on that service with those steamers. It is a reflection on that company, which is one of the largest, most influential and most respected steamship companies in Great Britain. The reason that these ships have been continued on the route is simply that for years past the company has been pressing the government for an improvement in this service. Four or five years ago the government did call for tenders for improved service. That company submitted a tender—the only one submitted—the terms and conditions of which were reasonable, but the government saw fit to turn it down. From time to time, almost from month to month, the government has requested that company to continue the service with the tonnage which has been carrying on that service for twelve or fifteen years past. When the ships were put on they were satisfactory, good enough for the business, for the route and for the passenger traffic. But conditions have changed since then; the ships have grown older and, as I said before, it is a source of annoyance to the company to have to operate them. They were only operated at the urgent request of the government.

In that connection I might say I believe that, as a result of the call by the government for tenders, there will be no offers to perform that entire service. The conditions governing the service to the western group, for which tenders have been asked, are so extreme and so exacting that I am sure no company will undertake it, and no government will pay the subsidy necessary to its operation. But I can quite conceive that with the wonderful picture of the trade that can be done and the expected increase in trade between the western group and this Dominion, the government may be induced to operate ships to carry on that service, and this House and the public will not be aware of the yearly cost the service will entail. It will be extremely expensive. It is held out that there will be a large passenger traffic down there, but I would call attention to the fact that within the last three or four years excusions on the big steamers have become very popular almost throughout the world, and at the present time inducements are being offered by the companies operating on the Atlantic which have arranged for excursions on their large ships from New York and other American ports to the West Indies. In my judgment that will interfere very, very materially with the proposed passenger traffic for the western group. Furthermore, as regards both groups, the tonnage that is now running out to these islands will be increased and the number of steamers and the number of trips will be greater than at the present time. The tonnage that is carrying on that trade to-day is running about only sixty per cent full cargo on the average throughout the year. The tonnage now proposed for the western group is eight or ten times greater than the tonnage operating to-day, and how those ships are to be provided with cargo, and where that cargo is to come from, is something that I, and I think those familiar with the West Indies trade, are at a loss to understand. The Royal Mail, operating on the eastern route, show by their report that their ships have been running on an average sixty-five to sixty-seven per cent short of cargo during the whole year, and yet it is proposed to increase the carrying capacity on that route under new terms, which can result in nothing else but heavy loss to whoever may be operating the service.

As I said when speaking of this matter before, we are obtaining from the West Indies—I refer now to the eastern group—all the sugar, all the molasses, and all the products of these West India islands that we can consume, and no amount of additional tonnage, not even a daily service can increase our imports from those islands.

So far as outward trade is concerned, the same conditions exist. I do not say there may not be some small increase perhaps in some of the things that are going out there at the present time, but it will not be very great; it will not in any way provide the cargo necessary for the tonnage on that route. This banana trade, of which such a glowing picture has been painted, is in my judgment very problematical. I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind that Canada as a whole cannot be supplied by the proposed services which are to be put on between Jamaica and Canada; I am perfectly satisfied that British Columbia and the western portions of this country cannot be supplied. That portion of this country will be supplied, even paying the fifty cents duty, via New Orleans and up the Mississippi valley. The distance and the time taken between Jamaica and New Orleans is about two and one-half days. It is about the same time up the valley, and bananas shipped from Jamaica via New Orleans will reach destination in British Columbia and the western parts of this Dominion before they can reach any Atlantic port, Halifax or St. John. The banana is not only a perishable article, but an article that cannot well be handled in cold weather. The House may know that a banana subjected to a temperature of 55 degrees is blackened and destroyed, and how the trade can be handled to advantage in cold weather is something that I cannot understand. The off season in Jamaica has also to be taken into consideration; what are these expensive ships going to carry during that period of four or five months? There is another disadvantage. If there are any fruit dealers here, they will know perfectly well that the Jamaica banana is inferior in quality to that of British Honduras.

Mr. CAHAN: Inferior to those of almost every island to the south.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Yes, and not only that: in Jamaica they have their dry seasons when the banana crop is not worth transporting. What are the ships to do for cargo under those circumstances? There is another point: We all know that Jamaica suffers from hurricanes. A few years ago we all read of the island being swept by hurricanes and the banana crop being blown down. Where is the fruit to come from then? This proposal in connection with Jamaica is but the dream of an idealist, which will never materialise, and it will cost this country millions of dollars.

I would also refer to an antiquated proposal in connection with this treaty, a proposal that has been tried in the West Indies and condemned and abandoned. In the early days before there was much competition among the steamship lines, the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company operated under subsidy from the imperial government from Southampton to Barbados. When these boats from Southampton arrived at Barbados, their cargo was transferred to what were called the inter-insular boats, which distributed the cargo among the islands, one going to the islands north, one to Grenada, and one down to Demerara. What happened? As competition increased, other lines came into the West Indies trade; they carried their cargoes direct to these islands that were being served by the inter-insular boats, and the result was that no shipper would put his goods on a boat when they had to be transferred to another boat. He could ship on a steamer going direct to destination, and the result was that these inter-insular boats were left without cargo and were withdrawn.

It is proposed under the treaty to have a service under which cargo from Canada will be transferred to another steamship at Jamaica, whence it will proceed to British Honduras. If that is done it will be necessary to provide warehouses and all sorts of docking facilities at Kingston, Jamaica, as well as officials to look after the boat. A certain amount of expense will be involved in loading and unloading cargo at Jamaica, and any damage caused on account of the extra handling will have to be met. Now, does anyone at all familiar with shipping undertake for one moment to say that cargo can be shipped in two bottoms, subjected to transfer, and carried at a rate which will at all compete with a steamship which travels direct? We can get none of the British Honduras trade by any such expensive process as that; it will all go by direct steamer from American ports. The extra steamer means a proposal which will be antiquated, expensive, and of no benefit whatever to Canada. It may be said, "Oh, we are going to bring bananas up from British Honduras, where the best fruit grows." I venture to say that there will not be a thousand bunches in ten years shipped in hot weather by any such route, and I have very grave doubts myself as to the possibility of obtaining bananas from the island of Jamaica in quantities required.

Then, in the last place, I want to emphasize what my hon. friend (Mr. Cahan) has said, namely, that the minister is asking us to enter into an agreement as to the cost of which the government knows nothing. This treaty was negotiated months ago so that there has been ample time to enable the government to give us some information as to the probable cost. We have not yet been vouchsafed that information and I say it is not fair, right or businesslike to ask the House to sanction an agreement as to the cost of which no one here can give any estimate, because we have not been given any kind of information.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend was out when I agreed to delay the second reading of the bill until we had tenders in our possession and could give the amount of those tenders. I was just wondering while I listened to my hon. friend if he was going to go so far as to advocate that we cancel all subsidies on steamship services to the West Indies.

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): I think it would be a very good thing for you to do in the interests of the country.

Mr. ROBB: Do you believe that?

Mr. BLACK (Halifax): Yes, and I am perfectly prepared to support it.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince): This treaty is supposed to be very important to the Maritime provinces at whose ports, including that of Charlottetown, we were led to understand the vessels engaged in this service would call. I think that when tenders are being called care should be taken to see that this provision, which was agreed to at the conference, is carried out. I ask the Minister of Finance to look into this particular point which is of very great importance to the Maritime provinces.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, I will keep that in mind.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do you want the resolution carried before six o'clock?

Mr. ROBB: Whatever my right hon. friend says. It might as well be carried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see much value in adopting the resolution if the second reading of the bill is to wait. The adoption of the details of the resolution really implies the adherence of the House to the pact itself. I suggest that the committee rise.

Mr. ROBB: My right hon. friend does not approve of the carrying of the resolution?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see any value in carrying the resolution when the second reading of the bill is to wait.

Mr. ROBB: I thought we might pass a resolution; then I could table the bill, and hon. gentlemen would be able to study its details.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The bill can be tabled anyway.

Mr. ROBB: Only after the resolution is adopted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The first reading may not be moved, but the bill can be tabled.

Mr. ROBB: My right hon. friend knows better than that. We never table a bill until after the resolution upon which it is based has been passed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no reason why the bill should not be tabled, although it cannot be distributed. However, I have no great objection.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Carried, with the reservation that we are only doing so for the sake of getting the bill.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Robb thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 15, respecting trade relations with British West Indies, Bermuda, and British Honduras.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

After Recess

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

The House in committee of Supply, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Trade and Commerce—The Copper Bounties Act, 1923, administration of, $1,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: This item provides for the cost of the administration of an act which the Right Hon. Mr. Fielding introduced in 1923 providing for copper bounties. My recollection is that it was a bounty on rods. Mr. Fielding expected that this would greatly increase the production of copper rods in Canada. This would be a convenient time for the minister to tell us what has been the production and what the bounties are.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): It was provided by legislation that from May 12, 1923, to June 30, 1924, both inclusive, there would be paid one and a half cents per pound; from July 1, 1924, to June 30, 1925, one and a quarter cents per pound; and so on, down to one-half of one cent per pound in 1928. The records show that in 1924 the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company of Rossland produced 27,505 tons of ore which yielded 2,030,605 pounds of copper. In 1925 the total production was 18,005 tons of ore, or 3,056,848 pounds of copper. For 1926, up to January, there had been produced 22,704 tons of ore, which gave 3,184,373 pounds of copper.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought we were paying the bounty on rods. I am interested to know how the production of rods is getting on.

Mr. ROBB: We paid the bounty on 532,117 pounds of coppper bars in August 1924; on 632,023 pounds in September 1924; on 213,571 pounds in 1925, and on 1,268,696 pounds in 1926. We have paid a total bounty of $29,374.42.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the present annual output?

Mr. ROBB: The average in 1924 was 27,505 tons of ore producing 2,030,605 pounds of copper.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That refers to ore and copper, not to copper rods.

Mr. ROBB: In 1925 there was a production of 18,005 tons of ore, or 3,056,848 pounds of copper bars. I have given all these figures.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are not making great progress, but I suppose that the real objection that might be urged is not to the item itself so much as to the fact that this government, which has been repudiated by the country, should be given any vote at all. However, under the circumstances I will say nothing more.

Item agreed to.

The Hemp Bounties Act, 1923, administration of, $500.

Mr. ROBB: This is the same vote as the one passed last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:: A proposition was made some years ago to the government whereby it was hoped that a large quantity of hemp would be grown and that there would be established a considerable industry in the western provinces. There was some issue between those interested in the proposition and the government. The government were prepared to go a certain distance and no further. It was thought they were not going far enough. If an industry has been established in the west what is the production?

Mr. ROBB: No one has so far claimed any bounty under the act, and this vote is only for purposes of administration. Last year the expenditure was $248.33.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why should there be any expenditure?

Mr. ROBB: Travelling expenses had to be paid.

Mr. HANSON: If there were no applications for bounties why should there have been any expenditures?

Mr. ROBB: Printing, stationery and so forth had to be provided for.

Mr. HANSON: Is it expected that there will be any claims for bounties this year?

Mr. ROBB: I do not know. The act was passed in the hope that an industry would be established in the west.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): There will be no forms to be printed.

Mr. HANSON: Enough forms have been printed to last twenty-five years.

Mr. ROBB: If hon. gentlemen insist upon it I do not object to reducing the item, but the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) tells me that someone is interested in the industry.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand that several hundred acres of hemp have been grown in the vicinity of Portage la Prairie and in other parts of Manitoba, and a small plant is being established on rented premises, the initial machinery having been installed. I have no official information on file to this effect, but I have gathered this from casual conversations with residents of Winnipeg and Portage la Prairie. I know for a fact, however, that several hundred acres have been under cultivation.

Mr. HANSON: This vote is only for administration. What expenditures will be incurred over and above clerical work in Ottawa?

Mr. ROBB: An inspector may have to go out.

Mr. HANSON: Does this come under the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. FOSTER: Some years ago a determined effort was made by some of the citizens of Winnipeg to establish a hemp industry in Manitoba. Colonel Grassie of Winnipeg was associated with the enterprise, and there came over from the Old Country a number of the best experts in the industry to investigate all that section of territory north west of Winnipeg up to the foot of lake Manitoba and on towards Neepawa and Dauphin. A great deal of money was spent and the reports were to the effect that the soil was highly suitable for the establishment of a great hemp industry. The samples of hemp pulled yielded, I believe, a product that compared favourably with hemp grown anywhere else in the world. It is exceedingly difficult to get local capital to go into an industry such as this if it is to start it from the foundation, as the hemp industry in the northwest would have to be started. It is a fact that nothing has been voted so far with the exception of $500 for clerical work, and that in itself indicates that the industry is not yet on its feet. Frankly, I think that if this country would assist by bounties in aid of the establishment of certain industries in western Canada, such as hemp growing, for instance, it would at least be an undertaking well worthy of consideration, and I think we should look forward to spending a little more money in Canada on the attempt to make two industries flourish where we have but one now. I think some part of the millions of dollars that we might be inclined to spend on railway development could be much more profitably spent upon the establishment of industries in all parts of the country, particularly the west and the east. Although I do not come from there I mention the west because for years I have been interested in the development of that country and have come very close to a great many men who are struggling against difficulties in their efforts to establish certain industries in that part of the Dominion. I have felt like asking the Minister of Finance to tell the committee what was the occasion for the introduction of this bill in the first place. Somebody must have come to the government and made the request. If so, what happens to those people? If we could have a little more information on that I would be very grateful, and perhaps the House would be also.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, Mr. Chairman, the act was passed in 1923. My hon. friend is quite right, the subject was brought to our attention by Colonel Grassie and some other gentlemen in Winnipeg, who hoped to develop the industry. I could not point out to the House any more than my hon. friend himself has disclosed. If they are to make progress this year, I submit we might very well let the item pass. Of course, hon. gentlemen will understand that if the bounty is claimed, it will be paid under the act. Like the other bounty I have just quoted, it commences in 1926 at 1½ cents a pound and diminishes each year until in 1933, it drops to half a cent a pound.

Mr. WHITE (London): Will the minister tell the committee whether the bounty is to be paid on the hemp as grown or on the twine to be made from it?

Mr. ROBB: The bounties are payable on:

Hemp grown in Canada and used in the manufacture of yarn or twine, or in the manufacture of hemp further advanced than yarn or twine, manufactured in Canada and sold for consumption therein, during the periods and at the rates following, that is to say—

And the rates specified are those I have just given.

Mr. WHITE (London): Does the bounty go to the manufacturer?

Mr. ROBB: I am going to continue my quotation to show how the weight is computed:

Provided that the said bounty shall be paid on the weight of carded hemp used in such manufacture and that the weight of the carded hemp shall be computed on the absolutely dry weight thereof, plus a moisture regain of not more than 12 per cent, and exclusive of lubricating or other extraneous material.

It is also provided that:

The sum to be paid as such bounty shall not exceed $125,000 in any one of the said periods.

Mr. EVANS: Mr. Chairman, I should like to know if the minister has satisfied himself that a quality of hemp can be grown in Manitoba that would be available for making twine successfully. I have it on pretty good authority that hemp of that class cannot be grown in Manitoba and brought to such a state that it can be used successfully in the manufacture of twine. I think this is the third year that this matter has been before parliament without very much having been done in regard to it. It would be preferable to give a bounty for co-operative effort in growing hemp and bringing it to a state where it can be used in any factory before any industry is established in the city of Winnipeg or elsewhere. I would caution the government at this time to be very careful in encouraging an industry that is not indigenous to the country and that can be used for the manufacture of a supposedly commercial article. We should satisfy ourselves first that the raw material can be produced. We have established many industries in Canada which may be termed exotic, and I think we should be very careful not to encourage the establishment of any further industries until the raw material is at hand in abundance.

Mr. HAY: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be wise on the part of the committee to pass this item. I understand that the parties interested in the proposition are still working on it, and hope eventually to be able to establish a plant in Manitoba for the manufacture of twine and other products. I should like to see the item pass because I think it will help to encourage an industry which we have been seeking to establish in Manitoba for quite a number of years.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, the difficulty is not in connection with the growth of hemp. When I say that I am relying on the word of the government, because the government were in charge of what was going on and were checking off the tests that were made. I am relying, as I recollect, on the word of the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), that good hemp could be grown in Manitoba, that in fact he had seen magnificent hemp growing there. I think we had similar testimony from the other minister from the west (Mr. Stewart). Apparently there was no question but what this country could produce excellent hemp, and that there was ample room for a plant to manufacture hemp into twine and other products, the only difficulty being in starting such a plant. That was common ground. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture nods his head; his memory and mine are exactly the same with respect to the matter. The difficulty was that while Colonel Grassie with his associates from Manitoba were perfectly firm as to the minimum assistance which would be required, the department thought that that assistance could be pared. The difficulty, as I recollect, took on two phases; one was as to the amount per annum, and the other as to the number of years and the manner in which the bounty would taper. As a matter of fact, the difference between the department and the expert which these gentlemen brought out from Ireland was very, very small; but I know the Irish expert when he left the country said that the government had effectually killed the scheme which they were ostensibly trying to help; that by withholding but very little they were effectually ensuring that Manitoba would not get this industry.

In connection with this item, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the government make it workable. The government has on its files now the representations made, and they have had two and a half years of failure. They have information that this is an industry which ought to be developed; they have acted upon that information and are committed to that position. Why should not my hon. friend make his act workable this year? It would be an easy thing to do and as I recall it, the amount involved is practically trifling. If the government really have faith in this venture, after playing with it for two and a half years, why not make sure that something will be done to give this new industry to a province which should have it?

Mr. ROBB: I would not like to make a commitment to amend the act and increase the expenditure. I submit that $125,000 a year is not a trifling amount.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It tapers off very quickly.

Mr. ROBB: However, I may say to my hon. friend that I will carefully look into it, without making any statement that I will increase the bounty.

Mr. HANSON: I think we should hear from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). If I am not mistaken this is one of his babies, and I would like to hear his reply to the attack of the hon. member for Rosetown (Mr. Evans) on the principle underlying this. If the Minister of Agriculture approves of that underlying principle, let him get up and say so, and let us hear what he has to say about the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Chairman, when Colonel Grassie and his associates came here from Winnipeg during the first session of the last parliament I had a long discussion with him, but nothing was done during that session except to have the matter investigated. I found that he and his associates had been working on this question for some fifteen years. Their hope of success had been interfered with by the war, and following the war they had still greater difficulty in financing it. Eventually they came down to Ottawa to see if something could not be done in the way of a bounty to assist in getting the necessary capital to establish the industry. Mr. Coote, a representative of the Belfast Rope Works, accompanied Colonel Grassie the second year, and there was no question in my mind from the outset as to the capacity of many provinces for producing raw hemp of a splendid quality. In bringing in a hemp bounty no new principle was established in this House, because that principle had been recognized by various parliaments for many years. In this case, however, the bounty was to recede with the years and to ultimately disappear, in contrast to some methods of assistance which we have adopted at other times. In the meantime our friends who have been at the bottom of the movement in Manitoba, as indicated by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton), were not able to get a sufficiently attractive bounty to get the necessary capital immediately following the war. For a number of years in Great Britain one government followed another in rapid succession, and as a result the money market was greatly disturbed. That was the reason why the bonds did not find a sale. Now they have secured sufficient capital to start in a small way and have entered into the necessary contracts with farmers to grow something like 500 or 600 acres of hemp; the necessary ray products have been arranged for; the machinery is being installed now if it has not already been put in, and this industry will work up to a position which will enable it to qualify for the bounty. Until that is done, very little money, with the exception of this merely nominal item, is required. I think possibly I have covered the question, except the reference to the hon. member for Rosetown, and I think the Minister of Finance replied to that. I know my friend's views with regard to that question; he did not support it very ardently at the time it was first introduced, so his views have not changed much since that time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would the minister observe the wording of the act? The maximum bounty, I think, commences at a given year and works down. Owing to the fact that nothing has been done, does not the Minister of Agriculture think that act should be amended in order that the bounty term might commence with the inception of the industry, rather than in connection with the years that have passed?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is my hon. friend correct in that statement?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is as I understood it from the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb). When he read it out I think he said it was for the year 1925, one and a half cents, and then it worked down.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, I did make that statement, because I thought it had started then, but as a matter of fact the memorandum I have in front of me says "1926, one and a half cents," so my hon. friend may be correct.

Mr. FOSTER: I am entirely in accord with the hon. member for West York when he says that something should be done to put the House in a position to assist this industry. The very fact that these men have been devoting fifteen years of time and their own money in an attempt of this kind and getting nowhere appears to me to merit the serious consideration of this House. It is almost unthinkable that when we have the country, the climate, the soil and everything conceivably needed to start an industry which will assist the farmers of a certain part of this country, it should take fifteen years of long labour on the part of a few progressive citizens of Winnipeg in order to get to a point where they may ask the government to put an act on the statute book, and that three years should then elapse before that act is made workable. It does seem to me that some steps should be taken immediately to assist this industry. If it is bonds they need, help put them in a position where their bonds are salable. If they need further investigation with regard to whether or not the kind of hemp they can grow is marketable, let us give them $5,000 or $10,000 in order to develop that particular phase of the question and help this industry to success. I may hold peculiar ideas about some things, but I am convinced that you cannot solve the problems of this country in any better way than by assisting in the creation of new wealth, when that new wealth is represented by a product which the world demands and which is therefore marketable.

Mr. ROBB: The only way any further aid could be granted would be by amending the act or by getting a special vote put in the estimates, and I am afraid I might run up against the Minister of Finance, who is not willing to increase the expenditure.

Mr. NICHOLSON: If this question is examined clearly it will be seen to have a broader aspect than merely the question of a bounty on hemp. There is no doubt, if all our information is reliable, that western Canada can grow a first class quality of hemp. I do not know about Saskatchewan, but I have information that it can be grown in Manitoba and Alberta at least, and my hon. friend to my left (Mr. Evans) says that it can be grown equally well in Saskatchewan. As a matter of fact, I have been through the west and have had bonfires pointed out to me by men who know the west, and who have told me that that straw was being burned on soil that would produce an excellent quality of hemp for the manufacture of twine of all kinds. The Minister of Agriculture put his finger on the sore spot in connection with this whole matter, and it is this, that the gentlemen behind this scheme cannot get the necessary financing. Why is that? The hemp that would be grown in this country would, for a considerable period at least, be used in the manufacture of binder twine. Now why is it that you cannot manufacture binder twine in this country? Solely because the market for Canadian binder twine has been handed over to the Consumers' Cordage Company in the United States, where they have a closed market of 110,000,000 people. The binder twine industry in Canada is in exactly the same position as any other type of industry in this country. You cannot find a group of financiers anywhere who will invest money in industry in this country to-day, because they do not know what may happen to that industry the day after they get it established. Conditions have been so uncertain in relation to all types of industry that you can no longer get a man to invest a dollar in industry of any character in this country. They are all anxious to get their money out of industry and put it into bonds or something else where they feel it will be reasonably safe, if they do not take their money out of the country altogether. If you take hold of this question as it should be taken hold of, and give the manufacturer of binder twine and the producer of the hemp from which that binder twine is manufactured the reasonable degree of protection that Canadian industry requires, the whole problem will be solved; the farmers on the prairies will grow hemp, which will be manufactured in the towns near by, giving employment to their own people and providing revenue for themselves. There is the place to start. So long as you go on tinkering with these things, so long as no reliance can be placed on governmental action, so long as things are in this unsettled state, we shall be in the position that my hon. friend from Nova Scotia referred to when he said that we have spent fifteen years tinkering with this question and have got nowhere.

Mr. GEARY: Was no money paid under this item last year?

Mr. ROBB: Nothing paid under the bounty. The item we are considering is for administration.

Mr. GEARY: I do not see any item in the Auditor General's report for the disbursements last year. There were no disbursements last year?

Mr. ROBB: Not under the bounty.

Mr. BROWN: Discussing the hemp proposition, I think we should try to keep our feet to the ground and not take an extreme position either one way or the other. I do not think there is any question that in parts of the three prairie provinces, in eastern and northern Manitoba and probably in the northern part of Alberta and Saskatchewan, hemp can be grown satisfactorily, but we must try to keep in mind the purposes for which this hemp will be used, and how it will be used. The hon. member for East Algoma has spoken of it as being used for binder twine. I think we may just as well disabuse our minds of that idea right at the start. Some investigation has been made into that matter, and it has been found that the hemp is not suitable for binder twine. Mr. R. A. Hoey, the member for Springfield in the last parliament, had occasion to get into correspondence with the University of Wisconsin, and they gave him the results of their own experience, and as well communicated to him the results of the experiments of the International Harvester Company. That company has been spending large sums of money for years in an attempt to find a suitable substitute for the southern grown fibre, and they have not found it. Even if a situable substitute could be produced, the testimony we get is to the effect that it cannot be used in competition with much cheaper fibres that come from the south or from the Philippine islands. So far as the production of binder twine is concerned, therefore, I think we may as well leave that question aside. But undoubtedly the fibre can be used very satisfactorily for manufacturing different grades of commercial twine, and personally I would like to see such an industry established. I believe if it could be successfully established it would give agriculture just one more industry upon which we could rely. If that could be done, and if we can take care of the growing and the harvesting of the hemp in the short season we have in the fall—very often a dry fall, whereas hemp needs a wet fall for its proper treatment—I believe we might have a satisfactory industry built up on the basis of the hemp that could be grown in the prairie provinces. If I remember rightly, when Colonel Grassie and his associates were presenting their case here they asked for a particular bounty; I do not know just what the figures were, but I do remember that when the government's proposal came before the House it was found that it did not meet the requests that had been made by Colonel Grassie and his associates—so much so, indeed, that they did not consider they could operate under the concessions offered.

I think we should approach this matter calmly, and the information we have been able to gather from the University of Wisconsin and the experience of the International Harvester Company is that as a binder twine proposition, we may as well put that idea aside. At the same time I believe there is a possibility, if we go at it in the right way, of developing what might be from the standpoint both of the producer of hemp and the manufacturer a very satisfactory industry.

Mr. MULLINS: I do not think Colonel Grassie is now connected with the company at all. While I was out west during the adjournment, the principal of the company came to me, and I learned the personnel of the company has changed altogether. I took the matter up with Colonel Grassie many years ago. Manitoba is a province that can certainly grow the material from which binder twine can be made, and there I take issue with my hon. friend from Lisgar. We burn stacks and stacks of straw in that country that would be suitable for that purpose, and I have bought it at ridiculously low figures for my cattle. This item is practically a nominal one, and I would like to see the House pass it in order to give this industry a trial in Manitoba.

Mr. GEARY: There has not been any expenditure on this class of item heretofore.

Mr. ROBB: There was $203 spent in travelling expenses, but there has been no expenditure on account of the bounty.

Mr. GEARY: Where is the administration item?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will find it under Trade and Commerce.

Item agreed to.

British and foreign news service, $32,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Any news in this?

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend will recall that this is part of an agreement which was entered into. The contract with Reuters expires on July 31, 1926, but we are asking for the vote because we may be able to renew the contract with them. My hon. friend and those hon. members who were in the last House will remember that the contract provides for the transmission by cable to the United Kingdom of an average of 10,000 words monthly of Canadian news designed to promote the interests of Canada. This is to be in addition to the service which Reuters already cable to Canada from the world at large, which they undertake to maintain at its average present length. They also engage to disseminate generally throughout the United Kingdom, the British dominions, and elsewhere mail news calculated to arouse and maintain interest in Canada and Canadian activities, commercial, financial, industrial and agricultural. They send us back clippings to satisfy the department that they are doing that. I have a record here that from August to December, 1923, when the service was introduced, they sent us 2,203 clippings; from January, 1924, to January, 1925, 10,772, and from February 1, 1925, to February 28, 1926, 10,750. The total number of clippings was 23,725, divided in the last named year as follows: Agriculture, 1,493; Finance, 1,288; Immigration, 1,534; Mines, 373; Railways and Canals, 1,262; miscellaneous items, 14,225.

Mr. HANSON: The government could very well make a saving by cutting out the whole amount of this item. So far as I have been able to observe, we get no very tangible result in the way of dollars and cents from this grant. It was put in originally, as I recollect, at the instance of the Prime Minister—I believe I am correct in stating that—but the country has never received value for the expenditure. It is on a par with the grant that used to be given to the Canadian Press but which the predecessor in the office of the Finance Minister cut out a year or two ago. There was never any row about that, and there has never been any deficiency in the newspapers on that account. The only result has been the saving of that $50,000 formerly made to the Canadian Press. I think this is a time when the government should pare such extraneous services and grants as this. I therefore suggest to the minister that he withdraw this vote.

Mr. ROBB: Well, Mr. Chairman, that is one view. I am not disposed to quarrel with my hon. friend on the subject, but I would point out that representations have been made to us by people associated with the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian National Railway, banks, and mining institutions of Canada, that we do not sufficiently advertise Canada overseas, that Australia advertises far more than Canada does, and they have represented to us that we should increase this grant rather than diminish it. It is pretty fair and pretty cheap advertising.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Would the minister confer with the Minister of Finance and see if he could not cut this item out?

Mr. HANSON: He would be doing a favour to the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is quite right in saying that the matter was introduced and brought to the attention of the government by the Prime Minister of the day, but it so happened that the Prime Minister was the Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden. It was reported on by Mr. M. E. Nichols, a journalist of experience, at that time Director of Information, the draft agreement having been approved by the Department of Justice. Final action by the government was, however, deferred pending further discussion of the subject with Sir Roderick Jones, Chairman and Managing Director of Reuters, who was expected to be in Ottawa in August of that year to attend the Imperial Press conference. It was in September, 1920, therefore, that the matter was taken up by the Right Hon. Mr. Meighen, the Prime Minister. Sir Roderick laid the proposal fully before Mr. Meighen at an interview in the Prime Minister's office. Mr. Meighen expressed his appreciation of the value to Canada of such a scheme of news publicity, and doubtless would have dealt with it in practical detail had not other pressing public duties prevented his consideration.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The minister told us a minute ago that the contract had about expired.

Mr. ROBB: The contract expires on July 31 of this year.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): It has served its purpose. Surely we can get rid of some of these things. They are cropping up every day, and we might as well start now and get rid of one of them.

Mr. HANSON: There is another reason. Once an item of this character gets into the estimates it takes several tons of dynamite to get it out. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has a chance to do his friend the Minister of Finance a good turn. Do not let him get away from the opportunity to save a little money for the country. Vote one-half of it to 31st July, or if necessary one-fourth, but let us try to save some money here tonight.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): If the minister wants a hand I will move to strike it out.

Mr. ROBB: No, my colleague will move it.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think my first motion in this House can be a better one than that indicated by the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. HANSON: No, we indicated it.

Mr. DUNNING: I move that this item be reduced by $16,000.

Amendment agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: The next item is $1,430,000 for administration of the Canada Grain Act. I understand there are a number of hon. gentlemen ill who desire to speak on this item. I will therefore consent to its going over to another sitting.

Mr. LANGWORTHY: May I say a word on that item?

Mr. ROBB: Some hon. members have asked me to defer consideration of the item until a later sitting. If my hon. friend will keep in touch with the whip we will not bring it up until he is present.

Mr. BROWN: Does that also refer to the other two related items, as to the management and equipment of elevators?

Mr. ROBB: I think we may as well leave them all so that hon. gentlemen interested can all be present at the discussion.

Dominion Bureau of Statistics (including 1926 census), $625,000.

Mr. ROGERS: This item will require some explanation.

Mr. ROBB: I was just going to make an explanation. I understand that under the act we have to take a census every five years in the three western provinces, and the additional amount this year is to provide for that extra expenditure. This vote provides for:

General contingencies of the bureau, including salaries of temporary employees, criminal and vital statistics, travelling expenses of the Dominion statistician and his staff; freight and express; telephone and telegraph; newspapers and periodicals; rental of tabulating and sorting machines..	$110,000
Completion of 1921 census (6th Census).. ..	10,000
Field work (actual cost of 1921 census of prairie provinces, plus 15 per cent).. ..	415,000

We have added fifteen per cent to the cost of the 1921 census of the prairie provinces, and the amount is $415,000. There is also the temporary staff at Ottawa, $80,000, and contingencies and stationery, $10,000.

Mr. HANSON: I understand that this census is taken in the three prairie provinces under an act, passed some years ago, and it has the effect of automatically increasing the annual subsidies to these provinces every five years, instead of every ten years, as is the case in other provinces. Why should that position obtain? It is an unfair advantage that the three prairie provinces have over the other provinces. The other provinces have to wait until the decennial census is taken before they get any increase. Of course it may be urged that this is a part of a bargain, but I do not see how it can be a bargain, because they were not provinces, as I recollect it, at the time this legislation was passed.

Is it the intention of the government to follow the practice adopted in 1921 by the late government when census enumerators were appointed and to see that those enumerators are selected, wherever possible, other things being equal, from returned soldiers? That practice was adopted in New Brunswick with very marked success, and the men who did the work did it as well as it was ever done—perhaps better. I commend the suggestion to my hon. friend—it is in his department—that the enumerators for the census be not employed simply because they are supporters of a certain party, but that returned soldiers be appointed.

Mr. ROBB: I think the commissioner will probably follow the same procedure as was adopted in 1921.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But will he be allowed to do it?

Mr. ROBB: I can assure my hon. friend I have not time to interfere with him.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But there are others.

Mr. ROBB: In answer to the question of my hon. friend (Mr. Hanson) as to why the census is taken every five years instead of every ten years, it is because in 1918 an act was put through providing for it.

Mr. HANSON: But previous to that time was there any such legislation?

Mr. ROBB: There has been a decennial census for some time. I imagine Sir George Foster brought it in because of demands made from western Canada, and it is quite a reasonable proposition. The drift of immigration coming into the country has been going largely to the western provinces. They have on that account to provide additional schools and highways and additional expenses are involved in that country.

Mr. HANSON: If we take to heart what we have heard from our friends on my left for the last three or four years—not this year, but previously—we would imagine that the country was going to the bow-wows. I listened to the lamentation of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland) when he sat in the centre of the House, that the western country was going behind. Has there been a natural increase in the population of western Canada since this government came into power, or is it on a par with the other provinces in that respect? I see no reason why the prairie provinces should have the census taken every five years, any more than the other provinces should. If they have it, we should have it. I do not see why any province should have it. It is an additional expense the country should dispense with, and the proper course is to repeal the act and save half a million dollars.

Mr. BURY: May I ask whether all the census enumerators have not already been appointed?

Mr. ROBB: I really do not know, but I imagine they have been, because they have to get down to work very soon.

Mr. BURY: I understand every one of them has been appointed.

Mr. ROGERS: Are they appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. ROBB: No, I think not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: On whose recommendation? Are they appointed by order in council?

Mr. ROBB: I do not think so.

Mr. HANSON: Are they appointed by the local member, or does the defeated candidate send in his recommendation to the patronage committee?

Mr. ROBB: I do not know that there is such a thing as a patronage committee. I understand the commissioner has followed the same course as he did in 1921.

Mr. BURY: I understand the minister made the appointments.

Mr. ROBB: Well, I have not found any order in council.

Mr. BURY: That is the information I have.

Mr. ROBB: Has the hon. member a nomination to make?

Mr. BURY: I had one or two applications to make, and I was instructed every position was filled.

Mr. HANSON: I made a suggestion to the minister which he ought to consider seriously, and that is the repeal of the act providing for the census in the prairie provinces every five years. He will save the taxpayers of the country at least half a million dollars every five years, and that will go down as an eternal monument to him. The matter is worthy of consideration, if he can save the treasury that much money every year.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The population of western Canada has not been going down; it has been increasing continuously. This census will show a big increase. I think the act should remain as it is, and that we should have our five-year census. The longer this government stays in power the more immigration will come into the country.

Mr. HANSON: I do not think I said that the population of the three prairie provinces had been going down, but I quoted the representatives from the prairie provinces in the last three years who stated that such was the case.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): The hon. gentleman spoke of lamentations. The only lamentations we have heard have been from the party sitting to the left of the Speaker.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member, who has been here such a short time, does not know anything about the history of his province.

Mr. DUNNING: He was born in it.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Here is another gentleman who does not know anything about what is being said here. He only knows the Progressives on the public platform when he calls them names. But I really rose to ask whether the answer of the minister is really serious when he refers to the legislation of 1918 as the legislation which made necessary this expenditure. I am inclined to think that the legislation of 1918 was merely legislation which had to do with the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and which simply continued an existing statutory requirement. It is entirely wrong to proceed on the idea that this is a new thing.

Mr. ROGERS: It is part of the legislation of 1905.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am inclined to think so.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): May I ask when these enumerators begin their work?

Mr. ROBB: The act respecting the Dominion Bureau of Statistics provides that a census of population and agriculture in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta shall be taken by the bureau under the direction of the minister, on a date in the month of June in the year 1926, to be fixed by the Governor in Council, and every tenth year thereafter.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): They begin their work in June. Can the minister tell me how many officials or enumerators are required for this work, and how many have already been appointed?

Mr. ROBB: The following is a report of the Civil Service Commission on the subject:

The Civil Service Commission has under consideration the question of the selection of the necessary staff for the taking of the quinquennial census for the prairie provinces, 1926. These appointments are of a temporary nature and consist of two divisions: (1) The census commissioners and census enumerators located in the prairie provinces; approximately 2,400 census enumerators will be required, whose term of employment will not usually exceed thirty days. There will also be about fifty-five census commissioners, one for each census district, who will be employed for a period not exceeding six months. The census commissioners and enumerators for the Dominion census of 1921 were exempted under section 38a from the provisions of the Civil Service Act, P.C. 2526, October 23, 1920, and the selection of these employees was left to the Department of Trade and Commerce, P.C. 1205, April 12, 1921.

It is recommended that a similar procedure be followed in the case of the quinquennial census for the prairie provinces 1926, and that the temporary census commissioners and enumerators be exempted from the operation of the Civil Service Act, and the selection of these employees be made by the Department of Trade and Commerce.

On this occasion the procedure of 1921 is being followed.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Have any of these officials been appointed yet?

Mr. ROBB: I fancy they have.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): How many?

Mr. ROBB: I hope they have all been appointed, because they must get to work and it is necessary that they be instructed first.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): They do not get to work until June.

Mr. ROBB: Yes, but they must be schooled in April. My hon. friend knows that in every census a man must be sent from the department to instruct the commissioners in the rules, and these commissioners must meet the various enumerators.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If they have been appointed already for the purpose of this schooling to which the minister refers, that brings up another point. On whose recommendation have they been appointed, and do these recommendations come from the various localities? I might ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Dunning) who sits immediately behind the Minister of Finance to inform the committee, if he can, whether any of these officials were appointed in Regina a short time ago, and if so, how many?

Mr. ROBB: Probably my hon. friend was not following me while I was reading the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission that the procedure of 1921 be followed.

Mr. BURY: If the appointments are made by the minister's department, who in that department makes them?

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Coats makes them on the recommendations he receives, and naturally he will consult with the people in that part of the country.

Mr. BURY: I understand from Mr. Coats that he does not make the appointments. I gathered from what the minister read and from what he stated, that his own department makes them, and not the Bureau of Statistics, although I may be wrong in that regard.

Mr. ROBB: When the matter was brought to my attention I asked an officer in my department to consult with the representatives of western Canada and have the nominations made so as to get the matter concluded. I have not heard from him since.

Mr. BURY: That does not meet my point.

Mr. ROBB: I do not think my hon. friend was here in 1921 when the nominations were made at that time.

Mr. BURY: My point is that if the nominations rest with the department, whether the department obtains recomendations from the Bureau of Statistics or not, the appointments have been made by the department. I want to know who actually made those appointments or who has knowledge of their making.

Mr. ROBB: If my hon. friend has recommendations to make and the positions are not all filled, I shall be glad to consider suggestions.

Mr. DUNNING: One practical suggestion was made by an hon. member opposite with reference to the vote before the House, namely, that the amount might be reduced by means of an amendment to the act which provides for a quinquennial census in the prairie provinces, in place of the decennial census which is taken throughout the rest of Canada. I have looked into the matter and I find that the quinquennial census in the prairie provinces is provided for in the acts creating those provinces. Constitutional lawyers in the House will correct me if I am wrong, but in my opinion this House cannot now amend those acts. An imperial act is necessary to amend the autonomy legislation creating the western provinces inasmuch as they are now under the provisions of the British North America Act.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): They did not hesitate when the autonomy acts were passed to override the spirit and letter of the British North America Act.

Mr. ROGERS: What purpose does the expenditure of this $500,000 really accomplish? What service is rendered by the taking of the census? The three prairie provinces get an annual subsidy from the Dominion of some five or six hundred dollars. Would it not be better to vote that money to the provinces direct instead of spending it in an idle manner, such as is proposed, for patronage purposes? Give us the $500,000 direct. It would be of greater benefit to the provinces than it can be when spent in the way suggested.

Mr. ROBB: As the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) has pointed out, this matter is subject to the British North America Act, and any amendment can be made only by an imperial statute. My hon. friend (Mr. Rogers) asks me what service is accomplished. Well, the Department of Finance will know that next year when an additional claim is put in.

Mr. ROGERS: But you can save an added subsidy by dividing the $500,000 among the provinces now.

Mr. ROBB: Does the hon. member suggest an amendment to the act?

Mr. WHITE (Mount Royal): The Minister of Railways has said that we have an act of parliament which is subject to amendment only by imperial legislation, in respect of the quinquennial census. What disturbs my mind is this question: What purpose is served by taking a five-year census rather than a census every ten years? Does it mean that if the population increases in the western provinces we shall increase the subsidy accordingly?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is so.

Mr. WHITE (Mount Royal): If the result of taking that census does not involve some such readjustment, why do we take it? If it is merely a duplication of work, I say the expenditure is excessive and unnecessary. If, on the other hand, the statute which we have validated in this House requires amendment, and can only be amended by act of the imperial parliament, I submit we should take appropriate steps to that end. Is not that reasonable? For what purpose are we voting this money? I care not whether the census enumerators entertain political opinions favourable to that side or to this side of the House; that does not appeal to me in any way; what I am thinking of is the unnecessary expenditure of public money. If we can prevent we should do so.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Mr. Chairman, last night I heard the hon. member for Argenteuil (Sir George Perley) announce that we could get the British North America Act amended at any time we desired. Here is an opportunity to ask the imperial parliament to take action. Then we could save the money covered by this vote.

Mr. DUNNING: I had no other intention than to state what were the facts with regard to the possibility of this parliament repealing the provisions affecting the quinquennial census in the prairie provinces. As to what the quinquennial census accomplishes with respect to those provinces, I read from the Saskatchewan act, section 18, subsection B:

> A census of the said proivnce shall be taken in every fifth year reckoning from the general census of 1901, and an approximate estimate of the population shall be made at equal intervals of time between each quinquennial and decennial census; and whenever the population, by any such census or estimate, exceeds 250,000, which shall be the minimum upon which the said allowance shall be calculated, the amount of the said allowance shall be increased accordingly, and so on, until the population has reached 800,000 souls.

Then of course the terms of the general act apply. Now, as to the effect of the coming census, may I say with respect to the province with which I am most familiar that at the census of 1921, if I recollect correctly, the population of Saskatchewan was 757,810. On the basis mentioned in the section which I have read, which provides for an estimate to be made by the Bureau of Statistics at equal periods between the quinquennial and decennial census, we are now being paid a subsidy on a population of 828,600, so that an increase in population in two and a half years from 757,000 to 828,000 has been recognized by the authorities who have to do with this matter. I am satisfied from my knowledge of conditions in the west, and I feel sure that other members on both sides of the House will bear me out, that the 1926 census will demonstrate a further steady growth in proportion to the growth to which I have just been referring. As far as the item itself is concerned, we cannot change it; we are bound by statute to provide for it. As to appealing to the imperial parliament, I feel sure they would want to know what the provinces concerned thought about amending the conditions under which they entered confederation.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am not quite clear why the minister brings in the imperial parliament. The bills of 1905 were passed by this parliament and as far as I know they have never been ratified by the imperial parliament. They are therefore in every sense Canadian statutes, if I understand correctly.

Mr. DUNNING: I must leave that to the decision of the constitutional lawyers in the House.

Mr. LADNER: Did the minister quote from an imperial or federal act?

Mr. DUNNING: An act of this parliament.

Mr. GEARY: Mr. Chairman, if the taking of the census is to establish the rate at which Saskatchewan is to be paid, it is not treating the province fairly not to take the census, so I do not think we need bother about the law. If the payment of the subsidy to Saskatchewan depends upon that, I think we should certainly let the item pass.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GEARY: I wish my good friends opposite had deferred their applause just for a moment. I was going to suggest that probably the province of Saskatchewan will be in no danger since the appointments are made.

Mr. QUINN: May I ask the Minister of Railways if he will show as much concern for the province of Nova Scotia with regard to the terms under which it came into confederation?

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Chairman, so far as I can I shall be happy to give consideration to the fairness of any matter presented to this House by any hon. member on behalf of any province.

Mr. QUINN: I am glad to know it.

Mr. HANSON: May I pursue that thought of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Quinn) a little further and ask the Minister of Railways if he will extend similar consideration to the reduction of freight rates, a subject that he dilated upon in Winnipeg the other day?

The CHAIRMAN: The question is out of order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no doubt at all that we have to take the census, although it is not for the reason given by the hon. Minister of Railways. He need not raise any bogey about imperial acts or anything of the kind. We take the census because it is provided for by our own law. But notwithstanding that fact, with great deference to the minister I submit that the item can be discussed. For example, we might discuss why it is that the amount is increased $85,000 over the grant made in 1921. What is the reason for the increase?

Mr. ROBB: The estimate was made up by the census commissioner who has been taking the census for a number of years. He added 15 per cent to the previous estimate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But what is the basis of the 15 per cent?

Mr. ROBB: I assume he estimates it on the growth of the population. He does not necessarily spend the money.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the rate of remuneration paid?

Mr. ROBB: The rates and classification are the same as in 1921: Census clerks: grade 1, $780; grade 2, $840; grade 3, $900. Census audit clerks: grade 1, $960; grade 2, $1,020; grade 3, $1,080. As in the Dominion census of 1921, it is intended that eligibles shall be appointed as census clerks grade 1 and census audit clerks grade 1, and be promoted to the higher grades as their services warrant.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But that has to do with the office clerks here, as I followed my hon. friend.

Mr. ROBB: Possibly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If he will just remember what his learned colleague the Minister of Railways was telling him, what is he going to pay the commissioners in the first place, and then the enumerators?

Mr. DUNNING: While the minister is looking that up, might I just read the authority for the bogey which my hon. friend—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought we were rid of that. If you like, we can argue it; if the hon. member wants to kill time he can do so.

Mr. DUNNING: This is a matter of some importance. I am not one of the learned members of the House, as is my hon. friend, but I can at least read the English language.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hurrah.

Mr. DUNNING: I read now from section 6 of the British North America Act, 1871, an amendment to the act which is entitled "An Act Respecting the Establishment of Provinces in the Dominion of Canada" and which empowers and sets forth the terms under which this parliament may create new provinces in Canada. Section 6 reads as follows:

Except as provided by the third section of this act, it shall not be competent for the parliament of Canada to alter the provisions of the last-mentioned act of the said parliament in so far as it relates to the province of Manitoba, or of any other act hereafter establishing new provinces in the said Dominion, subject always to the right of the legislature of the province of Manitoba to alter from time to time the provisions of any law respecting the qualification of electors and members of the legislative assembly, and to make laws respecting elections in the said province.

As I say, I am not a constitutional lawyer, but surely the language is plain:

It shall not be competent for the parliament of Canada to alter the provisions of the last-mentioned act of the said parliament in so far as it relates to the province of Manitoba, or of any other act hereafter establishing new provinces in the said Dominion.

I am not arguing, Mr. Chairman; I am merely stating what is taken to be a fact.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As I said before, there is no necessity for raising the bogey. It is our act and we observe it.

Mr. DUNNING: This is the British North America Act, an imperial act of 1871.

Mr. CANNON: My hon. friend does not argue this point seriously, does he?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know what my hon. friend is talking about. I am not arguing anything.

Mr. CANNON: If my hon. friend is not arguing why does he not sit down?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend—

Mr. MacLAREN: Mr. Chairman, I can quite understand the reason for a quinquennial census being taken some years ago. At that time the new provinces were adding to their population rapidly, and perhaps it was an uncertain stage. It seems to me that at that time it was fair to have a quinquennial census, but now conditions are more stabilized; we have not the same rapid growth in those provinces and the occasion for such a frequent census does not now exist. Of course it is the law, but if it is to the advantage of everyone to do so, the law may be changed. I understand that the subsidy per capita increase from the Dominion government for five years amounts to less than $500,000. Perhaps the Minister of Railways would inform me of the difference in those amounts.

Mr. DUNNING: May I be permitted?

Mr. MacLAREN: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: If the cost for the three prairie provinces is as estimated, $500,000 for the quinquennial census, the increase in each of the three prairie provinces multiplied by 80 cents per head for each of the years involved would be the aggregate sum for comparison. I cannot tell my hon. friend what that would be, but offhand one would say it would amount to more than $500,000 in the course of five years.

Mr. MacLAREN: I cannot say what the amount is, only I have been informed that the actual increase would not exceed, $500,000. That may not be, but there is not much difference between the two figures, and therefore I suggest that it is very poor business to expend $500,000 for the purpose of granting the three prairie provinces another $500,000 or thereabouts. And I think it is well worth the attention of the minister to consider whether some change, which would not interfere with the grants given to the three prairie provinces, might not save a considerable sum of money.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Just a word in regard to the quinquennial census. There were two objects in view when the legislation of 1905 was passed. The quinquennial census was enacted in that year in the first place for the purpose of fixing the representation of the new provinces. It was provided by section 6 of the act that the representation of Alberta and of Saskatchewan should be fixed at the next quinquennial census, which would be in the year 1911, and the proportion of representation was fixed by section 6. But it was only for that particular year, 1911, because subsection 2 of section 6 says:

The representation of the said province shall thereafter be readjusted from time to time according to the provisions of section 51 of the British North America Act, 1867.

So that the quinquennial census, since 1911, has had nothing to do with the representation of the new provinces. That is now adjusted in accordance with section 51 of the British North America Act, which provides for adjustment after every decennial census. The other purpose of the quinquennial census was in regard to the fixing of the subsidy, but the period has arrived when that is of no effect in regard to Saskatchewan. It is provided that when Saskatchewan has a population of 800,000 there shall be no progressive readjustment of the subsidy. The last clause of section 18 provides:

The amount of the said allowance shall be increased accordingly.

That is, from $250,000 up.

—and so on until the population has reached 800,000 souls.

There is an exactly similar provision in the Alberta act. If Saskatchewan had a population of less than 800,000, we could do nothing but take the quinquennial census, but I understand it is admitted by the Bureau of Statistics and by the government itself that there were, two and a half years ago, 829,000 souls in the province of Saskatchewan. Consequently their subsidy is fixed, as is the subsidy of every other province of Canada, so there is no necessity for a census in that province at present. In Alberta the case is different; the population of Alberta has not reached the 800,000 mark, therefore we are bound to take the census for the purpose of fixing the subsidy, but not for the purpose of representation in this House. I think the minister would be well advised to reconsider this measure and provide that no census be taken in Saskatchewan, if it be so that the population has already been ascertained as over the 800,000 mark.

Mr. LADNER: The Minister of Railways has created a rather impossible barrier by the contention that any act altering the provision for the quinquennial census would have to be an imperial act. He admitted that he was not a constitutional lawyer. If he will read section 146 of the British North America Act dealing with the creation of other provinces, and then turn to the very act from which he has read, which is the British North America Act of 1871, he will see in section 2 that:

The parliament of Canada may from time to time establish new provinces in any territories forming for the time being part of the Dominion of Canada, but not included in any province thereof, and may, at the time of such establishment, make provision for the constitution and administration of any such province, and for the passing of laws for the peace, order, and good government of such province, and for its representation in the said parliament.

So the inherent jurisdiction rests with the parliament of Canada to make a law dealing with just such a question as that to which the minister has referred, and I submit that, apart from the contention of the last speaker with respect to the abandonment of the vote, consideration should be given to the wisdom of extending the time for taking the census and making it co-ordinate with the census taken in the other provinces.

Mr. DUNNING: Dealing with the point made by my hon. friend from South Wellington, that the province of Saskatchewan does not now need a quinquennial census because it has passed the 800,000 population mark, which is given in the Saskatchewan act and in the Alberta act as the limit for change under their per capita subsidy, I would again call his attention to section 20 of the same act, which provides for compensation in lieu of the lands of these provinces which were retained by the Dominion at the time the provinces were created. There he will find:

Inasmuch as the said province will not have the public land as a source of revenue, there shall be paid by Canada to the province by half-yearly payments, in advance, an annual sum based upon the population of the province as from time to time ascertained by the quinquennial census thereof, as follows:—

The population of the said province being assumed to be at present two hundred and fifty thousand.

And so on. It provides that thereafter, until such population reaches 800,000, the sum payable shall be such and such; and thereafter, until such population reaches 1,200,000 the sum payable shall be such and such. It is important therefore to continue the engagement with the province of Saskatchewan. In quoting this in the first place I was not speaking from the point of view of the province of Saskatchewan, but merely with a desire that the House should be clear with respect to something with which I happened to be familiar. So far as the other two provinces are concerned, they have not even yet reached the 800,000 population mark, which is important to them with respect to the per capita subsidy. We must consider them also.

In regard to the point raised by my hon. friend from Vancouver South, the act from which I read, the British North America Act, 1871, was an amending act, amending the act from which my hon. friend read.

Mr. LADNER: No, I read from the amending act of 1871.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As I said before, I really think there is no necessity for anything except making speeches on this question. There is our act, and we have to live up to it, and we intend to; there is no question about that, and all this to the contrary is just so much of a bogey. The duty is upon this parliament, as I see it, to carry out this quinquennial census. If the Solicitor General had been in when I was speaking before, he would have known that I was not making an argument; I was simply saying we were bound to do it, but with his customary lightheartedness he rushed in and said something that was wrong. He is not often wrong, but we all make mistakes sometimes. But let us get down to the business of this item. I was asking the minister what the rate of remuneration was to the different gentlemen who are going to get employment. We have not yet found out how they are employed, what qualifications are required, who is recommending them, or anything else.

Mr. ROBB: The rates are to be exactly the same as in 1921. I will give my hon. friend a memorandum of the expenditure in 1921. There were 243 commissioners; their allowance was $77,500; travelling expenses and disbursements, $13,009.96; recording, $113,451.80, or a total of $203,961.76. Then for field work for the general census—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is more extended.

Mr. ROBB: I will get that for my hon. friend if he desires.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend seems to have given a very excellent reason why he can assist himself as Minister of Finance. The whole cost of doing this work in the 1921 general census, when more particulars have to be taken, was only $415,000.

Mr. ROBB: Oh no.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I took that figure down, that the cost of the census work in the three prairie provinces in 1921 was $415,000.

Mr. ROBB: No. The 1921 census was the general census, and the cost of the field work was $1,184,652.10.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is for the whole country?

Mr. ROBB: The cost of the general census of 1921 was $2,122,052.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Can my hon. friend tell me where he gets that item of $415,000 as the cost for 1921?

Mr. ROBB: That was the estimate they gave me for this work. The actual cost of the 1921 census in the prairie provinces was $415,000. Then there is the temporary staff at Ottawa, $80,000; contingencies, stationery, punch cards, telegrams and so forth, $10,000. This estimate of the cost of the field work anticipates approval of the rates that prevailed in 1921.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is this correct, that $415,000 is not an exact figure at all, but merely an estimate?

Mr. ROBB: Merely an estimate.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I do not press it. My hon. friend has not told me, for example, how many of these gentlemen who have been appointed are returned soldiers.

Mr. ROBB: I could not give that information.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That was the rule that was observed before, and we were to have the same rule obtaining this time. I think we should know whether the rule is being followed.

Mr. ROBB: I would say offhand, although I do not know, that any man in western Canada who did not follow that rule might find himself in trouble with the people in western Canada, because there is no part of Canada that contributed so largely to our effort overseas as the western prairie provinces.

Mr. BOYS: Do I understand the minister to say that the cost of the last decennial census in all Canada was something over $1,000,000, and that the cost in the three prairie provinces was something over $400,000? Surely that cannot be right. The cost of taking the census in the three prairie provinces could not amount to nearly half the cost of taking the census all over Canada.

Mr. ROBB: I have this estimate given me by the statistician who conducts the census. The total expenditure for the census of 1911 was $1,316,415.35. The expenditure for the 1921 census was $2,122,052.

Mr. HANSON: Is that for the field work or was it the total expenditure?

Mr. ROBB: They did not give me that information.

Mr. HANSON: I understood the minister to say the cost of the field work for the Dominion was something over a million dollars, and that of the field work for the three prairie provinces $415,000. It seems incomprehensible to us that the cost of the field work for the three prairie provinces should be approximately 40 per cent of the whole. There must be some mistake about that, or else the rate of wages there is higher.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, there is no higher rate of pay. The work is paid for at so much per head, and I have heard repeated complaints from the field men that they do not get enough for the services they perform. It is not a question of paying so much per month, it is a question of the work performed and the names turned in.

Mr. HANSON: Has there been any increase in the amount asked for in connection with the Bureau of Statistics? While I am on my feet I should like to say that while I do not avail myself very much of the activities of the bureau—and I rather think I should because I believe it is a very excellent institution—I have heard in days gone by numerous complaints from merchants, manufacturers and employers of labour that the multiplicity of the demands made by the bureau for statistics has proven to be a perfect nuisance to the office managers of those concerns. The concerns in question are threatened with dire pains and penalties if they do not fill up the forms forwarded to them and give the information asked for. Now, it is necessary for every country to have some system of statistics and these statistics are sometimes of very great value. But the difficulty probably in this case is that the Bureau of Statistics is embracing too many subjects, requiring too much information, and taking up too much of the available time of commercial executives. I have in my mind one of the largest pulp and paper concerns of the country whose secretary is not only assistant general manager, but discharges a multitude of other duties. This gentleman tells me that the demands made upon him from time to time by the Bureau of Statistics are overwhelming. I wish the minister would give some attention to the complaint. Perhaps the existing system could be simplified. The complaint is not a new one; I know that in days gone by it has been voiced by other members on both sides of the House. Perhaps the minister would look into the matter and see if he cannot devise some method which will remove these complaints on the part of businessmen.

Mr. ROBB: I will.

Mr. LADNER: Has the government under consideration negotiations with the province of Saskatchewan similar to those conducted with Alberta as to the question of natural resources? May I ask also whether the subsidy will be paid to Alberta when it receives back its natural resources?

Mr. ROBB: The latter question might very properly be answered. My hon. friend's first question has nothing whatever to do with this matter, although if I had the information I would willingly give it to him. I think the arrangement made with Alberta was tabled and is available to my hon. friend.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Cannot my hon. friend yet tell me how the men for this work are appointed, how many there are, and on whose recommendation they are chosen? We are voting this money; we have got to spend it, and we might just as well find out how it is to be disbursed—and how these appointments are to be made.

Mr. ROBB: I have already stated—perhaps my hon. friend was out at the time—that when the commissioner asked for recommendations I instructed my secretary to see the western men, and I have not heard from him since. I imagine the appointments have been made on the recommendations of western men. At any rate, I hope they have all been made because I do not want to be bothered with them any more. Let me say this to my hon. friend in all seriousness: If the conditions were reversed and my hon. friend were over here I would not challenge his judgment as to making the appointments.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not going to challenge my hon. friend's judgment at all. The trouble is that he has never exercised it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I wonder if it is an offence to take a minister of this government, whose veracity I happen to believe in, at his word? It is not so many moments since the hon. gentleman said that when applications came in for appointments all he did with them was to hand them to his officials and ask them to get the views of western members thereon, that he did not want to be bothered with them. Because I take the hon. gentleman at his word his supporters are so amazed that they call "order".

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You need not get mad, though.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There really is at least one minister of this government whose word the House can accept, but apparently his supporters are amazed at the fact. Now my hon. friend said he has not appointed these people; he has deferred the matter to his officials; he has given gentlemen from the west—and I do not know what gentlemen—the right of making these appointments. I do not think my hon. friend has got the list, I do not believe he knows anything about it. I am of the opinion that instead of the minister taking the responsibility of making these appointments the matter has been handed over to "the best political organization in the west" and if our reports are true "the best political organization in the west" is now represented here. Perhaps we should ask that political organization for the list; the minister has not got it. Surely the committee is entitled to a little better information than that. If my hon. friend has not made these appointments—and he says he has not—we are entitled to know who has made them. Surely the House is entitled to know a little bit about the country's business, what the qualification for these appointments were, and whether or not the returned soldier is being looked after in connection with them? My hon. friend does not know. Perhaps some of these gentlemen from the west can tell us whom they appointed.

Mr. HANSON: I have no wish to hold up this vote, but in view of the practice established in 1921 when returned men were given the preference, and the statement that the department has the appointing of these men, I should like to know if the minister can state now or at some future time what percentage of the appointees are returned men.

Mr. ROBB: I shall be glad to do that. I will bring down also a complete return, if it is available, with respect to the appointments of 1921. I do not admit they are all returned soldiers, but I accept my hon. friend's word.

Mr. HANSON: Nobody said they were all returned soldiers. What was said was that, other things being equal, where returned men were available they were appointed. In my constituency that rule was carried out to the letter.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton) Surely my hon. friend had nothing to do with the appointments in 1921.

Mr. HANSON: I happened to have the misfortune of running an election just before the census was taken, and had to run another one just after it was taken.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. GUTHRIE: I rise to make a correction. The Minister of Railways pointed out to me that the act of 1905 in respect to Alberta and Saskatchewan, which he and I were discussing, had actually been superseded in regard to the question of provincial subsidies by the act in amendment of the British North America Act in 1907, on an address of the Senate and the House of Commons of Canada. By the British North America Act, 1907, these subsidies are now fixed in all provinces according to population, starting with a population of 150,000, and running up to a population of 1,500,000, but with respect to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, the quinquennial census is still the determining factor as to population. I see now the necessity of taking the quinquennial census, as the British North America Act, 1907, is based on the population, and the population for the three prairie provinces has to be fixed by the quinquennial census.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know whether my hon. friend has yet given me the information I asked for. Can he not give me a list of the names? Can he not give at least the names of the commissioners who have to carry on this business? Surely there is not such a mystery about how it is being done that the information is kept secret from the minister. I am not asking for a list of a host of small employees, but I do submit that it is the easiest thing in the world to say who the commissioners are and who is responsible for their employment. It is ridiculous that we should be asked to pass this item, providing, as it does, for the appointment of a whole lot of commissioners who are already appointed, not by the minister, but on the say-so of certain western gentlemen, and to pass it without the granting of a reasonable request for information.

Mr. ROBB: I will undertake to give my hon. friend a complete list of the commissioners. He does not want the enumerators.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No.

Mr. ROBB: And if he desires it, I shall be glad to table the list of 1921. I will take the responsibility for the nominations in my department and say frankly, "upon the recommendation of so and so."

Mr. NICHOLSON: With regard to the point raised by the hon. member (Mr. Hanson), I think we all appreciate the very excellent work the statistical branch performs, but I would urge that some consideration be given to those from whom a large variety of statistics are received. Anyone who has had anything to do with business organizations—and I think the Minister of Finance will agree with me in this—will realize that for ten or twelve years there has been a burden imposed on office organizations that has increased the clerical cost of carrying on the ordinary business of the country by forty to fifty per cent, due to the amount of statistics continually being asked for. In order to comply with these requests it is almost impossible for an ordinary business man to do anything else than furnish statistical records, many of which are never looked at after they are compiled, because they are of no public service whatever. They do not accomplish anything; there is a considerable cost for compiling, printing and so on, and in reality they serve no real purpose.

Mr. BURY: The impression I had from the minister's statement was that he would give the western members a chance of submitting some names, and I was going to ask him if he would delay bringing down the list until I have had a chance of submitting names.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I find myself very much out of harmony with my hon. friend in his criticism of the Bureau of Statistics. I think it is one of the best departments of the government and that it should be maintained. Speaking for the group in this section of the House, we make use of these statistics to a great extent, and I think it is very important that we should have those figures available, compiled regularly as they are, at stated intervals. They are reliable and accurate, and I would protest strongly against any effort to reduce the efficiency of that bureau. I ask the minister if there is any reduction in the estimates for the bureau itself this year. The amount for the Bureau of Statistics and the amount for the census are under the one head, and it is rather difficult to know whether there has been any reduction in the amount for the bureau itself.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I appreciate the work of the Bureau of Statistics as thoroughly as my hon. friend or any other hon. member. I do not want to see the Bureau of Statistics made less efficient, but I am confident that it can in reality be made more efficient in matters of vital concern, leaving out matters of detailed statistics which can be of no public service whatever. There is not a business office in this country that is not called upon to furnish periodically all through the year a mass of details which cannot serve any public purpose. If only the essentials are looked after, the Bureau of Statistics will be able to give my hon. friend and his friends all the information they require on matters of a public character; it will render a service to this House and to the country and will place no unnecessary burden on business organizations and executives. The statistics we got ten years ago were just as satisfactory as those which are furnished to us now; but if you go into any industrial concern in this country you will find that their office overhead has been increased forty or fifty per cent by the necessity for making this detailed information available. The gathering of detailed statistics has become a municipal, provincial and federal hobby, and I expect that when I go home I shall find a form waiting to be filled out giving the colour of my employees' hair, the shade of their eyes, and every other personal detail, however trifling. That limit will soon be reached.

Mr. ROBB: For once I find myself on a question of public importance exactly in accord with my hon. friend. I have on more than one occasion taken this matter up with the Dominion Statistician and he has replied that, while no doubt it might be annoying to some individual employer to be asked to engage a few extra clerks to provide the information, it was nevertheless a fact that the information was required.

Mr. HARRIS: There is some merit in what the minister has to say, and those who are in business have not much fault to find with the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. But I want to say to my hon. friend (Mr. Campbell), in confirmation of the remarks of the hon. member for East Algoma (Mr. Nicholson), that there is too much duplication of requests of a like nature from different branches of the bureau with regard to the operations of various industries throughout the Dominion. All hon. members are no doubt acquainted with the census of industry, the information contained in which is compiled by the bureau from information derived from industries and business institutions. After a firm has given the necessary information for this compilation, along comes the Chemical and Metallurgical branch of the bureau with a demand of the same people, who happen to be engaged in some other industry, for precisely the same information with regard to capital, plant, repairs, maintenance, raw material consumed, the amount of labour involved, the quantity of fuel and supplies of all kinds used, and so forth. All that information has already been supplied to the census of industry, and within a week it has to be given to the Chemical and Metallurgical branch of the bureau. The dates are not always the same, nor are the items of information in exactly the same categorical order, but the industry is put to a good deal of trouble in getting the facts and figures called for.

The hon. member (Mr. Nicholson) is on perfectly safe ground. In my opinion the time has come for a co-ordination of all efforts of the various departments of the Bureau of Statistics, in order to obviate all the trouble to which industry and business concerns are put in supplying information. We are obliged to supply the reports asked for; if they are not provided, a penalty ensues. The same information which is given to the Bureau of Statistics is given, we find, to the Department of Labour.

Mr. HANSON: Let us abolish that.

Mr. HARRIS: That might not be a bad idea. I may inform the minister that businessmen generally have expressed the view on many occasions that there should be some consolidation of these statistics. I know of one industry which has been obliged to forward three times over to the federal government, in the course of one year, the same information in different forms. For example, the Department of Labour asks for a weekly return showing the number of employees, male and female, together with a statement as to the hours they work, and when you come to the census of industry you find detailed information demanded along the same line, notwithstanding that you have given all the facts already. The time has come when the bureau would be well advised to co-ordinate these multifarious activities of the different departments.

There is another important point that must not be lost sight of. There is a head of one branch who has to do with the chemical and matallurgical industries, and he is an expensive official, and when you take into account the head of the Bureau of Statistics along with that staff you have an army of civil servants involving a tremendous overhead. I cannot emphasize too often the necessity for consolidating all this work under one administration, perhaps by the Bureau of Statistics. If this were done a good many positions could be abolished and a good deal of duplication of requests eliminated.

Mr. FOSTER: Is the census which is now taken merely a counting of noses, or does it embrace all the details that are asked for in the decennial census?

Mr. ROBB: According to section 19 of the act the census of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, as in the case of the decennial census, shall consist of the following:

(a) their population and the classification thereof, as regards name, age, sex, conjugal condition, relation to head of household, nationality, race, education, wage earnings, religion, profession or occupation, and otherwise;

(b) the number of houses for habitation, whether occupied or vacant, under construction or otherwise, the materials thereof, and the number of rooms inhabited;

(c) the area of occupied land and its value, and its condition thereof as improved for cultivation, in fallow, in forest, unbroken prairie, marsh or waste land, and otherwise; the tenure and acreage of farms and the value of farm buildings and implements;

(d) the products of farms, with the values of such products, and the number and value of domestic animals within the preceding census or calendar year;

(e) the municipal, educational, charitable, penal and other institutions thereof; and

(f) such other matters as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council.

Now we have had a fairly lengthy discussion, and if my hon. friends would pass the item we could adjourn.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should like to meet my hon. friend's request, but I want some information in regard to these commissioners. We have a frank statement from the government that they are appointed not by the government but by western members or friends, I think the minister says. Of course, these western friends must be the representatives elected to this House from the west, or the defeated candidates who ran in the Liberal interests. Am I right or wrong in that assumption?

Mr. ROBB: It is a pretty fair guess.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will not the minister go further and say that I am right? The Minister of Public Work (Mr. King) says I am right, if I have heard him. Very well. I will put another question in connection with these gentlemen who are responsible for the appointments. Were any of them Progressives or were they all standpat Liberals?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You will have to examine the list.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend would hardly expect me to pass by the Progressives.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take it I am right in that, Mr. Chairman. My hon. friend says I would not expect him to pass by the Progressives. I assume that means they also have had a share in the responsibility and in the honour and glory of getting their friends jobs on this work. Going a little further, did my hon. friend entirely overlook the claims of the Independents and was Labour's claim also overlooked in this patronage exploitation? Supposing we take the one lonely independent from British Columbia, surely he could not have been overlooked?

Mr. NEILL: May I inform my hon. friend that no census is being taken in British Columbia this year?

Mr. POULIOT: May I ask my hon. friend how many Tories are seeking jobs?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend's question is just as near the mark as might be expected; he is doing well. So we have these appointments made either on the recommendation of the sitting member, the defeated candidate or the Progressive gentleman who happens to be here. Under those circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I think we should have information which will show the names of each one of those appointees and the name of the gentleman who appointed him. Then I think we would be able to apply his political colour, and to place the responsibility in the right quarter if we find that the appointment ought not to have been made. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he think that over and bring us down the list to-morrow.

Mr. HEAPS: The hon. gentleman having raised the question he may as well get an answer. We do not want any patronage, and if it was offered we would not take it either from the Liberals or from the Conservatives.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I should like the minister seriously to consider the advisability of consolidating all the statistical branches in Ottawa. As a further evidence of my confidence in the Dominion Bureau of Statistics as presided over by the Chief Statistician, I am satisfied that if industry were only called upon by the Chief Statistician they would readily respond. But I have in mind what one of my Toronto colleagues referred to, the return that is made to three separate departments, the Income Tax department, the Labour department and the Bureau of Statistics. We shall soon come to an item of $100,000 for printing. We do not print nor do we compile these statistics for nothing, and in the final analysis it is simply a duplication of work. I believe the minister is anxious to economize, and I commend this to his attention as an opportunity for saving a very large sum of money.

Mr. ROBB: Let me say again that I concur absolutely in what my hon. friend says, and I should like him to-morrow to give me the names of those three departments so I may check them back to the bureau.

Mr. BOYS: Mr. Chairman, I understand that the minister is going to furnish a list of the various census commissioners. Reference has already been made to the appointment of returned men to these positions. I am mainly concerned with their appointment, I do not care a rap what their politics may be. There is legislation providing that returned men, other things being equal, should get certain appointments. I see no reason in the world why in the case of census commissioners and enumerators the same rule should not prevail I think before this item passes the minister should let us have that list. I do not know why we should not also have a list of some of the more subordinate officials. I understand there is a commissioner for every electoral district, so the list would not be at all lengthy. I think we should be able to find out whether the appointees are returned men. I do not say that in every case returned men were appointed in 1921, but if proper consideration was not given them the government of that day would have to take the responsibility, as the government of to-day will have to take it now. But I do think we ought to be able to get such a list before this item passes, and therefore I would ask the minister to allow it to stand until he brings down the list that he has already promised the committee.

Mr. ROBB: I should like to make some progress. I have already promised to bring down the list of 1921 and the last list. We may as well pass this item. I give my hon. friend my word that I will bring the list down.

Mr. BOYS: I do not doubt the minister's word for one moment. I concur entirely in what has been said about his integrity. That is not my point at all. I submit we ought to have the list before the item passes, so that if we desire we may make some observations in connection with it.

Mr. ROBB: May I point out to my hon. friend that the civil government vote for this same department will afford him the opportunity he desires.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend will readily see that the vote under civil government cannot possibly cover the commissioners appointed under this vote.

Mr. ROBB: But I am undertaking to bring the list down.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But my hon. friend will see that under the circumstances there is no chance of discussing it. For example, we might have a little question as to the exact stripe of politics of some of the noble supporters of these gentlemen that have been appointed under this item. I would suggest that my hon. friend let this stand. We have had a pretty good discussion and now we only need the list. It may be perfectly innocuous, but at least it will be interesting.

Mr. CAHILL: And it would open up the question again in good shape.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then what is my hon. friend afraid of?

Mr. CAHILL: Nothing, not even of the opposition.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then I see nothing in his suggestion. Of course, he may be very much disappointed here because unfortunately owing to his geographical limitations he has had nothing to do with the list. Under the circumstances I would suggest that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Chairman, I should like again to plead with my hon. friend. It is only half past ten and I think it is a fair compromise that we should pass this item and go home. I want to ask my hon. friend who is now leading the opposition (Sir Henry Drayton) and the gentleman who is sitting beside him, both of whom have had considerable experience in administration, how far it is going to get either party when I bring down the list of 1921 and the list of this year and my friends on both sides of the House debate their contents? Presumably it will open up a debate that will be neither very instructive nor very interesting. We might as well pass this item and adjourn.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We are not considering the vote of 1921; that list is not even in order for the purposes of a—may I use that word "bogey" again? Someone was angry because I used that word before. I crave the permission of the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) to use it again. The bogey of the list of 1921 is used for what purpose? It gives us something to consider, as to whether it will pay us to ask for this list as well. We have nothing to hide about the list of 1921.

Mr. ROBB: And we have nothing to hide about this list.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As it is used in that way, Mr. Chairman, I insist the more strongly upon the production of that list. We will take full respo sibility for everything that happened in 1921. Those appointments were criticised; there was a great deal of talk when those lists of 1921 were being considered, with charges of patronage levelled against us, and we have gone through it all. Now it is the turn of my hon. friends. It is their vote, and it is something which has to do particularly with their vote. It has so much to do with it that my hon. friend the minister undertakes to produce it, but it cannot be properly discussed with the item closed.

Mr. ROBB: I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. GEARY: I think I had the floor before the minister made his motion. I wanted to ask on this item if the minister, when he sent to his friends in the prairie provinces requests for recommendations for appointments in connection with this census, pointed out that a desirable qualification for the position was that of being a returned man?

Mr. ROBB: I have the qualifications which were given me by the census enumerator. I have not them here; they are in my desk.

Mr. GEARY: I only wanted to bring this to the attention of the minister.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Robb the House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, before we proceed with this order, with the consent of the House—otherwise I have no right—might I ask if the government could make any statement as to what position they intend to assume toward the Easter adjournment motion?

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR RECEIVING PETITIONS AND FILING BILLS

Mr. GEORGES PARENT (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, with the general consent of the House I would ask that we revert to routine proceedings in order that I may present the first report of the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

Mr. SPEAKER: By leave of the House.

Mr. PARENT presented the first report of the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills as follows:

Representations having been made to your committee by parliamentary agents and others, on behalf of a number of persons who are desirous of initiating private bill legislation during the present session of parliament, but are unable to do so by reason of the expiration of the time for receiving petitions for private bills, as well as for the filing of private bills, that the calling of the session at least a month earlier than usual, and other special circumstances prevailing during the session, have tended to prevent private bill promoters from bringing forward their measures until the present time; and your committee having been advised that some thirty-five or forty such petitions may yet be presented, have agreed, under the circumstances, to recommend that the time for receiving petitions for private bills, which expired on February 18 last, be renewed until Wednesday, April 14 next, and that that portion of the 89th rule which limits the time for filing private bills be suspended for the present session.

All which is respectfully submitted.

He said: I presume that under the circumstances an explanation is necessary. The chairman of the committee has received a good many representations from parliamentary agents and others to the effect that owing to the political uncertainty prevailing at the opening of the session those who wished to present petitions for private bills refrained from doing so, as had the session been of short duration they would have lost their deposits. Consequently no petitions were presented. A number of persons are now desirous of initiating private bill legislation, and in view of the peculiar circumstances representations have been made to the committee that the time limit under rule 89 should be suspended. This morning the committee unanimously recommended that this be done. Therefore if there is no objection I will move the adoption of the report.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON:: Do they know now what will happen?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Yes.

Mr. PARENT: I beg to move:

That in accordance with the recommendations contained in the first report of the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, the time for receiving petitions for private bills be renewed until Wednesday April 14 next, and that that portion of rule 89 which limits the time for filing private bills be suspended for the present session.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to think we should give effect to the motion. I do not think we are in a position to delay many of these gentlemen who want to have legislation brought forward, after having been misled by the perambulations of this government. They are in the same position in that regard as the country at large, and I think they should be helped.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to oppose the motion at the moment, but I would prefer that it stand until I have had an opportunity of consulting the Department of Justice as to how it will affect the revenue.

Mr. SPEAKER: Stands.

CHICAGO DRAINAGE CANAL

ENFORCEMENT OF TREATY AND COLLECTION OF DAMAGES

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Toronto Northwest) moved:

That in the opinion of this House, in order to preserve the levels of the Great Lakes and conserve the money expended on canals and harbour improvements on the Great Lakes by the government of Canada, immediate and drastic action should be taken by the government, through the British government, to enforce the Boundary Waterways Treaty (1909) and to forthwith collect damages from the United States for breaches of the treaty by the Chicago drainage canal, and that this House regrets the failure to take in the past any effective action and will support the government in future in any drastic action it takes to preserve the interests of Canada and have the treaty enforced without any more delays; and that the government ask the British government to collect for the damage done to Canadian interests of such illegal diversion as reparations due Canada, which amounts to several millions per annum; and, that the onus for the enforcement of the said treaty is on Great Britain and Canada and not on any private individuals.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most important questions which this parliament has to deal with. It has been before the House now for some time and the matter is of such vast importance to the people of this country that something will have to be done other than talk about it. The question involved is a very large one. It was dealt with a few years ago in a treaty between Great Britain and the United States, known as the Boundary Waterways Treaty, dated January 11, 1909. After all is said and done, Chicago is not to blame for the situation which has arisen. Chicago has been termed in the United States congress and senate as the "pirate of the lakes," but I say Chicago is not to blame. The responsible bodies are the governments of the United States, Great Britain and Canada. There is no mention of Chicago in the treaty at all; nothing is said of the amount of water Chicago may use This is a solemn treaty, and must not be treated as a scrap of paper, as it has been treated by the government of the United States, with the apparent do nothing policy of this government. This government has made a football of the question. We talk of how Germany treated Belgium, of how she regarded the treaty with Belgium as a scrap of paper; but here is a convention entered into by the governments of Great Britain and the United States which the government and people of the latter country are treating in the same way.

I am not going into the history of this case at the present time. I spoke on this matter in this House in 1922, 1923 and 1924, and on March 26, 1924, the whole case was set out by me then. But I want to ask now whether Chicago is more powerful than the government of the United States, and more powerful than this parliament and the parliament of Great Britain. It is time Chicago was checked up. The government of the United States should take the matter in hand and enforce the treaty, and Chicago should be no longer allowed to control the government of the United States and prevent this parliament from protecting the people of Canada. In my opinion we have not settled this question sooner because we have been dealing with the wrong people. We have been asking for the production of correspondence, but all the correspondence in this matter has been between the government of Canada and the government of the United States. Canada is not a party to that treaty, because Canada is part and parcel of the British Empire. I have asked several times for the correspondence between the government of Canada and the government of Great Britain and the British ambassador at Washington, but apparently there is no such correspondence, or at least it is not forthcoming. What has this government done to call the attention of Great Britain to the fact that the terms of this treaty have not been lived up to for many years past? I believe if the attention of the British government had been called to this state of affairs we would have achieved some better results by this time.

The illegal diversion of these waters is, as I have already said, one of the most important things with which we have to deal. It is important not only from the standpoint of navigation and power development, but also with regard to the immense investments of our provinces and municipalities in light and power.

There is some mention now of the United States waiting for another decision by the courts. Judge Landis gave a decision on the merits of this case in 1911, and construed the treaty. He said that up to the time this treaty was entered into Chicago could only take 4,167 cubic second feet of water, not because they had any right to it but because they had obtained a permit from the Secretary for War. The public works on the Great Lakes are under the jurisdiction of the Secretary for War, and Chicago received permission to divert temporarily 4,167 cubic second feet of water for drainage and sanitary purposes. Not long after, the Boundary Waters Treaty, 1909, was negotiated which laid down what waters could be diverted, and what not. To-day Chicago, which needs only one thousand cubic feet of water for drainage purposes, is taking ten thousand cubic feet, and the water is not being taken simply for drainage and sanitation purposes at all, but for power purposes, to be used for street and domestic lighting in that great city through the plant erected there at Lockport. Not satisfied with that, they have applied for an even larger amount to be diverted from lake Michigan, which is one of the lakes included in the treaty, although it is inland water. The water flows into that lake from the great hinterland to the north, and the aforesaid treaty, the plans and profiles, all recognize that lake Michigan and the lakes and streams contributary thereto come within the four corners of the treaty.

What is the government going to do? As I said a moment ago, Chicago is now applying for ten thousand cubic feet to be diverted, and the water that is diverted by Chicago will never flow back into the Great Lakes. The water of the Niagara river that is used by the Ontario Hydro-electric Commission does flow back into the river again and on to the mouth of the Niagara river, out through lake Ontario into the St. Lawrence, but not one foot of the water that is diverted by Chicago finds its way back into lake Michigan again. The whole treaty is being laughed at and a football made of the whole question by the legislatures and courts and congress and senate of the United States. What does this government propose to do about it? What this resolution proposes to do is to find a remedy, for where there is a wrong there is always a remedy. The country has stood this diversion long enough now. We have been awaiting conferences, and have had correspondence and meetings and what not; we have just been running around in a circle. There is only one way to enforce this treaty, and that is set out in the treaty itself. The last clause of the treaty, which will be found at the foot of page 28 of the statute known as the Boundary Waterways Treaty, provides for the peaceful and amicable settlement of disputes under the treaty by reference to the International Joint Commission and to The Hague. What has this government done to collect the bill for damages done to the public works of this country, to our harbours and rivers and system of canals, on which we are spending large sums of money? What has this government done, or what does it propose to do, to protect the investment of $275,000,000 that the province of Ontario has made in the cheap light and power movement of the Hydro in Ontario. As was pointed out by the late chairman of the Ontario Hydro-electric Commission, the excess waters taken by the Chicago drainage canal, if transformed into direct current, would amount on a conservative basis to 500,000 horse-power, which may be considered equivalent to 5,000,000 tons of coal per annum, which at the recent price of soft coal would amount to about $35,000,000 a year.

What does this government propose to do? Has it prepared under the treaty a bill of damages, and if so, what is the bill of damages for the port of Montreal, for instance, Toronto, and other great ports on the Great Lakes? What is the government's bill of damages for the light and power plants of this country which have suffered as a result of this diversion? What damage has resulted to the trade and commerce of this country by lowering the level of the Great Lakes? One of the results of this diversion has been to lower the level of the lakes. During the last season of navigation, boats on the Welland canal were stranded for days, sometimes for weeks, because of the low water level caused by the Chicago diversion.

What does this resolution propose? It proposes that immediate and drastic action should be taken by this government, through the British government, to enforce the Boundary Waterways Treaty. The proper legal way to go about it is through the British government, not by sending deputations from our municipalities and provinces down to Washington to interview a foreign government. That is a humiliating position for the people of this country to be in. Delegations from the municipalities and provinces of this country have gone down and appeared before the Rivers and Harbours committee of the United States congress to protect their own interests, and have gone over the head of the Canadian government to take up with the government of a foreign country the enforcement of a treaty made between the Mother Country and the United States, and I say that it is a humiliating position for this country. What this resolution proposes is that:

—immediate and drastic action should be taken by the government, through the British government, to enforce the Boundary Waterways Treaty (1909) and to forthwith collect damages from the United States for breaches of the treaty by the Chicago drainage canal, and that this House regrets the failure to take in the past any effective action and will support the government in future in any drastic action it takes to preserve the interests of Canada and have the treaty enforced without any more delays; and that the government ask the British government to collect for the damage done to Canadian interests of such illegal diversion as reparations due Canada, which amounts to several millions per annum; and, that the onus for the enforcement of the said treaty is on Great Britain and Canada and not on any private individuals.

It is no use leaving this matter to individuals or to business organizations which go to the United States and appear before the state and federal courts and before a committee of congress. Why should the government of this country have our people going down to Washington to look after their own interests? Are we not under the British flag in this country? Have we not law courts of our own? Are we going over the head of the Supreme court of this country, over the head of the government of this country, over the head of the Privy Council of Canada, over the head of His Majesty's government in Great Britain? Have we not enough authority there to enforce the treaty without having self-appointed persons appearing before some committee of congress to look after our rights, holding a watching brief on behalf of the people of this country? Has Washington to-day become the capital of Canada? I thought Ottawa was the capital of this country. Ottawa has been called the Washington of the north, but when you see delegations from municipalities, provincial governments and trade organizations in this country going down to Washington in regard to this question, one might be excused for thinking Washington really was the capital of Canada. I think it is time this government should refuse to give passports to self-accredited delegates who wish to appear before the law courts and legislatures of the United States and before the Harbours and Rivers committee of congress on this question. The time has come for a showdown. When this Boundary Waterways treaty was negotiated in 1909, everbody agreed that for the sake of good international relations something had to be done regarding the flow of water in this great international stream, the St. Lawrence, and the Great Lakes, and after considerable debate in the British House, in this House, and in congress, this treaty of 1909 was concluded.

Let us look at this question for a moment from the engineering standpoint. Professor Coleman, one of the greatest geologists on the American continent, says that if this waste of water goes on much longer lakes Erie and Ontario will run dry and become unnavigable in the years that are to come. The people of Canada, as well as their governments, have been altogether too lax in this matter. Canada should have insisted long ago that the terms of the treaty be adhered to. Under article 1 of that treaty Great Britain and the United States, being the high contracting parties, agree that the navigation on all the navigable boundary waters shall forever continue free and open for the purpose of commerce to the inhabitants, and to the ships, vessels and boats of both countries equally. It is evident that under the treaty the rights of navigation enjoyed by each country are equal. Subject to the rights of navigation in these boundary waterways, rivers and streams, belonging half to the United States and half to Canada, the surplus waters, as well as the banks, rapids, and bed of the river or navigable stream, belong to the state and provincial legislatures. This provision has not been adhered to. The treaty, as I have shown, provides that the rights of navigation shall be paramount and that they apply also to lake Michigan. The whole argument of those responsible for the Chicago drainage diversion in this matter is a fallacy. There is no law or authority to be found for their action. Certainly they can find no such rights as they claim in international law, neither is it to be found in the Boundary Waterways treaty. No, the Chicago drainage commission have no such authority in right, custom, usage or treaty. As they say in Chicago, they have simply "taken French leave." They think they are a law to themselves. If the law does not give them what they want, then they think they have the right to act in contravention of it. With them necessity knows no law, or with their government either; they make their solemn treaty a scrap of paper.

The Great Lakes system is the largest, most extensive and navigable waterway in the world. The diversion of water by the Chicago commission has permanently lowered the level to such an extent as to interfere with its development and navigation, something not allowed by the treaty at all. The Chicago drainage canal has lowered the levels of the Great Lakes by diverting an amount of water equal to the amount of water that goes over the American falls at Niagara Falls. That is the amount of water they are diverting for the Chicago drainage canal, the same amount of water as flows over the American side of the falls every second of time. This is all being done illegally; it is not allowed by treaty. They are diverting 10,000 cubic second feet through the drainage canal on to the Mississippi river, and not one foot of this water can come back again to the Great Lakes. In its natural course this water would pass through the lakes and down to the Canadian seaboard. The reduction of the lake levels is a matter of national concern both to Canada and to the United States. The waterways treaty definitely fixed the amount of water necessary to conserve the water of the Great Lakes for navigation purposes. It also provided that there should be no diversion of boundary waters without the authority and consent of both countries. As I have said the case of the Chicago Drainage commission is based very largely on fallacy. They have no sanction in law for the action which they have taken except a permit from the United States Secretary for Wa.r This is not a legal permit, because under the treaty permits cannot be issued except with the consent of both the countries concerned.

It is not necessary that I should go into the history of the scheme for the disposal of the sewage of the city of Chicago, but I may make this statement: Those people met Sir Adam Beck, head of the Hydro Electric system of Ontario. Two years ago Mr. Healy, and all the rest of them, visited Toronto. They also went to Montreal, Quebec, and other ports to discuss this problem with the local municipalities. At Toronto they were met by the harbour commission, and as one of the harbour board I was sorry to see that they did not know more than they did about their own case. They actually advanced the contention that lake Michigan did not come within the terms of the treaty, although that treaty specifically mentions lake Michigan as a part of the Great Lakes system, the watershed of which extends into our northern hinterland. We met these gentlemen in company with representatives of the Ontario government and the Hydro Electric, and went into the question. The commission proposed to erect retaining walls and compensating works on lake Erie and on the St. Lawrence river as an offset to the water they were taking. They were prepared to erect what they called compensating works. I pointed out to them at the time that nothing could compensate the municipalities of Ontario for the loss of their investment of $275,000,000; nothing could compensate the people of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec for the loss of shipping and the damages to shipping in the port of Montreal and on the St. Lawrence, the damage to ocean going traffic and to trade, commerce and transportation of this country—not even the erection of compensating works to the value of $2,500,000. Such a compensating proposition is so ridiculous that it would be laughed out of any legislature. Imagine any body of men thinking that by erecting a few million dollars of compensating works they could recoup the people of this country for diverting a flow of water of 10,000 cubic second feet, equal to the amount of water per second that goes over the American falls!

And now the time has come when there should be a little action on the part of this government. I may say that I am glad to see a change of opinion in the United States in regard to this proposition; that the Hon. Mr. Hoover, Secretary of State for Commerce, has admitted that there has been a breach of the treaty, and that Canada has a good claim for compensation under the provisions of that treaty. Mr. Newton D. Baker, Secretary for War in the Wilson government—and the city of Cleveland takes the same view—was opposed to this diversion of water for the purposes of the Chicago drainage canal. Not only the city of Cleveland, but all the cities and towns on the American side of the Great Lakes are taking strong action against this diversion. Mr. Baker says that the people of the United States would be very glad to compensate Canada for the loss of millions of dollars by virtue of the act of the Chicago people.

It is admitted that the depth of water in the harbours of the Great Lakes has been lowered to a very serious extent. As regards the harbour of Toronto the launch of the Royal Canadian Yacht Club cannot get into its berth by reason of low water. The provincial government takes the position that if the federal authority does not discharge its duties it must itself intervene to protect the investments of its municipalities. I may say that the Dominion Marine Association, the Civic Federation of Montreal, the Atlantic Shipping Company, the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, the Richelieu and Ontario Navigation Company, the Canada Steamship Company, the Canadian Water-power Board and the boards of trade of the Dominion, including the Montreal and Toronto boards of trade, and a very great number of other organizations along the Great Lakes, have testified to the serious loss which has been sustained throughout the various municipalities in the Canadian area affected.

Professor Coleman, another geologist, states that in his opinion this diversion is going to have the most serious effects on the river St. Lawrence. As I say, navigation would be tied up on the St. Lawrence and in the port of Montreal and the St. Lawrence ship channel would become unnavigable. Professor Coleman says:

> A tilt of fifty feet would drain the whole of the Great Lakes into the Mississippi. "Is this beyond the possibilities of modern engineering skill?" He asked. "It is not." A mere deepening of three drainage canals would result in a similar state of affairs. It is entirely possible to drain the whole of the Great Lakes in this way.

Professor Grant, a grandson of a former President of the United States, and a great geologist of the Northwestern University of the United States, says:

> Even as it is nature is playing its part in drying up the lakes system and reducing the rivers to streams.

He points out that climatic conditions alone will have a very serious effect, let alone a diversion of 10,000 cubic feet of water per second.

Professor Coleman further gives evidence that the present lake levels in lake Ontario and the Great Lakes are ninety-five per cent due to this diversion of water through the Chicago drainage canal.

Why was the International Joint Commission constituted? To settle promptly and amicably any disputes about this treaty. Its duties are set out in the boundary treaty. Why was it not called upon to take up this question, decide in an amicable way what the damage is and collect it from the proper power. If it had been intended by the government of Great Britain and the government of the United States that Chicago should have these vast powers, the treaty would have said so, but there is no mention of Chicago in this treaty from beginning to end. Therefore, Chicago not being mentioned in the treaty, the latter must be construed strictly not only by the courts but by the body appointed to enforce the treaty, namely, the International Joint Commission. There is no way of enforcing this treaty in a civil court. It was taken out of the hands of the civil courts and placed on the shoulders of the International Joint Commission. The case has been taken to court after court in the United States and in every court the matter gets right back to the principles as laid down in 1911 in Judge Landis' decision. They have been before all the state courts in Illinois, the Supreme Court of the United States, the Rivers and Harbours committee of congress and the committees of the Senate, but the sum total of all the legal opinions given by law officers in the United States, the attorney generals of all the state legislatures and the Attorney General of the United States gets back to the decision given fifteen years ago by Judge Landis. What is the use of our wasting any more time in waiting for United States court cases? Three decisions which have been given in the last year all get back to the original decision given by Judge Landis on the 23rd January, 1911, in which he construed the whole treaty, the law, the facts, and the rights of the Chicago people under the permit of the Secretary of State for War and gave his decision. In that decision the judge quotes the original permit which is as follows:

> The future diversion of water from Lake Michigan for any purpose is fraught with difficulties. Not only has Canada an interest in the maintenance of lake levels which the United States must recognize, but every foot of water flowing through the Chicago drainage canal lessens the flow at Niagara Falls and at the power sites along the St. Lawrence river, where due to the fall available the same amount of water will create about four times the power that can be generated from it on the Des Plaines and Illinois rivers.

I will read just one paragraph of the judge's decision. The judge, after reviewing the evidence and the law, gave his decision which really summarizes all the decisions given between 1911 and 1926 by the United States. In the last paragraph he says that the consent of Great Britain is necessary to all diversions, otherwise they are illegal. The judge says:

> In the last analysis, should congress and the War department, in consideration of all these matters, decline to permit the necessary diversion, the burden is on the district of providing some other method of relief. In other words, the defence that the diversion is necessary for the purpose of sanitation, as against the rule that a navigable right and navigation right is a paramount right, is immaterial. In order to allow the sanitary district a chance to appeal to the War department for relief no order was made restricting the flow.

But the said judge's order showed that they had no right in law to this diversion. That decision of the judge has been backed up by every court in the United States all the way from 1911 to 1926.

The time has come, in my opinion, for the government of Canada to do something. It is not necessary for a minister of this government to go down to Washington. What has the government ever done to take up this question with the British authorities, because the government of Great Britain and not the government of Canada is one of the parties named in this treaty? Are we to continue until doomsday to allow the government of the United States to treat this treaty as a scrap of paper? This treaty was signed by the President of the United States on behalf of the people of that country. Is the government of Canada to sit in silence relying on what it calls its own autonomy and treaty making powers? Let the government enforce this treaty in order to prevent even greater damage being done to navigation. Are we to wait for a few self-appointed individuals, a few busybodies who, when they were asked if they represented the government of Canada, did not know whether they did or not, to go down to Washington and argue our case. Where does the British government come in on this question? I have the utmost respect for the government and the people of the United States and I appreciate the fact that there are many people on the Great Lakes including some of the state governors who take very strong grounds on this question. A meeting was held at which some twelve governors were present, and while I will not read all that was said, I should like to read what Mr. Baker, late Secretary for War, said at a meeting of the Great Lakes Harbour Association at Detroit on the 14th January of this year where he was one of the prominent speakers:

When he touched on the peaceful relations that have existed between the United States and Canada, Mr. Baker's voice trembled with his earnestness. "I would be willing to be taxed heavily to pay for the sewage disposal system of Chicago rather than to be a party to the slightest affront to the Dominion of Canada. I know what international complications mean, and I know that all of us pray that the rule of justice between nations will forever supplant the rule of force. In all our difficulties, we want amicable arrangements effected between ourselves and any other country. That is true in this case.

"Canada has an academic and economic interest in the Great Lakes and we cannot affect the lakes in any way without affecting Canada. Moreover, the lakes have made us the steel empire of the world. To imperil that great commerce is for us to commit industrial suicide. Some way can be found to settle this controversy to the best interests of the whole nation, and Chicago can be persuaded to see it in that light. We must take a broad view of the whole matter."

"A civic outlaw" was the characterization of Chicago by William Bruce, president of the association, in his opening address at the forenoon session.

"Every newspaper in Chicago," Mr. Bruce said, "is deploring the great crime wave among Chicago's citizens. They admit it springs from a general contempt for law among Chicago's people. Every civic organization and pulpit in Chicago is clamoring for a remedy. What else can they expect where the municipal government of Chicago persists in a ruthless contemptuous and colossal violation of the law?

"In continuing to steal from lake Michigan more than twice the amount of water allowed it for sanitation purposes by a permit from the United States War Department, Chicago is not only doing a damage totalling hundreds of millions to Great Lakes cities, including itself, but it is raising the greatest moral issue in American politics since the Civil war.

"After every court before which its theft has been contested, including the Supreme Court of the United States, has rejected its claims and condemned its action as illegal, Chicago now turns to the congress of the United States in an appeal for congress to make legal to-morrow what the United States Supreme Court has stamped as illegal to-day.

"Chicago takes the position of the outlaw, the bandit. It says to the rest of the country: 'Right or wrong we are going to have our way. We've got the water illegally—but what of it? We're going to continue to take it until something more than courts and laws stop us.'

"Is Chicago more powerful than the courts and laws of the United States? There is the issue in a nut shell. Chicago believes that it is. We believe that it is not. In the battle which is coming the whole country will presently be involved."

The foregoing shows that among the leading citizens of the United States there is a sense of justice in this matter. It is admitted that we have a claim for damages. Now if Mr. Hoover, the Secretary for Commerce in the United States cabinet, declares in unmistakable language, not only at this convention but at other meetings, that Canada has a claim for damages under the treaty, then where is that claim? What officer or minister on behalf of this government is preparing our claim for damages in this matter? Has that claim ever been presented? Has it ever been drawn up? If not, why not? That claim should be presented to the British government who would demand some action on the part of the United States in regard to it, and there would be a hearing, not before any of the courts either in the United States or in Canada, but before a joint commission and, if necessary, a convention like that of The Hague, as the treaty provides.

A former congressman of Illinois, Mr. G. L. Shaw, who represents the district bordering the Illinois river, which forms part of the water-way now connecting lake Michigan with the Mississippi, protested in strong terms against the continuation of the offence perpetrated by the Chicago sanitary district. He declared that the value of the lands adjoining the Illinois river had been largely destroyed by reason of the diversion of lake Michigan waters through the Illinois river channel, and indicated that notwithstanding very large expenditures which property owners had made to dyke their lands, in flood periods the barriers were broken and the lands flooded and rendered comparatively useless for agricultural or other purposes. He gave striking instances of the subterfuges which he said were adopted by the sanitary district to mislead property holders in the river district, and he outlined methods whereby, he alleged, those who suffered damage are defrauded in their attempts to get compensation.

The Hon. Daniel W. Hoan, mayor of Milwaukee, delivered a very effective address dealing with the sanitary phase of the problem and its solution. He made a startling exposure of the very extensive damage suffered by structures erected on pile foundations in communities situated on waters, the levels of which are reduced by the Chicago theft. He stated that in Milwaukee an examination of pile foundations originally below water level, but now partly above, by reason of the Chicago abstraction, had shown that the heads of the piles were perishing of dry rot, and that colossal expenditures must be made to save from collapse wharf and building structures resting upon wooden pile foundations. This is an alarming phase of the situation which must appeal to all who are versed in engineering matters or are familiar with construction work. Hitherto it has not been generally expressed or stressed, as Mr. Hoan declared.

What Mr. Hoan says about the condition in his municipality is true throughout the Great Lakes. I have here a letter sent me by the mayor of Thorold. He says he understands that the matter will be brought up in parliament, and in view of this fact he had a joint meeting called of the municipal councils of St. Catharines, Merritton and Thorold for the purpose of considering local conditions. As a result of that meeting a petition was prepared and forwarded to the Dominion government, a copy of which I have received. This petition says in part:

> That in common with the people of Canada, but more particularly by reason of their close proximity to and direct dependence upon the Welland canal, the inhabitants of your petitioning municipalities have suffered and will continue to suffer severe loss by reason of the increasingly frequent and dangerously low levels and state of the waters of the Welland canal.

The petition goes on to state that these conditions have been more marked during the present year than in preceding years. The navigation through the Welland canal has been on several occasions during the present season seriously interfered with, and at times it has been completely suspended on this account. This is a heavy handicap, entailing great financial loss, through the inability to move grain and other freights. By reason of these conditions, the petition declares, and the necessity for frequently shutting off the flow of waters into the old Welland canal and into the many hydraulic races and flumes fed from the Welland canal, so that levels of the canal might be increased and maintained for navigation, many of the industrial plants have had to close down for periods ranging from hours to days at a time, thereby causing great loss and inconvenience to manufacturers and others, and loss of employment for temporary periods to the operatives and employees of these industries. The petition goes on to say:

> 5. That particularly the said suspensions of operations have caused a great loss to the pulp and paper industries on or near the said canal, stock in process being damaged or destroyed by reason of compulsory stoppage of work thereon or from the dirty and noxious state of the waters when water levels have been restored.
> 6. That the sanitation of the district is endangered if the said conditions remain or recur, as the water supply systems of your petitioning municipalities are affected thereby.
> 7. That the operation of industries and of electric railway transportation, and the lighting of homes and stores in the Niagara peninsula and in the city of Hamilton is directly affected by the existence and recurrence of the said conditions, and the same have already entailed loss and inconvenience
> 8. That generally the people of the whole of the Niagara peninsula are suffering great inconvenience and monetary loss by reason of the said conditions, and a recurrence or continuation of the same will seriously prejudice the whole community and arrest the development of one of the most important industrial sections of the Dominion.
> 9. That whether or not there be other causes contributory to the existence of the said conditions, it is principally attributable to the diversion of waters of the Great Lakes to take care of the needs of the sanitary district of the city of Chicago, whereby, it is said waters are illegally diverted into the Mississippi river from the Great Lakes and their natural effluent.
> 10. That your petitioning municipalities deem it essential to the welfare of their inhabitants and of grave importance to the whole Dominion that steps be taken for immediate, if temporary, alleviation of the said conditions, and towards complete and permanent removal thereof.

This petition is signed by Mr. Jacob Smith, mayor, for St. Catharines, Mr. L. B. E. McCleary, mayor for Thorold, and Mr. Thomas Hastings, mayor, for Merritton. It is important that some action be taken to remedy the present situation before the next season of navigation opens, or the condition that now exists will be greatly aggravated.

I should like now to refer to the effect of this diversion of water on shipments out of the port of Montreal, and its bearing upon ocean traffic from that port. Mr. R. W. Reford, president of the Shipping Federation of Canada, in the course of an address to the annual meeting of the federation the other day, strongly attacked the diversion of water by Chicago which he said was detrimental to the St. Lawrence route and to this Dominion in general. Let me quote from his remarks:

> The waters of the St. Lawrence and the waters of the Great Lakes are the birthright of Canada, to be shared jointly and internationally with the United States. Canada cannot afford to give away this birthright. If we bargain with the United States and agree to waive our rights in International Law, we, by this, create a precedent for which Canada will suffer for all time. I would even go so far as to say that by doing so we tacitly agree to allow the Americans to take from us what they covet and then negotiate with us what they will pay for it or, if possible, avoid paying for it at all. This is what has been done in the case of Chicago Drainage Canal, and if we do not take a firm stand in this matter which is vital to Canada's future, and insist on our rights, it is what will occur again whenever the necessities of the United States call for it.

As Mr. Reford, president of the Shipping Federation of Canada, says:

Water is capital, and if we give away our capital, while we may beg, borrow or steal to replace what we have lost, we are, for all time, in the position of having lost this water, and when the time comes that it will be necessary to reform and improve our channels should we not be in a position to do so with the full flow of water tributary to the St. Lawrence watershed which nature endowed us with, we will for all time be short the quantity which it is now proposed we should give away.

The unfairness of the attitude assumed in this Chicago drainage canal scheme is not, I think, fully appreciated. The value of this water which Chicago proposes to take from the watershed of the Great Lakes to the city of Chicago is infinitesimal to the value of this same water to all the ports and harbours of the United States and Canada lining the Great Lakes; to the value of the water power capable of development at Niagara and on the St. Lawrence. This same water used to produce power for Chicago would yield from four to five times more power at Niagara and on the St. Lawrence.

Here is what he says about the cost of this diversion to the Dominion:

The cost of deepening our canals, our lake channels and river channels may run into hundreds of millions of dollars, and when all this work has been accomplished we will still be short all the amount of water that Chicago proposes to take from us.

And this diversion is costing us millions annually, in Mr. Reford's opinion:

We are already aware of the detrimental effect of Chicago's action on our river estimated by conservative engineers to run into millions annually through the lowering of the water and the consequent inconvenience and loss to the commercial interests.

The issue is indeed a national one, and the need for action should be brought to the attention of the people of this Dominion without delay.

Now, the city of Montreal appointed Mr. DeGaspe Beaubien to prepare a report on the effects of Chicago's diversion in relation to navigation from lake Superior to Montreal, and he shows conclusively that great damage has already resulted from the reduction in the levels of the Great Lakes and of the St. Lawrence. This has been estimated as entailing a loss on ship-owners of $20,000,000 annually, exclusive of the loss sustained by the various ports. Mr. Harvie, general manager of the port of Montreal, on the basis of the figures given by Mr. Arthur Surveyor on the effects of this abstraction from the St. Lawrence claims that it causes a loss to Montreal shippers of approximately $10,000,000 a year.

[Mr. Church.]

When the matter was discussed before the Rivers and Harbours convention at Detroit on January 14, 1926, those representing Chicago presented another argument in an attempt to justify the diversion. They compared the amount of water taken out of the Niagara river to that taken by the Chicago drainage canal, which they asserted was very much less. But as has been often pointed out, the water taken by Chicago is not returned to lake Michigan, whereas all the water taken by the Chippawa canal and other works is returned to the Niagara river. Under the boundary treaty Canada is allowed 36,000 cubic feet per second and the United States 20,000 cubic feet per second. But it must be remembered that of Canada's share 12,000 cubic feet per second is exported to the United States. So that our neighbours really get 32,000 against our 24,000 cubic feet per second.

I urge on the government that there is only one proper way to deal with this matter. There is no use our sending various individuals to Washington to interview the heads of the different government departments. This is a treaty between Great Britain and the United States, and the only proper way to get specific performance and to present our case is through the British government. Let us say to the British authorities in effect: A serious breach has occurred, and here is Canada's bill for damages sustained by the Chicago water steal; what do you propose to do about it? Undoubtedly something should be done. The people of Canada are getting sick and tired of the want of action by this government regarding the settlement of what is a very vital question. If this inaction is due to our added status and autonomy, then I say the sooner such autonomy and increased status are disregarded the better for the interests of Canada. We have a Department of External Affairs costing us annually $105,000 that does nothing, and we have a high commissioner in London at an annual expense of $107,000, which is also of no avail to help us. Surely these two departments should be able to advise the government as to the proper course to be followed in putting a stop to this illegal diversion, and as to aid in presenting our damage claim. Has Canada also consented to the diversion, or to what?

Now, what is being done? Are we content to have every Tom, Dick and Harry go down to Washington to represent the government of Canada in this important matter? Is that the way to get redress? How much money has been paid agents and American and other lawyers to appear before the United States Supreme Court and the Rivers and Harbours committee of congress to look after our interests? The other day a private citizen of this country interviewed the president, and some of the papers said that he represented the people of Canada! It should not be forgotten that the treaty governing this case was made between Great Britain and the United States, not between Canada and the United States, and therefore we should proceed through the British government in our efforts to secure redress. I have asked the government to lay on the table any correspondence that it has had with the British government. I speak subject to correction, but I do not think there is any such correspondence. Canada has played a lone hand and got nowhere. If, however, I am mistaken, I should like to have an opportunity to peruse the correspondence in order that I may ascertain what this government has done in a strictly legal way to enforce the terms of this treaty, instead of the "watchful waiting" and being "too proud to fight," and so that Canada's and Ontario's interest may be protected.

Bonds amounting to $275,000,000 have been sold in New York and London, representing money invested in light and power plants and hydro-electric radials in the province of Ontario. The security for that investment is liable to be wiped out to-morrow if the levels recede much more and if this diversion goes on. The time for talk has passed; we want action, and we want to know what the government of Great Britain propose to do about it. The United States is well able to pay any bill for damages which might be presented to it. At the present time Great Britain is paying $500,000 a day on her war debt to the United States, after having spent more, in blood and money, than any other nation during the war. I say the time has arrived when a bill should be presented to the British government, to be forwarded to the United States, for damages done to our Canadian interests through failure to carry out the terms of this treaty. Hon. members from the west, from the prairie provinces and from central Canada are all vitally interested in this question. There is no use in this government sending any more telegrams, memoranda or things of that kind winding up in talk and more talk; Chicago will just laugh at them as they have laughed at the decisions of the courts. Chicago has gone beyond the Supreme court now to congress, and I am sorry to see some Canadians among those engaged in lobbying in connection with this question. It is a humiliating position when the people of this country, with law and justice on our side, have to engage men to go down to Washington to press this question. Unless something is done now, action will again be deferred for a long time.

Hon. EDMUND BRISTOL (Toronto East Centre): Mr. Speaker, I think the subject brought up by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) is, next to the tariff, the most important matter before the people of Canada to-day, whether or not one is entirely in accord with the views of the hon. member in regard to procedure. Personally I think the hon. member has the correct view, and that this matter has to be taken up through the British government just as the treaty was taken up through the British ambassador at Washington, and just as some treaty amendment is going on now. Of course, these things are all done in consultation with members of the Canadian government who are instructed to deal with the matter.

There are two factors of vital importance in this case, and the first is the vast damage which has been done and is being done to this country—as much to the province of Quebec, the city of Montreal, the city of Quebec and the St. Lawrence river as to any other part of Canada—by this illegal diversion. Great damage has been done and is being done from day to day in connection with navigation. It affects the western men, who ship their grain through Canadian ports, in this way: if you lower the depth of water in the Great Lakes by six inches or a little more, as has been done by the Chicago diversion, it means the grain-carrying vessels must carry so many thousands of bushels less than they otherwise could carry. It also means a great deal in connection with the dredging which has to go on. In fact, the estimate has been made—I do not know how correct it is—that the expenditure would amount to $35,000,000 in one year. But that is a detail. The real point is that from 1911 down to the present time the city of Chicago, one of the richest cities in the world and quite well able to pay for their drainage, have had a full knowledge of the illegality of taking water out of these international waterways for sanitary purposes. They have also used that water for power, and now they have the audacious idea of deepening the Mississippi river by diverting upwards of 10,000 cubic second feet from our Great Lakes. If Chicago was a poor city I have no doubt the people of Canada would be perfectly willing to help them. I would feel as Mr. Baker, the former Secretary for War, felt when he said that he would be glad to contribute his share as an American to help poor Chicago as far as their drainage troubles were concerned.

There is nothing to be said in favour of Chicago. They have simply had audacity and nerve, and have been committing this illegal act since 1911 with full knowledge. I am not finding fault with any government, but I do say that we should now take a very strong position first as regards the damages which this country has sustained and is sustaining and for which the United States as a country, not Chicago, must pay. Further, we must stop any further diversion of these waters. We fortunately have the decisions of United States courts, but why should we wait for such decisions in connection with a matter which affects our national rights? Fortunately for us the state of New York recently came into the arena as against Chicago, and now we have several states fighting Chicago, and others backing up Chicago, desiring to get water with which to deepen the Mississippi river. Even should the decision be to deepen the Mississippi, Canada's rights still obtain, no matter what the American courts may decide. We are a part of the British Empire and expect our reasonable share of protection, assuming that we are not able to handle the matter for ourselves, as of course we would like to do.

There is no real problem in this connection, because we have the admission of men like Mr. Hoover, who said the other day, "Oh yes, we could pay for that water." He said they were taking now about 10,000 cubic second feet, and that Chicago could probably get along with 6,000 cubic second feet and use the balance to deepen the Mississippi river. Paying for the water is a very small part of the question. At the time that treaty was entered into water power was not so important as it is to-day, because the world had not then realized the power which could be generated from falling water, and navigation was the important point. Chicago and other neighbouring cities on the lakes were allowed to take what water they needed for sanitary and domestic purposes, but nothing was suggested in the treaty permitting them to take water out of one watershed and put it into another. That is against the laws of all nations of the world; you cannot legally take water out of one watershed and divert it into another. Canada and the United States have equal shares in this water; we have been and I hope always will be friendly neighbours. I have a friendly feeling towards the people of the United States, and it is difficult for me to understand why for fifteen years or more men as able and clever as Chicago business men should be so fussy about taking this water from the Great Lakes when, by the expenditure of a few million dollars of their own money, they could have all the sanitation necessary without an international complication, which so far has twenty-four states opposing Chicago on one side side and about ten on the other.

The Liberal party was in power at the time this treaty was made; they saw this going on, but never supposed, I believe, that Chicago would continue to take more and more water to which that city had no legal right. With all respect, I think that without further delay the government of this country should present through the British ambassador at Washington a claim for the damages we have sustained by the Chicago diversion, with full notice of the future damages we would claim, and a polite request that the city of Chicago in attending to its own domestic water supply comply with the terms of the treaty concluded between Great Britain and the United States with respect to that matter.

This is such a vital matter that one wonders that not more attention has been given to it in the past, and I think the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) has done a great public service to Canada in the last four years in bringing to our attention what has been going on. We have been a hopeful and peaceful people; we have believed that probably Chicago would comply with the terms of the treaty, but recently they had an order of the court to continue to take an additional 10,000 cubic second feet. As far as Canada is concerned, they have not the right to take one additional cubic foot per second. They can take the water for domestic purposes, but they must return it to the watershed from which they take it. We should stand on that position, and ask our friends in Great Britain, through the British ambassador at Washington, to present our case. We have a perfectly proper case, and it does not need much argument, for almost every distinguished lawyer and almost every fair-minded man in the United States, including the ministers, have taken the position that Chicago was doing wrong. As far as this country is concerned, on account of the low water levels, we are having to spend money on dredging and other methods to deepen the water all over the Great Lakes and in the St. Lawrence, while Chicago continues to do wrong and is not paying any damages to Canada. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this matter would be brought to a head in a very nice pleasant and agreeable way, if a diplomatic effort were made, first of all, to present our claim in the best possible form against the United States for what Chicago is doing, and secondly, our claim that within a very reasonable time at all events—we are not so much in need of that water for power to-day, but within a reasonable time we shall need it—Chicago should be compelled to do what other cities of the world have had to do, look after their own sanitation and pay the expenses of it.

As far as the United States is concerned, it is very important, of course, as we are neighbours, that we should live on pleasant and friendly terms. I am glad it is only the city of Chicago that has got greedy in this particular matter, although I see that some distinguished gentlemen in the United States want more power for Chicago and more water for the Mississippi river. They even want a canal from the Great Lakes to New York, and to take our water to put into a canal for that purpose. Unless therefore, we take a firm position, our rights will be further infringed.

Picture for yourself what would happen if we were taking water from the United States. Why, in that great country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Great Lakes to the gulf of Mexico, you would hear one great roar. Not only that, but some of the papers of the United States have the audacity to say that the government of this country, if you please, are trying to raise a feeling against Chicago in the United States, and trying to effect and influence legislation in the United States. Now we may not agree with this government on some matters, but we know that that is the last thing any government of this country would do, no matter on which side of politics it was; but it just shows the dirty character of the attack; it is not a nice attack at all. I regret to say I saw a similar attack about a year ago made by a member of congress on Canada. He said that she was interfering, trying to affect the internal politics of the United States in connection with the Chicago matter. It seems to me that the proper course for us to take is to present our case through the British ambassador at Washington. Let him present the claim we want presented on behalf of Canada. If they want to have litigation in the United States between the state of New York and other states, they may enjoy themselves as much as they want in that matter, but so far as Canada is concerned, that does not affect our rights at all. The hon. member for Toronto Northwest said that Great Britain was paying about $600,000 a day to the United States. If we keep in as part of the British Empire, it is quite possible that we may say to the government of Great Britain: One of your commonwealth is losing an enormous amount of money by wrong action on the part of the United States, and why should one member of the family pay money to the United States so long as the United States is inflicting terrible damage on another part of the empire? But if Canada is treated fairly in this matter by the United States, there is no reason why she should not contribute to the defence of the empire.

I did not have a chance to speak in the debate the other day on our relations to the empire, but I say this as a Canadian: We have had the benefit of the British navy for the defence of this country for 165 years. We have Japan and China on one side of us, with lots of future possibilities. We have tried a navy in this country, and have not been successful, because obviously our people would much rather work at domestic matters, whereas in England the people are at no point more than fifty miles from the sea, and they love the sea; following the sea is their business, and I would much rather that we should contribute something towards the upkeep of the British navy than try to run ships of our own. They know the business; they have been in it for years, and they can get more for their money than we ever could, and no navy that we ever could have would be of the slightest use if Japan said she wanted more fish out of the Pacific ocean. The time has come when we should be very much a part of the British Empire. In 1776 the United States had had the protection of the British navy for about 130 years, against Spain, against France, and had grown great and prosperous, but when a little tax was proposed on tea, as soon as the country had got its breath, they broke away from Great Britain at a time when she was in war troubles. Let us be a part of the British Empire, and let us do our fair share, whatever it is. Certainly we should be very proud to be a member of the British Empire. No empire in the history of the world has ever had the fairness and justice which the British Empire has shown to all peoples and all classes and all conditions, and now it seems that we should have a little help from them with reference to Chicago. I cannot see myself, with every courtesy to the government of the United States, why the government of that great country—I suppose the greatest country in the world to-day, in wealth at all events—should allow a city like Chicago to go on doing the things it is doing illegally and improperly, and after the courts have decided that Chicago is acting illegally and improperly.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, I think that in the main the government agrees with mostly everything that has been said by the two gentlemen who have just been discussing the matter.

Perhaps it would not be out of place at this moment to rehearse the history of this difficulty, which is international in character. May I say also that I think this is a most opportune time to be chosen for a discussion of this question, for the reason that the lakes this year, if not last year, will be at the lowest level they have reached in easily one hundred years. Still there is this comforting fact, that the lake levels, which undoubtedly are very low, have been as low on former occasions as they are at the present time. They have reached this low level partly on account of climatic conditions, as well as by reason of the diversion of water by Chicago. I agree most heartily with the suggestions of both hon. gentlemen who have spoken that the time has arrived when we should press most vigorously for a settlement of this difficulty. But we must not shut our eyes to the fact that the Chicago diversion is responsible for only six inches of the lowering of the lake levels at the present moment. I do not say that with any hope of diverting attention from Chicago but rather with a view to urging more strongly than ever the restoration of the water diverted. But inasmuch as the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has pointed out that shipping will lose millions of dollars on account of the lower lake levels and of the difficulty of getting into our harbours, this is the time in my opinion when vigorous action should be taken in connection with this matter. I do not say that vigorous action has not been taken up to this moment. I do not quite agree with my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Church) that the government have been lax in their duty in bringing this question to the attention of the American government, because we have been doing that repeatedly and doing it through the British representative at Washington, the only avenue by which we could approach the United States government. May I say this: We have never, either now or any other time, authorized any individual in a private capacity to go down there and speak for the government of Canada. Private individuals have accompanied delegations to Washington and to conventions of interested cities and municipalities along the Great Lakes and made representations. I believe my hon. friend is quite correct that one of them went so far as to have an audience with the president himself. A few days ago it was my privilege to be down there, not to discuss the Chicago matter but the question of the preservation of the scenic beauties of Niagara. Incidentally the matter of the Chicago diversion came up, and may I say that I found Mr. Hoover, with whom I was in conference, most anxious for a solution of this very vexed Chicago question. However, I was not authorized by the government to discuss it and refrained from doing so except to say this in a very informal way on behalf of the government of Canada—that we do not recognize one single foot of diversion at Chicago or anywhere else. Our position was that we wanted the restoration of the water. We were not concerned with compensation for that diversion, but rather the return of the whole of that water into the Great Lakes system, the lack of which was causing us a considerable amount of damage at the present moment. That is our attitude, and if I were to spend hours in giving explanations I do not think that I could state the position more clearly.

Just a word or two about the situation on the Great Lakes in order to give hon. members, perhaps, a clearer prospect of that situation, as it now exists. As hon. gentlemen already know there is a joint administration of the control of lake Superior and that has tended—I think I am safe in making the assertion—towards retaining the level of that lake at the present moment one foot higher than it otherwise would have been. So that control will play a very important part. But last year when the low levels began to affect shipping, at the Soo difficulty was experienced, even at the entrance of the canal. However, the control board authorized the letting loose of 8,000 cubic feet of water and the difficulty was cured at that particular point. Now in fairness we cannot argue that Chicago had anything to do with that because we know the Chicago diversion affects the levels of lake Huron but not particularly the level at the outlet of lake Superior. My reason for mentioning this is that I found our American friends, in an informal discussion, very anxious to discuss remedial measures; but I fail to see how the government or representatives of this country can be prepared at this time to discuss remedial works for which the United States would be willing to pay. Our attitude is that we want restoration of the water, and not remedial works. In fairness to Chicago I must say this: We are willing within a reasonable amount of time, lest injury be done that municipality, but no longer than is absolutely necessary, to permit Chicago to establish the necessary works for the treatment of its sewage and to return to the Great Lakes system all the water that is now being diverted. That in a nut shell is the position of the government of Canada. I found at Washington, as I say, a disposition on the part of the administration there to have the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States carried out to its full effect but I will add that, as my hon. friend has just pointed out, a tremendous amount of pressure is being exercised in congress itself by Chicago interests, or the representatives of the cities along the Mississippi river who have recently become interested in the construction of a ship canal from lake Michigan to the gulf of Mexico. What effect that pressure will have will be evidenced within a few days, as congress will evidently deal with the bill that is before it. Canada is fortunate, bearing in mind the decision of the Supreme Court in this matter, in having the good-will of the United States ministers. It is that this diversion should be discontinued, that it is illegal in every sense of the word. What the future may have in store with respect to the ultimate settlement of this question I am not prepared to say except to affirm that this is the moment at which pressure of the strongest character should be brought to bear upon the United States government for a settlement of this rather vexed question.

With respect to asking for damages for the injury to shipping that has taken place in the past it might be effective as regards the past two or three years, but one cannot say that it would be effective for a greater period than that because the lake levels did not begin to fall until about seven years ago, and owing to climatic conditions they have been falling very rapidly since that time. Undoubtedly we have suffered, and they admit that we have suffered, to the extent of six inches in the lake levels owing to the Chicago diversion and to that extent hon. gentlemen opposite may be correct in their views. But frankly I do not think that that is the strongest argument that we can present. What we want and what we have maintained throughout the whole controversy—not only this government but preceding governments—is that we should have returned to us the water that is being diverted. We are well aware of the fact that despite those protests—not in recent years may I say but in the years prior to 1920—Chicago went merrily along widening its canal, making provision for greater diversion than it enjoyed under the permit issued to it in 1899, I think, of 4,167 feet.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who issued that permit?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The Secretary for War.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of the United States?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes. Canada has never been consulted in connection with this diversion of water, and she never was a party to the diversion.

Mr. McGIBBON: Did Canada make no protest at that time?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not until 1912. That is the first protest, I think, that we have any record of as having been entered by the Canadian government. Of course, it must be remembered that in 1909 we entered into negotiation and consummated a treaty covering the whole waterway system. I think that treaty has been of immense advantage to Canada because on that occasion there was set up what is known as the International Joint Commission. With the single exception of Chicago, as has just been pointed out, through the instrumentality of that commission we have come to an agreement on every question that was in dispute. I think this commission has performed splendid service for Canada along the international waterways. In the first place, as hon. gentlemen will remember, there was the question of the St. Mary's river, and the allocation of the amount of water that could be diverted for irrigation purposes in southern Alberta and in the contiguous state across the international boundary line.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That was not the first one. There was quite a dispute in regard to the levels of the Rainy river and the lake of the Woods before that.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I stand corrected by my right hon. friend. I was going to speak of it later, but I will reverse the order. That was settled very satisfactorily. It had in it possibilities of a great deal of controversy arising out of the allocation of those waters. It involved the bringing into the river of waters that were flowing into another direction on the United States side and it contained possibilities of developing into a serious international dispute. The first question that came under consideration of the board was that of the Rainy river and the lake of the Woods, a controversy which was settled just a couple of years ago. As a matter of fact it is not yet settled in its entirety, because an investigation is still going on with respect to the upper reaches of Rainy lake and Rainy river. But a settlement was arrived at in the case of the lake of the Woods; a treaty was enacted, and that question is beyond the bounds of dispute so far as the two governments are concerned.

As regards the St. Lawrence reaches and some minor disputes of no particular importance in regard to the mouth of the St. John river, and where the international boundary should be placed, these questions have been got out of the way, so that this is the sole remaining active difficulty at the moment, and I for one am hopeful that we can, without resorting to drastic action, effect a settlement of this rather serious dispute.

Mr. GEARY: Is the matter now before the International Joint Commission?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. GEARY: Has any step been taken to bring it before that commission?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Nothing except an informal discussion between Secretary Hoover and myself the other day with respect to this matter.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Would the minister, when he is answering that question, be good enough to tell us what steps really have been taken by this government towards solving or attempting to solve the problem?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not know of other drastic action that might be taken than that of entering suit, as suggested by hon. gentlemen who have spoken, asking for damages for the injury done. No one, of course, is thinking of resorting to arms in connection with a dispute of this kind. I am certain it can be settled.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): I would expect that the government would take some legal action in the matter, or at least call the attention of the government at Washington to the condition of affairs, and the minister might give us some idea of what has been done in that regard.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We have been repeatedly in communication with the Washington government by despatches protesting against this diversion and stating our position with respect to it. The correspondence in that regard has been tabled.

Mr. HEAPS: What are the replies?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The replies are always that action will be taken for the purpose of reducing the diversion at Chicago.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. McGIBBON: I believe, in the diversion of water at Niagara, Canada was given about 16,000 feet per second more than the United States. Did the diversion at Chicago in any way affect that?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It has been argued by some of our United States friends, I believe, not officially, that because Canada had an advantage of 16,000 feet in the allocation by treaty of water at Niagara, that was in compensation for the diversion at Chicago, but I have not been able to discover anything of that kind.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is because the falls are on the Canadian side.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not particularly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The main waters are on the Canadian side.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I meant.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): At the time the treaty arrangement was made there was a diversion of power, attributable to 12,000 cubic feet already allocated to Canada, to the United States. A quantity of 4,000 odd feet would be accounted for by the fact that the bulk of the water was on the Canadian side of the river. In no way by the treaty at Niagara have we compromised the position with respect to the diversion of water at Chicago.

Mr. HEAPS: Have the United States government at any time admitted the correctness of the position that was taken?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In cold-blooded language they have not admitted that the diversion at Chicago was illegal. The position that the United States government will likely take is that when the treaty of 1909 was enacted lake Michigan was only incidentally mentioned, and I know the argument pleaded by the United States lawyers before the Supreme Court of the United States was that the waters of lake Michigan were not boundary waters and therefore the diversion from lake Michigan did not apply to the Boundary Waters' treaty. I may say frankly that is an absurd position to take, but I am pointing out to my hon. friend that is one of the arguments they are using. It is true lake Michigan is not mentioned as boundary waters, but it is also true that the outlet of lake Michigan is into lake Huron and that the flowage from lake Michigan affects boundary waters.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the minister pointed out that the lake of the Woods was in the same position.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Quite irrespective of the treaty of 1909 international law makes it very clear that that is the case. When the treaty was enacted in 1909 between the government of the United States and the government of Great Britain, which means after all the government of Canada, through the British ambassador, there was a permit, not mentioned in the treaty at all, for the diversion of 4,167 feet of water. Therefore, because that was in existence, they argue that they are entitled to at least that much. The government of the United States have never officially to the government of Canada taken that position.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I hope not.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We have no definite admission from the government of the United States as to what interpretation they will put upon the matter other than that obtained from them a few weeks ago which I placed on Hansard on the 24th February, showing what that diversion meant and what a reduction in that diversion bringing it back to the permit of 1899 of 4,167 feet would mean.

Mr. McGIBBON: Would the diversion at Niagara be affected in any way if the exportation of that power to the United States were stopped?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The matter of allocation of power between the two countries will undoubtedly come up at a later date. It seems to me that the only position Canada can take is that there shall be an equal distribution of power all along the international reaches. I hope that the report of the St. Lawrence Joint Engineering Board will be submitted in June—I am informed it will not be later than June—and when it is we shall have a comprehensive finding on the St. Lawrence and its reaches.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): What does the minister mean by an equal distribution of power? Does he mean that at Niagara the distribution should be equal?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am speaking of the whole international stretch.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would involve the same meaning as the hon. member for Lincoln infers. I think it is serious for the minister to say that there should be an equal distribution of power as between the two countries.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not follow my hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the point. At Niagara the greater flow is on the Canadian side; the main flow is there, and all that flows on our side is our water. That flow is much greater than the flow on the United States side, and we should have it, just as if at any point along the boundary the greater flow happened to be on the United States side it should belong to the United States.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): We have a larger amount of power at Niagara than they have on the United States side.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We should not admit a right to equal distribution.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The question in regard to the whole international stretch will come up for consideration, embracing power from one end of the system to the other. It must come up, because the question of export is bound to be considered sooner or later.

Mr. McGIBBON: I understood the minister to say that we were given 36,000 feet at Niagara as against 20,000 on the United States side, by reason of the fact that the greater bulk of the flow was in Canada, and partly, as well, for the reason that power was being exported from Canada to the United States. Is that correct?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: Suppose we should withdraw that exportation of power, what would be the effect on the distribution as between the two countries.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If we were dealing with Niagara alone then undoubtedly, because of the larger volume of flow on our side of the river, we should be entitled to greater consideration. But I was speaking broadly in reference to some agreement covering the whole range of power.

Mr. BRISTOL: Will the minister be good enough to let me read a short quotation apropos of this point. The following is of interest:

The object of legislation would be to put a stop to the further depletion of the falls, and at the same time inflict the least possible injury upon the important interests now dependent upon this water power. The amount to be diverted on the Canadian side (36,000 cubic second feet) has been fixed with a view to allowing to the companies on that side the amounts for which they now have works under construction, which are:

Canadian Niagara Power Company.. ..	9,500 c.s.f.
Ontario Power Company..	12,000 c.s.f.
Electrical Development Company.. ..	11,200 c.s.f.
Niagara Falls Park Railway Company	1,500 c.s.f.
Welland canal or its tenants (in addition to lock service)..	1,800 c.s.f.

One of the effects of such legislation would be to give to Canada the advantage of diverting more than is diverted in the United States. The advantage is more apparent than real, since the power generated on the Canadian side will to a large extent be transmitted to and used in the United States. In the negotiation of a treaty however, the point should be considered.

That was one of the matters that were considered when our share of 36,000 feet was decided upon.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the hon. member quoting from?

Mr. BRISTOL: I have just read from a note of my own made from the report submitted to the United States before the treaty was agreed upon.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What the hon. member has read has not very much bearing on the present allocation of 36-20.

Mr. BRISTOL: It is of interest as showing how the 36,000 feet was arrived at.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): What we are all concerned with is to maintain the position we now take at Niagara, that we are entitled to greater consideration in the distribution of power.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Will the minister repeat the statement he made a few minutes ago with reference to the lowering of the water level in lake Erie?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not remember referring to lake Erie, but the level is lowest on lake Huron. We have suffered most there. Generally speaking, however, the lowering under normal conditions is well on to three feet on lake Huron.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): I thought I heard the minister say that on lake Erie it had been thirty-two and a half inches during the past four years.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There has been a considerable lowering generally, and the situation is serious. Perhaps no one realizes this more than the shipping interests, who are suffering most, because at the moment the power interests are not suffering. They are drawing the usual amount of water, and will continue to do so unless lake Erie should go dry.

Mr. McGIBBON: Converting the diversion of water into horse-power and deducting the amount of power at present exported to the United States, what would be the relative distribution as between Canada and the United States?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I should not care to discuss that phase of the question, and in any case I think that Canada should take the ground that we will not admit any diversion. We are not asking for compensation; we want to get the water back.

Mr. McGIBBON: The minister does not understand me. What proportion of power are we actually getting at Niagara, after deducting the amount which we are now exporting? What share is due to Canada?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Because of the fact that the greater flow is on the Canadian side, I could not answer that question offhand. Indeed, I would not venture to discuss it without going thoroughly into the subject with the engineers.

Mr. MORAND: As a result of that lowering of thirty-two inches to which reference has been made, how much water is added to Chicago?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Six inches.

Mr. MORAND: How is that arrived at?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): At the moment they are diverting 9,700 cubic feet of water. That flowing into lake Huron and through the reaches and waterways would increase the depth on this side by six inches; conversely, when it is diverted, there is a lowering to that extent. That is the engineers' statement, not my own.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Has there been any discussion of some policy of conservation in connection with this depletion of water?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As I have already said, we have refused to listen to any proposals looking to compensation. In my opinion, the first thing for us to do is to get the water back. That is the business of the government. Chicago is more than willing to erect any compensating works, but although I am a layman and not an engineer, I fail to understand how we could benefit thereby. I can appreciate the fact that the spring flowage might be held in check by retaining works, but I do not see how any such works could restore six inches of water on this side, which is so important to us. Six inches of water means a great deal to us: it represents the difference between the facility for getting our larger ships up to Montreal and the necessity for having them call at Quebec.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Up to Toronto even.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That may come later. It is so important that we get the water restored that I do not believe Canada can consider any works by way of compensation for that diversion. I think that is the only position we can take. Chicago is but one municipality, and it must provide itself, as my hon. friend has stated, just as every other municipality has had to provide itself, with adequate works to take care of its sewage, because it is Chicago's main contention that it had to have this water for sanitary and sewage disposal purposes. The canal they want built from Chicago to the gulf of Mexico only entails a flowage of 1,000 cubic feet per second, or one-tenth of what is being taken to-day by the drainage canal. Chicago can have the proposed canal. So Canada is not inflicting any hardship on Chicago by insisting on the restoration of this water. I do not mean to say that reasonable time should not be given Chicago to make other arrangements for handling its sewage, but any unreasonable delay in the restoration of the water should not be countenanced by this government or by any private citizen of Canada. I think that is the position we should take in this very important matter, and that is the position that should be pressed and will be pressed by this government upon the American government. I do not think this is the time to discuss with Chicago or with the United States government compensating works for the diversion of this water.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Rather I would stress the position we have taken, and the position that we intend to maintain: the return of the water within a reasonable period for the benefit of our shipping along the Great Lakes and, incidentally, for the greater production of power.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): A minute ago the minister said that there had been no loss by power companies owing to shortage of water. He must know that that is not absolutely correct.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I beg to differ with my hon. friend. They are drawing all the water they are entitled to at Niagara.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): But there are other water powers besides that at Niagara. For instance, there is one large power company that uses water viz: the Cataract Power Company. When the water is down in the Welland canal, and boats cannot get through, does the minister mean to say that the government does not stop the water going to the Cataract Power Company? In fact the minister must know that the water has been stopped to enable boats to go through the Welland canal.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am not going to dispute that point with my hon. friend. I thought he had reference to the point raised that there had been a reduction of the 36,000 cubic feet per second that we are using at Niagara. There has been no reduction.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The minister said that the power companies had not been affected by any shortage of water. I say that that is not absolutely correct, because I have mentioned a specific case where a power company was very much affected, and rightly so, because navigation first had to be looked after.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is probably correct there. That was not brought to my attention. I was speaking primarily of the power companies on the international reach.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): The Cataract Power Company throw their water over the Niagara escarpment the same as the Niagara companies do.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is, they use the surplus water from the canal?

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Yes; but the water to create the power is thrown over the Niagara escarpment at Decew Falls.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. BRISTOL: The extract I read was from a report of the International Joint Commission at the time the treaty was under consideration.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): In all probability if we are to have cycles of this character we will have lowering of the lake levels. I have discussed the matter with eminent engineers, and they say that perhaps some steps will have to be taken to preserve the levels of the Great Lakes altogether irrespective of the Chicago diversion; that is, assuming this diversion was stopped and the water turned into the Great Lakes, there would still be necessity to take those steps. I think that is apparent from the very low levels at the present moment. If such remedial works were undertaken there would be an equal allocation of the cost between the two countries, and a study of the subject could very well be made. But it is evident to my mind that the municipality of Chicago is seizing upon every possible excuse to delay remedial works of their own to take care of their sewage in order that the diversion may continue, and I am exceedingly anxious first of all to get this out of the way; then we can discuss whatever remedial works may be necessary to preserve the lake levels.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How often do these cycles occur?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have before me a report dating one hundred years back, but looking up the records I find that in 1895 the lake levels were as low then as they were last year. If we are not mistaken about the prospects for this year, the levels will go still lower. Consequently we will have to meet the difficulty.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): How many years did that continue after 1895?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The low point was in 1895: It was undoubtedly one of the dry cycles. I will get that information for my hon. friend. In the opinion of some engineers, possibly the lakes will never go back to their old level, but in 1895 they were down very low. The levels were restored during periods of excessive rainfall. But transportation is becoming so important and we have so much money invested in it, that undoubtedly some measures will have to be taken to tide us over the dry cycles when the lake levels run low and interfere so seriously with navigation.

May I say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that we intend to press for the restoration of the water to the Great Lakes levels? In my opinion that is the paramount duty of the government. Not only are the municipalities along the lake shores of Canada suffering, but the lakefront municipalities in the United States are also suffering, and they also are pressing their claims upon the government of the United States and insisting that it deal summarily with this very serious matter and name a definite date for the full restoration of this water to the Great Lakes system.

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. G. R. GEARY (South Toronto): Mr. Speaker, at the outset of my remarks may I refer the hon. minister to Hansard of February 24? At page 1284, in answering a question respecting the Chicago drainage canal, he intimated that Chicago would be allowed until 1935 to complete such modern sewage disposal works as would enable it to dispense with the reversed flow from lake Michigan down the Chicago drainage canal. In other words, instead of treating its sewage as every modern and progressive city is doing, Chicago is relying still on the old-fashioned flushing system which sweeps the sewage back through the Illinois river down to the Mississippi. These disposal works are made the condition, as I understand it, of the permit to use lake water, and I judge from what the hon. minister said on February 24, that he and the government acquiesce in the proposal that Chicago shall have until 1935 to dispense with the necessity of taking water from lake Michigan.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon. friend will look up the statement preceding the definition, he will find that we secured from the Secretary of State of the United States a statement as to what that permit meant, and at what date they would undertake to have the works under way; but there is no acquiescence by Canada.

Mr. GEARY: All right, so far that is satisfactory. I wanted to know what the position of the government is. If the government have not already acquiesced in that, they surely see the danger and should take some definite step towards preventing the diversion of any water at all. May I point out that if this situation is acquiesced in we are faced with a new proposal, that the states bordering the Mississippi river have joined together in a very strong organization which is likely to overpower the government in Washington, so that even if the Chicago sewage disposal system is completed in 1935, this government may rest assured that that is not the end of the diversion of water from lake Michigan by Chicago. The power question is inconsiderable; they only develop 1,000 horse-power at the end of the Chicago drainage canal, but the question of continuing that drainage canal to make it connect with the deeper water of the Mississippi river is a live subject in these Mississippi states, and if the project is not scotched now it will reach the point where neither the United States nor anyone else can stop it. I call my hon. friend's attention to that position because I want to know what he has done and what he is going to do. We have heard of close contact and of watchful waiting, in different comunications, but it seems to me that so far as the minister is able to give it to the House this afternoon, masterly inactivity is a proper description of the government's position. I think we should take such steps, either through the joint waterways commission or through the British ambassador at Washington or in some definite way, as will put this whole matter up for discussion and settlement immediately. One does not worry only about the present situation; it is bad enough, but the continuance of withdrawal of water from the Great Lakes at Chicago to make a channel down the Mississippi river is fraught with the greatest danger to navigation on the Great Lakes. I hope the minister will be able to tell us what he has done through the British ambassador or otherwise, and what representations have been made with a view to the immediate settlement of this whole question.

Mr. F. G. SANDERSON (South Perth): I do not desire to prolong this debate in any way, Mr. Speaker, but I want to put myself on record this afternoon in a very few words. I want to say that I am not quite in accord with the resolution as worded. I imagine also that there is a little bit more politics in it than there should be, but apart altogether from that I agree with a great deal that has been said by hon. members opposite. I will go this far, and say that I think the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) deserves a great deal of credit for bringing this matter up again. It is a question that concerns not only the people of Ontario but the people of the whole Dominion as well. In Ontario we hear it discussed more and more all the time; it is getting more vital, and people are becoming more insistent in demanding that some solution of this difficulty be found.

Mr. CHAPLIN (Lincoln): Is that why politics come into it?

Mr. SANDERSON: I simply said that the wording of the resolution was a little more political than was necessary. I cannot conceive of the hon. member who asked me that question considering any matter in this House without political bias. As a new member I am prepared to discuss any matters in this House fairly at all times, and I hope in an unbiased way. As I said before, some way must be found to stop this steal of water. We have had various opinions expressed as to the amount of water Chicago is taking, and a difference of opinion also as to the amount the level of the lakes has been lowered. Until this afternoon I had not heard that the Chicago diversion was lowering the lake level only to the extent of six inches. I have heard the figure given as being all the way from one to three feet. I do not know which figure is correct, but altogether apart from that question, and the amount of water being taken, it is conceded by the United States government that Chicago is practically stealing that water. If that be so, why can there not be some solution found which will stop this steal? Why cannot the government of the day in some way at least restore the water? I am not going into the question of compensation; I am only a layman and my mind does not run in that direction, but I want to view this matter in a common sense way, and I must say that I am very glad the minister expressed himself as he did this afternoon. I would have preferred if he had gone further and been more explicit as to what the government intended to do to solve this question, and I hope that as the session goes on the minister will take this House into his confidence further. This is an international question now; it vitally affects the Dominion of Canada, and I hope that some solution will be found whereby the water taken from the Great Lakes may be restored. If it is possible to make the city of Chicago pay, damages should be collected. They have done wrong; their courts have practically said that they are in the wrong. I will not take up the time of the House longer, other than to say that as a new member from Ontario, I am vitally interested in the settlement of this question by this government as speedily as possible.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this question has been before parliament during each of the last four sessions, and possibly previously, but as far as I can observe we are not one whit farther towards obtaining—or indeed towards the assertion of—our rights than we were when the question was first mooted. Though I have heard every discussion to date I have never yet discovered in any of them an attempt to make this great issue a subject of party controversy in Canada. If the hon. member for South Perth (Mr. Sanderson) can so define the present discussion, I congratulate him upon the fact that his perspicacity is at least that much greater than mine. We want in this House, in a question concerning our relations with foreign nations, to strengthen so far as possible the hand of the government of the day, whatever the government may be. I know that if I were a member of the government, the stronger Canada's case was put, the more frequently it was presented, the more determinedly it was emphasized and insisted upon in the House of Commons of this country, the better I would be pleased. By that means the government is in a position to represent the feelings of this country to the authorities of the United States. I do not know that the people of the United States or the government of the United States are interested very much in the rights of Canada; we are supposed to look after those rights ourselves, but I do know that they are interested in the goodwill of Canada and in the goodwill of the Canadian people, The goodwill of the Canadian people is an asset to the United States of America, and an asset which they as a shrewd nation will not very readily impair or lose. Consequently, it is of importance that the people of Canada get to know just what is and has been going on, that the whole people get to understand it, and, getting to understand it, that they express themselves freely and strongly in order that the United States may apprehend just what they have to lose by persistence in their present conduct. We have to do only with the government of the United States; we have not to do with the city of Chicago. It is well to begin with, therefore, to understand what is the position.

We have nothing that can be called a legal right in the sense that we have a right enforceable in a court. The only reason we cannot call it a legal right is that two nations are concerned instead of one. Over a score of years we have lost an asset of the Canadian people, an asset of comparatively little value twenty or thirty or forty years ago, but of a value increasing in geometrical proportion every year since, an asset which now is one of the most prized of our possessions. That has been taken from us year by year by the city of Chicago, a city of the United States of America. That asset is the water of the Great Lakes system, taken from us, first in substantial but relatively small quantity, and now taken from us to the extent of 9,700 cubic feet per second; I use that figure because it is the figure authorized by the United States Supreme Court in a judgment addressed to the city of Chicago. I cannot help but bow in admiration before the consummate assertion of self-right by a court of the United States calmly to grant to one of the cities of the United States, without in any way speaking to its neighbour, Canada, the right to take our property.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): On the authority of a department of the government of the United States.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But they have done so to the extent of 9,700 cubic feet per second. Nor have we any very firm ground for asserting that the Chicago drainage district is confining its depredations to the limitations fixed by the Supreme Court of the United States. I do not know myself whether it is or not, but if my life depended upon a guess, I would put the extent of the diversion away above the 9,700 cubic feet. That that quantity is taken goes, of course, without saying, but the extent of it is very hard to fix definitely. The United States agree that it reduces the level of our lakes by six inches. Even if that is to be accepted, it undoubtedly means the loss of millions per year to this country. We know, however, that our lakes have fallen to the extent of 32, if not 36, inches, and very few of the Canadan people can ever be brought to believe that that fall of 32 to 36 inches is attributable only to the extent of one-sixth to a diversion of approximately 10,000 cubic feet per second.

Now were this a matter of merely legal right between one party and another in the same country, it could very quickly be settled.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I just interject, lest my hon. friend be under a misapprehension, that I was quoting the figures of our own engineers as to the six-inch reduction in depth?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister stated that the United States admitted that amount.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, but I juet wanted now to point out that it was not the figure of the American engineers, but of our own Canadian engineers, that the diversion of 10,000 cubic feet per second would lower the Great Lakes level by six inches.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would lower it six inches in how long a time? Certainly if it is continued year after year it will lower it more than if continued for only a month. I do not know just what the minister means. What I stated was his own words.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I make myself clear to my right hon. friend? If you returned the diversion of 9,700 cubic feet per second—say 10,000 in round figures—into the Great Lakes system it would raise the depth of the water from lake Huron eastward all through the system by six inches.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In what length of time?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The moment you turn it in and the water goes down through the system.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): Returning the water over how long a period? For a year?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As fast as that volume of water reached the St. Lawrence, it would raise the level and would continue to keep it raised so long as that water flowed in. If you take the water out, the level drops by six inches.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid the minister has not apprehended fully the advice given him. Undoubtedly the factor of time has to be taken into account just as much as the quantity of water. To say that the same thing would result in a week as would be the ultimate result seems to me to be nonsense. Undoubtedly the increase in the level would be greater if the flow was continued for a year than if continued for only a week, and a time would arrive at which the total effect would be reached and no more could be looked for. But the factor of time must be taken into account. Very well. Whatever it may be, there is a loss, and certainly a loss of that amount in the level must be taken as accepted.

I was saying that were this a matter between one party and another in the same country, the courts could settle it in the course of a week. There would be no law in dispute; there would be a principle of justice in dispute. Upon these elementary principles everybody has been agreed in every civilized nation for generations. If there is one principle more firmly established than another as relating to water it is that it must not be diverted from its natural channel to the injury of another, that when a water basin is established by nature the currents of water within that basin must run on unimpeded, and it would not matter whether lake Michigan were wholly in the United States or not, or whether the streams flowing into it were wholly within the United States or not, the ordinary common law and the principle of common sense would apply that you could not interfere with any water that affected the level of waters in which the two parties were interested. For example, if it is held that because lake Michigan is within the borders of the United States, though a part of the Great Lakes system, Chicago has the right to lower the level of the lake Michigan, or that because the river Michigan is wholly within the state of Michigan it has a right to divert waters in that state, the same would apply on the Canadian side, and we could divert the waters that flow into the St. Lawrence, greater than any that flow into it from the United States, and thereby dry up very largely the whole Great Lakes system. In a word, if both countries acted on that principle the whole Great Lakes system could be brought to an end in a very short time. It follows, unless the principle of force instead of the principle of right is to apply, that we must adopt the principle of the common law. We must come as two nations to the same position that two litigants must come to and acknowledge that water turned by nature into a certain channel must remain there and must not permanently be diverted therefrom. That there is, under the Ashburton treaty, a right to the use of these common waters for sanitation purposes, common to both parties to the contract, is of course admitted; but the use of the waters is one thing, the diversion of the waters is another. The use of the waters is quite consistent with their return to the original channel and no party is affected, but such is not the step taken by Chicago. Chicago takes the waters, turns them from the Great Lakes system altogether, turns them down into the Mississippi, and uses them as a source for developing a great American asset a series of powers along the Mississippi channel at our expense. Now, I stated and I repeat, that were there any common court before which we could come where these principles are acknowledged as they are the world over the matter could very quickly be settled. I add to that this: Were Canada a nation of fifty millions of people, and the United States a nation of the same population we would not be pleading at the door of the republic to-day. This matter is so plain that it would not have to await solution so long.

I said this was a matter between Canada and the United States. Canada has been protesting, I think pretty consistently protesting, against the diversion. Canada has been meeting all the excuses, all the defences, put up by the United States government, and, I think meeting those excuses and defences fairly successfully too. But we have got nowhere. One of the defences, as outlined by the Minister of the Interior, is this, that the Chicago drainage district had a license from the United States government in 1899, after the Ashburton treaty was executed, and while that license existed and was in effect we signed a treaty and did not specifically outlaw that license. So far as I have ever heard this is the best defence ever put up by the United States. What does it amount to?

It does not disturb the principle of common justice and common sense that I sought to explain before. It may be they were doing this against their right, it may be we did not take the pains to force them to contract themselves out of it. That may be but surely, it would appeal to the simple mind of any person that unless we contracted ourselves out of our right, we still have that right. We did not contract ourselves out of our right, consequently it does not lie in the mouth of the United States to say to us "Though we were taking this water that we had no right to in 1899, the fact that you made a treaty and did not bring us to terms makes that diversion permanent." It does not lie in their mouths to say that at all. They would have to establish that in that treaty we extended to them a privilege beyond the bounds of the common law and the comity of nations. There is nothing at all in that contention.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I make that statement of mine a little clearer, because I do not want my right hon. friend to be under a misapprehension. That argument was made by the legal representatives of Chicago in the Supreme court. It has not been asserted by anyone representing the American government. That is the point I wanted to make.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am glad to hear it has not been addressed to Canada and I hope it never will be. I do not know what argument the United States could advance in defence of their conduct at all. I am quite aware that in the United States there is considerable opposition to this diversion. I believe the western states are as a whole opposed, and as far as I know the state of New York is, generally speaking, opposed. The Mississippi states favour it. I do not believe in a policy which seeks, so far as Canada is concerned, to add to the strength of the opposition in localities of the United States. That is for the United States to look after. We look to the United States to stand up and do justice to this country. And I do not believe either in waiting in the anterooms of the Supreme Court of the United States—waiting there to see what the United States courts are going to decide about a matter in respect of which they have no jurisdiction, a matter in respect of which at least our jurisdiction is co-equal with their own.

The hon. member who brings in the resolution says we ought to go to Great Britain. The treaty is made, he says, between Great Britain and the United States. We ought to go to Great Britain and call upon her to enforce this treaty, of course for the benefit of our country. Well, that is a subject upon which one wants the fullest information before venturing upon very deep discussion. Let me say this: I have not up to now seen evidence adduced on this subject to show me that we have yet reached the stage where we can justly call upon Great Britain to take any steps in this matter. It seems to me we must exhaust every remedy first before we can go there. I do not think we are in any strong position to go to Great Britain and ask her to interfere in these relations at the present time. Great Britain as such has nothing herself to gain. We have very much to gain. We have very much at stake. I do not think that we have done very much of late to put us in a position to ask her to step in at this stage and help us out of this difficulty. It seems to me before we get to that point we ought to exhaust this remedy at least: We ought to see to it that the tribunal already established has the case before it. That tribunal of course is the International Joint Commission. I cannot see how the United States could even refer this question to the International Joint Commission, but at least they could be put in the position where they would have to refuse. I do not know what they could put behind their contention to warrant its reference there. Still I do not see how, without exhausting the powers given us before that tribunal we could go to the foot of the throne and ask for the intervention of Great Britain. Such is the situation as it presents itself to me.

Let me say that protests go a certain distance. Keeping in close contact is of course worth while. Watchful waiting sometimes has to be suffered. But all these things do not get us very far—at least they have brought us but a very short distance up to the present time. All that has happened so far is this: We have had to dig down in our pockets at the expense and the sweat of the Canadian people and atone and make up for what the United States has, wholly illegally and without shadow of right, taken from us. There is where we are now. What should be done is this: We should get into a position where the United States would be at our door rather than us at theirs, and we should at, as early a date as possible get this matter before the only tribunal which has any jurisdiction or any appropriateness as an arbitral tribunal in the premises. I do not feel myself quite patient enough to wait for the expiration of that long period mentioned in the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, when possibly Chicago will find herself pleased to establish a modern system of sanitation and to return to us at least some of the water to which she never had any right. I agree wholly with the hon. member for South Toronto (Mr. Geary) that if we sit down quietly and abide by that judgment as though it were given by a tribunal that had authority over us, we have just as much hope as we had ten years ago of being in a better position ten years hence than we are to-day, and just as much hope of having this matter entirely righted. We cannot be satisfied to await that event. Whatever can be done should be done now. I have indicated the lines upon which I think we ought to proceed, and I can assure the House that the government will have every endorsation and assistance that can come from this side in the prosecution of a solution of the question along those lines.

Mr. ROSS (Kingston): Mr. Speaker—

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 25, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

Mr. GEORGES PARENT (Quebec West) moved:

That in accordance with the recommendations contained in the first report of the select standing committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, the time for receiving petitions for private bills be renewed until Wednesday April 14 next, and that that portion of rule 89 which limits the time for filing private bills be suspended for the present session.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when this motion was before the House yesterday I asked that it might stand until I had had time to ascertain exactly what it involved. The Internal Economy Commission has reported on the question, and I purpose to place its report on Hansard so that the House with this report before it may share responsibility with the Private Bills committee if this motion is agreed to. This is the commission's report:

The Commission of Internal Economy of the House of Commons held a meeting this morning and took up the question of remitting fines to such applicants for private bills as did not present their petitions within the delays fixed by the rules.

The Private Bills committee report, read in the House yesterday, recommended that the time for receiving petitions which expired on February 18 last be extended until Wednesday, April 14, next, and that rule 89 be suspended in relation thereto. A motion for concurrence in this report is to be made this afternoon. The Clerk of the House has pointed out that under this rule a fine of $200 is levied on all bills introduced after the twelfth week of the session. There are at the present time a large number of divorce bills and several incorporation bills for which the delays have expired. As we have 175 divorce bills so far, most of which have come too late, and several companies' solicitors have informed us that they intend to apply for legislation, I may safely say, after consultation with the officers of the House, that the aggregate amount of fees and fines thus remitted would be approximately $20,000.

In the case of companies, the promoters avoid paying a large fee by introducing their bills in the Senate, where they are only called upon to pay $300 whether they are late or not. When the bill comes before the Commons a net fine of $200 is charged because a petition has not been duly filed. In this way the country makes $500 on that particular bill.

The Commission of Internal Economy went into the matter very thoroughly, and heard Mr. Walter Todd, Chief of the Private Bills branch, who represented that such a report as the one presented yesterday by the chairman of the committee had not been made to the House for the past fifteen years. It has been the custom to consider each case on its own merits.

Moreover, it is no fault of parliament if the applicants for private legislation are late in presenting their petitions. Sufficient notice of the opening of the session was given to the general public; shortly after the general election it was officially announced that parliament would be called for December 10—the proclamation calling the session for January 7 was published in the Canada Gazette on December 1.

There does not seem to be any valuable reason why petitioners should not have been ready in time. It is certainly not the fault of the House of Commons if they are late, and the commissioners were of the opinion that parliament should not be penalized under the circumstances.

I direct what follows to the particular attention of my hon. friend (Mr. Parent):

The principle that whoever is responsible for the delays should pay the costs was accepted as the best solution in the matter.

Heretofore parliament has considered each case on its merits, and I submit to my hon. friend that he might very well point out to the Private Bills committee the practice which is usually followed in such cases. It seems to me that the Private Bills committee, fairly representative of both sides of the House, has not carefully considered how this wholesale proposal will affect the public revenues.

Mr. PARENT: Mr. Speaker, I fail to see that the Commission of Internal Economy has anything to do with the purpose of this motion. If the commission has any representations to make it should appear before the Private Bills committee so that the committee may give them proper consideration. In view of the committee having unanimously made a certain recommendation, I resent the action of the commission in objecting to its adoption. However, if the House considers that the Private Bills committee should take notice of these representations I suppose I may have to ask that the motion be referred back to the committee, but contend that the motion should carry.

Mr. W. A. BOYS (North Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, although I am a member of the Private Bills committee I was not present at the meeting which made the recommendation incorporated in the motion. But it seems to me that we are here to do the people's business, and for my part I cannot see why applications for bills should not be received at a later date so long as the bills can be put through this House while we are in session. We should accommodate the people as far as possible. Speaking for myself, I heartily support the report of the committee.

Mr. ROBB: After that statement by the chief whip of the opposition, I will not further object to the resolution. I wish to put upon the House responsibility for its adoption.

Mr. BOYS: I spoke absolutely for myself, not as the chief whip of the official opposition at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask who is speaking for the other side?

Mr. PARENT: My motion is before the House, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Four.

2. These demonstration plots were conducted at Mile 137, Mile 185, Hudson Bay Junction, and Port Nelson.

Results: The results at Mile 185 were most encouraging due no doubt largely to the extremely favourable season. Wheat, oats, and barley of the earlier varieties matured good crops of good quality. Peas of the most approved varieties successfully ripened satisfactory crops. Potatoes yielded a fair crop and the various grasses, including western rye, brome, sweet clover and red clover, all made excellent catches and promised well for the winter. At Mile 137 the yields of wheat, oats and barley were even heavier and the quality even superior. Other crops, as at Mile 185, were very successful, and the grasses and clovers went into winter quarters with good promise. At Hudson Bay Junction unfortunately the crop went in late and with the heavy June rains the small area of plots was so thoroughly flooded that no reliable results were obtainable. At Port Nelson, here again the seed through delay en route arrived so late that the crops were seeded too late to mature.

Costs: The cost of each of these small demonstration areas was very small. The plots were carefully seeded in rows one rod in length. The total area of each of these demonstration areas would not exceed one-quarter of an acre. The cost of seed, postage and other expenses excepting the supervision of these plots did not exceed $10 each.

3. Yes.

4. It is intended to carry on these demonstration areas at Port Nelson, Mile 185, Mile 137, Mile 81, Mile 42, The Pas, and Hudson Bay Junction. It is also intended to carry duplicate plots at two or three of these to cover the different types of soil, and all the small plots will be conducted in duplicate. Larger grass plots at The Pas will also be undertaken.

These will be in operation during the present season.

TENDERS FOR MARINE LEAD

Hon. Mr. STEVENS:

1. Has the Department of Marine and Fisheries recently called for tenders for supplying of white lead or red lead for marine use?

2. Did the department specify that such "lead" should be of "English" manufacture?

3. Is it the contention of the department that no lead manufactured in Canada is suitable for the purpose?

4. Is the government aware that there are at least three Canadian concerns manufacturing white and red lead of excellent quality suitable for marine use?

5. For what reason were Canadian manufacturers refused the opportunity of tendering?

Hon. Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes.

2. The department has not specified, nor has it authorized any one on its behalf to specify that such lead should be of English manufacture.

3. It is not the contention of the department that no lead manufactured in Canada is suitable for its purposes. The general policy of the department is to purchase such lead as it requires from Canadian manufacturers.

4. Yes.

5. Canadian manufacturers have not only not been refused the opportunity of tendering; they have actually sold both white and red lead to the department.

BOVINE TUBERCULOSIS TESTS

Mr. DONNELLY:

1. In what provinces have restricted areas for bovine tuberculosis been organized and the testing done, and what have been the results as to reactors in the several areas; (a) in first tests; (b) in second or subsequent tests?

2. Is the accredited herd system of bovine tuberculosis eradication or control considered to be as satisfactory as the restricted area system?

3. How many herds have been accepted for control under the accredited herd system?

4. What are considered to be the principal advantages of this system?

	Cattle Tested	Reactors 1st Test	Reactors 2nd and Subsequent Tests
P.E.I.	95,254	561	3

FATHER LECOUTURE

Mr. HOCKEN:

1. Did the Indian department give Father Lecouture $11,000 of the local Indian fund belonging to the Caughnawaga band to be spent in repairing his church?

2. Was the consent of the band given to that transaction?

3. Is a wharf now being built on the Indian reserve lands at Caughnawaga, Quebec?

2. No.

3. and 4. Yes; a temporary wharf erected in 1925 by an Indian of the band, with the approval of the council of the band, is being reconstructed in a permanent manner by the Department of Public Works.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to move the motion standing on the order paper in my name with respect to the Easter adjournment. With the consent of the House I would ask that the motion be amended to read that when this House adjourns on Wednesday, 31st instant, it stand adjourned until Tuesday, April 6 next. Hon. members will recall that on presenting the motion in its original form I stated that unless the adjournment on March 26 met with practical unanimity I would not press it, but would request the adjournment customary at Easter. I trust the House will agree to the amended motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the unanimous wish of the House that the motion as amended be carried?

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF RIGHT HON. GEORGE P. GRAHAM AS CHAIRMAN

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I heard a report, rather more persistent to-day than usual, that the tariff commission so long promised has at last been appointed. That is more or less surprising but what is more surprising still is the personnel. May I ask whether the government can announce anything at the moment in respect of this subject?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am sure that both the House and the country will be gratified to learn that the government, after very considerable persuasion, has succeeded in obtaining the consent of the Right Hon. George P. Graham to become chairman of the proposed tariff board. Mr. Graham was anxious to have a brief space of well earned rest, but acting from a sense of public duty he has listened to the very strong representations of members of the administration and has agreed to the postponement, for a time at least, of the opportunity of recreation for which he was preparing, and to accept immediately the position of chairman of the board. I feel I am only expressing what hon. members of the House will generally concede, that with the wealth of experience which Mr. Graham will bring to the conduct of the affairs of the board he will succeed in having it organized and functioning sucessfully at an early date. I believe I voice a general sentiment when I express the hope that he will see his way clear to occupy the chairmanship of the board for a long time to come.

The government's intention is not to have a large board, but one limited in numbers, giving to the board, however, power to engage, from time to time, experts to assist it in its work. Naturally, in connection with a subject so technical as the tariff, the board will desire to have the fullest information from the best available sources, and accurate interpretation; and the government has thought that a board comparatively limited in numbers enjoying the power in association with itself to secure from different parts of the country and from various sources expert advice and opinion, would be better than a large board formed in an attempt to represent all phases and possible interests. A small body, thus empowered can, it is believed, more effectively deal with the questions that will come before it than a larger and more cumbersome permanent organization. The membership of the board has accordingly been limited to three. The Right Hon. Mr. Graham will, as I have said, be chairman and the other two members will be Mr. Joseph Daoust, ex-President of the Chamber of Commerce of Montreal, and Mr. Donald Gordon McKenzie, from Brandon, Manitoba, a well known farmer of the west. I may observe that, associated with these gentlemen, there will be a number of the members of the permanent service, chosen from various departments of the government. The Departments of Finance, Customs, Trade and Commerce, Agriculture, Labour and External Affairs and the Statistical branch will doubtless make their contributions as required. These departments all possess able public servants who have special knowledge that will be of great utility to the board in the discharge of its duties. These public servants will co-operate with the board in its work. There will also be a permanent secretary to the board. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) informs me that the gentleman whose name I was just about to mention has not yet formally signified his acceptance of the position. However, I hope on Monday next to lay on the table of the House a copy of the order in council setting forth in full the personnel and powers of the board.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What has become of the promised woman member?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No doubt she will be among the experts immediately to be selected to assist the board.

DUTY ON AUTOMOBILES

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): I would direct the attention of the government to a report that appeared in the journals of this city recently to the effect that the government has decided not to reduce the tariff on automobiles this session, but to refer the matter to the tariff board. I trust the government will be able to assure the House that there is no foundation whatever for that report.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend, who has been a member of parliament for some time, knows that statements regarding the tariff are made only when the Minister of Finance presents his budget from his place in the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Except occasionally.

PRIVILEGE—MR. WOODSWORTH

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): On a question of privilege I should like to make a statement with regard to a charge which was made the other day by the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) concerning myself. I quote the following from Hansard of March 23 at page 1812:

I rise to a question of privilege. Last night, at the conclusion of the speech of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), I rose to call the attention of the House to a certain statement that had been made with reference to myself earlier in the day by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), in which he misquoted a speech which I had delivered in Toronto. The hon. member referred to certain remarks of mine as rightly quoted by the hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Cannon) at page 67 of Hansard of the present session, and further put into my mouth these words:

Had we had autonomy we should not have entered the war.

The suggestion is there that I misquoted his speech, and that I put words into the mouth of the hon. member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church). In looking over my speech of that day, I notice that this is what I said:

I refer the House to page 67 of Hansard, where the member for Toronto Northwest (Mr. Church) in a speech criticising his leader's new war policy is reported to have said: "Had we had this autonomy in 1914 Canada would not have been represented in the Great war. There would have been no 60,000 soldiers in France from Toronto."

Now I turn to the passage quoted from page 67 of Hansard, and I read:

All autonomy did for the Liberal party was to send it to the political graveyard. Had we had this autonomy in 1914 Canada would not have been represented in the Great war. There would have been no 60,000 soldiers in France from Toronto.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the members themselves by looking up Hansard can decide that I did not misquote Hansard, nor did I put words in the mouth of the hon. member.

ADVANCES TO SETTLERS ON CROWN LANDS

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize advances to settlers on crown lands, and to provide,—

1.That for purposes connected with settlement, the minister may make loans to settlers on the basis of improvement of land and farm buildings erected—(a) to a settler who is a Canadian citizen as that term is defined in the Immigration Act, an amount not exceeding $1,000, (b) to a settler other than a Canadian citizen an amount not exceeding $500.

2. That settlement loans under the proposed legislation shall not exceed the sum of $5,000,000 in any fiscal year, and shall be paid out of unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund.

3. That Settlement Loan committees may be established anywhere in Canada to report upon and recommend to the minister the suitability of a settler, and of any parcel of crown land, and to advise the minister as to the amount of loan to be made and how it should be expended, and such committee shall consist of not less than two nor more than three persons in the employ of the Dominion government or of any provincial government, such persons to be nominated by the minister, one of whom shall be the Dominion lands agent or the provincial crown lands agent, as the case may be, for the district in which the settler is located, and no salary or remuneration additional to that which he otherwise receives shall be paid to members of such committee.

4. That no settlement loan shall be made unless recommended by a Settlement Loan committee, and unless approved by the minister, nor until the applicant has been recommended by a committee as a suitable settler and the land as suitable for settlement for agricultural purposes, and all settlement loans shall be expended under the direction of the minister.

5. That no settlement loan shall be made upon the security of improvements upon any provincial crown land, unless the province by appropriate legislation, has provided that the improvements upon the security of which any such loan is made shall be subject to a first charge for the amount of such loan with interest, and that no patent shall be issued for the said land until such loan with interest is repaid in full.

6. That the payment of principal shall be made in annual instalments extending over a period of not more than ten years from the date the settlement loan is made, the first payment to become due and payable two years from the date of the settlement loan, provided that the settler may at any time repay the whole of the settlement loan with interest to date of payment, and all loans shall bear interest at the rate of five per cent per annum, payable on the respective dates upon which instalments of principal fall due.

7. That when a settlement loan has been made upon the security of improvements upon Dominion crown lands, the patent shall not issue until the loan and all interest charges thereon have been paid in full.

8. That if a provincial government, not having suitable crown lands available, acquires by purchase suitable lands for settlement under the provisions of this legislation, the minister may pay to a provincial government a sum not exceeding one-half of the interest on the purchase price of such lands, reckoned at five per centum per annum, for a period not exceeding two years from the date of settlement.

9. That the Governor in Council may, on the recommendation of the minister, make regulations to carry out these provisions, and the minister shall make an annual report to parliament of all operations under the proposed legislation.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? Carried.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Speaker, I did not rise because I was expecting the minister to make some statement about this departure of policy.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The bill is a new departure in the encouragement of immigration. In the old days, when we had a large influx of settlers to the lands of western Canada, there were lying adjacent to all the railway lines lands that were known as homestead lands, and these were available to every individual who could qualify under the regulations. There is still a large quantity of land, though not of first-class quality, lying not so much in the southern portion of the prairie provinces, nor indeed in the southern portion of Ontario, but throughout all the provinces of Canada with the exception of the Maritime provinces there is a considerable area of crown lands, provincial crown lands and Dominion crown lands, lying within a radius of fifteen miles of existing railway lines. These lands, of course, are not as desirable as the lands taken up in former days by applicants who were desirous of settling upon them and developing farms in the various provinces, but particularly in the western provinces. For various reasons these crown lands are still available, and one of the problems that the Immigration department have to face is the fact that if open lands, and there are still open lands available in western Canada, are to be procured by the newcomers or by those who under the regulations can homestead our crown lands, they would have to go a very considerable distance back from the present railway facilities, which would involve on the part of the provinces the construction of roads and of schools, and so far as the federal government is concerned, it invariably involves the building of new railway lines. I think most members of the House will agree with me that what we ought to try to do is to consolidate our settlement along the existing lines of railway which have been built and are now in operation, and which have already been financed. In all the three prairie provinces these lands are very largely covered, if not with timber, with a very heavy growth of underbrush, and are somewhat difficult to bring under cultivation without entailing a considerable amount of labour. That was the thought in my mind when I recommended to the government the adoption of this policy for the settlement of crown lands. In most of those settlements to-day, while perhaps there are not schoolhouses, there are to some extent facilities by way of roads, because the idea is not to locate the settler beyond a point from which he can travel to his nearest railway centre, nor to involve expenditure by the provincial governments or by the federal government for improvements necessary to open up entirely new areas. That is the object that was in my mind when I recommended to the government this policy of assistance to the settler going on these new lands.

Perhaps the House will be surprised to know that we have in Manitoba almost three million acres of land still available for settlement coming within the category I have mentioned. In Saskatchewan well over one million acres, and in Alberta well over six million acres; so there is a very considerable amount of crown lands available for settlement lying contiguous to the railway lines already in existence and in operation. Now, these are not all first class lands, no one would make that claim. In the case of a considerable proportion they are, perhaps lands not desirable for settlement. But in the case of the three prairie provinces, there is a very large area of lands very suitable for agriculture lying within the fifteen mile limit. In the old days of homesteading in the west, when millions of dollars were being poured into the country by the various railway companies for the construction of new lines of railway, there was a certain popular form of obtaining sufficient money to carry the settler along. I think I am safe in making the statement that in 95 per cent of the cases the homesteaders who went upon the land were men without means, men who undertook to live upon those lands for six months in the year doing what they could and spending the remaining six months in earning what was called in those days a grubstake to carry them over the next period. As I say, employment was easy to be had. Vast sums of money were being expended throughout the west at that time particularly in railway building and also in the construction of buildings and the opening up of new towns. Therefore no difficulty was experienced at that time in obtaining employment. To-day the man who goes upon a homestead may find temporary employment in assisting with the harvesting operations in the older settled areas, or in working for a farmer who is already established. But that class of employment can only be obtained in the summer season when the settler can be most advantageously employed in improving his own holding. In endeavouring to find a solution for this problem we thought we could hold out hope of assistance to the individual who would settle upon the land; that as he improved his holding, as he progressed in the construction of his buildings, in the erection of his little home —it might be of log construction and very likely it will; many of us who went out on the prairies first were content with sod construction because we were unable to buy lumber for the building of our home—the new settler would be able by making application to the board to secure an allowance to be applied to the cost, materials and construction. This will enable him to provide for the necessities of life and if he is fortunately situated, he can devote some portion of the advance to the purchase of machinery. As he improves his land and buildings further advances will be made to him up to a maximum of $1,000. The idea is to prevent people who desire to own land from locating in the extreme areas of settlement instead of near the railway, and to give them the assistance they will need in the pioneer years when they are endeavouring to establish homes for themselves. It will be a tremendous advantage to the settlers themselves to have this consolidation of settlement along the railway line.

The committee will notice that some difference is being made between Canadians and people who come from countries outside of Canada. For some considerable time past there has been an agitation to bring people from the urban centres of the Dominion back to the land. It is an undeniable fact that a great many desirable agriculturists have left our farm lands and migrated into towns and cities. The best evidence of that is to be found in the statistical information in our possession, which shows that to-day, perhaps, more than 50 per cent of our people are residing in urban centres, notwithstanding the fact that Canada is an agricultural country. I am not so well informed as to the conditions in eastern Canada, but I do know that in the west a great many of our people who are now residing in the cities would be glad of an opportunity to go back to the land and try to establish themselves again in agricultural pursuits rather than remain as wage-earners in the city.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Does not this apply principally to the prairie provinces?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Principally but not altogether. I will explain later how it applies to the older provinces. There are many cases of young men, sons of farmers, who are desirous of going out and establishing homes for themselves. A loan to them at 5 per cent will assist them very materially in obtaining a grant of land by way of homesteading, improving that land and making homes for themselves. So, the Canadian government proposes to make a loan to a maximum of $1,000 to citizens of the character I have described.

To those who come to Canada as immigrants the proposal is to lend them $500, not the full $1,000 to assist them in establishing themselves upon the land.

Mr. BENNETT: How long after they arrive in Canada?

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Of necessity they would have to establish themselves before they could make application for the loan. If they did that during the first year they could make the application then; but the act provides that they must be upon a homestead within fifteen miles of an existing railway, and there must be evidence on their part that they have made improvements. It was felt that some difference should be made between those who come to us as immigrants and our own people. For that reason we do not propose to make as great a loan to the former class as to our own citizens. I think it can be said that in the case of these immigrants the conditions they have left are not as favourable as those they will encounter in Canada, and therefore they will be able to get along with a lesser amount than our own citizens. I am able to speak from personal knowledge of the adaptability of many of those who come from outside countries. I know that in my own province of Alberta one of the most prosperous settlements to-day is the Ukrainian settlement established around the town of Vegreville. Those people when they first came in brought everything they owned in a sack; and I am sure the members for Edmonton and the surrounding districts will bear me out when I say that there are in the Dominion no finer farms and none with more up-to-date equipment than in that particular district after eighteen or twenty years of settlement by the Ukrainians. And that has been done by our Scandinavian settlers and many people who have come from countries foreign to Canada and taken up their residence among them. We felt that some difference should be made, that we owed something to our own people in this respect, and that we should endeavour to be a little more generous to our own people than we would to those of foreign extraction who were coming to our country to establish themselves. In the case of the Britisher who comes here, of course our hope is that we will be able to interest the Overseas Settlement Board, and that they will make a loan to the British settler identical with that obtained by the Canadian. We are in joint operation with the British government on a good many schemes, more particularly that of the migration of 3,000 families to whom we are supplying land; the British government putting up in cash $1,500 for the establishment of those people upon our land, and that is working out very satisfactorily. We hope this year that we shall establish 1,200 British families in that way upon the soldier settlement land that we now are holding for this purpose.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Am I correct in supposing that you will not advance a loan until you are thoroughly satisfied that the settler has an equity in the property to amply cover your guarantee or loan?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes, that is why the provision is put in the bill, the idea being that, as these are crown lands, our advances will be first mortgages upon them, and that the improvements will be sufficient to warrant the advance, so that if there is an abandonment we will have sufficient improvements upon the land for the next applicant to repay us the advance made for the improvements thereon.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If the government must be satisfied—and of course the minister says quite properly that they must be—that that settler has an equity in the land to amply guarantee the loan advanced, why could not the settler get that loan from the loan companies or banks or other sources on the same equity? That is your guarantee. Why could he not get it from others?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There are two very valid reasons why it would be difficult for him to get it. One is that the land is the property of the crown, and no loan could be negotiated until the settler had title to the land, and he will not receive title for three years. The second is that he could not borrow money on the property at 5 per cent, which in my view, is the most valuable consideration in his favour. But if he were able to borrow, even if he had the title, he would pay 8 per cent for the loan.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: In reference to this scheme for the settlement of 3,000 families, does the government provide any cash for the settlers?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No, we provide the land.

Mr. HANNESSON: If the loan is to be a first charge upon the land in question, and the patent not to issue till the loan is paid, how does the minister propose that the municipality in which these lands are situated shall raise the money to provide for schools, roads and drainage? You are going to increase the charges on the land for which the man will get his patent, and the municipalities will have to do the necessary financing to provide for the schools, the roads and the draining.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There should be no difficulty.

Mr. HANNESSON: If the settler has a loan from the crown, the taxes are not a first charge. By this measure you are putting on a prior charge.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am quite sure you would not expect the crown to have priority on the issue of these loans. So far as taxation is concerned, I would have no objection to the taxes being made collectable, and the crown would have to suffer in a like degree with the mortgage companies, if they allow the loans to lapse and get into arrears. My hon. friend has in mind the provisions of the Soldier Settlement Act. That act will not apply in this case.

Mr. HANNESSON: One of the difficulties in the west, as my hon. friend knows, is with the municipalities which have a large quantity of unpatented land. They cannot sell those lands for arrears of taxes. They cannot borrow on the strength of their lien for taxes on the land, because if the patent does not issue they will never be able to collect at all. You are going to increase the handicap of the municipalities in the west by this provision. They have now great difficulty in collecting taxes.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): You are referring to the situation which exists in connection with the soldier settlement lands, because they have reverted to the crown. These lands are not taxable now. No one has gone on them at the present moment, and what my hon. friend is fearful of is that, because the crown is taking a mortgage, there will be no issue of patent, and therefore there would be some doubt as to the ability to collect the school and the municipal tax.

Mr. HANNESSON: As soon as the settler goes on the land he is subject to taxation. His interest in that land is subject to taxation, but there is difficulty in the collection of the tax. The moment the settler goes on, the municipality must raise money for schools, roads and drainage. I took the soldier settler matter up with the government some years ago—Sir James Lougheed was the minister at the time—and he gave an undertaking in regard to soldier settlement land. He gave us the assurance that as long as the soldier remained on the land the government would pay the taxes, but if they took the land back, then when it was resold, the arrears would be looked after. But in this case the minute the settler goes on the land he increases the burden on the municipality, but no responsibility is assumed by the government.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not want to get into a controversy about this matter in regard to the crown paying taxes, because I expect it will come up at a later date, but I think it should be borne in mind that it would be a very serious matter for the crown to have to agree to pay taxes on land held by the crown. While the settler is in occupation there will be no serious difficulty about the collection of taxes, so far as the soldier settler is concerned. As a matter of fact to-day, until the date of abandonment, the crown has protected the municipality in the school district, but at the moment of abandonment when the land reverts to the crown, it is then in a different category, and there are very serious difficulties about any suggestion of the crown being responsible for the payment of those taxes while it is strictly crown land, and naturally the same difficulty will apply here, because it would be general in its application. If you could confine it to any particular case it would not be so bad, but the breaking away in any particular instance would create what my hon. friends speak of so often as a precedent. I fear it would work very detrimentally to the crown, and I would much rather find some other way of solving the difficulty. My desire is to help the municipalities to increase settlement within their boundaries and so long as the settler is on the land they will have the same right to collect taxes that they would have under the Homestead Act as it stands to-day.

Mr. BROWN: These are lands that would be open for homesteading under ordinary circumstances?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. BROWN: In that case the effect of the loan being made would not make any difference in regard to the collection of taxes?

Mr. HANNESSON: Yes it would, because it imposes a prior charge.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think we should get away from the idea that the loan will make any difference. It will not change the situation so far as the homestead is concerned because, so long as the settler is upon the land, the municipality and the school districts will expect to collect the taxes even if there is a loan in existence. If the land is abandoned by the settler and reverts to the crown, it is non-taxable to-day. The only difference would be for the period between the abandonment by one occupier and the occupation by his successor.

Mr. McGIBBON: How long would a man have to be on the land before he qualified for a loan?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Until such time as he had provided the necessary improvements to warrant consideration of a loan.

Mr. McGIBBON: What is the settler going to do during that time?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): He will have to be in a position to make some improvements before he can obtain a loan. The idea is not to put the money into the hands of the settler and to say to him: You can go on and expend the money in any way you wish or even under instructions, but rather to lend him money after he has made progress in improvements or in building and there is justification for the issue of a proportionate amount of the loan.

Mr. McGIBBON: That is, the country is going to lend money on its own security.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Certainly.

Mr. MILLAR: Is it necessary that there should be a certain margin of security before a loan is granted?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There always is and should be a reasonable margin. The margin will probably not be a big one. A great deal will depend on the character of the settler and the initiative he shows in making progress on his homestead.

Mr. HANNESSON: Would it be possible to give this assistance under the Rural Credits bill?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think not. The Rural Credits bill is of an entirely different character. It is intended to deal with men who have patents for their land or, in other words, who are private owners.

Mr. BENNETT: And on security.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. McGIBBON: What ground is there for giving one man land and then money to start in business in preference to a man going into any other trade or calling?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon. friend will look at the earnings of our railways, he will notice that years of surplus are always those when agriculturists have had good crops. More money is put into circulation when there is prosperity among agriculturists than in years of dearth. The idea in thickening up the agriculturist population along our railway lines is that this will help to lessen the deficits on our railways by creating more traffic, more business in the country. If that were not so, I would oppose a loan of any sort.

Mr. McGIBBON: May I remind the minister of Sir Henry Thornton's statement that the falling off in the earnings of the railways was due to the falling off in the manufactures of this country, and the return made to this House which I placed on Hansard a few weeks ago showed that wheat in the west was being carried at a loss by the railways?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Being a westerner I would not like to admit that.

Mr. McGIBBON: Those were not my figures; they were the figures of the minister's own government.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): All I can say in reply to my hon. friend is that my observation goes to show that when you have, not particularly a big wheat crop, because that is confined very largely to western Canada, but a good agricultural crop throughout Canada, you have a year of great prosperity in the country. I think my hon. friend will not deny that statement. I am not denying for a moment the fact that industry plays a very important part in the matter. My hon. friend will realize, however, that boards of trade in all the important cities in Canada are crying out for more immigrants. Where do they want these immigrants to go? They want them to go on the land, and our difficulty is to find, in countries from which we recruit settlers, people with money to establish themselves. If we could secure from the Old Land and the continent people with means to establish themselves on the land, we would have no necessity for a bill to give assistance of this character. If we had former conditions in the way of employment on account of the expansion of the railways as we had in past years in western Canada, there would not be so much necessity for such a bill. But this is designed with the idea of settling up lands that are close to the railways and that have been passed over, I will admit frankly, for lands more desirable. The idea is to encourage people to go on those lands in order to thicken settlement under those conditions, to keep men working on the land and improving it until they get to the point where it will be self-supporting. I think there is a great necessity for assistance of this character wisely administered.

I have sought to recommend in this bill that we do not set up any elaborate establishment. In the western provinces we choose the Dominion lands agent in the particular district in which these lands are located, assisted by the expert advice of our Soldier Settlement Board officials who have acquired a wide fund of information in regard to various localities in connection with the settlement of soldiers upon the land. These men will be a committee of three who will decide upon the character of the land upon which a loan is to be made and the standing of the settler, and they will protect the government in every way in connection with advancing money to these settlers. I have tried not to set up any elaborate machinery, but simply to create an organization that will assist the new-comer upon the land to a very reasonable degree in order to thicken settlement upon those crown lands that are available for settlement along the railway lines.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): What assistance, if any, will this Immigration bill grant to the settler coming into Canada who is willing to settle in the old provinces? For instance, in Ontario there are tens of thousands of acres of farms that are available and that are offered for sale at practically the cost of the buildings, let alone the land itself. These farms are valuable for development purposes, and schools, roads and all the rest are provided. Has the minister not taken into consideration the fact that there is a possibility of an immigrant who has a reasonable amount of money being settled upon farms in the eastern provinces?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is in the bill a special provision that will apply particularly to the Maritime provinces which have no crown lands, but the bill does not purport to touch other than crown lands in the other provinces of Canada. In British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec, if the provincial governments are in agreement, the same provision will apply to crown lands. As regards Ontario, I have in my hand a bill almost similar in character to the one I am describing this afternoon whereby that province lends money up to $500. I have not the Quebec bill under my hand, but in it there is a provision, almost similar in character, under which loans are made in connection with settlement in the new land in the northern district along the Grand Trunk Pacific. I am not aware that in British Columbia they have loan provisions of this kind, but they have in the two older provinces. This bill, however, does not purport to touch the class of farms that my hon. friend has just mentioned; it deals only with lands owned and held by the crown whether federally or provincially. As regards provincial crown lands exactly the same provisions will prevail with the single exception that the provincial officer in the latter case will be a member of the board. That is, the officer in charge of provincial crown lands will be substituted for the officer in charge of Dominion crown lands. The Soldier Settlement Board officials will perform the same service in the provinces and of course this will be done only by consent of the provinces if they wish to take advantage of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HAY: I understood the minister to say that these regulations would apply only to crown lands. Now I see that under section 8 of the resolution if a provincial government has not any crown lands it has the right to purchase suitable land for settlement. Will the minister explain this apparent contradiction?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was just coming to that provision. It was designed primarily to meet the situation in the Maritime provinces. There I am told they have no crown lands available for settlement. In order to make the bill general in character and to avoid discrimination against any provinces without crown lands that wished to avail itself of the provisions of the bill, we have provided that under such circumstances a province may purchase suitable agricultural lands, and we will grant a certain amount of assistance, although it is true that this assistance is so meagre that it is hardly worth mentioning. If the provincial government wishes to put land into the hands of a new settler, we are prepared to make the necessary advance, of course always reserving priority of claim for repayment of our loan.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It will be; but in all probability some of the provinces will not care to take advantage of this measure.

Mr. McGIBBON: But they will have to pay for it just the same.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not necessarily.

Mr. McGIBBON: If one province does not participate, and two or three others do, would not the whole obligation be on the Dominion?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Only to the extent of the losses. I think after all my hon. friend will agree that land settlement is so important a factor that any small loss which might accrue would not seriously affect any province whether it participated or not.

Mr. McGIBBON: That would depend on the amount of the losses.

Mr. MacLAREN: Might I ask—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would suggest to members on both sides of the House that they withhold their questions until the resolution is in committee. I am quite aware that the questions are very pertinent and very important, but in committee stage both on the resolution and on the bill hon. members will have ample opportunity to put their questions.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, I have almost concluded my remarks. I commend the resolution to the consideration of the House, for I think it will be of material assistance in settling lands that hitherto have not been made use of, and will thus consolidate settlement. Lest some member should object that there is plenty of good agricultural land awaiting settlement, I think I am safe in saying that it is scarcely the business of the federal government to undertake the settlement of such lands; but we did feel that some concession should be made to the Maritime provinces, whose governments are taking a very active interest in immigration and have signed agreements with us for the care and placement of the young boys that are being brought out from the Old Country. This is all to the good, for in all matters of immigration I should like to have the closest co-operation with the provincial governments through their local officials rather than attempt to do work by establishing federal officials in the various provinces. I think our efforts should be devoted largely to bringing out the right class of settlers and placing them in the hands of the provincial authorities, who, being conversant with the local situation, know where to place the newcomers to the best advantage and can give them sound advice. I am speaking now purely and simply of immigration for the settlement of our agricultural lands. We are bending all our energies to getting that class of settler, believing that later on there will be an opportunity for immigrants of the artisan class, although they are already coming in in fairly large numbers. This measure is designed solely for the purpose of advancing the necessary funds to help the settler to improve his holding until the day that it shall become self-supporting. I have no doubt a good deal of criticism can be offered against the proposal, but I do think it will materially help in settling lands that up to date have not been considered first-class for homesteading.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to this resolution going through committee. I really want to give the minister credit for the best of intentions in introducing it, but he will have to forgive me if I cannot get enthusiastic over this venture. It is one of those measures which are very likely to be fairly popular at the initiation stage, but which leave a long train of sad memories in their wake. Not only so, but after they are immediately in operation there is an evidence of good results—often an illusory evidence. The very expenditure of considerable sums of government money produces a certain exhilaration and things look fine, but after the night of intoxication there is usually an awakening of bitterness; and I fancy we are going to suffer such experience in relation to this bill.

I must admit, first of all, that my doubts are very much related to the experience of the country with respect to soldier settlement. As respects soldier settlement, the minister throughout his entire term of office has been exceedingly fair to the whole scheme; he has given it, I think, a fair trial under his administration. He will admit with me, that if it was possible to launch such a scheme on sound lines, to barricade it against the rapacious and protect the treasury, these precautions were all taken. But while all this is admitted we have to confess that first of all we did not succeed in preventing the inroads of the unscrupulous and the fraudulent. We can point to cases where, notwithstanding all our precautions, the fact that it was a government venture rendered it vulnerable, and at different points in the country we were imposed on right and left. This however was not the worst result. As time went on the unexpected developed, so that we find ourselves to-day under the necessity of entering upon a great new scheme of revaluation, a scheme which, on whatever principle in the world you put it, is bound to land the country in millions, yes, tens of millions of a loss. I know that is due practically altogether, or very largely, to the trend of land stock values in these later years. But to all the incidents to which the soldier settlement scheme was subject, to all the vicissitudes that harassed it, this new venture will also be exposed. It is going to be so exposed from day to day.

The minister says this is intended to help the settlement of rejected lands, those which have been passed up by the homesteaders. Well, perhaps it will for a time. But lands which the homesteader passed by when he could get them free, when all he had to do was to live on them for a time each year for three years, lands which under those conditions are shunned will not be settled to any great extent by artificial means. Are we going to be further ahead in three, five, ten years? Our money will be there, but the homesteader will be gone, mainly for the reason that land which is not now settled along railway lines is in the main not worth settling. I do not believe that you will get a successful settlement upon such land by holding out the golden coin as an inducement to men to take up homesteads.

We are told that we have to do this because the provinces will not undertake the work, and that it is necessary in order to stimulate immigration. We all want to stimulate immigration; everyone knows that we need to. Indeed, it has been stimulated pretty nearly to death ever since this government came into power. They started out with an immigration of 145,000, and it is now 85,000; and last year was the worst in many a long day. But are you going to stimulate immigration by offering rewards? I do not think that any country has ever yet found any similar scheme an incentive to permanent and successful immigration. I am not aware of any means of stimulating immigration except to provide work for the immigrant. The minister says that the only people whom the boards of trade want are men who will go on the land. It is a funny thing to me that everyone on earth wants to keep out competition except the farmer. We are all ready to give him all the competition possible and to give it to him at his own expense. Now, if I were a farmer I would want competition among people to whom I could sell my produce. And as I am a farmer that is what I want. The best way to get immigration is to bring about healthful industrial conditions. We will get that way immigration for the land just as well as for the town, and artificial stimulants are not going to conduce to anything like wholesome, continuous immigration.

The minister refers to the provinces. He says, "Well, it is true that we cannot be fair among them, because some of them have not crown lands and we cannot help those that have not. But in any case they will not lose anything except, perhaps, to the extent of bearing a share of the loss, which will be trifling." Are we sure that it will be trifling? The loss will be trifling if we go into the venture on a trifling scale; but if we undertake it on any substantial scale the loss will not be slight. I ask the minister to cast his eye over western Canada, where he has been about the same time as I have been—not quite so long perhaps—and to assume that he had lent, say, $500—we will not put it at a thousand—to assist each man in establishing a homestead on fair land. How many of those $500 loans would he have lost? He would have lost a great proportion of them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I must disagree with my hon. friend. He has referred to the soldier settlement scheme, with the dissatisfaction and the losses that have accrued to it. I am bound to say that if the loans to the soldier settlers had been confined within more reasonable bounds the losses would not have been so great.

Mr. MEIGHEN: More reasonable bounds in what way?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They were given loans up to $7,000 at the start, and that is not being done to-day. The large percentage of the loss is due to the fact that we loaned far too much money. I believe that if any man in western Canada who had a reasonably decent homestead, not even a first class one, had been loaned $500 at that time, either he would have repaid it or the land to-day would be worth the money.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister knows that abandoned homesteads in western Canada are legion, and so far as those which are not abandoned are concerned the men who were originally on them are very often not there to-day. Very few of them are. The minister says that we lost on soldier settlement because we loaned too much money. Well, we loaned only sufficient to get the men on the land. We had to lend too much for the simple reason that it took too much to get the land and stock. Now we are going to settle rejected homesteads, and homesteads on crown lands in those provinces where there are such lands, but the minister cannot put the scheme on a basis which will be fair among the provinces. I do not want to arouse sectional prejudice at all, but it does seem to me that it is absurd for the minister to contend that this is possible. There is no way of doing it. Take Ontario, for example: that province to-day has a scheme for advancing money for these very purposes, and they can supervise the whole thing much more easily than we can. The land is theirs and they can take care of it. And they too, I venture to say, will have a loss. Quebec has a corresponding scheme. Nova Scotia has not, because it has no crown lands, nor has New Brunswick. Now to the losses that will accrue in respect of those provinces which have, these others will have to contribute, and there is no way of compensating them. The minister in the second last clause of the resolution has a scheme whereby he can give to Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick a half interest for two years on the purchase price of lands. He rightly describes this as meagre, I think he said trivial. Well, it is trivial. It does not hold out the slightest inducement, for not a province will buy on that basis. Imagine a province buying a piece of land privately owned, paying its value, and then turning it over to a settler. The settler borrows from this government and this government takes a first mortgage, giving the province a second mortgage for the purchase price of the land, and the inducement that gets the provinces to do thus is that the minister offers them the interest for one year. It is laughable. Never would a province venture upon the plan on such a basis. Therefore, you do expose those provinces which cannot come into the scheme to the necessity of subscribing towards it, bearing their share of the loan, in the first place, of the administration, in the second place, and of the ultimate loss, in the third. I warn the minister there will be a large cost of administration of this plan. I do not think he has devised it on a political basis, and I do not know that I can suggest at the moment anything very radical in the method of recommendation of the lands and of the loans, but I warn him that the cost of administration proportionate to the results will be very, very large. He will have to have a system of inspection, not only of the farms, in the first place, but of the farming, in the second place; he will have to have a system of supervision; he will have to have a staff here of a very considerable number to conduct all the correspondence with the municipalities and the like, and as the whole scheme develops, the top will increase in weight even after the base commences to diminish.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If my hon. friend will permit me, I do not see any reason for being alarmed about the administration cost, because we already have a thoroughly trained organization in the field, the soldier settlement organization, and that is the organization I purpose using.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is true, but the minister is going to add to the volume of work to be taken care of by that organization, and therefore add to the expense. But I must venture to intimate that the larger end of the loss, which will have to be shared by all alike, will be the loss in the ultimate, and that loss is just as certain as night to follow day. I press upon the minister to reconsider this matter. I do not like to stand in the way of anything of this sort, because those who will think they will be helped will be for the most part poor people, but I do venture to suggest to the minister that we are launched on just about enough loaning schemes now. We have the future of this country mortgaged just about heavily enough. It is the future we are mortgaging now, far more than the present, and more so in other concurrent legislation even than in this.

The province of Manitoba got into this, not quite on the same basis and with not quite the same class of land, more in connection with improved farm lands, but the experience of Manitoba has been one of remorse and regret. I do not think anybody would suggest that their loaning scheme has been a success, and if a provincial government, with a fairly compact province under its eye cannot make a success of it, how are we going to make a success of this scheme with its tentacles strung right from Halifax on the one shore to Vancouver on the other.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Is it not a fact that the farm loan scheme of Manitoba shows a profit every year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it is not so; not at all. I have talked with men who have had to do with it—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I have had to do with it myself; I have a mortgage with them, and I know they show a profit every year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman may have profited, but the province has not profited, and I fancy that will be the case here, that those who get the loans will be the chief beneficiaries, and I doubt if they will be any very great beneficiaries either. What I think is this: It is not hard now for a man who knows how to farm to get some land to farm. Lands are down in value, they are plentiful, they are easily secured. Why, I know in our district, and it is a good district, you can buy very much on a shoestring, and if you have the goods in your own person in the way of energy you can go ahead and make a farmer of yourself.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It is all right buying on a shoestring, but that does not get rid of the obligation or pay the interest charges. The obligations pile up until the man is smothered.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How do you get rid of them here? In the one case you can buy from the private owner at a low rate of interest; here you are paying the government a low rate of interest; that is all. The difference is this: In the one case the man knows he owes the money to a private owner, and knows he has to make good; in the other case, he owes the money to the government, and does not feel he has to make good.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I would not agree with that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Long experience has taught us that it is correct. It may be—I do not know—that there are certain obligations the minister has entered into in good faith which make this scheme necessary as a complement to his immigration policy. If such is the case, it would be some measure of justification, but with the tremendous load which is on our backs now, and which is to become greater and greater if this other resolution regarding the revaluation of soldier lands goes through, as well as others, with all these obligations I fancy that we are hardly doing justice to the general interests of this country to place upon the shoulders of the taxpayer still another burden.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): In making comparison between this scheme and the soldier settlement scheme, the leader of the opposition touched very lightly on one great difference. It is a difference which I think should receive a great deal of consideration at the present time. At the time the land and equipment was purchased for the soldiers going on the land, prices were at the peak. I will give just one instance. A farm that I know quite well for which the purchaser refused $60 per acre, was sold in two or three years afterwards on very, very easy terms at $29 per acre. In those years when the soldiers were going on the land the prices for land and equipment were at the peak, but the prices obtainable for the products of the farm, for the wheat, the oats, the cattle and everything the soldier produced were low. The peak prices were the prices he had to pay for his land and his stock. I think it is no exaggeration to say that horses which were purchased for the soldiers at a price of say, $200, in the course of three or four years' time were worth not more than $50. I do not give those as the exact prices, but that is about the proportion. In a conversation I had with the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) a few nights ago, I pointed to one settlement where some fifty-two farms were taken up and appraised by a very efficient appraiser, a mutual friend, and I believe that of the fifty-two, fifty-one succeeded under the very adverse conditions I have mentioned—buying land, stock and equipment at peak prices and receiving for the products of the farm low prices. The prices of the chattels purchased had dropped 50 per cent in many cases. An hon. member behind me says 150 per cent. At all events they have dropped 50 per cent and more in some cases.

I believe the greatest danger to this scheme lies in the appraising of the land. Some very peculiar things took place under the soldier settlement scheme. I am not sure that all of them ever came to the attention of the board, but I know of one that worked out like this. A piece of land that was nothing but a sand bank, not worth in my estimation more than $10 an acre at the most, and I would call that price high, was appraised at $30 an acre and sold at that price. But that was not all. The owner of that land, I believe —I have not positive proof, but I have sufficient to cause me to believe it is an actual fact—made a quiet bargain with the three returned men who were going to take three quarters of the section, that if they could persuade the board to purchase at $30 an acre he would make them a gift of the other quarter. The deal went through. However, the three returned men found out although they got the quarter for nothing, that having purchased the three quarters at $30 an acre after the deflation took place, they had made a very bad deal indeed. I have not the slightest hesitation in believing that the gentleman who made the appraisement of those lands was not absolutely honest. I cannot think that any man who possessed the experience the man in question is said to have had honestly appraised that land at $30 per acre. In discussing this matter with certain officials they advanced the excuse that the scheme at that time was an entirely new one, that they had to pick out new men, that they were up against a difficulty and in some cases secured men highly recommended only to discover that they were very poor appraisers. As the minister has pointed out, there is machinery that will be available under the new scheme, and I have no doubt that those responsible for its operation will profit from the mistakes made in the past.

Another point to which I wish to allude before taking my seat is this. The right hon. leader of the opposition stated that he believed that homesteads that have been passed over are hardly worth taking up, and that it is just a question whether it would be wise to insist upon settlement going on to these homesteads. If it were a case of the open prairie that statement might be true, but some of the lands on which it is proposed to settle these newcomers are potentially valuable. Where the land is good it will make excellent and valuable farms. In the case of lands covered with scrub sometimes the timber will be large enough to possess some commercial value but for the most part it is useless. Once that timber is removed, however, the lands will be found to be valuable. I am inclined to think that if the appraisement is surrounded with proper safeguards the present scheme will have undoubted value in connection with the settling of some of these lands.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How are you going to appraise lands that nobody will take now for nothing? Is not that the very land that is to be used?

Mr. MILLAR: I think it may be easily understood that land that many settlers might not take now for nothing, especially when they have to clear it without assistance, would be acceptable to them if they were going to receive an advance of money to enable them to make a start. It is true the amount is not very large but it is an encouragement to them to take the land and improve it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That may be. They may take the land and may get money to help them to carry on, but that does not affect the question of the appraisement of the land as it stands. How can you appraise land that nobody will take as it stands?

Mr. A. L. BEAUBIEN (Provencher): I should not like the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition in regard to the Manitoba farm loan scheme to pass without a comment or two. I do not think the right hon. gentleman wants to do an injury to any organization; I think he has confused the farm loan scheme with that of rural credits. There is no doubt that the rural credit societies of Manitoba have experienced losses but the loans in such cases were made on the operations of the farmer. The scheme of farm loans in Manitoba has been a success. It has not only proved profitable but it has been successful in keeping down the rate of interest. In the case of these loans the Manitoba farmer is getting money at the rate of 7 per cent, plus 1 per cent for amortization extending over a period of 30 years. This means an interest rate of 8 per cent. On the other hand you will find a great many farmers to-day paying a rate of interest as high as 8½ and 8¾. and in some cases 9 per cent, not only in Manitoba but in the provinces farther west. So that I think that the farm loan scheme in Manitoba even if it has not made large profits has certainly helped the situation as far as loans on farm lands are concerned.

I do not know how the scheme before the committee will work out, but I have this in mind; in a good many parts of western Canada—and for this I think the lack of proper colonization schemes is to blame—we have allowed a settler to locate here, and another there, and so on; they are scattered over quite a lot of territory. Then we have crown land adjacent to the settlers that are there to-day. But their numbers are too small to support schools, to build roads, and to carry out other improvements. If the present scheme can be properly worked out the settlers in question, few in number and virtually exiled, will receive a considerable augmentation of settlement and it will be possible to creat a community life which is largely absent to-day. If the scheme has this result it will be a good thing.

Another point to which I wish to allude is that this is the first time to my knowledge that we have given Canadian citizens a certain benefit under our immigration policy. We know of lots of men who have left the farm because of circumstances over which they had no control. They are at present in the city engaged in a desperate effort to make both ends meet. Now, if we could settle these people upon crown lands and advance them a sum of money to help them to carry out certain improvements they might be induced to return to the land and establish homes for themselves which would be a decided benefit to Canada. The hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) asked the question "Why not give those in all other walks of life the same advantages?" As a matter of fact we know that if the agricultural industry in Canada is prosperous all other industries will prosper likewise. Agriculture is a primary industry and everybody knows that if we have a prosperous agricultural community the rest of Canada is prosperous also. Suppose one had entered a manufacturing establishment two or three years ago, and had asked the manager why depression existed, his answer, if he were not intoxicated with the principle of protection, would be that it was due to the lack of purchasing power on the part of the Canadian people. He would say that was the reason why our industries were not prosperous. I have asked that question of dozens and dozens of manufacturers in the province of Ontario and they too gave me the same answer. While settlement was going on in western Canada, while the construction of railroads was in progress, and immigrants were coming in great volume to this country, we never heard the manufacturer complain about the lack of business. But depression came and hit the agriculturist first. Then, two or three years afterwards, the manufacturer began to feel the pinch. This experience may do our manufacturers a lot of good and render them more efficient.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON (Muskoka-Ontario): I desire to occupy the attention of the committee for a moment or two on this question. I am opposed to the principle of the resolution because I am opposed to parliament eternally spoon-feeding the people. I do not think we can ever develop a self-respecting and self-reliant race as long as we continue to follow methods of this kind. Neither do I think that in this good Dominion of Canada such a scheme is necessary. I remember reading a debate in this House some time ago when the then member for Springfield (Mr. Hoey) said that he knew a gentleman, presumably himself, who came to this country as a stowaway or something of that character. He had grown, if not immensely wealthy, at least very well off, and ended up by being a representative of the people in this parliament. That is the class of people we want in Canada, self-reliant people who can make good if given the opportunity, and I might say that he is no exception. There are hundreds and thousands and tens of thousands of such people in the country. Neither do I think that this proposition is a fair one to the dominion or to the province. As my right hon. leader has pointed out, you cannot make it fair to the provinces. I do not think it is going to be fair to the settler. I think you could not put a settler under a greater handicap than to put him where he could not grow a first-class crop. Of necessity his income and earning power is going to be greatly reduced from the fact that he is on inferior land. Why then should this country go into a proposition of this kind, loan money on our own property, or give away property which is inferior and ask a man to go on it?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I correct my hon. friend. He seems to be under the impression that the loans will be made on inferior land. That is not the proposition at all. A great deal of this land now under timber and brush is first-class agricultural land, the very best land we have in western Canada. I speak with some knowledge. I am sure when my hon. friend goes into northern Ontario he will have the same thing to say about the clay belt there. There is no better land than the clay belt in that district. Of course it is considerably to the north, but bear in mind the trouble is not the quality of the land, it is the difficulty in acquiring the land, to get it under cultivation.

Mr. McGIBBON: I was taking the minister's own word. He gave me to understand this was inferior land that had been passed over when settlers were going there.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): On account of the brush.

Mr. McGIBBON: On account of the difficulty in clearing. I think it would be of infinitely more importance to Canada if this government would get busy and so shape its policy that the people of the country could get something to do, and get some money for doing the work rather than simply loaning money on propositions which they admit are fraught with great difficulty and loss. The proposition is unsound and unfair from the dominion standpoint, from the provincial standpoint, and unfair from the standpoint of the settler. I want to voice my objection again to the eternal propositions coming before this House and country for the spoon-feeding of the people. We will never get into this country good self-reliant people so long as they have to rely on the government to be spoon-fed. This class of people will never make a living.

Mr. McPHEE: Would the hon. member apply that to manufacturing as well?

Mr. McGIBBON: I desire to tell the hon. gentleman and this House—and I have stated it in parliament before—that there is no more justification for giving assistance to men going on the land than there is for giving assistance to men who are going into a manufacturing industry, and when we are going into propositions of this kind we are showing favours to different classes of people in the country, which we have not the right to do.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): I see very little difference between giving a bonus to a man going on the land and giving a bonus to a manufacturer by protection, the latter being spoon-fed to the limit. I heartily endorse what the minister said with regard to the necessity of consolidating settlement, but I do not entirely agree with his plan for crarying it out. I think one of our troubles in western Canada has been caused by spreading settlement out too much. We surveyed land far beyond the reach of the ordinary settler. The moment land is surveyed and thrown open for settlement, it is a direct invitation for people to go in and occupy it. The settler is in a postion, after he has located on land a long way from the railway, to demand of the government railway facilities, and the government is under a moral obligation to provide him with those facilities when he goes in there, after the land has been thrown open for settlement. If we survey land too far out for settlement, men go in there and locate, start to build homes, clear up the brush, drain sloughs, organize municipalities, a large amount of money is spent on roads, schools being necessary, debentures are issued—against what? The most of the land is unpatented. After a few years, in many of the frontier settlements, a great number of these people, I think on an average in the bush districts probably 50 per cent of them, move out. You see the position in which that leaves the other 50 per cent. Their taxation is automatically doubled. There is continual pressure brought to bear on the provincial authorities—and I think the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Railways will bear me out in this—for improvement and for roads. The municipalities are burdened with the same thing, and instead of settling a problem you have created a new one. To my mind that is just what this legislation is going to do. It is not going to settle the problem that the minister has in mind, but he will create a new problem. I think I can speak with authority on this matter, because in my constituency we have about one hundred and twenty-five miles of a frontier on the bush land. There were large settlements there, but hundreds of these settlers have left and given up their farms. I am safe in saying that there are scores of homesteads which after being proved up, have reverted to the municipalities for taxes. Those homesteads have been improved and men have spent the best part of their lives there. Money has been spent on roads and money has been spent for schools, and in one district I know there are two schools idle to-day, not being used, but the debentures are still held against the land. The settlers are still striving to make a living. When you go out to the frontier settlement, between the old settlement and the railway, you pass miles and miles of good agricultural land not occupied and some of that is partly improved. My hon. friend asks, why? There are various reasons why. Agriculture out there has not been prosperous. Farmers have been evicted. Their mortgages have been foreclosed. Others have gone voluntarily. Conditions are improving now, no doubt about that. In other cases, farmers bought more land than they could handle. When they found they could not handle it they had to give up some of it. I say to the minister that if he wants to accomplish the object he has in view he should endeavour to consolidate our settlement and converge on the existing settlements where educational, transportation and other facilities are already provided. In that way he might accomplish something. He could use money to assist settlement on lands privately owned. He may say that that is a provincial issue. I say that it is not a provincial issue entirely. Colonization is a federal issue and not a provincial issue. As the hon. leader of the opposition has said, these lands are available for purchase to-day at very low prices, lower than we have seen in western Canada for many years. The conditions out there are improving to a considerable extent. I believe that if many of these men could get assistance to locate on this class of land to-day they could make good.

Instead of opening up new lands where we have to build new roads, new schools, and to provide all the municipal machinery and so put further burdens on provincial and dominion authorities, let us use the facilities that we have. One of the problems of our railways and of our private business to-day is the overhead. Any business man knows that if he can double, triple or quadruple his turnover, he can reduce his overhead. By thickening up our settlement, by filling up those lands privately owned which are adjacent to our present transportation facilities, we can as a nation substantially reduce our overhead. We do not need to go outside of this country to get many desirable settlers for this class of land. The minister has referred to the "back to the land" movement from the cities. I know I can go to small towns in western Canada and to our cities in the east and in the west and I can get thousands of men, many of whom have had considerable agricultural experience, to go out on the land. They will not go fifteen or twenty miles into the bush; they are too shrewd to go there; but if you give them a little assistance to buy good privately owned land adjacent to the towns, they will go there and tens of thousands of them can make good.

That will help to solve the problem of unemployment which at present exists in the cities. It will assist us in our taxation problems in the country, and that is a terrible problem in some of our districts where many men have been thrown out of or have abandoned their farms. It will assist in solving another problem. As I have said, one of our problems is that many of our farmers have too much land, perhaps on account of being over-speculative at a particular period when the government at Ottawa as well as private business concerns were demanding greater production. The farmer was pleaded with and preached at to produce, and produce, and produce. That was the proper thing to do at the time and there was a time when it was a profitable thing to do because, during the latter years of the war and indeed two years after the war, mass production was the proper kind of production for the farmer. He could use engines instead of horses and in that way cultivate a large area much more cheaply than a small one. But those conditions do not obtain to-day. The price of engine fuel is just as high now as it was then. The price of horse feed has gone away down; it is not more than perhaps 25 to 30 per cent of what it was in the years to which I refer, and the farmer finds now that he must go back to the use of horses almost exclusively in the cultivation of his land. That means that he cannot cultivate on a large scale; that he must get down to a matter of more intensive cultivation. Many of those farmers who purchased more land than they could handle are in a position where they are liable to lose everything they possess. A man may have a joint mortgage against his land, whether it is a section or two sections as the case may be. If he can sell two or three quarter sections to new settlers under some scheme, the government might very well take hold of it. This would take a tremendous burden off his shoulders, thicken up settlement, bring in more men to pay taxes and help to clear bush on this class of land because there will probably be only sixty, seventy or eighty acres cleared on a quarter section. It will be better to get settlers on such land who will clear the balance of the quarter sections, rather than to send men out fifteen, twenty, twenty-five miles into the bush to clear new land away from settlement altogether.

At one place in my constituency we have what was at one time a very large settlement, forty miles from a railway. The men there were brought in by the Soldier Settlement Board. The land is the finest class of land you will find in western Canada, an ideal place, but there is no railway and the inevitable has happened. Some of these men have cleared up as much as 100 acres on a quarter and after doing so have walked out and left it. We do not want any more of that and I would earnestly plead with the minister to use the same legislation, because it has some merits, but in a different way. If you assist a man to be relocated on privately owned land, you have the same opporunity to get first security on it as you have in connection with your homestead fifteen, eighteen or twenty miles from a railway on the edge of a forest reserve. Where is your security in connection with that? The farmer who owns the land—or whether it is a speculator or business man or bank or mortgage company it makes no difference—in many cases would permit the government to take a first mortgage and put his own equity on as a second mortgage. It would be of considerable assistance to the settler to have a first mortgage of $1,000, let us say, at a low rate of interest and spread over a long period of years, and many men under some such plan as that could be induced to go on the land whereas under this plan those who went on the land would be almost sure to fail.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: How would the hon. member give the federal government priority over everybody else on privately owned land?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Supposing these is a mortgage of $3,000 against a quarter section of land and a settler wants to buy it. The man who has the $3,000 mortgage would be only too glad to accept the $1,000 as a cash payment, give the federal government security for that, and take a second mortgage for the $2,000.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: And give the government priority?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Yes.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): Mr. Speaker, post-mortems are not valuable except in so far as we gather therefrom some knowledge that is useful at the present or in the future. I am not very much concerned about our experience in connection with soldier settlement, for instance, or the advances we made to farmers who were in the drouth-stricken areas of Alberta, or other advances, except in so far as they induce me to believe that no government assistance as such has thus far been successful in western Canada. I regret to say that in Manitoba to which the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) referred a moment ago, I think he will find that not only did the government lose money on the rural credits, but they also lost money, as reported by their own officers, in advances they made on farm lands as such. In Saskatchewan, where the administration was in the hands of an old loan company officer, their experience has been very much more satisfactory. Even in the land banks of the United States that have been in existence only a short time, there have been substantial losses during the last few years, and recently the government imposed upon those banks the necessity of setting up a reserve with respect to all property which they now hold under foreclosure.

The question that we are considering is whether or not this country shall put into unpatented or undeeded property $5,000,000 per annum at a rate of interest of 5 per cent per annum, repayable in ten years, the first payment to commence at the expiration of the second year. To that question baldly put in that way, I should think the answer should be in the negative. If on the other hand you surround the proposal with sufficient safeguards, there are a number of deserving cases that come to the attention of most of us every week of our lives, either by correspondence or by personal interview, that warrant the government in doing something to intensify settlement that is so sparse especially in western Canada. I wholly agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell) as to the causes that have brought about present conditions in western Canada. Nothing struck me more in the early days than to observe people going far away from a railway and settling and then the clamour that commenced for railways. In addition to the factors that have been mentioned as bringing about the condition referred to, there is one other factor which I think the minister might well bear in mind, that is, that lands have been stricken by drouth. Areas were opened for settlement that should never have been homesteaded. Especially is that so in Alberta and in one corner of Saskatchewan.

Now, the Minister of the Interior has observed that there are six million acres of land in Alberta within fifteen miles of railways and available for homesteading. But as I read the agreement that is now before the House, those lands are to be transferred to the provincial government, in whom the title would then be vested. These lands have not been homesteaded, and the reasons are twofold. First, in the northern part of the province there is considerable timber and railways have been extended north and west by the Dunvegan line, north by the Waterways railway, and to Athabasca Landing by the Canadian National. Still those homesteads have not been settled within fifteen miles of the railways for the simple and obvious reason that no person desired to take up the land.

There has been homesteading in the Peace river territory, and we have had demands for railways from men who have settled in those remote sections. In the southern part of the province there are still some homesteads left, and there is still a considerable area in the central part of the province, but no one has attempted to homestead on those lands for the last twenty-five years. Only yesterday I received a communication with respect to a quarter section once homesteaded, and the reports are that no man can possibly go upon it and make even a pretence towards a living.

Under these circumstances is it fair or just or right that we should pledge the public credit with the hope that we will ever get back the money that we lend to the people who go upon those lands that for twenty-five years have been passed by by those who might have occupied them on payment of $15. Although patents to the land cannot be obtained in less than five years, we are told that we may be able to get back the money in eight years, commencing at the expiration of two years, with interest at 5 per cent per annum. Can we hope that at the end of the second year the homesteader may be able to pay interest on $1,000, that is, $50, plus one-eighth of the principal, which is $125. But in my judgment, having regard to what I have observed in the operation of loans of that character in that part of Canada, this would be nothing more nor less than an admission of failure before we commenced.

Now, it is said there are millions of acres of land available in Saskatchewan. I am perfectly certain that the ministers from Saskatchewan will bear me out that any land available for homesteading within fifteen miles of a railway in Saskatchewan does not belong to the class of land on which we expect people to make successful settlement. In Manitoba there are three million acres of vacant land. Why? Because you have the Hudson Bay railway extending into the northern part of that province, and the lands within fifteen miles of it have not been settled because they are not of the character that attracts settlers for any purpose other than ranching.

Then why should we do this at all? I think there are some reasons why we should. I have observed a very considerable number of people during my residence in western Canada who have the merit of a willingness to work—which is not common in some parts of Canada—and yet despite all they may do they have not been able to get even $500 of additional capital to enable them to start upon the pathway of success. Those people I think this country might well assist. I do not agree with my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon) when he says we may rely upon the grim determination and the hardihood of settlers in these days to make homes for themselves in the wilderness, to succeed by their own unaided efforts or perish. Before the war that was true, but since settlement conditions have entirely changed, and we can no longer expect to attract people to this country and get them settled successfully under the same conditions as obtained before the war. With respect to that I am perfectly certain. The great success, if it was a success—I have my opinion as to that, but this is not the time or place to discuss it—with respect to settlement in western Canada was during those days when we were spending borrowed money on railways and paying interest on the borrowed money out of the money so borrowed, with the result that this country to-day is called upon to pay $30,000,000 per annum or even more for that costly experiment we engaged in at that time. Now my friend the minister knows, because he is aware of the conditions, that the very best settlement from the standpoint of getting results was settlement created at the time when men were able to find employment at certain periods of the year and then go up on their homesteads and utilize the money they had earned. What the country is demanding to-day is an opportunity for men to work; that is my observation; and if we can supply work of any kind for those who come into the Dominion, then advances of $500 or $1,000 would be absolutely secure; but if we merely intend to put people upon land within fifteen miles of a railway that has not been homesteaded for the last twenty-five years, and tell them as soon as they have a barbed wire fence around it and have put up a log or a sod hut they can come and get $500 or $1,000, that money is irretrievably and inevitably lost. I am satisfied of that. But if we can create conditions in this country, as I think we can if we only desire so to do, by which there would be some employment afforded to those who come here, especially having regard to the seasonal conditions that prevail, then those who have shown their desire to have a permanent stake in the country and have indicated by their earnings or savings to the extent I have mentioned that they desire to settle on land passed up by others, this country would be warranted in making some advances to them.

I fear very much that the minister will be not only disappointed with the working out of this proposal, but I think it will afford one more reason for a raid being made upon the government. To that extent I agree with my friend from Muskoka, that every time we weaken the fibre of our people by inducing them to believe that the government must take the place that has been occupied in times past by the hardy manhood of the people themselves, to that extent we have done injury to the country. But if we assist where there is ambition, if we aid where there is aspiration, then we have done some good to the community.

Now, this resolution does not say that lands must be within fifteen miles of a railway.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Oh yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I am told by those who have had to do with the handling of farm products that even fifteen miles in these days is too great a distance.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is the limit.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the existing machinery that is to be utilized, of homestead inspectors, of crown land agents, of soldier settlement inspectors—these officials may be very useful, but unless there is the strictest supervision the pressure that is brought to bear upon members of the settlement committee by those who expect to secure aid is of such a character, as was mentioned by one hon. gentleman who spoke this afternoon, as usually to bring about a condition that is injurious to the settler himself in the long run. I know that because I have visited many of these places during the last two or three years, and I propose to make some observations with respect to revaluation of land by reason of that very fact.

Now I suggest to the minister that instead of asking for $5,000,000 for the first year, he ask for a lesser sum. I suggest also that he make it clear that there is no commitment as to the future as in this measure, for it contemplates a larger commitment than that. I would further suggest that he surround it with such definite regulations as will not permit of the abuses that have attended loans of this character in the past. I do not say that in any sense a particular political party can be blamed, because all political parties are composed of individuals who are human, but the pressure brought to bear upon the settlement committees or whatever you may call them, is so great that usually I have observed that a friend gets better treatment than the man who is not a friend. The resolution speaks of improvements in land or farm buildings. Now there must be at least $500 worth of improvements in either land or buildings to warrant a loan of $500, and no doubt an improvement to the extent of $1,000 will be necessary before a loan of that amount may be obtainable. Under these circumstances it does seem to me that there will be no hope of success unless there is provided such machinery as has been used by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. There should be long rather than short terms and there might be provided an amortization plan instead of having the interest paid on the instalment principle. If the scheme were carried out along these lines it would afford great assistance in enabling the man to get his patent so that he might offer a valid security under any rural credit scheme. As the resolution stands, he is simply given a sop. I do know of cases in which great benefit would result. No one knows better than one who has practised his profession as I have, in western Canada, just how great are the evils that attend sparse settlement. Anyone who has had to do with the transaction of business on a large scale in the west is aware that the crying evil in the country at this time is the great sparseness of settlement extending over wide areas. Schools must be maintained, and there must be kept up lines of communication by rural telephone, mail delivery, roads, and so forth. The result has been that instead of a really happy and contented people we have in the west a population scattered over vast areas and discontented because they are not in easy communication with one another, and so feel that they are lost in a wilderness. If you could only fill up the vacant spaces within ten or twelve miles of a railway, then the greatest accomplishment any government can bring about would have been realized. But until that is done the present condition will continue.

I am willing to support the resolution merely because I believe it is the duty of the government to assist in every possible way to have these vacant places settled. But I would have the minister understand clearly that from my observations, and from what I have learned in discussing these matters with others, that he is doomed to great disappointment if he hopes by means of loans of this character made upon improvements, either on lands or in buildings, to bring about the settlement of homestead lands after people have declined for twenty-five years to take them up. I am intimately acquainted with such lands over a considerable part of Saskatchewan, and over no inconsiderable part of Alberta.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I may tell my hon. friend that 190 homesteads were taken up in western Saskatchewan last year in the wooded areas.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): And they have been passed by for twenty-five years. Across the Saskatchewan river, within fifteen miles of the Grand Trunk Pacific, there is another splendid area of first-class land, which has never been taken up.

Mr. BENNETT: What the minister says is absolutely true. There is no doubt that wherever men have to spend from three to ten dollars an acre to clear land to make it available for the profitable production of crops, such land will always be avoided, the preference being given to prairie lands. What the hon. member for Muskoka-Ontario (Mr. McGibbon) has said is quite correct. In the early days of settlement in eastern Canada the people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Quebec had to hew their homes out of the wilderness. But that is entirely a different thing from establishing homes on the prairies. There has been no disposition on the part of the prairie settler to take up land where he has had to do any clearing, even of scrub and brush, to any considerable extent. No great settlement of homestead lands has been passed up in southern Alberta.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I do not think so.

Mr. BENNETT: As I have already said, I fear the minister is destined to be greatly disappointed by a scheme such as is proposed. I have an idea that what has happened in the past will happen again. A desperate effort is always made by the political organizer to induce people to undertake things of this kind. The organizer will tell them, "Here is your chance. If you only do certain things, you are bound to secure the desired results." My hon. friend knows this; he has had as much experience of it as I have had. And this is not confined to one party. We know that during the days of the distribution of the drought relief such incidents were not uncommon. I would advise the minister to reduce the amount and to make the experiment for one year only, trying under those conditions to induce people to take up settlements in the vicinity of districts already settled, rather than going far afield and afterwards making demands for telephones, schools, rural mail delivery, better roads and, lastly, increased transportation facilities in the way of railroads.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Duff in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry? Carried.

Mr. CAHAN: I trust, Mr. Chairman, you are not going to carry it so rapidly as this. I wish to make no reflections, but I think the Speaker was rather hasty in calling "Carried" before.

There is one objection that I think may be made to this resolution, and that is that while the amount is large, $5,000,000 a year, it is also unlimited as to time. I do not think, under the present condition of the finances of this country, that an experiment of this nature to the extent of $5,000,000 a year should be unlimited as to time.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I intended to say in reply to the hon. member for West Calgary that I have no particular objection to a reduction of the amount. Indeed, we likely shall not be called on to spend any of the money this year, but my hon. friend will readily understand that if settlement takes place under the provisions of the act, the persons who settle on the land and make improvements will expect to have advances made to them in the succeeding year, and that is one of the difficulties in limiting it to one year. I have no objection to limiting it to three years, and, when the bill is introduced, to cutting down the figure to a very reasonable amount, if that will meet my hon. friend's objection.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman, it certainly will go a long way toward meeting the objection I had in mind, if the amount can be reduced, and if the term during which the experiment is to be carried on can be limited. As a matter of fact, the constituency which I represent, and this applies I believe to the whole of the eastern provinces, is desirous of going a very long way in order to assist in the development of the western provinces, but there must be a limit to the liabilities which the whole country will undertake in the next few years in that respect. We have this liability, and if it is not inopportune to say so, we have the liability coming in connection with rural credits, which is a somewhat similar application of public funds. Then we have the pension proposal, which I understand will require about twenty to twenty-five million dollars a year, if it is to be carried out according to the terms proposed in the resolution. Then we have the liability to which I called attention the other day in connection with the West Indies, which may amount, if we carry out that engagement, to a capital outlay of some nine or ten million dollars, and an outlay to make up the deficiency in earnings running anywhere from $300,000 or $400,000 to $1,000,000 a year, depending on the extent to which the scheme is carried out.

We are in a very critical position in this country at the present time. Hon. gentlemen do not seem to realize the burden of debt and the burden of taxation which we are now carrying, and which, if you take your municipal, your provincial, and your federal taxation, all of which we have to bear, amounts to nearly one-quarter of the productive energies of this country. Further, while the east is prepared to make large concessions to the west, if you impose too large burdens upon the east, it must break; it cannot carry the burden that it is carrying. Since confederation was established in 1867 the east has willingly carried that burden, and it is carrying it to-day. In proportion to the wealth of those western provinces, Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, the individual wealth of the eastern provinces is far less, and the eastern provinces are far less able to carry the burden than the west. The west is more prosperous to-day than any other part of this country, and I am thankful for it; but if you burden the east without giving, as I think, proper encouragement to the establishment of remunerative industry in the east, this country will break so far as the east is concerned; it will be impossible to carry the burden of debt and taxation which has been already rolled up. Without saying one word of disparagement of the west, the great burden of our taxation comes upon the eastern provinces, and they are carrying as heavy a burden as it is possible for men to carry under the present industrial conditions. I am thankful, therefore, that the minister has saved me from talking half an hour by the very reasonable concessions which he says he is prepared to make.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend surely is not arguing that the individual in the east carries more taxation than the individual in the west?

Mr. CAHAN: The eastern individual carries more than the western; there is absolutely no doubt about it. There is no doubt that the eastern provinces are carrying by taxation a large portion of the cost of shipping every ton of wheat that comes from the west to the east. That is according to the return which was brought down for my hon. friend from Muskoka, and to which he referred. It is not dealing with the present year—and I am not dealing with the present year, but in the two previous years this country as a whole paid a very considerable portion of the cost of transporting the wheat from the west to the east, and I think it is prepared to make large concessions in that respect.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That was not the question I asked my hon. friend. I understood him to be arguing that the individual in the east was carrying more taxation than the individual in the west.

Mr. CAHAN: I cannot discuss intelligently or compare our municipal taxation in the east with the municipal taxation in the west, because I have not the figures of municipal taxation. But so far as federal taxes are concerned there is absolutely no doubt, anyway you look at it, that the great bulk of the taxation of this country is being carried at a higher rate per capita in the eastern provinces than in any of the provinces of the middle west, and furthermore, it is being carried out of a per capita wealth much less in the east than in those provinces of the middle west. I am glad the amount involved in this proposal is to be decreased to a more reasonable limit. But consider the aggregate burden we are rolling up: We are also going to revalue the soldier settlement lands, a proposal which bids fair, if my information is at all correct, to place a further burden of forty or fifty million dollars upon the whole country by the reduction of the amount of outstanding loans and the assumption of that reduction by the Dominion treasury and the east will have to bear a very considerable share of it. Then there is the rural credits scheme, the pension scheme, the proposals in connection with the Hudson bay, and all the rest. I say that unless you limit those obligations and at the same time give us an opportunity to increase our industrial efforts in the east you are placing a burden upon this country that, in my opinion, can have only one result. I have said before, and I wish to repeat it, I have no prejudice whatsoever against the west. I am anxious, and I believe the whole of the east is anxious. to assist in building up this country as a whole, whether it be the western provinces or the eastern provinces.

Mr. MacLAREN: There is a provision in the proposed arrangement regarding the provinces which do not have crown lands suitable for the purpose of carrying out the desired object. The minister very correctly describes what is proposed as a very meagre provision, so meagre indeed that he thinks—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): May I correct my hon. friend? I am afraid that a different meaning from that intended has been given to a statement of mine. If the provinces have the lands and are desirous that the Dominion shall advance money to put settlers upon them, then the Dominion will advance the whole $1,000. The meagre provision I spoke of was the assistance granted the provinces to purchase the land.

Mr. BENNETT: There are some crown lands in New Brunswick.

Mr. MacLAREN: Some of the provinces have crown lands not suitable for settlement, and in order to make this provision apply generally the minister recommends the provision set out in clause 8 of the resolution. He described that as a very meagre provision and I agree with him absolutely.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): That is towards the purchase of the land.

Mr. MacLAREN: Towards the purchase of the land, yes. I wish to remind the minister, and I have already pointed out the fact many times, that the attention of parliament is too strongly drawn and directed towards settlement in certain portions of the west, whereas other portions of the Dominion might, with great profit and even greater fairness, receive equal attention at the hands of the ministerial head of the Immigration department.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think my hon. friend's province is in a very superior position in the matter of fares for settlers because it takes very much less money to bring settlers to that province.

Mr. MacLAREN: I understand the arrangement to which the minister refers has been agreed upon but has not yet been brought into effect. I should like the minister to point out to the committee anything in the nature of an advantage to the Maritimes in matters of this kind that has been carried out in the past few years. What we are dealing with here is something which it is hoped to secure in the immediate future. I think my contention is correct that the immigration policy of the government has been too restricted in its outlook, and that there has been a failure to apply it equally to all portions of the Dominion. My hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) pointed out the great difficulties that arise as a result of sparsity of settlement. In the remote portions of the country that difficulty would be encountered more easily than in the more settled parts of Canada. I would urge once more that settlement should proceed gradually from the populated districts outward rather than that it should be directed to remote and sparsely settled parts of Canada. At the present time I do not see that this proposal will apply to any extent to the eastern portion of the Dominion. I presume the minister will agree with that statement.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I must confess that I am ignorant of the agricultural situation in the Maritime provinces, at all events I am not familiar with it. But my hope was that something might be accomlished through the medium of this policy to settle the vacant lands of those provinces. I understand there are in the Maritime provinces a number of vecant and abandoned lands, although an abandoned farm has not a very pleasant sound to the ear of an incoming settler. That was a difficulty that was encountered in connection with the soldier settlement lands. At the same time I am informed that there are a large number of farms in the Maritime provinces of fairly good quality that are available for settlement to the newcomer. My hope was that perhaps the provinces might take up this problem in conjunction with the Dominion, in which case we would make these loans to establish the newcomers.

Sir EUGENE FISET: I should like to ask the minister one question, because I can see how this proposal is likely to affect the province of Quebec to a very considerable extent. The minister has stated that the land coming under this scheme must be situated within fifteen miles of a railway. Such a provision, whether established by regulation or by statute, is going to militate extremely against the province of Quebec and will absolutely prevent the application of this scheme to districts in our province where settlement is needed, these districts being in some cases fifteen, twenty and, perhaps, twenty-five miles from the railway. I should therefore be very glad if the minister, when preparing the regulations which are to govern the matter, would take into consideration the fact that other parts of Canada as well as the west have to be kept in mind.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am surprised to know that there is not a large quantity of land in the province of Quebec within fifteen miles of a railway.

Sir EUGENE FISET: All the crown lands that are being settled at the present time are situated more than fifteen miles from a railway.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend does not suggest that there are no crown lands unsettled within fifteen miles of the existing railways?

Sir EUGENE FISET: There is very little left in our part of the country within that distance.

Mr. MURPHY: I am in accord with the spirit of this resolution. The minister states that he wishes to settle vacant lands throughout the Dominion. I do not, however, follow him in his argument that the present proposal is going to carry out that purpose. The first clause of the resolution provides that the minister may make loans to settlers on the basis of improvement of land and farm buildings erected, and the amount of such advance is to be $1,000 for a Canadian citizen and $500 for an outsider. In other words after the man has been induced to go on the land and has demonstrated to the government that he can support his family and make improvements he is entitled to receive aid which however he no longer requires. He has demonstrated that he can make a living and support his family. Then the government intimates that it is prepared to come to his assistance. I do not see the soundness of any such reasoning. It seems to me that if assistance is given it should be given in the first instance, because the type of settler that you are going to attract to these vacant lands is likely to be a man of very limited means. Now, if the intending settler has certain moneys of his own that will enable him to live for a period of two or three years, erect his buildings, and carry out desired improvements, he does not need to settle on vacant land. There are hundreds and thousands of acres of more or less improved land in western Canada to-day and which, if they can be purchased, will be taken in preference to vacant land. There are lands which can be purchased in western Canada to-day on the basis of a share of the crop payment without the purchaser putting up one dollar of his own money. And upon these lands buildings have been erected in many cases. Buildings have already been erected on these lands, therefore I say this proposal does not encourage settlement on vacant lands. If we are to encourage settlement on vacant lands the assistance should come at the beginning of the term, not after the man has demonstrated that he is capable of making a living there. I am opposed to any resolution providing for making a direct loan to the people from any government of this country. It has been proven a failure, especially in my own province of Manitoba, under the rural credit scheme. It has been a curse rather than a blessing to the people of that province, and I think every member from western Canada will bear me out in that statement. The government in Manitoba is facing a loss at least of $500,000 under that scheme.

An hon. MEMBER: $675,000.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes. Those loans were made, I might say, to farmers already established upon the land with the object of improving their buildings and stock and making the business a success. If that policy was a failure under those conditions, where the farmers were already established on the land, how can hon. gentlemen expect inexperienced men taking up vacant land to make a success of it and be able to repay the money to the government? The principle of the government lending money directly to the people is to my mind absolutely wrong. We know that this is merely a sop and does not deal with the question in a big way. You have your other immigration schemes as well. Clause 8 states that if a provincial government, not having suitable crown lands available, acquires by purchase suitable land for settlement under the provisions of this legislation, the minister may pay to the provincial government a sum not exceeding one-half of the interest on the purchase price of such lands. If that provision was carried out you would add to the difficulties under which the municipalities are suffering to-day. You purchase the lands from private interests, and they become crown lands. Those lands are now taxable, and if those settlers leave them they revert to the crown, and any taxes that are paid on them at the present time will not be payable in future to the municipality.

Those are my main objections to this resolution. I believe the same result would be achieved by the government making a survey of all the different areas throughout the west, in co-operation with existing institutions such as agricultural societies, boards of trade, and the different locals of the United Farmers of the west, so that information would be at hand in concise form respecting lands which are available at the present time for settlement. There are many pieces of land in the well settled districts which the owners would be only too pleased to let go to men who wanted to settle on the land. If a man living in any of the cities of Canada to-day wishes to go on the land there is absolutely nothing to prevent him. Many farmers in the central provinces would only be too glad to get men and families to assist them, because many of them have too much land and not enough help to cultivate it. Some of these lands are capable of producing from 33 1-3 to 50 per cent more than they are producing at the present time with limited labour. Intending settlers from any of the cities of Canada, or incoming immigrants would have no difficulty in settling on the land or obtaining a lease and getting assistance from the owners of the land in order to get employment on the land.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): I do not think it is too late to suggest to the minister that he should withdraw this resolution, so that hon. members may study it and become more familiar with it. It is rather a radical move, a move that I would expect from my hon. friends from my left rather than from the Minister of the Interior. At least it is establishing something new that would have a bad effect on the public treasury. I am sure if the minister would withdraw the resolution he would be doing the country a kindness. It is all right to laugh, but at the same time you are loading up the industrial world and the country generally with something that it cannot carry, as an hon. member stated a short time ago. The government is getting into difficulties all over, with rural credits, pensions and everything else that is being suggested. Who is going to carry the burden? I do not wish to talk about it. I think the minister should use his judgment and withdraw the resolution. It is a radical move, this suggestion to spoon-feed the people.

Mr. BENNETT: The Conservative government are doing it in England.

Mr. SPENCE (Parkdale): I do not care what they are doing.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think there is a great deal of misapprehension about the resolution. I do not see the danger suggested by my hon. friend who has just spoken. While the losses in connection with the activities of the Soldier Settlement Board have been large and will be larger, after all the board has served a very useful purpose in Canada. No one will deny that. The difficulty to-day with the man going upon the land is that he has not got money. It is all right to talk about the ease with which a man can secure an improved farm. I know all about that. I have some farms I would not mind selling to someone on crop payments, without any payment down, but I could not afford to sell them for nothing. Incidentally, while a man is working a farm on crop payments, he must have at least $2,000 with which to purchase stock and implements before he can farm the land. So that he is met at every corner with a handicap. There is inherent in the human mind, no matter where we go, a desire to own land, whether in the city or in the country. It is a laudable ambition, because the ownership of land ties a man to the land and to the country and makes him a much more valuable citizen than he would be if he had no ties or stake in the country. I want to encourage not only the young man in the country, but those who are in the cities and towns at the present time, to go out and procure land which they will have a reasonable chance of owning within a certain length of time.

I think I can safeguard this legislation so thoroughly that the loss will be reduced to the minimum. I do not mean to say that when the government directly advances say from two to four thousand dollars by way of farm loans upon an improved farm, it is not taking a considerable chance in regard to the repayment of the loan. The loan companies lose a great deal of money, and they exercise much care. When you go into it on such a scale you sometimes lose money. But when you have an encumbrance on the land and the land is the property of the crown; when all you are doing is trying to give the man a sufficient amount to carry him along as he improves that land, and when you provide a safeguard by ensuring that he does not get more than the value of the improvements he places upon the land, the chances of loss are reduced to a minimum.

Mr. McGIBBON: How much does the minister think it would cost, roughly, on an average to clear this land per acre?? I know he cannot give exact figures.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If someone was hired to do the work it would probably cost $5 to $7.50 an acre. If the settler does it himself, the cost represents exactly the amount of energy he puts into the work, but we may say it would cost him on an average $5 an acre to clear that bush land. We have cleared whole townships of it in Alberta by burning. There is a very prosperous settlement that I know well on the Edmonton-Dunvegan railway where three townships were burned over by officers of the Department of the Interior and were cleared very rapidly in that way. That is exceptionally easy clearing, and probably it did not cost us more than twenty-five cents an acre to do it. Generally speaking there is sufficient timber on these lands to provide for the erection of log buildings. Many of these settlers would not under any circumstance get the maximum advance, but the advances would keep them at work improving their land whereas otherwise they would have to leave and finally abandon the land because they would have to go out in order to earn sufficient money to support their wives and families.

Mr. McGIBBON: All a man would have after three years would be his wages, which would be paid by the government.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Not necessarily, because in my experience in western Canada, although this may not be true in the east, every homesteader has an opportunity during at least two months in the year of earning very high wages. During the last few years he has been earning, in harvesting operations and threshing, five to six dollars a day, with board; so that he earns a very respectable amount of money in that way in a very short time. This is merely supplemental in order to keep him on the land until the spring when he can best perform his duties, and to encourage him, if it is possible to do so, to own the land and to become a contented settler.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Clause 5 reads:

That no settlement loan shall be made upon the security of improvements upon any provincial crown land, unless the province by appropriate legislation, has provided that the improvements upon the security of which any such loan is made shall be subject to a first charge for the amount of such loan with interest, and that no patent shall be issued for the said land until such loan with interest is repaid in full.

I do not see very much security that is going to be given in that way. In the first place the Minister of Justice may take care that his province will not permit the minister to put a federal mortgage on provincial crown land, and next if the province withholds the crown patent until the loan is paid, supposing the loan is never paid how is the government going to get title? Suppose, for example, in the case of crown land in Ontario a loan is made and patent does not issue. All the man mortgages is his right to a patent if ever he repays the loan. It is a sort of equity to title.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The arrangement will be between the provincial government and the federal government in that respect.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know, but that is the basis of the arrangement as outlined in the resolution. All the province agrees to is that it will not issue patent until the loan is paid and that the loan will be a first charge. The province holds the patent; all the man mortgages is his right to patent once the loan is paid.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): But the land would not be patented to anybody. The loan would be a prior claim on the land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How is the government going to get title if the loan is not paid? There is no way in the world that it can get title. A man settles in northern Ontario, and the provincial government have passed legislation in Ontario that first of all if he borrows from the federal government the loan will be a first charge. They pass legislation also that they will not issue a patent until the loan to the federal government is paid. Let us suppose that is all done as is provided in the resolution and then the settler does not pay. Will anyone suggest how the government is going to get title? It cannot get title.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They get title to sell the property in order to recoup themselves.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The crown patent has not issued.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The loan is the only charge that will be against the land and surely the officials of the government would not be so simple as to lend money upon land which was not worth it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is not the point.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Is it simply the point that we would not be able to foreclose and recoup ourselves?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, because there is no title to foreclose on. The title is in the province of Ontario.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): We would be in the position of having a first mortgage on the land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very good, but the patent has not issued.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee took recess at six o'clock we were discussing a certain proposed resolution to authorize advances to settlers on crown lands. Is the committee ready for the question?

Mr. ROGERS: No, not yet.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Will the bill contain any provision to prevent a settler going into debt in anticipation of getting a loan and then assigning the money to his creditors?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Of course, this is purely a case of a mortgage upon the property after certain improvements have been made. The settler must first improve his land to warrant any advance to him.

Mr. FOSTER: Has the government information as to the provinces in which these lands are located? What demand has been made, and by whom, for the introduction of this legislation involving an expenditure of $5,000,000?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The bulk of the land is in the prairie provinces and is vested in the federal government. As I pointed out this afternoon, the provincial governments of Ontario and Quebec have adopted a similar scheme for the settlement of their crown lands.

Mr. FOSTER: Where are these lands located?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): This afternoon I gave the acreage and location of the lands in the western provinces.

Mr. FOSTER: I beg my hon. friend's pardon, I missed the statement.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I did not give the localities.

Mr. FOSTER: That is what I am particularly interested in. I have knowledge of some of the territory in the western provinces. I do not know whether the lands I have in mind are vested in the crown or not; that is why I put my question. Do any of the lands east of the city of Winnipeg along the Canadian National lines come into this scheme?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Yes.

Mr. FOSTER: Is the land northwest and northeast of Winnipeg in that section east of the lakes vested in the crown?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There is some crown land there. Practically all lands in the northern portion of the three prairie provinces have been inspected by the inspectors of the Soldier Settlement Board. Those lands do not include any acreage such as I gave this afternoon. For example, out of a million acres in Saskatchewan, between 300,000 and 400,000 acres have been inspected by the Soldier Settlement Board inspectors, who have recommended the land, which is mostly brush and woodland, as suitable for settlement. In Manitoba I think land in five or six different localities has been inspected. In Alberta the Soldier Settlement Board inspectors have inspected five or six hundred thousand acres of land, mostly covered with timber and brush, that they recommend as being suitable for settlement. Those are the lands I have particularly in mind.

Mr. BURY: I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that the committee recognizes two things at least: that the problem with which we are faced to-day is the result, first, of the absolute lack of any proper system of colonization, of any proper principles. The orderly development of the city of Edmonton was tied up for years by the great block of land held by the Hudson's Bay Company and we were forced in consequence to extend our various utilities to reach the settled parts in the outskirts of the city. The committee recognizes also, I think, the sincerity and earnestness of the minister in charge of this proposal, and that he really conceives it to be a serious attempt to solve the problem. I do not like to criticize his proposal, although in point of fact criticism is the prerogative of the opposition and the price of office, but it seems to me that the government is indulging in an agricultural experiment which is going to mean nothing but a harvest of political disappointment and a financial loss to the country.

Before dealing with the elements of the proposal, may I mention one or two statements made by the minister which are misleading? In the first place, he spoke of the proposal as being a settlement, and the settlers as being settled under the act. I do not understand that there is any such thing as a settlement under the proposed act. The act, if it is passed, will possibly bring certain settlers within its purview and the range of its benefits, but I do not understand the phrase "settlement under the act." So far as I can see, there is no such thing.

The minister mentioned a fifteen-mile limit. I cannot find any reference to a fifteen-mile limit in the proposal as we have it before the committee. Perhaps the minister can discover it himself, but it has eluded me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not there.

Mr. BURY: The minister also said that this proposal was for the purpose of helping to put settlers on the land. That of course, is not correct: the settler is on the land before he gets any assistance at all. He may be on the land for some years before he is in a position to make application for a loan, as I hope to prove in a few minutes.

Finally, the minister talks about a charge on the land. He gave the committee to understand that the federal government would have, as security for the loans, a charge on the land. In no sense is that true. If the land belongs to the federal government, the federal government can have no charge upon its own land, and if it is provincial government land the federal government certainly can have no charge on it unless the provincial government actually gives such charge. What the federal government will have by way of security for any loans it makes under the scheme will be a kind of equitable claim or charge against the interest of the particular settler, an interest which is very vague and indeterminate; and the moment it is abandoned, that very moment the security goes, and the money along with the security, because the only thing that will be left will be the personal covenant or promise of the settler. When the settler abandons his land, therefore, his personal covenant becomes absolutely worthless.

It is necessary for the committee to have these facts clearly in mind, and not to labour under the delusion that moneys that will be advanced under the scheme will have behind them anything which we can properly call a land security, or any tangible security, or any security which, in point of fact, can be realized at all. The fact is that it will be absolutely in the power of the settler at any moment to extinguish the security merely by his leaving the homestead and throwing the land back on the government.

The minister has said that the purpose of the proposal is to settle crown lands within fifteen miles of the railways. He has gone further and assured us that the reason there is any such land still available is that homesteaders have passed it up long since and gone out into the country forty and fifty miles further on, rather than take them up. Why? They have passed these lands up either because they were poor or because, although being rich lands, they were so heavily timbered that it did not pay to clear the ground. I take it for granted that the land that would be brought within the purview of the proposed act would be not poor, but very heavily timbered, land. The question arises, then, as to what it would cost to clear such land. The Minister of the Interior tells us that it would cost $5 an acre to clear it. I do not think that is correct. Hon. gentlemen to my left understand something about clearing land, and I leave it to their judgment whether I am not nearer the mark when I say that the cost of clearing the land would be more like $15 or $20 per acre. Of course it entirely depends on the weight and thickness of the timber. If land could be cleared at $5 an acre it would not now be available for homesteading if it is within fifteen miles of a railway. I do not think anyone will dispute that statement. I happened to be in the northern part of the country two or three years ago in the neighbourhood of the Lesser Slave lake, and I saw some homesteads there with heavy timber on them. It was beautiful land. I asked some of the settlers what it would cost to clear such land, and they said $40 an acre. "In the name of fortune", I said, "how can it possibly pay a man to clear land at $40 an acre? Would it not be infinitely better to pay $10 an acre to begin with and get land already cleared?" That is a question which will be readily answered. However, if what the Minister of the Interior suggests is correct, and if this land can be cleared at a cost of $5 an acre, it means that before the unforutnate man can get a loan of $500 he must clear 100 acres of land. If he does not clear the whole 100 acres then he must put up a fence and build a house by way of improvement, which would mean that probably he would be on the farm about three years at the very least before he would have such improvements as would be worth $500. When he would have made improvements that would be worth $1,000 I leave it to the committee to imagine.

There is one other thing the committee must keep in mind. The minister has suggested that improved farms are so valuable in Alberta that a man has no difficulty in raising a loan of $600. I can only tell him that I lent a man personally $250 on an improved farm in Alberta near a railway station, and although that was ten years ago I am still whistling for the $250. In my office I am attending to two files representing mortgages, one of which started with a loan of $450 on a farm within a quarter of a mile of the railway station. That was an improved farm and I cannot get any money out of it. I have another farm up in the Peace river district in which there is a loan of about $800 and it will keep me scratching to get my money out of that transaction. And these are all improved farms. The truth of the matter is that by reason of the fall in land values there are plenty of improved farms in Alberta that can be sold cheap, and I feel very much inclined to support the suggestion made by an hon. member to my left, whose constituency I cannot name, that it would be better for the government not to try to clear these heavily timbered lands but, if they are going to do anything in the direction now suggested, rather to assist in putting improved farms that are now derelict back into occupation and use. The settling of heavily timbered lands might come later, when through an increase in population in the immediate neighbourhood, the general price of land goes up and when there may be a greater market for the timber, so that those who might take them up could get something of appreciable worth from the clearing of the land itself. But to tackle the problem in the way the government now proposes, means, to my mind, that this country will be faced again with another fiasco and with a burden of debt. In Alberta we have seen the results of attempts to assist the agricultural industry. We had a famous cow bill once, the provisions of which all parties in Alberta united in passing.

Mr. HANSON: Who was the author of it?

Mr. BURY: The Liberal government was the author of that cow bill, but to be perfectly fair, I must say that the Conservative members of the House ardently supported it when it was brought forward. But nobody mentions the cow bill now except with bated breath or when no one is around.

It is all very well to talk of advancing money only to the extent of the actual improvements, and it is all very well to have your valuators go on the land to find out what the actual improvements are, but will the committee remember this: that the improvements on which they are proposing to advance this money are wasting improvements, that when a man steps out of his land, the breaking goes back into the old condition and becomes grass, or worse still, weeds. The neighbours around who want fence posts come along and take fence posts and the wire, and those who want doors and windows come and take the doors and windows for their houses. By and by the roof goes, then the walls, and finally there is just about as much left to mark the place where those buildings and outbuildings were as there is over the site of Sodom and Gomorrah.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The mortgage will still be there.

Mr. BURY: There is no mortgage because there is nothing left on the land. There is only the promise of the settler to pay and the security of his tenure and his right of tenure in the land. When that is thrown up, the whole security is gone, and if there is any value at all in the improvements it is a wasting value. Every man who has handled mortgages in this country, especially in the west, knows very well that when he gets a derelict farm back on his hands, he may as well count it as new, unimproved land, because the breaking goes back into the old condition and becomes grass or weeds. Every fence post and every yard of wire, every stick and timber in the house, goes in process of time, and you have nothing left except what you had in the beginning, with this difference only, that some of the trees have been cut down and some of the stumps removed, and the ground is that much easier for some future tenant to break. For this reason, Mr. Chairman, I think the government would be well advised not to plunge with eyes half closed, or under the impulsion of any oblique influence from any side of this House, into a scheme which I know, and I think every member of this committee knows in his heart of hearts, means a further financial burden and further financial loss.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that hon. members who have been criticizing this resolution are taking much too serious a view of the situation. I think it is this amount of $5,000,000 that really looms large in the minds of a great many members who have spoken. Having a little knowledge of the conditions, I venture the prophecy that $5,000,000 will not be spent in this way within the next ten or fifteen years. I am perfectly satisfied that this scheme is going to be taken advantage of only by what I would call workingmen, men who work out during the summer months and earn big wages perhaps in harvest and threshing time, and who are willing to put up a house on a quarter section of rough land, leaving the wife there during the summer, and coming back home in the winter and gradually clearing and improving that land. There is a great deal of groundless fear on the part of our eastern friends as to the expenditure that will be made under this scheme.

Mr. BURY: What is the check on it?

Mr. FORKE: They have to make certain improvements, and the most they can receive is $1,000.

Mr. BURY: Does the hon. member not agree that the fewer the number that take advantage of this scheme, the less useful it is? His very argument that it is going to be taken advantage of by only a very few surely means that the scheme is going to be of very little use.

Mr. FORKE: I think the hon. member has not caught the point. I say this scheme will be taken advantage of by a certain class of people who have not sufficient capital to go on what I would call a really good cleared farm. It will appeal to men who are working out by the day during the summer and going back to the farm in the winter and making their improvements. My hon. friend from East Edmonton said that when one of these farms is vacated the fence posts and even the doors and windows of the houses are stolen by the neighbours. If there was anything else left, Mr. Chairman, I think the lawyers would get it.

Mr. BURY: That is why I am so poor.

Mr. FORKE: I was rather surprised, I will not say at the indignation shown by the hon member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) this afternoon, because I believe he was quite in earnest when he spoke of the terrible burdens the east was carrying for the west. This was only another scheme, in his view, whereby millions would be loaded on to the shoulders of the eastern people. Mr. Chairman, I do not know when this sort of talk, this everlasting story of the east carrying the west upon its shoulders, is going to end. I have borrowed money sometimes, I suppose from eastern capitalists, and I never got it for less than 8 per cent. I never supposed there was any favour in the thing; it was simply a business transaction, and if hon. members in the east have made bad investments in western Canada it must have been through their want of sound business judgment. I cannot understand this constant talk of the east bearing the burdens of the west, of every move made in western Canada as being something that is going to be a further burden on the shoulders of the east. I deplore that sort of talk, and I think we ought to stop it. The people of the three western prairie provinces do not want any charity; all they want is fair play and a square deal.

An hon. MEMBER: They take all that is coming to them.

Mr. FORKE: You do not hear us talking that way of eastern Canada. You do not hear any western man finding fault with the east or with the Maritime provinces. We are perfectly ready to help the east and the Maritime provinces in every way we can. Furthermore, I say this talk does not make for a united Canada, and I want to see a united Canada. I want this talk of east and west, of one carrying the burdens of the other, to stop, because I do not believe there is anything in it.

Mr. HANSON: May I ask the hon. member how he expects to have a united Canada in the face of the Speech from the Throne that this government brought down this year?

Mr. FORKE: How often hon. members are pointing across the floor and saying, "this" government. This government is here, and apparently it is going to stay here for some time.

Mr. BURY: Does the hon. member think that he should have been pointed to instead?

Mr. FORKE: I am not going to take up very much time, and I hope hon. members will allow me to finish. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is now in his seat, and I wish to relieve his mind a little. I want to tell him there is no danger that the east is going to be swamped by this little insignificant attempt that is being made at the present time to help some of the workingmen to get homesteads out in western Canada or in any of the other provinces. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George—I am repeating this just for his benefit—seemed to get very much worked up this afternoon about the tremendous burden that was being heaped on the shoulders of the eastern people through some of the commitments that are being made in western Canada. Mr. Chairman, I repeat that I repudiate any such statement. I know something about the history of railroad building and of the opening up of western Canada. I have seen that part of the west in which I live develop from the prairie to the point that we have there now a civilized community; we have roads and bridges, rural mail delivery, and all the conveniences of modern civilization. I know something about western Canada, and I think we ought to stop this talk about the east carrying all the burdens for the west.

What remedy do these critics propose in place of the scheme that we are now considering? Hon. members continually repeat the assertion that what we want to-day in this Dominion is a larger population. We want more people, they say. What are we going to do with them? I wish the hon. members who make this statement so frequently would tell us what we can do with them.

Mr. CAHAN: I will tell my hon. friend, if he will permit me. We are bringing into this country $600,000,000 of foreign products that can be manufactured in the Dominion.

Mr. FORKE: I had an idea what my hon. friend would suggest before he made his statement.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

Mr. FORKE: A great many arguments have been advanced during the last four years in an effort to prove the truth of that assertion. I have as yet failed to see that it will remedy the problems we have to meet. We are producing more goods than we can sell now, and they are being produced at a cost which renders it impossible to compete with other countries. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George would restrict the buying power of the people of Canada by forcing them to buy the goods that are produced here, notwithstanding the price at which they are produced.

An hon. MEMBER: Be patriotic.

Mr. FORKE: I am just as patriotic as hon. gentlemen who adopt that line of argument. But I am convinced that even if those hon. gentlemen had their way and obtained increased protection, that would not solve the problems with which we are now confronted. If any hon. member who favours that argument will give it serious thought he will soon come to the conclusion that his theory will not solve our problems. We have heard it stated, and it has been repeated time and time again, that we have all the facilities necessary to carry on business for twice our population, and that we need population to help to bear the capital expenditure that has been made in procuring those facilities. Now I come back to the question as to what we are going to do with the population we now have. You do not want them in the towns; you say you have not markets enough now for the goods you are producing in the industrial centres, and that you want to create a greater market in this Dominion. How are you going to create that market? By an increased population engaged in creating natural wealth. Now, I want to draw a distinction, Mr. Chairman, between what I call creating natural wealth and creating industrial wealth, because there is quite a difference between the two. I want hon. members to understand that I do not belittle in any way the production of wealth by industrial methods. Industry adds to the value of an article by shaping it so that it will be available for the actual use of humanity. Wealth derived directly from the soil is actually created wealth. Not only that, but the soil produces wealth that pays for the employment necessary to its production. These are the A B C's of economics, and no one who has studied the subject for a moment can fail to understand them.

The great problem before us to-day then, is to increase our population, and the only way in which that can be successfully done is by increasing our agricultural population. How are you going to do that? By making those who are already living on the soil industrious and contented. Now we get back to the basis of the whole theory that has brought this section of the House into parliament. I want to make the statement here that this is no sectional or narrow view: I honestly believe that the whole economic structure of our country is built upon an agricultural basis. I am not for a moment arguing that agriculture is everything in Canada. But let me say this: make agriculture prosperous and you will solve the problem we have before us.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George told us that the per capita wealth of western Canada was much greater than the per capita wealth of eastern Canada. Well, I am sorry the hon. gentleman was not in the House when the hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Bury) was speaking, because he told us about some farms of a few hundred acres on which there were mortgages, that the mortagees had never been able to pay off. There is something wrong in that line of reasoning. On the one hand they are unable to pay off the mortgages on those farms in the west, and on the other hand the west has a larger per capita wealth than the east.

Mr. CAHAN: We have some in the east as well.

Mr. FORKE: An hon. member asks me what about the people in the towns. I claim that if things are carried on as they ought to be in the west the people in the towns will be exactly in the same position. If there is more wealth in the cities than there is in the rural districts in western Canada it is because there is something economically wrong. That should not be the case.

I did not intend to make a speech when I rose, but I want to repeat that there is nothing in this scheme that is alarming, nothing that is going to saddle the country with very much additional debt. I do think, however, it will afford an opportunity for a class of people we have in western Canada, men who work by the day and gather up perhaps four or five hundred dollars in the harvest and threshing time, to get back to their quarter section, if they have one, and spend the winter months in improving and clearing that scrub land. Not only that, but such a man will be able to provide a home for his wife and his children. He may be able even to keep a certain number of chickens and a cow or two. I say there is nothing very alarming about the proposal. It will open up certain districts for settlement for a class of men who will not be able to undertake farming on a more ambitious scale.

Mr. HANNESSON: I understand the hon. member was president of the Union of Municipalities in Manitoba for some years, and has had experience in connection with the tying up of unpatented lands from a municipal point of view. How does he suggest that this scheme is going to help development in the western country?

Mr. FORKE: The situation cannot be any worse than it is, because these lands are not paying taxes now.

Mr. HANNESSON: Until the settlers get on them they do not, but the moment they do you increase the municipal expense without providing the municipality with any source of revenue.

Mr. FORKE: I do not see that there is any difficulty there, because if a man is settled on a quarter section of land and earning money at all the taxes on that character of land ought to be very low. The municipality would thus be in a safer position than if the land were lying idle and unoccupied.

Mr. DENIS (Joliette): I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the resolution, but I think the government should proceed very cautiously in this direction. The venture of lending money to settlers is not new in this country. A few years ago an act was passed under which moneys were loaned to returned soldiers. If I remember rightly that was done under the Soldier Settlement Act. I am speaking from memory now, but I think that under that act something like $100,000,000—the minister tells me $102,000,000—were loaned to returned soldiers. The wisdom of lending money to settlers was the same then as it is now, but at the time that act was passed the paramount argument was that returned soldiers had to be helped and that the country should be in a position to assume whatever risks such loans would entail. In my opinion that was the chief argument; that was the main reason. The government that promoted the legislation at that time should have been blamed very severely, because experience has proven that through this scheme of lending money to the settlers the country is losing each year enormous amounts of money. There is no question that out of the $100,000,000 that was loaned to soldiers a very large amount will never be collected and will be lost. I am not saying this by way of criticism, but I wish to point out that the venture of lending money to settlers is not new, and now that we have had the experience of one venture of the kind; now that we know the result which can be achieved by our lending money to settlers, I can hardly understand the wisdom of going into a new venture of making advances, not to soldiers, but to settlers generally—civilians. If one will make a study of these loans to returned soldiers, one may very well imagine that similar conditions will obtain under this loan. Soldiers have borrowed money, but after one, two or three years they found they could not continue on the land; they had to abandon their farms and go away, and some of the farms became practically worthless. Soldiers have borrowed money in some cases in excess of the value of the farm; of course that was the fault of the officials who recommended the loan. In many cases they have been unable to repay, and what are you going to do with them? Are you going to take their farms away from them? Are you going to bring actions in law against them? You can hardly do that. What I am saying with regard to the soldiers applies with greater force to the civilians. The same difficulties which have been encountered with soldiers will be encountered with civilians, and that is why I state that the wisdom of this legislation is faulty.

Mr. STEVENS: I wish to ask a question which I think would give us a little lead in this discussion. Will the minister indicate why it is desirable to have virtually a rural credit scheme of this kind, when the government are about to introduce legislation of a general character for rural credits? In my estimation this scheme, so far as it has merits, might very well be included in a general rural credit scheme. Why have the two?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The rural credit scheme will be designed for the purpose of lending money to people who own their property. The ownership under the proposal we are considering rests in the crown and will remain in the crown until the loan is repaid. When I began to think about this matter I had the same idea as my hon. friend. I thought a combination of the two might work out, but it will be impossible to work it out, inasmuch as this is merely a loan to assist the man to get his farm under cultivation, earn his patent and get matters into shape so that he can take advantage of the rural credit scheme when he obtains the patent for the land. He may do what ninety-five per cent of the homesteaders in western Canada have done already. A few years ago when homesteaders earned their patents—and I think the hon. member for East Edmonton will bear me out in this—in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred they went to the mortgage company and arranged for a loan. They had some indebtedness; they paid it off and obtained a loan, generally about $800, sometimes paying eight per cent and sometimes nine. This scheme is for a different purpose; it is to lend them money on the progress they make in clearing up their land and making it of some value, to bring their homestead to a stage where perhaps they can get through with a very much smaller loan than they have had to negotiate in the past. That is the only difference between this scheme and rural credits.

In reply to the hon. member for East Edmonton, I have seen a great deal of what he has stated as having happened in the case of the homesteaders—not altogether in the case of the homesteaders, because he has reference to the secondary stage, in which there was a mortgage on the land, and of course the mortgage was a detriment to the new settler taking advantage of the scheme of purchase. It has always been so; it is true every day. These lands will remain in the crown, with a mortgage against them; why? Because it is better business to go back thirty miles from a railway and take up land, than to buy lands lying close to railway facilities or close to towns, and pay the claims that may be against them. Where the land remains in the crown, where it is subject to re-entry, if it is worth anything at all it does not remain very long in that position. I am not going to argue that in the case of the man who abandons his land, say having earned $500, the same condition will not apply. The new homesteader might rather take his chance on a homestead entirely free from encumbrance than one carrying a small mortgage with nine per cent interest attached.

I am not claiming that I have discovered anything new or striking about this matter, but I do claim that if judiciously applied, on reasonably good land, it will assist materially in the settlement of that land. Even in our province, in the newer territory back of Peace river, where you have a good climate and good open land, you can obtain all kinds of homesteads, but that entails expenditure of money for the construction of new railways. I have always been opposed to that; when in the provincial government of Alberta I did my best to discourage the spreading of settlement, because it entailed the building of roads and schools to serve sparse settlements over large areas of land. That has been our practical difficulty in western Canada ever since I knew it. I do hope the rural credit scheme will consolidate settlement where we have land privately owned in the hands of the people, or even in the hands of prospective purchasers, because we hope to settle 1,200 families from the Old Country on improved lands under the arrangement we have with the British government. These lands are all in the hands of the Soldier Settlement Board at the present time, and that may relieve the somewhat difficult situation there. The rural credit scheme will help the farmer who finds it difficult, at the present high rates of interest, to remain on his land. I am going to ask hon. members, in the next bill that comes up, to consider some provision for assistance to soldier settlers, many of whom at present find themselves in a very serious position, which will enable them to remain on their land. All these things are designed with a view to thickening up settlement, to using the railways for which we have already paid, and to assisting materially in building up the country itself. If the committee will allow this resolution to pass I will, having in mind some of the suggestions made by hon. gentlemen, have the bill amended in that respect before it is given its second reading.

Mr. HANSON: I asked the hon. member for Brandon a few moments ago to answer what seemed to be a very pertinent question in view of the remarks which he had just been extending towards members of parliament from eastern Canada. I invite his serious consideration of that question which I asked of him, and I invite him to reply to it on the floor of this House. But it is not for that purpose that I rise now. Dealing directly with the resolution which is now before the chair, and having regard to the remarks made by the hon. member for East Edmonton a few minutes ago, I should like to know the real purpose of this legislation. I may be obtuse; I may not know conditions in the west, but the real necessity for this legislation is not apparent to me and to a large number of other hon. members. Is it to take care of a situation which has arisen as a result of the soldier settlement scheme?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): No.

Mr. HANSON: Then what is it? In other words, to use the language of the hon. member for East Edmonton, what is the oblique influence behind this legislation causing this government to embark on a money-lending scheme? I take it that it is sound governmental practice for a government to keep out of the money-lending business. We have done altogether too much of it in Canada; we are paying the piper to-day and posterity will pay the piper to-morrow.

There is another feature in connection with this contemplated settlement of crown lands in the provinces. I do not know what the practice is in the older provinces of Ontario and Quebec, but I do know something about the practice in New Brunswick. They have a system of settlement of crown lands in that province under what is known as the Labour Act. A would-be settler on crown lands goes in and makes his clearance. He is given practically as many years as he likes, but he must clear and cultivate ten acres and erect a building on it. When he does that he is entitled to a free grant of 160 acres of land, but until he does that he gets no patent. The process is a long, slow one, because most of that land is heavily timbered and it costs not $20 but $50 or $100 an acre to clear it. The would-be settler does this work at odd times, for instance in the spring of the year. He burns what he calls his fallow and he clears it up gradually while he is doing other work.

Has the minister consulted members of the provincial governments in regard to this scheme? Does he think it will be taken advantage of by any of the older provinces? I do not think for a minute it will be of the slightest advantage to any single province in eastern Canada, but with all due respect to the opinion of the hon. member for Brandon I think we shall pay the major part of the bill. I would not object to that so much if there was any real foundation for the belief that it would be a success, because I realize, as most men do who have been in this House for any number of years, that we must get more people on the land in Canada and make it profitable for them to stay there. I know that in the older parts of Canada there are many fertile farms which might be peopled with good settlers if they had some form of proper assistance. This is not the class of scheme that will bring about that result.

What is the expert opinion of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell)? He is never very slow to give us the benefit of his advice. Has he examined into this scheme? What has he to say about it? I cannot conscientiously vote for this scheme unless I find that it has his imprimatur, and I invite him now to get up and give us the benefit of his views, having regard not only to the three prairie provinces, including the one which he represents, but to the other great provinces of this Dominion, the new provinces as well as the old ones. Let us hear from the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I could not resist such a pressing invitation to say something on this subject although I thought it was receiving ample attention from the various members of the House. The committee will recall that during the last four years this government has been subject to a great deal of adverse criticism by my hon. friends opposite and their press because we were not doing something to promote immigration to Canada. As a matter of fact it was said that the number of immigrants was getting less and that apparently not very much was being done. In 1920, immediately after the close of the war, there was a tremendous deflation in agricultural prices and this rendered agriculture for a number of years quite unprofitable to those who were here and well established. The years 1921, 1922 and 1923 particularly were years of loss and in some cases of disaster to many farmers in Canada, although perhaps they were no worse off, if not better off, than farmers in other countries. But it was not a good time to take a forward step in promoting immigration to this country, for the simple reason that immigrants would experience tremendous difficulty in getting established under the conditions that prevailed during those three years. Since then conditions have changed; prices have got better, and we have experienced two or three good crops. That, accompanied by good management and thrift on the part of the farmers themselves, has brought about better financial conditions amongst the farmers generally. That, in turn, has had its effect on immigration; prospective immigrants in larger numbers are desirous of coming to our shores, and the government feels justified at this time in encouraging them to come because conditions are such that they should be able to make a success. That is briefly why we are taking an advanced step at this time as against not taking it in 1921. At that time it would have been unfortunate to place on the land people with practically no money and, expect them to make good under conditions under which old settlers, well established, found it difficult to succeed. Judging from the criticism of some hon. members one would think that this is a radical departure. It is not. For the last forty years we have given some form of assistance to homesteaders, especially in the west; not of this nature, it is true, but after they got on their homesteads how many times has seed grain been given to them, as well as fodder for their animals and food for themselves, in addition to loans of one description and another? That is no new thing.

Mr. HANSON: That assistance was not part of a settlement scheme; it was given to meet abnormal conditions.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Let me go back further than that. A hundred years ago the government assisted settlers to establish themselves in the woods of Ontario and other parts of Canada, the assistance taking the form of loans, equipment and tools. Quite frequently those loans were wiped off to still further encourage the settlers. In a word, it was found necessary in order to encourage settlement to give some form of assistance that settlers might establish themselves in this new land. Surely that was good work, Mr. Chairman. From that day down to this some form of assistance has been held out to settlers to establish themselves on the land. To-day, even if you give the maximum loan under this resolution, it is not as much of an attraction as the governments of Canada have been holding out for the last thirty or forty years in the form of free homesteads on the open plain. Such a homestead as used to be available fifteen or twenty years ago was worth more as a drawing card for settlers than the average homestead of to-day plus the maximum loan under this bill.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, no scheme can be evolved that is not subject to some form of criticism. The right hon. leader of the opposition was true to himself to-day as he pictured the gall and wormwood of disappointment that would follow when we tried to collect the loans to be granted under this scheme. No lending scheme either by a private individual or by a government has been carried out without some loss; that is inevitable. Now, are we to refrain from encouraging settlement on our vacant lands because there is a possibility of some of the loans not being repaid? No. I think the time is ripe when we should go forward and endeavour to people the great waste spaces in western Canada and other parts of the Dominion. Those who are likely to come to Canada at this time are not men of extensive means. If they have substantial means I fancy they are not going to embark on farming just yet; there are other attractions. Consequently our settlers will be men of limited means. The first step the government took under the Minister of the Interior to promote this forward movement was in the reduction of the ocean and railway transportation rates for settlers. It now costs three pounds sterling to land them at Halifax as against at least twice that much in former years. The next step is to hold out a drawing card that will attract them just as a good plains homestead did twenty or twenty-five years ago. Naturally risks will have to be taken in connection with this work. Such security as is available will be taken, but with this difference from an ordinary loan, that the money will not be paid out to the settler until it is warranted by his having established himself on the land, that is by building a home, digging a well, and so on, in order to enable him to go on his farm with his family. It is well known that few men went out to the west with anything but the clothes on their back and a keen desire to work. Ordinarily those men were not able to bring out their families for two or three years. Under this scheme a settler will be able to put up his shack and stable and bring out his family without delay,—and farming is a pretty slavish uphill business to a man struggling along alone.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How will he bring his family out when he gets his loan only on the security of the improvements he has made?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is one thing sure, he will be able to bring them out sooner as a result of the loan. And what is more, the very fact that he is able to stay on his homestead and put up his house without having to go out to work and earn the money is surely in his favour.

Mr. BURY: How can he use the money to put up his house and make his improvements if he does not get his loan until those improvements are all made?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Now, Mr. Chairman, the lawyers can quibble and squirm about this all they like but I have gone through it all.

Mr. BURY: Will the hon. minister tell me just exactly how it can be done because it will be worth money.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know it can be done, it has been done and it will be done better with a little aid than without any.

Mr. BURY: Will the hon. minister tell me how to do it?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, as I listened to my hon. friend describe the emaciated condition of his own clients, I was thinking that his speech would not help to bring any immigrants to Canada. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, if our friends opposite would just realize that their gloomy forebodings will counteract the effects of all our aid,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is the fact. Certainly any prospective immigrant will be discouraged who may have the bad fortune to read the dispiriting speeches by my hon. friends opposite that the loans under this proposal will be squandered by the settlers and only a few ruins be left on the prairie to mark where once houses and stables stood. If my hon. friends think that their gloomy talk will promote land settlement, I do not agree with them. I think the time has come when we should discuss this question from the standpoint of actually promoting the settlement of our vacant lands.

I notice there is a tendency to take the ground that what our people want is work. Will any homesteader in this chamber tell me any better way of giving a man work than by putting him on a homestead? Did you ever see a farmer or a homesteader out of a job? I never did. My hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) and another hon. member, I think my friend from St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), put it very nicely when they suggested that what we wanted was industry. Well, that gets us back to the old question of protection. Now, I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if the early British settlers who were brought out here shortly after the Napoleonic wars found industries established here? Did the British government first attempt to establish industries in this part of the world, or was not their primary anxiety to get settlers on the land, which would eventually necessitate the establishing of industries to supply their various requirements?

Mr. BENNETT: The minister knows they had protection.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is simply putting the cart before the horse. Industries came later. And so to-day we must first get men on the land, and then the supplying of their needs will necessitate the establishment of more industries or the speeding up of those we already have. Consequently work must come at the beginning, because the man on a homestead is never known to be out of a job; industries will come later.

I think the Minister of the Interior is working along right lines. This is a modest beginning. I can understand my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition being somewhat wary of even these small loans, because he has gone through the somewhat excruciating experience associated with the soldier settlement scheme which I think he was partly responsible for. I do not want to criticize that scheme severely, because it was undertaken with the best intention to be kind to the soldiers; but it loaded them up with debts running from $5,000 to $7,000. Those of us on the prairies had misgivings, and I stated mine to the gentleman who had charge of the board and who seemed to agree with me. I said I thought it was better to go slow rather than to go head over heels into debt; I did not think that more than one out of three or four of the soldiers who got these large loans would ever be able to extricate themselves from their indebtedness. Unfortunately that has come true, and we must be wary about any proposal of the kind. But under the present scheme the largest loan will be $1,000, and under proper administration, as I am sure this will be, very few will take advantage of the maximum loan. The British settlers under this arrangement will dovetail into the empire settlement scheme. Settlers from Great Britain eligible for the $500 loan will come under the provisions of that scheme, and that is one great advantage of this proposal. The others will be immigrants of various extraction, many of whom will not require any loans at all. Probably a good many of them will never make any application, for they will homestead very economically. If there is no timber they will put up a sod shack, as I have seen done. I live in a neighbourhood adjoining a town called Lemberg, and from the name one can form an idea of the origin and character of the settlers. I saw them go in there thirty years ago, and all the shelter they had was a teepee of willows tied at the top with a withe, Indian-fashion. That was the only house they had, and a little later they put up a sod shack. They progressed as time went on, and to-day the settlement is one of the most prosperous in Saskatchewan. They have fine houses with all modern conveniences, such as the telephone, and many of them have radios. They are largely out of debt into the bargain.

One of the greatest, I was almost going to say curses, to agriculture, in the prairies at any rate, has been too indiscriminate a tendency on the part of the people to go into debt. Formerly they would quarrel with the mortgage companies if they could not get another thousand added to the burden they already carried. That day has passed. We are getting away from that condition, and I hope there will not be a repetition of that orgy of reckless borrowing. Moderate borrowing is a blessing, for it can be controlled. But excessive borrowing has ruined agriculture in many instances, and to-day we are suffering from that curse.

Now, the moderate loans suggested in this proposal will have this effect, at least, of bringing people to a realization of what it means to pay back even a small amount. They will have to pay back the first loan before they can put on a second mortgage. This will be the means of steadying the borrower, so that he will not be overburdened with a debt which he will find it impossible to discharge. That is one incidental advantage in the scheme. I see the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George smiling. Let me assure him that I am not advancing any arguments; I am simply stating what I know to be a fact. I know quite well that fifteen years or so ago, men unwittingly drifted into debt to such an enormous extent that they found themselves unable afterwards to meet their obligations, and they did this under the delusion that by some turn of fortune they would be enabled to wipe out their indebtedness. They find today, however, that only by the sweat of their brow in a fearfully arduous task will they ever be able to pay their debts. The beginning under this system will be modest, and, as I have said, there will be many who will probably require no assistance at all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I see my hon friend (Mr. Hanson) laughing; I can understand his doing so. This is Greek to him.

Mr. HANSON: I want to assure the minister that I was not laughing at him.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not want to be uncomplimentary, but I do not expect my hon. friend to understand a word of what I am saying.

Mr. HANSON: I protest I was not laughing at the minister at all. I was laughing at something that was said over here.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I could not understand anything about an involved technical constitutional question; I should be just as ignorant of such a subject as the hon. member is of the matter I am now discussing. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I have covered the field pretty well.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Oh, no. I have got through and I think it is time to quit.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I do not want to take up much time, but I am in doubt as to where the government stands on this matter. I believe there is an understanding between the main wing of the Liberal party and the minor wing to my left in regard to all legislation brought into the House, and I presume that under that arrangement this subject has been duly submitted at least to the member for Brandon, the leader of the Progressive party in this House. But my understanding of what has been said by the Minister of the Interior, so beautifully amplified and clarified by the Minister of Agriculture, is entirely different from my understanding of the remarks of the hon. member for Brandon. If I have followed the Minister of the Interior correctly, the idea of the scheme is to put men on the land to work it and become farmers on their own account. No, says the member for Brandon, that is not the idea at all. He does not expect that this splendid scheme, which he endorses thoroughly, will result in many people going on the land. The hon. member for Brandon tells us that if they do go on the land they will spend their time working for other farmers. In other words, the building which they will put up on the land they acquire will be merely the place they will live in. They are not going to work their own land themselves. These people, according to the hon. member, will keep two or three cows and a few chickens, and while they work out for other farmers the family at home, the good wife and the children, will look after these cows and chickens. That is the way they are going to make their money.

Well, that brings us to the point of the special appeal that will be made in propaganda, disseminated throughout the world, to induce settlers to come in and take up land under this proposal. The government, backed up by the member for Brandon, will send out literature, calling attention to the splendid opportunity offering for men to come to this country to settle upon the land. And the hon. member for Brandon will add to that advertisement a little explanation as to the splendid wealth immigrants will amass from raising chickens and keeping two or three cows. He will point out that under this government's policy intending immigrants will be able to produce eggs and sell them in competition with eggs coming from Australia and New Zealand free of duty, or with eggs imported from China, or from the United States under a duty of three cents a dozen. He will make that perfectly clear to them, and it will be a strong inducement to them to come in and take up land. I suppose he will go on to point out the opportunities for acquiring ready cash and becoming rich which will be afforded by the production of butter in competition with butter coming in from Australia and New Zealand at a cent a pound. All this will be quite attractive, and it will undoubtedly draw thousands of people to this country. My hon. friend from Brandon will be there waiting with a smile to convince the immigrants when they come that the way to get rich in this country in farming is that provided by the policy which he has followed, the policy of buying everything which the farmers require at protected prices and selling in competition with the whole world without any protection whatever. That is his idea of the way to make them prosper in this country. The minister informs us that he expects to get people to settle on the land under this plan. The hon. member for Brandon says: I am heart and soul behind this proposition; it is a good thing, but I do not expect very many people will take advantage of it. His position, it seems to me, is absolutely illogical and absolutely unreasonable. I think that a good deal can be said in favour of trying to fill up the places which have been vacated in the older settled parts of the country; that is something we might very well attend to. But if you are going to encourage people to stay on the land you must give those who do stay a square deal in regard to the selling of their products. That this government is not disposed to do, and I do not suppose ever will do, so long as it submits to the advice, not to say dictation, of the hon. member for Brandon.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Before the House rose for dinner, I was very much interested in listening to the very fair and reasonable criticisms particularly of the hon. member for West Calgary and the right hon. leader of the opposition. The hon. member for West Calgary saw certain dangers in this proposition as it is now drafted, and suggested that care would have to be taken, that possibly it would be well to cut down the amount of money that would be available at least for the first year, and that other safeguards of that kind should be provided. The minister immediately agreed to that, and I think it was well that he did so. I think the debate before six o'clock was eminently reasonable, but listening to the skilled agriculturists who have been speaking recently, and lecturing the farmers of Manitoba on how and how not to do things on their land, it seems to me the tone of the debate has changed since dinner.

A good many criticisms have been offered during the course of the debate, some of them reasonable and some otherwise. Much has been made of the extensive losses incurred under the Soldier Settlement Board, and it has been suggested that if such losses were incurred under the direction of that Board, equally great losses in proportion would be incurred under this scheme. I do not agree. The Soldier Settlement Board started to function at a time when prices were at the peak of inflation, and they had to function at first with men who had not been trained to their jobs. I am not blaming them for that, because no doubt they got the best men available, but, of course, they made mistakes, and largely through the mistakes they made were they able to learn. The soldier settlers who went on the land in the first flush of their return home, after having been overseas for so many years, were naturally anxious to get out of uniform and to go on the land, and perhaps they took land that did not appeal to them, and at prices and on terms that were not altogether satisfactory to them, but they were so anxious to get away from military life and regulations, so glad to be their own masters once again, that many took chances that a few years later they would not have taken. Under those circumstances, with so many of these men heavily handicapped in taking up land at the time they did, the wonder to me, Mr. Chairman, is not that some of the soldier settlers did not make good, not that so much money has been lost, but that so many of them have made good in spite of the handicaps they were under. They were placed on land which was sold at high prices, and they stayed on the land during those years when times were not good even for the best of farmers, for men who had been on the land right along and had their equipment pretty well paid for and were off to a good start, but who have found it difficult financing in the past few years, commencing with the break in the price of wheat in 1920, and continuing for a few years thereafter. Yet the soldiers who bought their land at high prices have in large numbers and in many districts stayed on the land, battled with their problems, and are to-day coming out on the right side. Many men were placed on crown lands at a distance from the railway, in settlements where there were no roads, no schools, no facilities, and no medical care for long distances, and yet a great percentage of these men have stayed with the game and are winning out. If they were able to do that without the aid of the very skilful organization which has been built up since, and which has got more careful and more skilful as time went on, it stands to reason that a settler going on crown lands to-day, with whatever help from this organization is necessary in the way of advice and inspection of his land before and after he makes his improvements, has a much better chance of success than those who bought land at the peak prices a few years ago. In view of the very different conditions, I do not think it is fair to compare the failures under the soldier settlement scheme with what some hon. gentlemen think might happen under this scheme.

I have been struck with this thought, that the hon. gentlemen who criticized this scheme before dinner, very reasonably and fairly, were men who know the Dominion of Canada as a whole. The eminent farmers opposite who have criticized the scheme since dinner do not, I think, know the Dominion as well as their leaders who spoke before them. There is much good land running right across northern Canada, from Quebec west. I am not speaking of the Maritime provinces because I do not claim to know so much about them. I have running through my mind the words of an old Gaelic song written by a pioneer in the Maritime provinces, near Barney's river, in Nova Scotia. I do not know where Barney's river is; all I know about the place is what the song told me. This settler was afraid that before the trees were uprooted the strength would be gone out of his arm, that his back would be bowed before he could bring his land under cultivation and his children were able to make a living. I think that was a reasonable fear. The hon. member for York-Sunbury admitted a little while ago that in New Brunswick it is a slow process getting these lands cleared.

As I said a moment ago, there is much good land across northern Canada, in Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, but it is a slow and a hard jub clearing these lands. But the land is good. Some hon. members seem to be under the misapprehension that this is second-class land. In many cases it is the very best of land, and it is because of the climatic conditions and the very fact that these lands were good for raising a crop that they have been left vacant so long. The crops having grown so strongly and vigorously, the land was not as easily put into another crop as would be the case in the drier districts in the prairie provinces, and so we find that much of the best land has been left to the last because of the crop of timber that has grown upon it. That good land stretches across five provinces, and it is to speed up the work of clearing this land, which the hon. member for York-Sunbury admitted was a slow job, that these proposed loans are being made.

Mr. FOSTER: How are these loans going to speed up the clearing of land?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Suppose I go on to a vacant piece of land in northern Ontario to-day, having in my possession fifty or a hundred dollars. I could not go very far in clearing land with that amount of money. Under this scheme I know that by the time I spend $50 or $100 in clearing land, erecting buildings, ditching, or doing whatever that particular piece of land happens to need, the services of the homestead inspector, or such officer of the department as is detailed for the duty, will be available. Now, these officers of the department are passing through the new districts in the course of their usual occupation; special trips would not be necessary all the time and therefore no great additional expense would be entailed on this account. Well, we will say that I have gone on the land and exhausted my $100. Then I apply for an inspection of the improvements. The officer comes there and sees that I have given value for the $100 or $150 as the case may be. In the course of a little time I get a warrant as a result of which that money is refunded to me. I then go ahead and use that money over again; it is a sort of perambulating fund. I take it that is the principle of the bill.

An hon. MEMBER: That is not in the bill.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That may be, but I think there is nothing in the bill to justify the conclusion that it is not the main principle involved.

Mr. McMILLAN: We have not got the bill. We only have the resolution on which the bill will be drafted.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am trying to get the bill before the House.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): We are considering a resolution, and after it has been adopted the bill will be placed before the House. The situation, as I see it, is this: that a man coming along with a little money would be allowed to spend that money on improvements, but it would be refunded to him as he spent it from time to time. We pay him for what he does until he comes to the limit of his loan, either $1,000 or $500. That was the system employed in connection with the settlement of the land by soldier settlers. Under the Soldier Settlement Act the settler would go to the supervisor and say he wanted to sink a well, or put up a barn or a house, or carry out some other improvements. The supervisor, from his knowledge of local conditions and of the settler himself, could say, "All right, we will give you authority to do that . Then the settler would go ahead, breaking the land and carrying out other improvements, and so was able to make progress even under the handicaps from which he suffered.

One criticism was made, I think by the hon. member for East Edmonton. He said there was much land that could be bought cheaper than other lands could be homesteaded and cultivated. That is partly true, but if a man does not have money to buy a piece of land even if the land is cheap, he is subjected to a load of debt, and the accumulated charges are going to handicap him a great deal. Many a man would prefer to take a piece of land that would be hard to clear as long as that land was all right otherwise. He would prefer to wait a little while longer so as to keep out of debt as much as possible and finally get a clear title to it much sooner. In the case of a piece of land out in the open prairie the value might be $25 an acre. Well, that would be $4,000 for a quarter section, and the interest on it at nine per cent would be $360 a year, or a dollar for every day he was on it. Many men would prefer to go on a piece of raw land if it can be got from the Dominion for an entry fee of $10, and spend their time breaking and preparing it. In that case they would be able to establish a home at much less cost in cash than in the case of the land indicated by the hon. member for East Edmonton.

The criticism has been made that a settler would only have a home on such a piece of land. That is the greatest thing any citizen could have. There is no person coming from another country who would not be glad to have a home, accompanied by security of tenure in that home. In my opinion, and it is also the opinion of very many men more experienced than I am, if the people of Canada would do more to make real permanent homes for themselves and not be quite so anxious in the early years to make money they would get along in the world faster and go farther. That is the consensus of opinion among farmers to-day in the west, and I believe it is the reason why there is so much less credit being used; many people are satisfied to proceed a little more slowly and pay their way as they go.

The criticism has also been made that if this form of aid to settlement goes through assistance ought to be granted to men wishing to go into industry or business. Well, there is this difference between the two sets of cases in my opinion—that wherever there is a business opening, whether it is a retail store, a factory, a brokerage business, or anything else of that kind—plenty of applicants will be found ready to take advantage of the opportunity. Government assistance is not necessary in order to get a new business of that kind established on a small scale. But when it comes to clearing these rougher lands of good quality, it cannot be reiterated too often that the state should do any little thing it can to make the process of settlement and home establishment speedier. Any steps of that character are proper steps, provided that due precautions are adopted in taking them.

The principle embodied in this resolution is not a new one. Scores of years ago the early settlers who came into Ontario were given assistance in the way of grubstakes, tools and other aids of that kind. The same thing was probably done in the Maritime provinces; certainly it was done in Ontario and, I think, in Quebec. Very little assistance of this character has been given in western Canada. Much criticism has been heard in past years in Canada in regard to the government doing such and so for men who came from other lands, whereas nothing was done for our own people, and the argument was advanced, "You have us here, but you will not do anything for us. You offer inducements to outsiders to come here." I think we are justified in giving perhaps a little bit more of assistance to our own citizens when they wish to go on the land. We have seen that when lands in the open prairie ceased to be free, men who wanted lands went into the more northerly districts where the land was harder to clear and kept plugging away, with the result that in a few years they had brought more land under cultivation than some of the older provinces have altogether. There will always be a market for foodstuffs. No nation ever had to go to war to sell its foodstuffs. Nations have to do many things to sell their manufactured goods; and much trouble has been wrought in the world by nations hunting for new markets. I do not think you will ever find an instance recorded where nations had to go to war to force their foodstuffs on an unwilling people.

The country is labouring under a great tremendous debt, and there is only one reasonable way in which this debt can be paid off, namely, by increasingly making use of the natural resources and raw materials of the country—developing them and selling them on the world's market. Sometimes in the spring of the year a gardener or farmer will sow seeds in a hotbed and when the plants get old enough to be able to stand out in the open they are immediately moved out there. It often saves time and speeds up the process of growing vegetables to do that; but no vegetable grower or farmer will leave those seeds in the hotbed and expect that they will mature there and reach a profitable or useful growth. By giving a little assistance to new settlers, as well as to old settlers in the country, you will bring these newer lands to which I have referred under cultivation. This will be a good thing for the people who go on these lands and for the Dominion, and will help materially in producing the extra wealth which this country needs to carry its present load. It will also make for greater development all round—greater development for business men and for manufacturers, as well as for the farmers themselves. I feel that this scheme should apply particularly to the five provinces I have named, as well as British Columbia. I am not so familiar with the natural resources or the vacant lands of the Maritime provinces, but if there is any way in which they can be put to better use than at present, personally I am in favour of it, and I think everyone else on this side of the House would take the same view.

Mr. FOSTER: If this resolution upon which the bill is to be founded had for its object the assisting of settlers to clear land in the areas which I indicated some time ago, there might be something to be said in its favour. I have listened to the debate and have asked one or two questions in an attempt to find out in what way the settler could secure assistance for the clearing of his land through this particular resolution or the bill which is subsequently to be founded upon it. Frankly I have been disappointed in not being able to secure that information. The hon. member for Brandon said that the settler would work at harvest and threshing in the summer and spend the winter on the homestead. What will he do in the winter on these lands? Will he cut pulpwood? I tried to find out from the minister just after dinner where these lands were, what class of lands they were, and whether or not those in Saskatchewan or the prairie provinces were heavily timbered. If the lands in British Columbia along the existing lines of railway are proposed to be cleared, I may tell the committee that the cost of clearing them will run from $100 an acre up, and the settler will have to expend a large amount of money before he can get the loan at all. If you take sections of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba, particularly the northern sections along the branch lines of the Canadian National railway and some portions of the Canadian Pacific railway, you will find that while you have not so much of the heavy timber, you have a considerable portion of it. You have some very good land, I have no doubt, but you will have to pay for the clearing of it. If the location of these lands is where my recollection tells me they are and where the minister indicates they are, it will cost in some cases not $5 an acre but close to $15 an acre, and perhaps even more. I think the minister, who knows the situation, will bear me out in that statement. In the case of the settler coming in there without any money, the labourer working for wages on farms in the west, how is it possible for him to clear that land at a cost of $10, $12 or $15 an acre, build his home, and in general place himself in a position to avail himself of this loan within a year, or, as the hon. minister says, within two years or three years?

Mr. BENNETT: Those men will not apply for it.

Mr. FOSTER: That being so, who will apply?

Mr. BENNETT: The men who are on the prairies, the people from England who under this scheme are coming over, assisted by a grant from the Empire Settlement League, supplemented by the small amount from this government, to improve the land.

Mr. FOSTER: If the men coming from the Old Country to settle on that class of land are advanced $1,500 from the Empire Settlement League and $500 from this government—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am sorry to have to correct my hon. friend.

Mr. FOSTER: I want to be corrected.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Surely my hon. friend, if he has been in the House this afternoon, could not have misunderstood the statements made by myself and others who spoke on this subject. The bill does not pretend to deal with the arrangement for the 3,000 families in respect of which the $1,500 is paid. This is for the purpose of settling lands contiguous to the existing railway that are not the heavily timbered lands, but cost $30 and $40 an acre to clear. My hon. friend knows that thousands of acres of land have been passed up so far that do not cost anything like that to clear. The settler himself, by his own labour and by what we are proposing to do to help him, can acquire the land and it will not cost him anything like that to clear it. If my hon. friend knows western conditions he knows that many of the Scandinavian race have cleared up similar lands; they preferred those lands, I may say, and have cleared them up without assistance. I have known them to go on the lands without a single dollar and make a success of it. It was a slow process, but they have done it, and a little help would have been of very great assistance to them.

Mr. FOSTER: The minister has not shown me where—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does the hon. member want me to explain further? When the settler builds his primitive log home, it is of some value, my hon. friend will admit.

Mr. FOSTER: Yes.

[Mr. Foster.]

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): If the improvement is worth $100 he will be advanced $100. Suppose he clears up five acres of land; in accordance with the value of the improvement of the land, if he is a Canadian, he will receive an advance up to a maximum of $1,000; if he comes from a foreign country he will be given an advance of $500. As he progresses in erecting buildings and making improvements on the land further advances will be made to him. That is the only method that is being adopted here.

Mr. FOSTER: Where is that set forth in the resolution?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It will not be set forth in the bill except in a general way. The resolution is merely what the Clerk of the House takes from the bill itself as an explanation of what the bill purports to be. There are many things in the bill that are not in the resolution, and this discussion might more properly come under the bill itself when hon. members have it before them. As I promised my hon. friend from West Calgary, I am going to suggest some amendments to the bill when it comes down and we will undoubtedly have a good deal of discussion on it. I am trying to get the bill before the House.

Mr. FOSTER: The situation is a little clearer now. It may be that I missed some of the statements of the minister this afternoon; I was busy at some other work. With anything that this government or any other government in Canada undertakes for the benefit of settling this country I am in hearty accord, and I do not want any misunderstanding about that. I know something of the difficulties in securing settlers to go into the various parts of Canada and something of the difficulties they meet with after they get there. If this legislation is designed to assist those people to go on the land and to help them from the start, it has some value and I am willing to be fair and to admit that. But if the settler has to go through all this laboured effort before he can avail himself of this money—and that is the way I understood the matter prior to the explanation just made—I can see very little benefit arising from it. The minister will probably tell us a little later on exactly what is to be done and I shall reserve some further remarks for another occasion. I think he said that 1,600,000 acres had been examined and approved as being land upon which settlers could reasonably be expected to succeed. If the provisions of this bill are taken advantage of to its full extent, an amount of $5,000,000 would take care, at $1,000 apiece, of only 5,000 people, whereas 1,600,000 acres on the basis of a quarter section to each one will offer opportunities to at least 10,000 people. So, if the minister treats everyone alike, he will have to have at least $10,000,000 for this proposition, the other $5,000,000 coming at a later date.

There is another feature of this proposition that is not quite clear to me, and I am following it as closely as I can, because while we from the Maritime provinces desire to assist the people from the west in the development of that great western heritage in which we claim to have some interest, at the same time we are here as representatives of the eastern part of Canada in the capacity not only of looking after that part, but of seeing that the treasury of Canada is protected so far as our humble efforts will permit, and of seeing also that we are not taxed unduly for the development of one section in connection with matters in which the whole country cannot participate. While this resolution indicates that the bill to be founded upon it and the provisions thereof will be applicable to the whole of Canada, I fail to see how Nova Scotia can take advantage of it. We have no crown lands, so far as I know, that are available for settlement, and certainly we have no funds in the provincial treasury without resorting to extraordinarily heavy taxation, with which the government may go out and buy lands in order that this provision should apply. Therefore, we may reasonably expect no benefit at all from this legislation save that larger benefit which comes from the upbuilding of Canada.

The people of the eastern section of this country are getting pretty well "fed up" on a programme involving $3,000,000 now, $5,000,000 a little later, and $25,000,000 in connection with another transaction, in all $100,000,000 within the next six or seven months or a year, for expenditures in other parts of the country on matters in which the eastern part of Canada will not participate to any great extent. The committee will, I think, agree that in presenting our demands we have been very moderate and very fair. We have asked hon. members and the country to deal with us in the same spirit of fairness that we have shown towards other portions of Canada. As regards the demands we made in the early part of this session we have not heard anybody say that the country was able to assume obligations amounting to even $10,000 to assist in the relief of starving people in Nova Scotia, although in connection with the bill which is to be founded upon this resolution, we can calmly vote $5,000,000 to be expended in the prairie provinces.

Mr. SPENCER: The hon. member stated that the government was being committed to an expenditure of $75,000,000 or $100,000,000. Where are those commitments being made?

Mr. FOSTER: It is a little difficult of course to tell exactly.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER: My hon. friends need not laugh. They have a habit of laughing when anything is said in the House as if that were the only function which they had to perform. As a matter of fact if the bill on rural credits is to be of any value at all I have no doubt the amount will have to be at least $25,000,000 or $30,000,000.

Mr. SPENCER: That is not a direct loan.

Mr. FOSTER: I did not mention direct loans. I said that we were voting obligations and commitments in this House to the extent of over $100,000,000. There is the Hudson Bay railway proposition for which there is an item of $3,000,000 in the estimates. If that is brought to a conclusion it will cost $50,000,000 or more, and it is to be done forthwith. Those are two items. The old age pension proposition will involve a sum amounting to $25,000,000 or $28,000,000 as a basis according to the report of a committee of this House.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Is it all going to the west?

Mr. FOSTER: I would not say so, but a considerable portion of it will go there. In the opinion of many people legislation of that sort could be postponed for a year or two until we reduce our taxation and increase the production of wealth in this country. But we have it at this session of parliament, why? Because it is the price of office, not the price of power. It is one of the prices that the government is putting upon the taxpayers of this country for the privilege of retaining office.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Is it not possible that some of it will go to the starving people the hon. member spoke of a moment or two ago?

Mr. FOSTER: They are able and anxious to work. All they want is an opportunity to work. Does my hon. friend wish to ask any more questions?

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Do they ever grow old?

Mr. FOSTER: Yes, some of them reach seventy years of age, when they would be entitled to take advantage of the bill which has been announced to the country. But most of the people of the east are sufficiently thrifty to enable them to take care of themselves when they arrive at that age.

Mr. HEAPS: If they are able to take care of themselves, does the hon. member not know they will not require the old age pension and so will be no burden on the country?

Mr. FOSTER: I said just a moment ago that we had to differentiate in regard to where these people live. The hon. member will appreciate, I am sure, that when this House and this country put a premium on inactivity and lack of thrift we shall have conditions much the same as they are in the Old Country, where they have a dole system and cannot get rid of it. He knows that as well as anybody else in this House.

Mr. HEAPS: There is no dole system in the Old Country.

The CHAIRMAN: I think we had better get back to the resolution.

Mr. FOSTER: I will in a moment, but when I am interrupted by such statements as the last it is a little difficult to come back gracefully. I have pointed out to 10 p.m. my hon. friend that these commitments will reach in the neighbourhood of $100,000,000. When we hear rumours throughout the country that one part of this government was willing to assist the Maritime provinces, and particularly Nova Scotia, in the matter I mentioned a moment ago, and another part of the government would not listen to that, we must conclude only that it was for the purpose of playing a little cheap party politics.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has alluded to the government. Will he kindly indicate the source of the rumour?

Mr. FOSTER: It would be difficult to do that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought so.

Mr. FOSTER: I may tell my right hon. friend that we pressed the case in his absence in this House, as he knows very well, and we pressed it hard. It was a reasonable case and the statements of the Minister of the Interior would indicate that his heart was with us, but we have not been able to get anything practical done. So we have to conclude that some pressure must have been brought upon the rest of the government which prevented action being taken. I think that is a fair conclusion for one to come to in view of the fact that nothing has been done of a practical nature to relieve the actual distress that I have referred to.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think my hon. friend is under a misapprehension, because as a matter of fact I understand the provincial government have made advances to relieve the distress, and of course under the arrangement this government will have to make its contribution.

Mr. FOSTER: Well, Mr. Chairman, I am not to be sidetracked in that way.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am simply stating what really happened.

Mr. FOSTER: I quite understand that the provincial government and our people have beggared themselves in an endeavour to assist the miners in an emergency which was not of their own making altogether, though partly it may have been. But the fact remains that we asked this government for its good offices to attain an object which meant nothing more than a charge upon the country of $15,000. We are unable to get that assistance. Now we are asked to vote $5,000,000 for one section of the country.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend cannot get away with that statement because we are on record as having offered to assist in that particular case.

Mr. FOSTER: I know they are on record, Mr. Chairman, as offering to assist, but it was in a form that was of no value. What practical use is that? The assistance was offered on receipt of information from the government of Nova Scotia telling this government plainly what the provincial government was able to do and what it could not do. Then we made a real proposition, which meant this government assuming at the outside an expenditure of $15,000. It was a simple matter, but we could not get that assistance. So I say it becomes a little difficult for members from the Maritime provinces who want to be fair to this government or to any other government that may occupy the treasury benches to assist in the upbuilding of this country. I care not what government occupies the treasury benches for the moment, I am interested primarily in the upbuilding of this country. I have had as close association with the upbuilding of western Canada and of eastern Canada for the last ten years as has any member of the government. In fact I have sent a great many settlers and a lot of money into that country to help develop it. I am just as sincerely anxious, therefore, to do all I can in the upbuilding of that country and of the rest of Canada as is the Minister of Agriculture or the right hon. leader of the government or any of his cabinet and supporters in this House. I want the country to understand that I have proven that. So that when I examine this resolution, thick-headed though I may be on some of these points, not having had the experience of other hon. gentlemen in this House, I want the country to know that when we from the Maritime provinces bear our share again and again in these propositions for the upbuilding of Canada as a whole, we have a right to feel that in regard to any moderate requests which we may make of the government of the day, whatever be its political complexion, that government should come forward and say: Your request is a reasonable one, made in a reasonable manner, and it ought to be granted forthwith.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): As it is intended that the natural resources of the three western provinces shall be handed back to them, what is the necessity of going on with this proposal? Why not leave such work to the provinces when they have the lands themselves?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): As already announced, a bill will be brought down for the transfer of the natural resources of Alberta, but there is no arrangement with the other two provinces; with them the matter is still under discussion. Of course if the bill transferring to Alberta its natural resources goes into effect, I am convinced the province would be perfectly willing to place any of the crown lands at the disposal of the government for settlement purposes. That is why the bill is general in character.

In reply to my hon. friend from Hants-Kings (Mr. Foster), for some reason I seem to be unfortunate in dealing with the coal question. I have been perfectly willing to give reasonable support for the transportation of coal both east and west. I have demonstrated that on former occasions by having fairly respectable amounts put in the estimates for the purpose; and we did assist the Nova Scotia movement to some extent. I go further. I am willing to continue that assistance because I am very anxious that Nova Scotia coal should be burned in central Canada. But that is quite aside from the question, and no doubt it will be discussed when the time comes. If hon. gentlemen will let this resolution pass, and I have an opportunity of getting the bill before the House, its exact provisions will then be before each member, and I shall be perfectly willing to listen to representations from members from Nova Scotia. I do not want to be sectional. I come from western Canada, but I want to foster a truly Canadian spirit and assist every portion of Canada. That is why we find here provision for assisting the Maritime provinces to secure settlement. I want to pay my tribute to Premier Rhodes. He has expressed his willingness to co-operate with us on immigration matters. We want to co-operate with every provincial government. This must be a Canada-wide effort, or it will fail. I have to regret the feeling that eastern Canada is always being sacrificed for the west. That is rather an unfortunate spirit to instil in our people. I think it is really because we do not understand one another sufficiently well, for my experience here is that the various provinces are fairly generously treated by every government, judging by the estimates. Of course, unfortunate circumstances always will arise. For instance, British Columbia thinks it is being discriminated against because it is at the extreme west. Now we have this unfortunate circumstance in the east. But it seems to me that we must approach these questions from the viewpoint of having a Canada-wide policy. That is what I have tried to carry out in this bill, imperfect though it may be. I am ready and willing to listen to suggestions that will improve the bill itself, and I hope the resolution will pass so that I may get the bill before the House.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I spoke this afternoon on the resolution. I am going now to make a few further observations because I think it would be very unfair to the section of the country I represent to assume that the semblance of prosperity which we have at the present time is attributable to any effort of eastern Canada. The real truth is that the three prairie provinces with a population of less than two million people have produced a new wealth during the past year of nearly a thousand million dollars. That is really the basis of the present semblance of our prosperity, and until such time as there is a frank recognition of that fact on the part of those who reside east of the Great Lakes, we shall be open to many difficulties, much acrimony and a great deal of unpleasant discussion. I do not think this country should be divided into an eastern and a western group. But I do say there are reasons why hon. gentlemen who reside in the country in which I was born and where I lived the early days of my life might well conclude from the readiness with which principles that formerly were declared to be guiding principles of the party have been sacrificed, because those sacrifices have been asked for from western Canada, that therefore the west is dominating the situation. I do not conceive that to be the opinion of men in the west, and I know what the sentiment there is; I have knocked around a good deal in that part of the country, having gone there as a young man. When you remember how difficult this country's economic condition is, when you remember that we have two and a half billion dollars of a debt, and are obliged to raise close on to $400,000,000 a year, the real problem is where and how we can most readily create new wealth. New wealth is more readily created in the west than in any other part of the Dominion; I do not think there can be any doubt about that. And it is not from any sectional point of view that I make that observation. Every Canadian must be proud of the fact that a population of less than 2,000,000 produced in the year 1925 wealth to the value of $900,000,000. There is no doubt that the purchasing power of eastern Canada has been increased many fold as a result of that money having been made available in Canada at this time.

I am sure that no one will accuse me of being deficient in party spirit; no one will say that I am not a fairly strong partisan. Having observed that, I must say that I do not view this measure in any party light at all. I do not consider it party legislation. This is a demand that comes from a great many people in the west. Last year I was twice in the Old Country, and I was frequently asked by people there why it was that, willing as they are to use their money to assist their settlers in coming to Canada, there was no indication of any willingness on our part to help people of small means to settle properly on the land and to produce wealth from the soil. The minister has not said much about this phase of the subject, having only hinted at it. I do not know whether there is any reason why he should not have alluded to it, but this measure will go a long way towards removing that difficulty. I am satisfied that it will be very much appreciated in quarters that have not been mentioned, for it will enable people who have only enough money to come out here to get settled on a piece of land, not in the woods nor in the wilderness, and not in remote sections of the country where timber has to be cut down at the cost of $40 an acre. There are no inconsiderable areas of land still available which would be suitable for homesteads—lands, not far from settled communities but which have been overlooked for one reason or another, where wheat cannot be grown as readily as on the more fertile plains, but where the husbandman with a few cows may increase the value of his dairy products. I may observe that in the United States last year the value of the dairy products was greatly in excess of the farm products; the figures issued only last week are staggering in their magnitude. This measure will assist men of the type engaged in this industry to settle upon these lands within fifteen miles of railways in little villages and towns, and with the assistance thus given them they will be enabled to improve their condition, which otherwise they could not do.

I have in mind at this moment two men I know who in the early days had very meagre means, and who, if they had been able to avail themselves of some scheme whereby they might have purchased a few cows, would have prospered much more rapidly than they did, although they have succeeded remarkably. There occurs to me, while I am on this point, a letter which I have received since coming to the House from a man who came over from the Old Country with limited means. He said that he would be able to build a little home, but that he could not do much more than that, and he was afraid that his pathway would be strewn with too many difficulties if he had not assistance of some kind.

It is in no partisan spirit that I approach this measure, for, as I have already said, I do not consider it party legislation. It is a measure, that affords relief not only to the west, but to every part of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I see no reason why hon. gentlemen should applaud that statement. The measure says as much: it is available to every part of the Dominion. But the fact that the people of western Canada can take advantage of it more readily than residents in the older provinces is no argument against its adoption.

One other question remains to be considered, and that is with respect to taxation, which so bothered one of my hon. friends. I fully appreciate his difficulty. Where you have a vacant piece of crown land surrounded by settled areas it is clear that if it bears no burden of taxation then the burden placed on the adjoining and surrounding sections is greater. But if you get a settler on that piece of land it is not necessary to build a new school, as you would have to do in some remote section, nor are there any new roads to be constructed. All you require is a new rural post office box put up, and that settler, if he succeeds, as he must if he has the determination, will be able to make some contribution in the way of additional taxes to the community in which he lives, and thereby reduce the general burden. The effect, therefore, is obviously to lighten rather than to increase the burden of taxation which the community as a whole must bear.

I am greatly pleased to hear the minister say that he is not unwilling to reduce the amount. Every word that has been said today as to the serious condition of this country, I believe. We must realize that there are many projects in which we should like to engage but which we are unable to undertake. Financial considerations are often the measure of our ability. It is not our willingness but our ability to do these things that counts; and if the minister would reduce the vote to a reasonable sum and surround it with the safeguards which he has expressed his preparedness to do, I think the measure should meet with approval. The minister and I differ greatly in our political views, but I want to say that, however wide may be that difference between us, there is one respect in which, I am sure, we are in accord. In his desire to espouse measures that will benefit the country as a whole he has as strong and abiding a faith in his country as the rest of us. If, therefore, he will carry out the suggestions he has indicated, and give effect to them, I am satisfied that this measure will have a fair trial and we shall supplement the effort of our kinsmen across the Atlantic to enable immigrants, who perhaps are not rich in this world's goods but who are strong in hope, courageous, and of that virile race that makes the kind of settlers we so much require, to come to this country and become happy and contented Canadians.

I am sorry that we should have drifted in this debate into a discussion of the relative contributions that are made to this country's financial wealth by the east and by the west. I cannot have it said for a moment that the west is second to any part of the Dominion in the contribution it makes to the national wellbeing. I should be glad at any time to sit down and discuss with hon. gentlemen, as I said a little while ago to an hon. member who at present is not in his place, the per capita contributions made to the new wealth of Canada by various parts of the country. After all, the mere swapping of pieces of paper, to use the vulgar language of the street, does not add anything to the new wealth of a country. I may be able to exchange my share certificate on the stock exchange for a sum of money, but that does not add one single dollar to the new wealth of Canada. On the other hand, if, by any suggestion that I may make, legislation before parliament can be improved and I can thereby do my part to make it easier for one who is coming over to this country for the first time, to till the soil and acquire new wealth, then, indeed, I have assisted him in making a contribution to Canada much greater than anything that might be involved in the mere exchange of pieces of paper for money. He has done something that creates additional wealth, something that did not exist before, and he has thus been able to add something of a very permanent nature to the welfare of the country.

I have dwelt on this point because I felt, as one must feel who has lived as long as I have in the west and who came originally from the east, that I could not have it said that the people in that part of the country were merely sponging on the rest of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no necessity of applauding the sentiment, Mr. Chairman. It is a sentiment I am sure that anyone who analyzes the figures and realizes the productiveness and the amount of new wealth that those hard-headed and hardworking men and women have produced in western Canada during the last few years will recognize as sound. For that reason may I venture to suggest, not in any censorious sense, that we should all use our combined efforts to assist the minister in making this legislation as practicable as possible, limited in its application for the first year to a reasonably small sum of money, and if it does not succeed let us all bear our part of the responsibility for endeavouring at least to make it as good as we can.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Stewart (Edmonton) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 16, to authorize advances to settlers on crown lands.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SOLDIER SETTLEMENT ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Acting Minister of Immigration and Colonization) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend The Soldier Settlement Act, 1919, and to provide,—

1. That notwithstanding anything in the act, the board shall be empowered upon the application of a settler who has agreed to purchase any land from the board, who has not abandoned his land, whose agreement with the board has not been terminated or rescinded, and who has not repaid his indebtedness to the board, and where there has been a decrease or depreciation in the market value of such land not the result of neglect or mismanagement on the part of the settler, to make provision for the revaluation of the said land.

2. That application for revaluation shall be considered only when made by a settler residing on and himself farming the said land, and shall be submitted to the district superintendent of the Soldier Settlement Board for the district within which the said land is situated.

3. That the application shall be supported by affidavit on forms supplied by the board setting out the original purchase price of the land and the value of improvements effected since the establishment of the settler thereon, and by a written statement of the settler setting forth his belief as to present value of the land and his reasons therefor, and the names and addresses of any persons whom the settler proposes as witnesses to the present value; and the district superintendent shall consider the application and material in support and make report and recommendation thereupon to the board.

4. That if the board and settler agree upon the amount of depreciation in value of the said land such amount shall be credited by the board to the settler's account as on the standard date in 1925 and upon the settler's account being so credited, the balance then owing to the board by the settler for all purposes shall, at the discretion of the board, be consolidated and deemed to be the settler's principal indebtedness, and the total cost of the property may be amortized over the remaining period of the loan.

5. That the minister may appoint District Arbitration committees having jurisdiction in such soldier settlement districts as may be necessary, each committee to consist of three members, one of whom shall be an official of the Soldier Settlement Board and one a representative of the veterans' organization in the district, and the members of the District Arbitration committee when appointed shall have all the powers and authority of a commissioner under the Inquiries Act, and expenditures necessarily incurred by any District Arbitration committee shall be paid out of moneys appropriated from time to time by parliament to soldier land settlement.

6. That if the board and settler do not agree upon the amount of depreciation in value of the said land the board shall refer the matter at issue to the District Arbitration committee for determination, who will thereupon fix a convenient time and place for hearing. Upon the hearing of all evidence submitted the committee shall decide upon the question in dispute, and its decision shall be final.

7. That the District Arbitration committee shall forthwith forward a copy of its decision to the board and if it be found there has been a depreciation in the value of the land purchased by the settler from the board, not resulting from neglect or mismanagement on the part of the settler, the amount of such depreciation so found shall be credited by the board as provided by Resolution No. 4 in respect of amount arrived at by agreement.

Mr. STEVENS: Was this on the agenda for to-day, may I ask?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: It is pretty late. Could we not adjourn now?

[Mr. C. A. Stewart.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is just a short resolution.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister make a short explanation of this measure? It is of considerable importance.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I shall be glad to do that, but perhaps we might first go into committee.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): The resolution is for the purpose of the introduction of a bill to meet the demand made upon the government when this whole question of the revaluation of soldier settler lands, as well as stock and equipment, was before a committee of this House. Hon. gentlemen who were in the last parliament will remember that that committee reported that a revaluation of the land, in certain cases at least, should be undertaken. Last year we did not meet with the demand of that committee in its entirety, but the House met it to the extent of a reduction of forty per cent on stock and equipment of settlers who had settled between certain dates, and a reduction of twenty per cent in the case of settlers who had settled between certain other dates. That reduction has not yet been completed, but I have tentative figures that would indicate that it will cost the government between five and six million dollars.

The proposal this year is that in certain sections where injury appears to have been done to the settler through having purchased land during the period of inflation, redress will be given if he can prove that the price paid for his land is higher than it would be if he were purchasing under ordinary circumstances at the present time. The regulations that will be thrown around the revaluation will seek to prevent redress being given to the man who may have suffered through his own neglect or incompetence, or whatever it may be, directly attributable to himself. To put it concretely, it is to give redress to the man who had bought his land, say, at $40 an acre, while the prevailing price in the locality at the present time is perhaps not more than $25 or $30 per acre for similar land.

A good deal of discussion has taken place to-night that pretty well enlightens members of the House with respect to the injury done to some of the soldier settlers. Some of them, of course, have had to abandon their lands, and it is impossible by legislation to give redress to them. This measure applies only to those who are still on the land and are still endeavouring to meet their payments and secure the home they undertook to provide for themselves.

It is proposed that every soldier who is located on the land shall have the opportunity of writing to the Soldier Settlement Board indicating that in his opinion the land on which he is located bears too high a valuation, and that he is desirous of having a reduction made. Inspection will be made by the Soldier Settlement Board, and if in the opinion of the board's representative the valuation is too high, having in mind all the circumstances that surround the case, and the reduction the board's representative offers is reasonably satisfactory to the soldier settler himself, no further action need be taken. We anticipate that in a great many cases, far more perhaps than the number that will need to be dealt with, no reduction will take place, because we know of innumerable localities in which the land purchased by the soldier settler is more valuable to-day than when the purchase was made. In such cases, of course, there is no redress to be given. If an agreement can be arrived at between the person who is suffering injury and the Soldier Settlement Board through its representative, an adjustment will take place on that basis. But in the event of a dispute arising between the Soldier Settlement Board and the settler, recourse will be had to the tribunal created for the purpose, as provided for in the bill, and its decision in the matter will be final.

Mr. BENNETT: What about an appeal?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I was going to quote the exact wording of the provision:

> If the board and settler do not agree upon the amount of depreciation in value of the said land the board shall refer the matter at issue to the district arbitration committee for determination, who will thereupon fix a convenient time and place for hearing. Upon the hearing of all evidence submitted the committee shall decide upon the question in dispute and its decision shall be final.

Mr. BENNETT: The committees are appointees of the minister and therefore political tribunals.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): It says further:

> The minister may appoint district arbitration committees having jurisdiction in such soldier settlement districts as may be necessary, each committee to consist of three members, one of whom shall be an official of the Soldier Settlement Board and one a representative of the veterans' organization in the district.
> The members of the district arbitration committee when appointed shall have all the powers and authority of a commissioner under the Inquiries Act.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister appoints them all, or rather he selects them.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): They are selected from different organizations.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister selects a representative from those organizations, that is the difference. I suggest that the district or county court judge be the tribunal. If you are going to make this thing absolutely devoid of any semblance of politics, if you are going to create a fair tribunal, do as they do under the Railway Act in cases of this kind, take the matter out of the hands of arbitrators and appoint a district or county court judge to deal with it. Fairness and absence of political pressure are, in my judgment, vital, in order that this scheme may not work any injustice to anyone entitled to consideration. I suggest that to the minister.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend suggests that the third member of the tribunal be—

Mr. BENNETT: No, I suggest the elimination of these arbitration committees and the substitution of the district or county court judge. For it will be remembered that the county court judges especially in western Canada where many of these farms are, hold their sittings in small sections of the community.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I have no particular objection to raise, because the whole object in this connection is to avoid expense.

Mr. BENNETT: I know.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): All I am anxious to do is to provide satisfaction. I really have no desire to make these appointments. I can readily turn that over to some other power, and when the bill comes up I shall be glad to amend it in that way. That is really all I have to say about the matter. It is a very simple process for revaluation of the soldier settlement lands. I simply want to point out it is not a wholesale revaluation; necessity for consideration would have to be shown before consideration would be given.

Mr. BENNETT: I am strongly of the opinion that a revaluation of these lands is imperative.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. gentleman speak louder?

Mr. BENNETT: I was observing that in my opinion, from personal observation and inspection of many of these lands, a revaluation is imperative. The circumstances and conditions under which that revaluation may be made I find it difficult to describe. Fairness is a thing to be aimed at, and I cannot contemplate the setting up of district arbitration committees without abuses resulting, the same abuses that have brought about the purchasing of land at too high a price and its appraisement at too great a value. The very circumstances alluded to this afternoon by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar), that brought about the payment of excessive prices for land or its valuation by appraisers who were apparently desirous of assisting in the sale, may bring about the very reverse condition if you create tribunals that would be subject to pressure such as I have indicated, which we all must know from our own observation is something to be considered. I venture to suggest that unless we can enlist the services of a district or county court judge in matters of this kind, so that we shall have the advantage of trained, skilled minds accustomed to deal with evidence, of men who have not the remotest interest in the ultimate result, I fear that in a problem of this kind the revaluation will not be effective in accomplishing what is desired. By eliminating this provision and permitting the application to come from the settler in the first instance, and then having the revaluation proceed without expenses—because the district court judges and the county court judges hold their sittings in the smallest sections of their counties—it will not be any more difficult to present the case for revaluation—it may be done by the settler himself before a sympathetic district court judge—than it would be before a district arbitration committee of three, or of two if they agree, and I submit that the results—

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): Does my hon. friend suggest it go to the judge at once?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, so as to obviate all this difficulty that is experienced in respect to arbitration. Speaking from some little experience with respect to arbitrations when we used to acquire rights of way for railways, in days when I was more actively associated with that class of work than now, I can say that the amendment to the Railway Act which vested that jurisdiction in county court and district court judges brought about a very great improvement. Not only have the difficulties that used to be experienced in connection with arbitrations to fix the value of right of way greatly disappeared, but we have much better results by reason of the county or district court judge settling these matters. If the minister will be good enough to consider and if possible adopt the suggestion I make, the result will be very advantageous alike to the community as a whole and to the settler himself, because in a given community there will be a uniformity of treatment which might not, and in very many instances would not, be experienced if the arbitration was fixed as provided by the resolution. I am convinced from my own observations, from visits to farms and from discussions I have had with the settlers, that the conditions under which these farms were purchased were such that the price was greater than the value warranted. We must face this matter fairly, and although it involves this Dominion in a loss that loss must be borne by the Dominion as a whole. It is unfair that the prices at which lands were then bought should be continued. Many men, as has been mentioned already, found it no longer possible to remain on the lands and had to abandon them because they saw no hope in the future. From my observations I certainly came to the conclusion that it was my duty, had this resolution not been upon the order paper, to urge the government to consider it as a measure of justice and fair play to men who acquired lands at the height of the market, under conditions which made it impossible for them to carry on their contract. They do not desire to be the victims of these circumstances. They do not desire charity, but they wish the country to bear a share of the loss occasioned by reason of the high price paid for property acquired at the very peak of the boom in farm lands consequent upon the high price paid for wheat shortly after the war. But it is not all a loss. It is wrong to assume that it is a loss to the state, it is a gain to the state, for the simple and obvious reason that we have been able to place upon lands men who have become more or less accustomed to living upon farms, men who had left cities, and they have made a very valuable contribution to the wealth of the state by reason of the experience they have had in farming and the life they have lived upon the farm. Measured from one standpoint, therefore, I do not regard it as a loss; it is something the state might fairly assume. If we can approach the matter from the standpoint of absolute fairness and have this revaluation made by a tribunal whose duty it is to do that class of work in connection with railway corporations, in regard to rights of way and matters of that sort, a tribunal of judges who are dealing with questions of this kind every day, I am sure we will extend a measure of relief to a deserving portion of the population and will do general justice to the exchequer and to the state.

Mr. DUNNING: Do I understand the suggestion to be that the district court judge would be the arbitrator in all cases, or would the hon. friend still leave the provision providing for the board and the settler themselves to reach an agreement? Would he merely have the district court judge substituted for the arbitration committee, or would he have the district court judge hear all cases?

Mr. BENNETT: I would substitute the district court judge in every instance, for the reason that the matter of arriving at an agreement involves at times the raising of questions by one of the parties that a judge would not consider, and in other cases the elimination of factors which should be considered. If we have uniformity within the district, and if the district or county court judge determines in every instance the measure of decrease in value, then I think we have eliminated every possibility of complaint as to the method pursued to reach the desired end.

Mr. DUNNING: How would the cost be dealt with?

Mr. BENNETT: In my judgment the cost would be very trifling in a matter of that character. In the appeal board, my hon. friend will remember, the government itself has provided that a soldier's friend may assist in the presentation of an appeal, and it might be that some such arrangement would be made in this case. The settler does not require a lawyer to present a case of that character. It sometimes may be very much better done by the settler himself or by his friend than by a trained solicitor for reasons that will at once appeal to you, Mr. Chairman, and to my hon. friend. Courts are always considerate of a man who appears to present his own case, allowing for all the difficulties under which he must labour, whereas if the case is in the hands of an inexperienced solicitor the settler might suffer.

Mr. CAHAN: I presume the Minister of the Interior has obtained from his representatives in the west a fairly accurate idea as to what is the general rate of depreciation in the value of those lands. I was utterly astonished in the lobby this afternoon to hear some western members state that the depreciation in the case of some of the lands was at least one-half, and perhaps greater in other. If there has been a general depreciation of one-half, it means a loss to the treasury of $50,000,000, and if that is the real prospective loss it will come as a great shock to many people who believed that the settlement under the Soldier Settlement Act was really of general benefit to the whole country.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think my hon. friend is unduly alarmed. Perhaps the most aggravated case is in the constituency of the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ward) In Manitoba undoubtedly serious loss will be experienced in the revaluation of land in the district between the lakes, but I would like to stress the point I was trying to make in speaking previously, namely, that in the majority of cases there will be no revaluation at all and that in many cases the land now occupied by the soldier is more valuable than it was when he purchased it.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the minister not think that under the terms of the arrangement proposed by the resolution nearly every settler will contend that there has been depreciation and proceed on the idea that the time now has come to make a raid upon the treasury to secure the benefit of the alleged depreciation?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): The raid was made at the time the settlement took place.

Mr. CAHAN: Possibly that was all wrong. I am not here to vindicate or support anything done by any previous administration; as a new member of this House I am not called upon to do that. But, in view of the provision made here that every settler may apply, no specific terms being expressed as to the ground on which the revaluation should be made by the arbitrators or by the district judges, what is the opinion of the Minister as to the prospective loss?

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): One factor that will cut down the number of cases to be dealt with is that a very large proportion of the men who were unable to carry on are now off the land. The fact that their land was valued too highly was one of the contributing causes which forced them to leave it.

Mr. CAHAN: What proportion of these men have left the land? I understood from the hon. member opposite that a great number of them were still on the land.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): There are 21,600 odd still on the land.

Mr. BENNETT: Not more than 25 per cent.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think not.

Mr. STEVENS: About 29,000 went on the land.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I think 29-000 all told went on the land and of those 6,800 have made failures up to date.

But the fact remains that there are 21,600 odd still on this land, and you cannot discriminate and say that only John Smith in such and such a locality may apply for revaluation. All must have the opportunity, but that does not mean that all will be dealt with. They will have to show cause why they are entitled to any revaluation. I am somewhat impressed by the suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr Bennett). I may say frankly, without reflection on my legal friends, that I am always somewhat wary about the cost of courts and court actions and I was trying to avoid that. But it is important for the settler and for the country that a most impartial tribunal should make the decisions. I am thoroughly in accord with that suggestion.

Mr. CAHAN: That is fundamental.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): I am ready to give serious consideration to my hon. friend's suggestion if it will avoid expense to the settler himself and to the country, but on the other hand I am just a bit fearful about these courts. I want to do the thing that will bring about a result that will be satisfactory to all parties concerned.

I want to impress upon my hon. friend (Mr. Cahan) the fact that while this proposition may and undoubtedly will run into a considerable sum of money, to speak of a fifty per cent reduction in connection with the 21,000 soldier settlers who are on the land is away beyond the mark. I rather think not more than twenty per cent of those on the land to-day will have their land subjected to revaluation, in some cases perhaps a fairly considerable reduction, in others, rather a small one. That may be a wild guess, but I am giving my hon. friend my opinion in the matter so that he will not be unduly alarmed at the amount of money involved in this reduction. It is important that every one of the 21,600 odd soldier settlers should be kept on the land if it is humanly possible to keep them there.

Mr. STEVENS: I want to join with the hon. member for West Calgary in saying that I think something of this character is necessary. I appreciate also the very difficult task facing the minister in drafting proper legislation. There are two points which strike me, first, the one referred to by the hon. member for West Calgary, namely the securing of a tribunal that will have the confidence of both the settlers and the public. That I think can be achieved by substituting for the appeal to the board as suggested in the resolution an appeal to a county court judge.

Mr. STEWART (Edmonton): My hon. friend is now talking about the appeal. My hon. friend from West Calgary suggested that the matter should go directly to a county court judge. In a case which can be amicably settled between the representative of the Soldier Settlement Board and the settler, would he be satisfied with such a settlement?

Mr. STEVENS: I would not be prepared to express an arbitrary opinion offhand. I appreciate the difficulty. I was going to make another suggestion. Having achieved some understanding on that point, I still see a difficulty, that which perhaps is in the mind of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. It is this: Unless you have some rule or fixed principle upon which that revaluation is to be determined, no matter how clever or just may be the tribunal, there is a danger of doing an injustice to the public at large. Before I entered this board of legislators some fifteen or sixteen years ago, I was for some years city alderman and we had before us the problem of a new assessment scheme. This may seem a little aside from the mark, but I want to offer the idea to the minister. The question of assessment, whether it is the assessment of land or property in a city or the country for taxation purposes, or the assessment, as is really meant in the case of this property, for revaluation purposes, is always a very difficult thing to arrive at. I remember being much impressed, although I do not know that it was ever carried out in any instance that came to my attention, by a suggestion that was made that when an appeal was entered against an assessment and the price was fixed, as a final test of its justice, if the taxpayer objected that he was still being unjustly treated, the land should be offered for public sale at that figure. That is, if a man claimed that his property was too highly assessed and he intimated that the price ought to be fixed at a lower figure, he should be subjected to having his land sold at the assessed figure before it would be reduced any more under appeal. If we applied some such principle as that to this revaluation it might safeguard the country against unfair reductions. For instance, a man who has a farm applies for revaluation and the question of revaluation is in the air, is in the district. There may be in the same district land much poorer in quality or for some reason not worth as much as other land in that district and entitled to revaluation. But the very fact that you lower the price of A's land will warrant B in asking you to lower the value of his. That is going to be the chief difficulty. But if B is faced with the risk of having his land offered at public sale at the figure suggested, let us say, by the court, he may think twice before he will make application for revaluation or insist that he has been unfairly treated.

Mr. BENNETT: He has to make an affidavit on forms supplied by the board.

Mr. STEVENS: I confess very frankly to the minister that I have not had time to give this very much thought, but I see a great danger and I think it is what is in the mind chiefly of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George and others, namely, that by the very fact that we are revaluating, this will spread over a large and extended area and into a very large sum. I would suggest to the minister as my contribution to this debate, first, that as nearly as possible we should submit these things to a county court judge or some court in existence rather than to a board of arbitration, and, second, that some principle such as the one I have suggested should be applied to prevent the undue influence of local sentiment from entering into this question of revaluation.

Another point that occurs to me which I will just refer to, rather in support of the measure than in criticism of it—and I want my criticism to be taken as friendly—is this: We are not going to lose all the amount that will be represented in the figures of reduction in valuation. A large number of soldier settlers are leaving the land now, and every farm that is abandoned by a soldier settler and thrown back on the Soldier Settlement Board means an immediate loss. The board must take the stock and machinery, all of which is greatly reduced in value when it is put to a forced sale, but which if it were in a going concern would still retain a major portion of its value. So that every man who leaves the land causes a serious loss to the country. If by any means we can keep those men on the land, we will minimize the loss. Furthermore, and of course it is of very great importance, we will assist in building up happy and contented homes, which should be our main object.

Now, in British Columbia there are quite a number of people who bought land at high prices. I have in mind some very fine chaps who are striving and struggling earnestly to make good. I know some who have been already driven off their farms. They are those who see the margin of profit reduced to such a low point that they have no hope of paying off the principal sum. But if the property of those who are still holding on were revaluated so that hope might be revived, I think the great proportion of them would stick. On the other hand, if that last hope is removed, I think you will find in the next few years a great many will abandon the land, and in all probability the actual loss to the country in dollars and cents will be greater by the absence of this legislation than by wise and careful application of it.

Mr. WARD: Mr. Chairman, may I congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver Centre as a new recruit to this principle? I might recall his remarks of three or four years ago on this very question, but I refrain, for I am very much pleased to have him with us to-night.

Mr. STEVENS: What did he say then different from what he says to-night?

Mr. WARD: I also want to congratulate the government on having brought forward this legislation. I am only sorry that they did not see eye to eye with the few members in this corner of the House back in 1923. Had this legislation been brought forward then it would have saved at least two hundred returned soldier settlers in my constituency. Lest I be misunderstood, I want also to congratulate the member for West Calgary, whose sincerity not only on this but on all other questions I admire. But in the same spirit and just as emphatically I protest against his suggestion that any appeals under this legislation be referred to county court judges. I do not for one minute question their ability or sincerity, but I do say that at least ninety per cent of them are not at all qualified to judge matters of this kind. The only person in this country who is qualified is the practical farmer, the man of long residence in the community, the man who knows a farm from a slough or a marsh, the man who knows the potential value of the land. In reply to the remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, I say, yes, it is true in many cases that the land, if properly valued, will be rated at not more than 20 per cent of its original purchase price, and in some cases the value will be wiped out entirely if the settlers are to make a living.

But I rose more particularly to address myself to the method of reference. I am positively opposed to referring appeals to any law court, and I say this without in any way reflecting on the ability of those who occupy high and honourable judicial positions. I repeat that the only man qualified to judge matters of this kind is the practical farmer who has lived in the community and therefore is familiar with the conditions surrounding the farms. If the proper men are appointed under section 5 I do not think there will be need of any second appeal. If the third man is thoroughly qualified to judge of the potential value of the land to be revalued, that is all that would be required of him. The local supervisor, if he has been on the job for any length of time, usually has all the information at his finger tips regarding the soldier and the reason for his failure, having watched his progress for five or six years. Whether the man's failure is because of lack of potential value of the land itself, or is due to indolence, the supervisor knows. I am confident that he is a perfectly qualified person to be chairman of such a board. Secondly, I think it is proper that the veterans' organization should be taken into account in the appointment of the second man if it is possible to get from them someone thoroughly qualified, but I would be absolutely opposed to appointing a returned soldier to the board unless he were qualified for the position. I would be just as much opposed to such an appointment as to that of a county court judge. Thirdly, as I have said before, the man to be appointed should be not only a practical farmer but a man acquainted with the district in which he is making the revaluations. I hope the member for West Calgary will accept my remarks in the spirit in which they are made. I am rather inclined to think that if he had homesteaded in the wilds of western Canada and gone through some of the difficulties that many of us have experienced, he would have had some hesitation in making the statements he made to-night or in suggesting that these matters should be referred to the county court judges, because as a rule they are merely cheap, second-hand politicians. He will agree with me that a good lawyer would not be bothered with the job. I really do not believe he was serious when he suggested the selection of such men.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Chairman, I should like to support the attitude taken by the member for West Calgary, but it does appear to me that our difficulty in this very serious matter is due to the fact that in the first instance these lands were valued by some practical man.

Mr. BROWN: No, that is the trouble.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): They were not valued by a county judge, anyway.

Mr. CAMPBELL: They were certainly not valued by a practical man.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I am inclined to think there were some practical men around at the time these lands were sold.

Mr. FORKE: Mr. Chairman, how would the hon. member like a farmer to inquire into some legal matter?

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I should like a farmer to inquire into a matter about which he had special training; and I should like to have a matter of this kind investigated by a man who by special training has qualified himself for the work. I am sure if we are safe in trusting all our other disputes to a county judge, we would be equally safe in trusting him with this. We ought to be just as safe as we should be with anybody else under our system. It does seem to me, however, to be a suggestion that should work out with justice to all concerned. I cannot follow the argument of the hon. member (Mr. Ward) who so severely reflects on county judges. Possibly one has done something to him which he does not like. At any rate his argument is not well founded.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: This resolution is one that meets with general approval, but I am not just sure what the minister intends. If I followed his remarks, I understood him to say that every soldier was to have the privilege of having his land revalued if he so desired; and at another time he stated that it was not the desire to have a wholesale revaluation of soldier lands. I am not sure how he proposes in the forthcoming bill to safeguard the Soldier Settlement Board from a very considerable flood of applications for revaluation of lands.

Section 3 of the resolution proposes three conditions to be complied with by the applicant for revaluation: first, that the application shall be supported by an affidavit; second, that the applicant shall give a written statement setting forth his belief as to the present value of the land and the reasons therefor; and, third, that he shall give the names and addresses of any persons whom he suggests as witnesses to the present value. These three conditions may be fairly satisfactory, but it seems to me that they do not adequately safeguard the Soldier Settlement Board from an inordinate number of applications. With regard more particularly to conditions in western Canada—I am not sure that the same would not apply elsewhere—we have a small local governing body known as the municipal council, which is composed of seven men representing a nine-township unit, that is, a small area of land eighteen miles square. I would suggest to the minister that every application from a soldier settler should be submitted to that small local body. They are practical farmers. Each farmer councillor represents a little over a township, and he knows fairly well every parcel of land within that compass. He knows its fair value, and he is acquainted also with the soldier settler. He knows whether the case is a worthy one or not, or whether the land has depreciated as a result of indolence on the settler's part. I would urge the minister to incorporate in the bill a provision that throughout the country every application shall be supported by a resolution duly moved and passed by such a small local governing body, whether it be known as municipal council, township council, county council, or whatever the nomenclature may be. So far as the west goes we call them municipal councils.

It may be urged that these small local bodies are under provincial jurisdiction. That is correct. But I have had considerable experience in one of these councils, and if there should be any objection to a small body such as this handling such cases, all that is necessary is for the Minister of Municipal Affairs in the provincial government to send out a circular letter to the municipal officials, requesting that they give every support to such a movement. I am sure that such support would be given.

I suggest to the minister that in section three provision be made in this respect. Otherwise I fear that it will be necessary to move an amendment to the bill when it is brought down to ascertain the views of the committee on the point. I make that suggestion now.

As to the board of arbitration, I am not so sure that the district court judge is the proper officer to handle such cases. I am not so sure, again, that if it comes to a case of arbitration the municipal council is not the most logical body to settle any dispute. They are, in my opinion, better than anyone I can think of in the whole district. They know the lands, they are in touch with the situation, and I have no doubt they would give a fair decision if the matter were left to them.

Mr. STEVENS: As there will likely be considerable discussion of this important resolution, I would suggest that progress be reported. I think the Prime Minister will agree that the discussion so far has been constructive and helpful, and an adjournment now would be justified.

GOVERNMENT'S RIGHT TO RETAIN OFFICE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I do not know whether any hon. member in the House is particularly interested in having order No. 6 retained any longer on the order paper. I move that it be discharged.

Mr. BENNETT: Let it stand until the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) comes back.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very well.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

Friday, March 26, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

ALLEGED FRAUDULENT COMPANIES

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the government to the fact that at present Canada is getting a great deal of undesirable advertising in Great Britain in connection with companies which are described as fraudulent companies incorporated in Canada. I would direct the attention of the government to the exposure made in the press of the British Associated Oil Company, Limited, of Canada, and of the Westminster Finance Company, Limited, of Canada. I am now looking at the issue of the Daily Mail of March 8, in which these companies are described as being purely fraudulent in character, taking money from and exploiting the public, and the article holds up conditions here in the worst possible light. I desire particularly to ask if the government will see whether incorporation has been granted by this House or any department of the government to those companies, and if so what steps will be taken to remedy the wrongs done the English public.

Mr. ROBB: I recall a couple of years ago talking this over with the High Commissioner in London, and pointing out to him the injury it would do Canada if some of the companies, some land companies as well as mining companies overseas—

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: These are oil companies.

Mr. ROBB: As my hon. friend knows, we have our troubles in this country also. The operations of fakirs are not limited to the United Kingdom. I will direct the attention of the Secretary of State to the question of the incorporations. I think it quite important that we should watch those things but my hon. friend knows that the government are powerless to prevent people from investing their money upon the representations contained in highly coloured prospectuses.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Parliament is not powerless to prescribe such rules and regulations as will make it difficult for these frauds to be practised. However, I just draw this matter to the attention of the government.

MARITIME RIGHTS COMMISSION—PERSONNEL

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has yet appointed his commission to investigate Maritime rights and if so, who compose such commission? I would also like to ask if the government have abandoned stalling that question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might say in reply to my hon. friend that the government have been endeavouring to secure, as chairman of that commission, a gentleman whose name is already well known in this country. We have been a little delayed in getting a final reply from him. I am not ready at the moment to announce the name but we have received word which is satisfactory, and I hope in the course of the next week to be able to announce the appointment of the commission and its personnel.

Mr. HANSON: May I say to the Prime Minister that of the three provincial governments of the Maritime provinces one, Nova Scotia, has already framed a bill of rights on this very question, and in the other two provinces the same course is being followed. Would it not be well to wait and see what steps those governments have taken before this government puts into operation this commission, which has been unanimously rejected by members on this side of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my hon. friend will be pleased to know—I do not wish to give him the terms of the order in council with reference to the commission—that the government had observed just what he has said. One of the governments of the Maritime provinces, I am aware, has framed certain representations—I do not know just how to designate them—but at any rate our government was of the view that it would be proper to refer all these representations to such a commission. It was thought that this would be in accord with the wishes of the provinces as well as those of the Dominion, and we intend to act accordingly.

ALIEN ENEMY PROPERTY—RETURN TO ORDER OF THE HOUSE

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I desire to draw the attention of the government to a rather important matter—the character of the returns made to orders of the House. Sessional paper 130 is a return made on a motion by myself asking for a copy of all reports associated with the Hon. William Pugsley in connection with alien enemy property and the like. A return has been tabled, but it merely has to do with the release of money seized from enemy subjects, such release being made on the ground of necessitous circumstances. Nothing else is in that return. I just want to point out to the government that either the resolution brought in last year by the then Secretary of State, Mr. Copp, was entirely misconceived, or this return is absolutely wrong. I invite attention to Hansard of last year. There was a governmental resolution providing for the payment of claims for reparation for losses suffered by Canadian nationals; that resolution was supported by the then Secretary of State and also by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald). I refer the government to page 4519 of Hansard of last year, where the Secretary of State points out that decisions had been given by the Hon. William Pugsley involving amounts aggregating seven or eight million dollars. Not one of those decisions is shown in this report. The Minister of National Defence, at page 4523 of Hansard, said:

> Hon. Doctor Pugsley held a great number of hearings, and has made his report on practically two-thirds of all the claims that were made; and the principles which he settled in the cases which he decided would probably apply, I understand, to the easy determination of all the other claims.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if returns are to be of the slightest use, the returns must be what they say they are, and I point out that while we had a resolution presented last year authorizing payments running up to five, six, seven or eight million dollars, based on the judgments and reports of the late Hon. William Pugsley, and while the return on its face is supposed to be complete and to contain all these judgments and reports, it contains not one of those cases.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, I have no personal knowledge, of course, of the matter to which my hon. friend refers, but I shall draw the attention of the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Lapointe) to it, and I have no doubt that he will be able to give a satisfactory explanation.

PEACE RIVER BLOCK

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, now that we have with us our new Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), whose abilities and genial disposition we all welcome, I would like to ask him a question with reference to a despatch appearing in the Vancouver Daily Province in connection with the Peace river block. The despatch is dated Victoria, March 12, and reads:

British Columbia's request for the return of the Peace river block to provincial control for use in subsidizing northern railway development will be laid before the federal government shortly after parliament resumes its session next week.

May I ask the minister if the government is seriously considering or actually dealing with the Peace river block, and whether or not it is in consultation with Premier John Oliver of British Columbia in reference to the matter.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, no such application has reached me yet. Possibly among the accumulation of other matters, there may be such an application, but it has not reached me yet.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into committee on Bill No. 14, for granting to His Majesty a certain sum of money for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1927.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the bill, but I assume that it is an interim supply bill which will provide for the passage of one-twelfth of the estimates?

Mr. ROBB: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not rise to oppose the motion, Mr. Speaker. The reason I do not oppose it certainly is not that we have changed our views in the slightest as to the constitutionality of this government and their right to carry on. On the contrary, every day more and more confirms us in the wisdom of those views. We are simply not objecting owing to the fact that we recognize under the circumstances that business has to be carried on, and we are, therefore, facilitating it.

Motion agreed to and the House went into committee, Mr. Duff in the chair.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have no doubt my hon. friend has had this figure carefully checked, and I am quite prepared to take his statement that the figure is correct. I suppose we are safeguarded by the statement further on in the bill that this is one-twelfth of the whole supply to be voted. Of course, Mr. Chairman, if this bill be adopted by the committee, it is subject to the usual understanding, that understanding being that by the adoption of this vote not one single item in the estimates is in any way advanced, but that the objections which the House may take to any item either as to character, principle, or amount, stand exactly the same as if this bill had not been passed. I apprehend my hon. friend will be glad to give assent to that statement.

Mr. ROBB: My hon. friend is quite right. I had occasion to look up the procedure of previous years, not only while we were in office, but while my hon. friend was Minister of Finance, and the understanding is just the same.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

Hon. J. H. KING (Acting Minister of Labour) moved that the House go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to bring in a measure respecting old age pensions, and to provide,—

1. That the Governor in Council may make an agreement with the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of any province for the payment to such province quarterly of an amount equal to one-half of the net sum paid out during the preceding quarter by such province for pensions pursuant to a provincial statute authorizing and providing for the payment of such pensions to the persons and under the conditions hereinafter specified and regulations made under the proposed legislation.

2. That every agreement so made shall continue in force so long as the provincial statute remains in operation or until after the expiration of ten years from the date upon which notice of an intention to determine the agreement is given by the Governor General to the Lieutenant-Governor of the province with which the same was made.

3. That before any agreement so made comes into operation, the Governor in Council shall approve the scheme for the administration of pensions proposed to be adopted by the province, and no change in such scheme shall be made by the province without the consent of the Governor in Council.

4. That all sums payable to any province in pursuance of any such agreement shall be payable from time to time on the certificate of the Treasury board out of any moneys belonging to the consolidated revenue fund of Canada not otherwise appropriated, and the Governor in Council may borrow from time to time such sums as may be required for the purpose of making such payments.

5. That provision shall be made for the payment of a pension to every person who, at the date of the proposed commencement of the pension:—

(a) is a British subject, or, being a widow, was such before her marriage;

(b) has attained the age of seventy years;

(c) has resided in Canada for the twenty years immediately preceding the date aforesaid;

(d) has resided in the province in which the application for pension is made for the five years immediately preceding the said date;

(e) is not an Indian as defined by the Indian Act;

(f) has not made any voluntary assignment or transfer of property for the purpose of qualifying for a pension.

6. That the receipt of a pension shall not by itself constitute a disqualification from voting at any provincial or municipal election.

7. That the maximum pension payable shall be two hundred and forty dollars yearly, which shall be subject to reduction by the amount of the income of the pensioner in excess of one hundred and twenty-five dollars a year.

8. That provisions be made as to the credit to the pension authority of the annual value of a pensioner's residence, and the recovery of pension payments out of deceased pensioner's estate, and for the distribution of pension burden among provinces by proportionate reimbursement or proportionate reduction where the pensioner resided in more than one province or transfers his permanent residence to another province, and for ceasing payments where he transfers his residence to some place out of Canada, and the revival of his rights upon again becoming a resident of Canada.

9. That no pension shall be subject to alienation or transfer by the pensioner, or to seizure in satisfaction of any claim against him.

10. That on or before the thirtieth day of April in each year, the Minister of Finance shall make a full report to parliament of the operation of the agreements made pursuant to the proposed act, and of the moneys of Canada paid to the provinces under each of the several agreements entered into pursuant thereto.

11. That the Governor in Council shall have power from time to time, on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, and with the approval of the Treasury Board, to make regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of the proposed act, with regard to the pensions herein provided for, and such regulations shall be published in the Canada Gazette, and be laid before parliament.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, the resolution you have just read does not contain any new principle. The principle of old age pensions has been recognized in practically all the European countries, in Great Britain, in several of the countries of South America, in several of the states of the United States of America, and in the Dominions of Australia and New Zealand. In some form or other this principle has been recognized, but it varies according to the desire of the country in which the legislation has been enacted. In some states or some countries the system is a contributing one, the individual contributing a sum towards his pension in old age, and the state furnishing another portion. In Great Britain the dual system prevails. There the act was amended in 1925 to permit of the operation of contributing and non-contributing systems. In the Dominions of Australia and New Zealand the system in force is a non-contributing one.

As I say, the subject is not a new one in Canada. We find that in 1906-07 a resolution was brought into the House of Commons and adopted. At that time it was set out that it was desirable in the interests of the people of Canada that some provision should be made for old age. In 1911-12 and 1913-14 the subject was again under discussion, resolutions being introduced into the House. In 1914 a resolution in favour of the adoption of the old age pension system was moved in the House, but the debate was not concluded. In 1922 the House of Commons adopted a resolution favouring old age pensions. In 1924 a special committee of parliament was appointed to consider the subject, and spent some time delving into the history of old age pensions. It finally recommended to parliament that some system should be adopted in Canada. The recommendations of that committee were as follows:

That an old age pension system be established at the earliest possible date for deserving indigent persons of seventy years of age and upwards.

That applicants for a pension must be British subjects of at least twenty years residence in Canada, or naturalized subjects of at least fifteen years' naturalization and twenty-five years residence.

That the maximum rate of pension be $20 per month, which would be lessened by private income or partial ability to earn; that one-half the amount of pension payable be borne by the federal government; the other half, by the provincial government of such provinces as express by legislation their desire to adopt the system—the cost of administration to be borne by the provincial governments.

It will be noted the resolution follows very closely the report of the special committee of 1924. It was suggested the other day by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) that it would be desirable that the House should learn what this scheme would cost the nation. I did not understand altogether the right hon. gentleman's reference of a few days ago to this matter. He said at that time:

It is not customary to debate matters upon motion to proceed into committee on a subsequent day, but as these matters of immense consequence, perhaps the government could at least give this modicum of information. I should like if the government could give us an estimate of what the resolutions on the order paper just read will cost the revenue of Canada. I do not expect a close estimate at all, but say within a hundred million dollars.

I am satisfied that the right hon. leader of the opposition is not serious in that statement because he has in his possession the reports of the committee on old age pensions and I have no doubt has familiarized himself with its recommendations. On page 4 of that report the committee expresses itself as follows:

> Your committee has estimated that under such a system there would be approximately 98,841 eligible pensioners, and if all these were to receive the maximum rate of pension, namely, $20 a month, the federal government's portion of the total yearly expenditure would amount to $11,860,920. This amount, however would be reduced by any private income or partial earnings.

So there is no suggestion of an expenditure of $100,000,000.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The question did not refer to that matter, it referred to all the resolutions on the order paper. What is the use of talking about something that never was said?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I took the statement from Hansard.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend does not follow his own reading. The right hon. leader of the opposition was referring to all the resolutions.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have taken my own meaning from what the right hon. gentleman said.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And as usual it is wrong.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The statement was made to mislead this House. However, I will proceed.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is a suggestion in the right hon. gentleman's statement that as a result of the government entering into a scheme of this kind further burdens will be saddled on the Canadian people. That is really not so. There will be no loss financially to the Canadian people. The work of caring for the aged is being done to-day through other channels. The municipal governments and the provincial governments, charitable and other associations are doing that work. I believe under this bill there will be great benefit to those people who find themselves, in their old age, without sufficient means for their maintenance. There are many people in this country and in all countries, who, through the course of their lives, in some cases not due to their own fault, and in other cases due to their own fault, have been improvident and have not saved up for the rainy day. Anyone who has been associated with pioneering throughout Canada will realize that there are men who were pioneers for years in this country, and although they have failed to provide for their old age, yet through their efforts and their labours have contributed much to the prosperity of those by whom they were employed.

The proposal to make a federal grant in conjunction with the provinces does not involve the introduction of any new principle, as is well understood in this House. Between the years 1917 and 1920, I think, the government of that day brought down legislation whereby $20,000,000 was set aside to be devoted to the expenditure on roads throughout the Dominion of Canada, known as the national government's contribution to the good roads policy. That principle was accepted; it also has been accepted in the matter of technical schools. We enter the provincial field when every year we vote money in aid of agriculture, and it has been accepted as good policy. The central idea of this bill is the establishment of an old age pension scheme under which the Dominion and such provinces as come into the scheme will each bear one-half of the pensions payable, any administrative expenses to be met by the several provinces concerned. It is expected that the administration will be entrusted to existing provincial organizations such as workmen's compensation boards, and that the administrative expense will thus be very small.

Mr. MANION: The minister says this is a scheme to be entered into with the different provinces, but since he has read the report he knows that last year the provinces spoke practically unanimously against it. Has the minister any other reply from the provinces since which would indicate that they had changed their mind?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We had a reply from the province of British Columbia, which passed a resolution asking for it. The committee did communicate with the various provincial governments, and we have replies from those governments, but apparently the provincial governments to date have not given serious consideration to the old age pension question. The reply from the Premier of Ontario is dated 24th November, 1924, and contains this statement:

> I should be glad to consider the matter.

The Manitoba government state that they will be glad to consider the matter with the Premier and the Minister of Public Welfare. The Saskatchewan government wrote that they could see great complications and difficulties in the way. There was no refusal on the part of provincial governments to enter into the scheme.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has there been anything further?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No.

Mr. HANSON: Has the minister observed the remarks of the Premier of the province of Quebec which have appeared in the press?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I have not seen them.

Mr. HANSON: In his reply he states absolutely that there is no necessity for a measure of this character.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The proposed bill would not compel any province to enter into the scheme; it is entirely optional with them whether they go into it or not. I have no doubt that when the bill becomes law the advantages to the various provinces will become so apparent that the proposition will be generally accepted throughout Canada.

In order to ensure that provinces which come into the scheme shall be able to rely upon the continuance of the federal grant, it is proposed that this should depend upon an agreement between the Dominion and each of the several provinces, the agreement to be terminable only upon the repeal of the provincial legislation authorizing the payment of pensions, or upon ten years' notice by the Dominion. Upon notice being given, the province may cease granting fresh pensions and will thus find itself at the end of the term of the notice free from liability, except in respect of such negligible number of pensioners as may have continued to receive pensions for at least ten years.

It is considered desirable that the scheme should be indentical in all the provinces and the bill, therefore, specifies the classes of persons who will be entitled to pension. They must be British subjects of 70 years of age and upwards who have been resident in Canada for at least twenty-years before making application, and who have lived in the province in which the application is made for at least five years.

The maximum amount of any pension is to be $240 a year, and from this is to be deducted any income receivable by the pensioner in excess of $125, the upward limit of any pensioner's income, including pension, being thus $365 a year, or $1 a day. No one is pensionable who makes a voluntary transfer of property in order to qualify for pension, but the dwelling house in which the pensioner resides may be transferred to the pension authority, in which case its annual value is not to be counted as income. Any excess payment of pension on this account is, however, to be recoverable out of the sale of the house by the pension authority when the pensioner ceases to live in it. Provision is also made for the recovery of all pension payments when a pensioner's estate at his death goes to someone who, during his life, has not made a regular and reasonable contribution to his support.

Where, although the pensioner has resided in Canada for twenty years, his residence has been partly in one province and partly in another, the several provinces of residence which have come into the scheme are to contribute to the pension in proportion to the length of the pensioner's residence in each. If he has lived for part of the time in a province which has not come into the scheme, the total pension which would otherwise be payable is to be proportionately reduced.

The bill contains the general principles governing the scheme and provision is made for details as to evidence, method of payment, reports and other like matters being covered by regulation. These, before they are put into force, it is proposed to discuss with the province desirous of making agreements with the Dominion in accordance with the act.

Mr. EULER: Is there any discrimination so far as the naturalized citizens of Canada are concerned, as compared with the native born? It was referred to in the report of the committee last year.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No there is no discrimination under the bill. The committee's report required twenty-five years' residence. I believe this legislation will be of advantage to the people of Canada and will render service to a class of people whom we will always have in our midst and whom we must, from the human point of view, at least provide for in some way, and under this scheme there will be a central authority and one universal scheme that will operate throughout Canada, I believe, to the advantage of this system of taking care of our old people.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I do not rise with the purpose of quarrelling at all with the general policy that this country ought to look after the people who should be looked after. I am not at all sure that they are going to be very much better looked after, however, or that we are going to make very much progress by the adoption of this resolution or the statute that will follow it. In view of the statements of the minister on the other hand, it would seem to me that this is another way of stalling the situation.

We have had nothing further from the provinces. We know where the provinces stand. Now, in the first instance, the minister refers to a query from my right hon. leader as to the cost of governmental legislation as introduced and covered by the resolutions of that day. They covered many things. They were all financial resolutions, and did not have reference merely to this bill.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I had just moved the resolution which was on the order paper and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) said:

I should like if the government could give us an estimate of what the resolutions on the order paper just read will cost the revenue of Canada. I do not expect a close estimate at all, but say within a hundred million dollars.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The whole of the resolutions read that afternoon.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I had just read my resolution.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is no doubt as to what is meant. The hon. gentleman is surely not so hard up for an argument in favour of his bill as to try to twist a statement like that. Despite what my hon. friend has said in connection with his argument, there may be more merit underlying this proposition than his argument would lead us to believe there is. I am not at all certain that it is a good thing for this parliament to try to look after other business than its own, to try to look after provincial business, when I do not think the most enthusiastic supporters of this government can say it is looking after, as they should be looked after, matters of pressing Dominion importance. This is entirely a provincial matter.

My hon. friend was quite right in saying that during the period after the war Dominion assistance was given to the provinces; that in connection with roads and housing the Dominion government gave the provinces aid. I admit that was done; but I wonder if my hon. friend does not think the objections which were then made, the force of which was admitted but brushed temporarily to one side owing to the financial position the country found itself in, were not really right and that is that the power of taxation resting in the Dominion, and in the right of the Dominion, should not be exercised in ease of the provinces which, under the British North America Act, have the right of taxation for provincial purposes. The point is rather a serious one. The hon. member did not refer only to roads and housing which, as he knows perfectly well, were matters of emergency having to do with provincial finances at that time and a pressing necessity, not only for the purpose of aiding these works but much more so for the purpose of providing labour to the unemployed and also for the purpose of looking after the shortage in houses, something which otherwise could not and would not have been done. Besides those two temporary matters, matters of emergency, the hon. member referred to agriculture. My hon. friend is right again; we do help agriculture, but we have every right to help it. Agriculture is a Dominion interest just as much as it is a provincial interest. It is a Dominion child, a Dominion care, just as much as it is a provincial care. There we are on common ground, but I point out to my hon. friend that we are not on common ground in connection with this matter and his argument in that regard entirely fails.

Why is the resolution introduced now? This matter is not new; it is old, as my hon. friend says. The government during the four years of its existence played with it; they passed it on from time to time. We had committees and committees; we had reports; we even had reports adopted, but nothing was done. Why? The sole reason nothing was done was that none of the provinces wanted it and to-day none of the provinces, with the exception of possibly one, want it. My hon. friend thinks he can vouch for that one, namely, his own province of British Columbia.

I want to refer the House to the material it has before it just to show how this matter was really gone into for the purpose of seeing whether the provinces wanted it or not, and then I am going to consider very shortly why the provinces would not want it. Hon. members will find at page 455 of volume 62 of the Journals of the House of 1925 a report by the special committee appointed to inquire into an old age pension system for Canada as to the stand of the provinces. I think I had better read the report. It states:

Your committee has given careful consideration to the aforesaid correspondence, and also to the correspondence more recently received from premiers and ministers of several provinces. Briefly, the views of the several provincial governments are as follows:

1. New Brunswick.—Under date of May 23, 1925, the Premier (Hon. Mr. Veniot) writes: "This province is now considering the establishment of what is known as widows' pension, and we are not prepared to take any decision in the matter of an old age pension. While I do not disapprove of the old age pension, and feel that it would be a good thing, yet it would be impossible for me to commit the province to any action in this matter at the present moment."

That is the stand of New Brunswick and the minister tells us that nothing has been heard from that province since then.

2. Quebec.—Under date of February 17, 1925, the Minister of Public Works and Labour (Hon. Mr. Galipeault) writes: "On the occasion of the recent visit of the delegates of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada, this question was taken up and, although it was not submitted in the regular way to the cabinet, I understood from the remarks of my colleagues that it could be no question for the province of Quebec, considering the obligations actually imposed upon it, of adopting a law which would take care of the old age pensions in this province."

We there have a definite refusal and the press of this week confirms again that refusal.

Mr. FORKE: Will the hon. member repeat that because I could not catch it?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I just paused to point out that in the correspondence which the leader of the Progressive party will find at page 455 of volume 62 of the Journals of the House of Commons, Quebec gave a direct negative to the proposal and that direct negative of Quebec then given by the Minister of Public Works and Labour of that province is confirmed by the premier of the province himself only this week.

3. Nova Scotia.—Under date of June 2, 1925, the Premier (Hon. Mr. Armstrong) writes: "In view of the importance of the subject-matter, and the lack of an opportunity to fully consider the same, I was instructed to advise you that without a further and better understanding of the subject-matter and without an opportunity to fully discuss it with your committee, no action would be taken upon the matter at present."

No action has yet been taken. There was time and opportunity for a better understanding, but this government in its haste to introduce this legislation for a very obvious reason which has been explained in the House more than once, has not taken up the question again with the province which thus writes and has heard nothing further from it since.

4. Prince Edward Island.—Under date of May 22, 1925, the Premier (Hon. Mr. Stewart) writes: "In this province, as you probably are aware, except in the towns, we have no municipal government, consequently all assistance to indigent and aged persons is furnished directly by the provincial government, either in the provincial infirmary or by monthly contributions to private persons who become responsible for their support. I have read over your letter and the accompanying report with interest. I shall place the matter before my government at its next meeting and will then advise you of its decision."

No decision has yet been made, nor has there been any further exchange of correspondence such as might have made it easy to get some real progress in the matter. Furthermore, the difficulty of the provinces in dealing with the proposal is amply illustrated by that letter. The province has its own machinery for looking after the aged and the indigent, and it takes care of them either in private institutions or by means of donations or payments to families who will take the needy in and care for them. What will the provinces do with all that machinery? Are they going to scrap their own machinery? I do not know how the provincial organizations have worked out but I should have thought certainly that this was a question for the people of the provinces themselves to settle one way or the other. I am at a loss to know what is to become of all these various provincial institutions throughout the country. There is some provision in the matter of relief to the aged and indigent in nearly all the provinces, and I believe there are a few provinces that have not recognized their obligation in this regard. But generally speaking, either through the municipality or through the province as a whole, they have at least taken some steps in the direction of caring for those who are in destitute circumstances within their territories.

Now I come to Ontario. The letter received from that province is quite brief. Under date November 24, 1924, the Premier writes:

I shall be glad to consider the matter.

And there it stands. On behalf of the province of Manitoba the Attorney General there writes under date February 25, 1925:

We are in the midst of our session just now with a multiplicity of matters requiring immediate disposition. I shall, however, take the matter up with the Premier and the Minister of Public Welfare at the earliest opportunity.

And this government, although that session was concluded months ago, have not done a thing in the way of considering the question with the authorities of Manitoba. Again, the matter rests in abeyance. As regards Saskatchewan, the Hon. Mr. Gardiner, the present Premier of that province, writes on November 19, 1924:

The government of Saskatchewan is of opinion that an old age pension scheme for Canada can be best adopted by the federal government alone.

There we have a new light on the subject. A new idea is given us, but of course it is opposed to the principle of this scheme. That idea is that instead of a fifty per cent division as the minister proposes, the Dominion government should meet the whole cost. The letter proceeds:

There would seem to be so much difficulty in the way of providing any scheme that would be suitable to all the nine provinces of Canada as to make it almost impossible, and it will be readily understood that if any number of the provinces were to remain out, it would be almost impossible to adopt any scheme which would not subject those provinces within the arrangement to considerable expense that should rightfully be borne by those outside the scheme. While we are disposed to think that an old age pension scheme should be undertaken, the difficulties in the way of the suggested scheme appear almost, if not entirely, insurmountable.

That is what the great province of Saskatchewan says in connection with this proposal, and in connection with the report upon which this bill is drawn up. The objections of that province to the scheme are summed up in the opinion that the difficulties are insurmountable. Apparently they have the idea in Saskatchewan that there are real differences between the various provinces, that there is a separate problem to be faced in relation to each province in the matter of relief, and that therefore it is almost if not entirely impossible to devise a method that would be suitable to the whole Dominion, owing to the great diversity that exists in the conditions throughout the country. Of course, that diversity must exist. There is a diversity in the character of the employment available to the people in each province, and, depending upon the extent of the unemployment that prevails in the various parts of the Dominion, there exists to a greater or lesser degree the necessity for this relief. Well, who is to say that Saskatchewan is wrong? The minister in introducing this measure very easily answers these arguments by disregarding them altogether. He pays not the slightest attention to the suggestion that a scheme of this sort will never operate successfully. We have not the faintest argument offered in answer to the position taken by Saskatchewan that there are differences between the provinces, that there is a difference in the weight of obligation, having regard to the facts in each province. That contention, made about a year ago, is left entirely unanswered; the minister makes not a single suggestion to show that the point is improperly taken.

We come next to Alberta. On June 2, 1925, the acting premier of that province wrote:

This government has reviewed the recommendations of the committee and approve of the general principle of old age pensions. We are not prepared, however, to accept the recommendations of the committee. The three main objections are:

(1) We believe that the federal government should assume a larger share in the financing of an old age pension scheme, as it is more a federal obligation than a provincial one.

The writer there, I fancy, was thinking of the demands upon his treasury rather than of obligations or of law. Of course, he is absolutely and entirely incorrect. However, he does not like the scheme, whether his reasoning is right or wrong.

(2) We are not satisfied that a non-contributing scheme is the best one.

We have not heard anything on that point from the minister, to-day.

(3) There is no guarantee that the federal government would continue for a definite time to carry out the mutual arrangements with respect to financing the scheme.

I may observe that the government has considered that point; it has not forgotten all about these things. The government has answered in this legislation the points that can be answered, but it has tied the hands of the country for a definite period of ten years. It leaves the matter in the hands of the provinces. To be fair to the government, they have got over the third objection raised by the Acting Premier of Alberta, but the other two objections they have left unanswered. Now I come to British Columbia.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I ask the hon. member how it would be possible, if the Dominion had an old age pension scheme, for the arrangement to be contributory, seeing that it would call for contributions from the various provinces?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has put his finger on the crux of the whole question. What is behind that question of his? What is it that gives merit and weight to it? Simply this: if you make the scheme contributory you enter at once upon the domain of property and civil rights, and that is absolutely in the hands of the provinces. The whole thing is provincial and my hon. friend's point is well taken. No contributory scheme, no insurance, nor anything of that kind could be worked out through the agency of the Dominion. It must be left to the provinces. The point, I repeat, is well taken. Let us now take British Columbia. Under date of February 5, 1925, the Minister of Labour of that province writes:

This matter has been carefully considered by the government and also by the provincial legislature at its last session and the consensus of opinion is that the matter of old age pensions is one entirely in the sphere of the federal parliament—

Of course they want the Dominion to undertake it. They think they have absolutely nothing to do with it. They do not want to pay half, they want us to pay 100 per cent. I read further:

And this government does not concur in the suggestion made by the committee that a portion of the cost of such pensions be borne by the provincial crown.

In a resolution passed unanimously by the British Columbia legislature on December 18, 1924 the following statement is noted:

State responsibility in the matter of the proper maintenance of aged citizens has been recognized—.

This is going on to the report, and perhaps I should not read that. There is a further letter here from British Columbia dated March 5, 1925, which I think should be read in order that we may have before us the stand of all the provinces. The letter is from the Minister of Labour of British Columbia, reiterating his former opinion. He says:

I beg to say that the matter has had very serious consideration on the part of this department and the opinion is confirmed that the matter of old age pensions is a subject for the consideration of the federal and not the provincial parliament.

Then on June 2, 1925 Premier Oliver wrote further:

Your explanation of how the proposed scheme was expected to work certainly tends towards a better understanding. Should the parliament of Canada pass legislation along the lines suggested in your printed report of last year, I presume the question would then arise as to whether or not the province would co-operate.

So there we have the whole story of the position of the different provinces. With further reference to the point I made as to this being entirely a matter for the provinces, the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice was taken, which will be found at page 457 of the same volume. His letter is as follows:

Referring to your letter of the 12th instant, asking to be advised with regard to the authority of parliament to legislate on the subject of old age pensions, I may say that this subject does not fall specifically within any of the enumerated subjects given to the Dominion under section 91 of the British North America Act, but does in my judgment fall within the subject "Property and Civil Rights in the Province" committed to the provinces under section 92. I am of opinion, therefore, that the subject matter of pensions has been entrusted to the provincial legislatures rather than to parliament. I do not mean to suggest that parliament has not the power to legislate upon the subject so as to assist the provinces or to establish an independent voluntary scheme, provided that in either case the legislation does not trench upon the subject matter of property and civil rights in the province.

In other words, providing we just make a gift of so much, no matter what comes of it.

As, for example, by obligating any province or person to contribute to the scheme. The enactment of such legislation would, however, involve the assumption by the Dominion of obligations involving heavy expenditures with regard to a matter which does not fall specifically within the Dominion field of legislation.

For the reasons set out in these letters and for the reasons set out in the report, this government last year took no action. They could not take action, because there was no common ground, and they were only seeking to deal with this matter upon common ground and with the help of the provinces. To-day we know no more about it; the matter has not been advanced in the least.

Now as to the cost. My hon. friend, in introducing the measure, said the matter was already being looked after, so he said it would not cost any more money. If it is being properly looked after, so that it will not cost any more money, what is the reason for this bill? Why in the name of common sense disturb anything which is being properly looked after? If it is not going to add to expense, why go through the form of adding to expense? My hon. friend knows that is not the situation at all. He could not be serious in advancing this resolution if he were serious in making rash statements. The minister says that the cost is set out in the report as $11,860,000. My hon. friend there is absolutely and entirely wrong; he just illustrates, Mr. Speaker, a common error which many of us fall into, in assuming that this cost comes out of this parliament. It does not; it comes out of the taxpayer, and this sum only represents half of the cost. The provincial parliaments, in the same way, have to burden the taxpayer, so we have to just multiply my hon. friend's figure by two in order to find out what burden will be placed on the taxpayers of this country. What difference does it make to the taxpayer whether the tax collector represents the province or the Dominion? What difference does the colour of the tax collector's uniform or the address of his office make? We have to double the amount my hon. friend has given, and as a result, on his own showing, the cost of the proposed bill amounts to $23,721,840, plus the cost of administration, whatever that may be.

It is just as well, Mr. Speaker, that we look at these things fairly and honestly. In principle every right thinking man wants to help those who should be helped, but there are limits beyond which we should not go. Every right thinking man knows that taxation is one of the things which is making for unemployment, a condition which prevents these people whom we think ought to be helped from looking after themselves. Every student of economy knows, for example, that the cost of living in free trade England has gone up enormously as the result of taxation, and everyone knows that an enormous contributing cause to that taxation is the dole system. I believe that everyone thinking of this question seriously believes that the very first thing to be done in Canada is to make our country a place where people may live and get their jobs before they are seventy years old. One of the best ways to do that is to cut down the cost of government administration.

Before this resolution carries, Mr. Speaker, I should like the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) to make a statement as to the method of financing this proposition. I observe that the minister is now in such a position that he is actually making provision in this bill whereby he may further add to the debt of this country for the purpose of paying these pensions. Hon. gentlemen will find that provision in the fourth paragraph of this resolution. Surely we are entitled to that information before this matter is finally dealt with. I hope this question is not to be simply played with, and that it is not merely raising false hopes in the minds of the people, as was done in connection with the other committee procedure. I hope we are not going on with it just because this government know, as I am inclined to think they do, that the provinces will have none of it, and that the whole thing is just an idle gesture. We are entitled, I think, Mr. Speaker, before this resolution passes, to a statement from the Minister of Finance; we are entitled surely to a statement from the government as to how this matter stands in connection with the different provinces, and as to how much it has been advanced since last year. I think we are also entitled to a statement of what is to become of the different schemes for relief already in existence. The province of Quebec have their schemes, and they do not want this. The province of Ontario have theirs; they are already paying mothers' pensions, for instance.

Mr. HEAPS: That is not an old age pension.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No, but they pay mothers' pensions, and besides that, the province of Ontario has the most up-to-date and efficient Workmen's Compensation Act in existence, and which to-day covers the case of a good many people who are over seventy years of age. What is to become of that? What is the general idea as to the interrelation of all the different schemes which we now have and this one?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would explain how the Ontario Workmen's Compensation Act is in the most remote degree related to old age pensions.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is quite right, and he is also quite wrong. He is quite right on the face of it; they are entirely different; but he is quite wrong in how it works out, for this reason, that men over seventy years of age, unable to work, who otherwise would be indigent are being looked after under that scheme. The idea of this scheme, which is a government scheme, a pension act, is just the same as the other, although there are differences because in the case of the one we have the principle of contribution and the like.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not think the hon. gentleman really believes that a man who is injured continues to enjoy the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Act until he is over seventy years of age.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Frankly, I think my hon. friend will find a good many who have been injured living to over seventy years of age.

Mr. EULER: Does the hon. member mean to say that the Ontario Workmen's Compensation Act covers the cases of men over seventy years of age, merely because they are of that age, apart from their being injured?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Not at all. There is simply an overlapping there.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There will be no overlapping. A man drawing a pension of less than twenty dollars under the Workmen's Compensation Act, because of permanent injury, would have that amount deducted from what he could draw under this scheme, and if he drew more than twenty dollars a month he would not be eligible under this scheme.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Suppose we let that go; my hon. friends can have that little scrap of satisfaction.

Mr. EULER: We just want the matter put right.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend does not want it right, not in reference to this, because if he did, he would want something that was definite and that meant something, and that he knew would be operative. What is to become of all the industrial homes of the provinces, what is to become of mothers' pensions? The provinces have to make up their minds as to these things.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend says that this proposal will overlap the mothers' allowance scheme. I think I am right in saying that all payments under mothers' allowance schemes are based upon the number of children under the age of sixteen years. That being the case, will the hon. gentleman explain how the mothers' allowance scheme can overlap this one?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is perfectly correct, but I think he will find in Ontario that there are many indigent mothers being looked after to-day.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Surely, in every province.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister himself admits that.

Mr. DUNNING: Not under that scheme.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not care what scheme it is, so long as they are looked after. So long as there is a measure of public help being given to them, I do not care what the scheme is, provided it is effective, and here we have the minister saying it is effective.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I did not say it was effective. I said they were being looked after.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend said before, effectively. What is to become of all the industrial homes, and that sort of thing, which are being kept up at the present time? Is there to be anything done in ease of the provinces and the municipalities when they abandon all these kinds of relief and the investment that is there? But they cannot abandon them. When the hon. Minister of Railways is addressing himself to this motion, will he kindly point out in which direction he thinks his minister in Saskatchewan was wrong in his letter of November, 1924? If he would do that, it would tremendously help the situation. Perhaps my hon. friend will say that that letter is all nonsense and wrong. Perhaps he does not think there is any difference between the nine different provinces, and the like, but at any rate, let us hear from him and see whether the change of climate and the change of atmosphere down here has worked a complete change in his views.

Then there is another thing. Do my hon. friends think it is fair for the ratepayers of one province to contribute to the cost of a scheme in another province? Here is the province of Quebec definitely saying through its premier: We won't go in; there is no necessity for this scheme. Suppose British Columbia goes in. What is the result? To the extent that the citizens of Quebec as federal taxpayers pay taxes, to that extent and in that proportion will they be paying the cost of this scheme for British Columbia.

Mr. NEILL: Were not the same identical arguments advanced against the grants to the provinces for good roads, that the provinces that took advantage of the scheme would be getting ahead of those that did not?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has apparently just come into the chamber. I dwelt before with the precedent of good roads and housing, and I am not going to take up the time of the House referring to that again, except simply to say that that was a temporary thing, as my hon. friend well knows, as he was in the House at the time. It ran for a certain length of time only, and there was a fixed amount, and further, it was done for the purpose of giving employment at a time of crisis, and also to help the provinces in their financing. But this is an entirely different thing. This is permanent, and the fact remains that Quebec will be called upon to pay a far larger share of the cost of maintaining those requiring relief in British Columbia than will the British Columbia taxpayer be called upon to pay.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): That is not possible at all. The British Columbia taxpayer assumes half the burden at once. Then the other half is divided proportionately.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend again has not caught the point. I do not know what the trouble is; I am trying to make it clear. Let me say again, the Dominion taxpayers of Quebec province will pay as Dominion taxpayers far more than the Dominion taxpayers of British Columbia will pay as Dominion taxpayers to the support of British Columbia pensioners.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): You did not say it that way before.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am trying to make it clear even to my hon. friend. If you start wrong you cannot get away from that sort of thing. As I say, this is a matter which ought to engage the sympathy and the best thought of every one of us, but I submit we are not getting anywhere with such a proposition as this.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): This is an important subject and one which requires very careful consideration by every one of us before the resolution is adopted. I have listened with attention to the criticisms which have been advanced by my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton). He has been very moderate and, perhaps, has pointed out what may be called weaknesses in the scheme. At the same time I believe the proposal is one of so much importance, is one of such pressing necessity, that it cannot lightly be cast aside. A short time ago—I do not recollect whether it was last session or the session before—a committee of this House considered the whole matter and reported in favour of old age pensions. I think we have to take that fact into consideration. Reference has been made to the attitude of the different provinces, and I followed carefully the remarks of the last speaker on that point. I think that by none of them, with the exception of the province of Quebec, was a negative answer returned to the questions that were asked. Considering the answers of provincial governments on the whole you might regard their language as favourable. I noticed that a resolution with respect to old age pensions was introduced in the Manitoba legislature, which is now sitting, and one of the speakers declared the matter was one for the Dominion parliament to deal with; he appeared to think that it could better be dealt with by the federal authority. I am therefore inclined to believe that the province of Manitoba is in favour of Dominion legislation in regard to old age pensions. The province of Saskatchewan is in favour of the Dominion taking this matter up. So is the province of Alberta. The provinces of Ontario, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia have not had anything to say in opposition to legislation by the Dominion on the question.

It may be asked, "Why enter into any more commitments when taxation bears so heavily upon the people at the present time?" The question is a pertinent one. Everyone recognizes that Canada is a heavily taxed country. Coming from the province of Manitoba I may say that there the legislation along this line is as advanced as in any other province of the Dominion. I recognize, however, that it is possible to travel too fast, and that it is possible to pay too high a price for something that may be very desirable. At the same time I am not prepared to admit that an old age pension system is going to increase the burdens of the people or to add to taxation to any extent. A great many people in this country are taken care of in other ways than by an old age pension. There is a large class of the people whose circumstances place them far beyond the possibility of want or of requiring public assistance of any kind. There are also civil servants and employees in public institutions and corporations who are taken care of by pensions in their old age after a certain number of years of service. But the present resolution deals with an entirely different class of our population, and it is a class with whom I have a great deal of sympathy —I refer to the ordinary people, the common labourer if you please, the man who works for a day's wage and finds it difficult to provide for the daily necessities of his family and himself much less to lay by anything for his declining years. This man has rendered a service to his country, he has well earned the pension that may be coming to him in his old age; and although the providing of pensions may press somewhat heavily upon our people I cannot help feeling that those who pay the taxes are quite willing to do something for those poor unfortunates who do not earn sufficient to lay by anything for a rainy day. So I am quite prepared to consider this matter seriously, and see if we cannot evolve legislation that will meet the situation. In any case these people have to be taken care of. The last speaker wondered what we were going to do with some of the public institutions that we already maintain. I do not know whether my hon. friend is aware of the fact that this legislation, if it goes into effect, will only take care of a certain section of our population, those who have been twenty years in the Dominion. There are other requirements which have to be met before pensions can be granted so that a numerous section of the Canadian population will be unable to take advantage of the provisions of any act we may pass. From some little experience I have had in connection with the administration of certain public charities in the city of Winnipeg, and I have already mentioned this fact in the House, I am inclined to believe, there are people in receipt of what is called charity who should not be reduced to that necessity. As I have already said, they have given sufficient service to the country to entitle them to financial assistance to meet the necessities of their old age, and the aid so granted should not be regarded in any way as charity. I should like to see the spirit of thrift inculcated amongst our people so as to try and ensure that they will not at any time be in the position to need public aid. I can look back to my boyhood days in the Old Land beyond the seas, and I can remember how abhorrent the idea of charity was to the people there. I remember, and I allude to it with pride, the sturdy honesty and independence so characteristic of the Scottish people. So marked was this characteristic that they would have to be very hard up before they would accept anything in the nature of charity. I do not want the old age pension to be considered in that light. I would rather have it regarded as something which the people receiving it earned during the long years in which they toiled for a living.

There is one section of the resolution of which I should like to have an explanation from the minister. It is that section which says that the receipt of a pension shall not by itself constitute a disqualification from voting at any provincial or municipal election. There is no reference to a Dominion election, which leaves it open to doubt whether the person in receipt of this pension would be able to vote at such an election.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): In order to clear up that point I may say that some of the provincial acts do not allow voting where pensions are paid. That is not the case under our law and therefore the voter would not be affected under this legislation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister answer a further question just on that point? Has he been advised what jurisdiction the Dominion has over the voting qualifications in a municipality or in a province?

Mr. FORKE: I do not think I have much to add to what I have already said. I have considered this matter rather seriously. I appreciate the criticisms that have been made by my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) but I hope that partisanship will not be allowed to obtrude in the discussion of this question. I am always afraid to make a statement of this kind for fear I should be misunderstood, but this is a matter of supreme importance to a very large portion of our people, and it has been introduced by the government. There may be some criticism on the government side, and I should like to hear hon. members tell us if they have any fault to find with the proposal and to say whether they are going to vote against it. I should also like to hear my hon. friends to my right tell us whether they think it a good bill. If they wish to see it put into effect, let them say so. Let us consider the matter upon its merits. It is of too much importance to be made a party football. I am quite serious when I talk in this strain, and I hope this resolution will receive the serious consideration which it deserves.

Mr. PETER HEENAN (Kenora-Rainy River): I sincerely hope the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) does not reflect the opinion of the majority of the members behind him, because I have always heard that the Conservative party have been foremost in the advancement of legislation of this kind; at least I have heard them take that position during election time, and I would not like them to lose their reputation. I hope they will carry on in the House as they do on the platform. At first I believed the hon. member for West York was going to support this resolution, but I actually felt, when he had closed his speech, that he had been opposing it; at least if he was not opposing it, he was quoting from every angle possible to throw cold water on the old age pension scheme. He started out by saying that he thought it was a proper thing for the Dominion government to mind its own business and not interfere with the business of the provincial governments. I think it is the business of the Dominion government to look after the old worn-out industrial workers and pioneers of this country, and if they can do something to assist the provinces in this matter it will be a proper policy to pursue. The hon. member for West York stated that none of the provinces wanted this scheme. He went on to point out the difficulties in the way of the provinces getting together. As I understand it, this is an act to assist the provinces. Under this act the Dominion government is willing to assist the provinces to arrive at a uniform basis, and as the hon. Acting Minister of Labour stated, it does not compel the provinces to come in. The hon. member for West York also left the impression on the House, that there would be some duplication, inasmuch as some of the provinces have workmen's compensation acts already. If he will look at the provisions of the bill he will see that no one earning $240 a year will be able to participate in this pension.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend has not the point at all. The question is, where you had that duplication, which would you adopt? Would you abandon the local scheme and go on with this proposition?

Mr. HEENAN: Yes, I have got the point. The hon. gentleman spoke of the duplication of payments. The minimum payment under the Workmen's Compensation Act of Ontario is $12.50 per week, and if my hon. friend will figure it out he will see that no one receiving that compensation, though he may be 70 years of age will come under this old age pension scheme. My hon. friend also asked why there is the provision in the bill with regard to voting in municipal and provincial elections. He asked what jurisdiction the Dominion government had to make provision in regard to provincial elections. This is an agreement entered into by the Dominion with the provinces. One of the regulations is, that if the provinces accept this proposition they must not prohibit anyone in receipt of a pension from voting at provincial elections.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It is not in the resolution.

Mr. HEENAN: It is in the resolution. I think the hon. member will find it in paragraph number 6. The hon. member stated that the provinces were looking after the older people in some way or another, and in the next breath he stated that this was done by houses of refuge or poorhouses, and he asks, what are we going to do with these buildings? Surely it is about time we were taking better care of our old people, to prevent them being stigmatized as paupers after they reach the age of seventy. The time has come when old, worn-out industrial workers who are not able to earn over $240 a year, ought not to be stigmatized as paupers or placed in poorhouses. I was in the Old Country last summer and had an opportunity to witness the beneficial results of a scheme of this kind. I found some of the happiest people from 70 to 86 years of age, living on their allowances, living in many instances with their children, or living alone, without being stigmatized as paupers. This proposed scheme will not duplicate the existing system of relief. It is true the municipalities and the provinces have at the present time facilities for taking care of old people, but in discussing a bill of this nature, designed to provide for our worthy pioneers, we ought not to give much consideration to the question of preserving old, worn-out poorhouses made of brick and mortar.

Another point I want to make is that the cost of this scheme, whether you call it $11,000,000 or $23,000,000, has been arrived at after taking into consideration the number of people who will be eligible to share in its benefits. Under the provisions of this bill the railroad men will not be entitled to pensions, and those employed in many other institutions which have adopted pensions for their employees will not come under it, because their pensions will exceed the maximum amount provided for here; therefore the total cost will be very much less than has been estimated.

It is true that many of the provinces have instituted social relief of a very humane nature. Some provinces have passed a Workmen's Compensation Act and a Minimum Wage Act for men and girls and have taken care in a general way of those less able to take care of themselves, but none of them has undertaken the care of worn-out people of 70 years or over who have not been able to provide for themselves.

In my opinion this government is entitled to great credit for introducing this measure and making provision of which the provinces can avail themselves. I think, Mr. Speaker, that all who have in any way represented workmen whether politically or industrially will agree that one of the greatest fears among the working class is that of not being able to provide for old age, not being able to earn sufficient wages to ensure that in the evening of life they will not be stigmatized as paupers. This fear has a very unsettling effect which this legislation will very largely remove. I do not agree, of course, that the amount of the pension is sufficient, but the measure is a step in the right direction.

The immediate expense in connection with the scheme will not be great because it will take probably one more year for some of the provinces to come in under the provisions of this legislation. The provinces will not be put to any great extra cost in administering this scheme because they have the Workmen's Compensation Board, the Mothers' Allowance Board and other facilities that are already created.

Public opinion is advancing very quickly along these lines. Listening to the hon. mem- for West York a little while ago, I wondered if he had read the speech delivered by a good Conservative over in the Old Country, the Right Honourable Mr. Amery, the present Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, on the 27th July last. I had the pleasure and honour of sitting in the gallery of the House of Commons in London listening to that right hon. gentleman, and he made a speech in which he eulogized the old age pension scheme and the unemployment insurance scheme commonly known in this country as the dole. When we hear a gentleman of his standing, a member of the Conservative party in the Old Country, eulogizing these measures, surely we at least ought to concede there may be some merit in them. I have his speech under my hand and he says the fact that Canada has not this kind of legislation, namely, old age pensions, unemployment insurance and so on, has a tendency towards keeping desirable citizens of Great Britain from emigrating to this country as they realize that in their old age there will be no provision for them.

I want to point out also to the hon. member for West York that the Premier of Ontario only last week stated on the floor of the legislature that he was considering the question of an old age pension plan, but he was watching very carefully the progress of the bill in the Dominion House. I am satisfied that Ontario will be one of the first to take advantage of this bill and to come under it. I do not want to delay the House in going into the merits of old age pensions. Most hon. members probably know more about the question than I do, but I know it is humane legislation and I hope the majority of members on both sides of the House will vote for it.

Mr. R. S. WHITE (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I desire very briefly to record my objections to the resolution now before the House. Personally, I am disposed to agree with the view of the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) that this question should be treated as a non-partisan one. It affects all classes. It has never been to my knowledge the subject of a debate upon the platforms of this country. It is practically a new question before the people of Canada although it has received some consideration by committees of this House, and I think we would reach a better conclusion as to the real sentiments of hon. members if the question were made a non-partisan one.

My objections to the resolution are threefold. First, I think it is a mistake that Canada should, by such a measure as this, advertise to the world that our country affords so slight and narrow a margin between income and living that when many people reach the age of seventy years it becomes necessary for the state to step in and maintain them. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Heenan) referred to the matter of the dole in England. Surely the dole in England and the proposed old age pension scheme in Canada do not make for thrift on the part of the people. On the contrary I contend that the effect will be to destroy thrift. Again, the amount of expenditure involved is no slight matter. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. King) placed at approximately $12,000,000 the charge upon the revenues of the Dominion, and if the scheme is carried out a charge of some $24,000,000 is involved when the burden upon the provinces is added. Surely an additional annual expenditure of $24,000,000 is not a matter to be lightly considered by a people so heavily taxed as we in Canada are to-day.

I do not know, I cannot tell whether or not the government is serious in this proposal. There is no doubt that the proposal is at present at least utterly impracticable. You cannot pass and enforce legislation of this character until you have the consent and co-operation of every province in Canada without doing a grave and serious injustice to the taxpayer. As to the attitude of Quebec there is no secret. Only on Tuesday of this week the premier of that province, Mr. Taschereau, stated in no uncertain terms that he and his government—and he did not speak as an individual; he spoke for his government, using the plural—that the province of Quebec wants none of this legislation. It had had enough, he said, of legislation of this character from the parliament of Canada in recent years, legislation such as housing assistance, grants for the extension of roads and so on, all of which I personally opposed, although that may be of little consequence, but which grants in their operation have involved serious charges upon the country without adequate compensation to the people. Let me read the words of the Hon. Mr. Taschereau. He said:

> If Ottawa wishes to come to the aid of our farmers, and of our old people, the matter is for them, but I think that the matter should rest with Ottawa, for we are not prepared to go into a system of partnership. If there devolves upon us the need of caring for our old people, and for our farmers in the matter of credits, we will do the best we can under the circumstances, but as to embarking once more upon a system similar to that as to housing, we are not prepared to go.

How would this scheme work out? If this government or this parliament is determined to proceed to put into operation an old age pension scheme, in order to be equitable it must provide a pension of $120 a year for every individual indigent person of seventy years of age and permit the province to supplement that grant by an equal amount, making the $240 referred to in the resolution. Otherwise what happens? Suppose eight of the nine provinces accept this scheme, contributing their $120, and Quebec refuses to join, as it has already refused through the mouth of its premier only this week. The residents of that province would be obliged—the logic is irresistible—to contribute their quota towards the moneys that would be paid to old age pensioners in the other provinces of Canada. In my opinion that one fact, which is indisputable, is enough to condemn the measure and to warrant the government in withdrawing it until it shall have received more mature consideration, or until all of the provinces without exception are willing to join hands and parliament resolves that, under those circumstances, the legislation is such as should be proceeded with.

Mr. J. E. FONTAINE (Hull) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I deem it my duty to take part in this debate; however, I shall be brief. I must admit that I am somewhat astonished at the attitude taken by a number of our opponents, seeing that this question has already been thoroughly considered without any reference to party spirit. The hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White) has just stated that he is not in favour of such a scheme. Indeed, his statement astonishes me, especially when I see his friends on your left, Sir, and himself rise to oppose this resolution. As far as I am concerned, it is with a deep feeling of satisfaction, I would even add of pride, that I give my support to this measure which will provide a pension for old age.

I see in this resolution the realization of a project which I have cherished throughout my life. Indeed, in the course of the session of 1922, I had the honour to move in the House a resolution which read as follows: "That, in the opinion of the House, the Dominion government should consider the advisability of devising ways and means for the establishment of a system of old age pensions in Canada." This resolution was unanimously carried at the time. However, it was only in the course of the session of 1924 that the government appointed a special committee, of which I had the honour to be a member, in order to study this pension scheme. This committee in its report to the House, recommended that a pension of twenty dollars per month be paid to every citizen who, having reached the age of seventy, was without any income, providing he was a British subject. Considering that the sum involved to meet the payments of this pension might amount to more than $20,000,000 per year, the committee suggested to the government, owing to the depressed financial conditions of the country, that half of said expenditure should be paid by the provincial governments. I notice that the present bill is based on said report. I am pleased to see it and I wish to congratulate the government. I especially wish to thank the Prime Minister who has always shown himself favourable to this project and always listened to me sympathetically each time I broached the subject to him. Moreover, Sir, as I stated when I moved my resolution in the House, in 1922, it behooves the Liberal party, the people's party in opposition to the large interests, to have such a philanthropic and humane measure adopted. The fact is so true that at the time of the Liberal convention, held in Ottawa, in August, 1919, at the time of our party's important convention, a special motion having such an aim in view was moved and adopted. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, himself, at a large meeting held in Montreal, in 1916, stated that as soon as the war would be over, one of the paramount problems in this country would be the establishment of pensions for old age, and with this aim in view, he said, that he had confided to his principal lieutenants the care of studying this question.

After all, Mr. Speaker, similar legislation exists in almost every country. As early as 1908 the British parliament adopted an old age pension scheme. In France, Germany, Denmark, New Zealand, everywhere, there are old age pensions. Do you not think then that the time has arrived when, in Canada, we should do something for those old citizens, those old servants who have contributed largely to the progress and development of the country, who have worked during thirty, forty and even fifty years to enrich others and have spent their whole capital—as capacity for work, is really the workman's capital—who, moreover, as soon as their strength gives way, worn out by old age and work, are reduced to poverty, become a burden to their children or are forced to take refuge in the poorhouse? I say that it is the duty of the state to come to the assistance of these old people.

Some, perhaps, might remark that these people should have been provident and have practised economy during their youth, but every member in this House knows perfectly well that wages are never sufficiently high to allow of savings, as the wages paid to workmen are always based on the cost of living. The cost of living for a workman's family of five or six children is figured out, and the result of this calculation fixes the wages he is to receive.

How can he possibly economize when he is paid hardly enough to allow the strict necessities to his family? Yet, the workman is entitled as well as the rich man to some comfort in this world, he has a heart, loves his children just like the rich man, and he would like very much to give them greater facilities than he has had in order to face the struggles of life; but how can he realize such a desire with the small wages of two or three dollars per day? I especially made reference to the workmen, because they are the people who will benefit the most by this pension act. However, let it be well understood that all those who have reached the age of seventy, men and women, if they are in need, whether they have had, during their lifetime, a trade or been in business, will benefit by this pension legislation, providing they have lived like honest citizens. One objection which I have heard against this scheme, Sir, is that it would discourage thrift and personal initiative: the workman would be less thrifty being assured that the state would provide for him in his old age. To my point of view, this objection is not a serious one. If this measure, as some believe, was of a nature to create abuses, the European countries, where this act is in force, would think of abolishing it, but on the contrary, they are improving it from year to year. On that score, the government should abolish the retirement funds of the civil employees; the banks and corporations, where such pension funds exist, should abolish them. Quite the contrary, I think that this pension act would be of a nature to stimulate the energy of workmen who would feel themselves backed by the state, and immigration would benefit through it when it was known that Canada looks after its citizens when they are old and feeble.

I will close my remarks, Sir, and I feel firmly convinced that no member of this House would vote against this measure.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I am unable to share the views of my colleague and excellent neighbour from the riding of Hull (Mr. Fontaine). I do not wish to discuss the details of this resolution to-day. It will be time enough when the bill is brought down. However, there are two aspects of the question to which I draw the attention of the government, of members of the House and especially of those from the province of Quebec; it is the constitutional and the social side of the question.

The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) discussed the constitutional point of view. To what extent is such a policy within the purview of the Dominion government or especially amenable to the provinces? I leave to the authorities in these matters the task of throwing light on this strictly legal question, or rather of expressing their opinion; however, there is a practical side that immediately strikes me. Let us suppose that a province should take the necessary steps in order to be eligible for its share of the fund constituted by the government under this act, and that another should abstain from doing so. Then, if I understand correctly the resolution on which this bill is to be based a pensioner of both the federal and provincial governments, leaves the province of Ontario to come and reside in the province of Quebec —supposing that Ontario should agree to the act and Quebec should abstain from doing so —he loses his provincial pension, and, the loss of the latter entails the loss of the Dominion government pension, for this government will not pay the pension to each of the pensioners individually; it will contribute to each provincial fund a sum equal to the amount distributed by each province to its provincial pensioners. It is a point which deserves to be considered in connection with the effect it might have, for instance, on colonization. If the settlers in some district of Quebec, be made aware that when their father or mother have grown old, they cannot enjoy the same advantages which are enjoyed in the province of Ontario or in another western province, they may come to the conclusion: "Far better settle elsewhere than at home." This aspect deserves some consideration. I think that legislation of this character should not be definitely enacted before an agreement is reached between all the provinces and the Dominion government. That is the constitutional point of view.

I shall not discuss to-day what might be the consequence in regard to the cost. I think that the time is ill chosen to launch blindly into such a scheme, and open up new avenues of expenditure of which no one can foresee the consequences or the amount it may involve within the next few years. Let us not be deceived: once we venture into such an undertaking, we cannot withdraw. When you have given to a certain class of ratepayers the habit of depending upon the state for their livelihood or support, it is much more difficult to close the door than to open it. That is why I ask you to think twice, even ten times, before you open this door.

Now, let us consider the social point of view. I confess that I perceive with alarm the introduction and development in our midst of the spirit which has started to revolutionize the finances and social order in most of the European countries, develop amongst our people the habit of thinking that under all circumstances, in all their sorrows and difficulties, they may depend on governments, whether federal, provincial or municipal to come to their rescue, minister to all their ills, cure their slightest ailments and fill all the gaps in the family budget. However, I admit that with the economic evolution which is rapidly taking place in the world, in the home budget as well as in the nations' budget, there is something to be done. But why not consider the putting into practice the principle of social insurance? Let the government apply a system of insurance by which ratepayers in the prime of life would contribute a premium which would be afterwards returned to them under the form of a retirement pension, sick pension, accident indemnity, all well and good, I would agree. That is an aspect of modern socialism which deserves to be considered and looked upon favourably, because it admits of the co-operation of both the state and the individual, because it tends to develop in the individual, the young man and the youthful head of a family the sense of responsibility and the spirit of thrift. Let us induce the young men in the prime of life, the men who earn their living and who can put aside savings to deposit with the state a fixed amount according to their age, and in keeping with the choice they will make of a retirement pension for their old age; let the government constitute itself the guardian and administrator of these funds; let them therefore help the pensioner or the future pensioner with the advantage of a gratuitous administration; you will then have the fruitful co-operation of state and ratepayer, of the common weal and of—

Sir EUGENE FISET (Translation): May I put a question to the hon. member? Is he aware that there already exists a Dominion act which provides a system of indemnity that exactly corresponds to the system which he at present advocates in this House?

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): Quite so. I thank my hon. friend for having simply anticipated my thought, for I intended to submit to the House the system of the retirement pension—I shall not go into the details—but merely point out the principle of the retirement pension adopted in the service of the government, of the Canadian Pacific and in a large number of important institutions.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Translation): It is not what I mean. I want to draw the attention to the system of annuities payable so much per year, that anyone may purchase each year by paying a fixed amount annually.

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): Quite so. Let us generalize this system, let us make it accessible to all the provinces of Canada.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Translation): It is.

Mr. BOURASSA (Translation): If it is, then why seek to complicate the economic and social legislation of the country by creating a system which can have no other effect but giving rise to difficulties, jealousies between provinces, between classes of ratepayers and stimulate within our economic and social system the application of the principle of state ownership, which, in my opinion, upsets the economic equilibrium as well as undermines the social institutions of a large number of countries. We had in a large measure succeeded in standing aloof. Well, for my part, unless confronted with very convincing reasons, unless I have the proof that all the provinces of this country are ready to co-operate in the same way, and on the same footing in the application of a system of retirement pensions created by the Dominion government, I do not feel disposed to favour legislation like the present one, and that on account of the dangerous twofold principle, to my mind, involved, and especially as concerns the province of Quebec.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I am strongly in favour of the principle of old age pensions. This matter has been before parliament for a number of years. The question which concerns me now is the practicability of the government's scheme and the sincerity of the government in submitting this question to parliament. The principle of old age pensions has been adopted in a number of countries, including Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand, Belgium, France and Italy. Old age pensions is a form of social legislation, an advancement and progress in social legislation in keeping with advancements which have been going on in other forms of legislation during the past hundred years. One of the most serious objections raised against old age pensions is the charge that it involves a very heavy expense to the state. I believe that that contention is an economic delusion. Our aged people are, in fact, supported by the country, but that support is in the form of charitable institutions, the donations of philanthropic and benevolent people, or assistance provided by the children or relatives of aged people. No one will contend that men and women over seventy years of age, the aged people of this country, do not in fact receive the necessary clothing and food which they require, so that the proposal before parliament is not a question of adding to the expense of our country as an economic entity, but rather a question of the method of distributing responsibility.

The question we have to face is, has civilization advanced to the point where the state should take in its hands the distribution of the maintenance and support of our aged people, or must we leave that duty to the kindness and charity of benevolent people? From a purely economic point of view I would like to hear an answer to the contention that old age pensions is not a charge upon the economic state. That is the first point I wish to make.

I recall vividly each day, leaving my office in Vancouver, seeing a man, seventy-six years old, bent with the toil of half a century and ill from his very indigence, engaged in scrubbing floors and in doing the work of a janitor's helper. It is in the actualities of experience that we obtain judgment and advice on the wisdom of legislation, in many cases, and knowing that this matter was coming before parliament, I questioned this old man. I asked him about his life, how it was that he had nothing to provide for his old age, whether he had a family, how he was getting along and how he faced his work. His story was the story of thousands of men throughout Canada, one of difficulties and illnesses in his early years. He was a temperate man, sober in thought and habits; he worked as he was able to work, but had not been endowed by Providence with the mentality and skill necessary to provide abundantly for himself and he found, at the age of seventy-six years, that he was practically a pauper; in ill health; broken and bent, and leaning over the floor doing his work as a janitor's helper. He did not know how long he would be able to keep going. The great fear of his life was what was going to happen to him when he reached the point of being unable to longer earn his living.

In this country, as in every country, not because of the conditions of the country but because of the frailty of human nature, there are thousands upon thousands of such people. The report of the special committee tells us that there would be 98,841 people eligible for pensions. It cannot be said, however, that all these people over the age of seventy years would be entitled to pension. A great many have private means; others are supported by their children or by friends, and would not receive a pension. The committee reported that the cost of maintaining this scheme, so far as the federal government is concerned, would be $11,860,000. I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that at once we can deduct quite a large amount owing to the fact that many people who are over seventy would not receive the pension. Let us say you reduce this amount to $10,000,000 a year. As I pointed out in the first part of my argument, you are not adding that burden of $10,000,000 a year to Canada as an economic entity. You are merely distributing the obligation throughout the state upon people who are less disposed to be benevolent and less disposed to help the aged and infirm and people entitled to assistance of this kind. That is all you are doing. Now $10,000,000 is approximately one-thirty-fourth of the total revenue of this country, which is in the neighbourhood of $340,000,000 a year. I would prefer to have old age pensions than to have the Hudson Bay railway and many other public expenditures which have been made during the last few years. I would prefer to cut down the public expenditure, apart from the fixed charges. I would prefer to put the aged and infirm in this country in a position of comfort, assured at least of the bare necessities of life, than to make large public expenditures, engage in construction work and a number of other economic activities of doubtful benefit to Canada.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I would ask my hon. friend to include in that list the Welland canal.

Mr. LADNER: Yes, I would include a great many expenditures that have been made by both governments during many years. But those of which I have particular knowledge are the expenditures made by the present government, and among them I omitted to mention $9,000,000 for Quebec harbour. That alone would pay the pension bill for a year.

I think if any hon. member of this chamber were confronted in private with the proposition whether or not this country could afford $10,000,000 for the aged men and women of this country, leaving apart the form in which the assistance should be granted, he would agree to the principle of it; but what I am chiefly concerned in is the government's sincerity, and in making that statement I do not want to be charged with raising the question of party politics. I think this question is one of the most important before the people of Canada. It is far above partisan politics. It is a question, the solution of which will bring more real happiness to the maximum number of people in this country than any other enactment which has been before the House for a great many years, and for that reason I want to keep it out of party politics as much as possible. But in considering the merits of the matter we have to review the conduct of the government in connection with this proposal during the past four years.

When the last parliament opened in 1922 the question of old age pensions was raised by a number of hon. gentlemen in different speeches. My friend Mr. Irvine, from Calgary, took a very active part in those discussions, but during those four years the government did not do a single thing of a constructive nature in the matter of old age pensions, although they were pledged in the most serious and solemn manner by their convention of 1919, by their party platform in 1921, and by the speeches of every important political leader on the government side throughout Canada during the contest of 1921. Everywhere they proclaimed themselves the champions of old age pensions, but when they were in power, although they had sixty-five Progressive members nearly every one of whom was a supporter of old age pension, the government found devious ways and means to avoid bringing down legislation and putting an old age pension scheme into effect. If they found excuses during the four years from 1921 to 1925, when they had sixty-five Progressive members who would support them, and who enabled them to have a majority sometimes as high as 160 or more, what likelihood is there that the government will press this matter to a conclusion now?

In the report of the special committee of 1924, which is dated July 1, 1924 and is printed in the Journals of the House, volume LXI, appendix No. 4, a programme was set out which embodies almost word for word, certainly idea for idea, the resolution now submitted to the House.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Hear, hear.

Mr. LADNER: The minister says, "Hear, hear." I will ask him why he did not introduce this legislation in 1925 before the election took place.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Politically it would have been a very good move, but it was not an opportune time. This is an opportune time, conditions having improved in Canada.

Mr. LADNER: My hon. friend's party was pledged in the most solemn fashion by its convention of 1919 and by its programme of 1921 to introduce old age pensions, maternity benefits, and all kinds of things, but they took no steps to do so. The report of the committee was submitted in 1924, so the government had plenty of time to introduce this legislation in 1925, when they would have had the support in this House that would have enabled them to put that legislation into effect; but they did not do so. Then in June, 1925, a report was submitted by the committee of which Mr. Raymond was chairman; a debate ensued, and it is to be noted that in that debate not a single minister of the government uttered a word; they all remained absolutely silent. Mr. Raymond spoke, also Mr. Irvine, Mr. Neill, Mr. Shaw, Mr. Woodsworth and a number of others. Mr. Irvine introduced an amendment by reason of the fact that the question had been raised whether this was not a provincial matter, and the Justice department had given an opinion in these words:

The subject of old age pension does not fall specifically within any of the enumerated subjects given to the Dominion under section ninety-one of the British North America Act, but does fall within the subject of "property and civil rights in the province" committed to the provinces under section ninety-two.

The Deputy Minister of Justice adds:

I am of opinion therefore that the subject-matter of pensions has been entrusted to the provincial legislatures rather than to parliament. I do not mean to suggest that parliament has not the power to legislate upon the subject so as to assist the provinces or to establish an independent, voluntary scheme, provided that in either case the legislation does not trench upon the subject-matter of property and civil rights in the province, as, for example, by obligating any province or person to contribute to the scheme.

Mr. Irvine introduced an amendment asking that a purely federal scheme be brought into force. Speaking from recollection, and I believe I am right, the government's excuse was that they were calling together a conference of provincial premiers because they had also to consider the question of giving power to Canada to amend its constitution, and the hon. Minister of Justice on the 18th of February assured the House that that provincial conference would be called in the near future, at which all these questions would be considered. But in line with the procrastination and inactivity of the government, they never called that conference. So this spring, just a few weeks ago, in order to test the sincerity of the government in connection with this very legislation, I put on the order paper several pertinent questions regarding old age pensions and some other matters. My first question was:

Is it the intention of the government to call a conference before July of the premiers of the provinces of Canada?

To that question the Prime Minister gave the answer, "No".

The question was put:

Is it the intention of the government to submit to such conference or a later conference any proposal respecting old age pensions?

To this, reply was made:

Answered by answer to No. 1.

The questions deal with other matters, and finally the last interrogations are these:

What steps, if any, has the government taken to call together such conference?

When and where will such conference of premiers take place?

The answer to the first of these two questions by the Prime Minister was:

Up to the present time no steps have been taken.

That was on March 15, 1926. Then as to when the conference will take place, and where, we had the answer:

To be decided in due course.

That is the great trouble with the government—everything is to be decided "in due course." But no decision is ever reached, and I am afraid that is what will happen in this case. I want to see a pension law brought into effect, I want to see cheques go out to the aged people in this country, and not have a postponement by excuses and the bringing forward of different schemes to avoid facing the issue. We had last year from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), who acted in the early part of the present session as leader of the House, a positive, firm and clear-cut declaration that a conference would be called of the premiers of the provinces and that questions of this kind would be brought before them. The inference was that as a result of that conference we would have legislation that would have been already considered by the provinces so that this parliament could act in a more intelligent fashion. But the conference did not take place, and now the Prime Minister says that he does not intend to call a conference, but that the government will decide "in due course" what they are going to do. Notwithstanding all the reasons why we should have had a pension law during the last four years, none has been enacted. But all of a sudden, when the elections of 1925 were over, when the government found themselves in a minority and felt the pressure of public opinion demanding that they should step out, they found it necessary as a political expedient to ally themselves with people they formerly condemned. They then drafted a speech from the throne and included in it other things which would secure the good-will and the support of many hon. members who cherish such measures as the one now before parliament. That is the actual situation. That is why I raise a question as to the government's sincerity. And when you read the resolution now before the committee you find clauses that will provide all kind of loopholes so that the government may escape bringing this law into force and thus deprive those people who are entitled to them of the benefits which they would otherwise enjoy. The first clause says:

> That the Governor in Council may make an agreement with the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of any province for the payment to such province quarterly of an amount—

And so on. In my judgment this resolution, or the bill which is to be based upon it, should prescribe the conditions under which the pension scheme is to be worked out so that all the provinces need to say is, "We accept that scheme," or, "We do not accept it." The unfortunate thing is that the effect and force of this scheme is made to depend upon some agreement or some arrangement, that is going to be worked out, let us say, between the Prime Minister of Canada and his government on the one hand and the Premier of British Columbia and his government on the other hand, and I will venture to say they will not agree. Knowing the Premier of British Columbia as I do, I realize there are innumerable excuses that can be raised for not carrying out an agreement of this kind, and this is what will happen. My friend, Mr. John Oliver, a man who is resourceful and skilful in political matters, will say: "I am a champion of the province. The Prime Minister of Canada and his government have the responsibility. I wanted to do such and so and they would not do it." In other words, to use the language of the street, they will commence again the old habit of "passing the buck." Mr. Oliver will blame the Prime Minister of Canada; the Prime Minister of Canada in his genial fashion will say that the Premier of British Columbia should further investigate the matter and the federal authority will decide it "in due course," and so the pension bill will not become law.

Another loophole is contained in paragraph 3. My fear, and in this I am quite sincere—is that the proposals being considered to-day in this House will not become law, and I predict that two years from now when we come down to the House we will still be fighting for the issuance of old age pension cheques. The administrative machinery may be partly organized, but the agreements will not have been made with the provinces; something or other will be wrong, and it will be found that the pensioners are not receiving the pension cheques to which they are entitled.

I submit that the law aimed at is a commendable one, and I commend the government for the initial stages they have undertaken in a non-partisan way. I commend them for taking the step, although the experience of the past would indicate that they may not carry it into effect. I think that from the serious business point of view, from the economic aspect, those who think that the giving of a pension is going to add an additional burden to the country are suffering from a delusion. It is adding no burden, it is only distributing an existing burden among those who at present should pay but will not pay. It is only relieving those people who are benevolently and charitably inclined and who will give a great deal of what they earn, while others will give nothing. It is only in the taking and distributing of this burden that the state will interfere by legislation of this character. I hope to see some measure go through. If I find when the bill is introduced that its provisions are reasonable, if the measure shows an indication of sincerity, I for one will support it, because I do not think that partisan politics should be interjected in connection with a bill of such great importance to the nation and one involving such great advancement in its social reforms. We are going to become old. Some of us may require the $20 per month which is to be provided. I hope that I shall not, but I know many will. And when I think of the people whom I have seen in difficulties and in trouble; when I think of the old man who always comes to my mind when this question is discussed; when I think of that man seventy-six years of age there on his bended knees scrubbing the floors; when I remember the story I have heard of that honest man who has done his life's work faithfully and who has devoted half a century to the struggle for a bare existence; when I think of the benefits which will accrue from the action of the state in providing even $20 a month to enable that man to keep body and soul together; when I think of the sunshine of happiness that will brighten the evening of his life, my heart, my conscience, my judgment and my resolve spring forth to make possible for the aged of our land a comfort and a joy which no true Canadian citizen, animated by high and benevolent ideas, would deny.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I am glad to see the introduction of this long-overdue measure of social reform. It cannot be said that this is something newly sprung upon the House. I cannot think of any legislation that has been so long in the hatching as this particular measure. The minister who introduced it said it was first brought up in this parliament in 1907, when a motion was introduced to the effect that this subject "ought to receive the early and careful attention of the government and of parliament." I observe amongst those who supported the resolution the names of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Mr. Maclean of York, the Hon. Mr. Lemieux and Mr. Bourassa. I do not know whether the last-named gentleman is my friend to my right or not. The motion was not pressed to a vote, but was withdrawn. That was a preliminary step. In 1908 a special committee was appointed to consider a scheme for making provision for the aged and deserving poor. I see that Sir George Foster, amongst others, supported the resolution on that occasion. No report other than a verbal statement made by the chairman was presented to the House. Then the parliamentarians appear to have taken a rest until 1912 when this resolution was moved:

> That in the opinion of this House a committee should be appointed to make inquiry into an old age pension system for Canada.

That resolution was supported by the Hon. E. M. Macdonald, Sir Thomas White, Sir George Foster and a number of others. A special committee was appointed, and later on they presented a report to the House recommending that further information in regard to the operation of an old age pension system in Canada and other countries be obtained. Parliament certainly proceeded slowly, methodically and very thoroughly in the matter.

In 1913 a similar committee was appointed. They brought in a report recommending the appointment of a committee at the next session. There was no rush about their action. That was in the year 1913 and nothing was done apparently in 1914, except that Mr. Kyte, the member for Richmond moved:

> That in the opinion of this House an old age pension system for Canada should be inaugurated.

There was a debate on the motion, and Sir Thomas White moved the adjournment of the debate, which I presume killed the resolution. Then the war came on and nothing further was done. Then in 1922 the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Fontaine) who spoke this afternoon moved the following resolution:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the Dominion government should consider the advisability of devising ways and means for the establishment of a system of old age pensions in Canada.

That motion was unanimously agreed to. In 1923 a delegation of a number of members of parliament waited on the government with this matter in view. I think the only members in that delegation who are in this House at the present time were the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) the member for Hull (Mr. Fontaine), and myself That was towards the close of the session. The government agreed to have a committee go into the matter the next year. A committee was appointed in 1924, of which I was a member. They made a unanimous report in 1924 recommending that the matter should be referred to the provinces. The committee, which consisted of nine members, sat again in 1925, and we reached a unanimous report—with the exception I think of Mr. Irvine, who made some objection to it and afterwards moved an amendment in the House. The motion for adoption of that report was seconded by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) and with the exception of Mr. Irvine the report was passed unanimously and presented to the House. In this resolution the government have for the most part adhered to the report of that committee.

I should like to comment on some of the statements made by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). He discovered so many lions in the way that if we were to adopt his attitude in the ordinary procedure of human life we could never do anything. I could conceive of enough lions between this chamber and where the hon. gentleman lives in his hotel to prevent his leaving here tonight. It is easy to make objection, and it is easy to see trouble where perhaps a willing mind would see a way through. He emphasized the fact that the opinion of the Minister of Justice was that this is a provincial matter. Quite true, the deputy minister did make that report, but why did he not also emphasize the fact that the deputy minister also said that it was quite within our power to lend assistance to the scheme in co-operation with the provinces?

Now with regard to the reports which he read at such length, all of which are on record, I may say that every one of these has to be taken in conjunction with the fact that they were more or less given in ignorance of the situation. This was the situation: In 1924 we submitted a draft scheme of co-operation with the provinces, on a fifty-fifty basis. The reports the ex-Minister of Finance read were replies which were more or less antagonistic to the scheme, or which simply stated that it was a Dominion matter. The reports of those who were unfriendly to the proposition were to the effect that it was a matter for the Dominion, and that was the basis of the objection. No province is going into any scheme which it thinks somebody else is entitled to deal with. The objection then, was that it was a Dominion matter. But the whole basis was afterwards changed. In view of those replies we obtained the opinion of the Department of Justice, which held that it was a matter entirely for the provinces. That changed the whole situation; it cut the ground entirely from under the feet of those who said the matter of old age pensions was not their business. They could not make that argument, and when the opinion of the Justice department was presented to them there was an immediate change of opinion on their part.

The hon. ex-Minister of Finance read part of a letter from the Hon. John Oliver, of British Columbia, addressed to Mr. Raymond, chairman of the committee. I have not the letter here, but the effect of it was along this line. "Your explanation of the situation throws more light on it, and we now look on the matter more favourably." That was the sense of the reply, and if the other provinces, at the conference we suggested should be held, had been made aware of the action of the Justice department, it would have entirely altered their views, because they would have said, "Instead of the Dominion trying to impose upon us a scheme which is their business, they are actually offering to pay half the cost, of what is our business." If it had not been for the election, which prevented the conference, I believe many of the provinces would have taken that view.

I will illustrate that fact by drawing attention to the position in British Columbia. British Columbia, more than any other province, said flatly and bluntly. "This is your business, it is not ours and we will have nothing to do with it." But a year passed and in the meantime they had obtained the opinion of the Justice department. Public opinion had had an influence on the legislature, and the British Columbia legislature, unanimously passed a resolution on the 24th of November last which reads in part:

> That the necessary steps be taken to formulate some plan in conjunction with the Dominion government to provide old age pensions—

And note this:

> —and that the other provinces of the Dominion be requested to take similar action.

A total change from their attitude of the year before, when they said. "We will have nothing to do with it." They are not only anxious to co-operate with the Dominion, but they will get the other provinces to follow suit. The resolution continues:

> And be it further resolved that an humble address be presented to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor, praying that he will cause to be conveyed to the Secretary of State for Canada and the provincial secretaries of the various provinces this preamble and resolution.

So that they made a complete change of front when they found what the legal aspect of the case was.

Then I have a reported interview with the Hon. John Oliver. He is reported in the papers as saying he would look favourably on the scheme, but of course, he said, he would have to see the details before committing himself. But he spoke of it favourably. I have no doubt British Columbia will be in the forefront of this social legislation, as it has been in connection with the workmen's compensation scheme and the eight-hour day, and minimum wage act. The hon. member I thought did less than justice to himself when he referred to what would happen to certain poorhouses if this act were passed. "Why," he said, "these poorhouses would be done away with." That would be a trifling matter, would it not? It reminds me of the argument put up—and I am serious in saying this —when we had a plebiscite in British Columbia on prohibition; it was stated: "If this measure passes, what will we do with our gaols." Here it is the same spirit. "What will we do with our poorhouses?" Burn them down if necessary, if you cannot find anything better to do with them. Fancy in this day and generation having to talk against the enforcement of an act because it will empty our poorhouses! Has the hon. gentleman ever considered the hardship of old people being separated in their declining years? Would it not be better and cheaper to keep those people in some home, say with a son or daughter who could take care of them, with the aid of this pension?—which by the way, is rather inadequate. However, we must begin low. I do not think we need worry about what will happen to the poorhouses. We can turn them into community halls if necessary.

The hon. member made a great point of the assertion that the report of the committee and the government's bill had not made the measure of a contributory character because we were afraid it would in that case prove out of order, so to speak, owing to the fact that we could not enforce a contribution from anyone. That was not the reason why that report—and other members of the committee will bear me out—so recommended. The reason was because, after a very careful consideration, lasting over two sessions, of the various old age pension schemes of the world —particularly that of Australia and New Zealand which in some ways agree more as to conditions with Canada than does Great Britain—and also that of Great Britain, we decided it would be best to have a non-contributory system. I will not take the time to go into the reasons, but it certainly was based upon a careful consideration of the experience in other countries.

The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) spoke about $23,000,000 and said that we would compel the people of Canada to pay that amount under this measure. That is not the case. The provinces are represented by legislatures; they represent the ordinary people and if the ordinary people do not want to contribute their share they will not have to do so. He said: "We must multiply this by two." That is not logical, nor do I think it is reasonable, because it is entirely within the dictum of the provinces to say whether they wish to contribute their share or not.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That was not the point I made. I was dealing with the question of the total cost. Surely you cannot take half of the total.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member was dealing with the question of the total cost, but he said: It is useless for the minister to talk about $11,000,000; we have to double it because we have to force it out of the Canadian people. Force nothing!

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. member is entirely wrong.

Mr. NEILL: Hansard will decide that. I want to explain about that sum of $11,000,000. I do not for one moment believe that will be the cost in Canada for a number of years to come. For one reason we put it at the extreme; we did not want to underestimate the amount required. We estimated on the basis of Australia and we took a certain percentage which is bigger than is found in some countries. I talked on this subject to a man intimately connected with the operation of the Workmen's Compensation Act in British Columbia, and he said he was satisfied that the number who would require relief would be much under the forty per cent, I think it was, we calculated it on. Also, to put the matter mildly, I will say the ex-minister forgot to read this statement of the committee: After we had pointed out that the amount would come to $11,000,000 odd, we added this:

> This amount, however, would be reduced by any private income or partial earnings.

We made no allowance at all of that kind; we assumed that everyone eligible would get the full pension, but we know perfectly well the amount will be heavily reduced by private income or occasional earnings. That is the case in Great Britain, and it will be so here. I think we are quite safe in saying that the expense will be very much lower than $11,000,000 for quite a number of years to come. I have come to the end of that phase of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, and I would be glad if you would call it six o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

Mr. NEILL: I want to make a slight allusion to the remarks of the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White), and I do so in a most friendly spirit, realizing as I do that his whole life and environment have been such as to have removed him utterly from the people whose conditions we are considering to-day. So completely out of touch with them has he been that it must be almost impossible for him to visualize the true situation. The hon. member told us that the act would discourage thrift among the people. Well, that idea was prevalent at the time when women wore crinolines, and I think it went out about the same time as the crinolines did. Moreover, it has been proved by the experience of every pension system in the world that such a scheme does not discourage thrift; rather is the contrary the case. We know also that the proposed act provides for a small income which will be allowed, so to speak, outside of the pension, so that there, too, is encouragement for thrift in a small way.

I do not know of any idea that is more difficult to combat than this. The man who has made some measure of success of his own life is very apt to take the attitude that if someone else has not been equally successful, it is due to his own negligence or laziness or to some mental disability. It is hard for a matter of this kind to be discussed quite fairly in a gathering of this kind, composed of gentlemen who for the most part are very much removed from the circumstances of the class of people whom we are considering. Some of us may perhaps have inherited money which by judicious business manipulation we have managed to increase, while others of us have been more or less the architects of our own fortune. At any rate the majority of members of parliament have some means apart from their sessional allowance and are in a greater or smaller degree what is called successful; and they think therefore that they are in no danger of ever falling a prey to the misfortunes of old age and poverty. It was Bunyan, I think, who once said when he saw a man being led to the gallows, "But for the grace of God, there goes John Bunyan." If the most fortunate man amongst us were stripped of the advantages which opportunity and luck and chance, or possibly Providence, has given him there would be little for him to boast about in comparison with others. I never see a down-and-outer on the street bumming the price of a drink without thinking that under less happy circumstances I, too, might have been in his situation.

It is far from being the case that poverty necessarily indicates negligence or laziness or incompetence of any kind. Sickness is a misfortune that is apt to befall anyone, and the wage-earner and his family are not immune. I was going to say that ignorance was a disease; at any rate it is a disability for which you cannot blame a man if he has not had training. How often have we seen men who have scraped and saved and denied themselves all their lives in order to have a little income in their old age, and who have lost it in a few hours by being gold-bricked by some smart rascal. It may be said of such a man that he should not have allowed himself to be taken in, but we must remember that he had not the necessary knowledge to protect himself. Occasionally we see widows and others entrusting their money to agents or lawyers who take advantage of them and embezzle their savings. I am not casting a cheap slur on lawyers, for I know that they are reputable people, but they are liable to fall by the wayside like others. I have known people who were not lawyers who have embezzled money belonging to their relations or their friends. Again, we have known men who have worked hard all their lives, contented, willing, and who apparently possessed every attribute of success, and yet they have fallen down at every turn. It never seemed possible for them to get ahead, although they could not be accused of any particular fault.

Again let us take the case of the woman whose husband has been a waster, a drunkard, a profligate. He has neglected to take care of his wife and family, and they are in a destitute condition. This is one of the objections—I do not say it was the only objection, but it was one of them—that decided the committee against a contributory scheme. The contributory scheme assumes that a man must contribute something before he can get a pension. Then you must also have the other feature; that if he failed to contribute he would not get a pension. Then what are you going to do with a woman? A woman may be everything desirable, but she may marry a man who turns out to be a bad character and who may abandon her with a family to bring up, perhaps by taking in washing. Then when she gets old and unable to work she hears about this pension. She applies for it and is told "No, you cannot have a pension; you can starve or go to the poorhouse, because your husband, between the ages of twenty-five and some other age did not pay his regular contributions." It was to avoid things of that kind and an enormous duplication of such cases that a contributory scheme was decided against. It was also found to be unworkable in several countries, except in very narrow phases.

The hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White) told us in almost awestruck tones that each one of these pensions was going to cost the province $120. Spoken in that way it sounds a lot of money, especially when you are going to give it to someone else, but supposing conditions were reversed; suppose the hon. member or others in this House were to look at the situation from the other end of the telescope. Would the hon. member, or would any of us in our old age, either for ourselves or for our relatives, contemplate with equanimity the possibility of existing on a pension of $240 a year? It has been well said that riches take wings, and that phrase is increasingly true to-day, in the turmoil of modern commercial life. It is also an old saying that it is only three generations from shirt sleeves to shirt sleeves. That does not, of course, seem possible to us, sitting here at our ease and convenience and perhaps with our private incomes, but I can recall that one of the first acts I was asked to perform as a member of the local legislature in British Columbia in 1898 was to sign a round robin addressed to the premier, asking him to grant a sinecure to a poor old man who had once been a member of the House, rich and respected, and who had lost everything. He never thought he would have to take charity of that kind, and it is on record in scores of cases in the Old Country that rich men who have founded charities, or foundations as they are called, and have subsequently, lost all their money, have had to accept help from the very charities they themselves created. I suppose, taking the law of averages, possibly one member of this House, either in himself or his wife and children, will have to accept this pension we are now talking about. I hope that will not be the case, but probably it will be so.

The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) spoke before six o'clock. I have not had a translation of his speech, nor am I sufficiently acquainted with his language to understand what he said, but from his attitude I sensed he was against this scheme. If I am wrong I apologize, but his style seemed cramped and he did not have that easy gaiety which distinguishes him generally when he is talking on a subject with which he feels completely in accord. I gathered from his references to Quebec and from the word "refuse" which I caught now and again that he was taking the somewhat parochial line that Quebec would refuse; that if she did not go in she would have to pay a share of the pensions for the other provinces. Quebec can always be relied on to do the fair thing, and if she did not go in perhaps her claims could be considered in regard to other appropriations which might be needed, which would not be shared by other portions of Canada. I do know that on the committee of which we have been speaking, which drew up this report which the government have largely followed, there were three representatives from the province of Quebec, and they were all unanimous in voting for a report containing these principles.

To go back to the resolution, there may be and, I am sure will be, demands from the people whom it is intended to benefit. They will not be satisfied with the amount suggested, and they will think it should begin at an earlier period. I think possibly some consideration might also be given to the claims of the soldiers, that the pension in their case should begin somewhat earlier than in the case of a civilian. I would throw out the suggestion that where a man has spent say two years actively engaged in the trenches, he might be entitled to a pension say ten years sooner than the ordinary civilian. That may be a matter for future consideration. I would point out that the bill follows the same custom which prevails in Great Britain, with the pension beginning at the age of seventy. There is in England a provision now, mixed up with some other form of unemployment or sickness insurance, whereby the pension may begin at sixty-five, but that part is contributory; the regular non-contributory pensions begins at the age of seventy.

I was much struck with the evidence of a gentleman who appeared before that committee. He was a railway man, evidently high in one of the railway organizations, and the attitude he took seemed so appropriate that I would like to repeat it. Speaking on behalf of the railway men he said: "We railwaymen do not want your old age pension bill; it is nothing to us. We have organizations of our own that will afford us a pension greater than any you propose to give. Inasmuch as we pay taxes we would be contributing for the benefit of another class of people and we would derive no benefits ourselves, but as working men we will be pleased to do so." We asked him, as we asked all witnesses, at what age he thought the pension should begin, and what he thought should be the minimum amount. He said, "Gentlemen, I would not pretend to give you advice on either of those points, because the essential feature is to get the principle started. To get that started it may be necessary for you to begin at a scale lower than it should be and at an age later that it should be, and speaking on behalf of the working men we will be satisfied to get the principle established. There will be no danger of its being reduced, and once you have the thing started and find the cost, you will be in a better position to see whether or not you can increase it as the years go by." I was greatly impressed with his remarks, and I think they had a good deal to do with the decision of the committee.

Now I would like to refer for a few minutes to a matter brought up by the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). If he had not introduced it I suppose it would not be in order, but since he brought it up I would like to say a few words on the subject for the first and, so far as I am concerned, the last time. He alluded in that veiled way which you, Mr. Speaker, have ruled is the only way it may be spoken of now, to the remarks which were so current in the early part of the session, that the present government have secured the support of the minor groups in the House by bribing them with legislation. In some cases, in the enthusiasm of a political meeting, they forgot the last two words. Speaking for myself, I came down here with a specific platform, which I will not now go into. So, I suppose, did the other groups. I want to say first that the men and women who voted for me did so with the distinct knowledge —it could not have been otherwise—that I could not possibly form a government to carry out my platform, and that I would have to turn to some party or section or group here to have our platform put forward. My constituents gave me more or less a free hand in that regard. I ascertained what measure of support I could get from one side of the House and also from the other, and I found that I could get a greater part of my platform put through by supporting the present government. If supporting the present coalition government—for that is what it is—in order to get the platform I was elected on, passed, is bribery, then I am not at all ashamed of the word, and I am not afraid to face my constituents at what I hope will be an early election—the sooner the better—and explain the situation to them there. I would like to ask just two questions: Suppose the conditions had been reversed, suppose I, or suppose we—it makes no difference—had been supporting a Conservative government, what about the suggestion of bribery in that case? In the woods, only expert bushmen are allowed to use double-bitted axes, because they cut both ways and have very sharp edges. During the recent adjournment some of the Conservative members for British Columbia went home and spread themselves emphatically along that line, telling how the other members from British Columbia, not Conservatives, were being bribed in this House by legislation. I want to give just one illustration, and it is good to take your answer to an argument from the source whence it arises. In the years 1903 to 1906 there was a Conservative government in power in British Columbia, and they were supported and kept in power during the whole of that time solely by the votes of three Socialists. I have the Journals here, but I shall not detain the House by quoting from them as members can look them up for themselves, but I have the pages marked, and I find there were over a dozen cases, or almost a dozen, in one year, where if the Socialists had not voted with the government the government would have been defeated. In some cases the vote resulted in a tie; I think in two cases the government would not have been defeated, but in almost every other case, if the three Socialists had not voted with the government, the government would have been defeated. That went on, not for one year only, but for three or four years. What is the difference? Is there a bond that exists in British Columbia that enables Socialists and Conservatives to co-operate, and that makes it wrong for Progressives and Liberals to co-operate here? Does the thing not work both ways? Apparently not. It is all right when it is a Conservative-Socialist alliance, but all wrong when it is a Progressive-Labour-Independent-Liberal coalition.

Take this particular item we are discussing, old age pensions. That is in the platform of the Liberal party, and has been for many years. I am not so sure about the Conservative party, but if they say it is in their platform, I will accept their statement. I know it was in the platform of the Progressives, in the platform of Labour, and in the platform of the Independents. I do not believe there is another subject on which we could legislate in which the object sought to be obtained is to be found in the platform of every one of the parties in this House, and when this coalition government proposes to pass this measure, to which we are all pledged, and in which we all have a joint interest, carrying out the pledges we made to our constituents; when it is a plank in the platform of all four parties in this coalition, they talk of bribery! Where does the bribery come in?

I am at a loss, Mr. Speaker, to understand why this matter should be given a partisan aspect. I have an editorial here taken from a Conservative paper in British Columbia; I shall not give it advertising by stating its name, but this is what they say:

> We do not know how the new act will be viewed here—

That is in British Columbia, where there is a Liberal government in power:

> —but in provinces which have Conservative governments there may be difficulty experienced in passing legislation which in reality will strengthen the alliance which exists between the Liberals at Ottawa and the Labour members of parliament.

In other words, they take it as a matter of course that in those provinces where Conservative governments are in power this otherwise desirable legislation will not be passed because it may lead to closer affiliation between the Liberals and the Labour party. If that is not partisanship run riot, I do not know what is.

Let me recall, too, that this legislation has been twice endorsed by the parliament of Canada, not in successive years, but in the year 1912, I think it was, and again in 1922. Was it endorsed by a partisan vote? Not at all. It was approved by the unanimous vote of the parliament of Canada assembled. Many Conservatives are pledged to it, pledged to their constituents at least. Then why not let us all join in this matter; why not for once take it out of this slough of partisanship through which everything apparently has to be dragged, and all join to make it the best kind of a bill that can be obtained, and then share the credit when we go to the people?

I would quote a few sentences, and then I am done, from the London Times. This is no Canadian Conservatism, which appears unable to dissociate itself from the tariff. The London Times is well known for the stand it has taken for generations. It is Conservative, but very Liberal-Conservative, and it has always taken a stand irrespective of its party affiliations. Here is what they say about this subject when it was introduced in parliament:

> A really helpful measure of security against the economic sufferings and anxieties of life. The Prime Minister, the government, and parliament as a whole may justly be proud of the result of their exertions.

Further on:

> The measure, then, as it stands, is the product of the united wisdom of parliament.

Would to God we could say the same thing!

> It represents the determination of the whole country to carry out what it has come to look upon as a sacred duty towards a large number of the more defenceless of its citizens.

And it ends with these words:

> In these times of stress the burden of the contributions, both on industry and on the state, must needs be heavy; but for the good that it will do and the contentment which it will foster by the relief of suffering, it will be abundantly justified, and, it may be hoped, in the great majority of cases will be cheerfully borne.

That is the spirit in which I would invite and plead with our friends opposite, many of whom I know at heart are thoroughly in sympathy with this legislation, to unite with the other parties in this House and put this measure through. If we will co-operate in that spirit, we shall have done a great thing for Canada, and shall have raised a monument to ourselves that will last for a long time, and one that our children and those who come after us will be proud to remember.

Mr. D. M. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Neill) seemed to be in a very bad humour. Perhaps it was because the other half of the Independent party has broken away from him. I do not know, but it is enough to upset any party to have its leader and the other half of it go against it on a measure of this kind. If I wanted someone to bring forward a case for me, I would take anyone but the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. What reason he had to accuse the Conservative party of being against this measure I do not know. I am not against it; in fact, I am in favour of it, and have been ever since the idea was first suggested. I do not know what right the hon. member had to get up and suggest that his half of his party had a monopoly of all the good ideas in the country.

As to this old age pension, it does not seem to me there can be two ideas about it. It is intended absolutely for a class of people who need support and who, I think, are entitled to it—people who for various reasons have not been able to lay by enough in earlier life to carry them through their old age. I do not suppose there is any class of men that has a better opportunity than my own profession, that of medicine, of seeing the homes in this country and of realizing that there are many people to whom a measure of this kind will be of great assistance. In moving around and meeting all classes of people in very intimate circumstances, we see many who are almost in absolute want, people who are making the bravest struggle they can and putting up a front but to whom a little assistance of this kind will be a great help. There is this about it, and we may as well realize it, that the people who have money are entitled to help out in such a case as this.

There are a great many reasons why people are not able to look after themselves when they get to the age of seventy years. We must understand that the men who are now eligible for this pension at seventy years of age were raising their families forty or fifty years ago, when the wages paid were very low and when it was exceedingly difficult for a man to bring up a family and lay by any money. Even to-day we know it is a very difficult matter to lay by the sum of $4,500, which would be the principal required to bring in an income equivalent to the pension, and at the same time to bring up a family and keep a roof over your head. It is easy to say that if these people had been provident and pushing they would have been able to get good jobs. Everybody cannot get good jobs. No matter how much effort they put forth there is always a certain number of people that cannot get good jobs as foremen or positions of that kind, and we have got to look out for them.

There is another thing that tells against these elderly people at the present time. Manufacturers and other employers of labour do not want elderly men. When men reach the age of fifty-five or sixty their sight and hearing is defective; they are subject to a little shaking of the hands, and it is not considered safe to have them working around machinery—in fact the Workmen's Compensation Act rather discourages employers from engaging them. Consequently the earning days of these people are over when they reach the age mentioned. When that time comes, if they have been able to lay a little money by, they are forced to live on their capital. I do not think it is wise to impose too heavy a burden on the young people of a family. I have often seen cases where young people were held back a great deal by having to shoulder too heavy a burden in the way of looking after the older people. I do not argue that young folks should be relieved from support of their parents or dependents. I do not think that at all; indeed in the province of Ontario there is a law which compels children to support or partly support their parents if they are at all in a position to do so, and I do not think any legislation of the character contemplated here should relieve them of that responsibility. But I do say this: If the young people were relieved in a good many cases just when they are struggling to make a start for themselves it would be a very helpful thing indeed.

This idea of helping old people through the medium of a pension is just a sign of advancing civilization. In the old days when aged people could not keep up with the procession they simply dropped out and died. Then the municipalities and communities began to take them into homes where they spent their declining days. That was a step forward. Then came our houses of refuge. We have one in our own county, and from my personal knowledge I can say that it is a well conducted institution. A spirit of kindness and sympathy prevails there that does not grate on the old people who have to enter the institution. Probably in our own house of refuge we have twenty people over seventy years of age who will automatically qualify for this pension. I notice one provision in the resolution which declares that the pension cannot be transferred to any institution or organization of that kind. Now, in cases like that, where the old people are already inmates and have no relatives of any kind that will take care of them, some provision should be made whereby the pension or part of it might be allotted to the institution in which they are housed.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like the hon. gentleman to quote the section which declares that a pension cannot be transferred to an institution.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): The section I have in mind is that which reads:

> That no pension shall be subject to alienation or transfer by the pensioner, or to seizure in satisfaction of any claim against him.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think that would prevent the pension from being paid over to an institution of the character my hon. friend has mentioned.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): It would be perfectly all right if that were understood.

Now, it has been stated that some of the provinces are opposed to such a law. Personally I do not think we shall be doing our duty if we fail to pass this legislation. Then the issue will be up to the provinces, and if they do not come to its support we shall not be open to criticism. Speaking personally I think I shall be simply doing my duty in supporting this legislation.

Mr. W. D. EULER (North Waterloo): I am not sure that I can add anything of value to the discussion, but I desire to take advantage of the opportunity to state my sympathy with the principle of the resolution. I have always felt that when men and women who have spent a lifetime of labour, perhaps rearing families and aiding in the production of the country, thus adding to the national prosperity, reach old age, and perhaps by reason of misfortune or otherwise come to a condition of want, the nation as a whole owes them something, not merely as a matter of charity but as a matter of right. If there is one factor that makes for the worries which beset us all it is the fear of the future. I believe Sir, that is a very real thing. The thought, I believe, that exists in the mind of every human being, even though that person may be in a position of affluence and prosperity, is that possibly he may not be able to provide for himself when he reaches old age. If a provision such as this can help to relieve that situation, can help to dispel that thought in the minds of people, it will do a great deal more good than is accomplished merely by the monetary payments that are made; it will relieve during the whole course of a lifetime some of the fear to which I have just referred.

Now, Sir, if the principle is right that the nation owes something to those who are no longer able to help themselves in their old age, it becomes then merely a question as to how this relief shall be given. We have at the present time in most of our large municipalities, in the towns and cities, institutions known as poorhouses, houses of refuge or homes for old people, to take care of aged and indigent persons. We have such an institution in the city from which I come; in fact, I think it was one of the first established in the province. That institution has been improved from time to time until I believe it is to-day one of the best and most efficient of the kind. But in spite of such provision as this there still exists in the mind of almost everybody, and especially in the minds of those who feel that they may have to go there, a horror and a dread of being obliged to take refuge in an institution of that kind. That apprehension we should relieve, it seems to me, if it is possible to do so. We should allow the aged people to remain in their own homes where they may live self-respecting lives until such time as they come to the end of the road.

We have then the question whether the relief should come from provincial or from federal authorities. We have had some discussion this afternoon on that point. The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) seemed to believe the matter is entirely one for the provinces. In view of the fact that there is some disagreement it seems to me it is not an unreasonable compromise to place the burden equally upon both the federal and the provincial governments. It is quite natural that the provinces should not be particularly anxious to assume this burden if they feel that the Dominion government is going to assume all the cost. In any case there is the proviso that the provinces are not obliged to enter into the scheme if they do not see fit to do so.

Other objections have been raised to the proposal as made. Some of them have considerable force. It seems to me it is our duty to consider these objections and to weigh them and see whether or not the preponderance is in favour of the scheme or otherwise. The three chief objections have been these: first, that the old age pension scheme makes for improvidence on the part of the public; secondly, the matter of expense, and thirdly, that to those provinces which do not choose to avail themselves of this legislation there comes the burden of supporting people who do not live in the provincial jurisdiction. In so far as the first is concerned—that this legislation will foster improvidence—I would say that I do not believe the character of the Canadian people is such that they will deliberately for a lifetime so conduct themselves, be so wasteful and so fail to apply themselves to their work and to save something against old age, as to induce them, for the sake of some $20 a month, to become parasites upon the rest of the community after they reach the age of seventy years. With regard to the expense, I will admit that up until the present time I had felt that after the burdens imposed upon us on account of the war perhaps the time was not opportune to go into expense on this account. I believe from what I have heard that the expense will be quite moderate for some years, and after all I have come to the conclusion that this is a most worthy thing. It is right that something should be done, and that answers the objection almost entirely.

I will refer to another matter which has been mentioned this afternoon; that perhaps this government or any other succeeding government might very well economize along some other lines which I will not mention now—along lines much less important than old age pensions. With regard to the argument advanced more particularly by the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. White) I think he had particular reference to the province of Quebec when he said that those provinces which do not avail themselves of this legislation will be obliged to bear part of the burden for the other provinces. There is some force in that, but I would like to say, so far as the province of Quebec is concerned as I see it is represented in this House—and I do not say this for the purpose of flattery—that despite the fact that members from the province of Quebec were solidly Liberal in the last parliament and almost in the same position in this parliament, they have given us splendid examples of liberality and generosity. So far as the other provinces are concerned, they have never taken advantage of their own power to press their claims unduly, but have always sunk sectional advantage for the general good and I say that in justice to them. Even if there is some force in the argument of the hon. member for Mount Royal, is it not true that we never have any form of taxation which is equitably applied throughout the whole of Canada. It is practically impossible to apply taxation with entire equity; it is merely a matter of give and take in the interests of the whole Dominion. We might take some examples. We have in this House men elected from the Maritime provinces who attempt to place before parliament and to secure for their provinces some special consideration to which they think they are entitled. I might mention the matter of freight rates. We had during the recent campaign the argument of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) that special freight rates ought to be given to the west and also to eastern Canada. I am not going to argue as to the propriety, the advisability or the wisdom of that, but we have that suggestion. If lower rates were given to the extreme parts of Canada we would be in a position where one part of Canada would benefit at the expense of the other part.

Mr. HANSON: I think that is hardly a fair statement of the position of the right hon. leader of the opposition. His position, as I understand it, on the question of freight rates for the Maritime provinces is not that the matter should be taken out of the jurisdiction of the railway commission, but that on certain well-defined principles there should be a public grant to give relief in some cases.

Mr. EULER: I was not making reference to the desire expressed by one member from Nova Scotia that the Intercolonial should be removed from the jurisdiction of the railway commission. I was referring entirely to the demand if I may call it a demand, that lower freight rates should be granted to the Maritime provinces as well as to the western provinces. If those demands were granted it would follow that the deficits of the national railways would be increased, and the burden of that would fall upon other portions of the Dominion. I am saying this not in criticism of the particular proposal at this time, but to show that it is utterly impossible to have taxation equitably applied throughout the whole of Canada, and that applies to the pensions now under discussion.

I have sometimes heard legislation of this kind described as socialistic. I am not a socialist, but I would say that so long as we operate under our present economic system, and perhaps it is best, in which every man fights for himself—and I was almost going to say, the devil take the hindmost—just so long as opportunities are unequal and the relative abilities of men are unequal—and they will always be— and so long as misfortune follows one man and not another, just so long will some of our people fall to the rear, and when they reach old age they will find that they must rely on assistance from their fellowmen in spite of their best efforts.

Legislation of this sort is sometimes regarded as sentimentalism, but it seems to me that in an age when the claim is made that we are now coming more and more to recognize the principles of what we may call the brotherhood of man, and if there is any sincerity in our professions of humanity, to say nothing about Christianity, it seems to me that a pension scheme such as this is a proof that the needs of the aged men and women are acknowledged to be a proper charge not only upon the conscience but also upon the material resources of the country.

Hon. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac-Addington): It has been said this is a matter that belongs or should belong exclusively to the provinces. Judged from the practice of the past I suppose that is true; and perhaps it is also true if we judge it from a strictly constitutional point of view. But whether or not that principle be applicable, I do not agree with those who say that this is a matter which belongs exclusively to the provinces and in which the Dominion of Canada has no part. There is not an hon. member in this House who does not know of a number of cases in his own part of the country where a man and a woman, perhaps in educating their children and bringing up their families to be good citizens, have made great sacrifices in the interests of Canada as a whole, and who, through no fault of their own, on account of unavoidable misfortune, find themselves at seventy years of age unable to maintain themselves. I do not agree with those who say that the Dominion of Canada as a whole owes nothing to these people; it seems to me that they have a very definite claim upon the federal treasury. I am in entire sympathy with the principle of old age pensions, although I think we will require to consider it very carefully and to make alterations in the proposal as at present brought down.

The idea of old age pensions is not new in this country; we have had pensions for a great many years. We had them long before I had a seat in this House. We have had pensions for judges, pensions for soldiers—not merely those who served overseas but those also who served down in the Woods building or in other parts of Canada—yes, we have had these pensions for quite a while. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman who says that pensions discourage thrift. My observation is that the prospect of a pension has encouraged very materially the thrift of certain people in this country. They have looked forward anxiously and eagerly to the day when they will draw that pension.

Sir EUGENE FISET: They paid for it, but the hon. member seems to ignore that fact.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): If my hon. friend will wait a while, I will not ignore that fact, or the fact that he is a pensioner. Let us take, for instance, the matter of pensions to judges. This is not the first time that I have raised my voice in objection to these pensions. It did not do any good on former occasions, and I do not suppose it will do any good now. There are in this House too many lawyers for that; they are looking after themselves sufficiently and they are, I presume, looking forward to the time when they will also pull down pensions as judges. I would not be at all surprised if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) was looking forward to pulling down a pension.

I notice from the Auditor General's report we are paying $15,333.12 in pensions to three judges of the Supreme Court of Canada. Hon. members will note that they do not let up on the cents; they pull down even the 12 cents. There are twelve Ontario judges drawing $41,666.80 a year, and fourteen Quebec judges drawing $77,003.26 a year. Among them one judge who draws down a pension of $8,000 a year. Three get $7,999.92 each; two get $6,999.96 each; three get $6,000 each; two get $7,000 each and two others get $4,666.66 each. So it goes on. In Nova Scotia four judges draw $13,600; in New Brunswick four judges draw $13,166; in Manitoba four draw $13,663; in British Columbia two draw $3,833, and in the Yukon one draws $4,999. In this way there is an amount of $184,397.71 being paid out in pensions to these poor, unfortunate, indigent judges of this country. Of course the Supreme court judges and other judges in Canada work at such a small salary that they could never lay by anything for their old age, so they are provided for in this way.

When I refer to these pensioned judges I recall an hon. gentleman who graced the floor of this parliament for some years, who was a cabinet minister, who drew his sessional indemnity as a member of parliament, his remuneration as a cabinet minister and at the same time his pension of $4,666.66 a year. The reason why this judge was retired from the bench was because the work was too strenuous for him. He wanted a life of ease, and so he came into parliament. In order to be sure that the work would be extremely easy for him he took a cabinet position where he would have nothing at all to do. I recall another hon. gentleman who had a seat in this House for a number of years and who sat on the other side. I want to refer to the two so as to balance things up properly. This gentleman held the position of leader of the opposition; he almost became Prime Minister of the Dominion of Canada, but not quite. He was voted down on a memorable occasion when the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Mackenzie King) received the highest vote and was selected. This hon. gentleman had retired from the bench; the work got too strenuous for him; he could not stand the strain and he retired under a pension. He came into this House and he drew his sessional indemnity, his salary as leader of the opposition and his pension as a retired judge. He carried on here for a while, but this life got tame for him and he went back again to the strenuous life on the bench. I do not know whether or not he is now drawing his first pension, but I am sure that the fact of a pension being ahead of him will not discourage his thrift by any means. He will look forward to that eagerly. Some say: If you want a pension scheme, it will involve a large amount of money. They capitalize that amount of money and it amounts to so many million dollars capitalized. If you capitalize at four per cent the pensions now being paid to judges who worked for a bare living when they were on the bench and never could lay anything by for their old age, it will amount to pretty nearly $5,000,000.

We have in this country another class of people who are drawing down pensions, and this is the class that the hon. member for Rimouski (Sir Eugene Fiset) wanted me to go into details about. We have a number of military men, some of whom risked their lives overseas and some of whom risked their health in offices in Ottawa. Of course those who came back from overseas, who lived through that strenuous life, are drawing a pension, and rightly so. But those who lived through the stress and strain of office work at Ottawa, and were almost martyrs to the war by the great work that they were doing here and the long hours they were putting in, made application for and obtained pensions. I think the hon. member for Rimouski is one who is in that glorified class.

Mr. CANNON: I have no doubt the hon. member wishes to be fair. Does he remember the services rendered by the hon. member for Rimouski in the South African war?

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Yes, I remember that very well. I would not detract a particle from any of the military glory of the hon. member for Rimouski or the Solicitor General either, for that matter.

Mr. CANNON: I am not in this at all.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I would not specially refer to this if the hon. member for Rimouski had not interrupted me a while ago and called for it, but I do not suppose the pension of that hon. gentleman had anything to do with the South African war.

Mr. CANNON: That is where the hon. gentleman is wrong.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): I am not finding fault with these military gentlemen for drawing pensions, any more than I am finding fault with judges for doing so. The fault does not lie with them; they could not get the pensions if there was not a law on the statute books giving them pensions. But when we are considering whether or not we shall hand out $240 a year—not even a bare living—to a man who has lived in and served this country just as well as the judges and military men have, in view of these figures with regard to the pensions that these men are drawing, I say that so long as we have on the statute books of this country laws that enable judges to be retired at six, seven and eight thousand dollars a year and military men to retire, while they are in splendid health and good physical condition, on pensions of several thousand dollars a year, I will support on every occasion a pension to give something to old men of seventy years of age. I do not want to use any harsh terms in regard to these pensioners, but I believe I would be justified in referring, not by any means to all these pensions, not by any means to a majority of them, but to some of them, as nothing more nor less than glorified graft. That is the way it appears to me at all events. I think we should consider this whole matter carefully, going over the acts that provide pensions to men who, in my judgment, are not entitled to them, and wipe those acts off the statute book. Let us get down to sanity in this matter and if necessary give these men a decent, reasonable salary; but let us remove these provisions from the law. I would be the last to raise any objection to giving them an edequate salary. These gentlemen seem anxious enough to take judgeships when they are offered, and in my opinion we should give them a remuneration sufficient to enable them to provide for their old age. But if out of their salaries they cannot make that provision for themselves, then I do not think that they should be given pensions. It is ridiculous that certain men who have occupied positions in which they have received large salaries should be given pensions that enable them to live in luxury while others who have served the country equally well, even though in humbler capacity, receive nothing at all and are obliged occasionally to go to the poorhouse.

[Mr. J. W. Edwards.]

The present proposal is to grant a pension of $240 to men seventy years of age and up. Out of that the pensioner must provide a roof over his head besides clothing, food and fuel, and it is not unreasonable to suppose that he will be ill occasionally and incur expenses for doctor's services and so forth. All that he must provide out of $240 a year. Well, we may get a good deal of patting on the back from people for giving the indigent a pension of $240, but I do not think there is a member in this House who does not realize that this sum is altogether inadequate. I am in a position to obtain information from my own constituency to prove what I say. Last Saturday I had a conversation with the county clerk of the county of Frontenac in regard to this very matter, and I got from him certain information bearing on the cost of running the House of Providence and the House of Refuge, both in the city of Kingston. These two institutions provide food and shelter for the indigent of the county. I have in my hand the figures given me by the county clerk in regard to ten men and five women inmates. I find that the cost for clothes, tobacco and little necessaries for the men ranged from as low as $12.40 to as high as $24.39 over a period of three months. The county pays a straight fee of $4.80 per person per week, and taking into consideration maintenance, cost of clothing and so on, the average for the ten men was $26.65 per month. That, I think, is the lowest possible cost of maintaining these people. That would be a matter of $320 a year, or $80 more than the pension which it is proposed to give under this scheme.

I presume that the figures I have given for the county of Frontenac would be about the same as the cost in other parts of Ontario and probably very much the same as in every other section of the Dominion. Now, bearing in mind that the poor who are kept in these institutions are given, besides the shelter that is afforded them, the necessary medical attendance and all that, I am convinced that, in view of the fact that the lowest possible cost of maintaining the individual in such a place amounts to $320 per annum, anyone who receives only $240, out of which he must provide his own shelter, fuel, food, clothing and everything else, will find it exceedingly difficult to keep himself on that sum. The $240 will not nearly keep body and soul together.

There is a good deal to be said in favour of the institutions. When these people are taken ill, if they are living in the country some distance away, who is going to look after them? If, however, they are in an institution they are cared for at a time when it is imperative that they be looked after. There is this danger about giving these pensions, that where the pensioner is living by himself and maintaining or trying to maintain himself on $240 a year, people who otherwise would take an iterest in him will say: "Well, we are under no obligation. He is receiving a government pension, and he is supposed to be able to live on that." Now, we have a duty to these old people. There is no question about that, and we should not shirk the responsibility. I am entirely in agreement with the proposal that this obligation should be shared by the provinces, but I fancy the government will be well advised to be in no great hurry with this bill. I am not sure that it would not pay to wait perhaps another year, if by so doing we could obtain a definite expression of opinion and perhaps get all the provinces to come under the scheme. Others may differ from me in that regard. Certainly it is perfectly logical that the province that does not come in will be obliged to contribute towards expenses from which it will receive no money. True, as has been already stated, we should multiply instances in other matters where this discrepancy has occurred throughout the country.

A word in conclusion. I am in sympathy with old age pensions, and I believe that a duty does rest on the Dominion in that regard. I believe, further, that this duty has been accentuated, so far as we are concerned, by the recent war. Perhaps I might cite a case by way of illustration. Two or three weeks ago an old man, though a man not so very old in point of years—he is about sixty-seven or sixty-eight—wrote asking me to appeal to the pension board to see whether I could not get him a pension. The reason he advanced was that his only son went over to the war, and he was alone in the world, his wife being dead. When the son went to the war this man, who was a carpenter and in good health, was looking after himself and was perfectly confident of his ability to do so. Had the son said to his father, "Now, father, I will send you some of my pay," I have no doubt the father would have said, "No, I do not want your pay; I can make my own money"—and so he could, at that time. But he is not in a position to make any money to-day. His only son lies buried in France. I appealed on his behalf—I am not blaming the Board of Pension Commissioners; they have their regulations—and was told that if this man's son had sent any of his pay to his father they would have taken that as evidence that the father depended upon the son for support, but inasmuch as the son did not send any of his pay, the father has no claim upon the government of Canada for any assistance. That is the situation; I can get nothing for him, and he is not in a position to get anything for himself. That man lives in the province of Ontario. Am I to be told that the obligation rests entirely on Ontario to provide for that man in his old age? Was it only for Ontario that his son was fighting? No, Mr. Speaker; his son went overseas and fought for the Dominion of Canada. If that son had been spared he would be taking care of his father to-day. I have no doubt in my mind, Mr. Speaker, that the Dominion of Canada is under obligation to that man, to a certain extent at least. He is very close to seventy years of age, and the government should provide some assistance for his declining years. There are many cases like this, I have no doubt, all over the country; the situation has been aggravated by the war. That being the case, there is a duty, an obligation, a responsibility resting upon this Dominion seriously to consider this matter and to see what we can do in the way of making the declining years of the old people reasonably comfortable.

Mr. E. A. LAPIERRE (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I do not wish to detain the House very long on this subject, but now that the principle of old age pensions has been generally accepted there seems to be no reason why this legislation should not be unanimously accepted by the House. Other parts of the empire, Great Britain and Australia, have accepted the principle of old age pensions, and Canada is in duty bound to follow the example so shown. Old age pensions are to-day accepted by almost all civilized nations; the only objection we have heard against the scheme, so far, has been the refusal of some of the provinces to co-operate with the government in putting such a measure into execution. So far as my own constituency is concerned—a constituency composed very largely of wage earners and old pioneers—the sentiment generally is in favour of this legislation.

If amongst our population there is one class deserving of consideration, it is that class of old pioneers who spent the best parts of their lives in developing the fringes of our civilization. We have such cases in my constituency. We have old settlers who, after labouring for many years, have had years of bad crops, have met with misfortune and have had their farms taken from them by foreclosure, or have been forced to sell at prices which did not assure them of a livelihood for their remaining years.

We have also a class of people in the north country who have contributed a great deal to the development of the country, and those are the people engaged in the lumbering industry. The lumberman of the north has often been accused of not being thrifty, but even in our days of prosperity, when the standard of living was improving throughout the country and the scale of wages of all organized labour was rising, the man employed in the lumber industry had to be satisfied with the very lowest wage. In our House of Refuge in the city of North Bay one of the best managed and most progressive houses of refuge in the north country, we find that of its inmates a large majority spent a good many years in the lumber camps. These conditions exist, and it is the duty of the Dominion as well as that of the provinces to see that those citizens of Canada are not left to shift for themselves, but are given a certain measure of assistance.

That also applies to a very large class of unskilled labour. It is said to-day that the standard of living amongst wage earners is steadily increasing. While that is true; while the standard of living is increasing among those engaged in certain occupations, or members of labour organizations, the unskilled labourer has found it very much harder to keep up with that rising standard of living. It is among that class that you will find the man of seventy who is unable to provide for his last years. Our industrial system of to-day is called a capitalistic system, and it will be said to have failed if the great army of wage earners who have contributed their share towards the development and progress of our country are not fully taken care of, as well as those in the higher spheres of life. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I am going to support this resolution.

Hon. R. B. BENNETT (West Calgary): I desire to offer a few observations only, Mr. Speaker, with reference to this matter. First of all, I think there has been some misapprehension on the part of some speakers as to what the real situation is. In the first place, it is quite clear, although it has never been exactly determined, that the provinces have perhaps sole jurisdiction with respect to the granting of old age pensions, and secondly, that this parliament has power by the grant of money to supplement the action of the provinces in that regard. The various committees of this House that have dealt with this matter apparently were entirely moved by those considerations, and in 1925, on the 16th day of June last year, the committee that had made the recommendations for pensions legislation saw fit to make another recommendation to this House, and that recommendation is one which I submit the government should give effect to. It is the recommendation of the committee of which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) was a member. It is a recommendation which in my judgment recognizes the real difficulty of this situation. It is a recommendation which, if departed from, will bring about the condition of affairs to which the hon. gentleman from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) referred this afternoon.

May I refer to the Journals for the 16th of June, 1925? I observe that—

> Mr. Raymond, from the special committee, appointed on the 1st of May last to make an inquiry into an old age pension system for Canada, to which was referred the correspondence arising from the proposals recommended to parliament on the 1st of July, 1924, for co-operative action on the part of the federal government and the governments of the several provinces, has the honour to report as follows.

After reviewing the correspondence and the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice the report proceeds:

> The enactment of such legislation would, however, involve the assumption by the Dominion of obligations involving heavy expenditures with regard to a matter which does not fall specifically within the Dominion field of legislation.
> Having given very careful consideration to the opinion submitted by the Department of Justice, and also to the respective views of the different provinces, your committee have come to the following conclusions:
> Firstly, that if the Dominion government were to proceed now with a scheme of old age pensions, it would have to be prepared to bear the entire expense, which would approximately amount to twenty-three million ($23,000,000) dollars annually, according to the data obtained in your committee's investigations.
> Secondly, that in view of the present financial conditions and heavy taxation of Canada, your committee would not feel warranted at the present moment in recommending such a large additional expenditure, annually.
> Thirdly, that this measure of social reform, in the opinion of your committee, is very important, and
> Fourthly, that since it is the opinion of the Department of Justice that the matter is one coming under the jurisdiction of the provinces, although open to assistance from the federal government, your committee, therefore, strongly recommend:—
> 1. That the federal government arrange with the premiers of the different provinces for a conference to be held during the coming recess of parliament at which an old age pension system shall be given the fullest consideration with a view to securing co-operative action, and that the report of the said conference be laid on the table at the next session of parliament for future consideration and action.
> 2. That the chairman of your committee, and one other of its members who would be familiar with the subject matter, be invited to attend the said conference.
> 3. That a copy of this report be forwarded to each premier of the several provinces.

Now may I direct the attention of this House to the fact that that report, accepted and adopted by parliament in June last, is a report of the committee of which the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was a member, and that report clearly indicates, as clearly as words can, that this parliament should not proceed with this measure unless and until the provinces had agreed upon a co-operative system with respect to pensions throughout Canada. It is quite clear that as the election came shortly after, there was no likelihood of a conference being called between that time and the end of the year. There has been no opportunity for calling a conference since, and I do submit therefore that on the records of this parliament, upon the report of the committee, of which two hon. gentlemen at least of this House were then members, it is clearly apparent that it was not intended, contemplated, nor even thought by the committee that we should have an old age pension scheme put in force in Canada unless, as the committee points out, the Dominion government were prepared to bear the whole responsibility and pay the $23,000,000 annually in its entirety. The reasons for it were so admirably dealt with this afternoon by other speakers that I shall not refer to them, but as the hon. member for Labelle pointed out, if all the provinces did not agree, if one of the provinces did and another did not, and the citizens of the province that did not agree went into the province that did agree, then the new provincial home would be called upon to become responsible for the payment of part of the pension of those newcomers.

Now it is clear that parliament in 1925, and the committee that gave to this matter such unremitting care, as mentioned by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, were clearly, and the members severally were of the opinion that there should be no old age pension legislation by this parliament unless the various provinces had agreed and had arrived at a conclusion with respect to it, and as the correspondence indicated that they were not agreed, and as the minister stated this afternoon there has been no further correspondence, therefore it follows that this parliament should not proceed with this matter at this time, and, Mr. Speaker, I do venture to plead with my friends opposite not to urge the government to proceed with it at this time. Faulty legislation placed upon the statute books the effect of which is to bring about chaos is very much to be deprecated. Anyone who has followed the course of legislation in any country, especially legislation of this character, will realize that where you rely solely and entirely upon experiments you have nothing but political action following political action, and what was intended to be a great benefit has in many instances been a positive disadvantage to the very class it was intended to benefit.

Let me for a moment point out that since this committee made its investigation, two changes of the utmost importance have taken place in the world. I refer first of all to the change that has taken place in England, and I venture to ask my friends who are interested in this matter to turn to volume 184 of the English Hansard, page 74, and read the speech of the Right Hon. Neville Chamberlain in moving the adoption of the new system in England, the system that now obtains and prevails there. That speech was opened on the 18th of May, 1925, and many months passed by before the legislation in question was finally adopted. I commend the speech to gentlemen who desire to observe the reasons that brought about the change in England, and which resulted in the old non-contributory system being superseded by a contributory system.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the hon. gentleman correct in his facts, that the other system has been superseded?

Mr. BENNETT: The word superseded I think is the correct word, because Mr. Chamberlain has pointed out that the old system which provided for pensions at the age of seventy, and which was a non-contributory system, was to be merged under certain conditions in the new scheme, which provides for pensions at sixty-five, and which is contributory in its character.

Mr. HEAPS: I happen to have a copy of the act in my hand, and I do not think the hon. gentleman's statement is entirely correct. What has happened there is that the old system remains as it was, but it has been added to by a contributory system, as the hon. gentleman has just stated.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry the hon. gentleman has not, in my judgment, correctly observed all the facts, because I shall read in a moment from the address made by Mr. Chamberlain at Birmingham and broadcast throughout the kingdom, explaining the operation of the new system and its effect upon the old. It only takes a single page, and I shall read it because it is of importance to this House to observe how in Great Britain they have seen the faults of the non-contributory system; and in Australia, in 1925, at the very time this House was considering the report of the special committee, a recommendation was made that their non-contributory system should be changed to contributory system; and in Belgium, where they had a non-contributory system, the same recommendation has been made and put into effect. The reasons for it are admirably explained by the late Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain in a speech which he made at Birmingham in 1906, and which was quoted by his son in moving the second reading of the old age pension bill in England last year. The late Mr. Joseph Chamberlain said:

> All I have done in reference to this matter is to express my own sense of the necessity of enabling the industrious working people to make a better provision for old age—

> —to enable "working people" to make a better provision for old age, and to put before the working people of this country one or two circumstances, two plans in particular, which I have said and which I maintain are perfectly simple and clearly to be understood, which are within the reach of the working class of this country. . . That is my part in the matter, and I still think that this better provision ought to be, and should be made by the House of Commons. But it is not, and never will be so far as I am concerned, a proposal for anything in the nature of a universal old age pension, which, I believe, is impracticable from the point of view of its expense and which I believe, is immoral and undesirable from the point of view of its influence upon thrift and industry.

That in 1906 expressed the considered opinion of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, and his son, in moving the second reading of the most recent legislation of that character in England, gave expression to his father's sentiments by quoting the language I have just read, and upon that predicated a measure of reform that is now part of the legislation of England.

I do contend, Sir, that in this new country, with our great undeveloped natural resources, with our necessarily very large number of young people, it is of the utmost importance that we should have some contributory system of pensions rather than a non-contributory system. I say that for two reasons: First, because there is nothing more serious in a new country than that men should grow up with the idea or thought that they are to rely upon what is now called in England the dole; and secondly; that habits of thrift and economy should be encouraged and developed among the people if we are to take our place among the great nations of the world. I am convinced of that. The late Sir Richard Cartwright, who occupied so commanding a place in parliament, gave to this matter, as you will remember, a very great deal of time and attention. When he found himself in a position where the government of which he was a member could command the support of parliament, he introduced and caused to be passed through parliament the system with respect to annuities that we have upon our statute books. He did it to encourage habits of thrift. He did it that the young might, by saving small sums in their younger days, be able to have a fair and decent annuity in their old age.

Now, I will take the trouble to quote a few figures, and I trust I shall not weary the House by doing so. Let me put this case to the House: Assume that a young man of twenty desires to provide for his old age. If he goes into the government annuity office in this city, which is maintained at the public expense but which is not used so much as it should be, and desires to purchase from the government of this country an annuity, and if he will for each month during the year 1926 pay the small sum of 84 cents—a little less, I think—he will when he becomes seventy years of age have an annuity of a dollar a month.

An hon. MEMBER: Eighty-four cents per what?

Mr. BENNETT: Per month for only one year. If he does that, he will get a contract entitling him to $1 per month for the rest of his life commencing at the age of seventy. Now if at the age of twenty-four he desires to buy another annuity of $1 a month commencing at the age of seventy he will only have to pay $1.10 a month for that year. If again, not having bought an annuity in the intervening years, he does during the twelve months of his twenty-ninth year pay $1.40 per month, he buys an additional annuity of $1 per month commencing at seventy. At age thirty-four he would pay $1.80 per month for that year to secure an additional deferred annuity of $1 per month at seventy, while at forty-four he would have to pay $3.03 a month for that twelve months to secure an additional $1 per month commencing at seventy. Every year would thus be complete within itself; and if he makes the twelve payments for any one of the years between twenty and seventy he will have bought for himself a deferred annuity of $1 per month, commencing at seventy, for each of the years in which he has made the appropriate payments between the ages of twenty and seventy. I sometimes dislike the term "old age pension", preferring to use the expression "deferred annuity". If by these savings he desires to accumulate for himself a small annuity, an annuity say of $20 per month after seventy, all he has to do between the ages of twenty and seventy, a period of fifty years, is to accumulate during the term of twenty years, which need not be consecutive, sums varying from 84 cents a month to $4 a month. My suggestion, Sir, is that this parliament would be discharging its proper functions if it placed upon the statute books of Canada an act that will enable the young man who had thus shown this evidence of thrift to obtain an additional annuity of $5 per month, making a total of $25 per month instead of $20, the state contributing the $5 per month as an incentive to him to exercise thrift and economy during the earlier years of his life. That is my suggestion to the House at this time, because there are few matters which interest me more. No man who reads at all, no man who observes the operation of the great laws that have to do with the development of the human mind in the last fifty years can fail to be impressed with the necessity of this parliament, the necessity of this young nation, making some provision for the future old age of its citizens.

I refer my hon. friends to another volume of the English Hansard, volume 183 commencing at page 71 where they will find the great speech of Mr. Churchill, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in developing the reasons and arguments that induced the English government to deal with old age pensions as it did in 1925. It is pointed out what is well known, that the English actuaries and the permanent civil servants of that country, who really rule it, spent months and months of time in working out the plan or scheme, and in the end the amount of money involved in that measure which was introduced by Mr. Chamberlain, after it had been opened to the House in the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as a total capital expenditure amounts to the enormous sum of £760,000,000. That is what it amounts to, but that sum of money cannot be all provided at once. If we are to put an old age pension law in force in this country at the moment it is clear that the contributions of the state at the present time and in the immediate future must be larger than in the years to come, because if it is a self-sustaining system by contributions of those who come within its operation it is clear that the old people of to-day will not be able to contribute and the state will have to provide for their pensions practically in toto. But as days go by and the old people disappear, then every man within the Dominion who may hereafter claim a pension would become a contributor to the system. It requires no new machinery, it requires little new law. We have to-day in our annuity law a system of voluntary pensions. As you will remember, it was introduced by Sir Richard Cartwright for the purpose of encouraging thrift and economy on the part of our citizens. It has not been used as it should be, for reasons I do not dwell upon but which are in the minds of every hon. member present.

Now, as one more reason why I suggested the contributory system, I have given you some information indicating the trend of public opinion in Great Britain, in Australia, and various other countries. Perhaps the House would be interested in observing that there are twenty-five countries that have adopted an old age pension scheme of one form or another, and the sums payable as a rule are very trifling. They are larger in the states of the American union than they are in Europe. But of twenty-five countries of which we have reports as late as July, 1924, we have only the following countries in which there is no specific contribution from the beneficiary: Australia, in which a contributory plan has cince been recommended by a royal commission; Belgium, in which a contributory system became effective in 1926; Denmark and Great Britain, in which there was a change in 1925; New Zealand, Norway, Russia, and Uruguay. We have a voluntary contributory system in Canada and Hungary, two countries only, while there is a compulsory contributory system in force in fifteen countries, as follows: Argentine, Austria, Czecho-Slovakia, France, Germany, Greece, Iceland, Italy, Jugo-Slavia, Netherlands, Poland, Portugal, Roumania, Spain and Sweden. That indicates the trend of modern thought.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the hon member say that any of those that have the contributing schemes are federal countries?

Mr. BENNETT: They are all federal in that they have one government.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Are they federal in the sense that Canada is federal?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think any of them are federal in the sense that the United States or Canada is federal, except Germany.

Now to proceed. In the United States of America the matter has engaged the attention of many of the states. I think the state of Arizona enacted the first old age pension law. I commend hon. members to a consideration of a report that has probably engaged the minds of more thoughful men for a longer period of time than any report yet made on this continent. I refer to the report on old age pensions by the commission on pensions appointed by the legislature of the state of Massachusetts and printed in November, 1925.

That is the fullest exposition of the history of old age pensions that I think can easily be found, and in the appendix commencing at page 281 there is a full review of pensions in all the various countries. I was amazed to find that Germany, where they have a federal system of government—in point of fact it is fourth among the federal systems of the world—expended in the last year of which I have a report, over $103,000,000 in pensions, and that Great Britain expended only a million more, making $104,000,000. In Australia, with the non-contributory system, they find the pressure of politicians upon the government so strong that a royal commission investigating the matter has recommended a contributory system. Why? For reasons that I am sure must commend themselve to the government and to hon. members in this House. Every time a general election came round the constituent got busy for an increase of the monthly allowance. No contributions being made, it was an incentive to idleness, and in many respects did much to bring about conditions which the people of Australia very greatly deprecated; so much so that in the end they recommended that the contributory system be relied upon in order that the men who demand more money shall make larger contributions.

There are many other facts to which I should like to allude, and which I possibly may refer to if the measure goes to a second reading, but I rose to-night to plead with the administration and more with the members of this House who are forcing the legislation upon the administration—I do not use the words in any offensive sense—the desirability of not now passing this resolution. I implore them to give to this matter further time and consideration. I ask them not to hurry forward the legislation, and I promise them that so long as I am in the House—and I think I know the sentiments of some of my hon. friends on this side of the House—we will give every assistance we can in the way of suggestions or useful constructive criticism.

I want to see in this country a system providing for old age deferred annuities, for old age pension. But in this new young country, with its resources untouched and undeveloped, where we are endeavouring to develop a hardy spirit of enterprise on the part of our citizens, where we want them to look upon the government as an instrument for their well-being and not something on which they are to depend for sustenance, I do plead with the government to give the opportunity which the committee of last year promised would be given, namely, the calling together of representatives of all the provinces in order that a conclusion may be arrived at that will be fitting for so great and important a subject. This House has not been called upon to deal with any matter more important nor any subject more far-reaching in its operations and in its effect. Mr. Churchill in his great speech dealt with this subject, and Mr. Chamberlain said, "You cannot speak of this matter from the standpoint of to-day; it is what is going to happen fifty years from now." Mr. Churchill pointed out that with the prolongation of human life by the application of scientific modern methods; with the improvement in the health of the citizens, we will have a longer life and there will be an increased financial obligation upon the state. And I ask my friends who are so bent upon putting this through to pause, to consider, to weigh, and to ask whether or not we are lighty to disregard the recommendations of the committee that gave such time, such consideration and such thought to this matter.

I know that the right hon. leader of the government has given much time, thought and consideration to this question. Anyone who has read his work, Industry and Humanity, must be impressed with the fact that this is a social problem in which he is deeply interested, and I do ask him whether or not he believes that legislation hastily considered and placed upon the statute books of the country, pledging the credit of the country, against the recommendation of the committee, placing upon posterity a burden that cannot be easily shaken off is in the best interests of Canada. The great difficulty in a matter of this kind is that once you enact a law and place it on the statute book, and once you incur financial responsibility, you cannot lightly shake it off, as you can your overcoat. These are the obligations that stick and remain with us, and I do ask in the name of all those who are desirous of bringing about the best form of legislation, who know that hurried legislation very often is worse than none at all, who realize, if they will take the time to read the report made in the state of Massachusetts, the debate in the English House and the discussions that there took place, the far-reaching consequences of these proposals I ask them all to pause and consider. I wonder if hon. members would like to hear the message broadcast by Mr. Chamberlain. It is not very long.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. BENNETT: It is worth reading, because it is Mr. Chamberlain's message to the people of Great Britain when the new act was being brought into force. With the reading of this message I will close what I have to say, because it puts the whole matter so shortly before the people that possibly I can best put my case for contribution and for really careful, calm consideration of the matter in his words. Speaking on the 22nd of September last, at the Birmingham broadcasting station, he said:

The plan, then, is to help people whose means have not allowed them to provide for their widows or orphans or old age, but who have done something towards it. If you put by a few pence a week all your life, it will amount to a good many pounds by the time you are sixty-five. But you may never live to be sixty-five, and if you die young your savings won't go any way at all to support a widow and young children. But suppose you join with a lot of other people and agree to put all your savings together into one common fund, those who die young and are unmarried when they die or who live to be old will get much more than they have to put in. In other words, some will pay more than they get and others will get more than they pay, but all will be free of a great anxiety. That plan is what we call insurance. This is the plan adopted in the pensions scheme and it means that no one gets a pension who is not covered by any insurance. . . . .

Now you are doubtless aware that under the National Insurance Scheme the contributions are paid partly by the employed person, partly by the employer and partly by the state; so it is also in the case of the pensions scheme. The total additional contribution required is eight pence per week for each insured man and four pence for each insured woman, paid half by the employer and half by the employed person, but under an act passed last session we have been able at the same time to make a reduction in the amounts payable in respect of unemployment insurance so that people that come under that scheme—that is, practically everyone except domestic servants and agricultural workers—will get all the benefits of the pensions scheme for the absurdly low contribution of two pence per week per man and one pence a week per woman plus a similar contribution from the employer. These contributions will begin to be paid on the 4th January next. . . . .

That is, January, 1926.

Now I dare say some of you are wanting to interrupt and ask "Where does the state come in? What is the state's contribution?" Well, if the scheme only provided pensions for those who entered it at the age of sixteen, we should not require any help from the state at all. But then there would be no old age pension payable for another fifty years, and it would be very hard on people who are over sixteen to-day and who have had no opportunity of paying contributions because the scheme was not in existence. And so the state comes in and makes up what is missing in their case. And it also gives help to certain existing widows with young children, orphans and old people in respect of whom, of course, no contributions at all have been paid. Altogether the liability which the state has assumed in connection with the scheme is estimated at upwards of £760,000,000.

I will now tell you briefly what the benefits are and when they will first be payable.

Widows' pensions will be ten shillings a week, with allowances for children under the age of fourteen, or under the age of sixteen, if still at school, five shillings a week for the eldest child and three shillings a week for each of the younger children, and when the first child passes the age of fourteen or sixteen, as the case may be, the second succeeds to the five shillings and so on. The pension of ten shillings will continue for life or until the widow remarries. In the case of existing widows whose husbands died before the act, they will only be eligible for pension if they have at least one child under fourteen years of age on the 4th January next, and the widow's pension will cease six months after the youngest child attains the age of fourteen.

An orphan's pension will be seven shillings six pence a week and will continue so long as the child is under fourteen, or under sixteen if still at school. The rate of pension is the same for each child in one family.

Old age pensions are provided for insured persons and their wives after the age of sixty-five. These old age pensions will be ten shillings a week. All inquiries as to means, residence or nationality, at present imposed by the Old Age Pension Acts, are swept away for people who are insured under the new act.

Then follows a statement as to the dates on which the pensions begin. In this country it is perfectly clear that if the provinces undertake this responsibility alone, the result will not be satisfactory. It is essential that our Dominion should in some way be identified with and become a partner in this scheme. How that may be effected has been suggested —I will not dwell on it again—as a merely voluntary contribution in money—and observe that the whole details of this are to be worked out by the provinces, the Dominion only approving. A second method would be by advertising and pressing our annuity scheme and then providing further, as I said at the opening of my observations, that we as a parliament should add say twenty or twenty-five per cent to what the man or woman had been able to save between twenty and seventy years of age. In other words, thrift secures its corresponding reward; economy brings ultimate comfort. I hope we will not lightly rush into this matter when the committee gave it so much study and consideration and this House unanimously adopted a report that we should not take action until it is determined whether or not the provinces desire to co-operate. By proceeding as is now proposed we secure a result which the committee thought would mean chaos if all the provinces did not participate, a result which could be met only by the Dominion paying the whole amount.

I apologize for trespassing again to-night upon the time of the House, but I feel very strongly on this subject. I am deeply interested in it; I desire to see it succeed. I am convinced that it cannot succeed without the co-operation of all the provinces, unless the Dominion, in defiance of our constitutional jurisdiction as voiced by the Deputy Minister of Justice, sees fit to undertake the whole responsibility, which would involve us in an expenditure of $23,000,000 per annum and, in a very short time, an expenditure of $40,000,000 per annum, an expenditure entirely too large for us to entertain at the present time. I think the government, therefore, will be well advised perhaps to release the whip on its own members and let the opinion of the House as a whole determine whether or not it is desirable at this session to push into this matter or, in the light of a subsequent conference between the provincial and Dominion authorities, arrive at a conclusion which will enable us to place on our statute books legislation of a character that will redound to the credit of this country and that will maintain the confidence and self-respect of the future citizens of this Dominion by encouraging the practice of economy and thrift, while providing for the aged of to-day by suitable contributions to provincial schemes.

Mr. HANNESSON: Do I understand that the Massachusetts report recommended the contributory system?

Mr. BENNETT: No. The Massachusetts report, by a division of three to two, recommended a non-contributory system for reasons they gave, but they stated that it must be at once met by increased taxation such as a $2 poll tax upon its citizens and an increase of one-half of one per cent of the income tax to raise an annual sum of $6,500,000.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think there is an understanding, although it has not been formally expressed, that the House will not sit quite as late to-night as it did last night, but that we will adjourn shortly after ten o'clock. For that reason I shall not attempt to speak at any length on the resolution which is before the House, but I should like to follow my hon. friend in a few words in reference to some of the points he has brought to the attention of hon. members in, I must say, an admirable manner.

Speaking generally on the question of social insurance, of which old age pensions is one form, I agree entirely with the point of view which my hon. friend has expressed, that a contributory system is the proper one to adopt. I think it is desirable to enlist not merely the sympathies but the active participation of individuals in schemes of social insurance that are intended for their benefit. But while I entertain that view, I think a study of the question will go to show that, with respect to old age pensions, particularly their immediate application in countries that have systems of social insurance to-day, the schemes have been intitiated not under a contributory system but by a method such as is being proposed at the present time. It is important that the principle on the part of the state that there is an obligation be acknowledged at the outset. I will not assert the theory that the state owes a man a living or any part of a living, but rather that social justice demands, under the system in which industry is carried on to-day, where the rights of private property are recognized to the full, that there should be means whereby individuals who are not possessed of and have little means of acquiring private property to any extent should not be obliged to suffer unaided the handicaps of such a system, but that the state itself should recognize some obligations towards them as a consequence of the manner in which industry is carried on. If we were legislating as my hon. friend has suggested, for young people of the age of ten or twelve; if we were providing an old age scheme for page boys about the House, for schoolboys and girls, then it would be wise to lay emphasis upon the importance of a contribution on their part towards a system intended to help to maintain them in their old age. But I take it that this House at the present time, in discussing old age pensions, is not thinking of young people of ten, twenty or thirty years of age or even of persons of forty or fifty years of age. We are thinking more particularly of that large body of men and women now in Canada who are approaching the age of seventy years. We have in mind those between the ages of sixty and seventy who are finding it difficult to get the assurance that their declining years are not going to be spent in dependence on charity. It is for such people that we are legislating at the moment. We have in view men and women in Canada between the ages of fifty and seventy who are facing actual concrete conditions as they prevail in this Dominion to-day. That embraces hundreds, yes thousands of men and women who are earning their livelihood in factories and workshops, in different forms of clerical employment, as well as the thousands who as pioneers have contributed so largely to the upbuilding of the Dominion but who in their effort to bring up their families have been unable to lay aside any sum of money sufficient to maintain them in their old age.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the right hon. gentleman realize, when he says that he is dealing with people between the ages of fifty and seventy, that this involves the maintenance of this principle for twenty years, and that at the expiration of that time the actuarial figures would place the country's responsibility at a sum upwards of $40,000,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will make clear what I have in mind. My hon. friend has discussed in a way that is helpful the legislation that has been passed in Great Britain as recently as within the last year. But he might have emphasized at the same time the fact that England introduced her old age pension scheme in 1909. It was amended in 1911 and again in 1919, having been maintained all this while as a non-contributory scheme. But what has developed in Great Britain in the recent past? Alongside old age pensions there has grown up a system of social insurance applying to many phases of life—insurance against unemployment, insurance against invalidism, insurance against accident, insurance against disease and insurance in the way of maternity benefits, and so forth—a great mass of social insurance all of which relates to the hazards of industry incident to that large part of the population engaged in industrial pursuits of one kind or another. And recent legislation has assembled these various forms of social insurance into one great compendium, so to speak, and linked up the old age pensions system therewith.

In this country, I should like to see the annuities plan which, as my hon. friend has said, was inaugurated by Sir Richard Cartwright, developed into a comprehensive system of social insurance. But I do not believe that this can be accomplished solely by the federal government; it would have to receive the co-operation of the provinces. We must in some way establish that link between the provinces and the Dominion which will conduce to the working out of a great social insurance scheme along these lines. That will not be achieved in a year; as in other countries it will require time. The old age pension phase of the question is one that has an immediate bearing in respect of people of advanced years. Surely, then, we shall not be running any great risk so far as future generations are concerned if we put upon the statutes this year legislation which will hold out an inducement to the provinces to come together in conference for the purpose of discussing social legislation generally.

In the course of the debate to-day reference has been made to the old age pensions scheme as though it were something related particularly to inmates of poorhouses. I am inclined to feel that there is no class in human society to-day that has not in its numbers a very considerable percentage of persons who are living in constant dread of the moment when, in their advanced years, they will be thrown upon their children or upon society for support. I fancy there are many members of the legal and medical professions, clergymen and their wives, besides numbers of civil servants, clerks in all branches of occupation, who as they approach the age of fifty or sixty find that in a very few years' time every dollar which they have been able to put by gradually disappears, while simultaneously their earning capacity has been very seriously impaired. We are living under industrial conditions very different from those which the world has known heretofore. We are living in an age of keen competition, not only as between locality and locality, between state and state, between province and province, or between countries, but between continent and continent, and conditions affecting one quarter of the world are bound to react very soon in another quarter. Men and women, therefore, through no fault of their own find themselves thrown out of their occupations and unable to gain a livelihood. Consider industry for a moment. The processes of industrial life to-day hinge more and more upon a division of labour, and in an ever-increasing degree individuals are becoming specialists. The whole development of power, from water-power to steam and from steam to electricity, has been in the nature of an intensifying process which makes it impossible for men and women, once they have attained a certain age, to hold their own in the competitive arena. Consequently they are thrown to one side by a younger generation better adapted to the tasks which they have been performing and left to seek work in other directions. We all know this, and, knowing it, I think we feel the necessity of making some provision whereby men and women after they have done the best they can through life, should be freed, on attaining the age of seventy, from that fear of dependence upon charity which carries with it a sort of stigma at the end of a life of honourable activity.

My hon. friend said that the report which the committee brought in offered a reason to which the government at the moment should give heed. He left, I think, the impression that the report suggested that this work was only to be gone on with when all the provinces should agree to co-operate. I do not read the report in that way. I venture to say that had the committee reported that we should wait until all the provinces agreed to co-operate in any scheme of insurance the committee would virtually have declared that in its opinion the question should not be considered for some years to come. Here is the clause of the report which my hon. friend read, but let me direct his attention to the wording of it:

That the federal government arrange with the premiers of the different provinces for a conference to be held during the coming recess of parliament at which an old age pension system shall be given the fullest consideration with a view to securing co-operative action, and that the report of the said conference be laid on the table at the next session of parliament for future consideration and action.

Mr. BENNETT: "Future consideration and action".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, but the report says, "at which an old age pension system shall be given the fullest consideration, with a view to securing co-operative action—". I venture to say that it will be necessary, before this scheme is worked out in an effective manner, to have a conference of the premiers or other representatives of the different provinces, to consider how the provinces can most effectively work in under the plan that is here proposed, but the thing that will help bring about co-operative action is having something concrete to lay before them.

Mr. BENNETT: The report has it the other way. "That the report of the said conference be laid on the table at the next session of parliament for future consideration and action".

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite prepared to admit that that had reference to a conference. If a conference had been called last summer that action would have been taken, but as my hon. friend knows it was impossible to have a conference last summer, which makes the laying of a report on the table impossible at the present time. It does not, however, make impossible the preparation by this government of a carefully drafted method of assisting the provinces in an old age pension scheme, and then, when that plan is adopted, an invitation to the provinces to meet with members of the federal government to consider regulations for the carrying out of the plan. That procedure does not in any way preclude the conference; indeed, it will help bring about the conference in an effective way. It practically suggests that a step of that kind will be taken and ought to be taken.

In regard to legislation of this kind which necessarily is in part a matter of provincial legislation, I agree with my hon. friend that so far as the federal government is concerned our duty is largely that of assisting such of the provinces as are willing to undertake such a scheme as is proposed. If that is true, I think it follows that it is very desirable to have, so far as it is possible to have it, uniformity among the different provinces in any scheme adopted. An unfortunate feature which arises from the division between the provinces on matters relating to industry is that there are so many different standards in the different provinces. One of the greatest needs in the industrial life of Canada to-day is that the standards governing industrial relations should be more or less identical as between one province and another. That can only be brought about by some kind of action on the part of the federal government leading to co-operation between the federal government and the provinces and among the different provinces themselves. I submit that this scheme of old age pensions as here drafted will have that effect. It will be the natural thing to ask the representatives of the provincial governments to meet with the department of the federal government which may be administering the old age pensions plan, to discuss further its details, and to consider the regulations for its effective operation.

I did not really mean to take any part in the discussion this evening, but I felt that I would like to follow my hon. friend in one or two points which he developed. I hope I have shown him that they are factors which the government did not fail to take into account and did not overlook, but that so far as the purpose of the immediate legislation is concerned, it looks to providing a pension for men and women of the generation that is passing away, or will have passed away in the course of a very few years. That is primarily what we are considering at this moment, and in considering men and women of that category we will, I think, be taking the first necessary step to bring about that larger measure of contributory social insurance which is one of the great needs of our time.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the right hon. gentleman permit a question, or rather two questions in one?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS: Does it not follow that before this legislation can be made applicable the provinces will have to pass legislation? Secondly, will not such legislation to be passed by the provinces have to conform, generally speaking, to the provisions of this federal act?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Therefore would it not be better to have the conference prior to the passing of this legislation?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend, if he looks into his heart of hearts, will agree with me when I say that if we are in a position to put before representatives of the provinces a plan which has been drafted and carefully considered, and an act passed by this parliament, and to invite the attention of the provinces to what may be essential in the way of amendment to it or its relation to their own legislation, a measure of co-operation can be obtained that would not be possible if the provinces were simply brought together without any concrete legislation before them for consideration. I think what will happen is this: under this legislation, which I hope will be passed this session, until the provinces themselves undertake to conform to the regulations here laid down, not a dollar will be taken out of the public treasury. That will mean that the provinces will have to consider whether or not this is an act they will care to come under.

Mr. WHITE (Mount Royal): All the provinces?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, any province which cares to adopt legislation of that character. In that regard may I say that as between the different provinces I fail to see where there is a distinction to be drawn between the money voted by this parliament say for the purposes of immigration, which may go to place a man or woman in any one of the provinces, and money voted for preserving the individual, no matter in what part of the Dominion he may be found. Human beings are the greatest of the resources of the country. What we are here considering is human life. An individual, no matter which province he is in, is an asset to the Dominion as a whole, and it is from that point of view that the Dominion is, I think, considering this matter.

Mr. WHITE (Mount Royal): May I point out that in the case of an immigrant he becomes a producer, while old age pensions are given to indigents?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has presented a point of view which I hope this House will consider. He says that one man is a producer and the other an indigent. I have here a letter which I would like to read to the House. It was written by an elderly lady in Alberta in June, 1925. I will not read the whole letter, because it has some references to matters which I think need not be placed on record at the moment, although I shall be glad to show the entire letter to my hon. friend if he so desires. The letter begins by drawing my attention to the fact that this parliament recently voted a large sum of money by way of an annuity to one who had been a distinguished member of parliament. It points out that sums of money were voted by this parliament to cover some of the expenses incident to the visit of a great general from overseas and for other purposes, and it continues:

> I am impelled to write you on the old age pension. The poor old people, the pioneers of Canada, who have worked hard against great odds and nothing like a salary in return, have to stand aside while these large sums are disbursed. It will be extremely inconsistent should the old age pension bill not pass very soon, with the powers that be in parliament.

The letter next refers to a sum of money that had been raised for assistance in some connection, and then goes on:

> Worthy these gentlemen may all be, but it gives one the notion that if men getting such immense salaries and sums of money cannot make provision for a time when they cannot work, how possibly can a working man do so? It would be a boon if something can be done to relieve the hardships of the working class, especially when they reach an age which makes it difficult to live. Most of whom cannot work at an advanced age, and are not wanted at work either. My husband is turned 72, and is as yet strong and able to work, and does work hard. Still he is feeling the effects of age, along with work, which he has never shirked, but has had his share of trouble and losses, making him feel that he, along with others, deserve some consideration from the country.

I say to my hon. friend from Mount Royal (Mr. White) that the woman who wrote that letter was not an indigent; her husband, even had he been unable to do any work, is not to be classel as an indigent; they are two people who have helped to make this country what it is; they have helped to make the wealth of this country.

The whole principle of this old age pension is based, not on the thought that the state is giving something to an indigent or that the state owes something to individuals, but on a sense of social justice arising out of a condition of society based on the rights of private poverty. While my hon. friend and I may have been fortunate enough to start in life with a little capital and to have had opportunities to make investments that will enable us as we get on to maturer years to look forward to the period between seventy and eighty with a degree of confidence—while that may be possible for him and for me, it is not possible for hundreds of thousands of people in this country, for people working on the farm and in the factory, the people who are day after day producing the wealth from which we are able to derive our profits, the interest on our investments.

This legislation looks to personality rather than to possessions, it looks to human life rather than to material wealth. We are seeking in making provision for old age to do something which will maintain in the individual that respect and that feeling of pride to which everyone is entitled who serves his day and generation faithfully and well, and serves it against the odds and vicissitudes particularly of our present day. That is the purpose of this legislation, and I am sure that my hon. friend, when he thinks of it from that point of view, will be one of the first to join with the rest of us in doing what he can to have it made part of the law of this land.

May I in conclusion say just one word more? Some hon. members of this House have intimated, indirectly this afternoon, directly on other occasions, that in this matter the government, and more particularly myself, have been influenced by political considerations; that this legislation is being brought forward not from conviction but for reasons of political expediency. I would ask hon. members to pardon me, in view of that circumstance, if I undertake to give to the House, not words that spring from my lips at the moment, but words which appear in a volume I wrote some years ago and which was published as long ago as eight years. The volume is entitled "Industry and Humanity—Some Principles underlying Industrial Reconstruction." It was alluded to a moment ago by my hon. friend, the member for Calgary. I will read only a paragraph or two, but they will put more succinctly than I am able to do while on my feet at the moment my convictions and beliefs on this matter. In one paragraph dealing with the question of social insurance I have these words:

Social insurance, which in reality is health insurance in one form or another, is a means employed in most industrial countries to bring about a wider measure of social justice, without, on the one hand, disturbing the institution of private property and its advantages to the community, or, on the other, imperilling the thrift and industry of individuals. Social insurance looks upon industry as in the nature of social service. It regards the owner of land or capital as a capitalist, but also as a public trustee. It looks upon the worker in industry as a wage-earner, but equally as a necessary member of the community. It places the emphasis on personality rather than on property, and on life rather than on wealth.

Workmen's compensation, sickness and invalidity insurance, widows' pensions, maternity and infant benefits, recognize wherein personal relationships in industry have changed, and where as a consequence of new conditions permanent handicaps arise. The social legislation of which these measures are an expression rejects, as unworthy, the thought that men and women voluntarily incur accident, sickness, disease, enfeebled health, or dependence in distress, any more than they willingly seek enslavement of any kind. It recognizes the difficulty of differentiating between industrial accident and occupational disease; and between disease occasioned by occupation or its environments and illness otherwise contracted; also the impossibility of dissociating from economic conditions the social waste caused by excessive and preventable illness. It sees that debt binds health as it binds freedom, that sickness represents the most frequent factor of individual destitution, and that it is in painful crises that handicaps for the whole of life are oftenest imposed. 'To save the spirit of men from being crushed is quite as important as to prevent their bodies from being broken or infected. Many a man's spirit fails when, through no fault of his own, or of his family, efficiency is permanently impaired through accident, or savings become exhausted by unemployment or sickness, or where a new life in the home suggests an additional burden instead of a joy. Much invalidity and penury is due to lack of character and thrift; but much also is evidence of want of effective social control. What society fails effectively to prevent, society is in some measure under obligation to mend.

Then coming to old age pensions, I have the following:

Old age pensions are similar. They are based, not on the theory that the state owes every man a living, but rather on the fact that the provision of an assured competence for old age is an easy matter for some, whilst, for others, it is most difficult, if not wholly impossible. After all allowance has been made for superior thrift, intelligence, and integrity, it must be admitted that to the man who has capital to begin with, or whom society permits to own and control vast natural resources, there are opportunities of saving not possible to the worker who possess no capital, and who has to face uncertainties of employment and contend, unaided, against all kinds of vicissitudes. It is obvious that existing forces of world competition operate to rob advanced years of opportunities of employment, which, under the less strenuous regime of earlier times, were available to the close of life. There is need for society to assist in the protection of its members against a condition which simultaneously places burdens upon the worker whose day's work is done, and on the worker whose day's work is just beginning. If the young are to be given a fair start in life, the care of the aged should not be their first responsibility. If life-long public service in industry is to receive its fitting reward, years that are denied opportunity of employment should not be subjected to the humiliation of dependence or charity.

Those words were written, Mr. Speaker, when I had no thought of speaking on this question in the parliament of Canada. I am proud to be able to stand here to-night and to join with others in giving permanent expression in the legislation of our country to the ideas and the purposes that are therein expressed.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise not for the purpose of opposing this resolution. As a matter of fact, for some years I have on more than one occasion urged upon parliament the necessity of passing legislation of some character to deal with this problem of caring for old persons who have spent a life in usefulness and service to the community, and I am wholly in accord with the aim of all legislation of this character. The reason I rose a moment ago to ask the hon. the Prime Minister the questions I put was not, as I think he inferred, because I wanted to criticize his position on the matter at all, but rather to clear from my own mind, if possible, the fear that had been lodged there that if this legislation is passed it will not be practicable or effective because of the very fact that we are offering to the provinces a finished product, shall I say, without consultation with them in advance.

I was under the impression, and I still am of that opinion, that this legislation would be more effective, more apt to be applied in a practical manner, if the provinces were consulted beforehand and brought into accord with the objects this parliament has in mind.

As to the suggestions made by the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Bennett) a moment ago, I must say that there was much in his remarks that impressed me very strongly. However, so far as I am concerned I want to declare my position, and it is simply this: If the government offers to parliament this legislation and takes the stand that we must either accept this legislation or none at all I shall find myself forced to vote for it.

I hope that when the bill comes down we may have some more light on the subject. I trust that we shall have in the bill, as no doubt we will, a little more clearly set forth the manner in which the legislation will be applied, and I would hope also that parliament might consider some of the clauses which I shall not take time to go into to-night, and perhaps amend or change some of them so as to make this measure to my mind more practical and more effective. But I wanted to say this, that I stand with many, many others in this House wholly in favour of the very best effort possible being made to solve this problem of old age pensions, and to assure the government and parliament that the last thing in my mind was to offer obstacles in the way of a solution of the problem. But again I say to the Prime Minister that I do believe the much wiser course would have been to have had a conference with the provinces and come to parliament with a bill which the provinces could have assured us was acceptable to them, or with some assurance that it was a measure a number of the provinces might be willing to accept. For instance, Mr. Speaker, if this measure should be unsuitable to two or three of the major provinces, or only one or two provinces accepted it, that would be a most unhappy outcome. What we want, if possible, is to get a measure which will be applicable throughout the whole country, suitable and acceptable to all the provinces. That is the point I wish to emphasize; that is the danger I see at the moment.

Sir EUGENE FISET (Rimouski): I had no intention whatever of taking any further part in this discussion, in view of the statement I made this afternoon in French that I was thoroughly in accord with the principle of this resolution. But as a military officer, in view of the kind references that have been made to me by the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington (Mr. Edwards) I feel that I should make a further statement to the House.

Sir, I would have had no objection whatever to the statements the hon. member made to-night if those statements simply referred to myself. But the hon. gentleman has taken it upon himself—and I am not surprised at it, coming from him—to make the statements he did at a time when two prominent men in this House, the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn) and the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) two former ministers under whom I served, were absent, from the chamber. Had these hon. gentlemen been present they could have furnished to the House a thorough explanation of the reasons why I was compelled to take my pension in 1922, and their explanation would have given a different aspect to the matter from that which the hon. member for Frontenac-Addington placed upon it.

The statement the hon. member has made that I am drawing a pension at the present time as an officer of the permanent force serving at headquarters is not absolutely correct. Bearing in mind the despatches that were read in the old House of Commons after the battle of Paardeberg, and remembering the decorations I received for my services in South Africa, I can easily say that I am not ashamed of my services at that time. I was quite willing to perform the same services in 1914, but I was refused the necessary permission, notwithstanding the fact that I offered to resign my rank and serve as a Lieutenant-Colonel in the ambulance corps. I was one of the first to volunteer for service overseas, but I was told by the minister at the head of the department at the time, and also by the then Prime Minister of this country, that my place was here and that my duty lay in Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Did I question that?

Sir EUGENE FISET: You did.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): In what way?

Sir EUGENE FISET: Further than that, I was forced to retire from the service in 1922. I did not go voluntarily; I was compelled to retire after undergoing a surgical operation of the most serious character—a fact which the hon. member for East Hamilton could easily have vouched for. I was forced to take my pension and go and live in the country. For a year, Sir, I was there on sick leave, having hemorrhages every fifteen days, and suffering to such an extent that in April, 1923, I had to go under the knife for the second time. During that period I applied to the government to extend my leave of absence, and the only answer I received when I was on the hospital bed was that my successor had been appointed. Therefore, Sir, the pension I am drawing was awarded because I was not in a fit state of health to perform my duties.

There is another point that has been forgotten, and it is this: no man in this country has paid as much for the pension he is enjoying as I have paid. Towards that pension I contributed five per cent of my salary during a period of thirty years of service. There is not a judge in the country, there is not a brother officer of the permanent corps, who has made contributions to the pension fund to the same extent. I paid that five per cent not only on my full salary as deputy minister, but also on my salary as vice president of the militia council.

I apologize, Mr. Speaker, for taking the time of the House to make these remarks but I consider that no hon. member has a right to make such glaring statements as those which have been made with respect to me to-night. I only wish I could characterize that conduct in language that is parliamentary. The reason for my speaking the second time is that I wanted to offer a defence, to the best of my ability in respect to the insinuations directed to-night against those men who were compelled to remain at headquarters here during the whole duration of the war and who performed loyally, and to the best of their ability, as I have done myself, Sir, their duty to their common country and to the empire.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure whether I have the right to rise to a question of privilege. I merely want to assure the hon. gentleman that I cast no imputation on his loyalty or on his courage in any degree—none whatever. I say now, as I said before, that the hon. member is drawing a pension which has been given to him and to others. I also say that viewing the matter of pensions as I do I only wish I had the power to wipe the system off the statute books and prevent him and many others from receiving them.

On motion of Mr. Hanson the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Robb the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Monday, March 29, 1926

The House met at three o'clock.

TARIFF ADVISORY BOARD—PERSONNEL

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask if the tariff commission, or whatever it is called now, has yet been appointed, or if the government has changed its mind?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The tariff advisory board is what I presume my hon. friend has reference to. The order in council appointing the board has not yet been passed. I hope that will be done in the course of a day or so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Has the government reconsidered the personnel at all or does it intend to appoint those gentlemen named last week?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government still has the personnel under consideration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In reference to the statement of the Prime Minister, I desire to ask another question, and before doing so to quote his words in an answer given on 25th March, as follows:

> The Right Hon. Mr. Graham will, as I have said, be chairman and the other two members will be Mr. Joseph Daoust, ex-president of the Chamber of Commerce of Montreal, and Mr. Donald Gordon McKenzie from Brandon.

In the face of this statement, does the Prime Minister still persist that the personnel is under consideration?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend will look at the concluding words of the statement I made and from which he has just quoted he will observe that I said that I hoped to be able "on Monday" to lay a copy of the order in council on the table giving the personnel and the powers of the board. He will likewise observe that I was also about to mention the name of another gentleman—

Mr. MEIGHEN: The secretary?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The secretary, and I was informed that he had not formally given his consent to become a member of the board. I was answering my right hon. friend's question just at the moment without having had any previous notice of it, and I learned after I had announced the personnel that the other two members of the board also had not formally signified their acceptance, but that the matter was still being considered. I admit that I was a little premature in the statement, but subject to that I hoped to be able to make a full announcement by to-day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask, has the interview reported to have been given by one of the members had any effect on the reconsideration of the question?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, it undoubtedly would be taken into consideration along with other circumstances.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask: Does the statement of principle made by the member in question represent the views of the government on the subject?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The views of the government will be expressed in the order in council which deals with the matter.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When may we expect the order in council?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Well, well!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope before the House adjourns at Easter.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMITTEE—1923

RECOMMENDATIONS CONCERNING SALARY SCHEDULES AND OTHER MATTERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): I desire to bring to the attention of the government what is described as a protest and an appeal of the Amalgamated Civil Servants of Canada. The document is issued by the local council, and based on it I wish to ask a brief question. I presume the government have received copies of this appeal, but I will briefly refer to it instead of reading the whole. It refers to the report of the parliamentary committee of 1923, and then goes on to say:

> Though these recommendations were concurred in by parliament in the year 1923, we find in 1926 that no action has been taken.

And so on. Then follows this paragraph:

> On behalf of our membership we emphatically protest against this most unsatisfactory method of dealing with staff side civil service problems. It is neither just nor in the best interests of the service, the servant or the public. As an elected representative of the people of Canada we appeal to you to do your part in assisting the civil servant to get some measure of fair treatment. Surely three years' delay is not the best that we may expect from those who are elected by the people of Canada to attend to its public affairs.

Based upon that quotation I would like to ask the government if any steps have been taken to carry out the recommendations of the parliamentary committee of 1923, which included a permanent revision of the salary schedules and the adjustment of other matters which, I may say, were in dispute between the government and the Amalgamated Civil Servants at that time. I presume the government have copies of this circular, but I will send over the copy which I now have.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Secretary of State): The civil service is not under the Secretary of State, but I understand the Secretary of State is the via media between the Civil Service Commission and the government. I will make the necessary inquiry about the matter referred to by my hon. friend and will give him the information he desires.

Mr. STEVENS: I might apologize, Mr. Speaker, for not having given notice, and if the minister would give the answer fully tomorrow or the next day it will be satisfactory.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I will.

GREAT LAKES STEAMSHIP MERGER

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton): I would like to ask the government what action, if any, has been taken to prevent the merger of the large steamship companies operating on the Great Lakes? The effect of such a merger can only be to increase the rates for carrying produce both east and west.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Has my hon. friend any direct information that there is a proposed merger, other than the one already existing, which we corrected by legislation in 1922?

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton): From time to time for several months past, Mr. Speaker, articles have been appearing in our papers in connection with this merger, and I am surprised that the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) has not already been directed to them. In the Canadian Railway and Marine World for this month, you will find the following at page 125:

On February 23, a Toronto newspaper stated that Canada Steamship Lines had arranged to acquire the Great Lakes Transportation Company's fleet, including the steamship being built at Midland, Ontario, for slightly under $6,000,000, and also to acquire 1,500,000 common stock of Geo. Hall Coal and Shipping Corporation for approximately $2,000,000, and further that Canada Steamship Lines would issue consolidated bonds to retire existing issues, and provide about $10,000,000 additional, adding that the issue had been underwritten, W. H. Coverdale, president, Canada Steamship Lines, having arranged with an underwriting syndicate, including J. W. McConnell of Montreal, and a New York group.

I could add to this statement but I do not think it is at all necessary. I believe I am entitled to some answer from the Minister of Finance after making the statement which I have.

Mr. ROBB: I think I gave my hon. friend a complete answer: If there is any merger that is in opposition to the laws of the country, it is open to any person to take action in regard thereto.

AUSTRALIAN BUTTER—DUMPING CLAUSE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I should like to make an inquiry of the Minister of Finance regarding a question I asked on February 25th respecting the bonus being given by the Stabilization Committee of Australia to butter producers in that country. The minister informed the House that butter imported into Canada from Australia would be subject to the provisions of the dumping clause in our tariff. I should like to ask if the dumping clause has been applied to imports of butter from Australia and New Zealand since that time. I may say there have been upwards of 1,500,000 pounds of butter imported during the present month, and it is a very important matter.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): I observe that question No. 1 has something to do with this matter. I understand the answer to that question has been prepared and will be tabled when we come to it.

AUSTRALIAN AND NEW ZEALAND BUTTER—WRAPPERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): I should like to make inquiry of the Minister of Agriculture regarding an article which appeared in the Star Weekly of the 27th instant. The statement in question is attributed to Mr. J. A. McFeeters, Manager of the Toronto Creamery, and to another dealer in dairy produce, who contend that it is unfair to insist that butter coming to Canada from Australia and New Zealand should not be put up in wrappers indicating that it was made in Canada. I should like to ask whether the Minister of Agriculture, or the Department of Agriculture, permits this to be done, because it is the practice at the present time; the article indicates clearly that the practice is followed.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): The answer is covered in the reply that will be tabled to-day to question No. 1.

Mr. ARMSTRONG (Lambton):

1. Is Australian or New Zealand butter sold in Canada in such a way as to lead the consumer to believe that he is purchasing the Canadian made product?

2. Is butter from Australia or New Zealand being sold in London and St. Thomas in wrappers similar to those used in wrapping Canadian butter, the only difference being that the registration number is not printed on the wrapper of the imported article?

3. Is it a fact that creameries now wrapping butter under their own trademark place their own registration number on the wrapper?

4. Could Australian butter be placed in the same wrapper with the registration number eliminated?

5. Is it not a fact that Australian butter is now being sold in Canada in wrappers similar to those used by Canadian creameries with the registration number omitted, and, if so, what does the government intend to do in regard to this matter?

6. Has the government issued instructions to their inspectors to tell vendors of Australian butter that they may use the same wrappers as heretofore, but that they must ship in plain boxes and not use creamery registration number either on the boxes or on the wrappers?

7. Is the dumping clause put into effect on all Australian butter, and if only applied to a portion of the butter imported from Australia, to what extent does the dumping clause apply?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. As far as the Dairy and Cold Storage branch is aware Australian and New Zealand butter is not being sold in such a way as to lead the consumer to believe that he is purchasing a Canadian made product.

2. As far as the Dairy and Cold Storage branch is aware, butter is not being sold in London and St. Thomas in wrappers similar to those used in wrapping Canadian butter with the exception that the registered number is omitted on the wrapper on the imported article. A London firm and a St. Thomas firm did for a time put Australian and New Zealand butter in wrappers bearing their respective registered numbers. In the latter part of February and the first part of March, the violation in this respect was pointed out to these two firms with the result that new wrappers in accordance with the legal requirements were provided.

3. Yes.

4. Australian butter cannot legally be placed in the creamery wrapper with the registered number eliminated if the wording of the wrapper indicates that the butter contained in the wrapper was made in the creamery which was doing the wrapping. Regulation 13A under the Dairy Industry Act reads as follows: "No person shall brand any cheese or brand any package containing cheese or butter in any manner that shall give false information as to the country or province of origin, or as to the cheese factory or creamery in which it was manufactured."

5. In as far as the Dairy and Cold Storage branch is aware Australian butter is not being sold in wrappers similar to those used by Canadian creameries with the exception that the registered number has been omitted. The regulations prohibit giving false information as to the creamery of origin. Creameries wrapping Australian and New Zealand butter are required to eliminate from the wrapper used on imported butter not only the registered number but any other wording which would give the impression that Australian or New Zealand butter was the product of the creamery which was printing and wrapping the Australian or New Zealand butter.

6. No. Inspectors have been instructed to advise vendors that registered numbers of Canadian creameries must not appear either on boxes or wrappers containing Australian or New Zealand butter.

7. All Australian butter sold to the purchaser in Canada at more than 5 per cent below the fair market value thereof as sold for home consumption at the time and place of direct exportation to Canada is subject to special or dumping duty.

(b) How were these disposed of?

(c) What amounts were obtained for same?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. Authority P.C. 1983, dated August 12, 1918.

3 (a) (b) and (c) No information.

NOTE.—The cost of all supplies, ammunition, etc., (except the initial issue of personal equipment and clothing for the Canadian personnel) was borne by the Imperial government, which assumed responsibility for same upon shipment from Vancouver and any balance remained in their hands. (See Hansard, p. 1034, April 7, 1920.) The Imperial government also paid all transportation charges from port of embarkation to Siberia and return. The pay and allowances of the Canadian personnel were borne by Canada.

CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. H. A. MULLINS (Marquette) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine should withdraw at once from the North Atlantic Conference and should be operated independently of any association, conference or combine of steamship lines with the sole object of conferring the greatest possible advantage upon the Canadian producer.

He said: In the investigation before the committee on Ocean Freight Rates, evidence was given to show that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine were in the combine, and were operating in the combine the same as other lines of steamships. I do not know whether the Canadian Government Merchant Marine is still in the combine and I would like the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) to let us know, because he has stated in interviews on many occasions in western Canada that it was the intention of the government to obtain a reduction of freight rates on the ocean liners. So far nothing has been done. The rate remains at $20, which is too excessive altogether to promote one of the basic industries of western Canada, the live stock industry.

The sale of the boats of the merchant marine leaves a doubt in the minds of the people out west as to whether we are going to get any redress in the matter of rates at the hands of this government. A private line has been established in the city of Toronto, called the Live Stock Producers' Line, which runs four boats which have been refitted for the cattle trade, and with excellent results. The people in the west are wondering why the boats of the government merchant marine are not also refitted for the shipment of cattle to help solve this question of high freight rates. There are twenty-four boats of 8,000 tons each in the Canadian Government Merchant Marine which with a little refitting would be admirably suited for the trade, and these ships could be refitted just as easily as the four boats that are being run by the private line in Toronto that I mentioned a moment ago. We in western Canada who are interested in the live stock industry cannot understand why this has not been done; we cannot understand why the government has not taken some action to bring about a lowering of freight rates for this basic industry in the west.

I would not advise the sale of these government ships. I think it is a mistake to sell them at the ridiculously low figures at which they are being disposed of to-day. Six of them have been sold to the government's own friends in Midland, to Playfair's, at $40,000, and two to another gentleman in Winnipeg, at $50,000. Now in view of the completion of the Hudson Bay railway, and the necessity there will be for ships to sail into the Hudson bay ports, I think it is a mistake for the government to sacrifice the merchant marine boats at the figures at which they have been disposing of them recently.

I would ask the Minister of Agriculture what he is doing to solve this question of high freight rates on our cattle going overseas. The cattle raisers in western Canada are getting discouraged and uneasy because of the excessive charges that are against the live stock trade. Not long ago, owing to very bad weather, one of the ships, loaded with cattle drifted down to the Azores, and they are taking advantage of that circumstance in England claiming there was a heavy loss of cattle on that ship, some one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty head. Enemies of our live stock trade in Great Britain are trying to make capital out of that circumstance, saying that it is cruel to the animals, their object being to shut Canada out of the British Isles. It would be a very serious thing for Canada if she was shut out of the British market, because there we have one of the finest markets for our cattle we could have anywhere, if the government would only do something on behalf of this industry which is of so much importance to eastern and western Canada. The people of the west are discouraged at the inaction of the government, and are uneasy at the continual promises of the government, and particularly of the Minister of Agriculture, to bring forward some plan for helping the industry, but actually taking no action at all. The live stock industry and those interested in the trade have asked me to bring this matter up as strongly as I can, with a view to helping the trade and seeing if something cannot be done to bring into use these twenty-four ships, of 8,000 tons each, of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine which, with a little refitting, would be admirably suited for carrying our cattle.

The Minister of Agriculture said the other day that I had bamboozled the electors of Manitoba, that I went up and down my constituency talking cattle, and did not talk about other important matters, such as the tariff. He is mistaken, Sir. There were many other important subjects taken up from my platform during the campaign. The transportation question, for instance, was taken up very strongly. Sir the transportation of live stock is a vital question to western Canada, and if something is not done by the gentlemen who to-day occupy the government seats in this House to help that industry, it will dwindle into insignificance, because of the excessive charges that are heaped up against it. It is a very important industry in Canada, one of our basic industries, and it should receive encouragement, more encouragement than it has received at the hands of the government.

It is sometimes said that the boats of the government merchant marine are no good. The Minister of Agriculture in different interviews has said that these boats are no use. I take exception to that statement. The boats of the government merchant marine that I have shipped cattle on have carried the cattle over splendidly. They are good boats, and only need a little reconstruction to enable them to carry much larger numbers of cattle. The boats that have been reconstructed by the Live Stock Producers Line of the city of Toronto—the S.S. Ontario, the S.S. Manitoba, the S.S. Saskatchewan and the S.S. Alberta—the former in spite of heavy storms carried about 1,100 cattle with a very small loss, about ten or twelve cattle, with a very small shrinkage indeed. The man who was handling the shipment on Manchester Importer showed me a cable that he had received on Saturday saying that the balance of the cattle had all been landed and arrived in splendid condition in spite of the heavy weather they had encountered.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that the twenty-four boats of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine should be reconstructed and placed at the service of the cattle trade of this country in order to give it the encouragement it needs, for I want to tell the Minister of Agriculture that western Canada lands will run to weeds if the live stock trade does not get more consideration in the future than it has had in the past. Travel through that country and you will find many men who have gone out of the live stock business, and it is because of the excessive charges that have been placed against it. I have been engaged in the cattle trade, Mr. Speaker, for a great many years, but I am not talking from any personal standpoint, because I have retired from the export cattle trade. I have been charged with speaking on this question from the point of view of my own personal interest, but that is not true, because I am not going back into the export cattle trade, in which I have already spent forty years; but I am ready to give the minister the benefit of the advice I have gained in my forty years experience and to help him solve this question of high freight rates, so as to encourage the production of live stock in western Canada. The live stock trade is important to any country. Wherever you find feeders of live stock, there you find a prosperous country. I might take you, for instance, to Scotland, or to the United States, where they are clamouring for our cattle, and would like the market opened. I do not care about seeing our young cattle go to the United States, but I do not mind getting an open market in the United States for the heavier class of our cattle, and when we can produce cattle in this country like we can in the west, I want to see this basic industry of ours fostered and helped to prosper, and to bring back the conditions in the west that ought to prevail once more. We have a fertile land, Mr. Speaker. Take the live stock off the farm, and you have a poor farm. I want to see diversified farming in this country. I want to see some value placed upon the cow. In Ireland they value the cow. They made her the guest of honour at a banquet in Ireland, but we have not placed full value on her in this country. To-day Great Britain is clamouring for the entrance of our Canadian cattle, to augment the food supply of the British Isles with the milk from our cattle. Very little work on our part with the British government could secure the entry of the Canadian cow into the British Isles. Imagine dairy cows selling for between £30 and £40 in England, while they are sacrificed in our markets at $30 or $40. These are the conditions against which the men in western Canada must contend, and I would urge upon the Minister of Agriculture to take the matter up with Lord Bledisloe the British Minister of Agriculture in the House of Lords with a view to having some action taken to remedy the present state of affairs. I know from my experience in the Old Country last winter that very little work on the part of the government there would get our Canadian cows into the United Kingdom. Ireland has a monopoly of the cattle industry in the matter of females. The little Kerry cow fetches from £30 to £40 in the Old Land while our Canadian animal is sacrificed at a ridiculously low figure. Before September, 1892, when that stigma was placed upon our cattle, eastern Canada and the three prairie provinces enjoyed a wonderful trade in the dairy cattle. We raised females for dairy purposes with an eminent degree of success. The herds in England in many localities are depleted as a result of the ravages of foot and mouth disease which is rampant throughout the country. In Cheshire, for example, where this disease has been particularly severe, practically the entire herds of the district have been wiped out. So that we could very well secure a lucrative trade in supplying dairy cattle to the Old Country. At the present time meetings are being held in Scotland by various agricultural societies, but I have so far been unable to see a single thing done by this government to look after our interests in this matter. Hon. gentlemen on the other side apparently are not bestirring themselves to get our Canadian cow into the British Isles.

The value of the cow has not been recognized as it should be. We do not seem to appreciate all that the cow has meant to Canada; she has played a wonderful part in Canadian history. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that Wall Street recognizes to the full the value of the cow; it appreciates what that animal has done for the great United States. Yes, the cow is the mother of prosperity. I do not want my legal friends to become impatient of this eulogy of the cow. They may not know it, but one of these animals was placed in Central park, New York, on one occasion to teach the people in that great metropolis the obvious fact as to where milk came from, for some of them had the idea that it was obtained from a can and not from a cow. I do want the Minister of Agriculture to think a little more of the cow, and I appeal to him strongly to do something in the interests of the cattle industry in the west.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Railways and Canals): My contribution to the resolution will be brief, and necessarily so. I waited with some interest to hear my hon. friend (Mr. Mullins) who introduced the resolution say something in support of it, and I am still waiting. I do not believe that the hon. gentleman mentioned the resolution at all. It reads:

> That in the opinion of this House, the Canadian Government Merchant Marine should withdraw at once from the North Atlantic conference and should be operated independently of any association, conference or combine of steamship lines with the sole object of conferring the greatest possible advantage upon the Canadian producer.

The hon. member did not discuss this resolution at all. Perhaps he is aware now that there is no point in it for the reason that it is more than one year late: the Canadian Government Merchant Marine withdrew from the conference in February, 1925. There is, therefore, no object whatever in pressing this resolution upon the House at this stage. I do not think I need say more.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask the minister a question? Do they not at the present time charge the same rates as the conference fixes?

Mr. DUNNING: So far as I am aware, that has nothing to do with the resolution. I am not in a position to answer the question just now, but I should be glad to get the information for my hon. friend. The point of the resolution is whether the Canadian Government Merchant Marine is a member of the conference. The answer is it withdrew in February, 1925, and is not now associated with any body of steamship owners. As to rates, I shall be glad to get the information for my hon. friend.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The new Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) has summarily dismissed the resolution and seems to assume that the House will be satisfied with his assurance that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine withdrew from the conference in February, 1925. The House, however, will put a question mark after the word "withdrew," having some doubt as to what its meaning is. The government has evidently a dictionary of its own and applies such meanings as may suit the occasion. It is true that in the debate of last year on the Petersen contract, and as well in the evidence given before the committee, assertions were then made that the Canadian merchant marine had formally withdrawn. Some of the evidence, however, went to show that while they had formally withdrawn they still sat in, whatever may be the government's dictionary meaning of that term. They "sat in" while not being members and, I presume, not voting. They sat in and took such part as the sitter-in is entitled to, whatever that may be. But the more important fact, indeed, the only fact that is of any consequence at all, is the question of rates. If the rates are the rates dictated by the conference, it will not make any difference to the people of Canada whether they are members of the conference or sitters-in or sitters-out of it. If they follow the rates the conference fixes, then it is equally the same to the pocket of the shipper whether they are inside in the ring or outside in the vestibule. The minister comes into the House supposed to be in a position to discuss the resolution, and he does not know yet whether or not the merchant marine, which this government owns and which it is operating through a directorate, actually obeys the dictates of the conference. This is a matter of indifference to him so long as it formally asserts its nominal independence, or at least proclaims itself not a member in full standing of the conference, paying the fees. Now,—

Mr. DUNNING: Will the right hon. gentleman permit me? I am in a position to state absolutely that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine does not obey the dictates of any conference. My hon. friend is attributing to me statements I did not make.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I attributed to the minister the effect of a statement he made before, which was that he did not know whether they followed the rates fixed by the conference or not.

Mr. DUNNING: No; I must again object. I made no such statement. I said that I could not inform my hon. friend as to the rates charged. I did not say that I did not know whether or not they followed the conference rates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister will have some difficulty in confirming his present impression from the notes of Hansard. I did not ask him if he knew the rates: I would not expect him to carry the rates in his mind. I asked whether it was not a fact that the government merchant marine followed the rates of the conference, and I got in reply the statement that he did not know, but that he would look it up. The necessities of the case, however, seem to warrant the minister in revising that answer. He is at liberty to revise it, but not to tell me that he did not make it.

Mr. DUNNING: I have not revised my answer. At least I understood my right hon. friend to ask me if the rates charged by the government merchant marine were the same as those charged by the conference.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: That is entirely a different question from the one he now puts into my mouth. He asks me now if the government merchant marine charges the rates set by the conference, implying in his twisting of words—at which he is of course a master, and I defer to him in that regard—something that I did not say. In his twisting of words he is now distorting his question to make my answer mean what I did not intend it to mean at all. I did not intend it to mean that the merchant marine is in any sense controlled or directed by any north Atlantic conference. Whether or not its rates are similar to those charged by the conference I am not in a position to say, but I am able to say that they are not dictated by the conference. Now is that clear?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, it is just as clear as the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee. The minister follows the well-known habit of those who find themselves in a tight corner of their own creation, of attributing to the other side who points it out a splitting of hairs and a trading on words. I wonder who the trader on words is. Is it not he who says that the board may follow the rates or adopt the same rates as the conference, but that that is a very different thing from saying that they adopt the rates set by the conference? This is the distinction drawn by the minister who attributes to me hair-splitting. I am not endeavouring to split hairs. It is not the minister's hairs that are in danger at all; it is his head I am trying to enter. If the rates are the rates the conference sets, then I repeat it makes not one whit of difference whether the board is a member of the conference or not. I am not particular whether the rates are followed because of dictation or because of affiliation or because of affection or because of admiration; the reason is not material to the pocketbook of the producer. What we want to know is: Are they not the same rates? The evidence before the committee last year showed that the so-called divorcement meant nothing whatever because the rates then were the same as the rates had been before. So we are in the position of being asked by the government to close this debate without a particle of information as to whether the position is changed, as to whether or not the absolution granted the mercantile marine by the conference was of any set or practical value. We are asked simply to take the assurance of the minister that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine is not a member of the conference, and that if they follow the rates which the conference sets they do not do it because they have to, but because they like to.

Mr. SPEAKER: The reply of the hon. member for Marquette will close the debate.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Finance): Before the hon. member for Marquette closes the debate I should like to say a word. My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) appears to blame this government because of the operation of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Never at all.

Mr. ROBB: It was a baby that we found on our doorstep when we came into office. We do know that upon the first inquiry we made it was discovered that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine was working in co-operation with the North Atlantic Conference, and objection was taken to this state of affairs. I do not say that the government merchant marine became members of the conference when my right hon. friend was Prime Minister, but I do say we were surprised to find this to be the case after coming into office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Surprised?

Mr. ROBB: In 1923 or about that time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, it came out in this House over and over again and the government knew all about it.

Mr. ROBB: And they were in the combine when we assumed office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, and for two years afterwards.

Mr. ROBB: Very well, we have the admission of my right hon. friend that they were in the combine when we assumed office. We know they withdrew from the conference in February 1925. We also know that the members of the north Atlantic conference are not trying to help the Canadian Government Merchant Marine business. I have here a letter, received no later than this morning, complaining that the Canadian merchant marine have two vessels leaving a Canadian port with cargo on the same dates as those selected for some of the vessels that are in the conference. They would like us to withdraw from that business. But as the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning) has just said, we are not under any obligation to the conference, we are no longer members of it. These boats are running in the interests of the Canadian people and their earnings are gradually improving the position of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the government intend to build more ships?

Mr. ROBB: What has that to do with the resolution?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought if the government was going to add to the size of the baby it would not be complaining about finding it on the doorstep.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with some interest to the fine distinctions drawn by hon. members on both sides of the House with regard to the rates now being charged by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. member tell me what distinction he heard me draw?

Mr. FORKE: I do not think any of the hon. gentlemen knew what rates were being charged at the present time anyway, so we did not get from them any information on the subject. My hon. friend from Marquette says he is very much in love with the cow. Well, I do not blame him at all. I am in love with the cow myself—so long as I can get somebody else to milk her. But the hon. member never gets on his feet without making slighting references to the people of the west who grow wheat. Now, I think he is making a mistake in adopting this attitude. I agree with every word he says in regard to mixed farming and the raising of as many beef and dairy cattle as possible, but I would remind him that for a great many years to come wheat will be the staple production of the three prairie provinces. It is wheat that is going to help pay the national debt, and we must not forget that. As to doing anything to help mixed farming, I am at one with the hon. member for Marquette. He sometimes tells me—I do not think I shall be betraying his confidence when I say this—that although he sits on the Conservative side and I sit on the Progressive side, our ideas are not very far apart after all. I repeat, I am prepared to agree with him that we should encourage mixed farming, but I dissent from his slighting references to the farmers of the west who are raising millions of bushels of wheat, a production that means so much to the Dominion.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I hope my hon. friend from Marquette does not expect me to engage in a discussion on the advantages of diversified farming on a resolution of this kind, and yet I do not want to pass up his appeal to me to say something. Like him, I was keenly interested in the operations of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, and when this government took office I made some inquiries regarding its relationship with the north Atlantic conference, and also the capacity of the boats to carry cattle, because about that time this government interceded with the home government and eventually succeeded in having the cattle embargo removed.

An hon. MEMBER: What!

Mr. MOTHERWELL: With the aid, of course, of our predecessors, who had been working assiduously along the same line. I communicated with Sir Henry Thornton, who partially converted four boats for the cattle traffic, each accommodating approximately 265 head, or an aggregate capacity of a little less than 1,100 head. Besides providing insufficient accommodation for the traffic, these boats were not very satisfactory in other respects. Therefore Sir Henry thought that this was a sufficient experiment, especially as the results were not too satisfactory from his point of view, and I frankly admit that I did not make any further attempts to convince him of the desirability of converting other boats into cattle boats for the reason that it cost a lot of money to make the conversion, and they were none too satisfactory after they were converted. Further, they did not carry sufficient cattle to take care of the situation. As my hon. friend knows, the Petersen contract came up for consideration last year, and one of the primary objects then was to improve the situation with respect not only to cattle space but cattle rates as well. My hon. friend perhaps heard enough of the discussion to know that not very much encouragement was given to the proposal of the government by the other side of the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If I recall the situation, my hon. friend—

Mr. MULLINS: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will be through in a moment. My hon. friend was an important witness at the inquiry in connection with that matter, and I remember that he disagreed very strongly with some of my hon. friends on the other side of the House. I remember he disagreed with the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) as to the best way of shipping live stock. My hon. friend is familiar with all these facts, and I think he was in sympathy with the attempt of the government to do something by means of that contract. He must therefore give us some credit for at least a desire to improve conditions.

My hon. friend asked a question the other day with regard to further attempts by this government, particularly by myself, to increase the space available. I answered him on that occasion, pointing out that one boat known as the Jensen boat, now rechristened the Ontario, held more cattle on its initial trip than those four mercantile marine boats combined. This boat had a most successful trip, probably the most successful of any boat on the Atlantic during those terrible storms. That is as far as we have gone; we cannot do everything at once. We hope to be here for several sessions to clean up a lot of the things which require attention and which we have not yet caught up with. I am sympathetic with the ambitions of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins), but Rome was not built in a day, and all these wrongs or grievances cannot be corrected in a day. I think we are headed in the right direction, however, and I enlist the co-operation of the hon. member for Marquette in improving conditions as opportunities present themselves.

Mr. MULLINS: Mr. Speaker, we have had promises, promises and promises, and none of them have been fulfilled. Western Canada and the country as a whole are tired of promises. The hon. gentleman knows the correspondence which has been going on. We want action; we want something done which will give us redress in connection with ocean freight rates. The trade cannot stand a rate of $20 per head.

The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) stated that I made insurrections at the grain growers of western Canada. I refute that statement. I am upholding the cattle industry; it is the leading industry; it stands out more and is based on sounder principles than are the activities of the man who is just mining the soil, a soil robber is a menace to the western country. If a man is not in mixed farming he is usually a failure. The sowless, cowless, chickenless farmer of the west! I made that statement before in speaking on this subject, and I make it again. A man cannot be successful in western Canada without live stock. If you go back far enough in history you will find that we would have very little of the group system and very few Progressives if it were not for the dissatisfied settler who has been producing weeds on the western prairies. He has become so dissatisfied with raising weeds and mining the soil that he is ready to join any old party at all. They have two or three new parties in the west now, which the government will have to contend with if they hold office. There is a party called the Farmers' Union, and there is still another which I have been invited to join. In time you will have the group system, with no stable government at all.

With all due respect to my hon. friend I have everything in common with the man on the land out west. Politics have never played a part and will never play a part, so far as I am concerned, in matters affecting the interests of the man on the land. I came here with an open mind, ready to support the government in getting a reduction of ocean rates, at the instigation of one of the leaders of the Progressive party, the right bower of the Hon. Mr. Crerar. I refer to Mr. Rice Jones, who requested me to come and give evidence in regard to freight rates. I had some experience in negotiating with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) in trying to get a reduction in freight rates. I took the Canadian government boat Victor, whose freight rates were supposed to be $25 per space. I took her, it is true, because she was the only boat available out of the port, and I had to go to Dundee. I did not want to go to Dundee, but it was all I could get. I asked the minister if he would get a rate of $20, which the conference and the other regular liners were charging, but it was impossible. I was being charged $25 per space and I was compelled to take the boat, because the cattle were ready on my ranch and I had to ship them to market. The minister wired me and said that on account of going to another port the rate had to be $25. I did not like to crowd the cattle on that ship; they were heavy cattle and I could not put five cattle in four spaces. The capacity of the Victor is 233 spaces, and I was compelled to pay for 270 spaces at $25 per space, which was a gross injustice, for which I was never able to get any redress from the hon. gentleman. I could not do anything. So I was ready to come and support the government in an endeavour to do something in the right direction; I was ready to come to this committee and lend my support to it. But what was the result of that investigation? What did it cost the country? The man behind the investigation was that gentleman who has been in politics since I was a boy in West Elgin. I remember him—W. T. R. Preston—a good organizer for the Liberal party; one who used to sing hymns on Sunday afternoon and bring in votes on Monday. I object to such men handling the cattle industry, and if that practice is still followed when the Conservative party comes into power I will still object.

Then there was Duncan Marshall; let me refer to him for a moment. He was sent to England to receive the first cargo of cattle going to the British Isles, and what did he and the other gentlemen do? They put a red tape across the gangway, and as the first intelligent Canadian steer saw that tape he nearly knocked Duncan Marshall and the other gentlemen into the Clyde. The cattle should have been allowed to walk off the ship gently, with no red tape in front of the gang plank as a demonstration to the British public of their kindness in removing the embargo. It was a direct insinuation that red tape had kept Canadian cattle out of England for thirty-two years, and in my opinion was a direct insult. Never would a man who understood conditions do a thing like that, but that is what was done, and I say it was an injustice. The government allowed those wild Texas range cattle to go to the Wembley exhibition, which did not permit of the display of true Canadian cattle. Those were not cattle that we raised in western Canada. They were cattle that were brought up from Mexico in the old days of the range and turned loose on our western prairies. They were long horned, range cattle and to represent these as typical of our western cattle was a libel on the undoubtedly fine stock we raise out west. We had the old range days out west, but those days are gone, and we are now raising thoroughly domesticated cattle.

I should like to see the vessels of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine taken out of the steamship combine. They are still charging a $20 rate, and it looks to me as if the officials of the government line still have their feet under the combine table. The present government proposed to give a million and a quarter of the people's money to Sir William Petersen ostensibly to break the steamship combine. What were we to get for that? We were to get a bunch of old hulks belonging to the Thomson line, I think ten in number, vessels not to be compared with the ships of the government merchant marine. I have loaded cattle on the old Thompson line boats in the early days, and they are not ships that are at all fitted for the cattle trade today. What should have been done was to refit the vessels of the merchant marine just as the Livestock Producers, or the Jensen line, have done. By refitting the ships could have been made very comfortable for the carrying of cattle and could have transported from five hundred to six hundred cattle each, and the government could have handled the cattle transportation problem in the most economical way. But instead of that they proposed to pay out the enormous sum I have mentioned. In addition to that they have paid to their agent, W. T. R. Preston, between nine thousand and ten thousand dollars. They also engaged counsel during the cattle inquiry at $200 a day, with a resultant cost to the country for that item alone of $40,000. Then when Sir William Petersen died the government incurred an outlay of $4,000 to send his remains back to England. This will give an idea of the way the government have been spending money, of the way our debt is mounting up. I do not know where the old ship of state is drifting, but if it continues to drift much longer, God help the man who is struggling to make his way out in western Canada.

I make this plea not from any personal motive, but on behalf of those who are engaged in the live stock industry in western Canada. They have large numbers of cattle to move to the Old Country this spring but there seems no chance whatever for them to get ocean space. The old line boats have done good work, but their day is past. These ships are not able to make the trips across now, yet it is most urgent that the cattle men should have ocean tonnage for their live stock. I would suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that he get busy at once. I suggest that he get say ten vessels of the merchant marine and refit them just as the Jensen line did with their boats. I urge the government to do something so as to afford the live stock industry a chance of moving the cattle so badly in need of transportation. I speak feelingly and earnestly on this matter.

The Minister of Agriculture made an allusion to the dead beef industry, but I may say to him that I am not in favour of shipping dead beef to England. I believe the minister tried the experiment of shipping dead beef at one time and experienced a loss of $50 on every carcass that was shipped. I made a shipment of dead beef myself on one occasion, but that was the only time I ever did it. No man who has any understanding of the Canadian cattle industry would ever favour shipping dead beef to England. He might try it once, but never again. On Saturday evening I had dining with me one of the largest stock salesmen in England, who imports considerable quantities of South American meats. He told me that three and one-half pence a pound was the price at which dead beef sold in England. I asked, "What about the price of Canadian cattle?" He said that the Canadian cattle sold for nine pence a pound. If we can get such a price as that we do not want to go into the lower market. Ireland wants to keep Canada out of the road; she does not want this Dominion to get into the Old Country market. Those who do not understand the trade are the ones who are advocating the shipment of dead meat. Very recently a vessel carrying cattle to the Old Country drifted to the Azores and the opponents of Canada are pointing to the mishaps that they say are likely to occur, as an argument for the keeping of our cattle out of the British market.

I appeal to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Dunning), who comes from a great producing district in the west, to do something in the interest of the cattle trade. He reminded me the other day that he had sold me cattle twenty years ago. I remember when he was up in that country driving oxen. He knows something about the cattle trade, therefore, and I think we can look to him to take measures that will be in the interest of the industry. Hon. gentlemen opposite are in power through the support of our friends the Progressives and our friends the Labour men. I ask them to do something in behalf of the cattle industry, not to expend all their efforts in the interest of the grain industry. I repeat that the Minister of Railways was identified with the cattle industry and with the building up of the west in the old pioneer days. He knows how badly it stands in need of a helping hand and should be prepared to do something for it.

Mr. DUNNING: I should like to sell you a few cattle now if I could.

Mr. MULLINS: I am sorry, but I am not in the business. I got old in the trade, and now I feel that a man is so much handicapped by present conditions that he had better be out of it. I feel satisfied that if hon. gentlemen on this side had the reins of power action would be taken very promptly, and that the cattle industry would be on the way to a stable basis within five months. Holding the views I do I would not sit in this House if some action were not taken to obtain redress for the live stock industry, to build up and protect that industry.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Unanimously.

Motion agreed to.

DUTY ON AUTOMOBILES AND MOTOR TRUCKS

SUBSTANTIAL REDUCTION IN TARIFF PROPOSED BY MR. COOTE

Mr. G. G. COOTE (Macleod) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House a substantial reduction should be made in the customs tariff on automobiles and motor trucks.

He said: The subject dealt with in this resolution is one of very great importance to this country. Canada is a land stretching 4,000 miles from east to west. We cover an immense territory. We have a population of nine million odd scattered over this large area. For that reason transportation is one of the greatest questions confronting us to-day. The greatest improvement in transportation facilities since the invention of the steam locomotive is the automobile, both freight and passenger. The greatest competitor that Canada has to-day is the United States. The United States has motor trucks available to her population at two-thirds the price at which they can be purchased by the people in Canada. The United States has one motor car for every six of her population, while Canada has one to every fourteen of her population. On account of our sparse settlement in this country, we really require more motor trucks and automobiles proportionally than the people of the United States. The only reason that I can see why we have only one car to fourteen of our population, and the United States one to every six is that cars are too expensive in this country and the people cannot afford to buy them. The Ford Times a year ago published this statement:

> The development of the automotive industry is only a logical sequence of the demand for transportation facilities, which have always played a major part in opening up a land to its fullest possibilities. With vast unopened areas in our land of huge distances, proper railroad service could not be a paying or a practical proposition. The need for transportation still remains and is of prime importance in changing these waste spaces into productive areas. No country can rise to its full height of importance without adequate transportation.
> What is the truth? Let us apply such facts as are available to the solution of this involved problem.
> The automobile industry could never have attained its present tremendous totals over a period of 23 years had not its product more than justified itself economically.
> Its proper use lengthens life, increases efficiency, stimulates general business and promotes the wealth and stability of the nation.

There we have in a paper published by the largest manufacturers of automobiles in Canada a very good argument as to why automobiles and trucks should be cheaper in this country—because they are so necessary to development and production. Because of the development of our social and economic life, cars to-day are a necessity for a great many of our people, particularly doctors, preachers, commercial travellers and farmers. It has been estimated that farmers in western Canada, or in Alberta, live on an average ten miles from a railway, and yet only about one-third of them own motor cars. While on a visit to British Columbia last year I noticed that practically all the fruit which was being delivered to packing houses in one of the large fruit centres of British Columbia was being delivered in motor trucks. I did not see one rig drawn by horses These men have to pay practically 50 per cent more for their motor trucks than their competitors to the south of the boundary. In one town in my constituency this fall there were fifty-seven men delivering wheat to the elevator with motor trucks. Some of them were hauling the wheat a distance of twenty-eight miles. There are many others still hauling wheat with horses. I wish hon. members in this House could realize what a boon it would be to these farmers if they could afford to own motor trucks and deliver their wheat with them. It is impossible for a railway company to build railways within ten miles of all our settlers, and any man who has to haul his wheat, his cream and all his produce more than ten miles to market is certainly badly in need of a motor truck. For these and other reasons which I shall enumerate I think it is the duty of the House, without further delay, to see that some reduction is made in the price of motor trucks, so far at least as this can be attained through a reduction of the tariff. Henry Ford was quoted last year in the Ford Times as saying:

> The great trouble with farming is that it involves too much unnecessary work. There is no reason why agriculture may not hope to come abreast of the other industries in the near future, if the farmer will turn his attention to modern industrial methods, instead of to the problem of borrowing money. There is no food scarcity. The problem is not one of how to increase production, and thereby pile up a surplus for speculators to play with, but how to simplify production and distribution so that less human energy shall be wasted in the process.

One of the ways to solve this farm problem is to reduce the price of motor trucks. I have never yet heard any suggestion in this House as to how it could be done unless we reduce the tariff. The low-priced automobile and the motor truck is the greatest boon which has come to farmers since labour-saving machinery was invented. Again I would quote from the Ford Times:

> Autos Reduce The Farm Migration
> Easy to Get to Town Now; Just a Case of Starting the Family Car
> The farm telephone, the coming of labour-saving devices and the low-price auto are three of the greatest factors in checking the admittedly large migration from the farm.

Probably no mechanical invention has done so much as the low-priced automobile to lessen the monotony of farm life, particularly for people living on the prairies a long distance from the railways, and nothing has done so much to relieve the monotony of life for the farm women. Many of these people, prior to the coming of the automobile, were limited to their own farms. They are too far from town to drive there with a horse and rig. As I said before, approximately one-third of the farmers in Alberta are able to own motor cars, and I think the only reason the other two-thirds do not own them is that they are too dear at the present time. The Ford Times said recently:

> Every sure enough farm needs three automobiles—any farmer with a family will vouch for that and that number is his goal.

Then it goes on to show that he needs a truck, a roadster and a Ford sedan to take him to town in bad weather.

I would be pretty well satisfied, Mr. Speaker, if we had on an average one automobile to each farm, and I should like to say to the editor of the Ford Times that there is only one reason why there are not more automobiles on the farm, that reason being that the Ford Company have kept the price too high. If we reduce the duty the company would have to reduce the price and they would sell more. The Ford Times goes on to point out that only one-third of the farmers of Canada have motor cars. There is another reason why this is a very important question for Canada. We have for the past twenty or twenty-five years been trying to encourage the automobile business in Canada with a protective tariff of 35 per cent. Many other incidentals enter into it with which I shall deal later, and which give it a protection really of about 40 per cent.

Looking over a booklet recently issued by the automotive industries of Canada, I find that from 1904 to 1924 they have manufactured and sold in Canada 793,519 cars. The wholesale value of these cars is $699,237,511. To get the retail value of these cars, we must add to that amount one-third, which would bring the total retail value of these cars to $932,316,681, or an average value, without excise and sales tax, of $1,174. The total extra cost—I am assuming here that these cars were sold to the Canadian public at an advance of 35 per cent over the American price—the total extra cost of these cars to the consumers of Canada was $242,000,000. That means an average increased price to the consumer of these cars in Canada of $305 per car. This price does not take into account sales tax and excise tax.

The Ford Motor Company have estimated the life of a car to be five years. That would mean an extra $60 per year to each of the families owning a car, due to the increase in the sale price which is made possible by the 35 per cent tariff. To this amount would have to be added the increase in the price of tires, accessories and repairs, which I think would average at least $15 a year, or a total extra charge of $75 per car per year due to the cutoms tariff.

This booklet also shows that the total customs duties collected by this government from the manufacturers of parts of all kinds was $43,000,000, so that if that were deducted from the $242,000,000, which I have shown to be the extra cost, we would still have approximately $200,000,000 which it has cost us to establish this industry.

Possibly for the information of the House I should state that the rate of duty on cars and trucks is 35 per cent. The United States has an excise tax of 5 per cent, and any consumer bringing a car into Canada must pay this 5 per cent tax in the United States before he can bring his car in here. Then we have also a sales tax of 5 per cent, plus an excise tax of 5 per cent on the value of the car up to $1,200, and 10 per cent on the value in excess of $1,200. On trucks there is a sales tax of 5 per cent, but no excise tax.

But this is not all the protection they enjoy. On page 15 of the booklet recently issued by the Ford Motor Company it is stated that on a Ford Fordor sedan, imported from the United States and priced at $565, Detroit, you pay sales tax and excise tax when bringing it into Canada of $78.11. If you purchase this car in Canada from the Ford Company it is listed at $755, and you pay sales tax and excise tax amounting to $56.62. There they have an additional protection of $21.49 on the Fordor sedan.

Someone will say: Why single out the automobile industry for a reduction in the tariff when there are many other articles in the tariff on which some of us think the duty should be reduced? The reason I have singled it out, Mr. Speaker, is because the automobile is such an important article to the Canadian people, and because a demand for a reduction in the duty is so general. No matter where you go in Canada, I think you will find an almost unanimous demand from the people that the tariff on automobiles should be reduced. I think I shall be forgiven if I say that Toronto is generally regarded as the home of protection.

Mr. COOTE: One of them. At any rate, it is one of the places where they really believe in protection, and in a good share of it. The hon. member for Toronto West Centre (Mr. Hocken) I think is a consistent protectionist. I have an editorial published in his paper, the Orange Sentinel, some time ago. It is headed "Reduce the Duty on Motors and Prosper", and says:

> Whatever may be done with the customs tariff at the next session of parliament,—

I neglected to say that this was published in 1923, so we have missed two opportunities already:

> —there should be a substantial reduction in the duty on motor cars. It is clear from the prices quoted in the United States and Canada that the Canadian manufacturers are charging "all the traffic will stand." The duty of 35 per cent is more than protection; it is in part a government subsidy to the makers of automobiles.

I hope the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. McGibbon), who objects to government subsidies, will bear that in mind:

> As long as the motor car was purely a luxury that only the rich could enjoy, there was not much reason for complaint. But the motor car has become a necessity in business and professional life, and those who are thus compelled to buy one should not be forced to pay excessive profits to the manufacturers. A certain type of car that sells in the United States at $1,875, costs $3,100 in Canada. That is altogether too wide a spread, and is not warranted by any factor in the trade. The American makers have larger production, it is true, but they pay higher wages, and there is no reason why their raw materials are any cheaper. The makers of motor cars in Canada are soaking the public unduly, and it is the duty of the government to lower the tariff, and in that way inject a little competition of American firms that will bring down the prices.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Was all that in the Orange Sentinel?

Mr. COOTE: That was all in the Orange Sentinel, and surely, coming from that paper, it is sufficient justification for the government to reduce this tariff without any further argument.

As a further indication of the feeling in Toronto, I would like to draw the attention of the House to a news item appearing in a Toronto paper of January 30th, reporting the annual meeting of the Toronto Local Council of Women, and we should not forget that the women now have votes. It says:

> Buy cars in the United States. Be patriotic. Then the Dominion, not the makers, would get the duty.

It goes on to say:

> You can buy Canadian made cars cheaper in England and Australia than you can here.

I shall not weary the House with reading the whole report, but might quote this:

The Ontario farmer, if he were a patriot, would buy his car on the other side of the Detroit river and pay the tax to the customs collector on his way home, thus contributing to his country's treasury and not to the personal fortunes of Mr. Henry Ford and his son.

Then the report goes on to quote some of the dividends the Ford Company have been able to pay because of the privilege they have enjoyed of charging us 35 per cent more for cars on this side of the river.

Public opinion can sometimes be judged by the attitude of the press, but in this particular case I think the press would really like to advocate a reduction in the duty on automobiles in much stronger terms than they have done, but the automobile industry is furnishing a large amount of the advertising which these papers enjoy, and I think the newspapers have to go pretty easy on this question of reducing the duty on automobiles, or they may lose some of their advertising. But almost every editor with whom I have ever spoken is very anxious to be able to buy a motor car cheaper than he is able to do at the present time. In my speech in this House a year ago I showed that on ten different makes of cars manufactured both in Canada and in the United States the Canadian price f.o.b. factory, without any sales or excise tax, was from 38 to 41 per cent higher than the price charged across the line. That statement has never been challenged so far as I know. I do not think it is necessary to repeat that list, but I will give you the prices obtaining to-day on two of the best known makes of cars manufactured on both sides of the line, and I think it will prove that the extra price charged is equivalent to the duty. These two cars are the Ford and the Dodge. The Ford runabout is $290 at Detroit, and $410 at Ford, Ontario, or a difference of 41 per cent. It is true that in a booklet issued by the Ford Company this runabout is quoted at $310 in Detroit, but I have an advertisement published by that company in the Detroit News of February 21, 1926, giving the price of the runabout at $290 and of the touring car at $310. The mistake, therefore, if there is a mistake, is on the part of the Ford Company in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: It is a difference of equipment.

Mr. COOTE: You will not find much equipment on a Canadian runabout or touring car of the Ford make. As a matter of fact I do not know what you could safely eliminate if you want to run the car. The runabout at Detroit is $290 as against $410 at Ford, Ontario, a difference of 41 per cent. The list is as follows:

Ford	Detroit	Ford, Ontario	Increase Per cent
Touring car	$310	$440	42
Coupe..	500	665	33
Tudor sedan.	520	695	34
Fordor sedan.	565	755	34

Dodge	Price in United States	Price in Canada	Increase Per cent
Touring car	$795	$1,095	38
Roadster	795	1,095	38
De Luxe sedan.. ..	1,075	1,485	38

Just note how closely these prices keep to the line of the tariff. The Canadian manufacturer is taking practically full advantage of this tariff and is pushing the price up to the limit. We pay in Canada to-day the United States price plus the tariff, but if you buy a car in Canada the tariff goes to the manufacturer and he puts it into his pocket. Of the capital engaged in this industry 80 per cent is said to be owned outside Canada, practically all in the United States. This seems to me to be a tariff levied on the Canadian people for the benefit of the American stockholders rather than of Canadian industry.

Canada established a national policy about fifty years ago for the purpose of affording protection to infant industries, the idea being that when an industry had grown up the protection which it had enjoyed should be lowered. This is brought out very well, in better words than I could use, in a speech delivered in 1911 by the right hon. gentleman who at present leads the opposition in this House (Mr. Meighen). The right hon. gentleman contended that the tariff should be lowered when the industry had grown to such proportions that it had a reasonable hold on the home market and was able to export its product in competition with the products of other countries. I will quote one paragraph from his remarks on that occasion:

But the charge I have to make, and which I hope to bring home to the government this afternoon, is not that one, though it is the most serious; it is this, that in their attempts to continue the national policy which had obtained for years before, they have overlooked, they have neglected one essential feature of that policy: they have quite forgotten its guiding principle, namely, the principle that as our industrial institutions advanced in strength and as they were able with every advance to acquire a hold on the home market, the import duties were to be diminished and adjusted in order to meet the evolving and changing conditions. It is that restraining guiding principle which I claim this government has entirely overlooked—

I think that charge can be made against the Liberal government in power to-day.

—and as a consequence they have allowed, in the respect which I am discussing this afternoon, protection to run rampant—

That certainly applies to automobiles.

—and they have for reasons that are only too obvious, become the slaves of those who helped them into power and who now maintain them there behind ramparts of gold.

That charge might have been true in the last parliament, but we see very few representatives here this year sitting on the government side, returned from automobile constituencies. I could quote further from the remarks of the right hon. gentleman, elaborating that principle and proving by the speeches of protectionist ministers of finance in the past that this was the policy, namely, that as an industry advanced and grew stronger, demonstrating its ability to supply the home market and, as well, to compete in foreign markets, the duty should be lowered.

In a booklet recently issued by the automobile men themselves it was stated that automotive products exported from Canada are fourth on the list in value of all commodities. Surely this is an indication that the tariff might be lowered. I dealt at some length with the question of exports last year, and perhaps I might quote a paragraph from the remarks I made on that occasion regarding the ability of our automobile manufacturers to export their product. This is taken from the Ford Times:

For the calendar year 1923 statistics show that there were manufactured in Canada 147,582 motor cars and trucks. Of these, 69,920 were exported and 77,662 were consumed in Canada. That is, our exports were 47 per cent of the total output of our Canadian factories.

The value of automobile imports for 1924 was $11,-443,158, the value of our automobile exports was $33,828,692, or approximately three times the value of our imports.

We exported those cars to 97 different countries. I will not take the time of the House to read the list, but we sent the United Kingdom over $5,000,000 worth, to South Africa $2,480,000, to British India, $2,043,000, to Australia, $6,115,000, to New Zealand, $4,680,000, to the Argentine Republic, $1,413,000 and so on.

I presume someone may say that these exports went largely to Great Britain and her colonies where our manufacturers enjoy some preference. That is partly true but I would point out that we exported to Great Britain $5,575,000 worth, although the preference our manufacturers enjoyed there at that time was only 11 per cent. Now, if they could do that large amount of business in a market where they had an advantage over their American competitor of only 11 per cent, why do they need 35 per cent protection right here in Canada? Of course, it will be argued that it is good policy for us to encourage our automobile industry so that there may be an exportable surplus. That argument I do not question if the encouragement given to the industry does not cost us too much. What I should like to suggest to our automobile manufacturers is that if the cars they are exporting were made available to Canadians at the United States prices, I think they could sell every one of those exported cars right here in Canada. Canada needs these automobiles, but she cannot afford to buy them.

One other thing which must be taken into account when we are considering a reduction of the tariff duty is the financial condition of the industry. As an indication of that condition, I may be permitted to quote to the House from a clipping from the Financial Post of February 12, 1926, dealing with the last annual statement of the Ford Motor Company of Canada. This is the quotation:

The Ford Motor Company of Canada was incorporated in Ontario in 1904, and re-incorporated with a Dominion charter in 1911. It has the exclusive manufacturing and selling rights on the Ford automobile, the Ford truck and Fordson tractor throughout the British Empire, with the exception of Great Britain and Ireland. Its field of activities includes Canada, New Zealand, Australia, India, British South Africa, and so on. Originally in consideration of $63,500 stock given to the Ford Motor Company of Detroit, the Detroit company agreed to extend to the Canadian company the privilege of using all the devices and improvements of the American company's car without further cost. The capital stock, which amounted to $125,000 in 1905—half of which went to the Detroit company—has by the distribution of bonuses to shareholders been increased to $7,000,000.

I want the House to note that all of this capital stock has come out of earnings, with the exception of the first $125,000.

Shares have a present market value of about $500, representing a stock valuation of $35,000,000. The company has in twenty years distributed to shareholders in cash and stock dividends a total of $20,176,238; this in addition to the stock issued as dividends now having a market value around $35,000,000. In other words, an original stock holding of $100 has paid about $11,000 in cash dividends and in addition stock bonuses with a market value to-day of approximately $24,000 or a total of approximately $35,000 on the original $100.

The assets of the company as shown by the last balance sheet, total $41,419,335, of which $22,093,614 is represented by fixed assets—plant, equipment, etc.—stock in affiliated companies $5,866,998, and cash in government bonds $6,525,615. Profits for the year ending July 31, amounted to $6,132,327. Net earnings on the paid-up capital were approximately 87.5 per cent. The year's output was 70,816 cars and 4,543 tractors.

With the permission of the House I will place the rest of the statement on Hansard, unless any hon. member would like me to read it.

The continuation of the statement is as follows:

Let me draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that in 1924 the company had a net profit, after paying taxes and all other expenses, of $3,715,691, and that in 1925 the net profit was $6,131,352. It is significant how enormously the profit for 1925 has increased over that for 1924.

In view of the strong position of this company, I should like to ask the House whether it can any longer be considered an infant. Is it the spirit of the National Policy that when an industry has grown, out of earnings, to the position now occupied by this company that it is still to be protected to the extent of 35 per cent, when those engaged in the industry are taking advantage of the tariff practically to the last one per cent? Are our people to understand that that is what was contemplated by the framers of the National Policy? I have always understood that the prime reason underlying the adoption of the National Policy was to establish industries in this country on such a footing that they would be able to pay a living wage to those engaged in them. Measured by this standard, is the present tariff on automobiles higher than is necessary? For 1924 the total salaries and wages paid by the automobile industry was $14,219,137, and the value of their production, $88,000,000. Wages and salaries were therefore 16.1 per cent of the value of the production. The protection enjoyed is 35 per cent, and the increase in price over the United States price is also 35 per cent. In other words, the increased price which our automobile manufacturers exact from the Canadian people because of the tariff is twice the total salaries and wages paid by the industry.

Mr. CAHAN: Does that include the wages paid by companies making parts which are sold to the Ford and other automobile companies?

Mr. COOTE: These figures are from the Bureau of Statistics, and I take it they represent the wages paid in the automobile factories, although the report does not state this definitely. But whether that is the case or not, the wholesale value of the cars manufactured in 1924 was $88,000,000, of which cars to the value of $31,000,000 were exported, leaving $57,000,000 worth to be consumed in Canada. To these figures we would have to add one-third to get the retail price. This is shown clearly in the Ford Company's booklet at page 15, where the retail price of a touring car is quoted at $440. The sales and excise tax, which is 10 per cent, is put at $33. Clearly, then, the wholesale price is $330. So we must add one-third to these wholesale figures of production in order to get the retail worth. Adding this one-third we get $76,000,000 as the retail value of cars in Canada, without allowing for the sales and excise tax. This value is approximately 35 per cent greater because of the tariff. That means that approximately $20,000,000 is the excess price paid the manufacturers of these cars, or at least paid by the people of Canada for these cars in the year 1924. Of the cars made in Canada, 35 per cent were exported and 65 per cent consumed at home. Sixty-five per cent of the $14,219,137 of salaries and wages would be $9,242,429, for salaries and wages on Canadian made cars. That is less than half of the excess price charged to us by the makers of these cars.

As I have just said, $20,000,000 is approximately the price which we pay to manufacturers because of this tariff. It actually figures out at $19,696,432. On 76,923 Canadian made cars sold in Canada, that means an average increase in price of $255 per car. The total wages paid by the industry in Canada without salaries, was $10,938,202. Sixty-five per cent of these cars consumed in Canada would make the wages paid on Canadian cars consumed in Canada $7,109,831, or an average wage of $92.42 per car. The manufacturer charges us because of the tariff an extra $255 per car; he pays in wages $92.42, yet we are told that protection is for the purpose of enabling our manufacturers to pay a living wage to those engaged in the industry. I say again, Mr. Speaker, that surely this tariff on automobiles is a violation of the spirit of the National Policy.

I have no doubt that someone will say, "See the large amount of customs duties which these manufacturers pay to the government." On page 22 of this yellow booklet it shows that in the year 1924 they paid as customs duty on engines and parts $5,745,813; in 1923 they paid $5,857,689, a total for those two years of $11,603,502.

But I find that in the year 1924 we paid to those manufacturers as drawbacks $5,223,341 and in 1923 $3,216,396, a total of $8,439,737. The net customs revenue for those two years, when you deduct the drawbacks, was $3,163,765, or an average for each of the two years of $1,581,882. The wages and salaries paid on cars consumed in Canada in 1924 amounted to $9,242,429; the wages alone paid on cars sold in Canada amounted to $7,109,831; the net customs paid to the government was $1,581,882. You will find that in wages and customs duties they have paid a little over half of the excess price which they charged us for the cars. If there had never been any motor cars made in Canada and we had paid customs duty of 35 per cent of the value of those cars, instead of that money going to the manufacturers, we would have a revenue of $20,000,000 a year, and just think what we could do with that $20,000,000. Given to the railways as a bonus for hauling coal, it would solve the coal problem; it would, I am told, amortize our national debt in sixty years, and I think it would more than pay—

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Would it build the Hudson Bay railway?

Mr. COOTE: It would pay, I am sure, our share of the old age pensions. I would like to point out here that the revenue which we are receiving on cars imported into Canada is not increasing, but seems rather to be decreasing. People are buying more Canadian made cars and the duty is going to the manufacturer. The revenue to the government on automobiles imported in 1923 was $4,133,321. In 1924 it dropped to $3,316,369 and in 1925 to $3,038,851. I think that point is worth bearing in mind. If we maintain this policy there will soon be no revenue from the customs tariff on automobiles, unless the people accept the advice given by the Local Council of Women of Toronto, and buy American cars just to be patriotic.

What effect would reduction of duty have on the automobile industry and on employment generally? First I think it is beyond question that a reduction in the tariff would reduce the price. Secondly, a reduction in price will increase consumption, and increased consumption means more employment. According to a statement on page three of a booklet recently issued by the Ford Motor Company, there were 6,706 people on the pay list of that company, while 12,054 persons secure employment as dealers and employees in Ford service garages. This would show that 35 per cent of these people are on the salary list of the company, while 65 per cent are employed throughout the country as dealers and garage men. It is surely beyond question that a reduction in the price of automobiles would increase the number of dealers and garage men. If there were any decrease in the number of employees in manufacturing establishments, it would be more than offset by the increase in the number of dealers and garage men, but I am sure there would be no decrease in the manufacturing plants. This industry does not need a 35 per cent protection in order to carry on. If the tariff were reduced they would have to reduce prices; more cars would be sold, and they would have an increase of employment rather than a decrease. I do not think that statement can be successfully challenged. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, there would be an increase in the total number of employees in the automobile industry generally, and in the dealers and garage men as well. Lower prices, mean a greater consumption, a greater consumption of cars, tires, gasoline, repairs and accessories; it means more men employed as dealers and garage men and in the running of service stations; it means an increase in the number of tire vulcanizers; it will mean an increase in road work, because we will have to have more good roads. It will mean more business for the railways in hauling cars, trucks, tires, repairs, gasoline and so on. I think it will also mean more work for the railways in hauling gravel and other material for road building purposes. It would increase employment and stimulate industry generally, not only in the automobile industry but in many other industries as well.

Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that someone will say, "Well, we believe that the tariff might be reduced, but we are going to have a tariff board and we had better leave it tc them to settle this question."

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. COOTE: I am glad to hear that "no" I understand that is the attitude of the automobile manufacturers themselves. The automobile manufacturers realize perfectly well that the Canadian people are demanding this reduction, and they think that if they can only get the matter before a tariff board there is no question in the world but that they can stave the matter off for at least one year more. And one year is worth a considerable amount to them. As I pointed out a little while ago the Ford Company profits in 1925 were $6,132,000 compared with $3,719,000 the year before. No doubt they want to enjoy one more year of these very handsome profits. They have already a reserve in cash and government bonds to the amount of $6,520,000. Is there not evidence enough before this House to convince us as representatives of the people that the tariff protection which this industry enjoys could and should be reduced now, and that the question should not be shelved by referring it to some tariff board? I say let the tariff on automobiles be reduced now. If the automobile manufacturers are not satisfied let them go to the board and convince it they have not been justly dealt with; but I do not apprehend there is any danger of the government putting the tariff so low that they will need any further protection. I do not think we need a tariff board to determine the fact that a Ford car on this side of the river is just the same as a Ford car in Detroit. I do not think we need a tariff board to convince us that a bolt or a nut in a Dodge car on this side of the river is the same as a bolt or a nut in a Dodge car in the country to the south. Furthermore, we do not need any tariff board to convince us that the Dodge car costs $300 more on this side of the river than it does on the other side. So I ask, what do we need an advisory tariff board for in connection with the automobile industry? In the Ottawa Citizen of Saturday there was an editorial headed "Uncertain tariff protection," which contained this paragraph emanating from a Conservative newspaper:

> In the border cities alone men have been out of employment for months, and production has been curtailed for months, simply because the government seeking to curry favour in certain sections of the country, let it be given out that it would reduce the tariff on cars.

I wish the government had given that statement out; I would not need to make this speech this afternoon.

Now, to show you how unreliable some of the statements which are published in the press may be, I have here some figures showing the production in the automobile industry in the last four months compared with a similar period a year ago. They are as follows:

November, 1924..	5,962 cars
January, 1925..	8,301 cars
February, 1925..	10,779 cars
November, 1925..	8,741 cars
December, 1925..	7,498 cars
February, 1926..	15,895 cars

Surely those figures will dispose of the idea advanced in the paragraph quoted. I do not want to leave a wrong impression on the House. The paragraph I quoted was mentioned by the Citizen as coming from some other paper; I do not wish it to be understood that the Citizen itself was expressing that opinion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am very nearly through. But before I close I want to appeal to the members of all parties, in all sections of this House to support this resolution. I do not think I need appeal to any free trader that may be here. I should not have to appeal to any low tariff men, and I feel that I can safely appeal to protectionists in this House to support this resolution. I have heard it contended here by protectionists that protection does not necessarily increase prices. Well, there can be no doubt it does in this case because a Dodge car which sells in Detroit for $795 costs $1,095 at Windsor, so that protection increases the price of this car by exactly $300 The National Policy was established fifty years ago to build up industries in Canada. It has built up this industry; but surely the protectionists here would not want the Canadian people to think that it is the spirit of the National Policy that industries of this character should be permitted to take advantage of the tariff to the fullest extent as they are doing in this case. I claim there is no doubt in the world but that an unfair advantage has been taken of the tariff in the case of automobiles. We have often heard hon. gentlemen to my right say that when unfair advantage is taken of the tariff that tariff should be removed. Has not unfair advantage been taken of the tariff in this case? Then why should not the duty be lowered? If I were to take the resolution moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition in 1911 and substitute the word

"automobiles" for the words "agricultural implements" in one place, and then in another place add the word "consumers" this is how the resolution in question would read:

That in the opinion of this House a substantial reduction in the import duties on automobiles is now due the agriculturists and consumers of Canada, and is in just accord with the true ends of a protective tariff.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that these words are absolutely true, and I cannot see why any protectionist cannot consistently support this resolution to-day. I know that many of my Conservative friends, and some of my Liberal friends who, I think, are protectionists, believe that this should be done. They think it is about time the Canadian people—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman explain why he did not word his resolution in that form?

Mr. COOTE: All I can say is that when I placed my resolution on the order paper I had not looked up the resolution moved by the right hon. gentleman. I must admit that I had read his speech before, but I did not remember the exact form of the resolution which he moved at that time. I may say that I would have no objection to having the resolution changed in the manner indicated. I am not a protectionist, but I realize that it is not possible to get rid of protection in Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why not?

Mr. COOTE: If we must have protection it should be as low as we can get it. In the case of automobiles I think it is altogether too high.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman answer the question why we cannot get rid of it if we want to?

Mr. COOTE: Because both the leading parties in this House contain a number of protectionists.

Mr. EDWARDS (Frontenac): Would the hon. gentleman remove it if he could?

Mr. COOTE: It is impossible to do it, so I do not think it necessary to discuss that question. I should like to make it clear that I am not advocating that or asking for it; I do not think the people of Canada want all of the duty removed. I may say I am tired of the continual strife going on in Canada in regard to this question—some people wanting to put the tariff up as high as Haman's gallows and others wanting it removed altogether. We cannot get either of those policies, I believe, but I think we should do our best to get together, and I think the question of automobiles affords an opportunity for doing it.

I have appealed to my protectionist friends to support this resolution. I am now going to appeal to the government to support it, and this is the question I should like to put to the government particularly to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb): How can a government which reduced the tariff on butter, eggs, lard, cheese, mutton, beef, dried fruit and so forth, coming from Australia, partly at least to secure from Australia preferential treatment for our automobile manufacturers, now refuse to lower the tariff on automobiles, a tariff which amounts in the aggregate to twice the wages and salaries paid by this industry—

Mr. SUTHERLAND (North Oxford): Are you in favour of putting back the duty on agricultural implements—

Mr. COOTE: —and under which the manufacturers are soaking us 35 per cent for the benefit of foreign capitalists. It is the farmer's turn now. I think the time has come when some consideration should be shown him. I hope nobody will think this will be of more advantage to farmers than to any other class, because we all pay the same rate of duty. There were no lobbyists here in the interests of the farmer when the Australian treaty was put through. It is an open secret the lobbyists for the automobile manufacturers have been busy around the House for the past few weeks. Possibly a vote on the resolution to-day will show what effect they have had on hon. members. But I ask the House, what its duty is in regard to this question. To protect the automobile manufacturers eighty per cent of whose stock is owned in the United States? Is it our duty to protect the industry which makes these inordinate profits, or is it our duty to protect Canadian consumers from further unreasonable exploitation at the hands of these men by insisting that the tariff be reduced, so as to make it possible for our own people to take advantage at a reasonable price of this great invention—the autombile?

Mr. AIME BOUCHARD (Kamouraska) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it affords me much pleasure to rise in support of the motion of my hon. friend from Macleod (Mr. Coote). Last year on March 16, 1925, the same hon. gentleman delivered on the same question, a very noteworthy speech, which I regret to say did not at the time draw our attention to the extent it has done to-day. Moreover, we were then hoping that the motion would be given consideration when the budget was brought down, and I was somewhat guided by the words of my excellent friend from the county of Charlevoix (Mr. Casgrain), who on that occasion said:

The resolution moved by the hon. member from Macleod (Mr. Coote) is perhaps one of those that all classes of the community would like to see adopted for the very reason submitted this evening to the House by the mover of the resolution himself. Indeed, business and trades people, the most humble classes among our farmers, the rural districts as well as towns and cities, in fact everybody would like to be in a position to purchase automobiles for the convenience of business as well as for pleasure, but on better terms than those existing to-day. On the other hand the hon. Acting Minister of Finance explains to us the government's policy on this subject; he points out that they are busy preparing the budget and that within a few days the budget for the next fiscal year will be laid on the table. Under these circumstances I do not see what harm there could be in postponing this resolution until the budget is brought down.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I agreed entirely, last year, with my neighbour the hon. member for Charlevoix and I voted against such a resolution in the hope that some amendment would be forthcoming when the budget was discussed. This year, again considering the question—and you will admit with me, Sir, that a man whose opinion never changes is a man who has one fixed idea and but one idea through life—again weighing the question, and having not only the greatest sympathy but also the highest esteem for the member who has just moved this resolution, it is with much pleasure that I give it my hearty support. His perseverence in bringing this question before the House, only tends to prove that one should never relent in advocating a worthy cause; it is somewhat like the drop of water which in the end wears out the rock.

A tariff of 35 per cent on automobiles is certainly an excessive one. I do not intend entering, to-day, into a discussion on tariff in its relation to the farming class. I trust that when the budget is brought down I shall have the opportunity of expounding, before the House, certain principles on the subject. However, there is one thing that one must not forget to take into account when we speak on behalf of the farming class: it is that the farmer, to-day, who buys most of the articles of which he is in need on a protected market, must sell the surplus of his products on an open world market, where in fact, protection can in no way benefit him.

It was the belief, at one time, that automobiles were rather objects of luxury, and I even, one day, came across a friend who said to me: "When I bear a grudge against some one, when I do not know what harm to wish him, when I want to express my anger or my fury in a forcible manner, I wish him to own an automobile." But times have changed and if, to-day, there are, perhaps, too many automobiles which entice our farmers from the farm to drop them into towns, it is nevertheless true that automobiles have become a necessity, not only to professional and business men or commercial travellers, but also to farmers. Even, if it is a luxury, the farmers who can afford such a luxury can purchase them as well as others. This question is becoming more important from day to day, as the number of automobiles is constantly on the increase. Why? Because roads are everywhere improving. We are fortunate enough to have, at present, in the province of Quebec, roads which give to everybody the advantage of using automobiles, and the farmers are glad to avail themselves of such roads.

There does not only exist the ordinary vehicle for the farmers, there is also the motor truck which, thanks to the good roads, can facilitate the delivery of his milk, cream, vegetables and fruit to the town. We know that, to-day, in the vicinity of Montreal, Quebec or of any large town of Canada, there exist within a radius of 15 to 20 miles, people who devote themselves to market gardening and also sell their milk or cream in its natural state. If horses were used for the trip in the morning, these people would have to rise at 2 a.m. so as to load and leave by 3 a.m. in order to reach the city when the market opens. To-day however, with the use of automobiles, the farmers may rise with the sun—and that is not so bad—and bring their products to the market in time, and in perfect condition. Well, since these motor trucks have become a necessity, an indispensable farm implement, why make the farmer pay so dear for them?

Moreover, the automobile manufacturers have been taken care of very much like spoilt children. These industries must sooner or later drop their swaddling clothes. I think that they have been enough pampered and that it is time that an even balance be restored. This industry has grown to the extent that to-day we have in Canada one automobile for each fourteen people. However, in lowering somewhat the duty—I cannot name the amount, I shall leave this matter to our wise Minister of Finance, who will, I know, give it his most sympathetic consideration—care must be taken not to interfere with the output of automobiles. I would therefore, be in favour of a measure which would give to all classes of society, farmers especially, the advantage of purchasing these vehicles at a lower price.

I do not intend to follow the example of those who during a month carried on obsrtuction in this House, and I shall not go over, for the tenth time, statistics that have already been brought to your attention. I shall be satisfied to state that it will afford me great pleasure to support the motion of my hon. friend, trusting that the producers of automobiles will not suffer from such a reduction and I hope at the same time that the farmers and all other classes of society shall feel happy in seeing a more just equilibrium restored between the sources of productions.

Mr. RAYMOND MORAND (East Essex): Coming from the riding of East Essex, where a very great number of the automobiles used in this country are manufactured, I cannot of course be expected to be very enthusiastic in support of this resolution favouring a reduction in the duty on automobiles. I have listened during this session to a discussion of Maritime rights and to the western lament, and after listening to them both for a long time I began to wonder whether we in the centre of Canada had any rights at all. I must say that I viewed with considerable sympathy the troubles of both, and I was quite prepared to support any move that would help them, or at least stop some of their lamentations. But when, not satisfied with telling us about their own troubles, they come out determinedly with a definite resolution that would put us in the central part of Canada into trouble, I think it is time for us in the central part of Canada to say that we have some small rights at least, and that they should be protected.

I rather enjoyed hearing the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Forke) say a little while ago that he was quite willing to have a cow so long as somebody else milked her. So far as I can see, the two ends of Canada want, one the cow, and the other the milk, and they expect us in the centre to milk the cow for them.

Mr. BROWN: It is the milking we object to.

Mr. MORAND: I am glad you are good-natured about it.

Now first I am going to admit a few facts, and it is not very often I do that. The automobile to-day is a necessity; I am glad to have heard that said, because I believe it is true. The automobile industry has made a start in Canada, and it should be maintained in Canada because it is a permanent industry; it is not a thing which will be here to-day and be gone a short time after. Being a permanent industry, then, surely we must take care of it, surely we must protect it. We must see that it is based on a proper foundation, not ruined and given over to the United States; for I believe that would be the result of this resolution if adopted and put into effect in its present form.

Mr. EVANS: Oh, no.

Mr. MORAND: Well, I will come to that in a little while. I was rather surprised at some of the statements the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) made when speaking to his resolution. I was very much surprised to know, for instance, that every third person in Alberta owns an automobile.

Mr. COOTE: Every third farmer, I said.

Mr. MORAND: Very well then. That is certainly a very much higher percentage than in my constituency, for not every third family in my constituency owns an automobile.

Mr. COOTE: I wonder if the hon. member would tell us how far his people live from a railway or from a town.

Mr. MORAND: I assure the hon. member that that is not the reason they do not own an automobile; the reason is they cannot afford it.

The hon. member also said that there have been quite a number of lobbyists around here in the last two or three weeks. He probably is acquainted with some of them, because I am quite sure I saw amongst them the late member for South Ontario. I do not know if that is what he was doing, but he was here a great deal. I know my own opponent, who is a Liberal, was also here, and he is very much interested in seeing that the automobile industry should not be adversely affected.

I did hope and think, Mr. Speaker, that when this resolution was brought up some member of the government would rise and say: Here is a resolution that concerns a very important industry in this country, an industry with many ramifications, therefore we will refer the matter to our tariff board. I suppose, however, they did not do that because they had very little confidence in the board. I notice that when it was suggested this afternoon that this question should be referred to the new tariff board, there was quiet among the government followers, and when it was suggested that it should not be referred to the board there was considerable acclaim. Judging by the protracted labour over the birth of this new board, I am not sure that it is going to be very healthy now that it has arrived. I can readily sense its inheritance; I am sure it will inherit a lot of low tariff ideas. I also quite realize that it will not have very much direction, nor will its environment be good, and most things, of course, base their development on inheritance and environment. Furthermore, before the board was even born the government shackled it in the Speech from the Throne, where they definitely state: "We do not believe the time has arrived for raising the tariff." So that I can quite readily understand that our good friends across the way would not have much faith in such an offspring of the government as apparently we shall see in a short while.

I am going to show as far as I possibly can some of the ramifications of this business which the hon. member who has moved this resolution (Mr. Coote) feels can be so readily adjusted. I should have thought that the fertile brains of hon. members from the west especially could have conceived, for what they consider an abuse, some other cure than the lowering of the tariff. I expected to get something much different from that. All I am interested in is that the market for automobiles shall remain in Canada for the benefit of the workingmen of this country, and in making this statement I declare emphatically right here that I have no interest in automobile factories, nor am I interested in any great amount of profit. I do believe however that every firm which invests money, brains, and efficiency in an industry has a right to a fair profit. A good deal has been said about the large profits made by the Ford Company in Canada. This is absolutely true, but the same thing applies to the Ford works in the United States. At least, they invested $125,000 on this side to start the Ford plant, whereas the Ford plant in the United States was started with nothing but debts. It grew, however, and I have heard no one over there so far find fault with Ford for having developed a wonderful industry. Let us remember, too, that that industry was built up under protection. The profits made by the Ford plant in Canada are no greater than the profits made by the plant in the United States, and this fact can be substantiated.

I will now give a few reasons why I am interested in seeing this industry maintained in Canada. In my own town and in the border cities we have working for automobile manufacturers, and the manufacturers of automobile parts, 8,978 men. Remember, this is in the border cities alone. If therefore you wipe out the duty on automobiles, or even materially reduce it, you will affect not only the automobile manufacturers but a vast army of workers as well. In Windsor alone we have working in the manufacturing of automobile parts 1,786 men, and the pay-roll in the border cities amounts to $10,928,000, while the total plant investment is over $23,000,000.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Are those factories engaged exclusively in the manufacture of automobile parts?

Mr. MORAND: Yes.

An hon. MEMBER: Are they a part of the Ford Company?

Mr. MORAND: No; these are manufacturers who make parts required in the assembling of various automobiles.

Mr. MACDONALD (Glengarry): Where do the employees come from?

Mr. MORAND: Most of them come from constituencies of many of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MACDONALD (Glengarry): From the farms?

Mr. MORAND: Yes, too often from the farms. The sons of farmers who want to go to the United States come to Windsor, and then slip over. If it were not for the automobile industry in the border cities, the number going over into the United States would be still greater.

Mr. FORKE: It is a net to catch the farmers that are flying away.

Mr. MORAND: I still believe that the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) would rather have them stay in the city of Windsor under the British flag than go to the United States. Let me now read from a list showing some of the places that derive a benefit from the automobile industry in Canada. The parts manufacturers in the border cities buy supplies not in small quantities, but in a large scale from such firms as Steel Company of Canada, Hamilton; Anaconda American Brass Company, New Toronto; Algoma Steel Corporation, Sault Ste. Marie; Standard Paint and Varnish Company, Windsor; J. T. Wing Company, Windsor; Canadian Handon and Van Winkle Company, Toronto; John Morrow Screw Company, Ingersoll; Northern Bolt, Screw and Wire Company, Owen Sound; and from other concerns in Windsor, Walkerville, Montreal, Hamilton, St. Catharines, Galt, Wallaceburg, and elsewhere.

An hon. MEMBER: If the duty were reduced, more cars would be sold.

Mr. MORAND: I heard an hon. member some time ago say that if the prices of cars were reduced there would be an increase in the number of automobiles sold. Of course I agree with that statement, but I do not admit with any hon. member that a man who knows nothing about the automobile business can instruct the manufacturers in the proper conduct of that business. If the manufacturers knew of any way of increasing their business, we may rest assured that they would adopt it.

At a meeting of manufacturers of automobile parts, at which there were fifteen companies represented, there was a unanimous expression of opinion against any reduction in the duty on automobiles. For example, the Motor Products Corporation took this view:

> Reduction in duty on automobiles would affect our business very seriously. Practically our entire output is sold to the various automobile companies of Canada and we could not continue to manufacture with a lower tariff protection on the industry.

The Canadian Lamp and Stamping Company, Limited, said:

> We believe that a cut of even five per cent in the present duty on automobiles and parts would make it impossible for us to continue in business. Our profit in 1925 was three and a half per cent on our sales.

The Canadian Top and Body Company had this to say:

> Reduction in duty on automobiles would have a very serious effect on our business.

One after another they all told the same story. Supplies for the manufacture of parts that enter into the construction of automobiles are obtained in every part of Canada, and the sources of these supplies show the ramifications of the industry. As a matter of fact these supplies are obtained from New Brunswick to Winnipeg, from hundreds of firms. With the permission of the House I would place this list on Hansard:

Now I think the hon. gentleman said that a cut in the automobile duty would give us more railway revenue. I may state that since 1907 over 129,000 automobiles have been imported, and it is only natural to expect that a lowering of the duty will stimulate this importation, and instead of increasing our railway revenue it will reduce it, because the imported cars will be brought into Canada at the nearest point of sale and we shall lose the very considerable railway revenue that now accrues from the raw materials imported for the manufacture of automobiles. Hon. members will be surprised to be told that under the present rate of duty one of our border cities' plants representing a capitalization of millions of dollars has had to close down, only a watchman being now in charge. This plant manufactured automobile engines and axles, and these parts of course are now being shipped in from the United States.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Why is that?

Mr. MORAND: Because the duty is too low.

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Twenty-five per cent?

After Recess

Mr. MORAND: Mr. Speaker, just before six o'clock I was endeavouring to show the diversity of the industry now under discussion. One can readily see the various other industries that are involved, and I should like to give a few instances of the irregularity of the tariff on a large number of the raw materials and parts that enter into the manufacture of an automobile. I shall give a few figures to show that the duty on automobiles and on automobile parts has not been arrived at in any scientific manner, but that there has been just a gradual making up of the tariff to suit the various industries involved at various times.

Here is a statement of the duties on automobile parts, accessories and semi-finished materials entering into the construction of automobiles:

	Rate of Duty Per cent
Malleable iron castings	27½
Auto jacks	30
Spark plugs and parts	27½
Automobile lamps and hub caps	30
Twist drills, reamers and special tools	27½
Forgings	30

	Rate of Duty Per cent
Bendix drive..	27½
Springs for cushion and back upholstering.	30
Cylinder hubs, drums and flanges..	35
Windshields, metal mouldings, metal stampings, and so forth..	30
Lighting and ignition cable..	30
Cylinders, cylinder heads, and so forth..	27½
Dies, tools, and so forth..	27½
Cylinder blocks, heads and exhaust fittings.	27½

Following is a statement of the duties on raw and semi-finished materials required in the manufacture of parts, accessories and so forth:

	Rate of Duty Per cent
Fire brick..	15
Steel..	30
Porcelains..	27½
Asbestos..	25
Wires..	20
Sheet steel..	12½

Tool steel..	12½ / 30
Die blocks..	30
Manufactures of rubber..	27½
Machine screw products..	35
Gimp..	35
Insulated wire..	30
Cotton thread..	25
Spring wire..	20
Hoop steel..	12½
	Per ton
Pig iron..	$2.50

That, Mr. Speaker, will show you the diversity of the duty on the parts and materials that enter into the manufacture of automobiles. In addition to the duties imposed upon the various parts and materials entering into the manufacture of an automobile, the industry in this country has to bear the burden of a great number of taxes which the automobile industry in the United States does not have to bear. For instance, the sales tax. There is a sales tax in the United States, it is true; it was 5 per cent, but it has been cut down to 3 per cent. But in this country there is the sales tax, the excise tax, the stamp tax, and in addition, a sales tax upon the parts which go into the manufacture of an automobile, on the various raw materials, and so forth, all of which adds to the cost of the auto.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is my hon. friend correct in saying that these are taxes on the industry? Are they not taxes on the consumer direct?

Mr. MORAND: One equals the other, because the taxes make the price of the automobile higher than in the United States. When you compare the price of automobiles in the United States and Canada, you must certainly admit that taxes form a part of the price, and more than that, there are taxes upon the parts that go into a car, all of which adds to the price before the final tax is added to the finished product.

In comparing the Ford prices in the United States with Ford prices in Canada, we must remember that there has been a gradual evolution of the Ford plant in the United States over a considerable period of time, in a country with a very large population compared with ours, and the Ford Company, by virtue of the money which they made out of their plant, not what they invested in it, were able to secure forests, mines, railroads, and boat transportation, so that the Ford car evolves direct from the basic products into the finished article, and there is only one profit upon it. That certainly is not possible in any country until sufficient money has been made and the plant is sufficiently large to be able to own and control these various basic products. So in the United States there is only one profit on the Ford car from the time it leaves the forest until it is delivered to the purchaser, and that has been possible only by reason of the fact that they were able to do a large business and make considerable money, and thereby accumulate sufficient capital to acquire these basic resources. We have reason to believe that with the proper development of our own industry we shall get gradually into the same position, and that under a tariff here, as under a tariff there, we shall eventually turn out our Ford cars as cheaply as they do in the United States.

There is another factor which enters into it. In the United States competition has been so keen that some companies have been eliminated. It may be news to many hon. members to know that last year, in 1925, three hundred million dollars worth of new autos were sold in the United States on the instalment plan, which shows that the market there is saturated, and that they are cutting their prices. They are eliminating car after car company in the United States, and the remaining firms we have to compete with. Personally I believe in protection and so do my constituents, a protection that will be sufficient to maintain the Canadian market for our own goods. That applies not only to the manufacturer of automobiles; it applies to all other manufacturers, and to farm products as well. All I ask is, that before anything is done with the tariff on automobiles a proper and thorough survey of the entire situation be made by some competent body and that we be left with the Canadian market for our Canadian cars. We ask that those factories which are running at the present time be allowed to continue to function, and that some of the factories now closed be permitted to re-open. I believe that a proper survey such as I have indicated having been made, and some readjustment of the tariff and taxes carried out, cars can probably be produced more cheaply. Furthermore, with a reduction in taxation, a reduction in excise tax, of the sales tax, and of the stamp tax I believe we will get a materially reduced price on automobiles, and then, our factories can continue to operate. I think that the working men in those factories, the people who have invested in homes for themselves, the farmers who depend upon the industry for their market, have a right to expect from this government that it will make no move in regard to a change in the tariff, that nothing in this direction will be done until the whole question has been thoroughly investigated and the results of that investigation submitted to the House.

Mr. ROBERT McKENZIE (Assiniboia): I wish to say at the outset that I am in hearty accord with the resolution introduced this afternoon by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). The question of the duty on automobiles is one of more than ordinary importance in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. The hon. gentleman who preceded me declared that his constituency wants protection. I cannot say that the people of my constituency are very strong for protection. I believe there is no one question of more general consequence to my constituents than the duty on automobiles and motor trucks. This is partly due to the geographical location of that constituency. It extends for some ninety miles along the border of North Dakota, and this being the case our people—and particularly those who reside near the border itself—have an opportunity of studying at first hand the manner in which the duty on automobiles works out in actual practice. Under the circumstances, therefore, our people are familiar with the conditions that were described by the mover of the resolution this afternoon, and they have found that in some cases the man on the Canadian side is paying two hundred, three hundred and even four hundred dollars more for his automobile than his neighbour who in some instances lives only just across the road. My constituents have inquired thoroughly into the conditions which have brought that result about. They have found them to be the conditions that were described this afternoon and which I shall not weary the House by repeating. This tariff is not being used to protect an infant industry; it is being used to create millionaires not in our own country but in a foreign land; and the more we inquire into the conditions which prevail the more we are convinced there is something very unfair in connection with the operation of the tariff on automobiles and motor trucks.

The question has been asked: Why is it that we hear so much about the duty on automobiles to-day; why is it that so much has been said about it in the last few years? So recently as fifteen years ago very few people were concerned very much as to whether there was a high duty or a low duty on automobiles. The reason for that was that the automobile was so much of a luxury then that only a few people of wealth were able to buy it. But in the last ten years the automobile has come into much greater use, and it is no longer looked upon as a luxury. To-day it is being used more and more by all classes of people, and has come to be looked upon as an economic necessity. Not only is that the case on our farms, but it is also true as regards professional men, and men in all lines of business—in a word, the automobile is now considered a time saving device. The same can be said of the motor truck. And now that people use automobiles to such an extent and now that they are familiar with the use made of the tariff in connection with the manufacture of these vehicles, there is an insistent demand on their part for the reduction of the duty.

No doubt it will be argued that a material reduction in the duty is fraught with danger. No doubt some will maintain that as a consequence of that reduction the automobile industry will be unable to continue to function successfully, and that a large number of workingmen will be thrown out of employment. Personally, I have no desire to be otherwise than fair to the employees engaged in this industry. My desire is to be particularly fair to the local dealers in automobiles. I am not particularly concerned about the men who have made millions out of the automobile industry as we know they have in the past, but with respect to the argument advanced on behalf of the employees I do feel some concern. That being the case, I have made a careful study of the situation with respect to these employees and from that study I have come to the conclusion that a lowering of the tariff will reduce prices. I think there is no doubt whatever about the fact that a reduction in the tariff will bring about a reduction in the price of the automobile. But would that be an evil? I think not, because in my opinion a reduction in the price of automobiles and motor trucks would result in a greatly increased demand for these vehicles and as a result of that increased demand the manufacturers would increase their plant and equipment. That would mean more work for the employees; and in my opinion their position would be greatly improved from what it is at present. The same remarks would apply to the local dealers. Their commission probably would not be as large in the case of each car they might sell, but the volume of increased sales would more than make up for any loss in that regard. With respect to the manufacturers, we have not found in the past that a reasonable reduction in the tariff has resulted in the closing of the factories or a lessened production, although we have heard arguments along that line.

I should like to say a word now with respect to the Ford Motor Company, with whose position hon. gentlemen are more or less familiar. As I view matters, the Ford Motor Company is unique in its financial standing amongst the automobile industries of this country. If it were not so I would say that the automobile tariff should be wiped out entirely. If it were possible for other industries to emulate the success of the Ford Motor Company I would say they should have no protection whatever. But as I said, I believe the Ford Company is in a unique position, and for that reason I would not advocate wiping out the tariff entirely. But believing as I do that the time is long passed when we should have a substantial reduction in the automobile tariff, I would call on the government to introduce legislation which will have the effect of substantially reducing this tariff. With the facts which have been enumerated this afternoon by the hon. member who introduced this resolution, we do not require to refer this matter to the tariff advisory board or any other organization, because we have sufficient evidence to prove that there is just need for a substantial reduction in the tariff.

Mr. T. E. KAISER (Ontario): I crave the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I address myself to the question now under consideration. I shall endeavour to express myself as best I can, this being the first occasion on which I have attempted to address the House upon any serious question. In the first place, I desire to say a few words with regard to the automobile business as it affects the community, apart altogether from the man who happens to make a few thousand dollars in the business. Permit me to say that I have no interest whatever in the automobile business which has grown up in the city of Oshawa. Oshawa which has been denominated The Motor City of Canada, is in the constituency which I represent, and is the place where I happen to reside. I have seen the little city spring up around me. I have seen it grow from a village of 3,500 people to a city of 20,000. I saw the inception of the automobile business, and I say now that probably it was a mistake that that industry happened to be started in so small a place. It is a big industry, a tremendous undertaking, and probably it naturally would have started in a larger city if the people concerned in it had had any idea at its inception that it was going to expand to such dimensions. Naturally we as Canadians, were proud of the fact that our city was growing, and it is a matter of gratification to us that those who had been connected with other industries were able to foresee the possibilities to a city from having such a tremendous industry within its bounds. But remember that it cast upon us as a community a tremendous responsibility, and we were obliged to undertake financial obligations quite beyond the expectations of a city of our size. When the industry started in Oshawa in 1906 we had a bonded debt of only $299,335. In 1907, when the McLaughlin people started to build automobiles we had an obligation of only $300,685. In the year 1918 it increased to $617,482. In the year 1919 the McLaughlin automobile works merged with General Motors of the United States of America and established the Canadian branch of the General Motors. This was a tremendous concern. It came to our city, and in order that we might equip ourselves for the big industry we required streets, pavements, water, schools and all the equipment and facilities necessary to accommodate this great concern. The rapid increase in the financial responsibilities of the city of Oshawa will be apparent from the following figures showing the growth of the municipal debt during the period from 1920 to 1925:

1922	1,695,376
1924	3,091,235

Now we have issued bonds to this amount in order to provide necessary municipal services. These bonds should be paid in twenty years' time. Four years of this period have passed and with this tremendous debt staring us in the face we come to this parliament and find that it is calmly and coolly considering a proposal to reduce the tariff on automobiles, and place this industry in jeopardy in Canada and in our city. Is it any wonder that we feel alarmed? If those were the only obligations we had incurred, the position might not be so bad, but there were other undertakings beyond this. There were debts incurred in building schools, amounting to $1,000,000 and the obligations undertaken in providing churches to accommodate the people. We had workmen coming to our city from various parts of Ontario to work in these industries, and these people had to be housed. What did we do? We pledged the credit of the city for $800,000 to build homes in Oshawa for workmen. One-quarter of the moneys required for these homes is perhaps paid but three-quarters remains yet to be met. I just mention these things to show, in the first place, the number of people who are affected, the condition in which our community is placed, and the alarm we feel over this proposition.

It has been stated that the reduction of the duty on automobiles will not disturb the industry. We have that on the authority of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) and also of representatives from some other constituencies. These gentlemen, I suppose, consider themselves authorities in regard to this matter and perhaps they are. I have, however, some doubt about their conclusions. Why? Because this is not the first time our little city has been swept by the same kind of theory and reasoning; we have gone through these crises in that city more than once.

In 1923 we were told that the reduction in the duty on agricultural implements would have the same stimulating effect as we are told now the reduction in the duty of automobiles will have. Down went the tariff on agricultural implements. The government of the day did not realize that behind the agricultural implement industry were subsidiary industries here and there throughout the country. In Oshawa we had an industry manufacturing the iron that goes into these implements. and in order to appease the Massey-Harris people, what did the government do? They reduced the tariff on malleable iron from fifteen to six per cent. Six per cent was the only protection the malleable iron industry had in the city of Oshawa. If that had been the only thing that had been done we would not have suffered as we did; but, for instance, somebody from British Columbia stated that they had clay for making fire brick which the malleable iron people require, and the duty on fire-brick was increased. The result was that as the mallleable iron people could not bring the brick from British Columbia, they had to pay the duty on the same kind of brick coming from the United States because that is the only place from which they could get it. Taking into account the duties that were added in this way, the result was that the protection of six per cent upon malleable iron was absolutely wiped out. What happened? In three months' time all the patterns that were in the malleable iron industry were taken to Batavia and in the Massey-Harris building in the United States of America they undertook the business that we had been carrying on in Oshawa. This industry was thus transplanted to a foreign land. The price of the agricultural implements was not reduced, but nearly one thousand men in Oshawa were thrown out of employment.

If that had been all, we would not have minded it so much, but as soon as the patterns were gone we picked up the Buffalo papers and found in them advertisements for Canadian moulders of malleable iron to come to Batavia to manufacture the iron that formerly had been manufactured in Oshawa. We saw these thousand people thrown on the street by virtue of the action of the government of the day and what kind of responsibility did this put upon us? Nobody knows better than I, associated as I had been for thirty years with the social affairs of the city. We had to organize welfare societies—and Dr. Kaiser was always put at the head of this kind of work—to collect money and to care for the people who were in distress.

This reduction, instead of affecting one thousand people, will affect twenty thousand people in Oshawa. Why? Because nearly every industry in that city plays some part in the building of automobiles. We have the textile people making the material for the linings. We have the Pedlar people making the iron for the hoods and we have the woollen industry. We have the malleable iron industry making the little malleable iron that is required to go into these automobiles. This business is being carried on at very much reduced prices; in fact the malleable iron business throughout Ontario is just breathing to-day by virtue of this reduction in the tariff. They tell us that the aforesaid reduction will not affect our industries, that there will be such a demand for automobiles that there will be an increased demand for the output of our industries. A reduction in the tariff has never increased the demand. Every time the government has disturbed the tariff in the industrial city which I represent, the result has been almost to put the industry affected out of business. We have seen this happen before. The same people who are advocating this reduction stated that there would be an increased demand if the tariff was removed from binder twine. But what happened? The binder twine people went out of business and binder twine became more expensive than before. They told us the same thing would happen in the case of wire fencing and wire fencing became more expensive than before. What has happened as regards the woollen industry? The effect on Canada has been almost ruinous. Why? Because our farmers had been developing the sheep industry—

Mr. FORKE: It is a good paying business.

Mr. KAISER: I want to tell my hon. friend something about the sheep industry.

Mr. FORKE: I raise them.

Mr. KAISER: Every farmer in Ontario who has a good flock of sheep has a clean farm. We cannot afford in this country to continue reducing the number of our domestic animals. The vegetable and animal kingdoms should grow side by side. I cite those just as instances to show how a change in the tariff has disturbed an industry instead of helping to build it up.

Some of the arguments that have been advanced are pure misconceptions. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Howard) stated recently that a certain sedan was sold in the United States for $1,195 and in Canada for $1,925. Those figures, standing by themselves, may be reasonably correct, but it must be remembered that the $1,195 price was the factory price and the $1,925 price as quoted was the dealer's price in Canada, including license plates, a full supply of gas, bumpers, extra tire, extra cover, the freight and what is still more, the sales tax and the luxury tax which were not included in the United States price. A fair statement of the prices would be $1,195 in the United States and $1,720 in Canada. As a matter of fact it should be $1,195 in the United States as against $1,400 in Canada. Of all the automobiles put upon the market this particular one carried with it the widest comparative spread. Why? In Canada this particular car was more strongly built. In the next place it was lined with mohair as against cotton lining in the United States, the mohair lining costing two and one-half times as much as the cotton. The next factor is this, that the automobile people, just the same as any other manufacturers, sometimes put a new article on the market. This was a new article; it was a try-out of the market. The automobile people did not know whether this would be a popular car or not, and therefore manufactured only a thousand. As a matter of fact, it did not take with the public, and the company produced no more. That total output would have kept the factory going one single week. This explains why in the case of this particular car there was a reasonably large spread.

In discussing this subject last year, the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) gave a comparison between the prices paid for different cars in Canada and in the United States. We will not quarrel over the difference that existed last year—and there was considerable difference—but it is interesting to compare the prices that obtained then with those that are paid to-day. On a Chevrolet five-passenger touring car the price last year was $525 in the United States, and in Toronto with the tax paid it was $817. This year the Canadian price is $695. I will give now a short list showing the prices last year and this year:

	U.S. list 1925	Tax paid Toronto	Present Canadian list
Chev. coach..	735	1,118	895
Chev. 5 pass. sedan..	825	1,279	985
Star 5 pass. tour..	540	844	735
Dodge special tour..	985	1,506	1,180
Overland 5 pass sedan..	715	1,199	1,010

What is the reason for the reduction? It is due simply to the fact that in the evolution of the automobile industry they are now just emerging into mass production; this year they were enabled to reduce their prices considerably and I have no doubt that this tendency will increase as the years go by. We may, I think, look forward to a continued appreciable reduction.

The ordinary man in comparing the respective prices of cars in the United States and Canada is apt to be guided in his opinions entirely by the bare figures, without taking into consideration all the various factors that enter into the production of the car, and consequently into the cost. We have in Canada, for example, a sales tax of five per cent; we have an excise duty of ten per cent on all cars over $1,200; and there is also the duty payable on parts that enter into the manufacture of cars. Adding all these charges together, we find that 30 per cent of the value of the car is represented by some form of taxation. Now, if the Canadian public wants a cheaper car our public men must not lose sight of these factors to which I have referred; and if it is decided that the revenues at present derived from the various duties and imposts levied on automobiles shall be raised from some other source, then the problem of producing cheaper cars in Canada is greatly simplified. The automobile men assure me that they can reduce the price by 30 or 40 per cent if the government will comply with certain requirements which they indicate as necessary to a reduction in the cost of production. I have here a table of revenues which the country has derived during the last four or five years from automobiles, and to save time I will simply hand it to Hansard. I need not read the list because I think hon. gentlemen are reasonably familiar with the facts it discloses.

I want to state just a few facts in relation to this great industry that we have in the city of Oshawa. The following table will speak for itself:

The General Motors of Canada, Ltd., is responsible for Employment in Canada

General Motors employees..	3,743
Dealers and staffs..	2,739
Estimate of salesmen on comm..	3,500
Estimate of associate dealers, etc..	2,000
Estimate of employees of manufacturers supplying materials to General Motors of Canada, Ltd., and dealers..	4,000

Using generally accepted statistics, this means that the number of Canadian residents deriving a living from General Motors of Canada, Ltd., 74,910.

The question has been asked why the manufacturer of automobiles in Canada cannot produce and put on the market as cheap a car as can be sold in the United States, even leaving aside taxes and duties. Putting the manufacturers in the two countries on an equal footing, what are the reasons why the competition even then would tell against the Canadian producer. Let me give the House some reasons why cars produced in Canada cost more than those produced in the United States. The main reasons are that quantity production is less, resulting in higher cost; there is a considerable purchase of materials from outside countries on which duty is collected; machinery and equipment are largely purchased abroad, carrying a duty of 27½ per cent; materials purchased from Canadian manufacturers are higher in cost because those manufacturers have been required to pay a duty on their raw materials; the cost of these materials is further increased because of small production; the cost of distribution in Canada is greater because of wide area and small volume, this item alone accounting for at least 10 per cent. Furthermore, the car produced in Canada contains certain refinements for which no credit is given when making price comparisons with similar cars produced in the United States. Then again, the car as listed in Canada includes certain extras not included in the United States list, and the latter list prices are usually on an f.o.b. factory basis, while in Canada they are on a delivered basis. In addition to these items of higher cost, dealers in Canada require a greater margin on their business because of its small volume. The following comparison bears this out:

Canadian dealers' margin to United States dealers' margin

United States dealers 100 per cent

	Per cent
Buick	153
Chevrolet	144
Oakland	146
Oldsmobile	157
Cadillac	150

In this connection I may mention that Canadian dealers last year made less than one per cent as a clear profit on their turnover.

[Mr. Kaiser.]

The automobile industry means the expenditure in Canada of vast sums of money for wages, materials, taxes, transportation charges and so on. The following statement gives at a glance the Canadian expenditures made by General Motors of Canada during 1925:

General Motors

Canadian expenditures during year 1925

Paid employees	5,187,859
Paid federal government, duty less drawback, sales tax, excise tax, etc.	5,498,463
Paid to railroads for freight, express and cartage	2,664,204
Paid for factory improvements, tools, jigs, supplies, etc.	1,201,244
Expended on branch operations, parts depots, etc.	1,864,544
Dividends to 1,243 Canadian stockholders paid from New York on stock in General Motors Corporation	1,085,464

It has been stated that 80 per cent of the stockholders in this industry are people of the United States. I doubt very much the accuracy of this statement, for even in the Oshawa district alone we have hundreds of stockholders in our automobile plants, many of them farmers. Now I come to the domestic and export side of the automobile business. For the calendar year 1925 the sales of General Motors of Canada, Limited, were divided in these proportions: Domestic 55 per cent; export 45 per cent. Do we Canadians ever take cognizance of the fact, I wonder, that this one company has developed its Canadian industry to such an extent that within a few years the volume of its export business is the second largest of that of any motor company in the world?

Mr. FORKE: It weakens your argument.

Mr. KAISER: Everything weakens an argument to my hon. friend here except one thing, that is how to get a cent or two more for a bushel of wheat. Are we to be governed in this country by two or three men whose vision of Canada begins at their barn door and ends with their line fence?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. KAISER: Well, every argument in favour of Canadian industry is questioned. The only argument that appeals to some of my hon. friends is how they may get an extra cent a bushel for their wheat. We want the people in the west to be prosperous, but we do ask them not to be dominated by the idea that wherever a little prosperity in other lines is manifested in Canada it must be demolished. We must not be so intolerant in our view respecting any Canadian who is making a few dollars. Apparently as soon as a person has begun to make a success out of an invention some people seem to think that parliamentary action should be taken to destroy such prosperity. We are not asking for any favours. All we desire is to be left alone.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. KAISER: Let me say that in Oshawa we are undertaking greater obligations to-day in maintaining this industry than the assistance that is being asked to complete the Hudson Bay railway. We in that little city are assuming those obligations because we want to develop a Canadian industry employing Canadian people, an industry within our own borders to take care of our own needs. Surely every agrument we advance along that line is not to be regarded as a fallacy. This large export production necessitated the use of large quantities of Canadian labour and materials. The handling of these shipments by our railways and steamship lines is also an important factor.

Now let me direct the attention of the House to the huge sum of money that the export sales of General Motors of Canada alone has brought to Canada in the last five years. Hon. members may be surprised to learn that these export sales brought to this country $65,000,000 in that short period. That may be a matter of no importance in the opinion of some hon. gentlemen, but I do not think their opinion will be shared by the House generally. The benefit of this business is being shared by thousands of farmers around Oshawa. The other day a farmer told me that he had made $40,000 out of selling milk to the citizens of Oshawa. But of course a farmer must not make any money catering to the needs of our urban centres; he must make it out of growing wheat, or else be driven from the country! All our farmers in the county of Ontario are protectionists—quite naturally, because they realize that they can make a good living by looking after the needs of the local market.

Now then, Oshawa is not the only centre that is concerned in this automobile industry. The province of Quebec received in purchases from General Motors $103,068.77; Toronto, $4,983,258.67; Chatham, $652,022; Oshawa, outside of General Motors, $1,461,000; Hamilton, $421,000; Walkerville, $591,000; Gananoque, $563,000; St. Catharines, $379,000; Galt, $76,000; Ingersoll, $55,000; Peterborough, $195,000; Windsor, $201,000; Waterloo, $83,000; Belleville, $55,000. With miscellaneous purchases of $177,000 we have a total of $9,942,369 distributed among the towns and cities of Ontario and Quebec in connection with the activities of the automobile industry. General Motors of Canada, Limited, have constantly obtained from Canadian sources such raw materials as could be utilized in the manufacture of a motor car, without penalizing the consumer so far as intensive competition would permit.

Mr. Speaker, some heed should be given to this thought. The automobile to-day is only one of the requirements of mankind, and I would like to give a few figures as to the cost of one dollar's worth of goods in 1913 as compared with the cost of the same goods to-day. In 1913 one dollar went a certain distance in buying an automobile and its accessories. To-day the same amount of automobile and accessories can be bought for eighty cents. Now let us compare that with the cost of some other articles entering into living costs:

Living..	1 00	1 59
Clothing..	1 00	1 52
Building and construction.	1 00	1 54

I have here a list which I will hand to Hansard, without taking the time of the House to read, of one hundred and fifty firms in Canada which have received orders from General Motors of Canada, Limited, and are furnishing supplies to this one industry in the city of Oshawa. The list is as follows:

In conclusion, I wish that hon. gentlemen who consider that certain abuses have arisen in this industry, as in others, would get into their minds some other remedy than that of destroying the industry in this country. It seems a strange thing that certain people, no matter what the difficulty is, have only one remedy to propose, and that is—reduce the tariff and destroy the industry; make it go to some other country. If they find a man making a million dollars in an industry in Canada, they propose to destroy his business and force it across the line into the United States, where a man will be making five hundred million dollars instead of one million. Their policy is to patronize the man making hundreds of millions in some other country, and to destroy anybody in Canada who attempts to make a success of his business. I claim that it is our duty as Canadians not to destroy prosperity in our own country. If we find a number of farmers making a little money by catering to the needs of an industrial city, why should we bow down to the fellow who says that they should not make money on anything except wheat? We are all citizens of Canada, and I might say that it costs me more for the boots I need than it does for wheat, the same as it does every other hon. gentleman. We consume five bushels of wheat a year per head, and one pair of boots at prices to-day costs me more than all the wheat I can consume in a year.

Mr. KAISER: Yes, it is the automobile to-day, and to-morrow it will be the boot and shoe industry, as soon as the automobile industry in this country is destroyed. I do not know where the boots are made in this country, and I do not care, but if they are made in Canada and that industry requires 35 or 40 per cent protection to keep going and keep men at work in this country, I do not care what it costs me for a pair of boots, for I want to see Canadians at work and industries built up in this country and protected. Surely the genius for government on both sides of this House has not been exhausted. Surely there is some way of maintaining an industry in Canada without resorting every time to knocking down the duties and driving the industry out of the country. We want to build up this Canada of ours. We have toiled each of us in his little sphere, always ready to help everybody else. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) says he has a legacy of five or six generations behind him; that is two generations more than I have, but he does not love Canada any more than I do. I want to see our country prosperous and progressive, and I say that the way to build up this country is not to destroy one industry after another. There is some other way surely of curbing avarice where it exists than that of reducing the tariff and driving industry out of the country entirely. I intended to move an amendment, Mr. Speaker. I would like to move—

Mr. YOUNG (Weyburn): Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that because a duty was imposed on fire brick in order to help an industry in British Columbia, it was a factor in ruining the malleable iron industry in Oshawa?

Mr. KAISER: No, I never said anything of the kind. The hon. gentleman has not listened carefully. I said that the tariff on malleable iron was reduced from twelve or fifteen to six per cent, but that an additional burden was placed on the industry. A duty was placed on fire brick, which formerly came in free, and this increased duty was put on to accommodate someone who had clay out in British Columbia, and the freight from British Columbia to Oshawa more than offset the duty, and they had to bring in the American product and pay the duty, showing that it was an additional handicap. I thank you, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. MEMBER: Move your amendment.

Mr. KAISER: You will have to get someone else to move it, if you want it moved.

Mr. THOMAS DONNELLY (Willow Bunch): Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly in favour of this motion now before the House to reduce the tariff on automobiles and motor trucks. My chief reason for speaking in favour of this motion is because of what it costs the people of Canada to have this automobile industry in this country. The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) quoted statistics this afternoon showing that in the year 1924 it cost the people of Canada something like $20,000,000 to have this automobile industry in Canada. Now $20,000,000 is a lot of money. Twenty million dollars would complete the Hudson Bay railway twice over. Twenty million dollars would pay one-half the deficit on the Canadian National Railways; it would pay also the interest on the bonded money it would take to deepen the St. Lawrence waterway. That is one reason why we are asking for a reduction in the tariff. We are told, however, that if we reduce the tariff on automobiles we will have to reduce the tariff on many other articles that enter into their construction; the tariff items are so inter-related that when a change is made in one an adjustment of others becomes necessary. This only goes to show that a protective tariff is like a malignant disease. When it once becomes rooted in the country it spreads and permeates other lines of business, with the result that every industry except the farming industry begins to ask for protection. Now, in the case of a human being the only way to get rid of a malignant disease is to cut it out, and cut it out early. So I say that in the case of a protective tariff on automobiles, or any other industry, the only way to get rid of it is to cut it out root and branch—cut it out early and do away with protection.

But I wish to refer particularly to the manner in which the automobile industry affects the constituency which I have the honour to represent, the constituency of Willow Bunch This constituency extends for something like 100 miles along the northern Montana boundary line. Twenty years ago it was nothing but a bald prairie; it was not even surveyed. In the year 1908 it was opened for homestead entry but not until about the year 1911, that is 15 years ago, did the cultivation of the land begin. Now we have two lines of railway traversing this constituency. We have our little towns, our churches, our schools, our hospitals, and our telephone lines radiating throughout the country; and for the last five years this constituency has exported more wheat and better wheat than any other electoral district in western Canada. We also have 100 miles of railway traversing the constituency, and this stretch of railway ships more wheat from the producer than any other line of equal extent in the world. I simply mention these facts to show the House that the soil of Willow Bunch is fitted for the growth of wheat, and that the climatic conditions are ideal for the growth of good wheat. The people who live within fifteen or twenty miles of the railway have mostly all the land under cultivation, and a few years since—some seven or eight years ago—when we were told by our Conservative friends that the farmers in the country to the south were prospering, many of our settlers left their farms and went down there. Unfortunately, as a result, they went broke. Some of their neighbours here in Canada are helping to bring them back. They are coming back again now. The stream has turned northward. Now we have immigrants coming into our country and settling there. Just in this connection I may say that at one of our meetings in the last election we heard from Conservative orators how hard up our farmers were. Seated in the audience were eight of these people who had returned from the south, and how they must have laughed when they heard how prosperous the farmers were in the country from which they had just come. As I say, these people are returning to that district and trying to make homes there. The settlers who remained during the last three or four years are going ahead and becoming a happy, prosperous and contented people. That is the best asset that any country can have.

There is, however, another portion of this constituency which lies twenty, thirty, forty, yes, sixty miles away from the market along the boundary line of Montana. Things are different there; the settlers are too far away from the market. These people went into that country some fifteen years ago and settled there. The promise was made to them that a railway would be built right away. The war broke out and they did not get the promised railway. In 1923 a bill was introduced in this House to build what was known as the Fife lake extension of the Canadian National railway. We know what happened to that bill. It was defeated in the Senate, and the settlers did not get the much looked for railway. In consequence of the defeat of this bill the Canadian National have given up the idea of building into that section. The Canadian Pacific, however, are beginning to show signs of extending a line into the district, and the people are anxious to see progress made with it in the hope that they may have a railway in the near future. Originally the people who live at that distance from the railway started to raise cattle, as the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Mullins) said this afternoon. But when they did that 99 per cent of them went broke, and of recent years they have gone into raising wheat. Nevertheless anyone who is engaged in farming knows that men cannot farm and raise wheat twenty, thirty, forty, fifty and even sixty miles from a railway; it is impossible to do it. They are making a living and getting along, but it is most essential that these people should have motor trucks in order to be able to haul their wheat to market. We find as we travel from one of these towns to the south that we will meet probably twenty, thirty, forty, and even one hundred motor trucks hauling wheat to the town. But these people come into contact with American farmers and they find that a truck which costs $800 in the United States cannot be bought for less than approximately $1,200 in Canada; and an automobile which costs in the neighbourhood of $1,500 in Canada can be obtained in the United States for $1,000. Is it any wonder that these people begin to say, "the automobile industry is against us, the railways are against us, yes, every man's hand is against us" and they are almost inclined to give up hope of ever obtaining any relief in this country.

Mr. MORAND: Do they ever consider the difference in the freight rates between Canada and the United States?

Mr. DONNELLY: Surely they do. We have cheaper freight rates now in Canada than they have in the States; we have the cheapest freight rates in the world in this country.

Mr. MORAND: Yes, but we have deficits on our National Railways.

Mr. DONNELLY: My profession is that of medical practitioner. I have travelled through this district and have seen many families where the women and children have not been to town for four, five, six, and even seven years. The reason for it is that it requires three or four days to make a trip of sixty miles with a horse and rig and costs too much. Therefore they do not go into town; they cannot get in. It is almost essential for these people that an opportunity be afforded them of getting a cheap automobile or a cheap truck in order to be able to get into town and carry on their business. I would therefore urge upon the government that they provide a means whereby our people may be able to purchase a cheap automobile or a cheap truck. Then we may render contented settlers of the class to which I have referred and save them for our country till the railway is built.

I shall only say in conclusion that the automobile industry is expecting a reduction of the duty on automobiles. We read this in the press and we hear it on the street. The people themselves are expecting such a reduction. Why then should we disappoint them? Why not give them a reduction in the tariff? Let me say that although production in the automobile trade during the month of February has been the greatest, with the exception of one month in the whole history of the industry, yet the public generally and the automobile dealers are not buying automobiles, believing that the duty is going to be cut, and that on that account there will be a downward tendency in the price of automobiles. Let me therefore say to this government, "Do not wait for any tariff advisory board to investigate the situation and to recommend what should be done." Let the government act and act at once, in order that the public generally may know where they stand with regard to the prices of automobiles. Let them get down to business, so that the country may get back to normal conditions.

Mr. T. GERVAIS (Berthier and Maskinongé) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, first, I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) for the perseverance which he has shown in moving once more the resolution under discussion. I was under the impression that the resolutions moved in previous years differed somewhat from the present motion. I think that I remember, without having them before me, that the resolutions of previous years were more of a free-trade character than the one we are actually discussing. This question of tariff reduction as you may judge, Sir, brings back the protection and free-trade issues of days gone by. One could, I think, fill a whole library with the speeches which were delivered on the subject, both in the House and on the hustings. I remember that in my childhood, it was at a time when Sir John A. Macdonald had expounded his national policy, a protective policy, and I grew up amid the din of discussions which took place on free trade and protection. Later on, faced with the responsibilities of office we were forced to give closer study to this question of free-trade and protection, with the idea not only of discussing them as mere theories, but with the idea of applying them to the needs of the particular situation which arises in this country.

The doctrine of free trade! How delightful it was, the first years, to listen to our friends the Progressives and especially to one of them who is no more in this House, how delightful, I say, it was to listen to him debating on unrestricted free trade. Absolutely unrestricted trade, no barriers, no frontier anywhere; a sublime humane impulse on the part of nations bartering freely and in a brotherly way their products and living in the happiest possible manner on this terrestrial globe! In short, it was a dream, a humanitarian dream but unrealizable. However, the system opposed to it, protection, has given rise, in the business world to many abuses, and I think—perhaps my ideas may be wrong—however, I believe that if there had not been any tariff wall in Europe, if the whole of Europe had been under the same tariff system, if there had but existed a legitimate competition, I think that there would have been no war nor would there be any in the future. It is trade rivalry created by different conditions which give rise to disturbances among the nations. The truth, the golden mean, to my mind, lies between these two doctrines.

It is impossible for us to establish absolute free trade. It is a very humanitarian theory, but it remains a theory, nothing more nor less than a theory. Now, is it possible to maintain, and should we maintain a tariff wall as high as the one we have at present? Must a tariff be enacted for a country according to definite and fixed principles? I do not think so. I believe that tariff questions must be considered one by one according to the particular conditions which arise, and this applies to the automobile industry as well as to others.

Some thirty years ago, we witnessed the development of the automobile industry. This development has revolutionized the transportation problem. You will remember like me that some forty years ago we travelled by boat; those among us who then lived at Sorel, Berthier or at any point along the St. Lawrence river, will remember the circumstances. When the railway was built it entirely superseded the boats. To-day, the latter are used merely as a luxury. In the district which I represent, the railway in its turn has entirely given way to the automobile. The town where I have the pleasure of residing is the starting point of one of the largest motor bus services in the whole country, and it gives a regular service. We have but to consult the statements of railway companies to find out that the automobile has entirely altered the problem of transportation and has superseded the railways just as the latter had replaced navigation. This only goes to prove that the automobile has become part of our life, and of the economic structure of the country, and must now be considered as a necessity and not as a luxury.

Let us briefly examine how this expansion took place in this country. I am not going to comment upon the numerous statistics which were cited by the hon. members who have spoken on both sides of the House. I received, like everybody, all the literature on the subject that the opponents and partisans of this measure were kind enough to supply members with. I glanced over most of it. My views to some extent were already settled on these questions and I am glad to be able to submit them to the House.

Under the regime of a very high protective tariff we gave birth to the automobile industry in this country. Protected by a 35 per cent tariff this industry made rapid strides. On this score Canada compares favourably with all the foreign countries, even including our powerful neighbour, the United States. I think that the amount received from automobiles exported by us approximates the value of our imports of the same article. Our exports and imports balance or very near. Two or three years ago, having the occasion of looking up the statistics on this subject, I think I ascertained that our exports and imports balanced as to numbers and value, or near.

Can we, now that the automobile industry has established itself in this country, now that our manufacturers have improved their implements, now that they have trained expert hands, can we now, I say, abolish entirely the tariff? I do not think so, and so far as I am concerned I would oppose it. I am in favour of maintaining a protective tariff wall on automobiles. And if I make use of the word protective, allow me, Sir, to define the meaning I attach to it. To me, the word protective, so far as industries are concerned, should never have borne the interpretation given to it and must not be so construed. It behooves legislators, it devolves upon parliament to give to any industry, not protection, because we must not give to one, two or three individuals protection, to the detriment of ten, twelve or fifteen other individuals, but it is the duty of this country to give to any industry legislation which will allow the suppression of all unjust competition on the part of similar industries operating in other countries.

What is the sum of protection which the automobile industry, to-day, requires in order that it may not be crushed by the United States industries? What constitutes the advantages which the American automobile industry has, relatively, over the Canadian industry? Is our tariff of 35 per cent too high? That is the question. I believe that a duty of 35 per cent is too much; however, I would strongly oppose doing away with all duties, because I think that the American industry enjoys a much larger market and a ready sale of its products, when we are restricted to seasonal sales, in our country.

I think that the automobile industry to maintain its present level, needs a reasonable protective tariff, a tariff which I am not in a position to determine; but on the other hand—I do not wish that my words be misunderstood—I think that the duty, at present, of 35 per cent is too high and that it can be reduced. To what extent? So far as naming the figure, I cannot do so on the spur of the moment.

Mr. GERVAIS (Translation): I have just stated, I cannot on the spur of the moment fix the amount of duty.

Mr. MORAND (Translation): Therefore, we can leave this to—

Mr. GERVAIS (Translation): I do not know, at present, what duty to place on this article. I am not an expert on tariff matters, I have not studied item by item, all the interchangeable parts which may be imported or not, I have not gone into the details of the automobile from the wheels to the starting crank, I have not looked into all these things, I do not know what amount must be fixed as a duty, but I state—and it is my conviction—that a duty of 35 per cent seems to me excessive and exaggerated; however, I think that the duty should not be abolished, because the United States industry has over us an advantage against which we must protect our own industry by means of a pro rata duty. I hope that my hon. friend has well understood my answer.

Mr. MORAND (Translation): To whom are you going to leave the care of deciding this question?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Translation): To the government.

Mr. GERVAIS (Translation): I will say to my hon. friend that I place such trust in the government that I shall confide the task to them.

Mr. Speaker, it is customary for every member, who delivers a speech,—and rightly so, I think—to air his views, but these views may have been moulded or somewhat influenced by the feelings which exist in the riding he represents, for no one can better feel the pulse of a county than its member elect. I represent one of the finest farming counties, the most fertile district that exists in the province of Quebec. There are but few industries in the large electoral division, made up of two counties, that I represent and I wish to inform you, Sir, that the industries that prosper in the counties of Berthier and Maskinongé can take care of free-trade, do not fear competition and control entirely the market, because they are alone. And if I express my views, if I ask that a moderate protection be maintained, it is not that I am influenced by my constituents, who belong to a farming community and who would have very much liked to have reciprocity; to such an extent that my opponent, at the last general election—he once was a member of this House—fearing defeat, came forward, in 1911, and openly advocated reciprocity. Notions of freedom and free-trade are the orders of the day in my riding and in making the above statements I was, therefore, in no way guided by local influences. Reviewing all that is being done in our country, considering the almost phenomenal growth and the ever-increasing success of the automobile industry in Canada, taking into account the interest of the whole country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, weighing all the questions that may affect the national prosperity, I would ask the government to kindly give to the resolution of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) a substantial effect if not immediately at least in the nearby future. The only objection I find at present— and I am speaking frankly, I am not hiding my thoughts—is that the summer purchasing contracts have already been closed, at least, in the province of Quebec and it would upset trade for the incoming season—the sale of automobiles is at its highest in the months of May, June and July—it would upset trade because almost all contracts have been signed, agents are on the road and have made their arrangements. However I would gladly see the government take a step forward in the direction pointed out by the resolution of the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). And I have sufficient confidence in the government to know that if they give us to understand that they will take steps in that direction, they will keep their word.

Mr. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, Canada for nearly fifty years has been protectionist. Whether the Conservative party were in office or the Liberal party, with a few lapses in particular instances on their part, we have maintained a policy of protecting home industries. During those fifty years I have noticed that occasionally some industry which was able to manufacture by mass production on a large scale, made profits which were regarded by the people as undue profits, as profiteering, and in such a case, in times past, the governments of the day and successive parliaments have reduced the customs duty in order to prevent such excess profits being made by reason of the tariff or to prevent what is know in the ordinary phrase as profiteering on the part of manufacturers.

But in our industrial development we have reached a stage where a small reduction in the tariff will not meet the necessities of the case. When we began manufacturing in Canada, a few individuals started to manufacture in a small way gradually increasing their output as the market increased. We were at that time dealing with Canadians resident here, who had their capital invested here, whose whole future was bound up in the future of this country, and if they entered upon a scheme of profiteering or of making undue use of the tariff by increasing their prices, we could nip that sort of profiteering in the bud by threatening a reduction in the duty which gave them the protection necessary for their industry. But in recent years we have seen a large influx of United States capital invested in Canadian industries which are in fact branches of larger industries in the United States. We welcome them because they have brought into Canada expert artisans, expert workmen, and they have taught us in all classes of engineering to become as expert workmen in this country as their workmen are in the United States.

During the war when I was interested in a small engineering factory in the town of Amherst and the question came up of producing in that factory not merely ordinary shells, but certain other articles necessary for the war, I sent experts through England, and in all England with the exception of two or three large factories they were not so well equipped to produce that particular class of engine and certain other articles in the engineering trade as we were in the little town of Amherst, N.S.

It is absolutely essential to the future growth of industry in this country that we should have the assistance of expert artisans from abroad. England started her great manufacturing industries, for instance the woollen industry and the cotton industry, by bringing in experts from Belgium, France and Flanders. So we have welcomed United States firms which have established branch factories in this country, giving us the use of their experts and technical training, and we have been able to educate in certain industries a large body of our own workmen who would not have had that advantage unless those United States firms had established branch factories here. The tendency, I think, has been for a United States industrial company which establishes a branch in Canada to take advantage of the tariff to the limit. Many have not done so, but others have, and figures which have been placed before parliament at its last session and this session, tend to show that certain parent industries in the United States which have established and control largely branch industries in Canada, have apparently raised the Canadian price, not taking full advantage of the tariff, but in some cases raising the suspicion throughout this country that they are taking an undue advantage of the tariff.

I listened to-day very carefully to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Coote) who introduced this resolution. I think he overlooks certain considerations which may be presented in favour of the Canadian branch factory, because of the heavier municipal taxation in many cases which is paid here, because of the comparatively heavier federal taxes which are paid here, because of the fact that we have not reached the mass production which has been reached in the United States and which cuts down overhead on the individual unit of the commodity produced, and because in his statement of the factories established, men employed and wages paid out, he did not take into account the great number of factories throughout this country which are manufacturing component parts which enter into the branch United States factories here as purchased commodities. But the fact really is that with regard to this manufacture of automobiles almost the entire productive cost is in wages and largely in wages expended in this country. It is absolutely essential for the welfare of Canada, in order to give remunerative employment to our people, that we should maintain those factories in this country.

Now can we meet the case of profiteering merely by reducing the duty? I think not. We have had one instance in a large concern manufacturing agricultural implements in Canada with considerable factory facilities across the border, to whom a mere reduction in the duty would be a matter of utter indifference. They can transfer the manufacture of those commodities for the Canadian market to their American factories and make as much there out of their mass production per unit as they make in Canada by manufacturing the smaller quantity. So that if we reduce the duty in respect of any commodity manufactured in the United States, and produced in this country by a branch factory of the American establishment, it only tends to transfer the manufacture to the United States factory and to place in their hands the production of the entire quantity of that commodity required in this market, enabling them to fix from the United States the price at which they sell their commodities in Canada. Time and time again you will find that when we have reduced the duties in order to cut down profiteering in this country, the result has only been to transfer the industry from Canada to the United States, with this consequence that the United States manufacturer, controlling the market, has raised the price in Canada beyond what it was before the reduction in duty took place. I therefore suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Robb) that he will not solve this problem which we have now before us merely by reducing the duty. In fact, the difficulty of ascertaining the real facts is a strong argument in favour of having some expert officials, or some trustworthy commission in whom we all have confidence, who will examine into each case and present the facts, and if possible propose the solution, for the consideration of parliament.

I have not seen any of the lobbyists about this House. If any have been around I wish they would call upon me at my room, for there are a good many things I should like to have an explanation about in regard to the automobile industry. If therefore there are any lobbyists in the vicinity of parliament who have knowledge of the automobile industry I here and now welcome them to my room, because, as I say, I should like to ascertain some of the facts from those who know the facts. which I have myself been unable so far to get at.

Mr. FORKE: I suggest that it is the lost sheep the shepherd seeks.

Mr. CAHAN: Then I do not wonder that my hon. friend has been canvassed by some of them. But there are others who wish to get at some of the facts, and I am persuaded from what I know of him and his career, that the Minister of Finance is as desirous of ascertaining the real facts, and as desirous of arriving at the proper solution of the problem as I am myself. I give him credit for that. I assure him however that in my humble opinion he will not find a proper solution in the mere reduction of the duties levied on automobiles coming from the United States. I think that the solution will be found in providing ways and means whereby any branch factory doing business in this country, if it attempts to make undue profits out of the Canadian people who purchase the commodities manufactured by such a branch factory, will be deprived of those profits beyond a reasonable and fair manufacturing return. I believe the solution is to be found in that direction.

As nearly as I can find out, although I do not know all the facts, several of these automobile companies are not making undue profits. They are simply beginning to build up their business and have not yet reached the point where they have a sufficiently large trade in this country or in any foreign country to make undue profits. When however it is stated publicly in the press of this country that the Ford Company, for instance, with a capital investment in Canada of $6,000,000 has been able to obtain a profit in a single year of some $6,000,000, so that its capital stock has increased in value on the market from par at $100 to $600 or $650 a share, then I say that that company is bound to make explanation to the Canadian people and to the Minister of Customs who directs the tariff projects of this country; because it does seem to me that, even taking into account the advantage of all the patents they have, and the advantages in assets which may not be comprised in the $6,000,000 investment, as well as the advantages of their skill and skilled workmen, such profits are excessive for a manufacturing industry to make from year to year in this country. Such returns the Canadian people call profiteering, and that the common people, whether they be Conservatives or Liberals, will not stand for. That the people of Canada, whether they be free traders or protectionists, will not tolerate. There must therefore be some independent means of ascertaining the facts by compelling the attendance of the representatives of this industry and obtaining their full explanation. We do not wish to do them an injustice, but if they persist in charging for their commodities in Canada prices which enable them to make undue profits by reason of the tariff, the satisfactory solution will not be found in a mere reduction of the tariff. It will be found in devising ways and means of relieving them of their excess profits and turning those profits into the treasury of the country. You will only have to do that once and for one season, and you will find that, rather than pay their excess profits into the treasury of the country, these branch factories will reduce their prices to the Canadian people. so that the purchasers of these commodities in Canada will receive the full advantage of the lower prices as well as the full advantage of the greater mass production which will result from manufacturing at the lower prices.

To reduce the tariff is to wipe out the industry; to reduce the tariff is to send thousands of expert men over into the United States to seek remunerative employment; to reduce the tariff is to wipe out the towns and villages where these automobiles are being manufactured, and where the parts that enter into their manufacture are produced; to reduce the tariff is to destroy many auxiliary industries throughout the length and breadth of the country. And that is a process which I do not think will commend itself even to the government of the day. On the other hand we need tariff protection against foreign competition. Living alongside the United States with its enormous home market and its mass production in nearly every commodity of that sort, we must have tariff protection. A tariff of 30 or 35 per cent on most of these things in order to assure the home market to our manufacturers is not too great protection. But I suggest that the real solution will be found in devising ways and means whereby those branch factories which make use of the tariff for purposes of profiteering will have their profits transferred to the national treasury.

It was suggested this afternoon that automobiles manufactured in Canada are sold in foreign markets at a less price than prevails in this country. Obviously so, because the exporter receives, if I understand the situation aright, a rebate not only of all the duties which he himself has paid on foreign materials entering into the manufacture of the exported car, but a rebate of all the duty paid by the minor factories that manufactured the component parts for that commodity. So it is not surprising, as pointed out by my hon. friend who introduced this resolution (Mr. Coote), that when you take any one automobile factory and compare the duty which it pays on American materials entering into the manufacture of its cars with the rebate it receives on those materials which entered into the exported cars, the rebate in many cases is in excess of the duty paid. But the duty paid by that particular factory is not the whole duty, because duty has also been paid on the materials entering into the manufacture of the component parts which are supplied by auxiliary companies from one end of the country to the other.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that the government of the day does not intend to act hastily in this matter. It is not merely a question of automobiles. If it was, there might be some excuse, because this matter needs explanation. I do not think that the circulars which I, in common with other members of the House, have received from the automobile companies contain a full and satisfactory explanation. But we must remember that this is only a typical case, and I could give the names of half a dozen other branch factories, some of which manufacture in very large quantities, with regard to whose commodities the same principle must be applied if it is applied to automobiles; and by a reduction of duty we would threaten the very existence of a large number of industries which both sides of this House regard as absolutely essential to the welfare of the country.

Mr. M. N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the discussion should have drifted into one of those fights which we have had so often in this House, a fight between free trade and protection. I maintain that no such issue is involved in this resolution at all. Rather it is an issue between moderate protection on the one side and extortion on the other. That is what we are called upon to decide.

Now, let me quote a few figures regarding the manufacture and sale of automobiles in 1920. I find in that year we manufactured automobiles and automobile parts to the value of about $137,000,000. The wages paid amounted to $19,368,000. We exported nearly $21,000,000, so the balance sold at home represented a value of $116,509,000. On the basis of the wages involved in the total manufacture, the part chargeable to the cars distributed in the home market would be $16,376,000. Taking the value of the domestic consumption, and reducing it to an import basis, that is, the price they would have cost at the port of entry, their value would be about $101,792,000. Now, had all these automobiles and automobile parts been manufactured in the United States and imported into Canada, there would have been turned into the national treasury about $35,000,000, or just about double the wage bill. If we can imagine such a condition as no automobiles being manufactured in Canada, and all these goods being imported, and the government out of the national treasury paying the wages of all these men, we might still have had in the treasury about $19,000,000. We hear a good deal about the cost of wages in Canada. I submit, Sir, that the wages paid in our Canadian automobile factories are in all cases lower than the wages paid for similar work in the United States.

Let me take another year, 1923. In this case I may say that I have not been able to secure the figures for automobile parts. We manufactured automobiles to the value of $96,614,000, and we imported automobiles to the value of $32,000,000, while we exported to the value of $37,000,000. The salaries and wages paid on account of the cars manufactured at home amounted to about $15,000,000. Reducing the value of the cars distributed in the home market to an import basis, it would be about $44,000,000, on which the import duty would be $15,330,000. If we figure in the accessories as well and put them in the same category, it would run the amount up to pretty nearly $20,000,000, which was estimated by the hon. member for Macleod as the annual bonus that we paid to the manufacturers of automobiles and automobile parts. Last week we had a discussion in this House on a resolution dealing with old age pensions, and several hon. gentlemen took the ground that it would cost the country too much money; they considered that we could not afford to pay annually some $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 to our indigent old people. I wonder if these same hon. gentlemen will maintain that we can afford to bonus the automobile industry nearly twice that amount annually.

Now I come to the argument as to the necessity of protection, because I am not considering the question on the merits of protection as a whole. I am assuming that the protectionist argument is right as to these industries needing a certain amount of protection. Now, there is only one way in which we can determine that necessity—by the profits made by the companies. I find that one of the leading Canadian companies in 1905, the first year in which it was in operation, paid a dividend of 6 per cent; but even this does not show the true state of affairs, because there was 6 per cent paid on all the stock. But the stock was only half paid in cash; that is, where the original stock was $125,000, only $62,500 was actually paid in. So I draw your attention to this, that the actual amount of the dividend was double the figures I quote.

Mr. BENNETT: The other half was property.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The other half was water.

Mr. CAHAN: Would the hon. gentleman give us the name of this company?

Mr. CAMPBELL: The Ford Motor Company. In 1910 they paid a dividend of 100 per cent; 1911, 100 per cent, plus 500 per cent stock dividend; 1915, 110 per cent; 1916, 600 per cent stock dividend; 1919, 35 per cent; 1922, 30 per cent; 1924, 10 per cent. The pamphlet I am reading from states:

> The original investor who sold his stock at recent market prices would have received back in dividends and sale price $350,000 in return for every $1,000 invested.

A very substantial profit indeed, and it should do away with the necessity for any further argument as to the need of this industry to be protected.

Mr. CAHAN: Supposing that you reduce the duty to nothing, how will you really solve the problem which you have presented to us?

Mr. CAMPBELL:: We are not asking that the duty be reduced to nothing, and I anticipate that the government has no intention of doing that. But the moment you do reduce the duty, to the extent it is reduced the price will have to be reduced. This company is taking advantage of almost every dollar in the tariff to-day; their cars are just a few dollars less than the price at which a similar car can be imported from the United States. I assume, then, that if the duty is reduced, they must reduce the price; otherwise, similar cars would come in from the United States.

Now with regard to the question of unemployment. I am sure there is no hon. member of this House, whether he comes from an urban or a rural district, who is insensible to the problem of unemployment. We all realize that it is one of those terrible problems we have always with us, at least in recent years, and I am sure there is no one here who will advocate anything that will increase that unemployment at the present time. But taking the very figures presented to the members of this House by the two leading automobile companies in Canada, they show that for every two men working in their factories there are three men employed in the garages of the country. Now I submit that a reduction in the tariff, even supposing it will put some of these factories out of business—which I do not for a moment admit—by increasing the importation of cars and the number of cars in use, you would increase the work for the garage men throughout the country, and I think it would take a very little increase in the work in the garages to absorb all the men who might be thrown out of employment in the factories.

With regard to the protectionist argument, I have a quotation from a speech delivered by the late Sir John A. Macdonald, who is often referred to as the father of protection. When presenting the National Policy to the House in March, 1878, he stated that this was only to foster infant industries, that it would last only until such time as those industries could stand on their own feet. He was then asked ironically by one of the members of the opposition how he could ascertain when that time had arrived, but Sir John was equal to the occasion. He said that just so soon as those manufacturing concerns began to ship goods outside the country and compete in foreign markets with the manufacturers of other countries in the world, they would have demonstrated they no longer needed protection. Now what are the facts? The hon. member for Oshawa (Mr. Kaiser) while telling us that the industry in his city would be ruined, while telling us a terrible tale of the ruination and devastation that would follow in the wake of any tariff reduction, at the same time boastingly pointed out that forty-five per cent of the product of that factory was exported. Surely, Sir, when at the present time that factory is able to export forty-five per cent of its product to a great many other countries of the world and compete there on an equal basis with American and other monufacturers of automobiles, a reduction of ten or fifteen or twenty per cent in the protection on automobiles is not going to close up that factory and turn all those people out of employment.

The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) makes a strong point of what he calls mass production, attempting to show thereby that the American manufacturers are in a much more favourable position than those of Canada. I admit there is something in that argument. We all know that the same argument applies to every line of business, that doubling the output will naturally reduce cost of the product. Henry Ford, perhaps the greatest industrialist of this continent, has proved that very clearly, and he has repeatedly expressed the opinion that the lower he sells his product the more he can sell, and the more he can sell the cheaper he can produce. Now I say that the very procedure we are advocating to-day will, on that argument, cheapen the cost of production, because there is probably no member of this House who would deny that a reduction in the price would mean the consumption of more automobiles, and the production of more automobiles would naturally reduce the price, and thereby assist the manufacturers in solving the very problem they are so much afraid of.

The automobile manufacturers have tried to make a strong point of the fact that they produce about one hundred million dollars' worth of goods annually, and they think they are entitled to special consideration at the hands of members of this House because their production runs so large. Well, Sir, in comparison with the industry of agriculture their output is infinitesimal. The agricultural industry in 1924 produced one billion and a half dollars worth of goods, and the figures for 1925, which are not yet available, will show a substantial increase in that amount.

Mr. MORAND: How does the income derived by the federal treasury from farm production compare with the income derived from automobile production?

Mr. CAMPBELL: The taxes collected by the federal government from automobile production are largely paid by the farmers. The agricultural industry, in the last analysis, absorbs a great deal of those taxes. Whenever we on the farms buy a tire or the product of any factory, the tax paid by that factory is passed on to us and added to the price of the article. I think the hon. member will not deny that. The automobile to-day, particularly the cheap automobile, is essentially a farm implement and should be classed as such, and if that be true of the automobile, it is doubly true of the light motor truck. I would suggest to the government that in framing this reduction, and I assume the government will meet the wishes of the people in this regard and make some reduction, they should give special consideration to the motor truck. They have done it already in exempting the motor truck from the excise tax, and I think they could very well carry that a little further. As the hon. member for Willow Bunch (Mr. Donnelly) has pointed out, I think there might not be the same demand for branch lines in many parts of western Canada, and perhaps in eastern Canada as well, if we could secure motor trucks at a considerably reduced price.

But, Sir, when we come to compare the protection afforded the automobile industry with that given other manufactured products there seems to be something entirely wrong. Let us take farm implements. Binders and mowers are protected by a duty of 6 per cent; horse rakes by a duty of 7½ per cent; ploughs by a duty of 10 per cent; and wagons and sleighs by a duty of 10 per cent. I would think that the average protectionist himself, for the benefit of his own party and in order to expedite the adoption of his own ideas. would want to eliminate some of that discrimination and put it on a fairer basis than this. Is there any protectionist in Canada who can justify such a small amount of protection on farm implements and such a high protection on automobiles? I fail to see that there can be any. The onus therefore is on those protectionists to show why this discrimination exists. Either one is entirely too high, or the other is entirely too low. Just to show you how much cheaper our American cousins can buy cars I will quote a few figures, but I am not going to weary the House by quoting many. Classified under cars that can be bought at the factory under 500—that is, bought at retail prices at the factory—I find the Ford roadster selling at $260, the Ford touring car at $290. I should say in fairness that these are without demountable rims and starter. With demountable rims and starter added the prices are $345 and $375, respectively. The Overland 91 costs at the American factory $495, the Star touring car $525, and the Chevrolet roadster $525, and so on.

The hon. member for East Essex (Mr. Morand) tried to show that the automobile industry in Canada contributed a great deal to the public revenue in the duty they paid on accessories and other parts imported from the United States. But in the list he quoted from there was not a single one of these products that paid as high as 35 per cent. On the other hand the figures which the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) quoted proved that the Ford Motor Company, after receiving the drawback for the goods exported, paid only about a million and a half annually in duties to the treasury on the goods imported. That is not a very substantial amount at all. The hon. member for Macleod corrects me and states that these figures apply to the whole automobile industry—that is to say the entire industry pays only a million and a half into the treasury annually for the purpose indicated. So, I think there is very little indeed in the argument.

Mr. KAISER: What does my hon. friend mean by the figures quoted?

Mr. CAMPBELL: The figures I was quoting deal with the amount of duty paid on imported parts or raw material. When the drawback is deducted from that amount it leaves only about a million and a half that the treasury actually gets annually from the raw material or parts imported.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think my hon. friend has made a mistake there; I think the amount should be about four times that.

Mr. CAMPBELL: The figures I quoted from are those which the hon. member for Macleod gave this afternoon.

An hon. MEMBER: He was wrong.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Again when we come to deal with the exports I find that we export about $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 worth of automobiles and automobile parts annually. Last year we sent automobiles and parts to the Argentine, to Australia, to Brazil, to British India, to British South Africa, to New Zealand, to the United Kingdom, to the United States; and to other countries not specified we shipped goods to the value of $6,028,000. It seems to me that when our automobile manufacturers can export their products and compete successfully with the manufacturers of other countries in the markets of the world there is no necessity for such a high duty as 35 per cent being given them by way of protection.

Mr. JOHN VALLANCE (South Battleford): The question under discussion is one of great moment to-day throughout the whole of Canada. The automobile industry, I think, is the most protected of all our Canadian industries. The extent to which the industry has developed has already been pointed out, and that growth is not to be wondered at when we consider the amount of protection it has received.

Being a westerner and a farmer, my mind naturally thinks of the Ford when discussing automobiles, because that is the farmer's car. I should like for a few moments to consider the Ford car and compare the one we get in Canada with the same make of car in the United States. We have had a great deal of discussion along this line already, and it is quite obvious to the House that it has been mostly on the part of western members. So if I reiterate something that has been already mentioned, I hope the House will bear with me. We find that such a car sells in the United States, f.o.b. for $310, whereas at Ford, Ontario, the same car sells for $440, an increase of 42 per cent. Again, we might take the Dodge touring car. We find the United States price to be $795 and the Canadian price $1,095, or an increase of 38 per cent. The Ford runabout costs $290 in Detroit. A United States tax of 5 per cent must be paid, and this brings the price up to $304.50. This is the value for duty on importation into Canada. Add 35 per cent to that and it amounts to another $106.57, bringing the cost of your imported car up to $411.07, and if you buy such a car at Ford, Ontario, they will charge you $410, showing how closely they hew to the tariff line. All you save by buying a Canadian car is $1.07. But the revenue lost to the government of Canada amounts to $106.57. The Ford people naturally get that as additional price.

To the average Canadian citizen a car is no longer a luxury, at least not to the farmer. It is just as necessary to the farmer as is every other implement of production, and I believe that if we reduce the tariff down to 10 or 15 per cent it will not only make cars cheaper, but will greatly increase the demand. This will mean the employment of more hands and will help to reduce unemployment. Why is it that in the United States to-day there is one car to every six citizens, whereas in Canada there is only one car to every fourteen? It is not that conditions in general in the United States are any better than they are in Canada; it is because cars are more reasonable in price there, and are within the reach of a greater number of the population.

According to figures I have before me I find that the Ford Motor Company have now invested in the business something over $31,000,000, all of which has been made from profits, except the original investment of $125,000. Of the latter amount only $62,500 was cash. And so since 1904 they have been paying, as has been already pointed out by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Campbell), a very large dividend. The Financial Post of February 12 of this year is responsible for the statement that the original investor who sold his stock at recent market prices would have received back in dividends and sale price $350,000 in return for every $1,000 invested. Ford exported 47 per cent of his Canadian production and 53 per cent was marketed in Canada. The amount received for the 53 per cent sold in Canada came within $6,716,840 of paying for his entire production, so that if he had marketed 66 per cent of his cars in Canada the profit would have given him 33 per cent of the production for nothing.

Now, Mr. Speaker, coming from one of the great western constituencies, as I said before, I believe that the car is an absolute necessity on the farm in western Canada to-day. A great many of our people are farming from ten or fifteen to thirty, forty and fifty miles back from a railway. The government propose this year to bring over some 3,000 British families through the Empire settlement scheme, and as the minister outlined the other night they intend settling these families along the railroad, from ten to fifteen miles from the line. It is a question that has been debated a great deal in the farmers' organizations in Canada, of which I am very proud to say I have been and always intend to be a member, that it is unprofitable for a grain farmer to farm land over nine miles from the railway. So that if we intend to settle these people from ten to fifteen miles back, with the people we have in the west farming long distances from the railway, it will not be successful. It seems to me that after all the pressure that has been brought to bear on this government they should be convinced now that the reduction is necessary. It would be a great relief to those who are already in that part of western Canada and are farming some distance from the railway, and I believe it would be an inducement, as well as an asset, to those whom we hope to welcome to our shores within the coming year.

I have not very much further to advance in this argument to-night. This is the first time I have had the privilege of addressing the House. I have been somewhat indisposed, having had some throat trouble, but I thought this question was so momentous and meant so much to western Canada that I should at least say something.

Mr. R. H. JENKINS (Queens): The resolution which we are now considering meets with my hearty approval; the proposal it involves is something I have advocated for some time past. It is high time that some move was made by this government to give relief along the line indicated. Although we have not such a large number of cars operating in Prince Edward Island as in some of the other provinces, yet in proportion to our population the need for some reduction is just as great. The automobile industry is the pet of the protection family. No other industry, so far as I am aware, has such attention paid to it by way of tariff. We pay in Canada to-day for cars the United States price with the duty and all costs added; in other words, the Canadian manufacturer collects the duty and he or his friends keep it. The tariff on automobiles is not designed for the benefit of Canadian industries. It is a tariff levied on the people in the main to pay American stockholders of Canadian factories, or possibly I should say assembly plants.

In common with other members of the House I received a few days ago a letter from the Ford Motor Company of Canada, reading as follows:

Dear Sir—

In view of the agitation in connection with the tariff on motor cars, we have considered it advisable to compile data in connection with our industry, which we feel will assist in arriving at a proper solution of this problem.

This data is submitted herewith as briefly as possible in the form of a number of graphic charts, the purport of which will be very quickly grasped.

We recommend this to your careful consideration.

A change in the tariff on motor cars would be a matter of such vital importance and of such widespread ramifications, that we believe no change could be made without a most careful study of all angles of the problem by a properly constituted tariff board.

To which I replied as follows:

Dear Sirs,—

Your letter of March 10, re proposed reduction on motor cars, is before me, and I may state briefly that I need no better evidence that a drastic cut is needed on the duty on automobiles than page 15 of your folder, showing the price of Cars in the United States, and the price of same in Canada.

I am firmly convinced that the government should lose no time in making the change.

Our friends of the opposition tell us that the duty does not necessarily mean an increase in price to the buyer, but I would like to ask hon. members of this House to examine the prices of motor cars in Canada and the prices in the United States, as given by the Ford company on chart 15 of their booklet,

Let us analyse the situation. Take for instance the runabout, the cheapest car on the list: United States price, $310, excise tax, $7.44 a total of $317.44. This I believe is the wholesale price to the dealer although the Ford company would leave the impression—in fact they state it—that any saving as between importing a car from the United States and buying the Canadian made car, is made by the Canadian purchaser—they do not use the word "dealer". If this is the wholesale price let us add say 20 per cent for the retailer's profit, which I think should be quite enough. This amount added allowing 20 per cent, on the excise tax as well as on the cost price, would give us $380.92. Now what is the price at which this same car is sold in Canada? The Ford people would have us believe it is $440.76, but I find on the price list received to-day from the local Ford dealer that the price is $588, or over $200 more than the price of the same model in the United States. I am not speaking from hearsay, I am quoting the firm's own figures, a copy of which I pass along to Hansard.

Take another model, if you will, the touring car; United States price, $330; United States excise tax, $7.92; total, $337.92. Allow the retailer 20 per cent profit, making the selling price in the United States say $405.50. What does this car sell at in Canada? According to the figures of the company, $619—again a difference of over $200. These are only two examples of the way in which buyers of cars are imposed upon by the manufacturers all along the line. I may note in passing, however, that the Canadian company will fill your gas tank and give you driving lessons free.

What has my hon. friend from Fort William to say now about his statement on page 313 of Hansard, when he interrupted me in a former speech by saying:

He—

—does not necessarily require to charge any more at all. The advantage to the manufacturer is that he holds his own market for himself, as they do in other countries.

He holds his own market all right, but it is a mighty heavy expense holding for the purchaser who needs a car. Motor cars, especially the cheaper ones, are not a luxury to-day. For a man with a moderate income and a family, it is to say the least a most enjoyable form of recreation—possibly not for his pocket book, but it gives him a much greater opportunity of meeting people and seeing the country than he could otherwise enjoy. It stimulates business, and if not carried to extremes, as in cases where owners cannot afford, it may be made to serve a useful purpose.

Suppose a man in Canada wants to buy a Ford car, say the head of a family in moderate circumstances; what happens? He may be working in a factory drawing a wage of $6 per day. This, I notice from this famous Ford chart, is the average Ford wage; it is higher than the average wage in other occupations in this country. He may work 300 days, which would be a good average excluding Sundays and holidays. He would at this rate be earning $1,800. He may be the head of a family, and out of his wage he may be able to save, say $1 per day. This would mean, if he wished to save money to buy a Ford runabout, in the United States, that he would need to work 317 days. At the same rate of saving from his salary in Canada he would have to work 588 days, and for other models in about the same proportion. Possibly in Canada he might die before he ever reached the goal, but in the United States he would have at least a sporting chance of attaining it. It may be argued by those in favour of keeping a high duty on cars that the money is kept in Canada and paid to Canadian workmen. If this were the case we would not particularly object, but it is doubtful. In a number of industries which I have investigated I have found that the Canadian workman is paid a smaller wage than his United States brother. I do not state positively that this is so in the automobile industry, but it would be interesting if the Ford Motor Company would prepare an additional page for their book of charts showing the wages paid to Canadian employees as against those paid for similar work in the republic to the south of us. If wages are no higher in Canada than in the United States, it naturally follows that the difference in price is corralled by the manufacturer who distributes it in large dividends to his shareholders. It would be interesting to know whether the amount indicated goes into the pocket of the workman or into that of the capitalist. I think the difference might much better be retained by us who buy the cars, and we would then know we had the difference in price and not take a chance of paying out these huge sums in dividends to people who have no interest in the country except the amount they squeeze out of us by way of protection.

Mr. Speaker, I believe in protection for all the people, not for a favoured few or a privileged class. I firmly believe that no move the government could make would be more popular, at least in our part of the country, than a reduction in the duty on motor cars. This government need expect no sympathy from manufacturers of this class, and we expect that a government just as an individual will do its duty, which, under the present circumstances would be to reduce the duty on automobiles and motor trucks.

Mr. A. J. ANDERSON (Toronto-High Park): Mr. Speaker, if this resolution is carried it will strike directly at one of the most important industries in the constituency which I represent, namely the industry of the Willys-Overland. As I said once before on the floor of this House, seventy-five per cent of the electors of my constituency are composed of those who depend upon wages, salaries, and commissions that are derived in lieu of salaries and wages. It is a matter of very considerable moment in my constituency that the tariff should remain reasonably as it is, and from the standpoint of the concern which I am principally interested in, namely, the Willys-Overland, I think it can be shown that the duty is not too great for the purpose of maintaining a really beneficial institution in the country. I have no interest whatever in that institution; I am not a stockholder and I have no interest in it in any other way than simply as a representative of the constituency in which it is situated. My interest in the automobile industry is merely to see that that industry is maintained in a reasonable way; that it will prosper as one of the industries of the country; that it will afford employment to a large number of our citizens, and that it will give reasonable and profitable employment for Canadian capital.

The labour element in my constituency pronounced in no uncertain terms that they were in favour of a protective tariff. I was opposed by the representative of Labour in this House, in fact the ex-Minister of Labour, who had every opportunity of presenting the views of labour to the electors in my constituency. He accepted the position of being in favour of reducing the tariff, but the vote was very strongly against this theory and in favour of the maintenance of a proper tariff for the institutions of this country, and in protecting the industries it was incidentally protecting the wages and employment of the workingmen.

Canada's position in regard to the automobile industry is probably the same as it is in regard to any other industry. In the United States the automobile industry has reached the highest point of production and perfection of any country in the world. Canada is situated close to United States and is subject to the influences of the tremendous mass production and aggressiveness of industry in that country. Our interests are interlaced in regard to the automobile industry the same as with regard to any other industry. It has been said to-day that Canada has been working under a protective tariff for fifty years. The United States has been working under protective tariff for a hundred years and its protective tariff to-day is probably higher than it ever was before. There is no tendency in that country towards a reduction in the tariff.

The automobile industry is a tremendous one in the United States. I find that in 1925 in that country there were 17,591,981 cars and trucks, or one to every six people. Great Britain is the next largest in point of number of automobiles and trucks used, and the statistics show that they have 770,839 cars and trucks, or one to every fifty-seven people. Canada comes third in the list, with 639,302 cars and trucks, or one to every fourteen people. One can readily see, in comparing those figures, that with a car census of 17,591,981, the automobile industry in the United States has had an opportunity of giving a fair and lower price than we have had in Canada. It has afforded an opportunity for mass production; it has, as a matter of fact, brought about mass production. I am not so sure what the condition is in Great Britain, although the 770,831 automobiles and trucks there are not, of course, all of British manufacture. I think I am safe in saying that probably over 90 per cent of the 17,591,981 cars in the United States are of United States manufacture, but in Canada the 639,302 cars are not necessarily all of Canadian manufacture. In this country we have succeeded in controlling a considerable part of the market, but we do not depend upon the home market for our real returns. In fact, I think the export trade in connection with our automobile industry is equal to and in some cases a little greater than the sales in the home market.

I will confine myself to the Willys-Overland industry, because I am not familiar with the figures in connection with other concerns. In the Willys-Overland we have an employment roll of 858 men; we have dealers and staff numbering 1,075 men, and salesmen numbering 525. For the 858 men employed by the Willys-Overland our payroll last year amounted to $1,267,872. It is interesting to note that the Willys-Overland Company expended in connection with its production the sum of about $2,700,000 for materials, while the salaries and wages it paid out amounted

We have heard about the duties paid by the automobile industry into the treasury of Canada. Well, the duty less drawback, together with sales and excise taxes paid into the Dominion—and these figures are obtained from the Customs department—total, from this one company alone, $924,401 or very nearly $1,000,000, while in freight and express paid to the railways and express companies the company has distributed $318,925. In plant additions they have spent over $26,900 and in miscellaneous expenditures, such as advertising, branch operations, and so on, $801,277. In other words, we find that this one company alone has expended in Canada for the year 1925 $5,947,343. In connection with that expenditure I would point out that the salaries and wages, which is a very important item to the people of my constituency, represent to the city of Toronto alone $998,686, which is a large sum of money. In Winnipeg the company pays out in wages and salaries $44,519; in Regina, $13,218, and in Montreal $111,447 or a total of $1,267,872. This total paid to employees represents about one-half of the amount spent by the company in materials used in the construction of their automobiles.

It is interesting to see what expenditures are made in the various cities and towns throughout Canada by this company. They spent altogether $3,436,146 in various parts of the Dominion, most of which, I may observe, was expended in the cities and towns of Ontario. I will not give all the figures, but I notice that the city of Toronto alone received from the Willys-Overland people for materials used in construction $1,315,322 while the city of Montreal received $163,112 and the city of Winnipeg $17,832. These figures indicate that the company is doing a Canadian business, paying out a large amount of money to Canadian workmen in wages and salaries, and purchasing Canadian material. It is a Canadian concern and this money is largely spent in Canada. It is noteworthy that the cars of to-day are sold at probably 20 per cent less than they were sold in 1914—that is to say, for 80 cents one can get as much in automobile purchase as could be got for a dollar in 1914. Compare this with other products. Commodities in general cost 59 per cent more to-day than they did in 1914, while the general cost of living is upwards of 50 per cent greater than it was at that time. It is clear, therefore, that the automobile industry has endeavoured to meet the desire of the people for a cheaper car.

This industry is seventh on a list of forty leading industries in the Dominion. Its invested capital amounts to $47,761,964. The cost of the materials used throughout the whole industry is $54,408,719, and the value of the production $81,956,429. These are considerable figures, and they prove that the industry is of immense importance to the country. So that any reduction in the tariff which would materially affect the stability and the progress of any of the concerns operating in the production of automobiles would seriously injure not only the manufacturers themselves but all those interested in allied industries, and in any concerns in Canada engaged in supplying material used in connection with the automobile industry proper.

For the purpose of comparing American and Canadian prices perhaps the Overland No. 91 may be taken as an ideal illustration. This is a touring car and of all the models produced by this particular company it enjoys the greatest sale. A car of similar make is sold on the American side also. The American quoted sale price is $495 as against the Canadian sale price of $695, and naturally the question is asked, how is the difference of $200 made up? Well, to begin with, the United States model corresponding to the Canadian Overland No. 91 does not include certain parts with which the Canadian car is equipped. It does not include, for instance, in its quoted price a speedometer which is valued at $15, nor does it include cord tires. It has only fabric tires, and this makes a difference of $25. Again, the American car uses the single texture for the top and side, whereas the car manufactured in Canada is equipped with double texture which is stronger and better. This accounts for a difference of $20. These items alone amount to $60, so that the American quotation for a car of similar design would be really $555. The price of the Canadian car is quoted at $695, and it includes these extras I have mentioned. Besides this, the Canadian company pays $72.87 in duty on manufactured parts imported from the American side for use in the Overland No. 91. So when we consider all the facts, the protection afforded the product on this side is simply the difference between $555 plus $72.87 or say $627.87—and $695, about $67.13. That is the extent of the protection given to the Willys-Overland people on that particular car, and the protection on their other models is proportionate. The protection they enjoy is therefore not 35 per cent, as has been suggested, but a much smaller percentage.

The automobile industry throughout Canada is very much in the same position as the particular company to which I have referred. The business is only seasonal; the greater part of the sales of the Willys-Overland as well as of other automobiles being made in the months of March, April, May and June. During the rest of the year these companies must more or less depend on their export business. The Willys-Overland returns for the year 1925 show that the domestic sales were 47 per cent of the total, and the export sales 53 per cent. Some hon. member in this debate has asked the question, if the Canadian manufacturer can afford to sell a large part of his output in competition with the world's manufacturers, why it is he cannot reduce the price of the car sold on the Canadian market? The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) has answered that question completely. The rebates which the manufacturer gets in the way of the return or drawback of the duties on all goods exported as well as on the materials that enter into the manufacture of his product, enable him to make a profit by means of which he can afford to carry on an export trade, in competition with other countries. But in his home market the Canadian manufacturer has to compete with the mass production of the United States. Owing to the tremendous population on the other side and to his exclusive home market, which is absolutely protected against the world, the American manufacturer has been able to establish mass production, which of course means that he is able to sell his output at much lower prices than are possible in this country. As I said before, the United States is not reducing its tariff even where its industries have been established for a century. The agriculturists of that country in recent years have been demanding very high protection; for instance, 42 cents a bushel against Canadian wheat. It is rather strange that we should be considering the desirability of free trade or lower tariff when so many of our competitors have been raising their tariffs since the war in an effort to protect their home market and their workingmen. On the contrary, we are advised by certain members of the House to reduce our tariff, especially on automobiles and other commodities, in order that we may buy them cheaper here. I submit that this is one of the factors that will reduce our population and increase our difficulties generally.

A reduction of the duties on automobiles will affect a great many other industries which depend upon the automobile industry for their existence. For instance, the Willys-Overland Company has to import a long list of materials the duties on which range from 25 to 35 per cent, only four of the articles having duties ranging from 5 to 10 per cent.

11 p.m. The company endeavours to manufacture the bulk of the component parts entering into its automobiles, but even so it has to import a great many. In addition, they buy 39 different classes of commodities from 91 Canadian firms, all of whom would be affected by a reduction of duty on automobiles, and this is something which we should very carefully consider before we make any change.

There are several reasons why automobiles and other commodities cannot be manufactured as cheaply here as in the United States. For instance, the limited production here results in higher cost, then the duty on imported materials, machinery and equipment also tend to enhance the cost of the Canadian manufacture. Furthermore, the Canadian car is better finished and generally of a higher standard than that sold in the United States, although they are similarly described in the American and Canadian catalogues. Then again our taxes are higher than those which the United States manufacturer has to pay. All these factors of additional cost in the manufacture of the Canadian car should make us hesitate before we decide to reduce the tariff. Undoubtedly we should proceed very carefully. In fact, since the government has appointed a tariff commission, I submit that this resolution should be referred to that commission in order that a proper study may be made of the effect that any reduction of duty would have not only upon the automobile industry but upon allied industries.

During the course of the debate it was said that the amount of duty pocketed by Canadian automobile manufacturers was in the neighbourhood of $20,000,000, and I believe in the circular distributed among hon. members the figure is placed at $19,942,641.60. But I do not think this is actually correct. The total value of motor cars produced in Canada in 1925, taking the wholesale price, was $107,694,-168. Of this total $40,387,904 worth was exported, leaving a balance of $67,306,264 as the value sold in Canada. These cars were sold as cheaply as possible, and at very little profit to the manufacturer.

I am not familiar with the Ford position, about which a great deal has been said, but I think that Ford cars are in rather a different class from most others cars; and the cars on which the Ford company has made the greatest amount of money are in the category of utility cars, the cheapest cars, purchased by the largest number of people. The profits made in that way may seem big. If cars to an equivalent amount of value, namely, $67,506.26, had been imported and sold in Canada instead of having been made here, the duty collected would have amounted to approximately $17,000,000. Against this, in 1925, motor car companies paid to the federal government, in customs duties alone, after deducting drawback, the sum of $7,418,513.66. These figures are believed to be accurate to the cent, having been obtained from the Customs department. In addition to this, other companies in Canada, selling goods to motor car manufacturers, paid in duties to the government an amount which these various companies have estimated as closely as they could, at $1,500,000. So that the federal government has collected, in duty alone, the sum of approximately $9,000,000 from materials entering into the motor cars built by Canadian manufacturers and sold in Canada in 1925. This does not include many other items of duty which are more remote in relation to the industry and which could not be accumulated with accuracy. So that the net protection which manufacturers enjoyed did not exceed $8,000,000 on a domestic production of $67,000,000 in value. That, Mr. Speaker, is very different from the story that has been told here to-day.

In conclusion, I will place on record a summary of the results:

Total wages and salaries..	$17,595,282 44
Amount of money spent in Canada for production material and supplies.. ..	38,663,598 65
Payments made to railroads and transportation companies..	6,497,830 93
Value of goods exported..	40,387,904 86

Mr. Speaker, for the reasons I have somewhat imperfectly stated, I am against this resolution. In my opinion the resolution should not be approved by the House, but the whole matter should be referred to the tariff commission for the purpose of study. If it were possible for all the members of this House to study this question as the tariff commission will be in a position to do, I would have no hesitation in saying that the members of this House would be the proper parties to deal with the matter. But there is so much involved, the question is so intricate, that it would require more time than the average member of parliament has to deal with the question adequately; therefore I have no hesitation in saying that to refer it to the tariff commission is the proper disposition to make of the matter.

Mr. S. G. TOBIN (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to support the resolution introduced by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote). While I have nothing to add to the arguments that have been made in support of it, one may be excused for wishing to go on record in support of this resolution, as it is of so much importance to the whole of Canada. We are always glad to support resolutions that will be of benefit to our own district, particularly when such resolutions are of first importance to our own province as well as to the whole of Canada.

This, Mr. Speaker, is an automobile age. From one end of Canada to the other every man and every woman you meet wants an automobile if he or she has not got one. As the mover of the resolution has stated, Ford has said that every farmer should have three,—a truck, a runabout, and a sedan for rainy days. That would be the ideal, but we shall probably not reach that stage for some time. However, we all realize that the automobile to-day is a utility needed by all walks of life, not by farmers only more than by all classes. When we think of automobiles we naturally think of Ford, because he was the creator of the cheap automobile. He believed, as many others in other lines of business believed, that it was better to sell many units at a small profit than a few at a large profit. It seems that in Canada we have adopted the reverse idea, and that some business organizations have decided by the help of high protection that the ideal is to sell a few units at a high profit.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite said this afternoon that the people of the United States did not find fault with Ford because he made millions. No, they could not, because Ford made his millions by his genius and ability. He made cars that were sold cheaply and that could compete anywhere, and people were glad to buy them; so why should they find fault with Ford? But I say we are trying to undo the very thing he did. Certain organizations in this country are saying: Here is our opportunity to make fortunes. They do not say: Here is our chance to do a good business. They wish to take advantage of the tariff to make a fortune for themselves. That is what I am against. I wish to be fair to all business in this country, bar none. I wish all business men to profit, but when it has been shown so well to-day that an initial investment of $125,000 by the Ford people in Canada has grown to assets amounting to $31,000,000 to-day, and that they have paid out approximately $20,000,000 in cash and stock dividends, I say that is a business that certainly does not require as much protection as it now enjoys. Someone quoted the Financial Post this afternoon as saying that if Ford had received the full value in stock and dividends for the 625 shares he got for his patent rights, he would have received $21,812,500. I presume that is true, because it has been stated over and over again by members of this House and has not been contradicted.

I trust that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Meighen) will take this resolution seriously and will give us his views in a businesslike manner. I have great faith in the ability of the leader of the opposition, and if he would only use his ability in the right way it would be a great advantage to us.

Mr. BENNETT: Give him a chance.

Mr. TOBIN: We are going to give him a chance. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) believes in mass production, but how are you going to get mass production by keeping prices up? Ford got mass production by lowering his prices, and that is what we want. Let us get mass production in this country by producing the cars as cheaply as possible. That is the very thing we wish to do. I do not concur in the suggestion that we should go to the officers of these firms and ask them what we should do in the matter, or that we should wait until the tariff board sits and ask them the same question. Let us deal with the matter ourselves. Let us act promptly and in a businesslike way. The country is anxiously awaiting our decision.

I want to be brief, but before I close I wish to refer to the statements of certain hon. gentlemen who have spoken during this debate. Some of them have claimed that if the duty on automobiles was reduced the automobile factories would go out of business. Instead of the factories going out of business as a result of a reduction in the duty, I would expect that they would receive a considerable stimulus. One hon. gentleman, who comes from Omaha, I believe—no, I beg pardon; Oshawa—talked of the serious effects to his town that would follow from a reduction of duty. He dilated upon the debenture debt of the town, and the nature of the different expenditures they had incurred. The tone of his argument was that they were doing very well as they were, so why not leave them alone? But besides the interests of Oshawa I suppose we have to consider the welfare of hundreds of thousands of other citizens in other parts of the country. As a result of a reduction in duty automobiles, I think, would become cheaper, also automobile parts. I would like to see everything all down the line, even gasoline, become cheaper. That is what we are working for, I hope, in this Dominion. Then we shall have a revival of business; the industry will not be hurt in any way but rather stimulated, and an impetus will be given to other lines of business.

We read about the exports of cars from Canada. No less than 56,000 cars were exported last year. Surely these cars are not being exported at a loss? Surely this argument is not being advanced in order to influence the government with the idea of making the good Canadian people pay the difference? Of course it is quite possible for an industry to make a large enough profit at home to justify exportation on a basis of reduced profits or even losses.

I think I have indicated where I stand on this resolution. I hope it will not be referred to any tariff advisory board. The hon. member who introduced the resolution has looked into the matter, and I think the figures he brought forward, as well as his arguments, are wholly dependable. I know the hon. gentleman well and I am convinced that any arguments he brought forward would be as fair as he could possibly make them; he would not be betrayed by bias into any unfair argument. The great majority of the members of this House and of the people of Canada are earnestly looking to this government to do something to relieve the situation in order that they may get cars at a price approaching that which obtains on the other side of the international boundary line. At the present time a really good car costs in Canada $1,000 more than across the line—a tremendous advance. I hope therefore that the House will adopt the resolution. I heartily support it.

Mr. A. M. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I wish to compliment the mover of the resolution before the House proposing a substantial reduction in the duty upon automobiles and motor trucks (Mr. Coote) for placing before the House some very valuable statistics. During my recent visit to the west I found there were two things the people seemed to be most vitally interested in: First, the Hudson Bay railway, and second, a reduction in the duty on automobiles. I think I have had more letters on this subject than on any other question since I came to Ottawa. A very short time ago hon. members were presented with a very fine copy of some statistics prepared by the Ford Motor Company of Ford, Ontario. These contained information of a rather interesting character, but there were certain facts which the document omitted to state, facts which I thought I would like to have. Accordingly on March 16 I addressed a letter to the Ford Motor Company, of Canada, Limited, Ford, Ontario, in which I said:

Dear Sirs,

Please accept my thanks for your beautifully prepared statistics, "The Real Facts about Ford".

I went on to say:

(1) The original investment in your company.

(2) How much additional capital was put in the company, which was not taken out of profits?

(3) The dividends paid yearly on actual capital originally invested.

(4) Any bonuses which may have been paid.

I received a reply from the Ford Motor Company, and I think the figures they give can very well be taken as authentic because the letter was written by the vice-president and treasurer of the company. In a letter addressed to myself, dated March 23, 1926, the writer says:

Referring to your letter of the sixteenth which was received during the writer's absence in Ottawa—you may recall the writer called on you last week and discussed this matter with you.

(1) The original investment of the company, $125,000.

(2) Additional capital put in the company not taken out of profits, None.

(3) The dividends paid from year to year on original capital invested—

Year	Amount
1910	125,000
1919	2,450,000
1920	1,050,000

(4) Bonuses paid, None.

I am given to understand that in these lean years there were certain stock bonuses issued. When we add those up we find that the total dividends paid in the twenty years amounted to $12,851,238, or an average per year for the twenty years of $642,561. In addition to that I have this statement of their own here which shows that the total investment—and the word "investment" is underlined—in the business was $31,275,530. These two figures added together, the dividends plus the present value of the assets, make a total of $43,978,006. If we average that up for the year and take all the dividends plus the assets it would represent a yearly average of $2,198,900. Now, mark you, Mr. Speaker, the only investment made by this company was $125,000, and according to their own figures that was worth to them annually about $2,198,900. This is one of the infant industries of this country. An infant industry! I have had a little to do with infants during my career. I have had to do with bottle fed and spoon fed babies, but in my judgment this has been the finest spoon fed and bottle fed baby I have had anything to do with. I wonder when the child will be able to walk on its own feet? It has been my experience that if you keep babies bound up too long they will never grow strong, and I think the time is long past due when this baby should be loosed and allowed to walk upon its own feet.

I have been very much interested in some of the remarks made by some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to-night, and I was greatly interested in the remarks of the hon. member from East Essex (Mr. Morand). He said the automobile manufacturers had a right to have a fair profit. I think no hon. gentleman in this House will disagree with the statement that any concern has a right to have a fair profit, but I would ask hon. members if the figures I have given constitute what the hon. member would regard as a fair profit. I have a few figures relating to the business of another concern; I must say I have not been able to get such extensive figures as in the other case, but they are sufficient to show the difference in the cost of some models in Canada as compared with similar models in the United States:

United States price	Canadian price
1,475	2,155

But those cars were not made by Ford; I think they were made nearer Oshawa. I was very much interested by the statement made by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Kaiser) in which constituency, I understand Oshawa is situated. He gave us rather a nice outline of the growth of the city which he has the honour to represent in this House. He was much worried because in 1920 they had a debt of $900,000, which grew in 1925 to $3,383,000. I was not very much concerned about that small amount of money when they had the automobile industry there. With all these industries going they could wipe out a little thing like that overnight. Is it not a wonderful thing that a small city could grow to such an extent with a protected industry? I come from a city where in 1903 there were 113 people, and to-day, twenty-three years later, there is a population of between 30,000 or 35,000, but it did not grow up on a protected industry.

Some hon. gentlemen opposite wonder why we in western Canada speak about protection all the time. I am going to ask hon. members in this House how they protect the wheat farmer? Out there we have to grow up and have to provide all the things they have to provide in Oshawa. We have as fine schools there as they have anywhere else. We are a little bit proud of our schools and our secondary education. We are proud of the provincial university, which happens to be located there. We have churches in that town, and I think they are a fair sample of the churches in the Dominion of Canada. I am glad to know that in Oshawa they have their churches, and I hope the hon. member will attend there often; perhaps if he does he will have a little of the the milk of human kindness in his make-up and will not be asking for continued protection.

My hon. friend said that if the reduction in the tariff were made 20,000 people in Oshawa would suffer. Let me say that if no reduction is made millions of people will suffer. From my hon. friend's remarks one would be led to think that if there was some reduction in the duty on automobiles all the people engaged in the Ford industry would go somewhere else. I find on page 3 of the Ford Motor document the following:

> Do these three cities mean anything to you?

Then they give pictures of Brantford, Regina and Calgary and they say:

> The Ford industry supports the equivalent of the populations of Brantford, Regina and Calgary, 121,844 people.

Ford Motor Company of Canada, Limited	6,706
Ford dealers..	3,300
Ford service garages..	8,754
Allied industries..	6,000
Dependents..	97,084

Allied industries! They seem to be worried about these allied industries and dependents. Is it supposed that if there were some reduction in this duty, the company which only made these slight profits I quoted a little while ago would go out of business? Let us not be worried or afraid of the Ford company in Canada going out of business on account of reduction in duty. If the duty were removed or lowered, it would reduce the price of cars, and I think I can assure the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) that the price of cars will go down the moment the reduction is announced; it will not wait until the reduction comes into effect.

Cheaper production would mean an increase in the sale of cars, and instead of having less employees in Canada there would be a greater number. Then why all this talk from hon. members opposite to the effect that we must have protection? Why the talk? They were telling us just the reverse all along. They were worried about the egg industry and the strawberry industry—trying to draw a red herring over the trail; trying to get us to admit the principle of protection, which we shall never admit. Why? If the argument is good one way, it is good the other way. I say that the price of the Ford car should come down. We do not want to injure that industry in Canada; but what will happen? If the price is lowered, some of the people living in the country from which I come will be in a position to get a car which they need. You may ask what kind of country we have out west. It is a country sparsely settled, over a wide area, and we have to travel long distances. Last September and October I was out there, and what kind of people did I see hauling grain to the market? I saw the women and children out in cold stormy days hauling the grain. Are these people not entitled to a bit of luxury? Cars are a necessity out in that country, but even if they were not a necessity, is there anyone who will deny that the women and children are entitled to that much luxury; that they should be in a position to have a car so that they may travel around and get over to see their friends in the long summer days? It means a great deal in western Canada that the price of cars should be reduced as much as possible. We do not want to injure the industries of eastern Canada, but we say the profits being made in the automobile industry are outrageous, and that the tariff must be immediately reduced. I should like to ask hon. members in this House, with the exception of two or three who have spoken, if they believe in a 35 per cent protective tariff on automobiles? Does the right hon. leader of the opposition believe in such a tariff?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. gentleman might address his remarks to the government, none of whom have spoken yet.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I will address them in a moment. I take it the right hon. leader of the opposition does believe in a 35 per cent tariff on automobiles. I heard only three hon. members in this House to-day suggest—and some of them made the suggestion very mildly—that the 35 per cent duty was all right.

I will now speak to this government, and I will say to them that the time has arrived for a reduction in the duty on automobiles; it would be the most popular and just thing the government could do. We do not want to refer the matter to a tariff board that is not yet in existence, because we have had sufficient evidence in this House to-day to show that the time has arrived that the duty on automobiles should be reduced.

If I may venture to make a statement which may seem a bit bold, I will say, in reference to one gentleman whose name has been mentioned in connection with this tariff board, that I think he would have been a little better advised, as the right hon. leader of the opposition said to-day, if he had not made so many remarks. This tariff board is one of the most important things we have to consider, and if I may again use the words of the right hon. leader of the opposition, I would say I am not too enthusiastic about a tariff board, but I certainly have no use for his tariff commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the difference.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): There is quite a difference. This House must retain within itself the power to fix the tariff.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the hon. member read the resolution I moved regarding the tariff commission? If he did, he will find the same reservation there as to the power of this House. There is no difference in the world except a difference in name and that is simply to fool Saskatchewan.

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): This is not the time when we should delay by referring this matter to any tariff board which may be created. We have sufficient information at the present time, and the people throughout Canada, whether they are Liberal, Progressive or Conservative, are clamouring for a reduction in the tariff. Unless this comes a great injustice will be done to the Canadian people.

The thanks of the people of this country are due to the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Coote) for bringing the facts to the attention of the House to-day and giving hon. members an opportunity of expressing their opinions upon a matter of public concern. I desire to place myself on record as being unreservedly in favour of a reduction in the duties on automobiles in Canada at the present time.

An hon. MEMBER: By how much?

Mr. YOUNG (Saskatoon): I would not be very drastic in the matter. I would be quite agreeable to leaving on say 10 per cent.

Mr. J. E. LETELLIER (Compton): Mr. Speaker, during the last election I had the pleasure of presenting before the electorate of the constituency which I have the honour to represent, a constituency which is not the least in the province of Quebec, a programme of moderate tariff. I, therefore, feel it my duty, not only for my satisfaction, but for the satisfaction of the people of my constituency, to address a few words to the House on this important question of the tariff. I know, as you do. Sir, that a great deal, if not everything, has been said on this question; but as I, in common with, I presume, all other hon. members, have received from the Ford company a pamphlet which deals with a great number of questions, I believe it is worth while to take advantage of this opportunity of discussing the matter seriously.

I am pleased to say that I concur in a great deal that has been said by my colleague the hon. member for Berthier-Maskinongé (Mr. Gervais). I am in favour of a moderate tariff because I really believe that is the only way of protecting our industries. In Canada we have advantages and opportunities that the people of other countries may not have. For instance we have the benefit of our hydro-electric power development, and by maintaining a moderate tariff we will help our factories to develop and afford opportunities for the establishment of additional industries. As it is getting rather late I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

An hon. MEMBER: Go ahead.

Mr. LETELLIER: I have in my constituency a class of farmers, a class of insurance agents and a class of commercial travellers, and as they all need automobiles, I believe it is my duty to help them out in connection with this question of the tariff. As I have a really bad cold, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

On the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

END OF VOLUME II.

MR. JORDAN (Saskatoon): I am addressing my question to the Minister of Agriculture. I take it the target price mentioned by the opposition does relate to average farm income. I find this in anomalous in this House to-day, since—but I do not feel bound to—I could make quite a speech on this.

I am not sure to what extent the target price is related to the cost of production in the country. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture can tell us if it is not true that the target price is related to the cost of production in the country, and that the target price is not related to the income of a farm family. Perhaps the Minister of Agriculture can tell us if it is not true that the target price is not related to the income of a farm family, and that the target price is related to the cost of production in the country.
