they can. I suppose it would take an army of preventive officers to prevent smuggling there entirely, but I want to ask the minister why the gulf of St. Lawrence, being surrounded by Canadian territory, is not made a mare clausum?

How does it come that an inland water like the gulf of St. Lawrence, only three miles from the Gaspe coast, with Canadian territory all around it, is considered international waters so that outside boats can go there and carry on such a business? I think the minister will be well advised to look into the matter and see if the gulf of St. Lawrence cannot be declared a mare clausum with all that the term implies, and thus put an end to the smuggling operations which are so demoralizing to the population particularly in the county of Gaspe. The parish priests, who are well acquainted with the facts, complain of the opportunity afforded to poor people to go out to these boats and barter for whiskey, with the most unhappy results. I understand that the cruiser Margaret is available for patrol duty but is powerless to act because of the rule which has been laid down respecting the three-mile limit. I hope the minister will look into the matter and see if an end cannot be put to the existing situation to the consequent great advantage of the inhabitants in that part of Quebec.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend will remember that very shortly after the general election he brought this matter to my attention. The officials of the department are not experts on international law and it was impossible for us to determine whether or not the gulf of St. Lawrence could be considered closed waters. The opinion expressed by the legal officers in our department was that the gulf should be considered part of the Atlantic ocean and that the three-mile limit should apply within its waters. The question, however, has not been definitely decided and an opinion has been asked for from the Department of Justice. That opinion has not yet reached us, but we do hope even if it should be contrary to the wishes of my hon. friend to find some other means of coping with the situation that he complains of. He says that the same state of affairs exists in Gaspe. That matter was brought to the attention of the department by His Honour the Speaker and upon his request a special detachment of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, three in number, I think, were sent to the coast of Gaspe in July in order to correct as far as possible the abuses complained of by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil).

Mr. McGIBBON: In view of the fact that the minister has admitted that the preventive service is bad—I think he admitted the other day that they had ten or twelve cruisers on the Atlantic and had only made some forty seizures all summer—and in view of the fact that public opinion in Canada to-day is very much concentrated on his department, I should like to ask him what policy he intends to adopt to increase the efficiency of that service during the coming year. As a new minister no doubt he has given considerable thought to the subject and has ideas of his own, which I think the House and the country would be much interested in knowing.

Mr. BOIVIN: I hesitate somewhat about putting my views—some of the ideas are my own and some are ideas received from the leading officials of the department—before the House at the present time. I intended to place my opinions before the committee now investigating administration of the department and then do the best I could to meet the recommendations contained in the report of that committee, which I hope will be confirmed by the House. I cannot however refuse the courteous request of my hon. friend, and I would say that the special preventive service force which was authorized last year by the vote of $350,000 in the supplementary estimates must be improved. In other words, of the sixty-seven men now employed, much as I hate to make dismissals, many must be dismissed and many additional men must be appointed. My intention would be to appoint a preventive force of some 260 men, divided up among the different provinces approximately as follows: Nova Scotia, 56; New Brunswick, 20; Prince Edward Island, 10; Quebec, 90; Ontario, 54; Manitoba, 16; Alberta, 3; Saskatchewan, 5, and British Columbia 13, for the purpose of patrolling and guarding the boundary points where trucks and automobiles may enter Canada, but also for the purpose of guarding strategic points in Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Does the minister mean 260 in addition to the present staff?

Mr. BOIVIN: Not in addition to the new special staff. I desire to make myself clear. The men authorized by the $350,000 vote of last year were roughly estimated at 200. Only 67 were appointed. Those who will be retained out of the 67 so appointed will be included in this number of approximately 260. These of course are just approximate numbers. The idea would be to group the men by twos and threes at junction points where several routes coming in from the United States converge to go into one large city; for instance at the Victoria bridge at Montreal, or at the Longueuil ferry. We would thus have a double check on all the incoming cars at these particular strategic points. In addition to that,

I think that a certain number of officers should be equipped with motor cycles or high powered cars for the purpose of patrolling, what I might almost call, the lonely country roads, the unimproved dirt roads that cross the boundary between the United States and Canada. They are or can be used by smugglers during the dry season of the year, but there is so little traffic that it would never pay to appoint permanent officers to guard them. In that way, we can pretty well protect the boundary. Hon. gentlemen will notice there is a less number of men mentioned in my estimate for the province of Ontario than for the province of Quebec. There is an extensive land boundary between the United States and the Province of Quebec, whereas the boundary line between Ontario and the United States is formed almost entirely by water. The points at which people can cross and come into Ontario are not so numerous as they are in Quebec. I would adopt the same methods along the boundary of the province of Manitoba at and near Emerson, and upon all the different roads leading up from the United States to the city of Winnipeg. The same thing applies also at points south of Vancouver, between Washington and British Columbia. I do not think this will be necessary between the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan and the United States, because there is very little smuggling done there. I am told that the distance between the large American cities on the south and the large Canadian cities on the north of the boundary line, is so great that it is not advantageous for smugglers to try to operate in that territory. The service will also have to be increased on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts. We had fourteen boats on the Atlantic coast. That number is not sufficient. The only way to effectively interfere with smuggling on the coast is by the use of patrol boats. A great number of boats have been offered to us for rental, but I have not rented more than one or two so far. A great many of the boats offered to us for rental are boats having a speed of about eight or nine knots per hour, and naturally they would be of little use in preventing smuggling.

The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario, mentioned the fact that we had only made forty seizures during the past year. It is not the duty of patrol boats to make seizures and we cannot expect that service from them. The patrol boat is operating to scare the smugglers away, to prevent any communication between the coast and the liquor-laden schooner outside of the three-mile limit. When patrol boats are operating very few attempts are made to unload cargoes, and when vessels are obliged to remain too long on the open sea with their cargoes, they naturally move on and endeavour to send it into the United States or sometimes deliver it at Newfoundland points. The efficiency of the patrol service should never be measured by the number of seizures, but a certain number of boats should be added to the service. In British Columbia certain boats should also be used. The coast of Vancouver island should be protected although there is not much smuggling into Vancouver island, the largest amount of smuggling being into the bays and inlets on the coast of continental British Columbia. We have only one cruiser there; we should have others and I hope as soon as possible three or four other boats may be placed in operation. I hope I can lease boats to prove that this is a means of prevention. Later on if the experiment is successful I intend to ask parliament to vote a sufficient sum of money to build a certain number of fast patrol boats. They need not be very large, but they must be fast, because a patrol boat, if it is to be of any use, must be fast.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The minister has given quite a comprehensive plan, but I notice that no provision is made in that plan for patrolling the Great Lakes. Is it the intention to leave that out of the scheme entirely?

Mr. BOIVIN: It is not the intention to leave the Great Lakes out of the plan. The reason why we have not made provision for patrolling the Great Lakes is that we consider that most of the ports at which boats of any size or importance land are already protected by preventive officers. The great trouble on the Great Lakes is not so much the smuggling in as the smuggling out. A great deal of liquor, as we all know, is shipped from lake ports to the United States of America, but we are particular about the export entry, about the necessity of giving the name of the boat and a description of the cargo in each instance, so that we may have some control of the boats when they come back and make sure that they do not return laden with United States merchandise. The boats report back empty to customs officers along the coast, and there must therefore be very little incentive for any one who is not exporting from Canada to the United States to use small boats for the purpose of smuggling goods into this country. The coast line of the Great Lakes is fairly well protected now by preventive officers, by sub-ports and ports and we do not consider it necessary at the present time to put patrol boats on the Great Lakes. I thank the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) for bringing the matter before the committee. I want hon. members to remember that all I have said is merely a tentative plan, and other methods are under consideration. An idea which has been submitted to me by one of the officials of my department is that of erecting steel gates on roads crossing the boundary, gates which might be locked at sunset and opened at sunrise, and watched over perhaps by one preventive officer. I am not inclined at the moment to favour the idea, but I am willing to admit that it has much merit. It is certainly worthy of consideration even if I have not yet considered it worthy of adoption.

Mr. KAISER: I hope the minister will not become so absorbed in points in Canada that indulge in smuggling as to forget some of the places which know nothing of smuggling. I represent the city of Oshawa, a port which is fifth in the Dominion in the amount of the revenue it sends to the federal treasury. The federal service in that city requires some particular attention. In the first place we have no collector of customs, and we have not had a local appointee for a few years. I realize that the government have been very considerate in dealing as they have done, during his illness, with the gentleman who was appointed by the Conservative party, but something must be done at the present time. If it is the intention of the government to appoint a collector of customs at our port apart from the one who has held it in his illness, the appointment should be made immediately. Some attention should also be paid to the building which is absolutely inadequate for the services which we are endeavouring to carry on.

I do not know who in this House represents the Post Office Department, but in that regard we are worse off than we are in the Customs department. We have had no postmaster for several months, and nothing is known as to the intention of the government. The postal service is not as it should be; there is discontent within the office, discontent with the carriers and so on due to mismanagement of the service at that particular point. I hope the government will pay some attention now to the port of Oshawa and see that our services are lifted to a higher plane. I can understand why the office of postmaster was held open until after the election, but the election is over and we are willing now, and the town demands, that an appointment be made in connection with the post office. We say also that the customs service is not what it should be. Business men are patient but there is an under-current of complaint. As a matter of fact the customs office at Oshawa costs less than any other office in Canada in comparison with the amount of revenue received. The offices have been inconvenient and unsatisfactory to the business men, and I hope that the Minister of Customs and whoever may be responsible for the administration of the Post Office Department will make special note of this, look into the conditions, and give us a remedy for them.

Mr. BOIVIN: In answer to my hon. friend I may say that his remarks apply to three separate departments. So far as the buildings are concerned that is a matter for the consideration of the Minister of Public Works, and it will be brought to his attention. Regarding the appointment of the postmaster, I must thank my hon. friend for the indirect compliment he has paid myself and my colleagues of the government by saying that the appointment was left open until after the general election.

Mr. HANSON: There may be a reason.

Mr. BOIVIN: Possibly so, but as a rule party appointments are made before an election. This matter will receive the immediate attention of the Postmaster General. The question which interests my department, the appointment of the collector, and my hon. friend is right when he complains that the port of Oshawa, with the large revenue derived from the General Motors Corporation, has remained for some time without a collector. As my hon. friend knows, Mr. C. E. Thomas, the collector at that port, is unfortunately ill and has been on leave of absence through illness. I am told that he has been absent from his duties for about five months, and that an acting officer has been placed in temporary charge. This state of affairs cannot continue very long, and it is expected that if this estimable collector cannot return to his duties in the very near future, he will ask to be retired and the Civil Service Commission will be requested to make an appointment to fill the position. I can assure my hon. friend that within a very short time the position of collector of customs at Oshawa will be filled.

Mr. HANSON: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the remarks of the minister concerning the preventive service, I should like to ask what type of man he has been appointing or proposes to appoint; is he to be a man of the so-called police type, or is he to be what has been referred to in the committee as a departmental man? Is he to be tangled up in a lot of red tape, or is he to be allowed to show some initiative? That is a most important feature, to which the minister has not referred. I would suggest to him that the success or failure of his plan will depend upon the personnel of the staff which he proposes to appoint. Furthermore I would like to know how he proposes to make these appointments; are they to be made on the recommendation of the local patronage committee of the community in which the men are to reside or operate? If so, I think he will get exactly the same class of service in regard to the prevention of smuggling as he and his predecessors have been getting, and that to a large extent is zero. I will not say that; I will withdraw that statement. The minister will not get as good service as he would if the men were not appointed for political reasons. Are the appointments to be made through the Civil Service Commission, or, as I understand from the vote last year, are they to be made by the government? Are the men to be of the type of the gentleman who was appointed chief of the preventive service in Montreal last July, and whose actions are now under review? I want to tell the minister that I think the department is on trial in this connection, that the revelations which have been made so far in the investigating committee have fixed the eyes of the entire country upon this preventive service.

While I am on my feet I would like to point out to him, in connection with the remarks of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil), that while in my humble opinion I think it would be impossible to treat the gulf of St. Lawrence as a closed sea, I see no reason why the bay of Fundy, which is enclosed by British territory on three sides and which has a comparatively small mouth, should not be treated, as I believe it has been treated in international law, as a mare clausum. I should like to know the opinion of the department in that connection.

Then there is another matter which I would like to mention while I am on my feet. I want to take up all the things I have in mind now, because there are many others who want to speak on these questions. The Fisheries department has along the Atlantic coast and in the bay of Fundy a patrol boat, driven by internal combustion engines, which patrols along the border of the country between Canada and the United States. I wonder if the minister has ever considered the use of that fishery patrol in conjunction with the patrol against smuggling. As I understand it, the boat has a complete crew of fishery officers on board; she is on duty every day, and might very well be employed along certain portions of the coast line, with a preventive officer. Has consideration been given to that matter?

Mr. BOIVIN: We have not given consideration to the employment of the fishery patrol for that purpose. The suggestion is one that has never been made to me; I am very glad to have it made now, and I will take the matter up with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and see if it will be possible to use the fishery patrol for the double purpose. I will discuss the matter with the minister, and the two departments will get together and confer concerning it.

The other question asked by my hon. friend concerning the method of appointment of the preventive officers is much more embarrassing. I have not yet decided how the appointments can best be made. I am convinced that they should not be made upon the recommendation of a local patronage committee or of a member of the House and I am equally convinced that they should not be made upon the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission. I do not like to refer to matters under investigation by a committee; I am not going to blame my hon. friend for referring to them, but he mentioned one name—

Mr. HANSON: I do not think I mentioned the name.

Mr. BOIVIN: My hon. friend did not mention the name but he mentioned the officer, the chief preventive officer of Montreal, who was appointed in July, 1925. That gentleman was raised to that position by the Civil Service Commission, on the recommendation not of the minister—.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The recommendation of the department.

Mr. BOIVIN: On the indirect recommendation of the officers of the department who gave him his rating. I am not blaming the Civil Service Commission for his appointment. If my remarks in this House on a previous occasion were interpreted as blame against the Civil Service Commission, I want to dispel that idea at once. The Civil Service Commission could not have done otherwise in this particular case. A requisition was made for a bilingual appointee; there were two applicants one of whom was not bilingual. No matter what his qualifications might have been, it was necessary for the Civil Service Commission to appoint the bilingual candidate, but that was not the fault of the department. The position was advertised in the port and in all the sub-ports of the district of Montreal, and if only two applied for the position, certainly the department cannot and the Civil Service Commission should not be blamed. There is much merit in the Civil Service system. The Civil Service Commission has its place in our public life, to determine the qualifications of the applicants for promotion and appointment in the ordinary civil service not only in Ottawa, but also in the larger cities and also the towns and villages of Canada. The Civil Service Commission can well act as an intermediary between the applicants on the one side and the government on the other. There is no doubt about that. The Civil Service Commission can do excellent work but there are certain positions still within the jurisdiction of the commission which should not be there. How can the commission determine who is a proper man to be a preventive officer?

Mr. GOTT: By examination.

Mr. BOIVIN: Just exactly the answer I thought I would get. Do you agree, Mr. Chairman, that the man who is the best scholar, who is able perhaps to count in decimals, to write an essay or make a translation in more perfect form than his neighbour, is better qualified to act as a preventive officer?

Mr. GOTT: That is some qualification.

Mr. BOIVIN: True; that is exactly what I have said. For a great many positions you cannot get a better appointing authority than the Civil Service Commission. But I say there are some positions of a peculiar nature requiring certain qualifications which cannot be established by a man's examination paper, that cannot even be manifested by his appearance, yet these positions the Civil Service Commission are called upon to fill. Let me give an example. There is no man in this country prouder of a certain branch of the government service than the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), sitting beside me. I think every member, be he Conservative, Liberal, Progressive, Labour or Independent, shares his pride in the achievements and reputation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. In the customs inquiry and elsewhere it has been said, "Oh, why don't you assign this work to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?" And in every case where that branch has been placed in charge of any particular work which came within their jurisdiction it has been done excellently. Now, I ask hon. members on the other side this question—and excuse me, Mr. Chairman, if I put it direct—Will any one rise in his place and say that appointments to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should be made by the Civil Service Commission?

5 p.m.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Why confine your question to this side of the House?

Mr. BOIVIN: I regret the mistaken expression. I meant to address it to the entire House.

Mr. BURY: The Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Mr. Chairman, is a semi-military body and is entirely under the jurisdiction of its officers. It is so in the Old Country in connection with the police, or with any similar semi-military body. Therefore that illustration does not at all come fairly within the purview of the minister's answer.

Mr. BOIVIN: Perhaps my hon. friend did not hear the preliminary part of my remarks. I did not say to the Civil Service Commission, "Hands off the Customs department." I agree that the commission should continue to make a large number of the appointments—appointments of customs collectors, appointments of customs officers here at Ottawa, appointments of appraisers, and so on. I am now referring to the new preventive service, and I think it should be a semi-military or semi-police service. I say that that service cannot be satisfactorily appointed by the Civil Service Commission. I hope the committee and the House will not decide otherwise. I will not however determine any definite plan of action until I have received the report of the committee. It will render effective service to the country if it only determines where some of the smuggling takes place at the present time and reports to the House ways and means of organizing an efficient preventive service to stop that smuggling. If it can do this it will do better than any special committee that has been appointed by this parliament for many years.

Mr. GEARY: Does the minister mean that on the other hand these appointments should be made by the department?

Mr. BOIVIN: No. I said in my opening remarks that I was equally opposed to direct appointment by the minister on the recommendation of the local patronage committee.

Mr. GEARY: Of course, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are appointed after examination.

Mr. BOIVIN: But not by the Civil Service Commission. They are appointed after examination by the officers in control and who place each probationer under observance.

Mr. GEARY: Certainly.

Mr. BOIVIN: In other words, they judge their appearance, ability, honesty and integrity.

Mr. GOTT: Is not that a kind of examination?

Mr. BURY: It is merely a qualifying examination. It does not necessarily carry promotion with it.

Mr. GOTT: I should like to know where examinations do carry. They did not carry in connection with the Kingsville appointment. Is the minister aware that all papers and information submitted to him by the department in connection with the dismissal of Mr. C. R. McCallum and the appointment of A. D. Pearsall, were issued even before Mr. McCallum's appointment was made? I am impressed by the minister's desire to be fair. He said in the House some time ago that when charges were instituted against any civil servant, the procedure followed was first to suspend the man charged, and then to investigate the charges; if found guilty he would be dismissed, and if found innocent he would be reinstated. Now, I ask the minister, although this appointment did not occur during his term of office, to go back and correct mistakes where it is possible to correct them. As I have said, none of the information I requested yesterday has been supplied. The examination took place on May 29, and Mr. McCallum passed with a high percentage of marks. He had a fine reputation locally, where he was well known, and an equally fine record while on overseas service. Yet under date of June 10, 1925, I find a letter addressed to G. Graham, Esq., Assistant Inspector of Customs and Excise, Ottawa. I may use this correspondence?

Mr. BOIVIN: Certainly.

Mr. GOTT: The letter reads:

I have the honour to state that the department has deemed it advisable to review the recent examination of applicants for the position of sub-collector at the outport of Kingsville.

Very remarkable that on June 10 the department should deem it necessary to review an examination that took place on May 29! I ask the minister what happened in the meantime that the department considered it necessary that this examination should be reviewed. I might state that the person by whom it was reviewed was a very outstanding Liberal, and the only thing in connection with the appointment that had not the appearance of political control was the examination and the marks obtained thereon. The next communication is from Mr. Graham, assistant inspector of customs and excise, under date of June 15, 1925:

In this connection I conferred with Mr. A. W. Massey, the principal of the high school at Kingsville, Ontario—

Mr. Massey, I might say, is an outstanding Liberal:

—and in the case of Mr. C. R. McCallum, I am obliged to state that this party, while of good ability, has been guilty in time past of a rather serious offence. It appears that while employed by the Canadian Pacific Telegraph Company at Kingsville, Ontario, this party divulged certain confidential information entrusted to him, with the result that he was discharged by the telegraph company.

Mr. Massey declined to make any change in the ratings already submitted by himself and Mr. McGuire at the previous examination.

Next I submit a letter to Mr. L. J. Lafferty, Windsor, from G. R. Kerby, chief inspector of the Canadian Pacific Railway, under date of August 15, 1925:

DEAR SIR,—Further to my letter of recent date in connection with former agent C. R. McCallum.

Kindly be advised that Mr. McCallum was not discharged from the service but resigned on his own free will, not wishing to assume further responsibility as he was not acquainted with the wire work.

Under the circumstances consider he acted very wisely as our system is quite complicated which made him dependent for information from his operator.

Yours truly,

G. R. KERBY,
Inspector.

As Mr. Graham, the assistant inspector of customs and excise, points out in his letter of June 15, 1925:

Mr. Massey declined to make any change in the ratings already submitted by himself and Mr. McGuire at the previous examination.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Who came out at the head of that examination?

Mr. GOTT: Mr. McCallum stood far above all the others who tried the examination. The next letter is under date of June 15, 1925:

I have the honour to state that I am this date in receipt of a report from Mr. G. Graham, Assistant Inspector of Customs and Excise, relative to the rating of the candidates who recently made application for the position of collector of customs and excise at the outport of Kingsville, Ontario.

The assistant inspector's report, which is attached herewith, indicates that while Mr. C. R. McCallum is a party of good ability, he has in time past been guilty of having committed a serious breach of trust in that he divulged secret and private information while in the employ of the Canadian Pacific Railway Telegraph at Kingsville, Ontario, and also is a party whose disposition is such that he is not likely to get along very well with the public in the discharge of his duties were he appointed to the position.

Mr. BOIVIN: Just to have the file complete in Hansard, would my hon. friend be good enough to give the name of the person by whom that letter is signed. Would he read any other paragraph and the signature?

Mr. GOTT: It concludes:

All of which is respectfully submitted.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant,

E. S. BUSBY,

Chief Inspector of Customs and Excise.

The next is a letter to the secretary of the Civil Service Commission from Mr. R. R. Farrow, Deputy Minister, Department of Customs:

I have the honour to enclose oral examination ratings by Mr. G. C. McGuire, Inspector of Customs and Excise, and Mr. A. W. Massey, on the candidates for appointment to the position of sub-collector of customs and excise at Kingsville, Ontario.

. The department recommends the appointment of Mr. A. D. Pearsall and copy of letter from Mr. G. Graham, Assistant Inspector of Customs and Excise—

If his position had not been stated, I would have been inclined to believe it was the Right Hon. George P. Graham, my worthy opponent in the last election. It goes on:

—is enclosed respecting the candidates, and your attention is directed to his remarks concerning Mr. McCallum, whose assignment would not be acceptable to the department.

That letter is under date of June 19, 1925, and that is the last letter which the Minister of Customs has supplied to me—one under date of June 19, 1925. Now Mr. McCallum received his official appointment under date of June 25, 1925. Here is his notification from the Civil Service Commission to report for duty. It is under date of June 25, and was received by Mr. McCallum in Kingsville on June 26:

Civil Service Commission of Canada

Notification of Report for Duty

Name—Charles R. McCallum.
Address—Kingsville, Ontario.
Department—Customs and Excise.
Branch—Kingsville, Ontario.
Title of position—Sub-collector of Customs and Excise, outport, Kingsville, Ontario.
Duties—As specified in the official definition, and such other related work as may be required.

As I said, the last letter that has been supplied to me by the minister is under date of June 19, 1925; Mr. McCallum was appointed on the 25th day of June, 1925, so it is obvious that the minister has failed in every respect to give me any papers in connection with his dismissal, and that is what I asked for yesterday.

Mr. BOIVIN: I am sure that my hon. friend will admit that all this took place before I entered the department. I had no knowledge of it at all. After he had brought the matter up, I called upon my officers to give me copies of all the documents concerning the matters referred to in my hon. friend's remarks. He has reopened the subject to-day, and has indicated what he still further requires. I can only say that further investigation will be made and if any other letters or documents are found relating to this matter, they will be brought forward and given to my hon. friend.

Mr. GOTT: I would like to ask the minister this question: If it is found that Mr. McCallum was entitled to that position, being a returned soldier, will he now be given consideration by the minister?

Mr. BOIVIN: Certainly he will be given consideration, and the entire facts will be reported at once to the members of the Civil Service Commission in order that the wrong done to Mr. McCallum, if wrong has been done, may be righted just as soon as possible.

Mr. GOTT: That is very satisfactory.

Mr. PETTIT: May I ask the minister if he has considered the advisability of establishing a continuous night patrol between Niagara Falls and Fort Erie, along the Niagara boulevard? That is a very important stretch, and I think a continuous night patrol is very advisable. There should also be a boat patrol along the shore of lake Erie on the Canadian side, from Port Colborne for a distance of at least ten or twelve miles west of that port.

Mr. BOIVIN: The matter is not only under consideration, but I may say that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have a patrol at that point. We are now in communication with the chief of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the purpose of ascertaining if it will not be possible for them to give us the men required to establish the continuous patrol suggested by my hon. friend. I cannot make any definite statement now.

Mr. PETTIT: It should be a continuous control.

Mr. BOIVIN: Oh yes. I have found that a patrol on a dangerous boundary is no good at all unless it is maintained for the twenty-four hours, because smugglers know the hours the patrol is maintained, and naturally take advantage of that knowledge. That is why I am giving serious consideration to the idea of erecting steel gates on boundary roads, but I admit frankly I have not yet decided that it would be the best plan that could be adopted.

Mr. EVANS: I have listened with interest to this discussion to-day, and particularly with regard to the contemplated plan of the minister to prevent smuggling. A discussion of this kind might have taken place in England some one hundred years ago, but since that date it would have been utterly impossible for that country to engage in any discussion of this kind. It must be obvious to hon. gentlemen from all the discussion to-day that our preventive service is costing this country a tremendous sum of money; in fact, it is getting too costly. Now the plan is to put on more boats for patrol work, and they will be still more costly because they have to be of pretty high speed if they are to do any good. Instead of spending the money in this way, I think it must be obvious to the whole of this country that there is another way to prevent smuggling. I believe smuggling is carried on to a tremendous extent at the present time, but by lowering the duty on the goods smuggled we could do away with a great deal of these illicit operations. The preventing of smuggling is costing this country too much. Apart from the smuggling going on around our borders, and the preventive service designed to check it, we have a little army of high salaried men who follow up importations from foreign countries and see that the manufacturers do not falsify invoices and so forth. All this is very costly, and so I would recommend to the earnest consideration of the government the advisability of lowering the duties, whereby smuggling will be greatly lessened.

Mr. McGIBBON: I should like to draw the attention of the minister to a fact which I think is rather serious. It is that when an hon. member asks for a return from this government and it is brought down it is found to be incomplete. No less than four letters, to be found on page 1271 of Hansard are missing from the return brought down at the request of the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Gott). Surely it is a serious condition of affairs when documents are lacking from a return brought down at the request of a member of this House. That constitutes a serious situation which merits some consideration from the minister.

Mr. BOIVIN: I would agree with my hon. friend if the documents which the hon. member for South Essex has just read had really formed part of a return. The documents that I handed the hon. gentleman to-day were not in the form of a return to the House. They were sent to him in answer to a question that he asked the other day concerning the reasons why a certain person who had passed the qualifying civil service examination had not been accepted by the department. The departmental officers gave me some letters which they thought would explain the matter, and I handed them to my hon. friend, but there was no intention to mislead parliament. If a request had been made for the complete file, all the letters would have appeared in the return. In fact if my hon. friend desires to have the complete file laid on the table, I shall be only too glad to see that his request is complied with.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I hope the hon. minister will not be unduly influenced by the suggestion of the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans). One of the great difficulties of the preventive officers is to stop the smuggling of liquor into this country. I was somewhat surprised, therefore, to hear the hon. member carry his free trade ideas to the extent of recommending a lowering of the duties on that commodity which the best talents of the preventive service are being exercised to keep out. It was also noticeable that the free trader from Rosetown did not advocate an entire removal of the duties, but a reduction. Consequently we can only assume that the hon. member, who regards anything in the way of protection as a vice and everything in the way of free trade as a virtue, prefers for the time being a measure of vice to complete political virtue. There is no other logical conclusion to arrive at than that the hon. member for Rosetown is compromising with vice, although as Pope says:

> Vice is a monster of so frightful a mien,
> As, to be hated, needs but to be seen.

The hon. gentleman seems to have come to the point where having been compelled to endure protection for a while he will end up by embracing it.

I cannot agree with the reasoning of the minister in regard to the qualifications of the Civil Service Commission to appoint men to the preventive service. As I understand it when a vacant position is advertised the qualifications required for that position are clearly set forth,. and the Civil Service Commission must judge whether or not the candidates possess those qualifications. Therefore I suppose that in advertising for a preventive officer the qualifications for the office would be distinctly specified, and the Civil Service Commission should be able to judge of the qualifications of the candidates as they do in the case of vacancies in the post office or other clerical positions. The fact of the matter is that so far as the Civil Service Commission is concerned a great change has come over the minds of hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House since that body was appointed. I very distinctly remember that when the matter came up in the House—and it gives me considerable satisfaction now, although I was in a very hopeless minority at the time—I opposed the transfer of political patronage to the Civil Service Commission. I opposed it at that time, and as the years have gone by I have been more than ever convinced that the position I took then was the correct position. I do not believe that any three or four men sitting in the city of Ottawa are as well qualified as local men in the various counties to determine who is or is not best fitted to fill local positions. I take the stand now that I took some years ago when this matter came up, that not the defeated candidate of the party in power, but the member elected, no matter to what political party he belongs, is the man who should assume full responsibility for such appointments and the advice given to the government with respect to them, and that he should stand or fall by his action. The people of his constituency will hold him responsible. If the man he nominates for a position does not fill the bill he will have to answer to his constituents and that is a course which I think should very well be followed.

The minister has intimated that he thinks appointments to the preventive service should be made in some other way. He has not indicated very clearly, to me at least, just how he thinks such appointments should be made, but I take it that he would want men who had had some training in military discipline at least. In that case why not utilize our permanent force and give them something to do besides walking around the barracks in different parts of the country.

Mr. BOIVIN: I do not think they would have the training necessary to enable them to do the work.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I presume they are all men of intelligence, and if they are, the department should be able to educate them as well as any other class. The tribute paid to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is none too high; you cannot praise that splendid force too highly. That class of men would undoubtedly give the same kind of service that has given the force a world-wide reputation.

Mr. BOIVIN: Let me put this question to my hon. friend. I am very much interested in his views and I should like to have him tell me what he would think of the idea of enlarging the scope of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and of confiding to them, or to a special branch of the organization, the preventive service of the country.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Well, that might be all right in some respects; I do not see why those in the permanent force could not be utilized and taught their duties. But when you try to carry out that idea of the minister you are simply going round the Civil Service Commission; and back of it all you have the fact, expressed in a circuitous manner, that we have a Civil Service Commission, the members of which draw very good salaries, which is not competent to appoint officials in certain branches of the public service. That is a condemnation of the Civil Service Commission. I will back up the minister or anybody else in this House who will undertake absolutely to overhaul the whole of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. BOIVIN: If I can get that same assertion of opinion from the majority of the members of this House, I will attempt to start the overhauling right off.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I cannot speak and do not propose to speak for any other member on the Conservative side of the House. Certainly I would not presume to speak for my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Brown) and I would be in wrong if I undertook to represent the views of the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans), or of others who profess to hold similar opinions. I cannot give the minister any guarantee beyond my own opinion—

Mr. BOIVIN: I did not ask for that.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I know he did not. One thing is certain; it is time we had in the Department of Customs a minister who was seized with the responsibilities of his office. I am not going to express any opinion now in regard to the present occupant of the office, but the position strikes me as very peculiar. This government last session succeeded in putting through a vote of $350,000 for special work in connection with the prevention of smuggling, which they must have known and did know at that time was carried on to a large extent in this country. I am informed that up to the end of January of this year only $20,000 or $30,000 of that amount had been spent. What is the use of the government voting $350,000 for special preventive service and then coming forward and asking the people of the country to pat them on the back for their economy in not spending money to make the preventive service of the country effective? With such information that we have before us I hope the government will take serious action in this matter of preventing smuggling, appoint a staff of preventive officers and organize such a service of patrol boats as is required to give effect to the laws of the country. There is no use quibbling over a few hundred or a few thousand dollars of expenditure in our preventive services. Make your officers as efficient as you will and still you have a difficult problem to deal with in preventing smuggling. If we have, and so long as we have, a customs tariff in this country, we will require customs officials and preventive officers to see that the law is put into effect; and you will always have in this country, within the lifetime of the youngest member of this House, a customs tariff. I know my hon. friend from Rosetown believes that just as much as I do, but he came here, as did a good many others from the Old Country, with his mind impregnated with the free trade policies which these people still continue to cling to, and I suppose always will cling to, until Providence takes them out of this world.

We are glad to have these gentlemen come from free trade England to Canada, where they are carrying on to a certain extent under a protective tariff and are much more successful under protection than they were under free trade. We are glad, I say, to welcome them here. The only point is that we would like them, when they cross the Atlantic, to leave their free trade nonsense on the other side of the ocean and proceed here on sane and modern lines. This old idea born and bred in England fifty or sixty years ago, which they still cling to, covered with the cobwebs of age as it is, without a single sound reason to support it, has become so moth-eaten at the heart that even the British statesmen are turning their backs on it, and when you get a British statesman turning his back on an old idea you have to take into consideration the significance of the fact that he is English or perhaps Welsh—I think the Welsh are more stubborn and harder to change than the English. When an Englishman gets an idea into his head it takes him fifty years to get it out and replace it with something saner; and it takes a Welshman about seventy-five years to do the same thing. If they will take the word of people born and bred in Canada, who understand political conditions here, who have not their eyes closed to the fact that we live alongside the United States, the most highly protected country in the world, they will abandon some of their nonsensical theories. If the hon. member for Rosetown will take these matters into consideration and get down to horse sense, he will not rise in the House and advocate the free trade nonsense which he hands out every now and then. He knows down in his heart that it is the veriest nonsense, but he still keeps to it, because I assume out his way there are still some people who came from the Old Country and the only fiscal idea they ever got into their heads was the theory of free trade. Those people have votes and that is the class of people my hon. friend appeals to. The hon. member from Rosetown talks free trade in this House, yet he advises the minister not to take off all the duties, not to have complete free trade, not to get ride of the vicious thing, the aching rotten tooth, all at once, but to pull it out by degrees. Deal with the cancer gradually, he says; take a little bit to-day and a little bit to-morrow; do not do it all at once, because the country could not stand the shock. Let us therefore hang on, he says, to that vicious thing protection; do not take all the duty off; let us continue to be vicious; then we will be in the happy position of being able to keep company with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), following the expression of opinion with which the hon. member for Rosetown favoured us about the hon. minister some time ago.

I wish the minister all kinds of success in his attempts to prevent smuggling. If he proposes to appoint to the preventive service first-class men who have had some experience, some discipline and some training, I am prepared to give him the names of three or four from the counties of Frontenac-Addington, where we produce good men. I can assure him that they would make first-class officers. I will not ask him to take them on trial for a year. I am so satisfied that they would fill the bill as I believe he wants it filled that I will undertake, if they do not come up to his expectations in the fullest degree in thirty days' time, to replace them with others. That will be a long enough time to give them a test. If in this matter he intends not to depend upon the Civil Service Commission for suggestions, I am not going to quarrel with him in that regard. As one who opposed the transfer of patronage to the Civil Service Commission, I submit that I am consistent in the position I take to-day, and I hope he will give due consideration to any names I send to him for these positions which he wants filled by first-class men.

[Mr. J. W. Edwards.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: When this item was under discussion on Tuesday last, the minister stated that there had been an increase in the staff of officials at Bridgeburg of some seven or eight who had been put on as car sealers at that rather important point. My object in asking a question on that occasion was to ascertain just what the facts were at Bridgeburg and also at Windsor in respect to the sealing of cars, because rumour had it that the system which had been employed at those points for some time past had been very loose and insufficient. The minister has kindly brought to the attention of the House to-day two reports made by Chief Inspector Busby of the Department of Customs and Excise, and these reports go exhaustively into the question of car sealers at those important points, and confirm an impression which existed that little or no inspection of sealing and probably little or no sealing took place of cars moving on the railroads at those points between Canada and the United States.

The inspector is to be congratulated upon taking action in this matter. I see that he has recommended some seven additional car sealing inspectors at Bridgeburg, and also some six or seven at Windsor, to do work which I do not think could have been done before in any satisfactory manner. The inspector in his report dated Bridgeburg, April 20, 1925, states—and I will not read all the report:

Accompanied by Inspector A. M. Kennedy and Supervising Officer G. A. Clark, I visited this date the Canadian National Railway freight yards at the port of Bridgeburg and ascertained that at this point during the fiscal year 1924-25 there were 209,672 cars entered Canada and 191,132 cars were reported outward from Canada.

This is the paragraph:

The cars entering Canada at this point arrived from the Canadian National and Wabash yards at Black Rock, N.Y. Tyden seals on such cars are stamped with the crown and port number by an officer at the port of Bridgeburg, and sent over to Black Rock in bundles of 1,000 to 2,000 seals to the agent of the railway there, where they are placed on the cars by employees of the railway company without the supervision of customs-excise officers.

That, evidently, was the system employed—sending the seals in bundles of 1,000 to 2,000 from Bridgeburg to Black Rock, where the railway employees placed them on the cars without any customs or excise inspection at all. The report continues:

These car seals are not examined by customs-excise officers when reported inwards at Bridgeburg, although occasionally some of such cars are examined and checked by the officer checking less than carload shipments when not engaged in checking goods out of cars which is very rarely.

The inspector very wisely recommends a change. He says:

To supervise the placing of seals on the cars and the checking of same against inwards report, A-1, would require the services of four additional officers, two for day duty and two for night duty, to be placed in the yards of the Canadian National and Wabash railways at Black Rock, N.Y., under the supervision of Mr. Supervising Officer, G. A. Clark, at the expense of the Canadian National Railways, who would benefit thereby.

That recommendation I entirely approve. But the other branch of the report which deals with the Michigan Central railway contains no recommendation, so far as I can see, that the additional men placed in their yards shall be paid for by anyone but the government of Canada. The Canadian National for their convenience must pay for these men, but not so, if I understand the report aright, in the case of the Michigan Central. The report continues:—

We then visited the office of the Michigan Central railroad at the end of the international bridge, and examined into the manner in which train reports inwards and outwards are dealt with, and ascertained that seals have never been checked at this point, on cars entering or departing from Canada; which work is in the future to be dealt with by the four additional officers which it is proposed shall be placed at the yards of the Michigan Central railroad at Victoria.

The United States customs have officers stationed at this point—

That is, Bridgeburg.

—to examine and check seals on cars entering the United States at Black Rock, N.Y., from Bridgeburg, at the expense of the transportation companies concerned.

The United States has taken care of the situation in the interests of its government, but at the point where approximately 400,000 cars a year, 200,000 inward and 200,000 outward, cross the international bridge, no inspection in Canada of the sealing of those cars has taken place. There is an open door to smuggling. Cars unsealed entering Canada may very easily be opened in this country and goods discharged at any Canadian point, whereas these cars are supposed to be bonded going from one point in the United States through to another point, for instance Niagara Falls. The inspector is to be congratulated on having remedied that defect, which evidently was permitted to continue until some time during the last eight or ten months.

At Windsor the situation is as bad, if not worse. The inspector visited Windsor and this is what he said in his report dated April 14, 1925:

I might here state we first visited the ferry slip where the car ferries of the Wabash and Père Marquette railways land cars for shipment to points in Canada on the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Although we waited for some time, the officer was absent from the office and could not be located, the office being open and two bunches of Tyden seals stamped with the port number were lying in the window seat of such office, where any person if they so desired could take same, instead of such seals being kept under lock and key when not being used, as they should be.

The inspector goes on to report that seven additional officers of the department are necessary to see that a proper system of sealing and inspection takes place at Windsor. In regard to the sealing of cars coming into Canada, he says he thinks this might be done as a matter of convenience at Detroit instead of on the Canadian side of the line. He continues:

This would necessitate the services of four officers for whose services the Michigan Central railroad should be required to pay. These officers to be assigned to duty in the sealing yards of the Michigan Central railroad at Detroit, two on day duty and two on night duty.

The suggestion is that the Michigan Central pay for those, as they should do, because it is for their convenience. Further on the report states:

To carry out the proper checking of seals at this point in the Michigan Central yards it will be necessary that the services of four additional officers be provided for, unless the department agrees to the placing of the four officers at Detroit (at the expense of the Michigan Central railroad) in which event all that will be necessary will be the moving of the officers now at the electric tower to the office to be provided at the summit of the Humps, to check trains reporting inwards and outwards on forms A-1 and A-5.

It will also be necessary to provide two additional officers at the Wabash and Canadian National car ferries' slips to check seals and car numbers against reports inwards and reports outwards, which at present is not being done owing to the insufficiency of staff to take care of this work.

I bring this to the attention of the minister because, if this system has existed until recently at important points such as Bridgeburg and Windsor, what is the situation at other international points? What is the situation at international points in Quebec and in the west? Is the loose system which obtains at Bridgeburg and Windsor also in force at the suspension bridge at Niagara Falls? Unless these cars are sealed and unless they are properly inspected after being sealed, the door is thrown wide open to all kinds of smuggling. I would strongly impress upon the minister that it be his duty or the duty of some of his officers in the near future to see that this international freight traffic is properly inspected and the cars properly sealed. If we have not enough officers now to look after the sealing, more should be appointed and their salaries paid by the railways, for whose convenience they are appointed. I personally believe that the matter has been discussed a good deal among railway and commercial men during the past two years, and I am glad to hear that at these points there has been a remedy applied.

[Mr. Gauthrie.]

Mr. BOIVIN: I agree entirely with my hon. friend in what he has said concerning the report made by Inspector Busby. If, however, the remedy was not applied sooner, there is no official of the department who can share the blame with Inspector Busby. He has charge of the inspection at all of these points. He is a very competent official, but he has an enormous territory to cover. The sending of the seals by the customs officers in Canada to the employees of the railway in the United States to be affixed to the cars was in direct violation of the instructions given to these officers by the department, a violation which was discovered by the inspector. I might reassure my hon. friend by telling him that I am under the impression that when this inspection was made at Bridgeburg and at Windsor, an inspection was also made at Niagara Falls as well as at Sarnia, and it was found that the abuses which had crept in at those two points where we were obliged to apply the remedies, had not crept in at the other points, and the cars there were being properly sealed. I hope my hon. friends will allow the preventive service items to go through at once.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought it was only the one item.

Mr. BOIVIN: I think my hon. friend will recall that the night before last, he stated than one of the principal reasons why he did not want this item to be passed then, was that it was intimately linked up with the succeeding items.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Quite so; I did not want discussion on one to be shut off from the others. In reference to this particular item, I was not concerned so much with it as I am with the other two. I just want to point out to my hon. friend that I do not think he should ask us to pass the other two items at all until the Customs committee has reported. This gives the House the only control it can have; it enables review and puts the House in the position of being able to go into this matter properly and fully from the fiscal standpoint. It would be a very remarkable thing, I think, if under circumstances such as we are faced with to-day and in view of the charges which were made—yes, and more than that; in the face of the admissions of the government—we should now pass these other votes which are intimately connected with the subject of the investigation. I think my hon.

friend will agree that the consideration of these other two items should be postponed until after the committee reports.

Mr. BOIVIN: There is a great deal to be said in favour of the view taken by my hon. friend, but if the inquiry instituted into the administration of the Department of Customs and Excise is to be thorough and efficient, it certainly will not be concluded for a very long time. It may last as long as the session itself. When its report comes before parliament every recommendation made will be open to discussion; the entire reorganization of the preventive service will be brought up, and I expect that suggestions will also be made to amend the Customs Act, and possibly the Excise Act in certain particulars. That will necessitate legislation attended by a long discussion, and I do appeal to my hon. friend to kindly allow us to dispose of these estimates now. If any further amount is required an item will be placed in the supplementary estimates. There will in any event be a supplementary item in connection with salaries and promotions for the present year. The difficulty with which we are confronted is, as I pointed out to my hon. friend when I started the discussion of these estimates, that unfortunately all the items are linked up, and if my hon. friend takes the course of asking that the adoption of the item for $350,000, and the next item of $100,000 be deferred, he will hold up the entire estimate, and on the Votes and Proceedings of this House the labours of the new minister will go for naught; there will be nothing to show for the items that have already been passed. I do appeal to my hon. friend to pass the preventive service vote, with the understanding that the matter may again be thoroughly discussed when the report of the committee is presented, or on the supplementary estimates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But my hon. friend knows very well that the only control the House has over the government is in the matter of the funds to be voted. The government can do just as they like about the other matters. I really thought my hon. friend would agree with me that the matter should not now be proceeded with. I feel that that should be done, Mr. Chairman, and in order to bring the matter to a question I move that the Chairman do now leave the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: That is hardly necessary; I will declare it six o'clock.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is a motion before the chair.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. BOIVIN: I hope my hon. friend will at least allow me to ask a question. Does he desire by this motion to secure the withdrawal for the present of these other two items?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I want the ordinary rules of the House to be applied. I have made a motion. I want to prevent these two items from being considered, as I do not think they should be considered.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Just as a point of information, Mr. Chairman, I desire to know if this motion means that all further discussion on these items is cut off.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Motion agreed to: Yeas, 74; Nays, 41.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

REPRESENTATION ACT, 1924, AMENDMENT

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma) moved the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend The Representation Act, 1924 (Boundaries of certain constituencies).

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill, as shown by the bill itself, is to change slightly the description of the districts of Nipissing, South Timiskaming, North Timiskaming, East Algoma, West Algoma, and Port Arthur. The bill has been introduced because of the almost unanimous request made to the representatives of these districts by the people within the areas concerned. Without going into any considerable detail, I may say that the bill in no material way affects the population in any of the ridings concerned, and this is more particularly the fact because, due to the expansion that is taking place in certain sections of northern Ontario, the population is changing so rapidly that you cannot define any particular area on a basis of population at any period and have that remain stationary for more than a few months, let alone a considerable period of years. Just let me explain how the people affected are situated in relation to the distribution of these several districts. Take first the districts of Nipissing and South Timiskaming in relation to each other. The portion of South Timiskaming, as defined in the legislation of 1924, that will be taken away and added to the district of Nipissing under this bill is a group of townships in the northwestern corner of the district of Nipissing. In order to get in touch with their representative in South Timiskaming the people residing in these townships must travel a distance of about 170 miles through the district of Nipissing to North Bay and then a distance of 130 to 140 miles further through the district of Nipissing on the Timiskaming and Northern Ontario Railway to get back into that particular section in the district of South Timiskaming. They are just an isolated group of townships in one corner of the district of Timiskaming. And may I say here that I have discussed the matter with the representative of the district of Nipissing, and he agrees with me, or at least has so expressed himself, that these townships properly belong to the district of Nipissing. The only means of communication between these people and their representative now in the House and the place where they are grouped is for 200 miles across the Timagami forest reserve, or by a roundabout route of about 200 miles, all of which is through the district of Nipissing.

Let me come now to the next change that will be effected as between East Algoma and West Algoma. There is just a small group of communities with about 2,500 people in the northwestern corner of East Algoma that has been taken and put into West Algoma. Now in order for these people to get into touch with their representative who is now in the House they must travel eastward on the Canadian Pacific railway a distance of 172 miles to the town of Sudbury, and then turn westward and travel for 172 miles to Sault Ste. Marie. To put it in another way: In order for the representative of the riding to reach this particular part of his constituency he must travel through East Algoma a distance of about 340 miles. Then there is another single township where, in order for the representatives to reach that township, he must travel through East Algoma for a distance of 200 miles through a portion of the district of Nipissing, on to the district of South Timiskaming, and then for another 100 miles in East Algoma, to get to this one township.

Then in relation to the district of Port Arthur and West Algoma there is what was recognized as the southwest corner of the latter district situated about 100 miles from Sault Ste. Marie. And may I say, as most of you know, that is the centre of the district of West Algoma. In order for the representatives of these people, who now reside in Port Arthur because that place is the centre of the district of Port Arthur, to get in touch with this particular section he must travel 280 miles eastward on the Canadian Pacific railway. Then getting into the district of West Algoma he travels about 140 miles, reaches the district of Port Arthur and then goes back again into West Algoma in order to reach this small group of communities which, as I previously stated, are 100 miles from the city of Sault Ste. Marie. I think I am well within the mark when I say that the people affected are themselves unanimous in their demand that they be replaced in the district from which, I believe, they were inadvertently removed. I think I can say that the representatives from all these districts are unanimous in their desire that the boundaries shall be restored, and that the constituencies shall bear some relation to the convenience of the people in getting in touch with their representative, and to the convenience of the representative in getting in touch with their people. I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that the bill be referred to the committee on Private Bills where the details can be fully and frankly discussed, and care taken to see that nothing of an injurious character is worked out in relation to any part of this district.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does not my hon. friend think that the committee on Privileges and Elections would be the more natural committee to deal with this matter than the Private Bills committee?

Mr. NICHOLSON: I cannot see how this matter has any relation whatever to the subject of privileges and elections. However, I have no objection to the bill being referred to any committee that is empowered to deal with it logically and would be prepared to go into the details of the whole matter. I have absolute faith in the logic of the whole proposal. I am perfectly certain that no objection to it can be raised from any quarter. All that I ask is that any committee of the House properly constituted to handle this matter shall deal with these details and decide the matter fairly.

Mr. E. A. LAPIERRE (Nipissing): As representing one of the constituencies named in the bill submitted by the hon. member (Mr. Nicholson) I wish to explain under what circumstances the section of South Timiskaming is in the situation which has been outlined by my hon. friend. The House will recall that during the redistribution which took place in the last session of the last parliament three distinct constituencies had to be carved out of Nipissing and Timiskaming. It was found later that the population of the two constituencies of Timiskaming and Nipissing contained 102,000—36,000 being adopted as the basis of representation in order to form the three constituencies. With regard to that portion of Nipissing which now forms part of South Timiskaming, it contains, although at a considerable distance from the resident population, the only population that is available to form another constituency. There is no other way by which an equal partition of the two constituencies could be arrived at in order to grant a fair representation to the three new ridings. This, Mr. Speaker, was certainly not done in order to favour the district of Nipissing, as the section which was removed from that constituency was composed almost entirely of French-Canadian voters who protested to me against being separated from the riding of Nipissing. It was found, however, by the committee that it was absolutely necessary to take out that much of the population in order to give to South Timiskaming the required number of people. The proposal was finally accepted, and I feel the decision of the Redistribution committee should stand. For that reason I am opposed to the motion.

Mr. E. F. ARMSTRONG (South Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this subject because it directly affects the district from which I come. Never before in the history of political divisions in the north has that district which comes near Sudbury been included in South Timiskaming. To make the situation plain to hon. members, I may say that this corner comprising about 4,000 people coming within three miles of the town of Sudbury has been cut off and attached to South Timiskaming. This really means a district commencing at about Cobalt, 200 miles away. In other words this small population which, since the earliest days of settlement, has belonged to the community around the town of Sudbury, has been cut off and thrown across the forest reserve 200 miles away, and there are not fifty people between the two communities. That means that the member representing that district in Cobalt has to go 100 miles south into the Nipissing district to North Bay. Then he has to go eighty or ninety miles west to Sudbury, then take a car and go fifteen or twenty miles up through the Blizzard valley into the Capreol district. The people down there are among the finest settlers in this country. They went in there as pioneers, they have hewn out for themselves their homes, and they very much dislike this treatment. They are associated with the conditions and problems affecting the district around Sudbury and their interests are the same. They know each other. They know no person in Timiskaming. They know us not at all. Our problems are not the same. We are 200 miles away and for that reason I say the present adjustment of the boundaries of that district is very unfair. On the other hand, the representative from Nipissing spoke very well along the line of representation, and I wish to say a word on that phase of the subject. Let us take the district which includes South Lorraine, Cobalt, Haileybury, New Liskeard, and that beautiful town of Englehart; Charlton, Gowganda, Elk Lake and Swastika, Kirkland Lake and the splendid farming community in their vicinity. Kirkland Lake alone had added a population of 4,000 or 5,000 to this district since the last redistribution. That country has picked up 7,000 or 8,000 additional people since the last redistribution. To my mind that offsets any argument against not having sufficient population in that north district to carry the representation. I submit that the present condition is unfair to the people of both places. To run an election up there is like carrying on an election in two districts; and it is in harmony with the ideas and aspirations of the people of both the north and the south sections that they should be sent back to their old lines, the old historical community to which they belonged when they went into that country as settlers.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Nobody who is unacquainted with the geography of that particular district can discuss this matter with a large degree of intelligence, but as you know, Mr. Speaker, the matter of adjusting the boundaries of a constituency comes up after every census is taken. We have what is called the redistribution of the constituencies of Canada. It was carried through last year, indeed, in such a way as to exclude partisanship. A committee of members representing all the provinces and every party in this House sat for many weeks, or I should say many months. Sub-committees were formed. Members on both sides of the House representing every province were entrusted with the task of going over the map, of hearing representations from interested parties in the various districts, and after discussion and consideration to the fullest degree, those sub-committees agreed, and the committee itself agreed, on the redistribution that was made. A unanimous report was presented to the House, so far as I remember, and the redistribution as made was accepted unanimously by this House. Under the circumstances it is rather unusual to ask to change the boundaries of a constituency, but I am quite willing to accede to the demand that this bill be referred to a committee. However, I believe the committee on Privileges and Elections is the one to which it should be referred, because it is a public matter, and that committee is composed of members who could easily deal with it.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): I am pleased to hear the minister take the very reasonable attitude he has taken in this matter. I am not affected at all and I have nothing to say against his remarks about the work of the committee last year. They had a very difficult task to perform, and I think they performed it pretty well. There was a good deal of compromising, and that is where the difficulty arose in regard to the constituencies which are now being dealt with. None of the constituencies mentioned touches my constituency, so that I am speaking not personally but simply as one from that great section of northern Ontario which requires some special consideration in a matter of this kind, consideration which the Minister of Justice has fairly agreed to give it, because the area is so immense.

If you will look at the map you will find that the area of northern Ontario, with its 150,000 people or thereabouts, is a number of times greater than the area of all the rest of Ontario put together, yet there are only eight constituencies up there. I do happen to know that in the compromises which took place in the committee last year the constituency of East Algoma was changed a little, I do not mean to say unfairly, but a little unfairly to the constituency as a constituency. I am not speaking of parties. For example, without naming places, one town, the centre of East Algoma, was taken out of East Algoma and put in West Algoma and made very much more awkward to get at by virtue of that fact.

As the Minister of Justice has agreed to leave this to a committee, I do not wish to take up the time of the House, but I wish to offer a suggestion. I have not discussed it with the member who proposes the bill, but I suggest that a special committee should be appointed, made up of members in proportion as to parties of course, but taking in any territory largely affected. The member for Nipissing would be one of them; it would include the other members from the district, and the committee could be balanced up with other members, if you will. I do not know whether that suggestion would be acceptable to the member who proposes the bill, but it would appear to me to be the fairest method of dealing with the matter. I have talked the matter over with the member for East Algoma and I am convinced that his whole idea is one simply of making all of the constituencies more convenient to handle. That is something that should be taken into account where those large areas exist, because some of the constituencies up there are hundreds of miles wide and hundreds of miles long, and anything that can be done to make them a little more convenient to handle is certainly good, not only for the members who run but for the people who live in that part of the country.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): In reference to the suggestion just made by the hon. member, I think he will agree that it would be possible for hon. members specially interested to appear before the committee and make clear to its members their respective points of view. There is an objection to having a large number of special committees appointed. The House has found in the past that where there are a number of special committees, sitting frequently when the House is in session, it is a source of embarrassment, and leads to an accumulation of reports to be considered at the end of the session. We have a committee on Privileges and Elections, and its personnel is such I believe, as will commend itself to the House. There appears to be general agreement as to the propriety of referring the bill itself to a committee; I hope we may all be able to further agree to referring it to the committee on Privileges and Elections.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): There is only one precedent, so far as I can remember, and that was in 1919 when the then member for Chilliwack, Mr. Stacey, sought to have the name of his constituency changed from Chilliwack to Fraser Valley, and endeavoured to do so by way of amendment to the Representation Act. Consequently the bill is on all fours in so far as its character and status in this House are concerned. That bill was not referred to any standing or special committee; it was referred to the committee of the whole House and having passed through the committee of the whole House and third reading, it became law. There is some objection which I can understand to referring a public bill to the Private Bills committee, and if the hon. member is prepared to have the bill go to a committee at all, I do not see any objection to accepting the intimation of the leader of the House and having the bill go to the committee on Privileges and Elections.

The precedent would indicate that it should simply go through without reference to any special committee, but I take no stand on that matter. Let it go to the committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): As a member representing, I think, the largest constituency in that part of Ontario, I agree with a great deal of what has been said on the other side of the House, but I have a suggestion that probably is the best one that has yet been made, and that is that we redistribute the whole of northern Ontario. Perhaps a committee appointed to do that work would be more appropriate. We in the Kenora-Rainy River district are not satisfied with the territory that has been alloted to us, and telegrams were sent to the Prime Minister at Ottawa shortly after the Redistribution bill went through. Some of the towns that had been included in the Kenora-Rainy River district for many years were cut off and put into the Port Arthur-Fort William territory, and now that they happen to have Conservative representation they are not at all happy.

Mr. MANION: The constituencies of which my hon. friend speaks have not had anything but Conservative representation for ten years.

Mr. JACOBS: I thought we had Union government for part of that time.

Mr. MANION: That was Conservative too.

Mr. HEENAN: I was wondering if that was the reason why my hon. friend (Mr. Manion) always answered when some hon. member called him the member for Rainy River. Now that those people have seen the light and have changed over from the representation they have had in the last ten years, I think northern Ontario should be redistributed in a proper manner. I agree with the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) that there is a great deal of misunderstanding and hardship in connection with the redistribution in northern Ontario, but just because an hon. member brings in a bill to strengthen one particular portion of it, and deal with that alone will not be satisfactory to northern Ontario as a whole. Consequently I would like my suggestion to be accepted, that we appoint a committee to redistribute the whole of northern Ontario.

Mr. J. R. O'NEILL (North Timiskaming): The riding which I represent is affected physically, but not on the basis of population. I descry in the suggestion of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) an appeal for the administration of extreme unction in his case. He refers to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) taking unto himself the honour of representing Rainy River, but I think there is a great deal more in this suggestion than meets the ear, and so I would oppose the suggestion of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. I am in favour of the suggestion emanating from the hon. member for East Algoma, not that it affects my riding on the basis of population, but there is predominant in the minds of the people of that riding one idea, namely, that the redistribution of that territory constituted one of the crudest pieces of gerrymandering ever perpetrated in the political history of Canada. While that is a strong statement, and the hon. member for East Algoma was very generous in his suggestion in reference to the matter, I am rather inclined to think that if the situation were otherwise, hon. members on the opposite side of the House would be quite prepared to admit that something was radically wrong. The basis of revision may be in proportion to population at the present time, but the inaccessibility is such that it is practically impossible for the people represented there to reach their representatives without going out of their riding or out of the particular section of the country. For that reason I am prepared to favour the proposal coming from the hon. member for East Algoma.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): I do not know whether this bill could be amended in the manner which the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) has suggested, but I recall that I had a brief conversation with him in connection with the matter, and he said to me: "I hope you are not interfering with my riding." The hon. member will notice that this bill refers specifically to ridings east of his riding, and has no relation whatsoever to it. I am quite satisfied and other members with whom I have discussed the matter and who represent constituencies concerned, are quite satisfied to have the bill referred to the committee as suggested by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

Mr. LAPOINTE: Of course that does not mean that we accept the principle.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the second time and referred to the committee on Privileges and Elections.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS

RIGAUD POST OFFICE

Mr. DOUCET:

For a copy of all documents, correspondence, letters, declarations, and other papers, in connection with the investigation held by the investigating post office inspector in the charges brought against Mrs. George Seguin, Postmistress of Rigaud, Vaudreuil-Soulanges, Quebec.

EXPLOITATION OF LABOUR

INDUSTRIAL FREEDOM OF CONTRACT AND ACTION

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, every effort should be made to affirm and establish the full industrial freedom of the citizens of Canada to bargain for their services on all industrial contracts and works; that the exploitation or conscription of labour should be prevented and condemned; that no person should be induced or compelled by undue influence, threats of dismissal, loss of wages or position or by any other unfair and improper means, to work for wages less than the standard or to engage in work which he has not agreed to do; that in all cases such wages as are generally accepted as current in each trade for competent workmen in the district where the work is carried out should be enforced and paid; and that this House will, so far as it is within the jurisdiction of parliament, endorse every reasonable and legtimate proposal to preserve such industrial freedom of contract and action, and will co-operate with the several provinces in these objects to provide for uniform legislation throughout Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution is really very simple, and one which I am sure will readily receive support from all sides of the House, although perhaps its length and somewhat involved wording might give a different idea. The underlying principle is very simple. I had to have it somewhat loosely drawn, and expressed in somewhat general terms, in order to bring it within the scope of discussion in this House, otherwise it would have been framed in very much more simple language. Despite its general language, however, this resolution seems to have already given offence in some quarters. I hold in my hand an editorial taken from a paper called The Gazette and presumably published in the city of Montreal, in which great offence is taken at this resolution. I have heard it said—I had no previous knowledge personally—that this paper is more or less devoted to what is known as the vested interests of Canada. If that is so, it certainly is anxious to prove its fidelity, because it is howling before anyone is hurt. I see featured at the head of this editorial the fact that the paper was founded in 1778, 148 years ago, and apparently the political ideas current and acceptable then still hold sway in the editorial offices of this paper to-day, 150 years later. The editorial is one long sneer, I might say, or one long attempt to be somewhat cheaply sarcastic at the expense of this resolution and of myself. I will leave out the personal allusions, which do not hurt me and will not interest this House. I notice repeated allusion in the editorial that they do not understand what the resolution means. If they do not understand what it means, why do they attack it? Why do they not wait until they get light on the subject; why devote a whole column of a so-called important paper in talking of what they do not know? It almost suggests to the onlooker the old fashioned idea that to the ignorant everything unknown is suspicious, and therefore must be attacked.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

I would just like to draw attention to one or two items; I would not think of delaying the House by reading all of it. The editorial says:

If he (Mr. Neill) is sincerely desirous of establishing industrial freedom, he will stop composing resolutions out of trades union catchwords.

And so on. I wonder what the really learned and capable King's Counsel who devoted a good deal of his time in drafting that resolution would say if he heard that his best success was a composition of trade union catchwords, whatever they may be. I do not think the editor would have used that language if he had known who really drafted that resolution. The ignorance displayed in the editorial is almost pitiable. It asks with fine sarcasm:

But when and how and where has labour in this country been conscripted?

I will show that presently, and to enlighten their ignorance I might say that it has been the law of the land for more than three years. Further they begin a discussion of the eight hour day; I do not know why, because it has nothing to do with my resolution. In putting up a man of straw in order to knock it down again, they say that no province of Canada has introduced the eight hour law. Poor, simple Gazette; they do not know that British Columbia has had that law on the statute books for several years. Again we find this gem, which is really worth consideration:

The individual workman has, and has always had, the abstract right to make the best of his market, to sell his labour upon fair terms or to withhold it.

Inferentially they imply "What more does he want?" I looked up in the dictionary the meaning of "abstract" and I find the word means "existing in the mind only; not concrete", so reading it with that meaning, the sentence would be:

> The individual workman has, and has always had, the right existing in the mind only, not concrete, to make the best of his market, to sell his labour upon fair terms or to withhold it.

That might have been good political dogma 148 years ago, but the editor of this paper should remember that times have changed, and that we must move with the world or be left very much behind. What was extreme radicalism a few years ago is now being accepted by many of the Conservative governments of the world, and rights which exist only in the imagination are no longer satisfactory to the great body of the working people, who are more intelligent than they were 148 years ago. So much for The Gazette, with its ancient fossilized doctrines.

I think I can express in twenty words the real meaning of what I wish to bring before the House in this resolution. I will leave out everything else, and just recite those twenty words, taken from the resolution:

> That the exploitation or conscription of labour should be prevented and condemned; that no person should be compelled to work for wages less than the standard. . . . .

That, and that only, is the underlying motive of the resolution which I am presenting to the House to-night. Before I deal particularly with the word "conscription", I wish to prevent any misunderstanding in regard to that word. I am not talking now of conscription in war time. So far as that kind of conscription is concerned, I am in favour of it, but I stand for conscription of all kinds; conscription of the millionaire as well as the pauper; conscription of capital as well as labour; conscription of the civilian at home as well as the man in the trenches, but I am not now talking about that kind of conscription of labour. I refer now to peace time conscription of labour. The Gazette wanted to know where and when and how labour was conscripted in peace time. If the editor of the Gazette will turn to chapter 93 of the Revised Statutes of British Columbia, 1924, he will find these words.

> Any officer or employee of the Forest branch may employ or summon the assistance of any male person between the ages of eighteen and sixty, except only trainmen, telegraphers, and despatchers on duty, doctors, and persons physically unfit—

They do not say anything about being mentally unfit.

> —for the purpose of controlling and extinguishing any fire, and the compensation for such voluntary or compulsory assistance shall be such as the Lieutenant-Governor in Council may provide.

They may take a judge from the bench or a member of parliament from his office and put him out to fight bush fires in the country. There is a rather serious penalty imposed of not less than $25 and not more than $100 in case of refusal to do so. That has been the law for the last three years.

Bush fires do not generally occur in towns, and consequently there is not much likelihood of professional and other people in urban centres being conscripted for fire-fighting purposes; the burden falls upon the country workers, and the remuneration that the government kindly accords them is 25 cents an hour, or $2 for an eight-hour day. That is not the current rate of wages in British Columbia. I have before me an announcement that the scale of wages for the lowest outdoor labouring class in the city of Vancouver shall in the future be $4.50 a day; I think before that it was $4 a day. The government therefore makes a cut of 56 per cent in what is the current rate of wages in the city of Vancouver when they compulsorily conscript men to go out and fight fires. Then again it is not the $3.50 or $4 or $4.50 men generally upon whom this obligation falls. Naturally being in the bush, it falls on men working in logging camps, such as trainmen, swampers and hook tenders, who get pretty high wages because they are engaged in dangerous and seasonal work which can be carried on only during a limited number of months each year. In the summertime they are laid off on account of danger from bush fires, and in the winter their operations are interrupted by heavy snow or rain; so when they are working, being highly skilled technical men, they get wages above the ordinary level, running from $5 to $9 a day. Suppose they are earning $6 a day, and are suddenly called off to work at $2 a day, that means a cut of 66 per cent. The Dominion government relieves itself of responsibility as regards its own employees by the fair wage resolution adopted by this House in July 1900, which was confirmed and made more effective by order in council in June 1922. We all know that this fair wage policy compels contractors and other employers to pay the current rate of wages for their particular trade in their particular locality.

Now, that is all I ask here, that when a man is taken against his will to fight bush fires he shall be paid the current rate of wages. Incidentally, I may say that this work almost invariably results in the destruction of his boots, and boots are costly in British Columbia. That, as I say, is all I suggest—these men should not be conscripted unless on the basis of their current rate of wages.

I am aware that this is not a matter in which this parliament can legislate, and that is why I have brought it up in this somewhat indefinite way. What I do want—

Mr. NICHOLSON: Before the hon. gentleman leaves that point, may I ask, for information, whether he advocates by his resolution that authority to conscript men to fight bush fires in case of serious fire hazards in newly settled countries shall be taken away?

Mr. NEILL: No, but I do not think men should be conscripted in times of peace at a compulsory wage fixed by the other party. They should be allowed an opportunity either to bargain for their wages, or in case of emergency they should be paid the standard wage that they are earning at their regular work. That is all I can ask this House to do. This being a matter of civil rights, I cannot ask that the provincial government shall be directed not to conscript labour for this purpose at less than the current rate of wages. I would only ask for expressions of opinion from the very able legal gentlemen on both sides of the House whether such legislation on the part of the local government is not really ultra vires. It would seem to me to be going beyond their jurisdiction. As far as civil rights are concerned, I am aware that it is within their jurisdiction.

Apart from that, I would ask this House to at least go as far as to express moral disapproval of this action on the part of a provincial government. If it is legal and right in one-ninth of Canada to conscript men to fight fires at a wage to be fixed by those doing the conscripting, then by following the same logic it might be pronounced equally right to conscript men to cut logs or to do some other work which in the opinion of the authorities was needed at a wage which they considered should be such and so. In other words, I would point out that if the House passes this resolution it commits us to nothing except the expression of a sort of moral disapproval of conscripting men in times of peace to fight fires at a rate of wages from 50 to 66 per cent below the current wages in the locality for that kind of work.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): There are some features of this resolution to which I take no exception whatever. But I notice in the first place my hon. friend says that the essence of his resolution is that the conscription of labour should be prevented and condemned, and if I followed him correctly, he finds some fault because in one of the provinces men are compelled to turn out and help fight bush fires. I cannot follow him that far. I think in times of such hazard the state must take some means to protect its property.

But there is another feature of his resolution which appeals to me:

> That no person should be induced or compelled by undue influence, threats of dismissal, loss of wages or position, or by any other unfair and improper means, to work for wages less than the standard or to engage in work which he has not agreed to do.

I find myself in sympathy with that part of the resolution to a certain degree because I have observed during a residence of some years in an industrial town and while going about the country in the recent general election that in certain industries notices sometimes are posted warning the employees that unless they voted in a particular way they will lose their position the day after the election. It seems to me that every hon. member, no matter what party he supports, should repudiate such oppressive tactics on the part of large corporations. I do not mean to say that this applies particularly to federal elections. I have observed it even in municipal elections, when certain corporations were looking for concessions from the municipality.

So having that in mind, I am prepared to accept the resolution, for it covers an abuse that, it seems to me, should be corrected.

Mr. E. B. RYCKMAN (East Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I have read this resolution for the first time, to-night. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has told us that a learned king's counsel drew it. I would like to know his name, because I think he was somewhat of a wag—that he tried to make fun of the hon. member. This resolution does not deal with matters within the competence of this parliament; it deals with matters within the competence of the provincial legislatures. Anything that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has said has related to a provincial statute, and the gravamen of the charge made by the hon. member is that in case of a conflagration endangering the safety of property, men should be allowed to stand idly by and not serve unless they have the dollars and cents passed over the counter to them. I am reminded of those ladies who were in a seminary which was burning up. It being after six o'clock at night when the firemen came up the ladders to rescue them, they declined to be rescued unless the firemen were in evening dress. Such is the effect of this resolution. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that unless there is something that this august body has well within its competence it should not deal or attempt to deal with something that, notwithstanding what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) has said, is altogether outside the jurisdiction of this parliament.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON (East Algoma): I have no objection whatsoever to the principle of this resolution, if there is a principle, but I do object to the affirmation of a principle condemning something that does not exist. As one who has had a life's experience in dealing with labour and workingmen's problems I say at once that in the province of Ontario at least and the parts of Canada in which I have had experience, no such condition exists. Men cannot be conscripted for ordinary labour against their will, nor can they be forced to accept wages that do not suit them.

With relation to the matter of fighting fires, let me just give you an illustration. We have had some harrowing experiences in recent years in the matter of fires in the part of Canada from which I come. Just recall, if you will, the fire at Haileybury, where about two o'clock in the afternoon a fire swept across the forest and wiped out that town completely. Would you say that the authorities of the town of Haileybury, or the provincial authorities represented there, should have to wait and start to bargain with people when they need their help to go and rescue the women and children whose homes were being devastated? That is what is involved in this resolution. So far as conscripting workingmen, and not the professional and business men, is concerned, again I say that no such condition exists. If you go back to the fires in Timmins, Englehart and Cochrane, when those towns were being wiped out it was the business men, the doctors, the lawyers, the clergymen, the railway officials and every other man who could go who went to the assistance of these people.

Mr. NEILL: Were they conscripted?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Those who were unwilling were conscripted. The provincial government of Ontario places in the hands of those who are responsible for looking after fires in the north country authority to conscript men. The fire inspector has authority to come along to any man's plant, and take the superintendent of the sawmill, for instance, or the superintendent of a pulp mill and all his men, tie the whole plant up, and take the men to go and fight the fire. They do not, as my hon. friend says, pay them an arbitrary rate of wages of $2.50 a day. Not at all. The fire superintendent or the man in charge of the fire fighting forces of the provincial government has authority to pay these men what they are worth and what they earn, and they pay extra money for this hazardous work. Why should we in this House of Commons pass a resolution that implies they are not doing that? That is the objection I have.

In so far as giving any man the freedom to bargain for any rate of wages he wishes to get, that is the recognized principle all over this country. There is no such thing as conscription of labour, nor is any effort made to hinder men from bargaining and getting everything they possibly can for their labour. That is recognized as their right; it has been so, and it will continue to be so. But do not let us place a stigma on the provincial authorities of a province just because certain conditions might obtain in some other province. If such conditions prevail elsewhere, then deal with the provincial authorities in that province.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The emphasis which is being laid in this discussion on one particular phrase, not to say word, in the resolution which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has presented, is I fear directing attention away from the main purpose of the resolution. So far as there has been adverse criticism of what the hon. member has proposed, it has been to his including in his resolution the word "conscription," and the conscription of labour referred to has been restricted to conscription in cases of fire. The hon. member has made his meaning quite clear. When he used the words "exploitation or conscription," what he evidently intended to convey by the alternative word "conscription" was neither more nor less than what is conveyed by the word "exploitation;" and I would suggest to him, if that is what is in his mind, that it might remove any difference of view that the House may have on the essential parts of the resolution if he dropped the word "conscription" altogether, and just let that part of his resolution read "the exploitation of labour should be prevented and condemned."

I say this because I think the resolution itself is an important one and should be adopted by this House. It contains two or three fundamental principles on which all hon. members will, I trust, be prepared to agree. The first is a statement of the principle of freedom of contract and bargaining in the relations of capital and labour. That is a principle for which men have had to fight many industrial battles in the past, but which, happily, to-day is coming to be recognized as a principle which should be generally accepted. I venture to say there is not a member of this House who would stand up in his place and say that he did not think it was in the interests of the community, as well as in the interests of capital and labour, that there should be the greatest freedom of bargaining in the making of contracts between the two great parties to industrial contracts.

Mr. RYCKMAN: If the resolution is carried, will the Prime Minister bring in a bill embodying its terms?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my hon. friend will be satisfied with half a loaf, instead of asking at once for a whole loaf, more progress will perhaps be made towards achieving what my hon. friend has in view. I take it that the view of the hon. member is this: In industrial questions, public opinion in the long run is more effective in achieving the object that is to be desired than mere legislation; that, after all, it is public opinion that will determine whether or not industrial laws will be respected. It is not the number of measures there may be on the statutes; it is rather the extent to which communities recognize that public sentiment is in accord with particular views.

My hon. friend has expressed two or three views here which it seems to me this parliament would do a national service in endorsing. One is the view already mentioned that there should be freedom of bargaining between capital and labour in the matter of industrial contracts. The second is that there should be no exploitation of labour, a term which I think is generally understood to mean the sweating of labour, employing labour under unfair conditions. The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) has said that there is nothing of the kind in Ontario. I wish that could be said truly. I think there is less of it at present than there has been at any time heretofore, but I venture to say that all of the provinces of this Dominion present instances where labour is being sweated in a manner which I am sure all hon. members would do their utmost to stop if it were brought to their knowledge and attention. If this parliament expresses its view against the exploiting or the sweating of labour, public opinion formed on the basis of our expression of view may go far towards meeting the very object the hon. member has in mind in moving this resolution. The suppression of sweating is the second principle for which the resolution stands.

The third principle that my hon. friend affirms in his resolution is that of fair wages in contracts. He uses the phrase:

> That the wages should be those that are generally accepted as current in each trade for a competent workman in the district where the work is carried out.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Now that phrase, as I recognize it, is one that has been in the public contracts of the federal government for the last twenty-five years. It was I think in 1900 that what is spoken of as "the fair wages resolution" was first introduced into this parliament. Since that time public contracts, whether they related to public works or to the making of uniforms for post office officials or for the militia, or any other form of public contract work—have contained clauses to prevent the sweating of labour and to secure for the labour engaged on these contracts the payment of wages at fair rates and the carrying out of the work under proper conditions. This House has already adopted a fair wages resolution, a resolution using the very language we are now asked to affirm. I might add that the resolution adopted originally by this House has in substance been adopted since by most if not all the legislatures of Canada with respect to the public contracts of the provinces. There is reason to believe that the resolution of this parliament has been copied by other countries as well. It is the power of example that my hon. friend is seeking to have exerted.

That brings me to the fourth point which my hon. friend mentions in his resolution, namely the importance of co-operation between the several provinces in order to secure uniform legislation throughout Canada. I might mention that, within the past four years, if I am not mistaken, we have already held a conference of the provinces under federal auspices to effect that very purpose. I believe that uniformity of industrial standards is one of the most important objects to be attained by legislation. In Canada it should be our aim to bring about, if at all possible, uniformity of legislation among the several provinces. It is important for this reason: if there is not uniformity it very often happens that the particular province that has higher standards in labour ultimately loses in consequence of the lower standards that exist in other provinces. The higher standard is undermined by the lower to the disadvantage of the particular industry which may be enjoying the highest standard. I remember some years ago looking into the question of sweating in industry, I found that in some of the American states where the clothing industry was carried on, that as one state raised its standards of legislation with respect to fair working conditions the labour employed in that industry was gradually supplanted by labour enjoying a lower standard in another state, and the state that was really seeking to preserve a high standard of labour was losing its industries.

as a consequence. Now the only way in which that sort of thing can be prevented is that there shall be like industrial standards over areas of effective competition however wide they may be. The League of Nations has seen the importance of that principle and has laid down in its labour clauses as an object to be aimed at the establishment of uniformity of industrial conditions not only as between the provinces of any one country but as between the different countries of the world; and I really believe it is a fact that until in some way the standards are made equal in the different countries, those countries that have higher standards are going to some extent to be handicapped in virtue of those very higher standards they have adopted.

I can perhaps illustrate what I mean by referring to what is known as "Gresham's law of the precious metals". It was discovered many years ago, in relation to matters of currency, that where there were the two metals in circulation, the baser metal tended to drive the better out of circulation, the coins made of metal of finer quality were hoarded or else were melted down and the metal used in the fine arts, and the coins made of the baser metal gradually replaced them in circulation. I believe that the so-called law of competing standards as applied to the precious metals is equally applicable in the matter of competing standards in industry, that where you have a lower industrial standard and a higher industrial standard competing with each other, the former tends to undermine the latter; the industry that is run on the lower standard will effectively and prejudicially embarrass that industry which seeks to support higher standards.

I believe speaking generally there is no country in the world that enjoys higher standards of industry than our own. From the national point of view, I believe there is everything to be said in favour of a resolution that will help to convey to the world the knowledge that the parliament of Canada supports the broad principle of uniformity of legislation with respect to fair wages with respect to conditions in industrial contracts, with respect to freedom from exploitation and with respect to freedom in industrial bargaining. For that reason, for the moral support that parliament is able to give these great principles, I hope the House will adopt the resolution.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Before the right hon. gentleman concludes, will he permit me to ask one question: Does he know of any part of Canada where a condition prevails under which freedom of bargaining is denied to workingmen? If he does not, does he think it is fair to the workingmen themselves or to organized labour or to industry in this country, that a resolution should go out from the parliament of Canada implying that there does exist a condition by which the workingmen can be exploited in the manner indicated in this resolution against their own will?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think we will have to strain the meaning of the resolution a good deal in order to interpret it as a reflection on Canada. As I read the motion it says that every effort shall be made to affirm a certain principle. To my mind that would imply that the principle is more or less assented to and that we want to affirm it. That is my reading of what the resolution means rather than the view expressed by the hon. gentleman.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I have very little to say on the resolution itself. In so far as its specific terms go, were it a matter within our own competence I do not know that I would take any exception at all. It is all very true that the resolution says there shall be no conscription of labour, and that the member who moves the resolution in his interpretation of it himself declared that that should apply even to cases of extraordinary emergency such as a conscription to fight fire. The reading of the resolution itself does not necessarily embrace such a case at all, and I think the hon. member was poorly advised in going so far as to assert that he would strain his own words to the extent of saying that in the case of a great conflagration he would not have legislation on the statute book compelling the compulsory combating of that conflagration. He did make an exception in the case of war. He said that in case of peace he would have no conscription of labour but in case of war it would be different. Well, the conflagration is precisely of the same character; it is because it is of the same character that sometimes it becomes essential to resort to the same means. The reason is only too evident. It is because there can be no possibility of consideration or of bargaining on the one hand that it cannot be allowed on the other. The time does not permit of it; you cannot have it. Consequently the duty of the moment must be performed. All other rights must be submerged. As to the remuneration, that is a minor question. Something is to be said for a remuneration, something below the standard in a case of that kind. Nothing has been said in support of it, although I think something could have been. But it is not akin to the resolution, so I pass it by.

But the comment I want to make is this: Has the resolution any place in this parliament, and if so, does it become the government to pass its blessing upon it? I do not say that we have nothing at all to do with the question as to the fairness of wages. We have a little. We have to do with it only in so far as we employ the workers ourselves, in so far as we, the government, or we the parliament, in the case of our employees throughout the country can, directly or indirectly, influence contractors entering into engagements with us. To that extent we must take into consideration this principle regarding fairness to the wage earner. But the hon. member admits we have done that, and the whole House admits we have done it. Consequently there is no cause for castigation, there is no cause for any didactic resolutions or lectures; we are living up to the spirit of the law which the hon. member himself conceives to be right. So there is no reason for a resolution on that score. That is all we have to do with it. Over and beyond that, it is a matter for the provincial legislatures only. It is only within their jurisdiction. That is not a matter of dispute, for we all know it. Does it become this parliament to pass resolutions dictating to the provincial legislatures what kind of legislation they shall pass? Does the hon. member really think so? I do not think it does. The constitution of this country gives plenary powers to both sets of legislatures. The provinces are just as original in their jurisdiction as are we. Their powers are just as ample and just as plenary. We do not give them their powers; we cannot subtract from them. They are supreme in their own field just as we are supreme in ours. Have we no better task than to be entering upon their sphere of consideration, lending them a little of our wisdom and advising them what they ought to do? Is it dignified conduct? Does it become and befit the parliament of Canada? I suppose we could plead that they have offended in the same way. I know it was a very common practice of the legislatures of the prairie provinces to pass resolutions on the tariff, telling us what they wanted and what we ought to do here in the way of low tariff and no tariff. Hon. members were a whole lot freer in expressing themselves and putting themselves on record out there than they are when they get to the parliament of Canada. But they never achieved anything by it except perhaps a little local popularity. They were engaged in an exercise which could not be said to be worthy of a member of a local legislative assembly.

Mr. NEILL: Do these resolutions passed by the local legislatures not influence public sentiment, not only among the people of Canada as a whole, but also in this parliament and government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am quite free to say they do not influence any public sentiment that I notice, and I do not think they were ever intended to influence public sentiment—never for a moment. The public sentiment they felt was there and they catered to it. The resolutions were passed for the purpose of adding an increment to the popularity of the members voting for them, and if possible making difficult the course of those in this parliament who felt it their duty to vote otherwise. In a word their purpose was mischievous and nothing but mischievous. Nor were the legislatures of the west alone in this respect. There have been others in our country who have spent their time saying, in the quiet and safety of their own small realm, what ought to be done here, where there was virtually no opposition, where it was an easy task. It has been done in British Columbia. It has been done I think, even in Ontario, but I never knew any object served that was worthy the attention of a member of the House or worthy of his objection, and I do not like to see this parliament launching upon the consideration of that mischievous procedure. I think we would do well to frown upon that resolution with which we have nothing to do ourselves. We would do well to confine ourselves within the ambit of our own jurisdiction. We have enough to attend to here. The legislatures of the provinces can attend to their duties far better without recommendations from us as to how they should attend to them.

I was most interested in the question put by the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson). He asked the Prime Minister if he knew of any place where the situation sought to be redressed by this amendment really existed; where there was, for example, exploitation of labour; where there was not freedom of contract. And what was the answer? The Prime Minister said: "No, we have lived up to these things in Canada and this is merely to confirm what we have done." In a word, things are all right in this country, and let us by the resolution pass our blessing upon the people of Canada for having done what is right in a sphere in which we have nothing to do. For my part I have no exception at all to take to the resolution itself, but I do not think it is necessary, so far as I know, conditions do not call for it. But above and beyond that, I am opposed to the practice, and do not want to encourage it and cannot support it—the government can do much to stop it, but I cannot—of having this House, merely for the sake of some individual advantage, perhaps, to a member, go into a sphere to which we do not belong and seek to perform duties which the constitution has assigned to others.

Mr. NEILL: I have much pleasure in accepting the recommendation—

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member replies now, the debate will be closed.

Mr. J. K. FLEMMING (Victoria-Carleton): I cannot see that it is necessary for parliament to express its opinion on this resolution. The resolution says:

That, in the opinion of this House, every effort should be made to affirm and establish the full industrial freedom of the citizens of Canada—

Everbody approves of that.

—to bargain for their services on all industrial contracts and works; that the exploitation or conscription of labour should be prevented and condemned; that no person should be induced or compelled—

These are the words I object to.

—that no person should be induced or compelled by undue influence, threats of dismissal, loss of wages or position or by any other unfair and improper means, to work for wages less than the standard or to engage in work which he has not agreed to do.

In New Brunswick we had a law framed to try to fight against the awful destruction which has come to that province, as I think it has come to the other provinces, by forest fires. Under the law of that province the fire warden has the right, when there is a fire and he has been notified, to summon the number of men necessary, to rush as rapidly as possible to the scene of the fire, and if possible prevent the destruction of the forest wealth. I am sure every hon. member of this House realizes that a great deal of destruction has unfortunately come to our forests on account of fire, and it seems to me that it parliament passed this resolution we would be saying to the legislatures of the provinces, "We do not view with favour your legislation to provide for the putting out of forest fires as rapidly as possible, legislation which gives the fire warden power to take the necessary number to grapple with a dangerous fire."

Three years ago we had a most disastrous forest fire in New Brunswick. Every effort was made to stay that conflagration, and it was limited to a smaller area than it would have been had we not had an effective law to compel men to do work they had not agreed to do, namely to fight the fire and if possible prevent great loss to the country. I know myself of cases where by quick action on the part of the warden in summoning fifteen, twenty or twenty-five men to fight fires resulted within one day, or perhaps within a few hours, in averting a disaster that would have cost the country twenty-five, fifty or a hundred thousand dollars. I do not like the idea of this parliament passing a resolution which will say that that is not the right kind of legislation for a legislature to enact. If there is anything under heaven that we in this country should try to do, it is to save the forest. There is great forest wealth in this country and anything we can do to save the young and growing trees, which are the means of giving employment to the people and producing wealth, is worthy of the consideration of parliament. I want to see nothing done either by implication or by suggestion to limit the power of the province to pass such legislation as in its judgment may be in the public interest and may help to conserve the forest wealth of this country.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West Centre): My objection to this resolution is its absolute futility. It does not mean anything at all.

Mr. ROBB: The same as the resolution we had this afternoon.

Mr. MANION: It was not futile.

Mr. HOCKEN: I was discussing this resolution which reads:

That no person should be induced or compelled by undue influence, threats of dismissal, loss of wages or position or by any other unfair and improper means, to work for wages less than the standard.

I presume my hon. friend means union wages. What is the standard wage?

Mr. NEILL: The standard wage current for that class of work in that district.

Mr. HOCKEN: There may be several standard wage scales in the district. I am one of those who believe in paying union wages. I think the workmen of this country are well able to take care of themselves in that respect, but this resolution would say to a man who is not competent: You cannot lose your job; you must be paid the standard wage paid for competent workmen even though you are incompetent. That is entirely within the terms of this resolution and it is an absolute absurdity. No man will do that; no union insists upon that. This to my mind is simply a piece of flim-flam, probably for the constituents of my hon. friend. If he wants to do something for labour surely he can find some better means than the placing of a futile resolution of this character on the order paper. Neither this nor any other parliament can force the carrying out of such a resolution. If a man does not want to employ one who he thinks is not competent, he does not employ him and there is no power in this parliament to compel him to employ him. It would be absurd if parliament should have such a power. While I am in sympathy with paying reasonable wages to men who work, and with preventing anything in the shape of coercion upon them, as one who appreciates the principles of trade unionism, I could not support a resolution like this.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have pleasure in accepting the suggestion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and with the consent of my seconder, I would delete the two words "or conscription" in the fourth line. That I think will meet all the major objections which have been raised against this resolution.

As regards the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), his legal mind immediately flies to the legal aspect of the matter. I am sorry he did not see something a little beyond that, and I am particularly sorry he ended his remarks with the suggestion that it would possibly enure to the individual advantage of some member. I do not think that suggestion is worthy of him or worthy of myself. I should like to see him rise to a height above the legal point of view—I am quite aware that this House at this present moment cannot legislate in this matter over the provinces; but there is such a thing, despise it as we may or ignore it as we like, as public sentiment, and when this House of parliament, which is the highest court of appeal, so to speak, in Canada, expresses itself such and so, it is liable to have a considerable effect on the legislatures and hon. members composing the governments of the different provinces. Public sentiment is an intangible invisible thing, but it is a very vital thing in many respects, and I was asking from the moral point of view only the support, the endorsation, of this House, expressing its opinion that such a thing is not desirable—that and no more.

The leader of the opposition cited a case of provinces passing what I suppose he might call political resolutions in order to give themselves credit in the province, or perhaps to embarrass the government at Ottawa that happened to be of an opposite political complexion. But it is on record that British Columbia, the province with which I am most familiar, has passed resolutions notably on the Asiatic question, urging this government, which was of the same political colour as itself, to take steps towards restriction regardless of whether such action would embarrass the government at Ottawa or not. Having been challenged to cite a case of its ever having been effected, I would like to cite that same case of Chinese exclusion. Beginning with the Chinese and going on with the Japanese, British Columbia has been fighting for twenty years passing resolutions regardless of whether they embarrassed its friends here or not. It was rightly considered that when those provincial members unanimously passed a resolution of that character, they represented the concrete consensus of public sentiment in British Columbia, and it was so regarded here. In course of time this led to a poll tax of one hundred dollars being imposed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier. Sentiment still continued to be expressed that that was not sufficient or effective, and this led to a poll tax of five hundred dollars being imposed. Time went on and these representations continued to be poured in. It did not matter whether it was the parish council or the city council or the legislature; they were the units and they sent resolutions to Ottawa in order to focus the attention of politicians here on what was needed in British Columbia. This led to the "gentleman's agreement."

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. member not see a very great distinction between the representation of a local viewpoint on a matter within our jurisdiction, and the passing of a resolution on a general principle, on a matter wholly within the juridiction of others?

Mr. NEILL: The point is well taken, but it is taken as against my right hon. friend, because it was he who introduced the illustration of legislatures passing resolutions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the tariff. That is wholly different from passing a resolution on a local condition such as Chinese immigration.

Mr. NEILL: Is the tariff not a local condition?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all—Dominion.

Mr. NEILL: A tariff often is an extremely local condition in some respects. As regards the other members who spoke, most of them, so far as I could make out, came from the city of Toronto, and most of them appeared to be hampered by the fact that they had not heard my opening remarks, because nearly every one of them challenged me to cite a case where such a condition existed. I did cite such a case. It is the law of British Columbia that a man can be conscripted to go out and fight fires at twenty-five cents an hour, or any less wage they like to give. It is that feature of the matter to which I object. An hon. member referred to the particular case of a man being called out to fight fires for the sake of saving life, and haggling about the pay before he would start. The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) need not worry about conditions like that. Canadians do not do those things; when the case is one of saving life, they will not haggle, they will go out even if they have to work for nothing. This is not a case like that; it is a case, as one hon. member opposite said, of saving thousands or millions of dollars worth of property by prompt action. If it is going to save some lumber companies millions of dollars in timber, surely they can afford to pay the standard wage to those doing it. But that is a very different thing from the question of human life being endangered. The hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson) said there was nothing like conscription in Ontario. He went on to say that there was conscription, but that the conscripts were paid what they were worth. Is there not such a thing as conscription in the sweatshops of Toronto? I think the hon. member will find there is a worse kind of conscription, economic conscription, there. He says that in fighting fires men can be compelled to go, but they must be paid what they are worth. More power to him and more power to Ontario; I only want the hon. member to say that Ontario is right and British Columbia is wrong. Let us say, academic though it may be, that it is not right to do so and so, that something else should be done. One of the hon. members for Toronto challenged the Premier to say whether or not he would bring in a bill if this resolution passed. We all know that that cannot be done, but let us try moral suasion, and if that fails perhaps by co-operation with the provinces, when they have been educated to it, it will be possible to bring in a bill of that kind. I ask the House to remember that it is not altogether this particular thing which we must face, but what it may lead up to, and I particularly suggest that the Labour members should consider that. If it is right and legal to force a man to put out a bush fire which is not within fifty miles of a town and which is not endangering the life of anyone except himself, then when we need anything else people may be forced to supply the labour at a wage which the government will establish. There is a danger there, and it is that danger against which I want to guard. One hon. member opposite said in his second sentence that he thought the resolution was all wrong, and in his first sentence he explained why he thought it was all wrong, when he said he had not read it. Perhaps if he will read it with a little care he will not have the same contempt for it. Perhaps his mind is not able to readily assimilate a resolution of this kind without some study. The hon. member also wanted to know who had drawn it up. If he wishes the services of the gentleman who did it, I will be happy to furnish him with the name privately. With the consent of my seconder, I agree that the two words "or conscription" be deleted from the resolution.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

MARKING OF EGGS

PROPOSED APPLICATION TO DOMINION OF BRITISH COLUMBIA ACT

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the Eggs Marks Act of British Columbia should be made applicable to the Dominion of Canada as a whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am sure this resolution is in every respect the antithesis of the one we have just considered. It is short; it is simple; it is within our jurisdiction, and I think it will be acceptable to everyone. I might briefly explain how the need arises. There has been a continual feeling in British Columbia and no doubt in Ontario as well that the poultry farmers are not getting a square deal, owing to the importation of American eggs. That leads one to the suggestion that there should be an increased duty on American eggs. As that is not the basis of this resolution, I am just alluding to it in passing.

Some months ago there was a meeting held at a place called Duncan in the riding of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie), which was attended by representatives of practically all the poultrymen of British Columbia. I may explain that the poultry industry in British Columbia is entirely different to that of any other province, inasmuch as it is a specialized business. There it is not a case of having a few hens running around the farm machinery, nor is it a case where you can say to a man, "Eggs are not selling well; you had better go in for cows." You cannot do that when you have only five acres of land absolutely unsuited for anything else. Consequently they go in for specialized hen farms, with five or ten acres of land on which they keep from two to five thousand hens. It is useless to say to them that they should grow cucumbers or raise pigs, because the land is unsuited to that. At this meeting a number of resolutions were passed; one asked for an increased duty on eggs coming from the United States; another asked that there be no material change in the egg grading regulations; a third resolution dealt with Australian eggs, and asked that they be not allowed to come in under the definition of "fresh", while the last resolution was that which I just read. They asked that the Eggs Marks Act of British Columbia be made applicable to the Dominion as a whole.

I may explain briefly what the act is. It was passed in 1923, and I need not quote it; in effect it states that every imported egg sold in British Columbia or offered for sale shall have the country of origin stamped on each individual egg. That is, there must be a stamp stating that it comes from the country of origin. An egg from the United States would be marked "U.S."; an egg from China would be marked "China". That act was introduced three years ago, and I am advised that it has been exceedingly successful.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Might I ask my hon. friend if that applies to all countries, or only to China?

Mr. NEILL: The section is as follows:

> Every egg dealer who keeps or has in his possession or under his control any eggs which have been imported into the Dominion, and which have not been marked, shall mark each egg with the words "Produce of", followed by the name of the country of origin of the egg.

It applies to every country outside of Canada. The result is, as I am advised by this association, that it has been of great assistance in preventing the importation of foreign eggs. Further, I am advised by the association as follows:

> It is a well known fact in the business that the consumer is suspicious of a marked egg. About fifteen years ago this association placed its eggs on the market with a special stamp giving the name of the association and the producer's number, but it was found that occasionally a retail grocer would carry eggs in stock thus marked for some weeks and some consumer would purchase a dozen of these stale eggs and forever forswear anything with the Cowichan Creamery stamp on it. We know of one firm of distributors in Vancouver that made an attempt to bring marked eggs before the public, and for the same reason gave up in disgust.

The idea, of course, is that a man might import perfectly fresh eggs from the United States; he might put them at the back of the bin and put eggs received later in front, and in that way the eggs first received might become more or less stale. Then when a consumer buys an egg marked "U.S." or whatever it might be and does not like it, he tells his wife not to buy any more of that kind. Then there is another idea, that when an egg is marked as being from a foreign country, the suggestion is that it might possibly not be fresh, coming from that distance. People do not stop to consider whether "U.S." means the state of Washington or the state of California. Also, it is possible that some vague spirit of patriotism stirs the man at his breakfast and he says to his wife, "Get local eggs if you can; I see these are imported."

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Is the marking to be done by the dealer?

Mr. NEILL: He can buy them marked if he likes, or he can mark them, but he must not expose them for sale unmarked.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If they come in from the United States they are unmarked.

Mr. NEILL: They might or might not be marked.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): There is no law in the United States compelling the marking of eggs, so I presume they would come in from there unmarked.

Mr. NEILL: Possibly.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Then it would be up to the dealer in British Columbia to mark those eggs before selling them?

Mr. NEILL: Or else he would have to stipulate with the man from whom he was buying the eggs to mark them. But that phase need not worry the hon. gentleman, because that is an inexpensive operation.

Mr. FORKE: Suppose the eggs come in unmarked, and they are exposed for sale, who is to tell that they are not local eggs?

Mr. NEILL: If the person offering them for sale fails to mark them he becomes subject to a fine.

Mr. FORKE: How do you find it out?

Mr. NEILL: The eggs are checked at the port of entry. There is no trouble about that. Perhaps my hon. friend thought it was going to increase the cost to the consumer, but this cost would be negligible.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): No, I appreciated the difficulty which I think occurred to the mind of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke).

Mr. NEILL: I will deal with that again later. Discussing for the moment the cost of marking these eggs, this association says that to mark eggs arriving in this country in accordance with the act would not cost more than one cent a dozen. So the cost to the consumer would be negligible. The association adds:

Since the act went into force in British Columbia, eggs imported from Washington are seldom sold in British Columbia, being generally bought for re-shipment elsewhere.

They do not appear to have found any trouble in British Columbia. There is a penalty provided in the act for anyone who exposes eggs for sale that are not so marked:

Anyone who violates any of the provisions of this act is liable to a fine not exceeding $100.

This is something practical; it, has been in existence in British Columbia for three years and has been a pronounced success. There are no complaints from the consumer. The legislation has not raised the cost of eggs to him, but it has raised their quality, and he likes it. He buys more eggs now, the consumption in British Columbia having gone up considerably. It does not hurt the dealer, for he passes on the cost—and it is trifling. But it helps the producer because it tends to keep out foreign eggs. My hon. friends opposite, who are such enthusiastic exponents of protection, will kindly take notice that this is a form of protection without increasing the cost to the consumer of the commodity protected, and yet it is claimed that such legislation will materially benefit the producer for it gives his eggs a preference over the American. Their surplus is largely shipped over here, and our producers have to meet that competition.

If any further explanation is desired I shall be happy to furnish it when I close the debate. This is fundamental: The policy has been a success in British Columbia; it is not going to cost anybody anything; and it will help the struggling poultry interest not only in that province but here as well.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Have there been any convictions in British Columbia for infractions of the law?

Mr. NEILL: I do not know, but they say it has been successfully enforced.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, so far as the Eggs Marks Act of British Columbia may come under federal jurisdiction, I think there is no objection to the resolution. For the last eight or ten years every egg-exporting country has been making commendable efforts to improve the quality of its product. In Canada the first effort I recall was during the war—I think part of the time under the old Canada Food Board—with good results; but that applied only I think to export eggs. This resolution is restricted to imported eggs, and the main purpose is that of identifying the country of origin, so that the source of all imported eggs will be known, this information appearing on the egg itself, on the container, and on a placard to be displayed where the eggs are retailed. Having regard, however, to the fact that some of the regulations we introduced three years ago are not yet sufficiently known to warrant any change—it is generally accepted that any regulation should be in force for two or three years at least to give it a fair trial—it is not the intention of the government to make any changes in those regulations until another year has elapsed.

With that understanding, and with the further understanding that we would not incorporate any provincial law inconsistent with federal jurisdiction, there can be no objection to this resolution going through.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to hear the minister say there is no objection to the resolution passing, but I should like to call the attention of the House to the resolution itself:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the Eggs Marks Act of British Columbia should be made applicable to the Dominion of Canada as a whole.

Now, I have a copy of the British Columbia act respecting the marking of eggs, passed by the legislature of that province on December 21, 1923, and I find it applies practically solely to eggs imported from China. I do not think it applies to eggs imported from the United States, Australia or New Zealand.

Mr. NEILL: Will the hon. member allow me to direct his attention to section 3 of the act? It is quite plain that this meets his objection. I have already read it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Section 5 of the act pays particular attention to eggs imported from China.

Mr. NEILL: I am talking about section 3.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): Section 5, subsection 1, provides:

Every person being the proprietor of any manufactory, bakery, confectionery, hotel, restaurant, cafe, tea room, or any place or shop where any Chinese eggs are exposed or offered for sale, or used in the preparation of any goods, wares or merchandise, or used in the preparation of any food exposed or offered for sale or served for meals, shall place a legible sign in some conspicuous place where all persons entering his place of business can readily see the same, upon which is marked in letters not less than four inches high the words, "Chinese eggs used here" or, "Chinese eggs sold here", as the case may be.

Now, there is no reference there to the importation of eggs from the United States or from Hong Kong. A great many more eggs arrive here from Hong Kong than from China, and I do not know that there is any great difference between the eggs coming from those two sources.

Mr. NEILL: Will the hon. member allow me to explain? I do not think he caught my remarks. If he looks at section 3 of the act which he has in his hand he will find that the importation of eggs from any place outside Canada is fully covered. Section 5 deals only with Chinese eggs.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I was directing attention to something that my hon. friend neglected to point out to the House when he was dealing with the resolution, that is, the particular pains taken to make it appear that eggs from China are being used in the restaurants of this country, and that no such pains are taken with respect to eggs from Hong Kong. Now, a great many more eggs arrive from Hong Kong than from China. I fail to see why a distinction should be made between eggs from those two sources. I might refer to subsection of section 5 of the British Columbia act. Apparently in British Columbia there is a very strong feeling against anything imported from China. If my hon. friend is so anxious to prevent unfair competition from other countries, I think he should be equally eager to see that the poultry raisers of British Columbia are protected from that great country to the south just as much as from Hong Kong, China, and any other country.

I have here figures of the importation of eggs from the United States, and they show that during the three weeks of February some 820,000 dozen eggs were imported into Canada from the United States. The British Columbia Act provides against the importation of eggs only from China; why single out China? Section 5 of the British Columbia Act mentions nothing except the importation of eggs from China. It is true, as my hon. friend has pointed out, that under section 3 of that act the eggs have to be marked. In restaurants where eggs are used in the making of pastries and other things of that kind a card has to be exhibited showing that the eggs used are from China, if that is where they are from. Why not exercise equal vigilance with regard to eggs from the United States or any other country? If our eggs in Canada are so superior—and in the view of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) they must be, because he has passed regulation after regulation until the people engaged in the raising of poultry in this country are completely paralysed; I venture to say there is not one man in fifty, no, not one in a hundred or nine hundred of those engaged in poultry raising who understands the regulations of the Department of Agriculture to-day—if, I say, our eggs are so superior, why not take the same precautions against the eggs from other countries that you take against the eggs imported from China?

And now to make the situation still more complicated the hon. member asks to have the act of British Columbia made applicable to the eggs which are imported into this country. If he would exercise the same precautions with regard to eggs from all countries as he does with regard to eggs from China, I would be heartily in accord with him. I think it is absolutely necessary that we should know where the eggs come from. The Minister of Agriculture this afternoon, when the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) called his attention to the importations of dairy products into this country, could not answer at the moment, but wanted time to consider and find out whether the products of other countries were being sold in this country as Canadian products. I think the minister must be aware of the facts in view of the representations which have been made to his department. I think he must also be aware that grave complaints have been made with regard to the importation of eggs. I do not see why China should be singled out and the eggs from other countries, the United States, Australia and the rest of the world, be allowed to escape.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Section 3 of the act makes it quite plain.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): It is section 5 that I refer to. Section 3 is not applicable in this respect at all. Section 5 is the one that makes it necessary to put up cards in the restaurants if the eggs used there come from China.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Mr. Speaker, I have only a word to say. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) said he thought the principal feature of this resolution was that it compelled those handling eggs from foreign countries to have them marked with the country of origin. I do not think that is the main feature of it at all. The main feature of this resolution, it strikes me, and as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) very frankly admitted towards the close of his remarks, is its protective feature. It is an attempt on the part of a so-called free trader to practise protection and get around his free trade scruples. I assume, and I think I have a right to assume, that if the province of British Columbia could have passed an act requiring China, the United States, Australia or any other country to mark the eggs they were sending into British Columbia with the country of origin, the province of British Columbia would have taken that means of protecting itself, but it was not within the jurisdiction of the province to pass such an act. It is within the jurisdiction of this House to pass such an act, and I can only conclude from the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture in accepting this resolution that it is the intention of the government, if the House approves this resolution, to pass a federal act which will compel the United States, New Zealand, Australia, China and all other countries sending eggs to Canada to stamp them before they will be allowed entry into this country.

Mr. NEILL: How does the hon. member propose to compel a citizen of the United States to do anything at all?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I do not know exactly how you will do it, nor do I know just how you are going to enforce this idea either. It is, however, possible to require goods coming into a country to be marked with the country of origin. Legislation along that line, I believe, exists in different countries; goods must be marked "Made in Germany," "Made in France," and so on; that is being enforced in various countries at the present time. If you apply this to eggs, why not apply it to other things? If this is a legitimate and proper way of protecting the poultry men of British Columbia in the production of eggs, why not apply the same principle to the sheep raisers of Alberta and protect them by specifying that all mutton and lamb imported into this country from New Zealand and Australia shall be stamped as coming from those countries before it is allowed to be put on the market here? Why single out eggs more than anything else?

Mr. NEILL: One thing at a time.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I assume from that remark that my hon. friend would not very seriously object to applying the principle further; that if he succeeded in having it applied to eggs, he would not object to applying it to mutton, butter or anything else. But I doubt very much the practicability of anything of the kind. The practical way to deal with this matter, I venture to submit to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni—and I hope I shall not shock too severely his free trade tendencies—the reasonable course is to impose a duty on eggs coming into this country from the United States, Australia or any other country, in order to give the poultry men of this country the protection to which they are entitled. If you do that, you will not have to adopt the roundabout way my hon. friend has suggested to protect the poultry men of the province from which he comes.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): I would like to know if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) understands what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) means. We all know that the container in which the eggs come is marked with the country of origin, but I think he now wishes each individual egg to be marked. How far are you going to go? What are we coming to? What is going to happen to the business men of this country anyhow?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This applies only to imported eggs.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): That is what the resolution means, that each egg should be stamped. Do you not think you have given the business men of this country enough work to do already, keeping track of all the regulations and restrictions you have passed? The only thing they have left to do now is to pay the taxes you impose upon them; they have no other privilege in the world People in business in this country today are so sick and sore and tired they wish they were out of it. I never heard such nonsensical twaddle as this in my life. Hon. members get up here and advocate the most extraordinary things; I never heard the like of them. I only wish the hon. member for Comox-Alberni would get the House to a state where it would clearly understand what the Minister of Agriculture and this government has put the country up against. It is the most difficult thing in the world to comply with all the laws they are responsible for enacting. No matter how desirous you may be of observing those laws you cannot comply with them. Too many restrictions are being imposed on the business world, so much so that the business world is getting sick and tired of the whole thing, and the responsibility rests with the government. We had difficulties when the Conservative party was in power, but under this government they have been increased ten-fold. If the government keeps going on in this way, people will quit business entirely and the business will have to be done in some other way.

Mr. W. F. GARLAND (Carleton): I really believe the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is trying to benefit the poultry industry of Canada, but if this resolution is carried out that industry will be harmed instead of benefited. I agree with the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) that there are already too many regulations in force with regard to the grading of eggs. Under the existing regulations eggs when they enter Canada, whether from China or other countries, are examined as they come through the customs. Not only are they graded, but the quality is marked on the cases, not on the eggs. I believe that is a sufficient safeguard if the idea is to protect our poultry industry.

As the hon. member for South Oxford says, if the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) would adopt some procedure whereby the householders would know what kind of eggs they were buying, it would be a step in the right direction. As matters are at present the householder may think he is buying a first grade egg when as a matter of fact it is an egg of the third grade and is not to be compared in quality with the egg it is supposed to represent. The present trouble is caused by too many regulations and too many grades. As to the requiring the dealer to stamp the eggs, I really believe he has so much to do at present that such a thing is out of the question. In the case of eggs coming from China or the United States they at least should be stamped by the producer in the country from which they come. If that were done the consumer would know when he was eating a Chinese egg, but the stamping should be done by the man in China.

The producers in Canada are not worrying about the competition caused by eggs from China. Those eggs cannot come through the customs as first grade eggs because they are too old to meet the requirements of that grade; therefore Chinese eggs must be classed as thirds. If people want to buy such eggs they should do so after the grade of third had been stamped on them and also the country of origin. That would remove a lot of the difficulty complained of. If the hon. member for Comox-Alberni would exclude these inferior eggs from Canada altogether, or impose a sufficiently high duty, it would be a benefit to the Canadian poultry industry. The reason those engaged in that industry cannot make both ends meet is because of the unfair competition to which they are exposed, and the present multiplicity of grades. The grades should be properly arranged and simplified so that people will know what kind they are buying. A Canadian egg of the first quality will offer convincing proof of its merits.

Mr. HARRY J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Let me say in the first place that I am in sympathy with the resolution. During a previous debate I brought this matter to the attention of the House and in view of the fact that I come from British Columbia and have seen the working out of the act in that province, I feel that I can justly support the resolution. I do not think we need worry about the marking of the individual egg. I know one firm in the city of Seattle who claim that they have no objection to the marking of individual eggs for export into Canada, and the cost would not be over one-half cent per dozen. Therefore I think there is no need for concern over the question of the stamping of the individual egg. We have found in British Columbia that we have little or no trouble. There eggs when put on sale must be marked with the country of origin, so that when the customer comes to buy eggs he or she knows that they are from the United States, or from China, or whatever the country of exportation may be. That system has worked out well in my own province.

I returned from British Columbia this morning, and let me assure my hon. friend (Mr. Neill) that he is not going to solve all the problems of the poultryman through the instrumentality of his resolution. During my recent visit to British Columbia I travelled through some of the outlying districts, and they were bringing eggs in and selling them at the low rate of fifteen and twenty cents a dozen, and at the same time paying a big price for feed. In addition to the marking of eggs I think it is absolutely necessary that there should be an increase of duty. I believe the hon. member said some time ago that he was quite favourable to bringing the Canadian tariff on eggs to a parity with that of the United States provided that it did not interfere with the policy of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). There is no doubt at all that the question of an increase of duty must be dealt with. An agitation in its favour is springing up throughout British Columbia. Deputations waited on me urging that course while I was there, and I have had communications—I think my hon. friend has also received some—in which the raising of the tariff is urged. In addition, the adoption of the egg-marking act of British Columbia was advocated. There is no doubt whatever that the existing situation in regard to eggs must be met, and it must be met by an adequate increase in the tariff. We have got to accord some protection to the poultryman. I am going to support the resolution, but I hope before the session closes the government will grant some further protection to the poultry industry by making our tariff equal to that of the United States.

Mr. ROBB: I did not like to interrupt my hon. friend during his remarks, but I should like to ask this question just for information: My hon. friend said that he had observed while in his constituency that eggs were coming in and selling at fifteen cents a dozen. Could he say from what country those eggs came?

Mr. BARBER: They were local eggs. I was talking to one lady who was lamenting that all she could get that particular day was fifteen cents a dozen whereas the week before she received twenty cents. Owing to the lack of protection and to the high cost of feed it is impossible to carry on the poultry business there with success. In fact people are disposing of their flocks in that particular district at the present time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the resolution be adopted? Carried.

Mr. NEILL: I want to make only a few remarks.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. NEILL: If I am not interrupted I will only be a few minutes, but if interrupted I will be a few hours. I am glad indeed to find myself in sympathy with and voting on the same line as the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) for once. I understood him to say—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: What is the point of order?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The point of order is this: The hon. gentleman has already discussed the resolution which he moved and which you, Mr. Speaker, declared carried. I should like to know what is before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is true that I declared the resolution carried—

Mr. NEILL: But, Mr. Speaker, I was already on my feet.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member was on his feet at the moment I said carried. I will give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt, as I am sure he is not obstructing himself.

Mr. NEILL: I think in any case I have a right of reply. The remarks of the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) were purely of a detailed character, and, I do not think we should take much time in discussing that phase of it.

With regard to the criticism of the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards), I think it is quite immaterial whether the egg is marked in Seattle or in Vancouver. The point is that we can compel the man in Canada to have them marked before he sells them. We naturally would compel the man over whom we have control. I can assure the hon. member there will be no trouble and he need not worry. But the hon. member came back, as hon. members on that side of the House do, to the matter of protection. He said that to put an increased protection on eggs would be sufficient. I say to him, I would also put protection on American eggs. But that should be only supplementary to this legislation, for this reason: that increased duty means increased expense, whereas the resolution I have suggested would mean no increased expense to the consumer, and in these days we are supposed to cut down the high cost of living.

The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) goes one better than I do and says they can be marked for half a cent a dozen, so that will not increase the cost to the consumer. I am quite willing to vote for a higher duty on eggs coming in from the United States. But the hon. gentleman could not resist the temptation—it is ingrained in him—for political effect to twist my remark. He says I stated, "I am willing to vote for the increased duty on eggs coming from the United States, provided that it does not interfere with the Prime Minister." I will subscribe any sum of money to a local charity if my hon. friend will find any such words of mine in Hansard.

Mr. BARBER: I think the statement was that if it was not in the form of a confidence motion, which would imply that if it did not interfere with the government he would vote for it.

Mr. NEILL. He deliberately twisted my language. I said I would vote for it if it were not attached to a straight vote of confidence or combined with a motion in regard to higher protection on other goods in such a way as to make it entirely nugatory.

I will pass over the remarks of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence). He says it was all nonsense. My resolution has been vindicated by the hon. member for Fraser Valley. I am pleased to see the stand he took.

One other point as regards the question that it would be far better to put on protection.

Here is the language the Cowichan Creamery Association used:

The board of directors and management of this association are of the opinion, and very strongly of the opinion at that, that the Eggs Marks Act is a much better form of protection than 5 cent extra duty, at the same time we believe that if the act was a federal measure instead of a provincial one, it would have a better chance.

And so on.

The hon. member for Frontenac-Addington accused me of being a near free trader or a has-been free trader. As soon as you propose to go half way to meet hon. gentlemen opposite, they are never satisfied. Here is a measure of protection. I am not ashamed to say that I favour it as protection, but they are not satisfied. It does not go far enough for them. But only two members on the other side have the courage of their convictions and say, "Here is protection; we will support it." I hope the House will unite in passing the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): The debate is closed on this motion, is it?

Mr. SPEAKER: The debate is closed. When the mover of a resolution has first expressed his views and other members have taken part in the debate, and the time comes for the mover to reply, his reply closes the debate, according to the rules of the House.

Mr. ROBB: Before adjournment I desire to repair something of the damage which hon. gentlemen opposite innocently, or I am sure not with intention, caused just prior to six o'clock when you yourself, Mr. Speaker, left for home and many hon. gentlemen had left to go to dinner. I move—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. ROBB: I move that this House will on Friday March 19th instant resolve itself into committee to consider of supply to be granted His Majesty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rose to a point of order.

Mr. ROBB: I had the floor.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think I had the right to rise to a point of order even if the hon. minister was on his feet. I do not know under what rule the minister rises to make a motion at this stage. The rules of the House plainly read that the proceedings of the House must be taken in accordance with the order paper. We are certainly not proceeding in accordance with it now.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. ROBB: This resolution before the House had just been passed, and I rose to make the motion—

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the point is well taken; the orders of the day must be exhausted before this motion could be taken up.

Motion agreed to.

ATHABASKA ELECTION

ALLEGED CORRUPT PRACTICES

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (Peace River) moved:

That the following address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General:

To General, His Excellency, the Right Honourable Julian Hedworth George, Baron Byng of Vimy, General on the Retired List on the Reserve of Officers of the Army, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Honourable Order of the Bath, Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, Member of the Royal Victorian Order, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of the Dominion of Canada;

May it please Your Excellency:

We, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects of the House of Commons in Parliament assembled beg leave to represent to Your Excellency:

1. That a petition has been, within the time specified in the Corrupt Practices Inquiries Act, being chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes of Canada (1906) as amended, presented to the House of Commons signed by more than twenty-five electors of the electoral district of Athabaska, stating that no petition charging the existence of corrupt practices has been presented under the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, and that corrupt or illegal practices have, or that there is reason to believe that corrupt or illegal practices have extensively prevailed at the election holden in the said electoral district of Athabaska aforesaid on the 29th day of October, 1925.

2. That the said petition was presented to the House of Commons on the 29th day of January, 1926, and on the 1st day of February, 1926, was laid upon the table of the said House of Commons with the Report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he had examined the petition of the more than twenty-five electors of the electoral district of Athabaska aforesaid, and that all the requirements of the Corrupt Practices Inquiries Act (R.S.C. chapter 8) in respect of such petition had been complied with (No. 17 Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons of Canada, Monday, 1st February, 1926).

Wherefore we, His Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects of the House of Commons aforesaid in Parliament assembled Humbly Pray Your Excellency:

To cause inquiry to be made under the Corrupt Practices Inquiries Act aforesaid, as amended, by one or more of the following Honourable Judges of the Supreme Court of Alberta—The Honourable Horace Harvey, Chief Justice of Alberta; the Honourable William Charles Simmons, Chief Justice of the Trial Division of the said Court; the Honourable Charles Allen Stuart; the Honourable Nicholas Dominac Beck; the Honourable James Duncan Hyndman; the Honourable Alfred Henry Clark; the Honourable William Legh Walsh; the Honourable Maitland Stewart McCarthy; the Honourable William Carlos Ives; the Honourable Thomas Mitchell Morel Tweedle, and the Honourable John Robert Boyle. Competent under the Dominion Controverted Elections Act as amended to try an election petition in the province of Alberta, within which the electoral district of Athabaska is situated.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up any time in discussing this motion. I rise merely for the purpose of moving it. The motion has been on the order paper for six weeks, and covers practically all the arguments that I would care to make on the question this evening. The Corrupt Practices Inquiries Act, chapter 8 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, as amended, provides for an inquiry into alleged corrupt and illegal practices under certain conditions. More than twenty-five electors of the federal electoral district of Athabasca have petitioned this House praying for an inquiry under the terms of the statute. The petition was accepted by this House on the 1st February and I move this motion at this stage simply in order to give effect to the prayer of that petition.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): Inasmuch as the Hon. Mr. Justice Stuart has died since this resolution was placed upon the order paper, it seems to me that the name of his successor, the Honourable Charles Richmond Mitchell, should be substituted for that of the Honourable Charles Allen Stuart. I would also point out that the name of Mr. Tweedie is incorrectly spelled; it should be the Hon. Thomas Mitchell March Tweedie instead of the Hon. Thomas Mitchell Morel Tweedie.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the business for to-morrow?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is the old age pension resolution, and one or two other resolutions that appear on the order paper.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not quite understand. The old age pension resolution is quite clear, but what about the other resolutions? Are they those that appear under government notices of motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. There are two or three of which notice was given to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All right.

Mr. ROBB: What disposition has been made of my resolution which was moved a few moments ago?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There was no resolution. I submit that the House has been declared adjourned.

Mr. SPEAKER: I said "carried", but the hon. gentleman knows that after that there was an interchange between him and the Prime Minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister rose about two minutes after the motion for adjournment was carried.

Mr. FORKE: I would venture at this time to remark that members in this corner of the House can take no part in this argument because we cannot hear a word of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does Your Honour hold that a motion to adjourn has been made but is not yet carried?

Mr. SPEAKER: Not yet carried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The motion is not debatable.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman submitted a motion that a moment ago I said could not be put because the order paper was not exhausted. I said a moment ago that this motion could come up to-morrow.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I submit to you, Sir, just a few simple reasons? When the motion was submitted, I rose to a point of order. I pointed out that it was out of order and could not be proceeded with. I was upheld and consequently there was no motion made.

Mr. SPEAKER: The minister proposes it again.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But when? When there is a motion to adjourn before the House. That motion is not debatable and I rise again to a point of order that he cannot now propose it. We must decide the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point is indeed a very fine one. Before the House adjourns every evening leaders on both sides, after the motion is put, speak on matters quite different from the motion to adjourn, and by the courtesy of the members, and by custom from time immemorial, no one has ever taken any objection to that. There is no question before the Chair at the present moment. The Minister of Finance evidently did not notice that the adjournment of the House had been moved and that I was about to declare the motion carried. He then inquired about his motion, and I declared that the motion could not be moved. So this is a tempest in a teapot, if I may say so, with all due deference, and without any vindictive spirit. It is well known that every evening before the House adjourns, when the motion is put and often after it has been declared carried, the leaders in the House put questions to each other as to the business for the next day.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

Friday, March 19, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

POINT OF ORDER RAISED BY MR. MEIGHEN RESPECTING MOTION OF MINISTER OF FINANCE.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): I desire to move seconded by Mr. Motherwell:

That this House will on Monday, March 22nd instant, resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I take the ground that the motion is not in order. The committee of Supply having risen, by virtue of a motion that "the chairman do now leave the chair," it is of course extinguished. It passes from the order paper and, I submit, is subject to be revived only upon the submission of a proclamation from His Excellency, or by bringing down a new Speech from the Throne—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAPOINTE: General election.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That would be even better.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —or by the submission of further estimates to this House. I refer Your Honour to May, 13th edition, on pages 538-539:

When all the supplies for the service of the year have been granted, the sittings of the committee of Supply are discontinued. Care must be taken not to close the committee until all the necessary grants have been obtained. If the committee of Supply be designedly closed, it cannot be reopened save by the demand from the crown for further supplies made by a second Speech from the Throne, or a royal message, or by the communication of additional estimates.

Those words are most distinct. They are not qualified by anything in any other authority that I have been able to see, in fact they are supported distinctly by Bourinot at page 400 There is a case defined by Bourinot, distinct from the case we are on now, where subsequent to a motion that progress be reported a motion immediately follows for the chairman to leave the chair. There the committee may be revived upon motion, but even Bourinot is distinct that where there is nothing but the motion that the chairman leave the chair it cannot be revived upon motion save only upon the conditions stated in May. I read them again:

An hon. MEMBER: Louder please.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I read them again:

When all the supplies for the service of the year have been granted, the sittings of the committee of Supply are discontinued. Care must be taken not to close the committee until all the necessary grants have been obtained. If the committee of Supply be designedly closed it cannot be reopened save by the demand from the crown for further supplies made by a second Speech from the Throne, or a royal message, or by the communication of additional estimates.

Instances are given in the footnote of each of these methods being adopted. That the committee was designedly closed goes without saying. It does not need to be closed at the instance of the government. A committee of the House is not under the charge of the government at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was closed by a member of the committee making the motion to close it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): What were the first words of the statement my right hon. friend read?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The first sentence is not relevant at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I referred some time ago to this method of interrupting; I hope I do not need to remind hon. members of it. I will read the paragraph again:

When all the supplies for the service of the year have been granted the sittings of the committee of Supply are discontinued.

Certainly, they are, that is the regular proceeding. Now:

Care must be taken not to close it until all the necessary grants have been obtained.

The reason being that when it is closed this result follows:

If the committee of Supply be designedly closed, it cannot be reopened save by demand from the crown for further supply made by a second Speech from the Throne, or a royal message.

There is nothing in the world to qualify the sentence upon which I rely, "that if the committee is designedly closed" and that it was designedly closed there can be no doubt. It was not designed by the government, I quite admit that, but the committee is not in charge of the government. The committee is wholly independent. The committee granting supplies to the crown designedly was closed by the motion, and therefore the steps which I have indicated must be taken to revive it.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to enter into a controversy with my right hon. friend on the points he has just raised more than to say this, that the procedure followed to-day is in my recollection identically the same procedure that was followed at one period when my right hon. friend was either the Prime Minister or a very important and active member of the government of the day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When?

Mr. ROBB: I will come to that in a moment. My right hon. friend knows as well as I do that it is not always easy for a government to know when a vote is going to be sprung on them by the opposition. My right hon. friend will recall, if not I think the chief opposition whip will, that during the period in question, 1920-1921, the government of the day had difficulty in keeping their forces in the House and an opposition is always anxious to make trouble. That was the situation at that time. The chief government whip of that day came to me and told me of his difficulties, and one night some of our boys, anxious to play such a trick as was played upon us yesterday, counted the House out, and consequently the House had to adopt exactly the same procedure respecting estimates as has been adopted to-day. Upon the instructions of the then leader of the opposition, who is the Prime Minister to-day, I as chief whip, arranged with the government whip of the day that we would not impede the despatch of public business by counting the House out if the government had difficulty in keeping the members here. That was the position we took in opposition. All we ask is that the same courtesy be extended to us.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was a case of counting the House out because there were not enough members in. That is not the case here at all.

Mr. ROBB: The result is the same.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. That certainly could be restored by revival, or could be revived by motion. Very frequently there are cases of such revival, and though the opposition of that time may have been credited with much philanthropy, philanthropy of which I cannot recall any instance in their history, we did not depend upon it. We had our rights without asking for it or receiving it. All I ask is that the government proceed in the regular way, and that this is the regular way there is no doubt, and I do not think it is very difficult. It is not that we are trying to put obstacles in the way. We are asking only for regularity and there is no need of any delay at all. The government cannot go on until Tuesday.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): May I ask, just by way of enlightenment, what object is to be gained in having the government ask His Excellency for a message to present estimates to the House, beyond that of delaying the business of the committee? It can be done easily, but delay seems to be the whole object of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will answer the right hon. member frankly. First of all, there will be no delay. The government cannot go on until Tuesday anyway. They are not suggesting that they should go on to-day. There is no difficulty in the world in presenting estimates Tuesday. The object to be served is merely to keep the proceedings of the House regular and not to be making new precedents when there is nothing to be gained by it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other member desire to speak?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that it is necessary to supplement what my right hon. leader has said. As I moved the motion, perhaps I ought to say that the motion was designed. We designedly closed the proceedings of that committee. Our view was that it was absolutely improper—I could use a much stronger word—for the government to ask that committee to further consider the estimates of my hon. friend the Minister of Customs when his department was under review, under the circumstances that it is now under review. We meant what we said. We closed the committee designedly on an issue which was an active issue between the parties, and I certainly admit that we are entitled to whatever benefits flow from what happened on that occasion. On this point of order I think it is perfectly proper to point out that during this session we are establishing new precedents, but perhaps we will have to establish another precedent. This government has been defeated by the people and has been defeated in this House, and perhaps we will have to establish some new precedent to ascertain whether it can be dislodged only by dynamite or trinitrotoluol.

Mr. SPEAKER: A motion is made by the hon. Minister of Finance to revive the committee of Supply in the following words:

That this House will on Monday March 22nd, resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted His Majesty.

The point taken by the right hon. leader of the opposition is that the power of the committee is exhausted by the decision which was rendered yesterday; that is to say that the committee should rise. Now, what is the effect of a similar motion when it is carried in committee of the whole? May I refer the House to No. 191 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms which reads:

If the motion "that the chairman do now leave the chair" is carried, then the business of the committee is superseded, but the original order of reference remains and it is competent for the House to resolve itself again into committee on the same subject, for the committee itself has no power to extinguish a question.

This is taken from Bourinot at page 400. The right hon. gentleman has quoted from May at page 538. Before coming to the point which he makes, I wish to call his attention to May's 13th edition, page 455.

It is the practice for members who desire to close the sitting of a committee, to move that the "chairman do report progress, and ask leave to sit again," in order to put an end to the proceedings of the committee on that day, this motion in committee, being analogous to that frequently made at other times for adjourning the debate. A motion "That the chairman do now leave the chair" when carried, supersedes the order of the day for a committee, and converts it into a dropped order; as in this case, when the Speaker resumes the chair, no report whatever is made from the committee. The same result is obtained if, when the chairman reports progress in the matter referred to in the committee, he refrains, upon a direction given by the member who had obtained the appointment of the committee, from asking leave to sit again.

Now how can you revive a committee which has been so converted into a dropped order? May, at page 256, says:

To replace a dropped order of the day upon the notice paper, a motion is made before the commencement or after the close, of public business, to appoint the order for a subsequent day. These motions, which are made without notice, are usually treated as purely formal motions.

Is a notice of motion necessary? Let me refer to Redlich, volume 2, page 219, where I find the following:

Certain motions of a formal or uncontentious nature do not require notice; such are motions:

(a) For the first reading of a bill from the House of Lords;

(b) For the consideration of Lords' amendments forthwith or on a future day;

(c) For the postponement, discharge, or revival of an order of the day;

(d) For the appointment of a committee of the whole House on a future day.

Therefore no notice is required in the present instance. I would also quote rule 76 of our own rules and I also refer to May, page 237, where I find the following:

Certain formal motions which are necessary for the due transaction of business are also made without notice, before the commencement, or after the close of public business, such as motions for the first reading of bills received from the House of Lords for the consideration of Lords' amendments forthwith or upon a future day for the postponement, the discharge, or the revival of an order of the day.

I now come to the very serious argument based on the citation made by the right hon. gentleman at page 538 of May. Let me read it again:

When all the supplies for the service of the year have been granted, the sittings of the committee of Supply are discontinued. Care must be taken not to close the committee until all the necessary grants have been obtained. If the committee of Supply be designedly closed, it cannot be reopened save by the demand from the crown for further supplies made by a second Speech from the Throne, or a royal message, or by the communication of additional estimates.

My knowledge of the English language is far from perfect, but reading carefully this paragraph and using my common sense, it means that once all the supplies have been passed by the committee of Supply, then designedly the committee is closed, and if the government have further supplies to present to the House they must present them by either a second Speech from the Throne or a royal message. That is what happens every session in this House. When the bulk of the supplies have been passed, a message comes from His Excellency for further supplementary estimates and the Speaker reads the message to the House. Again, I am of the opinion, with my poor knowledge of the English language that "designedly" means that when certainly and finally the House has closed the committee all the supplies having been passed. Now, if further supplies are presented the government cannot refer them to the committee of Supply without a new message from His Excellency. That is how I read this passage of May at page 538.

The right hon. gentleman referred to the foot-notes on page 538 of May. I may say that I have taken great pains to look over the foot-notes and references and they apply simply to cases where all the main supplies have been passed and the government in England wanted to submit some further supplies. I think that covers the points which were raised in the discussion, and under the circumstances I believe I am justified in ruling and I rule, that the motion is in order.

Motion agreed to.

REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE ESTIMATES

Hon. GEORGE H. BOIVIN (Minister of Customs and Excise) moved:

That resolution No. 349 of the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927, be again referred to the committee of Supply—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Might I ask for an explanation from the mover?

Mr. BOIVIN: The resolution referred to in this motion was under consideration by the committee of Supply yesterday when my hon. friend moved that "the chairman leave the chair." By the adoption of this motion the committee of Supply went out of existence and it was necessary for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) to make the motion just adopted reconstituting this committee for Monday next. Some doubt has been expressed but it will be cleared up by this motion if it is adopted, as to whether or not the particular resolution under consideration at the time that the committee rose without report, was automatically superseded and whether or not it could be again considered by the committee without being again referred to the committee by the House. Now that hon. members are all in attendance and the Liberal members are not attending the sitting of the Customs committee nor on their way home for their evening meal, I introduce this motion so that the House may decide that the matter which was taken out of its hands yesterday shall be restored and considered. I believe it is the desire of the House that the estimates as submitted by His Excellency the Governor General should receive consideration and be voted upon.

The government has no objection to allow all of the estimates to be carefully considered by the committee of Supply and the committee may decide against any one of the estimates submitted by His Excellency; but we do not propose to be condemned by snap verdicts nor to have the estimates wiped off the order paper by a division such as that which was taken in the House last night. For that reason, the motion is presented and I trust it will be unanimously carried.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am glad to note that generous chord in the hearts of my hon. friends over there. They recognize right even though they want to crush it. The minister was perfectly right from his standpoint in making this motion; in making it he confessed the fact that the item is killed. We have had one motion in the first instance for the purpose of resurrecting the committee, and this may be done if we read the English language in a certain way. But besides resurrecting the committee we have to revivify an item which has been defeated and that is why my hon. friend makes this motion. If he did not know that the item which was in question was defeated he never would make this motion. It would really have been better if this motion had come before the other because this motion shows the extent of the effect which has or rather which ought to be given to the motion of yesterday But now we have the admission as to what the motion amounted to. The government itself admits that the item is killed, and there is no doubt about it. Now I am not saying anything about the appetites of my hon. friends' supporters; I am not saying anything about when they go to dinner or anything of that kind; nor am I, on the other hand, complaining about Conservative members having to attend that committee. The Conservatives attend the committee just as much as the Liberal members do. I am not making any references, either, to the wires, the wild wires, sent out for assistance by the government to its supporters last night. We have not done that.

An hon. MEMBER: Nothing of the kind.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does some hon. gentleman say that this was not done? Hon. gentlemen opposite know that it is true. The point I want to make now is simply this, that the item being killed, as undoubtedly it is, according to the government's own admission and as evidenced by the very fact that we have now a motion to resurrect it, it must be reintroduced by a further message from His Excellency. In this I am absolutely on safe ground. Never mind in what language the rule is written. Here we have an admission that the item is dead, an admission from the government itself, and the only way in which it can be reintroduced is to have it submitted as a new item.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The House heard the remarks of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin), and there is no doubt as to what the purpose of his motion was. He did not admit that the item had been killed; he did say that, as hon. gentlemen opposite might entertain that view, and in order to relieve their minds of any anxiety, he would have the House as a whole express its opinion on the subject. I would ask my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) a simple question: was his motion intended to kill the item? Was that the object he had in mind?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The purpose of the motion was to do just what the motion does.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hon. members laugh, but I repeat that the object of the motion is self-evident. The motion was intended to kill the committee, and it did. The item was, in the opinion of members on this side of the House, one that was improper and that should not have been pressed. It was pressed against the protest of this side and without treating the House as the House had a right to be treated by the government in connection with a matter that was and is sub judice. I want to tell the Prime Minister that so far as I am concerned, indeed, so far as all hon. members on this side are concerned, we are determined to see the people get a square deal. We are determined to see that the only check which an opposition can exercise, namely, the check on votes, is maintained.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Notwithstanding my hon. friend's eloquence he has not answered the question. He tells us that his motion had a wider range of slaughter in view than the killing of the item itself; he admits that the intention was to kill the committee. I ask him again, however, the simple question I put to him before: was it his intention to kill the item? Now, I may say, I was in the House at the time my hon. friend was speaking, and he was requesting the Minister of Customs not to press the item at that particular moment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But the hon. member did not say anything about killing the item; he merely asked that it be held over. The item was to provide money for the preventive service. That being understood, was it his desire to kill it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I cannot make myself much clearer to the Prime Minister. Our position was that the item should not be pressed, and we did the only thing we could do under the circumstances. What else was there to be done? I have an idea that the whole thing will have to be gone over again, if we are to have anything like a proper administration of affairs in this country, when the report of the committee comes in. I expect that when the report is submitted something will be done to try to stop what has been going on in this country, as apparently it is admitted. I am not against a proper item for the protection of the customs and of the commerce of this country, but I am opposed to any scheme of putting through votes that have a bearing upon the matter now under investigation by the Customs committee before the report of that committee has been submitted to the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is important that there should be no misunderstanding of the exact significance of what transpired yesterday. As hon. members know very well, when the House is in committee hon. gentlemen frequently attend to other matters than the questions immediately under consideration in this chamber, especially when they have reason to expect that a debate will go on without a division. It so happened that yesterday afternoon there was an important meeting of the committee which is investigating the smuggling charges and a large number of hon. members from this side of the House, as well as some hon. gentlemen opposite, attended that meeting. The fact that the total vote in committee in this chamber was 105 shows that one-half of the members were not in the House at the time that the vote was taken. I came into the chamber about a quarter to six, having previously been in conference in my own room with some hon. members, and at about ten minutes to six I heard my hon. friend the member for West York suggesting to the Minister of Customs that the item be not pressed at that particular moment. The Minister of Customs was replying to the effect that there were strong reasons why the item should not be held over, and I believe what he had in mind was that it was desirable to proceed with the business of the House as expeditiously as possible. The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), while the Minister of Customs was speaking, kept his eye steadily on the clock, and when it was nearly six o'clock—about five minutes to six—instead of making any motion of any kind respecting the item, either to strike it out or to reduce it, he moved to have the committee rise at once in order, so he said, to show his good faith in the whole matter. The Minister of Customs, according to Hansard at page 1751, thereupon asked my hon. friend this question:

I hope my hon. friend will at least allow me to ask a question. Does he desire by this motion to secure the withdrawal for the present of these two other items?

What answer did my hon. friend make?

Sir Henry Drayton: I want the ordinary rules of the House to be applied. I have made a motion. I want to prevent these two items from being considered, as I do not think they should be considered.

In other words, my hon. friend expressed the view that he did not wish to have the item considered. Why did he not want to have it considered at that moment? He did not wish to have it considered at that particular moment because most hon. gentlemen opposite were at that time in the lobby waiting for orders to come in here and get a snap vote. That is the whole explanation. I am ready to admit that the hon. gentleman did turn a clever little trick, but if my hon. friends opposite regard it as a great victory I fancy they are the only ones who will be of that opinion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the Prime Minister allow a question? If he is right in his contention that I did not want to have the item considered, why was it that I pressed the vote immediately?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the hon. member had not pressed the vote immediately it would have been six o'clock and he could not have obtained a snap verdict.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William): The whole discussion is out of order, but as apparently it is being allowed I wish to say a few words on the question. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and other hon. gentlemen opposite have been speaking of this vote as a snap verdict. Well, is it any more a snap vote than the snap votes which the government has pulled off at various times when some of our members on this side have gone away not expecting a vote?

An hon. MEMBER: When?

Mr. MANION: My hon. friends know very well when, without having me tell them.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: Hon. gentlemen opposite, when they cannot reply with an argument, frequently interrupt with laughter, as they have interrupted my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen), or with howls. It reminds me of a strange custom I noted some years ago when travelling in Europe. In the Italian theatres there is maintained what is known as a claque for the purpose of cheering when it is called upon to cheer, or laughing, as the case may be. My hon. friends on the other side of the House, Mr. Speaker, very often remind me of that claque.

I listened yesterday to the very able discussion carried on by various members on both sides of the House, and I want to say that it was not simply a snap vote, it was the right kind of vote. It was the sort of vote that this government should be getting in this House on all occasions, and it would be so dealt with if it were not for the fact that having made so many promises to all sections in this House it has been able to secure support from hon. members who apparently are more ready to accept promises than action.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Customs when he pointed out that the government was going to allow the House to discuss these estimates spoke as if it was doing something generous, but that is the duty of every government. The House has the right to discuss all the estimates; that is why we are here.

I should like to point out that for lesser defeats of this kind governments in Great Britain, much more strongly entrenched than this government is, have resigned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: Yes; and if I wished to take the time of the House I could give many instances of governments in the British House with clear majorities over all other parties, majorities running from 30 to 40, which for lesser reverses than this government has had realized their duty to the country and resigned.

The Minister of Finance has stated that the opposition simply wished to cause trouble. Well, the trouble in the country at the present time is caused by this defunct government insisting on carrying on when it should be out of business. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that this was not a snap vote nor a prepared vote. It simply happened because our party was on the job and the government's party was not.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I hope my hon. friend has misunderstood me. I do not think I said anything of the kind that he objects to.

Mr. MANION: I wrote down the words at the time. Maybe my hon. friend did not mean them in the way he said them.

Mr. ROBB: I simply rise, Mr. Speaker, to say that I am a little alarmed by a statement made by my hon. friend from West York

(Sir Henry Drayton). This is March 19, and in a few days members will be urging us to name the date when they can separate for the Easter holidays. Every member is interested in carrying on the public service, particularly the preventive service to check smuggling and ensure the maximum collection of revenue; and no person is more interested in these measures than the Minister of Finance of the day. My hon. friend knows that from his past experience. I have for the moment the responsibility of providing moneys to carry on the public service, including moneys required for the preventive service. In view of my hon. friend's statement, if this motion is killed does he mean to say that the doors are going to be opened wide to every smuggler to carry on his illicit traffic? I appeal to the common sense of my hon. friend. If he wished, he might say, "We will give you a reasonable vote to carry on, we will only give you a percentage of this on April 1." But surely he does not take the stand that we are going to paralyze the whole public service and especially have no means of paying our preventive officers? I appeal to my hon. friend from his past experience as Minister of Finance whether upon reflection he does not think he has gone a little bit too far.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): How did you use all the vote last year for the same purpose?

Mr. ROBB: Does that mean we do not want it at all?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): That is a very pertinent question. How much of the moneys did you use of the vote last year for the same purpose?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Let us go into committee of Supply, and you will get the information.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the question was asked as to the meaning of this motion it did not necessarily involve a long discussion on the merits or demerits of the government's defeat yesterday. That discussion was precipitated by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) who felt that something had to be done to revive the waning spirits of the gentlemen around him.

I have been listening for some reasons as to why the motion before the House can be said to be in order. The minister states he has some doubt whether this estimate is killed or whether it is not killed. Well, if it is not killed, of course no motion is necessary. That seems to follow very reasonably. If the estimate is killed, then the motion is futile, because undoubtedly an estimate which is killed can be revived only by representation. There does not seem to be much room for argument about that. The Prime Minister says, "We do not admit it is killed." Then why the motion? The motion cannot help the estimate; if it is killed it is a futile effort to revive it. There is a method of reviving it, and that method the government apparently does not want to resort to. That method is merely to bring down another estimate to this House.

So far I have spoken on the merits of the point of order raised by my hon. friend to my left (Sir Henry Drayton). Discussion has taken place as to whether the government ought to suffer the ignominy of yesterday's vote, or whether it can escape by a certain amount of additional boasting to-day and by the imputation of motives, schemes, plans and all the rest of it. I happen to know it was the desire of my hon. friend to move his motion earlier than he did, but many members on this side of the House who did not know of this desire continued discussing the point of the motion that was before the committee, and therefore he delayed until close around ten minutes to six. Consequently what my right hon. friend says is entirely untrue. It is true that the hon. member for West York intended to make the motion, and he would have moved it at half past five but for the discussion which was then proceeding. But the fact is this, governments depend upon the result of motions as to the quality and dependability—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my right hon. friend excuse my interrupting him? He says that the motion was to have been moved at half past five. Does he mean it was prearranged?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Some time shortly after half past five. I know this because I was by his side at the time, but hon. members who knew nothing about his intention continued the discussion. Do hon. gentlemen opposite contend that in cases in Great Britain where governments have been defeated it has been because their own supporters went and voted against them? They have been defeated many a time, and taken the consequences, because their supporters had no more interest in their proceedings nor in the government they were supposed to follow and did not bother attending in the House. When a government finds itself in such a position in England it usually realizes that it is about time to retire. But there is one virtue this government has never yet attained, and I do not believe it ever will until some super quality of political dynamite is invented, and that is the virtue of resignation.

We are not urging this discussion now. All I want to say is that the judgment of yesterday was no more a snap judgment than many a judgment in Great Britain, and I think one or two in Canada, upon which governments have acted; no more a snap majority than the majority obtained by this administration time and time again on votes designed by themselves. They may call it whatever they like in the press, but the people know that this government is in a precarious position, and they know as well that if hon. members voted on the government's record and their own opinion of it, and on the results of the late contest, this government would have been out of office two months ago. They know they were permitted—and quickly availed themselves of the opportunity—to present to this House a new programme consisting of a series of new promises especially addressed to hon. gentlemen who were not elected to support them, in order to bring to their side that support. Because they were so permitted and entirely without precedent in the parliamentary history of this country or of any other British country, they sit in office today.

I submit again that the government cannot revive an item killed in the estimates by the mere process of a motion. It does not matter to us as a party what the position is, but surely it is of some consequence to parliament that if we have regulations and rules we should be bound by them, and this government cannot escape from those rules merely because they do not propose to study them.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) following the example of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion), appealed to the precedents established in England, and said that in England any government suffering what this government suffered yesterday would have immediately resigned. I intend to read a very recent statement—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that at all, as a matter of fact.

Mr. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend is still misquoted, but his words will appear in Hansard.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit—

Mr. LAPOINTE: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought he would not.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am glad my hon. friend knew I would not. My hon. friend has a queer custom of interrupting members of this House all the time. I never interrupt my hon. friend, and I do not think it is a good practice to be followed in parliament, if my hon. friend will permit me to say so. The former Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. J. Ramsay MacDonald, when he assumed office on February 12, 1924, made a speech, which is reported in the British Hansard at page 749 of the Debates of that year. His very first words were as follows:

4 p.m.

No Prime Minister has ever met the House of Commons in circumstances similar to those in which I meet it. For the time being no party in this House has a majority. The party opposite is the largest of the three, but on account of the circumstances of the election, it is impossible for this House to ask them to remain in power. As the second party, the Labour party has accepted the responsibility of office. I think that that will necessitate some alteration in our House of Commons habits. I think that we will have less to say about party and less to think about party than we have had hitherto, and that we shall lay more and more emphasis upon the responsibility of individual members of this House of voting as responsible members of the House and not merely as party politicians. That is all to the good, as far as this House is concerned. It puts me in this position, however: I have a lively recollection of all sorts of ingenuities practised by oppositions in order to spring a snap division upon a government, so that it might turn it out upon a defeat. I have known bathrooms downstairs utilized, not for their legitimate purpose, but for the illegitimate purpose of packing as many members surreptitiously inside their doors as their physical limitations would allow. I have known an adjoining building, where there happens to be a convenient division bell, used for similar purposes. I have seen the House, practically empty when the bells began to ring, suddenly transformed into a very riotous sort of market-place by the inrush of members, doing their best for their nation, for the House of Commons and for their party, to find a government napping, and to turn it out upon a stupid issue.

I am going out on no such issue. I am sure that no one would enjoy the engineering of those snap divisions more than my hon. friend opposite.

One might almost think the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) was facing Mr. MacDonald at the time.

He could do it. On this occasion he will not bag his prey. The Labour government will go out if it be defeated upon substantial issues, issues of principle, issues that really matter. It will go out if the responsible leaders of either party or any party move a direct vote of no confidence, and carry that vote. But I propose to introduce my business, knowing that I am in a minority, accepting the responsibilities of a minority, and claiming the privileges that attach to those responsibilities. If the House on matters non-essential, matters of mere opinion, matters that do not strike at the root of the proposals that we make, and do not destroy fundamentally the general intentions of the government in introducing legislation—if the House wished to vary our proposition, the House must take the responsibility for that variation—then a division on such amendments and questions as those will not be regarded as a vote of no confidence.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this principle as enunciated there is certainly a sound one, certainly when a House is composed as the present House of Commons is. Every member of the House knows how easy it is to spring a snap vote, even when the government has a large majority. It would have been easy in the last parliament, as well as in former parliaments. No one can expect every member of the House to be in his seat during every sitting of the House. Members of parliament have their correspondence to look after; they have visitors to receive; they have departmental business to attend to, and as far as the members of the government are concerned, we have to work even during sessions of the House. It very often happens, Mr. Speaker, that I am asked by hon. gentlemen opposite to go to my room and meet them on some particular business, and my colleagues have had the same experience. We have even been asked by my hon. friends opposite to meet their constituents on business. Am I to expect that when I am there, at the request of my hon. friends opposite, their associates in the House will take advantage of my absence and take a snap vote? I do not think that would be fair.

I may also say that I think this incident of yesterday may induce hon. gentlemen to consider the inconvenience of having committees sitting while the House is in session, because these committees attract not only the members who compose them, but when interesting matters are being brought up, other members of the House, who naturally go and are interested in the business. I do not think my hon. friends opposite may commend themselves upon this little experience of yesterday. If they want to defeat the government they will have to defeat it on serious matters, in a serious way, and not by reducing parliament to a game of hide and seek.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington) Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has referred to Mr. Ramsay MacDonald in connection with this matter. I would remind the hon. gentleman of what happened to Ramsay MacDonald when the people had an opportunity of getting after him. I hope my hon. friend will take that to heart, and realize in good time just exactly what will happen to him and to his party when the people have a chance to get at them. The Prime Minister offered the excuse for the vote yesterday that hon. gentlemen opposite were home at supper which of course means that those hon. gentlemen thought more of their supper than they did of the government. We know that they are hungry—not merely physically hungry for that occurs to all of us—but hungry for office. They have shown that very clearly to the country. The facts simply reduce themselves to this, that parliamentary precedents cut no figure whatever with this government. When they find themselves at war with the constitutional precedents and the rules of the House they propose to make new rules and establish new precedents to get them out of any difficulty in which they may become involved. That is the situation before us at the present time. The motion made yesterday by my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) was warranted in every particular. It had reference to a department which at the present time is attracting the attention of every person in this Dominion, and I say it was our right under the circumstances, when the government was asking for a vote for this very important matter of the preventive service, to move the motion which was adopted yesterday and the motion was moved. With all due respect to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the rules are established as to the correct procedure for reinstating the committee, and I do not think that the action of the Minister of Customs in making the motion he is making at the present time is in harmony with those rules

Mr. BOIVIN: I have something to say if no one else desires to speak.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): I do not know that I can add very much to what has already been said by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. However, I want to give expression to what I would call a common sense view of the situation. I do not claim to be a politician. I have been now four years in this parliament, and I know something more than I did when I first came to this House; but I am perfectly certain that were it possible for the people of this country to be seated in the galleries and watch the proceedings that have happened this afternoon the dignity of parliament would suffer considerably.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FORKE: I have no fault to find with the opposition for having moved the resolution which they moved yesterday, and I am not blaming them for feeling rather good because the resolution was adopted. At the same time I think a great deal more importance is being attached to the fact than is warranted under the circumstances. We all know what those circumstances were. Of course, if it is going to do hon. gentlemen to my right any good I am quite willing to let them enjoy the incident to the fullest extent. At the same time I might mention what happened in my own case when the vote was taken. The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate and Mrs. Bostock were holding a little reception, and I sauntered down the lobby to spend a few minutes there, and I think I remarked to the Liberal whip whom I met at the reception, "What will happen if there is a vote taken in the House just now? We know what will happen." "Oh," he said, "there is no danger." That is exactly what happened so far as I am concerned personally, but I cannot understand how hon. gentlemen could attach so very much importance to a vote of that kind. However, it is up to the government to keep members in their places and look out for situations such as that.

I cannot understand why taunts are always being directed at those hon. members to the left of the opposition, and why that should be a part of the proceedings every time a debate takes place. The right hon. leader of the opposition knows very well that if he were in the government to-day he could not carry a majority in this House without the help of some of the other parties. Why then in the face of such a situation should the taunt always be thrown out that the government is being carried on by the aid of a third party? It is the only possible way for the government of the country to be carried on in view of the present situation. The right hon. leader of the opposition knows very well that it would be pretty difficult, in view of the situation that has existed during the past few years in parliament, for him to command a majority of members in this part of the House. I am not speaking for all of us, I do not know what they would do under certain circumstances, but why the constant repetition of the taunt to which I have alluded as if there was something disreputable or dishonourable in some of us supporting the government at the present time. We are supporting the government upon its legislative programme, and we are prepared to support them upon that programme. Is there anything dishonourable in that? I would ask hon. members to my right if there is anything wrong with the programme the government is bringing before the House or with the item that was before the House yesterday afternoon. Why not defeat the government upon that item?

An hon. MEMBER: We did.

An hon. MEMBER: You are not here to vote for them.

Mr. FORKE: Well, now Mr. Speaker, hon. members to my right keep repeating the statement that "they did." They know very well they did not do any such thing. It really is surprising that grown up people should play upon words to the extent that they do in connection with what happened yesterday afternoon. I am a little diffident sometimes about talking in this strain because after I had spoken on one occasion the right hon. leader of the opposition characterized my speech as "sanctimonious complacency." Well, I am not so frightened of that term now as I was on the occasion referred to. I was a new member then and my right hon. friend did not have very much mercy on me because I ventured to offer a little criticism with respect to some of the proceedings in the House. But I know how business is carried on now, and I want to tell hon. members on both sides that I am not afraid of anyone here. I hope that we can get down to business, and if the government is going to be defeated upon its legislative programme let it be defeated. That is the way I feel about the matter. I have often made the statement, and I think it is a proper one, that a government should not be defeated except upon a motion of want of confidence. That is when an administration should be really defeated and upon no other vote except one of that character.

An hon. MEMBER: We have not had a chance yet.

Mr. FORKE: Some hon. members seem to be anxious to get a general election. Well, I am not a mind reader but I have an idea that there are a great many members to my right who are not very anxious for a general election at the present time.

Mr. HOCKEN: Give us a chance.

Mr. FORKE: Wait a little, gentlemen. There are more people in Canada than are assembled within the precincts of this House, and I do not think the people of this country are anxious for a general election at the present time. I want you to wait a little bit, wait until the public mind gets a little time to assimilate what has taken place and perhaps after a year or two, or even less, it may be possible, and perhaps the right thing to do, to have a general election. Notwithstanding the taunts about our being afraid of our indemnity in my opinion the country does not want an election. The duty of parliament is in the meantime to carry on, and when the time comes the people will give some definite indication as to exactly what they want done.

Some hon. MEMBERS: They did.

Mr. FORKE: Hon. members keep repeating, "they did." We all know the circumstances. Then why the necessity for this repetition? The Conservative party did not get a majority of the votes of the people of this country, and why, therefore, keep repeating that statement all the time?

An hon. MEMBER: They got more than the others.

Mr. FORKE: They did get more than the others but they did not get a majority.

Mr. SPENCE: Get over there where you belong.

Mr. FORKE: The proceedings must be carried on by a majority of the votes in this parliament. Whenever a government fails to get a majority upon a question of prime importance it will be defeated. I have ventured to make these few remarks because I think I am in a better position to take an unprejudiced view than are some other members of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FORKE: Very well.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. FORKE: All right, gentlemen, you may have your little joke, it does not do me any harm. I will repeat the statement. I am in a better position to take an unprejudiced view than either Liberals or Conservatives at the present time. I have no hesitation in saying so, and I am quite prepared to look everyone in the face and repeat the statement.

Mr. MANION: Why not vote that way some time?

Mr. FORKE: I want to call attention to the fact that in the last parliament on four of the most important divisions I voted three times against the government.

Mr. RYCKMAN: You knew they were going to be sustained.

Mr. FORKE: I am not a mind reader like my hon. friend from East Toronto. It seems to me that when hon. members to my right are in such a joyous state of mind they might have a little courtesy for a member who is making a speech, but apparently they do not like to listen to anything that is not pleasant for them to hear.

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): I think the statement of my hon. leader that we should get down to business should have some effect on the hon. members of this House. I feel, in common with my leader, that these suggestions that we should go over to the other side and show our true colours could have been applied with very much more justification in the last parliament to the party to my right than it could be applied to us to-day. If hon. members to my right will take a few moments in their spare time to look up Hansard and Votes and Proceedings they will find that in the last session of the last parliament they voted twice as often with the government as we did, and I resent this idea that the Progressives should always be accused of falling into the hands of the Liberal party, because I am falling into the hands of no party. I have been elected on certain principles and I intend to follow the party which advocates these principles.

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort): Referring to the way in which business is conducted in this House, I should like very much to endorse the statement made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke). A few days ago the daily papers of Canada carried a report that an effort had been made to broadcast the debates of the Imperial House of Commons in London, the mother of parliaments. Objection was taken to the broadcasting of those debates on the ground that if they were broadcast the people of the country would lose a great deal of the small amount of respect that they still retained for the dignity of the mother of parliaments. With the Imperial parliament standing in that position—and we know that it has been in that position at various times in the past—it is time for the House of Commons to pay a little attention to its own position and to the opinion which the people of Canada are forming regarding it. There was a time not so very long ago when a very great deal of the respect for parliament in Canada was lost. Much of the lost ground has been recovered, but it would be very easy for parliament to again lose ground if it were not careful. In my humble opinion the respect which the people of our country have for institutions such as the House of Commons is the greater part of the legacy that has been left to us by the Anglo-Saxon portion of our forebears, and if we lose that respect we will have lost something that cannot be replaced in the life of Canada. The people of Canada elected members to the House of Commons in order that they might assemble in a common meeting place, discuss the problems of the country, differ as they saw fit in a reasonable way, according to the views of the people who elected them, and that they should get down to business as speedily and reasonably as possible. The people of Canada are entirely responsible for the election of members. There is no blame attached to them. They are entirely responsible for the constitution of the House, and as I look over the division lists in Hansard I do not see the name of a single political party in any of the lists. I see the names of hon. members and the names of the constituencies, where two or three members of the same name happen to be in the House, and that is the only distinction that is noted in this House. It is the only division the constitution intends, and the only division the people of Canada in my opinion are willing to support. Wasting the time of the House and acting like boys at play is not in the best interests of the House or of the country and will not tend to increase the respect due to this House by the people. We have been elected to carry on business, and to continually throw sneers at any particular section of the House is not playing the game. The hon. members diagonally opposite me differ from some of us here, but they do not differ from us so much as they differ from hon. gentlemen to the left of the Speaker. But the people of Canada knew what they were doing and the responsibility is theirs. It is only right that their action on October 29 should be treated with all respect. Now that the members of the House have had their fun—I was going to say that they have on various occasions attempted to turn the House into a bear garden—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): —I appeal to them to get down to business.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think the hon. gentleman should withdraw that expression. It is not parliamentary.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I did not hear your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I said that the expression "turn the House into a bear garden" was not parliamentary.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I said, if I can remember correctly for this short space of time—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw, withdraw.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): —that I would not use the expression "bear garden," but I will say that they are turning it into a kind of a kindergarten.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman should withdraw the statement that hon. members are turning the House into a bear garden. I hope he did not intend to use the expression "bear garden."

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I am afraid my hearing is somewhat defective. I had no intention of saying that this is a bear garden. I simply said I would not use the term "bear garden."

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN: (Toronto West Centre): I am sure members of the House, some of whom have been here ten or twenty years, will appreciate very highly the lecture my hon. friend from Melfort (Mr. McLean) has given the House. He undertakes apparently to instruct men who have been here for a score of years as to how they should conduct the debates and at least we can appreciate his kindly interest in trying to teach us how to behave ourselves. But I think his most serious indictment is that which he prefers against the government he supports. The government is the party that should have controlled this House. Evidently the government has not control of the House, and a government that cannot control the House should not be in power. If my hon. friend objects to the course of this debate I do not follow him in his objection. Why should he take any part in it at all and why should he undertake to call this House a bear garden and to charge members with misbehaving themselves? I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that there are men on this side of the House who have had much longer experience than he has had in parliamentary life and who are quite as capable of knowing how to conduct the debate as he is or ever will be. This criticism is not against the House as a whole; it is against the government because the government is unable to control the House and the sooner a government that cannot control parliament resigns, the better. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) said that this party did not get a majority of the votes. I venture to say he will not contend that the policy of the government was supported in the last election. The policy of the government was defeated, and we are entirely within our rights in carrying on this debate in order to show that the government cannot control the House.

Mr. BOIVIN: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The reply of the minister will close the debate.

Mr. A. de WITT FOSTER (Hants-Kings): Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the proceedings I rise merely to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) upon the progress he has made in the direction of independence since the day when the House first met. It will be interesting to you, Sir, I am sure, to remember that during the first days of the session, when the Speech from the Throne was more or less hazy in the minds of hon. gentlemen, there was not the same spirit of courage that we find manifested to-day on the part of that hon. member. He has progressed by easy stages along this line until to-day, after various explanations of the Speech from the Throne and subsequent legislation have brought pleasing news to him and some, if not all of his friends, he is able to announce to the House that he is in a position where he cares for no one on either side, for neither party. That is the nearest approach we have had to a definite statement that "I am in control of the House and I fear neither party." Therefore I congratulate the hon. gentlemen, being always pleased to observe a courageous attitude on the part of a courageous man.

I am sure the country is following the proceedings of this House with a degree of interest which has not in many years been manifested, and particularly the debate we had yesterday on the estimates and the results growing out of that discussion. No one suggests that there was any impropriety on the part of the opposition in discussing the items that were before the House as presented by the Minister of Customs and Excise (Mr. Boivin). This is the first opportunity I have had of saying that I feel like congratulating the Minister of Customs and Excise upon certain characteristics which he has manifested in this House. They deal more or less with his personal relations to the situation and the presentation of his estimates, the courteous manner which he has in the main assumed.

But we came in the discussion of these estimates to a sharp difference of opinion. The opinion expressed by himself and his supporters indicated their desire to have the items in question called at once. A difference of opinion arose. Knowing that the government had nearly a year ago obtained a vote of $350,000 and that they had that amount of money in their hands for nine or ten months, we on this side have some idea to-day as to the manner in which they have attempted to utilize that vote in the administration of the affairs of the department. The minister himself tells us that he is not satisfied with the manner in which they performed under those circumstances or with the results which they obtained. We come to this point—and I wish to make this clear if I can—that this vote of $350,000 which the minister is endeavouring to re-establish before the House, ought not to pass and discussion on it should cease until we have some further report from the committee which is now sitting upon the various items of investigation into the Customs department. That was the situation leading up to the motion which was made yesterday by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) when he moved "that the Chairman leave the chair", because that was the only weapon we had in our possession. It has been clearly pointed out by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) and those associated with him that the motion of the minister does not reinstate this item before the House. With that question I do not propose to deal, but I submit that the argument that we have made in this House is a sound one and I believe that the country will stand by the position we have taken. As regards characterizing the vote as a snap vote, I do not think that is serious enough to merit the attention of the House for any length of time. In connection with the remarks of the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean), I do not believe that on reflection he will feel like repeating the criticism that he made of hon. members.

Mr. BOIVIN: I have only a word or two to say in reply to the remarks that have been made by hon. members on both sides of the House in connection with this motion. I do not propose for a moment to refer to the manner in which the vote was brought about, nor to enter into a further discussion as to the reasons why the majority was large or small. I want, however, to point out that the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) stated quite clearly and I think he desired to convey not only to the House but to the public the idea that his motion "that the Chairman leave the chair" was for the purpose of preventing the adoption or further consideration of the two preventive service items in the estimates of the Department of Customs and Excise. Why was my hon. friend obliged to make that motion when those two items had not yet been placed before the committee, when they had not even been read by the Chairman and when they were not legally under discussion at all. The leader of the opposition gave the secret away; he let the cat out of the bag. He said: "At half past five I came into the House; I sat beside the hon. member for West York and he was then desirous of making this motion that the Chairman leave the chair." I repeat that at that time, I had not suggested nor requested that the two preventive service items be passed nor even that they be considered by the committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Two or three minutes afterwards.

Mr. BOIVIN: Hansard will bear me out. If hon. members will look at Hansard at page 1684 they will see that for the first time in the course of my remarks, not more than three or four minutes before the motion was made I said:

I hope my hon. friends will allow the preventive service items to go through at once.

The discussion—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We had been discussing them for hours.

Mr. BOIVIN: Discussion had taken place during the entire afternoon concerning the preventive service as linked up with the previous item that had first been considered on Tuesday. In order that there may be no misunderstanding let me say that when we went into supply on Tuesday last, the first item called was: "Salaries and contingent expenses of the several ports in the Dominion." That will be found at page 1597 of Hansard. The proposal was made that the different items be discussed separately. At page 1598 the Chairman asked the question:

Is it the pleasure of the House that the resolution be considered item by item?

The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) was the first to agree. That method was adopted. Yesterday when the committee met the Chairman proceeded to again read the item:

To provide for expenses of maintenance of revenue cruisers and for preventive service, $376,510.

That is an item that has been in the estimates for many years. The two special preventive service votes were never read by the chairman nor regularly before the committee, and being misled—I will admit that I was misled by the smiling countenance of my hon. friend as well as by the apparent abandon, courtesy and interest with which the questions were being asked and answered and by the spirit of forbearance which apparently existed at the time—I jokingly requested—

An hon. MEMBER: Jokingly!

Mr. BOIVIN: Yes, I said "jokingly"—I jokingly asked my hon. friends if they would allow the preventive service items to go through. I knew that they had not been read by the chairman and I was aware that even if the hon. member for West York consented, they would have to be called by Mr. Chairman before they could be passed. Still I asked him if he would allow the items to go through, inasmuch as according to his own admission, they had been discussed throughout the entire afternoon. At page 1685 the hon. member for West York in putting his motion "that the chairman leave the chair" made the statement that he did so to prevent these items from being considered.

In view of that statement, I ask the hon. member why he did not take that step before. It is evident that the motion was made for the purpose of securing a snap division and embarrassing the government. We have been asked by some hon. members on the other side of the House to resign, and to admit that we have not a majority in this House. I say that the government is supported by a majority of the people of Canada, and while it may sometimes be defeated on snap divisions, it will not surrender to the Conservative party.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have been discussing this matter as though it were the motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I debated when on my feet was the point that the motion of the minister cannot revive an item which has been killed in the estimates and consequently is out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Mr. Boivin moves, seconded by Mr. Cardin:

That resolution No. 349 of the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927, be again referred to the committee of Supply.

To this motion the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) takes exception, contending that resolution 349 having been killed by the motion carried yesterday, that the chairman leave the chair, it cannot therefore be revived. I take it for granted that the point of order raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) is that the motion now before the chair should have been preceded by notice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, Mr. Speaker. May I explain?

Mr. SPEAKER: Rather, I should say, it should have been reintroduced with a new message.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is right.

Mr. SPEAKER: The point is that a new message should have been read to the House from His Excellency. The right hon. gentleman also mentioned something about a notice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, Mr. Speaker, I did not.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then I am under a misapprehension. At all events, the position of the hon. member for West York is that resolution 349 having been killed by the committee rising, it cannot be revived by the said motion. I was under the impression that I had inferentially decided that point in the preceding ruling which I gave a moment ago, but I have no objection to deal with the matter again. Redlich, at page 202, volume 2 says:

> There is also another motion which may be brought forward in committee at any time, and which also has the effect of bringing its sitting to an end, namely, "that the Chairman do now leave the chair." The carrying of such a motion has a more far-reaching effect; it causes the order of the day—for the discussion of such and such a subject in committee of the Whole House—to drop entirely; a renewed order for the constitution of the committee must be made by the House before the discussion can be resumed.

The motion made by the Minister of Customs (Mr. Boivin) is intended to revive the item under discussion when the committee rose without reporting. As regards the subject matter under discussion at the time the vote was taken, as a result of which the item dropped, let me again quote Bourinot at page 400:

> If the motion "that the Chairman do now leave the chair" is carried, then the business of the committee is superseded, but the original order of reference remains and it is competent for the House to resolve itself again into committee on the same subject for the committee itself has no power to extinguish a question.

In yesterday's proceeding of the committee of Supply no report of progress was made, nor was the leave of the House asked that the committee should be allowed to sit again. The whole matter was consequently left in the air. The committee will, however, be revived by the motion of the Minister of Finance passed a moment ago, and the question now is, shall that committee have the right to discuss a particular matter which it had under consideration on a previous occasion, when it lapsed, namely, resolution No. 349? The point, as Bourinot indicates, is perfectly clear: though the business of the committee be superseded the original order of reference remains.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Now, what is the order of reference in the present instance? It consists of the estimates which were submitted to the House by the government for reference to the committee of Supply. I had my doubts as to the necessity of again referring the resolution in question to the committee, but it seems to me that all misapprehension in the matter will be obviated if this motion is carried. It is true that the authorities on parliamentary procedure, Bourinot amongst them, regard the reference of the whole of the estimates to the committee as one reference. But Bourinot says also that each item becomes a resolution by itself. Therefore the resolution of yesterday, having been left, so to speak, in the air by the fact that the committee rose without making any report, I am perfectly satisfied that it would remove any doubts as regards the reconsideration of resolution No. 349 should there be any, if this motion is carried.

It is my ruling that this motion is in order.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. BOURASSA

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I suppose I may use another five minutes of this lost time on a question of privilege. On coming back to Ottawa this morning I noticed that my good neighbour the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) yesterday thought it necessary to put himself right before the loyalists of this country by explaining why he had been sitting during some singing performances.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The hon. member is perfectly in order.

Mr. BOYS: Do you call singing the national anthem a musical performance?

Mr. BOURASSA: The hon. member may keep his seat, sullenly or joyously as he likes, while I explain my position. Like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I am not a singer, and from the experience I have had in listening to singing in this House, I am happy that I am not one of the inflicters of the so-called "singing" upon those members of the House or those in attendance in the galleries who by education or by inheritance at least have some degree of musical taste. I might explain that I never caught the difference by the tune as between the drinking and other songs by which the House of Commons in its dignity expressed its feelings and the national anthem.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BOURASSA: I must say I did not notice the difference. But I want to add, Sir, if it will please the pillars of the empire and the upholders of the dignity of the crown, that if I had caught in the noise made by the party opposite of mewing or barking that there was any intention of coupling the name of the king with the performance, I would still have sat in protest against that kind of thing. I do not frequently boast of my loyalty to the king—

An hon. MEMBER: Naturally not.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so. I do not make it my stock in trade.

An hon. MEMBER: Naturally not.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so. I have learned my attachment to the British crown by my study of British history and by my contact with British institutions and in the British parliament, where such performances would not be tolerated. I remember one instance at a late hour of the night—

Mr. MEIGHEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I do not dispute the hon. gentleman's right to refer to any incident in the House and make a statement regarding it; but I do dispute his right to enter into a controversial argument about the merits of that incident.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the right hon. gentleman is perfectly right. The hon. member should confine himself to the question of privilege at issue.

Mr. BOURASSA: Very well, Mr. Speaker. My point on the question of privilege is that in about a dozen or so newspapers—I have not read them or counted them, but I was so informed by my friends in Toronto—and I have some excellent friends there—

An hon. MEMBER: They don't know you.

Mr. BOURASSA: Oh yes, they have known me for twenty-five years. It is precisely because they know me that I keep such a good remembrance of them and they keep an equally good remembrance of me. I was told that all through the Tory Orange press of Ontario this incident was given out—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BOURASSA: —was given out in about the same terms as employed by one of those papers mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre yesterday—I do not recollect its name. I want to say this, Sir, that I have no objection to members of this House expressing their joy or their sorrow either before or after a vote in any way they choose; but I have always considered that as a matter of dignity this was not the place or the time to mix up the national anthem with various other songs. Always when I was in the House many years ago I refused to stand up when the national anthem was sung in that manner. I propose continuing to do so. Every time the national anthem is sung properly, with dignity and propriety, I pay to it the homage which is due to the king, to his name and to his authority. But I do not take my lessons of loyalty from any political party, nor do I propose to—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member has, I think, stated his case perfectly well, and the House understands that he protests against the unseemly remarks which have been made against him by certain newspapers. A question of privilege will be brought at this stage of the proceedings, but it must be presented so as to consume as little time as possible to permit him putting himself right before the House.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite right, Mr. Speaker. I bow to your ruling, both from the point of view of rule and of common sense. I suppose it was the atmosphere created this afternoon which caused me to go a little beyond the usual length. I merely add this, Sir, that I have learnt also from my knowledge of procedure in the British House of Commons, that if there is a place in the United Kingdom where the national anthem ought not to be sung it is in the House, where the name of the king should never be mentioned. I propose to stand by the traditions, the rules and the customs of the House of Commons in England in this respect.

LAKE ERIE FATALITY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GOTT (South Essex): Mr. Speaker, may I ask if the lake Erie fatality of March 1 has ever been drawn to the attention of any department of the government? This fatality having occurred in the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this House, I feel in duty bound to bring it to the attention of the government. Let me quote from the Border Cities Star of March 18 in which, under the heading, "Lake search is abandoned: fate of five to remain mystery," the following despatch appears:

Search for the bodies of the Phipps family, held beneath the ice of lake Erie, was definitely abandoned Wednesday. No further effective measures for their discovery can be taken until the lake is clear of ice.

This news was brought back by the party under Harry Ford, which returned to Leamington about 4 p.m. Wednesday after spending all day at the lake. Mr. Ford declared the ice is now too treacherous to be ventured on. The party cut some channels, clearing about 10 square yards, near the spot where the auto is believed to have disappeared. Over this area, a boat was used, and dragging was carried out, but unsuccessfully.

Mr. Ford has decided not to communicate with the Ontario Hydro Commission with regard to the use of electrical devices. He believes electricity would not be effective through the ice.

Charles Neale, noted exponent of the "divining rod," left last night for Cottam, and he expected to be back home in West Lorne to-day.

Mr. Ford now plans to wait until the ice has all disappeared. Then, when a calm day comes, a search will be made in boats for oily patches on the surface of the water. There is just a faint hope of such being discovered, but Mr. Ford believes there is a possibility of oil indicating the position of the sunken car.

With the permission of the Prime Minister I would like to submit a portion of a letter which I received from one of my constituents.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. GOTT I said: "With the permission of the Prime Minister." This bears directly and entirely upon this fatality. Have I the privilege?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, certainly.

Mr. GOTT: Thank you. This letter is from Leamington, Ontario, under date of March 6, although it was not received by me until Monday of this week. It is as follows:

Since the accident here last Monday. in the casualty list were included a man by the name of James Phipps, his wife, and three children between three and ten years of age, who took a plunge through the ice somewhere between Pelee island and Leamington in a closed Ford sedan. The present situation is a crime against the people of the mainland and the island. Something surely must be done. The island has been cut off from the mainland this winter and isolated on account of a broken cable, and there has been no communication whatsoever with the mainland. This service between two sections of Canada lying within fourteen miles of each other is so deplorable as to be pathetic. The ill-fated party and car lay on the bottom of lake Erie from Monday afternoon until Thursday before the fatality was discovered. Both terminals were unconscious of what had transpired, the island supposing the party had landed safely, and the mainland content to think they had remained on the island, whereas they were resting beneath the ice and waters of lake Erie.

It is worth while for the government to think it over. Five human lives were lost in one dive, which is too many to go on record. The island is in dire need of assistance, and I should like to ask the government if, in the cause of humanity, they would be moved to immediate action by way of monetary assistance in locating the bodies.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I fail to see the necessity of putting in that letter or the newspaper clipping to have the government take any action in a matter affecting human life. I am sure if my hon. friend had called upon the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Cardin) this morning, he would have been able to satisfy his own mind as to what the government would be prepared to do, and what the government is in a position to do. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries is not in the House at the moment, but I will see that the remarks of my hon. friend are brought immediately to his attention, and I can assure my hon. friend that if this government can deal with the matter—and if it has not already been dealt with—to the extent of our authority it will be taken up.

CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL

CONSTRUCTION OF LAKE IN NORTHERN ONTARIO

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. R. O'NEILL (North Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question which I intended to put to the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart, Edmonton), but which, as he is not in the House, I shall put to the Prime Minister. A great deal of publicity has been given a suggestion or scheme to meet the present situation resulting from the Chicago water steal, and this has greatly disturbed the people in the north country. As you understand this suggestion predicates an absolute disregard for the natural resources of the north country. The plan appears to be to divert the waters flowing northward and to establish an immense lake in the north. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether those back of this plan are spokesmen of the government, or if they are harbingers of the proposals of the government in this respect. In the absence of the Minister of the Interior, however, we might have a more decisive reply from the Prime Minister if I were to put the question in another way. Would the Prime Minister make an ex cathedra pronouncement to the effect that all surplus waters of navigable streams belong to the province in which the streams happen to lie?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend began with one question and ended with another. I think the last question is really a constitutional one, and will call for an answer from the Department of Justice. If my hon. friend would like an answer from the Department of Justice, I have no doubt he can get one in due course.

Mr. O'NEILL: Would it be in order to expect an answer from the hon. Minister of Justice under the present circumstances?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Not upon the orders of the day.

CANADA-WEST INDIES TRADE AGREEMENT, 1925

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to introduce a measure to approve of the agreement dated the sixth day of July, 1925, between the government of the Dominion of Canada and the governments of certain of His Majesty's colonies in the West Indies, which agreement is termed "Canada-British West Indies-Bermuda-British Guiana-British Honduras Trade Agreement, 1925," and to provide:

1. That after the said agreement is brought into force, and so long as it remains in force, goods mentioned in the said agreement, the produce or manufacture of any of the colonies parties to the said agreement, which are conveyed without transshipment, except transshipment at a port of any of the said colonies, by ship direct into a sea or river port of Canada, shall be admitted to Canada at the rates of duties provided in the said agreement.

2. That the tariff concessions covered by the said agreement to be extended to goods the produce or manufacture of any of the said colonies shall be so extended with respect to any one or more of the said colonies which may have ratified the said agreement on and after a day to be fixed by proclamation of the Governor in Council, which proclamation shall be published in the Canada Gazette.

3. That subject to the provisions of the Customs Tariff, 1907, the Governor in Council may, by order in council, extend the said advantages to goods the produce or manufacture of any British country.

4. That the operation of all laws inconsistent with the giving to the provisions of the said agreement and of any act that may be founded on this resolution their full effect shall from time to time be suspended to the extent of such inconsistencies.

5. That subject to the ratification of the said agreement by the various colonies which are parties thereto, and to the fulfilment of their undertaking to make the contributions on their behalf as specified therein, the Governor in Council be empowered to make such arrangements as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the said agreement relating to the establishment of steamship services between Canada and the colonies concerned, and any expenses incurred in carrying out the said agreement shall be defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for that purpose.

He said: Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I should like to place on the record some of the provisions of the agreement, and to give a brief history of the negotiations carried on from year to year between Canada and the islands of the West Indies. The West Indies islands represented in this agreement have a population of roughly 2,200,000 persons, as compared with a population of 1,218,913 in New Zealand and 5,435,734 in Australia, according to the last census.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How is that divided?

Mr. ROBB: I could not tell my hon. friend; I have not the details. The government of Canada, or rather the people of Canada, have recognized for many years the importance of trade relations with the West Indies. This agreement which will be submitted to parliament is one of a series of agreements which have been made from year to year. Thirty-five years ago, in 1890, the government of the day sent to the West India islands Sir George Foster, then Minister of Finance, in an attempt to arrange commercial reciprocity between Canada and the British West Indies. No results crowned his efforts, for at that time the West India governments were negotiating with the United States for a favourable treatment under the McKinley Tariff Act, and they thought that if they granted a reciprocal preference to Canada, the United States would penalize West Indian sugar, one of the great products of the West India islands, and the main product of the colonies at that time. In 1897, seven years later, a royal commission investigated conditions in the West Indies, and reported that the views of the West Indies estate proprietors remained unchanged. In 1896 there was a change of government in Canada. In 1898 Mr. Fielding extended to the British West Indies the Canadian preferential tariff, and in the course of his budget statement pointed out the large opportunities that existed for the development of trade between Canada and those islands. Accepting Canada's imperial responsibilities Mr. Fielding then extended the preference without asking for any concessions in return. In 1900 the preferential reduction on British imports into Canada was increased from 25 per cent to 33⅓ per cent, but our trade with the West India islands still remained at a low level. The same year however, Trinidad sent delegates to Ottawa, and as a result the Canadian government made a proposal to the Trinidad government for a reciprocal trade arrangement. This failed to materialize into legislation. Apparently the people of Trinidad were not prepared to grant to Canada the preferences which we desired.

In 1903 the Brussels convention brought the West Indian sugar question again to the fore. This convention, which aimed at the abolition of the bounties on the production of sugar brought in its train the disappearance of the American countervailing duties on bounty-fed sugar, and made the American market less attractive to the West Indian growers. In the same year Canada imposed a surtax on German importation into our country.

By 1903 the Spanish-American war had ended, and the effect of Porto Rico becoming a part of the United States was felt, because sugar from that country was imported into the United States free of duty, and a similar treatment was extended to importations from the Philippines and a reduction of 20 per cent to those of Cuba. This practically ended, for the moment, the export of sugar from the British West Indies to the United States. These three circumstances influenced the desire to commence fresh negotiations between Canada and the West Indies which later on brought about a measure of trade agreement with the West India islands. Negotiations were opened between Canada and the West Indies and British Guiana, including proposals for a reduction of 10 per cent on importations from Canada and the United Kingdom. Likewise in 1904 Trinidad revived the proposals of 1900. The proposals which Trinidad had rejected in 1900 they were prepared, apparently, in 1904 to accept.

I said a moment ago that all Canadian governments had been anxious to effect commercial relations with the British West Indies. In so doing these governments were only representing the views of the people, because we find that in 1907 the boards of trade of Toronto, Montreal, St. John, and Halifax sent a commission to the West Indies to study trade conditions. In that year the groundwork was laid for the holding of a conference at Barbados in 1908 to consider the steps which might be taken to encourage closer trade relations with Canada. This conference was held in January, 1908. Canada was represented by two delegates, and practically all the colonies were represented. The representatives, however, had no power to bind their governments, and only a general exchange of views was possible. The Canadian government, realizing the difficulties involved in the conclusion of separate reciprocal agreements with each of the colonies, proposed that a conference organized by imperial authority should take place. Accordingly in 1909 a commission was appointed by Great Britain, headed by Lord Balfour of Burleigh, who was chairman of that commission. The commission, I am told, consisted of five members. The Canadian representatives on that royal commission were the Hon. W. S. Fielding, then Minister of Finance, and the Hon. William Paterson, then Minister of Customs. This commission visited the principal cities of eastern Canada. Later all the members excepting Mr. Fielding visited the West India islands. During the same year the commission met in London, England, and drafted a report which was presented to the King's Most Excellent Majesty. A suggested form of agreement was presented with this report. The visit of the royal commission was not without results, because we find that in 1912 the first West India conference was held in Ottawa. In that year representatives from most of the islands and British Guiana visited Canada, and an agreement was entered into, the terms of which were practically the same as those of the suggested agreement of the West India commission of 1909.

The conference which took place in 1912 at Ottawa granted special tariff reductions on a few selected West Indian products, including sugar, and in addition a preferential rate of four-fifths of the general tariff on some other goods. The Canadian statute ratifying the new pact left the British West Indies in enjoyment of the regular British preferential schedule in any cases where it should happen to be more favourable to them than the new treaty preference. The agreement secured for Canada a corresponding preference of one-fifth of the ordinary duty in Trinidad, British Guiana, Barbados, Grenada, St. Lucia, St. Vincent, Antigua, St. Kitts, Nevis, Dominica, and Montserrat on various food products, animals, boots and shoes, machinery, vehicles, soap, cement, calcium, carbide, furniture, lumber—in all, articles specified under forty-seven tariff headings. On flour the preference was to be not less than 12 cents per hundred pounds.

In 1920 another conference was held and at this conference Jamaica, the Bahamas, British Honduras and Bermuda joined in the discussion. These four colonies had not been members of the 1912 conference, and all with the exception of Bermuda later on ratified the agreement. The act of parliament bringing the latter agreement into effect was assented to on May 3, 1921. I imagine my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) was then the Prime Minister of Canada. The act provided that the agreement should come into force on a day fixed by proclamation by the Governor in Council, which was made on the 18th June, 1921. It was provided that the agreement should remain in force for ten years from the date of the proclamation and thereafter until terminated by twelve months' notice given either by the government of Canada or by the government of any of the colonies. This agreement is still in force.

The 1920 agreement was more general than the agreement of 1912.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Can the minister say at what time the agreement was ratified by the last of the West India colonies?

Mr. ROBB: The agreement of 1920?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. When did it finally go into effect?

Mr. ROBB: I will try to get that information for my right hon. friend. I do not think I have it at my hand now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be in the fall of the year.

Mr. ROBB: On a few articles such as flour from Canada and sugar from the West Indies, special treatment was given. As I have stated a moment ago, under the agreement of 1912, the preference given to Canada on flour was 12 cents per hundred pounds. Under the agreement effected in 1921—better known as the 1920 agreement, it came into force in 1921—Canada granted a preference of not less than 50 per cent and the West Indian colonies reciprocated with a preference varying from 50 per cent to 25 per cent. This arrangement was ratified by Canada and by the colonies, the Bahamas and British Honduras granting larger preferences than the agreement called for.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): The minister was about to make a statement in regard to the increased preference in respect to flour.

Mr. ROBB: I was. My recollection is in respect to flour under that agreement that we obtained a one shilling preference.

In June, 1925, a further conference was held in Ottawa to meet changing conditions and the agreement then made is now before the House.

The British West Indies lie considerably to the south of Canada. Their products are those of a tropical climate and do not enter into competition with our agricultural products. Canadian agriculture, the fishing and lumbering industries and dairying especially, together with certain branches of manufacturing, stand to gain materially from the new pact, whilst such West Indian products as bananas, sugar, molasses, coffee, cocoa and citrus fruits will either enter Canada duty free or be admitted under a lower rate than similar products from foreign countries.

The preferences granted Canada are divided into two classes, special and general. The special preferences apply to a selected list of products in which Canada is especially interested, and are greater than the general preferences. The latter apply to all goods not receiving special preferences. For example, Trinidad, Barbados and British Guiana agree under the general preference to charge practically all imports from Canada only half, British Honduras, Leeward and Windward islands two-thirds and Jamaica three-quarters of the duty levied on goods from foreign countries.

As regards special preferences, the western group of colonies consisting of Jamaica, the Bahamas, and British Honduras impose a duty on Canadian flour of two shillings a barrel less than on foreign flour and duties of not more than half those charged foreign countries on butter, cheese, lard, condensed milk, fish, apples and potatoes. In the eastern group of colonies, British Guiana, Trinidad, Barbados and other West Indian colonies also give Canada a preference of two shillings a barrel on flour and a preference of not less than 66⅔ per cent on apples, pork, beef, lard, butter, cheese, fish, condensed milk, boards, planks, scantlings, shingles and lath, cement, prepared cocoa, confectionery, boots and shoes and cordage. It is also provided that on these items the preference shall not be less than a fixed amount.

Turning for a moment to navigation, it is admitted that the key to a successful trade with the West Indies lies in satisfactory steamship service between the colonies and Canada.

Previous to 1900, a subsidized steamship service between Canada and the West Indies was being performed by Messrs. Pickford and Black of Halifax. This subsidy was for $63,000 annually. The service was continued under a year to year arrangement until 1900, when the British government undertook to pay half the cost of the steamship service and a new contract was made with Messrs. Pickford and Black whereby they received $65,700 from Canada and a like amount from the British government. They were to maintain a fortnightly service, the vessels starting alternately from St. John and Halifax. This agreement was for five years. Towards the end of the period of the contract, the British government signified that it was not altogether satisfied with the service, the desire being to have a fast through service to Barbados, Trinidad and British Guiana, which would be supplemented by a service of slow cargo boats. Negotiations were opened with other companies but the Pickford and Black company received the contract for a twelve-day service. This was carried on until 1911, when the British government declared that it could not see its way to continue paying its portion of a subsidy based on the old arrangement.

I am not going further into that part of the agreement but I will refer to the royal commission of 1909. The royal commission reported in favour of a weekly service and also that there should be fortnightly sailings from Halifax and fortnightly sailings from Montreal during the season of navigation.

The proposals of the British government made in 1911 fell through and Canada was left to pay the whole subsidy. The Dominion renewed the contract with Messrs. Pickford and Black and in 1912 the subsidy was increased to $100,000 per annum. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company commenced a service in November 1913, at an annual subsidy of £70,000. They did so with some reluctance and only at the request of the Canadian government. I think it is only fair to the company to emphasize the fact that they have been carrying on the service at the urgent request of the Canadian government, both this government and preceding governments. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company have frequently represented to us that if they had a longer contract they would be prepared to give a more favourable service. I have before me a memorandum which I desire to place on the records in justice to that company.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Is the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company still carrying on the service?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: And at the same subsidy?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, at the same subsidy. The memorandum reads as follows:

The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company commenced this service in November 1913, at an annual subsidy of £70,000. They did so with some reluctance and only at the request of the Canadian government. They had experienced a good deal of difficulty in finding suitable boats, in view of the peculiar conditions on this route, which require a type of vessel very difficult to obtain. Such a vessel must have a fair average speed, considerable passenger accommodation, capacity for several thousand tons of freight and in addition must draw not more than 18 feet of water, in order to get over the bar at Demerara.

The company were finally successful in obtaining four suitable boats and with them undertook a five-year contract, expiring on October 31, 1918.

Since that date the service has been renewed for short terms, either by contract or by order in council, nine separate times and in each case the renewal has been made at the request of the Canadian government, in order to give further time in which to arrange for an improved service.

The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company have been very reluctant to continue the service with the old boats put on in 1913, which they stated were out of date, but it has been impossible to find any other boats suitable, and the only way to improve the service is to build boats specially for the trade.

On two separate occasions tenders have been called for an improved service, and in each instance the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company was the only tenderer. In addition to this the company made a special offer in 1924, reducing their previous figure by about $50,000 a year, but by this time it had been decided to call another conference with representatives of the various West Indian Colonies, and the service has, therefore, been continued at the express request of the Canadian government on the same terms as before until such time as the tenders, which were recently called for, have been opened on April 6th, and until the government announces what the result will be.

The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company have lodged complaints at various times because the Canadian Government Merchant Marine have entered upon that service; we have a complaint before us now that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine have two boats going out at the same time. But in 1921 we signed an agreement with the West-Indian islands providing for a certain service, and had the Canadian Government Merchant Marine boats not entered on that route, we would have been compelled to pay a subsidy for additional boats to meet the requirements of the agreement, and those in Canada who import large quantities of goods from the West Indies would have been deprived of that service.

The Canada-West Indies trade agreement of 1920 contemplated an improvement in the service between Canada and the West India islands to the extent of making it weekly instead of fortnightly and also of putting on larger and more up-to-date vessels.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): As regards the government merchant marine vessels, might I ask the minister as to the number of vessels, and the tonnage, if he can give it?

Mr. ROBB: My recollection is that there are four. I have not the tonnage, but I may be able to get it for my hon. friend in committee.

In 1921 Canada called for tenders for the service but received only one tender which was from the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company. They did not specify any particular amount of subsidy but merely asked for a guaranteed return of seven per cent on the cost of the new vessels which it would be necessary to build for the service. This tender was not acceptable to the Canadian government, and the company's old contract has been renewed from time to time, expiring, I repeat, on the 31st March of this year. On March 14, 1923, tenders were again called for this service, but in view of the fact that it had been demonstrated beyond doubt that there was not traffic on this route to support a weekly service with large vessels, the call for tenders specified merely a fortnightly service.

The only tender received on this occasion was from the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company who offered a service in accordance with the trade agreement of 1920—and hon. members must bear in mind it was to meet that agreement of 1920 that we were asking for this additional service—for an annual subsidy of $585,000. That offer was not accepted. The company made a special offer in 1924 reducing their previous figure by about $50,000 a year, but by this time it had been decided to call another conference with representatives of the various West India colonies, and the service has therefore been continued as I have already stated.

In addition to this subsidized service provided by the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, and so as to fulfil our obligations with the British West Indies to put on additional boats, freight vessels of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine are plying beween Canadian ports and the West Indies. The former steamship service is admitted by all to have been inadequate. The new agreement provides for a first-rate service with weekly sailings the year round. From Maritime province ports a 12-knot freight, passenger and mail service using vessels of 5,000 to 6,000 gross tons and with accommodation for 230 passengers each, will be provided fortnightly to Demerara and intermediate ports. Supplementing these sailings there will be alternate fortnightly freight sailings from ocean ports in winter and river ports in summer, using slightly smaller vessels with a speed of 10 knots. To the cost of these services which are to be supplied by Canada, the eastern group of colonies will contribute about $142,000 a year.

Mr. MacLAREN: What is the tonnage of the steamers that are at present in service?

Mr. ROBB: I stated in reply to the hon. member for East Lambton a moment ago that I have not the figures before me, but I may be able to give them to my hon. friend in committee. I think the tonnage was that provided under the agreement. May I say in passing that this agreement as regards sailings between Canada and the British West Indies does not differ materially from the agreement of 1921.

To the colonies of the western group, with Kingston, Jamaica, as the terminal port, similar passenger, freight and mail services are to be supplied. Refrigeration for 70,000 stems of bananas on the large steamers and for 50,000 on the small ones, and for Canadian perishable products, is to be provided. The colonies served will contribute about $87,600 per year toward the service.

A few moments ago I gave to the House the population of the British West India Islands as approximately 2,200,000. Hon. gentlemen will be interested to know what are really the trade possibilities with those islands, and I have under my hand a brief review of the trade possibilities which I would like to place upon Hansard. In the year 1924, the last year for which the total trade for each of the West India islands is available, Canada's exports to the West India colonies amounted to about $18,000,000. The total imports of these colonies were over $90,000,000. From this it will be seen that Canada enjoys approximately one-fifth of the trade of the West Indies. By the present agreement it is hoped to widen this market.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Could the minister give some idea whether the $18,000,000 worth of imports into the West Indies were of similar nature to the $90,000,000 worth as a total, or in what proportion?

Mr. ROBB: I have not that, but this fact stands out, that in some items which I have already enumerated and which I may come to again, we have a preference that will give us an absolute monopoly of that market. Under no conditions has any other country a greater preference than Canada; we have as great a preference as is given to any other country.

The trade with Canada for the first and last fiscal years under the first agreement, and the trade for the last fiscal year under the second agreement, are as follows:

Imports into Canada from West Indies

Fiscal year
1913	$ 9,864,017
1921	24,130,552
1925	25,016,182

The chief imports were raw sugar, of which in 1925 over $17,000,000 worth was imported, and molasses to the value of $2,600,000. The exports from Canada to the West Indies in the fiscal year 1913 amounted to $4,967,312; in 1921 they totalled $18,187,118 and in 1925 $15,432,455. The greater portion of these goods exported from Canada comprised manufactured products. The chief item was flour. In 1925 the percentage of manufactured products exported by Canada to the West Indies was a trifle over 87 per cent of the total.

I propose now to put on record a statement showing the immense field for trade which the agreement opens up in agricultural commodities. The following figures will show the value of these products imported by the colonies in 1924 from all sources and the proportion supplied by Canada:

	Total Imports of B.W.I.	Exports of Canada to B.W.I.
Flour..	$8,512,278	$5,678,909
Meats..	2,949,992	253,313
Lard and substitutes..	808,626	255,003
Butter..	1,655,291	487,002
Cheese..	370,811	168,803
Condensed milk.. .. .	1,295,231	775,258

The Canadian manufacturers also benefit from the agreement in addition to the general preference ranging from 25 to 50 per cent. There are certain articles such as boots and shoes, confectionery, cordage, prepared cocoa and cement, which enjoy larger special preferences, and the field for expansion of trade in these lines is shown by the following figures—

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Before leaving the last item can the minister give us the total amount of raw sugar imported into Canada from these islands?

Mr. ROBB: I gave that a few moments ago; it will be found on Hansard. The following is a table of certain imports into the British West Indies showing the proportion supplied by Canada:

	Total Imports of B.W.I.	Exports of Canada to B.W.I.
Boots and shoes..	$1,894,374	$217,454
Cement..	772,466	35,291
Apparel..	2,463,383	22,815
Hardware..	1,697,849	98,990
Iron and steel..	2,337,974	99,560
Soap..	1,331,443	37,301

The development of this trade should be helped materially by the improved steamship service. Regular weekly sailings have been agitated for at each investigation and conference that has been held. The great objection has always been that it would not be self-supporting, but in coming to an arrangement as to the tariff preference under the present agreement, due consideration was given to the development of trade in some commodities which hitherto have not been brought into Canada by direct shipment. Let me repeat here that under the agreement it is necessary, in order that the preferences should be secured, that the goods shall enter Canada through or be exported from an ocean or river port of the Dominion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The same as the agreement of 1919.

Mr. ROBB: Bananas under the new agreement are given a preferential treatment. In the past fiscal year out of 2,463,925 bunches of bananas imported into Canada only 7,976 bunches were imported direct from the colonies signing the new trade agreement. It is of interest to note, in view of our cold winter climate, that about 80 per cent of our bananas are imported during the period from April 1 to October 1, so that the greater portion of what we use in central Canada could be brought in in the season of navigation.

I shall place on Hansard a comparative statement of preferences on goods imported into Canada from the British West Indies under the trade agreements of 1912, 1920 and 1925:

I may point out incidentally that in no instance where we have specific duties shall the preference to Canada under these special rates be less than 66⅔ per cent.

The government presents this resolution to parliament in the hope that it will be accepted in the spirit in which it is offered. In no measurable degree does the steamship service differ from the agreement of 1920 whereby we obligated ourselves under solemn treaty to provide certain services. I might as well admit frankly that we never provided those services; we were never able to comply with the provisions. This government and the previous administration made, however, the best arrangement that could possibly have been made to satisfy the requirements of our fellow Britishers of the West Indies. The government has been urged by boards of trade in different parts of the country to give this matter careful consideration, and while I will not tire the House by reading it I may say that I have a letter written to the Minister of Trade and Commerce by a representative of the Montreal Board of Trade dated June 16, 1925, urging us to do practically what we were able to accomplish.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Can the minister tell us what increased subsidies are being paid?

Mr. SPEAKER: May I suggest that the hon. member might ask his questions in committee?

Mr. ROBB: Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, other hon. members may want to ask questions.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I merely want some information in regard to the increased subsidies in order to ascertain what the additional cost to the people of Canada will be as a result of this agreement as compared with the treaty of 1920. In addition to that could the minister place on record or give me some idea of the increased preference to be granted, for instance, on raw sugar coming from that country over what was granted under the treaty of 1920?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. My hon. friend will recall that just a moment ago, with the consent of the House, I placed on Hansard a comparison of the preferences between the trade agreements of 1912, 1920 and 1925.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): And those comparisons will appear?

Mr. ROBB: Yes. With regard to the subsidy, there has been no increase; we are simply following the agreement of 1920-21. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, at the earnest request of the previous government and this government, are continuing the service, but they say they will not carry it on after the tenders are opened, when we shall know who are the lowest tenderers and negotiate with them. It was to meet part of the conditions of the British West Indies agreement of 1920 that we put the vessels of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine on that service.

Mr. HANSON: . Will the minister tell us what the estimated cost of the service will be as contemplated by this agreement—if carried out? Because I understand we have never carried out our previous agreements.

Mr. ROBB: No, we have not.

Mr. HANSON: What is the estimated cost of this service, if the agreement is carried out?

Mr. ROBB: I shall be able to tell my hon. friend early in April when we receive the tenders.

Mr. HANSON: Had the government no idea of what the service would cost when it put its name to a solemn treaty? Or did it do so blindly?

Mr. ROBB: I do not want to insinuate anything, but my hon. friend knows that I cannot make any announcement now. I am looking after the interests of Canada.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, one necessarily approaches any treaty made by this administration with considerable apprehension. They have had the treaty-making mania ever since they came into office, and never seem satisfied if three months are allowed to go by without a new excursion to the Orient or to Australia—always by the longest route—with some kind of treaty brought back as return cargo. Those so far presented in their four years of office have been a succession of unredeemed disasters. The treaty with France, the treaty with Belgium, the treaty with Australia—and fall emphatically into that category. Our trade with each of those countries has been sensibly injured, and in at least two cases very seriously so.

The present is an attempt to negotiate a treaty with the West India Islands. Had one confidence in the judgment and care and in the grasp of Canadian trade conditions of the government of the day, he would naturally welcome the negotiating of a treaty with any of our British dominions, and he would be more disposed to welcome the negotiating of a treaty with those dominions whose trade is complementary to our own, rather than competitive therewith; and of all portions of this empire which could correctly be so described, perhaps the most conspicuous would be the West India Islands. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) is entirely right when he says these islands are producing goods which this country requires but which, on account of climatic and soil conditions, it cannot very well produce. The converse applies: our products the West India people require, and we have a surplus with which to supply them. This no doubt accounts for the fact that over a considerable period of years and throughout a succession of governments efforts have been made to improve trade relations with those islands,—efforts which have continued in progressive degree and, I think it may be said, always with increasing success.

There are other reasons which have induced governments of the past to make these attempts; they are of what one would call an imperial character—if that adjective has not become wholly offensive to some hon. gentlemen of this House. The British West Indies are fellow-citizens of this empire with ourselves; they have been so over a long period of years; they are well thought of within the circle of the empire by all its people; and because of their position, because of their possessions and because of their history, they are entitled to the best of consideration at the hands of the rest of us; and they are able to give us something in return for the consideration we give them. Besides, they occupy a position analogous to no other portion of the empire save ourselves with relation to the United States of America. Their trade necessarily is very much influenced by the neighbourhood of the great republic and by the trade policy of that republic. In a measure, though no part of the United States, they are subservient to America's trade policy. In corresponding measure we are the same. We, it seems to me, have a peculiar obligation with relation to those islands, and it is certainly the part of Canada to do anything within reason to enhance the interest of the people of those islands in the people of the rest of the empire, and particularly in ourselves, to add to the interest they have in our trade, to bring them, as it were, more and more within the circuit of Canadian and imperial trade rather than of American. That a like feeling prevails in the West Indies, there is no question whatever. Indeed, they view the tendency of recent times and the trade ambitions of the United States with very serious apprehensions. Their desire is to become more and more closely united with us and other citizens of the British Empire; and they look to us particularly, as the foremost of British dominions and the one closest to themselves, their great British neighbour on this continent, to extend to them the best trade facilities within our power.

All these considerations have had weight with administrations of the past, and they had very great weight in determining the course pursued by the late government in negotiating the treaty of 1920. That treaty has been reviewed by the Minister of Finance in his short address this afternoon. I was not one of the administration who had to do directly with the negotiation of the treaty, with its terms I am not so familiar as would be other hon. members of this House, but I have generally a fairly accurate knowledge of them. Under that treaty we secured trade preferences with the most important West India Islands of 25 to 50 per cent, that being the preference given us on their general tariff. We in turn gave them preferences equally great—indeed, greater still if I caught the words of the Minister of Finance aright when he stated that in our preferences to the West Indies the minimum was 50 per cent. We also agreed to extend to them certain steamship services, to the western group as well as to the eastern group, without which the preferences would be of little avail. This treaty has been in operation for some four years, or somewhat less than four years at the time the new treaty was made; I am not certain of the date at which it went into effect. The Minister of Finance is right in saying that as far as Canada is concerned it was ratified by this House in May, 1921, and I think the order in council supplementary to the ratification was passed, according to his words, in June. The minister is not able to say at what time it was ratified by the West Indies, but if my recollection is right the complete engagement did not take effect until some time later. Consequently the treaty was scarcely in operation at all under the late government. We were engaged in an election campaign for the last three or four months of the term of the government, and the attention which would otherwise have been given these matters of course could not be applied.

It seems that the terms of that treaty have not been wholly lived up to on the part of Canada. I was sorry indeed to learn that Canada had to make admission of having failed to live up to the terms of a solemn engagement. I do not know just what was done in the last few months of the late administration after the treaty went into effect, nor just how brief a period then elapsed, but I do know that no complaint was ever brought to my attention of any failure to live up to the terms of our contract. I am just informed by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) that one of the principal islands, Jamaica, if not others, did not come into the treaty at all until some time after we went out of office. Certainly there was no conscious failure to live up to the treaty during the term of office of the last administration. I do not know just what the difficulties have been; I would like to have heard them further explained. The minister said in his remarks that both governments did the best they could. I fancy the obligation chiefly or wholly fell upon our successors in office, but why it was they could not do what we had engaged to do, I do not know. Certainly it is no credit to this country that we have to stand now, four years later, and say—especially with relation to a treaty with our brothers of the West Indies—that we have failed to comply with the terms of an engagement made with them.

Though this has to be admitted, certain good results have accrued. Undoubtedly our trade has expanded. I do not say it is not capable of further expansion, but I must be pardoned if I express the fear that we cannot look for quite so much as the Minister of Finance expressed as his hope this afternoon. I am inclined to think that we are a lot nearer the maximum of our exports of the various articles which he recites in chief as Canadian products going to the West Indies, than he imagines. I think indeed that in some of them we have nearly a monopoly of those products which the people of the islands really consume. There are, besides white people, many blacks in those islands, and in some of the lines covered by the treaty they do not purchase the character of goods which we have for export. However, there will be room for some expansion, and I earnestly hope the terms of the treaty will prove such that expansion may take place.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The picture painted by the Minister of Finance as to the enhancement of our exports to the West Indies was, I think, somewhat rosy. In respect of flour I doubt if there is very much room for further expansion. The qualities of flour used there in so far as they are of the nature of the article that we produce at all are practically wholly bought from this country now. The same applies to lumber and many other things embraced in the treaty.

Coming to the other side of the trade feature, the imports from the West Indies, I hope there is more room for the optimism of the minister in that direction. As respects the great product of the larger dominions, bananas, it is true that notwithstanding the fact that under the old treaty the reduced tariff was open only to goods entering our ports, the great bulk, in fact the almost overwhelming proportion, came through the United States. I am not so sure that this treaty is going to effect so great a change. There are a great many factors entering into that situation, factors that will not be removed by the treaty at all and which will still militate against direct shipment. However, if the treaty does anything in that respect it will do a service to this country.

I am apprehensive of the loss of revenue from reductions made, especially on sugar. The minister did not give us any idea of what he expected there. We are reducing our tariff on sugar, we are not increasing it as respects other countries, and I think the minister will find that he or probably his successor. will have to do without something approaching a million a year. That is a large sum of money. Similar remarks would apply to other features of our imports. However, I believe in the principle of giving to our Dominion, and especially giving to them in return for consideration given us, a preference over every country in the world in respect of articles consumed in Canada. That is what we have to give, that is what we ought to give, that is what we can give without militating against Canadian production; and for my part I would be slow to criticize treaties because of any vulnerable feature from that standpoint. If, however, the treaty went to the impairment of Canadian production then it would take certainly a multitude of virtues to cover a sin in that respect.

As to the service features, I referred to them only briefly before six o'clock. I cannot understand why the minister is not able to give the House a rough estimate of what the new service features are to cost this country. In reply to a very direct question he said he could not do so for some time. Surely the government has not entered into a contract involving very large commitments, commitments which doubtless will run into millions, and yet is unable to give the House at least an estimate of what the aggregate is to be. I know there are very grave fears expressed in some quarters, where the opinion should be the most intelligent, that these commitments are serious. Indeed, the commitments we made in respect of service under the treaty of 1920 evidently proved so onerous that this government could not comply with them. I am still not wholly clear as to why the compliance did not take place, but I am inclined to think that the government found itself unable to make compliance save by an extension of the service of the Canadian merchant marine.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have made such a tremendous bogy of the merchant marine before the electors—in which possibly they were joined by the Saskatchewan colony, I do not know—but they have so condemned it and ridiculed it from end to end of Canada that notwithstanding the recommendations made to them for its extension in the West India service they did not do it, but rather put themselves in the position where they have to come to parliament and admit they have failed to comply with a solemn contract made on behalf of Canada. I think there was difficulty in living up to our engagements at the service in the treaty of 1920. How is it going to be easier to live up to far greater engagements? In this treaty without a doubt they are more serious. The minister knows they are more serious—especially as to one of these groups they are far more serious—and as a result this government will have to pay out very large sums of money indeed in subsidies, or they will have to extend the merchant marine service. I know they are in a quandary as to which they will do. I know they find difficulties both ways, difficulties they created very largely for themselves by spurious political propaganda. But anyway, though these commitments may be serious too, I am disposed to sympathetically view the whole situation as to this treaty. I believe it has very important significance from an empire standpoint. Hon. gentlemen have often ridiculed this idea. I do not mean those very close to me, but hon. gentlemen at other angles of this House have often ridiculed the idea that trade has anything to do with nationality, that trade relations necessarily involve political relations. I want just to suggest this thought to hon. members of this House; it is just because trade has a lot to do with nationality, it is just because trade relations are bound up with political relations, that this treaty comes before this parliament at this time. It is because of the importance of this treaty to national and political relations with the West India islands that it appeals most strongly and will appeal most strongly to hon. members of this House.

I believe, indeed, the government would do themselves credit to admit that this factor of the situation had very much to do with the whole matter of the negotiation of the treaty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It did.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am glad to hear that from the Prime Minister. It is creditable to the government that it had so to do with the negotiation of the treaty; but I want to know why it is that the trade relations of the West Indies with the United States are inseparably and inexplicably involved with their political relations with that country, and the trade relations of Canada with the United States have nothing whatever to do with the political relations of Canada with the United States. I am glad that the light has come in, even though it had to come from the far off West Indies to reach the mind of the government in this regard.

So I say, reserving certain criticism which would be more appropriately addressed to the government in committee, and reserving the right of course to make suggestions with relation to it—and I have in mind one especially as respects the sugar refining industry of British Columbia—I am disposed to welcome the advent to this parliament of any effort to tie more closely our brothers of the West Indies to ourselves in any trade treaty.

Mr. W. K. BALDWIN (Stanstead): This is a very interesting subject to me, and has been very interesting since the close of the Great war. From November 11, 1918, when the Armistice was signed, I conceived the idea that Canada should have some territorial rights in a tropical or semi-tropical country, to produce the things that we need, so as to assist in repaying us for the great expense to which this country was subjected in our efforts to win the world war. Coming to this House shortly afterwards I found that the champion of the development of West Indian trade was F. H. Keefer; I forget what portfolio he held. He had been down to the West Indies on a trip, and I approached him in order to get some information. I found that the ideas which Canadians generally had on this subject were absolutely wrong. On Armistice day I was called upon to make a speech in my county and in my remarks I stated that Canada should have territorial rights in some tropical country. A very well-informed man whom I met at lunch that day said, "What do we want of 15,000,000 niggers?" On coming here I went to the library and found that the population of the West Indies was about one-third English, one-third French and one-third Spanish, the total less than 3,000,000. Mr. Keefer was very much interested, and was pleased to get even one person to raise his voice in this House in favour of commercial union. I am a political unionist.

Mr. O'NEILL: What is the name of the minister?

Mr. BALDWIN: Frank H. Keefer, a member of this House under the ministry of the Borden government. I obtained information which I had never received before. I got information from Harry Crow, who had a long and extended acquaintance with the British West Indies. He was a political unionist and favoured a commercial union between Great Britain, the Crown colonies and the dominions of the West Indies. When we speak of the West Indies we must remember that there are innumerable islands, the Leeward, the Windward and a multitude of other islands, and their possibilities of production are tremendous.

I have been watching the great American republic to the south of us for many years, and I have observed that through their diplomacy and their methods of conducting affairs they have acquired great territories that will produce tropical and semi-tropical products. Here we have a country in Canada covering one-half of the North American continent, without one inch capable of producing tropical or semi-tropical products. It appears to me very desirable that we should obtain a footing in the West Indies. Mr. Crow spent a great deal of time and a fortune in advancing ideas of political union.

Mr. Macaulay of the Sun Life had made many trips to the British West Indies in connection with his great company, and he maintains that commercial union is very much needed. Whether a continuous agreement or any agreement that would be never ending were made, would be immaterial; but let us see how much we need their produce and how much they need ours. We require in this country all the products which they produce. It is within the realm of possibility that they will learn to produce rubber in British Guiana and British Honduras, and that they will produce cotton and everything in that line that we will require. What a splendid chance for Canada in this line. The people of the West Indies, in the development of these islands, require the manufactured goods we produce in Canada, and they need the natural products of this country. Mr. Keefer was sent down there by the Borden government, and Sir George Foster has made many trips to that country investigating conditions. I dislike to suggest what I might possibly think—that the opposition were not able to conclude trade relations or to negotiate favoured nation agreements, and they are simply not pleased that this government has about consummated what they worked for years and years to accomplish and failed.

Mr. HANSON: My hon. friend is wrong.

Mr. BALDWIN: Why am I wrong? Pray tell me.

Mr. BENNETT: Did they not make some treaties with the West Indies?

Mr. BALDWIN: Yes but those treaties availed very little indeed.

Our Maritime provinces are crying for Maritime rights. Now if we can get a market for the products of the east and the west of Canada by giving to the West Indies a market for their produce, will that not be beneficial to the Maritime provinces? In Halifax they have great storehouses where they could store these products and a splendid trade could be built up.

I believe that Canada is going to make rapid progress; the population will in a few years be much greater than it is to-day. If we can get a market for our manufactured products, our condensed milk and dairy products in the West Indies, it would be a great thing; our trade would grow and grow and it would make us independent of other countries. It would also furnish traffic for our railways and our steamships. There is nothing selfish about this. The provinces of British Columbia and Alberta will send their fruit out to the Pacific ocean and it will be shipped through the Panama canal to the West Indies. So that there is no part of Canada that will not be benefited; all the products of the different provinces will be shipped by rail and water. There is no reason therefore, why this agreement should not be consummated. As to the bugaboo that many features of this treaty are unfavourable to this country, when we think of those far distant lands of Australia and New Zealand away down on the rim of the world, why should we be afraid of their products that will take seven or eight weeks to reach Canada, when the great markets of the world are much nearer to us than to them.

A great deal has been said about butter. A few weeks ago some members of the opposition, speaking in the House, were making it almost a point that the farmers of this country were going to be destroyed owing to importations of butter. Butter has been advancing in price, and I believe the poor people of this country must be eating their bread dry at the present time because butter at the lowest price is costing forty-seven cents a pound and none can be procured for less. I do not think it would be a crime if the great consuming public of Canada could get butter for a little while at a lower price, and surely our farmers are receiving a price with which they are quite satisfied.

Under this favoured-nation treaty that is being made with the British West Indies, our butter, cheese, condensed milk, flour and vast quantities of manufactured goods can be exported into those colonies under a preference that will give us almost a monopoly. Who for one moment could think that would not be a great advantage to Canada? On the contrary let me tell the House a few things that transpired during the late Conservative regime. We were importing $100,000,000 worth of fruits principally from the United Fruit Company, a great octopus company in the United States At that particular time they were paying for the goods in the West Indies when the dollar was about equal to sixty cents, and they were re-selling them to Canada making from 12 to 20 per cent of a discount on the Canadian dollar In other words, for the $100,000,000 worth of fruit that was imported from the British West Indies this company was making a profit of over $50,000,000. If we look at the matter from any point of view it makes a Canadian look small.

I wish Canadians when going to a sunny clime would travel via Halifax and boat to the British West Indies although if they want to go by way of the United States, the trip will be a shorter one. But let them visit the British West Indies and learn of our brothers there. One important thing we can learn from them is that they speak better English than we do. I noticed last spring even as regards the coloured members of the delegation which came here from the British West Indies, their dialect was such that they spoke perfect English. There is no place on the American continent where they speak as good English as in the state of Virginia where the old colonial English are now kept intact and they send their sons and daughters back to England to be educated. It almost makes me ashamed to speak to those people. It would be a much shorter trip to visit the British West Indies than to go to California. We should learn from those people in the British West Indies and they could learn from us. We could consummate trade with them; we would have much better enjoyment for less money and we would come to a fuller realization of the greatness of the British Empire. Should political union come, which I am very much interested in, I do not know that they would send members to this House of Commons, but they might send members to the Senate. They could be represented in this parliament in some way, and I have no fear that a population of around three million could ever dominate this great country.

Notwithstanding all the drawbacks we may have had in the past few years, we are going to make great progress in Canada. The United States is being filled up; its lands are being held now at almost fabulous prices; they are dyking back the seas and making land costing over a thousand dollars an acre. They are constructing roads up the highest mountains and over the deserts, but they cannot continue in that way so that people will come to our great country, and develop our great resources in agriculture, forests, fisheries and perhaps the greatest wealth of all, our mines. The people of the British West Indies will be great consumers for our fisheries, and from every point of view there need be no parochial thought about this. As I have said the extreme western part of Canada produces beautiful apples, and I do not know but the time may come when they can raise figs, as I hope they will be able to do although at present they are importing them from California. But notwithstanding all that, in order to keep a healthy body we must eat green things; we need fruits that we cannot raise in Canada, but that can be produced by the cheap labour in the British West Indies and brought here by boat to nourish our bodies.

From every point of view there is not the least doubt that the consummation of this treaty will be of great benefit to Canada and of as great benefit to the people of the British West Indies. As it is dull to listen to a member talking extemporaneously on this matter after hearing the Minister of Finance—and after all others will follow me who will give exact figures—I will not make any further remarks with regard to this question which is very dear to my heart.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, I find myself in accord with the principle of this resolution, and I should like to say a few words about it before it goes to the committee. Everyone knows I stand first for Canadian interests, and I believe in giving as much work as we possibly can to our own people. I do not want any treaty that is going to reduce work in Canada. At the same time I am one of those who believe firmly that our British commonwealth of nations can be made self-sustaining. We know that we can produce within the commonwealth everything that we require either for our comfort or for the safety of the empire. This was demonstrated beyond any question in the war when our supplies from foreign sources were cut off and we were obliged to produce more food and to make munitions and other necessary equipment for the safety of ourselves and of the British Isles. At that time the people of the British Empire enormously increased their production and proved to the world that they could produce everything that was required within the commonwealth. Why should we not take every step we can to make that condition permanent?

The United States has attained its present great strength as a result of the pursuit of just such a policy: she trades within herself and her home market is the one that is of value to her. We in Canada have also a home market but we can at the same time create within the whole empire a home market on a larger scale, a British home market. I say therefore that it is the duty, as it would be to the advantage, of every part of this commonwealth of nations to adopt the principle of buying from sister nations what the people at home cannot produce for themselves. That, as I say, is the policy that has produced such excellent results in the United States and it is equally the policy that can make a success of the British commonwealth of nations. To bring this about we must trade with one another to as large an extent as possible and this treaty is to my mind a distinct step in that direction.

I was sorry indeed to hear the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Baldwin) bringing party issues into the discussion to-night, for one of the things in regard to this treaty that pleases me most is the continuity of policy which has characterized one government after another in Canada. This has been so for years, and I am firmly of the opinion that in regard to all questions of foreign policy, including relations between different parts of the empire, there should be a continuity of policy. None of these questions should be discussed from the party point of view. In the case of this treaty hon. gentlemen opposite have followed in our steps, just as we endeavoured to follow in the steps of those who went before us, in order to bring about favourable relations with the British Islands and the West Indies.

Years ago I was much interested in this question, having for a considerable period at various times administered the Department of Trade and Commerce. While in that position I learned a good deal about this interesting problem. The products raised in the West Indies are complementary to those that we produce in this country, and are in no way competitive with them. It is true we buy a lot of these things from the United States, and that is one practice I should like to see put an end to. I earnestly hope therefore that this steamship service which is about to be arranged for will have the effect of increasing our imports of these commodities from the British West Indies rather than from the United States. We in Canada need a good deal of the products of the tropics, and it is only natural that we should buy them from British countries. The British West Indies, embracing such islands as Bermuda, as well as British Guiana on the mainland and British Honduras, are all friendly to us, and while we require the things they produce they on the other hand need the products that we raise in this northern zone. Now those islands are all contiguous to the United States. At any rate they are nearer to the United States than to us, and I for one hope that we shall do everything we possibly can to keep them British. We should do our share in that direction, and I consider that this treaty has that tendency.

As the United States is a very strong magnet to these islands, we must, as the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) has said, develop inter-imperial trade if we are to preserve our British sentiment, as no doubt we all desire to do. Several prominent men in Canada have for years taken a great interest in this question. I have had conversations with many of them at various times in London when the matter has been fully discussed. I may say that they welcome the treaty as a fulfilment of some of their wishes. While I am on this subject I may observe that we were all very pleased to see the delegates from the islands and from Demerara. Personally I found them men of ability and of broad views who could understand our Canadian conditions and problems, and they showed themselves in every way friendly to us and our ideas. I very much hope that we shall see them frequently.

I am not very familiar with the details of this resolution, but we naturally expect that this government will have made some mistakes in the matter. It would be very extraordinary if they did not. At the same time, however, we trust that they have not injured any of our Canadian industries in arranging the details of the agreement. The items of the treaty will of course be discussed in committee, but I just want to refer in passing to the matter of the steamship service. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) does not feel disposed to tell us how much the service is likely to cost, and I take it that he does not wish to disclose that in advance of receiving tenders for the service, but I am very much afraid that it will be a costly piece of business. All we can hope is that the traffic between this country and the West Indies will be so developed that the expense we shall incur may be justified. At any rate I want to say at this juncture that I am in favour of the principle of the treaty, for the reason that it will help to develop trade between the various nations and sections of the British commonwealth, and thus be another step in the direction of making that commonwealth self-sustaining.

[Sir George Perley.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I had not intended taking part in the discussion but I feel that this is an occasion on which it should be made apparent to the country that happily, for once, both opposition and government seem to be in entire accord on a great principle which we all have very much at heart, namely, the principle of developing as far as possible, by means of trade and in other ways, the relations that bind together the different parts of the British empire.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) said he was pleased that the government appeared to have received more light in the matter of treaty relations within the empire than it had previously had. I am afraid my right hon. friend has forgotten his own speeches in the Maritime provinces made so recently as a few months ago. This treaty was negotiated last summer by members of the government who at that time met delegates from the British West Indies. The conference was held in Ottawa, and as a result a treaty was signed which was subsequently printed and distributed to the press in all parts of the Dominion. The government felt that it had not only rendered a definite service to Canadian trade, but also the kind of service to which hon. gentlemen opposite have alluded to-night, namely that of helping to bind more closely together, through the agency of trade, different parts of the British empire. What was our amazement when we discovered that my right hon. friend in the course of his speeches in the Maritime provinces was declaring that so far as he was aware there was no such thing as a treaty even negotiated! He nevertheless condemned the treaty very strongly. He shakes his head now, but he has forgotten what he then said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I have not forgotten a word. I know what I said at that time. I said no such thing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will he tell us what he did say?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly. I said I had never seen a copy of the treaty, and that I would not take any position for or against it until I had seen it. Whatever criticism I might have of it, I would not give judgment upon it until I had seen the treaty.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: All I can say. Mr. Speaker, is that after the profession my right hon. friend has just made about desiring to further trade within the empire, it is extraordinary that he should now have to confess to the House that he went into a political campaign and criticized the administration on a treaty designed for the very purpose of closer trade relations within the empire, a treaty which he also said that he had never even seen! I was going to remind him of the fact that the statements he made throughout the Maritime provinces when he was campaigning there in the fall were first of all, as I understood, condemnatory of the treaty. However, I will take his word for it now that what he then said was not condemnatory, but was simply that he had not seen a copy of the treaty. I know he made that statement because I had him presented with a copy of the treaty myself. We happened both to be in the vicinity of Sussex, New Brunswick, the day after my right hon. friend asserted that he had not seen the treaty and that it was non-existent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He did not say that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I sent him a copy of the treaty with my compliments. That evening he undertook to discuss the treaty at a meeting in Sussex, and he then condemned it. I have reports of his speech and the impression it created throughout the Maritime provinces was that the treaty was a mistake, that the government had done something that was wrong, and that this was one thing more for which fault should be found with the administration. Well, I am quite prepared to forgive my right hon. friend. I am glad he has seen the light; but I do not want him to come and tell this House and the country that the government has seen the light, when he himself was in such total darkness as not even to have had any knowledge of the treaty itself, if not also of its terms.

My hon. friend from Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) has referred to the importance of linking together the different parts of the empire in matters of trade. May I say, Sir, that that is something which this government has had at heart not only with respect to this treaty, but also with respect to another treaty which some of his friends have condemned rather strongly, namely, the treaty with the great dominion of Australia. That treaty was also negotiated by this administration with the same belief that it was desirable to seek to bring about a closer bond of union between different parts of the empire.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: May I suggest to the right hon. gentleman that that is a very different matter, because that treaty in many cases takes away work from our own people.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not quite follow my hon. friend's point of view. As I understood, he wants to develop closer relations within the empire by trade. Australia is at one side of the globe and our Dominion is at the other. It is a vast range over which competition is taking place, and it is an extraordinary thing if this Dominion within its own boundaries cannot hold its own in competition with Australia. However, supposing it were true, which I do not admit, that the treaty did take away a certain amount of work from our people as my hon. friend suggests, I ask him: would he not feel that what might be gained by further strengthening the empire in many other respects would be fully equal to so small a sacrifice of a material character? If he is really sincere in his talk of empire unity and solidarity, he must, if need be, be prepared to make some little material sacrifice for it. If he is not, I may tell him that the present administration is so prepared to do, and we have so viewed these questions.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, I hope that what has been done in this treaty by way of furthering, as we trust, closer relations between the British West Indies and Canada may be extended to include possibly another British dominion in this western hemisphere. In addition to the West Indies there is the island colony of Newfoundland, which is a near neighbour of this country. I think something might be made of the fact that we have in this western hemisphere what may well be known as a British North America, composed of Canada, Newfoundland and the islands of the Atlantic generally classed as the British West Indies. It should be the aim and purpose of all of us who have at heart the interests of our own Dominion and the larger interests of the British Empire to seek to develop to the fullest possible extent that British North America in relations of trade, in relations of commerce and communication and in relations to friendship. I believe this treaty will go far towards developing trade with the West Indies. I believe it will do more than that. I believe the contacts it will lead to between the peoples of the West Indies and the people of our Dominion will be mutually helpful in directions that possibly very few of us at this moment can foresee. Certainly the meeting of the delegates here created the impression to which the hon. member for Argenteuil has alluded, namely that they cordially welcomed the closer relationships that were likely to grow out of this treaty.

In addition to trade, there is developing between the British West Indies and Canada an important tourist traffic. The two countries are the complements of each other; one is in the temperate zone, the other in the tropical; and it is the natural thing that at particular seasons the people of the British West Indies should look to Canada as the part of the empire to which they would be glad to come, and that we should look with equal desire upon the British West Indies as a part of the empire which our citizens will find it easy to visit and become acquainted with. This treaty as it has been drafted has had in mind not merely the purposes of trade but also of travel, and part of the money which has to go for subsidy purposes will be spent in increasing the facilities for travel between the British West Indies and this country.

Once again, Sir, may I say what a pleasure and satisfaction it is to discover that at least on one measure both sides of this House appear to be united,—a measure which has bearings that are much larger than those of mere nationality, bearings that concern vitally the interests of the great empire of which we are a part.

Mr. STEVENS: May I ask the Prime Minister if the different items of this treaty will come under consideration in committee of the Whole? I have not been able to be in the House during all the discussion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I merely want to ask the Prime Minister a question. He referred to a number of other countries that were likely to be benefited by this treaty. Would he be good enough to give us the names of those different countries? I am sure the information would be appreciated by the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING. I think my hon. friend must have misunderstood my remarks. I said there were different countries that composed what I termed a British North America, including Newfoundland, the islands of the British West Indies and some other islands, and of course our Dominion. I was there referring to something that I hoped this treaty might lead to—a further development of trade in directions which are not included in it at the present moment, but which may come to be included later on.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I understood that the preferential clauses in this treaty would be extended to other countries outside of the British West Indies.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is a treaty with the West Indies.

Mr. W. A. BLACK (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, in making a few remarks with regard to this treaty I do not wish it to be understood that I am strongly opposed to any treaties that will lead to the development of Canadian trade. The object of all Canadian governments should be to increase our trade as far as possible, always having in view the economic position of this country, the cost of such extension, and the operation of such treaties. This West India treaty I think has some defects. In the first place, it was negotiated by representatives of Canada who never had been closely identified with the West Indies, and who had very little knowledge of West India trade and West India conditions, and that was done notwithstanding the fact that representations were made to the Department of Trade and Commerce at the time suggesting that in the interests of Canada the committee that dealt with this matter should contain some representatives who had a knowledge of the West India trade. Not only that, but the department was asked to have a conference with merchants and others who had been brought up in that trade and had been familiar with it from boyhood, having carried it on and been in close touch with it in some cases for forty or fifty years. But even this suggestion was not accepted, and, as I said before, the gentlemen composing that committee were wholly without practical knowledge of the West India trade.

I think that the treaty is faulty in many respects. When this matter was first brought up in the House last year by the then member for Cumberland, he painted a very glowing picture of the trade possibilities with the West Indies, running into millions indeed, I believe, almost hundreds of millions, of dollars' worth of trade which he thought might be done between Canada and our West India neighbours. As a matter of fact Canada to-day is receiving from the West Indian islands about all of their products that they can supply to this country; I am speaking now altogether of the eastern group of the West Indies, or what is generally known as the Windward islands group. Those islands produce four articles in quantity: sugar, molasses, lime juice and cocoa.

An hon. MEMBER: What about rum?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): They do not produce very much rum. There is some rum coming from Demerara, but I may tell you that it is of rather an inferior quality. The four articles I have mentioned are the chief articles produced in those islands.

Taking first, sugar, Canada is now receiving from the West Indies all the sugar she requires. If she required more, the present subsidized steamship service is quite capable of carrying more freight, because on an average voyage of the steamers of the Royal Mail Steamship Company the cargo carried averages only from 65 to 67 per cent of the total carrying capacity. So that if more sugar is required in Canada from the West Indies, the tonnage is there to carry it; but it is not required.

Molasses is in the same position as sugar. We get from the eastern group of the West Indies all the molasses that Canada needs, and no increased service is going to increase that trade.

So far as cocoa is concerned, a few years ago, when I was looking around to increase our trade with the West Indies and increase the freight cargoes for our boats, I remember interviewing Cowan's, a large cocoa concern in Toronto, and urging them to get more of the West India cocoa for use in their manufactures, and the reply I got—and the same thing applies I believe to Moir's of Halifax, a very large chocolate manufacturing concern there—was that in order to obtain the best quality of chocolate they had to mix the cocoa beans they got from the West Indies with the products of other countries, otherwise they would not get the best results. So I doubt very much if there can be any increase in the importation of cocoa, and even though there was a possibility of that, the quantity used in this country is very small indeed compared with the capacity of the steamers that even now are running on that route.

I do not think it is worth while spending very much time over lime juice, for the consumption is very small in this country. It is certainly small in Nova Scotia, even under prohibition. So I do not look forward to any great increase in our imports from the West Indies.

With regard to exports, we are to-day supplying the West Indies with all the chief articles which they require. Of flour, for instance, the eastern group take from Canada about 98 per cent of their total flour requirements. They also take from this country the greatest proportion of their imports of mill feeds, although they do not keep very many horses or any other animals down there, and therefore the sale of these articles is not very great; but what they do take of flour and mill feeds they get very largely from Canada. The lumber they require is supplied chiefly from our provinces, and there can be no increased business in that article. Furthermore, lumber is an article which is carried at a low rate of freight on sailing vessels; it is not and will not be transported by steamer. The few sample lots of Douglas fir that have been sent to the West Indies have been favourably received, but of course there is no possibility of shipping that article from Atlantic ports.

In connection with this treaty it must be borne in mind that Great Britain is in precisely the same position as Canada with regard to the preference, and the articles which Great Britain at the present time is sending to the West Indies will continue to go there, I take it, under the same conditions that they would go if shipped to Canada, and these articles are largely those imported by Canada herself from Great Britain. In view of what I said, and perhaps I have not gone as fully into the matter as I should have, I do not see the possibility of any very great increased trade—nothing to warrant the expensive steamers and the frequent sailings it is proposed to put on.

Cold storage is provided for in the treaty. There is not very much involved in that provision. I think the only islands that would make use of cold storage would be the larger ones, Barbados and Trinidad, and then Georgetown, Demerara, on the mainland. These islands and the mainland are farming countries. They have what they call their "penns"—in other words, farms—and they produce a great many of the products that might go out in cold storage. But on the return trip, I do not know what would be placed in cold storage, because the Windward islands and the mainland—the mainland especially—produce nothing but sugar and molasses. The islands are not adapted for the growing of fruit, and therefore there would be no fruit to fill that cold storage capacity. Even if there were bananas to come back, or fruit of any kind, the space necessary for them would be insignificant if there was any trade northward in fruit or other things that might require cold storage. So I do not look upon cold storage for the eastern group, the Windward islands, as of any great advantage.

With respect to the limited markets down there for anything outside of fish, and so on, that we are sending to them at the present time—and I do not know that we are sending very much fish, but I will touch upon that feature of the subject in a moment—I should like to quote from the Commercial Intelligence Journal published by the Department of Trade and Commerce. The Trade Commissioner at Trinidad, as reported in that publication, says:

> A considerable proportion of the imports are made up of such staple articles as flour, rice, lard compound, butter (largely cooking butter), pickled meat and cotton piece goods.

Now, we have no pickled meat to send there; we get our own across the American border. We have no cotton piece goods to send there. Flour is going there. We do not grow rice. Lard goes in limited quantities. So that these articles would form but a very small proportion of any steamer cargo.

> For other lines, which are only purchased by people in comfortable circumstances, the figures are small, and in some instances exceedingly so. Take, for example, Trinidad.

Trinidad is one of the largest and probably the most prosperous of the eastern group.

> Such prime necessities as flour, rice, lard compound, butter (largely cooking butter), pickled meat and cotton piece goods were imported in 1923 to the value of £1,118,000. On the other hand imports of such articles as apparel, boots and shoes, electrical apparatus, and musical instruments—used only by the well-to-do—were respectively: £63,211, £67,664, £16,128, and £7,746. A similar analysis of the trade of the smaller islands would show that the imports of such products are still larger in proportion to the total trade. The British West Indies furnish a fair market for certain staples, but outside of that the purchasing power is limited. For some commodities the total imports for all the colonies mentioned would compare with the trade of a large city in Canada but for others they probably would not equal that of a city with a population of fifty thousand, certainly not one of a hundred thousand. At the top of the list there will be such a commodity as flour, and at the bottom jewelry and electrical appliances, or in fact any articles that are used by persons with a fair standard of living. Of the total population of about 1,093,000 a very large proportion are labourers who work on the cocoa, sugar, cocoanut, and cotton estates, and only earn from about forty to eighty cents per day. Their purchasing power cannot be large and must be confined to the absolute necessaries of life. There are very few wealthy people in this portion of the British Indies, consequently Canadian manufacturers in estimating the value of the trade for the principal products manufactured by them must keep that fact in mind.

[Mr. W. A. Black.]

Surely that is a warning. Then he says further with regard to British Guiana:

> Statistics relating to the import trade of British Guiana during the first nine months of the present year show that goods from the United Kingdom accounted for nearly half the value of the merchandise, etc., imported. The total value of the imports was $8,124,365, and of this abount $3,984,432 represented the share of the United Kingdom, $1,974,033 that of Canada, and $452,859 that of other British possessions. The United States did business to the extent of $1,375,599, and the purchases of the colony from other foreign countries amounted to $337,442.

That, I think, supports what I say, that there is not such a large field down there outside of the articles I have mentioned.

Then in connection with sugar it is proposed—notwithstanding the fact that Canada is buying from the West Indies and Jamaica all the sugar that she requires from these islands—to reduce the duty and give a further preference, which will cost this country, based on the figures for 1924, about $650,000. That is a contribution, of course, towards trade with the West Indies, but the question naturally arises: who is going to get the benefit of that amount? I venture to say, from what I know of the West Indian dealer, that the consumer of Canada will not get that benefit. I say that this reduction will not increase the imports from the West Indies, although a great many people are of the opinion that it will. However, if it will increase those imports, what effect is that going to have upon the sugar beet growing industry in Canada? I understand that a new beet root sugar factory is now being established in Canada. If the duty is made so light on the West India sugars, will it not seriously affect the sugar beet growing industry in Ontario and other parts of the Dominion?

In regard to boots and shoes, the coloured people in the West Indies, who form nine-tenths or more of the population, wear very few boots and shoes. They wear a "sneaker", just as they wear a jumper, generally of blue cotton, what we might call an overall; so that the exportation of such boots and shoes as Canada produces would be very limited indeed.

The portion of the treaty to which I take exception is the connecting of the steamship service with it. I first of all think it is not the duty of the government to enter into competition with private interests in operating public services. The experience of the government with the merchant marine should be a sufficient warning to them not to embark on any further steamship enterprises. We have had statements from year to year, and we know the result of the operating of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. Without any allowance whatsoever for depreciation and interest, which would be taken into account by any business concern, the operating loss alone, according to the last report, I think, was nearly a million and a half. If you add to the value of the ships for interest and depreciation ten per cent, which would be very small indeed, especially considering the age of the steamers, you will have the loss anywhere from five to six or seven million dollars annually, and the taxpayers of this country are called upon to make good that loss year by year. Not only that, but during the last two years a number of the Canadian government steamers have been sold. Ships costing $1,000,000 have been sold for $50,000. Ships costing $800,000 or $900,000 have been sold for $40,000; so that on that basis, the closing up of the accounts of the merchant marine would cost the country somewhere about $100,000,000 or probably more. The operation of these government boats for a few years will cost this country many millions, and if their operation is continued they will add in ten years a further substantial amount to the loss, because year by year the ships are depreciating in value, and presently they will be of little or no value. The operation cannot result otherwise than in a loss, in view of the present condition of the shipping trade throughout the world, and it is only a government that can continue to carry on a business of that kind with such heavy losses. No private corporation, firm or individual would for a moment attempt to continue operating their vessels at such a loss. As a matter of fact the newer and more modern ships owned by people in the Old Country are tied up at the wharf, in preference to operating at the serious loss which they would suffer if operated.

In reference to Canada still further engaging in government ownership, I do not think it is a business proposition that this treaty should have been signed and completed without the government knowing the probable loss or the probable cost of operating the steamers. The hon. Minister of Finance—and I think he represents Trade and Commerce as well— has been asked if any estimate was made, and if the department has any idea whatever of the cost of providing the ships, and he has not yet told us that an estimate was made. Every move of the department or the government has pointed toward the operation of these services by the government. Everything that has been done has been in that direction, and I for one think it a jump in the dark if the department entered into that treaty without knowing something about the cost that would fall upon Canada in carrying it out. It is unusual for a treaty of this kind to be coupled up with steamship services. I cannot see why when these gentlemen from the West Indies were here, they got everything they wanted. One legal gentleman on the committee said, "Well the best we could do was to provide them with steamship service, and therefore we did it."

In my judgment, the cost of those services, if they are provided by the government, will run into about $10,000,000 of capital There will be an annual loss on operation of at least two and a quarter millions, exclusive of interest or depreciation; indeed the figures are likely to be larger than that rather than smaller. With conditions such as they are in this country at the present time; with the people burdened with taxation, I do not see how this government can justify such an expenditure as will fall upon the country if this service is provided and operated by the government.

Although Nova Scotia has the advantage of fishing banks and grounds near its shores and we produce very large quantities of fish, we do not supply the West Indies with nearly as much fish as is consumed there. The West Indies get large quantities of fish from their own waters. In that connection I should like to read this extract from the report of the conference with the West India delegates. The vice-chairman is questioning Mr. Leacock, a delegate from Barbados:

The Vice-Chairman: Your suggestion is that the preference given now is sufficient?

Mr. Leacock: Yes, as far as we are concerned.

Mr. Leacock says further on:

Mr. Snowball has referred to the item of salted cod-fish from the point of view of the Barbados. I would not like the conference to be under any misapprehension in that regard. Practically our entire trade of salted cod-fish is done with Newfoundland. In regard to cod-fish we are in this position with our teeming population, who need a cheap article of food, they take the refuse from Newfoundland which no other market will take, and that fish is sent to us for sale at the best possible price on our market (not having been purchased before it is sent down). I do not see how it will be possible to swing that trade over to Canada. The other places are very differently situated. I just wanted to make it clear to the conference in reference to that point.

Mr. Snowball, M.P.: How about your lumber trade?

Mr. Leacock: We practically buy all our lumber in Canada with the exception of what Canada cannot supply.

Mr. Leacock says further:

The Vice-Chairman: Before you sit down, Mr. Leacock, do you think it well to say something about what you can give to Canada?

Mr. Leacock: Well, that is a very difficult point of view for me to touch upon, because, as I say, Canada has the entire flour trade with the exception of what she cannot supply; she has the entire oat trade of our colonies, the entire oatmeal trade of our colonies, et cetera. Our manufactured goods come very largely from the United Kingdom, and the only article, as it appears to me, that we could encourage in trade with Canada by an increased preference, is the item of salted meats, which could be turned over to Canada, and would probably go over quicker if you got an increased preference. That is as far as I can see as far as Barbados is concerned.

What he says applies not only to Barbados but to all the islands of the West Indies and to Bermuda.

I do not know that I desire to say anything more at the present time in regard to this matter. As I said when I rose, I am not opposing any treaty or trade arrangements with any country from which treaty we shall derive a benefit, but I am strongly opposed to coupling up our steamship services with trade treaties. We have had experience enough, as I said before, with regard to the operation of steamers by government, and if this contract is taken on by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine the cost to this country will be a very serious matter.

Mr. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I had intended making a few general observations but they have been already referred to by some hon. members who have spoken, and I am going to confine my remarks to some of the criticisms of the treaty made by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black). As one of his associates in framing this treaty, first of all I should like to pay tribute to the excellent work of the hon. member for Cumberland in the last parliament who inspired the negotiations that took place between Canada and the sister colonies in the south. We have just heard it said that we cannot develop a business in fruit with the West Indies. That was the very thing that inspired Mr. Logan when he saw Canada importing practically 2,500,000 bunches of bananas, with only 700,000 bunches coming directly from the West Indies, the balance all coming through the United States. Fruit was one of the items in which he was most interested when he made his trip to the West Indies.

I should like to pay a tribute to the delegation which came here. We found on meeting those gentlemen that they knew a good deal more about Canada than the Canadian delegates knew about the West Indies. For that reason I appreciate the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he says it is to be hoped that a better steamship service will induce many of us to travel to the West Indies for the winter instead of to Florida or California, and learn a little more about our sister dominions or sister colonies. If the steamboat service is good enough to induce Canadians to know the West India islands, I think it has in that respect alone served a very useful purpose.

I am rather interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax when he infers that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and the government did not know anything about what this service was to cost. It is quite true that you would not expect the Minister of Finance who intends to ask for tenders for this service to reveal to the agent of the West India Steam Packet Company who has just spoken, what he expects to pay them. The hon. member for Halifax is in the shipping business; his company has had contracts with governments of the past for this service. He knows that when his company got $131,400 per annum by way of subsidy we were doing only a very limited business with the West Indies, a business of imports of about $801,000 and of exports of $1,500,000 whereas the trade has grown to $14,000,000 of imports and $10,000,000 of exports. Any one who has seen the trade with the West Indies develop knows that we have built up in the last few years in one item alone, that of condensed milk, a business amounting to three-quarters of a million dollars. We have also built up a business in cheese, butter, cement and flour, the latter probably being the largest, but the fact remains that in many commodities, even our own fruits which they do not grow, such as apples, we have built up a substantial trade. The hon. member for Halifax and some business men in that city are objecting very strenuously to the cost of the service. As an Ontario business man I am prepared to pay my share of the cost of this service as a contribution to imperial unity, and I cannot see why a Halifax merchant who is going to receive a great deal more benefit than probably any Ontario man, should object if the rest of Canada including members like the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley), the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen), the Prime Minister of Canada and others speak of the necessity of imperial trade and the desire if possible to further that trade.

I remember reading in the Toronto Saturday Night, a journal which is not noted for complimenting this government, shortly after the treaty was published, an editorial which said that critics of the King government would have a very difficult time to find fault with the West India treaty which had just been negotiated. I was thinking of that article to-night when I observed the laboured efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite to bring forward something against the treaty. I believe that when we go into committee and the agreement is considered item by item it will be very difficult indeed for hon. members to find very many flaws in it.

Mr. RYERSON: Can the hon. member tell us the number of bunches of bananas imported into Canada from the West Indies?

Mr. MALCOLM: About 700,000 direct.

Mr. RYERSON: That is not my question. Of the total number imported into Canada how many are grown in the West Indies?

Mr. MALCOLM: That is not the point I was making. What I am pointing out is that we import a total of 2,500,000 bunches of bananas from the United States and elsewhere and that a very large proportion of them could be bought direct from the West Indies. Indeed, the delegates from Jamaica declare that they are able to take care of the Canadian banana trade if they have the proper steamship service. Given that they are prepared to develop a fruit trade with Canada which would meet all our requirements.

I prefer to discuss the subject further when the agreement is under consideration in committee, but at the moment I may be allowed this observation: the government was actuated by a desire to promote imperial trade, and I believe that the people are prepared to make a substantial contribution to that end. In this regard I would refer to the criticism which has been levelled at the Australian treaty, which is a trade agreement of exactly the same nature as this. That criticism has been eminently unfair. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the Australian treaty will make it possible for ten million or twelve million pounds of butter to be imported into Canada, but they forget their own argument that the treaty was designed to benefit certain manufacturers. My hon. friends opposite have always contended on the hustings that in building up industry in the country you create a greater consumption for the farm products of the Canadian agriculturist, but critics of the treaty never say a word to the effect that the improvement in Canadian industry might well take care of all the additional butter that could come from Australia. I do not see how hon. gentlemen can possibly criticize the Australian treaty on that score. In a country that produces 275,000,000 pounds of butter, roughly speaking, and exports 30,000,000 pounds, the home market cannot possibly be greatly affected by an importation of five, six, seven or eight million pounds of butter, especially in view of the fact that its industry is benefited to such an extent as to consume very largely the excess imports.

The business men throughout Canada do not view with any degree of credit the opposition adverse criticisms of trade treaties that make business for the manufacturers of the country. I would point out to my Conservative friends opposite that their friends in industry were anxious to see the Australian treaty put into effect, as I was myself, and we all looked forward to having a greater market among the dominions for the manufactured products of Canada. We hope that we shall be able to supply Australia and the West Indies with practically all their manufactured imports, thus taking away that business from the United States. If the treaties with Australia and the British West Indies which have been entered into by this government do not develop a greater manufacturing connection between those countries and Canada, I shall be very much surprised, for all the indications to-day are that they will. This treaty with the West Indies was made in good faith but the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black) thinks that those who are interested in its negotiation do not know very much about business in the West Indies. I suppose that in order to know anything about West Indian or international business for that matter, one must live in Halifax. Let me tell the hon. member, however, that the Canadian members of the conference with the records of the Department of Trade and Commerce before them, and the advice of the various delegates from the West Indies, who surely know their own business, did carefully study the possibilities of trade so that they were able to submit for the consideration of parliament an agreement based on a thorough investigation and a complete inquiry into all the details. Our hope is that the agreement will lead to further trade relations with the islands of the West Indies, to the advantage not only of the contracting parties, but of the empire as a whole.

Mr. ROBERT K. SMITH (Cumberland): It is not my purpose to discuss this subject at any length; I shall be very brief. I want to say however, at the very outset, that during the last election we of the Maritime provinces were told that we must look overseas for our markets, and I believe I am correct in attributing that statement to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The same thing was said by other Liberals in the Maritime provinces during the campaign. Now, if this treaty is brought forward as a means of solving the difficulties of the Maritime provinces I must say that we in that part of the country seriously object to it on that ground as the only remedy which the government intends to apply to the evils that have existed since confederation and are now so oppressive in those provinces. I hope it will be clearly understood by every member of this House that, whether this treaty is ratified or not, it is not intended as a means of solving our many problems by providing markets beyond the seas.

Another statement was made on the floor of this House to-night by the Prime Minister, a statement which was not only a gross exaggeration but a base misrepresentation of the attitude of the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) towards the treaty with the West Indies as stated by him during the last election campaign. I understood the Prime Minister to say that the leader of the opposition in the campaign in the Maritime provinces condemned the West Indies treaty. I wish to say, speaking from firsthand knowledge, that this was not the case.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will my hon. friend allow me to interrupt him? He says that I have misrepresented the leader of the opposition in this regard. I have in my hand at the moment a despatch that appeared in the Montreal Gazette and which I think I may quote as being fair to my right hon. friend. It reads:

Meighen Warns Maritimes On New Trade Pact
After Cursory Perusal He Says It Will Cost Millions
(By Canadian Press)

Sussex, N.B., September 22.—Having obtained a copy of the West Indies treaty from the Prime Minister's train which passed through here early this afternoon, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen, Conservative leader, subsequently warned the people of the Maritime provinces not to be too optimistic about the new trade pact. "I have just made a cursory perusal of the treaty," Mr. Meighen told a large audience in the rink here, "and all I have to say is 'don't get too optimistic about it.' The features of most prominence in it are the bills. It will cost millions."

That is the extent to which the right hon. gentleman dwelt upon the advantages of the treaty from an imperial point of view.

Mr. SMITH: It makes no difference what the Montreal Gazette or any other newspaper says, although I do not object to what the Prime Minister has just read in this connection inasmuch as there is nothing in the quotation to show that the leader of the opposition condemned the treaty. But I can give the Prime Minister some firsthand information on the matter. I was present at a meeting in the town of Amherst at which the leader of the opposition had spoken, and after he had taken his seat someone in the galleries asked; "What about the West Indies treaty?" He had finished his speech at that time, but he got up and said in effect: I am not in a position to take any definite stand on the West Indies treaty until I have studied it from begining to end; I am not in a position to condemn it, nor will I condemn it now, but I have heard from various sources that it will be an expensive experiment. I think that is pretty nearly quoting exactly what the right hon. leader of the opposition said in this regard. If that is "condemning" the West Indies treaty, then I do not understand my leader's language as does the right hon. Prime Minister.

Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but it was not published in the press of the Maritime provinces during the campaign that the leader of the opposition was condemning the treaty. The trade agreement was signed, I believe, in July; the election followed very closely in October, so that the people had not very much time to study and investigate it. I was up against the problem in my own county of Cumberland, where Mr. Logan my opponent, who had been largely instrumental in bringing about this agreement, brought it before the electors. And what was our answer? That we were not in a position to condemn the treaty; that we had not had an opportunity of studying it; that it would have to come before both houses of parliament for ratification; and that upon the floors of parliament it would be ascertained whether it was of virtue or not. That is the position we took in Cumberland county, and I believe a similar position was taken in every other county in the Maritime provinces.

As has been mentioned by other members who have preceded me in this connection, the main objection to the treaty has been the cost of the steamship service. We would fall short in our duty as Canadians and as partners in the imperial federation if we condemned a trade treaty with another portion of the empire which was to be of some benefit to us. We consider that this treaty will be of some benefit to us. But taking the benefits on the one hand and the expenditures on the other, it should be our duty to endeavour to find out whether they balance or not. That was our stand then, it is our stand now. We all desire imperial trade. There can be no difference of opinion on that ground, and there will not be, providing the benefits and expenditures at least equalize each other; but there will be a very serious opposition if they do not. When we go into committee and discuss the details of this agreement clause by clause, I hope to become thoroughly conversant with it. On the principle of beneficial trade arrangements, as I said before, there is no difference of opinion. The only question is whether for the money expended we are going to secure anything like commensurate results.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, let me repeat what I stated in my opening remarks, that we in the Maritime provinces will not feel that by the passing of this treaty, if it does pass, our problems have been solved by any means.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince): Mr. Speaker, coming as I do from the Maritime provinces, where this is looked upon as a very important treaty, I crave the indulgence of the House while I make a few observations upon it. In the first place, as has been already said, the treaty provides for an exchange of products between the two countries. The province of Prince Edward Island is altogether agricultural, and our products have to find an outlet somewhere; that is our difficulty at the present time. Our friends opposite have said in the course of various debates in this House that it was a good thing for the Maritime provinces that the reciprocity pact was defeated. Well, I may say that they will have a great deal of difficulty in making a Maritime audience believe their statement, and they will have still greater difficulty in convincing a Prince Edward Island audience, because as we cannot find a market for our farm products in the other portions of the Dominion beyond what we are able to dispose of in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, we are forced to send our surplus into the United States against an almost prohibitive duty.

Now, I am glad to see our friends of the opposition approving of this treaty to a certain extent. As fair-minded men from all parts of Canada, I think we ought to view the treaty as broadly as possible, and carefully look into its provisions in committee to see that no mistakes are made; but let us endeavour, if possible, to secure the advantages which this treaty will undoubtedly give us, because, as my good friend from Cumberland (Mr. Smith) has said, we have Maritime rights to be considered, and our friends of the opposition have been advocating Maritime rights. I should like hon. members to know that here, I am confident, is one of the things that is going to help us overcome some of our Maritime difficulties. If there is a Maritime right to be brought up in the House this session that is more important than this treaty, I should like hon. gentlemen in whatever quarter of the House they may sit to tell us what it is.

Various views have been expressed regarding the cost of the boats that will have to be subsidized, and on other questions. I notice that under this agreement we are for the first time to get a substantial subsidy from the West India islands to help the steamship service that the Canadian government has been subsidizing. That subsidy amounts to $142,000 per year, according to the treaty. Hitherto Bermuda has never contributed anything towards the cost of this steamship service, but they did contribute some $121,000 annually to American steamships to encourage them to trade with the British West Indies. This departure alone is a very important feature. Therefore, I repeat, we should consider this treaty in a broadminded way. I have in my hand a clipping from the Montreal Gazette in which reference is made to Mr. T. B. Macaulay, of Montreal, as one of the gentlemen who was largely instrumental in the treaty negotiations. The Gazette also contains cables from the British West Indies to that gentleman suggesting that if possible the treaty should be put through in its entirety. One of these cables from the Jamaica Imperial Association reads as follows:

> We strongly urge Canada-West Indies Trade Treaty should pass in entirety as any modification would amount to new proposal and would necessitate entire agreement being reconsidered by colonial legislatures which means delay and uncertainty.

I have here a number of telegrams along the same line from the different legislatures, which I shall not take time to read. As I have said, I think we should take up this treaty item by item and endeavour to put it through as nearly as possible in the form that was agreed upon by the delegates from the West Indies when they were here.

What are some of the benefits that will accrue to the Maritime provinces from this treaty? In the little province of Prince Edward Island alone we raised last year over $7,000,000 worth of potatoes, the bulk of them for export. Our friends of the opposition have taken exception to a statement in the Speech from the Throne and have said that the government was endeavouring to take to itself the credit that belonged to Providence for the splendid crops we had throughout Canada last year. That is all right, but I would like to point out to them that in our little province alone we could triple in one year our production of potatoes with the help of a kind Providence, if only we could find an outlet for that increased production. Instead of growing only $7,000,000 worth of potatoes for export, within two or three years we could grow $25,000,000 worth, if we could only find an outlet for that production. We hope that this agreement will give us an outlet for some of our surplus products, especially seed potatoes. This year, instead of the people of Prince Edward Island being encouraged to increase their acreage and produce more potatoes, they are being advised by our papers at the present time not to overproduce, because if they do it is said they will have no outlet for their products and the result will be a slump in price, and the growers will lose money, instead of making a small profit. That is the campaign that is being carried on by our papers at the present time, all because of our restricted market. Now that is a very serious state of affairs, and if this agreement will do anything to encourage even that one industry alone, I think it should receive the support of every member of this House.

Take dairy products, for instance. Last year we manufactured over $1,150,000 worth of butter, and cheese. In those two articles also we have a very large surplus for which we must find an outlet, and although we have a good trade with Great Britain, especially in cheese and butter, there is a possibility of obtaining a better price in the West India market for part of our product, and the same as to fish and other products.

Mr. Hodgson, of the firm of Hodgson Brothers, Montreal, is quoted as follows in the Montreal Star of July 9, 1925, regarding this trade agreement:

> Local exporters, particularly of dairy products, are elated at the terms detailed in the text of the new trade agreement between Canada and the West Indies. In this connection, A. J. Hodgson, president of the Montreal Butter and Cheese Export Association, made the following statement: "The new agreement should prove a great benefit to the country at large, and should promote an increase in the dairy business everywhere in Canada."

It is contended by our friends of the opposition that the Australian treaty may injure our dairy industry in Canada, but when the treaty has been tested I do not think that contention will be borne out by the facts. Taking the treaties as a whole that have been negotiated by this government, I think our dairy industry will not suffer, but rather that the situation will be greatly improved.

My good friend from Cumberland (Mr. Smith), who preceded me, has referred to the fact that Mr. Logan was largely interested in putting this treaty through. We all know the splendid efforts that Mr. Logan made on behalf of this trade agreement, and we can read in Hansard the very elaborate details that he gave in respect to every line of trade that is dealt with in the agreement that is now before the House. He showed the tremendous possibilities of increased trade between the two countries, especially in the products we raise in the Maritime provinces. I noticed a very strange thing in the last campaign in the Maritime provinces, and that was that this agreement was not praised at all by our friends opposing us, but rather they threw cold water upon it, and declared it was something about which we should be very, very careful and not be too optimistic over. I have a quotation here from The Ottawa Journal in which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) is quoted as saying:

10 p.m.

> There is not one dollar in the West India Trade agreement for the people of the Maritime provinces.

I hope he has not been misquoted again, but if he has, it is only one more of numerous instances of which we have heard this year. One of the strange features of the last campaign in the Maritime provinces was that the three premiers of the Maritime provinces went to the town of my good friend from Cumberland, the town of Amherst, in order to defeat Mr. Hance Logan, the gentleman who was primarily instrumental in having this trade agreement brought before parliament. Those three gentlemen combined their efforts to defeat Mr. Logan. I am not saying that this trade agreement was the only matter that was discussed, but I do say that our friends should be consistent; but what do we find? Immediately after the Dominion election the government of Prince Edward Island took upon itself to send a trade commissioner of their own to the British West Indies, clothed with all the power the local government could give him, to negotiate for trade with these islands. Our friends should be consistent, and instead of endeavouring to defeat the gentleman who was instrumental in bringing this agreement into its present form, they and the Maritime provinces would have done very well to give Mr. Logan the credit he deserves. I admit, of course, that the constituency of Cumberland is at present represented in this House by a very capable gentleman, who will no doubt do his very best for his constituency and the Maritime provinces generally, but I did wish to pay this tribute to Mr. Hance Logan, because he put more effort into this trade agreement than any other man in this chamber or any other man in the Maritime provinces during the four years we were here in the last parliament. I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything further in regard to the treaty, except that I believe it will be of immense benefit to us in the province of Prince Edward Island, because the British West Indies can use a certain amount of every product we have to export. We wish this treaty to be given a fair trial, and if that is done, and we endeavour to develop our trade with the West Indies, I believe this agreement will redound to the benefit not only of our province but of the Dominion as a whole.

Mr. R. B. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) has the floor.

Mr. HANSON: Had it not been for the fact that I have been on my feet more than once and have had to give way to other hon. gentlemen, I would have been glad to give way to my hon. friend from Pictou, who is very much my senior both in point of years and business experience.

I desire to make a few brief observations in regard to this trade agreement. In the first place I was much interested in the remarks of the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) who spoke just a few moments ago. I am sorry he is not now in his seat, because I wanted to congratulate him upon the statement he made which I take to be a prelude to his introduction to this House as a possible Minister of Trade and Commerce in this dying government. Personally I have a very high opinion of the ability of the hon. member for North Bruce. He is a charming gentleman of considerable intellectual powers, a thorough protectionist in principle and in practice. I should like to say this for the benefit of our friends from Saskatchewan, that they will find him, as we have found him, very sound on the principles of protection especially with reference to the furniture business.

An hon. MEMBER: A future minister.

Mr. HANSON: A would-be future minister.

Now, I want to approach this treaty, and the general principles underlying it, with the utmost consideration. That was the viewpoint of my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) from the very inception of the negotiations which resulted in this agreement in the month of July last. I remember very well when the delegates from the British West Indies assembled in this city in the month of June last. I remember very well a public statement made by my right hon. leader, in or near the city of Ottawa, in the presence of these delegates and I believe in the presence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself, when he told them publicly that his attitude towards this treaty would be one of the utmost sympathy, not so much because he considered that any great material advantage would result to this country, but because of the fact that it would tend to foster so-called inter-imperial trade. For that reason I have endeavoured myself to view the negotiations, and the treaty itself, with the utmost sympathy.

Speaking particularly from the standpoint of the Maritime provinces—and naturally we drift more or less into local considerations,—I do not look for any very great increase of trade as a result of this treaty. It must be borne in mind that the treaty is with the British West Indies, and not with the West Indies alone. The big thing from the standpoint of the Maritime provinces, if we could get it, would be a trade treaty with Cuba, which has a big purchasing power and contains a big consuming population. Just in that connection let me say that while this treaty was negotiated and the agreement signed in the month of July last, the treaty itself has never been brought before parliament until this stage of the present session. Nevertheless, on the part of members then supporting the government, from the Prime Minister himself down—not excluding my good friend Mr. Logan, an enthusiast in this matter, and to whom I believe a meed of praise is due for his energy in bringing this matter before the public mind of Canada and before parliament—there was the obvious desire to make political kudos out of this matter. Before the treaty had ever been submitted to parliament we were told down in the Maritime provinces that we were dependent upon export trade. The Prime Minister told the people of Amherst, if I recollect aright, that our whole salvation depended upon export trade. Well, I believe in export trade for the Maritime provinces, but I question very much the ability of that portion of Canada to grow and prosper on export trade merely to the British West Indies, with a consuming public whose purchasing power, I suppose, is the lowest of almost any people on the civilized globe except that of the wilds of Africa or the west coast of that continent. Take butter alone. It is said that we would develop a large increase in the products of the dairy industry. Let my hon. friends read the report of the government's own trade commissioner, and they will note that outside of an exclusive and very limited circle the only butter which is in demand is cooking butter, and I doubt if any business house in Canada will make any very great efforts to follow up that class of business.

Speaking in connection with the potato growing industry, which has been referred to by the hon. member for Prince (Mr. MacLean), let me say that we supply the island of Bermuda with seed potatoes. There they grow their own potatoes, and they grow them not only for local consumption but for export. The earliest potatoes that appear on the New York market are Bermuda potatoes. Bermuda is exporting them to that market to-day, and the only potatoes imported into the island are seed potatoes. The people there do not grow seed potatoes themselves; they have to renew their seed every year, and the same is true of other West India islands. To-day we supply practically one hundred per cent of their demands. I should like to point out this though—that gentlemen supporting the government in the last campaign told the people in the Maritime provinces, the people of New Brunswick—and I understood from an hon. member of this House that candidates representing the government told the people of Prince Edward Island—that as a result of this treaty Canada would have a preference in the Cuban market; they failed to lay emphasis on the fact that this was an agreement purely with a very limited population in the British West Indies as against the population of the whole of the West Indies, which has a very large buying power. As I said before, the big thing from the standpoint of the West Indies for the Maritime provinces would be a trade treaty with Cuba, but under present political conditions in that country that is impossible; that trade seems to have been coralled by our friends to the south.

But I do view with a very considerable degree of sympathy the making of a trade agreement such as this. I intend to vote for the treaty unless it is made apparent that the cost in dollars and cents to the Canadian treasury is too great. On that point we have not been vouchsafed a tittle of information by the Minister of Finance to-night; he takes refuge behind the fact that he is now calling for tenders for the West India service. While that temporarily may be a good reason, I should like to say here that before the minister asks this House to ratify this treaty, before the imprimatur of our two houses of parliament is put upon this agreement, he should tell what we shall have to pay in dollars and cents. There is no question that the loss of revenue from sugar, and one or two other items, will represent a bill of a million dollars per annum. As was stated by my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Black) I doubt very much whether the Canadian consumer of sugar will benefit to the extent of a farthing from that reduction in duty. Nevertheless it may be that we should be willing to assume the responsibility of that loss of revenue and the shifting of the burden of taxation to something else in order to foster trade treaties of this character.

There is a further objection to this treaty, and that is that it is linking up with what is purely a trade arrangement, a proposition for a steamship service. I do not want to enter into any detail.

Mr. ROBB: Is there not the same objection to the treaty that already exists?

Mr. HANSON: I quite agree that in the trade treaty that already exists there was an undertaking to carry on steamship communication. But the service that is now agreed upon, as compared with that which has previously been carried out, is so great and so extensive that I doubt very much whether the government will be able, without the expenditure of several million dollars per annum, to induce any steamship company to carry on these operations, and I very much fear that as a result of the commitment of the government in this connection we shall be in the steamship business, operating between Canada and the British West Indies, before this matter is concluded. I warn the government that they ought not to do that. If there has been no complaint on the part of the British West Indies—and we have heard of none; at least the Finance minister has not taken us into his confidence to that extent—as to the character of the service in the previous year, and if the cost of the new proposed service is as large as some of us anticipate, I think there ought to be a modification of this particular part of the agreement.

I should not like to see the government and the country too optimistic about the benefits that may accrue to us from the West Indies trade agreement, especially those of us in the Maritime provinces. There are about three things we can export from New Brunswick to the West Indies: lumber, certain agricultural products, and possibly certain dairy products. Lumber now goes along well established routes by sailing schooners, so that it is not affected, and the treaty will be of no benefit in that respect. The amount of lumber that will be shipped to the British West Indies as a result of the agreement will never have any appreciable effect upon the lumber trade.

With respect to potatoes, we have the trade now in the Maritime provinces, and this treaty will be of no particular benefit to us. I venture the assertion that it will not increase the production of potatoes by 1,000 bushels per annum.

I should like to reserve whatever other remarks I desire to make in respect to this matter until we get into committee, with this statement, that the government should not have attempted during the last election to take to itself the kudos for entering into a trade agreement which, from the statements of its very sponsors, was supposed to have been kept out of the sphere of party politics, and for that the government and the Prime Minister himself are to be condemned.

Mr. BALDWIN: Does the hon. member not know that great quantities of fish are shipped from St. John, New Brunswick to the West Indies?

Mr. HANSON: I understand that that business is carried on through New York. If the hon. gentleman will consult the records of the Department of Trade and Commerce he will see that the people who import fish in the British West Indies buy only the meanest kind of fish. They buy dried hake, a kind of fish that neither my hon. friend nor any other self-respecting man would eat.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): I am just as anxious as any other member of this House to develop trade within the British Empire, but I certainly do not wish to see that trade develop at the expense of industries in our own Dominion. I call attention of hon. members to the fact that this treaty will vitally affect one very important industry in my riding. Farmers living in western Ontario have a sugar beet industry of tremendous importance. Tens of thousands of acres of sugar beets are grown in that part of the province, valued at millions of dollars, and the profits to a considerable extent go back into the pockets of the farmers. It is a basic industry in that part of the country. In two sugar refineries alone, in Wallaceburg and in Chatham, at least $5,000,000 have been invested. In the town of Petrolia, where I live, we made an attempt a few years ago to build a sugar refinery. We are in the heart of the sugar beet industry, and that industry was being developed to an enormous extent prior to the action taken by this government in 1923. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that this government then reduced the duty on sugar one-half cent per pound. The very day after the duty was lowered the refineries in Wallaceburg and Chatham reduced the price of sugar beets to the farmers of that whole countryside fifty cents per ton. That might not have amounted to very much when sugar beets were selling at $8 or $10 a ton, but at the present prices of $5 or $6 a ton you can appreciate the fact that fifty cents a ton is a very important consideration to the farmers of that country.

We had an organization of sugar beet growers in that district with over 4,000 members. Just about that time these men conceived the idea that the proper way for them to develop the industry was to build a sugar refinery in Petrolia. To that end they gathered together over $200,000, and they have already spent that amount on the sugar refinery, believing that they were going to receive fair consideration from this government. But the duty on refined sugar having been reduced by one-half cent per pound, what was the outcome? Hon. gentlemen must recognize the fact that you cannot build a sugar refinery without spending nearly a million dollars. These men were carrying on a campaign for funds to develop the sugar refinery, but when the price of sugar beets was reduced it made it impossible for them to obtain capital and all their efforts went for nothing. The result is that buildings stand on those grounds to-day with the rafters up and without roofs—a monument to the folly of this government and the way they have conducted the affairs of this country.

Mr. ROBB: What is the use of my hon. friend talking such nonsense, when we have before us applications from the sugar beet people of Alberta to let in more men for the additional labour required in that province for the sugar beet business?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): We have heard all this wonderful story before. We heard from the Minister of the Interior something about the building of a sugar refinery in Alberta but that was only built within the last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just started.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Just started. Those gentlemen do not realize what they are up against. People living in Ontario, with the finest sugar beet growing land in the world, are surely able to compete with our good friends in Alberta. The position in which the farmers of that whole countryside are placed is not only a humiliating, but a very difficult one owing to the price of raw sugar coming in from the West Indies being reduced. Last year $17,000,000 worth came in from the West Indies and $26,000,000 worth from Australia. The government have reduced the duty on that article coming from Australia and now in the same way we are going to reduce the duty on these products coming from the West Indies. Yet we find hon. members to-night who will stand up and defend this treaty in all respects. We who live in the sugar beet area appreciate to the full that the time has come when our industry should receive some consideration at the hands of this government. It is an important industry in fact, a basic industry of this country, and although hon. gentlemen opposite in their platform boast of protecting the basic industries of Canada, this is one that surely the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) himself must see the wisdom of at least not undermining with all these different treaties.

I wonder whether the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) and those who assisted him in framing this treaty took into consideration the fact that this enormous industry is in its infancy in western Ontario. We are producing to-day only about ten per cent of the raw sugar that is consumed in Canada but why not give this industry an opportunity to develop? Why undermine it and flood this country with raw sugar from all parts of the world to compete with our own product? We heard the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm) a few minutes ago say: that this treaty is going to be an excellent thing for the manufacturers of this country and we ought to be prepared to make some concessions. But I notice the concessions that these gentlemen make in connection with these treaties are largely undermining the basic industry of this country, agriculture, and I for one will certainly raise my voice in protest against that particular part of the treaty.

I have tried to-night to secure a copy of this treaty from the distribution office and I am informed that the only copies there are printed in French. I would think in an important matter of this kind—

Mr. ROBB: Just a moment. I discovered from the officers of the department a few days ago that there were four hundred copies of this treaty printed in English and none in French, and I gave orders that the French edition should be printed immediately. They are now in the distribution office.

Mr. STEVENS: I sent twice to get copies and they were refused.

Mr. ROBB: They should be in the distribution office.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): About two hours ago I called for a page and the chap who came to me first was rather small in stature. I asked—

Mr. ROBB: I am just told by the Clerk that 250 copies have been distributed from the distribution office to members of the House.

[Mr. J. E. Armstrong.]

An. hon. MEMBER: When?

Mr. ROBB: I do not know.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): An important treaty such as this should be in the hands of the members.

Mr. ROBB: Certainly.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I am surprised; I know the Minister of Finance, if he had thought of the matter, would have had them distributed.

Mr. ROBB: But he did think of it and he did have them distributed.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): The fault is not mine, because I made an effort at least to obtain a copy.

I honestly hope that when we come to deal with the clauses of this treaty, every consideration will be given to the industry to which I have called attention to-night. I know my people feel that they have had that industry seriously interfered with in 1923, and now on top of that we are to have another treaty opening the door and letting in this raw material from other countries with cheap labour and cheap transportation. Surely the time has come when we as a people should appreciate the fact that the industries of our country and not the industries of other countries, even if they are part of the British Empire, are our first charge.

Mr. THOMAS CANTLEY (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention at this time to deal at any length with the commercial phases of this question. That I think has been better dealt with by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Black) and some others who are better acquainted with that phase of the situation than I am. The minister has referred to the character of the steamer service supplied the West Indies by Canada under the recent treaty and he has stated that that service has not been satisfactory. That statement is well within the mark. The service was certainly not satisfactory to the people of the West Indies nor to the people who took advantage of it and travelled by it. That service was operating at one time with four and later three discarded boats of the Royal Mail service boats, which had formerly been employed in the South American trade and were out of date, foul smelling and lacking in accommodation. The proposal now, as I understand it, is that we should embark upon three different services at a cost for new vessels of probably between five and six million dollars. The senior member for Halifax has referred to the loss that is likely to ensue from the operation of these vessels and his estimate in that connection is, I think, pretty close to the mark.

I wish particularly to call the attention of the House to the proposal to put on freight vessels to compete with private enterprises in the Maritime provinces and elsewhere. We have had quite enough of that in the last few years without embarking on any more of that particular kind of business. It is not fair that the government of this country should compete with private enterprise in matters of that kind. We have to-day a number of merchant marine vessels tied up in the port of Halifax and elsewhere eating their heads off, and if they could be sold at even the prices obtained for boats that have been disposed of during the past two years, it would be good business for us to get rid of them.

One phase of the question seems to have some possibilities of merit. I refer to boats which, if of the character I have in mind, would capture the winter tourist trade of this country now running into enormous figures, and which trade is benefiting our friends of the United States, especially California and Florida. Thousands and tens of thousands of Canadians are every winter travelling to those two states and spending anywhere from $30,000,000 to $100,000,000 annually in a foreign country. If we want to aid our compatriots of British origin in the West Indies, we should turn that trade their way instead of to California and Florida. I believe we could do it to the advantage not only of the West Indies but of Canada as well. I would suggest putting on a fast service of 12 or 14-knot boats making weekly trips from the ports of St. John and Halifax alternately to the West Indies. Also run from Winnipeg weekly a special West Indies winter tourist train. That train could leave Winnipeg on Friday, running through Toronto and Montreal, get into Halifax or St. John on Sunday, and connect with those boats. This fast tourist train could thus collect tourists from Winnipeg and all the way down east to Halifax, destined for various West India islands, to the mutual advantage of Canada and that portion of the empire, for it would be a means of consolidating at least these two sections of the British commonwealth. The people of the British West Indies are just as British as we are, and I know of no better method than that I have just suggested of promoting good relations and a wider common understanding between us.

That brings me to another consideration. I have on a previous occasion spoken of Maritime rights, and while I will not dwell upon the subject to-night, I want to drop a hint. It is sometimes said that if the Maritime provinces left the confederation they could do nothing by themselves. Well, perhaps they could not, and perhaps they could. I would remind the House, that the population of the three Maritime provinces combined totals about a million, and in any quarrel that might arise as a result of any dislocation in conditions in that part of the country, as they have existed since the first days of confederation, the three provinces would act together. I would ask hon. members this question: how has Newfoundland got along? That island has not been a part of the Canadian confederation, but is it not prosperous? Are the people of Newfoundland bankrupt? Have they made no progress? I will never admit for a moment that the people of the Maritime provinces could not get along alone and without assistance, but in conjunction with the island of Newfoundland could not the Maritimes make a treaty with the West Indies or with the United States, if to their advantage? At least, we would get along as well as we have during the last twenty years. I am not a secessionist and I hope I shall never have reason to be one; but whether I am one or not will depend altogether on the nature of the treatment accorded my part of the country by the other members of the confederation in the immediate future.

Mr. THOMAS McMILLAN (South Huron): We are certainly living in a wonderful age, an age of conversion. We hear gentlemen getting up and telling us that they are absolutely opposed to the government going into business in competition with private interests and more particularly in the steamship enterprise. Yet when they were in power themselves they were so anxious to get into that business that they expended $75,000,000 in steamships, paying as high as $190 per ton at a time when the British government was offering for sale its own vessels at a price in the neighbourhood of $45. Let hon. gentlemen consider what their friends did when they were in office, and let them offer some justification for that conduct.

Not only are we living in an age of conversion, we are living in an age of discovery. It may be surprising to you, Mr. Speaker, as it is no doubt interesting to the young members in this section of the House, to know that we have discovered in this parliament so many new-found champions of the interests of the farmers. One of those champions has just taken his seat in the person of the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong).

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I refute that statement. I am no new-found champion of the farmers' interests. I represent a municipality in which there are a large number of farmers—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. McMILLAN: I leave it to the judgment of the House whether the hon. member has not shown himself to-night a champion of the farmers' interests. Is he not championing the interests of the farmers of Ontario in favouring protection?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton). Yes, and I am proud of it.

Mr. McMILLAN: I am living in the centre of a sugar beet district where the people have been growing beets for years, and this is the first time I have ever heard the suggestion that the government of this country did wrong when they reduced the tariff on raw material of sugar as they did a few years ago. We farmers are neither narrow nor circumscribed in our opinions. Let me tell the House that the agricultural production of this country as a whole amounted in 1923 to $1,342,000,000, of which we exported over $543,000,000 worth. The farmers know that, and they also know that in order to dispose of their products they must export a very large proportion of them. They know, further, that the price obtainable for that exportable surplus regulates the price obtained at home. In view of all these facts the most superficial observer ought to realize that a 100 per cent duty would not increase the price of a domestic product at home. We must look at these questions from a national and not from any sectional point of view. Surely everyone knows that when there is a large exportable surplus a high duty cannot possibly have the effect of increasing the home price of that product. The farmers have therefore, come to realize as a class that the arguments adduced by our friends on the opposite side, for the purpose of proving that a high tariff on agricultural products will benefit them, are simply a blind, and the plea for higher duties on vegetables and small fruits is merely a lure to commit the Canadian farmer to a policy of sky-high protection in order to benefit some other class. Arguments such as these are only sectional, and no government which is worthy of the name should consider any public question from such a point of view. The government must take into account the interests of the nation as a whole, and that is the standpoint from which the farmers of Canada do, as a rule, view public questions. From that broad national point of view we realize that a system of high protection would be the worst policy which could be adopted in this Dominion.

Can hon. gentlemen opposite quote one manufacturer in this country who is a protectionist in the sense of wanting the government to impose high duties on the raw products which he requires for his own industry? Is there anyone in Canada who in that sense of the word is a protectionist? No. They all want to get everything they need for their own industries at the lowest possible prices obtainable, and quite reasonably so. But they are human, intensely human, when it comes to selling their goods. When they have anything to sell they are like the rest of us: they want the highest prices they can possibly get, even to the point of having the government jack up the tariff to such a degree as will keep out of this country foreign products similar to their own and in that way have the Canadian people at their mercy. That, Mr. Speaker, is the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, that is high protection with a vengeance, Tory protection "as high as Haman's gallows." That is what we on this side of the House protest against.

And let me say this in conclusion, Sir. It is for these reasons that I should like to see carved in bold, outstanding letters above the head of every prime minister in Canada a message that all comers for government favours could not possibly miss seeing and understanding, namely: Efficiency in business is attained by men who rely upon themselves and the ingenuity of their own resources rather than on government favours. We on this side of the House who represent a great section of the Dominion believe that our people have as good brains as the people of any other country. This being so, all we want in every line of endeavour is a fair field and no favour. Then we can meet the competition of the world.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Duff in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that the resolution be considered clause by clause, or debated as a whole?

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, an hour or two ago I asked the Prime Minister if we might consider some of the clauses in the treaty when this resolution was in committee, and I understood him to say that that would be in order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, that is right.

Mr. STEVENS: Then I have one or two questions to address to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) in connection with this matter. If he will turn to page 10, schedule A of the treaty itself, he will find at about the middle of the page this proviso to which I wish to draw his attention:

> Provided that nothing herein contained shall prevent the government of Canada from changing the rates of duty, provided the preferences granted herein are maintained.

I call his attention particularly to those last seven words, "provided the preferences granted herein are maintained." Now, one of the "preferences granted herein" is on sugar of one cent a pound. The effect of these words will be to render it impossible for parliament to reduce the duty on sugar below one cent a pound. I am not advocating for the moment that the duty should be so reduced, but I am pointing out that this form of preference, which is a specific preference rather than a percentage preference, ties the hands of parliament so that there can be no reduction below the amount fixed in this schedule; or to give effect to the treaty, Canada would be compelled to grant a bonus to the West Indies. Let me put it in a little different way. If Canada, for instance, reduced the general tariff to three-quarters of a cent a pound, we would be compelled then to pay to the West Indies a quarter of a cent a pound on all the sugar we bought from them in order to carry out the terms of the clause. That is the first point I wish to bring to the attention of the minister, and to suggest, if it is too late to do it in this treaty, that in future treaties we should deal with percentage preferences rather than specific amounts.

My next point is that the benefits of this treaty may accrue as far as sugar is concerned —which perhaps is the most important in it— to the refineries on the eastern coast; they do not apply to the refinery on the western coast, which is a very large institution and supplies a considerable section of the western part of Canada—I refer to the refinery in Vancouver, B.C.—for this reason, it is exceedingly difficult, if not almost wholly impracticable, to get cargoes of sugar from that portion of the West Indies affected by this treaty, we having no steamship lines established to the Pacific coast that will call and pick up these parcels of sugar. The minister has already received some considerable correspondence on this subject, I think. I wish to suggest, not merely with the desire of extending the application of low duties—that is not for the moment what I am speaking on,—but in order to be equitable and fair that the refinery on the Pacific coast and the people buying sugar from that refinery ought to have the privilege of securing their raw materials just as cheaply as the refineries on the eastern coast. This could be done, I think, if sugars from the Fiji Islands were admitted on the same preferential basis as cane sugars from the West Indies under this treaty. I would ask the minister: What has been the result of his investigation and thought over this question during the last few months? He will recall that I communicated with him I think on January 16, and that he had some other communications prior to that date. If the minister could tell me what has been the result of his pondering over this problem for some months, I think it would be of some advantage.

Mr. ROBB: Regarding the first point brought up by my hon. friend, if the price of refined sugar dropped very low, there might be something in his contention, but it would have to come down very low. The preference provided under this agreement differs very materially from the preference which the government of the United Kingdom gives to the West Indies and to the British possessions producing sugar.

Regarding his second point as to the disadvantage, or rather, let us put it the other way, the advantage the eastern refiners have over the refiners on the Pacific coast, the government recognized that feature, and we are under commitment to extend to Australia, and this was done particularly to help out the sugar refiners on the Pacific coast, the advantages contained in the West India agreement when that agreement comes into force.

As regards the Fiji Islands, there is a considerable trade there. When I went to school we were taught to believe that the Fiji islanders were not very great producers, although it was said they did have a liking for the producer. There is a considerable trade developing in the islands, a trade of great importance. The capital of the Fiji Islands, Suva, is quite a good town and a growing town. They have a government house there that compares very favourably with the government houses of most of the provinces in Canada. If the colonial government of the Fiji Islands were prepared to make some additional concessions to Canada, I think we might very reasonably consider the observations made by my hon. friend to-night. But does he think with me that it is wise to see what kind of a trade we can make with the Fiji Islands additional to the preference we now have?

We have had a pretty lengthy discussion, Mr. Chairman, of this resolution. Suppose we now let it have its first reading, or pass all the stages so that I may introduce the bill, which will give hon. gentlemen an opportunity of seeing it in detail. Then we can hold the bill over for a considerable time to give them an opportunity of studying it. I am just suggesting that, not pressing it at all. My hon. friend from Lambton had some difficulty in securing the information he desired, although I have been told that instructions were given this week to mail a copy of the agreement to every member of the House. It is just possible that among all the material that is sent to members, some may not have noted the agreement; but those were the instructions given.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When were they given?

Mr. ROBB: I think copies were mailed to members on Wednesday.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Members have not got them.

Mr. ROBB: Some of them have.

Mr. MANION: I just inquired now at the distribution office, and they told me that they had received only enough copies for the members, and some may have gone astray in the mail. I think a further supply should be brought downstairs.

Mr. ROBB: I will see that that is done, but what my hon. friend has said confirms exactly what I said. I tabled the agreement here purposely one day this week so that the copies of the agreement might be released and mailed. I repeat, I am prepared to stay here and answer all questions, but as it is now eleven o'clock I think we might pass the first reading.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was going to say that we might very well stop now, but before doing so, it might avoid delay if we were to point out one or two things to the minister, so that he would be in a position to deal with them when this matter comes up again. In connection with sugar, which is, of course, a very important question, as my hon. friend knows very well, what is he defining now as the degree of polarization? I really forget the commercial degree of polarization—

Mr. ROBB: There are no changes whatever in that respect.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We have a long list of polarizations running all the way from very, very low averages up to 100 per cent.

Mr. ROBB: From 82, 83 to 97, 98.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is my own recollection. I want to point out this to my hon. friend: If in the ordinary conduct of commerce we are bringing in sugars for the purpose of refining them here, running to these degrees, there is a fairly substantial preference —I am not complaining about it at all—but the preference is substantial. When we get to 97, there is a preference which is plus one cent. Then it works down to half a cent. At 96 we have exactly one cent a pound. I wonder if my hon. friend will agree with me in this, that as the price to the farmer of sugar beats in Canada is regulated having regard to the market for raws, and also having regard to sugar content, then on the ordinary basis of sugar beat production in western Canada a reduction in the duty, and therefore a reduction in the price of raws—I admit the reduction does not go to the producer, but to the refiner—automatically results in a reduction in exactly the same proportion to the beet grower. Does he agree with me, for example, that when his predecessor took his half cent a pound off raws, there was a reduction to the Ontario producer of sugar beets of 50 cents a ton? If he does not, I would like him to look into it, because it is certainly something which we ought to have no dispute about one way or the other. If I am right in this, and I think I am, the reduction in duty worked by this preference of a cent a pound will result in a reduction to the farmer on every load that he carries to the refinery of one dollar a ton. I think my hon. friend will find that is right. Mr. Chairman, I am not for one minute trying to press this unfairly or beyond where it should go. I know it affects only a comparatively small percentage of the raw sugars coming to this country; that we get most of our raw sugars from other sources, largely from Cuba. But has my hon. friend considered at all what effect that would have upon the price of sugar beets, and to what extent that will be common?

11 p.m.

There is another thing to which I also wish to draw his attention, and that is in connection with the confectionery business. We get our cocoas very largely from British South Africa.

Mr. ROBB: From the west coast.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes. Those cocoas are comparatively cheap, much cheaper than the Trinidad cocoa. I understand that the cocoa question is a very live question for Trinidad, and that they have been asking for the specific concession which they have here. I have been advised by those in the manufacturing business that they can use in their mix only a certain percentage of the Trinidad cocoa, and that no more Trinidad cocoa will be bought at all as a result of this preference, because this preference, although it is relatively good, would still leave the Trinidad cocoas considerably more expensive than the African cocoas, and the manufacturers would still have to have for the purpose of their mix the cheaper cocoas of Africa. That will mean additional taxation to the Canadian manufacturer on the raw material which he will still have to continue to import from Africa. I have no doubt the question has been brought to my hon. friend's attention. I am told that that will make a considerable difference; that it will make it impossible for manufacturers here to continue manufacturing the sweets which are sold in bars, the package sweets with a chocolate content; that they can be produced no longer for five cents, and that the effect will also be to raise the cost of manufacturing here. It is urged that some attention ought to be paid in the general tariff schedules to our production of confectionery of this kind. I just bring these points to the attention of my hon. friend. I do not ask him to deal with them to-night.

Mr. ROBB: I will have the points advanced by my hon. friend looked into. I admit with him at once the amount of preference that was given on the raw sugar, and I will confess to the House that we have sometimes wondered whether the government should not have given a little more attention to the urgent requests of the delegates from the British West Indies with regard to polarization in order to allow in some of their grades. Still I think we have used the sugar refiners of this country pretty well. They are doing fairly well, and—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend does not get my point.

Mr. ROBB: I know well what my hon. friend has in mind.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am speaking of the producer, not of the sugar refiner.

Mr. ROBB: Allusion was made a few moments ago to the increased importations of raw sugar. It is quite true. The importations of raw sugar during the last two years were greatly in excess of previous years, but exportations were also far in excess of previous years. I tried to get the figures, but as I recall them the sugar refiners of Canada have had their best year and have done their largest export business.

As regards the other point of my hon. friend in relation to cocoa, it is true that representations have been made to us. The conditions are these: When the delegates from the West Indies were here they said: "If we are to give the people of Canada a preference in our markets for their products, is it not reasonable that they should only give a preference to those countries that give them a preference?" They said that the west coast of Africa gave no preference to Canada, and they cannot do so for a certain period of years because of an agreement entered into with, I think, France. We thought that was fairly good reasoning; at least that was my opinion. Sometimes I agree with my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition and in considering that matter on the 2nd of June last—he will recall that we had this conference on that date—I heard the right hon. gentleman use these words:

> I do not see any reason why we should continue to give preference to anybody unless we get preference in return. . . . . My principle is, give advantage for advantage, but do not give it without.

Well, that is the policy that we followed in taking away the concessions from the west coast of Africa, which does not give us any preference. We do give a preference to Trinidad, which buys our butter, our cheese, our condensed milk, our fish, and whatever products we have to sell.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The government does not expect to get the resolution through to-night?

Mr. ROBB: I will not press that, but I should like to have introduced the bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the resolution goes through the committee it is through; that is all there is to it.

Mr. ROBB: I will table the bill. I will not press the matter if my right hon. friend objects.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do not want the resolution to go through in detail until we understand all about it.

Mr. ROBB: Very well, I will move that the committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the government any information as to what private business will be taken up on Monday?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have been informed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) that he will be prepared to go on with his resolution.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He has two.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The first one that appears under Notices of Motion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the very first one?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, the very first one. I may also tell my right hon friend that the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote), who has a resolution for a reduction in the customs tariff on automobiles and motor trucks, will be ready to proceed. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) is also ready to go on with his resolution relating to making protein tests in the research laboratory at Winnipeg. These are the only three resolutions, so far as I have learned, that are likely to be proceeded with.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I assume the government feels then that all reason for postponing discussion on the subject matter of the first resolution referred to is now past?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I think so.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

Monday, March 22, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

Mr. JEAN FRANCOIS POULIOT (Temiscouata): I rise to a question of privilege. I refer to an article published in the Montreal Gazette some time ago. On the 10th March instant, there appeared in that paper a quotation from a speech delivered in Montreal by "the man on the street"—I mean Sparks street, namely Mr. R. P. Sparks, who repeated the same thing in Toronto. Moreover, I see that in the same article Mr. Theodore Morgan voiced the opinion that the statement should be printed in pamphlet form and distributed throughout the country—"Sherwin Williams paint covers the world!" In his speech Mr. Sparks said:

All the organized bands of crooks that are living at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada hope that it will be a fiasco.

He means the customs probe.

A whole group of corrupt customs officers who are taking bribes hope that it will be a fiasco. American prison contractors who are shipping thousands of dozens of goods here, I am sure, are hoping it will be a fiasco. If Mr. Pouliot does hope so, he has got lots of company.

In explanation of those things let me refer to a former article in the same paper, the Montreal Gazette, on March 8. It is a resumé of a speech I made at Montreal at the Reform Club on March 6. I wish to quote this extract from that resumé:

The member for Temiscouata did not go deeply into the subject of the customs inquiry, but advised his listeners to spread counter-propaganda against the "odious attacks of Mr. Stevens," which he claimed are being distributed throughout the country in pamphlet form.

This is the point. I only said then that the Tory propaganda in connection with the customs probe would be a failure and an immense fiasco. I have nothing to say about the result of the customs probe, except that Mr. Sparks' nonsense may make of it a fiasco.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rise to a point of order. I have not detected in anything quoted by the hon. gentleman any subject matter of a question of privilege. Certainly, even if there were, the remarks which he is making are away beyond his right as a member at this time.

Mr. POULIOT: I think I have a right to explain my position on such a question of privilege and moreover I have just a word to say—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, I ask for your ruling. I should have risen, I think, on many other occasions similar to this. If this is permitted, there might be no end to orders of the day.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman states that he rises to a question of privilege respecting certain statements made by Mr. Sparks in commenting upon a speech delivered by the hon. member himself at the Reform Club. He has indicated the remarks he made after having quoted from the Montreal Gazette, and I suppose he is coming now to the remarks made by Mr. Sparks and wishes to deny certain statements attributed to that gentleman.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The point is this. He came some time ago to the only reference to himself which was contained in these words:

If Mr. Pouliot does hope so he has got lots of company.

He is at liberty to deny those words or the implication of them, but he cannot go into a dissertation of this kind.

Mr. SPEAKER: I hope the hon. gentleman will state briefly the question of privilege—what he would like to deny before the House.

Mr. POULIOT: I will say why Mr. Sparks said that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not privilege at all.

Mr. POULIOT: He said that because he went to the Prime Minister to ask for protection on clothes which he manufactures, which protection was refused.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like the hon. gentleman to follow the rules—state the question of privilege, make a personal explanation and leave the matter at that.

Mr. POULIOT: The personal explanation is this, that to use parliamentary language I should say that Mr. Sparks is neither a snake nor a skunk, but that he has the high qualities of both.

For a return showing:—1. The numbers of each of the following, lieutenant generals; major generals; colonels commandant; colonels; lieutenant colonels; majors; captains; lieutenants; non-commissioned officers of each rank; privates at present or at the latest date at which the information is available, in the employ of the government of Canada in the permanent force, including civilian employment and the air force, (a) at headquarters at Ottawa, (b) at each military district in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend (Mr. Doucet) agreed with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald, Antigonish-Guysborough) that he would particularize more in detail the information he wanted so as to avoid the large amount of correspondence here indicated being brought down. If the hon. member is agreeable to the motion being adopted on that understanding there is no objection to its passing at the moment.

Mr. DOUCET: I am quite agreeable.

Motion agreed to.

MR. H. BOULAY

On the motion of Mr. Hanson (for Mr. Culligan):

Mr. HANSON: The hon. member is not in his seat and the motion might stand.

Motion stands.

SETTLEMENT OF IMMIGRANTS

On the motion of Mr. Boys (for Mr. Morand):

For a return giving a settlement of all permits issued by the Minister of Immigration, under section 4 of the Immigration Act, showing the names of all persons permitted to enter Canada under the said section during the years 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925; the occupations and former residences of all such persons; the dates and places of entry into Canada; the duration of their stay in Canada as allowed by such permits and whether still in Canada; and if so, their present places of residence; and if not now in Canada, the dates and places when and where they left Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The motion asks for "a settlement of all permits" issued by the Minister of Immigration; I think what is meant is a statement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It should be "statement."

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would call attention to another matter: I do not think the hon. member wants all the information he is asking for. There are two kinds of permits; the minister may issue a permanent permit or one of a temporary character. The motion would indicate perhaps that it is only the temporary permits to which the hon. member has reference, and if the order were allowed to stand I could look into it.

Motion stands.

DOCUMENTS RELATING TO WAR CLAIMS

On the motion of Mr. Nicholson:

For a copy of all orders in council, letters, telegrams or other documents between the government of Canada or any department official or appointee thereof, and parties presenting claims of any character whatsoever incurred or presumed to have been incurred during and as a result of the Great War, 1914 to 1918, or the clearing offices in Germany and Austria, and falling under any of the articles of the treaty of Peace and more particularly under Articles 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303 and the annexes or general provisions relating thereto.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I am sure that if I merely indicate to my hon. friend what this motion would involve he will not insist upon it. Otherwise I shall be compelled to ask that it be transferred to debatable motions. There are 7,560 files relating to this question and the number of claims is upwards of 10,000, while the number of documents in support of these claims is 20,002. There have been 101,700 letters written and 100,000 received, many in foreign languages. It would take three years and a half to complete the work, and the wages alone would be $21,600.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The resolution may stand and I will confer with the minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands—for conference.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—ROUYN RAILWAY

Mr. O'NEILL moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and reports relative to the construction, financing or operation of the Rouyn railway passing between the government or any department or official thereof and:

1. The management of the Canadian National Railways or any officer or official thereof;
2. The government of the province of Quebec or any department or official thereof;
3. The Rouyn Railway Company or any officer or official thereof;
4. Messrs. Dillon, Read and Company or any official thereof;
5. The American Exchange Securities Corporation or any official thereof;
6. The Noranda Mines Limited, or any official thereof.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Stand.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the mover of the motion might have a little say whether it stands or not.

Mr. DUNNING: I make the request merely as a matter of courtesy. I did not intend to infringe upon the privileges of any member. Just as a matter of courtesy, if the mover would permit, I would ask that the motion stand.

Mr. O'NEILL: Yes.

Motion stands.

PULPWOOD EXPORTS

Mr. ANDERSON (Halton) for Mr. James Arthurs moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams or recommendations relating to an embargo upon pulpwood or to a proposed export duty upon pulpwood shipped from Canada. Such order to apply to correspondence, etc., subsequent to January 1, 1921.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): if this is allowed to go through, it is on the understanding, after consultation with the mover, the hon. member for Parry Sound, that he designates just what he seeks because, this involves a great deal of correspondence which would be of no interest to him.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA'S IMPERIAL RELATIONS

RESPONSIBILITY FOR COMPLICATIONS ARISING OUT OF POLICY OF UNITED KINGDOM

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, Canada should refuse to accept any responsibility for complications arising from the foreign policy of the United Kingdom.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a subject which, I clearly recognize, has a great many bearings, and upon which there may be considerable difference of opinion not only as between parties, but as between individuals within the various groups. I fancy there has been in the past somewhat of a tendency to treat rather lightly matters that relate to the foreign policy of this country; but now that the war hysteria has passed and feelings have more or less subsided, it would seem that it is high time that we should give a little more serious consideration to our relationships with the Mother Country with regard to foreign policy.

I know that there is likely to be some opposition to this proposal, but I would point out that nearly all reforms are opposed, dire results are foretold, and very frequently there are fervent appeals to what is known as patriotism. Glancing over a bit of history the other day, I noticed that during the debate on the Reform Bill of 1832, introduced by Lord John Russell, Lord Macaulay in supporting the measure said:

> My hon. friend the member for the University of Oxford (Sir Robert Inglis) tells us that if we pass this law England will soon be a republic. The reformed House of Commons will, according to him, before it has sat ten years, depose the king and expel the lords from their House.

I do not think I need point out that although nearly one hundred years have passed by, the king has not yet been deposed and the lords still sit in their chamber.

In Canada the tendency is for some of us to be more British than the British. We sometimes neglect the spirit which underlies British action and imagine that loyalty suggests slavish conformity. In terms of psychoanalysis, I suppose we may be said to suffer from an inferiority complex. Some of us imagine that we are not quite big enough or wise enough to consider these things in our own right, and have simply to take second-hand the opinions of someone on the other side of the water. I do not know of a better illustration of this inferiority complex than that which is afforded by a statement credited to one of the Toronto members not very long ago. The Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) has already quoted it this session. I refer the House to page 67 of Hansard, where the member for Northwest Toronto (Mr. Church) in a speech criticizing his leader's new war policy is reported to have said:

> Had we had this autonomy in 1914 Canada would not have been represented in the Great war. There would have been no 60,000 soldiers in France from Toronto.

I suppose he might have added: Nor 50,000 Canadian boys in French graves. Frankly, I had thought more of Toronto than would be indicated by this speech of one of its representatives. Think of it! He says: Had we had autonomy we should not have entered the war. Are we then to be dumb, driven cattle, and simply go into any action because we are forced into it? I take it the time has come when if we are to enter upon any such action it should be entirely of our own free will. It is well that we should place our position clearly before the world.

The preliminary question arises as to whether Canada has indeed a foreign policy. No one seems to know. Last year, while we had assurances from the government that we would be able to discuss foreign affairs, as a matter of fact the discussion was postponed until after midnight on the last day of the session; that was the only opportunity that we had during the session to discuss the foreign affairs of Canada. Yet I would point out that Canada must maintain very intimate relations with the United States 365 days of the year, and that we ought to have our foreign policy, so far as the States is concerned, very clearly defined. Fortunately since the union of the two great races in this country there has never been a war between England and France. I would, however, point out that if that contingency ever arose, which God forbid, we would all be placed in an exceedingly delicate position, and therefore we ought not to shut our eyes to what might develop. I would further point out, coming as I do from the west, that we have hundreds of thousands of immigrants who call one or other of the various European countries the fatherland or the motherland, as the case may be. What would happen in the event of war with some of these European countries in the days to come when the numbers of their nationals in this country are greatly increased? Further than that, within recent years Canada has become keenly interested in the Orient. Personally I am inclined to think that a great many of our trade developments in the days to come will be on the Pacific rather than on the Atlantic, and that more and more we shall have to pay attention to our relations with our trans-Pacific neighbours.

In the last war, though having no immediate concern with European affairs, Canada found herself involved, and we are still struggling under the burden of the debt created by that Great war? What about the next war? Perhaps hon. members will say: It is too early to consider the next war. I am not at all sure about that. I noticed that just the other day Major General J. H. MacBrien was talking to the Anglican Fellowship Club in this city. By the way, I should like to take this opportunity of protesting against any employee in the public service going around doing propaganda work for any particular policy. We do not permit it in any other of the departments. I would call upon the government to forbid any employee definitely engaging in political propaganda with respect to a question on which there is a wide divergence of opinion in this House. On December 15 last this gentleman said:

> It is useless to deceive ourselves into believing that there will not be another war. . . . The cause for this next war to come might well be an adjustment of frontiers in the European countries.

Well, here we have our chief of staff definitely preparing us and the country at large for another war that is likely to arise, as he says, because of the adjustment of frontiers in the European countries. If that is the case, surely it is high time that we took full opportunity of a discussion such as may be initiated by my motion. Almost at the same time we have Viscount Jellicoe suggesting that Canada should contribute $36,000,000 a year for the next few years towards the cost of the Imperial navy, and should provide a squadron of four cruisers within the next four years at an annual cost of approximately $10,000,000, during the four-year period of construction. He also suggests a cruiser in reserve. He estimates the annual cost of the maintenance of the four cruisers at approximately $4,290,000. So here we have not merely our own war men but those from the Motherland urgently pressing upon us the need of preparing for the next war.

I think it unnecessary for me to point out that the question of Canada's relationship to foreign nations is inextricably involved with Canada's relationship to the United Kingdom. Under existing circumstances, we cannot deal with our policies without dealing with our relationship to the United Kingdom, and I am glad to see that there is coming to be somewhat of a changed sentiment with regard to this matter. Hon. gentlemen may recall that in 1922 the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) gave utterance to his famous expression "Ready, aye, ready. We stand by you." Now, three years have passed, not a very long period, but a few weeks or months ago we find the same gentleman saying at Hamilton:

> I believe it would be best not only that parliament should be called but that the decision of the government, which of course would have to be given promptly, should be submitted to the judgment of the people at a general election before troops leave our shores.

I am inclined to think that the right hon. leader of the opposition has gone too far in that. If we are to assure the effectiveness of any war, it would hardly do to call parliament together in order to provide an opportunity for a referendum. But while I am inclined to think he has gone too far, I do not think we are going too far in settling the principle before another war is in sight. Now is the time to decide such a matter. As a further indication of a change in sentiment, I would quote a clause from the constitution of an organization which we have in western Canada, known as the Native Sons of Canada, a patriotic and fraternal society. The plank in their platform or constitution relating to Canada's status reads as follows:

> It is imperative that the parliament of Canada shall have sovereign rights. Our Dominion must acquire the constitutional status of a nation, enjoying absolute equality with any other component part of the British Commonwealth. The rights hereby demanded should not rest on sentiment, nor the assurances of statesmen, but should be enacted as law by the proper parliaments. Generous safeguards and covenants, protecting the vested rights of provinces, and civil and religious liberties, should be preserved.

It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to enter at any length upon the question of Canada's legal and constitutional status. I hope that before this discussion is over some of the legal gentlemen who are specialists in this matter will take advantage of the opportunity and go into this question more fully. But from my standpoint, as an ordinary layman, I do not know that such discussions help us very much. We are told that if Canada wants her autonomy she may have it, that no obstacle will be placed in the way by Great Britain. That may be true. Personally I am inclined to think that the greatest obstacle has been the fact that we have never asked for larger autonomy, and have never been determined to gain it. In fact it is only within recent years that there has grown up any considerable sentiment with regard to that question. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we are not to-day attributing blame or casting aspersions upon the authorities of Great Britain; we are not declaring that they refused to give us this, but we are taking the position that it is quite within our rights to discuss whether or not we want it. It will be time enough afterwards for Great Britain to say whether or not she is agreeable to our having it. I would point out that the constitutions which have been drawn more recently than our own go much further than the British North America Act. For example, when the Irish Free State bills were being discussed in the British House of Commons, it was pointed out that there is no phrase in the British North America Act making the Dominion of Canada a co-equal member of the community of nations forming the British commonwealth of nations. Similarly, there is in the Canadian constitution no such declaration as that contained in the Irish Free State constitution, which states that all powers of government and all authority, legislative, executive and judicial, are derived from the people of Ireland. The Irish constitution also provides that save in the case of actual invasion the Irish Free State shall not be committed to participation in any war without the consent of parliament.

At the last Imperial conference it will be remembered that the prime ministers of the dominions refused to attempt to define by resolution the present relationship of their dominions to the Mother Country, and Mr. Bonar Law welcomed the refusal. He added:

I say without hesitation, that if this parliament were to pass an act which attempted to limit the powers of the dominions, according to statute, it would re-echo all through the dominions, and would be one of the most dangerous things that could happen.

I am not very sure, however, that our powers in Canada are not already limited. For example, during the last few days we had the report of a decision of an appeal to the Privy Council from two judgments of the Supreme Court of Alberta, in which we find that the Lord Chancellor, Viscount Cave, in speaking of the powers of the Canadian parliament, said:

In their Lordships' opinion, section 1025 of the Canadian Criminal Code if and so far as it is intended to prevent the sovereign in council from giving effective leave to appeal against an order of a Canadian court is repugnant to the Judicial Committee Acts of 1833 and 1834 which have been cited and is therefore void and inoperative by virtue of the act of 1865. It is true that the code has received royal assent, but that assent cannot give validity to an act which is void by imperial statute.

I say I am not blaming the imperial authorities, but I would suggest that our legal standing has not kept pace at all with constitutional developments.

In discussing the constitution of Ireland a writer in the Canadian Gazette, which is published in London, under date of November 30, 1922, suggested that the relationship of the various component parts of the British Empire should be that of a partnership by consent. I accept the phrase, Mr. Speaker, and I fancy that if we worked out our relationship somewhat along that line we would get a great deal further. A partnership by consent means by the full consent of each partner. We are, however, frequently told that we should not avoid our imperial responsibilities. This is said to us by some of our militarist advocates, especially with regard to contributions which they think should be made to the Imperial navy. I would like to point out what Lord Milner said several years ago in his little book entitled Questions of the Hour, at page 97:

We could not afford to reduce it—

Speaking of our army.

—even if we had no empire at all. And as for the navy, we need it for the protection of our world-wide commerce and mercantile marine, and we should need not a smaller but a larger navy if we were deprived of the navy bases which the empire contains.

So it would seem that we are under no very great obligation to the Motherland with regard to the maintenance of a navy. I should like to urge the general principle that financial responsibilities are contingent on moral responsibility. The Imperial conference of 1917, on the resolution of Sir Robert L. Borden, stated that we——should recognize the right of the dominions and of India to an adequate voice in foreign policy and in foreign relations, and to provide effective arangements for continunous consultation in all important matters of common imperial concern.

With regard to this, I should like simply to ask two questions, and urge that they be answered by anyone who still maintains that we ought to assume responsibility for actions of the United Kingdom. My first question is: Can anyone say that to-day Canada has an adequate voice in the foreign policy and in the foreign relations of the United Kingdom? My second question is: Can we hope to have an adequate voice, can anyone suggest any plan by which we could possibly have an adequate voice in the very complicated questions which are continually arising in the foreign policy of the great British Empire?

It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to deal at any length to-day with the question of Locarno. I am of the opinion that this question is of sufficient importance to Canada to be dealt with under a separate order, and I should like to think that the Prime Minister would give us the assurance that we would have a full opportunity of discussing the Locarno treaty. But, incidentally, I should like here to point out that the conference of Locarno has produced a significant and important international declaration affecting the status and obligations of all the dominions of the British commonwealth. Article IX of the Rhineland security pact between Great Britain, France, Belgium, Italy and Germany reads:

The present treaty shall impose no obligations on any of the British dominions or upon India unless the government of such Dominion or of India signifies its acceptance thereof.

Speaking to the journalists assembled at Locarno, Mr. Chamberlain, when asked if he represented and spoke for the whole British Empire said:

You do not appear to know the constitution of the British Empire. The dominions and the other parts of the empire are bound only if they ratify of their own free-will and accord.

I would like to accept that statement of Mr. Chamberlain. However, while I do so I recognize that there is the other side of the question as well. This is pointed out by Lord Parmoor, who is one of the highest authorities on the subject. He is reported by the press as saying:

The Locarno pact was signed without previous consultation with the dominions. It places upon Britain an obligation to fight on the side of either France or Germany in the case of aggression, and the dominions cannot escape some of the results of these obligations.

It is true that Mr. Chamberlain inserted a clause protecting dominion interests so that the dominions are not obliged to send troops or any form of assistance in the event of war arising from the Locarno treaty, but if Britain goes to war, the rest of the empire automatically goes to war, and no general election in Canada or vote by the Canadian parliament can alter this international fact. All that Canada can do is to refuse to assist, but under international law she still remains the enemy of Britain's enemies.

I would call this to the attention of the right hon. leader of the opposition, with his suggestion that the whole matter should be referred to the people at large before troops leave our shores. Let me repeat it:

No general election in Canada or vote by the Canadian parliament can alter this international fact. All that Canada can do is to refuse to assist but under international law she still remains the enemy of Britain's enemies.

I have been speaking so far of the danger that we experience here in Canada of being dragged into war without having an adequate voice in saying whether or not we desire to go to war, but I would further point out that even in Great Britain the power of parliament is decidedly limited. I should like to quote a few paragraphs from a little pamphlet entitled Foreign Policy and the People, by Morel and Lees-Smith. It may come somewhat as a surprise to some of the members of this House to know how limited are the powers even of the British parliament with regard to the making of war. The article reads:

4 p.m.

The powers now enjoyed by the executive and by individual ministers in matters of foreign policy may, then, be summarized as follows:

(1) Ministers can conclude and ratify a treaty with a foreign power or powers, committing the country to go to war under certain contingencies, without the prior consent of parliament, and without, therefore, any precedent national debate. Parliament is only informed after the act has been committed, and the country has become bound. Theoretically, no doubt, parliament being thus presented with such a treaty can throw out the government that has concluded it, but for a host of reasons this is well-nigh an impossible course for parliament to pursue. It never has so acted. Considerations of party politics and of personalities make it virtually impossible that it should so act. A government with a dependable majority behind it can always defeat any such attempt.

Example: the Anglo-Japanese alliance.

(2) Ministers can, when presenting to parliament the text of such treaty, withhold from the published text certain clauses either attached to the original treaty itself, or embodied in a separate document. The treaty, as presented to parliament, may do no more than provide for the settlement of various disputes and for the diplomatic support of the power with whom the treaty is made for certain objects which that power may be pursuing. But the secret clauses may be of such a character as to alter entirely the general character of the treaty, and be tantamount to involving the nation, without its knowledge, to go to war under certain contingencies. The danger of the exercise of this power is the greater in so far as parliament and the country in this way may be entirely misled as to the real character of the agreement entered into.

Example: the secret clauses of the Moroccan-Egyptian convention in the Anglo-French general settlement of 1904.

(3) Ministers can conclude and ratify a treaty with a foreign power or powers committing this country to go to war under certain contingencies, or committing it to a vast extension of military and political liabilities without informing parliament for an indefinite period.

Example: the conventions with Italy, France and imperial Russia during the war.

(4) Ministers can authorize joint military and naval co-operation for potential war with another state or states without informing parliament, and without even informing their colleagues in the cabinet.

Example: the Anglo-French military conventions of 1906-1914.

(5) Ministers, sure of their parliamentary majority, can levy direct and indirect war upon another state or states without giving the country the right to pronounce upon their action.

Example: the military and naval operations, directly and indirectly continued, against Soviet Russia in 1919-1921.

It is, therefore, in the power of the executive to commit the nation without national debate and even without national knowledge to irrevocable decisions.

Further, and this is something that we hardly recognize in Canada, there is in Great Britain what is known as the Committee of Imperial Defence. Arthur Ponsonby, the late Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in his recent book, Now is the Time, says, page 42:

This body which is outside parliamentary control and not subject to political change in the same way as a cabinet gives a military and strategic interpretation to all questions of policy, and in a powerful yet inaccessible position forces the administration of the day, whatever its political colour may be, to modify and, if need be, abandon projects conceived on the lines of international co-operation.

This is the situation which exists with regard to the control of foreign affairs even by the parliament of Great Britain. Much less may we in Canada by the very indirect means provided, hope to exercise any effective control. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I urge that we be honourable, and that we now serve notice that our partnership is one of limited liability. Someone who has been reading my motion has suggested that it may possibly leave itself open to the interpretation that never under any circumstances should we go to the defence of the United Kingdom. Such I think perhaps is rather a far-fetched interpretation. However, I have no desire at all to insist upon certain phrasing being maintained. I think my resolution is sufficiently clear to enable every member of this House to understand its purport, namely, that without reference to, or decision by this House we assert that we do not propose to be bound by anything that may be transacted overseas.

In bringing forward a resolution of this kind I am not anti-British, but I am anti-imperialistic, which is an altogether different matter. In Canada we all know there are a great many different classes of people and different policies. There are advocates of higher tariff and advocates of lower tariff. There are advocates of what has been called the National Policy, and there are those who condemn the "National" policy. The right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) is not accused of being unpatriotic because he attacks the policy of the present government. The leader of the Progressives (Mr. Forke) is not accused of being unpatriotic because he attacks what is known as the National Policy, nor might I say am I anti-British when I oppose the imperialistic designs of a small but powerful group in Great Britain. In fact, in arguing along this line to-day I am in line with the policy of the British Labour party. If certain gentlemen feel that they have a perfect right in this House to support the imperialistic designs of some individuals in Great Britain, I as a Canadian have an equal right to support the ideals and policies of that great party in Great Britain which before long will again be the government of that country. In their pamphlet issued several years ago, at the time of the organization of the British Labour party, we find this statement of the position of that party towards foreign affairs:

LABOUR AND THE NEW SOCIAL ORDER

We desire to maintain the most intimate relations with the Labour party overseas. Like them, we have no sympathy with the projects of "Imperial Federation," in so far as these imply the subjection to a common imperial legislature wielding coercive power (including dangerous facilities for coercive imperial taxation and for enforced military service), either of the existing self-governing dominions, whose autonomy would be thereby invaded; or of the United Kingdom, whose freedom of democratic self-development would be thereby hampered; or of India and the colonial dependencies, which would thereby run the risk of being further exploited for the benefit of a "White Empire," We do not intend, by any such "Imperial Senate," either to bring the plutocracy of Canada and South Africa to the aid of the British aristocracy, or to enable the landlords and financiers of the Mother Country to unite in controlling the growing popular democracies overseas. The autonomy of each self-governing part of the empire must be intact.

And as I know there are members of this House who do not keep very closely in touch with affairs in Great Britain, and yet who feel themselves quite competent to speak on any and every occasion as the representatives and protagonists of Great Britain. I should like to read a certain resolution of the National Council of the Independent Labour party passed February 13. Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, who is one of the outstanding members of this organization, is now of course well known throughout Canada. This document reads:

The I.L.P. declares itself in favour of the ending of political and economic imperialism by a policy directed to the following ends:

1. The development of systems of full self-government in all countries at the earliest opportunity in accordance with their racial characteristics, and the extension to all non-self-governing countries, in the transition period, of a re-constituted mandate system, instead of the sole control being left to single powers.

2. The creation of world economic organization, with the object of establishing a progressive international standard of labour conditions, the protection of native peoples from capitalist exploitation, the rationing of world supplies according to need, and the regulation of credit.

In particular the I.L.P. demands,

1. The recognition of the independence of Egypt by the withdrawal of British troops, accompanied by the submission of the issues of the Suez canal and the Sudan to the League of Nations.

2. The immediate withdrawal of all repressive measures in India, the declaration of an amnesty for all political offenders, and the recognition of the right of India to self-government and self-determination, by acceptance of the proposal of the Indian Legislative Assembly that a representative Indian Convention should prepare a constitution for India, and by using British influence to secure the withdrawal of the disabilities from which Indians suffer in the British Empire and other countries.

3. The complete revision of the treaties imposed upon China by the Great Powers, with a view to the restoration of full self-government.

4. The reversal of the Imperialist naval policy in the east, including the abandonment of the Singapore Dock and the "Indian" Navy.

5. The termination of the British occupation of Irak.

Finally, the I.L.P. urges upon the British and international labour movements the necessity of assisting the workers of Asiatic and African countries which are passing through capitalist control to organize industrially and politically for their protection against exploitation and for their ultimate emancipation. It recognises that the interests of the workers throughout the world, of whatever race, colour or creed, are one, and that international socialism cannot be fully realized until the workers of the world have united for their political and economic liberation.

If one of us labour men suggested a policy of that kind in Canada he would be liable to be accused of sedition. In England that is the policy of the Independent Labour party of which a former prime minister is a leading member. In regard to the particular issue we are now discussing I came across only the other day, in the little book to which I have referred—Now is the Time—at page 81, this declaration from Mr. Ponsonby:

The dominion citizens are, therefore, more completely than we are at the mercy of the false appeal to participate in international war. Their governments, too, are in a position of disadvantage which has become one of the chief concerns of imperial statesmen. No means has been devised of consulting dominion governments on foreign policy. Indeed the intricate tangle of European relationship and intercourse from which at any time questions of moment may arise would seem to make continuous consultations with the component parts of our extensive but loosely knit empire impossible.

Moreover the interests of the various dominions necessarily differ. The problem has assumed an acute form since the conclusion of peace, and there is a growing feeling even among the dominion governments that they cannot be dragged at the heels of the Mother Country, unless they have full knowledge and have expressed approval of the policy in question.

I would call the attention of the House to this very significant statement.

Any disposition on the part of our dominions to refuse to join in these wars of European origin will be all to the good. The deadweight of a reasonable pacifism from that quarter might have a moderating effect on the home government.

Thus we have leading members of the British House of Commons welcoming such a declaration as that which is contained in my resolution now before the House.

I said that I was against imperialism. I recognize that there are various imperialisms in the world to-day. There is a German imperialism, not at the moment dangerous, having been ruined by its own ambition. There is a French imperialism that since the war has threatened Europe. There is an Italian imperialism that struts in the person of Mussolini and there is an American imperialism which is perhaps more dangerous to us in Canada than is British imperialism. I should like to read, as giving my idea in this regard, a short quotation as reproduced in the Western Producer of November 19, entitled "American Bankers Enslave the world." This is the quotation:

During the last year Americans have loaned to and in foreign countries an average of $115,000,000 per month. The foreign loans and investments of Americans now amount to $9,500,000,000 in addition to the $10,500,000,000 owed to the United States government with accrued interest of $1,500,000,000, making a total of $21,500,000,000 of loans and investments of Americans to and in foreign countries. Five per cent on this amounts to $1,075,000,000 annually.

The article goes on later to say:

The net income of the exploiting class in America amounts to at least twenty-five billions annually.

There is a situation in which we find a new economic imperialism developing on this continent. I should like to say very frankly that I prize our British connection because of the possibilities it holds in respect to resistance to American imperialism. As I look forward to the next few years I sometimes wonder what will happen when labour and socialistic ideals prevail in Great Britain. I wonder then whether our flag-waggers in Canada will follow as loyally the British lead as they advocate that we should do to-day. At this time, as a Labour representative in the House of Commons of one of the British nations, my special duty is to deal, not with German imperialism, or French imperialism, or Italian imperialism, or American imperialism. I hope we shall have an opportunity at some later date of dealing with the latter in connection with the discussion on the exploitation of our natural resources. But to-day I wish to deal with what has been termed British imperialism, and in this connection I should like to quote from a little treatise used as a textbook by labour groups in Great Britain. I do so because it affords a convenient summary and also because it gives the point of view of the workers of Great Britain, which is, I think, altogether too little understood by the rank and file of the people of Canada. I intend to trespass upon the patience of the House while I read a page or so which gives an outline of what is meant by modern or economic imperialism:

Modern European history and its wars easily and naturally divide themselves into three main epochs—the periods of mercantilism, nationalism and imperialism. The mercantile period was that in which the western European countries were striving to gain trading markets and monopolies in the other continents. It was one long period of wars small and great; and it necessitated military activity, so also it found appropriate political expression in such policies as (a) the balance of trade, which "estimated the worth of a nation's intercourse with another by the excess of the export over the import trade, which brought a quantity of bullion into the exporting country"; (b) the Navigation Acts, "designed to secure for English vessels a monopoly of the carrying trade between England and all other countries which sent goods to English or to colonial shores"; (c) the fostering of home manufactures. Its triumphs furnished both the stimulant and the necessary capital for an extension of manufacture, and thus brought about the inseparable but conflicting interests of the industrial capitalist class and the modern proletariat.

Next is nationalism:

Nationalism. With the development of capitalism the nations became absorbed in the effort to achieve geographical boundaries which would at the same time render them economic units. In order to accomplish this the rising manufacturing class sought political power and cleared away the old barriers to production and trade which the feudal system and the mercantile policy had created. It was the politics of industrialism which liberated the great productive forces that were so quickly and so completely to change the face of the earth. It is easy to see now—for everyone can be wise after the event!—that this struggle is the real, although for the most part unconscious, meaning of the passionate appeal for nationality which so stirred Europe, and not infrequently plunged her into war, during the nineteenth century.

I should like to suggest that we in Canada are perhaps passing through the period of nationalism although we are still dominated by the ideals and policies of the earlier mercantile period. In the meantime, the world has come to their third period, that of imperialism:

Imperialism. External policy under the mercantilist regime had provided at once the dynamic and the necessary means for the internal industrial transformation of the west European countries. Now that internal development in turn stimulates a new period of international relations. The evolution of capitalism consists in the ever more rapid accumulation of capital in a few hands, and especially in the constant revolutionising of machinery and the methods of production. The value of these changes lies in their "labour-saving" quality. Living labour-power is replaced by machinery, the flesh and blood man by the "iron man." Thus masses of workers are from time to time thrown out of work, and a relative over-population is caused: there are more men than there are jobs for. The presence of this army of unemployed is one of the most powerful factors in keeping down the wages of the employed workers to mere subsistence level. Yet at the same time, the productivity of labour increases by leaps and bounds. Thus the masses are less and less capable of buying and consuming the ever-greater amount of commodities they produce. Capitalism presents the paradoxical spectacle of an always-growing power to produce wealth, together with widespread want and misery among the masses. Moreover, precisely at the moment when the wealth actually produced is most plentiful, workers are thrown out of employment because they have already produced more than their masters can profitably dispose of. With unemployment comes a stoppage of wages also, and thus a further closing of the markets—i.e., the market represented by the expenditure of the wages of the workers; and this in turn intensifies the great problem of capitalism: how to dispose of its surplus product.

The treatise goes on to show how capitalism is forever changing customers into competitors. Let me read:

Exploitation of the masses at home, the destruction of the home market by the lowering of the standard of life among the masses to the level of mere subsistence—such is the original cause of the necessity for seeking spheres of remunerative investment abroad. In creating these spheres of investment, the latter are themselves transformed into capitalist nations, or at least are set on their way to becoming capitalist nations.

And here is the point:

This creation of new spheres of influence and investment, and the political control of backward countries constitutes the essence of modern imperialism. Its motives are primarily economic; it enters into the political life of the native country as a means to that economic end.

I suppose we are now far enough away from the South African war to view it somewhat dispassionately; hence I venture to cite it as an illustration of the development of this modern imperialism. Mr. J. A. Hobson in his Evolution of Modern Capitalism says:

Nowhere in the world has there ever existed so concentrated a form of capitalism as that represented by the financial power of the mining houses in South Africa, and nowhere else does that power so completely realize and enforce the need of controlling politics. . .Recognizing that the success of their financial operations and of their political adjuncts was dependent upon the movement of public opinion and public sentiment in South Africa in Great Britain, they bought the leading organs of the South African press. subsidized political parties in South Africa and Great Britain, and organized a moral propaganda among the churches and philanthropic bodies. . .By a concentrated exertion of all their moral and intellectual influence they engineered a catastrophe, from the ruin of which they have emerged with a firmer grip than ever upon the substantial resources of the country and its government.

Think of it, Mr. Speaker: Within the short space of a little over a hundred years Great Britain has fought with the French and the Russians, with Arabs and Afghans and Zulus, with Boers and Ashantis and Burmese and Chinese, with Germans and Austrians, with Turks and Bulgarians, and with a host of smaller peoples. Are we forever to continue this game, and are we in this fair country of ours to be dragged in at any time that some of our commercial adventurers undertake to exploit some still unexploited part of the world? Think of the history of imperialism even since 1882, a date which is within the memory of most of us in this House. I would simply glance over some of the events. In 1882 Egypt, in which country the foreign control encouraged the nationalist movement, Great Britain crushed the revolt and there followed the so-called "temporary" occupation which still continues. Then there was the Venezuela boundary dispute of 1895 and 1896, closely connected with the gold fields, and the trouble in Persia in 1896 indirectly connected with the growing tobacco trade at that time and later on certain loans. In 1895 came the trouble in South Africa to which I have already referred, and concerning which Mr. Brailsford has summed up the cause in a couple of sentences:

What the mine owners really at bottom desired was cheaper labour, and their effort to acquire political power through the franchise had no other object. "Good government," as one of them reckoned, would mean two and a half million a year in dividends—War of steel and gold, pp. 55-6.

This war resulted in the establishment of Kaffir and Chinese cheap labour and compound slavery in the Rand mines, and in the reduction of white men's wages. I need not refer to the Anglo-Japanese alliance into which Britain was practically forced because of her growing isolation in other quarters, nor to the Fashoda incident after the settlement of which the Associated Chambers of British Commerce passed a resolution in favour of an entente between England and France for the mutual commercial benefit of the two countries. Nor need I go into the question of the Moroccan crisis, nor of the Anglo-Russians relations of 1906-7, concerning which we have not yet heard the last and because of which we have had so much trouble in re-establishing relations between Great Britain and the Soviet republic. The treaty between Great Britain and Russia had reference to their relations in Persia, Tibet and Afghanistan. Then there was the Triple Entente of 1907. Great Britain about this time became involved in financial complications in China. The republican reformers were led by Sun Yap Sen. Their powerful backers, the Shanghai Chamber of Commerce and the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation, were representative of British economic interests in China. With regard to all these imperialistic ventures I do not know that we have any clearer statement than that made by Sir Edward Grey in the British House of Commons on July 10, 1914, just before the outbreak of the war, when he said:

> I regard it as our duty wherever British capital is forthcoming in any part of the world, and is applying for concessions to which there are no valid political objections, that we should give it the utmost support that we can, and endeavour to convince the foreign government concerned that it is to its interest as well as our own to give the concessions for railways and so forth to British firms who carry them out at reasonable prices and in the best possible way.

I think it is nearly twenty years ago since personally I became aware of some of the evils of imperialism. In the Evangelical school in which I was brought up, people were in the habit of referring to some particular time and place as the time and place of their conversion. Well, I can date my conversion so far as imperialism is concerned. I was converted as the result of a visit some twenty years ago to the Army and Navy museum in Whitehall, where, as I went through chamber after chamber, I saw flags that had been picked up on various battlefields, stained with the blood of British soldiers. I saw tattered garments that had been stripped from the bodies of poor natives in almost every part of the world, and I saw engines of war, ancient and modern. It was then that it began to dawn upon me what imperialism really meant and what militarism involved, and from that time on I have tried to do what little I could to keep this country at least out of the imperialistic game. My convictions arrived at in Whitehall were confirmed a few months after by a visit to Egypt, where I learned something of what was going on at that time on the upper Nile, and how the British had been sending in punitive expeditions whenever it was necessary to quell the justifiable ambitions of some of the native tribes who were fighting for their very lives.

To-day I do not intend to discuss in any detail the causes of the Great war, although I feel that we have there the very best exemplification that we can find of a great struggle brought on by what were fundamentally economic causes. In this connection, I should like to refer the House to our distinguished fellow-citizen, John S. Ewart, whose very painstaking work on the Roots and Causes of Wars is well worth perusal by every hon. member. With regard to modern wars, may I give the opinion of the late President Wilson. In a speech delivered at St. Louis he said:

> Is there in this audience any man or any woman, nay, is there any child, who does not know that the seeds of war are sown in hot, successful, commercial and industrial rivalry?

There are some people in Canada, it would appear, who have not yet learned that, even after the years that have elasped since that utterance was made and since so many books have been published on the question.

Without fully going into the references on this question, with the consent of the House, I should like simply to place upon Hansard particulars of about a dozen books in which the sources, at least so far as the British writers are concerned, are given in detail. They are:

Roch:—Lloyd George and the War. (Chatto & Windus).

Mr. G. P. Gooch, the eminent British historian, in the Contemporary Review of August, 1921, at page 181, said:

> We have now discovered that the Great War was caused by the bungling of a handful of highly placed individuals in different countries.

That is the historians have now come to the point where they frankly recognize that much that was told us during the war consisted of fairy stories, and that many of the appeals made during the war were absolutely without any true foundation.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am not so much concerned about the last war as I am about the next war. Now, what about the next war?

Within the last few days we have had a statement that I think ought to give any thoughtful man pause. According to the report in the Montreal Gazette of March 18 of a speech delivered by Sir Esme Howard, British Ambassador, before the Chicago Association of Commerce, he said:

> The next war will be a struggle for markets, and will be waged as bitterly as any that has ever sprung from traditional hatreds, national jealousies or territorial ambitions.

And again:

> The whole energies of governments will be bent toward the all-important, all-absorbing object of finding markets in other countries for the surplus production of their own, and of preventing their own from being swamped by the surplus production of the others.

We have clear revelations of the designs of the imperialists all through the carrying on of the last war. In passing, I would refer to the secret treaties, of which we in Canada were given no information whatever, and to the best of my knowledge have never yet been published in any of our leading Canadian papers. There was the treaty dealing with the partition of Persia in 1915; the treaty with Russia respecting Constantinople in 1915; the secret treaty—and I think the most disgraceful—with Italy of 1915; the treaty for the partition of Asiatic Turkey in 1916; the treaty between Russia and Japan in 1916.

Had I time I should like to have referred to the economic clauses of the Peace treaty of Versailles where, from every one of those clauses there sticks out the imperialist ambitions of certain great groups in the United Kingdom. But I must content myself by referring hon. members to Keynes' Economic Consequences of the Peace, or to any other book in which those clauses are set forth and explained.

I should like also to have referred to the system of mandates which has grown up in the period following the war, a system which, it seems to me, is absolutely unjustifiable in its character, since through it the more backward countries are placed under the arbitrary control of certain "advanced" nations.

I should like to refer to the imperialism that is manifested in the Dawes report, a report concerning which no less an authority than Lloyd George said a few years ago that it was not the work of the statesmen of Great Britain and of France, but was essentially the work of the international financiers. This Dawes report has had the effect of threatening to reduce the workers of Germany to industrial serfdom. Already its reactions have been so keenly felt in Great Britain that she is being forced to safeguard the standards of life in Germany in order that there will not be unfair competition from German workers in the products that are also manufactured in Great Britain—and so, as the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) suggests to me, lowering the standard of life in Great Britain. Thus so intimately is one country to-day connected with the other that in order to maintain the prevailing standard of life in Great Britain the British government to-day is forced to consider the maintenance of proper standard of living in Germany.

As I said a little while ago, I do not propose to discuss the bearing of the Locarno treaty on the subject matter of my resolution. Someone has said that it is the political supplement, as the Dawes report is the financial supplement, of the Versailles treaty. It may seem to be taking a good deal of the time of the House to go into these matters even in so cursory a way; still it is eminently fitting that we should do so. We are now at peace, and when we are at peace we have the only opportunity which is ever given to a people to discuss the question of international relations; when we are at war there is no opportunity whatever. I want to read a paragraph or two from an authority whom I have already quoted to-day, Mr. Arthur Ponsonby, Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs in Ramsay MacDonald's government. Mr. Ponsonby is not by any means an alien; he comes from one of the oldest and most respected families of Great Britain; he is not in any sense irresponsible; he is not even a member of any communist organization. Yet what does he say? In a letter published in the Nation and Athenaeum of September 14, 1925, I find the following:

> Our government denied having made any agreement with France before the war. Yet an agreement not only existed but turned out to be a binding "obligation of honour."
> Our government knew that Germany alone was not solely responsible for the war, and although this fiction had to be put into the Treaty of Versailles there is no responsible minister who would maintain it now. But at the time it had to be declared.
>
> Our government knew that France and Russia had been expecting and preparing for war (as the disclosed communications between their ministers have since proved to be the case). But they represented the outbreak of war as coming from the enemy on innocent and unprepared nations.
>
> Our government knew that if Germany had not violated Belgian neutrality France would have done so; and a French general has recently admitted this in an article in "l'Ere Nouvelle." It was only the common sense of military strategy, of which we were fully aware. But the popular indignation which could be roused by the invasion of Belgium was an immense asset.
> Our government knew during the course of the war that the Serbian government were directly responsible for the murder of the Arch-Duke at Serajevo. But they never told us.

Our government knew that the Russian general mobilization preceded and caused the German mobilization, but we only discovered the documents to prove this towards the end of the war.

Our government knew there were no Russian troops in this country. But it was a rumour of strategic value, and they carefully abstained from ever denying it.

Our government knew that there were no corpse factories in Germany, but they framed their answers in parliament to this ridiculous supposition by suggesting, although never affirming, that there were.

I could multiply instances had I the space. But these may suffice to show how war makes it necessary to suppress the truth, which is the most insidious method of spreading falsehood.

I said a few moments ago, Mr. Speaker, that during a time of peace we have our only opportunity of discussing war, and to prove this I should like to read from an order in council passed in Canada in April, 1918. It is well that in peace times we remember how during war times our freedom is taken from us. The order in council is as follows:

Whereas the mind of the entire people should be centered upon the proper carrying out in the most effective manner of that final decision, and that all questioning in the press or otherwise of the causes of that war, the motives of Canada, of Great Britain, or the Allies, in entering upon and carrying out the same and the policies of them adopted for its prosecution must necessarily divert attention from the one great object on which it should be so centered, and tend to defeat or impede the effective carrying out of that decision, ... It shall be an offence to print, publish, or publicly express an adverse or unfavourable statement, report, or opinion concerning the causes of the present war, or the motives or purposes for which Canada, or the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or any of the allied nations entered upon, or are prosecuting the same, which may tend to arouse hostile feeling, create unrest, or unsettle, or inflame public opinion. . . . .

This, I may say, was under penalty of a maximum fine of $5,000 or imprisonment for five years, or both. In harmony with this order in council, the houses of parliament authorized their Speakers to delete from the official reports of the debates any adverse statement, report, or opinion concerning the causes of the war, or the motives or purposes for which Canada and Great Britain, or any of the allied nations, had entered upon the struggle. During war, then, it becomes treason to talk peace. Surely, now that we are between wars, it may be permitted to us to speak.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am firmly convinced that the common people of Canada do not want another war. If we want war we must prepare for war, but I say it is equally true that if we want peace we must prepare for peace. That is the great truth this House must learn. While we have had war policies for a number of years in this country, and while the war psychology has dominated even this house of parliament, I believe the time is rapidly approaching when peace policies may be freely discussed upon the floor of this House, and when the general sentiment which is growing throughout the country will enable us to adopt steadily and definitely those policies which will make for peace. The war lords, the imperialists, the great financial and commercial and industrial kings, have largely captured the machinery of the government of the empire. Perhaps I cannot prove that; I think you have but to read many of the official records of the war and many of the books written since the war to have that statement fully borne out. Let me repeat it—and I give it here simply as a statement, because it affords the reason for the introduction of this resolution at this time: The war lords, the imperialists, the great financial and commercial and industrial kings, have largely captured the machinery of the government of the empire. It is for us to join hands with those of the other parts of the empire who are striving for peace. Surely we should at least assert our right to protect the lives of our children.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that we are too prone to think of the triumphs of the past, and too little given to consider what our action ought to be with regard to the problems presenting themselves to us now? In the age-long conflict between the forces of advance and the forces of reaction, the tide of battle goes backward and forward. Sometimes we are apt to say, "Well, our fathers carried the field; our fathers took this trench, and we are proud of what our fathers have done". Yes, then what shall we do? There are those who would sit down in the trench and fly their little flag and say, "My father took this trench, and from now on I dedicate my life to singing the praises of my father". In the meantime the battlefront has swept five miles ahead. I suggest that true patriotism consists not so much in looking to the past or in singing the praises of the past as in getting out of that trench and forward into the firing line. We have had wars in the past, all through history; we all know that. We have made advances in freedom in times past—I will not say whether because of wars or in spite of them—but we are proud of the advances which have been made in liberating peoples in times past. To-day, however, we face a greater problem, that of securing for the people of this country and of the world complete economic freedom. The battle is sweeping on ahead, and the problems are new. Our fathers never had to face such problems, and I would suggest that we show true loyalty to the spirit of our fathers if we leave the trenches which they have taken and press on to more advanced ground. I would even venture to suggest that we are most truly loyal to the principles of our British forefathers if we do not rest on the precedents or institutions which they have created, but rather ourselves advance to create new precedents and new forms of government by which we may work out our common life in this new age.

Mr. W. W. KENNEDY (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I ask hon. members the reason for this resolution. What is there behind this resolution brought forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth)? What purpose does this resolution serve? What purpose can this resolution serve? I submit, Sir, that this resolution deserves nothing better than to be buried by this House without the aid of bell, book or candle. It is a resolution which, in my humble opinion, does not deserve anything but very short shrift at the hands of this House.

Why is it brought here? I do not purpose to go into any detailed discussion as to the position of Canada within the empire; I do not think such detailed discussion is called for by this resolution. I do take this opportunity, however, to say to this House and to the people of Canada, that the sentiments as enunciated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre do not in any appreciable degree represent the ideas or thoughts or the people of the great city of Winnipeg.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: If I might interrupt—

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I may tell my hon. friend that when I am finished, if he cares to ask me any questions, I shall be glad to answer any and all questions that he sees fit to ask.

Mr. Speaker, I say it is not only my privilege but my duty to rise upon this occasion because, representing, as I do, a constituency of the city of Winnipeg, I feel that I have a very personal and a somewhat local interest in what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says. Let me read the resolution:

> That, in the opinion of this House, Canada should refuse to accept any responsibility for complications arising from the foreign policy of the United Kingdom.

"Canada should refuse to accept any responsibility." Mr. Speaker, a refusal predicates a demand, an insistence, or at the least a request. When has it ever been demanded of Canada by the United Kingdom that Canada should, in the words of the hon. member, be dragged into any of the empire's wars? Never since Canada was, has Canada by the demand of the United Kingdom been dragged into her wars? Never has she been requested to enter into them, nor is she requested at this time.

Under what conditions has Canada entered into the empire wars? By her own choice, by the choice of the people of Canada, and by that choice alone. I agree to this extent, that Canada recognizes no compulsion. Canada is impelled by no compulsion other than by the free-will choice of a loyal people, other than by the call of blood, other than by the call of kin calling to kin, other than by the desire of one nation in the great British commonwealth of nations to answer some great call of national or imperial need, answering some great call to fight for the right. Under such conditions in the past Canada has willingly entered. May I here and now express the hope that under such conditions in the future Canada again will enter, if need be.

Now why this resolution? Is there some imminent, pressing peril of the day from which we would escape? Has some call come over to Canada to send men again for the empire's need? If the ears of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre have caught it, I doubt if those of any other hon. member have heard it. If it be true, and it is true, that Canada to-day decides of her own volition whether or not she will enter into empire wars, if the Mother Country never has demanded, and does not demand to-day, that Canada take part in her wars, if we are under no compulsion to take part therein, then why this resolution? Why the need?

5 p.m. Is it to sever some link, to cast off some bond that binds us to the Mother Country? Is that the purpose? Does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre think that by this parliament passing such a resolution, by declaring here and now to the world at large that Canada under no conditions will accept any responsibility for the needs of the empire—does he think that by such a declaration to the world Canada as a nation is going to increase in stature? Does he think that will make Canadians prouder to be Canadians than they are to-day? Why declare that we will not do something which we are not bound to do?

Let me give an illustration. The law does not require any hon. member of this House to give succor in time of stress to his own mother. The law impels no such duty; it imposes no duty upon the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre or upon any other member to provide such succor; but will any hon. member increase his stature by one cubit, will any hon. member improve his standing in the community, will he rise in stature as a man, by declaring to the public that he will not be responsible under any conditions for the needs of his own mother? Let us then not do something at this time which will not add to the stature of Canada or of Canadians, but rather will make us walk through the streets of our cities, not with upright head and buoyant step, but ashamed of the fact that we are Canadians, ashamed of the fact that some have thought it necessary to advertise to the world that under no conditions will we be responsible for assistance to the empire—and that at a time when we are enjoying many, many of the benefits of membership in that empire.

While it cannot add to our stature, may it not do harm to pass a resolution such as this? Envisage the passing of this resolution by the elder daughter, so-called, of this British commonwealth of nations. What will the citizens of the empire treading the streets of London say? What will the citizens of the city of Melbourne say? What will the people say in Capetown and India? What will the people throughout Canada say? I say that if we pass this resolution we shall be going out of our way to place ourselves as Canadians in a position which I feel sure few hon. members of this House would care to occupy.

Again I ask, why, then, this resolution? What is behind it? I ask this House, is it a sincere desire on the part of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to help Canada? Is that his purpose? I say no. I say his purpose is simply to gain a little kudos with a certain little coterie of agitators in this country of whom we as Canadians ought to be ashamed. That may be a hard thing to say of a member. I was pleased to learn when I came to this House that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had acquired something of a reputation in this House for sincerity. I call now into question the sincerity of the hon. member.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. My motives in introducing this motion to-day were questioned a moment ago, and now my sincerity is questioned. I think it is not in keeping with the rules of the House that that should be done.

Mr. SPEAKER: Perhaps the hon. gentleman can find another epithet. In this House members are supposed to be honest and sincere.

[Mr. W. W. Kennedy.]

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I might say, Mr. Speaker, I chose the softest word I could think of.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I must ask that that expression be withdrawn.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I will withdraw, upon the ruling of the Chair, the intimation of his lack of sincerity, but I question here and now the motive that lies behind this motion. Perhaps since the question of the sincerity of the hon. member has been raised, I might draw attention to a little incident that occurred in this House not very long ago, on the evening when this House adjourned for recess, and referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre a few days ago under the question of privilege. It appeared to me that the hon. member designedly left with this House the impression that he did not rise when the national anthem was being sung, partly by inadvertence and partly because of the particular setting of the background under which the anthem was being sung. That was the impression left with this House.

I endeavoured to ask the hon. member if he would state to this House whether he himself had any personal objection to rising when our national anthem was sung, but he declined to answer. In order that his position on that matter may be perfectly clear to this House, I take this opportunity of saying—and I declare it to be true—that subsequent to his election as a member of this House on the 29th October last, and prior to coming to this House, he with his colleague, the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Heaps) and I, were invited to attend the banquet of the Manitoba branch of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy held in the Royal Alexandra hotel in Winnipeg, the exact date of which is immaterial. On that occasion, when the programme was completely finished, and we were guests, and the toast to the king was called, and that great assembly of banqueters stood up, toasted the king and sang the national anthem, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and his colleague the hon. member for North Winnipeg, who were seated at the same table with myself, sat throughout.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I must protest that that statement is absolutely untrue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. HEAPS: I make the same statement as my hon. colleague. On the occasion that the hon. gentleman refers to I, with my hon. colleague, was standing up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I point out that the hon. member who is speaking was present and is in as good a position to know as either of the hon. gentlemen, and he does not have to withdraw a word he says.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rules of the House are well known. When a member makes a statement about another member, and that other member denies the statement, the member making the statement must accept the denial, and I hope the hon. gentleman will accept the denial made by the the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He was there himself.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask hon. members to carry on this debate in a calm and dignified manner, and I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, who has impressed this House with his eloquence and ability, will live up to the traditions of the House.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Being a new member, I find the rules somewhat confusing. I am not permitted to say to the hon. member from Winnipeg North Centre that he is insincere, and yet apparently he is permitted to rise and tell me that what I have said is an untruth.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the statement the hon. member has made is a reflection on the ruling of the Chair. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has made the statement that both the member for Winnipeg North Centre and the member for North Winnipeg at a banquet given in that city did not rise during the singing of the national anthem. Both those hon. gentlemen deny that statement and say it is not a true statement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I desire to put before you, Mr. Speaker, more fully what I sought to say a minute ago very briefly. I quite realize that if any hon. member in this House makes a statement as to another's conduct, either on the basis of report or on any evidence whatever, save the evidence of his own senses, he must accept the denial of that other member if it comes; but surely the rules of this House do not go to the extent that an hon. member who is present himself, who is just as competent to give a statement of the facts as the hon. member about whom the statement is made, must accept the word of the hon. member against the evidence of his own eyes. He is in just as good a position as the hon. member to state the facts. If the same rule were applied to both, the member for Winnipeg South Centre could call upon the member for Winnipeg North Centre to accept his word. But it does not go to that extent. It merely goes to the extent that he must accept his word as the word of a man of honour when "peculiarly" in a position to know, and that is all.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am not prepared to accept the position so ably put forward and argued by the right hon. leader of the opposition. In a court of law a judge has to decide between the statements of the party on one side and the party on the other. Here I have to follow the traditions and usages of the House and to say that the denial of the hon. member must be accepted. In the present instance we have the further fact of the denial of two members against the statement of one. Surely, as a judge, I must accept the word of the two hon. members. At all events it is a well known rule that when a statement is made and categorically denied by the hon. member of whom it is made the denial must be accepted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why not have the other hon. member accept the statement of the hon. member who has the floor? They are both members of this House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has made the statement that the hon. members for North Winnipeg and Winnipeg North Centre did not rise during the singing of the national anthem at a public banquet in the city of Winnipeg, and the hon. members in question having denied the statement, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is obliged under the rules of the House to accept the denial.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not made myself clear. I quite agree that no unworthy motive can be imputed. The hon. member himself knows the motive and nobody else knows it. His word must be accepted as the word of a man of honour. But there has been no imputing of motives in making the statement about the hon. members standing or rising. It is no more incumbent on the member for Winnipeg South Centre to accept the word of the member for North Winnipeg or the word of the member for Winnipeg North Centre than for them to accept the word of the member for Winnipeg South Centre.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think there is no need to discuss this point any longer. I have given my ruling. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre states that the two hon. members to whom he has referred did not rise during the singing of the national anthem, but the statement being denied by both of them the hon. member is bound in honour to accept the denial.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I defer to your ruling Mr. Speaker. Still it puts me in rather a—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I understand your ruling, Mr. Speaker, means the statement must be withdrawn.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I repeat it is true.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. By the rules of the House the hon. gentleman is bound to withdraw the statement.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I defer to your ruling, Sir, and withdraw whatever statement you desire withdrawn as to the conduct of these hon. gentlemen. I am not permitted to say I saw it.

I was discussing a circumstance which to my mind casts some light upon the motives which might lie behind such a resolution as this. Perhaps I might discuss some others. Shortly after the opening of this House, the hon. member for North Winnipeg saw fit to make some reference to a strike which took place in the city of Winnipeg in 1919. I do not propose to go into it at length, but I will say this that the strike took place at a time following over four years of a great war which stirred this country to its very roots, at a time when our men were returning to their cities, and those who returned to the city of Winnipeg in those days found there a condition of riot, which was, to them at least, a matter of great surprise in a country which they thought was then a country at peace.

Mr. HEAPS: Why did the objection come—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Am I to understand that the hon. member who has the floor allows the hon. member to put the question?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: If as stated by the hon. member there was such a condition of peace in the city of Winnipeg at that particular time, why did the objection come from his side of the House to the production of papers concerning the 1919 incident?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I am sure the hon. member for North Winnipeg does not think the papers are under my control.

Mr. HEAPS: The objection certainly came from that side of the House.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): While it is quite true that the hon. member for North Winnipeg was clever enough to be acquitted when he was tried following those strikes, he and his confrere, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, were two of the prime movers in that strike.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I again must absolutely deny the statement which has just been made and I must ask that the statement be withdrawn. Let me say, if I may, whilst the strike was in progress—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Am I allowed to make a statement?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman is entitled to explain his question of privilege.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I might say that I arrived in Winnipeg in the middle of the strike. I did not know when I left my home in Vancouver that the strike had been called. I was not a member of the strike committee. I could not be said to be a prime mover in it and when the government then in power passed legislation which took away—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Have I a right to make my statement?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think a member has a right to rise to speak in the middle of an hon. member's speech without permission, especially when there is no ground of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: I differ from the right hon. gentleman. I understand there is a question of privilege raised by the hon. member. There seems to be a great deal of excitement over this question of the Winnipeg strike which has nothing to do with the matter under debate. I understand the hon. member rises on a question of privilege because the hon. member who has the floor said that he had been one of the prime movers in the Winnipeg strike. Will the hon. member state his point briefly so that I may direct the hon. member if he has to be directed in the present instance?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am attempting to do that. I said that so far from being one of the prime movers in that strike, I did not arrive in Winnipeg until the strike had been in progress for three weeks; that I was not a member of the strike committee, but after legislation had been passed which deprived—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rise again to a point of order. Is the hon. member to be allowed to make a reply to a speech under the shield of a question of privilege?

Mr. SPEAKER: No, but the hon. member must be given an opportunity of denying or explaining. I have heard only one part of his statement. I want him to conclude his remarks and then I will rule.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If he is allowed to conclude his remarks, there is no use of rising to a point of order at any time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the right hon. member rise to a question of order?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has the floor. He has made a statement as to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. If the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says that is a personal allusion within his peculiar knowledge and he denies it, that is his right on a question of privilege, but it is not competent for an hon. member to rise and argue the subject out and say it is a question of privilege. He cannot do that. He is not entitled to argue the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not share at all the views of the right hon. gentleman. If I were accused of having been the chief mover in a strike, especially the Winnipeg strike, I would consider my personal honour was in question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes and would deny it.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would rise on a question of privilege because the honour of a member is thus impugned. The statement having been made by the hon. member who has the floor, the mover of this resolution rises and he is stating that he was not the chief mover in that strike. I want to let him finish his remarks in order that I may rule exactly. If he is interrupted at any moment, there cannot be any debate. I would ask the hon. member to be as brief as possible.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am trying to be brief. As I was saying, I did not arrive in Winnipeg until the strike had been in progress for three weeks. I was never a member of the strike committee nor had I any part in the direction of that strike. When legislation was passed by this House at the instance of the right hon. gentleman, who is now leader of the opposition, which had the effect of depriving a large number of workers, in fact everybody born outside of Canada, the right to trial by jury—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now I want to make a speech in reply to that.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I think I have the floor.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The right hon. gentleman is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has stated that the government of which I was the head passed legislation which had the effect of depriving a great many people out of work of their right to trial by jury.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was it?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Which had the effect of depriving a large number of workers, in fact everybody born outside of Canada, of the right to trial by jury.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I want now to make a reply to that. In the first place, the legislation to which the hon. member refers was not passed by the government of which I was the head. The hon. member is quite as near the facts in this regard as in any other part of his entire speech. The legislation was passed some time before the government, of which I had the honour to be the head, came into existence. It did not deprive anyone of the right to trial by jury. The legislation referred to was legislation under which those who came from other countries, if they were subject to deportation from Canada under the rules and laws of the Immigration department, were equally subject whether they came from the United Kingdom or elsewhere.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The right hon. member is not speaking just now to a question of privilege.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I yield to your ruling, Mr. Speaker; it is entirely right. I only ask that it be applied to the hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth).

Mr. SPEAKER: May I urge the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to be as brief as possible in his statement? He is interrupting the hon. member who has the floor (Mr. Kennedy, Winnipeg) on a question of privilege and such a question should be stated concisely. If such a practice is not rigidly observed no debate is possible.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I can easily state my point, Mr. Speaker. I have said that I was not present when the strike began, nor was I responsible either for its initiation or for the conduct of it. I repeat, however, that we had legislation which deprived those born outside of Canada—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rise again to a question of privilege.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Then, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have explained a matter with which I was definitely concerned—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is raising a point of order in relation to the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen)?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not yet stated the question of privilege to which I have just risen.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I have raised a point of order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I submit, Mr. Speaker, I have the right to state my question of privilege before the Minister of Justice raises his point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask members on both sides of the House not in any way to defeat the rules of the House. I am sure the debate can proceed without undue interruption. I have heard the statement of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with reference to the suggestion that he had been one of the chief movers in the strike of which mention has been made, and I am satisfied from his explanation that he denies having been one of the promoters of that strike. He denies the allegation. Is that correct?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: That is correct, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: Then the right hon. member who leads the opposition is bound to accept that denial. Let me read the following from Bourinot, who undoubtedly will be readily accepted by hon. members on both sides:

> It has been formally ruled by Speakers in the Canadian Commons that a statement by an hon. member respecting himself and peculiarly within his own knowledge must be accepted, but it is not unparliamentary to temperately criticize statements made by a member as being contrary to the facts; but no imputation of intentional falsehood is permissible.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. SPEAKER: Now let the debate proceed.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker. But since the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has seen fit to take up so much time by way of explanation, perhaps he would not be averse to explaining further by answering this question: Was he one of those who assisted in forwarding the strike in question?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Am I permitted to answer that question?

An hon. MEMBER: Surely.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I answer the question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that a question has been asked of the hon. member.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, so far as the question goes, I would say that after that legislation had been passed to which I have referred—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —one of the gentlemen concerned, a man of British birth and editor of the newspaper to which reference has been made, was threatened with deportation. Although his arrest had not been legal he was threatened with deportation by the right hon. gentleman who is at present leader of the opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rise to a question of privilege. This statement, which the hon. member makes by way of excuse from the manly duty of answering a direct question, is wholly wrong and entirely aside from the truth and the facts. I want the hon. member to withdraw it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would say—

Mr. MEIGHEN. I insist that the hon. member withdraw the statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member (Mr. Woodsworth) must accept the denial of the leader of the opposition, who repudiates in toto the charge just made.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the right hon. gentleman what it is he wishes me to withdraw?

Mr. STEVENS: I beg to submit to you, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. STEVENS: I submit with deference, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) should withdraw the statement, which is objectionable.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have already asked him to do so.

Mr. STEVENS: He must submit to the ruling of the Chair just as any other member has to do.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I must ask the Chair to tell me what I am expected to withdraw.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac). You had better withdraw all that you said. That would be the easiest thing to do.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) made a statement concerning the leader of the opposition which that right hon. member has denied unqualifiedly. Under the rules that denial must be accepted and the statement withdrawn to which objection has been taken.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I withdraw the statement until such time as it can be debated on the floor of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member must withdraw it absolutely. Any delay would be eternal if until the hon. member might prove that statement, for the reason that I was never Minister of Immigration.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must withdraw the statement without qualification.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker. Now am I permitted to say—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member may state his case as briefly as he can.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: All I want to say is this: After the editor of the paper had been arrested and, as I have said, although he was British-born, threatened with deportation, I acted as editor for one week out of the six weeks of the trial. There was brought against me a charge with which the crown could not proceed when the matter came before the courts. That is the connection I had with the Winnipeg strike.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, I wish now to refer to something that was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) shortly after this House opened. When the question—

An hon. MEMBER: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Give him a chance, sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: There cannot be a point of order, no statement having yet been made concerning the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask members on both sides of the House to comply with the rules and not make these frequent interruptions. I must also ask the hon. member who now has the floor to confine himself to the subject matter of the resolution. The Winnipeg strike has nothing whatever to do with that resolution. The resolution before the House is:

> That, in the opinion of the House, Canada should refuse to accept any responsibility for complications arising from the foreign policy of the United Kingdom.

Will the hon. member please confine himself to this resolution?

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, I was endeavouring to direct the attention of the House to certain incidents which, in my opinion, throw some light upon the reasons underlying such a resolution as this. I now refer to what the hon. member for North Winnipeg stated in the early days of this session when we were discussing the question of breaking precedents derived from British parliamentary traditions. His words were to this effect: he never heard of a precedent being broken but it gave him pleasure. Now, I ask this House to go behind the statement to the mind that prompted it. I think only one conclusion can be reached—that when a member in this House, which goes to the mother of parliaments for its inspiration and for its rules and traditions, makes such a statement, and supports this resolution, if he does support it, his motive can be easily divined.

Mr. HEAPS: May I rise to a point of order now, Mr. Speaker? May I tell the hon. gentleman that I have not yet seconded the resolution? I have not yet stated my views, and until he knows what stand I take, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that he has no right to indulge in prophecy.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think the point is well taken.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, I did not say that the hon. gentleman had stated what his views were on this resolution, but I am indulging in a little forecasting, and I think I can do so pretty correctly. It is not the first time that prophecies have been uttered in this House. Now, you will find not only the mover of this resolution naturally behind it, but unless I mistake very much the mentality of the member for North Winnipeg, and the man as I know him, he too will be found behind the resolution.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I may say that the entire Labour party is behind it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): I charge that behind this resolution there is the purpose to stir up in this country dissension and discord. Further, I say that it is not policies for the upbuilding of this country, policies that tend to the unification of all classes in the Dominion behind which we find the hon. member for North Winnipeg or the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. Rather are they to be found behind those policies that provoke dissension, discord, agitation and discontent. Discord and dissension are the meat and drink upon which they batten. While these hon. members express great concern for the labouring men throughout Canada, it appears to me that in matters of vital interest to labour they are more concerned with keeping alive discontent and dissension that in helping to solve the real problems of sane labour.

The hon. member in speaking to his resolution referred to himself as, "one of us labour men." If he and his colleague from North Winnipeg are to be deemed the friends of labour in this country, I say, God save labour from its friends.

Let me say again that the views expressed by the mover of the resolution are not the views of the citizens of Winnipeg at large, they are not the views of western Canadians at large, and I feel sure they are not the views of eastern Canadians at large. This resolution is but the fruition of certain lines of agitation that have been sedulously fostered by such men as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre through papers of the kind he has already referred to; I charge that on every occasion possible he takes the opportunity, not of endeavouring to solve the problem of labour, but of stirring up agitation. I say to hon. members on both sides that he owes his seat in this House, as does the hon. member for North Winnipeg, simply to the fruits of such agitation.

Now, Sir, I close with one reference. I would draw the attention of the House to the majority of three by which this government was sustained on the first vote in this parliament,—the most vital vote so far. This government was saved by a majority of three. A change of two would have been sufficient to vote it out. I ask the government to consider that they are maintained in office by virtue of a pledge given in writing to the hon. members to whom I have been referring, the hon. members for Winnipeg North Centre and North Winnipeg. I ask them to consider the fact that they are retained in office—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): — by these two hon. gentlemen.

Mr. LAPOINTE: This is not relevant, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): They don't like the truth.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Can you keep silent! Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre has made a speech, three-fourths of which was absolutely irrelevant; and his reference to the motion which was voted at the beginning of the session is equally irrelevant to the subject of debate. That is my point of order, Sir.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the fact that the House should deal with the resolution brought forward this afternoon. All these personalities have nothing whatever to do with the question under discussion, and I believe the people of this country expect much from this debate. I would request hon. members to speak to the resolution.

Mr. KENNEDY (Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who moved this resolution suggested that perhaps it should be passed in order that the position of Canada, particularly as affecting the United States of America, should be made clear. It occurs to me that we do not need a resolution such as this to make clear to the United States the position of Canada within the empire. I daresay the informed people of the United States are as well aware of our position as is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I might also suggest that in my opinion admiration for that position is widespread throughout the neighbouring republic. I do not think, therefore, that a resolution such as this can do anything towards clearing the air, either for the United States or for any other nation of the world.

Let me say this in closing. The hon. member asks where Canada stands, and suggests that our position within the empire should be clarified. I would simply say that so far as Canada's position within the empire is concerned, there is no doubt. As to what action she shall take respecting any future war, we may well abide the arrival of that day. Our position in relation to the empire to-day is that of a nation within a commonwealth of nations, and one of the senior members of that partnership. As in the past, so in the future, Canada will, I trust, be prepared, so long as she shares that distinction and that honour, to accept her full responsibility and whatever obligation her position entails.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I do not quite agree with the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Kennedy), if he thinks that the question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) can be disposed of in such an easy manner, nor do I think that the people of Canada or the other portions of the empire would be much enlightened by the connection he has tried to draw between the constitutional position of Canada in the empire and the part played in the Winnipeg strike by the two Labour members. Neither do I believe that it will advance anyone, any party or any country to attempt to minimize the importance of an issue of this nature by impugning the motives of anyone connected with it. I am prepared, for my part, to listen with much patience to the most ardent imperialistic argument that can be presented on an issue of this nature; and I suppose there is an equal desire on the part of sincere imperialists to listen to those Canadian and British subjects who take an opposite view. It seems to me that if we are to develop in this House and outside of this House something of what was called the spirit of Locarno—I hope it is still alive—it will not be done by stifling any expression of opinion on any aspect of this huge problem of imperial connection.

Now, Sir, to come at this time and say that we should wait for the next war to deal with the matter is, I think, entirely unworthy of our responsibility to the people of Canada and unworthy also of the connections which we have with Great Britain—connections which, for my part, I desire to preserve as long as possible and to make useful to Canada, to Great Britain, to the other portions of the empire, and to the world. Men just as devoted to the British Empire as the hon. member who has just taken his seat have judged that this is the time to discuss in a broad way the question of imperial relations. In Great Britain, in South Africa, in Australia and in New Zealand, men of all varieties and belonging to all shades of opinion, from the highest imperialist to the most radical anti-imperialist, have discussed these issues ever since the close of the war. They were considered at imperial conferences; they have been debated in the various parliaments of the empire; valuable articles have appeared in British reviews and in foreign publications. A very short time after the war—in fact, I should say when the war was still on—one of the most enlightened British imperialists, one of those devoted, sincere imperialists who have given much thought to this question, Mr. Lionel Curtis, went all around the British Empire, including Canada. He came in contact with men of various shades of opinion; he insistently spoke and wrote on the necessity, for the people of Canada as well as those in the other portions of the empire, of preparing, immediately after the war, to take up these issues of political and constitutional relations with Great Britain. Why should we not look upon these questions from that point of view, whether or not the wording of the motion is exactly that to respond to the needs? That is a very limited aspect of the question after all. Can we not at this time take one day to look seriously at these problems?

As this is a very broad subject, Mr. Speaker, may I ask you to now call it six o'clock, so that after dinner, and after the appeasement of the little squabbles we have had this afternoon, we may consider this question in a serious and, I hope, a broadminded spirit.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Speaker,—

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: With the hon. gentleman's permission, I should like to ask him a question. Before we rose at six o'clock he used the words "ardent imperialist." If he is going to discuss this question, I would like very much if he would tell us exactly what he means by the word "imperialist" in that sense.

Mr. BOURASSA: My excellent friend and neighbour who represents the county of Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) puts me a very simple question, but a very hard one to answer. I think it was Pascal who said that to properly define was a divine prerogative, that the man never lived who could give a proper definition. I am an ordinary man and, besides, I am very British in my concept of political things, and therefore not much given to cut-and-dried definitions. I think my hon. friend will easily find out from the observations that I am going to make what I mean by imperialist in the British sense. I may simply say at the start, in order to please my friend, for whom I have a great deal of personal friendship, that by imperialist or ardent imperialist—I do not care much for the "ardent"—I mean a man who believes that the British association of nations should be conducted primarily from London, by the influence of London, for the advantage of the United Kingdom, in the same sense, for example, that the Roman empire was governed for the benefit of Rome, in the same sense also in which the word was used some twenty-five years ago by Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, who was the great prophet of modern British imperialism.

Let us come back now to the question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and to what I might call the interruption of the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy), with regard to the importance of discussing the problem of inter-imperial relations now. While this somewhat marginal debate, if it can be called debate, was being carried on just before six o'clock, I was thinking of an observation made in the midst of the war by an English statesman, one of the most sensible, thoughtful, and practical men who governed the United Kingdom, and indirectly the British Empire, during the war, though not perhaps the most brilliant; I refer to the late Mr. Bonar Law. Even before the war was finished, when England with the other nations of Europe was in the thick of the struggle for victory, Mr. Bonar Law gave this warning:

> After this war the relations between the great dominions and the Mother Country can never be the same again.

This he wrote in December, 1915, in his preface to Sir Max Aitken's book, Canada in Flanders. Evidently this was not a casual thought, because a few months later, in September, 1916, speaking in London at a luncheon offered to Sir Edward Morris, Prime Minister of Newfoundland, Mr. Bonar Law, still Secretary of State for the Colonies, developed the same idea. He said:

> So far as the dominions are concerned, this war is being carried on under conditions which never existed in the world before, and which it is almost incredible to believe could have existed now. These great dominions are, in fact, independent states.

I recommend this definition to Canadians who are apt to get into a flurry every time the suggestion of autonomy or independence is made, contrary to so-called expressions of faith in solidarity between the various portions of the empire. Bonar Law proceeded:

> We could not have compelled a single one of them to send a man or contribute a penny. But they have sent their best, not so much to help us as to help the empire of which they are a part. These conditions can never occur again. It requires great good-will and good sense on the part of both the dominions and the authorities at home to enable the arrangement to work by which one set of men contribute lives and treasure and yet have no voice as to the way in which those lives and treasure are expended. That cannot continue. There must be a change.

These were not the words of a rabid revolutionist, with sinister motives, looking to a radical and sudden change in the relations between the Motherland and the self-governing dominions. No, it was the thoughtful word of a man closely connected with the affairs of the United Kingdom, of which he had become a distinguished citizen and statesman, and with the great Dominion of Canada in which he was born. With a sense of British citizenship, he had kept more than a mere trace of pride in the Dominion. He thought, as Mr. Joseph Chamberlain thought, that the dominions would not consent to continue to supply the men and treasure—willingly if you like—but at least to supply the means of war to be put practically at the disposal of a government responsible to only one of the parliaments of the British Empire, that parliament itself being responsible only to one section of the free electorate of the British Empire. Mr. Bonar Law had kept enough faith in the pride of British citizenship all round, not to believe that the free people of Canada, of Australia, Newfoundland, South Africa or New Zealand, would go on spending money and giving their blood for imperial causes, unless they had a voice and a real voice in the government of that empire and the framing of its policy. Perhaps he was wrong, but I do not think so, especially if one remembers that after all, those great problems of external policy, that control of foreign affairs which results occasionally in war, which manifests itself in diplomatic relations with various countries, has a direct or indirect bearing upon all internal policies. On this point, no student of British affairs, I think, has put it more clearly before the free peoples of the British Empire than the thoughtful writer whose name I mentioned this afternoon, Mr. Lionel Curtis. In 1916 he issued his first volume on the Problem of the Commonwealth, and in this volume I find these lines:

> In matters of peace and war, the first, greatest and most comprehensive of all public interests, South Africans are subject, in fact as well as in law to a government which exists, not in Pretoria nor in Cape Town, but in London. And so it is with Canada, Australia, and New Zealand. It is in London and not at Ottawa, Melbourne or Wellington that their ultimate destiny is made or marred. . . . . They may manage their own domestic affairs, regulate their commerce, create forces by land and sea, and do anything they please short of attempting to handle for themselves the ultimate issues of national life and death. Those issues, the moment they are raised, must be left to a government in which they have no more voice than the peoples of India, Egypt, or of Fiji. So far as the first, last and greatest of all national interests is concerned they are not self-governing dominions. They are simply dependencies, and no thinking man can face this conclusion and yet believe that communities like Canada and Australia can long continue to accept that position.

Now I ask how a question of such momentous importance, involving such far-reaching developments, can be settled with a striving for small party advantage, or by gibes of such a nature as we have heard this afternoon? I do not want to insist upon it, but I claim that we should give more thought, deep and intensive thought, to a problem of that nature and look at it from a point of view, I will not say entirely divergent from party interests—I quite well realize the exigencies of the party system—but I think we can for a moment put a stop to the narrowness of party spirit and think of these questions from the broad Canadian point of view, with the ultimate intention of coming to an agreement with Britain and the other dominions of the empire which would give satisfaction to all and advantage to the whole community.

But with regard to the effect of such a policy, or should I say lack of policy, upon internal matters, Mr. Curtis goes more deeply into the subject, and he appeals especially to the self-governing dominions on this ground. He says:

> On paper their autonomy in local affairs remained as before, "absolute, unfettered and complete."

These words were borrowed from Mr. Asquith's speech at the Imperial conference in 1911—

> But in practice those affairs were all profoundly modified by the exigencies of war. Schemes of development were cancelled, projects of social reform were suspended, and the people of the dominions suddenly discovered that the issues of peace and war are an interest which overmasters all others. They have found that until they control that interest their control of all others is purely provisional.

Now we are getting at the root of the question. It is the whole problem of conciliating the powers of self-government of each individual state in the British Empire and the common interests which all British communities have to conserve by conciliation and by understanding. It seems to me a problem well worthy of study and consideration in peace time, rather than in war time, when the voice of blood, the exigencies of national defence, or, if you like, the exigencies of imperial solidarity, stifle all other considerations. I think this is the proper time, when the empire is at peace and before the next Imperial conference, that the parliament of Canada should go into this problem with serious thought, with a full degree of self-consciousness of what is due to itself, its people and its future generations, of what is due also to those other communities composing the British Empire, so that we may all give to the world at large a striking example of the combination that can be made between principles of liberty and principles of unity.

No doubt the Great war, with the sacrifices it entailed to the various British communities, brought about a tremendous change in the relations between Great Britain and the self-governing possessions of the empire and also the great empire of India. But with due respect to those who have emphasized that change, may I suggest, as I have done on many previous occasions, that the change after all was not so extraordinary or unexpected as is generally considered now on account of the facts that underlie the change? To my mind, in this respect as in all other respects, the evolution that has taken place in the frame, the government and the life of the British Empire is the continuance of that extraordinary process, unique in the history of the world, which makes of British institutions a standard lesson, I will not say always to be copied, but certainly always to be studied with fruit and advantage by all, always to be admired and always to be considered. Therefore, it seems to me that instead of stopping at this or at that other point in the evolution of the relations between Great Britain and the various dominions, we should ask ourselves simply in what manner we should follow up that evolution and bring it to the best result possible for Canada first, because this is the part of the empire for which we have responsibility, and also for the advantage of the rest of the British dominions and the world at large.

If the House will bear with me with some patience, I would like my hon. colleagues to have a little look backwards into the history of our relations with the Motherland, in order to exemplify just what I have stated, namely, that we are always in the process of evolution; that there is no stopping point in the growth of our nationality, in the development of our affairs, external or internal.

From the time of the conquest of Canada by England until, let us say the midst of the last century, there was practically, so far as our outside relations are concerned, but one policy and it was that Canada had no responsibility in foreign affairs. The success of the American revolution had taught the rulers of England the timely lesson that a government acting in London and responsible to a parliament sitting at Westminster, had no moral right to impose taxation upon outstanding British colonies established by free British settlers who had made the sacrifices entailed in the quitting of their native land and the establishment of new colonies because they wanted to live their social life as they thought fit.

Even before the conclusion of the American revolution, the British government and the Imperial parliament had declared themselves incapable morally of taxing the colonies for imperial purposes. As regards British North America, divided as it was then into the various colonies of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Canada, first separated and then united, the policy pursued was "no responsibility, no taxation." But with the granting of self-government to those various colonies arose the problem of their defence. The consideration of the problem was precipitated by the Crimean war. If hon. gentlemen take the time and trouble to peruse some of the old books, they will find there some very interesting documents, despatches exchanged between the Colonial office and the various governors of those colonies as well as memoranda by the governments of those provinces to the home government. Perhaps I may quote one of them, a despatch from Lord Elgin, whom Sir Robert Borden very properly qualified not long ago as the first governor who really understood the mechanism of responsible government in Canada. This despatch, which is dated December 18, 1854. contains this paragraph:

> Although I hold that so long as the colonies have no voice in the imperial councils they are entitled to look to the imperial authorities for protection against hostilities which they have no share in provoking, and that it is therefore fitting that imperial garrisons should be maintained at certain important military stations such as Quebec, as a pledge that this protection, when the contingency occurs, will not be invoked in vain, I am confident that nothing will more effectually tend to the security of the empire, or to the establishment of a high standard of national and manly morals among the colonists, than the assumption by themselves of some portion of the responsibility in respect of self-defence and the preservation of internal tranquility, which has heretofore been cast upon the Mother Country.

The whole despatch is to be found in the Accounts and Papers of 1854-55, volume 36, pages 19 to 43. As a result, the following year the MacNab-Taché government brought in a militia bill based upon that principle, containing, of course, the reservation which had been put into every militia bill from 1777 down to that date, namely, that the militia of Canada was organized for the sole purpose of defending the soil of Canada and that the militia could not be sent outside of the territory of Canada except on "conterminous" territory, for the defence thereof. In those days they were clear on that point. The British in London as well as Canadians in Quebec and Toronto were under no misapprehension as to the fact that obligations were limited by responsibility, and that the people of Canada, having no say in imperial affairs, had no other obligation than to defend their own territory. The bill met with some opposition, which it would be interesting to read; but I will not weary the House with quotations from that ancient day. Then came the Secession war, accompanied by certain acts on the part of the British government, which I do not consider it necessary now to qualify. There was the "Trent" affair, and there was the "Alabama" incident, which threatened war between Great Britain and the United States. The British government was insistent in the demand that the colonial government should reorganize the defence of the country, and the Cartier-Macdonald government consented to recast the militia law. This time, however, there was a good deal of opposition in the House,—opposition that came mainly from English-speaking Canadians, from the representatives of Upper Canada. I will quote at the moment only one of the opinions manifested in the House at that time against the idea of increasing the military responsibility of Canada. Colonel Rankin, an undoubted loyalist, who had fought in the British army and in the colonial forces during the '37 Rebellion, spoke as follows:

If war overtakes us, it can only be caused by some question of imperial policy. We, as a province, have not the war-making power; no armed collision can take place between Canada and the United States founded upon any dispute between the government of the United States and our provincial government, though we are liable at any time to have our country over-run and devastated from end to end by the armed hosts of our powerful neighbour, in consequence of some such cause as that afforded by the outrage upon the Trent. If war had grown out of that unfortunate affair, we the people of Canada, regardless of all selfish considerations, and animated by sentiments of generous devotion to that flag which is the emblem of so many glorious recollections, would have rushed to arms as one man in the cause of England's honour; but, Mr. Speaker, if war had taken place, we Canadians, after that war was ended, and every town and village in our country had been reduced to ashes, or levelled with the ground, would doubtless have been "thanked" for our "loyalty" and then permitted to rebuild our homes and repair our ruined fortunes as best we might, consoled by the reflection, that though we had borne the brunt of a war growing out of a question in no way affecting our material interests, and in the prosecution of which the blood and the lives of our countrymen had been freely offered up, we had conquered the right still to call ourselves British subjects. Mr. Speaker, I claim to be behind no man in point of attachment to British institutions and "real" loyalty to the crown, but, Sir, loyalty is one thing, and "servility" is another, and in this country, I regret to say, the latter quality is sometimes mistaken for the former.

So pronounced was the opposition that the Cartier-Macdonald government was defeated on that bill. A new administration was formed under the direction of the Hon. John Sanfield Macdonald, another sturdy citizen of Upper Canada. A very interesting correspondence followed between the new Canadian government and the Colonial office, then directed by a distinguished Englishman, the Duke of Newcastle. I would suggest respectfully that hon. members refer to this correspondence. It is one of the most illuminating, one of the most comprehensive records which are to be found in our archives with regard to this question of the relations between Great Britain and the self-governing dominions. The Duke of Newcastle wanted the legislature of United Canada to put this military question beyond the reach of any possible accident of parliamentary or electoral caprice; in other words, to create a sort of military Fascism—a word which, of course, would be an anachronism at that time —on the margin of responsible government. But the government of Canada, perhaps because at that time the people of Canada, English-speaking and French-speaking alike, were nearer to the struggle and fight for the conquest of their rights as British subjects, was unmistakable in its expression of opinion, and gave the noble duke to understand that Canadians, as Colonel Rankin had put it, while loyal to the king were primarily loyal to themselves, to their country and to their rights as British subjects and were not going to deprive the parliament of the province of those prerogatives which the parliament of England had asserted for seven centuries against encroachments either from crown, from oligarchy, from aristocracy or from popular factions. And they gained their point. But not only did they gain the point; they gained also the respect of British statesmen. The hon. member (Mr. Kennedy, Winnipeg) who spoke this afternoon mentioned, I believe, something about measurements in the eyes of other British communities. If I have read my British and my Canadian history with some degree of light and comprehension, I have come to this conclusion, that every time we have asserted an equality of rights with the British at home, we have thereby grown in their eyes and gained increasing respect from them, inasmuch as we have proven to them, by so asserting ourselves, that we are worthy sons of the father and that we are not to be subjected to any dictation, whether by force, by corruption or by any other means that may be taken to induce a free British community to renounce its birthright, either in fact or in principle.

Very soon afterwards the delegates from the various provinces met together at Charlottetown to discuss the terms of confederation, meeting subsequently at Quebec and finally adopting the resolutions out of which confederation and its constitution were born. With regard to our relations with Great Britain, I fear that a good many readers and students, and even professors of constitutional law, have forgotten that those relations were not written down in black and white in our constitution. That constitution was the instrument of government for the internal affairs of Canada. It was the putting into an imperial statute of the terms of the contract or solemn treaty consented to by the various provinces of Canada to become one confederacy.

But the terms upon which that new-born nation would stand with regard to the Motherland were not, thank heaven, reduced to so many articles of law; there was enough British spirit on the other side of the ocean to prevent those broad terms of alliance between the mother state and the daughter, coming of age, from being circumscribed within the terms of a few articles of law, to be made subjects of dispute between lawyers and to be adjudicated by irresponsible tribunals. The terms upon which Great Britain and Canada were to stand in those predominant questions of peace and war were discussed freely in conversation—and in writing also, fortunately—and they are preserved in the archives of this parliament as well as in the archives of the Colonial office in London. Anybody who will take the trouble of doing so will find there in what spirit the Fathers of Confederation made their solemn agreement with the government of England with regard to Canada's contribution to defence and to matters of foreign policy. The exchange of thought was very free, very outspoken. Nobody then was afraid to speak of Canadian rights as separate from British rights. They had sense enough to understand that Canada, a country in America, has some interests different from those of England, a country in Europe; and they acted accordingly. In the report which was signed on July 12—

An hon. MEMBER: A bad date!

Mr. BOURASSA: Oh, no, not then; on July 12, 1865.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I hope the report was equal to the day.

Mr. BOURASSA: Oh, yes, the report was superior to the day, and far superior to such reports as we usually get now of that day. It was signed by such puny Canadians as John A. Macdonald, George Etienne Cartier, George Brown and A. T. Galt.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The first of those is a good twelfth of July man.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, but they understood the twelfth of July in a rather different manner and in rather different colours than the hon. gentleman. In those days the Orange order was under the authority of the government of Canada and of the Conservative party; now the Conservative party seems to be under the authority of the Orange order.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): We are making progress all the time.

Mr. BOURASSA: Surely; the hon. gentleman should take this as a compliment; it shows he is the power behind the throne and above the throne.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The only difficulty I have is in appreciating the hon. gentleman as an authority. I am rather doubtful of his opinion.

Mr. BOURASSA: I quite admit that I am not an authority on orangeism.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I assume that the hon. member who has the floor is not objecting to these interruptions.

[Mr. Bourassa.]

Mr. BOURASSA: In that report the delegates of Canada related on what terms and basis they had presented the question of defence to the imperial authorities:

On the part of Canada we expressed the desire that this plan for the defence of all parts of the province should be taken as the basis of arrangement, and that a full and candid discussion should be had as to the share of the cost that ought to be borne respectively by the imperial and provincial exchequers. We expressed the earnest wish of the people of Canada to perpetuate the happy existing connection with Great Britain, and their entire willingness to contribute to the defence of the empire their full quota, according to their ability, of men and money. But we pointed out that if war should ever unhappily arise between England and the United States, it could only be an imperial war on imperial grounds—that our country alone would be exposed to the horrors of invasion—and that our exposed position, far from entailing on us unusual burdens, should on the contrary secure for us the special and generous consideration of the imperial government.

And further on:

We pointed out that, while fully recognizing the necessity and prepared to provide for such a system of defence as would restore confidence in our future at home and abroad, the best ultimate defence for British America was to be found in the increase of her population as rapidly as possible, and the husbanding of our resources to that end; and, without claiming it as a right, we ventured to suggest that by enabling us to throw open the northwestern territories to free settlement, and by aiding us in enlarging our canals and prosecuting internal productive works, and by promoting an extensive plan of emigration from Europe into the unsettled portions of our domain—permanent security would be more quickly and surely and economically secured than by any other means. We did not fail to point out how this might be done without cost or risk to the British exchequer, and how greatly it would lighten the new burden of defence prepared to be assumed at a moment of depression by the people of Canada.

Now, this was fully understood at home, and Mr. Edward Cardwell, Colonial Secretary, in a despatch to Lord Monck on the terms of the agreement, reiterated practically what the Canadian delegates had told him. He said:

On the last point—

The point of defence.

—it seemed sufficient that Her Majesty's government should accept the assurances given by the Canadian ministers on the part of Canada that that province is ready to devote all her resources both in men and money to the maintenance of the confederation of the provinces. To this we, on the part of Her Majesty's imperial government, fully acknowledge the reciprocal obligation of defending every portion of the empire with all the resources at its command.

Some twenty-two years later, at the first Imperial conference convened in London, the delegate of the Canadian government, Sir Alexander Campbell, one of the Fathers of Confederation, one of the most thoughtful leaders of the Conservative party—the good old Conservative party—who afterwards, if

I am not mistaken, was Minister of Justice in the government of Canada and later Lieutenant Governor of Ontario—

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Would the hon. gentleman in referring to the Conservative party leave out the word, "old" and bring it more down to date?

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course, I suppose the hon. gentleman allows me the freedom of making a distinction between the Conservatives of sixty years ago and those of to-day, unless he is specially desirous of being classified with the fossils of his party? I am not quite sure.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): No, I am not quite that old yet.

Mr. BOURASSA: Well, I am speaking of the old Conservative party, which was a very respectable national party. I am not qualifying at all the present Conservative party; I leave that to my hon. friend.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I was anxious to have my hon. friend's opinion brought down to date.

Mr. BOURASSA: Well, no; it is nicer to talk of the past than of the present.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes, that is right.

Mr. BOURASSA: I want to keep as peaceful an atmosphere as possible in this debate. It started in strife; I hope it will finish in amity.

At that Imperial conference, where for the first time in a gathering of that nature the question of interdependence between the Motherland and the various dominions was discussed, Sir Alexander Campbell summed up all that had passed between the home government and the Dominion government; and when it came to the point of the 1865 agreement he said.

> The imperial government had previously given us notice of their intention to withdraw from the colony Her Majesty's troops, and they declared their resolution to carry that out. The government here agreed to undertake the naval defence of Canada, the Canadian authorities undertaking the land defence of the colony. Upon that basis the confederation of all the provinces was formed, viz: that Her Majesty's troops would be withdrawn (the withdrawal was then in course of being carried out), and that the local authority were only to undertake the land defences.

So, Sir, when during the Great war, and previously during the discussion carried on in the province of Quebec against the proposed policy of the Liberal government to build up a so-called Canadian navy and the policy of the Conservative government later to contribute to the British navy; when we said that these proposals were going beyond the solemn agreement entered into between the British government and the government of Canada, we stood by the letter of the agreement and the spirit of the "solemn contract", as Sir John A. Macdonald called it, which was concluded between the two governments. That was exemplified in fact very early. Confederation had hardly taken place when our frontiers were attacked and sometimes transgressed upon by Fenian raids from the United States. The Canadian government stood true to its engagements; Canadian volunteers were sent to various points on the frontier, and Canadian territory was defended by Canadian soldiers. But after the troubles were over, Macdonald, Cartier and Campbell did not forget that before defending the British Empire they had the duty of standing by Canada's rights. Sir Alexander Campbell went to London to claim from the British government compensation for the moneys spent and the blood shed on the frontiers of Canada. As Sir Alexander Campbell stated then, "We have been true to our engagement, but if we have spent money and blood in the defence of frontiers it is on account of your policy, right or wrong. We are not passing judgment upon your Irish policy, but we have suffered thereby and we claim compensation". They did not beg for it, but claimed it as a matter of right. It is true that compensation was not obtained; but there again it was put in black and white that these relations between the home government and the colonial government, so far as peace and war were concerned, were to be determined on every occasion by the degree of responsibility exercised by either government; that when the Canadian people were called upon to spend money and to shed blood, even in defence of their own territory but in consequence of British policy, the British people at home should pay for it. You are free to say to-day whether those men who made confederation, who brought peace between England and Canada, who raised the Canadian people in the eyes of the people of the British Isles to a higher degree than they had before attained—whether they were disloyal and traitors to the crown, but we who chose to stand by their ideals and their conception of social and political justice should be free to say so.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BOURASSA: Certainly.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Did the Canadian authorities referred to by my hon. friend specify the acts on the part of the British government which led to the Fenian raids?

Mr. BOURASSA: Oh, yes.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Would you mind giving those specified acts?

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes. I suppose my hon. friend is prepared to take the responsibility if he contributes to the length of my remarks?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): To be perfectly frank, I do not think it will make any difference what part I take.

Sir EUGENE FISET: That remark seems very kind, after your question.

Mr. EDWARDS: (Frontenac): What is wrong with it?

Mr. BOURASSA: I will try to find what my hon. friend wants. I have here a report from Sir Alexander Campbell to Sir John Young, Governor General of Canada, which will be found in the sessional papers of 1871, number 12, page 41, and also number 46, page 26. Really, if I could induce several hon. members of this House to read these papers, they would find them very interesting. These men took the time to write their reports, and they make splendid reading. I suppose they were not so busy with patronage or disputing power as they are now. The report contains these words:

> We thought a very strong case might be made out for a demand for indemnity from the United States.

Sir Alexander Campbell wanted the British government to demand an indemnity from the United States in favour of Canada, on account of the Fenian raids.

> Messrs. Cartier and Macdonald had asked that such a demand should be made with reference to the loss sustained in 1866, and we considered that we were entitled to ask for indemnity in reference to all the expenditure that had been since caused to us by the Fenians. Failing the obtaining of such an indemnity from the United States, we thought the empire should join Canada in meeting the losses: the Fenian difficulties were not of our creating, but grew out of real or imaginary wrongs that the empire had in the past inflicted on Ireland, and we were fighting battles which were not ours but those of the empire. We were quite ready as a portion of the empire to bear our share of these or any other troubles in which the country might be involved, but it was not fair that we should be allowed to suffer alone all the losses and consequences of the imperial acts or policy which were complained of, and I strongly urged that for the past and the future, should any further Fenian troubles arise, the empire, as a whole, should bear the burden of resisting such attacks, and that Canada should only contribute as a portion of the empire.

I need not remind the House, Sir, that that demand or request was not countenanced. I am not prepared to say that the British government were wrong. Looking at it after these years I think it was wisdom on the part of the British government; I think it was deep instinct of government rather than reason or logic which made the British statesmen of those days understand that after all each portion of the empire must suffer the consequences of its own situation and of its connection with the empire, provided it would not be called upon to suffer the consequences to be endured in some other part of the empire on another continent, as we will see later. I think the Canadian statesmen understood it the same way. At least, they did not insist upon their claim. But when some fifteen years later the Soudanese war broke upon Great Britain, after the disaster at Khartum and the slaughter of "Chinese" Gordon, frantic appeals were made by certain Canadian officers to the Canadian government to raise troops for the defence of the empire in the Soudan. But Sir John A. Macdonald, leader of the Conservative party and of the Canadian government, faithful to the principles laid down in 1865 and maintained in 1871, refused his co-operation to the British government in the enlistment of troops. Nobody was scandalized, nobody raised the cry against him that he was disloyal to the empire. No, everybody understood that he was doing his duty to Canada, and in doing his duty to Canada he was thereby helping to maintain those relations which had been established and maintained between the two countries for thirty years—the safest manner, in the long run, of maintaining those relations.

9 p.m.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Did the British government make formal request to Canada on that occasion for troops?

Mr. BOURASSA: I am not speaking of that.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): How could the Canadian government refuse a request if it was not made?

Mr. BOURASSA: They refused the request from certain Canadian officers of the type of mind of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I do not wish to be offensive to the hon. gentleman, and I do not suppose he wishes to be offensive to me—

Mr. BOURASSA: Not at all.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Then you might just change your mode of address. What do you mean by the type of man of the hon. gentleman? I am perfectly willing to have my type of mind compared with that of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BOURASSA: Certainly. I mean people who are rather restive, people who every time they hear of a little flag here or a little flag there get nervous, and therefore are apt to lose their good sense—excellent thinking people, as my hon. friend is, only they do not always think deeply or take the time to think.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Might I point out to my hon. friend that no person was more restive and had a greater regard for the flag than he had when he was in France in 1914? He was glad to get out under the flag then.

Mr. BOURASSA: I would not like to follow the course taken by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) this afternoon and get away from this debate, but I may say to the hon. gentleman that I did not get out of France under the British flag, but under the French flag, by pure accident, as many other foreigners from many other countries got out at that time, after the war had broken out—in spite of the legends that have been printed in the Ontario papers.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Well, perhaps.

Mr. BOURASSA: What I want to say is simply this: In 1885 there began to grow a new conception of imperial relationship. I am not condemning that, I am simply pointing out the fact. Some people wanted to give expression to that new conception of relations by committing Canada officially, as a government, as a nation, to that war in the Soudan. Well, Sir John A. Macdonald thought it was a wrong conception. He thought the right conception was the one arrived at after a century of struggle between French and English in Canada, and between Upper and Lower Canada. He thought that the only means by which moral unity could be maintained in the British Empire was by respecting to the fullest extent the needs, the desires, and the will of each of the self-governing dominions to frame its external as well as its internal policy according to its will, according to its needs, according to its prejudices,—its narrowness of mind, if you like,—but, nevertheless, according to its free British conception of self-government. Not only was the attitude of Sir John A. Macdonald on that occasion supported by his party, but it was not even challenged by the opposite party. So strongly entrenched still was the principle of dominion autonomy at that time that neither party thought it advantageous to attempt to attack the other party for taking that attitude.

The first attempt at making political capital out of this question of military preparation was in 1896, when the Conservative government, a few months before dissolution, thought it necessary, rightly or wrongly—I am not discussing the policy at all—to devote a certain sum of money to the purchase of arms. The Liberals of Quebec then started a campaign of denunciation against the Conservative government for spending money to fight England's wars. Mind you, there had been no suggestion whatever that this appropriation of money was to fight England's wars; it was simply to increase the munitions of the Canadian militia. That was in 1896.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. gentlemen will admit that at the time of the purchase of those arms there was very grave danger of complications between Great Britain and the United States. Secretary Olney, of the Cleveland administration, had sent his message, and there was very grave danger of trouble on the Canadian frontier.

Mr. BOURASSA: Quite so. I am not discussing at all the propriety of the thing. On the contrary, the responsibility of first raising the issue as between the duty to Canada and the duty to England came from the Liberal side, who challenged that purchase of arms, without, I think, any justification. Three years later the game was reversed. Trouble had begun to arise in South Africa. In the summer of 1899 a so-called delegate of the Outlanders of the Transvaal and Orange Free State, but as was proven later in the House of Commons in England, a paid agent of the De Beers Mining Company and the company under the control of Mr. Cecil Rhodes, came here and secured from both parties a resolution of sympathy with the Outlanders of South Africa. The negotiations at Bloemfontein dragged on for a few weeks, and the Montreal Star launched its campaign for consultation with the mayors of the various municipalities of the Dominion. All the answers favourable to the intervention of Canada were published with heavy headlines, but all those opposed to it were thrown into the waste paper basket; this I have from a member of the staff of the Montreal Star of that day, and it is typical of the means the Montreal Star has resorted to on several occasions of that nature. The Liberal government began by stating that it could not intervene. Sir Wilfrid Laurier gave an official interview to the Toronto Globe, stating that under the constitution of Canada he could not intervene. Ten days later he gave way, after he received a telegram from Sir Charles Tupper, leader of the Conservative party, and he did exactly the opposite. He decided to send troops; nevertheless his government took the precaution, rather childish as I thought, to put in the order in council deciding on the enlistment and sending of troops, a statement that it would not constitute a precedent. Later on, in the House of Commons, on the 13th March, 1900, the Prime Minister laid down this principle, which at least was in accordance with all past precedents and constitutional doctrines as applied heretofore:

> But I have no hesitation in saying to my hon. friend that if as a consequence of our action to-day, the doctrine were to be admitted that Canada should take part in all the wars of Great Britain and contribute to the military expenditure of the empire, I agree with him that we should revise the conditions of things existing between us and Great Britain. If we were to be compelled to take part in all the wars of Great Britain I have no hesitation in saying that I agree with my hon. friend that, sharing the burden, we should also share the responsibility. Under that condition of things, which does not exist, we should have the right to say to Great Britain: If you want us to help you, call us to your councils; if you want us to take part in wars let us share not only the burdens but the responsibilities and the duties as well.

That was in 1900. Two years later there was an Imperial conference and there the reaction began to assert itself both in England and here, against the principle—I should not say the principle, but the policy—of imperial solidarity adopted in 1899 contrary to the well established principle and practice of dominion autonomy carried on during thirty years previous to that war. In England, the so-called Little Englanders came back to power under the guidance of that able though not brilliant statesman, Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman, and at the conference of 1907 he laid down very properly the principle which applies of course to all forms of defence, though in its terms it speaks only of naval defence. He said:

> The cost of naval defence and the responsibility for the conduct of foreign affairs hang together.

In other words, as was agreed in 1865, as was reiterated in 1887 by Sir Alexander Campbell, and as admitted by the Prime Minister, the dominions have no responsibility in the general defence of the empire at sea or on land, so long as they have not control of the foreign affairs of the empire in the same manner, with the same degree of power, with the same measure of control, which the people who rule the United Kingdom have, and the same degree of responsibility to the people who elect them to power as the rulers of England have to the people of the United Kingdom. But unfortunately that did not last long. Two years later the naval scare was launched. Anyone who has taken the trouble to study the documents and evidence in London knows now that that naval scare was launched simultaneously in Germany and England in order to enhance the shipbuilding trade, but let that pass.

Mr. HOCKEN: Yes, you had better.

Mr. BOURASSA: Better?

Mr. HOCKEN: I think it would be better.

Mr. BOURASSA: In a way, yes, because I would not like to introduce to-night controversial matters. But it has a very interesting bearing on German as well as on British imperialism. Parliament agreed upon the necessity of doing something. The Liberal government came out with a policy that was defined by the then Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, of building up a Canadian navy, Canadian in time of peace and imperial in time of war. It was rather a queer policy. Later on, the Conservative party in the House of Commons came with a counter proposal of a contribution to the British navy.

Perhaps it may not be out of place, not for the sake of resurrecting old arguments, but simply to show on what principle or basis of argument we rely to oppose these changes in our relations with the United Kingdom without any thoughtful reflection being given to it, if I now read a resolution which was adopted after the election in Drummond-Arthabaska, and framed if I may mention it by myself in conjunction with the late Mr. Monk, later on Minister of Public Works in the Borden government. It reads thus:

> This meeting approves and ratifies the verdict rendered by the electoral division of Drummond and Arthabaska; re-affirms the will of the Canadian people to uphold the rights of the British crown in Canada; declares itself ready to approve of all necessary and efficient measures to make sure the defence of Canadian territory. But it considers as contrary to the principle of Canadian autonomy and the real unity of the empire, any policy tending to impose upon Canada, that has no voice in the government of the Empire, any share in the external responsibilities or in the military defence of the Empire, outside of the Canadian territory—the only portion of the Empire upon which the Canadian people may exercise any political or constitutional action.

This after all was a mere enunciation in a condensed form of all the principles and policies that had been laid down for half a century; that had been supported by argument and by correspondence; that had been applied in practice as well as upheld in doctrine by the leaders of the two great parties whether in opposition or in power. It seems to me therefore that there was no reason for one party to attack the other on this ground in the province of Quebec, while denouncing and combating the men who were instrumental in maintaining that policy.

At the following session, after Mr. Monk had moved an amendment to the Address in conformity with this resolution, Mr. Borden, leader of the Conservative party, moved a sub-amendment; but when his sub-amendment had been defeated he rallied himself with all his party in support of Mr. Monk's motion which was nothing but a confirmation of the policy asserted in Drummond-Arthabaska. It was then that Mr. Borden very properly laid down this policy in the name of the Conservative party:

I think the question of Canada's co-operation upon a permanent basis in imperial defence involves very large and wide considerations. If Canada and the other dominions of the empire are to take part as nations of this Empire in the defence of the empire as a whole, shall it be that we, contributing to that defence of the whole empire, shall have absolutely, as citizens of this country, no voice whatever in the councils of the empire touching the issues of peace or war throughout the empire? I do not think that such would be a tolerable condition; I do not think the people of Canada would for one moment submit to such a condition. Shall members of this House, representative men, representing 221 constituencies of this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific, shall no one of them have the same voice with regard to those vast imperial issues that the humblest taxpayer in the British Isles has at this moment? It does not seem to me that such a condition would make for the integrity of the empire, for the closer co-operation of the empire. Regard must be had to these far-reaching considerations.

If it were legitimate, proper, for the leader of the Conservative party in 1910 to lay down and to express in such clear terms the doctrine of Dominion autonomy, of equality of right with the United Kingdom in matters of foreign policy, why should we be branded as traitors to the crown because we persist in saying that this is the true and the only principle upon which it is possible to maintain the dignity of the various component parts of the empire, and at the same time that unity which has been and will be found under British rule alone as long as British rule means liberty of opinion and liberty of action?

The next year the Imperial conference dealt with these matters. It was probably one of the most interesting of those Imperial conferences. It came before the war, before our minds were troubled by the anxieties of the war, and close enough to the war to enable far-seeing statesmen to see what complications would arise in connection with inter-imperial relations, in case of a war in Europe. At that conference, the Prime Minister of New Zealand, Sir Joseph Ward, a staunch imperialist with a logical mind, came with a motion in favour of the organization of an Imperial council to deal with all these matters and to enable the various portions of the empire to stand on a footing of equality. To this the Prime Minister of England, Mr. Asquith, made this reply:

For what does Sir Joseph Ward's proposal come to? I might describe the effect of it, without going into details, in a couple of sentences. It would impair, if not altogether destroy, the authority of the government of the United Kingdom in such grave matters as the conduct of foreign policy, the conclusion of treaties, the declaration and maintenance of peace, or the declaration of war, and, indeed, all those relations with foreign powers, necessarily of the most delicate character, which are now in the hands of the Imperial government, subject to its responsibility to the Imperial parliament.

And he added these significant words:

That authority cannot be shared.

That was a pretty clear and stiff declaration. It passed, but later on, after the change of government had taken place in Canada, Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister of Canada—whom I will always credit with some of the most timely and courageous declarations that have been made in favour of Canadian autonomy and whose pertinacity of thought in this matter has rendered great services to Canada and the empire—Sir Robert Borden, when proposing his naval contribution, came out with this declaration, very interesting because it combines at once the statement of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman in 1907 and this late declaration of Mr. Asquith in 1911:

Responsibility for the empire's defence upon the high seas, in which is to be found the only effective guarantee of its existence, and which has hitherto been assumed by the United Kingdom, has necessarily carried with it responsibility for and control of foreign policy.

This is practically a repetition of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's statement in 1907.

When Great Britain no longer assumes sole responsibility for defence upon the high seas—

Naturally, I repeat, this applies to land war operations outside of the country.

—she can no longer undertake the same sole responsibility for and sole control of foreign policy which is closely, vitally, and constantly associated with that defence in which the dominions participate. It has been declared in the past, and even during recent years, that responsibility for foreign policy could not be shared by Great Britain with the dominions. In my humble opinion, adherence to such a position could have but one and that a most disastrous result. During my recent visit to the British Islands, I ventured on many public occasions to propound the principle that the great dominions, sharing in the defence of the empire upon the high seas, must necessarily be entitled to share also in the responsibility for and in the control of foreign policy. No declaration that I made was greeted more heartily and enthusiastically than this. It is satisfactory to know that to-day not only His Majesty's ministers but also the leaders of the opposite political party in Great Britain have explicitly accepted this principle and have affirmed their conviction that the means by which it can be constitutionally accomplished must be sought, discovered and utilized without delay.

The answer was not slow to come. This was pronounced on the 5th December, 1912; and on the 10th December, Mr. Harcourt, Colonial Secretary, sent a despatch explaining the position. He said:

The Canadian government having changed in the autumn of 1911 it was necessary, when Mr. Borden and his colleagues visited England this summer, to put these proposals before them, as they were, of course, unaware of the previous proceedings. Subject to consultation with his colleagues in Canada, Mr. Borden provisionally accepted the resolutions as passed and stated that he saw no difficulty in one of his ministers either with or without portfolio spending some months in London in order to carry out this intention. Mr. Asquith and I had, subsequently, several private conversations with him, at which he expressed the desire that the Canadian and other dominions ministers who might be in London as members of the committee of imperial defence should receive, in confidence, knowledge of the policy and proceedings of the Imperial government in foreign and other affairs.

Mind you, a very reasonable request, just to have knowledge of what was going on.

We pointed out to him that the Committee on Imperial Defence is a purely advisory body and is not and cannot under any circumstances become a body deciding on policy, which is and must remain the sole prerogative of the British cabinet, subject to the support of the House of Commons of the United Kingdom.

Now, I do not dispute the soundness of this policy from a practical point of view. I quite realize the difficulties in which these men in London find themselves, when from day to day they must keep in touch with what is going on in Africa, in Asia, in Europe and elsewhere, keep up their diplomatic correspondence with all their ambassadors and ministers and consuls, keep in touch with all foreign governments, and so forth. I quite realize the difficulty, not to say impossibility, which they must experience in keeping governments in Ottawa, in Melbourne, in Capetown and in other parts of the empire equally informed as to what is transpiring, and the still greater difficulty of getting the sense of these various governments in respect of any policies that are propounded. Very well; I fully appreciate the situation. But, then, is it not a natural consequence that so long as a means is not found of putting the self-governing dominions on an equal footing of responsibility with the United Kingdom, it is unfair, it is unjust, it is un-British to ask those outlying dominions to share the same consequences ensuing from imperial policy as the people of England and Scotland and Wales, who at every by-election or general election can reach by their votes the men whom they hold responsible for such policy, and can reward them if they have done well by their country or punish them if they have betrayed their trust?

[Mr. Bourassa.]

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Have they ever been so asked?

Mr. BOURASSA: Who?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): The overseas dominions.

Mr. BOURASSA: No; I am afraid my hon. friend is under a misapprehension. No one has ever claimed, I least of all, that the British government has at any time endeavoured to impose any policy upon us. It is worse than that. What I have always maintained, and what I have stated to-night, is that for the past twenty-five years a growing number of Canadians have lost their sense of British citizenship to such a degree that they are prepared to assume burdens which the British people would never think of undertaking themselves, or of imposing upon us.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): It still rests with the people of Canada.

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course it does. I should not like to do so, but if my hon. friend grates upon my British nerves I may be tempted to make a comparison.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BOURASSA: This surprises hon. gentlemen, but they are so much imbued with the modern Yankee type of imperialism that they do not realize how it is possible for a man, foreign by blood to British institutions, to be deeply attached to those institutions. It is not an attachment of blood with me, but purely one of reason; and therefore I am not carried away by impulse in these matters. I try to reason them out. In my reasoning I may be wrong, but I nevertheless claim the right to remain faithful to principles which I believe to be sound, principles that have been respected for a full century as constituting the only safe basis of imperial relations. I claim the right as a Canadian and a British subject to remain faithful to that ideal without being branded a rebel or a disloyal French-Canadian. The fact is that not being English by language, nor American by mentality, nor Prussian in spirit, I choose to remain British in the sense in which our Canadians were British fifty years ago. And here my hon. friend from Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) may begin to realize the distinction I draw between an ordinary British-Canadian and what I call an ardent imperialist.

Now the Great war came on with none of these problems settled, but all of them raised before the people of the various British communities in a haphazard manner. This is not the time to discuss whether or not Canada or any other of the British dominions ought not to have entered the war. I merely mention one outstanding feature of the whole thing, with which everyone agrees, apart from a few eccentrics, namely, that each dominion was free to participate in the war or to refrain from doing so, as it might see fit. Everyone shared that view. Mr. Bonar Law, among other British statesmen, was of the opinion that neither Canada, nor Australia, nor New Zealand, nor South Africa had any obligation whatever to take part in the war. But if any dominion undertook to go in it, it meant a tremendous contribution in men and money to the new doctrine of imperial solidarity. I say it meant a contribution to the doctrine of imperial solidarity, for it cannot be pleaded that either Canada or Australia went into the war as full-fledged nations. No; had they entered the war in the status of full nationhood they would have been obliged to make a declaration of war against Germany, Austria, Bulgaria and Turkey, according to the time that those countries entered the conflict. Before even England had declared war, the government of Canada had sent a despatch to London offering troops. True, parliament was convened after the offer had been made, but in point of fact no declaration of war was ever served in the name of Canada to the German or the Austrian governments. How, therefore, did Canada come to take part in the war? No one has ever answered that question precisely. It is admitted on every hand that the declaration of war by the British government could not commit us to action, although of course it did render the territory of Canada liable to attack from the enemies of Great Britain. Everyone is agreed on that point. But according to the doctrine and practice that had been followed up to the South African war and maintained during that war, a declaration of war by the British government did not carry with it any obligation on the part of any of the self-governing dominions to enlist one man or to spend one dollar. I do not think I need labour that point; it has been acknowledged not only in England but in every one of the self-governing dominions as an incontrovertible principle. Well, then, how did we come to participate in the war? I leave aside to-night, of course, the very eloquent reasons that were advanced during the war—the defence of democracy, the assertion of the principle of self-determination, and all that. Let us suppose that those had been the true reasons: they would nevertheless have imposed upon us the necessity of declaring war upon the enemies of the empire just as the United States did in 1917. The fact is, we went into the war without any declaration of war on our part because of the new doctrine of imperial solidarity, irrespective of the geographical situation of any of the self-governing dominions, and irrespective equally of the local or particular causes of war which any of those dominions might have against Germany at that time or against any other country subsequently. This is what was new.

Mr. McGIBBON: Might I ask the hon. member if he thinks we did wrong?

Mr. BOURASSA: I will tell my hon. friend frankly. The hon. gentleman must know, or he might ask some of his friends who know me, that I am not afraid of saying anything. I stated at the beginning of the war that I thought we did right, but I added this: First, that parliament should have declared, previous to its decision to participate in the war, that it reserved for the free and peaceful will of the people of Canada to decide what would be her future relations with the empire, and should not have acknowledged the principle of imperial solidarity as opposed to the principle of dominion autonomy that had been sustained heretofore. That was the first reservation. The second was this: I considered that Canada should have measured her participation in that war according to her means of action, according to the number of her population and according to her future needs, not only as regarded herself, but as regarded her true contribution to the British Empire, which will never be so efficacious as when we accomplish it on the soil of Canada by making Canada populous, prosperous and happy. In the light of what has transpired since, I would not now say that we did right in going to war. But I repeat, I do not say it was wrong then. I do not blame those men who voted in sincerity for the participation of Canada in the war; but I say, first, they departed from the established practice and principle upon which the relations between Great Britain and Canada had been carried on for a century, and happily for both countries; and, second, that this having been done, they must be prepared now to stand manfully in a broad way the consequences of that participation. Surely there is not a representative of the people of Canada, whether he be French or English by birth, whether he be Conservative, Liberal or Progressive by party affiliation, who will come to me and say that after we have spent in four years' time as much money as we had spent in fifty years' time to build up this country, after we have made greater sacrifices for England and France than generations of Canadians had been called to make for Canada, after we have either compromised or endangered the solution of every national, provincial, racial or economic problem of this country in order to come to the rescue of England and France,—surely not one such representative will tell me that this is not the time to study the problem, and that we have only to look upon the past actions of this or that gentleman in some little street in a Canadian city, town or village. No Sir! The most patriotic and practical men of England and Australia, of South Africa and New Zealand, have been concerning themselves with this problem for the last ten years. This coming fall the Prime Minister of Canada, whether he be this right hon. gentleman or the other right hon. gentleman—the purely party of point of view for the present time I want to forget—will go to London, and with men representing the free peoples of Australia and the other outstanding dominions will discuss those problems with the representatives of Great Britain. Is it improper that as a Canadian, tracing my ancestry back through generations of Canadians, I should desire that some one will speak out in those councils of empire with the same thoughtful voice and after the same due reflection that the representatives of the other portions of the British Empire will carry there? Is this improper? Is this unpatriotic? Is this disturbing the House of Commons from the tremendous problem of whether certain gentlemen painted in blue shall take the place of certain other gentlemen tinted in red? I repeat with Lionel Curtis: this issue of peace and war, of relations between Great Britain and the sister dominions, out of which the maintenance or the downfall of the British Empire may be assured in the next twenty-five years, is predominant over all other domestic issues that we may have to deal with; because according to the solution that will be given to this supreme issue, the other issues will be governed and directed and finally settled.

Now, have we progressed in the way of participation in the government of the empire in the same proportion as we have progressed in our contribution to the war expenditure of the empire? Not later than last fall Sir Robert Borden—who is now free to speak his mind, who has no longer the responsibility of a government or a party, and who, I am happy to say, has preserved his freshness of mind and his constitutional knowledge—went to a very interesting yearly gathering, the Institute of Politics of Williamstown College, Massachusetts. He spoke there on August 17, 1925. He did not think, as did our good friend from Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy), that it was not worth while speaking of this, that we should wait till the fire is burning the house to know what measures we will take to extinguish it. No! Sir Robert, ever since he quit politics, has lost no occasion of talking on these matters and, I think, on the whole, very sensibly. He spoke of the part which the dominions played during the war in framing the war policy. He spoke of the imperial war council, and he defined it as:

> A consultative body in which all important questions respecting the conduct of the war and the war effort of the empire were discussed and determined, and in which dominion ministers sat on terms of perfect equality with their British colleagues.

Then he spoke of the imperial war conference of 1917:

> The well-known resolution passed by this conference to which the British government was a party, based the constitutional relations of the empire upon a full recognition of the dominions as autonomous nations of an imperial commonwealth, and of India as an important portion of the same, confirmed the right of the dominions and India to an adequate voice in foreign policy and foreign relations, and declared the necessity of providing effective arrangements for continuous consultation and necessary concerted action.

My old friend Sir Robert still has an affection for the adjective, "adequate." I remember when he spoke of "adequate protection." Of course, that is pretty difficult to define. Let us see how in practice that adequate voice granted to the dominions and to India in the various conferences or congresses in which they took part during the war and since the war was heard.

First there was a negotiation which resulted in these instruments of diplomacy—I will not say of peace—which followed the war: the treaty of Versailles, the treaty of Trianon, the treaty of St. Germain, and so forth. There was one Dominion statesman who saw through them, or at least who saw through the treaty of Versailles. That man was General Smuts, who, before affixing his signature, entered a solemn protest because, as he said, "This will not bring peace." I think events have proven that he was perhaps the most clear-sighted of all the British representatives there. I have been told by one very close to the peace negotiators that forty-eight hours before that so-called instrument of peace, the Versailles treaty, containing the covenant of the League of Nations, with nearly four hundred articles and appendices, was signed, not one of the Dominion representatives had read it. I do not know. There is one thing I do know, however, that at the next meeting of the League of Nations at Geneva, the Hon. Mr. Doherty, Minister of Justice in the late Conservative government and representative of Canada, wanted article 10 of the covenant of the league to be revised in such a manner as to resurrect in different form the old doctrine of colonial and dominion autonomy, although it was not stated in so many words. Later on Sir Lomer Gouin, Minister of Justice and representative of the Canadian government at the following conference, also endeavoured to have a revision of that article. He came closer to the goal, but did not succeed. There it stands, committing Canada with all the other full-fledged nations, nations able to frame their policy and constitution to their needs and having the right of self-government in foreign as well as international matters. We stand committed by signatures made in haste by our representatives because they were told to rely upon the wisdom of the British representatives.

Mr. CAHAN: Does not the hon. gentleman admit that at a later date the representatives of the present government, of whom I think the Minister of Justice was one, did secure an authoritative interpretation of article 10, which changes it in its bearing very considerably, and which relieves the dominions of some considerable responsibility that would have been imposed upon them under the original article?

Mr. BOURASSA: If my hon. friend means, as I do, that after second thought and reflection we have come to a point where article 10 will not hurt us the way it might, I quite agree with him.

Mr. CAHAN: Does not the hon. gentleman admit also that on a day before the signing of the original treaty of Versailles Sir Robert Borden himself at Versailles made a strong protest against article 10, and reserved the right so far as Canada was concerned to secure later if possible an authoritative interpretation or the repeal of that article?

Mr. BOURASSA: I am very happy to learn that he did so, but unfortunately he signed the treaty as it was, and the treaty had been negotiated outside of his knowledge.

Mr. CAHAN: I submit to the hon. gentleman that he should not state in that precise way that Sir Robert Borden was ignorant of the terms of the treaty at the time it was signed, and I do not think he should conceal altogether from this House, whether or not it is done intentionally, the fact that Sir Robert Borden under the circumstances, having made his protest, regarded it as in the interests of Canada that the treaty should then be signed and that a reservation should be made with respect to Canada's future relations under article 10.

10 p.m.

Mr. BOURASSA: Mr. Speaker, I must say I have not heard of Sir Robert Borden's protest. I do not find it anywhere in the documents relating to the Peace conference.

Mr. CAHAN: It appears in a number of the reports.

Mr. BOURASSA: Yes, unofficial reports, but even then that strengthens my contention that in that so-called association of nations which took its first form in Paris, an article was introduced in the treaty which was supposed to govern in the future the relations of the British Empire at large with all other nations. It was supposed, as a consequence, to govern the inter-imperial relations of the various British dominions whose representatives affixed their signatures. There was an article framed in closed chamber between Mr. Wilson, Mr. Orlando—no, he was not there—Mr. Clemenceau and Mr. Lloyd George, which forced Sir Robert Borden, as representing Canada, to enter a protest which is not noted in the international documents, and which has no official bearing. Later on, when Mr. Doherty, representing Canada, tried to make that protest effective, it did not carry weight, and when Sir Lomer Gouin again tried to make that protest, it did not carry. I am simply taking this as an example to show that the so-called equality of representation between Great Britain and her self-governing dominions in these matters of diplomatic concern has not been satisfactory nor complete nor true to the letter or the spirit.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? What good does he think that treaty would have been without article 10?

Mr. BOURASSA: I am not going to enter into a discussion upon that with my hon. friend. I am simply pointing out, or giving this as an illustration, that it is not according to fact—and it could not be, as I will show in a moment—to say that the representatives of the various self-governing dominions were represented in the council of nations at Versailles on the same footing and with the same voice as the representatives of the United Kingdom. We have an example of that later on, and again I want to show the good work and the splendid spirit evinced by Sir Robert Borden in very difficult circumstances. In the year following, when this treaty was brought up for ratification by this House, he laid down this doctrine, which I may say is also mine—irrespective, of course, of the merits of the treaty:

His Majesty the King and his advisers have recognized the right of this parliament to express its opinion upon this treaty. I made that pledge to parliament and the British government have been informed of that pledge. They recognize the situation, and they are not disposed to deal with this treaty, so far as Canada is concerned, apart from the approval of the Canadian parliament.

This was challenged by Mr. Fielding, who endeavoured to make out that even if the parliament of Canada did not ratify the treaty, the treaty would go on just the same, to which argument Sir Robert Borden replied:

I am stating to the hon. gentleman an absolute fact, as to which I hope he will not doubt my word. I tell him it is recognized by the ministers of the crown of Great Britain that this treaty must be submitted to the Canadian parliament for its approval, and that we desire, we insist, upon the judgment of the Canadian parliament in regard to it before we advise the King on behalf of Canada that the treaty should be ratified.

Again Mr. Fielding derided this pretension. He claimed this simply meant that if the treaty was not ratified the Conservative government would be defeated, to which Sir Robert Borden replied:

I beg my hon. friend's pardon. He has forgotten what I said a moment ago. Failure to ratify the treaty would involve very serious consequences indeed.

Hon. Mr. Fielding: What are they?

Sir Robert Borden: The consequences would be that Canada would stand out of a treaty of peace accepted by the empire.

Hon. Mr. Fielding: Would we be at war?

Sir Robert Borden: I have already said what in our opinion our status would be in that case. If my hon. friend means that, notwithstanding the arrangements which have been made, the conventions which have become recognized, the status which has been accorded to the Dominions during recent years, we are still subject to have this treaty ratified by His Majesty on behalf of Canada whether the parliament of Canada is willing to ratify it or not, then I tell him he is dealing in ancient history and that his ideas should advance with the progress of recent years.

Later on he adds:

His suggestion was that ratification by the parliament of Canada is merely a farce, that the government of the United Kingdom possesses such constitutional right in respect of this Dominion that they can impose their will upon us without regard to this parliament. I repeat that if such is the opinion of the hon. member, he is thinking in terms of a hundred years ago, and not of to-day.

There Sir Robert Borden laid down quite clearly and unmistakably the doctrine that neither the government of Canada nor the government of Great Britain can compromise the future or the present rights of the people of Canada without the explicit and expressed consent of the parliament of Canada. This is good nationalist doctrine, and I accept it when it comes from a Conservative leader just as readily as I would accept it from any other authority.

Mr. CAHAN: It is good Conservative doctrine, and if I understand the statement of policy made in times past by the right hon. leader of the present government, it seems to me it is a statement of good Liberal policy as well.

Mr. BOURASSA: Of course; that is what I am going to prove in a moment. The only thing is I would like to have it asserted by parliament as early as possible in time of peace, when people possess their cool senses, instead of waiting for the excitement caused by the approach or the declaration of war to have it disregarded by both parties. The observation of my excellent friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) dispenses with the necessity of my giving another quotation from Sir Robert Borden on the rights of the parliament of Canada from that same lecture at Williamstown last summer, but I may well give this short quotation, which I think was meant as a warning to London:

It will be wise for British statesmen constantly to remember that the commonwealth cannot go to war in sections, and that engagements which may involve the Dominions in war ought not to be undertaken without their full concurrence.

Now let us see how this worked out in practice after the war. Not long after the conference in 1922, came what has been called the Chanak incident. After some squabble had been going on between the Greeks and the Turks, the Turks being encouraged by the French, and the Greeks being encouraged by the British—that is a matter of history now—the matter became rather ugly. The Greeks were thrown out of Asia Minor, and of a sudden came a message from Mr. Winston Churchill to the Canadian government, as well as to the governments of the other Dominions, asking practically for a declaration of empire solidarity in the action which the British government contemplated taking in the Mediterranean. Of course, it has been explained since that this action was not very well thought out, that the British cabinet had not been consulted, and that there was not much danger; but, Sir, past experience should prove to us that even when the whole British cabinet is not consulted, that does not mean that nothing will come out of it. At the beginning of this session I reminded the House of what is also a matter of history, that the obligations laid upon the shoulders of the people of Great Britain on behalf of France, and which eventually came with a vengeance upon our own shoulders, were undertaken solely by some members of the British government, in the ignorance of the Prime Minister of England and of two-thirds of his colleagues in the cabinet. The truth was known in the three fateful days which elapsed between the declaration of war by Germany upon France and the declaration of war by England upon Germany. So I do not think any incident of that nature can be overlooked, and I think also the present Prime Minister did the right thing by Canada, did the right thing by the British Empire, and did the right thing by the world, when he refused to be stampeded by that blackmailing process of Mr. Winston Churchill. Likewise I think he remained absolutely faithful, in word as in deed, to the old doctrine and the old practice of Dominion freedom of action, when he refused to be bound by the terms of the treaty of Lausanne, when he refused even to accept the invitation to be represented at Lausanne which came just a few days before the conference was opened, and when this government had not been kept in knowledge of what had elapsed since the Chanak incident, and when the conference came practically as a sequel to that incident.

Mr. CAHAN: Is the hon. gentleman speaking with knowledge and authority on that point?

Mr. BOURASSA: On which point?

Mr. CAHAN: As to whether the government were kept informed or not during that interval?

Mr. BOURASSA: I take the exchange of telegrams which has been published both in London and here, in which I find, and it has not been contradicted, that the British government assumed that the Canadian government would act at Lausanne in the same manner that it had acted at Versailles and elsewhere; to which the Canadian government replied that the case was rather different because at the Peace conference they had been invited beforehand; they had taken a share in the negotiations, and they had signed for what they were worth the treaties of peace. Of course, I cannot read the whole correspondence, but it can be found in the Sessional Papers of 1924. I will read just this one paragraph, which I think sums up the whole thing. This is in the despatch of Lord Byng to the Secretary of State for the Colonies, then the Duke of Devonshire, dated December 31, 1922:

> Your Grace is quite right is assuming that as regards treaties in which Canada is supposed to have a direct or immediate interest, the procedure here outlined is the one which our government would wish to follow. In the case of the main political treaties concluded since the war, in general the rule seems to have been followed that, wherever the Dominions could be said to have a direct or immediate interest, the procedure was shaped to include their participation in, and signature of, the proceedings. That in the case of the conference at Lausanne a like procedure has not been followed with respect to representation and participation by Canada, has been regarded by us as evidence that in the opinion of the countries by whom the invitations to the conference at Lausanne were extended, Canada could not have been believed to have the direct and immediate interest which she was supposed to have in the conference at Versailles and Washington.

Mr. CAHAN: I understood the hon. gentleman to say, not that Canada had not been invited soon enough to Lausanne, but that the government of Canada had in the meantime not been kept informed as to the progress of events.

Mr. BOURASSA: Oh, I do not know.

Mr. CAHAN: Then I misunderstood the hon. member.

Mr. BOURASSA: What I mean is that there was not such official communication between the government in London and the various dominion governments in regard to this as there is between any full-fledged government and foreign governments with which it is allied—that is, in the way of diplomatic correspondence, such as was exchanged during the war or for some time previously, for example, between the French and English governments.

Mr. CAHAN: I read all that, but I did not place the same interpretation upon it as my hon. friend does.

Mr. BOURASSA: If my hon. friend will allow me, I will not go into the details. I am taking the official documents and trying to make out what has been the general trend of relations between the two governments. I would not like to discuss any small issue connected with any of those instances.

This was not merely a free handed or self-willed determination of this government. The attitude observed in the Chanak incident and with regard to the Lausanne treaty, one before and the other after, was in exact conformity with the principles laid down at the Imperial conference in 1923 and adopted unanimously by the conference with regard to negotiation, signature and ratification of treaties. There for the first time—and this is one of the redeeming features in that whole history—it was fully acknowledged, unanimously acknowledged, that with regard to negotiation, signing and ratification of treaties, each portion of the British Empire stood as a unit. If the matter for negotiation concerned only one of those countries, then the treaty was to be negotiated by the representatives of that country and signed by them. If it concerned more than one, then those self-governing countries of the British Empire concerned should be represented, always with regard, of course, to the interests that might arise, or that might connect their actions with the situation of other portions of the empire. In other words, there was a return by a roundabout way to the old principle that the obligations of each portion of the British Empire are measured by their responsibilities and by their interests. Under that new rule, each country controls, or is entitled to control, its foreign affairs according to its situation and its interests, and takes part, by its representatives, in diplomatic relations or in the diplomatic conferences which deal with those things. That is practically what has been done by the present Minister of Justice in the so-called Halibut treaty. I must say that I do not attach a great deal of importance to that; but it is at least a landmark in that interesting process of evolution in our relations with the Motherland. Instead of being looked upon as a revolutionary procedure it should be accepted as a healthful sign of the development or the renascence of the sense of dignity and nationality in the various portions of the empire. For my part I am prepared to congratulate this government on their attitude in those instances, just as I congratulate Sir Robert Borden in the instances I have mentioned, and just as I congratulate the right hon. leader of the opposition for his attitude in London in regard to the Japanese treaty. Why should we always look upon the action of our leading men from the small point of view which would enable one party to take advantage of the other, instead of looking to the general advantage accruing to Canada through the effort which any of its representatives may make in London or elsewhere to assert the dignity and the interests of the people of Canada?

I must say, not to be too complimentary, that I think our representation by the so-called panel system in London, the year after, is one of the most absurd things I ever heard of. The idea that the British Empire should be represented in an international congress by the British government first, last and forever, and then in the case of the dominions, one of the dominions on Monday, another on Tuesday, another on Wednesday and the other on Thursday, is surely laughable. Of course the reason is easy to understand. Foreign nations, realizing the tremendous possibilities that might accrue from that evolution in the constitutional government of the empire, have begun to challenge the right of the dominions to be represented independently, or rather to be represented as units in an international congress. It is a well-known fact now that the dominions could not be represented equally with the United Kingdom in London in 1925 because of the opposition of the French government, among others. Time and again I have read—not time and again, because foreigners do not take much interest in our affairs—several times I have read very thoughtful studies by foreign authorities on this situation, as it affects international affairs. They say the British Empire must make up its mind whether it is one nation or several nations. If it is one nation, then it must be represented by one authority. That authority cannot be shared, as stated by Mr. Asquith several years ago. If it is several nations, then it cannot at leisure act as one, or as six or seven, according to its fancy or its interests. I admit this is the one aspect of the question which is the most baffling at the present time. I have confidence enough in the common sense of the British people at home and abroad, and I have confidence enough, in spite of appearances, in the sense of just pride in these young nations that have grown all the world over on the pattern of the Motherland, to believe that we can solve that problem as between ourselves. But with regard to the foreign world, it must be admitted that since we have abandoned the safe and sound policy of the Fathers of Confederation, we have created a very complex situation in our relations with the outside world. The moment we have chosen to share in the responsibilities of the empire the world over, we must be prepared to face that problem, not only from the British, not only from the Canadian, but also from the international point of view. It is worth while being considered and studied; and for that reason alone, it is urgent that the best minds of this country should give it their deepest thought as right-thinking men, in England and in the other portions of the empire, are doing now and have been doing ever since the war.

With the adjunction of the Free State of Ireland to the association of nations called the British Empire—with Lord Milner, I do not like the term "British Empire;" I think it is a misnomer—a new phase has developed. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) pointed out this afternoon, the constitution of the Free State of Ireland is in advance of our constitution. Between the two stands the constitution of Australia, which in some respects is in advance of ours and in some respects backward of that of Ireland. Last year, in Washington, at the interparliamentary conference, Mr. Fitzgerald, foreign minister in Dublin and representative of the Free State of Ireland at that conference, suggested that the British Dominions should assert their right to remain neutral in any war in which Great Britain or other portions of the empire might be engaged, and that this should be recognized internationally. Of course, the resolution was withdrawn. Numerous articles appeared in England, but more so in Canada than in England, denouncing this as a novelty, as a suggestion of secession.

It is strange how the drifting policy which we have followed for twenty-five years should have made so many of us forget the elements of our national history. As far back as 1862 the same idea was suggested in Montreal by another Irishman, it is true, but I hope this in itself does not discredit the contention. He said:

> The present is not the fittest time, nor is the hustings the fittest place, to enter fully into the subject of our colonial defences. I will only say for myself, gentlemen, what you, as my electors have a right to know, that while I am thoroughly convinced the connection with the Mother Country ought to be an object of attachment with us, second only to the love we bear to our own institutions—that while I believe next to England our duty is to cultivate a good understanding with the United States—that having these maxims to steer by, on the right hand and the left, I am still of opinion, speaking as a Canadian publicist, that some recognized international status must be found for this country which will preserve her better than any armed force, from being made the battleground of quarrels, which she can neither make or avoid.

He suggested finally—

> Some such arrangement as established the neutrality of Greece in 1831, and the neutrality of Belgium in 1839. With such an arrangement our own militia would be quite adequate for an internal defence, and Great Britain would be honourably relieved from the anxiety and outlay of her Canadian garrisons.

This was suggested in 1862 by Thomas D'Arcy McGee, who a few days later became a member of the Canadian government, and who two years later entered into the coalition government which made confederation. I find no trace in the journals or the public expressions of the day that anybody was scandalized by that. Whether agreed to or not, everybody seemed to think that it was a fair point for discussion. So much was this the case that at the opening of the next session that speech was reproduced and added to the debates of the House as a very valuable contribution to the great subject of the relations between Great Britain and Canada. More than that, when three years later Sir John A. Macdonald presented the Quebec resolution before the parliament assembled here, on what basis did he ask for the approval of the parliament and the people of Canada? That under those new terms of nationhood Canada was looking for a "permanent alliance" with Great Britain which she hoped would be reciprocated; but in the very same sentence he reserved to Canada the right to form alliances with foreign nations. Just imagine, Sir, the idea that Canada could, of her own free will, make alliances with foreign nations without regard to whether that pleased the people in London or not! That was not the saying of a striker in Winnipeg or of a French rebel in the province of Quebec who will not stand up every time or place the national anthem is sung. No, it was stated by the leader of the Liberal-Conservative party, by the chief of the coalition government which made confederation, and it was stated as the principle upon which Canada would stand henceforth in her relations with Great Britain.

Why, then, should it be improper to think and to state that in readjusting our terms of partnership with Great Britain we should come back to the sound policy that was laid down in those days by the men who succeeded in reconciling race with race, in adjusting provincial differences, in doing away with all the bitter remembrances of the past; who destroyed, both in England and in Canada, the idea that secession was unavoidable, because it was impossible to get along? It was by relying upon the sense of nationhood of the Canadian people and upon the common sense and sense of fair play of the British people that confederation was made possible. I admit it is perfectly legitimate to look to something else, to look to closer partnership, to unity of action in time of peace and war. I have no grudge against those who hold that doctrine as the proper one, but I would simply ask them and the people of Canada to think a little over the consequences.

England is a world power; she rules the vastest and most complex empire that has ever existed, not only because it covers more land and contains more inhabitants than any other human conglomeration of the past, but because it is scattered on all continents of the earth and therefore raises problems of a complexity and diversity such as no other nation has ever been called upon to consider and to solve. Surely it is a great testimony to the political genius of the British nation, to the marvellous tradition of policy of her ruling men, whether kings, statesmen or leaders of opinion, that England could have got along, especially during the last century and a half, carrying that extraordinary burden. Let us leave aside the stock phrases about philanthropy and duty to humanity. No, the English conquered their empire for their interest first. But they rule it with genius, and administer it with perhaps a lesser proportion of injustice than any other nation. And that is saying much. So far as we are concerned, however, let us consider for a moment what it means

Take the situation of England in Europe. A century ago, England was allied with Austria and Russia to fight France; and after France had been defeated, England had a rapprochement with her, and later fought with her for Turkey against Russia, and in contradiction of Austria's interests in the near Orient. A few years later one of the wisest statesmen of England, Lord Salisbury, said that the English had ridden the wrong horse. We were not concerned with that. But if the present doctrine had prevailed then, I suppose we should have been called upon to fight against France at a certain period and with France at some other time. Then came the reaction of the sixties, when England, without actually fighting, upheld morally and diplomatically the policy of Prussia and of united Italy against France and assisted coolly in the defeat of France in 1870. It was in those days that such a wise and thorough English statesman as Lord Stanley expressed this view in the House of Lords:

> The government and the people of this country have seen with entire acquiescence, and even, I believe, with approval, the enormous aggrandisement which has accrued to Germany, or rather to Prussia.

That was three years before the Franco-Prussian war, one year after Sadowa, and three years after Prussia had deprived little Denmark of the whole of Holstein and a part of Schleswig. I am not saying that the British were wrong. I am merely pointing out how complex a situation exists in Europe, and showing that British statesmen must change their policy according to the circumstances, the needs and the interests which they are obliged to meet. But it does not follow that we should acquiesce, especially to the point of being prepared to shed blood and contribute money every time they choose to alter their policy.

About ten years later, Great Britain stands alongside Germany and France, against Russia, in negotiating the Berlin treaty, in preparing the way to the Balkan crisis which precipitated the last war. Then she favours the Triple Alliance against France and Russia; then she allies herself with Japan to crush Russia in Manchuria in 1905, and looks complacently upon the development of the Central Europe policy of Germany and Austria, to the extent that the Bagdad railway was first brought to the attention of Europe and of European finance by the London press. So sympathetic was England at that time to German policy as against the Russian and the French. It was in those years that Mr. Chamberlain launched his famous appeal, to the United States on the one side, and to Germany on the other, to consummate the consolidation of the Teutonic races to counteract the influence of the Latins and the Slavs. But there was a sudden reversal of policy. The moment Germany began to develop her naval programme, the moment her fleet became a menace to the sea power of England, British statesmen saw the necessity for changing their policy. I do not blame them for that But what was the result? The result was that in less than five years the astounded world saw England, France, Russia and Japan allied against Germany, Austria and Turkey. The war being over, we again see England preparing for a reversal of policy to side with Germany and Italy against France and the Balkan countries. Again, I say, I do not blame her. On the contrary, I think her statesmen are very wise and far-seeing.

At the beginning of the war when our newspapers were filled with denunciations of the wild Huns, with the darkest pictures of the horrors that would befall Canada, should Germany win the war, I had the advantage of meeting an accredited English publicist, with the best letters of introduction that could be had from the British authorities. I asked him what he expected would be the result not, of course, of the war—he did not know any more about that than I did—but of British policy after the war. I wanted to find out from him what he thought would be the next turn in that policy. "How is it", I asked him, "that the sentiment in Great Britain against Germany has grown so suddenly?" He answered: "For the simple reason that we discovered that they were getting better than ourselves at our own game." I asked him what he meant. "I mean," he said, "at the game of settling colonies and building navies. They are improving upon us in this game and we will not let them get the better of us." I asked him further what England would do in relation to Asia Minor after Germany had been crushed. I did not know then of the secret treaties under which Sir Eward Grey, our spokesman, the spokesman of the empire, had given a free hand to Russia over Turkey, including Constantinople, and had agreed with the French government in one month to hand over a certain piece of territory to Greece and the next month to Italy, the difference being that in one treaty the same territory was called North Epirus, to satisfy Greece, while in the other it was described as South Albania, to please Italy. I asked this gentleman what he thought England's policy would be after the war. In reply he declared that the moment the end seemed imminent, just before Germany was crushed, England would form an alliance with Germany to keep Russia down. I said, "Do you think you will bring the French to agree to that?" He replied, "They will have to agree, for if they don't we will isolate them." That was practically five years in anticipation of the policy which began to assert itself in Genoa, which asserted itself still more clearly in London and also at Lausanne, and which was apparent, with a slight modification, at Geneva this year. But wait until next year.

Once more, I repeat, I do not blame England. For their own good and for the good of Europe, British statesmen have changed their policy after each war. As Mr. Lloyd George said on one occasion, "My attitude at Genoa was exactly the attitude of Lord Castlereagh at Vienna. Just as Lord Castlereagh prevented Austria and Prussia from crushing France, because England's interest did not lie in the direction of crushing a great nation, so I do not want France to crush Germany." That, I say, is good policy, inasmuch as it makes for the peace of Europe and of the world. For that reason I have, time and again, to the great scandal of some of my friends in the province of Quebec, praised the policy pursued by England after the war, because it conduced to peace. But after this war is forgotten, we should be careful of England's policy, because then, it will likely lead us into another war; and that, not because England wants war, but because, in view of her enormous possessions, it is imperative that she shall remain mistress of the seas. England so long as she remains mistress of the seas over which is flung the greatest empire that has ever existed, is bound to go to war to crush any nation that threatens her naval supremacy or her colonial power.

Well, we are a young nation with a population little larger than that of the city of London, scattered over a territory as vast as Europe. Is it, then, socially right; is it politically right; is it British-like, that we should impose upon the future generations of this country burdens of empire equal to those which the people of England must bear of necessity because of England's unique situation and because of the tremendous responsibilities which she must inevitably shoulder?

So far I have been speaking only of the situation of England in Europe. Just this week I was reading a protest from the mouthpiece of the ultra-loyalist element of Cape Colony, the Cape Times, reminding the British government about Locarno:

> Great Britain is so occupied with the confused currents of European diplomacy that she has forgotten that she represents the British Empire. The British partnership is the greatest power in the world as long as it speaks with one voice, and Great Britain should speak not as a European power, but as a delegate of the empire, and refuse to be drawn into the vortex of European complications.

It is easy to say that in Cape Town, but not so easy to put it into action in London, on the borders of Europe. But this precisely opens the door to the other aspect of the situation. After all, England is a secondary power in Europe. She is a first-class power only on account of her navy. And she has her navy on account of her possessions—not for our protection, but for the protection of her water routes, to keep the avenues of trade open so as to give nourishment to her people and to bring raw materials to her industries. The day that England loses her empire and her navy, that day she would come down to about the level of Holland after that country lost its navy and practically had to rely on the grace of England and the other great maritime nations for the retention of her colonies. But nevertheless it is true that England is much more of an Asiatic power than a European, nearly as much of an American power, and of course much more of an African power than either an Asiatic or American. Well, what does that mean? It means that England in her relations with the rest of the world, with Europe as well as with her dominions, is obliged to think all the time of India, of Egypt, of Asia Minor, of Africa—painted in red from Cape Town to Cairo—of Australia, of Canada. She cannot disconnect any portion of her policy from her general situation in the world. This is an evidence of her tremendous imperial genius, but it makes a problem that is rather hard to deal with for a small growing nation such as we are with the tremendous home responsibilities that we have. Take her Asiatic and African policy; for a century at least it has been dominated by the simple fact of her possession of India. Let us look at one single aspect of that relationship—Hindu emigration to the other portions of the empire. Our friends from British Columbia, would not, I think, be prepared to agree that in order to make the government of England easier in India they should open the doors of their province to Hindu immigration; but if they looked at the question from the imperial point of view they would see the other aspect. I remember being in London just at the time when our naval policies were so tremendously discussed here. I was asking a high official of the India office in London: What is really the best contribution that Canada could render to the imperial cause? "If you could bring British Columbia to open her doors to Hindu immigration, that would be worth all the dreadnaughts you could build in ten years." Well, that is an aspect of the imperial question. The Australians see it from another point of view. But that is not all. There is Persia, as my hon. friend stated this afternoon, there is Irak, there is Palestine, there is Egypt, there is Morocco.

But let us come to America and terminate there our review of British policy and Imperial entanglements in the last century. Strange to say—and I do not think I am boasting in saying it—I stand as perhaps the only Canadian public man who on the whole has upheld British policy as applied to American affairs. I well remember at the time of the Alaska boundary award, when I was denounced in this House of Commons as a traitor to my country because I stated that Lord Alverstone's decision was sound according to law and to fact. I still believe it. I know that numerous writings have appeared, mostly in Toronto, denouncing British diplomacy as regards Canada. I do not view it that way. Of course, we boast very much about the century of peace between this country and the United States. Undoubtedly we owe it to a large extent to the common sense of the Canadian people; but we owe it also to the common sense of the British people; and when we were accusing Great Britain of sacrificing our interests for the sake of maintaining peace with the United States, I think we were making a mistake. England was doing the only thing she could do in that respect. I never understood it better than on my second last visit in London, a few months before the war. At that time there was a great deal of discussion about difficulties in Europe, Irish affairs, and all that. We had had our two squabbles about naval policy—naval contribution as proposed by the Conservative party and a so-called Canadian navy as proposed by the Liberal party. I had an excellent occasion to get opinions on the merits of those policies from two of the most respected British authorities on naval matters—authorities whose opinions I valued much because they were generally in absolute contradiction to each other; I mean the late Lord Charles Beresford and the late Lord Fisher. Now the two old sea-dogs have gone to their reward, I hope that on the other side of the world they are not quarreling as much as they did while here, and I think I can without any indiscretion repeat exactly what they told me.

Of course, Lord Charles Beresford's opinion was well known. On the one hand, he did not believe in the dreadnaught policy. Then he had expressed himself quite openly on the Monroe doctrine as being the main safeguard of British possessions in America. But with regard to Lord Fisher, I did not know. So I went to him and asked what he thought of our two naval policies. "Well," he said, "my good fellow, I don't think much of either. Of course, if you have money to squander you may do anything you like, but if you regard it either from the naval point of view or from the national point of view for your protection, it is a great mistake. Don't make any mistake, England will never spend one penny and will never shoot one gun to defend Canada against the United States—simply because we cannot do it. It is just as well you should understand it. It would not be rendering service to you to fight the United States, either for Canada or for anything else. If you need help as against any other country, you must not count on us; you must count on the United States. If you want to make an arrangement for national defence, don't come to London; go to Washington." "Well," I said, "that would be very ill received by our super-patriots and imperialists in Canada." "Ah," he said, "are you so foolish as that in Canada? Don't you realize that the whole world's policy is based on inter-dependence? I think we British have some degree of national pride, and yet we rely upon the French army to fight for us against Germany, just as France relies upon our navy to fight against the German navy, just as in times past Germany relied upon us to give her money to fight against France. The whole of the world's relations is based on interdependence. How can you imagine that you, a small nation of nine million people scattered over a country as large as the continent of Europe, alongside a nation of a hundred and ten million people, can count upon the support of a fleet in Europe,—the main use of which is to keep our sea routes open—to defend your own land against the richest and most powerful country on earth? Of course, I repeat that if you have money to squander, throw it in the water if you like; it does well there from a sentimental point of view. We cannot stop you, but really we do not need your money; you had better keep it at home."

So I came back convinced that in opposing any such policy, while I might be styled a traitor in Canada, there might still be a few men in England, whose names are connected with England's power and glory, who have enough British common sense to understand that Canada should look on her own situation as Great Britain looks on hers.

I thought that was sound advice then, Sir, and I think it is sound advice now. Why do we not come to a reality? Why do we not come back to the old principle which was so strongly enunciated by Sir John A. Macdonald, and later by Sir Charles Tupper? There is no man I know of in our Canadian history who resented so strongly as Sir Charles Tupper the accusation that Canada was a sponger upon the British nation because she did not contribute to the maintenance of the British navy and army. I know of no Canadian and no Britisher who ever brought out so strongly, and with such explicit facts, the evidence that by building up our territory, by bringing in population, by being peaceful here and making Canada strong we were making our best contribution to the British Empire. That was the way I looked at things twenty-five years ago and I confess that it is still my view. It seems to me there is no harm in asking the Canadian people to look over these things, to compare the policies pursued in late years and what they have cost Canada, with no real profit to Canada and the empire, with the results obtained by the humbler but more practical policy enacted by constructive statesmen of sixty years ago, who based all our relations with Great Britain upon the sound principle that each country should look to itself and leave the British statesmen to look after the general affairs of the empire.

These ideas are growing; they are having a rebirth, so to speak, in the minds of many people. A year or so ago, I think, Sir Clifford Sifton, once a member of the Liberal party and another time an ally of the Conservative party, whose policy may be open to discussion on many issues, but whose common sense and keen mind no one will dispute, put that problem before the people of Toronto in as clear and unequivocal a manner as it could be put. It is not so long ago that an English imperialist, one who knows much about Canada, Mr. Percy Hurd, in the House of Commons in England, reminded the English rulers that they should not forget that Canada has interests in America which are not the interests of Europe, and that Australia has interests in the Pacific ocean which are not the interests of Canada.

Now, Sir, our connection with the British Empire may last long or may terminate abruptly. For my part I stated twenty-five years ago, at the time of the South African war, and I state again to-night with the same conviction, that I am not longing for secession. I believe we need for a long time, not the protection of Great Britain; I do not think Great Britain can afford us any protection that we are in need of, but I prize the association with Great Britain. I repeat, without any idea of offending members of this House or anyone of English stock, that I appreciate that link with Great Britain in a certain degree more than they can, because it is an appreciation based on study and on reflection; it is not the voice of blood. You cannot expect the French-Canadians to love the British; why should they? But you may expect the French-Canadians at all times to appreciate their connection with Great Britain. For my part I appreciate it more, perhaps, than a great many other French-Canadians, because I have frequently been in Great Britain and have, so to speak, imbibed the atmosphere of British political life. And why have I been so often in trouble in this country? It is because I have persisted in thinking that I could have the same freedom of thought and language in this country as is enjoyed in England, and I propose to stand by that contention. I believe the association with Great Britain is needed by us for a long time, in order to help in developing our minds to the same broad standard of individual and political liberty. I believe the association with Great Britain is a great help to us if we view it in the right way, and if we act upon it with the same British spirit of self-determination and self-respect. But I repeat, Sir, that it is not by playing the servile worshipper of everything English that we are going to benefit by that association. On the contrary it is by standing up in the face of Great Britain, not in a defiant attitude but in an attitude of self-respect and virile admiration, asserting to Great Britain that there are certain matters upon which we can agree with her, and that there are other matters upon which we cannot agree, because they have interests which are not the same as ours and because we have trusts to perform and to hand over to generations to come with which neither the Englishman nor the Australian can deal for us. We have a duty to perform by Canada; the Australian has a duty to perform by Australia, and the British have a duty to Great Britain which no other country can accomplish. If we only revive these principles, these elementary truths in the minds of the people of this country or in the other portions of the empire, I am quite sure that this great problem of inter-imperial relations will soon be solved.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to vote for the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I think, with all due respect to him, that it is rather narrow in its wording. On the other hand I will not associate myself with those who denounce him for bringing forward the motion. Whatever be the wording, I consider that the hon. gentleman has rendered service to this country and has done his duty in proposing this motion. But I would respectfully suggest an amendment to the motion, seconded by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Spencer), which is as follows:

11 p.m.

That this be referred to the select standing committee on Industrial and International Relations for consideration and study, with power to invite expert advice, such committee to report to the House during the present session.

I suggest, for example, that that committee invite such men as Mr. Ewart, Sir John Willison, Sir Robert Falconer, Mr. Skelton, Under Secretary of State; men holding various opinions on this problem, who would come and give us their view of what some would call the imperial solution and others the national solution, and even the solution of independence. Why should we be less free in our minds than the men of sixty years ago? Are some hon. members of this House so afraid of their loyalty that they cannot hear anyone proclaim Canada's right to independence, as our forefathers did? In order to show my spirit in proposing this amendment, I would suggest—not as a motion but as a mere suggestion to the committee—that, in the opinion of this House, Canada is not bound by any obligation assumed by the government of the United Kingdom, in matters of foreign policy, unless and until the government of Canada, duly authorized by parliament, expresses its adherence thereto.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not rise to address the House on the motion, nor yet on the alleged amendment, but to take exception to the amendment as no amendment at all. It is not an amendment to a motion to move that the motion go to a committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: That was my opinion when the hon. member moved his amendment. According to rule 45, there is such a thing as a motion to commit a bill or question. It reads as follows:

A motion to committ a bill or question, until decided, shall preclude all amendment of the main question.

[Mr. Bourassa.]

Then the instructions to the proposed committee might be made the subject of another motion, no notice being required. If the hon. member would amend his motion, it would be preferable, because as it stands I shall be obliged to declare it out of order. Under Rule 45, the hon. gentleman should simply move that the question be committed to the committee on Industrial and International Relations. But his motion having been put, the mover should now get the leave of the House to withdraw it and move another one. Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman shall have leave to withdraw the motion I read a moment ago?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Ordinarily I would not object, but now that it is to be followed merely by a motion to commit this to a committee, I do take exception.

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendment has been declared out of order, as contrary to Rule 45. I suggested that the hon. member should move another one in conformity with rule 45. There is nothing now before the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The main motion is before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: Except the main motion, of course.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I shall not speak very long, but I would like to say a few words on this resolution.

In the first place, I take exception to the form of the resolution. I think I might make the same comment on it that the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Kennedy) did. I do not see how we can be called on to pass a resolution refusing to accept a responsibility when we have never been asked to accept it. I have another objection to the resolution, and that is that it raises indirectly the question of the future status of this Dominion, whether we are to stay out of the empire or not. I think a question of that importance should not be raised in this indirect way. It seems to me that if a matter of that kind is to be discussed it should be brought up by the government and some statement of government policy be given on the subject, in order that we may have a proper debate carried on from day to day, and that everybody may have a chance to express his opinion.

The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has spoken to us a long time this evening on a great many subjects. May I suggest to him that when he is discussing a matter of this kind—really an important problem—he ought not to go over the whole past history of this Dominion? As a matter of fact one is not surprised that he should remember with pride some of the things in the history of his ancestors, but the fact remains that we are now in the year 1926, and, as he said at the end of his speech, many things happened during the war. Precedents were created. Sir Robert Borden took a stand for this country which has never been equalled by any other Canadian statesman, a stand which resulted in our being recognized in every way as a nation having complete authority in all matters, not only of domestic concern, but in regard to outside questions affecting us as well.

Remarks have been made again this evening about our autonomy. Somebody said that it was absolutely unfettered and complete, a quotation, if I remember rightly from Mr. Asquith. The time has long since passed, Mr. Speaker, when any effort is being made in the Old Country to bring pressure on us, and no such effort will be made. No statesman over there would for a moment suggest that any pressure should be brought to bear on this country, and there is not a man in Canada, so far as I know, who would give up in the slightest degree our powers and our rights of self-government. Those things are all settled; we have got them; we are going to keep them; they are acknowledged by everyone; so why raise the question here? Why take up the time of this House in killing a dead horse?—for that is really what a great deal of this discussion amounts to.

The question before this country to-day and the empire is this: Can we so arrange matters that six independent countries shall work together in matters of foreign affairs and common concern? I am going to criticize this government for not taking some steps that I think they might have taken to help us along with this problem; and that could be accomplished by continuous consultation with the Motherland and with the other parts of the empire.

As I understand it, the great bulk of the people of this country want to continue our connection with the British Empire. The hon. member for Labelle this evening left me in a bit of a doubt. When he commenced his speech he said that he desired that the connection with Great Britain should be preserved, but when he came toward the end of his speech I could not make out where he stood, and I do not know now whether he thinks we should be independent or should continue as part of the British commonwealth of nations. However, the Prime Minister of this country, speaking in this House on June 9, 1924, stated his position. After pointing out that there were three avenues of political development, he said:

> For my own part, I believe that the future of this Dominion will be happiest and best, most prosperous, and in every way most to the good, if its development is along the line on which it has been thus far, towards a fuller recognition of national status within that community of free nations which comprise the British Empire.

He went on to say that the imperial parliament was not a possible thing, and an imperial council was a thoroughly bad thing. I entirely agree with him in both these statements, and in the idea that our best chance for future development lies within the British commonwealth of nations. But what has the Prime Minister done, and what has the government done, to try to bring that about? What have they done to further our relations with the rest of the empire?

In connection with our desiring to remain a part of the British Empire, I want to read from a statement which quotes a remark made by General Smuts, a man of as great ability, I think, as anybody I have ever known. It quotes General Smuts as follows:

> The empire was a priceless blessing and was to-day, with American abstention from the league, the main force supporting the advance of great human causes and ideals in the world. The maintenance of solidarity and a united front were therefore essential.

If we are to maintain the British commonwealth of nations we shall have to have more consultations from day to day than we have at the present time. We have to find some way, in between the Imperial conferences, by which we can have this consultation which is absolutely essential to our getting on together and seeing eye to eye in regard to matters of foreign affairs and common concern. As to the necessity of that and as to the feeling that people in England have on the subject, I want to read a couple of extracts. In the first place, Mr. Austen Chamberlain, when he brought in the Locarno treaty, referring to the Dominions, said:

> Their liberty and freedom of action are safeguarded specifically under the treaty. It is recognized that only their own governments, acting with the authority of their own parliament, can undertake for them the obligations that we are asking the House of Commons to undertake for Great Britain, but we hope that we may discuss this matter fully whenever the next Imperial conference is set up, and that that Imperial conference may not be too long delayed. I do not think that it is possible to treat matters of this great consequence, covering so wide a field, by dispatch or cable across thousands of miles of ocean. For a true appreciation of the position personal contact and personal explanation are necessary.

Now Mr. Chamberlain states a truth which we all know, namely, that you cannot discuss intricate and delicate matters unless you are face to face with the men with whom you are dealing. In connection with the same matter he said:

The Dominions could not be committed to obligations without their assent, but he earnestly hoped that not only might those negotiations not be an obstacle to future co-operation, but that they might excite in every government of the empire a keener desire to find a machinery by which our foreign policy could become in every act and at every hour the foreign policy of the empire and not of this country alone.

In other words, statesmen over there would welcome some method by which we should have continuous communication or consultation between the different parts of the empire, a method by which the government here would be constantly informed through their own representative about what was happening over there. That representative would have no plenary power, but he would act in such a capacity the government would know from day to day exactly what was happening every hour as they cannot know from cables or letters. A number of thoughtful articles appeared in the London Times last year on this subject, and I should like to read an extract from just one of them:

If British foreign policy is to be one which will command the approval and support of all parts it must be the outcome of collective discussion and agreement about the ever-changing problems of the international world. Unless that consultation can be brought about it is only a question of time, as recent incidents have shown, for a crisis to arise which will show opinion so divided that action is paralyzed or the unity of the empire endangered.

We are living in a very interesting age. We are making now, in the British Empire, an experiment which has never been tried before in the history of the world. Canada has complete autonomy. Nobody has challenged it, and nobody ever will. When the hon. member for Labelle states that there are people in this country whom he calls imperialists who want to have the control of affairs in Canada centred in London, I think he is making a mistake. I do not know where they are. If there are any such people, they are a negligible quantity.

Mr. BOURASSA: I do not think there is any number of people suggesting that our affairs be settled in London.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Centred.

Mr. BOURASSA: Oh yes, the hon. member is quite right; I do not believe that either. But I think there is a large number of people who believe that all imperial affairs, even those which concern ourselves, should be settled in London.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY, The hon. member means Canadians?

[Sir George Perley.]

Mr. BOURASSA, Yes.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: All I can say is that there must be very few of them. They must be a negligible quantity, because most of us in this country are of one mind. All governments from confederation on whether Liberal or Conservative, have asserted the right of this Canada of ours to govern herself. and never was that right asserted more strongly than by the Conservative government during the war. If there were time to-night, I could cite several instances which came under my direct notice where steps were taken definitely to assert the right and authority of Canada in regard to her own affairs, whether they had to do with matters in this country or after our troops had left for overseas. I would also like to read, for the benefit of the hon. member for Labelle, a statement made by Lord Milner, one of the most ablest of the English statesmen, who has unfortunately passed away, regarding this delicate question. He said:

The only possibility of a continuance of the British Empire is on a basis of absolute out-and-out equal partnership between the United Kingdom and the dominions. I say that without any kind of reservation whatsoever. It is very easy to say that; but undoubtedly the working out of it in practice without bringing about the severance of relations between us and the dominions will be one of the most complicated tasks which statesmanship has ever had to face. I am not afraid of it, and yet I have to admit that the difficulties are such that our best efforts may end in failure. I hope not. At any rate, there is no other way out.

That is from a speech made by Lord Milner in England, and I heard him say it. It was a carefully made statement; it expresses the situation exactly as it stands, and I agree with every word of it.

I am one of those who hope and believe a way can be found for having the independent nations within the British Empire act together in matters of common concern in foreign affairs. I remember one Dominion day before the war when we had our annual dinner in London and I was in the chair, I made some similar remarks pointing out that the question was a difficult one, but that I believed the energies and abilities of the English nation were such that it could be solved. The hon. member for Labelle, who was present, said to me: you are just trying to square the circle; you are trying to do the impossible. I am still of opinion that by care this question can be solved, but before it can be solved the government of this country should take the proper steps to see that we have some system of continuous consultation with the people of the rest of the empire.

I did not read the whole of the Prime Minister's remarks of June, 1924, but I take it for granted we all desire to remain as part of the British commonwealth of nations, and I am starting with that assumption. If that is so and if we are to avoid breaks and make the thing work, we must have some other method of consultation. From a business point of view it is idle to think we can get along under the present system. When I came back from England—naturally I took much interest in and heard a great deal about this question—it was my pleasure to call upon the present Prime Minister and to talk the matter over with him. He has always been most courteous to me, but I am going to charge him now with exhibiting either indifference or neglect with regard to this important matter. He gave me all the time I wanted to talk the matter over and to explain my feelings in regard to it. I had ideas of my own as to how the plan ought to be carried out, but that is a secondary matter. All I want to press home to-night is that some way must be found of continuous consultation among the various parts of the empire if it is to hold together. It is impossible to imagine our going on as we are now with the possibility at any moment of some serious question developing. The inaction of the government in this respect has brought us into difficulties on several occasions. The despatch about Chanak would never have happened if there had been any system of consultation by which somebody close to the government had been in London and could have talked these matters over with the foreign secretary or the Prime Minister and have been given access to them for that purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend, but I think he knows, with respect to the Chanak communication that came from the then Secretary of State for the Colonies, that even the members of the British government had not had a cabinet meeting in regard to it. They did not know anything about it and they repudiated the message afterwards. So I fail to see how, even if we had had a representative in London, we should have had a word to say about it.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: I accept what the Prime Minister has said. I thought there was some dispute about that subject; it was not very definite whether it happened or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The late Mr. Bonar Law said—I do not remember the exact words he used—it was taking a big chance with the whole imperial structure for a communication of that kind to be sent without a consultation between the different members of the government. I think the present Prime Minister of England has also made it quite apparent that one of the reasons he left the Unionist ministry was because of the way in which that despatch was sent out.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Did Mr. Churchill not state that the cabinet had been consulted?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No. I think he claimed the then Prime Minister, Mr. Lloyd George, had knowledge of it, but I do not think he said for a moment all the cabinet had.

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: Whether that is correct history or not has really nothing to do with the argument I am trying to make. If it did not happen in that case, it happened in some others. Perhaps Lausanne would be a better example. At any rate I simply want to make that argument. I am firmly convinced that if the government really want to find a way of making independent nations within the British commonwealth work together, they must help provide some system of consultation which will be continuous. Backing that up, I read another extract from the Times article:

> If the Dominions and Great Britain then find themselves unable to work together we shall at least know that the empire has perished because there is a real and unbridgeable gulf between the opinions of its parts. But it is at least permissible to believe that, despite all changes in status, they will succeed, in the future as in the past, in working together, if only they are provided with means for understanding the international problems with which they have to deal.

In conclusion, I may say that I have spoken many times in London on themes similar to this. I have tried to put before the people there our feelings and desires in Canada and the fact that some way must be found by which Canadians shall have something to say about the foreign affairs of the commonwealth of nations. Never have I found anybody who did not acquiesce and agree with that. As for the method, may I say to the Prime Minister that I am sure the statesmen of Great Britain would welcome any plan put forward by the government of this country to bring about this consultation? It was suggested at one time during the war that there might be a representative of the Dominion government in England, either a minister or some official who would have access to the Prime Minister of Great Britain, and a resolution of the war cabinet was passed in 1918 which provided that, in order to secure continuity in the work of the Imperial War Cabinet and a permanent means of consultation during the war on the more important questions of common interest, the prime minister of each dominion should have the right to nominate a cabinet minister, either as a resident or as a visitor in London, to represent him at meetings of the Imperial War Cabinet, to be held regularly between plenary sessions. That authority was never taken advantage of, and I urge as strongly as I can on the government of the day that they give this matter their consideration and that, instead of the inaction which has characterized them during the last four years, they undertake in earnest to find some way by which the different parts of the empire, so far as Canada can bring about that result, may consult continuously with a view to obviating any possibility of friction or of serious difference of opinion.

Mr. PARENT: When representations were made in this matter by the hon. member, was he a member of the cabinet?

Sir GEORGE PERLEY: It was when I was about to resign my position as High Commissioner in 1922; I came back to Canada and consulted with the Prime Minister before actually putting in my resignation. Now, I submit that this is too serious a question to be brought up in the form of a private member's resolution, and I take exception to the method that has been adopted. It seems to me that if we are to discuss the matter we should do so on a motion by the government, with a statement of their policy. For these reasons I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.37 p.m.

Tuesday, March 23, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

When this House adjourns on Friday March 26th instant, it stand adjourned until Tuesday April 6th next.

He said: Before the motion is put, may I say to hon. members of the House that the government has no intention of pressing this motion, unless it meets with approval on the part of hon. members. The motion has been made because the government has reason to believe that to most of the members it would be a convenience to have an adjournment of ten days, which we would have if this motion carries, rather than to be obliged to come back for two days and one-half during that period of time, thereby breaking the adjournment of ten continuous days which would otherwise be possible. The custom has been to adjourn on the Wednesday afternoon before Easter, the House sitting for half a day on Wednesday, and then adjourning until the following Tuesday. I have had occasion to look up the record and I find that in the years 1917 to 1925 the practice has been to adjourn on the Wednesday. Monday and Tuesday are full days and Wednesday half a day. If this motion does not carry, members will be obliged to come back for two days and a half the following week. If the motion carries it will be possible for hon. members to leave the city on Friday night of this week and remain away until Tuesday of the week after next. The government, in view of what has been communicated to its members, has thought that, with that feature drawn to the attention of hon. members, the motion would probably meet with general approval. However, the purpose of presenting the motion at the moment is rather to call forth an expression of the views of hon. members, and if the views of hon. members appear to be against the motion, I would ask that it stand.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): As far as I am individually concerned, and as far as my own convenience goes, the motion would suit me very well, but the members on this side of the House, especially those from the far west and far east, are, if I may be permitted to speak their minds as indicated to me, strongly against this motion. Their reasons are chiefly their anxiety to get on with the business of the session, and added to that there is the fact that the business of the House seems to be a joke to hon. members opposite. There is also the fact that we have just had quite a long recess of about ten or eleven days during which most of the members, I think, availed themselves of the opportunity of returning home, and naturally they do not feel like inviting another opportunity to go back home, spending most of the time, as is necessary, on the way. For these two reasons, the feeling on this side of the House would be against the motion, and I would suggest that, if it is not dropped, it stand, until perhaps a further conference could be had.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Personally I would prefer to have the adjournment. It seems to me that out of the ten days there would be only two and one-half days during which we could really be doing any work in the House. I would like to have gone west. If there is any strenuous opposition to the longer adjournment, I am quite willing to bow to the will of the majority, but we would only lose two and one-half working days out of the ten days. The adjournment would be broken by Saturday and Sunday, the legal holidays intervening, and it would be only two and one-half days longer than the regular adjournment. During that period there are, of course, five legal holidays. It seems to me it would be to the convenience of all hon. members to have the adjournment for ten days. I think the government have had adjournment enough. They have had two weeks. I have had to remain in Ottawa as have a great many other hon. members. At the same time if there is anything to be gained by it I would be in favour of the longer adjournment. Seeing that only two and one-half days during which we could do any business would be lost, I think hon. members would be well advised to vote for the ten day adjournment. I am quite willing to stay here or I am quite willing to go home.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): This is an occasion when I wish to say a word or two. I was not able to return to Vancouver during the previous adjournment. I think the public at large and members generally are anxious to get on with the business of the country, for there is a good deal to be done. I myself have a copyright bill which I should like to proceed with and I would urge upon the government the wisdom, even if we have only two and a half days, to let us use all our time in getting some work done. It might mean some personal inconvenience to hon. gentlemen who would like to return to their homes, but that should not stand in the way of public business.

Mr. HARRY J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): As one who took advantage of the last adjournment I may say that I spent ten days in travelling, having only two days at home. To hon. gentlemen in the far west and east who could not avail themselves of the adjournment it would mean much inconvenience: they would have to remain in Ottawa until the re-assembling of parliament. I think that those hon. members from Ontario and Quebec, who have easy access to their homes, should have some consideration for others who come from a distance. We are anxious to proceed with the business of the country, and we hope to make the session as short as possible. We are looking forward to the other end of the session, and we would rather work now. I for one am very much opposed to a further adjournment.

Mr. MURRAY MacLAREN (St. John-Albert): The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has asked for an expression of opinion regarding the duration of the adjournment at Easter. My right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) has represented the views held by many hon. members sitting on this side of the House, and personally I would wish to emphasize this point, that this is a longer Easter vacation than usual. Let us bear in mind the previous adjournment of eleven or twelve days which we had very recently. In the light of that vacation I submit that the proposed adjournment should be as short as possible, rather than one which will be longer than any we have had in the last five or six years.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As I intimated a moment ago, it is not the desire of the government to press the motion at all. If I act on the suggestion which has been made to allow it to stand until Thursday, the whips might confer among themselves in the meantime. Let me make it clear that the government is as anxious as any hon. member on the opposite side to proceed with the business of parliament, but we have felt that in matters relating to the procedure of the House there may be occasions when mutual accommodation would also help to expedite business. As to what my hon. friend has just said about the proposed adjournment being longer than usual at Easter, he will recall that parliament assembled this year earlier than is customary. The House met early in the month of January, and for that reason the period of time during which hon. members have already been away from their homes is longer than is usual at Easter. However, it is a matter of meeting the convenience of the majority of members.

Mr. W. A. BOYS (North Simcoe): Speaking from the standpoint of the convenience of members, it seems to me that, whatever is going to be done, the sooner we know what is decided upon, the better, in order that we may be enabled to make our arrangements. If the Prime Minister would permit me to interview the whips of the Liberal and Progressive parties this afternoon, we might come to some understanding and we could know the decision to-night. It would inconvenience hon. members greatly to be obliged to wait until Thursday or Friday to know what the government intended doing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I entirely agree with that suggestion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it understood that the motion stands, to be considered again later in the day?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If it is possible for the government to make an announcement to-night, the motion can be formally put at the next sitting of the House.

Motion stands.

PRIVILEGE—MR. CHURCH

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. T. L CHURCH (Toronto Northwest): I rise to a question of privilege. Last night, at the conclusion of the speech of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), I rose to call the attention of the House to a certain statement that had been made with reference to myself earlier in the day by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), in which he misquoted a speech which I had delivered in Toronto. The hon. member referred to certain remarks of mine as rightly quoted by the hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) at page 67 of Hansard of the present session, and further put into my mouth these words:

> Had we had autonomy we should not have entered the war.

I never used these words. I have nothing to retract from what I said on that occasion but inasmuch as the hon. member omitted the qualifying text of my speech I desire to quote rather extensively from a report of it. Parenthetically, I may observe, Mr. Speaker, that I would not have risen on this occasion were it not that I was prevented last night from making the explanation when I had a perfect right to do so in view of the fact that I had the floor beyond any dispute. The hon. member for Labelle had moved an amendment which was not seconded, and which it appears was not in proper shape, and he had gone to the clerk's table to have it redrafted as I presume and went around looking for a seconder. I therefore had the floor and I was prepared to make the present explanation then. What the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said was not altogether correct. He quoted only one sentence and at that not as to the text. I should like to read the following extract from the speech I gave at Toronto in order to make my position clear. I quote:

> I am opposed to separatism, changing Canada's status and autonomy. We are proud that Canada is an integral part of the greatest empire the world has ever known. The war has not changed Canada's status. What she has done in the past thirty-five years she has done of her own free will and voluntarily

> Canadians have good reason to know that the national status of Canada was a good enough status for more than 400,000 Canadian soldiers to fight for. Canada's present national status in 1914 was a good enough national status for over 50,000 Canadians to die for. That status was good enough for fighting Canadians like the Canadians of St. Julien, The Orchard, Courcellette, Vimy Ridge, Passchendaele and many another field of battle. That status should be good enough for talking Canadians and writing Canadians. The British Empire and the British navy are our friends. The socialists who would wreck the British Empire and the pacifist who would weaken the British navy are our enemies.
> I stand on the platform of our late beloved leader, Sir John A. Macdonald, when he said: A British subject I was born, a British subject I will die and I will never see General Election become commander-in-chief of the British forces or take the place of the British fleet to protect our shores. I have more faith in the sentiment expressed by the writer of "Ye mariners of England" and all it stands for than I have in the Monroe doctrine, the League of Nations, or any other similar debating society to safeguard Canada's shores in the future should trouble ever come again, which God forbid.
> Canada is not going to be talked out of the British empire, if it could be done, the hon. member from Labelle and the two gentlemen who call themselves the so called labour party—the whole party and nothing but the party would have accomplished this feat long ago. They are but a vest pocket edition of J. Ramsay MacDonald and his ideals. "Something has been said about holding elections and going to the country for endorsation before sending troops from Canada to participate in Britain's wars. So far as the Toronto sixteen regiments and units are concerned, no legislation nor no election nor no conscription act will be necessary. They will do their duty for the Empire as each separate exigency occurs the same as they have always done in the past."

This and the quotation appearing at page 67 of Hansard is what I said. I am glad to have had this opportunity of explaining my position in the matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: In justice to the hon. member, I may say that I did see him rise last night to address the Chair, but he did so at a moment of suspense. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) had just concluded his speech with a motion which was improperly drafted, and through the courtesy of the House I allowed him some time in which to have his amendment correctly worded. For that reason I intimated to the hon. member for Toronto Northwest that the hon. member for Labelle still had the floor; otherwise I should have been only too pleased to let him interject his explanation at that moment.

TRANSFER OF PRISONERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): Is it the intention to transfer some eighty prisoners from Portsmouth to Stoney Mountain penitentiary? If so, will the prisoners be ticketed, as on a former occasion, through the Canadian National Railways office in Ottawa, or will the minister issue instructions that the prisoners be ticketed through the Hanley ticket agency of the Canadian National Railways at Kingston, where the business originates, where the entraining takes place, and where the agent of the Canadian National Railways can and must give his personal supervision to the details of the work?

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I will make the necessary inquiry and give the information to my hon. friend to-morrow.

LOCARNO TREATY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister about what time the House will have the privilege of discussing the Locarno treaty; also, if he could let us know what the government's attitude is towards it.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if it is the desire of hon. members to have an early opportunity to discuss the treaty, it can be arranged. But I think I am correct in saying that in any event the Locarno agreement does not go into effect until after Germany is admitted to the League of Nations; it is now quite apparent that this will not take place until after September, so any immediate haste for discussion of the agreement is, I imagine, removed. However, if hon. members wish to have an early date set for its discussion, the government will be very pleased to make the necessary arrangements immediately after the Easter recess. As to the government's attitude regarding the treaty, it will be expressed at that time, if so desired.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the usual unanimous consent to go into supply in order to put through the Interim Supply Bill. We are now approaching the end of the fiscal year. I notice my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) is not in his seat. I had a conversation with him, and while he was not prepared to consent to put through the customary supply bill of one-sixth, he did say that he would offer no objection to one-twelfth.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I understand that the hon. member for West York has agreed to raise no objection to a vote of one-twelfth of the entire supply applicable to each item. Of course, it is passed on the usual understanding that there is no commitment to any single vote or to the principle of any vote.

Mr. ROBB: Quite so.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Mr. ROBB moved that the House go into committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Mr. ROBB moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $15,934,291.06, being one-twelfth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Should there be an exception of the items already voted in toto?

Mr. ROBB: No, this is the customary practice.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in.

COMMITTEE OF WAYS AND MEANS

Mr. ROBB moved that the House go into committee of Ways and Means.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Mr. ROBB moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1927, the sum of $15,934,291.06 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported read the second time, and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 14 for granting to His Majesty a certain sum of money for the public service for the financial year ending March the 31st, 1927.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first and second time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the House go into committee on the bill?

Mr. ROBB: Is my right hon. friend willing that we should proceed in committee?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The member for West York is not here.

Mr. SPEAKER: Next sitting of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the right to sit again to-day was reserved. Perhaps it was an oversight.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was understood that later in the day we would go on with supply.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, but the right to sit this day?

Mr. SPEAKER: Yes, I said so.

CANADA-WEST INDIES TRADE AGREEMENT

The House resumed from March 19 consideration in committee of the resolution of Hon. Mr. Robb respecting the Canada-West Indies trade agreement, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Mr. CAHAN: As the agreement in question is of very considerable interest to the city of Montreal, whose board of trade have taken a great deal of pains to consider that matter, I would like to place before the committee one or two considerations. In dealing with a trade convention with the West India islands, I am not speaking without some knowledge and experience of the conditions there. I have lived in British Guiana on several occasions for many months at a time; I have been on the islands of Trinidad and Tobago on several occasions for months at a time, and I have also been to a number of the other islands, for the purpose of investigating financial and trade conditions and commercial possibilities there for certain clients. Therefore, I personally feel disposed to make every reasonable concession on the part of Canada in order to improve our trade relations with those people, colonies of Great Britain, who are like ourselves under the British crown. Personally I do not think this convention will secure for Canada a very much larger trade with the West Indies than we have enjoyed under the convention of June 1920. Nevertheless, as the government have entered into that convention, there are strong considerations why we should approve of it if it is at all possible, in the public interest, to do so.

It seems to me that at this stage the government are bound, before we are called upon to approve of that convention, to state very clearly to the House what it will cost Canada. In respect of the convention of June 1920, which called for services both to the eastern and to the western groups of islands, we are told by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) that it was found impossible for Canada to live up to that agreement. Now when a new convention is negotiated we should know definitely whether Canada can live up to this second substituted agreement, and what it will cost the treasury of Canada if we do live up to it.

In respect of the first convention of 1920 the government must have on file complete statements of what the cost of that service would have been if it had been carried out as originally intended. This House should be fully informed of what that cost would have been; how high the cost was, and what were the insuperable difficulties in the way of the government carrying it out since they came into office in 1921. We agreed under the 1920 convention to give to the eastern group of islands, a steamship service consisting of a weekly mail, passenger and freight service, and we gave instead a fortnightly mail, passenger and freight service by subsidizing the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company. On each alternate week we gave a service restricted to freight through the medium of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. As to the western group, we agreed to give a fortnightly freight, mail and passenger service to the Bahamas, Jamaica and British Honduras. We did furnish a service every third instead of every second week, and provided no cold storage, as had been in contemplation. We now agree to give not a service once every three weeks, but a fortnightly passenger, mail and freight service consisting of larger and faster steamships, and therefore a more expensive service by far than was proposed in 1920. We also now propose to give on alternative weeks a fortnightly freight service with cold storage, with a subsidiary line for freight sailing from Jamaica to Honduras every two weeks. Therefore there is no doubt in my mind that the proposed service to the western group of islands under the convention now before the committee will prove a far more expensive service than that proposed in 1920, which the government, in the interests of the country, found it impossible to carry out.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is there not also this difference, which I think should be interjected, that the cold storage service guaranteed in 1920 was only as business warranted, whereas now it is absolute?

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so. The service from 1921 to 1925, performed to the extent which I have noted, has, I understand, proved very unprofitable indeed, and this is true with respect to the present time and recent months. I am informed, and I think quite reliably informed, that only 40 per cent or 50 per cent of the cargo space of the steamships employed at these infrequent intervals has been taken up. Therefore the new service which is proposed depends to a large extent, it seems to me, upon the successful prosecution of the banana trade with Jamaica.

When this convention was being negotiated the council of the Montreal Board of Trade wrote a letter, through their secretary, to the then Minister of Trade and Commerce, Hon. Thomas A. Low, in which they set out that all the people in Canada engaged in commerce are very desirous of having improved reciprocal trade relationships with the West Indies. But they state, under date of June 16, 1925::

With regard to the suggestion that the Canadian government should build new ships for the West Indies service, the council would strongly oppose any such scheme at the present time, believing that the existing trade conditions and the enormous burden of debt under which Canada is suffering, together with its already serious transportation problems, render exceedingly ill-advised the expenditure of any considerable sum of public money on a project, the profits from which are at least problematical.

I might be allowed to say, with all deference to the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Malcolm), who discussed this question the other day, that undoubtedly the West Indies were represented by very able and experienced men. I have had many years experience with the officials of those governments, and a few years ago, but not now, I knew nearly every prominent merchant in those islands. They are very able and experienced men, and they came to that convention, undoubtedly, knowing exactly what they wished to obtain, and they were dealing with men who very largely were ignorant of the conditions in those islands, and not sufficiently informed, I think, to deal with the matter so as to protect to the utmost possible extent the interests of the treasury of Canada. But, we are told by the hon. member for North Bruce, the representatives of the government acted very largely upon the advice of those West Indian representatives, and in reading the report of those negotiations I find that those gentlemen from the West Indies dealt very frankly with the representatives of the government, and they did not pretend that any very large increase in the exportations of Canada to the West Indies was likely to be obtained under the convention which they then proposed. However, after this latter convention was negotiated, the council of the Montreal Board of Trade passed this resolution, which I understand was also brought to the notice of the government. I quote:

The council regrets that the negotiators of the agreement did not accept its suggestions concerning the steamship services, and fears that the heavy commitments on this account may provoke such opposition as to render it impossible for parliament to sanction an agreement which includes provisions of some value to the trade between this country and those other portions of the empire which are parties to it.

More recently I am informed that the board of trade, under date of March 3rd, received from its own sub-committee which was investigating the prospects of trade under this new agreement a report, in which it is stated:

That, in respect of the commitments on account of steamship services, the agreement far exceeds the recommendations made by your predecessor—

That is the predecessor committee of the board of trade:

—and in the opinion of your committee it is unlikely that the increased trade which will result from the very considerable extension of the mutual preferences provided by the agreement will, at any rate for some years, warrant the heavy cost of the improved steamship services proposed;

That, notwithstanding the financial burden undertaken by Canada as referred to in the foregoing paragraph, your committee is strongly of opinion that, considering the serious effects upon the West Indies and other colonies concerned and upon the trade relations of the empire, of a failure on the part of Canada to ratify the agreement negotiated in good faith by the duly accredited representatives of all the parties thereto, the said agreement should be approved by parliament without delay;

That, in thus urging the approval of the agreement, your committee does not recede from its former objection to the building of vessels by the Canadian government, being still unalterably opposed to any extension of government ownership or operation of steamships, but it hopes that the provision of the additional steamship services necessary may be secured by means of subsidies to private lines, thus minimizing the burden on the heavily taxed citizens of Canada.

Mr. Chairman, I do not concede personally that parliament is bound to ratify this convention simply because the representatives of the West India islands have in good faith negotiated the convention, always subject to the approval of their own councils and legislatures and subject to the approval of the Canadian parliament, but, on the other hand, I do admit that the government of Canada having negotiated the convention, no slight objection on the part either of this House or of the country should defeat the confirmation and approval of that treaty if the costs of the services to be provided are at all commensurate with the advantages which Canada would receive by putting the treaty and the auxiliary steamship services into operation during the term of the treaty, the next twelve years.

I quite appreciate that dealing with the representative men of the West Indies, it is desirable that we should support the government's action in negotiating the treaty if it is at all practicable for us to do so, because on the part of Canada I personally would rather see some financial sacrifice than to disclose to them by the vote of this committee and of this House that the government which negotiated this treaty did it through incompetent officers and representatives, and negotiated it without having first carefully ascertained what the cost would be to the public treasury of Canada.

On the 8th of March of the present year the council of the Montreal Board of Trade placed their final views before the right hon. leader of this government in a letter written by the secretary of the board, in which they say:

I have the honour to communicate the views of the council of this board on the question of the ratification by the Canadian parliament of the Canada-West Indies Trade Agreement, 1925, as follows:

On 16th June, 1925, just prior to the meeting of representatives of the Dominion and of the West Indies and other colonies interested, at which the agreement was drawn up, the council of this board submitted to the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce certain recommendations with regard to provisions which in its opinion should be embodied in that agreement. These recommendations included one to the effect that this country should go to the utmost possible limit in the granting of reductions in its tariff in favour of the West Indies, as well as very definite suggestions as to the necessity of keeping the expenditure on steamship services at the lowest possible minimum, and above all the council voiced its strong opposition to any proposal that the Canadian government should build new ships for this service, pointing out that the enormous burden of debt under which Canada is now suffering, together with its already serious transportation problems, render exceedingly ill-advised the expenditure of any considerable sum of public money on such a project.

To the great regret of the council the agreement as negotiated involves very heavy commitments on account of steamship services.

While still unalterably opposed to any extension of government ownership or operation of steamships, the council nevertheless believes that failure on the part of Canada to ratify the West Indies agreement, negotiated in good faith by the duly accredited representatives of all the parties thereto, and since ratified by all those parties with the exception of this Dominion, would have the most serious consequences, and it therefore urges the ratification of the agreement by parliament without delay.

The council cannot refrain from expressing the hope that the government may find it possible to secure the necessary additional steamship services by means of subsidies to private lines, rather than by launching into an expensive programme of shipbuilding, believing that thereby the additions to the financial burden on the already heavily taxed citizens of this Dominion would be minimized.

Now it is all very well for the council of the Montreal Board of Trade to submit the opinion that under the circumstances, in order to maintain the good reputation of the government of Canada with those with whom it negotiated this convention, we should endorse the expenditure of untold thousands, yes of millions, without having before it definite details as to that cost. Although I concede to no man, to no member of this committee, a stronger desire to maintain friendly and profitable commercial relations with the West India islands, yet I do not feel that as a representative, even of the city of Montreal, I should vote blindly in favour of the approval and confirmation of this later convention, unless we have from the Minister of Finance, or from the Prime Minister, or from some other of his ministry—the Minister of Trade and Commerce for instance—a clear and precise statement of what in their opinion, backed up by the best information which they can obtain, the carrying out of this convention will cost the country for the next twelve years. I have seen, and have at hand, a report of a committee of the Board of Trade of Halifax in reference to this matter. I know well the gentlemen who are on that committee. I know that they are competent business men who have had a large and varied experience in steamship matters, and especially in the matter of trade with the West India islands. Their good faith in making the calculation which they do cannot be questioned by anyone in view of their standing in the commercial community, and they estimate that the capital expenditure alone upon this steamship service may reach a total of $9,550,000 if the government undertakes to buy the ships and to operate them as a part of its mercantile marine. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that it is due to this committee, and to the House, and to the country, that the government should give us a complete statement of its policy—whether it intends to enter upon this large capital expenditure, or whether it intends to subsidize independent steamship companies to carry out these services. I quite appreciate the remark made by the hon. Minister of Finance the other day, that in view of the fact that tenders have been asked for it would be inexpedient on the part of the government to make an announcement as to what its definite policy was, or as to what the proposed cost of the services would be, until such time as these tenders may be received. But, Mr. Chairman, the delay in asking for tenders in respect of a convention made in June, 1925, is not due to any member on this side of the House. It is due to the undoubted fact that the members of the government have been much engaged since June, 1925, in their political propaganda leading up to the general elections of October 29, last, and since that day they have been deprived of their political and intellectual head and of his direction in the matter. We are not responsible for that, and before you ask us, as intelligent and honest members of this committee and of this House, to approve of a convention which may entail this enormous expenditure of money we are entitled to have the full facts placed before us; and if, owing to the fact that tenders are still being called for, the government does not feel in the position now to give us that information, certainly it should postpone, or be willing to postpone, the further definite consideration of this convention until after the Easter holidays when the tenders in question will have been received.

Personally I desire to suport the convention if I possibly can, but I am not going to support it at a cost of $9,500,000 of capital expenditure to this country. We desire full information too, because other matters of very considerable importance are to be brought before this House involving very large appropriations of public money, and I for one am not going to oppose large grants from the public treasury to the west and to the centre of Canada, and then turn round and vote for equally large or larger appropriations for services which are less valuable to the country, simply because the city of Montreal may be interested therein. As an honest and, I think, fairly intelligent representative I want to have the full facts stated to us so that there may be no deception—I am not saying that in an unpleasant way—so far as we are concerned. We must be fully informed and be in a position to vote intelligently on this matter. I put it to the Minister of Finance, who has a reputation to sustain as a competent and experienced business man if he would submit to any board of any corporation, of which he may be a director and official, an agreement of such a character and ask them to take it blindly without knowing, with a very considerable degree of definiteness, the actual expenditures that would be involved in the corporation carrying out such a project. He could not maintain his reputation as a competent business man by so doing. Therefore, I think that as we are to have some sort of an adjournment during the coming Easter holidays this matter should be deferred until the committee and the House may be fully informed as to the extent of the financial obligations they are undertaking by approving this convention, and may be able to determine each member for himself whether, having regard to our sentimental interest in the West India islands, our sentimental and political desire to co-operate with them effectually and fully and at the same time conserve the interests of this country, we are justified in voting the very large amount from the public treasury of Canada which the present convention will undoubtedly entail.

Mr. MacLAREN: I wish to take this opportunity of referring somewhat briefly to the matter under discussion, the Canada-West Indies agreement. Many of us have followed the discussions in the House during the last five years, and several of us have taken part in those discussions. Whether one approves of the present treaty or whether one disapproves, I believe all are in accord on this point: that there is great need of an improved service of ships between Canada and the West Indies, a better modern class of boats, better passenger accommodation, better facilities for freight and for cold storage. There is another point on which I believe we will all agree, and that is that it is necessary to observe the fulfilment of the treaty between the West Indies and ourselves. A very decided complaint has been made regarding the method in which Canada has performed its obligations under the treaty. I believe it is correct to say that it is necessary to maintain at, least, the conditions at present, or there must be some other change. I present these two points; a better transportation service in many respects and a fulfilment of the conditions that have been laid down in the present act, or as may be promised in the proposed act. Then there is the third point, and surely we will agree upon that; that it is necessary for us to move on and search out to increase our trade with the West Indies. Whether the future is a great one, or whether it is not so great the fact is there is much left for Canada to do in increasing the West Indian trade so that these are the three main features on which I believe the members of this House all agree.

Let me say a word on a few points arising in this discussion. I think there is some misapprehension amongst some hon. members of this House as to the terms of the present treaty or agreement. First of all, let me say that to-day all imports coming from the West Indies to Canada can pass through the United States on the same terms as if they were entering Canada directly. It is true there is a provision that on six months' notice Canada may insist or may require that imports come direct to Canada, but that provision is not enforced and never has been enforced Many members in this House will remember that this matter has been pressed on the government for several years, and a feature of this agreement that one must recognize with satisfaction is that the government has incorporated in it and propose to enforce the requirement that all imports from the West Indies come direct to Canada. That is one of the favourable features of the treaty. Another point I wish to make is, that with reference to the imports from the West Indies at the present time, the statistics do not represent accurately, or even fairly, the amount of business we do with the West Indies. Most strikingly is this true with regard to bananas. At the present time a large quantity of the bananas imported into Canada is obtained through the United States. They may be West India bananas and they may not, but they are credited as an import from the United States. The United States does not grow bananas, but in the method of compiling customs statistics the import is credited to the United States, because our bananas are purchased and paid for there. I point this out because all bananas, whatever the amount may be, that are got from the United States, to almost the entire extent, appear as imports from that country, whereas, really they may be indirectly imports from the West Indies. Then there is the further point that under the preference provided for, it is reasonable to expect that a large part of the import of bananas will come from the West Indies direct. To that extent the benefit of a treaty with the West Indies, will be apparent because instead of importing through the United States, we can reasonably look for a very considerable increased importation through our Canadian ports.

Let me refer to the question of the quantity of bananas, because one may reasonably ask, can Jamaica, which is the principal island for the growth of this fruit, supply Canada with bananas? To give an illustration of the enormous amount of this fruit that is imported into the United States, let me say that in the year 1924, 47,000,000 bunches were imported into that country. In 1924 Canada imported 2,000,000 bunches from the United States, to the value of $4,500,000. From the British West Indies direct we imported only 7,000 bunches at a value of $14,000, a marked contrast between the imports of bananas from the West Indies and the imports from the United States. In 1924, Jamaica exported a total of almost 12,000,000 bunches of bananas. Our requirements were about 2,000,000. It is therefore clear that there is ample production of bananas in the West Indies to supply Canada, but it is not clear at the moment whether the bananas that come into Canada actually come from the West Indies. Some no doubt do, others do not; there is no customs return that will decide that point. But the important factor is that they will come to Canada from the West Indies under favourable conditions, and one would hope that this trade may be added to the business that is now going on between Canada and the West Indies.

There is a further point that should give us a favourable view of our future trade with the West Indies. It is this. We know that the business that we have has grown up largely without the assistance, or at any rate, with the very limited assistance, of trade agents. We have been informed in this House that the United States have trade agents scattered all through the islands of the Caribbean sea while it is a fact that the number of Canadian agents is extraordinarily few. I would suggest to the government therefore that, whatever agreement may be arrived at in the future, the matter of trade agents should should be carefully considered and due attention paid to their employment, inasmuch as the trade must depend to a considerable extent on the work of these agents. It is encouraging, in my opinion, to reflect that the trade which we have had during the past few years has been almost independent of the activities of agents.

There must always be a start in movements of this kind, and a start has been made in the development of our relations with the West Indies. The trade has never reached any great proportions, however. Is it not reasonable to expect that our relations with the British West Indies will lead in the future to trade with other West Indian islands that are not British, as well as with that portion of the continent which is known as Central America? These fields naturally should and I believe would, open up as the result of a well defined policy of West Indian trade.

On the other hand, consideration must be given to the adverse views held in relation to the proposed treaty with the West Indies. One must pay regard to the opinions of Canadian West Indian merchants, and we should defer to some extent to the views of the various boards of trade which are interested in the prosperity of this country. There are a number of important merchants in Canada who disapprove of conditions of the proposed treaty, and I am aware that the Halifax board of trade has pronounced strongly against its terms. I hold a copy of that board of trade's decision on this question and I have no doubt other hon. members have also received copies. A similar report was published two or three years ago and was concurred in by the council of the St. John Board of Trade. It is necessary to refer to these things because they must receive consideration. These reports may represent very valuable opinions.

Now what is the outstanding objection to the treaty as proposed? The objection is the enormous cost which it is said it will entail. My own personal attitude towards the treaty is a favourable one. Of course, I do not think it proper to take too optimistic a view of it, and I believe that possibly such a view was held by the late member for Cumberland, who was tremendously interested in the subject. Probably his views were too optimistic; I do not consider the West Indian trade an eldorado for Canada. At the same time there are those who hold too pessimistic a view of our future trade with the West Indies. I believe there is room for substantial growth in that trade, perhaps not to any enormous extent, but something tangible and worth while.

How can one decide in a matter of this kind? It is contended very forcibly that the future business between the two countries is not sufficient to warrant our going into any very heavy expenditure. We must be careful therefore in promoting this trade agreement; we must make some reservation in forming our opinions on the subject. I would suggest therefore that, before we come to a final decision in the matter, as close an estimate as possible be given to the House as to what cost will be involved in carrying the treaty into effect. I do not want to scrutinize the cost too closely, but it should not be excessive. There is however something more than a mere commercial arrangement in such a treaty. We are carrying on or we should carry on, relations with another portion of the empire, so that not only is there the commercial aspect of the treaty to be considered; there is also the national responsibility which I think we should regard. We must have further details with regard to the expense that will be entailed. It may be that later on in this debate, or when the matter comes down in the form of a bill, that information will be largely supplied.

There is one other point to which I would refer here. I notice that there is a provision giving the Canadian government power to call at any port other than those specified in the agreement. Perhaps at some stage the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) will give us the full information on that point, as to whether the treaty may include ports in the United States or elsewhere.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend's attitude indicates a fair understanding of the future possibilities of trade with the West Indies and neither his suggestion nor that of the hon. member (Mr. Cahan) is unreasonable, namely, that at some time before the bill receives its third reading we should be in a position to give to the House information as to the cost of the subsidies. I would be inclined to accept the proposition of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. MacLaren), and if the resolution was passed and the bill introduced we might very well leave it for second reading until we were in a position at least to say to the House what the tenders amounted to. But I think every hon. member, had he the responsibility that I have now of seeking tenders and keeping the subsidies down to the lowest possible point for the benefit of Canada, would hesitate to give information which might be a guide to the tenderers as to how they should present their figures. My hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George has referred to the great ability of the West Indian business man. I admit all that. But he has nothing on the shipping lords of the world, who are looking about for fat contracts, and have a way of putting their heads together and deciding where and how they will tender. I know that at the moment I am in the hands of those gentlemen, and I think my hon. friend will agree with me that it is not wise to disclose any information which would be of advantage to them.

Mr. CAHAN: If my hon. friend will allow me—I understand that fully, and I have no objection at all to his withholding any information until tenders are received.

Mr. ROBB: I am glad my hon. friend realizes that. I am sure were he sitting over here he would adopt my attitude. I notice my hon. friend has quoted some resolutions from the council and secretary of the Montreal Board of Trade. These gentlemen apparently blow hot and cold according to who happens to attend the council meetings. Now, I am a member of the Montreal Board of Trade and of the Montreal Corn Exchange, and the gentlemen I meet at the board of trade for the most part are generally in favour of the West Indian treaty. Like my right hon. friend opposite, they say that the negotiating of this treaty is one of the bright spots in the record of this government. But I know there are other members of that board who possibly are tendering for this subsidy, and they would like to know what is the government's idea respecting it. Of course, they are perfectly right in seeking to place themselves in an advantageous position.

In reply to what has been said, I should like to remind the committee that we did not go into this matter without estimates. I confess frankly that we have estimates of what the subsidy is going to cost, and any person who has so far estimated on it is very wide of the mark. In addition, we have an estimate from the Halifax Board of Trade that would not lead anyone to imagine that it is going to cost the great sum of money that some people seem to think likely; and the members of the Halifax Board of Trade at least should know something about shipping. I do not know that they would object so very much to what it is going to cost if they only knew who was going to get the subsidy. I think that interests them more than the cost.

Mr. HANSON: I do not think the minister is doing himself or the West India committee of the Halifax Board of Trade justice when he makes that statement.

Mr. ROBB: I am not going to revive old stories and refer to any of the past subsidies, but I have in my hand a report by the royal commission of which Lord Balfour of Burleigh was chairman, made in 1909. Perhaps hon. gentlemen would like to know what that commission thought about some of the gentlemen who then enjoyed the subsidies and about the sort of ships they had on that route. The commission referred to them as something like old curiosity shops, for which they were getting a pretty good subsidy.

Mr. HANSON: One hundred thousand dollars a year.

Mr. ROBB: I did not say whose ships they were.

Mr. HANSON: We all know whom you mean.

Mr. ROBB: We are not going to subsidize antiquated ships. We need good, modern vessels for our West Indian trade, and the government desires to secure a service not only satisfactory to the people of Canada but also to the people of the West Indian islands.

A few moments ago my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George, who has had some experience in the West India islands and down south, expressed doubt whether we could increase our trade with the islands; and I gathered that he also thought there were other people who could have made a better treaty, that in fact the government of the day went into it blindly. Now, Mr. Chairman, we did not go into this arrangement so blindly as my hon. friend imagines. For many years, under different governments, we have had in the service of Canada experienced trade agents. These agents had been travelling through the West India islands for something over two months gathering information as to trade possibilities, and when we met these gentlemen in conference we had the advantage of that information. They are experienced men with no axes to grind, and they went as our trade missionaries to spy out the land and the sea. Then we had also the experience of another gentleman who sat in as one of the delegates representing the islands, although he is a Canadian. No one will say that the interests of Mr. Macaulay of the Sun Life Insurance Company are greater in the West Indies than in Canada. He has extensive interests throughout the whole Dominion, and should at least be a real Canadian missionary. He certainly knows the West Indies very thoroughly, and his judgment should be of some value. He does not quite agree with my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George. But we did not need to take the advice of any of those gentlemen, for we have cold statistics of the trade of the West India islands. I placed those figures on Hansard when the bill was presented to the House, and my hon. friend will find them at page 1730, showing the purchases of the West India islands and the small percentage that Canada enjoys. Then if he will turn to page 1731 he will find the increased tariff concessions that we obtained from the islands. So if we cannot get their business with the preference they have granted us, then the Canadian business man will not display those qualities that he has manifested in going out and securing trade in the other parts of the world, because Canadian export business has grown very rapidly in the last few years.

I repeat, I will not press this resolution, but if my hon. friend agrees to make progress we might pass the resolution and introduce the bill, which we could give second reading, and then allow it to stand until we open the tenders, when we will be in a position to tell the House just what they contain. But I take it every hon. member agrees with me that it is not wise at this time to disclose any information that will adversely affect Canada's interests. I am glad that my hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George agrees with that view.

Mr. KAISER: Are there no particulars in which this treaty may be modified?

Mr. ROBB: I think it must be accepted as it is or rejected. That is the agreement with our friends of the West India islands. Most of their legislatures have already ratified the agreement. To keep good faith with them I think we should accept the treaty just as it is.

Mr. RYERSON: Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to make any general criticism of this treaty at the present time, for the reason that I am in favour of the policy of trade treaties between the sister dominions as a means of bringing them closer together in commercial relations. But I do maintain that in the framing of such treaties every care and every caution should be exercised to see to it that our commitments are not too large, and that they are in proportion to the benefits that we are to receive. In the framing of this treaty I fear the government have been misled in important matters, and all my criticism is directed against that part of the programme dealing with the importations of bananas and the banana carrying business. I believe the government have been misled in this matter and have attached altogether too much importance to the possibility of diverting to our Canadian ports the large banana carrying trade which comes to us now, almost entirely through United States ports.

I claim, Mr. Speaker, to have some knowledge of this business, and of the difficulties of transportation, refrigeration, storage and the distribution of this fruit, and I state frankly to this House that I do not believe the plan to divert this traffic to Canadian ports feasible or practical. I am not going into detail as to why that is my opinion, but if permitted I will read a few extracts from a report of the Halifax Board of Trade, dealing with this matter, which is in the possession of many hon. members.

Where then can the increased traffic to warrant the expenditures be expected to come from? The only remaining article suggested is bananas and a great deal has been said about them at the conference. The agreement provides that all bananas imported direct into Canada from British possessions shall be entirely free of duty and that all coming from or through a foreign country shall pay a flat duty of 50 cents per stem or bunch. For the fiscal year ending March, 1925, Canada imported 2,464,925 bunches. Of these 100,000 came to the Maritime provinces, 2,059,369 to Quebec and Ontario, 303,396 to the prairie provinces and 133 to the Yukon. The greater bulk of these—2,118,000 bunches were imported during April to November or eight months of the year.

Presuming that the ships as proposed are provided, they could carry 240,000 bunches per month. The importation during the month of May was 317,847; June, 360,369; July, 444,154; August, 376,274, showing that during these months a considerable quantity would have still to come through the United States to satisfy the demand or more tonnage provided for that period and during the remaining months of the year, December to March inclusive, the costly ships proposed for the service would be required to operate carrying from 70,000 to 130,000 per month with a capacity of 240,000 bunches. It is not hard to see how the operating losses would pile up during that period.

The above is based on the presumption that all the bananas used in Canada would come by the ships proposed for the western service from Jamaica to Canadian ports but this is not at all likely to occur. Owing to the perishable nature of the bananas the shortest route and quickest transportation is necessary to avoid loss by deterioration, therefore all the bananas used in western Canada and possibly some used in Ontario are brought by steamer to Mobile or New Orleans, a two or three day voyage, and shipped to destination by rail, and the rail haul is shorter than from Canadian sea ports to similar points, creating a saving of six to seven days in the sea voyage and a possibly lower railway freight; is it not reasonable to assume that the saving in freight and lesser deterioration will offset the duty of 50 cents per bunch and admit that the bananas for western Canada will continue to move that way? This would leave 2,000,000 bunches to be imported direct by the proposed steamer. The first question that occurs to us is, "Who is going to operate the business?" Will the Jamaica growers or merchants form a company to load the ships, establish a selling and distributing organization in Canada and sell to the Canadian dealer on as suitable terms and conditions as they buy at present? If so, the problem would be simplified and even though by virtue of their control of the business they would probably derive the whole benefit of the duty imposed on bananas of 50 cents per bunch, when imported via the United States, the proposal would have some little merit if it increased our exports to Jamaica. But if we know the Jamaica growers and merchants that is not likely to happen—they want to sell their bananas to somebody in Jamaica for cash and take no risks of the market conditions in Canada.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would ask the committee to take particular note of article 13. This article deals largely with the inauguration of this service, which is to deal practically with the banana situation. It would seem to me that the entire plan is linked up with this banana business, and a large part of the cost of equipping these steamers will be devoted to that purpose. Steamer service is to be provided for storage and refrigeration for 70,000 bunches, and freight service for 50,000 bunches. The important point—and I direct the attention of the committee to it—is that if the government fail to secure this traffic, a good deal of this expenditure will have been wasted, and the revenue which they expect to receive will have been lost. I claim that before this matter is intelligently voted upon we should have some statement from the government as to just how they propose to carry on this business.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) a few questions in connection with this particular part of the treaty:

1. What information was available in reference to this industry, when the treaty was negotiated? Did they have reports from experts, or first-hand information from those connected with this business here in Canada, such as dealers, transportation companies or distributors?

2. Where they fully informed as to the extremely perishable nature of this fruit and the great difficulties of distribution without heavy loss?

3. Were they advised of the fact that less than one-third of the total imports of bananas to the United States and Canada came from the West Indies, and that these West Indies imports were desirable only at certain seasons and for certain markets?

4. What arrangements or plans do the government propose as to the importation and distribution of this fruit? Will the government go into the importing business themselves, or have they in view some corporation or company that will take on the job?

5. Was any information supplied dealing with previous efforts to divert this traffic by transportation companies or other corporations or individuals?

6. Did they have any knowledge of the fact that millions of dollars have been expended by large corporations in the industry in experimental work, in growing, handling, refrigeration, transportation and distribution of this fruit, and that inspection stations are maintained at all important junctions, and a messenger service established which watches carefully the temperature of every car of bananas en route to its destination, and that the most satisfactory plan of distribution is based upon the shortest haul and quickest delivery from steamer side to centres of distribution?

I will send a copy of these questions over to the minister.

Mr. ROBB: I will see them in Hansard to-morrow.

Mr. RYERSON: I do not wish to discourage this treaty at all, but I simply want to point out that there is very great danger of the government not satisfying themselves as to the feasibility of this project. Personally, speaking from an experience of thirty-five years, I do not believe that you can divert more than a small proportion of that traffic. Undoubtedly, if proper steamers could be put on this route, a certain portion of the traffic could be diverted to Quebec, and a portion of Ontario and of the Maritime provinces might be served, but I know that you never can supply the west, and you never can supply northern Ontario from our Canadian ports. This is knowledge that I have gained by experience. But if the government are properly advised in the matter, and if they still can formulate plans for proper distribution, I believe it will be satisfactory to the trade.

[Mr. Ryerson.]

Mr. ROBB: I will look over the questions which my hon. friend has submitted and which will appear in Hansard to-morrow. May I just now say to him that I have greater faith and confidence in the management of the Canadian railways than he apparently has. Anything that has been accomplished by the United States railways in distributing this fruit can be equally as well done by the managements of the Canadian railways.

My hon. friend has referred to the fact that at the present time the banana trade enters Canada largely through Mobile and New Orleans.

Mr. RYERSON: No. May I correct the minister? I did not make that statement. That statement was in the Halifax report, and it is a very big mistake. The larger proportion of the bananas that come into the United States and supply Canada come to Baltimore, Philadelphia, Boston and New York.

Mr. ROBB: That is just what I was going to say. My hon. friend has placed on Hansard a record which says that those bananas largely come in through Mobile and New Orleans, but he has now corrected that statement himself. He knows that the trade comes in through New York, Baltimore, Philadelphia and Boston, and the United States railways get the long haul. I say very frankly that we purposely provided in this agreement that the benefits of this trade in and out should centre upon Canadian ports, so that Canadian ports and Canadian transportation companies would have the advantage of the business, and I believe they will be able to handle it. My hon. friend who is in the business doubts that. He seems to think the price will be cut and the trade continue to come in through United States ports. Very well, if it does, Canada will get out of that business one and a quarter million dollars annually; they will pay the duty, that is all there is to it.

As to refrigerator space, I would point out that we require cold storage for our southbound traffic as well. If we are going to ship our dairy products down there, we must have refrigeration. My hon. friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), who says he has been down there, and any other hon. gentleman who has been in the West Indies must have seen the lady going about with a tray of fruit on her head, and must have observed that while the vendors here sell oranges, down there they are selling apples. There is a good trade for apples in the West Indies, and we must have refrigerator space for our apples as well as for our dairy products.

Mr. RYERSON: The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) has said that our large transportation companies such as the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National can well be trusted to handle this business. I would ask him to make inquiry and find out if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company did not endeavour eight or ten years ago to do the very thing this government is now endeavouring to do, and fell down on it. I ask him to make inquiry and satisfy himself.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be understood as being opposed to the development of trade within the empire, but I am opposed to treaties being entered into without a proper investigation first being made as to the effect these treaties will have upon industries in our country that will be vitally affected by them. I called the attention of the Minister of Finance the other night to one important industry in my county and in adjoining counties, the sugar beet industry. The minister knows that the refineries established in that part of the country will be seriously interfered with by this treaty. This treaty allows the Canadian Government Merchant Marine to carry the products of the West Indies to the refineries of Halifax, St. John and Montreal, but the refineries that are eight or ten hundred miles inland will be very much handicapped in transporting their raw material over that great distance. The refinery at Vancouver is in a similar position. It is not likely that this government will attempt to carry the products of the West Indies around through the Panama canal and on to Vancouver, and therefore the refinery in Vancouver, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) the other evening, will be seriously handicapped. This is an industry of great importance to this country. Let me just place on Hansard a few figures in regard to the sugar refineries located in this country. The statistics of the sugar industry in Canada for the calendar year 1924 are presented in a report by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, which shows that the number of factories reporting operations during the year 1924 was seven, located by provinces as follows:

Province	Number of Factories	Located at
Ontario..	2	Chatham and Wallaceburg
Quebec..	2	Both in Montreal
New Brunswick.. .	1	St. John
Nova Scotia..	1	Dartmouth
British Columbia .	1	Vancouver

Then here are some figures as to the capital invested, number of employees, and so forth:

Capital invested..	$46,000,000
Employees on salary..	834,000
Employees on wages..	2,565,000
Total..	3,399,000
Cost of fuel..	$ 1,400,000
Cost of materials..	55,000,000
Value of products and by-products.. ..	67,000,000
Value added by manufacturing..	12,200,000

That goes to show the importance of the refining end of this industry.

Now the total cost of materials—and I should like the minister to pay some attention to this statement—fell from $61,800,000 in 1923 to $55,000,000 in 1924, due to the decline in the market price of raw cane sugar and of sugar beets. I have tried to call the attention of the minister—

Mr. ROBB: I am following my hon. friend.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): —to the effect of the lowering of this price and what it meant to the farmers interested in the production of sugar beets. The average price per hundred weight of raw cane sugar laid down in Montreal fell from $7.63 per ton in 1923 to $5.65 in 1924, while the price of home grown sugars manufactured from sugar beets fell from $12 per ton in 1923 to $5.87 per ton in 1924. I mention these facts for the purpose of impressing upon the minister at least, the serious effect this lowering of the duty on raw sugar coming into this country from Australia and New Zealand is having on the sugar beet growers of Canada.

Mr. ROBB: I do not want to interrupt the argument of my hon. friend but may I say this to him: There has been no change in the duty that has affected the price of beets.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): That may be, but the minister must admit he is increasing the preference.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If my hon. friend will allow me, I think the minister is wrong; there was a decrease in the duty.

Mr. ROBB: There was a decrease in 1923.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes that is when it occurred.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): And another by means of the Australian treaty.

Mr. ROBB: When did it go into effect?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): In October.

Mr. ROBB: It has not gone into effect and will not do so until this treaty becomes operative so far as Australia is concerned.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): The minister admits the fact that in 1923 there was a reduction in the duty on refined sugar of one-half a cent per pound. The very next day the sugar beet growers in western Ontario—and there are tens of thousands of people interested in the production of sugar beets—had the price of their sugar beets reduced fifty cents per ton. As a result of that reduction the people in the counties adjoining the district in western Ontario where I live lost many hundreds of thousands of dollars. The minister now says that the preference will not be entered into as far as Australia is concerned until the present agreement between the West India islands and Canada becomes operative. Then, if I understand the matter correctly, as soon as the treaty with the West Indies goes into operation a similar trade arrangement between Australia and Canada will become effective. These treaties will allow the raw products of the sugar from Australia and the West Indies to enter Canada at a lower price than they have ever entered before thereby competing with the product of the growers of sugar beets in my part of the province of Ontario. Such being the case I have good reason to protest against entering into any such arrangement as the present without the minister first investigating the needs of the industry affected. I should like to ask the minister whether he really did make an investigation before bringing down this treaty in order to find out what effect it would have so far as the producers of sugar beets in Canada are concerned? Perhaps the minister would like to answer that question at a later date, but let me say to him it is a matter of vital importance to our people.

I have already drawn the attention of the government to the position of sugar refiners. The minister has already been shown that there will be a loss of revenue of at least one million dollars, and that the total obligation to be shouldered by the people of Canada in connection with the investments involved here and in other matters, will reach a total of some $10,000,000. What are we to get in return for this treaty? I cannot do better than repeat the statement which was made in this connection by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Black) on Friday evening last:

5 p.m.

The West Indies get large quantities of fish from their own waters. In that connection I should like to read this extract from the report of the conference with the West India delegates. The vice-chairman is questioning Mr. Leacock, a delegate from Barbados.

"The Vice-Chairman: Your suggestion is that the preference given now is sufficient?

"Mr. Leacock: Yes, as far as we are concerned."

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. Leacock says further:

"The Vice-Chairman: Before you sit down, Mr. Leacock, do you think it well to say something about what you can give to Canada?

"Mr. Leacock: Well, that is a very difficult point of view for me to touch upon, because, as I say, Canada has the entire flour trade with the exception of what she cannot supply; she has the entire oat trade of our colonies, the entire oatmeal trade of our colonies, et cetera. Our manufactured goods come very largely from the United Kingdom, and the only article, as it appears to me, that we could encourage in trade with Canada by an increased preference, is the item of salted meats, which could be turned over to Canada, and would probably go over quicker if you got an increased preference. That is as far as I can see as far as Barbados is concerned."

What he says applies not only to Barbados but to all the islands of the West Indies and to Bermuda.

If that represents the total increase in trade we may expect from this treaty surely it is not worth the enormous sums of money which Canada will be compelled to pay. The minister must realize the fact that labour in the West Indies is the cheapest kind of labour in the world, that a large portion of the population in those islands,—as has been already stated here—represents the second lowest type of civilization on the face of the globe, and that it is practically impossible for us to expect to develop trade to any greater extent than is now taking place. We protect our manufacturers from cheap labour; why not protect our farmers?

I wish, further, to draw the attention of the minister to the fact that the people in my district, at any rate during the last season, in order to find a market were compelled to ship nearly 200,000 tons of sugar beets to the United States, and that those farmers making the shipment were not only compelled to pay the freight to the sugar refineries but also an excise duty of 80 cents per ton at the border before their sugar beets could obtain admission into that country. What encouragement have these farmers to build a sugar refinery in the face of treaties such as we are entering into at this session of parliament? I have called the minister's attention to the fact that in my own home town the farmers, with their organization of over four thousand members, gathered together $200,000. Our town granted them a large site and built a railway siding into the plant. They commenced to build the plant and spent over $200,000, and there it stands. But instead of those farmers receiving encouragement for the development of their industry, the minister now takes advantage of that treaty to interfere materially with the future development of the industry. When the minister reduced the duty on refined sugar by half a cent a pound, the farmers were compelled, as I said, to accept fifty cents per ton less on their sugar beets. If a farmer produced sixteen tons of sugar beets to the acre, he was then compelled in 1924 to accept eight dollars per acre less for his product. When these treaties go into effect, how much less will he receive, and what encouragement is there for the farmers to proceed to develop this industry? It is a basic industry of our country, one in which we should all be vitally interested. The western provinces have been able to demonstrate the fact that they can grow beets up there successfully. They have built a refinery, as I understand, and are trying to carry on, but what encouragement have these men to continue in the development of that industry, if we are to enter into treaties that will undermine it from year to year? We are only producing 10 per cent of the refined sugar that is necessary to feed our people, and there are many opportunities for the development of this industry in Canada.

I desire to place a few questions on record, and I should like the minister to be good enough to send me answers to these questions before the treaty is proceeded with. My questions are as follows:

1. What is the duty per pound at present on raw sugar similar in quality to the raw sugar taken from sugar beets coming into Canada from the West Indies and Australia separately, and what will the duty be on said raw sugar when the treaty between Canada and the West Indies now before parliament is consummated?

2. What was the duty on same grade of raw sugar previous to the reduction of duty on this product in 1923?

3. How many vessels of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine operate between Canada and the West Indies?

4. What was the amount lost in operating these vessels each year since they have been placed in that service?

5. What subsidies, if any, were paid in years 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925 separately to vessel owners operating between Canada and the West Indies?

6. Did the minister investigate the effect that this treaty would have on the sugar beet industry before submitting the treaty to parliament?

7. Why jeopardize the interests of producers in an industry before investigating as to the effect a reduction in tariff would make?

These are some of the questions I should like the minister to answer. I wish to urge upon the minister the need of investigating the extent of the sugar beet industry in our country, the effect that this treaty will have on the producers of sugar beets, and the effect that these treaties will have on refineries that are located inland, where they will be compelled to carry the raw sugar, if they do carry it at all, long distances in order to compete with those who are able to be served by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Mr. ROBB: I will answer my hon. friend right now regarding the particular situation which he has discussed. I saw at once the importance of that question when we were negotiating the agreement, and as it so happened that the presidents of the two great railways were in Ottawa I represented to them that if, under this agreement, we provided that the Canadian railways would have all the haul on the export and import business in Canada with the West India islands, they should see to it that the refineries in western Canada were not discriminated against; in other words, that they should help them out on the freight rates and thus put them on an equal basis with New York. I pointed out to them that these people did not object so much to the small reduction of sixteen cents per hundred pounds on the raw sugar but that they wanted to bring their sugar in from New York, where they claimed they could get a lower freight rate than if it came in by way of Halifax and St. John, and I had the assurance of the railways that it looked like a reasonable proposition, and that they would see that the refiners out there were not in any worse position than the refiners more favourably located at the ocean or river ports of Canada. The reduction under this agreement on raw sugar which my hon. friend complains of so bitterly is only sixteen cents per hundred pounds on the raw sugar.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): What is the total duty?

Mr. ROBB: The preference is one dollar.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It was eighty-three cents before, was it not?

Mr. ROBB: It was eighty-three something and now it is one dollar. It was almost eighty-four cents.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Did that include the half cent reduction in 1923?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, that is a different thing.

Mr. ROBB: It is quite true, as my hon. friend said, that the price of beets has dropped, but sugar is just like wheat, oats, butter or cheese, the price is regulated by the world's market, and the price of sugar has dropped all over the world. I notice that the people of the United States were complaining because their jam industry was suffering on account of the cost of sugar which did not compare with the cost in other markets of the world. I recall that in 1922 the government of Australia, through their high duties on sugar, practically put the jam and preserve people out of business, and they were compelled to conciliate them by giving them a subsidy. My hon. friend represents a splendid constituency and in the district near his constituency they grow beets for the sugar industry, but his next neighbour is interested largely in the jam and preserve business. That is a big business in Canada, and it is the duty of the government to see that that business is not discriminated against any more than any other business. In so far as injuring the beet sugar industry is concerned, this agreement practically stabilizes it, because it says that for a period of twelve years the preference shall be one dollar. So that they know exactly what they are going to do during the lifetime of the agreement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, oh.

Mr. ROBB: Does my hon. friend object to that?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON My hon. friend is not taking himself or the committee seriously.

Mr. ROBB: Why not?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Surely it is obvious that it is a preference on a rate of duty. There is no contract providing that the rate of duty shall be kept at any particular point; the only thing agreed upon is that there shall be a certain preference. Further than that, to show how absurd the suggestion is, there is a provision in the treaty itself whereby the arrangement may be altered at any time. The only understanding is that the preference shall remain stationary.

Mr. ROBB: That is right, but if my hon. friend happened to come into office he would have to retain that spread of one dollar. I was going to point out in regard to the beet sugar industry that according to the Monthly Bulletin of Agricultural Statistics for September, 1925, this business in Canada has grown considerably. In 1918 there were 18,000 acres under beets in Canada—I am leaving out the odd figures. In 1920 there were 34,000 acres and in 1922 there was a decline to 14,900. In 1924, however, the acreage was back again to 31,000 odd. That shows that the number of acres under cultivation is subject to the price obtainable for the product. If a man can obtain more money for wheat or oats or potatoes he will grow those products, and when he can get better prices for beets he will go in for beet growing. It appears, according to this bulletin, that in 1924 two Canadian beet sugar factories were in operation at Chatham and Wallaceburg. A third factory has been established at Raymond, Alberta, by Canadian Sugar Factories, Limited, and the acreage under beets for the past season was 6,634, of which 600 acres were lost and 6,034 thinned. This acreage yielded a total production of 58,000 tons. The business is therefore important.

Complaint has been made that the farmers are compelled to ship their beets to the United States. What is the reason? Let me quote the authority of a gentleman in the employ of the government of Ontario who spoke recently at a dinner in Windsor given in honour of the board of trade of that town. He claimed that the local industry was not dealing fairly with the farmers, and he took credit for having induced United States buyers to come over. He stated that the Mount Clemens Sugar Company was contracting for next year at $6 per ton. The company has to pay eighty cents per ton duty, and according to this information the farmers will now send their beets to the United States at $6 a ton as compared with $5.50 which the Canadian people were offering. That is why the Canadian beet growers have been shipping their product to the United States: they can get more money for it there. That is also the reason why the cream from my county and others sometimes goes to the United States. The farmer will send his cream or anything else to the market that pays him the most for it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I think the minister has been mis-informed on this matter. I know that the Chatham and Wallaceburg refineries had representatives in my own home town. Our people were obliged to ship their sugar beets to the United States for the reason that the refineries at Chatham and Wallaceburg had all the acreage under cultivation which they could handle. That occurred only last year. Surely the minister is making an incorrect statement. I know for a fact that the sugar refineries of the United States have sent their representatives over to Canada and contracted for large acreages, and that is why the farmers in my district got together and endeavoured to establish a sugar refinery in my town. But what encouragement have they? Who would put money into that industry to-day, knowing that hon. gentlemen opposite who have controlled the affairs of the country during the past four years have espoused, as the Progressives have done, a policy of free trade in everything, foodstuffs included? Free food means free sugar, and what encouragement has any man under such a policy to invest a dollar in the beet sugar industry? We have tens of thousands of acres of the best beet sugar land in the province. There is no question about that. If, therefore, we had a proper policy in this country a refinery in the town of Petrolia could be operated successfully. The farmer would receive $3 or $4 more per ton for his beets than he now gets, and would not be obliged to ship his product to the refineries in the United States. For that reason I am opposed to this measure. This is a young and growing industry, but as I have said repeatedly it is given no encouragement whatever. I can submit no greater proof than I have already presented to parliament to show that the people in my part of the country are prepared to put money into the sugar beet industry if the conditions are favourable, but they will not risk their money in something that might prove a failure.

Mr. CAHAN: Under this convention the government reserves the right to give a similar preference under certain conditions to other British countries. Is that so?

Mr. ROBB. Yes.

Mr. CAHAN: I infer from what the minister says that it is the intention of the government, in view of the provisions of the Australian treaty, to give the same preference to Australian sugar. That is a fair inference. Would the islands of Fiji come under that provision? Not long ago I was on the Pacific coast where on behalf of a certain gentleman I made a thorough inquiry into the importation of sugars into Pacific ports, and particularly the Pacific ports of Canada. I have not my memoranda with me, but I have in my office a full report of that investigation, and I ascertained this fact, that a Vancouver sugar refinery—I have forgotten the name, but there is one there—had developed sugar lands in Fiji, and were themselves producing a large quantity of sugar which they imported into Vancouver for refining purposes. I was wondering, therefore, whether Fiji would be given this preferential rate. Otherwise, it occurred to me that the Vancouver sugar refining industry might be prejudiced, in view of the fact that they have a large investment in the islands.

Mr. ROBB: When the matter was under consideration on a previous occasion the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) asked that question.

Mr. CAHAN: I am calling attention to the matter in his absence.

Mr. ROBB: I pointed out then that if the Fiji islands were disposed to give Canada a greater concession than we now enjoy, although I believe we are getting their lowest tariff, we would consider extending to those islands the advantages of the West India agreement. As my hon. friend has stated, there is considerable sugar grown in the Fiji islands, but about three years ago, I think it was, they had to curtail their operations, having had some difficulty with the government of India and being unable to bring in any more indentured labour.

Mr. CAHAN: That is since the time I was referring to.

Mr. ROBB: I am told they grow very good sugar down there. The question of Canada reserving to itself the right to extend this preference to other dominions and colonies was brought up in this way, that our West Indian friends, or perhaps some of our own friends, did not wish Newfoundland to be granted the same preference. We wanted to reserve the right to negotiate with Newfoundland, and also, later perhaps, with some of the other British dominions, including Australia and the Fiji islands, having in mind to secure advantages for our sugar refineries on the Pacific coast. Now, Canada is interested not only in getting sugar at a reasonable price for domestic use and for our great jam industry, but also for the important sugar export business that is now developing. Canada exports considerable quantities of sugar to different parts of the world. I hope my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) is not unduly alarmed over the small amount of beet sugar that is grown here, for it does not influence the domestic market. I say again, the price of beet sugar will be regulated by the world's market.

Mr. CAHAN: May I ask, not for the purpose of discussion, if the government reserves the right under this treaty to raise our customs duties to any height it sees fit?

Mr. ROBB: I should not like to be positive, not having the treaty before me at the moment, but offhand I would say that so far as the spread is maintained—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the contract.

Mr. CAHAN: I think it is very important.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, it does so provide on page 12:

Provided that nothing herein contained shall prevent the government of Canada from changing the rates of duty, provided the preferences granted herein are maintained.

Mr. CAHAN: Then so far as the contention of my hon. friend from Lambton is concerned, the government's hands are not tied, and parliament may give any protection it sees fit in future to the beet root sugar industry?

Mr. ROBB: I think my hon. friend is quite correct in that. If hon. gentlemen changed sides and my friend from Lambton wanted to put a high duty on the sugar of the people who make preserves and jams, he would be at liberty to do so.

Mr. CAHAN: I was not discussing that phase of the situation at all, but I think it is important that our ideas should be clarified, because there are a great number of people in the country who are deeply interested in this provision.

Mr. ROBB: That is clear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was going tc take up the point the hon. gentleman has just addressed himself to and add slightly to what he has said. The question of the general duty is really the decisive question on the price that the producer of sugar beets gets. As the minister well knows, only a comparatively small fraction of our sugars in the past have come in under specific preferences. That is beyond all room for argument. Sugar being high generally, as my hon. friend has said, and the sugar coming in from the West Indies being only a moiety of the whole, although there was a preference of 82.70 odd per cent given under the contract of 1920, instead of the price per ton of sugar beets going down, as a matter of fact it went up; but the converse happened in 1923, when with the manufacturers of jams and preserves getting along practically just as well as they are getting along now having regard to the relation of their business to other businesses—I admit their position was not as good as it is now, for we were only then getting over the post-war deflation—and without any real demand for it, the government took half a cent a pound off sugars, and immediately 50 cents a ton was taken off the price of the farmers' beets. That is perfectly obvious because, as I pointed out to my hon. friend the other day when I put my queries to him, the price of the sugar beet to the farmer depends on two things, saccharine content and the price of raws landed in Canada; and the price of the latter, despite what my hon. friend says, has a great deal to do with tariff arrangements and that sort of thing. It is quite true there is a world price for refined sugar, but this price varies tremendously throughout the world having regard to distributing costs and tariff. It varies very much more having regard to distributing costs than it does in this country in relation to the tariff. And there is a very simple way in which my hon. friend can help our farmers engaged in the sugar beet growing industry practically without hurting anybody, because if he studies the tables of refined sugar prices he will not find that the breakfast table gets the benefit of that half cent a pound; it does not. It gets the small benefit here and there which depends far more upon changes in cost of distribution and upon domestic competition than on any change in the price of raws. Therefore if my hon. friend wants to help our farmers who are engaged in the sugar beet growing industry he has just simply to go back to where we were in 1923. If he does that, if he puts up the general rate half a cent, he will find that his treaty here will make but very little difference, if any at all, in that cost.

Mr. ROBB: I do not want to interrupt my hon. friend's argument; but would it not increase the price of the best sugar used in Canada? Would it not mean a difference of three million dollars?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let my hon. friend take his own statistics as to the cost of living in this country, and just see how much our consumers have been benefited by that cut. The lifting of the cost that we have been having recently certainly has not had anything to do with tariff increases; it may have had something to do with tariff reductions, because these are sometimes concurrent with an increased cost of living. In fact we have had that happen. I do not think my hon. friend will find any very close relationship between his tariff on the one hand and his cost of living on the other.

My hon. friend has referred to the American situation. Well, last July there was trouble in the United States about the price of refined sugar. Some of the jam manufacturers thought they were being charged too much for their sugar, and they made application to the President to reduce the sugar duties so as to cut down the price. The President refused the application. In less than six weeks afterwards, notwithstanding that the tariff had been maintained absolutely, the competitive situation of the local market had so developed that there was a substantial cut in the domestic price of refined sugar, and the very people who had been urging for a reduction in the tariff ceased their agitation. My hon. friend will find that all reported in the American papers, the conclusion which they drew being that leaving the tariff where it was—and it was high—intensified their local production, as it happened that just as soon as the competitive situation reached a certain point they got their refined sugar at far lower prices than they would have secured if the tariff had been reduced. At any rate, that is what happened there. I repeat, my hon. friend will find a very easy way of helping the people of Lambton and Kent in their sugar beet industry if he will just simply look after what was done in 1923. My hon. friend is more or less engaged in repairing damage done by his government, and he might quite easily repair this little damage also. By retracing mistaken steps he would not only be improving conditions for his governmental record, but he would be helping things in the country generally.

There was just another point I wanted to refer to. I spoke to my hon. friend the other day in connection with cocoa beans, and I pointed out to him what I believe to be the fact, that with our manufacturers of confectionery and the like, the larger part of their cocoa beans are of a far cheaper quality than the Trinidad cocoa bean. I appreciate that we have to take this treaty or leave it. The different parliaments have passed upon this treaty; we are the last to take it up, and I understand from what my hon. friend says that Trinidad is adamant upon this point. I accept my hon. friend's statement absolutely. Apart from that statement I would have argued that the treaty does not help Trinidad because even with the preference—and it is substantial—the African cocoa bean is so much cheaper than the Trinidad bean, owing to cheaper labour in Africa, that it would still be brought into this country. But I am going to ask my hon. friend to take this into consideration very seriously and see if he cannot straighten it out in his budget, not as against Trinidad, but for the purpose of maintaining the tariff situation which now governs the local market, having regard to the confectionery business.

The American confectioner is not under the same disability our confectioner is under. Hon. gentlemen here must recollect that we are not now dealing with a preference but with a substantial increase in the duty on cocoa beans coming into Canada. My hon. friend, with a treaty, is substantially raising the tariff item. Of course if we could get all the items raised properly, it would be an excellent thing, but where we just have one item raised in this particular way, without considering the people who must feel the effects of that action, I think my hon. friend will agree with me that it is something he can well take into consideration in connection with his budget. He cannot, of course, tell me now what he will do; I appreciate that, but if he will tell me that he will, as I think he should, take that matter into very careful consideration, I am quite sure that one substantial interest of this country will be pleased.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend has himself given the proper answer. I cannot tell him what I will do, but I appreciate his argument and I will give it my most serious consideration.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is just another point. Will my hon. friend tell me when these tenders come in?

Mr. ROBB: I was just going to mention that. I said earlier in the day that I would not ask for a second reading of the bill until the tenders come in. I believe that date is April 6, and we may want two or three days to analyse them.

Mr. CAHAN: Might I ask my hon. friend another question? With regard to the decrease in customs revenue arising out of this treaty, plus the decrease which automatically arises in view of the Australian sugar coming in under the same preference, has my hon. friend made any estimate of the actual loss of revenue, on the basis of last year's importations, say?

Mr. ROBB: Yes, speaking from memory I think it is about $600,000.

Mr. CAHAN: I thought that was from the West Indies alone.

Mr. ROBB: I will get the correct figures later.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): A short time ago I think my hon. friend cast some reflection on the service now being operated. For the information of the House I may say that the service now under subsidy by the government to what is known as the eastern group of islands has been performed by the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, who have an office in Halifax. My firm work in conjunction with them. No one realizes more than that company does that the steamers are antiquated and unsuited to the route. That is admitted, and they have felt very deeply the conditions which required them to carry
