Mr. LAKE. The minister has not answered the suggestion made by the hon. member for Simcoe that subclause (a) might be eliminated without any harm being done, on the ground that the surveyors could very well state, while making their survey, whether any section of land should be open for entry or not. The section as it stands seems to be an extremely arbitrary one, as well as very vague in its wording. The minister is able to cancel an entry within six months, and without any compensation, even though the applicant may have made his entry in perfectly good faith and put certain improvements on the land.

Mr. BOLE. With regard to the policy of giving the minister discretion instead of an Act of parliament to govern in matters of this kind, I will cite a case. In the province of Saskatchewan, to the north of Regina, where members of my own family are homesteaders, they live on what is known as the edge of the bluffs. One mile north of their location it would be, according to my view, unwise to reserve even fifty acres of wood, because all the settlers have abundance; but five or ten miles south of that point it would be wise for the minister to reserve even five or ten acres of wood for the use of the surrounding farmers. Therefore I think it would be very unwise to have a provision limiting the quantity.

Mr. LAKE. What objection would the hon. gentleman have to taking the surveyors' report in regard to that matter? The surveyors, in making their survey, learn exactly the amount of timber, not merely on a certain parcel of land, but in the whole section.

Mr. BOLE. The surveyor only reports on the land he has surveyed. Circumstances could only develop the necessity of the minister exercising his discretion.

Mr. LENNOX. A surveyor who is in the neighbourhood is certainly competent to judge of the quantity of timber within seven or eight or ten miles roundabout. You have in the Act the provision that until the land is surveyed it shall not be open to homesteading. The minister, having the report of his surveyor, should decide at once whether the land is open to homestead or not, and when he does decide that it is open, there should be no cancellation. This opens a big question, the question of all surveyed and unoccupied agricultural land. This section provides that the minister may within six months of the date of entry reserve any tract of land. By section 80 it it provided that the minister may reserve different kinds of lands and among them timber lands. Not only may he reserve them and so prevent a certain person from getting them at the time, but there is the further power conferred on him by section 80 of releasing them again. So that he can turn away one person who has made a homestead entry, and within six months afterwards he can withdraw the same land from reservation, and thus enable some other person to go in and make the entry. I want to ask the minister if there is any strong reason which compels him to have this provision here at all? Could he not cut out the discretionary power at that point, and act upon the report of the surveyor?

Mr. BOLE. Why not act upon the report of the homestead inspector?

Mr. LENNOX. I do not know whether the homestead inspector would have control of the matter at as early a date as that. The surveyor is the first person on the ground, and the minister can at that early date reserve the land if he thinks fit.

I ask the minister, is there any insuperable difficulty in the way of eliminating that clause altogether?

Mr. TURRIFF. The clause is very much the same as the clause that has been in the Act in the past, and I do not think we can improve it very much. I do not think it would be advisable to depend on the surveyor's report as to the quantity of timber on the land. As we all know, the surveyor runs a line around a section, and he has very little knowledge, if the land is scrubby or bushy, of what class of timber is in the centre of the section. To my mind a certain amount of discretion must be left to the minister. In the province of Manitoba there are large tracts of country, especially in the northern and eastern portions of the province, which are covered with timber that you might not call of a merchantable kind, from the sawmill man's point of view, but that you would call very merchantable from a fuel point of view. If that part of the country is to be settled, you must allow a man to homestead even if there is more or less timber on the whole of his quarter-section. But in other parts of the country we have had in the past a very few cases where an entry had to be cancelled where a man deliberately went into a good part of the bush immediately near a market and homesteaded a quarter-section that was practically all composed of merchantable timber suitable for sawmill and building purposes and his sole object was to be able to have a homestead entry, to take those logs off and sell them. In some cases the man would have no intention of utilizing the quarter-section as a farm. Therefore the regulation was made that a man before making a homestead entry had to make an affidavit that there was not more than twenty-five acres or merchantable timber on the quarter-section. We had some cases of that, sometimes over a hundred acres, a solid block of timber, and in some cases the entry was cancelled.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. In order to do so he would have to perjure himself would he not?

Mr. TURRIFF. Yes.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. Were there many of such cases?

Mr. TURRIFF. For instance entry is made by agents in a good many cases, and in others a man would make an application and I remember one excuse a man brought forward was that all the timber on the quarter-section might easily have been put on 25 acres and not have made it exceedingly well timbered at that. I think that this is a provision that you can fairly leave in the hands of the minister. It has been in that condition a great many years and there has been no trouble from it. There is one thing that will have to be looked after and that is in certain portions of the country entries will have to be allowed even where the whole quarter section has been covered with a certain growth of timber. To my mind it has worked out fairly well in the past and I do not think you should provide in a statute that you could only have a homestead entry if there was less than so much timber on the particular quarter-section, because what would apply in one part of the country would be absolutely unreliable in another part, or at least it should not interfere with a man making a homestead entry.

Mr. PERLEY. This seems an argument in favour of leaving this clause out altogether. In the instances cited under the present Act the minister would have the right to reserve that land altogether and when he got his report from his surveyor that would certainly be on the face of the report and it is a very simple matter to reserve any quarter-section of that kind from homestead altogether. He has power under section 80 to do that now, and the instance the hon. gentleman cites is a very strong argument in favour of leaving this out altogether. The minister has that discretion before the land is homesteaded but when a man once homesteads it seems to me he should get the land unless there has been fraud and if there has been fraud it can be cancelled and before it is homesteaded the minister has power under section 80 to reserve it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think it would be a great mistake to withdraw the power from the minister. I know that in the district from which I come a great deal of timber has been destroyed owing to the fact that people could not enter for certain lands on account of these lands being covered with timber which was destroyed, was that there were many railway lands in that section of the country and a great many of these railway lands were timbered and were sold by the railways at a low price to people who might or might not settle on them. A great many went in and settled on the railway lands and they undertook to clear these lands from year to year by setting fires and destroyed a lot of valuable timber. I think that the power should be left with the minister and that he should use it freely too. I think it right and it might be necessary to grant homesteads on quarter-sections entirely covered with timber. It would be a protection to the timber if that was done. In the district from which I come I think it would be well if people were granted in certain districts homestead entries to lands entirely covered with timber. The settlers would be more inclined to protect the timber, but where they are allowed to purchase from the railways the odd sections, the even-numbered sections not being available because of having a certain quantity of timber on them, they burn the timber and destroy it.

Mr. PERLEY. Why cannot the minister settle this when the surveyors report comes in ?

Mr. TURRIFF. The surveyor's report does not say which section is solid timber.

Mr. PERLEY. It should.

Mr. LENNOX. What has been said about the case of fraud is covered under section 22. The minister has power to cancel any homestead entry for fraud or misrepresentation or error.

Mr. SAM HUGHES. In the meantime the timber is all gone.

Mr. LENNOX. That may be. The point I want to make is that the minister is not in any difficulty if we go back to the old regulation and provide that the homesteader should swear that there was not more than a certain specified quantity of timber. That however is not before us at the present time, but if that provision was adopted the minister could still cancel it for a fraudulent or false affidavit. I hope the minister will either drop this or let it stand to take this into consideration.

In subsection (b) the minister will notice that he has power in connection with these water-powers not only to cancel an entry but to withdraw from its application any part or portion of the land entered for. We are only dealing with the quarter-section and I suppose that the minister has not only the power to cancel the whole 160 acres but the still more drastic power to withdraw a portion of it from entry. Then he has power in his discretion to direct that the person who obtained entry be compensated in the event of his having made improvements on the land and to fix the amount of the compensation. I submit as an amendment that he should not have the right to withdraw a portion of it except with the consent of the locatee. He might have a perfect right in the public interest to cancel the whole entry but not to divide it, and withdraw a portion of it unless the party consented to that and he should in any event make compensation. Therefore I submit that this section should be amended by introducing after the word 'or' in the 26th line the words 'with the consent of the person who obtains the entry or those who represent him.' And we should strike out, in the 27th line all the words after the word 'and' and substitute the following 'in either of such cases full compensation for the loss occasioned thereby, should be made to the person who obtained the entry or those who represent him.'

Mr. ALCORN. With reference to subsection (a), I would suggest, in the light of what has been said, that it should be amended upon these lines—that the right of cancellation should be at a specified time after report upon survey. Then, with regard to subsection (b), this is worded in an extraordinary manner and gives just the power I was speaking of a few moments ago. It would involve the right to cancel a homestead two or three miles up the stream from the dam, and that might be done at the instance of the owner of the water-power who might be favourably viewed by the minister. In Ontario, and I presume, in other provinces, under these circumstances the man up the stream would be entitled to damages for flooding his lands, but here, the owner of the power would get out of that liability if the homestead are cancelled by the minister, as could be done under this section as it now stands.

Mr. PERLEY. If the amendment suggested were made, it would be all right, for, if the owner were fully compensated, justice would be done. But surely the minister does not wish to have the discretion to decide whether the owner of the land shall be compensated or not. If a homestead is cancelled in order to develop a water-power, there should be no question about the owner getting compensation. I ask the minister to say if it is intended that it should be in the power of any one person to decide whether a man under these circumstances, should receive compensation or not ? Surely he will agree that all should be treated alike—all compensated or none compensated.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The hour is late, and I think we might consider that matter to-morrow.

Mr. OLIVER. I was going to offer a few remarks, if I might be allowed.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. If the minister would sleep over them, he would be better.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to deal with the subject of the cancellation of the homestead because of timber upon it. The first difficulty in dealing with the matter by reservation beforehand, is that it is not the surveyor's business to report in regard to the timber conditions upon the land he surveys. The surveyor is a contractor who is paid for by the mile for the lines he runs. He reports upon the nature of the country through which the line runs, but with that his interest in the matter ceases ; and, as he is a contractor and not a regularly paid servant he is not in such a position that we can depend, or can be asked to depend, upon the report he makes as to the timber conditions aside from the lines he runs.

Mr. LAKE. You could make such an arrangement with him, could you not ?

Mr. OLIVER. It could be done, but it has not been done hitherto and it would complicate the arrangements with the surveyor. If we make a bargain with him outside of the original one, our hold on him with regard to his original contract is loosened to that degree. Besides, it is a fact that surveys are sometimes made many years in advance of settlement. Sometimes, it is true, we do not keep ahead of the settlers, but sometimes we are far ahead of them. Some surveys have been made so long before settlement that the lines have been obliterated by fire and the character of the country as to timber changed, before the settlers come along to occupy the land. The making of the reservation is entirely in the interest of the settler. And what occurs in my part of the country is this: A number of settlers go into a partially wooded country, and each is anxious to get the clearest piece of land he can, the piece with the least wood upon it. At the same time the fact that there is good timber in some parts of that country is one of the great reasons that part of the settlers go there. But after a dozen men get into a certain township where there happens to be a clump of timber, one of them, some day, will enter that quarter-section on which the timber stands.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. There won't be much of the timber a month or two after ten or fifteen of the farmers have got there.

Mr. OLIVER. Of course, this quarter-section is taken up for speculation and not for agricultural purposes. It is considered fair and reasonable, for the protection of the settlers in such a case, that the power should be held in the hands of the government, not so much for the exercise of it but that those who undertake to speculate in that way at the expense of their neighbours may not be allowed to go too far. However, the hour is late and I agree that the questions raised are important and will have to be considered well. I am willing that the section should be allowed to stand untill to-morrow.

Progress reported.

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. What business is to be taken up to-morrow?

Sir FREDERICK BORDEN. The Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) informed me that the Labour Bill would be gone on with first and after that the Bill we have just been discussing.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.20 a.m., Friday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 15, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

DEATH OF MR. A. A. STOCKTON, M.P.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Mr. Speaker, it is again my very sad duty to have to inform the House that death has once more entered our midst and removed one of our most esteemed colleagues. This is the third time in the course of a week that this painful duty has been imposed upon me. On this occasion the duty is all the more painful that the colleague whom we mourn at this moment was one of the most respected and one of the most esteemed members of this House. Dr. Stockton had been a member of this House for only three sessions, but he had been preceded here by a reputation well earned in the local legislature of his province, and the reputation that he had acquired in that body he sustained by his course in this House. It is nothing but the literal truth to say that in those three years during which he has been with us, he had acquired a reputation for high ability, for fairness in debate, for high moral standing, and for many of the qualities which should distinguish a public man. His loss I am sure must be very severely felt by his political friends, and I can assure them that it is almost as severely felt by his political opponents, and we join with them in conveying to his friends and bereaved family the warmest and deepest sympathy that it is possible to express.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton, Ont.). I thank the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) for the very sympathetic words he has used in regard to the loss we have sustained by the death of Dr. Stockton. I saw him for only a few minutes last Sunday morning, and although he seemed to be very ill, I did not then realize that he was so soon to pass from the strife and turmoil of political life to the eternal rest. He was a man of very scholarly and cultured mind, a man for whom, probably, the world of letters and scholarship had more attraction than political life. He was an eloquent man, a man, as the Prime Minister said, thoroughly fair in debate; in fact I do not think that Dr. Stockton ever had in his heart any instinct which was not that of a gentleman. He was indeed of a most lovable character, and he seemed to possess every trait that could command respect, and the admiration and affection of those who knew him well. I think that not only his own city and province, but the whole of Canada, especially the public life of Canada, has in his death sustained a very great, indeed I might say an irreparable loss.. Our deepest sympathy goes out to his family and friends.

Mr. J. W. DANIEL (St. John City). I wish to join in the tribute which has just been——

Mr. ARMSTRONG. On behalf of the member for St. John City (Mr. Daniel) may I be permitted to read what he was going to say with reference to the death of Dr. Stockton.

'I wish to join in the tribute just paid to our late member and colleague, Dr. Stockton. Coming from and representing largely the same constituency that he did, I feel that he was closer to me than to most of the members present. During his lifetime he always occupied a leading position in St. John and his native province, both as a member of the bar and as a representative of the people. For many years he was in the provincial legislature, and was a leader of his party there. He was a man of strong views and convictions as to duty, and what he considered right, and he had the courage of those convictions, willing to join in their triumph if they succeeded, willing to suffer for them if they did not. He was a most impressive speaker and debater, and in that respect occupied a foremost position in his native province. It has been a matter of satisfaction to me, as I am sure it is to his friends and constituents, to know that in the short time he has been a member of this parliament he had already attained a leading place, and that not only as a parliamentarian, but I believe also in the esteem and respect of members generally. His death will leave a vacancy hard to fill, both in his constituency as well as in parliament and the country; for he was clean in thought, clean in life, and clean in politics. I am sure the members of this House will sympathize warmly with his bereaved relatives.'

Mr. FOSTER. I did want to say a word too, but I cannot——

RESIGNATION OF HON. C. S. HYMAN, M. P.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE (Montmagny) Before proceeding with the Orders of the Day, I want to call your attention and the attention of this House to the report of the special committee on Privileges and Elections. regarding the resignation of the Hon. Mr. Hyman, Minister of Public Works. This report was presented to the House yesterday, and it merely states that the letter of declaration made by the Hon. Mr. Hyman did not constitute a valid resignation of his seat. The report does not conclude with any recommendation, requiring the concurrence or non-concurrence of this House. On this point I desire to quote from Bourinot:

> But when the report does not contain any resolution or other propositions for the consideration of the House, it does not appear that any further proceedings with reference to it, as a report, are necessary. It remains in the possession and on the journals of the House as a basis or ground for such further proceedings as may be proper or necessary.

I might also add that on Bourinot's statement a question of this kind touching the seat of any member is also a question of privilege and should take precedence over any other. The committee on privileges and elections, having brought in this report yesterday, I shall move at the end of my remarks that it be considered now and not concurred in. My reasons are these: It is a very well known fact, Mr. Speaker, that under the British constitution in England no member can resign his seat except under the provision respecting the Chiltern Hundreds. In Canada our practice differs slightly from that of Great Britain. We have a statute under which any member may resign and he may choose, if he please, the mode provided by the statute, which, I may say, is not imperative. For instance, a member may resign from his own seat in the House and I may add that the terms of the statute are not imperative but only give a certain mode of procedure to be followed so that fraud may be avoided and so that the good faith of the member or the good faith of the House shall not be violated. It is a principle both of the British and Canadian constitutions that the House and the House only can declare vacant the seat of any member. The witnesses whom our statute calls for are only there to prevent fraud and it must be remembered that the statute does not say that the members shall have witnesses, but the statute says that a member may, under these conditions, resign his seat. Now Mr. Speaker, I say that the spirit of the law is that, if the House feels satisfied that the intention of the member is to resign, the House can do without the provisions of the statute and if it does it is not necessary for the member to have followed to the very letter the provisions of the statute. In England the speaker's decision in the case of Mr. Bradlaugh who was expelled from the House was this. On March 14, 1881, the speaker in the British House of Commons decided:

> It is a matter for determination of the House, not of the chair, whether a seat is, under certain circumstances, vacant or not, and until the House otherwise order, Mr. Speaker would regard the sitting member as filling the seat.

In the history of our Canadian parliament we have had, I think two cases of the resignations of members brought before the House. The first case was that of Mr. Bruneau, then member for Richelieu. Mr. Bruneau resigned his seat before two witnesses, had a seal affixed to his resignation and sent it by mail to the Speaker. It is a well known principle of law that as soon as a letter is put into the postal box it belongs to the receiver. Therefore, the letter of Mr. Bruneau could be considered as the property of the Speaker of the House of Commons. Mr. Bruneau went to the Speaker and asked him to give him back his resignation. The Speaker gave it back to him. The matter was brought before the House and a vote was taken which shows evidently that the House considered itself the guardian of the seats of members and could decide whether the resignation of Mr. Bruneau could or could not be accepted. This was a perfectly legal resignation; it had complied with all the terms and with the very letter of the statute. The matter was brought before the House and upon a vote being taken it became evident that the House of Commons of Canada, the same as the House of Commons of England, considered itself the only authority which could declare a seat vacant.

Now, we have also in this country the case of Mr. Guite, the member for Bonaventure. Mr. Guite sent his resignation, signed before two witnesses, to Mr. Edgar, who was then Speaker of the House, but there was no seal attached to it. Mr. Edgar gave the following decision in the House:

Mr. SPEAKER. I have also the honour to inform the House that during the month of December last, the hon. member for Bonaventure forwarded to me, and I duly received a form of resignation of his seat as member for the said electoral district. The resignation was in the words and figures, and in the form following:

He gives the letter of the hon. member and then goes on to say:

As such regulation was not executed under the seal of the member in strict compliance with subsection 2 of section 5, chapter 13, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, I determined not to issue my warrant for a new writ of election without first receiving the instructions of your honourable House.

This conclusion I communicated to the hon. member by letter dated 29th December, 1898.

Therefore, Mr. Edgar acknowledged that he could not issue his warrant on that resignation, but he must first consult the House and the House alone could decide and that then, if the House felt satisfied that the resignation was valid, that the intention of the member was evident, he could give instructions to the Speaker to issue his warrant. It is shown here that even though Mr. Guite's resignation was not received, if the House had assented to it, the Speaker could issue his warrant for a new election.

Now, what are the facts set forth in the report of the committee in regard to Mr. Hyman's resignation? They are that Mr. Hyman first sent a letter to the Speaker written in his own hand and bearing his own signature stating his intention to resign. I have seen the letter in the committee. There is no doubt about Mr. Hyman's intention to resign. Secondly, Mr. Hyman wrote a letter to the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), the leader of the House, again stating his intention to resign his seat as the member for London. Then, having been informed by Mr. Duffield of London, that his resignation was not in strict compliance with the terms of the statute, Mr. Hyman manifested for the third time his intention of resigning by telegraphing to Mr. Duffield to have his resignation witnessed and a seal affixed thereto. Therefore, the intention of resigning was perfectly evident and was three times manifested, first, to the Speaker of the House, then to the leader of the House, and then to his friends in London, when he instructed them to have his resignation validated. The signatures of the witnesses were affixed to his resignation. The men who signed as witnesses knew Mr. Hyman perfectly. One gentleman, his partner, had no doubt of his signature and he felt quite sure that it was Mr. Hyman's intention to resign. In giving his evidence in the committee he said that the resignation was in Mr. Hyman's own writing and that it bore his own signature. Therefore, there was no doubt in so far as Mr. Hyman's intentions were concerned and the House has not a shadow of doubt to-day that Mr. Hyman intended to resign. I say that it rests with the House to take action on the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I claim, Mr. Speaker, as I think I have shown before the House, that the terms of the statute are not imperative, that they are there only to avoid fraud and to prevent the good faith of a member being violated, and that as long as the House is satisfied that the intention of the member is to resign his seat, the House which is the only body in the Dominion which can take action, and which can declare his seat vacant can, to-day, if it chooses, declare the Hon. Mr. Hyman's seat vacant. It was the undoubted intention of Mr. Hyman to resign, and as the House has power to declare the seat vacant, I move seconded by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa):

That the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections be not concurred in, but that the hon. gentleman's seat be declared vacant.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that, strictly speaking, this motion should be for the consideration of the report. There is no recommendation in the report one way or the other, which requires the concurrence of the House.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). I am disposed to concur in a good deal of what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Armand Lavergne) has said. There is no question, so far as the legal proposition is concerned, but that, apart from statute, there is no provision by which a member of the House can voluntarily resign his seat. A duty is imposed upon a member of parliament, in the public interest, when he is selected by the people of any constituency to represent them. He cannot avoid performing that duty unless some statutory provision points out to him a method which will relieve him from the burdens of his office. My hon. friend (Mr. Armand Lavergne) is entirely correct in his statement of the position which has been taken, as a matter of record or of history, under similar situations in the British parliament and in this parliament of Canada. The question here seems to be a comparatively narrow one; one for lawyers to decide upon the interpretation of the statute which points out a method under Canadian law, whereby a member of parliament may at his own will divest himself of the responsibility of that position. The statute has chosen to say that there must be a document not only signed by the member, but also under his seal, and that that document must be so signed by the member before not one, but two witnesses. A member may resign by standing in his place in the House and announcing that he does resign. That is a formal act which goes upon the records of the House when it takes place, and of which the House has immediate knowledge, but if the resignation does not take the shape of verbal communication to the House itself, then, to be effective, it must come in a particular form which the statute prescribes. It is easy to understand the reasons for the care with which the legislature provided these safeguards upon the manner of the resignation of a member—to guard against fraud; to protect the House against the possibility that a fraudulent resignation might be put off upon it, and equally to protect the member from the possibility that some one might fraudulently send to Mr. Speaker a resignation, which did not in fact proceed from the member himself. But, whatever the reasons may have been which led to the enactment under consideration, the language of it is very plain and it has its analogy in a somewhat similar statute—a statute passed with somewhat the same object, well known to lawyers, well known to every one—I refer to the statute which permits a man to dispose, during his lifetime, for a period after his death, of property which he may own. It is in a sense an anomalous thing, that a man, before his death, may in a particular manner direct what is to be done with his property for a generation after he himself has gone. Under the law of most, if not all civilized peoples, a man has the right to control the disposition of his property for a greater or lesser length of time after he himself is dead, provided he does so in a certain, particular, specified manner. The requirements of the law in that respect are very similar to the requirements of this particular statute, and they were adopted for somewhat similar reasons. A will, to be effective under the statutes of most of our Canadian provinces, must be signed in the presence of two witnesses, and not only that, but those two witnesses must themselves sign in the presence of the testator; the testator and the two witnesses must be together from the beginning to the end of what the law means to be a somewhat formal ceremony. Now, we have something very like that in this statute, and we have the plain indication that parliament meant, that before a member could effectively resign his seat in the House of Commons, he should prepare a writing; he should sign that writing, and that there should be three people present when it was being so signed. That is not a meaningless thing, that is done for reasons which are abundantly manifest. Then, there was an additional formality prescribed by the law. It is a souvenir, so to speak, of the ancient days, centuries ago when few men wrote, and when the thing by which a man identified himself was his seal. To the mind of the practising lawyer the presence or the absence of a seal on a document, is a matter of no inconsiderable import; it is indeed a matter of practical consequence even at the present day. A document under seal has higher authority than a document without seal. Even though the seal be a wafer or a piece of paper, different rights with regard to contracts solemnized under seal exist between the parties, than if such contracts are not under seal.

In the case of the present paper, which is simply a letter to Mr. Speaker, we have not only the requirement of the law in regard to the presence of two witnesses disregarded, but we have also something which to my mind, though it may seem a technical point, is of equal if not greater importance. This paper left the hands of the member who signed it without any seal. At that time it was unquestionably not effective under the distinct requirement of the law which calls for a document under seal. It now appears with a seal attached to it, and the oral testimony given before the Committee on Privileges and Elections discloses the circumstances under which that seal was attached. By the affixing of a seal to a document which previously had none, if it were a contract or agreement between parties, new rights entirely might be created and new obligations imposed. The putting on of the seal is in the eyes of the law a step not merely of what used to be solemnity, but one of actual practical importance, and that step was here taken upon the authority at most of an unverified telegram which did not even come to the person who chose to affix the seal. I mention this circumstance merely that you Mr. Speaker, may be possessed in outline of the facts which were before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and which necessarily had to be considered by that tribunal. That committee consists of some forty-six members of this House, every one of whom I think is a lawyer. That committee met on three or four separate occasions. It examined all the witnesses who could speak of the circumstances in question, and it then resolved that a subcommittee consisting of five members should be appointed to examine into the law applicable in the case, to search the records and the precedents and to report to the general committee itself. The subcommittee of five members consisted of two from the opposite side of the House and three from this side, and while we often hear jocular remarks made about doctors differing, and those remarks sometimes applied to members of the legal profession, I think it is somewhat to the credit of this subcommittee that they were entirely agreed and entirely unanimous in the view which, after consideration and after examination into the law applicable to the facts in hand, they reported to the committee which had appointed them. Not only so, but in the Committee on Privileges and Elections itself, and at a very full meeting of the committee, when the report of the subcommittee was presented and discussed, the report which we now have upon the Votes and Proceedings of the House was concurred in by that committee, with the single dissenting voice of the particular hon. gentleman who has moved this resolution this afternoon. Nominally it appears as having been concurred in upon division, but the conclusions of the committee in this matter were absolutely unanimous, with the exception I have mentioned, notwithstanding the fact that there was of course the usual marked division on political lines in the composition of the committee. In these circumstances, I think, Mr. Speaker, that the House might well be asked to adopt the conclusions of so large a proportion of its members upon a matter of this character. But I think it is the recognized course of parliamentary practice, certainly the recognized course of procedure in this House, that any report of a committee of the House is, ordinarly speaking, concurred in by the House, and is sent back or is not concurred in only upon good cause shown for the taking of that course. Now, if tried by that test, what cause has my hon. friend from Montmagny shown on this occasion for reversing at a stroke the whole conclusions and the whole work of this committee in these deliberations and adopting exactly the opposite course ? I have listened with care to the observations which he has made in support of the resolution he has proposed; and, without intending any discourtesy to my hon. friend, I must say that I have not heard one single reason advanced for reversing the conclusions to which the Committee on Privileges and Elections has come in this case. The only suggestion he makes is that beyond question the hon. member whose name is signed to this letter addressed to Mr. Speaker intended to resign and so expressed his intention. Well, I might answer to my hon. friend that from some things one has heard not only out of this House but in this House itself, there might not be absolute unanimity in the view which the hon. gentleman has expressed in that regard. It has been said that there never was an intention on the part of the member for London to resign his seat. Be that as it may, he has undoubtedly in this letter, in so many words, expressed the intention. But to return to the legal analogy of a will, it would not serve in the least for a man in the most explicit form to express his intention to do this or to do that with his property after he was done with it, unless he expressed that intention in the exact manner and before the exact witnesses specified in the law. Without that, his expressed intention on the subject would be altogether inoperative and ineffective.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE. Does my hon. friend contend that the House is not the sole body to decide whether this resignation should be accepted or not?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. I have not contended anything to the contrary, Mr. Speaker. That is the matter which I take it is now before the House for consideration. My hon. friend has moved that the House declare this seat to be vacant. Upon what ground can the House be asked to take that action? Only upon the ground that there has been an attempt at a resignation which is upon the face of it inoperative and ineffective, and I am just pointing out that the fact that a member may at a certain time entertain in his own mind the intention to resign does not vacate his seat. The fact that he may day after day express that intention to his fellow members does not vacate the seat. The fact that he may day after day write letters to his fellow members expressing his intention to resign does not vacate his seat. Even the fact that he might address one of those letters to Mr. Speaker would not vacate the seat unless in doing so he complied with the requirements of the statute and signed that letter before two witnesses, and affixed his seal to it, as the statute requires. Under these circumstances, speaking as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, I certainly could feel no doubt as to what the law was, and the matter being purely and simply a legal question, purely and simply an inquiry whether what the statute defines as the only way in which a written resignation can be made had or had not been taken, there was manifestly but the one answer to be given. Why the House should be asked to deal with the matter in exactly the reverse fashion and to pronounce a decision which would be opposed to all previous decisions in any circumstance at all similar that can be found in this country or England, is something I am unable to understand. I, therefore, oppose the resolution proposed by my hon. friend (Mr. Lavergne), and if it were a matter for concurrence or adoption I would submit that this report ought to be concurred in and adopted by this House.

Mr. H. BOURASSA (Labelle). My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) takes great pride in the fact that in this matter some fourteen or fifteen lawyers all agree. To his mind that is a guarantee of the infallibility of that committee in this particular report. Perhaps I may be lacking in some respect for the legal profession, but I must say that when so many lawyers agree I am inclined to be suspicious. I have found out quite frequently that although lawyers, like doctors, disagree on questions of principle or life and death, yet when it is a question of avoiding the real issue by legal quibbling, they find no difficulty in arriving at a common decision. To my mind, layman as I am, a barbarous and unlegal member of this House as I am, the whole proceedings of this committee with reference to the resignation of Mr. Hyman are one of the greatest parliamentary jokes ever perpetrated, and I think that that is also the view taken by the great mass of the people. What are the facts ? A member of the government, after disclosures of a most damaging character regarding the means taken to secure his election, decided to go south for his health, which no doubt was impaired, and at the same time decided to place his resignation, both as member of this House and member of the cabinet, in the hands of the Speaker and the Prime Minister. As to the intention of Mr. Hyman, I do not think there is any doubt. No one can doubt that Mr. Hyman had the apparent intention to all purposes of resigning. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) seemed to justify the report of the committee by alleging that some doubts had been expressed as to Mr. Hyman's real intention, but it would be rather strange to find one of the colleagues of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Hyman) taking advantage of a declaration made by members of the opposition impugning the good faith of his colleague to argue that possibly his colleague had no intention of resigning.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. I did not argue that.

Mr. BOURASSA. No, but the argument of the hon. minister led to that conclusion, and I am putting it in that light merely to show that the legal argument of my hon. friend cannot do away with the fact that no one entertains any doubt—and least of all could that doubt be entertained by any colleague of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Hyman)—as to the real intention of that hon. minister. In my opinion the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Hyman) felt that he owed it to his self-respect and his sense of dignity as a member of this House to resign his seat which had been gained by such nefarious means, and that his intention was either to withdraw from public life altogether or go before his constituents again and ask for their support in a fair and clean election. I take it therefore that his resignation was genuine and that his message to the First Minister confirmed his intention. I take it also that his message to his agent instructing him to affix his seal to the document was further evidence of his intention to resign. To my mind, as far as the intention of Mr. Hyman is concerned, there cannot be any doubt that he meant to resign, and therefore this House should give him the opportunity of making that resignation good and of justifying his conduct before his own constituents. But of course I bow to the legal acumen of the gentlemen who have decided that Mr. Hyman did not resign. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) has defined his letter as an attempt to resign. It seems rather strange that a man like the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Hyman), who may be credited with some business ability, judgment and common sense, should find such difficulty in putting into effect such an easy thing as giving his resignation to Mr. Speaker as a member of this House.

As regards the procedure required by statute to make valid the resignation of a member of this House, I quite agree with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) that certain formalities should exist in order to protect the House against any fradulent resignation, which might otherwise be acted upon, and thus the good faith of the House and of the member himself be abused. But what are the circumstances in this matter ? The committee, to which the question was referred, has not thrown the slightest doubt as to the intention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Hyman) to resign his seat. Let me quote the language of the committee. What is the first paragraph of its report ? It is this :

> That the letter or declaration bearing date 20th November, 1906, from the Hon. Charles S. Hyman, as a member of the House of Commons for the electoral district of the city of London, and communicated by His Honour the Speaker to the House, had been, on or about the day when it bears date, made in writing by the said hon. member under his hand, in the words and figures as follows:
> London, November 20, 1906.
> Sir,—I have the honour to tender my resignation as a member of the House of Commons for the electoral division of the city of London.
> Yours truly,
> C. S. HYMAN.

The committee there declares, in so many words, that the resignation had been written by Mr. Hyman. It does not say that a document was received by Mr. Speaker purporting to be a resignation and that the committee had no proof that the document was genuine. If none of the formalities had been observed, and their non-observance exposed the House to be deceived and the Speaker to be deceived, I would conclude exactly as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) has done. But the report of the committee declares that Mr. Hyman did write his resignation and did affix his signature to that document. So that as regards the authenticity of the document and the signature of Mr. Hyman, the report of that committee shows that what the Minister of Justice has described as an attempt at resignation is a resignation in fact. Therefore it is absurd to talk of any necessity for protecting the good faith of the House, or protecting a member against any fraudulent resignation such as, for instance, a possibly forged document. What remains to be decided is whether those formalities are, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, so binding that even when it is clearly beyond doubt that a member of parliament has been attempting for three months in good faith to resign, the House will not accept his resignation because the document is lacking some piece of sealing wax or red tape.

I repeat that while I have of course a great deal of respect for the legal opinion of the Minister of Justice or of any body of lawyers, it seems to me that the idea of attaching so much importance to formalities that have been introduced for a moral purpose, is certainly not of such a character that we must follow those formalities when the purpose for which they have been introduced is completely and more than completely reached by the evidence that was before the committee, and when the committee itself concludes that the object for which these formalities had been introduced had been accomplished, which is that Mr. Hyman meant to resign and in fact had resigned.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) has compared this to the formalities that are required for the execution of a will. Without attempting to enter into a legal argument with the learned gentleman, I dare say that, in my humble common sense, there is quite a difference between the formalities required for the execution of a will and the formalities required for the execution of a document of this kind. The formalities required for the execution of a will must necessarily be of the most binding character, because when the document is proved the man who is directly interested in it is no longer there to say whether he did or did not sign that document; whilst in a matter of this kind, the man is living, and in this instance, he has been in communication with the Prime Minister, members of his family have been in communication with the Prime Minister, he has been in communication with his own agent, he has manifested time and again, since that document was signed, that he meant the document to be genuine and wanted to resign. The Minister of Justice now tells us that we cannot act on that because the document has to be compared to a will which has to be proved after the interested party, the signer, has died and is no longer there to prove his good faith and his signature, or to challenge those who may want to impose on his heirs a false document.

The minister has given as another reason for not accepting the resignation of Mr. Hyman, the fact that it was completed after it was signed, and he said: Suppose a contract in civil matters to be entered into between parties and signed on a certain date, all the formalities not having been accomplished but the document being filled in later on by the parties, the conditions may have changed in the meantime. That is exactly where the comparison of the Minister of Justice is lacking because in a matter of this kind there is no question of contract, it is the status of a member of parliament in this House. Now that member finding that the conditions under which he became a member of this House are such that he feels bound in honour to step out of the House in order to redeem his honour by going back to his constituents, where is the change—because the little red paper has been affixed fifteen days or three months later? Where is the change in the position of Mr. Hyman either before the House or before the country or before his constituents? If his resignation had been based solely on the ground of ill-health, and as I understand that Mr. Hyman is now in good health and coming back to parliament, then I would understand that there would be a certain ground for the argument of the Minister of Justice, because circumstances would be changed; but, Sir, the circumstances that were unveiled in the police court in Toronto have not changed; they are exactly the same as they were then. Either they were of a damaging character or they were not of a damaging character; and I presume the Minister of Public Works, the member for London (Mr. Hyman) is the sole judge of his honour, the sole judge of his relations with his constituents, and with this House. In his full capacity as minister and as member, in the enjoyment of his full liberty he has judged it necessary for his own honour, his own standing in this House, to tender his resignation and to go back to his constituents. And now we come and say: We know that Mr. Hyman wanted to resign, we agree to his request; but because a certain little piece of red paper was affixed three weeks later, his resignation is no good, and he has a right to remain in this House. Of course it may be that Mr. Hyman, when he comes back, will take the necessary procedure, and will give in due form his resignation before the House, but I repeat that in the eyes of the common place people of this country, in the eyes of the people who have not been initiated to the highest and most subtle lights of law, it will certainly appear that this whole procedure is nothing but a farce, in order to avoid an election in London ; and the agreement between both parties in this committee will be judged by many people to have been reached not because there was such a consensus of opinion among lawyers, but because politicians on both sides did not care to have an election in London at the present time ; and I think that is a far better explanation of the report of this committee than the affixing of seals or the signing of that document on this day or that by certain gentlemen as witnesses.

Motion (Mr. Lavergne) negatived.

REPORT OF THE PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. BARKER moved :

That the sixth report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts be taken into consideration at the next sitting of this House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The next sitting of this House will be on Monday ; that will be a very inconvenient day to take such a motion and I suggest therefore that it be taken into consideration on Wednesday next.

Mr. BARKER. I agree to that.

Motion as amended agreed to.

Mr. BARKER moved :

That the minutes of proceedings accompanying the sixth report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts be printed in the Votes and Proceedings of the House of this day.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 117) for the relief of Selina Kingan Ansley.

Bill (No. 118) for the relief of George William Hadley.

REPORT OF THE INSURANCE COMMISSION.

Mr. BOURASSA. Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to give notice to the House that on a week from Tuesday next, on a motion to go into supply, I shall bring up again, for more complete discussion the matter on which I have already twice addressed the House : I mean the consideration of the accusations, or insinuations, or charges, that have been exchanged between members on both sides of this House. In order to make myself quite clear and that everybody may be prepared for it, I intend to refer to the report of the Insurance Commission, not exactly in order to consider its conclusions, but in order to complete what I would call the documentary evidence in support of the subject I want to discuss. I have consulted the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition, and they both agree that a week from Tuesday would be convenient.

PREVENTION AND SETTLEMENT OF STRIKES AND LOCKOUTS.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 36) to aid in the prevention and settlement of strikes and lockouts in mines and industries connected with public utilities.—Mr. Lemieux.

Mr. LENNOX. When we were last in committee certain amendments were proposed, one by the leader of the opposition, and I understood that the Bill was to be reprinted and that that particular matter would be considered, that is, the question of applying this Act to railway employees.

Mr. LEMIEUX. When the committee reported progress the other day we were engaged in the discussion of that clause of the Bill, which give the railway employees and companies a right to invoke either the Railway Labour Disputes Act or the present Act, in case of any dispute arising between them. I drafted an amendment which was discussed, and which embodies the principle I have just mentioned. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition also suggested an amendment on similar lines, but a little different in the wording.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is the new section printed in this Bill ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, I did not have that section printed for the reason that I propose to give now. I propose to move the reconsideration of three clauses of the Bill which have been adopted so as to incorporate in them the principle contained in a section which I proposed to the committee the other day. I move that we reconsider sections 5, 6 and 56.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The present section 5 reads as follows :

Whenever any dispute exists between an employer and any of his employees, and the parties thereto are unable to adjust it without having recourse to a lockout or strike, either of the parties to the dispute may make application to the minister for the appointment of a board of conciliation and investigation, to which board the dispute may be referred under the provisions of this Act.

The amendment I propose is as follows :

Provided, however, in the case of a dispute between a railway company and its employees, such dispute may be referred for the purpose of conciliation and investigation under the provisions concerning railway disputes in the Act respecting conciliation and labour.

This will give the railway employees and companies the option which I mentioned the other day, and to which both sides of the House agreed.

Mr. BOURASSA. Will that have the same effect as the original section in preventing strikes ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes. I may say that the object of the three amendments is the same as the object contained in the clause which I intended to insert in the Bill the other day, that is to say, to give the railway companies and their employees the benefit of both Acts, the Railway Labour Disputes Act and the present Act, for the purpose of a public investigation in any case before a strike or a lockout.

Mr. BOURASSA. I think the minister stated the other day that some amendments would be required to the other Act.

Mr. LEMIEUX. We have changed our minds since. We are going to bring the railway employees and companies under the Railway Labour Disputes Act. That would make it compulsory upon them to have an investigation before a strike or lockout. We made that offer to the railway brotherhood and they objected to it, because they said that the procedure was too expensive and too cumbersome. Now as they refused our offer we came at the last sitting of the committee with the proposition to put them under either one of the two Acts, with this condition, however, that the investigation should take place necessarily before a strike or a lockout. Now, coming to the section which I propose to amend, I will read it as amended :

Whenever, under this Act an application is made in due form for the appointment of a board of conciliation and investigation and such application does not relate to a dispute which is the subject of a reference under the provisions concerning railway disputes in the Act respecting conciliation and labour, the minister, whose decision for such purpose shall be final, shall, within fifteen days from the date at which the application is received, establish such board under his hand and seal of office if satisfied that the provisions of this Act apply.

This amendment is made necessary on account of the objection that was made ; that is to say if one of the parties shall refer under this Act and if it should happen that the other party shall invoke the other Act. Under this clause, as amended, the minister would direct the parties to go under the Act which would have been invoked at first by either of the two parties. Now, the other amendment comes in section 56, which section as amended would read as follows :

It shall be unlawful for any employer to declare or cause a lockout, or for any employee to go on strike, on account of any dispute prior to or during a reference of such dispute to a board of conciliation and investigation.

Then it is proposed to drop out from the words 'or during' to the word 'under.'

Under the provisions of this Act, or prior to, or during a reference under the provisions concerning railway disputes in the Act respecting conciliation and labour; provided that nothing in this Act shall prohibit the suspension or discontinuance of any industry or of the working of any persons therein for any cause not constituting a lockout or strike ; provided also, that except where the parties have entered into an agreement under section 62 of this Act, nothing in this Act shall be held to restrict any employer from declaring a lockout or any employee from going on strike with respect to any dispute which has been duly referred to the board and which has been dealt with under sections 24 or 25 of this Act or with respect to any dispute which has been the subject of a reference under the provisions concerning railway disputes in the Act respecting conciliation and labour.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, you have in these three amendments only one amendment because they embody only one principle ; that is that you give to the railway companies and to the railway employees two modes of procedure in case of a threatened lockout or strike. They can invoke the Railway Labour Disputes Act or they can invoke the provisions of the present Act. They are the two modes of procedure under which they can have a dispute investigated. But the main principle which predominates in both cases is that whether you come under the operation of the Railway Labour Disputes Act or under the operation of this Act no strike or lockout can be declared prior to or pending the investigation which can be had under these two Acts.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The practical effect of this is to amend the Railway Disputes Act by importing into it the provisions of section 56. I do not see very much difference between that and the Act in its first form. There is not very much difference in so far as the principle is concerned. That which the railway men object to in this Bill is imposed upon them by means of another procedure or of another form of legislation. That is all it amounts to as far as I understand it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend knows the objections of the railway men to the present legislation. The objections are twofold, first, that the procedure under this Act is too expensive, and second, that it is too cumbersome. They do not object to a public investigation before the strike or lockout. A few of the brotherhoods object to the procedure as being too cumbersome and to expensive. If my hon. friend will read carefully the letters that have been published he will find that these are the two objections made. Now, I am positive in saying that no railway employee and no railway company are against the principle of compulsory investigation. I think I can make bold to say that every fair minded railway employee and every railway company in this country will be in favour of this principle. Some of the railway employees object to this procedure as provided by this Act because they are under the impression that it is too cumbersome and too expensive. Well, we meet them half way. We say: Our Act must go into force and the brotherhoods and railway employee who would prefer to come under this Act will be at liberty to invoke this Act, while, if those who have been accustomed to the Act of 1903, choose to come under that Act they may do so. They will have their investigation less expensive and less cumbersome, as they state. They will have the benefit and advantage of that Act. That option is given to them in clear words and I believe that it would be in the interests of the country. My hon. friend, as well as nearly every hon. member of this House, has agreed that the principle of a compulsory public investigation before a strike or lockout is a safe and good principle. Well, let us carry out that principle fairly and squarely.

Mr. HAGGART. Would the hon. gentleman state how it is more cumbersome for the railway people than for others?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The brotherhood represented by one gentleman here were the only ones to object and to state that the provisions of this Act are cumbersome and expensive. We say they are not. We say they are less cumbersome and expensive than those of the other Act, but as we have the other Act on our statute-book and as the Act of 1903 has worked fairly well we say that we will leave that Act on our statute-book and that they can take advantage of it

Mr. LENNOX. It is eminently unfair to every one concerned, that the minister should adopt such methods as he is adopting in reference to this Bill. It is bad enough that this Bill was not sent to a committee in the first place, but it is worse when at the last moment a most important amendment on a most debateable point is presented to us, without notice, and without opportunity to consult those immediately interested. That is not fair to the men; it is not fair to the members of this committee, it is a thing which should not be tolerated by the House.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. I join in the protest of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Lennox). This is one of the most important Bills that has been introduced into this House of Commons for some years. It has been discussed at great length in the House and in the committee, and outside of the House by the people of the country. The Bill proposes reforms which are new and experimental in their nature, and the interests concerned should have every opportunity for consideration of its provisions. The most important feature of this Bill is the section which is now before us. There is no desire to make any political capital out of this measure; it is a measure which the House should approach from the standpoint of fairness, to the exclusion of party considerations, and I think members on both sides have regarded it in that light. When this Bill was last in committee, the Minister of Labour promised that it would be reprinted, and that a clause would be included in the reprint covering the point we are now discussing. That has not been done, and I have had to depend on a typewritten copy of this amendment, which I obtained from the chairman, in order that I may endeavour to understand its effect. The amendment, is far reaching. I have taken an active interest in this Bill from its very inception, and I certainly am unable, without time for consideration, to express anything like an intelligent opinion on this amendment. The interests affected by this Bill have been more or less consulted during its progress, but now at the last moment it is proposed to rush an important section through the House, without giving the railway men or those interested an opportunity to express their opinion on it. Those outside of the House who are interested in the measure have not been apprised of the contents of this amendment. It is in the interest of the legislature itself, and it is in the public interest, that men, or bodies of men affected by legislation of this kind should have an opportunity of saying what they think about it. It may be that they would agree to the amendment, but that I do not know. Nothing can be more unwise than to enforce such legislation on unwilling people. The measure has been under discussion for a considerable time, and no harm can be done by allowing it to stand further until the railway men have an opportunity of considering this proposal. Had the Minister of Labour taken the advice of many gentlemen in this House when he introduced the Bill, he would have referred it to a special committee, which would have reported long since, and in all probability presented a workable measure for our adoption. At all events, I am entirely opposed to such hasty procedure as is now contemplated by the Minister of Labour.

Mr. PARDEE. There will be an opportunity upon the third reading of the Bill to present any amendment that may be desired, so that between this stage and the third reading, gentlemen opposite will have ample time to consult those whom they desire to consult. Surely it cannot be said by any one that this Bill has not been amply, and thoroughly, and fully discussed. Every phase of it from the preamble to the last section has been gone into. Every objection that could possibly be raised has been raised, and has been considered by the House in committee, until last Monday evening we finally got to the consideration of the clause now before us. The leader of the opposition, and hon. gentlemen on both sides, felt when we last discussed the Bill, that the only thing that remained to be done was to harmonize the provisions of the Act of 1903 so that they could be made effective concurrently with the provisions of this Bill of 1907. It was that point which the committee was endeavouring to solve. Several amendments were submitted by both sides with that end in view, and there was no objection then raised to the fact, that prior to the time of the investigation, no strike should be inaugurated by the men. The House was endeavouring to provide that there should be investigation and conciliation prior to the strike, and the question before us was to make the provisions of the Act of 1907 accord with the provisions of the Act of 1903 in that regard. The views of the various labour organizations, and particularly the views of the trainmen, have been put before the House by their representatives. As I understand it, there has been an absolute conclusion come to by them that they have not the slightest objection to conciliation being invoked prior to a strike. Of course, it is the last thing the men want; it is the last thing any of us want, that a strike should be brought about if there is any possible way of avoiding it. I am led to believe that the men have not the slightest objection to the Board of Arbitration being appointed and to their grievances being looked into prior to the strike, and it is to that end that the amendment now proposed by the Minister of Labour is directed. What the men did take objection to was, that, in their opinion, the procedure under the Act of 1907 was more cumbersome and more expensive than that provided for in the Act of 1903.

They in effect say, let us remain under the Act of 1903, so that we may avoid the cumbersomeness and expensiveness of the other Act, but more than that we care not whether the one Act or the other applies; we are perfectly willing to accept the provisions of the Act of 1907, so long as we may do it under the procedure of the Act of 1903. The hon. member for South Toronto says that the question has been discussed over and over again, not only in the House, but in the labour organizations. I may say that I have letters from labour organizations which, far from being opposed to the Bill, are absolutely in favour of it. So that, with all the discussion that has taken place, and with all the pains that have been bestowed upon the Bill by the members of the House, especially by the Minister of Labour, it is surely not to be said that we cannot pass an Act of this kind without having a precedent for it from somebody else. Surely it is not to be said that we are not to stand on our own feet and initiate legislation on this subject simply because some other country has not tried it. I do not think that is either logical or good policy. I think these amendments are perfectly fair to the railway organizations and to everybody concerned who may come under the Act.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to ask if these particular amendments have been submitted to the representative of the men?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The principle of these amendments has been known to the men for a long time. I have had several communications with Mr. Hall, who represents the brotherhoods, and he has known it to be my intention to propose these amendments. He refused to accept the proposal which I made several weeks ago. I can assure my hon. friend that there is no change in principle in the amendments which I submit to-day. We might pass the Bill through the committee stage, and at the third reading, if there is any opposition to that principle, an amendment might then be made. But there is no change at all in the principle which has been offered to the railway brotherhoods. I may say that at the last sitting of the committee, I thought it would be necessary to add a section, but I found that we could embody the principle in the Bill simply by amending in a few words sections 5, 6 and 56.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The minister's position, as I understand it, is that although these particular amendments have not been submitted to the representative of the men, they do no more than embody a principle which he has already submitted to that representative, and which has not been accepted. That is about the way I understand it. It is practically the first proposition of the minister, although in another form. My hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Pardee) did not quite accurately appreciate my position when we were discussing this matter some time ago. The minister asked me whether or not under the terms of the amendment I proposed, the men would be permitted to strike before an investigation. I told him frankly that I thought they would, and I said further that until the men had an opportunity to come before a committee of this House and make their representations to the members who proposed to legislate for them, you should not impose this restriction upon them against their will. That is not in accordance with what the hon. member for London said just now—through inadvertence, of course. I have no objection to discuss these amendments at the present time; the question whether or not they should stand over, I will not discuss at the moment. Let us look at the amendment to section 5:

Provided, however, in the case of a dispute between a railway company and its employees, such dispute may be referred for the purpose of conciliation and investigation, under the provisions concerning railway disputes, in the Act respecting conciliation and labour.

These provisions provide for two steps. The first step is that the minister may not refer, but cause inquiry to be made into the dispute and the cause thereof, and for that purpose he may establish, under his hand and seal of office, a committee of conciliation, mediation and investigation, to be composed of three persons named by a particular method which I need not set forth. The minister is to notify each party to name a member of the committee, and it shall be the duty of the committee to endeavour, by conciliation and mediation, to assist in bringing about an amicable settlement. If that step does not meet with any success, or, as the statute expresses it, in case the committee is unable to effect an amicable settlement by conciliation and mediation, the minister may refer the difference to arbitration. What I desire to inquire is whether or not it is intended, by the language used in this amendment, to provide that the minister shall take both these steps; because, if so, it seems to me the language is not very happily chosen. The expression is: 'such dispute may be referred for the purpose of conciliation and investigation.' The word 'refer' is used in the statute of 1903 only in connection with the second step, and I presume that is the only step intended.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend will see, in reading over the Act of 1903, that its intent and purpose is to have conciliation and arbitration. It uses the word 'arbitration,' but my hon. friend knows that the purpose is investigation. The conciliation is the first step. If by conciliation the minister succeeds in making peace between the parties, of course he will not have recourse to the other one; but if conciliation does not succeed, then he can order the formation of a board for investigation. I suppose my hon. friend's objection is that it may take too long a time.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am not making any objection, but only trying to find out what is the intent.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The Act of 1903 provides for the establishment, in the first place, of a board of conciliation, and then, if the board of conciliation does not succeed, a board of investigation is appointed.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What I am asking is whether this amendment is intended to provide for both steps contemplated by the Act of 1903 or is it intended, as its language seems to imply, that the minister shall take only the second step mentioned in that Act?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The evident object of the amendment is that if the parties choose to come under the Act of 1903 it does not follow that the two means provided for settling disputes will be taken. If conciliation succeeds, there will be no need for a reference to a board of arbitration. But if conciliation does not succeed, then the other recourse will be had.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. But the amendment says that only one step shall be taken, and that is the second step. 'Such disputes may be referred for the purpose of conciliation and investigation.' That is the language of the amendment.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It adds 'under the provisions concerning railway disputes.'

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. But there is only one reference under the Conciliation and Labour Act. We are dealing with words used in another statute. One clause provides that you may cause inquiry to be made into the dispute or cause thereof. The other provides that in case that inquiry should be futile, you may refer the matter to arbitration. In his amendment the minister says that such dispute may be referred under the provisions of that Act. I would understand that to contemplate only the second step, and that is why I put the question whether or not the minister contemplated the possibility of both steps. It is not a matter perhaps of much moment except that I do not think the amendment carries out the intention of the minister.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I think the amendment is very clear.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If the minister is satisfied, I shall not say another word.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The intention is that railway companies and employees may invoke either one or two means. If they choose to invoke the provisions of the Act of 1903, they may do so. The minister then may cause an inquiry to be made into the dispute, and he has two means of making that inquiry. He must begin by a board of conciliation. If that does not succeed, he may refer the same subject to a board of arbitration, but always under the provisions of that particular Act. I think really the amendment is well drawn.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It may be well drawn, but not for that purpose, because the minister has not used words appropriate to the process provided for by section 13 of the Conciliation and Labour Act. He is only using words appropriate to describe the proceedings under section 15 of this Bill. I feel satisfied the language is not happily chosen, but if the minister is satisfied I shall not argue further.

Mr. CONMEE. Would not the effect go this far? The proceeding is to be under the Act of 1903. That Act contemplates first a board of conciliation. If the word 'reference' is not used, the men might strike at the conclusion of the efforts of those who tried to conciliate, but by using the word 'reference' that makes it clear that until the reference is concluded, which is the latter remedy under the Act of 1903, the men would not be at liberty to strike or the company to lockout.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. LEMIEUX moved that section 6 be amended by inserting after the word 'investigation' and before the words 'the minister' in line nine, the words 'and such application does not relate to a dispute which is the subject of a reference under the provisions concerning railway disputes in the Act respecting Conciliation and Labour.'

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. This section would have a curious effect if the minister's argument of a few days ago is well founded. At that time the minister took the ground that there was no obligation upon him to act under the Conciliation and Labour Act of 1903, that it was absolutely discretionary with him. The result of this then is that as the men cannot go on strike until there has been a reference under that Act, when a dispute once arises the whole question as to whether they can go on strike in all the years to come rests upon the minister.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend is assuming that I will not act wisely in the exercise of my discretion.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am only taking the argument the minister put forward himself on the last occasion. I tried to convince him then but I apparently did not succeed.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I became wiser since.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I must conclude that while holding his opinion he will still exercise that discretion, so if one thousand or two thousand men desire to strike and the minister does not see fit to grant a reference, the men must remain under the then present conditions for all time to come. I do not see any alternative under that proposition.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Of course if I should be unwise enough to refuse a reference in such a case, the parties would only have to invoke the present law and under that law I would be bound to give them a board of investigation. At all events if, as my hon. friend says, I am using language not similar to what I used the other day it is because I have become wiser since, after reading the weighty arguments of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Has the minister really experienced a change of heart and opinion on that question ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not admit it, but assuming that my hon. friend finds contradiction in my words——

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The contradiction is not important but the question of the minister's heart and opinion on this matter is very important. Does the minister feel himself absolutely bound to act under the statute of 1903 in case an application should be made ?

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend the other day stated that the word 'may' used in that section means 'shall.' My first impression on reading that section was that it was purely discretionary on the part of the minister. I may have been wrong, I freely admit if I am wrong I am correcting myself to-day, but I could go so far as to say that the Minister of Labour, being responsible to the country and to parliament, will never refuse a reference whenever an application is made to him and whenever he finds that there is sufficient evidence before him that society is endangered by the threatened strike or lockout. We must believe that the minister will always be wise enough and prudent enough to exercise his judgment cautiously and prudently.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I would ask whether there should not be some time limit on the commission for reporting on a strike of this kind. You limit the time for the appointment of the commission to fifteen days, and I would suggest that if the Board of Inquiry do not report within the specified time the men will have the right to go on strike. I think that is a reasonable precaution and should be inserted in the Bill, because if the board take an interminable time in inquiring into a matter it would be most unfair.

Mr. LEMIEUX. If my hon. friend will read section 68 he will see that :

> The minister may make regulations as to the time within which anything hereby authorized shall be done, and also as to any other matter or thing which appears to him necessary or advisable to the effectual working of the several provisions of this Act. All such regulations shall go into force on the day of the publication thereof in the 'Canada Gazette.'

I quite agree with my hon. friend that it would be very unwise if the Board of Investigation should sit indefinitely and retard the settlement of a dispute or even the using of the weapon which is properly in the hands of the employees. But my hon. friend will admit with me that it would be difficult to fix a limit of time. In some cases as that of the Pennsylvania coal strike the investigation may last a long time and then if we had a limit fixed by statute we might find it cumbersome in the end. The minister may publish these regulations in the 'Canada Gazette' every week, and for instance order interim reports from the commission if it appears to the public and to the parties that the board is delaying matters. In these questions we must rely on the good sense of the minister and especially on that of the registrar, who will, before this board and between the two parties, act as a sound counsellor.

Mr. CONMEE. It seems to me it might be dangerous to put in a limit. I agree with my hon. friend from Yale-Cariboo that it is very important that this reference ought not to be dragged out for a long time and that there should be despatch of business, but if you fix a time I apprehend from my hon. friend that he would desire to have a short time fixed, say thirty or forty days; then this contingency might arise, that one of the parties to the dispute might seek delay in order to accomplish some particular purpose, so if the Act is sufficiently broad to have it in the power of the minister to fix in the commission which he gives to the board or in regulations, some time limit or means of forcing the despatch of business that would seem to be a good remedy. If the Act is broad enough to cover the suggestion of the minister that would meet with my approval, but if it is not, I think this is the time to make such a provision.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Section 68 is broad enough, I think, for that.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does the minister think section 68 would be broad enough to empower an interim report; if it is, I would think section 68 ought to be struck out? But I do not think it would authorize any such thing as that.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is not a report of such a nature that it would be final, it is a report of the progress of the investigation. Public opinion might become impatient, the parties might become impatient, and in order to carry out the intention of the Act it would be wise that an interim report should be published during the investigation, in order to let the public know, who in the last resort is the supreme judge, that progress is made, and that the procedure is not wilfully or corruptly delayed by members of the board. That is the only object of such an interim report.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The minister is talking about the policy upon which this statute should be moulded, I am discussing what is in this Bill; they are two entirely different things. It may be desirable that there should be interim reports, that is one question; the other question is, what does the Bill actually provide. This board has absolutely no power, function or authority in any respect except what is given to it within the four corners of this statute. These powers would be construed with considerable strictness as they involve a departure from the common law of the land. There is only one report provided for, and that is by section 27. That is the only report the board can make which would have an official character. So if it is desirable to have interim reports, you must provide for them by special enactment. I have one further remark with regard to section 68. It seems to me, even under the limited construction which I am inclined to place upon that section, that the powers ought to be exercised by the Governor in Council and not by the minister. They are regulations of some importance, and in so far as this parliament delegates its powers, they ought to be exercised by the Governor in Council. Important changes in that line have been made in legislation during the present session. It is not contemplated I suppose that the minister should make special regulations in any particular case, the regulations are to be in the nature of general regulations. There is therefore no possible inconvenience in my suggestion that they should be made by the Governor in Council. Of course we thoroughly understand that they would be made upon the recommendation of the minister, and the minister no doubt would act upon the report of his technical officer. But the regulations should have behind them the responsibility of the whole cabinet.

> The minister may from time to time make, alter and amend regulations as to the time within which anything hereby authorized shall be done, and also as to any other matter or thing which appears to him necessary or advisable in order to the effectual working of the several provisions of this Act.

Of course this interim report would not be of the nature of a final report, even if it did embody some recommendations which might have a bearing on the whole case. We must certainly surround any such procedure with all the necessary precautions. But as it is only one of the minor details in order to facilitate the operation of the Act, and to put the machinery in motion, so to speak, I think it should be left within the power of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Why?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Because he is the person who is best informed on the subject, he is the one who has in hand the administration of the Act, and he has all the facts and all the knowledge of the progress of the case. I think my hon. friend might well let the clause stand as it is. As I have mentioned several times, this is experimental legislation, and if later on we find that these regulations give too much power to the minister we can amend the Act.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not agree with that at all. The minister recommends to Council, but I want the responsibility of Council behind the regulations. If the minister had to act suddenly to do anything suddenly then power should be given to him.

On section 68,

In the event of any question arising as to whether or not a particular employment properly appertains to an industry or class of industries included under the terms 'agency of transportation or communication, or public service utility,' the matter shall be referred to the minister, whose decision shall be final.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I move to strike out the word 'minister' and to substitute therefor the words 'Governor in Council,' and to add the following words:

And shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days after such publication, or if parliament is not then in session, within fifteen days after the opening of the next session thereof.

Motion agreed to.

On the motion that the amendment shall be read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the amendments are read a second time, I suppose as a matter of course that all these regulations are published in the 'Labour Gazette' so it is not necessary to make any special provision about them; that it is done as a matter of routine?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Amendments concurred in and Bill reported.

DOMINION LANDS ACT—AMENDMENT.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 21) to consolidate and amend the Acts respecting the Public Lands of the Dominion.—Mr. Oliver.

On section 7,—proviso as to water supply and power, harbour and landing.

Mr. LENNOX. On that section we were calling the attention of the hon. minister last night to certain provisions that were not acceptable to some members and we asked the minister to consider the question of leaving out subsection (a) and amending subsection (b). I indicated at that time the amendment that I thought ought to be made in subsection (b). It will probably be clearer if I strike out a certain number of words and read the amendment that I propose to have made to that subsection. I would ask to have all the words after the word 'or' in the 26th line struck out and the following words substituted:

With the consent of the party who obtained entry or who is to represent him in estate withdraw from its applicaton any part or portion of the land entered for and that in either of such cases full compensation for the loss occasioned thereby shall be made to the person who obtained the entry or who represented him in estate.

The minister provides here not only that he may cancel the entry, but that he may cancel it as to part; that is, he may withdraw a portion of the 160 acres from a person who has made the entry. That is an expropriation proceeding of a very drastic character and it is even more than a mere question of expropriation, because it is left in the discretion of the minister whether even in that case he shall allow any compensation or not. I submit that the minister should not have any discretion in the matter. A man enters and obtains his homestead in good faith. If the minister sees fit afterwards to withdraw a portion or all of the land from him there should be no alternative to the minister but to compensate him for the actual loss that he has sustained.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). Mr. Chairman, I am quite willing to agree that there should be no choice as to the payment of compensation. I am quite willing to agree that the question of compensation should be left to arbitration, but I cannot say that I can see in the same light the desirability of leaving the matter subject to the consent of the homesteader. It is necessary, or it is generally conceded to be necessary, that water-powers shall be for the general benefit, and the purpose of this section is that having declared that water-powers exist for the general benefit, means are taken whereby they may be preserved for the general benefit. As the section reads, of course, a hardship is liable to be committed upon a settler, and I am quite agreeable to provision being made that that hardship shall be compensated for by arbitration, but I do not think it would be in the public interest that the right to the land necessary for the development of a water-power should be subject to obtaining the consent of the homesteader. If it were so then the man who had fortunately located a homestead which controlled a water-power would, for all practical purposes, own the water-power and that would not be in the public interest.

Mr. LENNOX. I have not made myself clear to the minister. What I mean is this: I do not think that there should be any limit upon the right of the minister to take back a homestead if he thinks fit, but I do say that the minister should not have the right, without the consent of the owner to say: I will take part and I will not take the whole. In other words when this man goes to obtain the homestead he gets his 160 acres, he is living on it and the minister decides to take eighty acres of it; 160 acres make a farm and eighty acres make no farm at all. The minister has the right to take eighty or 100 acres and to say to the man: You shall keep the balance of it. Yet, the man cannot get any compensation as to that. The minister should have the absolute right to take the land in the public interest, but if he wants to take less than the whole 160 acres and compensate the man for the loss he has sustained it should only be in case the man is willing to retain the balance. That is fair between the country and the settler.

Mr. OLIVER. I think if it were provided that the owner shall be paid compensation, which compensation may be fixed by a fair arbitration then it ought to be competent for the government to withdraw as much or as little of the land as is required, because, if the farm is broken so that the remainder is of no value, it is simply a matter of increasing the compensation. There is no necessity to lay down a hard and fast rule that we must take all or nothing. As long as we agree to compensate on a fair basis and provide that there shall be no limit to the compensation, that is as far as it is necessary to go. In reference to the point raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) I would propose to add the words :

Or withdraw from its application, any part or portion of the land entered for, and the amount of the compensation therefore to be fixed by arbitration.

Mr. LENNOX. You could say :

Or upon making full compensation therefor, the amount of the compensation to be settled by arbitration.

Mr. OLIVER. Will my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) draft some words which would meet the point. The hon. member from Prince Edward (Mr. Alcorn) last night raised a question as to the result of withdrawing land for the development of water-power. Our intention was to withdraw all lands necessary for the construction of the works only, and we left the results of the development to be settled in the ordinary way. We believe the section meant that, but in deference to the hon. gentleman I would ask that the section should read in this way :

If after entry be obtained, it is ascertained that the land entered for or any part or portion thereof, is necessary for the preservation of any water supply, or (for the location and construction of works necessary to) the development of any water-power.

I add the words in parenthesis so as to make the clause quite clear, if there should be any doubt about it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Subsection (a) seems to give a very remarkable discretion to the minister. Is it the minister who is to ascertain that the lands are so valuable that the entries should be withdrawn ?

Mr. OLIVER. In practice it would be the minister on the report of the officers of the department, but really upon the application of the surrounding settlers who would hope to benefit by the reservation of the timber.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There is no provision for compensating a man who may in good faith have made an entry and expended money.

Mr. OLIVER. There is not.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is that fair to the settler ?

Mr. OLIVER. There should be provision to compensate a man who made entry in good faith and made expenditure.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That would be only fair. If there are many cases of this kind who made entry in good faith and made expenditure.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That would be only fair. If there are many cases of this kind in which compensation should be given, it would be less cumbersome if a general provision were made, determining what the compensation should be.

Mr. OLIVER. The cases are few, and I think they will be met by inserting a provision in each clause. We could provide a general clause as to the method of arbitration.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The most convenient and the usual way is to provide, that the proceedings upon an arbitration should be conducted in accordance with the law of a particular province. I suppose Alberta and Saskatchewan have arbitration laws now.

Mr. OLIVER. I rather doubt it.

Mr. McCRANEY. Unless such an Act was passed at the last session, it is my impression that Saskatchewan has no law with regard to arbitration.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Was there an arbitration Act in the Northwest territories ?

Mr. McCRANEY. I have no recollection of it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I have no doubt that British Columbia and Manitoba have arbitration Acts.

Mr. BENNETT. Are not the field notes of the surveyors so comprehensive that they would show if there was considerable quantity of timber on a particular section, so that the department might reserve these at the outset, and present the possibility of such a thing as this occurring.

Mr. OLIVER. The surveyors who run the subdivision lines are contract surveyors, and it is no part of their contract to give us correct information as to the interior of the sections around which they run the lines. I think it will be agreed that if we made another bargain with them it would rather complicate matters and would not produce the very best results. Then, many surveys are made long before settlement occurs, and it may be that in the meantime fires have run over the land and changed the whole condition of the country. Then, as was pointed out last night, the value of the timber does not depend so much on the timber itself as on the country surrounding; that is to say, a small clump of timber surrounded by a large area of clear prairie is of immensely greater value than a similar clump surrounded by a timbered country. The surveyor's notes with regard to the timber are not what we want, and we do not want to make any reservation unless the requirement of settlement calls for it. Therefore, in practice, it is an authority that we do not exercise of our own desire, but simply to meet the desires of settlers for the holding of a piece of timber for their use.

Mr. LAKE. The minister will admit that, if it were possible to do so, it would be preferable for the department to reserve in advance the sections in which entries should not be allowed, and I hope he will endeavour to make arrangements to do that. Where it is impossible to do that in individual cases, I think the suggestion that he has made that there should be compensation where entries have been made in good faith, and that compensation should be settled by arbitration, will meet the case fairly well.

Mr. LENNOX. In amending the section, I think it would be advisable to have something on the line which the hon. leader of the opposition suggests. I started to draft an amendment and found that, in providing that the compensation should be determined by arbitration, it would be necessary to set out the procedure or else to refer to some Act. I think we have in the Dominion statutes a General Arbitration Act which might govern. Later on in this Bill we might have a general provision for that. If the minister has decided not to strike out subsection (a), the alternative is to provide for compensation. In reference to subsection (b), what I propose is, after the word 'for' in the twenty-seventh line, the following: 'Upon payment of full compensation for the loss occasioned thereby, and in case of dispute the amount of compensation shall be determined by arbitration as hereinafter provided.' Perhaps a similar provision in subsection (a) might cover the case.

Mr. OLIVER. And I will introduce a general clause providing for the procedure.

Mr. J. W. ROCHE. The amendment will mitigate to a certain extent the objection made to the original form of this section, but still I wish to reiterate once more my objection to the naming of the homestead inspector as the officer on whose report the minister will cancel or refuse to cancel, as the case may be, a particular homestead. The compensation will of course be satisfactory to the individual whose homestead is cancelled; but after all how much compensation will be necessary to pay for improvements made in the short space of six months? Comparatively little. Having had the experience I have had of homestead inspectors, I was impressed last night with the guilelessness of the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Bole) that the homestead inspectors should report on the timber, for I felt that the hon gentleman, representing a city constituency, could not have had much experience with that class of officials. If he represented Marquette and were in opposition to the government, he would have a better idea of how these homestead inspectors perform their duties. It is only necessary for me to cite one instance. Last session there was a Forestry Bill passed through this House and under it certain lands were withdrawn from the Riding mountain timber reserve. It was published in the Northwest that on the 1st October those lands would be open for entry in the Dauphin office. About three hundred people went up to Dauphin prepared to make entry for those lands, but when they arrived there they were informed by the land agent that it was decided not to open them for entry until the 1st of November. They returned to their homes, and before the 1st of November a message came from Ottawa that the opening of those lands had been indefinitely postponed. In the beginning of the session I asked the minister when those lands were to be opened, and he informed me that the matter was still under consideration, that it had not been definitely decided. I asked him in reference to squatters who had located on the lands prior to their having been taken out of the timber reserve and those who had located since, and his reply was that each individual case would be considered on its merits, and that the homestead inspectors had been authorized to make reports. In that case, as in this, there is no principle applied, but each case is considered by itself. A few weeks ago I was informed by a gentleman who is a political friend of hon. gentlemen opposite that he was told by the homestead inspector to go and locate on those lands, and he would undoubtedly have priority when he came to make his entry. I do not know if the officials have received pointers from the government or not, but they are urging their friends to locate on those lands as squatters and then they will be given precedence in making their entries. When we see homestead inspectors utilizing their position in this way, is it any wonder that I am somewhat skeptical regarding the advantage of placing such great power in their hands and allowing them to be the arbitrators as to whether there is sufficient timber on the lands or not to reserve them from settlement. I would much prefer our adopting the suggestion made last night that the surveyors' report as to the timber, and that different instructions be issued in the future to cover such cases as the present and not have the lands thrown open at all. Even though the holder of the land be compensated, that compensation will amount to very little, and he will lose his hand, which is something he cannot be compensated for.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say positively that homestead inspectors are instructing settlers to settle on those lands at present?

Mr. WILLIAM J. ROCHE. When I was home a few weeks ago I was told by some gentlemen that they themselves were given the tip by a homestead inspector to locate on those lands. I may say further that on October 1 when a number went to Dauphin to enter for the lands, they were told that they would not be opened for another month. Before that month was up I was informed that the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Crawford) said to a gentleman that he need not go up to make an entry the 1st November as the lands would not be opened until after this session and the present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) had no business giving the notice he did. My informant told me that this information came from the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Crawford). That hon. member had inside information that the lands would not be opened until after next session, and within a week after that announcement was published in the newspapers.

Mr. CRAWFORD. As regards the statement about my giving information in connection with the land situation, I deny it altogether. It is utterly unfounded and not in keeping with the facts.

Mr. WILLIAM J. ROCHE. Am I to understand that the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Crawford) did not inform the reeve of Odanah—for it was from him the information came—that those lands would not be opened November 1?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. McCRANEY. I would like to make a correction of a statement I made. I find that there is a general ordinance in chapter 35 of the revised statutes which would govern in the two provinces unless repealed.

Mr. LENNOX. As regards what has been just said on this side, I do not understand that the minister would be complying with the provision he is agreeing to if he were to appoint an inspector as one of the arbitrators. That inspector would represent the government in a very close sense. The provision, I assume, will be a provision for a purely independent tribunal to decide the matter.

Mr. OLIVER. When we get the provision drafted, it will have to meet the approval of the House. For the present it will be quite sufficient to provide that there shall be an arbitration. Later on we will discuss the provision. Even although we should refer to the ordinances or Acts of the present provinces, it would be desirable to have a general clause.

Mr. BENNETT. How would it be to add this proviso, that this shall not refer to any lands which may be comprised in any survey that may be made after this date. The department would then simply instruct all surveyors from this out that they must report on the value of the timber. The department then would be in a position to refuse, in the first instance, to allot the lands to the settler.

Mr. TURRIFF. That provision would not be of much value because the land might not be entered for ten years after the survey. A report on the timber would not be of the slightest value at the end of ten years because a fire might have destroyed the timber altogether. You could not depend on the statement of a surveyor as to the quantity of timber except immediately after the survey was made. That would add very much to the cost of the survey and would be no improvement on the plan adopted in the past. In spite of what has been said about homestead inspectors, my experience of them is that, as a class, they are very reliable and their reports, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, are correct. I do not know of any cases in which individuals have been hurt in any way by reports of inspectors. Sometimes the inspector may not report quite as fully as he might, but as a rule their reports are good and they are the best informed men on that class of work. They are driving all around the country and are in a position to report accurately on all these matters. You would not improve matters by taking this out of the hands of the inspectors. Certainly to make an entry of a quarter-section depend, as to the amount of timber, on the report of a surveyor would not work as well as the present system.

Mr. BENNETT. Assuming that a fire might intervene, as those homestead inspectors are thoroughly conversant, each with his own district, they could report that timber had been destroyed by fire on certain lands.

Mr. TURRIFF. The expense of the survey would be much greater and we would not accomplish anything.

Mr. BENNETT. I have seen the field notes of different sections of land and they seem to me pretty full. They point out where there might be a creek, or a certain part is indicated as being a ridge having stone on it or a little timber or something of that kind.

Mr. OLIVER. This is a matter which has necessarily come to the attention of the department in all stages of its administration, and for the reasons which have been given we have found that it is practically impossible to protect the interests of the settlers in cases where they most need protection. As I have already pointed out, it is not so much the kind of timber or the amount or the condition of the timber as it is the condition of the surrounding country and the requirement of settlers resulting from their coming in. We do not consider it sound policy to make reserves here and there unless there is a direct demand for such reserves. We do not think it good policy to go into a new country and reserve sections here and there from settlement because of timber, but when settlers go into a country and demand the reservation of a section I think it is good policy to give it to them and we think that in this section provision is made to do so and by providing for compensation by arbitration we prevent the possibility of serious damage to any man. At any rate it is a case where the interest of the many should dominate the interest of the individual and we make it as fair as we can all around.

Mr. BENNETT. If a man settled there in the summer he might be dispossessed when the cold weather was coming on and then in the succeeding spring he would have to start out to look up a new homestead. The question of damages would depend on each particular case, and while the damages may be very remote, it would be hard to study out what they would be in each case.

Mr. SPROULE. Why take in one instance only six months in which you can cancel and in the other case until the issue of the patent ?

Mr. OLIVER. The reason for the difference between the six months' term in the one case and the unlimited time in the other is that in the case of timber the benefit to surrounding settlers is only temporary and therefore it is not of as great importance as in the case of the water supply, water-power, harbour, or landing where the benefit is for all time, and it is thought that in such a case the government should have the right to step in and protect the public right at any time up to the issuing of the patent. As the law now stands it has been held that a patent issued for land that controlled a water-power was issued in error and could be cancelled. We do not propose to have any such provision as that, but we desire to lay down clearly and distinctly in the law just how far we are entitled to go and when we are going so very far short of the law as it stands and providing for compensation I think we meet pretty well all interests and all views.

At six o'clock House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. H. GERVAIS (Montreal, St. James) moved the third reading of Bill (No. 82) respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.

Mr. LENNOX. I would ask that this matter be allowed to stand. I was speaking to my hon. friend (Mr. Gervais) about it. There is hardly anybody here to-night and there are some gentlemen who wish to assist me in this matter. I would ask that it stand over until next week.

Mr. GERVAIS. I would be only too glad to comply with the request of my hon. friend, but the promoters of the Bill are very anxious to have it put through this House at as early a day as possible. There are some rumours that this House may prorogue in a few weeks from now and I would not feel at liberty to jeopardize the rights of the promoters of this Bill even for the sake of pleasing a good friend like the hon. member for South Simcoe. I insist upon the third reading of the Bill now.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not know that it is a matter for the private holder of the Bill. I address myself to the government as well. This is a matter that affects the public interest, it is an exceedingly small House, and I think I might very fairly appeal to the government to say that this matter should stand over to-night. I do not want it to stand over beyond next week, but I think that it would be only fair that it should be adjourned.

Mr. GERVAIS. The amendments which are proposed to be made to this Bill were disposed of by this House in 1904. Since then decisions of our courts have been rendered and I do not see that any debate upon these amendments would have any result now. All questions respecting the validity of the arrangement between the employees and railway companies have been settled by the Act, 4 Edward VII, chap. 31. This Act has been submitted, in regard to the question of its constitutionality, to the Supreme Court of Canada, and it has been declared that it was within the jurisdiction of this parliament to pass such legislation. Then an appeal was taken to the Privy Council and the Privy Council confirmed the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada last November. The Act is being put into force by way of procrastination on the first day of April next. All the questions which the hon. member for South Simcoe is trying to raise were threshed out and discussed in the sessions of 1903 and 1904, and later before the courts. As a matter of fact, the amendment which the hon. gentleman wishes to propose now is unconstitutional and moreover useless. I reserve to myself the right to discuss that question later on.

Mr. LENNOX. Will the government say anything in reference to the matter ?

Mr. BRODEUR. I have just read the amendment which has been suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) and it seems to me that this amendment would be better in the Railway Act itself. I do not know why it should be incorporated in the Grand Trunk Railway Bill alone. My impression is that my hon. friend some time ago presented a Bill embodying the principle which we see in this amendment and in view of that I think that my hon. friend should not press his amendment in connection with this Bill. General principles should be embodied in the Railway Act itself and not applied to one company alone. For that reason it seems to me that this amendment, which I have not read very carefully, as I have just now seen it, should not be introduced into a private Bill but must form part of the Railway Act.

Mr. LENNOX. That is begging the question. Here is the private Bill of a railway company in which a large number of people are interested. We have not the means of discussing it to-night. I am prepared to discuss it myself if necessary, but I am asking the ministry to have this matter stand over until it can be properly discussed. I am not going into the merits of whether I am right or not. If the minister says it must go on I will go on and argue it, but it is not giving fair play to a large class of people if it is forced on to-night.

Mr. GERVAIS. The very question which this hon. gentleman wishes to argue has been discussed on previous occasions.

Mr. LENNOX. That is begging the question.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is a motion for the third reading of the Bill and I do not think that hon. members should be allowed to talk three or four times on the question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question, question.

Mr. LENNOX. I understand the position taken by the government at all events, and I shall take a reasonable length of time to explain my position on the matter. The Act I am seeking to amend is an Act conferring some general rights on the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, and providing that they shall also have power for the purpose of making provision for the payment of allowances to employees after leaving the service, to establish a fund to be known as 'Grand Trunk Pension Fund,' and from time to time contribute thereto out of the gross revenues of the company such amounts as the directors determine.

The Bill also provides, by section 6, that :

> Any sums contributed to the said fund by the company shall be considered as, and form part of, the working expenses of the company as defined by the agreement set out in the schedule to the Grand Trunk Act, 1893.

Section 7 provides :

> The directors may make and adopt all such rules, by-laws and regulations not inconsistent with law as they deem proper and necessary for the due and efficient management, administration and disposition of the said fund.

This is not the first legislation that we have had of this kind. We had a provision similar to this introduced in 1874. That was a provision authorizing the Grand Trunk Railway Company to establish a fund to be called the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada Superannuation and Provident Fund. That provision was made by chap. 65 of 37 Vic., 1874. The 11th section provides that they can establish this fund :

> For the payment of superannuation allowances to the officers and servants of the company, or such of them as shall become and continue contributing members of the fund, or for the payment of allowances to such officers and servants in case of sickness, or to their widows or children or other representatives in case of their death.

You will notice that the provision here is for a somewhat similar fund to that which is established by this Act. Then it provides that :

> The fund should be formed, invested, managed and distributed in accordance with the rules and regulations contained in a scheme to be prepared by the company, and sealed with their common seal within six months after the passing of this Act.

And it provided that these regulations may be altered from time to time. So we have here two features common to these Acts, the right to establish a fund, and the right to make rules and regulations for the government of that fund. This Act of 1874 then went on to provide the proportion in which the company should contribute to the fund, and the proportion in which the men should contribute, and also that the fund should be vested in a committee. That was followed by the Act of 1878, chapter 25, a section of which provided :

> It shall be lawful for the Grand Trunk Railway Company to make provision for insurance against accidents to its employees, which may include insurance against death.

Then it provided for contributions, as in the former Act, and it provided that the provisions of the previous Act as to the management of this scheme should apply to the insurance fund by this Act created.

So we had these two features, the right of the Grand Trunk Railway Company to establish a fund, and to make rules and regulations for its management. But the Minister of Marine and Fisheries says that it would be better to have general provisions in the Railway Act, instead of the provision I am asking to introduce by this amendment. Well, we are dealing with a concrete case, we are dealing with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and it is practically the only company in Canada that seeks provisions of this kind. It is the company, too, that created the difficulty, and it is to meet that difficulty that I propose to move an amendment. The difficulty was this: That company proceeded to make rules and regulations under the provisions of these Acts which they were empowered to make. According to their rules, if an employee, or the representatives of an employee had been paid the proportion of the fund provided for by these regulations by way of insurance or indemnity, then, although the death or injury of the person had been caused by the negligence of the company, that person or his representatives had no remedy. It was argued in this House that these statutes could not have that effect. But the fact was that it had that effect, as declared by the cases decided in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. In Grenier and the the Queen, Holden and the Grand Trunk, and Harrison and the Grand Trunk, it was found that these regulations made under the authority of that Act barred the wife and children of the employees that were killed through the negligence of the company, from recovering the compensation to which they would have been entitled but for the passage of that Act.

My hon. friend who is supporting this Bill says that this matter has been determined by legislation already introduced. I should be a reasonable judge of that matter, perhaps, because I was the person who fought for that legislation and got it. But there is no legislation that deals with this matter. My hon. friend says in one breath that this matter is satisfactorily provided for, and in the next he suggests that this is ultra vires. As regards the question of its being ultra vires, that is determined by the statute to which reference has been made. In 1904 we passed the Act 4 Edward VII, chapter 31, to which reference has been made. That Act provided that,

> Notwithstanding anything in any Act heretofore passed by parliament—(a) no railway company within the legislative power or control of parliament, shall be relieved from liability for damages for personal injury to any workman, employee or servant of such company; nor (b) shall any action or suit by such workman, employee or servant, or, in the event of his death, by his personal representatives, against the company, be barred or defeated, by reason of (1) any notice——

And so on. That Act was passed, and it was a condition of its passage that it should be submitted to the court to determine whether it was within the competence of this parliament so to legislate. The Supreme Court, and ultimately the Privy Council, decided that this parliament had power to legislate upon this question, but beyond that, the decision did not go. The Act provided that if it was declared to be competent for this parliament to pass the legislation, then it should come into force by proclamation, and under proclamation issued, it will come into force on the 1st of April next. The section of this Act which I seek to amend, provides:

> The directors may make and adopt all such rules, by-laws and regulations not inconsistent with law as they deem proper for the due and efficient management, administration and disposition of said funds.

Mr. Biggar told us the other day in the committee that he introduced these words 'not inconsistent with law' with a view to meeting the difficulty I am suggesting, that is, that by the introduction of these words we are limiting the right of the company as to the rules and regulations that they might make. Now we have no law that governs a case of this kind. If we had a provision of law which would govern this case, then these words 'inconsistent with law' would be effectual. But we have no common law which will control the Grand Trunk Railway Company and prevent it from making such by-laws, rules and regulations for the management of their fund as they may deem proper and necessary. Therefore I desire to amend that section by providing that there shall not be conferred upon this company, by this section a power such as it was determined that the same company had under the Act of 1874 and 1878, with similar provisions, of preventing a person who has been injured through the negligence of the company, or that person's representatives, from recovering the damages to which they would otherwise be entitled. In other words, I want to make it clear that whilst the railway company professes to be conferring a benefit upon their employees by establishing a fund called a retiring pension fund, they shall not in the future, as they have in the past, take advantage of legislation of this class for the purpose of enabling them to make rules, regulations and provisions by which they shall bar their employees from the just compensation to which they would be entitled but for the passage of this Act. Therefore I move that section 7 of the Bill be amended by adding thereto the following:

> Provided, however, that the company shall not be relieved from liability for damages for personal injury to any of its workmen, employees or servants, nor shall any action or suit therefor by such workman, employee or servant, or, in the event of his death by his wife, heirs at law, or personal representatives against the company, be barred or defeated by any rules, by-laws or regulations made or adopted under authority of this Act, or

2. By reason of any notice, conditions or declaration made or issued by the company as to the terms upon which the said fund or any portion thereof shall become payable, or

3. By reason of any express or implied acknowledgment, acquittance, or release obtained by the company prior to the happening of the wrong or injury complained of or the damage accruing to the purport of effect of releasing or relieving the company from liability for damages for personal injuries as aforesaid, or by reason of the contribution or payment of the moneys of the company to the said fund or of the benefit or payment to which the workman, employee or servant, or his wife, heirs at law or personal representatives may become entitled out of the fund aforesaid.

I contend it is not right, that the Grand Trunk Railway Company should, under cover of the provisions of this Bill, have the opportunity of barring these men and their families from the right of action to recover damages for negligence, to which they would otherwise be entitled. In other words, the Grand Trunk should not be allowed to contract itself out of its liability. I declare by this amendment, that the Grand Trunk, before it takes employees into its service, or when it takes them into its service, shall not have the right to compel them to subscribe to the rules they may make, and one of which may be that in case of accident the employee shall not recover anything beyond the provision made for him in these rules. I ask that there shall be no condition, declaration, or statement by which the company shall escape liability. If, after the accident happens, the employee frees the company from liability, well and good, but I hold that before the accident happens the company should not be allowed to free itself from liability. I provide, therefore, that no arrangement or release signed prior to the happening of the accident, shall have the effect of releasing the company from liability. The Act which this parliament passed in 1904, recognizes that this is a proper provision to make. It cannot be argued that the clause now moved to insert in the Bill is not necessary. It is necessary, because the provisions that were made in 1904 were with reference to the insurance and provident association, and it is therefore in the public interest that this safeguard which I propose, should surround the employees of this company. It is said in section 8 of the Bill:

Nothing in the preceding sections shall be construed as in any way limiting any powers conferred upon the company, but the powers by this Act conferred shall be held in addition thereto.

Mr. LENNOX.

That is an important point, not to be overlooked, in considering the extent to which the company wants to go. As regards the fund which they had authority to create under the Acts of 1874 and 1878, they had power to make rules and regulations, until 1904. The wording of this Bill would not be a just provision, because the powers heretofore conferred were the powers of 1874 and 1878, which were limited by the Act of 1904. Therefore that clause should be amended as the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) proposes, by substituting instead of the words 'heretofore conferred' the words 'now vested in the company'; thus limiting the additional powers to those that are now vested in the company and not to those which were heretofore conferred. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Roche (Marquette) that section 7 be amended as I have read.

Mr. SPEAKER. I desire to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact, that on the third reading of the Bill, no amendments except such as are merely verbal, are customary, under our practice. The usual form is to move, that the order for the third reading be discharged and that the House go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of amending the Bill as proposed.

Mr. LENNOX. Then I beg to put my motion in that form.

Mr. GERVAIS. I rise to a point of order; no notice of this motion has been given.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Lennox).

Amendment negatived.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to move an amendment. Section 8 of the Bill is in these words :

Nothing in the preceding sections shall be construed as in any way limiting any powers heretofore conferred upon the company, but the powers by this Act conferred shall be held to be in addition thereto.

I do not profess to have given a great deal of attention to this matter, but the amendment stands in my name, and is moved at the suggestion of the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), who has given to the subject a great deal of attention and care, and has been, I may say, looked upon as the champion of the railroad employees, including those of the Grand Trunk. This Bill on the face of it looks a very innocent Bill, but on closer inspection it would seem that the Grand Trunk Company has been gathering up every odd and end of legislation which they thought might be favourable to themselves, and in this innocent looking clause there appears to be a good deal involved. In 1874 and 1878 certain legislation was conferred on the Grand Trunk Railway Company by which they were given very extensive powers. These were to a great extent curtailed by legislation enacted in the year 1904. The result of this clause, as I understand it, would be to place them practically in the original position they were in prior to that legislation of 1904, and for that reason it has been considered in the best interest of the employees that this section should be enacted in the words of the amendment which I desire to move, and which is as follows :

That the order for the third reading of the Bill be discharged and that the House go into Committee of the Whole with instructions to consider the following amendment :

That section 8 of said Bill be amended by striking out therefrom the words 'heretofore conferred upon,' and substituting therefore the words 'now vested in.'

The effect of that will simply be that all the employees of this railway will be practically in the same position that they were in on the passing of the legislation of 1904, and it will remove any doubt as to the standing of the men.

Mr. LENNOX. Mr. Speaker, I have just a word to say on this. As I have already said, certain powers were conferred on the Grand Trunk Railway Company by the Acts of 1874 and 1878. In 1904, by 4 Edward VII., chapter 31, we amended that law and curtailed the powers of the company very decidedly, and it has been argued here tonight that we curtailed them to the extent of bringing about the result I sought for by my former amendment. Be that as it may, a number of the powers conferred on the company by the Acts of 1874 and 1878 have been taken away by the Act of 1904. By section 8 of this Bill we propose to add to the powers which the company originally got or which have been at any time conferred on it, the powers which are conferred by this Act, thus taking in the widest range. That is not what this parliament or the Railway Committee expected to do. What they expected to do was to add to the powers that the company now possess by the additional powers contained in this Act. Therefore, I submit that we should adopt the amendment introduced by the hon. member for East Simcoe.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is my hon. friend's point? Is it that these words might operate as a re-enactment of provisions which have been repealed?

Mr. LENNOX. It is provided here that you shall add to the largest powers already conferred on the company all the powers that are contained in this Bill, and the two will make the sum of the company's powers. What you should provide is that the company shall have all the powers given in this Bill in addition to those they possess to-day. And this is how it should read: Nothing in the preceding section shall be construed as in any way limiting the powers now vested in the company, but the powers conferred by this Act shall be in addition thereto.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I should not suppose there will be any objection to that change.

Mr. GERVAIS. If the proposed amendment of the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox) is adopted, section 8 of the Bill might have the effect of repealing the powers granted in years gone by to the Grand Trunk Railway or promoting litigation about the question of rights conferred upon or vested in the company.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I cannot understand the argument of my hon. friend. I cannot see the slightest foundation for one word he has said in that regard. The words proposed to be substituted are 'now vested in.'

Mr. GERVAIS. All the rights 'conferred upon' the Grand Trunk Railway in years gone by are surely vested in that company and when they are now asking for new powers they do not wish that such vested rights be taken away from them.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My hon. friend either does not understand me or I do not understand him, or our minds are so constituted that they will not work along the same lines. He has inserted in this clause very remarkable language:

> Nothing in the preceding sections shall be construed as in any way limiting any of the powers heretofore conferred upon the company.

Now powers have been conferred upon this company and taken away. That is the point made by my hon. friend from Simcoe. They have been conferred upon the company by parliament and have afterwards been taken away or limited or qualified. This clause, which is designed to prevent any repeal of powers now vested in the company, should be limited to the powers which the company now actually possesses. That ought to be perfectly obvious to any one who will give the matter a moment's consideration. The ordinary words for accomplishing that purpose would be these:

> Nothing in the preceding section shall be construed as in any way limiting any powers now vested in the company.

That would be the ordinary way of drafting such a provision. I do not think that that admits of argument. But the hon. gentleman does not do that. Face to face with the position that there have been powers granted which have afterwards been taken away, modified or qualified, he uses language which may be used as an argument that that repeal, qualification or modification is intended to be taken away by this statute, and the law is intended to be restored as it was before the enactment of the repealing or modifying or qualifying sections. If this is a bona fide attempt to accomplish only what the hon. gentleman says, there is absolutely no need for those words; but if he desires something more than he has admitted, then there is a good reason on his part to insist that these words shall remain as they are. It seems to me that they should be changed; and in the absence of some better explanation, the House should adhere to language ordinarily used in a case of this kind for the purpose indicated by the hon. gentleman in charge of the Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hour for private Bills having expired, the House will again resume in committee on Bill (No. 21.)

DOMINION LANDS ACT—AMENDMENT.

House in committee on Bill (No. 21) to consolidate and amend the Acts respecting the Public Lands of the Dominion.—Mr. Oliver.

Mr. OLIVER. I would ask Mr. Deputy Speaker to read paragraph (a) of section 7 as proposed to be amended.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The proposed amendment is as follows:

> If entry be obtained for land which, though not reserved at the time, is ascertained to be valuable on account of merchantable timber upon it, the minister may, within six months of the date of such entry, cancel the same on payment of full compensation for the loss occasioned thereby; and in case of dispute, the amount of compensation shall be determined by arbitration hereinafter provided.

The same words are added at the end of subsection (b).

Mr. OLIVER. In connection with that, I thought it would be right to add a proviso that the timber upon the land should not be considered as any part of its value.

Mr. LENNOX. I would be disposed very seriously to object to that. A man goes in and makes an entry in good faith for a homestead. He goes to considerable trouble in doing that and probably moves on to the lot before there is anything done. The government is allowing the right of pre-emption under this Bill and is allowing parties to have their land under pre-emption rights at $3 an acre as a minimum price. If the government dispossesses a man who has gone in bona fide and entered for a homestead, he is entitled to fair compensation according to the value of his land—not an extortionate but a reasonable value. And if there should be timber on it, I do not see why he should not be compensated for his timber. What I understand the government to want is the right to reserve a particular timber lot for the general use of the public, but if that lot is expropriated by the government for the general benefit, the holder should be paid whatever it is worth, and I do not know that it would be fair to deduct the value of the timber from the amount to be paid.

Mr. OLIVER. If it is recognized that it is proper for the government to take the homestead from the settler for the sake of the timber, then the value of the timber should not enter into the compensation. We are not holding out to settlers the advantages of the timber upon lands; we are only holding out the advantages of the land. When they take land that is valuable because of its timber they are going outside the principle or intention of the homestead Act and when we interfere to cancel the right that is acquired, in the interests of surrounding settlers, it is in my mind that it would be unfair that this man who should not have taken the section at all, should be given the benefit of the value of the timber which the public demands he should not receive.

Mr. BARR. It seems to me an extraordinary doctrine that when the land is up in the market for sale, because there is a certain amount of timber on it, he must not take it and if he does take it his homestead is lible to be cancelled at any time; and not only that but if a man in prospecting in the country finds certain lands with timber on them and on account of that timber which he thinks would be just sufficient for his own use, selects that quarter section, it would not be encouraging settlement if he should be made to feel that at any time the land might be taken away from him and that he would get no compensation for the timber. The settlers should be better protected than that and it would be dangerous to place them in that position. The logical result of such a policy would be that a man taking such a homestead would destroy the timber or sell it at once so as to make money out of it as soon as possible.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It is only within six months that this can be done I understand ?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would be inclined to concur in the view the minister has advanced, although this is difficult to work out from the standpoint of absolute justice. A man enters for 160 acres of land and you are going to pay him for that without taking into consideration the value of the timber; but are you going to pay him for it on the basis that the timbered portion is good agricultural land ?

Mr. OLIVER. I think that would be only fair.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Yes, I would think that would be fair. I originally suggested that you should simply pay him for the improvements, I think the amendment would result in paying the full value of the land, plus the improvements.

Mr. OLIVER. It would involve the payment of damages whatever the arbitration agreed on.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It is just the question of damages that I have been a little troubled about. If a man could not get another homestead then as he has acquired a right to 160 acres of land and has put some work on it, it would be perfectly right, looking at that aspect alone, to give him the value of the 160 acres of land at the time he entered for it, plus the improvements, the added value which he has given to it by his work and his labour. But then he will be at liberty to enter for another homestead will he not ?

Mr. OLIVER. Oh certainly.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The result of that will be—I am not criticising it for a moment, I am just looking at the way it may possibly work out—that you will have paid him the full value of the homestead he has acquired in the first instance and all the improvements he has effected on it, and then you will give him another homestead which may be quite as good as the first. Perhaps that is something you cannot guard against but that is the way the section as proposed will work out, and it is entirely a question of what is right and fair to the settler under the circumstances. Perhaps if you could assure him another homestead of equal value his rights would be fully satisfied if you paid him for all the improvements, the work and labour he put upon the first. So far as that is concerned, deal with him upon a pretty generous basis; but would that not meet all the requirements of the situation ? Of course the possibility remains that he would not be able to get another homestead if the prognostications of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Greenway) are likely to be realized.

Mr. OLIVER. I hardly understood that the valuation would be made exactly as my hon. friend has suggested, that is to say that he would be given the full price of his homestead, to which he would be entitled only after he got the patent. I do not think that in any valuation a man who had been less than six months on a homestead would be given the same value as if he had acquired a proprietary right by the completion of the three years' residence. However, I think, now that the point has been raised, there is a considerable difference between the two conditions, between the provision we desire to make in regard to the man who has taken timber which it afterwards desired to reserve for the use of settlers, and the provision in the next section for taking a portion of land required for water-power. In the case of taking land for the water-power no doubt the land taken should be paid for, but in the case of taking the land with timber on it, of value to the neighbourhood, I think the view taken by the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) is probably the correct one, that if the person who should not have taken that land, according to the spirit of the land Act, when it happens to be found afterwards that it is in the public interest that it should be held for the public benefit, is settled with for his improvements by a fair board of arbitration, probably fair justice is done in the matter. As matters stand I think we may carry this idea of compensation too far and go beyond the point that would really be justice to all parties concerned. So perhaps it would be well, if the mover of the amendment would agree to it, in regard to subsection (a), that provision be made to pay the homesteader for his rights subject to arbitration as suggested.

Mr. LAKE. I think the minister has hardly got beyond the idea of a man going in and deliberately taking up land which he ought not to take according to the spirit of the homestead laws. He, I think, is forgetting that there may be many cases in which a man would take up land in perfectly good faith. The conditions vary in different parts of the country and he may in perfectly good faith take up a quarter-section which in another part of the country he would be allowed to take up, according to the minister's own statement. Then he puts on his six months residence, he loses not only six months of his time and the improvements he has made, but he loses the opportunity of taking up another quarter-section elsewhere, and perhaps a better one. Therefore I think there should be some compensation for that as well. To restrict the compensation simply to the amount of the improvements he may have put upon his land, would not be fair. The amount of the compensation might be left to the arbitrators who, I think, would take all the circumstances into consideration and give a fair decision.

Mr. OLIVER. Would my hon. friend agree to a proviso that the value of the timber should not be taken into consideration in the valuation?

Mr. LAKE. I am inclined to agree to that, with the consent of the mover.

Mr. LENNOX. I will agree to that.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN I would suggest that the idea of my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Lake) is perhaps after all the better one. You can eliminate the value of the timber, and then, apart from that, I would leave pretty generally the affairs to the arbitrators.

Mr. TALBOT. I would take this occasion of appealing to the minister on behalf of a certain class of settlers who start from the province of Quebec and go to the Northwest Territories to take up land. Now, if there is one thing farmers from the east like better than anything else it is land with timber on it. I understand from people who are acquainted with that district that there are two classes of timber lands, there is land with timber for lumber purposes and land with timber for fuel purposes. I am afraid that if this section is adopted in its present form, you will prevent from going into that country a class of settlers who wish to take up land with a certain amount of timber upon it, whether for fuel or lumber purposes. The minister proposes to leave it to a particular officer or a land agent to declare what is timber land, and that might affect some people settled upon land having a certain amount of timber which they desire for fuel. Many people prefer to live in an uneven country where timber generally grows to living on a prairie. The interpretation of what is timber lands seems to be pretty wide, and it might be so construed as to prove a detriment to the settlement of the country by a certain class of people who prefer land of that kind.

Mr. OLIVER. This provision is not new. It has been a part of the land law ever since we have had a land law. We are merely trying to make it more easily understood and more easily operated. This provision does not debar settlers from timber lands. It will rather debar settlement upon lands where the country is not generally timbered, but where the timber has an especial value. Where land is all timbered, or where it is generally timbered, then the timber has no special value, and there is no reason why a man should be hindered from going on that timbered land because everybody has enough timber in a timbered area. The restriction only applies where it happens to be timber fit for sawing. In such a case there is no doubt that the interest of all the surrounding settlers is that one man should not have an absolute control of the sawing timber. It is in the best interest of all the surrounding settlers that each should have an opportunity to get a timber permit and apply that on the timber growing on that quarter-section, rather than that one man should control the supply of sawing timber for a whole settlement. There is nothing new in the principle.

Mr. TALBOT. I do not wish to raise an objection merely for the sake of raising an objection. But I am informed that in a certain portion of the country if a man makes an entry for a certain portion of land, and there are farmers settled all around him on homesteads without any timber, they consider that the timber within a certain distance of their farms is their own and they can at any time raise an objection and say that they have no fuel on their farms. They can say: This fuel belongs to us, and under certain regulations they may raise an objection and an official of the department may declare that to be timber land. I am informed by people living in that part of the country that timber land is divided into two classes, timber for lumber and timber for fuel. If a man desires to settle in any section sparsely covered with timber, why should he be debarred from settling there because that land might be declared to be timbered land?

Mr. OLIVER. I think the provision we are inserting now that damages will have to be paid if the land is cancelled, is a sufficient protection. There is no danger of any unwarranted cancellation. Under the circumstances provided in the Bill, and especially as it is proposed to be amended, there is no doubt that cancellation can only take place upon the desire of the surrounding settlers, and when it has been demonstrated that it is their interest. Everybody must agree that in such a case the interest of the majority should rule.

Mr. BENNETT. Does the minister interpret the word 'merchantable' to mean timber that can be cut into boards?

Mr. OLIVER. It depends on circumstances. In a prairie country, timber that is suitable for cordwood is merchantable timber, but in a wooded country of course such timber is not merchantable. In a wooded country only that timber is merchantable which can be cut into lumber. The term 'merchantable timber' depends upon the particular locality you are in.

Mr. BENNETT. Will each land agent or homestead inspector be the judge of what is merchantable timber?

Mr. OLIVER. The department, speaking generally, will have to be the judge according to the conditions of the different parts of the country. There is no way in which we can make a positive definition or description.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. As it is proposed to be amended subsection (a) will now read:

If entry be obtained for land which, though not reserved at the time, is ascertained to be valuable on account of merchantable timber upon it, the minister may, within six months of the date of such entry, cancel the same on payment of full compensation for the loss occasioned thereby, and in case of dispute, the amount of compensation shall be determined by arbitration hereinafter provided, but the value of the merchantable timber shall not be taken into consideration.

Mr. LAKE. Before that is carried I would like to ask the minister if he will explain exactly what the position of a man would be who, being in possession of a homestead and boring for water in the ordinary way, strikes natural gas. I understand he will have no right to the natural gas.

Mr. OLIVER. Of course, he would own the surface right and owning the surface right he would have immediate control of the gas. At the moment I do not think we have any regulations dealing with gas, and until such regulations are made the surface owner would absolutely control it. No doubt it will be necessary to make regulations for dealing with the question of gas supply, and as in the case of petroleum the surface owner should not have absolute rights or absolute ownership, but he should have prior rights in regard to the petroleum or gas that may be found within the limits of his holding.

Mr. LAKE. Is there any land coming in under this category in the immediate neighbourhood of Medicine Hat where we know there is a supply of natural gas and where it is a very valuable commodity and greatly used?

Mr. OLIVER. Undoubtedly there is considerable land in the vicinity of Medicine Hat that may be shown to be gas land and that would come under the provisions of this Bill.

Mr. LAKE. And the land has already passed into possession of homesteaders?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes. There are a number of homesteads which are at present occupied or have been patented under which gas may very well be found and there is still a great deal of land which has not been alienated.

Mr. LAKE. This is going to take away, I suppose, the right which they might be assumed to have possessed up to the present moment?

Mr. OLIVER. No, this Bill does not in any way presume to detract from any right held under the law as it stands. We declare what the law is to be for the future but the man who has acquired the right to land under which natural gas may be found and who possesses that right now, unless there is a reservation of that gas in the patent, owns the gas.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think that some attempt should be made to define some of these expressions having no especial legal meaning, and which will lead to confusion in the future because one homstead inspector or one officer of the department may construe them in one way and another officer may construe them in another way. The minister may answer that there will be regulations. Well, if there can be regulations there should be a definition. The regulations will not improve the matter in that regard unless there is something done in the way of definition and if there is to be definition I think it should be done in the Act and not in the regulations. We have have such expressions as 'agricultural land.' 'merchantable timber,' 'water-power' and 'water supply.' They have no defined legal meaning. I admit the difficulty of defining some of them. If you asked me at this moment to sit down and write a proper definition of them I do not profess to be able to do it, but I am quite sure that a certain amount of consideration would work out a definition which might serve as a guide or a principle at least. With respect to what I have just mentioned, perhaps the minister will not object to our returning to section 7 for the discussion of that point.

Mr. OLIVER. Oh, no.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There is a very comprehensive expression used in subsection (c). I will omit the unnecessary words for my present purpose.

No entry for a homestead shall convey any exclusive right or privilege with respect to any body of water within the land covered by the entry.

You declare that the man has no exclusive right in any water upon his land. It may be desirable or necessary, but I thought it worth the attention of the minister.

Mr. OLIVER. That matter was discussed here last night.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I did not know that.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes. The value of water, as is well known, is very great in that country and under the Irrigation Act the right of the water is declared to be absolutely in the crown. This is merely following the principle enunciated in the Irrigation Act. It is not intended to take away from any proprietor the water that may be on his land in ponds or in small quantities, but it provided in the former Act and in the administrations, as it has prevailed, that where there is a body of water which can be considered to be a lake: in the first place, he is not required to accept that as part of his homestead, or, if he purchases, he is not required to purchase it. It is excluded by special survey from the homestead or the purchased land and the right is retained in the Crown. In administration no attention is paid to less than twenty acres but larger areas, if attention is called to them, are surveyed and set apart. It is the intention that the right to the water shall remain in the Crown.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Of course no usage of administration would in any way control the direct provision of this statute ?

Mr. OLIVER. Oh, no.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. So that any body of water however small within the land covered by the entry would really not belong to the individual who might happen to have entered for that land. It may be desirable that that should be the law but it seems unusual to any one accustomed to the eastern country, where a small pond in a man's pasture is a very valuable asset and which would not be nearly so valuable if it were not his own. Do you mean that if there is a small pond of that kind his neighbours would have the right to it or that the Crown would be enabled to give to his neighbours the right to use it and to go upon his land for that purpose.

Mr. OLIVER. There is no provision that gives his neighbours the right to cross his property if the pond does not happen to touch the boundary, but if it does touch the boundary, then his neighbours have an equal right to a share of that water for their own purposes. The provincial government could, by the expropriation of a roadway, provide access for his neighbours to the water upon his land. It is considered to be sound policy where water is scarce that this should be so.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Do the provincial governments have power of expropriation of that kind and for that purpose ?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, they have full powers of expropriation for roadways.

Mr. LENNOX. You provide in this section, among other things, that the entry does not give any exclusive right to a 'stream' which passes through the land covered by the entry. In old Canada, the man who had a patent for his land was not entitled to exclusive right in a navigable river, but he had an exclusive right to what we understand by the word 'stream.' The provision in this clause may be necessary in the west, but it is likely to cause difficulty to the owner if he has no exclusive right in a stream, even as against his neighbours who may trespass on his land.

Mr. LAKE. This provision is advisable owing to the conditions which prevail in the west. Those who have been through a succession of dry seasons there, know that it is very important that the people should have access to even a small lake. I have in mind an instance where a homesteader had on his quarter-section a deep lake, small in area but containing a wonderful supply of water. It was the only water within a considerable distance and the neighbours used it to water their stock, but he fenced it off. The local government very properly expropriated the right of way to the water, under the provisions of the Irrigation Act, paying the homesteader fair compensation. The right of way to any of these waters must be purchased by the provincial authorities, and I think we can leave it to them to act in the interest of the people.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I have a note here which says :

It would appear that hay lands are open for homesteads. Is this intended ? All the available natural hay meadows which in some places are most valuable may be obtained by a very few, and the balance go without.

If that statement is correct, some of the considerations which have been advanced in regard to the water, might be equally applicable to these hay meadows.

Mr. OLIVER. In considering the matter we thought it was as well not to make any provision of that kind in regard to hay lands.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The matter has been under consideration?

Mr. OLIVER. Oh, yes? If we wish to prevent individual occupation of certain hay lands we would do so by withdrawing the lands, but if an entry is given we think it should stand.

On section 8, subsection 2—application by woman as head of family.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. What would be the nature of the doubt as to who is the head of the family?

Mr. OLIVER. A husband and wife may have separated and the wife may be raising the family; there was a question as to whether she could be considered the sole head of the family. It was thought well that the minister should have power to decide whether such a person should be entitled to a homestead.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. This provision appears to be designed to encourage separation. The husband may separate from the wife and get a homestead, and the wife who retains the family may be regarded as the head thereof, and she can also enter for another homestead.

Mr. OLIVER. If we provided that the husband and wife who are separated should each be entitled to a homestead, that would be so, but, it is left to the minister to decide each case on its merits.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Then we will have no further difficulty about divorce courts, because the Minister of the Interior will act in that capacity in future.

Mr. LAKE. This rule has been interpreted rather too narrowly in the past. A case came under my notice a short time ago of a woman whose husband had died and whose children were grown up. She wanted to get the homestead entry for her husband's pre-emption, but that was denied on the ground that she was not the sole head of a family, because she had grown-up children.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend is a little in error. It was not because she was not the sole head of a family, but because she had no dependent children.

Mr. LAKE. I think a widow should be considered the sole head of a family. I think this rule should be interpreted more broadly than it has been in the past. In the United States, I understand, homesteads are granted to spinsters, and I think we might go half way in that direction by providing that a woman who has had a household of her own and has become a widow shall still be enabled to take up land.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Will the minister have jurisdiction to decide whether or not the woman is the sole head of a family when the husband and wife are living together?

Mr. OLIVER. I think that is settled beyond question; it is not left to his jurisdiction.

On section 8, subsection 3—reservation for entry—

Mr. TALBOT. It is provided here that between the time the minister makes the reservation and the time the application is made ten acres of the land reserved must be cultivated. I would like to know how that cultivation can be made.

Mr. OLIVER. Because a year intervenes. The land is reserved as a homestead for the young man, and we give him the privilege on condition that he or his friends for him shall cultivate ten acres as an evidence of good faith that he intends to enter for such homestead.

Mr. LAKE. There is a matter that seems to be overlooked. A man may not be residing on his homestead, but on land adjoining it which he has purchased. It seems to me that in such a case his son should be entitled to this reservation of land. I think it is a mistake to confine it to those who reside on the homesteads of their relatives.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. I quite agree with the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. That is a point I spoke of yesterday.

Mr. OLIVER. I remember my hon. friend's suggestion of last night, and I would suggest that after the word 'homestead' in the third line of subsection 3 there be inserted the words 'or on farm land owned by him of not less than one hundred and sixty acres,' or the area may perhaps be reduced to eighty acres.

Mr. LAKE. Is there any necessity of making it imperative that the land shall be owned by the parent or guardian? Would it not be better simply to add after the word 'homestead' the word 'or other agricultural land?' A farmer may be living on rented land or he may be managing a farm for somebody else, or his sons may be growing up into manhood and may wish to have a homestead reserved for them. I think the provision should be made fairly broad.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot just agree with my hon. friend. The purpose of this special privilege is that the young man shall be enabled to acquire a homestead in the vicinity of that of his parent for the purposes of mutual help. When this special privilege is given, I think it should be given only where the parent and son desire to be near each other for the purposes of mutual help in carrying on legitimate farming operations.

Mr. TALBOT. I may be somewhat obtuse, but I would like to know upon what basis the minister will declare that a quarter-section is reserved under subsection (b.) Nobody knows anything about it but himself. From a report of the census or otherwise he learns that in so many families there are so many children of 17 years of age, and he makes reservation for these children. Between the time the minister makes the reservation and the time the young man has a right to apply, that is a year; how is the young man empowered to cultivate ten acres of that land? That is what I cannot understand.

Mr. TURRIFF. The matter is, I think, clear enough. A farmer has a son only seventeen years old, and there is a quarter-section not taken up in his vicinity. Under this Act, that quarter-section will be reserved on application by the son or the father.

Mr. TALBOT. Not at all. There is no application for a reservation, and a year must elapse between the reservation and the application for a homestead.

Mr. TURRIFF. The quarter-section will be reserved in the land office and no one else can make an entry for that land until the boy becomes eighteen years of age. In the meantime the boy will have to break up ten acres. My hon. friend asks how that can be done. In the past it has been done in hundreds of cases by young men who had no right whatever. This is a very good provision because it enables the son to get a homestead by having it held in reserve for a year, whereas if it were not held in reserve some one else could come in and the son might have to go away ten miles from home to get a quarter-section.

Mr. WILLIAM J. ROCHE. There must be an application for a reservation as well as an application for a homestead entry.

Mr. TURRIFF. Certainly there must be an application from the son or the father.

Mr. W. McINTYRE. I am in favour of the provision, but it seems to me that the requirement with regard to breaking up ten acres for cultivation should only be insisted on if the reservation is made say six months from the time when the young man will become eighteen years of age. If he were say seventeen years and ten months old when he made that application for a reservation, he might not be able, within two months time, to perform the cultivation duties and would lose his right.

Mr. TALBOT. Would it not be considered a trespass by the Crown if any one should step in on any land, the property of the Crown, and cultivate a certain portion of it, whether that portion be ten acres or fifteen square feet? The minister has power to reserve that land when the youth is seventeen years of age, but the application can only be made when he is eighteen years of age. In the meantime between the moment the minister reserves that land and the moment the father or the son applies for it, ten acres have to be cultivated. But that land is still the property of the Crown. How therefore can any one cultivate it without committing a trespass?

Mr. W. McINTYRE. The hon. gentleman finds great difficulty in understanding a very simple matter. There are two applications.

Mr. TALBOT. There is only one provided in this Bill.

Mr. W. McINTYRE. There must be an application for the reservation or the quarter-section will not be reserved. There is a primary application for a reservation and then there is a second application for the homestead entry. When the application is made for a homestead entry, three years are given the applicant to perform his homestead duties and at the end of that time he gets his patent. Under this provision, the land will be reserved for four years, but the first year is under one agreement and the other three years are under a subsequent agreement. The first is only a provisional agreement and the second is the ordinary homestead agreement.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. The minister said yesterday that this was a privilege exercised in days gone by and not a right, and that he was converting the privilege into a right. Is he sure that the wording of this clause will entitle the settler to a reservation as a right? The words are 'the minister may reserve.' Should it not be 'shall reserve'?

Mr. OLIVER. The provision is intended to be mandatory, but the word 'may' does leave a discretion which the word 'shall' would not. It is only fair that there should be some measure of discretion allowed in the case of a privilege of this nature. It is a privilege that might be exercised for the purposes of speculation, and I do not think it would be well to leave the minister no possibility of refusing any application that might be made.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. If all the necessary requisites are complied with, the applicant should be entitled to the reservation. But if you leave the granting of the reservation subject to the discretion of the minister, that discretion might be exercised in such a way that one applicant would get a reservation and another, equally entitled to it, would not. So long as the boy complies with all the conditions, why should he not be granted his reservation?

Mr. OLIVER. There might be reasons why the reservation should not be made. The boy might not be mentally qualified or he might be unfit physically. If the conditions are fulfilled, the provision is mandatory; but the use of the word 'may' gives a discretion which would only be exercised when the conditions were not absolutely complied with. May I suggest an amendment to this subsection 3? In the third line after the word 'lives' strike out the words 'on a homestead'; and after the word 'guardian' in the fourth line, add the words 'on a homestead or on farm land owned by him of not less than eighty acres.' I would also make subsection (b) to read as follows:

There shall be ten acres of such land cultivated within one year of the date of reservation.

I think it would be more workable than it is now and would answer the purpose.

Mr. LAKE. I do not think it would altogether answer the purpose, I would suggest that you put in the limit after the word 'application'. Provided at least four months intervene between such reservation and such application.' Otherwise, if the suggestion of the minister is carried out, if the reservation is made for a boy of 17 years and one month, no work at all would be done on the quarter section until a month after he had entered into possession of it.

Mr. OLIVER. I say that instead of saying that he must do ten acres of cultivation between the date of reservation and the date when he becomes 18 years of age, which might be an interval of only one month, we should say within a year of the date of reservation he should have 10 acres in cultivation. It would not matter if it was a month or eleven months before he became entitled to make entry, when he became entitled to make entry he would do so and the cultivation would be provided for if time permitted. Oh, my friend's point is that he might do the cultivation at the end of the year; suppose we make it read within six months of the date of reservation?

Mr. LAKE. That might be impossible if the reservation took place in October.

Mr. LENNOX. Why not make it read 'until he has attained the age of 18 years.'

Mr. OLIVER. What we want is to have evidence of good faith by reason of cultivation during the time we are holding this land under reservation, so we will have some guarantee that it is not merely a speculative reservation, the boy holding it until some other person comes along who is entitled to make entry.

Mr. LENNOX. Why not make it that after he becomes seventeen you can make reservation for one year, and that he shall within that time cultivate the ten acres and shall at the expiration of a year from the date of reservation make his permanent entry?

Mr. OLIVER. We want his permanent entry as soon as he is 18 years of age.

Mr. McCRANEY. I rather like the suggestion of my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Lennox). In a country like that a man cannot always get to the registration office on his birthday and if the application is to be made within one year it would be for him to get his application in as soon as possible after attaining his 18th year as he would thus get his homestead so much sooner.

Mr. OLIVER. We will amend subsection (a) and instead of saying that he shall make entry at the age of 18 years, say he shall make entry within one year.

Mr. LAKE. He would make personal application at the age of 18.

Mr. OLIVER. (Reading).

The person for whom such reservation is made shall, within one year, make (personal) application for the homestead.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. In case a reservation of this kind has been made and the cultivation has not been done within the time limit, then the boy, on attaining his 18th year, shall not be debarred from making an entry provided that no other qualified person has made an application in the meantime.

Mr. OLIVER. If no one else has applied, but in order to keep his own priority he must fulfil this requirement.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There is no provision for any application for the reservation ?

Mr. OLIVER. There is no special provision for a form of application but the minister has power to make a reservation and it is provided that he may make a reservation for this purpose.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Knowing nothing of the conditions in the west and the methods of administration in this particular, I would not understand that any one made application to the minister ; I would understand that the minister would find out about the people answering this description and make the reservations accordingly but if an application is required it would seem to me there should be some reference to it in the Act.

Mr. LENNOX. There might be a provision in the section :

The minister may, upon application therefor, reserve an area of agricultural lands, &c.

Mr. OLIVER. We will make that amendment.

Mr. TURRIFF. It seems to me we are going to make this clause cumbersome. During my experience in the department I never knew of a case where a young man applied to have a quarter-section reserved for him that his relatives did not carry out these conditions ; it is always where land is scarce and there is great anxiety to get land in the vicinity of the father's home.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I have noticed that there is certainly a great deal of machinery to cover the period between 17 and 18 years.

Mr. TURRIFF. All you need to do is to provide for the reservation and the boy or his father or friends will see that this condition is fulfilled. It is only one year and if he does not come forward within ten days after he becomes of age the land would be available for the next applicant. So there will be nothing lost, and it would simplify matters if the land was reserved for him, as it has been in the past, without legislation, only by regulation.

Mr. LENNOX. It is provided in section 8 that every male who has attained the age of 18 years, being a British subject, or who declares his intention to become a British subject, and who makes application in the manner provided, shall be entitled to obtain an entry for homestead. But when we come to deal with a person 17 years of age, there is no provision as to his being a British subject, or declaring his intention to become so.

Mr. TURRIFF. At the end of the year when he comes to make application for his homestead entry, then he has to declare that he intends to become a British subject. In the meantime it is held for a year.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think the minister has certainly shown a very generous spirit in one of these amendments, because section 4, as it stands at present, reads as follows :

The minister may, upon application, reserve for one year any area of agricultural land not exceeding one quarter-section for any male of the full age of seventeen years, who lives with his father, mother, brother, sister, or guardian upon a homestead, or on farm land owned by him of not less than eighty acres.

That enables any young man in the eastern provinces 17 years of age to get a homestead out there. I think the people of the east should feel very much indebted to the minister.

Mr. OLIVER. The father, mother, brother, sister or guardian must be the owner either of a homestead of 80 acres of farm land.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Suppose the father, mother, brother or guardian owns a farm in any of the surrounding counties here, he comes within the terms of this section.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Do you mean it to apply all over Canada ?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, but there is a provision which does not require the residence of the young man upon the quarter-section. Therefore it makes no difference so far as that is concerned, whether he is near or remote. But when the young man gets his entry he is expected to reside upon it, the resident requirements of the Homestead Act come in, and he must reside on that unless he takes advantage of a provision later on where he may fulfil his homestead duties by residing within nine miles.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. But the minister does not mean this section to apply to people residing all over Canada ?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly not. But we are following the Act as it has existed, and the present definition. We can amend the definition if necessary.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Any person living in eastern Canada or British Columbia would apparently, under the literal reading of this section, have a right to make such an application and entry as is referred to here. I thought from the form of the section as it was at first, the minister was providing for cases of persons living upon homestead land in the west, or in the vicinity of homestead land.

Mr. OLIVER. That is the intention, of course.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The language is much more comprehensive than that.

Mr. OLIVER. I admit that.

Mr. TURRIFF. There is one point that is not made clear. A farmer may have taken up a homestead several miles away and may be living on a rented farm, and there may be a vacant quarter-section on the same section where he has taken his homestead. For the first year or two he may not be living on his own homestead; so I think this should be made a little wider, and would suggest amending the section to read as follows:

The minister may reserve for one year any area of agricultural land not exceeding one quarter-section for any male of the full age of seventeen years who lives on farm land of not less than eighty acres, with his father, mother, brother, sister or guardian.

That would enable the son of a man who was living on a rented farm to take advantage of this reservation. A man may be living on a rented farm, and have taken a homestead six or seven miles away, and there may be another vacant quarter-section that he wants to get for his son. But if, in the meantime, this farmer is living on a rented farm a few miles from his own homestead, the son would not be eligible under this section to have that quarter-section reserved. I would use the expression 'agricultural land,' making the term more general.

Mr. OLIVER. Is it agreed that we shall require ownership or not?—because if we require ownership, then we can define the vicinity or the distance within which this privilege may be allowed. If we do not require ownership, there is not much use in making a definition of 'vicinity.'

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My idea of the principle would be that you should require that a man should own a certain amount of land, and that he should be carrying on farming operations.

Mr. OLIVER. We agree that this privilege shall be extended to a young man who has lived with one of his relatives upon land which he occupies as a farm of an area of not less than 80 acres and that the privilege may only be exercised within the vicinity of such a farm.

Mr. LENNOX. Stating a limit for the vicinity?

Mr. OLIVER. Shall we limit the word 'vicinity?'

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, leave that open.

Mr. OLIVER. I think that when we do not require an ownership we cannot very well limit 'vicinity.' I think we had better use the word 'vicinity' and let it go at that. Would that be agreeable?

Mr. LAKE. I am still rather inclined to think that the suggestion as made by the leader of the opposition would be better that the parent or guardian should be the owner of not less than 80 acres of agricultural land and that he should be residing on the land which he has been farming. Then strike out the word 'vicinity.'

Mr. OLIVER. That again brings up the objection raised by the hon. leader of the opposition that a person in Ontario might have the privilege.

Mr. LAKE. I take it for granted that would be provided for.

Mr. OLIVER. I think the word 'vicinity' should be used. If the subsection is allowed to stand I will have drafted a provision embodying the idea as we have agreed to it.

Mr. LAKE. Would it not be advisable to more closely define the terms that the minister has used as to who is to be considered a woman being the sole head of the family. Would it not be better to define that as a woman having junior children depending upon her?

Mr. OLIVER. I am willing to accept the assistance of my hon. friend in making the definition, but it is a matter I have had to consider with some frequency and there have been no two cases alike.

Mr. LAKE. Could the minister give an example of a number of cases which come under this category?

Mr. TURRIFF. There must be a considerable discretion. A case will come up where a woman who has a child dependent upon her, but who is not a married woman, makes application for a homestead. You cannot very well define that. That is a case that has to be dealt with when it comes up. There are a good many cases involving different conditions that come up and we have to decide on the merits of each case. Take the case of a grandmother of three or four children under 21 years of age, perhaps under ten years of age, dependent upon her. Her son and his wife, both the parents of these children, have died and this old lady has the full care of these children and has to support them. She has no children of her own under twenty-one years of age and, strictly speaking, under the definition, she is not entitled to a homestead. I remember numbers of cases of that kind that came before me when I was a commissioner and

I just had to use ordinary common sense and discretion and I do not hesitate to say that in every case of that kind where a grandmother came forward and proved to the department that these children were orphans, that their father and mother were both dead and that they were absolutely dependent upon her for support, she was considered the sole head of the family within the meaning of the Act and allowed to take a homestead, although, strictly speaking she was not the sole head of a family because she had no children under twenty-one years of age dependent upon her.

Mr. LAKE. Or even an adopted child dependent upon her, I suppose ?

Mr. TURRIFF. There is the case also where people have adopted children, and that is one of the cases where a great deal of care has to be exercised, because we had cases coming before us where parties had attempted to prove adoption in order to get the right to make a homestead entry.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. On what ground was it held that a woman who had grandchildren living with her was not the sole head of a family?

Mr. TURRIFF. The general interpretation that was put upon that clause was that a widow who had children under 21 years of age was entitled to a homestead entry. If her children were over 21 years of age, if her sons and daughters were all doing for themselves, she was not considered the sole head of a family.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. They were not living with her?

Mr. TURRIFF. They were not living with her, but where there were grandchildren, the parents both dead, and they were depending upon her, she was granted a homestead entry.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I thought you said she was not considered the sole head of the family?

Mr. TURRIFF. Not under the strict interpretation of the Act, but she was always given a homestead entry.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Well——

Mr. TURRIFF. There is just a case where some latitude must be given to the minister who is administering the Act, and although the Act did not provide that a woman who had grandchildren dependent on her was entitled to an entry, if she proved she had grandchildren depending on her she was given a homestead entry.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not think you should have done that if you did not consider here the sole head of a family, because the statute provides, in my opinion, that a woman living with her grandchildren under those circumstances shall be regarded as the sole head of a family and, therefore, while you thought you were violating the statute you really were complying with it.

Mr. McCRANEY. Within the past two or three months I have brought a case to the attention of the minister which will illustrate that point very well. A father near Battleford had become insane without having exercised his homestead right and the mother wished to obtain entry and under these circumstances the minister was willing to allow her to obtain it.

Mr. LAKE. I am very glad to hear from the hon. member from East Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) what was the practice of the department when he was in it, and I assume from the minister's silence that it continues to be the practice that the right is conceded to a woman who has children dependent on her in one way or the other.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not see any reason why a woman under these circumstances should not be regarded as the sole head of a family. The term 'family' is comprehensive enough surely to include circumstances of that kind, and a woman is to all intents and purposes the head of a family when she has children dependent upon here and is bringing them up.

Section 8 allowed to stand.

On section 9—rights of persons settling on lands before survey.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I have a statement before me, that this period of six months should be reduced to three months. I have no opinion on it, but I would like to know why the minister fixes the period at six months ?

Mr. OLIVER. Where a man has settled in advance of the survey, he is generally far from a land office and as he is considered to have a vested right it is thought proper to afford ample time to exchange notices in order that he may protect himself.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. This clause only refers to settlers who have located and made improvements prior to the land being surveyed.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. In cases where lands have been surveyed and have not been thrown open to settlement, is there any provision in regard to squatters?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. What is the policy of the minister in regard to squatters on such lands? Why does he discriminate between lands that have been surveyed but not thrown open, and lands that have not yet been surveyed ?

Mr. OLIVER. The man who is on the land before the survey has a recognized legal right, but the man who goes on surveyed land, whether it is thrown open or not, must necessarily be dealt with at the discretion of the minister.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. I object to this system of giving the minister discretion in such cases. I can see where the door is going to be thrown open wide for abuses. If, on these already surveyed lands it is left to the discretion of officers to say whether the squatter shall be allowed to remain; it is sure that some will be allowed to remain and some will be ejected.

Mr. TURRIFF. The squatter has never had any right on surveyed land, because it is open to him to make a homestead entry. In the case of land, for instance, reserved for timber limits, the government puts up a notice that the land is not available and all law abiding men will be governed accordingly. But one man out of ten will set the law at defiance and squat on the land. If you provide by law that he shall have priority, you will open the way for all kinds of people to squat on every bit of reserved land. My experience is that the bona fide squatter on surveyed land, who remains on it, always gets his entry in the end. It is only the man who squats on the unsurveyed land and is on the land at the time of the survey to whom this clause applies. This section will not apply, nor did the old section apply, to the man who squatted on unsurveyed land and broke five acres and then disappeared. During the last year or two a great many have gone ahead of the survey, knowing that a township was about to be surveyed, and they put up a shanty, but the land not being surveyed as soon as they expected a great many of them did not remain. These would not come under this clause. It is only the bona fide squatter who is on the land when the survey is made who gets the benefit of this provision.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. The hon. member knows, that although notices have been posted saying that the rights of squatters will not be recognized on the reserves scores of settlers have located on those reserves. The outside townships of the Riding Mountain are filled with the Galician settlers, notwitstanding that they are timber reserves, and in consequence the minister excluded those townships from the reservations in the Forestry Bill last session, and the squatters were allowed to remain.

Mr. TURRIFF. A bona fide squatter always gets an entry in the end.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. There are a number of those squatters who have been located in the heart of that reservation for some years, and they are anxious to know whether they are going to be allowed to remain or not.

Mr. LENNOX. If this is the practice, is it not better to define it by statutory right ?

Mr. TURRIFF. If you allow that you might as well not make any reservations.

Mr. LENNOX. It ought to be allowed by statute or else it ought not to be sanctioned by practice. There is no use having a statutory law, if the department recognizes the universal ignoring of it.

Mr. LAKE. A correspondent in the west informs me that he has presented a case to the department in which he alleges this privilege has been abused. He tells of one man who has put in a claim as a squatter, and who never was on the quarter-section for more than a day before the survey was made. If a man squats ahead of survey he should in some way notify the authorities, that he is in occupation and is actually residing there. This clause of the Bill is altogether too loosely worded.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. What does the minister mean by a 'bona fide settler'? I know of one gentleman who happened to find out where a certain railway station was going to be, and rushing forward he cut down a little tree and put four or five little sticks in a pile and claimed he was a settler. That land is worth $50 or $60 an acre to-day. This man had not even a tent on the place and yet he managed to get an entry through. I can tell the minister that there are a good many cases like that. I draw the minister's attention to the words providing that the notice shall be given by the local agent 'or to a grown-up person found on the land so settled upon.' That might be some stranger rambling about the place who had nothing to do with it.

Mr. OLIVER. What would the hon. gentleman suggest?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I would strike out these words.

Section amended accordingly.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is it intended that the occupation of the land shall include residence ?

Mr. OLIVER. Not necessarily. The rights of a squatter are superior to those of a homesteader, and the fact of a squatter having improvements would give him a right under this section where a homesteader would not have a right unless he were a resident.

Mr. LAKE. Is it the intention of the minister that a man may go out ahead of the survey, plough up a couple of acres and put up some kind of a shack in order to prove occupation of the land, and then retire and live on his homestead until the land is surveyed, and then within six months after notice make entry for that land ? Is that sufficient occupation to give him priority of right to that land after it has been surveyed ?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly not. The first line of the section provides that he must be a person who has bona fide settled and made improvements on the land that is his headquarters.

Mr. LAKE. I cannot help thinking that bona fide settlement should include permanent residence.

Mr. OLIVER. It includes permanent residence in this way, that it would be his main place of residence ; but it does not require him to be on the land all the time, or even half the time. It would be a serious hardship to a squatter to require him to remain on an out-of-the-way place all the time.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What do you require of the homesteader ?

Mr. OLIVER. He has to put in six months residence in each year.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Why should you not require the same of the squatter ? You should not make it easier for him.

Mr. OLIVER. I think we should. He has acquired rights by common law, and we do not desire to limit them.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If he had acquired rights by common law, I would agree with the minister, but he does not acquire any right by common law against the Crown.

Mr. OLIVER. He does against other people.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. He acquires a right so far and only so far as he is in occupation. It is not necessary that a man should be on a piece of land all the time to be regarded as living there. If his usual home is there, and he goes away to engage in some occupation elsewhere, he would still be regarded as living there. But if a man is a bona fide settler on agricultural land, why should he be away from it ? You give a homestead to a farmer on condition that he shall live on it six months in the year and cultivate it. The settler who is to acquire a prior right to a homestead should, it seems to me, have qualifications in that regard at least as great as the homesteader, because his homesteading is really a continuation of his squatting.

Mr. SAM HUGHES. Unless the settlement duties are very carefully considered. I can point out to the minister how a great many opportunities will be afforded for sharp practice. In one of these districts where the surveys are not yet completed, but where a railway is expected to strike in, a squatter with an eye to business who wants to get control of land near a town site, will be able under this clause to take up twenty different sections, putting up a shack and doing some little improvement on each one ; and when the time comes when he can see where the station or crossing will be, he can elect to take whichever one of these locations he chooses, unless he is limited by residence to one particular section.

Mr. OLIVER. We do not require people to live in a certain place or under certain conditions all the time. There are always outposts of settlement where there is no land surveyed, but where people make their living as best they can—perhaps as fishermen, hunters or voyageurs. They may be away from the place for a great part of the year, but it is their home. When the survey is made, does my hon. friend wish that they should be deprived of their home because they do not live on it all the time ?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. If the man is a bona fide settler, I would be the last man to move him, but I want him to be a bona fide settler. I do not want town site jumping to be indulged in, as it could be under this section. The minister should determine what bona fide settlement means.

Mr. TURRIFF. In the beginning of the clause it is pointed out that a man is only considered a squatter if he has not been in residence——

Mr. LENNOX. It does not say residence at all.

Mr. TURRIFF. The word occupation is used. He could not be in occupation of ten or a dozen different quarter-sections at the same time.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Has the hon. member never heard of such a thing ?

Mr. TURRIFF. I have never heard of any one being in occupation of a dozen homesteads at the same time. This clause was originally intended to protect the rights of people who had gone out years before settlement, and what we want to guard against is something like what the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Sam. Hughes) has suggested. In the district of Qu'Appelle, a year or two ago, dozens of people went in prior to survey and put up shacks. When the surveyor came along and made the survey, he simply noted that there was a shanty on the place. But that should not give them any prior rights. A man who puts up a shanty and goes away and leaves the quarter-section, is not a bona fide resident.

Mr. LAKE. I agree with the hon. gentleman, and the case I was mentioning is one exactly in point. The man had gone in and put up a shanty and then went away and was allowed an entry. He was considered to be in occupation. That was a case I had to protest against.

Mr. OLIVER. How does my hon. friend propose to amend this section ?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Make the residence in some way more specific.

Mr. OLIVER. I shall be very glad to have a suggestion, but I have not thought it desirable to take a position that would deprive the pioneer of his rights.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would suggest the words 'ordinarily resident.'

Mr. OLIVER. That would be satisfactory, but I think that is covered by the expression 'bona fide.'

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The other would give a little additional safeguard—'in occupation of and ordinarily resident upon.'

Mr. OLIVER. I shall be glad to put those words in if that will be satisfactory.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. In occupation of and ordinarily resident upon.

Mr. LENNOX. I would like to call the minister's attention to something else. I understood that there might be a survey made and the land not be opened for entry for some years. Is that correct ?

Mr. OLIVER. That is a very unusual case. The land is open for entry within say three, four or six months after survey as a rule.

Mr. LENNOX. Last night it was said that it might not be opened for a long time after survey.

Mr. OLIVER. That is an error.

Mr. LENNOX. If only for three or four months, the difficulty I am anticipating might not arise, but it might to some extent. The wording is 'and is in occupation of the land at the time of survey.' But he ought to have been in continuous occupation or residence upon the land up to the time of the entry if he is to be entitled to the benefit of this clause. A man for instance, knowing that a survey was about to take place, might go on the land a week or two previous and make the improvements. He would be in actual residence at the time of the survey. Then he could abandon it until he got a notice, and after he got a notice, he has six months. There ought to be a provision requiring that he shall conform practically with the conditions as regards homesteading—that is that he shall at least reside one half the time continuously on the lot from the day he settles on it down to the time he makes an entry.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not see how you can tie up the squatter by hard and fast rules.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. You do tie up the homesteaders.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That may be, but two-thirds of the people who settle on homesteads do not live up to the conditions.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. That is where the land agent gets a crack at them when an election is on.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Two-thirds of the people who have settled on homesteads, if they were forced to live up to the conditions of the homestead Act, could not stay in the country. The people who are the backbone of the country are in a great majority poor people, and unless great latitude is allowed them and their time extended, they would have to abandon their homesteads and quit the country.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. How do they manage to get patents ?

Mr. CRAWFORD. They are allowed extra time, at any rate so far as residence is concerned.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The words in the tenth line 'or to a grown up person found on the land so settled upon' are struck out.

Mr. OLIVER. After the word 'of' at the end of the second line insert the words 'and ordinarily resident on.'

Mr. LENNOX. What about continuous residence ? You open the door for any amount of speculation and dishonesty unless you provide for continuous residence or occupation down to the time of making the entry. Otherwise you can put a man in to make the improvements a few days before the survey takes place, and then after the survey is made he can leave the land.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The ordinary homesteader is not a speculator in any sense of the word.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The point is that this offers opportunity for speculation.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot agree with that. If these words in the first line and the words added at the suggestion of the leader of the opposition have any meaning, there is no need for the amendment suggested by the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox). The man must be a bona fide settler and this land must be his ordinary residence.

Mr. LAKE. Might I ask whether there is any provision for a formal notice that a township is going to be thrown open to entry after the survey is made, and what notices are to be given the public that a date has been fixed when such and such a township shall be thrown open for entry ?

Mr. OLIVER. There is no provision in the Act for such an announcement; it has not been considered necessary. The period after the completion of a survey within which a township can be thrown open varies greatly according to circumstances, according to the quality of the survey, the necessity of corrections, inspection and one thing and another, but as soon as it is ready to be opened it is opened, the land agents are notified and entries can be made.

Mr. LAKE. I think there should be some formal notice. Under this clause a squatter, prior to survey, has a certain priority of rights in homesteading, but directly the survey has been completed no one can obtain priority rights except the man who is there upon the homestead. Public notice should be given to enable people to go in and take up homesteads, and this would avoid the possibility of inside information being given to the detriment of the general public.

Mr. TURRIFF. If anything of that kind was done it would delay the opening of townships for homesteading. I have never heard of any difficulty arising.

Mr. LAKE. The law formerly was different; a man could go in after survey and obtain priority of rights.

Mr. TURRIFF. He could not make entry. After a survey is made it has to be inspected, and with the great amount of surveying that is now going on, new townships are being thrown open practically every day and the department cannot tell beforehand just how long it is going to take owing to the necessity of making corrections, inspections, &c. I do not think there will be any difficulty from the fact that there is no public notice given when certain townships are to be thrown open. If the notice were given there is no doubt it would cause considerable delay.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. In order to prevent anything like favouritism notice should be given when a township would be available for homesteading.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would not suppose it would ever be done otherwise.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. I think it is a most important point, and I need only recall the illustration I gave this afternoon to show how important it is that the public should be notified a certain length of time ahead in some conspicuous manner as to when certain townships are to be open for homestead entry. It was no small task for 300 or 400 individuals to go many of them 300 miles to the Dauphin land office, as many of them did this fall when notice was given that the lands taken out of the timber limit would be open to entry, but when they got there they found they were denied an opportunity of entering and the land agent informed them that the lands would not be opened for another month. In the last two months I have received over a score of letters asking when these lands would be thrown open for entry, but I have not been able to obtain the information. Some persons have sent money to the department here, applying for these lands, but they have been informed by the Dominion Land Commissioner that the department was not in a position to accept the money and many individuals are to-day anxiously waiting for notice when the lands will be thrown open, and I think it only right for the protection of these people that there should be some public method of giving notice of the opening of these lands.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think the hon. gentleman is trying to leave a wrong impression so far as this Dauphin business is concerned. There was no public notice given that the lands would be opened at Dauphin and the 400 people whom he mentions went there entirely on their own responsibility in so far as any notice from the department is concerned. These lands were supposed to be opened at Minnedosa on the 1st of October; public notice was given of that fact in the public press of the country—

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. How long in advance?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Some time at least; I cannot say how long. Owing to the closing of the Minnedosa land office on the last day of September, when the 1st of October arrived there was no Minnedosa land office.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Why was it closed?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Twenty or thirty people went to the Minnedosa land office on the 1st of October to enter and the office was closed. My hon. friend did not see fit to give that information to the House; he tried to make the House believe that notice was given that the lands would be opened at Dauphin at a certain time, which was not in keeping with the facts. These people who went to Dauphin went entirely on their own responsibility.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Crawford) has made the strongest possible argument in favour of a public notice. He says no public notice was given and yet three or four hundred people went up there.

Mr. CRAWFORD. They went up on the strength of rumour.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. They should not be compelled to rely on rumour.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The department was not to blame because they did not advertise the lands.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The department is not obliged to advertise the lands.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The lands are not opened yet.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That is the point; the people knowing that they have only rumour to depend on, that there is no public notice given in the ordinary course, go out there on the strength of rumour. But we are urging that there should be a formal notice so that men will not go there for the purpose of locating upon mere rumour. The hon. gentleman says the land office was closed. Why was it closed?

Mr. OLIVER. It was closed because it had ceased to do any important amount of business.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Crawford) contradicted my statement a few moments ago with regard to the notice of the Dauphin land office. I had a great deal of this information from applicants who had visited the Dauphin land office, and who informed me that the agent there had told them he had received instructions that the land would be thrown open in that office, and that the work of the Minnedosa office was largely transferred to the Dauphin land office. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. Well, let me read what the minister said about this. On the 28th day of November, I asked the following questions:

1. Were any of the Dominion lands agents notified when to accept entries for the even-numbered sections in those townships recently taken out of the Riding mountain timber reserve? If so, what was the date mentioned?
2. Were those instructions subsequently cancelled? If so, for what reason, and at whose request?
3. When will those lands be available for homesteading?
4. Will squatters who have located on the lands, either before or since the lands were taken out of the reserve, have priority in making entry?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior):

1. (a) Instructions were sent to the agent of the Dominion lands at Minnedosa to grant entries for even-numbered sections in the tract taken out of the Riding mountain timber reserve. Similar instructions to the agent at Dauphin were, through a clerical error, sent to Yorkton. The mistake was not discovered in time, but the advertisement which appeared in the press correctly stated the facts.

(b) The date mentioned was the 1st of October, 1906.

2. Owing to the closing of the Minnedosa land office on the 1st of October, 1906, entries were not granted. Action on the instructions was therefore stayed.
3. That question is under consideration.
4. An investigation is being held by officers of the department as to rights of squatters on the land question, and action will be on the merits of each case.

So I was perfectly justified in using this as an argument why public notice should be given in order that these people might not be misled, as they were in this case.

On section 10,

Mr. LENNOX. We have the word 'homestead' here and in other sections. The minister will recollect what was said about the definition of 'homestead.'

Mr. OLIVER. I have an amendment prepared, which I will give to the House at a convenient moment, to subsection (f) of the interpretation clause.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Let us have it now.

Mr. OLIVER. Subsection (f) will read thus:

'Homestead' means land entered for under the provisions of this Act or chapter 55 of the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1906, or of any Act relating to Dominion lands repealed by that Act.

That is to read into this Act the meaning of 'homestead' as provided in the previous Act.

Mr. LAKE. I would ask the minister to consider more fully the suggestion which has been made that after the lands have been surveyed, and before they are put on the market and thrown open to entry, full notice should be given to the public that they will be so thrown open to entry. That will avoid a suspicion which will be created that some people will have inside information in regard to them.

Mr. OLIVER. I will take the matter into consideration. I think it is a matter of such a nature as might be left to departmental action.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not think a matter of that kind ought to be left to departmental action. You should embody in this statute a provision that public notice must be given, unless the Governor in Council, on a recommendation setting forth full reasons for departing from that rule, should order to the contrary. I am surprised to know that such a rule was ever departed from. Here is a public domain to which the citizens of this country become entitled to make claim. Now why should not people generally have notice that that particular tract of land is going to be open for claim under this law? I am astonished that any departure from that principle has ever been sanctioned in the administration of the department. If any man had told me outside this House that any departure from that principle had been sanctioned in the administration of the department, I would have been inclined to think he had been entirely misinformed. It seems to me outrageous that public notice should not be given.

Mr. TURRIFF. It never was at any time.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The principle I am propounding is that you should embody in this statute a public notice, the law should provide that it must be given. Take the mineral lands of Nova Scotia. Suppose, for example, there was no provision that they should be open to entry by any person, and that some favoured individual in that province should have the right in advance of the general public to make claim to valuable mineral areas. Why, the thing would be regarded as a perfect outrage. It is an outrage not to have a statutory enactment providing that it must be done here.

Mr. TURRIFF. The routine always followed has been that as soon as the surveyors have surveyed the township lands, the plans are sent to the agent and then become available. The case referred to by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche) was a special case. They were not regular lands that were surveyed and made available. These were lands that had been in a reservation which had not been taken up and which were supposed to be made available. I see no objection to notice being given. It would have to be defined how the notice would be given. The only objection I saw in the first place to it was that it would be bound to cause a delay for a certain length of time because the department would not be able to say how long beforehand it would be in a position to open the lands if it had to wait until the township plans were ready until it could give the notice.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think that slight delay would be very well endured for the sake of a higher principle that all should be placed on a basis of equality.

Mr. SAM HUGHES. This notice would be all the more necessary now owing to the fact that homestead lands are getting rather scarce.

Mr. OLIVER. The suggestion that notice shall be given would not involve an amendment to this section at any rate. It would probably come as an amendment to section 5 and if it is desired we can make some provision for notice.——

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think it is very desirable.

Mr. OLIVER—in an amendment to section 5, but it would not involve any amendment to section 9.

On section 10: subsection 1—application for entry.

Mr. LENNOX. Why do you say 'between such hours as may, from time to time, be fixed by the Governor in Council?'

Mr. OLIVER. Hitherto there have been no hours fixed by the Act. We thought it as well to fix the hours by the Act but still circumstances might arise under which it would not be desirable to maintain those hours, and we therefore make provisions that they may be changed under the authority of the Governor in Council. The insertion of the hours in the Act here renders illegal or of non-effect an entry made any other time than between these hours which was not the case in the Act as it has been. We thought it was well in order to make it as definite as possible to define the hours in which a legal entry may be made.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would agree with that. In so far as I am concerned I think it is a good provision, but I would like to ask the minister what he proposes to do about a matter that I mentioned in a few remarks I made on the second reading of the Bill, and that is the application of the principle of publicity to these land offices. Why should not they be in exactly the same position as the registry office or the mining office in Nova Scotia, or any similar office? Why should not every one be at liberty to inspect any record in that office upon payment of a small fee? It is no more than a registry office in principle at least. There are certain details connected with the administration of these lands which are not to be found in the older provinces. In Nova Scotia, Ontario and Quebec, in so far as I am aware, any person can inspect the records of the country in regard to the ownership of land. These are records which affect ownership. Why should they not be open?

Mr. OLIVER. I am not prepared to say that they should not be, to state the case just in its barest form, but the reason, if I understand it correctly, why they have not been open in the past—and, of course, they have not been as it has been the usual practice to deal with them as they are now dealt with—is that it was not considered to be sound public policy to facilitate in any degree the operations of the claim jumper. It was believed that if a man had such an interest in a quarter-section that he desired to acquire it he might acquaint himself by his own observation as to whether the duties were being performed or not and then, having satisfied himself that they were not, it was eligible for him to apply for cancellation. But, in the condition of the country, particularly as it has been, as my hon. friend from Portage La Prairie (Mr. Crawford) has said, a very large proportion of settlers of very limited means have been compelled by circumstances to be absent from their homesteads perhaps beyond the time permitted by the strict letter of the law in order that they might ultimately make a success of their homesteads. These people were rendering themselves liable to cancellation. In years gone by, no doubt more than at the present time, but in those years and to some extent even in these years, to facilitate the operations of the claim jumper by giving him access to a knowledge of the moment at which the homesteader's right became liable to cancellation was not thought in the long ago, nor is it at the present time, to be sound public policy. It may be, however, that under present conditions, with settlement as it is and with a larger proportion of land under entry and therefore a larger number of cancellations available, a change would be advisable, but I think it is just as well to state clearly to the House for the information of every one the reasons, which, I understand, governed the late administration, and as well the present administration, in withholding the information to which, as my hon. friend says, the public are, under a strict right of the law, absolutely entitled to.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would be inclined if necessary to remove the evil which the hon. gentleman has spoken of as one possibly arising. I would greatly prefer to make the conditions of settlement less severe and to have the land office open to the public. If the evil were of such a character I would be prepared to do that but I would like to see any office touching the public domain of this country open to the people so that they would know upon examination exactly what the records were. I think that is a good principle which ought not to be departed from except for the very gravest reason. I hope the minister will come to the conclusion that the time has arrived when that can be done. I would be inclined to some relaxation for the sake of having the principle I am advocating carried out.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The present system tends towards a number of people holding homesteads for speculative purposes. There are scores of homesteads not open for entry and you cannot find out who owns them. If one could know it was John Smith, you could locate John Smith and some one could properly jump his claim.

Mr. OLIVER. There is no limit to the application for cancellation; and then the question has to be decided whether the homesteader is in good standing or not.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The policy has been not to afford facilities?

Mr. OLIVER. That is the idea, but I am quite ready to admit that as conditions change it is quite possible that a change in that system may be advisable.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. Under this section the applicant for a homestead entry has to make an affidavit that he is eighteen years of age. It would be wise to have a special form of application for a reservation, or otherwise boys of sixteen years might come in and tie up the land for some years.

Mr. OLIVER. That is a good suggestion.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would like to have subsection three held over, and I would mention a matter now so that the minister may consider it in the meantime. Subsection 3 reads:

> Such application shall have no force or effect until it is accepted by the local agent or an officer acting for him.

I would suppose that if a man goes to an office, and makes his application in a proper form, and hands it to a proper officer of the government, he has discharged all the duty the law imposes on him, and no act of an officer by refusing to accept it or in any other way, should have the slightest effect upon that man's rights. But the words of the statute seem to cast some doubt on that.

Mr. OLIVER. It is not intended he shall be prejudiced. The agent has no discretion; he must accept the entry if the law is complied with, and what is intended by the clause is that the acceptance of the entry by an agent is an evidence of entry.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I see what the minister means, but I think the clause could be better worded.

Progress reported.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION ACT, 1898.

Bill (No. 18) to amend the Steamboat Inspection Act, 1898.—Mr. L. G. McCarthy.—read the second time and referred to the Select Committee on Masters and Mates.

Mr. FISHER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What business will be taken on Monday?

Mr. FISHER. This Bill will perhaps be taken first, and then Supply.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. You cannot say definitely?

Mr. FISHER. I have not consulted the Prime Minister.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Will you be good enough to let me know in the morning.

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

RETURN PRESENTED.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) laid on the table, a return to an order of the House dated February 11, 1907 for a copy of the record and of all the proceedings in the suit in the Exchequer court of Canada between the King and H. E. Lyon, plaintiffs, and Malcolm McKenzie and Felix A. Montalbetti, defendants. He said: This is a partial return consisting of the papers in the Interior Department. Another part of the return will be brought down by the Justice Department.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL.

On the Orders of the Day being called.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY (North Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Emmerson) in reference to the Trent Valley Canal. In the 'Globe' of Saturday, as well as in pretty nearly every Toronto paper, a report is given in reference to the selection of the route from Lake Simcoe to the Georgian bay in which it is said that the Severn River route is recommended. The statement is as follows:

SEVERN ROUTE RECOMMENDED.

A report giving the recommendations of Mr. Butler, Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, and of Mr. E. J. Walsh, engineer in charge of surveys on the Trent canal from Lake Simcoe to Georgian bay, was laid on the table of the Commons this afternoon. For the northern part of the canal they recommend the route by way of the Severn river from Lake Couchiching to Georgian bay. This is the natural route, and eliminates all questions of diversion of water and other technical difficulties. The surveys made by Mr. Walsh show the estimated cost of six feet navigation to be $1,219,818. The cost of eight feet navigation is estimated at $1,457,244. Mr. Butler recommends that the draught of eight feet be decided upon, in view of the fact that the additional cost would be only $237,426, and the greater draught would very materially reduce the cost of transportation of all products from the west into Lake Simcoe. This practically means that the whole of the Trent Valley canal route from the Georgian bay to Trenton is finally settled, and when completed will allow of a continuous eight feet navigation from the northern to the southern outlet.

In reference to that article which appeared in the 'Globe' of March 16 I would like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals if he received this letter from me:

Mr. FISHER.

March 14, 1907.

Hon. H. R. Emmerson,
Minister of Railways and Canals, Ottawa.

My Dear Mr. Emmerson,—Referring to the conversation which I had with you to-day in regard to the route of the Trent Valley canal from Lake Simcoe to the Georgian bay, I beg to protest against a selection of that route being made until there has been a proper survey of the route from the east end of Kempenfeldt bay to Nottawasaga bay upon which an estimate of the cost of construction can be made.

It is quite apparent from the reports which you showed me to-day that no proper estimate can be made from the report of Mr. Walsh, based on the reconnaissance survey which has been made. I therefore urge you, and through you the government, not to make a selection until you have had a proper survey made of this route upon which an estimate of cost can be based, and I urge you to immediately take the necessary steps to have such survey made.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) LEIGHTON McCARTHY.

I would ask the Minister of Railways and Canals if he received that letter and if so whether such a survey as I ask should be made will be made and made immediately?

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, before the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals answers, I would like to ask him if he received a letter from me, dated the 14th March, virtually in substance, saying the same thing as that which is contained in the letter of the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy); that is protesting against any definite action being taken by the government before a complete survey has been made of the alternate route from the head of Kempenfeldt bay to the Georgian bay by way of Nottawasaga river?

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). Before the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Emmerson) answers I would like to ask him if he will be good enough to intimate to the House if a large appropriation will be made this year for the completion of the section recommended to the Georgian bay, which I need hardly say, is the only, original and proper route to adopt.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals). I may say that the matter of the route between Lake Simcoe and the Georgian bay end of the Trent valley canal has not been finally determined. It is true that I laid on the table the other day the plans and reports of the engineer. The reports favour the Severn river route, but at the same time there was not furnished a comparative estimate of the cost of the Nottawasaga bay route so called. My hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) wrote me and I received the letter, a copy of which he has read. I also received a letter from the member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox). The matter has been determined in this way: that the final disposition will not be made pending some further information that is necessary from the engineers, and instructions have been given by the deputy minister to the superintending engineer, Mr. Walsh, to have the necessary instrumental survey made.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURN.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to point out that on the 4th of March, a return was ordered on my motion, asking for the number of desks of every kind and description bought for the House of Commons since 1896. The return is a very small one, and as the acting Minister of Public Works is not in his seat I would ask one of his colleagues to call his attention to the necessity for bringing it down as early as possible.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND COMMUNICATION.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queen's). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, what information he has within the last few days concerning the ice bound Prince Edward Island steamers 'Stanley' and 'Minto,' whose crew and passengers have been for the last ten or fourteen days, in danger of their lives.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). I have had no information to-day with regard to the two steamers. On Saturday we had news that the 'Stanley' had gone back to Georgetown, and that the 'Minto' was still in the ice and would not be able to move until the wind blew from the south.

Mr. A. MARTIN. I called up the department by telephone about two hours ago, and I was told they had no news either yesterday or Saturday. I wish to say——

Mr. SPEAKER. There can be no discussion on this question now.

Mr. A. MARTIN. I will hand a notice to you, Sir.

Mr. BRODEUR. My deputy informed me on Saturday that the news I have given had reached the department.

Mr. A. MARTIN. I press my motion to discuss the matter as a question of urgency; the information given by the minister is not satisfactory to me.

Mr. SPEAKER. The notice which the hon. member has handed to me is a mere statement that he intends to interrogate the government. This would not come within the rule, allowing a motion to adjourn on a question of urgency.

Mr. A. MARTIN. But there is something more than that statement in the notice. It proceeds: 'and discuss questions in reference to the present unsatisfactory winter service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.'

Mr. SPEAKER. The notice as framed does not come within the rule.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Will you allow me to read the notice ?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman cannot discuss the matter ; the notice is not at all framed under the rule.

Mr. A. MARTIN. I would like to have the paper read.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Before you leave the chair Mr. Speaker——

Mr. A. MARTIN. Just one moment please; I wish to say Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SPEAKER. I would point out to the hon. member (Mr. Martin) that the rule requires, that, if a member intends to introduce a discussion at this stage, he must rise and ask the leave of the House to move to adjourn for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance. There is nothing in the notice handed to me which at all intimates that such is the intention of the hon. member.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Will you allow me to read this notice ?

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member wishes to put his notice in proper form it is quite open for him to do so.

Mr. A. MARTIN. I have written in the notice that I intend to interrogate——

Mr. SPEAKER. I have ruled the discussion out of order.

Mr. A. MARTIN. And so discuss the question——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. A. MARTIN. And to discuss certain questions in reference to——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. I have intimated to the hon. gentleman the mode in which he can bring the matter before the House at this stage.

Mr. A. MARTIN. I will take another opportunity. I think I am quite in order—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

FOREIGN GOODS UNDER BRITISH PREFERENCE.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton). Before you leave the chair Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the government what action they intend to take in reference to an item which appears in the weekly report of the Trade and Commerce Department, and which is as follows :

CUTLERY.

I am informed that a very large amount of German cutlery, razors, &c., is shipped from Germany to Sheffield, and is there exported and sent to Canada as Sheffield goods. Canadian buyers cannot be too careful in seeing that the goods are stamped from Sheffield, and especially that they are dealing with well-known Sheffield firms.

In to-day's 'Citizen,' there appears the following article in reference to the same matter.

Not made here.

Mr. J. B. Jackson, Canadian trade agent at Leeds, in a report just received, again expresses the belief that a considerable portion of the goods imported by Canada under the British preference are foreign goods, shipped into England, repacked and sent to Montreal as English goods. He quotes from the Yorkshire 'Post' a report of an interview which delegates of the Associated Chambers of Commerce had with Mr. Lloyd George, President of the Board of Trade. They urged a better enforcement of the Trade Marks Act, alleging that there was much fraud in the marking of goods. Mr. Lloyd George suggested that the Chambers of Commerce institute prosecutions on their own behalf.

Mr. Jackson particularly mentions cutlery and felts as lines of German goods which enter Canada under the advantage of the British preference. Much of the cutlery stamped 'Made from Sheffield steel' never saw that city. German felts are sold in Canada at prices which make it evident that they must enter under the preference, for less than they can be purchased for in Germany.

In justice to the manufacturer of these goods it would be well for the government to give some explanation in reference to the matter.

Hon. WILLIAM PATERSON (Minister of Customs). I cannot tell of course whether there is any foundation for that statement. Occasionally, goods come in, upon which the surtax has not been paid. If they are entered in such a way they come in at the risk of the importer and action is taken thereon. In addition to the surtax they have to pay a penalty for infraction of the law. Such attention as the department is able to give to this matter is being continually given to it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Would the minister be good enough to lay on the table a copy of the letters sent by Mr. J. D. Jackson to the Trade and Commerce Department in reference to this matter ?

Mr. PATERSON. I shall ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and if he has no objection to comply with the hon. gentleman's request, I shall be glad to place the letters on the table.

PRIVATE BILLS.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY OF CANADA.

Further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. Gervais for the third reading of Bill (No. 82) respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company, Canada, and the proposed motion thereto of Mr. Bennett.

Mr. BENNETT moved :

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House with instructions that they have power to amend section 8 of the said Bill by striking out therefrom the words 'heretofore conferred upon,' and substituting therefor the words 'now vested in.'

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There is no objection to the amendment.

Amendment agreed to, and House went into committee on the Bill, amended the Bill as moved by Mr. Bennett and reported.

Mr. GERVAIS moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to state why I think this Bill should not be read a third time, and to again direct the attention of the House to the attitude to the public of the Grand Trunk Railway Company now seeking relief. My contention is that if a great corporation like the Grand Trunk Railway Company is in default as regards previous legislation of this parliament, it ought not to get any relief until any grievance the public has against it is redressed. Now, there are two great grievances in this country to-day against the Grand Trunk. One is in regard to its non-compliance with the penny a mile clause in its original charter. It has refused to give that penny a mile rate; it is opposing the attempt to get it in the courts. It is fighting the law, fighting the public, and fighting and defying this parliament ; and any company that is an outlaw and that defies the law of the land ought not to get any kind of relief until it complies with that provision of its original charter. But there is another thing which I am going to give in a little detail to the House. Section 253 of the Railway Act expressly prohibits any company from 'subjecting any particular person or any particular description of traffic to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.' That prohibits any discrimination against any locality or person or description of traffic. I have shown in this House and outside of this House, I have proved beyond a doubt by the fare tariffs, and the Railway Commission have confessed in communications addressed to this House, that this Grand Trunk Railway Company does to-day deliberately charge all the people who travel over its line east of Toronto, 11 per cent more than it charges the people west of Toronto. That is a gross injustice that amounts to hundreds of thousands of dollars a year; it is an injustice which the people in all the towns east of Toronto are speaking out against. They are holding meetings, and declaring it to be most unfair. If that is so, my contention is that this railway company should get no relief until it removes this discrimination. Why does the Grand Trunk choose to discriminate against the people who live east of Toronto? Wholly and solely because it has no competition there. It may claim that under its original charter it can charge these abnormal rates. I do not know on what ground it contends that. The present Minister of Railways and his predecessor have both declared, and pledged themselves and their party in this House, that the Railway Act would suppress all kinds of railway discrimination. This section 253 is framed on the lines of a similar clause in the Interstate Commerce Act, which declares that 'there shall be no undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage to any particular description of traffic in any respect whatsoever.' The words are exactly the same. The Grand Trunk to-day, then, is discriminating against all that country east of Toronto, which includes twenty-two constituencies represented in this House. Under these circumstances, why should this parliament afford that company any relief? As I have said before, the object of parliament, at least in past days, was to make new laws; but it was also to obtain redress for grievances, and there could be no legislation, there could be no supplies granted, until the grievances of the public were redressed. Well, here is a grievance of the public—not a petty grievance, but a grievance amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars a year, affecting twenty-two out of the eighty-six constituencies in the province of Ontario, as well as the rear constituencies, which are more or less connected with those on the front.

I ask the House to refuse to give them any legislation in the way of relief until they comply with the law of 1852, which binds them to give the people a penny a mile passenger service. If the Grand Trunk Railway can override the law in this respect, they will override it in every respect. What assurance have we that, under the circumstances, they will carry out the agreements they entered into with regard to the construction of a great transcontinental system, which is to build up northern Ontario, northern Quebec and New Brunswick, which is to build up our national ports and encourage all kinds of home industry? If the doctrine be laid down that this Dominion is not responsible for the enforcing of federal laws, that it is no concern of ours if any company incorporated by this parliament neglects its duty, if the Grand Trunk Railway is free to repudiate that clause in the Railway Act which says they shall not discriminate in any respect, if they are to be allowed to charge on this portion of their line though the most thrifty and closely populated portion of Ontario, 11 per cent higher passenger rates than in any other, we are forced to the conclusion that the Grand Trunk Railway is greater than parliament. The issue before the people is whether this Dominion parliament is inferior to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, whether this parliament has or has not the courage to compel that company to do what is right. If the government are going to put this Bill through without insisting on a rectification of these grievances, the government will be simply giving the Grand Trunk Railway a free hand with regard to every solemn obligation and duty imposed upon it by parliament. I submit that we ought not to put through this Bill before compelling the company to live up to its obligations. The right hon. Prime Minister laid down a similar doctrine some years ago in dealing with the Canadian Pacific Railway. That company were asking for great concessions with regard to the Crows' Nest Pass Railway. Well, at that time there were public grievances against the Canadian Pacific Railway regarding their traffic arrangements and tolls, and the government claimed credit for having compelled the company to remedy those grievances before consenting to give the franchises asked for. If that doctrine held good then, it ought to hold good to-day, and we should refuse to give the Grand Trunk Railway any legislation until they remove the cause of the complaints now made against them. I believe that to-day the passenger agents and the head men of that company are in this city, and I would not be at all surprised if some negotiations were going on regarding passenger rates. There is a very substantial rumour that the government have at last come to the idea that something must be done. Let us then hold back this legislation and give the company a chance to explain and to do what is right. Will the hon. minister ask that this Bill be suspended until he can get information from the Grand Trunk Railway as to whether it is true or not they are disobeying the law and discriminating against all the towns that lie east of Toronto?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals). We have heard the speech just made by my hon. friend so often that I am sure many of us almost know it off by heart. On several occasions my hon. friend has presented his views in this matter in almost identically the same language, and on every occasion he has been answered. I do not think therefore that I need take up the time of the House by repeating the very obvious answer which has already been given several times. My experience is that wherever there are grievances in this country and whenever those grievances are presented in all sincerity either to this parliament or provincial legislatures, they are recognized and remedied. And I fancy that this parliament will consider grievances wherever they are found and will afford a remedy for them. But grievances must be presented in sincerity, and not for the mere purpose of repeating over and over the story that ought not to be heard more than once. I have no answer to make other than has already been given to the speech that we have again listened to this afternoon.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the third time.

On motion that the Bill do now pass and the title be as in the order paper.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. If I may speak on that motion, Mr. Speaker, I have to say that it takes a good long time to make this government realize the existence of any grievance; but if you tell them often enough and strongly enough, if you put it up to them time after time and make them justify their conduct, they grow afraid and yield at last. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson) speaks of my having made a speech on this subject two or three times. But with regard to other grievances I have found it necessary to speak a dozen times and more to get the idea through the heads of ministers and compel them to remedy grievances. All the amendments and improvements in the Railway Act that they are claiming credit for are the expression in the form of law of suggestions made to them by the member they now pretend to ignore. I shall live to see the day—and perhaps that day may come before this session is over—when the Minister of Railways, who has repudiated the statements I have made and has told us that no amendment can be made, will come down to this House and confess that there is something needed and will acknowledge that he is forced to concede it. Why he said the same things that he said today with regard to the telephones, with regard to the express companies, with regard to a great many other things; but, little by little, the railway law is being improved and it is being improved as a result of agitation in this House, the presentation of the facts and sticking to them. Let the Minister of Railways go into any of these counties between Toronto and Kingston and tell the people that there are no grievances, or that he has no intention of remedying them except in his own particular way. Why he will not dare to say to the public there, that this parliament is not the proper place in which to present a grievance; he will not dare to tell the people there that the proper time to present a grievance is not when a lawbreaking company is seeking relief. Let him go into East Northumberland, where there is a vacancy, and make the speech that he made here to-day. Let the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth), who ran once in a constituency in that portion of the country, go into East Northumberland and justify the remarks that the Minister of Railways has made here. They will have an opportunity of showing how close the relation is between the Grand Trunk Railway and the government and how the Grand Trunk Railway is master of this parliament, at least the government side of it, so that it can repudiate the law, setting a bad example to every great corporation in this country, with no effort on the part of the government to force it to obey the law. Where will the government be if things go on in this country as they are going now? Why, anarchy must come, if the law is not respected. But when we have a Prime Minister, a Minister of Justice, a Minister of Customs, a Minister of Finance, and a Minister of Railways, who, one after the other, tell us that they are not responsible for the enforcement of federal law, anarchy is at hand—and the anarchists are the men who set this example of the defiance of law. It has been well said, and widely repeated, in the United States that the great promotors of the sentiment in favour of public ownership, are not Roosevelt and men of that stamp, but the men who conduct the railways and the great corporations and who assume to be above the law. Anarchy is nothing but a disobedience of the law, and ignoring of the law; and the greatest anarchist in this country is the Grand Trunk Railway which refuses to obey the law with regard to the penny a mile service, refuses to obey the law with regard to discrimination. I hope some of these ministers of the Crown will come into East Northumberland and tell these people along the Grand Trunk that this government does not consider it its business to enforce the law against the Grand Trunk, or to compel the righting of grievances when this company comes here for relief. Let them tell these people that the business of the government is to make laws not to enforce them. I know now why the Minister of Justice does not want to enforce Dominion law. He and the Prime Minister got into a very bad hole the last session. They passed a law relating to the Sabbath, and placed the duty of enforcement upon the attorney generals of the provinces. They so arranged it that the province of Quebec could get out of enforcing it. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice would not like to be held to the duty of enforcing a federal law of that kind. And so they are forced to make that ignominious confession they have made in this House that they are not responsible for the enforcement of federal law.

Now, I want to finish my constitutional argument with that great lawyer, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) He got up here as wise as Minerva's owl, and told us that he was not responsible for the administration of federal law, and quoted from the clause in the——

Mr. SPEAKER. Will the hon. member (Mr. W. F. Maclean) state how this discussion is pertinent to the motion before the Chair.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. It is quite pertinent to the criticism the Minister of Railways passed upon me.

Mr. SPEAKER. At this stage, it is not customary in this House to debate a Bill.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I receive that information with all due respect, Mr. Speaker, but I understand that you do not say that I am out of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The practice in this House has been that the motion that a Bill do now pass is agreed to nemine contradicente immediately after the third reading. I will say that that practice should be followed.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that it is very seldom done, but I understand also that you do not rule that I am out of order. But I bow to your statement of the practice of this House and will say no more. I had nearly finished in any case, and I can finish on another occasion what I had to say. I have answered the Minister of Railways sufficiently, I expect to see him in East Northumberland.

Mr. A. JOHNSTON (Cape Breton). I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether I am in order in adding a word to the discussion—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think not.

Mr. A. JOHNSTON. —but if I am in order—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. The question is on the motion that the Bill be now passed.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I would ask whether it is your ruling, Mr. Speaker, that on the motion that the Bill be now passed, discussion is precluded?

Mr. SPEAKER. Discussion is not absolutely precluded. If a member desires to postpone the passage of the Bill or that further consideration of it be postponed, he may move accordingly. But discussion, apart from that, as I understand the practice, is not usual on this motion.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. BOYCE—by Mr. Blain—asked :

1. When and to whom were homestead entries granted for the following Dominion lands : northeast quarter-section 20, township 14, range 1, west second meridian ; southwest quarter-section 16, township 28, range 1, west third meridian ; northwest quarter-section 36, township 21, range 8, west second meridian ; southeast quarter-section 36, township 21, range 8, west second meridian ; northeast quarter-section 2, township 22, range 8, west second meridian ?
2. Are the persons holding the entries fulfilling their duties ? If not, to what extent have they fallen short ?
3. Have extensions of time been granted, and on what grounds ?
4. Have patents or recommendations for the issue of patents been granted, and on what grounds ?
5. Have any of the entrants had previous homestead entries ? If so, what were the dates of the same, and were patents granted ?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) :

N.E. ¼ sec. 20, tp. 14, range 1, W. 2nd M. was patented to Wm. Goldsmith on the 10th October, 1888. He had no previous entry.

S.W. ¼ sec. 16, tp. 28, range 1, W. 3rd M. (1). Homestead entry granted to Wm. B. F. Whitesides on April 26, 1905. He had no previous entry. (2). The homesteader failed to perform the required duties, his residence being defective owing to ill health. He had lived on the land for six months only, but had broken 12 acres and erected a house. (3). On the 19th May, 1906, an extension was granted until the 1st of November following. The grounds for such extension were that the entrant had resided for six months upon the homestead, had erected a house and cultivated 12 acres. (4). No certificate of recommendation was issued ; but on account of the ill health of the entrant, necessitating a change of climate he was allowed to purchase at $3 per acre.

N.W. ¼ sec. 36, tp. 21. range 8, W. 2nd M. (1). Homestead entry was granted to John Bradley on the 3rd October, 1902. He had no previous entry. (2). Homesteader is at present in Brandon, and attributes his absence from homestead to a broken leg. His duties were in default when land was visited by homestead inspector on February 21, 1906, as no residence had been performed although there was a house on land worth $25, and 20 acres of breaking was done. By a subsequent report dated July 24, 1906, the value of the house was placed at $10. Homesteader has announced his intention to return to the homestead as soon as able and perform necessary residence. (3). The following extensions were granted in this case : October 19, 1904, entry protected to May 18, 1905, no reason recorded ; April 4, 1906, entry was protected to May 1, 1906, for the reason that the inspector recommended that the entrant should be given an opportunity of going into residence. February 20, 1907, entry was protected to May 1, 1907, under general order protecting all homesteads in Regina district owing to scarcity of fuel and severe winter. (4). Neither certificate of recommendation nor patent has yet been issued.

S.E. ¼ sec. 36, tp. 21, range 8, W. 2nd M. (1). Homestead entry was granted to John Bradley. He made no previous entry. (2). Present condition of duties uncertain. The duties having been reported in default the agent was instructed on the 9th of November, 1906, to cancel the entry, but on the 16th idem the agent wrote to the head office inclosing copy of a letter from entrant stating he was going on to his homestead that week. Consequently, the agent was instructed to hold over proceedings for a homestead inspector's report, and not to carry out instructions if entrant was found in occupation. The agent on the 6th of December, 1906, instructed the inspector to furnish a report, which has not yet come to hand. (3). On the 18th of January, 1906, the entry was protected until 1st of May, 1906. No reason recorded.

N.E. ¼ sec. 2, tp. 22, range 8, W. 2nd M. (1). Homestead entry granted to Thos. Forster on 31st January, 1907. He had no previous entry. (2). There has been no correspondence since the present entry was granted. (3). No extensions have been granted. (4). Neither patent nor certificate of recommendation has been issued.

JUDGES IN REVIEW OR APPEAL.

Mr. BEAUPARLANT—by Mr. Talbot—asked :

1. What is the detailed statement of the travelling expenses of Judge Tellier, for the years 1891, 1892 and 1893, when he had his official residence at St. Hyacinthe ?
2. For how many days of court sittings, outside the district of St. Hyacinthe during each of those years, did he make special claim ?
3. During each of those three years, how much did he receive under this heading ?
4. Does the honourable Minister of Justice intend to leave exclusively to the chief justices of the Superior Court and of the Court of Appeals, at Montreal and Quebec, the responsibility of selecting the judges to sit in review or, as judges ad hoc, in appeal ?
5. Does not the honourable Minister of Justice purpose rather to have an understanding with the said chief justices to the effect of forbidding a judge—who had in the first place exercised his jurisdiction in a rural district, without having, on leaving there, obtained a certificate from the bar of that district—from hearing, as a judge in review or of appeal, cases originating in the said rural district ?

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice) :

1892	1,500

4 and 5. Under the revised statutes of the province of Quebec, article 2321, it is the duty of the Chief Justice of the Superior Court, or of the judge performing the duties of Chief Justice for Montreal District, to select the judges who, in the Superior Court sit in review. If the despatch of judicial business calls for it, he may require the temporary services of any judge outside Montreal or Quebec, as the case may be.

By article 2299 of the said revised statutes, the Governor General in Council may appoint an assistant judge in the King's Bench, appeal side, in case of the prolonged absence of a judge, if the Chief Justice, or, in his absence, the senior puisné judge, who is able to act, certifies his opinion that the due administration of justice would be promoted by such an appointment.

In cases of simple re-hearing under article 2303 of the said revised statutes, a judge of the Superior Court may be requested by the Chief Justice to act ad hoc.

The responsibility of selecting judges to sit in review or as judges ad hoc in appeal, does not rest upon the Minister of Justice unless the appointment of an assistant judge under the provision of article 2299 becomes requisite.

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON IMMIGRANTS.

Mr. LEONARD—by Mr. Blain—asked :

1. Is the government aware of the recent arrival in this country of a considerable number of colonists, natives of the French colony of St. Pierre et Miquelon?

2. If so, have measures been taken to retain and settle those immigrants on Canadian soil ?

3. What are those measures ?

4. Who caused those immigrants to come here ?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) :

1. Yes.

2. and 3. No special measures.

4. A letter in this connection was received by the department in December last from Dr. T. A. Brisson, agent of the Montreal Repatriation Society, stating as follows:—'Following the several consecutive seasons of bad fishing and also for various other reasons which have aggravated the crisis at the present time, the population of the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, which was formerly from 5,500 to 6,000 souls has decreased this year to from 4,500 to 5,000. Over a thousand immigrants already have left, more than 500 have come to Canada, a quarter has gone to the United States, and the balance consisting of the important ship owners, of merchants, and of the best fishermen have returned to France.

As, in the opinion of even the most optimistic, there is little hope that the situation will be improved in the near future, the population is preparing to desert in a body as soon as it will have found the way of sufficient investment. I estimate 2,000, as a low estimate, as the number of those who will set out in the course of the next year.

Convinced of the excellent quality of this emigration, the Colonization Society of Montreal has busied itself with the means of attracting it in this direction, and letting it know the prosperous state of Canada as well as the great need of labourmen which is prevalent, and of procuring for it considerable facilities of transport and employment.'

To this the Superintendent of Immigration sent the following reply :—'Referring to your report dated the 5th ultimo, on the subject of French immigration from the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, I beg to say that the view taken by the department is that as long as there appears to be a field for their activity in Canada the movement referred to is acceptable, but as the immigrants are fishermen, rather than farmers, the department cannot take the same interest in the work as if the people were farmers, inasmuch as the government's interest in immigration is largely to help the movement in agricultural population.'

3. When does the government expect to be able to conduct sales of the land, and at what point or points ?

4. Does the government propose to acquire by purchase or otherwise any portion of the reserve for homestead purposes ?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) :

On January 28, 1907, the Kakeewistahaw band of Indians surrendered 33,281 acres of their reserve, No. 72, in the province of Saskatchewan, lying south of the road allowance between projected townships 17 and 18, ranges 4 and 5, west of the second meridian, to be sold for their benefit, and on January 29, 1907, the Cowessess band of Indians surrendered 20,704 acres of their reserve, No. 73, in the province of Saskatchewan, lying south of the road allowance between projected townships 17 and 18, range 6, west of the second meridian, to be sold for their benefit.

Hon. Mr. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). (Translation). The 'tour-de-rôle' system has not been abolished but it is the intention of the department to grant licenses to the apprentices who have passed their indenture of apprenticeship, only insofar as their services will be required by the navigation companies, so as to avoid conjestion in the 'tour-de-rôle'.

2. In 1894, 266 days; 1895, 264 days.

TORONTO—BRANCH POST OFFICE.

Mr. BRISTOL asked:

Is it the intention of the government to erect a branch post office in Centre Toronto, at or near Spadina avenue and College street?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). The matter is engaging the attention of the department.

IMMIGRATION EMPLOYMENT AGENTS.

Mr. BARR asked:

1. How many agents are appointed by the Dominion government for the purpose of assisting immigrants to obtain employment?
2. How many in each province?
3. What is the name and address of each agent?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). The immigration agents regularly employed at ocean ports, viz., North Sydney, Halifax, St. John, Quebec, Montreal, Vancouver and Victoria, the Commissioner of Immigration at Winnipeg, and all immigration agents and land guides in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, make it a part of their duty to assist immigrants to obtain employment when required. In addition to these are employed 188 commission agents for the special purpose of placing farm labourers in the province of Ontario. With the permission of the House I shall lay on the table a statement of their names and addresses.

On the order:

SUBSIDIES TO PROVINCES.

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:
Most Gracious Sovereign:

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty for the purpose of representing that it is expedient to amend the scale of payments authorized under section 118 of the Act of parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, commonly called the British North America Act, 1867, to be made by Canada to the several provinces of the Dominion for the support of their governments and legislatures by providing that—

A. Instead of the amounts now paid, the sums hereafter payable yearly by Canada to the several provinces for the support of their governments and legislatures, to be according to population, and as follows:

(a) Where the population of the province is under 150,000.. .. .. $100,000
(b) Where the population of the province is 150,000, but does not exceed 200,000.. 150,000
(c) Where the population of the province is 200,000, but does not exceed 400,000.. 180,000
(d) Where the population of the province is 400,000, but does not exceed 800,000.. 190,000
(e) Where the population of the province is 800,000, but does not exceed 1,500,000.. 220,000
(f) Where the population of the province exceeds 1,500,000.. 240,000

B. Instead of an annual grant per head of population now allowed, the annual payment hereafter to be at the same rate of eighty cents per head, but on the population of each province, as ascertained from time to time by the last decennial census, until such population exceeds 2,500,000, and at the rate of sixty cents per head for so much of said population as may exceed 2,500,000.

C. An additional allowance to the extent of one hundred thousand dollars annually for ten years to the province of British Columbia.

We pray that Your Majesty may be graciously pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the imperial parliament at its present session, repealing the provisions of section 118 of the British North America Act, 1867, aforesaid, and substituting therefor the scale of payments above set forth, which shall be a final and unalterable settlement of the amounts to be paid yearly to the several provinces of the Dominion for their local purposes and the support of their governments and legislatures.

Such grants shall be paid half-yearly in advance, to each province; but the government of Canada shall deduct from such grants, as against any province, all sums chargeable as interest on the public debt of that province in excess of the several amounts stipulated in the said Act.

All of which we humbly pray Your Majesty to take into your favourable and gracious consideration.—Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I give notice that I intend to take up this resolution on Thursday next.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Might I ask the Prime Minister whether this proposed revision of the constitution is to be strictly limited to the one matter of financial reform? Inasmuch as he has confessed several times in this House that he cannot enforce federal law, can he not obtain that power which the Minister of Justice confesses he does not now possess, when applying for this revision of the constitution?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If the provincial governments were asking for a revision of the constitution in that respect, there would be more force perhaps in the hon. gentleman's contention than there is in this case.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. WM. PATERSON (Minister of Customs), moved that the House go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Customs Act, chapter forty-eight of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, and to provide as follows :

1. That section thirty-eight of the said Act be repealed and the following inserted in lieu thereof :

38. Vessels entering the Gut of Annapolis shall be reported and entered at such place as the minister, from time to time, directs.

2. That section forty-three of the said Act be amended by adding thereto the following words .

Provided that duty shall not be assessed on less than the invoice value of goods in any case, except on account of reduction in the fair market value of such goods between the time of their purchase by the Canadian importer and their exportation to Canada ;

Provided further, that the appraiser, or collector acting as appraiser, in estimating the value for duty may disregard trifling fluctuation in market values occurring after the purchase of the goods by the Canadian importer, and may allow a bona fide discount for cash, not exceeding two and one-half per cent, when allowed and deducted by the exporter on his invoice.

3. That section sixty-four and section seventy of the said Act be repealed.

4. That section seventy-nine of the said Act be amended by striking out the words 'twenty-five,' and inserting instead thereof the word 'fifteen.'

5. That section one hundred and fifteen of the said Act be amended by adding thereto the following subsection :

(2) In the case of goods shipped to Canada on consignment, when such goods have not been sold by the exporter thereof prior to their arrival in Canada, the owner or his agent or consignee shall deliver to the collector such documents and information as he requires, including statements showing the terms and conditions on which the goods are to be sold, accounted for, or disposed of in Canada, as an aid in the appraisement of such consigned goods.

6. That section two hundred and twenty-seven of the said Act be repealed, and the following provisions substituted therefor :

227. Every one is guilty of an offence, and liable for such offence, on summary conviction before two justices of the peace, or police magistrate, or other magistrate having the powers of two justices of the peace, to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars and not less than ten dollars, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or to both, who without written authority of the collector or other proper officer of customs—

(a) by any contrivance gains access to bonded goods in a railway car, or to goods in a railway car, upon which goods the customs duties have not been paid ; or

(b) delivers bonded or other goods upon which customs duties have not been paid, or aids or abets such delivery ; or

(c) (except in consequence of accident to the car) unloads or removes from any car any bonded or other goods upon which customs duties have not been paid, or aids or abets such unloading or removal ; or

(d) contrary to the order of the collector at any port of entry, distributes any car or cars on a track or siding not designated by the collector for holding the same at such port, when any of the cars contains imported goods in bonds or, under customs manifests to be entered at customs at that port, or aids or abets such distribution.

2. The collector at any port of entry in Canada, may (subject to the directions of the Minister of Customs), designate the railway tracks, sidings, yards and places within the limits of the port, whereon there may be placed and held cars containing imported goods on which customs duties have not been paid, pending the delivery of such goods under the permit of the collector, or their transfer to authorized customs warehouses, or their removal under customs regulations.

7. That section ninety-nine of the said Act be amended by adding the following subsection thereto :

(5) Every person who desires to export any article manufactured in Canada which is subject to a bounty from the government of Canada when for home consumption and not for exportation, including steel blooms and steel billets made in Canada, shall file his written application with the collector at the nearest customs house, for permission to export the same. Such applications shall be accompanied by the affidavit of a person having a knowledge of the facts, setting forth and describing the articles proposed to be exported and establishing to the satisfaction of the collector, that bounty has not been paid and will not be claimed on or in respect of the said described articles, or if bounty has been paid thereon, or in respect thereof, that the same has been refunded to the government,

The collector may then grant his permission for the exportation of the said described articles. If any of such articles be laden in any railway carriage or other vehicle, or vessel, for the purpose of being exported, without the permission of the collector of customs as aforesaid, the same shall be seized and forfeited.

8. That section ninety of the said Act be amended by adding thereto the following words :

Provided that an allowance not exceeding two per cent per annum, nor exceeding eight per cent in the whole in any case, may be made for deficiencies in measurement of wines and spirit in cask, arising from natural causes, after such wines and spirits have been entered for warehouse, and prior to the ex-warehousing thereof, under regulations of the Governor in Council.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does the hon. gentleman intend to take that up on any particular date ?

Mr. PATERSON. No. Not to-morrow.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. The Minister of Customs is now proposing to change the Customs law, and I wish to ask him in that connection if he is making any provision for the enforcement of the Customs Act which he is asking parliament to amend ?

Mr. PATERSON. As far as I know, the Customs Act is very well enforced.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I can show the minister, and I will show him later on, that it is not.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY EMPLOYEES' PROVIDENT FUND.

Amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 68) to establish the Intercolonial Railway and Prince Edward Island Railways employees' provident fund—Mr. Emmerson—read the first time.

Mr. EMMERSON moved that the said amendments be now read the second time and agreed to.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What are the amendments ?

Mr. EMMERSON. They are not of very great import. One enables female employees to come under the provisions of the Act. Another provides that the physician shall be a duly qualified medical practitioner.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. How many women are employed on the railway now ?

Mr. EMMERSON. At all terminal points charwomen are employed to clear cars. I do not know how many at the different points. There is one other amendment where they leave out the words 'and are not reinstated' on page 5, lines 4 and 5. That relates to employees who have been dismissed for misconduct. Under the Bill, as it left this House, any of these men might have been so dismissed, but having been reinstated they could come under the provisions of the Act. The Senate, in their wisdom, have seen fit to make it impossible to reinstate a man who has once been dismissed for cause. There is some force in that and I am accepting the amendment, although I have known of cases in which men were dismissed, under some misapprehension of the facts, and where the matter came under review, they were reinstated. That is not now possible—that is so as to enable a man to come under the provisions of the Act or get any of the benefit flowing from the operation of this Act.

Motion agreed to, and amendment read the second time and concurred in.

DOMINION LANDS ACT—AMENDMENT.

House again in committee on Bill (No. 21) to consolidate and amend the Acts respecting the public lands of the Dominion.—Mr. Oliver.

On section 10—application for entry.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I was discussing with the minister on Friday evening the importance of having the books and records open to public inspection, either with or without the payment of a small fee. The minister, while justifying to some extent the practice which has prevailed in the past, was inclined to think that the time had probably now come when some change might be made in the practice in that regard. It seems to me that this section would be a very good place for making such an amendment.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). Having gone into the matter pretty carefully with the officers of the department, I would not like to take the responsibility at present of making the change my hon. friend suggests. No doubt in some parts of the country the change would be a very proper one but in others it would not. It would depend upon the conditions of settlement and of the settlers. In a land district where the greater part of the land had already been taken up, and it was a matter merely of getting the land under entry, no doubt the provision would be quite proper. But in other parts, where new settlers are coming in and undergoing all the difficulties of pioneer life, the policy would be a doubtful one and contrary to the principle which has been hitherto maintained in the administration of the Lands Department, and would give speculative claim jumpers the advantage of using the records and books of these offices for advancing their own interests at the expense of the pioneer settler.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The objection to the present system is that it encourages speculative homestead entries.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot agree with my hon. friend that the present system encourages speculative homestead entries ; and I think he would have to agree with me that the proposition of the leader of the opposition would certainly assist speculative claim-jumping.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. How could it ?

Mr. OLIVER. If my hon. friend cannot agree with me, of course, we cannot agree—that is all.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I am open to conviction, and would be pleased if the minister will allow the knowledge that John Jones occupies a certain quarter-section could possibly affect his claim to that quarter-section or facilitate any body dispossessing him. The minister knows,—or, if he does not know his agents can tell him—that when one goes to a land office anywhere in the Northwest and asks who is the homesteader of such and such a quarter-section, he is refused the information. If the occupant is a bona fide settler, his name is known, but the date of entry cannot be ascertained. Now, you cannot get it out of the heads of the people that there are hundreds of claims held for purely speculative purposes. I have always held that, in every land office there should be a plan of each township showing not only every quarter-section open to homesteading, but every quarter-section taken up for homestead, who occupies it and the date of his entry. As it is now, a man looking for a homestead finds a place with no improvements upon it, but when he goes to the land office, he is coolly told by the agent that it is taken up, but the name is withheld. The would be settler may have spent two or three hundred dollars going about trying to find a homestead, but that makes no difference to the agent. Who are holding all these homesteads out of settlement in the Northwest? The minister's plan will perpetuate that system but the plan of the leader of the opposition would open the land to honest settlement.

Mr. TURRIFF. The intending settler can always get information whether the land is available for entry. Any settler can go into a land office and find half a dozen township plans giving the land available for homestead entry in these respective townships.

Mr. SPROULE. What about the land that has been entered for, perhaps, two or three years, and not occupied?

Mr. TURRIFF. The suggestion of the leader of the opposition and the member for Victoria would do just what the Minister of the Interior says it would—it would lend great assistance to the men who make a business of claim jumping. If these men could find out exactly who had each quarter-section and the exact day when the six months' term was up, they would be able to cancel the claim of many a bona fide settler who might be prevented by unavoidable circumstances from coming back to his homestead exactly on time. Another drawback would be the interference with the work of the office. I have often seen from twenty-five to fifty men standing in line in the land office awaiting their turn. If any one were entitled to go in and make an examination of the books, the work of the office would be tied up and the bona fide settlers would be delayed in their business. I can understand that in some parts of the country the idea of the leader of the opposition would work well, but if you try it everywhere it would greatly delay homestead entries by bona fide settlers.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) mean that there are sometimes forty or fifty people standing in line who desire to inspect the public record and are denied that privilege?

Mr. TURRIFF. They are there for the purpose of making entry and learning the lands that are most available for homesteading. But if half a dozen of them wished to go in and examine the books to ascertain what lands are available, it would certainly delay the work of the office.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not see that. The person in charge of the office should be ready at all times with a statement to show what lands are available. The facts could be announced, or they could be shown on a map on the wall. I do not think there is any difficulty in that respect. But I start out with the general proposition that the public records touching the public domain of this country ought to be open to the people of this country. Is there any reason why that should not be? The hon. member (Mr. Turriff) and the hon. Minister of the Interior say that publicity will encourage claim jumping, I should think, on the contrary, that secrecy would encourage claim jumping. The only man who is entitled to cancel a claim is the bona fide settler, the man who intends to take up a claim himself. You can place as many safeguards upon his bona fides as you think fit. I cannot see that there is any argument here against publicity. As a matter of fact, the minister told us, last session, or the session before, that under this scheme of secrecy, a great many homesteads had been taken up by those who were not bona fide settlers. These claim jumpers had been able to hold up many claims year after year as against intending settlers. You cannot have a much worse condition of affairs than that described by the minister himself. The principle of publicity has worked well in the other provinces, and I do not understand that in their administration of public lands the difficulties have arisen of which the minister speaks. The hon. member for East Assiniboia and the Minister of the Interior say that this may be a good principle for some part of the country. The minister spoke of districts in which the greater part of the homestead lands had been taken up. Well, if it is a good principle there, surely it is a good principle where nearly all the lands are open for homesteading. If it is good where homesteads have been taken up and there is opportunity for claim jumping, surely there can be no argument against it where no claims have been made, and where, consequently, there can be no claim jumping. I venture to still further insist that the principle of publicity is a good principle, and ought not to be abandoned in this instance unless better arguments are urged against it than have been advanced up to this time.

Mr. LENNOX. The statement of the member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) as to the people waiting in line in the land offices does not present great difficulty, I think. What you need is that there shall be a knowledge on the part of the people and of the official that there is a public record accessible to the public. Even though that record is open, the public need not avail themselves of it all the time. If you have forty or fifty making entry, the official announces whether or not a lot is open for homesteading. If the law provides that the person making the inquiry can verify the truthfulness of the answer, you will not very often have the demand made for the production of the record. He feels that the officer dare not tell him what is not true; he knows that the person making the application can verify the answer immediately. When you have that safeguard you will have an honest administration of the office, whereas with the present law there is a feeling in the minds of the public, not altogether unfounded, that in some cases there is not an honest administration of the office and that A, B or C makes application for an entry and is told that that lot has already been taken, whereas in fact it has not been taken. Let there be a record kept, let the books of the office be open to the examination of any person who wishes to test the accuracy of the statement of an official, and you will not have a great rush of people to examine the records but every one will feel he can verify statements made to him and an obligation will be put on the official to tell the truth. There is no such obligation now, and there can be claim-jumping and fraud of various kinds. In all public business a written record should be kept open to all people who have occasion to consult it.

Mr. BARR. Secrecy in connection with the public domain is a very dangerous power to place in the hands of any body of men. Few who have had experience with lands agents will dissent from the statement that it would be well for the country to have publicity, and that so long as these matters are kept secret there is danger of the present want of confidence increasing. I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) that it would be most dangerous to allow the agents full power to cancel claims or change them from one to another according to the political complexion of the applicants, and just so long as we have this secrecy there will be danger of such frauds. Therefore it would be to the interest of the government and of every honest land agent that there should be full opportunity to ascertain whether certain lands are either now available or will be available in the near future. Why should this information not be open to the public? Why should not a land seeker be able to ascertain whether certain lands would be opened within a month or three months? Is it not to the interest of the government that this should be done? The present system might be an advantage to the government if they desired to have land settled by men who would vote in a ertain way, and I believe that to-day there is too much of that sort of thing going on and that it will continue so long as the power is vested in the land agents. It would be better if land seekers would enter the land office as we can a registry office and find out how the land stands and when land would come into the market so that if those in whose names the lands are entered do not fulfil the requirements of the law, others might enter for them. If we had publicity in all these matters, it would be better for all concerned.

Mr. SPROULE. A great number of the omplaints we receive from the west are from people desirous of getting homesteads and are that, although there is a large amount of unoccupied land, they cannot secure information as to when that land was taken up. If a seeker for land knew that a certain homestead had been entered for within the last six or eight months, he would not waste time looking after it, but with land entered for two or three or five years ago, there is a chance of the conditions not being fulfilled; perhaps the land is still vacant but when these seekers go to the land office, they find they cannot enter for these lands. Surely it is not reasonable to allow any man's entry for a homestead to stand for three or four years, yet it will not be cancelled until some person applies for cancellation. Land seekers would not hesitate to apply for a cancellation of an entry dating that far back, but if they knew they were entered for five or six months before it is not likely the land seekers would pay attention to the entry because they would expect the applicant to take possession of the homestead. That is the position of affairs all over that country. I have letter after letter telling me that land has been entered for three or four years ago and that there is no person on it yet. I have brought two or three cases before the minister, or the department, one which he will remember on Saturday last, and in some of these cases it is two years since the entries were made, other parties have been desirous of having them cancelled but they will not be cancelled until application for cancellation is made and the sixty days are up during which that party has an opportunity to go on the homestead. One of the first requisites to remedy that state of affairs is publicity. In the newer parts of Ontario this was one of the most annoying things settlers had to contend with. The land seeker would get from the agent a list of lands open for settlement and would be told to inspect them and make first, second and third selections. He would return and say that he has selected a particular farm, but would be informed that it had been entered for while he was away. The agent would not say who had made the entry but years and years afterwards it was found that friends of the land agents had had their names entered in that way. It was all manipulated through the land office, some friend of the agent would purchase the right to enter and give consideration for it, whereas in reality there never was a bona fide entry. It was found that the agent had permitted improper entries to be made which could never have been made had he been obliged to give publicity to his transactions as do all other offices dealing with the public lands. I have no doubt that the same thing has taken place in the Northwest. There was a case that came within my knowledge where a land agent accepted entry for a homestead. The party never resided three weeks on the land in his life but he held it, finally got his deed, mortgaged the land and raised money on it. If it had been known who had the entry of that land a great many people in the district would have known that the party was not living in that locality at all and that he did not intend to live in it. But it was managed so well that he got his deed for the land and afterwards mortgaged it, and it it safe to say that he could not have done that except through the connivance of the land agent. Whether the land agent was paid a consideration for allowing this to be done or not I do not know, but if parties desiring to make entry for that land had known that the duties had not been performed and had known who had made the entry previously the scheme could not have been carried out in the way it was. I have reason to believe that in many cases, through connivance between the land agent and individuals, these homesteads have been held not for five or six months but for some years and that they are being so held to-day because they understand each other and the entries have not been cancelled. The land agents will not allow a cancellation of them. If you have publicity it will bring about a different state of things, it will establish the fact that in many cases there is wrong being done and it will prevent the possibility of it. These things have remained so long hidden that the people cannot know of them. When the facts are brought to light the people will be able to take advantage of these homestead entries that were made years ago for lands on which the parties never intended to locate and the country would be settled up much more rapidly than it is being settled at the present time.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. I think that at the last session of parliament the Minister of the Interior stated that it was his intention in order to put an end to what is known as fake homesteading, to have his officials make their inspection and where they visited a quarter-section and found that the homestead duties were not done, to cancel the entry without an application having been made by any other applicant to have it cancelled. I would ask the minister if that principle has been carried into effect in this legislation, or if it is necessary to have a person make application for the cancellation of an entry where the duties have not been fulfilled instead of empowering his officials to take action themselves, or if this is to remain exactly in the same position in which it used to be; that is that it is necessary to have an application made on behalf of some other party in order to secure the cancellation of an entry.

Mr. OLIVER. The law as proposed in this Bill is, in that regard, exactly the same as the law in the present Act. There is no provision in either the present Act or this proposed Bill for the case which my hon. friend (Mr. W. J. Roche) speaks of. It was thought last year that in certain parts of the country there had been considerable blanketing of homesteads and because of that special condition, under the authority which is vested in the minister, an arrangement was made which provided for cancellation on the responsibility of the department without waiting for an application for cancellation. That was a proper procedure under these circumstances but it would not have been a proper procedure to apply it all over the country. That procedure was applied in parts of the country which were largely settled, where the proportion of unprotected entries was comparatively small and where the question of cancellation was a very live and important one. But, it would not have been in the interests of settlement to have arbitrarily applied that policy of cancellation in the newer and more sparsely settled parts of the country because there is no doubt that a very severe blow would have been given to settlement; that is that many poor settlers who did not happen to have gone into the occupation of their land in time would have been deprived of their entry, they would have sustained a considerable loss and the settlement of the country would have been held back to that extent. After all it is the man who has gone out into the country, who has appeared at the land office and made entry whose land is inspected, who has paid his fee and who, so to speak, puts his life in the balance against this particular quarter-section, who is entitled to consideration and that is the man to whom we want to give consideration and to whom consideration has been given in the administration of the land law ever since there was a land law, with the exception of one short period.

Mr. SPROULE. Do you not think that where a man has made an entry and has remained away from his homestead without giving any reason of his inability to go upon it the government should be entitled to cancel that entry without inquiry? If he had given reasons from time to time and they had been acceptable to the department I could understand it, but where a man makes an entry without any intention of going on the land and remains away for several years it seems to me that cancellation should take place as a matter of course. I am told that there are lots of cases where entries were made five years ago, where nothing has been done in the direction of the performance of the duties and that still these entries are held. Does the minister think that it is proper under such circumstances to hold such land and prevent others from settling upon it?

Mr. OLIVER. In the law as it stands there is nothing to prevent the arbitrary cancellation of a homestead entry by the authority of the minister?

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. Is that ever done?

Mr. OLIVER. Last year we entered upon a campaign in certain parts of the country where it seemed to be desirable and it was done in something like a thousand cases. We thought that the evil had grown so great that it ought to be grappled with. What I am trying to point out to the committee is that as conditions differ in different parts of the country it is right and proper that there should not be an even hand in the administration of what appears to be the same law, but that in order to secure the best results we have to be lenient in one place where we have to be stringent in another place. It must strike my hon. friend that the practice which has been in existence ever since this Dominion government was charged with the administration of the public lands of the Northwest must have some reason for it although it may not appear upon the face. It is a practice that has existed in the Northwest ever since the Dominion government has administered the lands there. There was a short time during which there was an exception to that principle when, for one reason or another, under the late government, the principle of automatic cancellation was adopted, or if not automatic cancellation, a principle akin to what my hon. friend has suggested that the claim jumper should have every facility for carrying out his work. That principle was adhered to in the administration for a few months—I do not think it lasted a year—and it was abandoned by the same government which had entered upon it and was never resumed.

Mr. SPROULE. What was the experience in the locality in which the minister says a thousand claims were cancelled? Was it good or bad?

Mr. OLIVER. It was perfectly good there.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. What I am trying to say is that under the conditions existing in some parts of the country it is perfectly right that there should be all the publicity that the hon. leader of the opposition has suggested. A statutory provision would apply to all parts of the country, whether they are suitable for its application or not.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Would the minister please point out how this publicity, will interfere with this discretion to grant an extension of time for good and sufficient reasons? I can tell the minister that those who get extensions of time honestly are nearly all known, and the men we want to get at are those who are holding these mysterious sections. If John Jones has not completed his homestead duties, give him all reasonable time to do so if he is an honest citizen, but let his name be published. The publicity does not interfere with the minister's power to extend the time.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The point raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Sam. Hughes) is a very important one. Publicity will not interfere with the discretion of the minister, but it will attach a certain publicity to his acts, which I am certain he does not dread. Let me remind the minister that the man whom he calls a 'claim jumper' may be a bona fide settler, and the man whose claim is jumped may be a speculator. Of course there may be a case where the speculator tries to jump the claim of a bona fide settler, but 'claim jumper' is not necessarily a term of reproach. If a bona fide settler goes to the west he has a right to know whether certain land is held by a speculator, and he has a right to make his claim for cancellation and to oust the speculator. Publicity does not interfere with the discretion of the minister, and if that discretion is exercised along proper, and honest and straightforward lines, as we should assume it will be, then, publicity is better not only for the people of the country, but for the minister and the government.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. As it is now, the thing is arranged by a deal between the homesteader and the land agent. I would infinitely prefer to have it a deal between the homesteader and the people of Canada, through the minister. If by reason of illness or any other proper cause, a man is unable to carry out his homestead duties, every one would endorse the minister in giving an extension of time. But, for goodness sake let us know who are supposed to be on these lands. The adventurer has the advantage under the present system, and if the bona fide settler could find out who that adventurer is, then he would have the right to jump the adventurer's claim. As to the argument of the minister, that the time of these land agents would be taken up by the number of people asking for information, that difficulty can easily be gotten over. The minister knows as well as I do that there is very little land left in that country for homesteading, and now that the land is becoming valuable we want to get at these speculators. Let there be a map hung up in the land office, and let the man's name and the date of his entry be written on each quarter-section. Then, the bona fide settler can see at a glance what lands are available and who owns them.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. The only argument advanced by the minister against publicity, is, that it will be an encouragement to the claim jumper. Well, if a bona fide homesteader made the original entry he need have nothing to fear from publicity, for if a 'claim jumper' came along the bona fide settler would have had an application in the department for an extension of time if he were not able to fulfil his duties within the statutory limit. It is the 'claim jumper' and speculator who have to fear publicity. I would prefer to see arbitrary power placed in the hands of the government inspector, rather than to have the present system continued. The homestead inspectors could know from the local land agents whether good reasons had been assigned for extension. I would not bind the homesteader down to a year, or a year and a half if he gave good reasons. If the homesteader did not make some reasonable effort to fulfil his duties, I would rather see the inspector have the authority to cancel, than to have the thing held up for years as it is now, and the speculator allowed to thrive. It will not be the bona fide settler who will be injured by publicity; it will be the speculative homesteader. It is not a new thing to hear of collusion between land agents and speculators. The hon. gentleman who last year expressed surprise to hear of such a thing as fake homesteading had their answer to-day in the announcement of the Minister of the Interior, that no less than 1,000 entries have been cancelled during the past year. I think it was my genial friend from Strathcona (Mr. McIntyre) who told us he had to come to Ottawa to hear that there was any such thing as fake homesteading, but now he learns that 1,000 homesteads have been cancelled.

Mr. W. McINTYRE. Does the hon. gentleman say there was any fake homesteading within my constituency? It is the only place for which I was empowered to speak.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. I do not know where the cancellations took place, but I do not think there is anything in the argument of the Minister of the Interior, that publicity would be beneficial in one locality and not beneficial in another. The hon. member for East. Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) spoke of inconvenience, but the inconvenience could be easily overcome, and anyway, whatever inconvenience might ensue would be more than offset by the benefits which will be derived by bona fide settlers.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The bona fide settler does not require any collusion with the land agent; the speculator does. That collusion cannot take place when there is publicity. That is the whole thing in a nut shell. What public records are kept in the land office?

Mr. OLIVER. There is a book with a description of each quarter-section in the township, the date of the entry, the applicant, and all particulars in regard to it. There are other books contingent upon that, but that is what you might call the day book.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Are there documents kept on file?

Mr. OLIVER. The correspondence is kept on file and the land office book contains the actual condition of every entry so far as the land agent is aware. In regard to the suggestion of my hon. friend from Marquette as to the power of arbitrary cancellation by order of the minister, that of course is in the Act as it is in effect at present, and it is a very necessary and proper power; but I think it is a power that should not be exercised indiscriminately or acted on automatically. My hon. friend is good enough to say that it would be right that the minister should have a little discretion in giving an extension of time to a bona fide settler for good and sufficient reasons; but will my hon. friend remember that during the last year there were over 40,000 homestead entries, the year before some 30,000, and the year before that some 25,000; and any of those hundred thousand entries may come under the requirement for an extension of time? This discretion is given to the minister, not to benefit the speculator or the speculative homesteader, but to assist the man who is dependent on the money he can earn by labour off the claim, in order to make good his title to it. That is a matter of fact, and the very first land Act was framed with that in view. It required residence for six months on the claim, so that the holder of the claim might be six months off it in order to earn the wherewithal to prove upon it. That is the principle of the Act, that the man may be off his claim for half the time, and it is under that principle that the country has been settled. I have known hundreds of cases of men having had to go from the district where I have lived to work in the lumber woods of British Columbia to earn a litle money; and if a man is not home on the day after the end of that six months, is his claim to be up for cancellation?

Mr. LAKE. Cannot the minister still grant him leave of absence?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly, the minister can grant him leave of absence. We have to deal with men who are not versed in the letter of the law, who are living a thousand or two thousand miles away from headquarters where this leave is granted, who may not know beforehand that they will require the leave. If we are going to give consideration only to those homesteaders who have secured leave of absence from the central authority, we are going to work a very severe hardship and cause a very severe loss to those on whom we are dependent for the building up of our country.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Will the minister tell me this? Some claim jumper notifies the department that John Jones, of a certain quarter-section, has not been on his place for a certain length of time, and has not complied with the settlement duties. What is the procedure in that case?

Mr. OLIVER. Any person may apply for the cancellation of any homestead. If a man goes into the land office and applies for the cancellation of a certain homestead, it is not necessary that he should know in whose name the homestead is entered or any other particulars about it beyond the fact that the settlement duties have not been fulfilled.

Mr. LAKE. How can he tell that if he does not know the date of the entry?

Mr. OLIVER. If he has been observant of the land and the conditions, he will know.

Mr. LAKE. He might be a new comer.

Mr. OLIVER. Precisely; he is a stranger and that is the whole argument—that the stranger shall have the advantage over the man who has settled in the country.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The point I make is that the minister has to intervene. He may say, Mr. Jones has not done his settlement duties, but he has done pretty well, and we will give him an extension, and the claim jumper is turned right about. If the time of the entry were known in the neighbourhood, the claim jumper would not go in. I know of a case, and the minister knows it, in which a man, no doubt in collusion with the land agent, jumped a claim on which the holder had built a House and had broken up scores of acres. The settler got notice to leave in a few days; but the neighbours gave the adventurer to understand that if he came there he would be treated to a coat of tar and feathers. In such a case the neighbours can be trusted to see that fair-play is done.

Mr. OLIVER. In the instance which the hon. gentleman mentions the actual settler on the homestead had not made entry for it. That was the whole trouble.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. He thought he had made entry. It was not his fault.

Mr. OLIVER. The books did not show that he had made entry. Under the system of publicity which my hon. friend suggests, his friend would have lost his place.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Not at all. He would have known that he had not entered for it. That man had made his entry, but by some mistake it was not recorded.

Mr. OLIVER. As a matter of fact he did not make his entry, although he was in occupation of the place, and therefore the books of the land office did not and could not give him protection.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Was not an application made for it?

Mr. OLIVER. A stranger, and I verily believe a claim jumper, heard or was informed that there was land at that particular place. I do not know that he went to see the land; but I believe he knew that there was some person in occupation of it before he made entry. He then undertook to put the occupant off.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Publicity would not have injured any one in that case. Further, is not the applicant obliged to declare when he makes application that there is no one on occupation?

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That would be a saving clause. Publicity could not have made it any harder for that man, who thought he had made an entry, but had not.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. If I understood the minister correctly, he said that the record gave the applicant's name and the date of application. I suppose if there is a cancellation, there is also a record of the date in that same book. Is there any way in which the public can have access to that record? Are they allowed to go into a land office and examine it on the payment of a fee?

Mr. OLIVER. There is no provision for any person demanding an examination of the books.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I claim there should be. I claim that the public should have the same access to the books as in a registrar's office. It would be quite legitimate to demand a fee, but I cannot see why there should not be the same provision in this case as in the case of a registry office.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister gave as a reason why we should not make a change, that this provision has been on our statutes in every Land Act up to the present. Well, it may be consequently by age but time has shown its defects. One of its results is that it keeps certain localities from being settled. Another reason given by the minister is that the power has always been vested in him of arbitrary cancelling.

Mr. OLIVER. Of arbitrary cancelling when there is default.

Mr. SPROULE. That is not the statement made from the department and the question has been submitted to the department over and over again. Will he just consider the case that I saw him about on Saturday? An entry was made three years ago and nothing done on the land ever since. A party from Ontario went up with his family seeking land. He applied at the land office for permission to cancel that claim, the entry for which was made over three years ago. But although the man in whose name the entry was made was never in the country and has no intention of ever coming there, and has not made the slightest improvement on the land, this other man, who desired to take possession and become a settler, is told that that entry cannot be cancelled except through the usual procedure of applying for cancellation and waiting for sixty days. I understand from the minister that now he can cancel at any time if he is satisfied that the facts warrant cancellation. I think that right should vest in the minister because that would remove many hardships. The operation of the present law has shown that it is defective and that publicity would largely get rid of the defects. I could cite several cases somewhat similar to the one I have given. Entries were made for parties who never intended going to the country and who were simply acting in collusion with other people. In some instances the object was to secure the advantage of grazing cattle, in others to hold the land until certain individuals came of age, in others because there was a likelihood of these lands becoming town sites. In such cases the minister should be free to cancel the entry and give the land to bona fide homesteaders. I know of instances where men went in from Ontario desirous of getting homesteads and who left the country in disgust because they could not succeed, and yet there were lands locked up through entries having been made, as long back as five years, by men who had no intention of settling, and who had never made any improvements. Does the minister think it wise that he should continue the law as it is?

Mr. W. McINTYRE. I do not think the suggestion of hon. gentlemen opposite will cure the evil of blanketing lands. My hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Roche) was good enough to say I had made a certain statement a year or so ago regarding blanketing which had since been disproved. I would like to make myself clear in that particular. The statement I made then was that I was not aware of any homestead blanketing in my constituency or province. I also said that this was a matter which, under the present law, could not be overcome. I do not believe that this change in the provision suggested by the hon. the leader of the opposition would meet the case.

Mr. SPROULE. Why?

Mr. W. McINTYRE. In this particular. The true blanketing of lands is not the holding of lands by a bona fide homesteader. A man may be unable, owing to bad health, to live out on the prairies and must live close to medical aid, and in such a case I think the minister should have the discretionary power to allow him to continue holding the land. We are all agreed on that. But what really is blanketing is when a man files a claim to a homestead, who never intends to become a settler. Take the conditions as they exist in the west to-day. Every man, regardless of nationality who has not already entered for a homestead, can go into any of the western provinces and enter for a homestead on the payment of $10. Here is where the blanketing comes in. People coming from the United States on a visit know that if they guarantee the railway company which brings them in that they intend to become bona fide settlers, they will get a return fare of one cent a mile. What evidence do they give that they intend to become bona fide settlers? They take out an application for an entry on a quarter-section. What would the publicity of that entry matter to a man living in Wisconson or Illinois? He would not care whether his name was placarded or not. The publicity would not prevent a man making an entry and his entry would hold good for a year.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. W. McIntyre) must have misunderstood the point of my remarks. I did not advocate publicity as a panacea for blanketing. I was laying down the principle that public records respecting the public domain ought to be open to the public unless some good reason could be put forward for keeping them secret, and that, up to the present time, I have not heard any good reason against this publicity. The minister himself raised this question of blanketing and claim-jumping; and I endeavoured to point out, as my belief is, that publicity would not increase claim-jumping, but would operate against it. I may be wrong in that. The hon. gentleman (Mr. W. McIntyre) seems to think I am. But, even if I am wrong in that, the argument is still left that the records of a public office ought to be open to the public unless there is good reason to the contrary.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I would like to ask the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. W. McIntyre) a question. Did he mean to say that Americans in order to get the one-cent-a-mile rate had to take out a homestead entry?

Mr. W. McINTYRE. No, not necessarily. But I said that in going to the proper officer they had the very best of evidence that they are entitled to the return fare by taking it up. And it is their right to take it up. Any passenger from the eastern portion of Canada can do the same, and that to my mind, is a typical case of blanketing. It was not the leader of the opposition who made the statement concerning blanketing, but the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. W. J. Roche). Like the leader of the opposition, I could not see what it had to do with the case. The statement I made still holds good.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My hon. friend from Strathcona is a reasonable man, and I would like to ask him : Does not he believe that the records of a public office, respecting the public domain should be open to the public unless good reason for the contrary course is shown ?

Mr. W. McINTYRE. I am in sympathy with the hon member (Mr. R. L. Borden) there. I have had four or five years' experience of the homestead law, but I do not pretend to know much about it as some hon. members in this House or to be an expert on the subject. I can see no objection to the statement of the leader of the opposition. But, as the minister has said, these hard and fast rules must not be allowed to increase the restrictions upon the public. The conditions in the outer districts of the west require the same freedom from restriction as heretofore. There are localities where the tightening of the administrative grip would be advisable. But there is this to be said, that the more we leave the matter in the discretionary power of the minister the more closely we come to the ideal method of administration.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. There is another reason why these records should be made public, and I think the minister will agree with what I am to say. Take a district in which some man has blanketed the homestead but has done no work—such a case as the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) pointed out. If the records were public, the name of the holder of the homesteads in question would be known, and, if it were clear that the man had no intention of becoming a settler, his application would be cancelled. But here is the kind of thing that has often occurred within the last few years in the west, as it is charged, and I think as evidence can be brought to show : An intending homesteader goes into a village, gets in with the land men and asks where there are homesteads. He goes to the office and is told that such and such quarter-sections are vacant. He finds that these places are far from town, and, for one reason or another, are not satisfactory. He is approached by some person who tells him that he knows of a homestead that is open, but, of course, it will take a little to secure it ; if the intending settler is ready to whack up $1 or $2 an acre, the place can be secured. The would be settler makes a few inquiries and finds that his informant stands pretty close to the land agent. So he puts up his $320 and gets his homestead. If the public had access to these records, every person as well as the friend of the land agent would know which homesteads were open and there would be no trouble. The lots taken up, with the names of those who have applied for them, could be given on a map. That used to be done ; why is it not done now ? The effect of giving such information would be to open up the land for settlement without the necessity of an arrangement on the basis of $1, $2 or $3 an acre to the friend of the land agent.

Mr. PATERSON. I desire to ask a question for information. All seem to be agreed that, so far as it does not take away discretionary power from the minister, publicity is desirable. The hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) spoke of two cases in which quarter-sections have been held for three, four or five years, by parties who were known yet who had not performed settlement duties. If there is no publicity, how are these facts ascertained ? And are the facts we ascertained in such a way that one can rely upon them ?

Mr. SPROULE. In the first place, by visiting the land, it is easy to see that improvements have not been made. Then, it can be learned from people in the neighbourhood that the lot was taken up three years ago, or whatever the length of time may be. I have a case before the minister now in which the land was taken up three years ago, by a man in eastern Ontario, who, I am credibly informed never intended to go there. On the other hand, a man from my constituency, went up there ; and, to avoid the need of coming back for the members of his family, he took them with him. He would take up this lot if he could get it. According to his calculation—though I must say I think he is in error—it would take to about July 1 before the application can be cancelled and he can get on the lot. By that time it would be too late to put in a crop and so, he will have lost the year. I am glad the minister has the authority to act in such cases ; this is a case calling for the exercise of his authority. If there were publicity in these matters, it would be possible to write to the man who has taken up the lot asking if he intends to settle. I have no doubt there are cases in which men have entered applications intending to go, but, for a variety of reasons, have been compelled to change their minds. In many cases, these men would not object to stating their position in the matter. Means could be afforded by which on the facts being properly brought to the attention of the right authority, it would be possible to cancel the application and leave the land open for an actual homesteader. We know that these same difficulties existed in Ontario, and the same things were done by the land agents, not in one case but in many cases. The land agents made immense sums of money out of the business. I am not saying that the land agents in the west are making any money out of it, for I do not know the facts, and would be sorry to be understood as making a charge when I have no evidence to support it. The present system prevents the bona fide applicant from getting a homestead owing to this want of publicity. If the policy of publicity is adopted I believe it will remedy the grievance to a large extent and will result in the settlement of many parts of the country years and years sooner than it would otherwise be settled.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. The Minister of the Interior did not complete his reply to the question of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Sam. Hughes) as to the mode of procedure where a person sends in an application to cancel a homestead entry. He dwelt on the hardship it would be to the bona fide settler who, being obliged to spend half a year in the lumber woods to earn sufficient money to erect his buildings and fulfil his homestead duties, would, perhaps, have some claim jumper secure the cancellation of his application; but the minister knows that when the application for cancellation comes into the office one of the first things done is to send a notification to the man in whose name the application stands and he is then allowed 60 days in which to put in his defence. If this policy of publicity were adopted the minister would still have the discretion to decide whether that application for cancellation should be granted or not, on the strength of the defence, so there is no discretion taken from the minister, he has the same privileges as he has to-day, he need not cancel the application unless he sees fit to do so. I think the system of publicity is one that would work out to the advantage of the country as a whole and the more I think of it the more reasonable it seems to me. The minister should allow the section to stand at least until he makes up his mind more definitely as to whether or not he should adopt the suggestion.

At six o'clock, committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

On section 10, paragraph 1,

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There does not seem to be anything particularly objectionable in the paragraph except the lack of what I have been already refering to at some length.

Mr. OLIVER. I think that what we have been discussing lately would hardly be appropriate in this particular section any way. Whatever conclusion we come to in regard to this matter would have to be provided for in a new section rather than in an amendment to this or any other section that I am aware of in the Bill. While it is all right to have the discussion no amendment of this kind could be appropriately made to this section.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am not especially wedded to discussing it on this section, but it occurred to me that this was a proper place because we have here the reference to the land office and you are making provision for office hours and various details of that kind. I thought it desirable that this subject should be gone into now, but if the minister would prefer to leave it for the present and proceed with the section I have no particular objection.

Mr. OLIVER. I quite appreciate the importance of this question, and I have no objection to carrying on the discussion until we settle exactly what we shall do. The Bill as brought into the House ought not to be absolutely inelastic. It represents in its present form the best efforts that the department could make in adjusting the law to the requirements and conditions. At the same time it must be quite evident that a Bill covering so much ground and touching so many interests might very well be viewed from many different standpoints by many different men. Certainly the Bill cannot suffer any loss by having the freest possible discussion with the fullest possible liberty of amendment in regard to any point.

Mr. SPROULE. You say that the land office shall be open from nine to five or at such other time as the Governor in Council shall fix. Would it not be well to say after that 'during which hours the books of the office shall be open to the inspection of the public.'?

Mr. OLIVER. I think it would be very objectionable to say that the books would be open. I think it would meet every requirement that has been put forward by hon. gentlemen and at the same time interfere with the business of the office in the least degree if we provided that on the payment of a small fee an abstract of the standing of any particular quarter-section could be secured. I think that would probably answer every purpose, as it would interfere very seriously with the work of the office to let any person other than officers of the department handle the books.

Mr. LAKE. I hardly think that would meet the whole case. I cannot see that it would so seriously interfere with the working of the office if the books were placed under the inspection of any man who wanted to make inquiries, not merely as to any particular section, but as to a number of sections lying near or far apart from each other as the case might be. It seemed to me that the whole argument of the Minister of the Interior this afternoon amounted to a plea that the homestead conditions should not be insisted upon. It practically comes to this, that we are drawing up a set of conditions under which homesteaders may go in and obtain the right to a parcel of free land; then after having spent a good deal of time, as I have no doubt we shall, in drawing up these exact conditions, the minister is of the opinion that we should not enforce them. Anybody who listened to his argument this afternoon and to the argument which was made the other evening by the minister would come to the conclusion that the great mass of homesteaders who went into that country did not carry out their conditions. I think that is not the case. I think the vast majority of them carry them out faithfully enough. I think it is a very dangerous principle to announce that the government is in no way prepared to insist that the conditions shall be carried out. I think the government should be prepared to insist that the conditions should be carried out. But, of course, I understand that there are individual cases arising in which it should be in the discretion of some central authority to give extra leave and to give some concessions to the homesteaders who may not be in a position to carry out those conditions to the letter. It seems to me that having these books open and allowing people to examine them and to make entries for certain lands on that examination in no wise makes it absolutely necessary for the minister to cancel any particular entry when it is proved to him that the conditions are not being carried out. He will be well able to inquire into the circumstances of the case and in certain instances, which I understand are provided for in this Act, if a man is absolutely unable from disability of some kind or other to carry out the conditions to the letter the minister is able to extend the time during which they may be carried out. The minister has spoken as if claim jumping, as he puts it, were a matter of great reproach. I think the secrecy which it is proposed to maintain in regard to the books of the different land offices is encouraging the very worst kind of claim jumping. There is no doubt that there is a great deal of suspicion all through that country that the land offices are in many instances used for the granting of benefits to political friends. Whether that is true, or whether it is not true—and I am not saying it is true in every instance—it certainly has given ground for suspicions that would not exist if the books were open to the fullest inspection of the public. I think it is rather hard upon the officials that they should be open to that suspicion, but it will continue beyond a doubt just as long as secrecy is maintained. It seems to me also that there would not be as great an effort made to jump claims if these books were open. For instance, there is a quarter-section of land in which no improvements have been made, where no one is living and there is no evidence of effective occupation. Every one who comes along and finds that quarter-section of land lying there, puts in his application for cancellation and all that he is told is that it is not open for cancellation. A dozen men might do that and do it in perfect good faith, whereas, if they were able to inspect the books in the land office, they would see at once that an extension of time had been granted or that some special concession had been made in regard to that special entry. There are a considerable number of cases, as the minister admitted, in which bogus entries have been made, and in a few only of the land districts, over 1,000 cancellations were made last spring. Last year we discovered that some of the land agents themselves had called attention to the fact that bogus entries were being made. If we have this publicity which we ask for, all suspicion of collusion between the officials and their friends would disappear. Apropos of that, I shall read some extracts from a letter which I have received. I shall not mention the names because I am not going to vouch for the accuracy of the statement made. I quote it as a sample of the letters I have received, and which no doubt other hon. gentlemen have received, as to bogus entries. The letter says:

> There are plenty of young men here anxious to get homesteads but cannot unless they go a long distance from the railway, while a certain family can hold their homesteads without living on them at all. One member of this family has not lived on his homestead for one week of the time he has had it, and that is over four years, while there are no buildings on his son's homesteads. There is also another man who has a homestead for the same period and has never even seen it.

I cannot vouch for the accuracy of that statement, but that is the kind of information I have received. The letter continues:

> So and so brags that he has had two or three homesteads and he will also have this one or he will tell what he knows, etc.

All this kind of thing would be avoided if people could go to the land office and see exactly how these homesteads stood. There is everything to be gained and very little to be lost by publicity. This question of claim jumping is a bogie. In nine cases out of ten the man who jumps a claim is a bona fide settler and is trying to get possession of the land which was entered for by some one else who does not intend to fulfil the conditions. In many cases claim-jumping is a very good thing, when it is done by those who are willing and anxious to earn their lands and add to the prosperity of the country, to the exclusion of the speculators. I hope the minister will consent to have these books and records open to public inspection as the leader of the opposition has asked.

Mr. A. A. WRIGHT. The suggestion made by the Minister of the Interior is in line with the practice we have in Ontario. Any person, by paying a small fee in the registry office, can get the history of any piece of land from the beginning to the present day, and no one ever dreams of asking to see the books in the registry office.

Mr. SPROULE. I would point out to my hon. friend (Mr. Wright) that in the west a man may have to go a long distance to the land office, and naturally when he goes to the land office he would want to know the condition of more than one piece of land. It would be unfair to expect a bona fide settler to pay a fee to get information about the several quarter-sections of land which he might have in view.

Mr. LAKE. The proposal of the Minister of the Interior is, that a man would have to pay twenty-five cents for every single inquiry he makes. He may want information about a dozen quarter-sections, and if he had an opportunity of looking over the records he could find out what he wanted to know without giving trouble to any one.

Mr. A. A. WRIGHT. If a man cannot pay twenty-five cents he ought not to get the land.

Mr. LENNOX. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wright) is not familiar with the law in regard to search in Ontario. The practice and the law is that the books are open to every one, who can look at the entries if they want to. It is only when you get an abstract that you pay the twenty-five cents.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. The Minister of the Interior seems to be afraid that if you leave the records of the land office open to inspection the speculator will rush in with applications to cancel entries to homesteads belonging to bona fide settlers who may not have fulfilled the conditions. The payment of a fee will not hamper the speculator, because he can act in collusion with others who will each pay twenty-five cents to get all the particulars they need about entries. The argument of the Minister of the Interior is not tenable. I feel convinced that if it is well known to the public that there is this publicity about entries, in a greater portion of the cases the right will never be exercised. The mere fact of their knowing that they have this means of finding out when, where and by whom those lands were taken will no doubt satisfy them. There has not to my mind been given as yet any good reason for refusing this very reasonable request of the leader of the opposition.

Mr. OLIVER. I was under the impression that I was conceding the suggestion of the hon. leader of the opposition. If that was not his suggestion, let us know what it is. What the hon. gentleman has said as to the giving of an abstract opening the door to the claim jumper as much as opening the books is quite true. That is why it has not been considered the best policy to adopt that course. The reason for suggesting the giving of an abstract rather than allowing a person desiring information to have control of the books is simply to facilitate the working of the office for the convenience of the public. As my hon. friend from Eastern Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has pointed out, when there is a rush of people demanding entries and information at the land office, to allow some individual to have control of the books for such time as might suit him, would certainly be productive of great inconvenience to the public. If it is decided to be sound public policy to give out information, any person who wants that information can get it just as easily by means of an abstract as by handling the books.

Mr. SPROULE. I was not objecting to the abstract; but a person might want to get information about several lots, and he would have to pay a fee for each one.

Mr. OLIVER. The fee might be large or small, or there might be no fee. What I am suggesting is that if any individual wants to know the standing of any particular quarter-section or any number of quarter-sections, he can apply for that information, and it can be given to him on the written authority of the agent then or later. The difference between that and his having the right to demand an inspection of the books is that he can put in his application in writing, if he pleases, and the answer can be made and handed out to him at a time when the business of the office is not urgent. He will get his information just the same, and the convenience of the public will not be interfered with. The question of the fee for the abstract is a detail. There may be no fee at all, or it may be very trifling; but every object that would be attained by permitting access to the books would be attained by getting the information asked for by means of an abstract. My hon. friend has said that the idea of there being such a thing as speculative claim jumping is a bogy—that it is the bona fide settler who is the claim jumper. My hon. friends are surely not acquainted with the facts, or they would be aware that one of the greatest evils in connection with land speculation in the west during the last few years has been this. The odd numbered sections were held by the railway companies, who turned them over to speculative holders of one kind or another; and it was the principal leverage in the successful handling of these railway lands that the speculator who held a block or a section or a quarter-section, as the case might be, would go into a land office and apply for the cancellation of all the homesteads in the township. Then, having found a buyer for a quarter-section of railroad lands he would sell that subject to being able to secure a quarter-section of free homestead lands for the buyer, which he did by means of claim jumping or cancellation. My hon. friend knows perfectly well that that was the system that was carried out and it was the worst abuse we had to contend with in the west; and to give this land speculator the inside information which enables him to get under the legitimate settler and oust him from his holding because he happens to be a few days short of the requirement, is a very dangerous practice. At the same time, there is much to be said for publicity. Speaking for the Department of the Interior and its administration, there is no desire to avoid publicity. What the leader of the opposition says is very true, that it would be better for the department, speaking only as a department, to have the publicity that is suggested. It is not in the interest of the department that we take the position we do, but it is because of the experience we have had in the administration of the land, and with a view to protecting the interest of the legitimate settler. My hon. friends have mentioned that there have been complaints from the Northwest in regard to the improper holding of homesteads. If those homesteads are held improperly, and if they know it, it is evident that it is not the lack of publicity which prevents the cancellation, whatever else it may be, because they must know that the homesteaders are in default, or they would not be able to tell the story they do. My hon. friend read a list of complaints that some person had put in. These complaints might be well founded or not. In one case, he said, a young man had a homestead, and had not been on it during the whole time he held it. Possibly under the law he did not have to be. Such cases as that occur very frequently. I think it would be well for our hon. friends to bear in mind that while they have heard complaints with regard to the overholding of homestead rights if they will consider the proportion of complaints as against the total volume of homesteads, they will see that so far from there having been general ground of objection to the system that has been followed, it is to be strongly commended. Out of about 100,000 homesteaders in the last three years, what proportion does the small number of complaints we have heard amount to? It is the success of the majority that is the test of sound policy and sound legislation, not the complaints of the minority; and when the satisfied majority is of such great proportion and the complaining minority of such small proportion, it seems to me there is ground rather for continuing the practice as it is than for changing it. However, as it would relieve the department from suspicion, which our hon. friends are certainly doing their best to foster and increase, I would be quite willing to provide for the giving of information as it would be called for from the offices.

Mr. LAKE. I do not think the minister is justified in saying that the members of the opposition are doing their best to foster and increase suspicion against the land agents and offices.

Mr. OLIVER. I might alter that by saying that they are doing their worst.

Mr. LAKE. Of course the hon. gentleman is well known to be very bitter in some of his opinions but I insist that he is absolutely unjust in the charge he has made. He must be singularly ignorant of what is going on throughout the country if he does not know that there are lots of complaints. I am not prepared to say personally whether these complaints are well founded or not, but I propose to read a reply which the hon. gentleman gave himself to a question I put to him on the 28th of January last regarding the manner in which a certain homestead had been protected by the department, although one man after another had put in applications for its cancellation. And I suppose others will go on putting in applications for cancellation so long as they are not certain how long this land is to be protected by the department. This is the answer I got:

The southwest quarter-section 24, township 21, range 8, west second meridian, was entered for as a homestead by Thomas E. Bradley on the 30th October, 1902. On the 29th January, 1905———

Rather more than two years later.

On the 29th January, 1905, application was made by Jacob Ley for an inspection with a view to cancellation. The entry was protected until the 16th March, 1905. Application was made again October, 1905 and on the 25th of that month the agent at Regina was instructed to have a report on the homestead by the inspector. That report showed that there was a frame house of the estimated value of $50 on the land and that eight acres had been broken. the inspector recommended that the entrant should be notified to comply with the regulations or forfeit the entry. The entrant was notified that unless a satisfactory explanation of failure was given within thirty days the entry might be cancelled. He replied that he was going to put crop in, do more breaking and erect a stable right away. The entry was protected until the 1st November, 1906, and the entrant was again notified that failure to comply with regulations would result in cancellation. On 19th November a sworn statement was received from Valentine Unterschutz stating that having examined the quarter-section he found no building thereon; that not more than five acres had been broken, and that no cultivation had been done in the past two years. On 26th November, John Bradley, father of the entrant, wrote stating that his son had been living with him on a homestead two miles from the quarter-section in question, which the inspector at Brandon had told him would do in lieu of living on his own homestead.

I have a statement to the effect—which I shall not vouch for—that that was not the case and that Thomas E. Bradley was not living with his father at all.

On 22nd December, 1906, the father was notified that cancellation proceedings would be abandoned but that his son must faithfully comply with cultivation duties next season.

That is a simple statement of the case. I have no doubt whatever that the department has been besieged with applications for cancellation, and on very good ground. The people know that the homestead duties have not been done, there are a large number of young men in the neighbourhood wanting homesteads, and naturally they put in applications for cancellation. But if they knew how long this entry was going to be protected, they would wait until that time expired.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know what bearing the case cited can have on the question under discussion. In that case there certainly seems to have been all the publicity necessary to warrant the applications for cancellations. This afternoon my hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen opposite were strongly of the opinion that the minister should have discretion with regard to extending the homestead privileges. Well, that discretion was exercised in that particular case. What is my hon. friend complaining about? Does he not want the extension or the publicity?

Mr. LAKE. I consider that when an extension is given for cause, that should be shown in the books of the land office. I would like very much to know what were the reasons for the extension of time in this particular case. There must have been very strong reasons, considering the failure of the entrant to carry out his duties. The minister apparently was ready to grant an extension of time simply on the promise that the homesteader would do better another year. Although I am in favour of giving some discretion to the minister, still I think that an extension should be given only for some definite cause, such as disability from illness.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not familiar with the case in question, but from the facts recited by my hon. friend, this young man was entitled to hold his land because he was living with his father. Therefore the fact that he was not residing on the land itself during three years is not a warrant for cancellation. The fact that the improvements he made were not large was against him, but on the other hand this boy may have been one of a class I have mentioned before. He and his father may have been struggling as best they could to get along, and perhaps the boy's time was put in on his father's place so that the improvements were there. That of course would not be a compliance with the law, and I assume my hon. friend would insist that, under such circumstances, the entry should be cancelled. Otherwise he would not bring the matter up before the House. But that would not be according to the principles on which we have been successfuly administering the public lands. The young man was living with his father.

Mr. LAKE. If the hon. minister had followed what I read, he would have seen that the homestead inspector did not report that the young man was living with his father. There was no claim made in that connection until the father wrote the department and said that the young man was living with him. I have other statements to the effect that the boy was not living with his father.

Mr. OLIVER. At any rate the father said that the boy was living with him. I do not know that I would be prepared to cancel the entry until I found that he was not living with his father. Another point I would draw attention to. At one time there was a small house on the place and afterwards there was none, which would indicate that the house had been destroyed by fire.

Mr. LAKE. Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER. That may not have been the case but that was probable. At any rate I do not think that the story, as my hon. friend has told it, would be a fair reason for cancellation. I do not know what the real merits may be. But, on the merits of the case as my hon. friend has told it, there is no ground for his claim that lack of publicity hindered the carrying out of the letter of the law. Nor is there ground for his claim that the law was improperly administered or otherwise than in accordance with the interest of settlement.

Mr. LAKE. The fact that it was stated that a house had been upon the place, which house afterwards disappeared, rather argued that the shack which was worth about $50 was hauled off to another quarter-section to do duty as a house for the entrant's father and brothers—for he had a father and brothers taking up homesteads in that neighbourhood. Certainly if the house had been destroyed by fire the homestead inspector should have so reported. It would have been good reason for the extension of leave in the case.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister says that there appears to be a desire to discredit the land agents. Personally, I had no such intention, nor did I say a word against the agents. I merely called attention to existing difficulties. The minister said also that the fewness of complaints showed that the matter was hardly worthy of consideration. As to that, I think it would be a low estimate to say that every member of this House has received at least ten complaints a year, in the vast majority of which he has not asked the minister for redress. One goes to the department with these matters, and, if the department will take hold of them there is no need to trouble the minister about them. Taking the average that I have stated, this would mean that over 2,100 complaints have been made each year, which would be a pretty respectable portion of the whole. To show that my estimate is below the mark, I may say that last year I received not less than thirty complaints, and, in addition, I have received information from parties who have travelled the country desiring to get homesteads, but who found that the country was blanketed, so that they could not homestead except a long distance from the railway ; and, after travelling about the country, they left the Northwest altogether. Some of the parties to whom I have referred settled in British Columbia, and, in some cases, I have had complaints concerning similar difficulties there. Receiving so many complaints from honourable and trustworthy men, we cannot but conclude that there must be something wrong in the way the homesteading system is carried on. I think the difficulty is in the length of time that people are allowed to hold a homestead without reasonable cause. As I said, cases have been called to my attention of parties holding homesteads for three, four, and even five years. The minister says this was not done in secret as evidently the facts were known. It is true that the neighbours in these cases knew the facts, but strangers travelling about the country seeking a homestead would pass over forty of these blanketed homesteads before they could get one to settle upon. Men living near these blanketed homesteads have told me that even though the duties were not performed within six months or even within a year they would not apply for cancellation ; but when the duties are two, three or four years in arrears, they have no hesitation in applying. But they tell me that when you go to the land office you are confronted with another difficulty—you do not know the name of the party holding the homestead or his post office address. In many cases the holder is an eastern man. He may have entered with the intention of going back to reside, but circumstances have caused him to change his plans. If he could be reached it is not unlikely that he might frankly inform any person interested that he had no intention of returning. What I contend is that if the man's signature could be obtained to a statement of the facts, this, on being called to the intention of the land agent should be a reason for cancelling the claim. Publicity would be, to some extent, a remedy—we do not say that it would entirely remove the grievance. But, if it enabled the intending homesteader to locate more quickly and more satisfactorily, as we believe it would, then, publicity in these matters would be a good thing.

Mr. PATERSON. Are we not getting a little away from the subject ? The remarks of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), it seems to me, would lead to the conclusion that more explicit instructions, so to speak, should be given to the minister as to the discretion which he shall exercise. As I understand the suggestion of the leader of the opposition, the effect of it would be that information should be available as to how each lot stands. But the minister has pointed out, from his knowledge of the working of the department, that to allow any one who wished to go through the books would greatly interfere with the business of the office. I am told that there are only fifteen land offices and as there were about 40,000 homestead entries last year, this would mean an average of between 2,000 and 3,000 for each land office. One can understand that if the entries in the books were to be open to the inspection of every one, business might be seriously retarded. But I understand that the minister seriously proposes that an abstract should be made giving the information without the need of throwing the books open to every one's inspection. Does not that meet the difficulty ?

Mr. SPROULE. What I said was in answer to the observations of the minister that there appears to be a desire on our part to prejudice the case of the land agents, and that the grievance did not seem to be a substantial one. Surely I had a right to reply as there was no intention or desire on my part to say anything against the land agents, and as I have had so many letters making complaints in regard to this matter of homesteading.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not dispute the number of complaints the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) has received, but I think that if he goes over them, he will find that at least seventy-five per cent ask for greater leniency in the administration of the law, as against twenty-five per cent asking for greater stringency in its administration.

Mr. SPROULE. They are not quite in that proportion but there are a good many.

Mr. OLIVER. I think my hon. friend will find it is about that way. In regard to the difficulty of people finding land, it is hard for everybody to be suited, and the fact that hundreds or possibly thousands of people go to the Northwest every year and do not find land to suit them is no indication either that there is no land or that the land laws are not satisfactory. I myself emigrated to Manitoba in 1873. The farthest settlement in Manitoba then was 100 miles west of Winnipeg. Everything beyond that was open and it was pretty open between Winnipeg and that farthest west point, called at that time Palestine. I remember very distinctly that a number of my fellow passengers on the steamboat down the Red river had gone to Manitoba particularly to look for land and they returned to Ontario not having been able to find land to suit them. If that was the condition then—and it was the condition then—it is not to be laid against the form of the land laws or their administration or even against the character of the country that a man may go to the Northwest now and not find land or conditions to suit him.

Mr. LAKE. I have just come across a letter in regard to the Bradley homestead of which I spoke. It is from a gentleman in whose statement I have the most absolute trust, I am sure that he believes every word he writes, and he lives quite close to the homestead in question. This letter will show what ground there was for the argument the minister used just now for leniency in this case. The letter is as follows :

Rosemount, February 13, 1907.

Mr. R. S. Lake, M.P.

Dear Sir,—Yours 30 to Kirkaldy to hand re Thos. Bradley. Southwest quarter in 24—21—8 was entered for in fall of 1902. In summer 1903 about five acres broke. Geo. Kirt put crop on said five acres and broke two or three acres more as rental in 1904. In fall of 1905 Bradley built shanty and slept on place a week or ten days; that is all he ever done. In fall of 1906 he drawed shanty on his father's place, northwest quarter 34—8, which was taken up the same fall, 1902. John Bradley made a false statement when he said his son Tom was living with him ; the shanty was taken on the old man's place and Tom was there a few nights. His home is with his father in Manitoba near Griswold. Cannot give you postal address, but that is where Bradley is supposed to have two homesteads, and it is said the boys had entry in Lake Dolphin.

Yours truly,
H. G. FORBES.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The minister suggests as I understand that publicity in this matter should be provided for to this extent that on payment of a small fee an abstract should be given in respect of any homestead.

Mr. PATERSON. Just as in a registry office in Ontario.

Mr. OLIVER. It does not matter about the fee, it might be provided that simply on application the standing of any homestead would be given to any applicant. By putting the matter in that way at a time of congestion in the office when a number of people were applying for entry if any one of these people was given access to the books which the officers would require to advance the business of the other people, the other applicants would be delayed ; whereas by my suggestion, application for the information could be made by letter or on a slip of paper and when the rush at the counter was over the officials could procure the information, which would be received by the applicant in a thoroughly reliable form and the business of the office would not be seriously delayed.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. You could have printed forms for the purpose at each office. That I think would be an improvement on the present system. I would suggest that the minister allow this to stand so that he may consider our suggestions and we may consider his, and take the matter up again.

Mr. OLIVER. I think it would perhaps be appropriate to put a separate section before the section providing for homestead entry and if agreeable I would be prepared to draft such a section along the line I have suggested. The only question is, should there be a fee or not ? My own idea is to have a small fee to prevent inquiry without a purpose, not for the sake of revenue but to prevent impertinent or useless inquiry ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Appropriate provision should be made to secure the delivery of a correct abstract. I do not mean penalties for inadvertence, but some provision that the officer should be bound to deliver a correct abstract under a penalty of some kind.

Mr. OLIVER. That would be quite proper. That is another advantage I saw in providing for an abstract, that you could hold the officer responsible, whereas if you allowed the outsider to come in and look at the books he might get a wrong impression.

Mr. LENNOX. I notice in looking at the forms that the affidavit form 'D' is not in accordance with the provisions of section 9 as introduced or amended. I suppose the forms will be gone over later ?

On section 10, paragraph 2,—what constitutes entry.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That section is very peculiarly worded. It seems to be so expressed that one cannot tell whether or not a man who puts in a perfectly regular application in respect of a homestead which is vacant secures a statutory right in case the officer, for some reason, does not see fit to accept it. I think I mentioned this to the minister the other evening. The statutes of similar character to which I have been accustomed put the applicant in this position that if he makes a perfectly regular entry in respect of a portion of the public domain that is open for entry, then it does not make any difference what the officer does or does not do, that man by those acts secures a statutory right. I would like to see this subclause so expressed that there could be no possible doubt about its meaning. I imagine that the minister would agree to the principle that I am putting forward. The act of an officer should not be allowed to interfere with the right of a man who had done everything necessary under the law to make secure that man's right in the public domain.

Mr. OLIVER. That is quite in accordance with the intention. According to the present law a man secured his right by making an application, but there was no provision made that it was unquestionable evidence of his having taken the necessary means to secure the statutory right. So, we are making provision in this section, that, having made his application, the receipt of the agent may be absolute evidence of his having secured the statutory right. We thought we took the necessary step beyond what the statute was before when we declared that the agent's receipt was the evidence of the right of the applicant.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Suppose there are two men who have an application ready for the same homestead. One man steps forward, presents his application and tenders his fee. The officer says: I cannot accept that just now; I cannot give you a receipt at the moment. Then the other man steps forward, presents his application, pays his fee and the officer accepts it and gives him a receipt for it. Under the provisions of this statute the second man would have the prior right. I think that the man who comes first with his application and money ready to tender should have the prior right and that no act of the officer should interfere to postpone the claim of the man who comes first. That is what I would like to see made absolutely plain on the face of this statute. But, I doubt very much if it is plain on the face of this statute as it has been drafted.

Mr. OLIVER. I think the hon. gentleman is perfectly correct that in the wording of the Bill as we have drafted it, if the second man got the receipt, he would have an unquestionable right to the entry?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. It is the intention of the Act that whoever gets the receipt shall have the right and that is the evidence of his right. The difficulty of the law where No. 1, No. 2, No. 3 or No. 4 made application for an entry was that the question as to who had the right to the entry would have to be tried out afterwards. We thought that was inadvisable and that whoever got the entry should have the evidence of that entry and should have the right and that if a wrong were done it would be better that they should stand it than that there should be litigation as between these different parties. Of course I do not ask some of my incredulous friends opposite to accept the statement, but I beg to assure them that an agent who gave No. 2 his receipt when No. 1 was entitled to it would not have any further opportunities of giving receipts to anybody on behalf of the Interior Department once it came to the attention of the officers of the department.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN What would you do for No 1 ?

Mr. OLIVER. Well, we could not do anying for No. 1. But, we think it is better that whoever gets the entry should have it and should have the evidence of his right than that there should be a question as to whether No. 1 or No. 2 or No. 3 had the right. We thought it better to have it settled then and there and beyond dispute than that there should be any question about it.

Mr. LENNOX. I think that is a very bad plan and I think it is very unfair that you should leave it in the hands of an officer to issue a receipt in a case where a manifest wrong would be done and to say that the receipt of the agent should be acknowledged as evidence of the entry. What I submit is that it should be provided that the date and the hour at which applications are received should be recorded and that the person, who, being eligible, makes the first application, shall receive the entry no matter what the officer does and no matter whether the applicant gets a receipt or not.

Mr. PATERSON. If the officer would do a wrongful act such as was suggested by the hon. leader of the opposition could he not make an incorrect record?

Mr. LENNOX. I would make it the law that the officer shall record the date of the application. A man might put in an application, it might not be a good one at all but he would make the application and when he made it the day and the hour should be recorded upon it. Whoever makes the first application, being a party eligible to make the application, would be the party who would be held entitled to the entry.

Mr. TURRIFF. These applications are made in person at the counter by the applicants for homestead entries. If a man is eligible for a homestead entry and the land is available the application is entered. He makes a verbal application at the counter, and the agent takes his name, enters it in the book, takes his fee and gives him a receipt.

Mr. LAKE. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to suggest that that is not absolutely correct because a good many entries are made through the sub-agent.

Mr. TURRIFF. I was just going to point out that in some cases the entry is made through the sub-agents. Under this Bill an entry may be made before the sub-agent. The application will be noted down. The sub-agent, at the expense of the applicant, may wire to the agent to ascertain if the land is available. If the agent wires back that the land is available the entry is closed there and then. Under the present regulations entries are not made by agent. A man cannot appoint another man as his agent to make an entry for him so that it does away with a great deal of the difficulty that my hon. friends on the other side seem to think may arise under this paragraph of section 10.

Mr. LENNOX. The difficulty is in the wording of the statute here.

Mr. TURRIFF. I do not think there would be any difficulty at all because a man coming to make an entry does not put in an application but he makes a verbal application From my experience there has never been a single case of where two men came in together to make an entry and the man who came in second was allowed to make the entry over the head of the man who had applied before him. The agents are a good class of men and no agent would do a thing like that. If he did he would be reported to the department by the man who was first on hand to make the entry, the homestead inspector would be sent out to investigate the case and if it were proven that the agent had deliberately given a homestead entry to a man when there was another man right before him and that he had refused the entry to that land he would be dismissed at once.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Why do you not add to the clause some expression like this: That the local agent or officer acting for him shall be bound to accept a regular application made for a homestead entry? You do not even express that in this clause.

Mr. OLIVER. There will be no objection to that if my hon. friend thinks it is necessary, but I do not think it is necessary at all.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Why not?

Mr OLIVER. For the reason that the agent is there to accept the entry, he is there to take it according to the law and he knows that if he does not take it according to the law, if any man has a grievance against him because of improper dealings, he is subject to the loss of his position. It seems to me that that is as good a safeguard as we could have.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The trouble is that you do not express that in the statute. You do not say anywhere in the statute that it shall be the duty of the officer to accept the application and to give a receipt. You say that his acceptance shall be a necessary part of the entry, but you do not provide that it shall be his duty to accept.

Mr. OLIVER. No one has greater respect for the legal acumen of the leader of the opposition than I have, and I would ask him to be good enough to suggest the words which would carry out his view.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I present this as carrying out my idea, though no doubt the wording can be much improved. I would insert after the word 'made,' the following words so as to make it read :

When application is so made, for land then open for homestead entry the local agent or officer acting for him shall accept the same upon payment of the said fee and shall give the receipt hereinafter provided for.

Then I would continue with a new sentence :

The acceptance by the local agent or officer acting for him of the same and of the fee shall constitute entry, and the receipt shall be given, &c.

Mr. MILLER. I hesitate to make a suggestion after the leader of the opposition has spoken, but it seems to me it would be better to have the section read, by inserting the following words before the words already printed :

Applications properly and legally made, with fee paid, shall be accepted in the order received, and when application is so made, &c.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That would carry out the same purpose and is very well expressed.

Mr. OLIVER. I shall have the section amended according to the ideas expressed.

Mr. SPROULE. I wish to submit to the attention of the Minister of the Interior the following case. Some time ago a gentleman left Ontario to select a homestead for his brother. The land agent in the west was ill at the time, but the person acting for him instructed the brother in the west to write to his brother in Ontario to send the money on to the man acting for the land agent, and he would make the entry for the homestead. The brother sent the money by post office order and not hearing from the acting agent he wrote to him and also to the department at Ottawa. I discovered that the man's name was not entered, although his money had been received. After the land agent recovered from his illness the man was out of the office, and the gentleman who sent the money could get no satisfaction. He is not permitted to apply the money on another homestead. The land which was selected for him was in a favourable locality, but another party having entered for it in the meantime he could not get it. He is out of both his money and his homestead.

Mr. OLIVER. If these facts are correct he is certainly entitled to his money back.

Mr. SPROULE. That is what I would think. I have the receipt for the post office order that was sent by this man, but I have been unable to ascertain whether the money was received by the agent, it has been received however by the man acting for him.

Mr. OLIVER. I will say here very distinctly that if the money can be traced to any officer of the Interior department, or to any one acting for an officer, I will guarantee that gentleman gets his money back. But, of course it will have to be so traced.

Mr. SPROULE. I think there is a letter from the man in the land office acknowledging the receipt of the money. I went to the Post Office Department here, and ascertained that this man had signed the receipt for the money in the post office and received it.

Mr. OLIVER. If it be as my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) represents, the man will get his money back. I do not want to be found guilty of keeping a man's money without giving him value for it.

Mr. LENNOX. The hon. gentleman from East Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), in order to make an argument against my suggestion, said that the application was made at the counter and was verbal. In this very section it provides that the application has to be put in the form set out in a schedule to this Act.

Mr. TURRIFF. He comes to the counter and asks about a quarter-section, and if it is available, he applies for it there and then and the agent fills out the paper and the applicant signs it.

Mr. LENNOX. Then the time it is received should be recorded.

Subsection 2 allowed to stand.

On section 10, subsection 3—application to subagent.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There does not seem to be anything particularly objectionable in the principle of this subsection ; but why should it not provide simply that the application shall have priority according to the hour at which they are received by the subagent ?

Mr. OLIVER. The subagent merely receives the application and forwards it to the head office of the district. The entry at the head office is that which has effect.

Mr. LAKE. I would suggest that provision be made for a reply from the head office. The subagent is authorized to wire at the expense of the applicant. It would be a great convenience to the applicant in many cases if a return wire were provided for. Otherwise he might have to wait for several days to get an answer.

Mr. OLIVER. I think that is a good suggestion.

Mr. M. S. McCARTHY. Is there any objection to providing that the abstract shall be furnished by the subagent as well as by the agent ?

Mr. OLIVER. It would be impossible for the subagent to furnish it from his own books. The complete books are kept only at the head office.

Mr. M. S. McCARTHY. I understand that, but there appears to be no provision to entitle the applicant to receive an abstract from the head office through the subagent.

Mr. OLIVER. We have not made provision for the abstract yet. We propose to have a new section.

Mr. M. S. McCARTHY. When that provision is being made, the point I mention might be taken into consideration.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. You are using the word 'accept' in a somewhat peculiar sense. You do not mean that the subagent shall 'accept' in that sense at all. What he does is to receive, not accept. The application can be accepted only by the agent at the head office.

Mr. OLIVER. That is right. That wording is because of the difference there may be between the time that will be required for the applications to reach the head office from different points. There is no way of providing for fixed or stated times, because in some cases there may be a mail only once or twice a week and the route may be very roundabout, while in other cases there may be a daily mail and a very direct route.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. Still the subagent may, through negligence or intent, fail to send off the application at the earliest possible moment, and in the meantime the applicant might be jockeyed out of his entry. Why not provide that the subagent shall transmit the application by first mail or forthwith ?

Mr. OLIVER. The telegram fixes the date on which the subagent receives the application, and that fixes his responsibility. There is no use of putting a provision in the Act to punish the subagent for not forwarding the application when it is the intention of the department to punish him in any case if he does not do his duty and forward the application by the first mail.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. It is the man who makes the entry who is being punished perhaps by the loss of his land. The telegram is of itself an entry, but it is not an entry that can be accepted until the application arrives at the land office, and if the subagent held that for some time, it might be the means of the applicant losing the land.

Mr. OLIVER. Undoubtedly ; but how is my hon. friend going to make a provision that will compel the subagent to do his duty any more than the control which the department has over him ?

Mr. LENNOX. There is no provision here that the subagent shall forward the application. It seems to me that it should be provided that he shall forward it forthwith.

Mr. TURRIFF. The instructions to the subagents, when appointed, cover all that, and I think just as strongly as if they were in the Act.

Mr. OLIVER. There is no objection at all to putting words in the Act, but our purpose in drafting it was not to load it with more words than are necessary.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I think it should be provided that the subagent shall forward the application forthwith to the head office. That means by the first mail, or without unnecessary delay. I wish to suggest what I think a necessary amendment in the concluding words of this section, which I think should read in this way: 'and the application, if received by the local agent within such period, shall be regarded as received and accepted at the time of the receipt of such advice.' You see the word 'receiving' is of no importance. The officer must accept it. It is the acceptance that constitutes the entry. You must state that it shall be regarded as accepted, otherwise you do not comply with the provisions of the previous clause.

Mr. LAKE. Form 'K' which is referred to in the schedule might give the order as well as the date. That would be a check on the subagent.

Mr. OLIVER. No objection to that. It is rather difficult to make satisfactory drafts on the spur of the moment. I have taken notes of the suggestions made and will be prepared to submit careful drafts of the proposed amendments at another stage. When we are discussing each provision, we see it only in the one light and we do not see its effects in more than one direction, but each provision may touch many different points, and it is better that we should see that one does not conflict with the other.

On section 10, subsection 4,

Every application for entry shall be made by the applicant in question, except where cause is shown to the minister for allowing entry by attorney or agent, and he directs accordingly; and, in the event of such entry being allowed, application shall be made in either of the forms (f) or (g) in the schedules of this Act, and the affidavit in support thereof shall be in the form (h) in the said schedule.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What kind of cause is meant?

Mr. OLIVER. Since last spring we have not accepted any cause, but before last spring the principal cause was that a man wanted to have the entry made by his attorney or agent. I have been considering the matter and think perhaps it is well not to make provision in the Act, but by departmental regulation, that entry may be made by one of the members of a family for the other members, so as to allow the father to locate for his sons or one of the sons for his father and brothers. I do not think it would be advisable to go beyond that. The reason why I would prefer a departmental regulation is that should abuse or difficulty be found to result, the privilege can be withdrawn, whereas if we embody it in the statute, we cannot withdraw it without the authority of parliament. Last year it was by means of these proxy entries that the greater number of blanket homesteads took place, and in order to straighten out matters we thought it advisable to absolutely suspend the privilege.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My hon. friend prefers departmental regulation to order in council.

Mr. OLIVER. In such a case. I think it would be just as effective and answer every purpose.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Do you mean a general departmental regulation made in pursuance of this statute or a departmental regulation embodying simply the usage of the department?

Mr. OLIVER. I mean that under this clause, I would be in favour of allowing members of the same family to act for each other, but I would not be favourable to making a provision to that effect in the statute because the practice might lead to abuse and it might not be safe to have it made permanent.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. An order of the Governor in Council may not be necessary, but it seems to me you should have a departmental regulation general in its character and made by virtue of some power conferred upon the minister by this statute.

Mr. OLIVER. This section would be the power.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It does not provide for any power to make a general regulation but leaves each case to the discretion of the minister.

Mr. BRODER. Why not deal with it in this way? If the father of a family is going out to that country, let him locate for his sons as well as for himself. Under the law now, they must all go out. Why not give the father a permit from the department in Ottawa to go out and locate for the family and that permit would have to be accepted by the agent out there. If the father did not carry out the conditions upon which he got the permit, the department would deal with it. Or the permit could be given to one of the sons.

Mr. OLIVER. That is what I have in my mind to-day, and my impression was that the authority contained in this section was sufficient.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I think that this is a clause which has given a good deal of trouble. Previously it was too general and now it is too restricted. Do I understand the minister to say that he is going to allow the entry by attorney or agent to be extended to the family, so that one member of the family can enter for the other ?

Mr. OLIVER. I am considering that proposition.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. That is as far as you are going.

Mr. OLIVER. As far as I am thinking of going at present. Although a great deal has been said in favour of granting entry by attorney in many cases, I am a little afraid of it. We have absolutely restricted that privilege during the past year and I do not think we have suffered any serious result. My own inclination would be to continue without any relaxation, but many representations have been made to me on the line taken by my hon. friend from Dundas (Mr. Broder) and I would be willing to experiment to that extent. I thought it would be a very desirable thing for our eastern Canadians and I would be willing to make the experiment for a time with the view to accommodating such people.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I think I have had more complaints in connection with this clause than in connection with any other. I hope the minister will go further than to say that he will consider it and will assure us that it will at least be extended to members of the family. I think it a hardship to expect a father and all his sons to go up and apply for homesteads. The father or one of the sons should be allowed to enter for other members of the family. I shall be much disappointed if we are not granted that at least.

Mr. M. S. McCARTHY For once, I am able to agree with the stand taken by the minister The reason the amendment was made, if I recollect well, was that we found that in the new provinces many homesteads were being blanketed. As I understand it, the Department of the Interior sent out their officers to make an examination, with the result that about 2,000 homestead entries in the office at Regina alone were cancelled—I do not say that I give the figures with exactness, but I understand that the number was in that neighbourhood. My hon. friend from Dundas (Mr. Broder) looks at this matter from the eastern standpoint, and probably I am looking at it from the western standpoint. He desires that the man from Ontario should have the opportunity to get land in the west for himself and his sons. On the other hand, we in the west want whoever makes a homestead entry to occupy the land and cultivate it. The hon. gentleman can see that, if his suggestion is carried out, every man going into that western country will be met by a real estate agent and asked if he has sons in the east, and if he has, the agent will induce the man to get the permit from the department which will enable the agent to blanket these even numbered sections of land, with the result that we shall get back in a short time to the condition of affairs which existed about a year ago. I think there are cases in which this privilege should be granted, cases in which it would be a hardship to prevent a man who goes into that country from applying on behalf of members of his family as well as of himself. If good cause were shown why exception should be made, I think a special permit should be granted; but I am opposed to a broad resolution being put through allowing the father in every case to put in applications for his sons or relatives. In cases where it is allowed, it should be protected by proper regulations and a case should be made out satisfactory to the minister or the land office. My observation, as I have indicated, is that the abuse in this case arises from the operations of real estate agents who have these applications made on behalf of relatives by parties coming in. Then, when a bona fide settler comes in, he is told that there are no lands in the district open for homestead, but that if he will buy railway land or some other land, he can get it for $6 or $7 an acre and that arrangements can probably be made by which he will have the privilege of making a homestead entry on land alongside. This is the sort of thing that has kept the land vacant and has driven settlers back from the railways. And these people cannot understand why there should be so much vacant land between them and the railway track. This makes them discontented and causes them to be an adverse influence on immigration. Any precaution which will restrict homestead entries to those who will settle on the land is a wise precaution.

Mr. BRODER. My hon. friend (Mr. M. S. McCarthy) makes my contentions wider than I made them. The cases I spoke of were those of bona fide settlers who only desired to secure the land. The case I had in mind was that in which the father or one of the sons would go up and select the land and make the entry with the idea of all moving to the place within a month or two. I do not think the land should be kept open for months—that is not my intention at all.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Does the minister intend to insist upon having this personal application in each case? Or, what does he mean by the expression 'attorney or agent' in exceptional cases ?

Mr. OLIVER. I am looking for light on that particular subject, and I am not being disappointed.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Would this be an exceptional case ?—A gentleman from the county I have the honour to represent went to the Northwest and wanted to enter homesteads for himself and five sons. One of the boys was with him. The man was told that he would have to bring his other four sons if he wanted to enter homesteads for all. The result was he had to telegraph for the four boys, who went up and made their entries. But, as these four could not remain over for the winter, they had to return to Ontario with the intention of going back to the Northwest again in the spring. It seems to me that the father should be allowed to enter the names of his sons in cases such as this.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I suppose that the minister's idea would be carried out by inserting after the word 'minister' the words 'in accordance with general regulations made by him.'

Mr. OLIVER. That was my idea. But, as I said, I am looking for light on the subject. While the amendment in the form suggested by the leader of the opposition would meet the views of the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder) and the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner), and I suppose, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Sam. Hughes), I take it, it would not meet the views of the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. M. S. McCarthy) I thought that the section might remain as it is simply allowing for a special case on the responsibility of the minister.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. How could the homesteader in the far west get word to the minister 2,000 miles away in a special case ? Why not say that the father should have the privilege of entering for his son ?

Mr. M. S. McCARTHY. The objection I have is that every man who goes out there will be interviewed by real estate agents to see if he has not sons in the west and he will have the new comer blanket claims for 6 months and keep other people away.

Mr. TURRIFF. I do not think there will be that danger. There is no doubt that a great deal may be said for the system we have had of allowing entry by agent; it helped a great many people to get to that country and it is absurd in such a case as that represented by my hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Sam. Hughes) that a father should not be allowed to enter for all his sons, because the Act provides that they do not have to go on their homesteads for six months, and there is no good reason why they should all have to go out there and make an entry. Under the old system where entry was made by agent the man who wanted the entry made had to apply either to the commissioner's office here or to any agent in the west and have some one appointed as his agent to apply.

Mr. M. S. McCARTHY. Why did they abolish that ?

Mr. TURRIFF. Because it was abused, largely by land speculators from the United States, who had bought railway lands. It was not abused by men from Ontario or Quebec going in with families.

Mr. M. S. McCARTHY. There are still land speculators there and railway lands.

Mr. TURRIFF. Certainly, but the sons or fathers applying to have relatives make entry for them would have to state in their application that it was their intention to take possession of the land and become bona fide homesteaders, so I do not think the hon. member for Calgary need fear that if that little latitude is given by the minister any bad effects would come. I think it is a step in the right direction.

Mr. McCRANEY. I would point out that in addition to immigration from Ontario or Quebec we have had very considerable movements from the United States to the Northwest. In the district of Humbolt there has been a large immigration from St. Cloud, Minnesota. That colony came in in 1903. Most of the entries in that case were made by the promoters of the colony and so far as I am aware there was no abuse of the system. I sincerely hope the minister will go as far as he says he is considering going, and I believe there may be cases where there are colonies coming to this country that it might be advisable to authorize an agent to act in their behalf.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If the minister wants power to make general regulations I should think he should insert some such words as I have suggested; otherwise I think we would be confined to dealing with each individual instance.

Mr. OLIVER. While the words here indicate dealing with each individual instance. I would imagine they are broad enough to cover a general regulation. Of course it is a question yet as to whether we should make a general regulation or decide each individual case on its merits.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. Under this section the minister alone will be the arbiter, no officer of the department—

Mr. OLIVER. Oh, yes, the section places the responsibility directly on the minister so there is no question about his responsibility.

Mr. LENNOX. I would think the section very narrow as regards the minister's power and that it is assumed that some exceptional circumstance must be shown. I do not think it would authorize the minister to adopt a policy as regards certain classes of persons, as regards families, etc. It would apply to such cases as a man becoming ill at Winnipeg and not being able to make entry. I think the suggestion to permit one member of a family to enter for other members is reasonable, and I can imagine many cases where it would apply, as for instance the case of a father with sons in remote parts of the United States who wished to have them return to Canada and settle near him. He would not want to bring them over unless he could be sure of getting homesteads for them near his own.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Why not provide that right in the section ?

Mr. OLIVER. I think it better not to make this provision in the Act because as already stated and as has been shown in the discussion to-night there are differences of opinion as to the advisability of doing this. If we insert a provision in the Act, then if we have made a mistake we cannot remedy it, and we do not want to be tied to an unfortunate experiment. I would think it better to trust the discretion of the minister in working out the solution of the problem to the best possible advantage. Another consideration is that to make complete provision for handling these exceptional cases in the Act would make it very cumbersome, whereas that could be covered by departmental regulation ; in that way we could make special provision for special cases, whereas in the Act all cases would have to be treated alike, without regard to their different merits.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Has the minister amended subsection 4 ?

Mr. OLIVER. No, not so far.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. I would suggest that it should read after the word 'accordingly', 'or except where a father makes entry for a son or a son for a father.'.

Mr. W. McINTYRE. Brother for brother ?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. The paragraph would read in this way :

Every application for entry shall be made by the applicant in person, except where cause is shown to the minister for allowing entry by attorney or agent, and he directs accordingly, or except it may be determined by departmental regulations that entry may be made for an applicant by a member of the applicant's family.

Mr. OLIVER. That would cover all the points that have been raised and if agreeable to the House I would be willing to accept it. The objection to making the provision mandatory, as my hon. friend proposes to do in the case of a family, is that the department then has no liberty in working out special requirements which it might be very desirable to do. A member of a family who would be entitled as a matter of right to entry without his presence would then have all the rights and privileges that he would have if he had entered in bodily presence. I do not know that that is always advisable for the reasons set forth by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. M. S. McCarthy). What was in my mind in proposing to deal with this question with respect to a member of a family was that I would permit entry by a member of a family for the benefit of the whole family, but the members of the family who were not present in their own persons to make entry would be required to be upon their homesteads within possibly a shorter time than if they had come and made entry themselves. I would not give the same relief from actual residence as if they had entered in their own presence. My idea was that if they were given a special privilege in the one case they should be held more tightly to the residential requirements in the other case. If we gave them entry without requiring their presence we should all the more strictly require their absolute residence upon their homesteads. I would prefer to not embody that provision in the Act because I think we will be able to work it out.

Mr. LENNOX. You could do that in working your discretionary power in extending the time.

Mr. OLIVER. If left free to deal with the matter I think that we could possibly meet the views of the hon. members for Dundas (Mr. Broder) and the hon. member for Calgary. If we embody it in the Act the position as sketched by the hon. member for Calgary will stand and it will be not a fortunate position at all.

Mr. ALCORN. It would seem to me that it would be better to deal with this case by general regulations than to place the burden upon the minister of investigating particular cases and therefore that it would be well to strike out the words 'except where cause is shown to the minister for allowing entry by attorney or agent, and he directs accordingly' and inserting words to this effect :

Every application for entry shall be made by the applicant in person unless otherwise provided by general departmental regulations.

Then the minister could frame regulations which would meet the cases which have been discussed here.

Mr. MILLER. It seems to me that there might be a case where an applicant must be laid up by some temporary illness or accident. His friends are going west, perhaps not members of his family who would be entitled to make application, and yet it must be a case that was deserving of special attention.

Mr. OLIVER. I think the desirability of having this provision as it is in the Act now, although it has not been acted upon the past year, is emphasised by the fact that it permits the locating of a colony. Personally I am not particularly favourable to colonies, but sometimes there are occasions when it is desirable from the standpoint of the public interest to assist the location of people in the vicinity of each other, and this provision as it is could be used for that purpose. I am inclined to view with favour the proposition of the hon. member for South Grey having seen it written out. He proposes that the clause shall read :

Every application for entry shall be made by the applicant in person, except where cause is shown to the minister for allowing entry by attorney or agent, and he directs accordingly, or except it may be determined by departmental regulations that entry may be made for an applicant by a member of the applicant's family.

We could then, under the departmental regulations, make such provision as he thought fit in regard to the handling of a family entry.

Mr. LENNOX. The terms upon which the privilege would be granted.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, we could provide in the regulations the terms upon which the privilege would be given by which means we would probably be able to get over the unfortunate condition sketched and sketched truly by the hon. member for Calgary.

Mr. ALCORN. Then I see no reason for leaving in these words 'except where cause is shown to the minister for allowing entry by attorney or agent, and he directs accordingly'. That throws a responsibility upon the minister which he need not assume. If departmental regulations are made and are made general to cover all the cases, every person who goes to locate knows that he has to locate subject to these regulations and not otherwise. What I think ought to be avoided would be the presenting of special cases to the minister and having each adjudicated upon by him according to the special circumstances of the case because the minister might be deceived. Representations might be made which were not in accordance with the facts. If they are general regulations every body has to come under these regulations.

Mr. MILLER. I have in my mind the case of a man who went to the west to look up a homestead location. He had gone to the expense of visiting that country, he had paid his fee and obtained his receipt, but owing to a mistake that had been made in the office of the land agent, which every body admitted to have been a mistake, when that man returned to Ontario he found that he could not obtain the land and permission was given to him to make another entry without going back to the west to make it in person. It seems to me that that was a very proper instance in which such a privilege should be given. This might possibly occur again. It is only one of many instances that might arise.

Mr. M. S. McCARTHY. No person suggests that certain exceptional cases should not be dealt with, but we want to try and get the regulations passed in such shape that they will not be abused. The hon. member for South Grey (Mr. Miller) has stated certain isolated cases in which he knows of people having gone up from his own section of the country and having suffered inconvenience by reason of the fact that they could not make their entry by power of attorney. But, he does not seem to view it from the standpoint of the men who have had to go miles back from the railway track to locate because there were homestead entries covering every quarter section for miles back from the railway.

Mr. MILLER. I quite realize that privileges are being abused but I think that provision should be made to meet exceptional cases.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Shall subsection 4 of section 10 be carried ?

Mr. OLIVER. With the amendment suggested by my hon. friend from South Grey.

Or except it may be determined by departmental regulations that entry may be made for an applicant by a member of the applicant's family.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. It would be improved by saying :

Or except under departmental regulations providing that entry may be made by a member of the applicant's family.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 11, disputes between applicants for same land.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. This is a pretty wide kind of discretion; perhaps the minister is suggesting it as a sort of a joke ?

Mr. OLIVER. It is a joke that has been the law for twenty years ; it must have whiskers.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The Minister of Customs should be jealous of these extraordinary powers ; he should at once demand that the customs tariff should be in each instance what he may deem proper.

Mr. PATERSON. It is pretty near that.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Pretty near.

Mr. PATERSON. I mean the Customs Act is pretty near that.

Mr. LENNOX. In section 60 the minister's discretion is subject to the subsequent order of a judge. This is quite as broad a power without any right of appeal.

Mr. OLIVER. This principle has been embodied in the law for a long time. The proprietary rights of two persons respectively claiming entry to a piece of land, are not of any great monetary value, and I presume the enactors thought it better to have a quick and final decision on a matter that involves no serious loss to either party, rather than have delayed proceedings which might entail very great loss to both. It may not be good law but it is good practice.

Mr. LENNOX. It goes further than the old statute. All the minister could do under the former statute is to allow the person who made the first entry to be considered as the owner unless, he determined there should be no entry at all in reference to the homestead. According to the note here, this would give much wider discretion.

Mr. OLIVER. The note is not full enough to give a correct idea. If you will compare this with the original section 35 of the Act of 1886, the minister is given power to withdraw from both parties a piece of land on which two pioneers have settled, and as to which they dispute as to the right of entry. This section does not go so far. I think that would be unfair to both parties.

Mr. ALCORN. I think it advisable that the minister should confine himself to taking power to settle the dispute as to whom the entry shall go when that dispute depends on the validity of the proceedings in regard to entry. But, where a dispute involves matters of fact—as to for instance, the claim of a squatter to a piece of land—requiring the taking of evidence, that might more properly come before a court in some way such as by a summons taken out before a local judge.

Mr. OLIVER. Section 9 makes adequate provision for preserving the rights of the first settler on unsurveyed land. It is not admitted in this Act that there is any question as to that, and the minister has no authority in regard to it. If there is any dispute as to that it must be settled outside the department. The new Act says that the man who is first on the quarter-section is the one who is entitled to it. There is no dispute in that case. Section 11 is confined to disputes which may arise in the Act of obtaining entry or matters connected with that, and the minister should have the decision of such disputes.

Mr. LAKE. It may become a matter of doubt as to who was the first to squat on the land. I have under my hand a case of that kind. A man wanted to get entry for some land which had recently been surveyed and thrown open for entry, and he found that some one else had been ahead of him with a squatter's right, but he says the man never was on the land at all, that one of his sons went out and located it. How is the minister to determine who has the right of entry ?

Mr. OLIVER. Under the new Act the minister does not assume to determine. That is a matter to be determined by the courts. We simply undertake to give entry to the man entitled to it by priority of settlement, and the question of priority of settlement must be settled outside of the department.

Mr. LAKE. I understood that clause 11 did give the minister the sole right of deciding in a matter of this sort.

Mr. OLIVER. If the minister has the right, does my hon. friend object to it ?

Mr. LAKE. No. I think it advisable that the minister should settle the dispute, but subject to an appeal.

Mr. OLIVER. I beg to assure the House that I do not wish to assume or to have placed on my shoulders an arbitrary authority. I quite appreciate the serious character of such responsibility ; but it is a very old saying that justice delayed is justice denied, and a quick decision of such a dispute is better for all parties than a slow decision, even though the quick decision might not have all merit on its side. The Bill lays down clearly in section 9 that the first settler shall have the entry. Section 11 gives the minister authority, in case of dispute, to decide that matter. I do not see that anything better could be done, unless there is a right of appeal to the courts. I do not know that we can prevent a case being brought before the courts ; but I do say unquestionably that the sooner a dispute of this character is settled finally, the better for everybody concerned. In the old Act it was provided that the responsibility might be shirked ; it might be put upon the minister or the Dominion Lands Board or the Commissioner of Dominion Lands or some person appointed by the Governor in Council. We do not propose anything like that. We make a definite provision that the minister shall have the responsibility of deciding, and deciding on the lines laid down in the Act.

Mr. LAKE. Probably in nearly every case the minister's decision would be accepted ; but there may be cases in which there would be a great deal of hardship if his decision were accepted, and I think that for these cases there should be provision for an appeal.

Mr. McCRANEY. I hope our hon. friends opposite will not insist on having an appeal from the decision of the minister. I am convinced that few things would do more harm in the west than to impose upon the settlers coming in, some of them unable to speak the language we speak, the possibility of a lawsuit in the nature of an appeal in matters which might be decided finally by the minister.

Mr. ALORN. I suppose that in any case the decision of the minister would be binding where all the facts were before the department and the department was not deceived. If an applicant could show that the evidence which had been placed before the minister was untrue and that he had acted on a misapprehension of the facts, his decision would not be final. Unless all the facts were before him, his decision would not stand.

Mr. OLIVER. Provision is made in subsequent sections that if an award has been granted through misrepresentation or fraud it may be cancelled. Therefore while the jurisdiction remains in the minister there is every opportunity given to annul any decision on evidence being offered.

Mr. M. S. McCARTHY. The minister takes the objection that any appeal if allowed to a dissatisfied applicant is going to delay the proceedings; cases have arisen in the last year or two in which a decision of the department has practically overruled a decision of a court of law in the province of Alberta. In one case a man named Griffith bought cattle from a man named Walker, and Griffith entered on Walker's homestead and made improvements, and then brought an action for specific performance, in which he failed. Walker being unable to transfer his homestead. But the department took the ground that they would cancel Walker's homestead entry, as he had received Griffith's money by misrepresentation, Griffith supplied the department with statutory declarations, copies of which Walker has never been given so that he has never been able to get at the evidence on which the department based its decision. This is one of the number of cases, in which the holder of a homestead entry would be glad to have the decision of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) reviewed and be given the opportunity of placing his statement of the facts before the department. I do not anticipate that in a great number of cases there will be an appeal or a lawsuit, but there should be a cheap and speedy remedy in cases of dispute. In many instances the decision of the minister is not his at all but simply that of some official in his department, and it seems to me that the aggrieved party should have the right to have that decision reviewed by a judge of the Supreme court in the district where the land is situated.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not versed in legal procedure, but I would ask my hon. friend if it is not possible under this Bill to have such a decision reviewed by the Supreme Court.

Mr. McCRANEY.

Mr. M. S. McCARTHY. I would not care to express an opinion offhand, but have cited a case which came under my own notice. I might put on 'Hansard' a letter writen to the department in answer to one received from it, so that the minister may look the matter up for himself. The department had written to Walker—who was the man who originally entered the homestead and who had sold his cattle to Griffiths—that he must settle with Griffiths and get off the land; and the letter written to the department on November 19, 1906, is as follows:

File No. 733455.

Dear Sir,—We are to-day in receipt of your letter of the 3rd instant, herein. We are afraid that we failed to make ourselves understood in our last letter to you.

We have already endeavoured to come to a satisfactory arrangement with Mr. Griffith. We have offered either to pay him in full for his improvements or to take a reasonable sum for surrendering the homestead to him. Both of these propositions he has refused and the only counter-proposition that he has made is that he would be satisfied to have Walker get off the land and surrender his rights to him absolutely without consideration. Can you suggest what we can or should do under these circumstances? It takes two to make a bargain. We cannot compel Griffith to make any arrangement with us and he has shown so utterly unreasonable a disposition in the matter that we are quite satisfied that we will never be able to get him to adopt any other stand than the one that he now takes.

We are honestly and sincerely desirous of meeting your views, but your last letter does not give us much encouragement to think that you appreciate our efforts. We are quite willing to have some official of your department act as an arbitrator or are willing to fall in with any other reasonable suggestion that you are ready to make looking to an amicable settlement of these matters, but if you simply say, as you have said to us twice, now that we must make a satisfactory settlement with Griffith, and that gentleman is determined to make no arrangement of any kind with us, what can we do?

We must confess that the position your department has taken in this matter is utterly inexplicable to us. You have decided to take away a man's rights behind his back without giving him any chance whatever to meet the case with you against him, beyond telling us that we must make arrangements with Griffith, which, according to the tone of your communications, means we must simply do whatever Griffith tells us to do. This may be British fair-play, but to us it has an appearance of something very different from that.

I understand that the evidence upon which the department based its decision consisted of statutory declarations put in by Griffiths, the man who had lost the case he brought before a judge of the Supreme Court. I understand also that no copies of these declarations were furnished Walker so that he has not the remotest idea what evidence is in the department. So that the department gave a dicision which forces

Walker practically to abandon his land, and gave that decision without letting Walker see the evidence or giving him an opportunity to contradict it. That is why I object to this power being given the minister, and why I say there should be some opportunity afforded to a dissatisfied homesteader of seeing the evidence brought against him before the department.

Mr. OLIVER. If Mr. Walker is anxious to have the evidence, he should certainly be put in possession of it. This seems to be a case in which the department is reviewing the decision of the Supreme Court rather than the Supreme Court reviewing a decision of the department. I do not know however that a single instance is evidence that the principle enunciated in this section is an improper one. Any one who is familiar with the variety of disputes which come before the department for settlement will agree that it would not tend to the good handling of the land or the welfare of the disputants to provide facilities for litigation. I might call attention to an instance which occurred not far from Edmonton. There was a dispute with regard to a church and a church site. There might have been an acre of land involved and the building might have cost $500, but the dispute as to the ownership arose some six or eight years ago and is about to be argued before the Privy Council. Up to the present the costs have amounted to some $8,000 or $10,000. I submit that to furnish opportunity for disputes of that character is not in the public interest.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. No, but on the other hand this is an extremely wide power and might be so interpreted as to give the minister the right to intervene and settle a dispute which had resulted in litigation between the parties. I thoroughly appreciate the importance of settling trivial disputes quickly and saving the parties expense, but there are other considerations also important. One is that no man should have his rights determined without being heard. That is even more important than reducing the cost of litigation. This provision would seem to empower the minister to determine the dispute upon the hearing of only one of the parties or without hearing either of them or to do anything he saw fit upon such evidence as he saw fit or without any evidence at all. The power is given in the widest possible terms. Even if we can see the necessity for vesting some power in the minister, it ought to have some limit. The case just alluded to by my hon. friend from Calgary is an example in point. People who have obtained judgments of the court in their favour are liable to have the fruits of that judgment taken from them by the minister. Surely the Bill should be modified so that that would not be possible.

Mr. ALCORN. I do not pretend to have a special knowledge of these matters, but would merely make a suggestion. Would it not be possible, as a modification of this section, to provide that, where a substantial dispute arises before the minister, before he gives his decision, either party should have the right to demand that the evidence of both sides should be taken before a superior court judge of the district in which the land is situated, and forwarded to the minister? It seems to me that the fault, in a great many of the cases I have heard of, has been the manner in which the evidence is placed before the minister. It is done by statutory declaration or other methods of that kind. Any one conversant with the manner in which such evidence is collected will know that there is no great difficulty in getting people to make statutory declarations which by no means represent the whole truth. The hearing before the judge that is suggested would not be a trial but simply a taking of the evidence on both sides. It would be more likely to be properly taken than if collected by irresponsible people from irresponsible people.

Mr. TURRIFF. I think that hon. members have no idea of the number of these disputes that come before the department. A majority of them are trivial, but they arise in a hundred and one different ways.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Of what nature are they?

Mr. TURRIFF. Well, for instance, there is the case of priority of settler. Two men may settle on the same quarter-section, and as the lines are more or less obliterated they are not aware and a dispute is almost sure to arise. Both of them have settled before making entry. One goes to secure entry and finds that the other man is living on the same quarter-section. That is only one of many cases. But, although so many disputes arise, I suppose there are not half a dozen in which the decision has not been accepted, both parties making arrangements to go to work without loss of time one of them getting another homestead. If the right were given to go before a judge, it would not be only the party against whom the decision was given that would be injured, but the other party as well, because having no security of tenure he would be prevented from going on with his ordinary farming operations. Of course, it would not be reasonable to say that in the many hundreds of cases decided there are not wrong decisions. But, even a wrong decision is usually better than delay. I have heard a good many men say, in the old days, in cases which have been kept for two or three years before the department, that it would have been better for them to have a prompt decision against them than to have had a delayed decision in their favour. To overcome the disadvantage of one wrong decision in hundreds of cases, I do not think it would be advisable to facilitate delay. In a clash of interest both parties are apt to feel warmly on the subject and are ready to carry the matter into court. It would be better even to have a wrong decision at once, and allow both the parties to get to work without delay.

Mr. M. S. McCARTHY. The hon. member for East Assiniboia seems to be under the impression that the suggestion made from this side is that there should be opportunities for litigation afforded to parties claiming a homestead. But as I understand it, what is proposed is some summary proceeding to be instituted by the party who is dissatisfied with the decision of the minister. Under this proceeding the party would have the right to summon the other side before a Judge in Chambers, and have the evidence taken and reported to the minister.

Mr. PATERSON. Would not the judge, in all probability, come to the same conclusion as the minister ?

Mr. M. S. McCARTHY. In that case, the loss would fall upon the applicant. But, at least, he would have the satisfaction of knowing that somebody besides the minister had thought the other party had the right to the entry. I think this would be the interest of the department itself, for every day letters are received here from the west written by people who think they have been wronged by the enforcement of the regulations. Only to-night I answered such a letter, the case being this : The party wrote to the officer here to learn if a certain quarter-section was open for homestead entry. The answer came from Ottawa that there had been an entry, but it had been cancelled and the land was open. On the day of the receipt of that letter, the 21st of January, the party receiving it went to the land office at Olds and made an entry and sent his fee of $10 to the land office. In two days his money was returned and he was told that another party had entered on the 20th of January, at the head office of the lands branch in Calgary. In this case, if the suggestion made were carried out the party would have the right to apply to bring the matter before the Judge in Chambers and to have the application of the other party produced. It is not as though every decision of the minister would be brought before the Judge in Chambers or whatever other authority was appointed for this purpose. But the effect would be to satisfy people by showing them that they have not been unfairly treated. For I must confess that many who complain do so upon no very sufficient grounds. I do not say that there are not cases where the parties have a right to be dissatisfied, because I know there are such cases ; still, I do not think there are as many who have been unfairly treated, as would be indictated by the number of letters we received from that part of the country. The evidence should be accessible not only to satisfy the people beyond question that they are entitled to every consideration when the title to 160 acres of land is brought in question, but also in order that they may be satisfied that a proper decision has been given in their case by the minister or the official to whom he delegates the power to give a decision—because the minister does not contend for one moment that he will pass upon one tenth of the applications that are received ; I doubt if he would pass upon five per cent, and whilst he may delegate his power to a very competent official, the people of the country I am sure would be more satisfied if they had the right to see the evidence which was brought in by the other party which enabled the minister to make a decision.

Mr. ALCORN. In answer ot the observation of the Minister of Customs (Mr. Paterson) I did not propose that the judge give a decision at all. My object is to see that proper evidence is submitted to the minister, that the minister is not imposed upon by statutory declarations or evidence of that class gathered in bar-rooms or similar places and given by irresponsible people so that the department is deceived. My proposal was that the taking of evidence only should be delegated to the county judge and as in the case of commissions issued by a court, have a time limit placed upon the commission as to when the evidence would be returnable to the department. It would seem to me that some process of that kind would be very efficacious in leading the minister to a true decision on the facts.

Mr. PATERSON. Would the minister not seek for information on the point before giving this decision ?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I dare say he would but you should provide that he must. For instance the Minister of Customs has the right to fine people who according to his belief have been guilty of infractions of the customs law but, the person who has been fined can decline to accept the decision of the minister and then he is relegated to the courts. The minister fines him in the first instance but the man has the right to appeal to the law of the land.

Mr. PATERSON. Yes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There may be some trival cases where this is not necessary, but there may be serious disputes involving $1,000 or $5,000, and this section permits the minister to deal with such disputes without hearing either one or other of the parties, or by hearing one party and not the other, on any kind of evidence or without evidence; it gives absolute uncontrolled discretion to settle that dispute in the way he sees fit. That is a pretty large discretion.

Mr. PATERSON. The dispute is only with regard to the entry for a homestead, but if a man thinks he is unfortunate in the decision of the minister he can get another homestead. It is really not a very serious case. It is pointed out on the other hand that if he has the right to appeal he is really worse off from a monetary point of view if he wins than if he loses. It is only the right of entry, it is not the only homestead in the country, there are hundreds if not thousands of others, he may lose that one ; but if he went to court he would stand a chance of losing and in any event, even with the proposal of the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Alcorn), he would be involved in expense. I cannot imagine the minister arbitrarily deciding a case without full information through some channel in which he would have confidence.

Mr. McCRANEY. I think the fact is being overlooked that most of the settlers who come in are very poor people and that by the time they have reached their destination they have very little in hand. It seems to me that if disputes would arise which would necessitate their appearance before a judge the result would be altogether in favour of the wealthier party. Probably the first thing that would have to be done, in fact as a matter of necessity it would have to be done because these people are not familiar with our forms, would be to consult a lawyer. Many people who have no knowledge of our profession or methods would hesitate to undertake the initial stage. I think we would find that the experience of such a practice would be that in very many cases indeed a man having little or no means would simply drop out of the contest. The working out of such a scheme in the portion of the country in which I live would mean that as my town is not a judicial centre the parties to such a proceeding would have to go either to Prince Albert, fifty miles away, or to Saskatoon, forty miles away, that is supposing some system of district judges is arranged for. All these things involve expense and delay and I hope the suggestion of an appeal to judges made by the member for Prince Edward (Mr. Alcorn) will not be entertained.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My hon. friend (Mr. McCraney pays a very delicate compliment to the legal profession when he says these people would be deterred from engaging in litigation because they do not understand the profession or its methods; the ordinary criticism would be that they would be deterred if they did understand.

Mr. ALCORN. These applications are for new homesteads which are worth a considerable amount of money.

Mr. McCRANEY. These people though have not the money to put up.

Mr. ALCORN. They are dealing with a valuable asset. My proposal would at all events give them a chance to place evidence properly before the minister and not have a decision arrived at practically without evidence or on manufactured evidence.

Mr. OLIVER. Our friends have overlooked the fact that they are suggesting a very serious change in procedure. A certain procedure has been followed for thirty years, there has been no serious objection to it and it seems to me it is desirable—while I am not Conservative altogether in my methods or politics—that we should have good cause shown before we depart from the principle that has obtained for so long and under which there has been certainly a very satisfactory administration.

The point has hardly been brought out that the question to be decided by the minister in this case is not a right in fact but only a right in expectation. If the minister were called upon to decide as to property rights actually acquired that would be a different matter, but he is not called upon to decide upon property rights actually acquired, he is called upon to decide upon rights in expectation or property in expectation and there is, I think every one will agree, a very wide difference between property in expectation and property in fact.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Why do you call it property in expectation ?

Mr. OLIVER. Until the entry is secured it is only property in expectation. There is no expenditure upon it, there is no interest in it, there is no right to it. It is only the expectation of a right that there is a dispute about. It is because of that fact that an apparently arbitrary power has been left in the hands in which it is and the leaving of that arbitrary power in these hands has proven very generally satisfactory. It is not that it is giving permission to divide people's property at the will of the minister, but it merely gives the minister power to decide as to which claimant to that right or expectation shall have the property.

Mr. LENNOX. This section applies to what are properly called squatters.

Mr. OLIVER. No, it applies to parties who are making entry. Squatters are provided for in section 9. Their applications would come in under this, but their rights are all very specifically provided for in section 9 so that you can hardly consider that they come in to this question in dispute. I will give the House an instance of disputes such as those which arise and which call for decision: I am sorry that the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Barr) is not present as it was he who brought this case to my attention. A young man from the constituency of the hon. member for Dufferin goes up to the country west of Battleford, he gets an entry for a quarter-section, he decides that he has to return home, he abandons the quarter-section or he leaves it at any rate and it becomes open to cancellation. Another young man from the same constituency applies for an entry upon this land. The one who entered first is then in Ontario. He receives notice that his land is up for cancellation. It is impossible for him to get back on it in time to prevent the cancellation. He asks for an extension of time. He is given an extension of time but in the meantime the agent on the ground has given the other man the entry. Then, No. 1, having received authority to enter, goes on and finds No. 2 in possession and holding the entry. There is a dispute between these two parties as to which has the right to enter. It is a difficult question to decide, and it seems to me that there would be no object to be gained by leaving that question to any other tribunal.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Was the time extended before the second man got his entry?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, but the local agent did not know that the extension was given.

Mr. M. S. McCARTHY. Have both of them made valuable improvements upon the quarter-section?

Mr. OLIVER. They both have valuable improvements upon the quarter-section and they are both in occupation.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Which way have you decided?

Mr. OLIVER. I have not settled it yet. I have asked for a report from the inspector and I propose to settle it on the basis that whichever one has the more valuable improvements will get the homestead. If it were decided by the Supreme Court I do not know that a more equitable decision could be arrived at. Of course, the man who gets the quarter-section will pay for the other man's improvements.

Mr. PATERSON. I did not look over the second subsection of this section when I made my remarks before. It might be more than the mere homestead upon which nothing has been done. I see that the question of improvements is mentioned also. I supposed that it was simply a question of the right to the entry the application for which is mentioned in the second subsection.

Mr. ALCORN. It seems to me that the case mentioned by the hon. Minister of the Interior is precisely one to which my suggestion would apply. Here are two contending parties and the decision depends to some extent upon the value of these improvements. The minister intimates that he will give his decision according to a report made by a homestead inspector. It seems to me that a judge should investigate the facts, get the truth and present it to the minister who would then have something on which he could rely and he would not be depending upon the mere report of a homestead inspector.

Mr. OLIVER. It is more important to both of these young men that they should have a decision within the next three or four weeks so that whoever has to leave the quarter-section will have the whole of the coming summer to look for another location than that they should have the decision within six months or a year's time.

Mr. ALCORN. Nobody is suggesting that this question should be kept open for a year or six months. Surely the minister could have the evidence taken in the way that I have spoken of. The evidence could be taken in one or two days.

Mr. OLIVER. The nearest judge is about 150 miles away. Either the judge would have to be brought there or they and their witnesses would have to go to the judge.

Mr. M. S. McCARTHY. They are appointing district judges.

Mr. OLIVER. They are not appointed yet and I do not know that they will be appointed in time to settle that case. At any rate that is not the question. The condition is as it is and to call in judges of the Supreme Court of these provinces to settle these cases would simply mean unending delay and I think my hon. friend from Calgary would bear me out in that statement.

Mr. M. S. McCARTHY. I cannot agree with the minister. I think that if this procedure were followed this dispute would probably have been settled some time ago.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How long has it been up?

Mr. OLIVER. Since last fall.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Why, that is worse than the courts.

Mr. OLIVER. Not worse than our courts.

Mr. M. S. McCARTHY. The minister must not try to create the impression that we are advocating that this should be left to the ordinary courts. The suggestion is that there should be some summary and inexpensive procedure to enable these people to get a decision upon a point on which they are dissatisfied with respect to a ruling by the Minister of the Interior. I am surprised that my hon. friends opposite from the new provinces have not taken more kindly to this suggestion, because I venture to state that if they were asked to give the record of the correspondence they receive from that country it would show that 50 per cent of the correspondence that they do receive is from dissatisfied homesteaders who are continually asking them to go to the department and get some decision that has already been given overruled or who desire to be assisted in some other way.

Mr. TURRIFF. Even if in the two new provinces they appointed five district judges, as I see by the papers they have some thought of doing, there will be settlements in both provinces that will be one hundred miles or more away from the nearest of these judges. In that case it would be an expensive matter either having the judge coming to their point or they taking their witnesses to where the judge was residing.

Mr. ALCORN. We are not legislating for the present moment. This is the consolidation of the Dominion Lands Act and it is likely to be to some extent permanent. No doubt in that country there will be district or county judges and they will be quite numerous enough, it seems to me, to answer all the requirements of the suggestion that I have made. We are not dealing simply with the position as it may be today. All dealings with courts must involve a certain amount of time and expense. The time will come when there will be plenty of judges in that country and the distance is not a great bar in that country at all events. Possibly in one case you would travel forty miles to get a judge and possibly fifty miles another. It is not a matter involving a great deal of expense or time.

Mr. McCRANEY. It is a very considerable matter to men who have got very little money.

Mr. ALCORN. I am simply providing that where a dispute arises the parties have the right to demand such an investigation; they need not demand it if they do not wish.

Mr. PATERSON. You leave it to the minister to decide in the end?

Mr. ALCORN. I want to have the evidence taken before the local judge and sent to the minister who will decide upon it.

Mr. PATERSON. Could not the homestead inspector take the evidence?

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. The Minister of Customs does not know the average homestead inspector when he makes such a suggestion. I have heard a land agent state that some of the reports sent in by some of these homestead inspectors, are disgraceful. Some of these men are almost illiterate. If they are all of the character of one or two of them I know, they should not be entrusted with such an important duty, because the greater number of their reports are based on partisan grounds.

Mr. McCRANEY. If one party to the transaction was served with notice, it would be compulsory for him to appear before the judge or he would lose the homestead.

Mr. ALCORN. If one party demanded that the evidence be taken, of course it would be compulsory for the other party to appear.

Section 11, subsection 2—Disputes between applicants for same lands.

Mr. SAM HUGHES. Is the minister going to divide up quarter-sections under this clause? Where is the land available now?

Mr. OLIVER. Under the old provision they could only get a full quarter-section if it were adjoining, but now they can get it elsewhere.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. If a settler is 20 acres short, has he to go 10 miles away to get that 20 acres.

Mr. OLIVER. That is what it means.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. Why not let one of them pay for the improvements and give him his quarter-section elsewhere?

Mr. OLIVER. It could be decided in that way but there are cases in which it would inflict hardship.

On section 12,—Time for perfecting entries.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE. This means that in future there shall be no extension of time beyond the twelve months from the date of entry?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think this would inflict great hardship, and I believe the minister should have wider powers than are given him here.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. The minister is yawning, he is tired, and I think we should stop here. There is a good deal of contention ahead.

Mr. OLIVER. It makes no difference to me, I am quite willing to adjourn. The old section provides that there may be six months extension, and at the end of the twelve months if the entry is not perfected it shall be voided. Under this section we do not propose that the entry shall be voided automatically, but we provide that no one has authority to protect it beyond that time. In the old Act there was a subclause which provided that in the case of immigrants from elsewhere than from the North American continent the Governor in Council might extend the time for perfecting the entry from twelve months from the date thereof.

Mr. TURRIFF. I would not like to see this clause passed in its present shape. I think the last two lines following the words, 'after six months' should be left out. Cases will arise where it would be advisable to grant protection to the deserving settler even after twelve months, and although the old Act was as the minister has read it, it was never lived up to. So far as my knowledge goes, no bona fide settler ever lost his homestead on account of not having perfect the entry within twelve months. As a rule no extension of the time should be granted after 12 months, but where you have 40,000 entries in a year this clause will work hardship on many a deserving and struggling settler. Suppose he has 50 acres broken, and because of illness he is not able to take up absolute residence, it would be a great hardship if these were no power to grant to the bona fide settler an extension of time. I do not think any harm could be done by giving the minister authority to do so.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Hon. WM. PATERSON moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES. What business will be taken up to-morrow ?

Mr. PATERSON. The third reading of the first two Bills on the order paper; then, if Mr. Fielding is back, probably the iron bounties in Committee of Ways and Means. If he should not be back, we will go into Committee of Supply, and Mr. Emmerson will make his statement on the Intercolonial Railway.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 19, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS—SECOND READINGS.

Mr. O. E. TALBOT (Bellechasse) moved :

That the following Bills (from the Senate) having been reported upon by the examiner of petitions for private Bills as having complied with the requirements of the ninetieth rule, be placed on the Orders of this Day for a second reading.

Mr. TURRIFF.

Bill (No. 125) respecting the Lake Superior Power Company.

Bill (No. 119) to revive certain patents of the Nichols Copper Company.

Bill (No. 121) to incorporate the Ottawa Life Insurance Company.

Mr. SPROULE. Is this procedure regular ? As I understand it the Bills should have been sent to the examiner before being read a first time.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The question is whether or not a Bill that has passed the Senate, must, before it is read a first time in this House, be referred to the examiner of petitions for private Bills. In this case, these Bills have been read a first time before being sent to the examiner. The proper procedure would seem to be, in the absence of a special provision, that the same rule should be adopted with regard to Senate Bills as in regard to any Bill introduced into this House, namely, that before being read a first time they should be submitted to the examiner and reported on.

Mr. SPEAKER. As I understand it, these Bills were read a first time and then submitted to the examiner of petitions for private Bills to see whether the petitions were correct.

Mr. SPROULE. This procedure gives us very little time to consider the principle of a Bill. We jump from the first reading into the second reading before the principle of the Bill is considered at all. In this case the Bills come from the Senate, but if this procedure were adopted in regard to Bills introduced in the Commons, they might be read a second time before we would know anything about them.

Mr. SPEAKER. This motion is merely that they be placed on the order paper for the second reading.

Mr. SPROULE. The motion is that they be placed on the order paper of 'this day,' and so they might come before us to-day.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 126) to incorporate the Bonaventure and Gaspé Telephone Company, Limited.—Mr. C. Marcil

REPRESENTATION OF SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved :

That the report of the special committee to which was referred Bill (No. 51) to adjust the representation of Alberta and Saskatchewan in the House of Commons be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

THE ADULTERATION ACT—AMENDMENT.

Hon. WM. TEMPLEMAN (Minister of Inland Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 127) to amend the Adulteration Act.

Mr. SPROULE. Explain.

Mr. TEMPLEMAN. The Bill makes one or two amendments to the Adulteration Act. They are in respect to the appointment of assistant analysis. Under the law as it exists we have power to appoint a public analyst and one chief analyst. There are in the department several assistant analysts who really, according to the law as it now stands, have no legal status. It is simply to correct that error in the law that the amendment is proposed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

WINNIPEG TERMINALS—CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY AND GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 128) respecting the Winnipeg terminals of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What is the object of the Bill ?

Mr. EMMERSON. The object of the Bill is to provide for union terminals at the city of Winnipeg. The details are embodied in an agreement entered into between the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. Provision is made protecting the interests of the eastern division of the Transcontinental line of railway in the event of the government operating the road under the circumstances than as provided for in the Act relating to the leasing of the eastern division of the Transcontinental Railway to the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Motion agreed, and Bill read the first time.

WINTER COMMUNICATION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

On the Orders of the Day being called :

Mr. ALEX. MARTIN (Queen's, P.E.I.). Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to return to the question which I referred to yesterday as a matter of urgent public importance. I have given notice to Mr. Speaker of the matter which I propose to discuss.

Mr. SPEAKER. The subject which the hon. member wishes to bring up is :

The immediate necessity of providing efficient communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, and the extreme danger of those on board the government steamers attempting to perform the service.

Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. gentleman have leave to speak on this question ?

Motion agreed to.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I shall for a few moments draw the attention of the government to the imminent danger to life and property aboard the government steamers attempting to perform the winter service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. I proposed to discuss this question yesterday but was baffled in my attempt to bring it before the House. I then gave notice of my intention to bring up the question to-day and I am sorry the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) is not in his place, especially as I had given notice. However, I am glad to see that the premier is in his place.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. So is the minister.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Oh yes, I see he has just taken his seat. I am sure the minister is aware, if he has paid any particular attention to the telegrams that must be in his department that the winter service to Prince Edward Island this year is the most deplorably inefficient that we have had in the last ten years, and I am sure that it is not for want of calling attention of the department to their neglect that this condition exists. A few years ago we directed the attention of the government to the inefficiency of these two boats and the department at that time told us that they were about to provide a third steamer which would supplement the other two and if possibly they would fulfil the obligation which the Dominion government undertook thirty-four years ago, but which during those thirty-four years they failed to perform. I need not, but I think I shall, inform the House of the serious condition of affairs that has prevailed in that province for the last fifteen or sixteen days. I may inform the House that these two steamers, having sometimes one hundred passengers aboard, have been locked up in the ice for as many as five or six or seven days without any relief, the passengers in danger of their lives, the boats in peril and the freight aboard the steamers in danger of being lost. I think I am fully justified in again calling the attention of the government to this condition of affairs in order that they may take this question into much more serious consideration than they have hitherto done. I shall refresh the memory of the House with press comments on some of the things which have happened in that province in the last fourteen days. I have here an extract, not from a Conservative, not from an independent paper, but from the organ of the government in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, 'The Patriot'. This extract reads :

The fact that there are some one hundred passengers on board the 'Minto' now stuck in the ice south of Pictou island and have been there since last Tuesday, naturally leads to the inquiry as to the ship's accommodation.

There are nine state rooms with two berths and settees each or with accommodation for twenty-seven persons.

Imagine, Mr. Speaker, a boat out in the straits surrounded by floes of ice with ninety-four passengers and with sleeping accommodation for only twenty-four passengers out of ninety-four of the passengers, men and women, aboard. These men and women are huddled together on board that steamer in peril of their lives. The item continues :

Then around the dining saloon are settees capable of being converted into beds and will accommodate nine persons.

In the after part of the ship is a compartment with men's bunks without bed clothing, but containing mattresses, and this will accommodate from sixteen to twenty persons.

Taken altogether there is sufficient sleeping accommodation for between fifty and fifty-five passengers. Still there are one hundred on board. The crew, all told, number forty and have their own accommodation.

There are actually only nine staterooms on the boat, accommodation altogether for twenty-seven passengers. Here they are caught in the ice for days and days, men and women, and the government appear to treat it with great apathy if not callous neglect. I think the time has come when the matter should be more earnestly attended to. It may be as my hon. friend from York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) said yesterday, after he had made a speech six or seven times the government will at last pay attention to him. It may be a case similar to that mentioned in the scripture here the unfortunate woman approached the judge and the judge at last consented to give her justice because as he said :

Though I fear not God, neither regard men, yet because of this woman's importunity I will give her justice.

This will represent the case of Prince Edward Island and the government. I think the minister is sympathetic, or that he was before attaining office, and I hope he has not become unsympathetic now. I shall read further. Here is an extract from a newspaper published in Boston, from which it appears that the neighbouring republic takes more interest in the affairs of the island than does this government :

Charlottetown, March 5, 1907.—Forty passengers of the government steamer 'Stanley' have been marooned on Pictou Island since last Friday. They include a theatrical company and the Abegwelt hockey team. The government steamer 'Stanley', used in the winter to keep up communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, got caught in a dangerous ice field about a mile off Pictou island last Friday. . . On board the 'Stanley,' besides the theatrical troup and the hockey team, were fourteen lumbermen. Not relishing the prospect of remaining on the vessel for an indefinite time, or landing on Pictou Island, they set out for the mainland, fifteen miles distance, over the ice.

Mr. A. MARTIN.

They walked over floes of ice for miles. Where had they to go ? To a small island in the Straits of Northumberland, half way between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, where there were a few fishermen with small huts. Just think of forty passengers having to leave the boat, as a last resource to save their lives, and take refuge in this small inhospitable island. Here is a description of what they suffered :

The fourteen struggled for hours but before half the journey had been covered they were well nigh exhausted. The woodsmen staggered on, their faces badly frost bitten and their bodies cut and bruised by numerous falls. When at nightfall, they reached the mainland, all were in a pitiable condition and needed medical assistance.

This is not all. I have here something further :

Special by wireless.

Passengers called to the ice-boats in fear of ice-jam—but danger averted :

On board 'Stanley' in Northumberland straits, November 13.—Owing to the dangerous position of the steamer at four o'clock to-day, the ice-boats were launched and passengers and crew called to the decks, fearing serious results from an ice-jam, which however was happily averted. The steamer is now stuck three miles off Murray harbour. The ice is the heaviest ever seen by the oldest navigators, and is piled up into heaps of gigantic blocks four feet thick.

This is another experience quite different from the first one. Here is a list of the passengers :

Reverend J. H. Bates, Mrs. Bates, Miss M. Bates, J. D. White, Mr. and Mrs. Otis, Joseph Salter, North Sydney, H. D. McEwen, Morell, Capt. E. C. Rhude, Montague, W. R. Aitkin, Bank of Nova Scotia, D. S. Biggs, Toronto, J. C. Clark, Miss M. Clark, Mr. and Mrs. C. T. Godfrey and two children, A. G. McLean, J. B. McDonald, East Point, E. Hessian, Claude Davidson, Thomas Higginbotham, John McLean, Mrs. Joseph Morrison, Marion McDonald.

In the evening a mass meeting was held in the saloon and strong speeches on the tunnel by the Reverend Mr. Bates, Messrs. Salter, McEwen and Captain Rhude. A resolution advocating the same was passed unanimously.

This is a fair sample of what the people of Prince Edward Island and the public generally have to put up with because the government will not keep faith with Prince Edward Island. I have some other extracts equally effective. If such things were happening in Russia, if we were informed in this House that up in the northern seas, north of Russia, there were about 100 people out in a boat in danger of their lives, this House would likely pass a resolution of sympathy. But this government appears to be utterly indifferent to Prince Edward Island. I asked the minister not long ago if it would not be judicious to send down the 'Montcalm' or some other boat to the assistance of those boats, and the answer I got was that the 'Montcalm' was engaged in another service. I have since been informed, however, that she is not performing any service whatever.

If what we ask on this side were done, this condition would not prevail in that province. A few nights ago we discussed this question. I was not very well on that occasion, suffering from pneumonia, so I could not remain until the end of the debate, but I have read the speech of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur), and all he had to say to the people of Prince Edward Island was 'be loyal.' Submit, he said, to every oppression and indignity, but do not utter the word, close up your mouths, bear everything in silence, your duty is not to complain. Why, even a slave when he is whipped is allowed to cry out, but the people of Prince Edward Island have to suffer in silence. I think, judging by what I know of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) that if he were living in that province he would not be very quiet. I do not know that in 1837 his compatriots and dear friends in the province of Quebec were very quiet or as quiet as we are in Prince Edward Island. I do not think that some other members on that side who accuse us of disloyalty would be so very uncomplaining, and meek, and humble, under similar circumstances. They say that we have no right to talk about separation. Let me bring to the attention of the House, what happened not long ago in the city of Edinburgh. At a meeting held there not long ago to protest against the disbanding of the Scots Greys, the only regiment of cavalry in Scotland, Lord Rosebery said:

> We are living under the benefits of the Treaty of Union, an instrument of general character which stripped us of much if it gave us much; but the time may come when, if this friction continues, the Scottish nation may be compelled to examine more strictly into the benefits received from the Treaty of Union.

Is there anything in that stronger than is said in Prince Edward Island? What we said, and what we say now, is that, if the contract between Prince Edward Island and this Dominion is not carried out, we will take our own course. First, we will appeal to the King, who has a high sense of justice, and I think that appeal will give us separation or compel the government of the Dominion to fulfil its compact with us. As I said, the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) before he assumed office appeared sympathic with Prince Edward Island. He took the part of the oppressed, as he claimed to do when he spoke on behalf of the half-breeds of the Northwest. I wish he would make now a similar appeal on behalf of the people of Prince Edward Island; it would be a proof to me that he has not forgotten how to support the cause of the weak and oppressed. I would like to read to the hon. gentleman what he said for the half-breeds of the Northwest; and I think when these words are recalled to his memory he will declare: I am the same Sir Wilfrid Laurier that I was before 1896, and I will stand up for the people of Prince Edward Island, whose cause I supported before I became Prime Minister. Speaking in defence of the half-breeds of the Northwest he said:

> All these years they had been petitioning and petitioning, begging and begging, knocking and knocking at the door of the government, and the goverment never lifted a finger to come to their rescue.

And this is applicable to the case of Prince Edward Island. Then Mr. Laurier, now Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Prime Minister of Canada —all honour to him—went on——

> This, I say, and I say it, coming from a province where less than fifty years ago, every man of the race to which I belong was a rebel, and where to-day every man of that race is a true and loyal subject. . . . I say give these men justice, give them their rights, treat them as for the last forty years you have treated the people of Lower Canada, and by and by throughout those territories you will have contentment, peace and harmony, where to-day discord, hatred and war are ruining the land.

And a Prince Edward Island writer after commenting on these words says:

> The following year, Mr. Laurier, when indicting the government for execution of Riel used the memorable exclamation, 'Too late! Too late! Too late! Witnesses of the scene will recall that between each of the orator's pauses, there seemed to be an age, that a silence of death brooded over the House, broken only by the terrible monosyllables which summed up the whole drama of the insurrection.

I believe that the Prime Minister is warmer hearted than the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) and I cite this to bring to the right hon. gentleman's recollection the sympathy he felt in his younger days for those who were oppressed. Now, let me remind him of what he said before he assumed his present high position as to what he would do for Prince Edward Island. I read his whole letter on a previous occasion, but here is a part of it:

> Every man who has given any attention to the condition of things and to the interests involved by the island entering into confederation must admit that such a tunnel must be constructed if the thing is reasonably practicable.

This promise was made in 1892. The people of Prince Edward Island, I think, gave him a good deal of support, on account of that letter. I do not think he could get the same support there to-day; his following there is dwindling away because of his change of position. I have here an article written by a gentleman with whom he is very familiar, and who if I am not mistaken, has written a biography of the right hon. gentleman. This article is in the form of a letter which appears in the Boston 'Evening Transcript.' It deals with the question of communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland.

It was in this unmitigable sense that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, before he took office, construed the agreement.

The agreement referred to is that made respecting the entry of Prince Edward Island into confederation. I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he interprets that agreement in the same way as the Prime Minister does. If so he has a very poor way of carrying out his interpretation. Here is what the Prime Minister said about the clause in that agreement which provides for the maintenance of efficient steam communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland:

He said: It is a direct, binding and solemn undertaking that the government of Canada will maintain communication between Prince Edward Island and the Intercolonial Railway. There is no provision there that the Dominion of Canada would try to do it; there is no suggestion that there might be too much ice in certain cases.

I need not dwell upon that, though I by no means quoted the whole of it, and were I not so anxious to avoid taking up the time of the House I might well place before you other quotations from this letter. I turn now, from that part of the case. As I have already said, I was disappointed in reading over the reply of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. In that reply there was not even one ray of hope for Prince Edward Island. It was simply an opportunity for the hon. member for King's (Mr. J. J. Hughes) a few days afterwards, to ask in this House, whether or not a third boat would be provided. The only thing that the minister did in his speech was to abuse the province, but he did not give the people any real ground for hope. And in answer to the question as to the third boat he stated that the third boat would be supplied. You may build your third boat—you have to or you will have an insurrection down in Prince Edward Island. I am glad you are going to build your third boat.

But in the meantime you have to do more. We were promised in this House, a few sessions ago, that a survey would be undertaken for a tunnel. We think the tunnel is practicable, and that it is the duty of the government at once, this session, to provide in the estimates for a survey, and to call for tenders. If the tenders are too high, they need not be accepted. But you must satisfy the people of Prince Edward Island that you are going to take up this question in earnest. The people, as I said, are leaving that province by thousands. Within the last twenty years 18,000 people have left that province; and counting them worth $2,000 a head—the Doukobors are estimated to be worth $1,000 a head, and the Prince Edward Islanders should be worth at least twice as much—that makes $36,000,000 that have been lost to Prince Edward Island. If these men had remained they would now be contributing to your revenues. When the tunnel is completed I am convinced that the whole country will gain by it, and Prince Edward Island will be satisfied that Canada is after all honourable. There ought to be some honour in this country; a country that can afford to spend $150,000,000 on a transcontinental railway, of which nothing was said at the time of confederation, that can afford to spend $100,000,000 on a Georgian bay canal, that can build a railroad to Hudson bay, and run tunnels under the Lachine canal, a government that can afford to build a bridge at Quebec costing five or six million dollars, of which nothing was said at confederation—surely such a government can afford to incur the necessary expense to fulfil its bargain with Prince Edward Island, a binding agreement, as the Prime Minister himself has admitted, a bargain that has stood for thirty-four years without being implemented. Now I have perhaps spoken too long, but I do not think I could have said less; and my two colleagues are here ready to speak on this question also.

Hon. L. P. BRODEUR (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). I have not much to say in answer to my hon. friend (Mr. Martin), because I notice that his remarks to-day are simply a repetition of those he made the other day. Of course, I do not find fault with him for trying to justify the action which he and some of his friends on the island are taking in talking of secession. That is their right, and I have nothing to say with regard to that. I will remark, however, that my hon. friend did not supply the House with the very important information which reached us yesterday and which was communicated to him.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Allow me to say that I called up the minister's department about half-past two o'clock and asked what telegrams they had from Prince Edward Island. They said they had none to-day, but there was one yesterday. I asked if they could supply me with copies of all telegrams for the last six days, and I said I would like to get them before three o'clock ; but I did not receive them.

Mr. BRODEUR. That is very unfortunate. My hon. friend will take my word for it, because yesterday I gave him the information myself. He asked me whether we had any more information, and I told him that the 'Minto' had reached Pictou. That is information which reached us a few minutes after the discussion which took place in the House.

Mr. A. MARTIN. About half-past two o'clock yesterday I asked the department for information about the boats. I was told that the deputy was not in but that they would get me the information ; and the person at the telephone went away to inquire, and coming back he said there was nothing on Saturday. Of course I accept the minister's statement, but it is evident that something was overlooked, and perhaps the person at the telephone may not have understood.

Mr. BRODEUR. I inform my hon. friend officially now that yesterday afternoon we had a despatch that the 'Minto' had arrived about two o'clock for coal at Pictou, and would leave on the first chance.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How long has she been out?

Mr. BRODEUR. About eleven days I think.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Sixteen, I think.

Mr. BRODEUR. I may be wrong, I know the boats were caught in the ice for a certain period of time. This has been a very exceptional year. According to the reports which have reached us, the ice was packed this year in the straits of Northumberland in much greater quantity than has been usual; and there were heavy winds from the north which drifted the ice in unusually large quantities into the straits and prevented the boats from crossing as they had been accustomed to do. But from the beginning of the winter we had a very good service until a few days ago, everything had gone on in first-class order. At one time the weather was so fine that the boats, for a short time, could go to Charlottetown, and from that time the service was absolutely regular until this short period of time. My hon. friend complains that we are not taking the proper steps to cope with the situation. I think that is an unfair charge to make against the department. We are taking all possible steps to grapple with the situation.

We must not forget the situation in which Prince Edward Island found herself when she came into confederation. At that time there was only a winter service, maintained by small row boats running between the capes. It was then agreed that we should perform an efficient steam service, which was started a few years afterwards by the construction of a wooden boat; and later on, an iron boat, the 'Stanley,' was built and put on the service. Now there are two boats plying all the time between Georgetown and Pictou. But not only are we keeping up that steam service, but, recognizing that it might happen in very severe winters that the service would be temporarily interrupted, this government have engaged a crew to run small row boats, whenever the steamers can not run, between Georgetown and Pictou. We engaged these row boats, for a couple of months, and they were running the other day so effectively that the mail service has not been interrupted, nor has the passenger service been interrupted, because people on the island could cross over to the mainland on these row boats. Besides when passengers on the 'Stanley' were unable to complete their passage to Pictou, by being caught in the ice, we provided to send them back to the island, if they wanted to go back, and to pay their passage on the Prince Edward Island Railway; and if they wished to go on to the mainland, we had these row boats to take them free of expense. So you see, Mr. Speaker, we are making all possible efforts to cope with a very difficult situation. But we are not going to stop there. I know the situation is very difficult, I know it is difficult to find boats strong enough to break the ice and at the same time to resist the tides and the winds, but we are going to study the question once more and see whether something further cannot be done.

My intention is, when I go to Europe, to take with me some technical officer of the department and perhaps one of the captains of these boats who know exactly the situation there to see whether in the North Sea or in the Baltic we can find any ice-breakers which are built strong enough to meet the situation which now exists. That shows that we are making every effort possible to meet the situation. Some years ago we secured the services of a naval architect who made a design for a powerful ice-breaker, but unfortunately the ice-breaker which was recommended by this naval architect could not be utilized because the draught required was more than the depth of water over the Pictou bar. Since that time the government have taken means to dredge the Pictou bar in order that we should have the necessary depth of water to permit of a more powerful ice-breaker being put on the service. That shows that the government and the department are not sparing any effort in order that we may provide the island with a most efficient steam service. When this contract was made there was no statement to the effect that we should have ice-breakers. At the time that we provided the island with two ice-breakers it was not contemplated that ice-breakers should be provided. But we have done it.

Mr. LEFURGEY. What was contemplated ?

Mr. BRODEUR. An efficient steam service.

Mr. LEFURGEY. Well.

Mr. BRODEUR. At the same time it was pretty well understood that the system of row boats should be continued because all those who had some knowledge of the service, all those who knew anything about the situation, realized fully that it was absolutely impossible at all times to meet it and my hon. friend knows very well that has been the situation. Of course, I cannot blame them for criticising the government. They seem to be there for that purpose, but there is one thing that strikes me and it is that if they would use their energy in trying to work with us to find out some system by which a better winter service could be provided and not spend their time in simply criticising the action of the government I think they would be doing something more in the interests of their electors. I do not blame the hon. member for Queen's for doing that. It is a part of his duty to criticise the action of the government, but if he loves, as I suppose he does, the people of his island, I would like to see him devote a little more time to studying seriously the situation with us than in trying to find fault with the action of the government.

Mr. A. A. LEFURGEY (Prince, P.E.I.). Mr. Speaker, I shall not take up very much of the time of the House, but the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) got up a few moments ago and accused my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Martin), who made an excellent speech this afternoon upon this subject, of rehashing something that he had said before. On every occasion that I have heard the minister speak he has rehashed some excuse that was neither palpable nor palatable to the people of Prince Edward Island for the conduct of his own department and this afternoon he has done the same thing. He went back to confederation. He said that when the island came into confederation it had row boats, and that therefore it ought to have row boats now, and that because the government had given us one or two steamers that have not fulfilled the terms of confederation we ought to be grateful. I think the hon. member who has spoken from this side of the House has discussed the case very fairly and very fully. He has pointed out that the people of Prince Edward Island were not satisfied that they had been dealt fairly with and I do not know that he threw any more blame upon the present minister than upon other ministers and other governments who have gone before. Prince Edward Island did come into confederation under the terms that my hon. friend from Queen's has pointed out. The right hon. leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in this House has admitted that the terms of confederation were not carried out. We were to have efficient steam communication winter and summer and it will be very well understood that the steam communication that we were to have winter and summer could not be supplied by row boats, and it has not been supplied by the boats which the minister and his predecessors have put upon that route. He talks about putting these fine boats on. I pointed out in the House a few days ago that since confederation the government have spent on boats for the carrying out of its contract with Prince Edward Island some $300,000 or $400,000, and that these boats are not only needed for the winter service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, but that they are also needed for the carrying on of the marine and fisheries work all over Canada. Now, we are very grateful that the minister has, even at this late date, after promising us for the last four years that a new boat would be constructed, stated that he is going over to the old country, and I trust that the new boat that he will have constructed will be built in some of the best yards in the United Kingdom and that he will not bring over a second-class boat as was done in the case of the 'Minto.' I do not intend to take up very much more time. The minister has been primed to tell this House on each occasion that the affairs of Prince Edward Island have been brought up in regard to communication that they have done everything possible and that everything has gone on smoothly except at this time. It is just occasions of this kind when the whole machinery is stopped, when the commercial relations of Prince Edward Island are paralyzed, when people are out for sixteen days at a stretch at the risk of their lives, that call for something else than what has been given us in the matter of communication for the last thirty years, and it all goes to point to the fact that something else must be done. The right hon. leader of the House said the other day, in reply to a question I asked him, that he was not averse to doing something else, that he was not averse to taking up this question of a tunnel between Prince Edward Island and the mainland and finding out exactly what could be done. I think that on an occasion of this kind, after the experience we have had, there is no more suitable time than this session for the minister to put in his estimates an amount necessary to institute proceedings, and I would prefer to have the right hon. gentleman rise in his place and give us some assurance rather than have the Minister of Marine and Fisheries try to salve over the situation in the manner that he has attempted to-day. I trust that this may be but another occasion to impress upon the mind of the right hon. gentleman the necessity of further means of communication being provided and that he will not hesitate this session to institute such measures as may be necessary to bring this matter to a proper conclusion.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queen's, P.E.I.). Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) to the great loss that has been caused to the travelling public since the detention of these steamers. I had a letter the other day from a gentleman who went on board the 'Minto' on the 4th February. He was on board that steamer for eight days, and then he walked back from the steamer ten miles through slush and on the ice to Pictou. He told me that his loss by reason of the detention and on account of the extra expense he was put to amounted to about $100, and he estimated that since these steamers were detained there had been at least 500 people detained on both sides of the straits.

If these people were put to an expense of $100 each, it would be a loss to the public of $50,000. I do not think that estimate would be fair, but I will put it at $30,000 loss to the travelling public by reason of the detention of these steamers, and $30,000 would pay the interest on a steamer worth $1,000,000. When the minister considers that not only have the travelling public suffered, but that the business men of Prince Edward Island, of the maritime provinces, and of Ontario and Quebec are also at great loss. he should not hesitate one moment about endeavouring to perfect the communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. I repeat that in my opinion, steam communication by vessels will not fulfil the terms of the union. You must carry out these terms to the letter. It is no use for the minister to state in this House, that in 1872 we had row boats and that row boats are good enough for us to-day. When we entered into confederation we believed that the Prince Edward Island Railway system would be connected with the railway system on the mainland, and that is what we want now. The terms of union can only be carried out by building a tunnel under the straits of Northumberland, and thus connecting the railway system of the island with the railway system of the mainland. That is the only possible way and that is the way that should be adopted. It is all very well for the minister to say, on every occasion when this matter is brought to the attention of parliament, that the government has done well by Prince Edward Island. Neither this government nor any previous government has done well by Prince Edward Island, and the great loss which is accruing to the people of that province and to the mercantile communities on the mainland, is so increasing year after year, that the time has come when the people have a right to demand from the government, that this communication should be perfected without delay.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (King's, P.E.I.). Everybody will admit that the present system of communication between Prince Edward and the mainland is not such as we would desire. But, the existing conditions present natural difficulties which are undoubtedly hard to overcome. We all realize that, we must further realize the fact—and it is a fact—and our friends on the other side of the House may just as well realize it as we do, that the present government has done very much indeed to improve the facilities for crossing the straits of Northumberland in winter. We know as a matter of fact, that since the present government came into power they have constructed a larger and more powerful boat than the 'Stanley,' thus giving two boats on the service instead of the one which we had previous to 1896. We have the further fact, that the government, through the right hon. the Prime Minister, has given us a promise that during the present session a sufficient amount will be placed in the estimates to provide for the building of a still more powerful steamer, and one calculated to better cope with the difficulties of navigation. We also know that the small boat service by the capes has been greatly improved since the present government came into power. It is only reasonable that we should recognize these things, and that we should acknowledge what this government has done so far. I know very well that our friends opposite contend, that neither the Conservative government nor the present Liberal government has done all that might be done. Perhaps not. Of course, if a government came into power in this country that was reckless of expenditure, they might expend a great deal more money on this service than has heretofore been expended, but I question very much whether the parliament and the people of this country would sustain any government in such a course. I believe, however, that this parliament will cordially approve of the government doing all that can reasonably be done to meet the existing conditions, and I am satisfied that the present government, will do that. I have been urging on the government during the present session that steps should be taken at a very early date to obtain full detailed information with regard to the best means of keeping up winter communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, if it should be found that it is impossible to procure a steamer which will be able to do the work.

Mr. LEFURGEY. What do you want to keep on getting steamers for; we have had two or three already?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. My hon. friend (Mr. Lefurgey) need not be so captious. I would remind him that the chief newspaper supporting the Conservative party in Prince Edward Island, within the last month or two, urged that the government should take immediate steps to construct another ice-breaking steamer, and stated, that if that were done it would go a long way towards solving the problem. And now, when the government proposes to meet this suggestion of that prominent Conservative newspaper, even that is not satisfactory to gentlemen on the other side of the House. I am afraid that the course pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite, in this regard, is not the best or the wisest course. I believe, Sir, that the best course is to present our claims in a reasonable light to the people of Canada, to this parliament, and to the government; I believe that a reasonable presentation of the facts and a reasonable demand on our part will have the best effect. I know that the government is considering the matter, and I fully believe that before prorogation we will have an assurance, that the government, having looked carefully into all the circumstances, have decided to make provision to obtain such information as will enable them to state to the people of Canada, whether or not it is possible to provide other means than steamers to maintain communication between the island and the mainland.

Mr. LEFURGEY. Does the hon. gentleman think that between now and prorogation the government can get the necessary data before parliament as to the construction of a tunnel?

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. I do not think they could do anything of the kind, because I am quite satisfied it will take several months to obtain that information.

Mr. LEFURGEY. Are you quite satisfied they are going to do it.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queen's). The Minister of Marine has been kind enough to attempt to disparage my remarks by stating that what I said to-day, I had already said some weeks ago. If he will compare my speech to-day with my speech then, I think he will find that he has made a mistake. However, the Minister of Marine to-day has delivered exactly the same speech as he delivered about a month ago, and he sang the old song, asking the people of Prince Edward Island to be loyal, and to suffer in silence all the afflictions that the government are imposing upon them. The Minister of Marine seems to think that at this late date, Prince Edward Island can get along with small row boats, and that while every other part of the country is making progress, Prince Edward Island must be content to stay in the background. I am astonished that any minister of the Crown should entertain such an idea. He told us that he had never received a suggestion from this side of the House. I gave him one suggestion from this side of the House and told him that it was useless for him to direct those boats from his department here. I told him several times that those boats would have to be put under the charge of some competent person in Prince Edward Island who knew the conditions so that they would not be wiring back and forth to a department which does not appear to be very anxious to perform the service, a department whose head says to-day that there is no promise of steam communication, a department whose head thinks that row boats are good enough for Prince Edward Island, and I am astonished that the hon. member for King's (Mr. J. J. Hughes)—I should not be astonished because this is not the first time he has stood up as the humble apologist of the government——

Mr. J. J. HUGHES. There is no apology needed under the present circumstances, I may tell my hon. friend.

Mr. A. MARTIN. It may be needed by-and-by. The hon. member for King's says he is urging the government. Why, when he went home for the Christmas vacation that gentleman wrote a letter to the 'Patriot' from which I quoted, and he said in the 'Patriot,' with vain glory, that he had the promise of the minister that a third boat would be built and that the minister was going to submit it to his colleagues. That was three months ago, but after the minister had spoken a month ago the hon. member had to go down on his knees and ask the government again if they were going to build a third boat, after he had stated in Prince Edward Island that he had the promise of a third boat. He says that we are not taking the best means. How long has he been here? What means has he taken? If we are not taking the best means who has taken them? Have the best means been taken? What means does he suggest? This promise has been repeated here since confederation and the situation of affairs to-day, notwithstanding the minister's boast, is not a great improvement on what we had when we entered into confederation. I say to the minister's face that his ice boats and those steamers are of no direct benefit to Prince Edward Island. The people of Prince Edward Island are leaning on a broken reed when they depend on these boats in time of stress; when we want to ship our produce we find that the boats are tied up, and I believe if an estimate were made for the last twenty years of the benefits received by the province from those boats and of the loss occasioned to the province by depending upon these boats the account would be pretty nearly square. The hon. member undertakes to speak for the minister, why did not the minister speak for himself? He says that before prorogation something will happen; why did not the minister stand up and say that? Why is it that the hon. member for King's is the apologist for the minister?

Mr. BRODEUR. I may say to my hon. friend that he was not in the House the other day when the Prime Minister said that provision would be made for that purpose.

Mr. A. MARTIN. But the Minister of Marine did not say it.

Mr. BRODEUR. I thought it was not necessary to convince my hon. friend of that when it had been stated; I thought that one statement of it was sufficient for him, but I shall repeat it if he wishes.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Very well, why was it then that the urging of the member for King's was required? The hon. member for King's says he was urging the government and he undertakes to speak for the government and to say that before prorogation something will be done.

Mr. BRODEUR. And he has been meeting with success too.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Why did not the minister do that? At the same time the member for King's said he had the word of the Prime Minister. If he had the word of the Prime Minister why did he not rely on it? Why does it require his urging if he has the word of the Prime Minister? Evidently he discredits the word of the premier in the same way as he discredits the word of the Minister of Marine when he told the people of Prince Edward Island last fall that a third boat was to be put on, and notwithstanding that put a question on the order paper asking if a third boat was going to be built? That is all I have to say about it.

Motion (Mr. A. Martin) negatived.

APPELLATE COURT FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS (Yale-Cariboo). Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to interrogate the Minister of Justice in reference to the creation of an appellate court in the province of British Columbia. I desire to ask him if the following statement which appears in the Vancouver 'Daily Province' of Saturday, March 9, is correct:

> Notification to this effect has been forwarded to Hon. A. B. Aylesworth, Minister of Justice in the federal cabinet, by Attorney General Fulton. The Dominion government has also been notified by the provincial authorities that before legislation constituting the court will be passed the federal power must assent to the appointment of two judges to be named by the provincial government.

I desire to ask the Minister of Justice if any such representations have been made to him by the Attorney General of British Columbia or any other member of the provincial government, and if there is any such correspondence will he lay it on the table of the House?

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). I have simply to say that I have received from the Attorney General of British Columbia official notification of the intention of the legislature of that province, during its present session, to consider a measure for the establishment of a court of appeal for the province, but any statement, in a newspaper or otherwise, that from the attorney general or any member of the government of that province any proposition has been made to me as to the constitution of the court, once it is established, is a statement absolutely without foundation.

CONSOLIDATION OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton, Ont.). Before the Orders of the Day are called I would like to ask the Minister of Justice whether or not the government proposes to consolidate the orders in council up to date? They were consolidated in 1889 and the consolidation was found very useful. Some members of the bar have written to me from different parts of Canada inquiring as to whether or not I knew anything of the intention of the government in this regard and therefore I venture to ask the Minister of Justice whether it is under contemplation.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). The matter has not been under consideration recently but I am very pleased to have the suggestion from my hon. friend and certainly will take it into careful consideration.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The consolidation of 1889 was found very useful indeed; the examination of a great number of volumes of statutes to find a particular order in council sometimes involves a great deal of delay and inconvenience.

EXPORTATION OF ELECTRIC POWER.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice) moved the third reading of Bill (No. 60) to regulate the exportation of electric power and certain liquids and gases.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I have a telegram from the hon. member for East York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) requesting me, as it is impossible for him to be here today, and as he has given notice that he intends to move an amendment on the third reading, to ask that the government leave this motion over until to-morrow, when he will be here.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We have no notice at all of any such amendment.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, it is here, at page 2311 of 'Hansard.'

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. I have an amendment to propose to clause 5 and I wish to read it so that the minister may consider it. It provides for the very thing that this commission has suggested in their report. My amendment is:

That after the words 'Governor in Council' in clause 5, the following words be added: And has provided and is maintaining transmission lines in Canada capable of efficiently serving as many people in this country as can be served by such licensee in any foreign country, and also capable of serving as many people in Canada as may from time to time require power.

That is his notice of motion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is a speech from the hon. member?

Mr. SPROULE. He has given his notice from his place in the House.

Mr. PATERSON. He should be here then.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. He should be here, go on.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton, Ont.). I wish to move the following amendment:

That the order for the third readng be discharged and that the Bill be referred back to Committee of the Whole House with instructions to amend the same by conferring upon the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada the power of licensing and of regulation which, by the terms of the said Bill, are conferred upon the Governor in Council.

I have already stated to the Committee of the Whole my reasons for this motion. So far as the general provisions of the Bill are concerned, I am not entirely satisfied with clause 5, and I did have some intention of moving an amendment with regard to it; but I have no doubt whatever that the provision giving the powers of regulation and license to the Governor in Council is not in accordance with the lines on which we should proceed. The council which advises His Excellency is not an expert body; it is a political and a transient body. It is about as incapable a body to deal with a business proposition of this kind as one could reasonably imagine. More than that, the Governor in Council as well as the minister, in working out a measure of this kind, would most necessarily be called upon to deal with the business interests of political friends and opponents. It is inseparable of course from our constitution that such a body should be called on occasionally to exercise functions of that kind; but I am convinced that the proper course, owing to the tendency which is to be observed in legislation adopted this session, is that these powers should be conferred upon the Governor in Council to as small an extent as possible. In respect of matters of purely governmental administration are concerned, those powers must sometimes be conferred upon the Governor in Council; but so far as matters such as are dealt with in this Bill are concerned, that does not seem to me necessary or desirable. We have taken a step in advance by constituting a Railway Commission and conferring upon it very important powers which were formerly exercised by the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. It is true, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) observed the other day in reply to myself, that there are still certain powers of jurisdiction upon appeal preserved to the Privy Council. But I am not sure that the preservation of such powers is desirable. At all events that particular fact does not very much touch the argument I am now advancing. The powers of licensing and of regulation conferred by the provisions of this Bill are not necessarily matters of governmental administration. They are exactly in the same category as the matters which have already been referred to the determination of the Board of Railway Commissioners. That board has jurisdiction of very wide reaching effect in respect of transportation and railway, telephones and express companies. I have already suggested, and would suggest again, that its jurisdiction has outgrown its name and that it would be very proper and wise to reorganize that commission by extending its jurisdiction and increasing its numerical strength and working powers. It would be also wise to give it a new and more comprehensive name—to call it, for instance, the Public Utilities Commission instead of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. It may be and no doubt will be said that the work now developing on that commission is quite as great as it is able to deal with effectively. That, however, is an argument, not against the proposal I am now making, but in favour of a reorganization of that commission. It has occurred to me that it might be desirable to have that Railway Commission, when reorganized, work in two divisions—one division occupied more particularly with administrative matters and the other with matters that might be called judicial. However, that is not the question before the House at the moment. The question before the House, under the amendment I propose, is whether or not it is wiser to entrust extensive powers of this kind—powers which must be exercised under difficult and delicate conditions—to a partisan and transient body such as the Privy Council or to a permanent non-partisan and independent tribunal such as the Board of Railway Commissioners. For my part I am strongly inclined to the opinion that whether this or any succeeding government be in power, it would be much wiser to entrust powers of that kind to an independent commission and not confide them to the cabinet or the committee of the Privy Council which advises His Excellency. For this reason I beg to move:

That the order for the third reading be discharged and that the Bill be referred back to Committee of the Whole House with instructions to amend the same by conferring upon the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada the powers of licensing and of regulation which, by the terms of the said Bill, are conferred upon the Governor in Council.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. The proposition which my hon. friend has just made is one that was to some extent discussed while the measure in question was in committee. In fact, I might say it was so fully discussed that there is little need for me to add anything to what was then said. One of the practical difficulties in the way of referring the administration of this measure to the railway board has been already indicated by my hon. friend in introducing his amendment. The railway board is at present fully occupied with the work now devolving on it. In fact it is rapidly becoming a matter of practical consideration whether the board ought not to be reorganized and increased in number in order that it may successfully discharge the work for which it was appointed. But we are not yet at any rate in a position to recommend to the House—as a project which has been sufficiently considered and in regard to which plans have been sufficiently matured—the reorganization of that board and the increasing of its numbers. We are going on for the present with the board as it is now constituted. And, with the number of members of the board and the amount of work which falls practically to be done by that commission at the present time, it stands confessed that there could not be added to the duties of that tribunal such a body of work as, at all events in the beginning of the administration of this measure, would necessarily be entailed by it. Under these circumstances, if there were no other answer to the proposition that my hon. friend has made, it seems to me that that alone is sufficient. The board, with its present amount of work and as at present constituted, is working wholly up to the limit of its powers, and to add new duties of a burdensome nature would simply necessitate some part of the proper work of that board not being attended to as fully and as carefully as is to be desired. But there is in addition, a circumstance, to which I certainly feel disposed to attach much more weight than does my hon. friend—the circumstance, I mean, that, if this duty were imposed upon the Railway Board, there would seem a necessity to create some appellate tribunal, to provide somewhere a place where one dissatisfied might resort by way of appeal from any decision of the board to which he took exception. I do not know any place where any dissatisfied applicant, or any one resisting an application who is dissatisfied with the result, could be sent except where appeals upon all questions of fact from the Railway Board at present go. I need not remind you that that appeal which, under the provisions of the Railway Act, lies from discretions of the Railway Board to the Governor in Council, is by no means a dead letter or a right of which litigants do not freely avail themselves, nor can I say that appeals from that board are not frequently heard by the Governor in Council under the Railway Act. If the amendment which is proposed were adopted, and there were added, as would seem to be the necessary corollary, the right of appeal on questions of fact to the Governor in Council which now exists under the provisions of the Railway Act, we should be no further forward, but should be in the position of matters in which we now are under the provisions of this measure as it has been presented for the third reading.

In these circumstances, the objections I have referred to seem to me sufficient without more. But the grounds upon which my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) has supported his proposition to substitute the Board of Railway Commissioners for the Governor in Council deserve a word of comment. My hon. friend thinks the provision of the Bill on this point is undesirable; he thinks it dangerous that the power to issue licenses under the provisions of this statute should rest with a body which he refers to as a transient and partisan body. But is there anything anomalous in that? Is it not the proper, as well as the ordinary way of transacting the public business of this country? The issuing of a license of any description is the act of the Crown advised by the Crown's constituted advisers, The issuing of licenses for any purpose controlled by any particular department of the government proceeds upon the recommendation of the minister charged with the responsibility for that particular department; and, whether the licenses are of great importance, as in many instances we see on every side, or whether they are of minor consequence, in every instance they proceed from the Sovereign through, and acting upon, the advice of his appointed minister. The issuing of timber licenses—not, perhaps, so immediately important in the administration of the affairs of the Dominion as in those of the provinces—is an instance in which the governments of various portions of this Dominion are charged with a responsibility certainly as important and probably of much more consequence to the interested parties than that which will fall upon the government of the Dominion in the administration of this particular Bill, if it is passed in its present form. I do not mean to say that we have not heard in the past that governments or ministers in the issuing of licenses to cut timber, or for the sale of intoxicating liquors or for other purposes, have been influenced by political or partisan motives.

These charges are made. The ministers who administer the departments concerned necessarily run the risk of criticism of that character, and they take that as part of the responsibility of their offices. But, because these charges are made, we do not find propositions advocated that the administration of the public business of the country should be taken out of the hands of those who are appointed for the very purpose of administering these portions of the public business and given to some different tribunal. And I see no difference in principle. As I said a moment ago, the issuing of licenses, whether in regard to these larger and more important business transactions I have referred to or to the smallest matters, where the issuing of a license is of the most formal character, whether a license for the sale of postage stamps or a license issued so much as a matter of course as a license to contract matrimony—in every case that one can conceive of where the issuing of a license is necessary under statute, the license is issued by the Crown upon the advice either of some minister or of the body of ministers as a whole; and, to create an exception in this matter would seem to me something not needed, unless it be done upon the ground upon which it is put, that there would be always the suspicion to which members of the government would be open that they would be influenced by political friendship, for this, that, or the other person interested. And that, as I say, is a liability which ministers incur from the moment they undertake the administration of the affairs of the country, and there is no more reason to expect these charges to arise from this line of business than from any other. There is also the fact, manifest upon consideration and to be taken into account, that the investigation of the circumstances in regard to which information would inevitably be necessary before the application for a license under this statute could be intelligently disposed of is something which needs the assistance of the skilled and scientific people who must either be engaged for the special purpose or must be found already attached to the various departments of the government. If this duty were put upon the Railway Board, that board would of necessity be entitled to the assistance of skilled experts in the particular line of scientific inquiry involved, and it would necessitate, as it would seem to me, not merely the additional amount of work which it would place upon that board, but equally the engaging and maintaining of a staff of engineering assistants of a character which the present board is not now possessed of, but such as, on the other hand, can readily be utilized in the different departments, or some of the departments of the government.

Aside from these considerations which occur to me at the moment, there would be this additional difficulty, which possibly has been contemplated, but which has not been alluded to, and in regard to which I do not quite understand what the proposition of the amendment would be. We are by this Bill proposing a double measure of control upon the export of electricity and of fluid from this country. We are proposing not merely that any producer who desires to export must first obtain a license entitling him to do so, and that the amount which he so exports, or for which he has a license, should be limited to the surplus which he produces and which is not needed in this country; but we are also providing as a means for enforcing our control over the quantity of export, that by proclamation export duties may be imposed upon any producer who is not complying with the requirements of the law; whereas any producer who is complying may be relieved of the incidence of such duties. Those duties, it is proposed, are to be imposed or removed, are to be varied or reimposed, as occasion may require, upon proclamation, to be issued, of course, by the advice of the Governor's Council. It would introduce at once confusion in the administration of this measure if we were to put the licensing power into the hands of a separate tribunal from that which is charged with the responsibility of taking action of the character I describe, in the event of the conditions of the license not being complied with by the licensee. We are in this clause, with regard to the imposition or removal, as the case may be, of export duties, adopting the same course which this parliament sanctioned a few years ago in the case of nickle and other commodities, in regard to which export duties were to be imposed, if it was thought necessary, by action of the Governor in Council. There seems no other tribunal to which the right could be assigned to decide whether or not occasion had arisen for the imposition of export duties than the Governor in Council, and with the responsibility placed upon the Governor in Council in connection with the working out of this Act, it would seem the only natural thing, and not incongruous with the similar duty of deciding upon the terms under which export should by license be permitted, that the imposition of the duty should rest with the same body. For these reasons I prefer the provisions of the Bill as drawn, and must oppose the amendment of my hon. friend.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Might I say a word in explanation of my position with respect to what the minister has just now mentioned. The Governor in Council, of course, must deal with export duties. As I understand section 10 the power to impose export duties is in aid of, and ancillary to, the power of regulation. Well, it can be used as ancillary to, and in aid of, the enforcement of regulations by the board, just as it can be used under the present provisions of the Bill. So it did not occur to me that any difficulty would arise in that respect.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not think the minister's argument was very logical when he said that the power here asked for by order in council was like that granted in respect to leases of timber lands or agricultural leases. That is largely departmental work, and the Minister of the Interior grants these leases under the regulations of the law and they relate to the public domain. Then the minister says that there is a contention that political influence will be brought to bear. Is there not greater danger of political influence being brought to bear upon the government with regard to these licenses than there would be upon the Railway Commission? I would imagine so because the Railway Commission is not obliged always to keep in the good graces of the people, as a government is. The Railway Commission is independent of the electors, and can go on and do their duty as they judge right and proper. Then the minister says it would necessitate the board employing one or more experts, if this power was given over to the board. Well, who is going to inform the government if it is not the board? The board would make a recommendation to the government to grant the license by order in council, and in either case the board would require to be informed, whether they acquired that information from one or more experts. The board could be responsible for looking into the subject carefully and getting such information as would justify them in recommending to the government that a license be granted. It seems to me the board is the more proper body to deal with this question than the government, and that it would inspire greater public confidence.

Amendment (Mr. R. L. Borden) negatived on division.

Mr. SPROULE. I put a question to the minister who had this Bill in charge, and he did not deign to reply except by a nod of the head, which I consider was scarcely courteous when a request is made on behalf of an absent member, and in absence of any intimation that the government are disposed to move the Bill, and give a member an opportunity to move a motion of which he has given notice. I take the opportunity to move it now. I move that the order for the third reading of this Bill be not gone on with now, but that it be discharged, and the Bill be referred back to Committee of the Whole for the purpose of adding the following clause in amendment:

That after the words 'Governor in Council' in clause 5, the following words be added:

And has provided and is maintaining transmission lines in Canada capable of efficiently serving as many people in this country as can be served by such lines in any foreign country, and also capable of serving as many people in Canada as may from time to time require power.

I make the motion for this reason: While on the American side there are ample lines for conveying power, in Canada there are practically none. It might be contended that, if it was proposed to transfer more power to the American side than was being used in Canada, they have no appliances for conveying power in Canada, and therefore the supply of power to Canadians would be prevented because there are no lines to transmit power to them. We take for example the need that might occur in Galt which town might require power from this company. They know that there is no line to transmit power to Galt. They desire to have a certain quantity of power and after they have reached this conclusion I imagine that it would be almost unnecessary to apply to the company to grant them this power because of the small quantity they required and that the company would not be very likely to build transmitting lines to supply such a small quantity of power; whereas, on the other hand, if they were across the line the quantity of power that would be required would be much larger and the lines would be already built. Therefore, the Canadians might suffer because of the fact of no transmission lines having been built in the country. It is for that reason that I make this motion.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). Mr. Speaker, before the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) answers that I would like him to be kind enough to reply at the same time to a question I would like to put to him. Perhaps the point has been explained in committee, but I do not remember. It is in reference to section 4.

Subject to any regulations of the Governor in Council in that behalf, the minister may grant licenses, subject to such conditions as he thinks proper, for the exportation, &c.

What I wish to understand is this: Several companies are at present exporting power to the United States. They will require, if I understand the case rightly, a license. The regulations will not be particular ones but the regulations will be general ones which will be applicable to all companies whether they are exercising the right now or getting the right afterwards. Am I right in that?

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). Referring first, as I may be permitted to do, to the question which has been put by the hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart), my idea would be that the regulations of the Governor in Council mentioned in section 4 would be general regulations applicable, so long as they remain in force, to all applicants for licenses and applicable certainly to existing companies, which, under section 3, would require to have licenses. The regulations having been promulgated, each individual application would be considered by the Governor in Council subject to these regulations, and subject to the special circumstances of each individual case.

Mr. HAGGART. That modifies it considerably—subject to such conditions as may be applicable to each particular case. What is the meaning of that—that there will be other regulations than the general regulations ?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. That was not in my mind at all. What was in my mind in using the words mentioned was simply that the facts and circumstances of each particular applicant, the amount which he was supplying at the time of the application to Canadian consumers and the amount of the surplus which he had would differ from the same circumstances in regard to another applicant, and that the amount any particular applicant would be licensed to export might for these reasons differ materially from the amount that another applicant would be licensed to export.

In reference to the motion which has been presented to you, Mr. Speaker, by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) I would like to say first of all that certainly on my part, and I am sure on the part of every one on this side of the House, there was no thought of discourtesy when my hon. friend, at an earlier stage of the proceedings this afternoon, referred to the notice given by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) as appearing at page 2311 of the unrevised 'Hansard.' That was a notice given verbally in the course of the discussion upon the second reading of the Bill or in the Committee of the Whole, as long ago as the 29th of January. The Bill, upon that occasion, stood for the purpose expressed at the time of referring these two particular clauses to the government of Ontario for an expression of any views that they might care to give. The Bill was resumed last week and passed through committee. I am not, at the moment, aware whether the hon. member for South York was then there or was not here, but if he was here there was no mention at that time made of this proposal on his part and if he was not here he must have seen, if he looked at the proceedings of the House, what had taken place, and if the hon. gentleman was not satisfied or if he had intended to follow this matter at all he should have made some intimation of that intention on his part.

Mr. AYLESWORTH.

Mr. SPROULE. It was not that fact because it is not necessary to give notice at all inasmuch as this is a public Bill, but what I referred to was the fact that I held in my hand a telegram from the hon. member for South York requesting that owing to his unavoidable absence we should leave the third reading of the Bill until to-morrow. There was no answer given except a nod to go on with the Bill.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. As I said, I disclaim, in so far as I am concerned, any intention to be discourteous. I was engaged at the moment in endeavouring to find the statement to which the hon. member for East Grey had referred, and when he gave me the reference to the page in 'Hansard' I was engaged in turning it up because it came to me to-day as an entirely new matter and I had not any recollection of it. However, under any circumstances, I do not see that there is any reason why the business of the House should be delayed by the accident that the hon. member for South York is not here. If we were to delay upon that account we would delay upon a great many occasions.

In regard to the amendment which is proposed let me say, Mr. Speaker, simply that it attempts, I submit, to be specific, where it would be wiser to leave things in general terms. The clause as it stands conveys the exact meaning intended by the framers of the Bill. It provides that the amount which henceforth shall be permitted to be exported shall be restricted, that whereas heretofore there has been no restriction whatever on the amount which any producer might export for sale into the United States, in future, there shall be a practical restriction upon it and that the amount which in future the producer can export shall only be such amount as is not needed at that time in this country. We express that meaning when we clearly say that the license may provide that the amount to be exported shall be limited to the surplus after the licensee has supplied for distribution to customers for use in Canada power to the extent defined by the license at the price and in accordance with the conditions, rules and regulations prescribed.

We are intending to permit the taking out of the country only such amount as there is no use for in the country, and in the circumstances we should be restricting the general terms which this section lays down as a rule of guidance for the tribunal issuing the license if we were to add that the quantity to be exported should be limited to the surplus, after the licensee had provided and is maintaining transmission lines in Canada. The practical effect of it would be, as to existing companies at all events, that until they had provided and were maintaining some transmission lines—I do not know what the extent of them—but some transmission lines, they would be forbidden to export anything at all. Well now, where is the necessity for that or where is the propriety of it? At the present time, at Niagara—with regard to which alone there appears to be discussion of the present proposition—we have one of the three companies maintaining a transmission line over which it is supplying substantially all the power which is consumed at present in Canada. Apart from such local needs as there may be in the immediate vicinity of Niagara Falls, it is only one of the three companies that is maintaining any long distance transmission lines. If this amendment were inserted in the Bill, it would at once preclude either of the other companies from exporting anything, because the language of the amendment is that even their surplus cannot be exported until the producer has provided and is maintaining transmission lines in Canada capable of serving as many people as would be served by that licensee in the United States. If there is one producer finding his market in Canada and content to continue finding his market in Canada, and if the prices at which that one producer is supplying Canadian needs is reasonable and satisfactory, what object is there in preventing the unused surplus of other producers going abroad? I am unable to suggest any, and it would seem to me, with all deference to any hon. member who may have an opposite opinion, that it would be inadvisable to limit ourselves, or to tie the hands of the licensing tribunal, by preventing them from issuing a license permitting export, unless there was the condition of things which this amendment describes.

Mr. SPROULE. Suppose a person from a remote town applied for power, and he was told he could not get it because they had to build transmission lines, unless they charged him a higher rate. Would he not be likely to stop negotiations for obtaining that power? Then the company might say to the government: we have not been able to sell this power in Canada and we wish to export to the United States where we have customers and existing transmission lines. Would the power company not be much more likely to sell its power in the United States where it already has lines, than to endeavour to sell it in Canada where it would have to build transmission lines?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. I would think that the condition of things described by my hon. friend would be exactly such as the licensing tribunal would inquire into and deal with in a just and reasonable way.

Amendment (Mr. Sproule) negatived on division.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara). Before the Bill is read a third time I wish to make one more effort to sustain the rights of the people of Canada. I make a last appeal to have inserted in the Bill an amendment such as was indicated by me in the discussion in committee. I therefore beg to move, seconded by Mr. Cockshutt:

That the order for the third reading be discharged and that the Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House with instructions to amend the same by adding after the word 'Council' in the sixth line of section 5, the words following: In which it shall always be provided that no license shall be issued under this Act unless the licensee shall employ and actually use in Canada during the whole of the term of the license a quantity of power or fluid (not theretofore employed or used) equal to the quantity licensed for export; also that no further licenses whatever shall be issued when there shall be less surplus than twenty-five thousand horse-power immediately available.

The amendment is the same as I proposed in committee and I shall not weary the House with any repetition of the reasons I then gave for advocating its adoption. But new light has come to us since that discussion in committee. I was surprised to find that after the majority of the committee had, at the instance of the government negatived my amendment, a very important communication was laid on the table by the Minister of Justice, and which had the committee known of its existence I think they would have voted for the amendment in the interests of the country, and irrespective of party politics. I refer to the letter written by the Premier of Ontario to the Minister of Justice and which will be found on page 4761 unrevised 'Hansard.' If hon. gentlemen should vote for this amendment which I now propose, it is not too late to prevent that injury to Canada which Mr. Whitney in his letter gives such strong notice of. The letter is dated February 28, 1907, about three weeks ago, and it says:

Under agreements with three companies we are entitled to have used in Canada, when called for, one-half the power developed by them.

These three companies, as has been admitted by the Minister of Justice, are practically all that are now concerned in creating this power. And Mr. Whitney has an arrangement with these three companies to-day, that arrangement being that they shall do what my motion seeks to compel them to do. If my amendment be adopted we are therefore not asking these companies to do any unreasonable thing, notwithstanding anything that the Minister of Justice may say. Is it unreasonable that we should provide machinery to compel these three companies to live up to a solemn agreement made with a province of this Dominion? We find now that the Premier of Ontario has informed the Minister of Justice, that the province of Ontario is always to have for the Canadians one-half the power which is produced by these three companies. Without knowing that he had that agreement, but having an idea that some such arrangement would be the very least we should require from the producers of this power, I proposed my amendment. I, of course, had my own opinion that no exportation should be allowed at present until we saw if the power companies were able to develop Canada with the power they had, but I thought that we should at least insist that the Americans should not get more than one-half of the power that Canada was producing, and that the producers of this power should be compelled to assist Canada to an extent at least equal to the assistance they gave to American industry. I was told by the Minister of Justice that he proposed restriction was not reasonable, but now I find that there was this letter from the Premier of Ontario which shows that the only companies who could accuse us of being unreasonable if we limited their export had agreed with the premier, the government and the people of Ontario that they would always have at least one-half the power they create available for use in Canada. Then comes my amendment that we should at least insist that for every unit of power which we allow to be exported, Canada shall be built up by power to the same extent being furnished for the creation of industries in this country.

Having heard from the Minister of Justice last week when my amendment to this Bill to the same effect was before the committee that not one-tenth of the power being created would be used in Canada, I made inquiries and I have information from a gentleman who certainly knows, and who has given more attention to this question than possibly any one else, that is the Hon. Adam Beck, who as minister in Mr. Whitney's government has charge of this question, that one-half of the power which we will be permitted to develop under our proposed agreement with the United States has already been applied for. By the agreement proposed by the joint Waterways Commission the production of power on the Canadian side is limited to 200,000 horse-power, and I find that the Hydro-Electric Power Commission has at this moment applications from the districts served by it for 100,000 horse-power, one half of all that we can develop under the proposed agreement; so that instead of a consumption of one-tenth in Canada there are now applications for 50 per cent. Thus I do not see the unreasonableness of the suggestion that we should have retained in Canada an amount of power equal to that which is exported. If that is to be considered unreasonable let us so understand it, but the only visible ground for calling the suggestion unreasonable is that some one in this House undertakes to provide by legislation means to protect Canada and to assert that Canada is not to exist entirely for the benefit of the United States.

On a motion which I made early in the session it was demonstrated that we are to be allowed to create only a little more than one-half of the total development of power at Niagara Falls, and my suggestion is that we shall not allow more than one-half of that one-half to be exported from Canada. The Minister of Justice says that at present there is no market for all of this power in Canada. How are you to get a market if you take all the goods to be sold away to another market? If the market in Canada is to be an empty void you cannot expect people to go to that market to buy. If all power is permitted to be exported there will be no inducement to any one in Canada to create industries or to invite others to do so. If it is supposed to be fashionable to be so good to the United States that Canada should always hand over everything she has to the United States for fear of being called unfriendly, I am dead against such an attitude, but whether that is, or is not the position it is time the government woke up and undertook in the legislation which they frame, to protect Canadian industries and to see that Canada is built up. We have no safer way of protecting those industries than by some such legislation as is proposed by my amendment. It has been strenuously urged by the Minister of Justice two or three times as a reason for the passing of this legislation that until his Bill was brought in there was no limit on the exportation of power, but I point out that there was a contract between the people creating the power and the government of Ontario that they actually could not export more than one-half of what they produced. Then the minister comes along with federal legislation and there is this very serious question; if this Bill should pass without our enacting some such amendment as this of mine then this federal legislation could be used to override the bargain made between the province and these people who are developing power and we would be told that the Dominion government had permitted the exportation of the power, and as the two governments have not agreed on it the federal authority is supreme and the bargain with the province to a large extent would be overridden, the power companies would not be bound by it. This would be a very plausible argument and a likely result in a court of justice.

Mr. Whitney's letter gots on :

> Should any arrangement be made with the United States affecting the quantity of power to be developed on the Canadian side of the Niagara river, or should one or more of a number of other contingencies occur, our position would be a very complicated one indeed.

Now I propose to relieve that complication. Mr. Whitney does not know when he writes that whether the Waterways

Commission report is to be adopted or not, but there it is before this country, a document laid on the table of this House, awaiting the sanction of parliament, a bargain made by people authorized to make it, subject to approval by parliament, limiting this power. Let us assume, and I hope this will not occur, that the government intends to adopt that arrangement made by this Joint Waterways Commission and that it will be ratified by treaty between Great Britain and the United States. Mr. Whitney points out that if this is done and the quantity to be developed on the Canadian side is limited :

Then our position would be a very complicated one indeed.

I propose to remove that complication by having an enactment which will prevent the government being embarrassed by such a complication so that they can say to any people applying for leave to export : How much are you developing now, go on and furnish as much for Canadian consumption as you propose to export and then you can get permission to export accordingly. If we do not pass such an amendment it means that the government do not intend to protect the people, and it may be said when the people want to deal with the government under this statute and find the government has voted down such a proposition as I am advocating, they have a reasonable right to come to this government and expect them to not regard such a qualification.

It is reasonable for every one to suppose that they intend, if they see fit, to allow the whole of this to be exported. Under those circumstances, the government, not having proposed any other way, no other proposition being made by any one supporting the government to protect the Canadian people, I think it is my duty to insist on this amendment, and make one last effort to protect our people in this matter. I beg, therefore, to move the amendment which I have read.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. When this amendment was proposed in Committee of the Whole last Wednesday it was very fully discussed, and therefore I shall not delay the House by going over that discussion, beyond reminding you, Mr. Speaker, that this measure does not concern the Niagara peninsula alone. I think it was pointed out last Wednesday by the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) that there was within his constituency one case, at any rate, of the production of electric power, in which the total production was far less than the 25,000 horse-power this amendment proposes should always be retained in this country. I rise, however, merely because reference has been made to a letter which, on that occasion, I read at the request of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition—a letter addressed to me by the Premier of Ontario some three weeks ago. We have been told this afternoon that there is something new in this letter, that it contains a piece of news which, had the committee been aware of it last Wednesday, might have brought about an entirely different result. And that piece of news is that agreements exist between the government of Ontario on the one part and the three electric producing companies at Niagara on the other part, under which the government is entitled to have utilized in Canada, when called for, one half the pewer developed by these producers. I have only to say that the existence of such agreements has been public knowledge for months—I might say for years—in fact, ever since these agreements were entered into. The agreements in question are referred to over and over again in the reports of the Waterways Commission, which have been on the table of this House for months, and they are to be found, if not in the statutes of Ontario, at all events in the published orders in council and records of that province. What the legal effect of these agreements may be is not for me to say. All that I am desirous of pointing out is that whatever the contractual obligations resting upon these companies may be, those will certainly not be in the slightest degree interfered with by the measure of restriction upon export which this Bill proposes to impose.

Mr. SPROULE. If you give them the power to export, and they avail themselves of that power to the detriment of that agreement, which would prevail—the provincial or the federal?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. I am unable to see the slightest conflict. They are under contract with somebody—I do not care whether with a government or an individual—to dispose of their product in a certain proportion. That contract, if it has any validity at all, is enforcible by the courts ; and without reference to our permission, under this Bill, to export a larger quantity, their contractual obligation must be observed or they must take the consequences.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does the minister say that if we pass a statute which renders it unnecessary for them to do that, that will not be held a reasonable defence for their not doing it? If we pass an Act relieving people from their obligation under a certain contract, can they not plead that Act as their defence?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. If anybody were proposing to pass an Act of parliament relieving any individual or company of any contract, that would be a different story. But we are doing nothing of the kind.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is the effect of what you are doing.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. Not at all.

Mr. SPROULE. The Bell Telephone Company were relieved of their obligations under an Ontario law by virtue of federal authority. They pleaded their rights under the federal authority to ignore the obligations under the provincial Act.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. My hon. friend is referring to an altogether different thing. In the case of the Bell Telephone Company there was incorporation by Act of the Dominion parliament and also an independent incorporation, in slightly different terms, by Act of the Ontario legislature. It was therefore a question for the court to determine upon what terms the company was incorporated. There was no conflict of authority between the Dominion and Ontario legislation in the sense that either was superior to the other. It was simply a question, the one being earlier than the other, whether the provisions of that earlier legislation were embodied in the subsequent legislation.

Mr. HAGGART. I would like to clearly understand what effect the regulations may have. Suppose a license were granted to a company to export power, and that company entered into contract with companies on the other side, and suppose the Dominion government were to alter from time to time its regulations, thus affecting these contracts which the company had entered into. Might not that lead us into this difficulty, that a foreign country might insist that our contractual arrangements with individuals in that country should be carried out?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. The regulations are one thing and the license an altogether different thing. The regulations will not enter into any details as to individual cases, or the amounts which any individual producer may deal with either in Canada or the United States, but they will provide the rules under which any producer may make his application for a license. The licensee will obtain his license pursuant to those regulations. By his license he will be told: You must supply a certain definite quantity for consumption in Canada, but any amount beyond that you may send wherever you can find a market. His license authorizes him to export that surplus; but by section 4 of this Bill that license is revocable upon reasonable notice and without cause. All that is necessary is to give the licensee such length of notice as is reasonable under the circumstances, and, subject to that condition, the license is revocable at will. Every licensee will take his permission to export with the distinct warning before his eyes that the license may be revoked upon reasonable notice—three months, three weeks, or whatever it may be—and any contract upon which he enters with a consumer in the United States will be entered upon with the danger open before his eyes that, if the Canadian demand increase, he must supply the Canadian demand first, and that his license is liable to be revoked and a new one substituted, in which the amount of his permissible export is reduced. That is my idea of the practical working out of the statute, and I cannot see that the issuing of a license will interfere with the contractual obligations, whether in this country or in other countries, into which the licensee may have entered.

Mr. HAGGART. Is there anything in the Act that the license may be revoked?

Mr. AYLESWORTH. Oh, yes.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT (Brantford). This matter was fully discussed on a perivous occasion, so I do not intend to take up more than a few moments. Speaking a week or so ago upon this question, I had not by me the figures showing the cost of transmission lines per mile. Since then I have looked up the figures and desire to point out to the minister the difficulties there will be in the way of the existing companies placing the power in the market within a reasonable radiating distance of Niagara—say London on the west and Peterborough on the east—which points, I believe, would be found as far distant as it would be wise to go. It is difficult to give a hard and fast estimate of the cost of transmission lines. The cost of the right of way is one of the principal factors, and, of course, these values vary according to the country through which the transmission line is to go. But we have certain data on which we can place a fair estimate in regard to the proposition now under discussion—this Niagara power question. Take the Niagara-London line and the Niagara-Toronto line, one already constructed and the other in the course of construction. These are through the ordinary territory of Ontario, so that they will cost about what other lines in the province may be expected to cost. The distance from Niagara to London, I believe, is 123 miles, but it will be sufficient for the present purpose if we count it at 120 miles. From Niagara to Toronto is 80 miles. This makes a total of 200 miles of transmission lines. The figures I have shown of the detailed cost of the Toronto-Niagara line make a total of $1,235,000 in round numbers, and the Niagara-London line will cost about $1,607,000. The total cost of the two lines is $2,842,000, or about an average of $15,000 per mile. This includes right of way, towers, insulators, copper, lighting arresters, switches and telephone lines. The minister will see at once that it is a pretty large proposition for the power companies to entertain—an expenditure of over $3,000,000 to cover only a part of the district which they ought to cover; if they were to afford the facilities they ought to afford it would cost, probably, $4,000,000 to take in the territory within reasonable radiating distance of Niagara. On the other hand, to put the power across the Niagara river would only require about a mile of transmission line. It would be easy to put 100,000 horse-power across the river at Niagara. The expense for construction of line would probably not exceed $25,000 to carry 100,000 horse-power, which is the quantity that I base my calculation upon.

Mr. AYLESWORTH. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockshutt) allow me to ask him a question? Will it not cost as much mile for mile to build lines on the American side as to build them upon the Canadian side?

Mr. COCKSHUTT. I think it likely that it will cost as much on the American side as on the Canadian side. But may I remind the hon. minister (Mr. Aylesworth) that the transmission lines already exist on the American side and all they need is coupling up. With very slight expenditure a great power can be transmitted over the lines that already exist. If there were no lines, I agree with the minister that it would cost as much to deliver the power in the United States as in Canada.

Mr. CONMEE. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cockshutt) a question? Who owns these lines already constructed on the American side? And does the hon. gentleman think that the company would be allowed to use them without charge or would they expect to pay as much as though they owned them?

Mr. COCKSHUTT. I am not in a position to state who are the owners, but I understand the likelihood is that contracts will be let to the owners of the present transmission line, one of whom, I believe, is in close union with one of the companies on our side. Therefore, it is likely that all the power will be sold to one or other of the transmission lines in New York state.

Now, I wish to point out to the minister that the quantity of power used in Ontario will depend largely upon the price; the lower you make the price the greater will be the demand. But the way to make dear power is to export your surplus. In that you can easily keep the price to $40 or $50 a horse-power, which is about what we have been paying, and which is too much. Within two miles of where we sit there is a very large industrial concern which has a contract for power. I have figures concerning it from a gentleman who is interested, and I think I may venture to use these figures; hon. gentlemen can rely upon their being accurate. This concern has an agreement with one of the electric companies on the Ottawa river to supply 500 horse-power at $15 per horse-power per year, with a twenty-four hour day. This is the price delivered at the factory. On the other hand, in Toronto the people are paying $40 and $50, or, for small units, a great deal more. In Brantford we pay as high as $100 per horse-power per year for small units, and I do not think that it can be had in any quantity for less than $40 or $50. You cannot get a large market for electrical power at these figures. But we have figures which I quoted to this House last year showing the actual cost of producing the power at Niagara. I showed that in 100,000 horse-power units the power could be developed at $5 per horse-power, that price to include a sinking fund that in 40 years would purchase the works. These, I admit, are lower figures than any of the companies are willing to give. But the engineers who prepared these figures for the commission of which I have the honour to be a member, went into the matter with the greatest care. Hon. gentlemen will remember that we had a debate on the subject at that time and that all were not willing to accept my figures. So I said to the engineers: Your figures are disputed in the House of Commons. I said, gentlemen representing some districts in which transmission is a great factor, notably in the Niagara district, dispute the figures, and, I said, can you give me any evidence that these figures are correct, that the thing can be carried out? He said: I cannot give you any further evidence than this, but I am willing to say that if you will find the capital to build these transmission lines, we will take the contract at the price that will do it. That was one of the most reputable firms in Canada, one of the best firms of engineers in the city of Montreal who made that statement to myself after the discussion in this House, saying that they were prepared to take a contract that would enable them to produce 100,000 horse-power units at Niagara Falls at a basis of $5 per horse-power for twenty-four hours per day per annum.

Mr. HAGGART. With no allowance for value of water-power?

Mr. COCKSHUTT. No, simply the cost of the works and all the necessary apparatus for producing the power. The water-power has been paid for at a very small price by these companies, an average of about twenty-five cents per horse-power per annum. So really after you have paid for the water-power it would not cost more than twenty-five cents or fifty cents extra for your horse-power per annum. Therefore, you have a basis on which you can work. If you begin with a basis of that kind your market will be extended almost indefinitely. I think Mr. Whitney's figures read by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) would be corroborated within a very few years, and probably within five years at the utmost, this 200,000 horsepower that he speaks of could be utilized in that part of the province of Ontario. If you allow them now to carry to the United States at low prices and make arrangements for five or ten years, I fear you will check the development that might take place in our part of the province. For that reason I appeal to the minister to allow something like this amendment to be added. If he is not quite satisfied with the wording of the motion it can be modified, but let it contain the principle involved in the amendment of the member for Lincoln. I think it is in the interest of the people, it is in the interest of the industrial community ; and I believe the day is near at hand when our radial roads, and perhaps even our railways now run by steam, will require all the power that can be generated at Niagara Falls under existing conditions, providing the recommendations of the Waterways Commission are carried out.

Mr. E. D. SMITH (Wentworth)). The minister seems to think that it would be a hardship if this amendment were adopted. Let us see what the proposition is. There are four large companies now, three at Niagara and one at Decews Falls. Two of these companies, one at Decews Falls and one at Niagara, are Canadian companies, with Canadian capital entirely, I believe. These two companies are supplying the cities and towns of Canada. The other two companies are American companies with entirely American capital, and they are exporting practically all their power to the other side of the line. Now, what would be the position if this amendment were put into effect ? The two patriotic Canadian companies that are serving Canadians would be in a position at once to export a quantity of power equal to that which they are using on this side, which would be about all they can make. The other two companies would be put in this position, that it would be necessary for them to develop in Canada some means of applying this power, and that would bring into the field two strong competitors, two rich companies, who would commence to compete for supplying power to the various industries in Canada. Would not that be a great achievement for this government ? What more important or more useful thing than to bring into the field two rich and powerful companies, compel them by such legislation as this to compete for the application of power to the industries of Canada ? As my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) has just said, no great amount of power will be used unless it is cheap, and the way to make it cheap is to bring companies into competition with each other. It may be said that these two companies are now exporting large quantities of power, and it would be a hardship to cut them off at once. Well, give them two or three years to put in operation in Canada one-half of what they are now exporting, and the balance in two or three years, giving them a reasonable amount of time in which to put into operation in Canada an equal quantity of power to that which they are now exporting. The effect would be enormous. Nothing could be devised by this government more advantageous to the province of Ontario than a measure which would bring about the cheapest possible power, and bring it into thousands of uses where it is not now applied and never will be applied unless it is made cheap, and unless other strong companies are compelled or induced to start operations. It seems to me an amendment of this kind should be put into the Act.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Lancaster).

PRIVATE BILLS.

QUEBEC ORIENTAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 69) respecting the Quebec Oriental Railway Company.—Mr. Gauvreau.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What lines are comprised in this Bill ?

Mr. EMMERSON. A portion of this railway will be in New Brunswick and a portion in Quebec, the intention being to connect with the Baie de Chaleurs Railway at Matapedia. In the Railway Committee, after full discussion, it was declared to be for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. That declaration is not necessary if part of the railway is in one province and part in another. I do not understand how that can be, since it appears from the preamble that the company was incorporated by the Quebec legislature.

Mr. EMMERSON. A portion of it goes through New Brunswick.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. This cannot be the same undertaking, because no one province would undertake to incorporate a company to build a road in another province. We are repeatedly getting instances of this kind in this House. First, the provincial legislature incorporates a company to undertake a certain work, then, a few years afterwards, the same company comes to this parliament and asks for legislation, and that the work be declared to be for the general advantage of Canada. The fullest explanation should be given in such cases, because it is difficult to understand how a work which for ten or twenty years has remained a provincial work, suddenly becomes, without any apparent cause, a work for the general advantage of Canada. We should be jealous of interfering with legislation which is properly within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures. Up to the present, this certainly has been within the jurisdiction of Quebec. Yesterday it was a work provincial in its character ; to-day it is a work for the general advantage of Canada. This sudden transformation is altogether beyond my comprehension.

Mr. EMMERSON. The Bill is reprinted as amended by the Railway Committee and it will be found there that this railway goes through Bonaventure county and in the northern part of New Brunswick. It will be necessary to have a Dominion charter therefore.

Mr. LENNOX. We are not giving them a Dominion charter.

Mr. EMMERSON. It is practically that. The company was originally incorporated by the legislature of Quebec but in consequence of the route selected it was necessary to have legislation here. The Railway Committee now examines very closely into the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. LENNOX. The Railway Committee does ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes. A large number of these railways are incorporated in connection with other lines. It is seldom that any railways are now projected that are not Dominion in their character. All the railways along the line of the Intercolonial Railway are designed to connect with it, and it is desirable that in all cases where possible, the connecting lines with the great trunk systems, should be under Dominion jurisdiction. The reason is obvious ; we have established a Railway Commission and it would be anomalous if the jurisdiction of that commission were confined to one portion of a system, and did not include its connections. I make the statement the Railway Committee is very jealous in that regard. They examine very closely every Bill and no incorporations are granted, no Bills are approved by that committee, unless it is shown that there are very strong reasons why the legislation should be granted by this parliament rather than by the provincial legislatures.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The Railway Commission may have looked into this very carefully but the minister does not seem to give what I regard as a very intelligible explanation of it. If this undertaking is in respect of a railway that runs from the province of Quebec into the province of New Brunswick, which is partly in one province and partly in the other, there is no need for this declaration. The road, under such conditions, is a road over which this parliament has jurisdiction and is not a road over which either of the provincial legislatures' would have jurisdiction; that I think is perfectly plain. Therefore if what the minister states is to be accepted as absolutely correct, this section should be struck out as unnecessary, but it does not seem to me that that can be an accurate explanation, because if you look at the section you will see that it provides as follows:

The railway works which the company has been empowered to undertake and operate are declared to be for the general advantage of Canada.

According to the preamble of the Bill the company has been so empowered by the legislature of Quebec, and I do not think that legislature would undertake to give a charter for the construction of a railway partly in the province of Quebec and partly in the province of New Brunswick. Therefore the matter remains as much a mystery to me as ever. If the first explanation of the minister is to be accepted there is no need of this clause. If that is not to be accepted then we are relegated to the position which I first mentioned, that is we have a railway which has been dealt with up to the present time as a provincial work by the legislature of Quebec, and why is it that this parliament is now to exercise jurisdiction? Because the road is declared to be for the general advantage of Canada? Why is it any more to the general advantage of Canada now than it was two years ago?

Mr. EMMERSON. They got their powers from the Quebec legislature. A survey was then made and they found that the only possible route to connect the termini was through New Brunswick and they come to this parliament for this legislation, and under section 4 as it will be seen in the amended Bill:

4. In lieu of the line of railway described in section 7, chapter 82, of the statutes of 1903 of Quebec, the company may lay out, construct and operate a railway of the gauge of four feet eight and one-half inches from a point on the Intercolonial Railway at or near Rivière du Loup, in the county of Temiscouata, to a point on the Intercolonial Railway at or near Matapedia, in the county of Bonaventure, passing in a northeasterly direction through the counties of Temiscouata and Rimouski, and through the northern part of New Brunswick and through the county of Bonaventure, in the parishes of St. François d'Assise and St. Alexis de Matapedia, in the said county of Bonaventure, reaching St. Laurent de Matapedia along the banks of the Matapedia river.

That takes it through both provinces. They found in locating the railway that it was necessary to do that and therefore they came to this parliament seeking these further powers.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I may say that another reason for asking Dominion legislation is that this road is intended to be amalgamated with the Atlantic and Lake Superior and the Baie des Chaleurs road. These lines have already been authorized by the Dominion government and it is proposed that this line shall form part of that system. I believe arrangements have been made to take them all over and form them into one line, from the Gaspé basin along the shores of Gaspé, including this line with a branch to Edmundston, and it is desirable that all should be under Dominion legislation.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I did not see the reprint of the Bill, and I think section 4 as read by the minister, which shows an undertaking partly in one province and partly in another, is sufficient to justify the exercise of jurisdiction by this parliament; but I still do not see the necessity of section 1. I have this further to remark about it, that the Bill as reprinted seems to go very much beyond the Bill as originally introduced and I would like to know from the chairman of the Railway Committee whether any caution is exercised in respect of the advertisements and public notices which are required? A notice which would be sufficient for the Bill as originally introduced would certainly not be sufficient for the Bill as it now appears in the reprint, and it would be a very easy matter for any promoter of a Bill to escape the difficulties which would be occasioned by lack of due advertisement if in the Railway Committee he could add an undertaking which is not mentioned at all in the first instance. I would like to know whether or not any attention has been paid to that consideration.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I may say that no amendments are made to a Bill in the Railway Committee that do not comply with the notices given. Amendments are often made in the committee but due care is taken that the notices given will cover those changes.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. A notice which would be sufficient for the Bill as originally introduced would not by any means be sufficient for the Bill as it now appears, because the Bill as first introduced dealt with a road which had been incorporated and could be incorporated by the legislature of the province of Quebec, dealt with a road altogether in the province of Quebec; and upon a notice quite sufficient for the introduction of a Bill of that kind you have founded a Bill which deals with a railway covering territory in both provinces, partly in one province and partly in the other.

Was this advertised in that district? If so, it must have been a matter of extraordinary precaution because it would not be necessary in the first instance that this Bill should be advertised in New Brunswick at all; it related only to a road altogether within the province of Quebec and would the chairman of the Railway Committee or the minister——

Mr. EMMERSON. It was advertised in Campbellton, in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Was any inquiry made in regard to that in the Railway Committee?

Mr. EMMERSON. The chairman of the Railway Committee has already stated that in every instance inquiry is made. Mr. Hartney, the secretary, is very particular in respect of that and in every case where there is any proposed amendment to a Bill he brings the question of notices to the attention of the committee.

Mr. LENNOX. Does the Minister of Railways or the chairman of the Railway Committee say that there was an advertisement of a line of railway such as is described in the reprinted clause 4?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, that was done.

Mr. EMMERSON. And as will be seen by reference to the Bill as originally introduced it proposed to have power to acquire certain other railways, not definitely naming them. In the amendment the same powers are given but with more definiteness. The main point of the notice was that a railway was to be built from the line of the Intercolonial Railway at or near Rivière du Loup down to the Intercolonial Railway at or near Matapedia just on the borders between New Brunswick and Quebec and it has been clearly defined that in following that route it would go through the province of New Brunswick. I quite concur in the statement that the first clause is really not necessary, that is the declaratory clause, but it has been inserted in such Bill very frequently, notwithstanding objections to such a course.

Mr. LENNOX. Much better to leave it out.

Mr. EMMERSON. I frequently object to its being put in but those promoting the the Bill ask that it should be there, and the committee very frequently concur.

Mr. SPROULE. Several times we have had the question of the insufficiency of the notices up in that committee. It sometimes happens that the notice does not comply with the enactment in the Bill and our attention is not drawn to it by Mr. Hartney, as the minister says. More than once we have had quite a discussion over the insufficiency of the notice, but the committee consented to accept it as sufficient, although the members did not believe it was. It is evident that these notices are not looked into very closely.

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend will bear me out when I say that the question seldom arises because there are very few amendments proposed. Within the last fortnight, questions did arise with respect to that, and Mr. Hartney had the papers right here and satisfied the committee at once on the question of the sufficiency of the notice.

Mr. SPROULE. The minister must remember that Mr. Hartney did not satisfy the committee. I think the question arose with regard to the Canadian Northern Railway or amendments proposed to the Canadian Pacific Railway, in which cases the notices did not in any sense cover the ground. Yet we were obliged to change the Bill to comply with or partly comply with the notice because the notice was not properly complied with.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The rule of the committee is that if a notice does not cover the proposed amendment and is objected to by any member of the committee, it cannot go on. But if the members of the committee think that the proposed amendment is not of very great consequence, although it may be covered by the notice, and no member of the committee objects, frequently it is allowed to pass. In the case of the Canadian Northern, my hon. friend did object at first, but afterwards withdrew his objection and the amendment went through.

Mr. SPROULE. My hon. friend must know that when I raised the objection, he himself ruled that it was quite within the notice. I said I am not so personally interested as to continue the fight. The notice may be right or wrong, but I drew attention to it. That however did not control the action of the committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I remember well your saying I am not going to object.

Mr. SPROULE. I said I am not going to continue the fight.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I take it that the proper course to pursue when a promoter offers an important amendment, would be to refer the amendment to the committee on standing orders.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil). I may be allowed to say that this railway was incorporated in the province of Quebec in 1903 for the purpose of building a line from Rivière du Loup to Matapedia. It was originally thought that it could be constructed entirely in that province. But it runs through a very mountainous country, and it has since been ascertained that it may be necessary to run a small part of the line in the northern part of New Brunswick. Therefore a federal charter became essential. The second reason is that that this company is asking for power to acquire the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway, which is a federal railway, and to merge both and give a railway service from Rivière du Loup to the Baie des Chaleurs and as far as Paspebiac.

On section 6,

6. Should the company acquire the lines of the Atlantic and Lake Superior and the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, by purchase, lease, transfer, judicial sale or otherwise, it shall be held liable for claims on those roads for labour, board, material, right of way, and damages, including undercharged and prescribed claims to an amount not exceeding in the aggregate fifty thousand dollars for labour, board, materials, right of way and damages—the said amount, if insufficient to pay all such claims, to be distributed rateably in accordance with a report of a commissioner to be appointed by the Governor in Council for the purpose of determining the validity and amount of such claims.

Mr. MONK. This clause goes very far. It revives claims that have been outlawed. It decrees that this company, if it should purchase the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway or the Baie des Chaleurs Railway shall have to pay claims—even if it acquires by judicial sale, which in our province purges all other claims—all claims for labour, &c., even prescribed claims, to the extent of $50,000. Should any dispute arise, this sum will have to be deposited with a receiver who will judge the validity of those claims and pay them in their entirety or pro rata. We do not know whether the Atlantic and Lake Superior Railway or the Baie des Chaleurs Railway have been heard on this legislation, which will revive against them claims to the extent of $50,000, that may be outlawed under the civil code of the province of Quebec. If we enact this section, we may find ourselves in this position: That legitimate legal claims already due would have absorbed this $50,000; but, in view of this legislation by which we revise extinct and outlawed claims, the strictly legal claims might remain unpaid or be paid only in part. I point this out because it seems to me that this $50,000 ought to be devoted to paying legal claims only.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil). I may be allowed to explain, that this parliament has, on two different occasions within the last four years, enacted this clause. First in connection with the Baie des Chaleurs Railway Bill and afterwards in connection with the Atlantic, Quebec and Western Bill. This clause has been accepted by the Quebec Oriental, and it was concurred in before the Railway Committee by the Atlantic, Quebec and Western and also by the Atlantic and Lake Superior and Baie des Chaleurs companies, represented before the committee by Mr. T. Chase Casgrain, of Montreal. So, it is a matter of agreement. The Atlantic and Lake Superior, and the Baie des Chaleurs companies are insolvent corporations and have been for years. They have been operated by trustees for the bondholders and are now on the point of being sold. There are many unpaid accounts of workmen and others for labour, board, material, right of way and so on. It has been deemed just by the companies interested that before title is given for possession of the roads, a reasonable amount should be offered to the farmers for the right of way, the labourers who built the road and others who have unpaid accounts. It was thought that $50,000 would be a reasonable amount, and it has been agreed to by all the parties interested.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THE MANITOBA RADIAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

On motion for concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 46) to incorporate the Manitoba Radial Railway Company.—Mr. Bole.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton). Before these amendments are read a second time and concurred in, I would ask what is the effect of the elimination of section 9?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways). The effect is to obviate the necessity of getting the consent of the municipality for the running of this railway along any highway. The Railway Committee inserted that clause 9 making it necessary for the company to secure the consent of the municipality, but the Senate in their wisdom, struck it out.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). Section 9 in the Bill I have before me, refers to the use of gasoline.

Mr. EMMERSON. As it appears in the Bill as sent from this House to the Senate, it reads as follows:

Notwithstanding anything in the Railway Act, the company shall not construct or operate its line of railway along any highway, street or other public place without first obtaining the consent, expressed by by-law, of the municipality having jurisdiction over such highway, street or other public place and upon terms to be agreed upon with such municipality.

This is the railway that extends from the city of Winnipeg around Winnipeg, northward, I think, to Keewatin.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara). It is an electric railway is it not?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does not the minister (Mr. Emmerson) think that we ought to insist on that section remaining in the Bill ?

Mr. EMMERSON. My own view is that that section ought to remain. Of course, this is a railway extending from a province into a territory. But the most important feature of the railway is its radial character in and around the city of Winnipeg and to serve municipalities. The interests of these municipalities should be guarded. But if we concur in this amendment we are not conserving these interests.

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not think we ought to concur in this amendment from the Senate. This is a clause that has been carefully thought out and that has become, as it were, a standard clause in electric railway Bills. And I do not think the Senate has ever undertaken to advise the striking of it out before. There are ample reasons why a clause of that kind should be applied to electric railway companies which use the highways for lines and so avoid buying their right of way. It was decided some years ago that it was not just that these companies should be allowed to use the highway without the consent of the municipality which is responsible for damages to the highway, and which, under the British North America Act, through the provinces, is obliged to keep the highway in repair and to control it.

Mr. EMMERSON. I would suggest that the matter stand until we make further inquiry. I do not think that we should concur in the amendment.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Certainly, in the absence of explanation, this amendment should not be concurred in. This is a clause which has been adopted in respect of all railways for a number of years and no exceptional circumstances have been disclosed leading us to believe that it should not be adopted in this case.

Mr. SPEAKER. Stand.

PREVENTION AND SETTLEMENT OF STRIKES AND LOCKOUTS.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Minister of Labour) moved the third reading of Bill (No. 36) to aid in the prevention and settlement of strikes and lockouts in mines and industries connected with public utilities.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton, Ont.). Before the Bill is read the third time, I would like to say that in so far as it makes for industrial peace, and I think it is along that line, we on this side of the House have been disposed to assist the minister in putting it in as good shape as possible. It affects certain interests of employers and certain interests of employees in this country, who have already been provided with a means of settling disputes by the Railway Labour Disputes Act passed in 1903. When this Bill was introduced at the present session, and also upon its second reading, the Minister of Labour informed us that the Railway Labour Disputes Act had been eminently satisfactory ; he declared that it was owing to the provisions of that Bill that there had been no strike of railway employees in Canada from 1903 up to the present time. He attributed that result in distinct terms to the passage of that measure ; and he called our attention to its operation, in one instance at least, when he said the Act had resulted in the settlement of a strike between the telegraphers of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and their employees. Now, there has been a good deal of communication of a certain sort between the minister and the representative of some of these employees ; there have been letters, some of which have been read to this House ; there have been oral communications, and there have been conferences between the minister and the representative of some portion of the railway men of Canada. So far as these men are concerned, and indeed so far as all the labouring and employing interests of Canada are concerned, there has not been up to the present time any opportunity for their representatives to appear before a committee of the House to give any reason in support of or against the enactment of this measure. At an earlier stage in the session I urged that a course such as I have indicated should be followed, and I then pointed out what I desire to repeat now, that the very worst service you can render to the cause of harmony between employers and employed is to impose upon either one class or the other, any legislation as to which they think they have not had a fair hearing and which they regard as unjust. The course taken in other countries under similar conditions has been, so far as I have been able to ascertain, to give to both these classes an opportunity of being heard before any important departure is made. Now, this Bill, so far as railway men, and indeed all labouring and employing classes, are concerned, does make an important departure. I need not allude to those provisions of the Bill which restrict strikes and provide for an investigation, and which are along lines that have for the most part obtained support in this House. I understand the position of the railway men to be this: they say they are thoroughly organized; they declare they do not strike rashly; they declare they do not strike without investigation, without the most careful investigation; and they point out that not only is that investigation conducted through every local union, and through every other tribunal within their organization which has any jurisdiction over their actions, but that they follow up the matter in dispute from the railway official who has jurisdiction in the first instance to his superior officer, and so on through every grade of the service, until their final negotiations are usually conducted with the very head of the railway company.

Now, they point out also that the measure and the result of their care and caution and deliberation are to be found in the fact that no great strikes, no dangerous strikes have taken place within recent years, that the only strike which was likely to assume great proportions was that in respect of which the Labour Railway Disputes Act of 1903 was invoked, and taking these matters into consideration and pointing to the declaration of the minister himself that the Act of 1903 has been effective, that the Act is a good one and that it has brought about the very purpose for which it was enacted, they asked, in the first place, that this Act should not include them, and in the second place, that it should not be passed until they had an opportunity of coming before a committee of this House and putting forward their views, in order that they might be reported to the members of this House upon whom the responsibility of this legislation must eventually rest. So far as their demand for a hearing is concerned, it may be said that they have been heard through their representatives. But that hearing has been of a very casual character. It has not been such a hearing as should be given to the men upon whom legislation of this kind is to be imposed in the face of a declaration such as that to which we have listened from the hon. Minister of Labour. I do not believe in affecting any man's rights either in the courts of the country or in the highest court of all, in the parliament of the country, without giving that man the most ample right to be heard, and I do not think that these men, up to the present, have had that opportunity which they desire and which should be afforded to them to be heard before this parliament through one of its regularly organized and appointed committees. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, without taking up the time of the House further, because the subject has already been debated a good deal, I move:

That the order for the third reading of Bill (No. 36) be discharged and that the said Bill be referred to a special committee of this House for the purpose of hearing any persons affected by the provisions of the said Bill who may desire to present any reasons or considerations for or against its enactment in its present form, or who may desire to suggest any amendments, and that the committee do report to this House the result of such hearing.

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records and to examine witnesses on oath or affirmation.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Minister of Labour). Mr. Speaker, I regret that at this last stage of the consideration given to this Bill my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) should move this amendment inasmuch as the House has already pronounced upon the principle embodied in it. It is true, Mr. Speaker, that my hon. friend early in the present session, foved a resolution on similar lines to those of this amendment. It is true also that at that time the House thought, in view of the Bill which was being introduced, that a special committee should not be formed. Now, what would be, at the present stage, the necessity of renewing before a committee the debate which has already taken place before this House during several sittings? We have debated this question of compulsory investigation, because, after all, that is the only principle at stake for several days and evenings. I think that both sides of the House, generally speaking, have agreed to the soundness of the principle and to the desirability of adopting it and embalming it in the statute-book. After this long discussion, after considering the Bill clause by clause and section by section, after having seen that this Bill was generally approved by the country, my hon. friend, speaking on behalf of the railway brotherhoods, who are opposing this Bill and, as he says, speaking on behalf of the workingmen in general, wishes to delay the adoption of the Bill and have it referred to a special committee of the House. I take exception to the amendment for many reasons. It is quite obvious to the House that we have discussed the Bill thoroughly; we know its principal features and we know it bearings. Could we, by referring the Bill to a special committee, learn more than we know at the present time? I believe not. It is true that we might learn before a special committee of the House that there have been strikes and lockouts in the past, but, as I have stated before, we are not legislating for the past. We are legislating for the future. It is true that I stated when I introduced this Bill that the Railway Labour Disputes Act passed in the year 1903 had been satisfactory; that that Act had given satisfaction to the parties interested; that is to say, to the railway companies and their employees, and it is no mean compliment to pay to the father of it, the Hon. Sir William Mulock. But, notwithstanding that that Act has worked well in one instance when it was invoked by the Railway Telegraphers Union, we must also provide for any possible contingency that may arise in the future. We all admit as the hon. leader of the opposition has stated during the course of this debate, that no strike or lockout should be declared in this country before an investigation takes place. Is my hon. friend ready to say to-day that if to-morrow the railway employees, say, of the Grand Trunk or of the Canadian Pacific Railway, were to declare a strike that it would not be the duty of the government or of the state to step in and say: No, there will be no strike; the traffic of the company shall not be crippled, the passengers shall not be stopped until a thorough and complete investigation has taken place. We all agree as to that. Why then should we have a special committee and a reference of this Bill before it to know whether or not the railway employees or some of them are opposed to the principle? For my part I respect the railway employees. I have the highest regard for the organization of the railway brotherhoods. But I say that although they may be right in their assumption that this legislation may perhaps cause them a little trouble, still the public must be protected and before they declare any strike, or before the railway companies declare any lockout, the public must be protected and know the cause of that strike or quarrel or dispute existing between the contending parties. This is the only principle at stake; whether or not the parliament of Canada shall commit itself to it is the question before you, Mr. Speaker, this evening.

Are we to declare, or are we not to declare: that in future there shall be no strike and no lockout on a great public utility, unless a thorough public investigation has taken place? That is the principle incorporated in this Bill, and as to that, a special committee of the House cannot teach us anything more than we know at present. This is pioneer legislation, but novel as it is, it has been commended by the highest authorities on economics in America and in Europe. Need I mention the opinion of President Roosevelt, who in his recent message to the Congress expressed his desire that industrial interests in the United States should be furnished with a safeguard similar to that which we propose in this legislation. The commission which inquired into the Pennsylvania coal strike recommended the adoption of legislation similar to this, as did also the commission which investigated the labour, agricultural and industrial questions in the United States. I repeat my former statement, that this legislation is in accordance with public sentiment in Canada and in America as well. Not long ago Mr. Eliot, the eminent president of Harvard University, spoke before the Canadian Club in Ottawa, and he referred in high terms of this very Bill which was then being considered in this House. In view of all this, and especially in view of the fact that since this Bill has been under discussion, the principle which underlies it was invoked with great success in the case of the Toronto telephone strike, I submit that this parliament would be wise to pass the Bill and to have it come into force as soon as possible. I may say that at the present time, as Minister of Labour, several of the large concerns in western Canada have written to me asking that this Bill should be passed immediately and assented to by His Excellency, because there are fears that strikes may occur in the mining districts of the west, and it is hoped that the application of this Bill may avert them. It is, I think, generally recognized that this legislation will be beneficial to the employers and the employees, and to the general public as well.

I do not know what more we can learn from the railway brotherhoods. I have had conferences with their representatives, I have had correspondence with them. I have heard their delegates and their legislative agent in Ottawa. It is stated that they object to the legislation because they have in their own constitution all the machinery that is necessary to prevent strikes. Well, if that be a fact, then the railway employees will not be affected by this legislation. As I understand it, the railway employees argue that this Bill will be too expensive and too cumbersome, and that they are better satisfied with the Act of 1903. Well, we have provided that they shall have the option of availing either of the Act of 1903 or of this Bill of 1907. If they are satisfied with the mode of procedure under the legislation of 1903, they can adopt it, and if they are satisfied with the present legislation—as I know many of the railway employees are—then they can invoke it. But, will hon. gentlemen opposite say, that whether it be under the Act of 1903 or under the Act of 1907, the railway employees should not be subject to a public investigation before a strike, as are the employees on other public utilities? I am sure that is not what is in the mind of the leader of the opposition. It certainly is not what was in the mind of the hon. gentleman from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) when, in probably one of the most eloquent speeches he ever delivered in this House, speaking on the second reading of the Bill, he used this language:

And the internal transport interests of a great city are inextricably bound up with the steady, even, successful development and working of this franchise. Do you mean to tell me that, because the chairman of the street railway corporation and the president of the employees' union fall out as to what car shall be cleaned and by whom, or what man shall be detailed for this route and what man for the other, and cannot come to a reasonable agreement, that they should be free to leave matters in such a condition that the whole transport system of that city shall cease operation? Are we to be told that this is to be permitted—that women and children, the healthy and the invalid, the business man and workingman should all alike be deprived of what has come to be almost an absolute necessity and certainly a daily convenience? More: If these two men, the representative of the company and the representative of the employee, quarrel and continue to quarrel, and if an attempt is made to use the street cars, trouble arises and the police are called upon. And then the militia are called out and the state, in the highest exemplification of its power, must act. There is loss—that is one thing. There is inconvenience—that is another thing. There is the bad spirit that is aroused—a thing to be avoided if reasonably possible. Do you mean to say that the time does not come, and should not come, when the state represented primarily by that great municipality and secondarily by that greater authority which has the militia for its arm in the preservation of order, should have something to say in these matters. Do you mean to say that we should simply regard this as a quarrel between capitalists and labouring men, a quarrel to be settled by these people themselves? Sir, there is no need for me to make this part of my argument any stronger.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was there speaking of the possibility of a street car strike, but later on in his speech, he used the very same argument with reference to strikes on the great railway systems. Nobody in this House and nobody in the country at present, except probably my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) who has opposed the Bill from the beginning on its very principle, will oppose the principle of the Bill, and as I have stated on many occasions I do not believe that if we referred it to a special committee of this House we would learn more than we know at present. We know that the railway employees have all the protection, all the safeguards they desired to have at the beginning when they declared themselves perfectly satisfied to come under the Labour Disputes Act, 1903.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), in that eloquent speech, expressed a strong opinion that the men should have a hearing.

Mr. LEMIEUX. He may have declared that but the principle is there. Of course he was chivalrous enough to sustain my hon. friend who had moved on those lines a few days before. My hon. friend was moving to have a special committee to consider this legislation and it was through pure chivalry on the part of the hon. member for North Toronto that he supported those views on that occasion. No, my hon. friend has done his duty towards the railway men represented by Mr. Hall. I believe that Mr. Hall, if my hon. friend will read his correspondence, has expressed himself quite clearly on a previous occasion, when he said, speaking of the legislati n of 1903:

If after the committee have failed to settle the difference then the privilege of course of referring the matter to arbitration, or what is more a fact: investigation of the difference between the company and their men. They make in their report to the Minister of Labour, who will according to the provisions of the Act make a report of the findings of that committee through the public press of the country. This being for the purpose of influence by public opinion. Something I believe, that will have that force behind it, that no matter which side of the controversy refuses to be fair, will compel them to accept reasonable conditions and to make a fair settlement.

And further:

And as I believe the Bill is intended to operate and Sir, my only wish is that it will be the dove of peace to bring about happy conditions, where sometimes we have war and enmity to each other.

Well, this legislation will have the same effect as that of 1903 since railway employees will be perfectly free to invoke that Act of 1903. Under all those circumstances I shall vote against the amendment of my hon. friend.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle). There are of course in the brief remarks made by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) some points on which I would be ready to agree with him. If I understood this legislation to be of a permanent character, and that it would not be easy to amend it, if it was legislation that would be the permanent basis for the settlement of labour disputes, I would be willing to agree with my hon. friend and to support him in his motion. But I take this whole legislation as an experiment. It is my deep conviction that it will have to be amended very soon. When it was first introduced by the minister, I took it as a step in the right direction; and to my mind, if we intend making it operative—and we will have to make it operative—it will certainly require some modification before long.

As far as the railway organizations are concerned I may say that I am not ready to agree that the railway organizations should adopt such a dictatorial tone as they have taken in this instance. I have, for instance, received a letter which I think it is to the advantage of the public to make known. It is as follows :

The Order of Railroad Telegraphers, System Division No. 7. J. Wagner, general secretary-treasurer, Copper Cliff, Ontario.

Aylmer, Quebec, February 2, 1907.

Dear Sir,—At a joint meeting of the following organizations : Order of Railway Conductors, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and Order of Railway Trainmen, the following resolution was unanimously carried :

That in the opinion of this assembly the present Bill before the House known as the Minister of Labour's Bill (No. 36) is against the interests of the railway organizations, therefore we earnestly solicit your co-operation and support in aiding our legislative representative in his efforts to have the reference to steam railways eliminated from said Bill.

You, a member, supported, no doubt, by many a member of the various trade unions of Canada, are requested to use your influence in accomplishing the defeat of Hon. Mr. Lemieux's Bill, known as Minister of Labour's Bill (No. 36).

Anything you do to assist organized labour will be deeply appreciated. Your efforts on behalf of the labouring men of Canada are being closely watched, and no doubt at coming re-elections members of the various organizations will vote accordingly. Thanking you in advance for any assistance you give us,

I remain,

Yours respectfully,

J. B. GARTON.

Local secretary, Order Railroad Telegraphers.

Mr. Speaker, I must protest against this kind of intimidation being tried against members of parliament in the accomplishment of their duty. I am ready to render justice to the railroad organizations as to any organization in Canada, but at the same time I do not want that organizations of this kind should be allowed to write letters to members of parliament in which it is stated that if they vote this way or that they will hear of it at the next election. I think this kind of intimidation should be exposed immediately so that it may be treated according to what it is worth. On that ground, I would be disposed to regret the amendment of the minister with regard to railway organizations. However, as there was a special Act passed to cover railway disputes and as this amendment simply makes it easier to settle railway disputes, I will not make any strong objection on that ground, and I hope that this amendment has not been made because of any intimidation being exercised by those organizations.

There are some other amendments which have been made in committee which I regret. For example the disappearance of sections 62 and 63 of the Bill has to my mind been brought about in order to please what I might call unreasonable men on both sides ; and I am afraid that the disappearance of those two clauses will contribute to a certain extent to deprive this Bill of some of its usefulness. There is no doubt that most of the disputes between employers and employees either have risen from the struggle between organized labour and unorganized labour, or at least are certainly embittered because on the one hand of the unreasonable opposition on the part of the employer against labour organizations and on the other hand of the tyrannical spirit which exists in some of the unions. For my part—I have never concealed it—I am strongly in favour of the principle of labour organizations ; but as long as labour organizations have not a legal standing under our statutes, I am not disposed to do anything which might favour the tyranny that can be exercised by labour unions which are not acknowledged by our statutes, which organize themselves, have their own constitutions, frame their own regulations without having the responsibilities which any corporate bodies have under the law of Canada, and which might use their influence in an improper way. So long as the labour unions carry on their propaganda by trying to induce unorganized labour men to come in I entirely agree with them. But when they carry it to the point of trying to intimidate on the one hand the employer and on the other hand the free employee, they should not be protected but should be made to understand that their basis of organization must be the same as that of any other organization in this country. Likewise, I do not think it is legitimate to allow an employer to discriminate between union and non-union men. I am quite of the opinion that employers would find it better on the whole to favour the organization of labour on a proper basis than to combat the principle of unionism.

As regards the composition of the board, my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Lemieux) was kind enough, at my request, to let those sections stand. Unfortunately I was called away a few days, and I notice from the reports of debates that my hon. friend informed the House that, after considering the matter with the deputy minister of labour, I had come to the conclusion not to advocate this year the principle of a permanent board. This is accurate to a large extent ; however there is a shade of inaccuracy in the statement, and I will take this opportunity of stating it. To my mind one of the greatest weaknesses of this Bill is the composition of the board of arbitration. It is provided that the board shall be composed of one member designated by the party complaining—whether employer or employee—another by the party resisting, and a third by the minister. But how would this work in the case of a difficulty arising because of the different treatment that an employer gives the union and non-union men? Or suppose an employer would cause a lock-out because of difficulty existing between the union and the non-union men. The employer would name his representative on the board; but where would the labour men stand? Would their representative be designated by the union or by the non-union men? The employees themselves are at loggerheads with each other but they are only entitled to one representative. If their arbitrator is designated by the minister at the suggestion of the non-union men, then the minister is appointing a man antagonistic to the other section of the employees. And if he appoints an arbitrator at the suggestion of the union men, then he is antagonizing the non-union section. If the object of this legislation is to have an impartial board which can confidently appeal to public opinion in order to enforce its decision upon both labour and capital, such board should be composed of impartial men and not of arbitrators designated by the parties themselves to the dispute with one referee between the two. Let it be composed of men appointed with all the guarantees of independence and permanence which our judicial courts enjoy at present. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Lemieux) anticipated my objection by stating in committee that this would be very difficult on account of the great extent of our country. But of course if we are to take measures to prevent disputes between labour and capital, we ought not to be restricted by any such consideration as the number of tribunals required. There ought to be a tribunal to adjust these disputes in every province—a court composed of impartial men appointed with all the guarantees of permanence and independence given to the judges in our judicial courts; and in this respect these boards of arbitration or labour tribunals would acquire the same standing in public opinion as is enjoyed by our judicial tribunals.

However, taking this measure as merely experimental and tentative, I am ready to let the Bill go through this year without insisting on the permanency and independence of the boards of arbitration; but I predict that these boards, as devised under this Bill, will not give satisfaction. We shall never have satisfactory legislation in this matter until we reach that point of judicial organization with regard to labour disputes which we have reached with regard to civil disputes between citizens. The idea that the decisions of a permanent tribunal would not command public confidence because the party condemned would lose faith in that tribunal is preposterous. That same argument would apply to any ordinary tribunal which adjudicates between two ordinary citizens. Every time two citizens go before a court of justice, one is bound to gain and the other to lose; but no one would dream of arguing that our courts of justice should not be permanent and our judges be appointed for life because when one of the suitors was condemned he would lose respect for the court that condemned him; and that consequently the same court should not be called upon to adjudicate between the same parties on any other occasion. Such an argument would destroy our whole judicial organization. In this matter as in some others, no doubt I am a little in advance of my time in this country. I lay down the principle that disputes between capital and labour should be considered in the light of the same principles of justice and authority as the disputes between any ordinary classes of citizens in this country. I am not ready to agree that because capital and labour are not prepared to accept the adjudication of such a tribunal, the principle is bad. Capital and labour disputes should be submitted to the principles of justice just as any other classes of our citizens.

I come now again to the argument I made a moment ago. Suppose the union men strike because the employer discriminates between them and the non-union men. One arbitrator is appointed at the suggestion of the union men, another at the suggestion of the employer, and a third is appointed by those two. Can such a board give satisfaction to the non-union men who are perhaps interested to a greater extent than the other two parties to the dispute and yet have no representative on that board? Or suppose the non-union men go on strike because they claim the employer is intimidated by the union men and does not treat them justly. The non-union men appoint their arbitrator, the employer appoints his; but where are the union men? Where is the union, in that case? The union might be in a position to prove that, in the case in point, it had acted for the benefit of the whole body of workingmen; and yet, on account of the shortcomings of the law, the union would not be represented at the board. And do you think the board will give to the union the satisfaction which is said to be absolutely necessary for the proper carrying out of this Bill? Will public opinion be satisfied and will that feeling of confidence be inspired in the parties which you consider necessary for the proper settlement of these disputes? I repeat that the principle of the Bill is a good one; I voted for the second reading, and I shall vote for the third reading to-night. At the same time, I claim that the amendments which I have referred to have not tended to improve the operation of the measure. I am ready to submit to the judgment of the House—I have to—still, I think that we proceed in the wrong way when we, as it were, plead mercy for the principle of this legislation, saying that we do not want to use any kind of compulsion, that we do not want to do anything to displease capital on the one hand or labour on the other. I say that we should be courageous enough to give both capital and labour to understand that they have the same rights as other people in this country and no more, and that this parliament is prepared to force both capital and labour to observe the principles of justice and equity as other citizens are compelled to do, and that we are not prepared to sacrifice these sacred principles of justice because of the interest of either capital and labour at election time. However, I agree with the minister that we must move a step at a time, and this consideration is all that prevents me from moving an amendment to the third reading.

Now, there is one other point upon which I wish to say a word, and that is the striking out of the clause which gave power to the Governer in Council to declare that other industries than those directly referred to in this Bill might be brought under the operation of the measure. That section, number 67, read :

> The Governor in Council may, from time to time, by notice in the 'Gazette,' declare any specified industry to be an agency of transportation or communication or a public service utility, and such industry shall thereafter be deemed to be included in the provisions of this Act.

Now, there is one principle contained in this clause, which, certainly, I do not favour. So far as this point is concerned, I am glad to have this section disappear. The principle I refer to is that of giving the Governor in Council power to practically amend the legislation of this parliament. In this matter I agree with the leader of the opposition. I think this is an abuse which grows greater every day. It has been denounced in England by an author, who, certainly, cannot be considered as too democratic or liberal. I remember reading some very sensible remarks by Mr. Lecky with regard to the heightening abuse of cabinet legislation overruling parliamentary legislation. Looking over the history of the parliamentary system as developed in Great Britain, Mr. Lecky points out how at one time the King controlled, that afterwards the House of Lords was the great power in the state, that then came a balance between the House of Commons and the House of Lords. And he goes on to say that the great danger of the British parliamentary system is that, day by day, the control over legislation is shifting from parliament to the Cabinet; so that, in our day, the Cabinet has grown at the expense of both King and Commons. I am afraid that in this democratic country we are going in the same direction at an even quicker pace than Great Britain is.

But, while I am glad to see this section disappear on that account, yet, I am sorry to see it disappear as removing from control by this legislation of those classes of industries which are referred to. I am sorry that the Bill has not been amended in another way so as to include these industries. For my part, I would favour a change in the Bill which would make it operative in the case of any industry employing a sufficient number of men to make it of vital importance to the locality in which it is situated. This Bill is supposed to apply to industries in which the public at large are interested. It is made applicable to industries or utilities employing as few as ten men. But, surely, it will not be claimed that a tramway company, or a waterworks company, or an electric light company, employing only ten men, is one in which the people of Canada at large are concerned. I suppose the object is to protect the public of a small place against strikes which would involve the public there in inconvenience with respect to electric light, gas or tramways. But I claim that there are many industries that are of much greater importance to the public of the locality in which they are situated than are any of these public services. Take some concrete cases that have recently forced themselves upon public attention. The strike in the coal mines at Lethbridge, and the strike on the tramway at Hamilton have been quoted as cases which make it imperative for parliament to adopt legislation of this kind. But take another case, one quoted by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Lemieux)—the strike at Buckingham in the county I have the honour to represent. The industry affected by that strike was of far greater interest and necessity to the whole population of that town than could be all the coal mines of Canada. The strike was of greater inconvenience to the public of that town than the strike on the Hamilton tramway was to the Hamilton public, for no tramway strike in any city affects the very means of living of the majority of the people. Buckingham is a place of about 3,000 inhabitants. The only large industry, the one in which the strike occurred, employs between five and six hundred men, a large proportion of whom are heads of families. It is the one great industry of the place—not the only industry, but the others are comparatively small. Here is an industry giving wages and the means of life to one-third, if not one-half the population. A large part of the rest of the population is made up of the merchants and dealers of various kinds who depend for their living upon the earning capacity of the employees of this great industry. The moment there is a strike like the one which took place in Buckingham last year, not only have you one-third of the population deprived of its means of livelihood, but you have all those who are dependent upon these people reduced to the same position. I claim that this is one case of many which might arise, and that there is as great a necessity for legal interference in such a case as there was in the case of the coal mines.

The principle of the legislation is good, but it does not go far enough. I think it should be enlarged; but instead of being enlarged, it has been narrowed; and I am afraid it has been narrowed, not so much in the interest of the public, as on account of some process of intimidation brought to bear upon the government and its majority in this House. However, I cannot vote for the motion of the leader of the opposition, because I agree with the Minister of Labour that I do not see how a special committee of this House could give us any further information regarding the principle of the Bill. Legislation of this kind will be proved effective by experiment rather than by witnesses or opinions. If a committee were appointed, you would have men coming from all parts of the country, some to give evidence for and others against. With the means of communication we have to-day, I think the well organized labour unions have had ample opportunity to state their reasons for or against this measure. I think that public opinion on the whole is favourable to this Bill, and my remarks to-day are made, not so much for the purpose of criticising the Bill, as to impress upon the Minister of Labour that, instead of trying to get absolution for this Bill, he should look upon it merely as a step in the right direction, he should prepare himself to carry it further just as soon as public opinion will warrant him in doing so, and he should educate public opinion in that direction.

Mr. C. DEVLIN (Nicolet). I wish to say only one or two words on this motion for the third reading. The leader of the opposition seeks further information. I think he made a motion in this House a short time ago to a similar effect, but the House, in view of the Bill which was about to be submitted, decided that it was in possession of all the necessary information to justify it in proceeding with the consideration of the Bill. I am forced to the conclusion that we have before us a good Bill, and one that is calculated to meet one of the greatest evils that confronts this country. There is no doubt that a dispute between capital and labour is at all times a calamity. That has been the experience, not only in this country, but in every country where strikes have occurred. Knowing the intentions of my hon. friend the Minister of Labour and of the government with respect to this Bill, I am sure that they wish to show the labouring classes that they are not hostile to their interests, neither are they hostile to the best interests of the employing classes. We know that since this government has come into power they have created a Department of Labour, something which was unknown during the long term of years when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power, and that the creation of the Department of Labour has been welcomed by the labouring classes throughout this country. We know that the 'Labour Gazette' established by this government has been the means of spreading information regarding labour matters of great use to both interests. I believe that the object of this Bill is to render strikes unnecessary. We know that circumstances have in the past been such as to render strikes almost inevitable, but with good will on the part of the employer and with good will on the part of the employee, if this Bill is fairly applied, there will be less likelihood of strikes in the future than there has been in the past. I was interested in the remarks made by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). He is anxious for the creation of a permanent tribunal. No doubt a permanent tribunal would be a very good thing in its place, but what can be the objection of my hon. friend to the two judges who would be appointed under this Bill? True, they might not be qualified, they might make a mistake; but, on the other hand, they might succeed, and if they proved themselves efficient, I am certain the Minister of Labour and contending parties would continue those judges in the exercise of the functions allotted to them.

Mr. BOURASSA. In this Bill it is left to the parties interested to designate the judge.

Mr. C. DEVLIN. But with the approval of the government I understand the hon. gentleman would have a permanent tribunal. Perhaps this permanent tribunal might be objectionable to the parties themselves, and then there is no remedy.

Mr. BOURASSA. You might say that of any court.

Mr. C. DEVLIN. But in these cases there is much more sensitiveness than with respect to ordinary courts. I think this arrangement will not be strongly objected to by the labouring classes. At all events, I rose to support this Bill because I think it is a good one. I know perfectly well, and the hon. member for Labelle knows perfectly well, what the consequences of a strike are. There has been a strike in his constituency.

Mr. BOURASSA. As the Bill stands now, it will not apply to any exceptional case.

Mr. C. DEVLIN. The hon. gentleman can make such a statement, but let the Bill be put into operation, and then it will be time enough to see whether it will cure strikes or not. The Bill enables contending parties to meet and confer before they strike, and perhaps the causes which lead them to strike would be obviated by a conference, and then there would not be any strike. The hon. gentleman was eloquent in his remarks with respect to the strike which occurred in his constituency. I know what that strike was, because I represented the county of Labelle in this House during a number of years. I know perfectly well the town in which this strike occurred, and it was the saddest thing we have had in this country. I know of nothing so terrible as the strike which took place in the town of Buckingham. The poor men were out of their wages for ever so long, their homes were desolate, business was suspended, they were deprived of comfort, they were loaded with an accumulation of debt which will not be paid for years to come, and finally death, in its most terrible form, was another attending circumstance. I believe this Bill is an honest attempt to try to prevent such occurrences taking place, and that is one great reason why I congratulate the Minister of Labour upon bringing this Bill before the House. He has certainly brought one of the great measures of this session before parliament. He has debated it with skill, with patience and with every effort to meet the wishes of those favourable and opposed to the Bill. My object in rising was simply to state my view that this is a Bill which will not only receive the support of this House, but a Bill that will commend itself to the good judgment and approbation of the people of Canada generally.

Hon. JOHN HAGGART (South Lanark). Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the remarks of my hon. friend from Labelle Mr. Bourassa), especially in his description of the reception of a communication in which some member of a union came between the wind and his nobility and also his remarks with regard to his representation of the county. I suppose the hon. gentleman has been reading Burke's address to the electors of Bristol and endeavouring to emulate that celebrated author when he took the position that his duties were judicial altogether and that he should ignore the representations of his constituency. My idea is an entirely different one. I believe that the duties of the representative of a constituency are not judicial so much as they are representative, and that any elector in his constituency has the right to tell him how to vote and what the penalties are if he does not vote in that way. I do not see anything wrong in the representations of the gentleman who sent that letter saying that he was watching his course very closely and that if he did not vote in a certain direction he would be obliged to vote against him in the next election.

Mr. BOURASSA. If the hon. gentleman allows me; that gentleman is not at all a constituent of mine.

Mr. HAGGART. He lives some where in the country at large. The hon. gentleman is the representative of a constituency, and as such, no matter where the party lives, he represents that individual. That is the doctrine, and he must not mind if he receives representations of that kind; in fact, they are solicited by most of the representatives in this House in order to get the opinion of the electors. I was, however, with the hon. gentleman when he spoke about legislating in reference to unions and mentioning them in the legislation that we are introducing into this House. I think with the hon. gentleman it is bad form and that we should not be giving a position to unions by mentioning those that we know nothing about. As to the position of the hon. member for Nicolet (Mr. Charles Devlin) he blames my hon. friend from Labelle for not supporting the Bill thoroughly because, if the Bill were in force, it might have application to a strike like the one in Buckingham. The hon. gentleman has been listening to the debates in this House. I do not believe he ever read the Bill because if he had he would know at once that it would not have the least effect on a strike if it occurred in Buckingham to-morrow. The Bill is for the purpose of dealing with strikes or attempted strikes on public utilities. As my hon. friend from Labelle says it was originally intended, by order in council, to take in such strikes as that which occurred at Buckingham, but that was early eliminated from the Bill, and now it deals entirely with public utilities. The object of the Bill is to prevent strikes and lockouts on public utilities pending an investigation or inquiry into them. The minister has removed from the Bill its application to nine-tenths of the parties who were originally subject to it. Nine-tenths of the parties who were intended to be covered by the Bill, that is the railway employees, have been given an option. They are not under the Bill and they are under it. Why does the minister retain the application of the Bill to railway men when he does not intend to apply it to them? You have your option, he says. You have the Bill of 1903 and you can strike as often as you like and there will be no preliminary investigation under it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Whether the railway men choose to come under the Act of 1903 or whether they choose to come under the operation of the present Bill a public investigation will take place before the strike. They can adopt whichever procedure they choose.

Mr. HAGGART. Under the Act of 1903 there is no provision for a public investigation preceeding the strike.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. That is my information. I may be wrong.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Section 13 of the Railway Labour Disputes Act in the revised statutes provides that:

Whenever a difference exists between any railway employers and railway employees, and it appears to the minister that the parties thereto are unable satisfactorily to adjust the same, and that by reason of such difference remaining unadjusted the railway lockout or strike has been or is likely to be caused or the regular and safe transportation of mails, passengers or freight has been or may be interrupted, or the safety of any person employed on a railway train or car has been or is likely to be endangered, the minister may, either on the application of any party to the difference, or on the application of the corporation of any municipality directly affected by the difference or of his own motion, cause inquiry to be made into the same and the cause thereof.

Mr. HAGGART. There is no doubt about that. I have never denied that the minister had the right to make inquiry as to why the strike should take place, but is there any penalty for the parties striking?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, according to this Act. If they shall proceed under this Act there are penalties provided.

Mr. HAGGART. I understand that. The railways say they are perfectly satisfied with the Act of 1903. If it were not for your Act of this year there would be no penalties attached to striking at all. There is no means of enforcing the Act. They have the right to strike pending your investigation, or preliminary to it, but now, under the Act which you introduced, pending an investigation they are liable to penalties. The difference is an immense one. An employee, or a set of employees, or a union, can strike under the Act of 1903 which the minister gives them the option to come under altogether instead of coming under the Act of 1907. I want to know how the Act of 1907 will apply if the parties ask for the option of coming under the Act of 1903?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Let my hon. friend read section 56 of the present Bill and he will find that out.

Mr. HAGGART. I understand the position they would be in under the present Bill. Pending an investigation and a settlement by the parties to whom the dispute is left, if a man strikes then he is liable to penalties. How does the Bill apply to a railway hand or to a set of railway men who choose to come under the Act of 1903? What application has this Bill at all, if the minister's statement is correct, or do I understand him rightly that they have an option, that they may take one Act or the other and that if they choose the Act of 1903, the Act of the present year does not apply at all?

Mr. LEMIEUX. The object of this measure is to provide for compulsory investigation before a strike, and it provides, as does the Act of 1903, machinery by which that investigation can be held. The parties can select either the Act of 1903 or this Act of 1907, to have the board appointed and the trouble investigated.

Mr. HAGGART. The minister led us to believe that the option was with the railway men to come under this Act or under the Act of 1903, but the penal clauses are all incorporated in the Act of 1903. I fell into error because I had listened to the hon. gentleman. The fact is that this Act depends upon public opinion for its enforcement, and that is a principle which was long since adopted by the state of Massachusetts. The Railway Commission of that state had no power to enforce any order, but they published their decision in the newspapers and as a result the railway corporations conformed to the decision of the commission. That is the principle the Minister of Labour incorporates in this legislation, and I must say I approve of it. I may be a little old fashioned but I agree with the hon. gentleman from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) that you do not go far enough in this direction.

Mr. E. PAQUET (l'Islet). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, if the House will allow, I would like to say just one word. I have looked with the greatest care into this capital and labour problem which we are endeavouring to solve; and I regret very much not to be in a position to support the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition. Of course he has been inspired all along by the most sincere love for his country; however, as I am in favour of the principle embodied in this Act, that of compulsory investigation, I consider it my duty to give my support to the Bill introduced by the hon. Minister of Labour.

Mr. A. VERVILLE (Maisonneuve). I rise to express my support of the third reading of the Bill, and to dissent from the amendment presented by the leader of the opposition. I have already stated in this House that I do not agree with this amendment, and I cannot for the life of me see that it is any better to-day then when it was proposed in the committee stage. I repeat that it is futile to bring the workingmen and the employers from all over the country to confer at Ottawa, because when we are all through with such an inquiry we have to fall back on the situation that we are not able to declare what is the real cause of the strike, which, in a word, may be summed up to be a misunderstanding between capital and labour. There is no reason why there should be a committee appointed to hear both parties to the question unless it was intended to shelve this legislation for the present session. I do not want this Bill shelved. I would rather have imperfect legislation than no legislation at all. For my part, I would rather like to see this legislation go further than is proposed, but even as it is, I believe it will do some good, and to that extent I am satisfied with it. Something has been said to-night about the few men that may be involved in a strike on a public utility, but I can point to an important public utility, namely, the Shawinigan Falls Power Company, which produces hundreds of thousands of horse-power and in which only half a dozen men are engaged. Now, in reply to some remarks that have been made here, I may say that I am probably the only member of this House who is also a member of a trade union, and I may say further that I am not afraid of the non-union men because they are not dangerous. To gain anything, the workingmen must organize just as capital organizes. A man, to better his position, and to know enough to effectively ask this government to pass legislation, must first be a union man. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) spoke about legalizing the labour unions, but that is something for the future. If the responsibility of organized labour was defined properly, I for one would not have the slightest objection to incorporate or register under such a law. But until that is done, we cannot go under a Trades Union Act. This question comes down in the end to whether we want in Canada to bring capital and labour closer together. If we do not desire that let us vote down this Bill and let hon. gentlemen take the responsibility before their constituents. If we desire it we must vote for the Bill. For my part I see no middle course. If the Bill is not satisfactory in its operation we can amend it at a succeeding session of parliament, but in the meantime I give it my cordial support.

Mr. RALPH SMITH (Nanaimo). During the discussion on the second reading of this Bill I gave my opinion, but when the Bill had been considered clause by clause in Committee of the Whole with very reasonable objections and very reasonable amendments, I did not anticipate that there would be any objection to the principle of the Bill at this stage. It seems to me that in order to understand the situation of this Bill it is necessary to remind the House of the fact that gave rise to this legislation. Some months ago, owing to the shortage of the coal supply in the Northwest, a resolution was brought before this House and in the discussion of that resolution serious charges were made against the government for not having enacted legislation that would regulate those supplies in the interests of the public. As a matter of fact, so very close did the hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) come to proposing the fundamental principle of this measure, namely compulsory investigation, that the Conservative press represented my hon. friend the Minister of Labour had brought in his Bill, as the direct cause of that legislation. The 'Mail and Empire' of Toronto on February 18, 1907 says:

> The Bill of Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, based on the suggestion of Mr. R. L. Borden, calling for the compulsory arbitration of labour disputes on public utilities was approved by the labour council last night.

They discussed this measure, considered it satisfactory and forwarded resolutions to the Minister of Labour endorsing it. There was no doubt in my mind at that particular time that that was what the hon. the leader of the opposition stood for. There could be no mistake in the attitude of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) if anyone will read his words. He says:

> My hon. friend for Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith) says that you cannot intervene by force of law—that this country is not ready for it. I do not know. I do not pretend that it is or that it is not, but I am perfectly clear upon this—that now, and not a minute later, is the time for us to set ourselves to work.

To initiate legislation for the accomplishment of this purpose.

Now these are questions originating, coming out of the speeches made by the leaders of the Conservative party in this House on a question that was being discussed at that time and in my opinion these speeches, partially at any rate, induced the minister to bring this legislation forward.

In connection with the railway men let me say that they had two complaints against this legislation as I understand. They complained that the machinery for negotiation in its operation made it more expensive to their unions than their own voluntary machinery or the machinery of the Act of 1903. It has been stated in discussing this matter and it has been assumed and is assumed by the leader of the opposition that no consideration has been paid to the opinions of the railway men, that they have had no opportunity to consider this question. As a matter of fact the heads of the several railway unions of Canada met in a body in one of the committee rooms of this House. I was present and listened to the argument. The officials of these unions presented their claims and their objections to this legislation of the Minister of Labour. Weeks and weeks of negotiation with regard to this matter have taken place so that it is not right to say that opportunity has not been given to that body to make their protest against this legislation or to make propositions amending it.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. At what date was it that the members met in this House to discuss the question ?

Mr. RALPH SMITH. I could not give my hon. friend the date without looking at papers which I have in my possesion, but it is about five or six weeks ago.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Since the Bill was printed ?

Mr. RALPH SMITH. Since the Bill was printed. My friend Mr. Harvey Hall, the legislative representative of the railway men of this country and all the principal leaders of the railway employes not only of Canada but of the United States met in the old Railway Committee room of this House and discussed this matter with the minister, placing their grievances before him. I think it right and proper to present this fact because the basis of this resolution, the assumptions that have been made and the assumption of the resolution itself, is that opportunity has not been given the men to present their views. I would be the last man in this House to shut off any possible opportunity for men to present their views on matters to which they object. I think the position of the leader of the opposition, so far as that is concerned, is absolutely correct but the assumption is incorrect, that is the assumption that these men have had no opportunity, as they have had weeks and months of opportunity and more than once their representatives met the minister since the Bill was brought before the House and certainly since the legislation was printed.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Do I understand that at that meeting they approved of the legislation now before the House ?

Mr. RALPH SMITH. That is another question, I did not say that, I did not insinuate that. I am discussing the resolution before the House which proposes to put off this legislation and have a select committee look into the facts. I am saying against that representations have been made for months, have been made officially and made unitedly by the officials of the railway men of this continent to the Minister of Labour. His deputy was present, I was present myself because I was anxious to help the question along, and ever since then repeated opportunities have been given to the men to meet the minister and the officers of the department and discuss this question.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I may say that the railway men came in a deputation to meet me in the old Railway Committee room, I suppose it must have been on the 9th of February, because I see here in the notes of the proceedings that took place at the Prime Minister's private office that the deputation met the Prime Minister on the 11th of February and that was two days subsequent to the interview I had with the same deputation.

Mr. RALPH SMITH.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. A deputation of the railway men met in the office of the right hon. the First Minister and presented their objections to this legislation. One of their objections was that the machinery for arbitration under this Bill would be costly for their union. But they approved of the machinery provided in the Act of 1903. I have here the letter from Mr. Hall, the leader of the union, approving the law of 1903, which the minister read to-night. Well, said the minister, if you prefer the machinery provided in the Act of 1903, we shall give you that machinery instead of the machinery provided in the Act of 1907. The next objection of the railway men was to the principle of compulsory investigation. That, Sir, is the principle of this Bill, and I submit that if the railway men are entitled to be exempted from the operation of that principle, we should not apply it to any other public utility. If it would be wise not to enforce compulsory investigation upon the railway men, it would be most unreasonable to enforce it upon coal miners and operators. There is no industry in the country which is half so much a public utility as a railway. There is no business that affects directly public interest, life and limb and business and commercial interests of every description, to anything like the same extent as does the operating of a railway; and if the argument of the hon. gentleman in favour of exempting railway employers and employees from the operation of this legislation is reasonable, there can be no reason why this legislation should be made compulsory on any other industry. I understood that the House had, if not unanimously, pretty generally decided that there should be some principle of compulsory investigation enacted with regard to public utilities. I thought we had decided that it ought not to be possible for any body of men to go on strike and deprive the people of such a prime necessity as fuel, without giving the government authority to interfere. I thought that had been agreed to. And since the minister has agreed to give the railway men the machinery provided in the Act of 1903, their objection to this legislation is reduced to an objection to the principle of compulsory investigation being applied to them. Well, I say now in the presence of railway representatives, and will be glad to have the opportunity of saying it at any time before the men employed on railways, that if the argument presented by the railway representatives against this legislation on the question of compulsory arbitration is to hold good, then we must do away with the principle of compulsory investigation altogether. But if the principle of compulsory investigation be a good one, they are the last men in the country who ought to have any complaint against this legislation. The claim is made, and truly made, on their behalf that they rarely strike. They have brought the system of collective bargaining to a higher and more efficient condition than any other body of men doing business in the country, and that is very much to their credit. The railway men and the railway companies settle their mutual differences by coming together and thrashing out their points of dispute, and the result is that the men rarely have recourse to a strike. But this measure does not interfere with them in that respect. This Bill does not prevent their settling their mutual differences by negotiation. And if they can settle their disputes without a strike, then this Bill will not apply to them at all and they need have no fear of its application. According to the statements of the railway men—and they are the only men who are opposed to the Bill—this legislation will not affect them in one case out of a thousand. But suppose there should be one case out of a thousand in which compulsory investigation was desirable to prevent the business of the general public from being tied up, why should not the railway men be subjected to that remedy? Would it be wise, even if a railway strike should not take place in more than one case out of a thousand, in which disputes arise between the men and the company—would it be wise not to have compulsory investigation in that one case and have the grievances considered and the facts made known to the public? If necessary I could discuss this matter further, but we have discussed it repeatedly, and I think we are all pretty well agreed that the principle of investigation is a sound one. There is no legislation in the civilized world exactly like this. In the colony of New Zealand they go a good deal further. They go to the extent my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) would go. His complaint is that this Bill does not compel all classes of organizations of capital and labour to come under its influence. Logically he is correct, because after all there is a fraction of the public affected by every kind of industrial struggle. The industry may be a private one and any stoppage of it may not materially affect the public as would the non-operation of a railway, but after all every industrial strike in this country affects some portion of the public. The government, however, has thought it more prudent to confine this legislation for the present to the operation of public franchises. This legislation is after all merely tentative. Suppose that one year's experience proves its success. And suppose in the meantime we should have very serious industrial struggles and strife in private operations, then the successful operation of this measure with regard to public utilities would be the strongest reason for extending its application to private enterprises. Personally I would have no objection to this. In my experience I never knew an intelligent body of men who were not anxious to have public investigation and let the public know exactly what their grievances were. And I have come to the conclusion, since the beginning of this dispute with the railway men, that, with all due respect to their officers, I do not think they have a right conception of this legislation. I am not in the habit of speaking like that; and if I do so at present it is because of private correspondence which I have in my possession. I make that statement because men have personally interviewed me, men who work on railways in this country, and who, when the facts of the legislation were put to them, were absolutely satisfied that they had been mistaken in this matter. I do not say that any man personally and directly sought to deceive the railway men—that would be a pretty serious thing to say. But what I do say is that the great mass of the railway men of this country have never had a complete and truthful understanding of this legislation, and I am convinced that when the nature of the legislation is known the great majority of the railway men will support it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would it not have been wise, then, to bring them before a committee of the House and explain it?

Mr. RALPH SMITH. My hon. friend's (Mr. R. L. Borden) question is a very fair one. But the railway men are represented not in parliament, but about parliament by their official representative. And I want to say that the whole constitution under which the railway men carry on their business is based on the fundamental principle upon which this Bill is based—the principle of employees meeting employers, of using conciliation to overcome difficulties, of giving notice in case of industrial strikes and troubles—all these things are embodied in the purely voluntary machinery of the railway men's union. I submit—and I do not want to say a single word that would suggest that I had reflected upon any officials of the railway men—that, after repeated conversations with some of the men themselves, I am satisfied that they have not understood this legislation. And I am convinced according to their own constitution and my experience of the Bill that we shall find ninety per cent of the railway men in this country and on this continent supporting this measure. I think the government do right in maintaining their position in this matter. I support it absolutely. I hope the government will stand by the legislation. I am convinced that within three months they will have any amount of evidence that mistakes have been made and erroneous notions held with regard to the provisions of the Bill. There is a possibility at present of tremendous labour struggles in this country. I am not speaking officially or because of any direct information that I have, but I have good reason for knowing that there are great probabilities of very serious industrial strikes within a few weeks. I would recommend the government to get the legislation through as soon as possible, and apply it, and we shall get practical evidence of its benefit. There is a possibility of a struggle in the coal fields of the west on a much more extensive scale than when the question was originally considered in this House. Personally, I am convinced that both the companies that own the mines and the great mass of the men who work in them will appreciate this legislation and will gladly bring it into force. I believe in the intelligence of the people of this country. I believe that the time has come when capital and labour are not prepared to enter into a struggle to the public disadvantage unless they believe that the conditions of a struggle are fair, and, to that end, they will be ready to support the fundamental principle of this legislation. I hope that the government will not only put the measure through this House as quickly as possible, but will use their influence in the Senate to make it law. And if they apply it, I fancy we shall have an opportunity of showing the practical good of it in a very short time.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL (South Toronto). The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith) did not answer the question of the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), though that question was a simple one that seemed to call for a very simple and direct answer. The hon. gentleman says that this Bill is very much in favour of the railway men. I would ask him if he has any communication from the railway men's organizations affected by the Bill in the line of what he has stated? It seems to me that all the hon. gentleman has said makes for the amendment moved by the leader of the opposition in favour of allowing further time for investigation of this measure. The effect of what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ralph Smith) says is that railway men do not know what they want. The railway men, apparently, are not asking that this Bill be made law so far as they are concerned. And yet he tells us that this Bill is greatly in favour of their interests. Apparently the hon. gentleman is convinced that they do not know their own interest.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. A. C. Macdonell) if, in any resolution he has received from the railway unions, they give good reasons against the legislation?

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. They gave excellent reasons.

Mr. RALPH SMITH. In the resolutions from them that I have received there is absolutely no reason given against this measure.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. Has the hon. gentleman (Mr. Ralph Smith) any resolutions in favour of this legislation?

Mr. RALPH SMITH. I have the expressions of individual men in my own district working on railways who endorse it.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. The railway men had the opportunity of one or two hearings before the Minister of Labour (Mr. Lemieux) and, I think, the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). But it must be remembered that, though the Minister of Labour is a most industrious minister, he is not either this House or a committee of this House, and so is not able to bring to bear upon this legislation the wisdom that could be brought to bear upon it by a special committee of this House charged with the consideration of its provisions before whom the various interests affected could have been represented. The hon. member for Nanaimo gives another reason why there should be a select committee to consider legislation of this kind when he speaks of fresh strikes which may possibly arise. Had the parties been given the opportunity to make their views and their differences known to a select committee which would bring out the points between them, there would have been a better opportunity to propose means to harmonize these conflicting interests. I merely rose to point out to the hon. member for Nanaimo that the various railway interests are not at all satisfied with the hearing they have had and with the disposition that has been made of their case. They do not believe that they have had a fair hearing. I have here an extract from a memorial to the Prime Minister from the Order of Railway Conductors, presented as recently as the 16th inst.:

> If it is possible to exempt railway organizations from this Bill, could you not lay it over until another session, so that we could all have sufficient time to study its merits. This is an important measure, and you will agree with me if I say that all concerned should have ample time to weigh it. If you cannot consistently grant either of the above requests, I will appeal to you to have the Bill referred to a special committee before being fully passed in the House, in order that the same might have proper consideration and discussion.

This is the concluding paragraph:

> While it is true that we have had an interview with yourself——

That is the First Minister.

> —and the Hon. Mr. Lemieux, at the same time, sufficient opportunity was not given to fully present our objections to the Bill, and in granting this concession of allowing the Bill to be referred to a committee, we feel that many reasons not before given can be advanced, and greater justice can be done our organization.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is certainly a very reasonable request, and it is a request that I think should not go unheeded. This memorial is signed by the Supreme Grand Chief Conductor for Canada for the Order of Railway Conductors. These men surely ought to know their wants and their requirements. Their memorial is similar in tone and tenor to many others that have been received by members of this House from various other departments of railway labour. It is in complete harmony with all that has been presented to the House along the same lines. There has not been one discordant voice, so far as I have heard, from the railway men. They appear to be unanimous, notwithstanding the statement of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Ralph Smith).

Mr. RALPH SMITH. Has my hon. friend anything in his possession as a reason from the railway men against this Bill?

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. If they are given the opportunity now asked for they will present their reasons, and I am appealing to the government to give them a chance to present their reasons according to their own light, to give them a chance of presenting their grievances. It cannot be supposed that men, in a short memorial, can state their reasons as fully and as convincingly as they could orally before a committee. They have already sent lengthy memorials to this House, and believing that their request for a committee would be granted, they have not pressed their reasons in any other way except by memorial. I certainly think that this Bill ought to be referred to a special committee, and in that view I shall support the amendment.

Mr. H. LOGAN (Cumberland). With a view of making this Bill as satisfactory as possible, I would like to ask the Minister of Labour, first, if he has considered the effect of this legislation upon the coal miners of Nova Scotia? We have upon the statute-books of that province an Act which, I think it will be admitted, is a compulsory arbitration Act. Has the minister considered the possibility of this legislation clashing with the provincial legislation? Another question I would ask is this: The Bill as introduced applies to all public utilities in Canada, particularly to coal mines and railways. It is being amended so that railway employees may come under the operation of this Bill or, if they choose, under the operations of the Bill of 1903. Now, I have in mind a company which operates both a coal mine and a railway. All the employees of the company are on one pay-roll, some of them are on the pay-roll of the company as coal miners and many of them are on the pay-roll of the company as railway operators. Has the minister considered whether difficulties might not arise in a case like that? Would the men employed on the railway be allowed the privilege of coming under the operation of this Bill or under that of 1903, in other words, would they stand in a different position from their fellow-workmen in the coal mines of the same company?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Are you referring to the Springhill Railway?

Mr. LOGAN. To the Cumberland Railway and Coal Company of Springhill, N.S. They operate a coal mine at Springhill, employing about 1,700 men, and they operate a railroad running a distance of 30 or 35 miles.

Now, I would like to say a few words with reference to the general principle of this amendment. For one, I desire to protest against the proposed change in this legislation. I cannot see why we should give any more liberty to the railway employees than we do to the men who go down into the earth to bring up coal. I cannot see why the railway men should not come under the operation of this Bill as well as the coal miners.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Does he imagine I am moving an amendment to that effect?

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all. I am going to vote against the hon. gentleman's amendment, because I believe, with the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville), that delay in this matter means killing the legislation. It is better to have this legislation than none at all. I propose to vote against the amendment of the leader of the opposition and to vote for the Bill of the Minister of Labour, although I believe the Bill could be improved, yet half a loaf is better than no bread at all. Now, it seems to me that if there is any class of people in this country who should come under the operation of a compulsory investigation Act it is the men who operate the railways of this country. We know that when there is a strike upon a railroad the company will raise heaven and earth to operate it, and they will bring in men who know little or nothing about the business. That has been done in Canada. We have seen the company bring in men to work upon a railroad who are not skilled, and as a consequence every man in Canada runs the risk of his life in travelling upon a road which is operated by men who do not know how to operate it. Yet it is proposed to take this class of men out from the operation of this Act and put them under an Act passed in 1903. I believe, Mr. Speaker, in the principle of this Bill; I believe it is wise to have public investigation, in order to influence the great court of public opinion, which is, after all, the only court in a labour dispute to which a man can appeal who has to earn his living by the sweat of his brow. I have heard statements made by men who say that this Bill should not be applied to railway men; I have read a circular sent out by Mr. Hall, representing a great number of men. I hold in my hand a letter from a gentleman who says that the men he represents outnumber those represented by Mr. Hall at least two or three times. I propose to read a letter from A. B. Lowe, representative in Canada of the Maintenance of Way Men of the continent of America, a gentleman well known to most of the members of this House, a gentleman who, I believe, knows as much about the wants of the railway trackmen, at least, as any man who lives within the bounds of this confederation. Mr. Lowe says:

I have spoken to several of our people in the maintenance of way department, where the majority of organized railway men are; at least, they outnumber any other two or three of the brotherhoods, and they very cordially agreed with me that an investigation and an award by three chosen, two by the parties to the dispute and one by the other two so chosen, would most likely stop a strike, or if the men had to go out through the company refusing to abide by such an award public sympathy would be very strongly on our side.

And the delay caused by such investigation would be amply repaid in my opinion by having the public so thoroughly posted as to the merits of the controversy. Mr. Verville's suggestion that there should be no reduction of pay during the investigation seems good, and there should be a prompt investigation. In the telegraphers' dispute with the Grand Trunk Railway there were wearisome delays during the investigation. But even then the telegraphers came out well. But what some railway men and others perhaps need to learn is the public interest in these railway disputes, the danger to the travelling public and the inconvenience generally. The time has come when the railway service enters so much into almost every one's every day life that their safety and convenience takes preference of the interest of either employee or employer, and they are getting to have but scant patience with either strikers' or lockers out. Hence, the good of this Bill, in my opinion, that it informs public opinion on the merits of the dispute.

He alludes then to the proposal to refer this matter to a committee and says that he thinks this is an unnecessary delay. Then he ends up the letter by saying:

I hope with proper safeguards as to delays in holding the investigation and making the award, the Bill of the hon. Minister of Labour will carry.

(Sgd.) A. B. LOWE.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that only goes to show that all the railway men of this country are not opposed to this Bill. Here is a man who represents the trackmen who are a very large number of the employees of the railways from one end of this country to the other, and this is the deliberate statement of this man who has been their representative before the committees of parliament for the last fifteen or twenty years. I am prepared to give the statement of Mr. Low a great deal of consideration knowing him as I do and believing that he is thoroughly honest and fair in these matters. The principle of the Bill, I believe, is good. There may be some parts of it that are not as we would like them, but after all, and I refer again to my hon. friend from Maisonneuve, even if this is not perfect legislation it is better than no legislation at all. We are coming back here to another session of parliament. If there are deficiencies in this legislation let us then try to remove these deficiencies. It has been stated this is the only legislation of the kind in the whole world. We may have great faith in the Minister of Labour and in his deputy but we cannot expect to secure perfection in the first Bill of this character which has been introduced anywhere in the whole wide world, but I believe that the Bill as it stands has gone a long way to meet the difficulties of the situation that we have in this country, that the principle of investigation is a good one and that it should be our bounden duty as representatives of the people to do our very best to bring this legislation as near perfection as possible in this and following years. I agree with the statement of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) that the best way of testing this legislation is to pass it now and to experiment with it and if we can, by this legislation, prevent, as I believe we can by informing the great court of public opinion of the difficulties between employer and employee, privations, the loss of property, the ruin of men, the destitution of women and the hunger of children we will have done that which will be greatly to the benefit of mankind and will redound to the credit of this House of parliament, of the Minister of Labour and of his deputy.

House divided on amendment of (Mr. R. L. Borden).

Amendment (Mr. R. L. Borden) negatived.

Mr. TAYLOR. I voted inadvertently and I wish to have my name struck off the list. I am paired with the chief whip of the government, or otherwise I would have voted for the amendment. The hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Ward) has not voted.

Mr. WARD. I am paired with the hon. member for West Northumberland, or otherwise I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton). Since the House in its wisdom has seen fit to vote down the amendment of the leader of the opposition, I beg to move :

That the order for the third reading of Bill (No. 36) be discharged, and that the said Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House with instructions to amend the same by excluding from its operation the railway employers and employees, in respect of whom provision is made for conciliation and inquiry by the Railway Labour Disputes Act, 1903, now embodied in chapter 96, Revised Statutes, 1906.

Just a word in support of this amendment. The railway men throughout the Dominion are perfectly satisfied with the Act of 1903, and since it has come into force there has not been one strike on any Canadian railroad. Several amendments have been made to the present Bill in its passage through the House with regard to which amendments the railway men have not been consulted. When you realize that there are between 80,000 and 90,000 railway employees affected by this Bill, you can readily understand how important it is that the wishes of these men should receive due consideration. This Bill was only printed on the 12th of January this year and available for distribution on the 19th, so that the Bill could not be distributed among the unions in different parts of the country, its provisions considered, and the opinion of the men reported back to this House. The railway men have therefore not had an opportunity of expressing themselves on this Bill, or on the changes made in it. I urge on the House the necessity of adopting my amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. Amendment negatived on division.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. On the same division as before ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, on division.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Armstrong).

Amendment (Mr. Armstrong) negatived.

Mr. H. LENNOX (South Simcoe). I desire to move :

That the order for third reading of Bill (No. 36) be discharged and that the said Bill be referred back to Committee of the Whole House with instructions to amend the same as follows .

(a) By inserting in section 2, clause (f), immediately after the word 'work' the following words : or a lowering of wages, or change in conditions of employment.

(b) By inserting in the 27th section immediately after the word 'writing' the following words : 'within three days after the conclusion of the inquiry.

(c) By striking out of section 28 the word 'forthwith' and substituting therefor the words 'within three days.'

(d) By striking out of section 56 the amendments thereto inserted on 15th March and thus restoring the section to the following form :

56. It shall be unlawful for any employer to declare or cause a lockout, or for any employee to go on strike, on account of any dispute prior to a reference of such dispute to a board of conciliation and investigation, or during the pendency of any proceedings in relation to such dispute before a board under the provisions of this Act : Provided that nothing in this Act shall prohibit the suspension or discontinuance of any industry or of the working of any persons therein for any cause not constituting a lockout or strike: Provided also that, except where the parties have entered into an agreement under section 62 of this Act, nothing in this Act shall be held to restrain any employer from declaring a lockout, or any employee from going on strike in respect of any dispute which has been duly referred to a board and which has been dealt with under section 24 or 25 of this Act.

After the full discussion that has taken place on this Bill I need only make one or two remarks. In reference to the first amendment I propose to have made in the committee by incorporating in subsection (f) of section 2 'or a lowering of wages or changed conditions of employment' there was a rather full discussion of that matter in the committee and there seemed to be a general impression in favour of it, but owing to certain other amendments which were made and which I now propose to strike out these words were omitted.

As to the amendment which I propose to section 27, it is in order to make the matter definite. The language at present in the section is that the commission shall report 'forthwith'; I make it definite by substituting a specific number of days, namely, three days after the conclusion of the inquiry.

The amendment in section 28 is to make it harmonize with the amendment which I propose to section 27. As to the amendment to section 56, this is a very substantial amendment, and it is founded on this line. The Minister of Labour declared over and over again, after full consideration of the Bill, that he had come to the conclusion that he would leave the railway employees and the steam railways under the jurisdiction of the Act of 1903, if they so desired; that is he would leave it optional with them to be under the jurisdiction of that Act if they desired. Now at the last moment he introduces an amendment which puts them in a very peculiar position, neither under the one Act definitely nor under the other, an entirely different position from what I understood to have been the promise of the minister during the discussion of the measure, a promise frequently repeated which amounted to this, that it would leave the employees in the position that unless they made default, unless they went back on the provisions of the Act of 1903, this Act would not be invoked. As it is he does not leave them in that position, and, as I have heard it expressed by several employees, the change the minister introducer on March 15, left them in a more unfortunate position than they were in before. As I feel the minister is not carrying out the promise he made I ask to have the section as it now stands struck out and the section which originally was printed in the Bill restored.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend will understand that if, after the long discussion that has tken place, I do not reply to him it is not through any lack of courtesy.

Mr. LENNOX. I quite understand.

House divided on amendment (Mr. Lennox).

Amendment (Mr. Lennox) negatived.

Motion agreed to. Bill read the third time and passed.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). The tariff resolutions and the accompanying schedules were reported by the Committee of the Whole. I did not move that the report be received at once because I thought it desirable that the resolutions should be printed in amended form. They have since been printed, and I would ask the House to receive and concur in the report of the Committee of the Whole. Then I shall introduce the Tariff Bill for the first reading and it will be printed and distributed before further action is taken. There are also one or two trifling errors, merely verbal, in a couple of items in the schedule, which I desire to have corrected.

Resolutions read the second time, and agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 134) intituled an Act respecting duties of customs.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. LENNOX.

THE INTERPRETATION ACT—AMENDMENT.

Bill (No. 116) to amend the Interpretation Act—Mr. Aylesworth—read the second time and House went into committee thereon.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). In the present Act the provision is that in every Act, unles the context otherwise requires, the words 'Superior Court,' mean, in the province of Manitoba, His Majesty's Court of King's Bench for the said province. It was overlooked, when the court of appeal for Manitoba was established, to include that court within the definition of these words.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THE YUKON ACT—AMENDMENT.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) moved the second reading of the Bill (No. 109) to amend the Yukon Act. He said : This is to make provision for the appointment of an acting commissioner. Apparently the law, as it stands, provides only for a commissioner. Circumstances last year made it necessary to appoint an acting commissioner during the absence of the commissioner. Our advice is that there is not sufficient authority for the action taken and there is a possibility of its being questioned. The Bill legalizes the action of last year and provides that an acting commissioner may be appointed hereafter by the Governor in Council.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1,

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is there any commissioner for the Yukon or acting commissioner ?

Mr. OLIVER. There is no commissioner at present, only an acting commissioner.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How long has the office been vacant ?

Mr. OLIVER. Since some time in January.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Why do you not make the appointment ?

Mr. OLIVER. One reason is that government house was burned down, and it is not thought desirable to appoint a commissioner during the winter when it would be inconvenient for him to go into that country and when there was no residence for him.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is the structure being rebuilt-?

Mr. OLIVER. Not at present.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Will the minister wait until it is rebuilt before appointing a commissioner ?

Mr. OLIVER. That was not the intention. Of course, building operations cannot be carried on very well during the winter, and it is thought desirable that the appointment should not be made until navigation opens and people are going in, and suitable provision can be made for the residence of the governor.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. How is it that the acting commissioner can endure these hardships and the commissioner cannot ?

Mr. OLIVER. If it were merely a question of enduring hardships the commissioner, whoever he might be, could face them as well as others. But the acting commissioner is a resident of the Yukon and has the same accommodation as he always had not having been affected by the destruction of government house. The commissioner who would be sent in would have to find quarters, and would have to be specially provided for, as the acting commissioner need not be.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. And now, having trifled a little with the reason the minister has given, would he be kind enough to give us the real reason ?

Mr. OLIVER. I am sorry if my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) does not consider that the reason I have given is a sufficient one. I think, that in all fairness it should be considered adequate.

Mr. SPROULE. Is any provision made for the salary he is to get ?

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman who is acting as commissioner is the territorial auditor and receives a salary for the duties of that office. He is not receiving any additional salary for his duties as acting commissioner.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the one who is to do the work receive any additional salary ?

Mr. OLIVER. The purpose of the legislation is to legalize the acts of the acting commissioner the legality of which is at present, somewhat in doubt, there being no provision in the Yukon Act for the appointment of an acting commissioner—an omission, I think, hon. gentlemen opposite will agree, which should be cured.

Mr. SPROULE. By legalizing these acts in this way, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) admits that this official has been doing the work without legal authority. It seems to me that it would be most useful for the government to have a blanket Act to cover all its illegal acts in that country. If the information we get is correct, it would require to be a big blanket. I have no doubt that the acting commissioner, when appointed, will receive a consideration from some source. Is it or is it not intended to pay him a consideration for his work as acting commissioner, and, if it is, under what authority does the minister propose to pay him ?

Mr. OLIVER. The only authority by which he could be paid would be a vote in the estimates. At present there is no intention to put a sum in the estimates to make provision for the acting commissioner. But should it be thought desirable to give him extra consideration, it will be applied for in that way.

Mr. TAYLOR. Does not the minister consider it a mistake now to have sent the commissioner away from the Yukon to run an election in British Columbia, particularly in view of the fact that while he was away his house was burnt down at a great loss to the country ?

Mr. OLIVER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor is a little astray in his dates. Government house in Yukon was burnt while the commissioner was in Ottawa attending to the duties of his office which required his presence here. The fire did not occur after his resignation from office, when, of course, as a citizen of British Columbia he had a right to take part in any election he thought fit.

Mr. TAYLOR. But was not he brought down here preparatory to running the election in British Columbia—to get the stuff to go out with?

Mr. OLIVER. I hope I shall not be held to account for all the suggestions that may occur to my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) ; but I say that, as far as I am concerned, there is no foundation for the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Taylor's) observation.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. It seems unfortunate that the gentleman appointed as acting commissioner is auditor. Apparently, the gentleman who makes the accounts will have to audit them. Or, if this is not the case who will audit them ?

Mr. OLIVER. The accounts incurred on the responsibility of this government, of course, will be audited by the auditor, who is the acting commissioner. As to what provision will be made for auditing the accounts incurred in respect of the business of the territorial government, I do not know. That is a matter for the Yukon council itself to consider.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There is one matter we might understand a little better. For what length of time was the commissioner absent during the last year of his office—about?

Mr. OLIVER. The late commissioner was absent from the Yukon twice, once during the last session of parliament and once during the present session. During the present session he came out some time in December and resigned some time in January. On a previous occasion, I think he came out in February, and returned in April. I have not the date clear in my mind, but I think he was out for a couple of months during the last session.

Mr. SPROULE. Who was acting commissioner during the Governor's first absence?

Mr. OLIVER. The same gentleman who is acting now, the Yukon auditor.

Mr. SPROULE. Was he appointed by order in council as acting commissioner? This Bill would seem to imply that he may have been appointed by order in council.

Mr. OLIVER. He was appointed by order in council, but it is now believed that that authority was not adequate and that his appointment should be confirmed by statute. I presume it will be conceded that this omission from the statute was unfortunate, and that it would have been better if provision had been made for the appointment of a deputy or acting commissioner in the absence or illness of the commissioner. That provision it is proposed to make in this Bill.

Mr. SPROULE. Has not the Minister of the Interior power to appoint? The wording seems to be appointed by order in council or by the Minister of the Interior, implying apparently, that the other power has the right to appoint.

Mr. OLIVER. The appointment of the acting commissioner on a former occasion was by order in council. Now it is proposed to give the Governor in Council legal authority to appoint an acting commissioner. And it is proposed to make the statute retroactive so as to cover any difficulty that might arise from the possible illegality of previous action. It is merely to cure a possible difficulty.

Mr. SPROULE. It would appear by this Act that there were two authorities who had power to appoint the acting commissioner; he could be appointed either by order in council or by the Minister of the Interior. Otherwise why the necessity for this language.

2. The validity of any appointment of an acting commissioner heretofore assumed to be made by the Governor in Council or the Minister of the Interior, or of any instructions heretofore assumed to be given by the Governor in Council or the Minister of the Interior to any person to act as or for the commissioner during his absence, illness or other disability, shall not be called in question on the ground that there is no authority in law to make such appointment or give such instructions.

It would appear that either one or the other has acted upon authority and made the appointment.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. The minister has told us that this same acting commissioner acted once before. I would like to know who audited the accounts there? I do not think it is fair that the man who makes the accounts should also audit them.

Mr. OLIVER. I have already said that I understood the gentleman held the position of auditor audited the accounts for the Dominion; but I could not say whether he audited the accounts for the Yukon council. That would be a matter for the decision of the Yukon council.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. Is it not his duty to audit all these accounts?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. URIAH WILSON. Then who audited the whole of these accounts at the time he was acting commissioner before?

Mr. OLIVER. I believe that so far as the Dominion accounts were concerned they were audited by Mr. Lithgow, the acting commissioner then, and the acting commissioner now; but whether he acted as auditor for accounts incurred by the local government of the Yukon, I do not know. He is the auditor ordinarily for both the local government and the Dominion government, but when acting as commissioner for the Yukon he may not be acting as auditor for the local government.

Mr. LANCASTER. Is there a commissioner to be appointed yet?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. LANCASTER. Who is he to be?

Mr. OLIVER. I could not say.

Mr. LENNOX. There was an appointment to be made either by the Governor in Council or by the Minister of the Interior, of some one to act as assistant commissioner and as acting commissioner. Will the minister inform us whether the appointment was made by the Governor in Council or by the minister?

Mr. OLIVER. It was made by the Governor in Council.

Mr. LENNOX. Was it made before the commissioner left the Yukon?

Mr. OLIVER. I could not say at the moment.

Mr. LENNOX. Are we to understand that possibly somebody took the place without any appointment being made?

Mr. OLIVER. I assume that his place could not be taken except by some person after he had been appointed. The purpose of this Bill is to provide that there shall be no question as to the rightfulness of the authority which appointed him, upon which point there is at the present time some question, inasmuch as I understand provision has not been made in the Yukon Act for the appointment of an acting commissioner.

Mr. LENNOX. I have some doubt as to whether this second clause will cover what the hon. gentleman wants it to do, and I would like to know what the facts are. I understand that the appointment is made at the same time by the Governor in Council. Am I right in assuming that that was in reference to the contemplated absence of the commissioner ?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes, it was in reference to the absence of the commissioner, whether in contemplation or in fact.

Mr. LENNOX. It was to fill the vacancy which had occurred by reason of his absence ?

Mr. OLIVER. Not to fill the vacancy, but merely to carry on the duties of the office during his absence.

Mr. LENNOX. Now he never returned to the position, he resigned without returning. Has there been any subsequent appointment of an acting commissioner?

Mr. OLIVER. No.

Mr. LENNOX. Although there has been no subsequent appointment of an acting commissioner, he has continued to act?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. LENNOX. Then how will this clause validate that? I do not think it will. I mean that if a person was appointed by the Governor in Council to discharge the duties during the absence of the commissioner, and that commissioner resigns his position, it is the same as if he were dead, so far as the position is concerned, and without a subsequent appointment to meet the new conditions, the person who continued to occupy the position was exercising the duties without authority.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not in a position to discuss the somewhat delicate point of law which my hon. friend raises. But the Bill as it stands has been prepared for the purpose of meeting this case, or like cases which may occur in the future. I think the House will be safe in assuming that it fairly meets the case, which is well understood by those who prepared the Bill.

Mr. LENNOX. I take the ordinary reading of the clause. I presume that the acting commissioner has duties to discharge, the validity of his acts will depend upon his having been properly appointed. You are met by the proposition that you have to validate the act of a person who acted when there was no commissioner in existence, he is no substitute of anybody.

Mr. SPROULE. It seems to me that it would be very desirable for the committee to know just in what shape this Act stands and what the acting commissioner has been doing. How long he has been acting in that capacity illegally, what accounts has he been paying, whether he did the auditing for the government and for the Yukon Council, and whether he is auditor for the government still. I think we ought to get that information and to enable the minister to get it I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. In case you get through the special order to-morrow, what do you propose to take up ?

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Emmerson) will desire to make a statement in connection with the Railway Department and then he will probably follow with his estimates in supply.

Motion agreed to, House adjourned at 12.30 a.m., Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 20, 1907

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a certificate of the election and return of Ruben Charles Etienne Laurier, Esq., for the electoral district of L'Assomption, in the province of Quebec.

YUKON PLACER MINING ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 135) to amend the Yukon Placer Mining Act. He said : The Bill proposes to make two slight amendments. One is to correct an inadvertence which occurred in connection with the Act passed last session. That Act was intended to go into effect on the 1st of July, but did not go into effect until the 1st of August, and in the interval miners' certificates which had expired were not renewed, the miners being under the impression that the Act had gone into force on the 1st of July. Under the law as it has been, if a mining certificate was not renewed within the proper time, the right of the miner lapsed. The Placer Mining Act did away with the requirement of miners' certificates, and the miners, knowing that, and believing that the Act went into force on the 1st of July, did not renew their certificates. The consequence is that those who did not renew their certificates after that date have no legal standing for their claims, and we wish to cure that disability. With regard to the other provision, the Placer Mining Act does not apply to mining by dredges in river beds. This is dealt with by regulations, but in the Act no provision is made for amending the existing regulations. We believe the time has come when these regulations should be changed, and we wish to make the formal amendment to the Act necessary to permit of their being changed. These are the only two amendments proposed by the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 136) to amend the provisions of the Criminal Code respecting the preservation of the peace in the vicinity of public works.—Mr. Aylesworth.

QUESTIONS.

THE LATE DUNCAN McCALLUM.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES—by Mr. Taylor—asked :

1. Has the government paid or in any way settled with the relatives or the estate of the late Duncan McCallum, who was drowned in the Trent canal, in Victoria county ?
2. Is it the intention of the government to recompense the family ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals) :

1. The government has not paid anything nor in any way settled, with the relatives of the estate of the late Duncan McCallum.
2. The department holds that the government in the present instance is not liable.

POINT PRIM, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND, WHARF.

Mr. McLEAN (Queen's)—by Mr. Martin—asked :

1. How many tenders were received for the construction of the wharf at Point Prim, Prince Edward Island ?
2. What are the names of the tenderers, and the amount of each tender ?
3. What tender has been accepted ?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Acting Minister of Public Works) :

1. Six tenders were received.
2. Kimble, Coffin & John Quinn, $4,160 ; Alexander Compton & Wellington Compton, $4,750 ; D. W. B. Reid & Lewis Archibald, $5,480 ; Hugh McDonald, $5,875 ; Lyons & White, $5,990 ; Thomas Campbell, $6,200.
3. That of Messrs. Kimble, Coffin & John Quinn.

Finlay Panton's tender for $3,900 was withdrawn on January 7, the day on which tenders were due.

THE LORD'S DAY ACT.

Mr. MARSHALL asked :

1. Does the Lord's Day Alliance prohibit the distribution of American Sunday school papers in Canada ?
2. Would any one distributing such papers render himself liable to the penalty ?

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). I presume it is intended to ask whether the Lord's Day Act prohibits such distribution. If so, I have only to say that the interpretation of the Lord's Day Act, as of any other statute, is for the courts, and is a question upon which the government has no right to express any opinion beforehand.

DONCASTER INDIAN RESERVE.

Mr. DESJARDINS asked :

1. Has the survey, into farm lots, of a part of the Doncaster Indian reserve, in the county of Terrebonne, been completed ?
2. If not, does the government purpose having it completed this spring ?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) :

1. The surveyor reports that he has practically completed the field work of surveying into farm lots part of the Doncaster Indian Reserve, but that there are about 15 days' work to be done in the summer, planting boundary stones which could not readily be done in the winter.
2. It is intended to complete the survey, as soon as possible.

FLOOR OIL.

Mr. CLEMENTS asked :

1. What make or brand of floor oil, if more than one, is used by the department for the public buildings of Canada, for the preservation of floors and keeping down dust ?
2. What is the price per gallon of each ?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Acting Minister of Public Works) :

1. No special brand of floor oil is used.
2. Prices range from 60 cents to $1 per gallon.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC CARS.

Mr. CLEMENTS asked :

What number of box cars, passenger cars, and engines, respectively, belonging to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, are in operation, and what railway companies are operating them ?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals). This would seem to be a question that should be directed to the company rather than to the Department of Railways and Canals. The only Grand Trunk Pacific Railway equipment, in operation are twenty-six hundred and fifty box cars at present being used on the Grand Trunk Railway to relieve general shortage of such equipment until such time as required by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway for the operation of its own line.

THE ROSS RIFLE.

Mr. NORTHRUP—by Mr. Taylor—asked:

1. What sums have been paid to Sir Charles Ross, or the Ross Rifle Company, in addition to the contract price of $25 per rifle for, (a) sights; (b) gauges; (c) rent; (d) heating; (e) water tax; (f) lighting; (g) inspection; (h) salaries or wages; (i) for any other reason?

2. What sums have been paid to any person, company or corporation, other than the above, for the above items, respectively?

3. What is the total expenditure to date in consequence of the contracts re Ross rifle?

4. How many Ross rifles have been accepted by the government to date, (a) mark 1; (b) mark 2?

5. How many have been rejected, (a) before; (b) after acceptance?

6. What was done with those rejected in each case?

7. Has the government paid for any that were rejected? If so, how many?

8. Was the progress estimate paid on any of the rejected rifles? If so, how much, has it been refunded, and when?

9. How many rifles, mark 1 and mark 2, respectively, are being used by the militia, including the permanent force, and the Northwest Mounted Police?

10. Who discovered the nine defects in the Ross rifle, pointed out to the House by the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton, on the 26th of February last?

11. Are the Ross rifles, mark 1, corresponding and equal in every respect to a standard sample rifle, approved by the minister under clauses two and seven of the contract with Sir Charles Ross, dated 27th March, A.D. 1902?

12. If so, has the committee which approved the Ross rifle been asked to explain the above defects? If not, has the inspector of small arms been asked to explain why the rifles were accepted?

13. Were above defects in the rifle approved by the committee appointed by the minister to examine and report upon the Ross rifle originally?

14. How many contracts has the government made with Sir Charles Ross or the Ross Rifle Company?

15. What does the government consider to be the duration of the original contract of March 17, 1902?

16. What amount of insurance payable to the government is there on the rifles on which progress estimates have been paid, and what is the amount of advances?

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (Victoria and Haliburton). Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. In the question which the Minister of Militia and Defence (Sir Frederick Borden) has just answered, I find in sections 10, 12 and 13 reference to defects in the Ross rifle said to have been pointed out to the House by the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Sam. Hughes). Those who will read the speech of the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton that is here referred to will see that no defects were pointed out in the rifle. It is true that it is shown that certain improvements were made, but they are not the defects in the original rifle.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY—ACCOUNTS TO BE FURNISHED.

Mr. BRISTOL—by Mr. Blain—asked:

Has the Grand Trunk Railway Company regularly furnished to the Inspector General of Canada, or other proper officer, the accounts required by section 27 of 16 Victoria, chapter 37 ?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). The Act referred to is an Act of the old parliament of Canada before confederation, and the officer therein referred to was an officer of the province of Canada. The records of the Finance Department contain nothing to indicate that these accounts were furnished.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE—SIXTH REPORT.

On the order:

Consideration of the sixth report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Mr. SAMUEL BARKER (East Hamilton). For a proper understanding of the question involved in the report now under consideration, I think it would be convenient that I should make a statement of all the matters which have led up to the subjects that are involved in the report, and I shall endeavour to do so as fully as possible, and, at the same time, as briefly as I can. In 1903 the present government determined upon the construction of a national transcontinental railway from ocean to ocean through Canada, and for that purpose entered into an agreement with certain gentlemen representing the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, a company incorporated by this parliament in that year. A railway was agreed to be constructed from Moncton in New Brunswick, wholly through Canada, to the Paific coast. It was divided into two main divisions, the eastern and the western. The eastern division, from Moncton to Winnipeg, was to be constructed by the government and leased to the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the western division, from Winnipeg to the Pacific ocean, was to be constructed and owned by the company. Each division was again divided into sections. The western division was divided into the prairie section and the mountain section, which are those with which we are particularly concerned to-day. To aid the company in constructing the western division the government agreed to guarantee the payment of principal and interest on an issue of the company's bonds equal to seventy-five per cent of the cost of construction, such cost to be subject to certain limitations as to the prairie section. It may be convenient here to mention that in a mortgage subsequently made there is a provision that the amount of principal money to be guaranteed by the government for the cost of construction west of Winnipeg to the Pacific is not to exceed £14,000,000 sterling, or something over $68,000,000 of principal money, and, in addition to guaranteeing that principal, and interest upon it, there is a condition that for seven years after completion the government must pay, without recourse, the interest as to the mountain section. The terms and stipulations are set forth in the Act of 1903, chapter 71, and in the agreement annexed to that Act. Some changes were made by a subsequent agreement which is appended to the Act of 1904, chapter 24, but I think that none of these provisions affect the question before the House. By section 51 of the Act of 1903, chapter 71, it was provided that the guarantee may be signed by the Minister of Finance and that the government shall be liable according to its terms, and that the payment thereof shall form a charge on the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

By section 34 of the agreement the Grand Trunk Railway is to guarantee the principal and interest of the remaining one-quarter of such cost of construction, but the bonds for that quarter are to be second mortgage bonds ranking after the bonds for the three-quarters guaranteed by the government.

Then there is a definition of what is meant by cost of construction, and I shall refer to the agreement as set forth, at page 467 of the statutes of 1903, for that definition. In a few words the definition is this. The cost of construction means the cost of materials, supplies, labour, services, &c., required for the construction of that division, right of way, compensation, engineering and legal expenses, and generally all costs and expenses occasioned by construction.

By section 18 of the agreement, the definition of 'cost of construction' as applied to the western division is given in these words:

The cost of construction of the western division shall include the like classes of expenditure as in the cost of construction of the eastern division, but the amount thereof shall be established by the company to the satisfaction of the government periodically from time to time, and upon the completion thereof in such a manner as the government may direct or determine.

Thus the government, with regard to the expenditure on construction in the western division, are entitled from time to time to be satisfied as to the work done, and at any future time they may go over all that again and satisfy themselves until the whole work is completed. I mention that particularly because it emphasizes the point that came up in the Committee on Public Accounts, when some criticism was made by us as to the action of the government in not obtaining from the Grand Trunk Pacfiic either duplicates or copies of the vouchers which are being scrutinized and passed from time to time but which are left wholly in the possession of the Grand Trunk Railway. So that neither the Grand Trunk Pacific nor this government are possessed of a single voucher covering eight or more millions spent and for which the government are responsible to the bondholders with whose bonds they are entrusted. That is, it seems to me at the very outset, a most important question. The government has a contract with the Grand Trunk Pacific, but neither the government nor the Grand Trunk Pacific has possession of the vouchers showing the expenditure. They are entirely in the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway. It strikes me as a most extraordinary circumstance that this expenditure should have been going on for two or three years and no system adopted by which possession should be had by the government of at least the duplicates or copies of the vouchers.

I also call attention to section 19 of the agreement which is as follows:

For the purpose of enabling the government to determine the cost of construction of the said railway, or of any portion thereof, or the cost of equipment supplied, or the net earnings of the railway, or of any part or parts thereof, pursuant to this agreement, the government shall have the right from time to time, and at all times, to inspect all the books of account, pay sheets, contracts, correspondence and all other books, papers and documents, the inspection of which may be considered necessary for the purpose of determining such cost or net earnings.

It seems to me rather odd that so much care should be taken to give the government the right to inspect these documents and papers, and yet, in the actual working out of the contract, that no care be taken that the company which enters into the contract shall be in possession of these papers. They are left absolutely in the control of another company, over which we have no jurisdiction as contracting party.

By another Act of 1905, chapter 122, the Grand Trunk Pacific was incorporated. Its capital stock was put at $45,000,000. So soon as $2,000,000 were subscribed and ten per cent thereof paid into a chartered bank of Canada, that company might organize. And by a subsequent Act, chapter 80 of the statutes of 1904, the $2,000,000 was reduced to $1,000,000, but the company was still required to pay in $200,000 cash, and I draw attention to that fact because if that Act has been complied with, the company is in possession of $200,000 of paid up stock, which fund is the proper fund for the payment of the large amounts of promotion money which it has been attempted to place on the bondholders as cost of construction, but which are no more cost of construction than would be the clothes of the manager of the road.

By section 48 of the agreement the government has the right to appoint one director of the Grand Trunk Pacific who shall be paid a salary by the government not to exceed $2,000 per year. I presume there is such an official; but in the light of what has come to our notice in the Public Accounts Committee as regards the charges for cost of construction, I cannot imagine what that valuable director is doing. We pay him a handsome salary, and he at least ought to see that the Grand Trunk Pacific does not attempt to impose on the government a large sum for work, as construction work, but which was really promotion expenses with all that that implies.

Next we have the Act of 1905, chapter 98 which relates to the mortgages. Article 3, section 3 and 4, at page 170 of the statutes, deals with the government's position with regard to the proceeds of the first mortgage bonds:

All of the said bonds shall be so issued that the purchase price of any of such bonds (hereinafter referred to as the 'proceeds' of the said bonds), shall be paid by the purchasers thereof from time to time in the bank of Montreal, the Canadian Bank of Commerce, the Merchants Bank of Canada, or such other bank or banks as the government may approve of (which are hereinafter collectively and distributively referred to as the 'bank'). The bank shall receive and hold the said proceeds and any interest accruing thereon at the credit of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General of Canada, in a special account in one of the offices of the said bank, in accordance with and subject to the provisions of section 4 of this article.

So that, quite apart from the obligation which the government has undertaken as guarantor of the bonds, it becomes a trustee for the purchasers of all these millions of bonds, and is bound to everybody who deals in them to take care and see that the funds are properly paid. Section 4 provides:

The bank shall keep all such proceeds received by it as aforesaid at the credit of the said special account, and interest upon the balances at the credit of the said account shall be credited at such times and at such rates as may be agreed upon between the Pacific Company and the bank. In proportion as the construction of the western division is proceeded with to the satisfaction of the government, according to the specifications agreed upon or to be agreed upon between the government and the Pacific Company, the government shall out of the said proceeds and interest, pay to the Pacific Company or its nominees, in monthly payments as far as practicable, such sums as the chief engineer appointed by the government or such other officer as the government may appoint for that purpose, may certify are earned, having regard to the cost, at the date of such certificate, of construction work as hereinbefore defined, and having regard to the proportion of the costs of construction which, under the scheduled agreements, is to be met by the prices of bonds guaranteed by the government.

Now, it is to be noticed that the government is entrusted with the custody of the whole of the first mortgage fund, that is, the mortgage fund which is to cover 75 per cent of the cost of construction, and that it is the duty of the government, as the work proceeds to its satisfaction, to pay to the Pacific Company such sums as the officer appointed by the government for the purpose may certify are earned, having regard to the government's guarantee, and which guarantee for the portion from Winnipeg to the coast, as stated at page 160 of that statute, is not to exceed £14,000,000, or say $68,000,000. It may be as well to say here that if we add to that $68,000,000 one-third for the portion that the Grand Trunk undertakes to guarantee, we find that the cost of construction of the road west of Winnipeg to the Pacific is assumed to be somewhere in the vicinity of $90,000,000. I think that is a somewhat larger sum than the Finance Minister contemplated in the palmy days when he was putting the Bill through the House.

Mr. FIELDING. No.

Mr. BARKER. I think the people of the country will be somewhat surprised to learn that the probable cost of the construction of that division of the road is likely to be somewhere about $90,000,000. One other condition of the statute which bears on the question before the House is section 13, page 178 :

The Pacific Company shall, during the continuance of this security——

Mark you, this is a provision in the mortgage under which the government are trustee of the funds.

The Pacific Company shall, during the continuance of this security, carry on and conduct its business in a proper and efficient manner, keep proper books of accounts, and, from time to time, give to the government or to the trustee—— trustee there means trustee of the property held by the trust company.

——any information which may reasonably be required relating to the affairs of the Pacific Company.

Now, there is a very important provision in the mortgage, and in the statutes relating thereto, for the protection of the government, namely, that the government are entitled to call for any statements or information from the Pacific Company. Yet we know from the witnesses that have been so far examined that there has not been the slightest care to see that that is done and although over $6,000,000 has already been paid out. The gentleman who goes down from the Railway Department to inspect the accounts of the G. T. Pacific is handed over to the Grand Trunk official, and the Grand Trunk official produces—what ? Grand Trunk Pacific vouchers ? Not one. He produces simply vouchers of the Grand Trunk Company against the Grand Trunk Pacific, vouchers that are mixed up with the ordinary Grand Trunk vouchers. Until a month ago—why the change was made a month ago, unless it was the proceedings of the committee that brought it about, I do not know—until a month ago the papers affecting the Grand Trunk Pacific were not even consecutive, they were dispersed through thousands and thousands of the vouchers of the Grand Trunk Company in all its dealings as a public carrier. This is the way the government, as trustee of these millions, has been seeing that that provision of the mortgage has been carried out.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the position is shortly this : The government has undertaken to guarantee the cost of construction of the western division of the Transcontinental Railway that may reach, so far as the government guarantee of principal is concerned, fully $68,000,000, and it has also agreed to guarantee interest thereon as well as pay interest on a large portion of that sum for seven years without recourse. The government has also undertaken the responsibility of controlling the proceeds of all the bonds for that vast sum of money, so that not one dollar shall at any time be paid to the Pacific Company for any other purpose than the cost of construction. And to enable the government to check this cost, provision is made for the keeping of proper accounts which the government has a right to inspect from time to time. The government therefore is not only nominally the guarantor of the sum, but it is the trustee of the bondholders' money necessary to pay for the construction. Now, I need not urge upon this House the extreme importance of dealing with this trust fund with the strictest care and vigilance. Canada's faith is pledged to the financial market, to the financial world, and all dealers in such securities ; and should doubt be cast upon the handling of this fund, if there be any suspicion of misapplication, any concealment, any hesitation to allow the closest scrutiny, for example, if the Public Accounts Committee are not allowed to look into all the papers, the reputation of the government, of parliament, and of the country and the price and value of our own government securities would suffer in consequence. I think that is a consideration that should not be overlooked, especially when we find in the committee, day after day, obstruction being thrown in the way of obtaining certain accounts. As the majority of the committee have put it, if items are improperly charged we have nothing to do with them ; we have only a right to look at what is properly charged ; we are not to scrutinize any wrong accounts but only those which are right. That is the position taken by gentlemen composing the majority of the Public Accounts Committee, under the lead of the Minister of Finance. He says: We have nothing to do with items that have been cast out, that have been improperly charged; we must confine ourselves only to what has been said. Presumably if they are right, those concerned in this transaction may make attempt after attempt to get through items that are utterly wrong, we have nothing to do with them, and we must sit down and be content with looking at what we know or believe to be right. Now, the public accounts were formally referred to that committee, and upon that reference this trust account came under review, and not only all the receipts by the company, but the expenditure authorized by the government in its quality of trustee. In that line we have been endeavouring to get at the facts. According to the evidence, it appears that in September, or early in October, 1905, the Grand Trunk Pacific sent in their first statement claiming to have expended in construction on the western division, from the beginning up to the 30th June, 1905, $926,-293.

That statement was apparently sent to the Railway Department, it was submitted by the Minister of Railways to the Accountant of his department, Mr. Shannon, for audit. Mr. Shannon proceeded to Montreal to the Grand Trunk Pacific offices, and found that the vouchers, as I have said, were all in the possession of the Grand Trunk Company. They were not kept separately, he says, nor were they numbered consecutively, they were interspersed among the ordinary Grand Trunk vouchers and were in possession of the Grand Trunk. They were submitted to Mr. Shannon for inspection and as soon as they had been looked at by him they went back into the possession of the Grand Trunk. Mr. Shannon reported his audit to the department on October 11, and it appears that of that $926,-293 Mr. Shannon rejected and disallowed $162,000. And it must be remembered, in looking at that very considerable item, $162,-000, recommended to be disallowed, it does not mean that the vouchers represented only that amount, because any items that were of a general character were distributed pro rata over the several divisions and sections. So when Mr. Shannon was allowing or disallowing general items he might in many cases be dealing in this $162,000 with only about 61 per cent of the actual sum vouched for, an additional 39 per cent being charged to other sections. The pro rata of the western division among the properties of the company is, I think, 61·35 per cent, and in a large number of items, legal expenses for example and matters of that kind of a general character, the amount represented in the $162,000 would not be the whole of the legal expenses, and various matters that come under the head of promotion, but only 61⅓ per cent; so you will see that the $162,-000 was a very striking item to be refused and disallowed by the government accountant out of the first statement presented by the G. T. Pacific.

Although Mr. Shannon, on the 11th of October, 1905, disallowed that $162,000, we find that on that day or the following day the government engineer overruled Mr. Shannon and allowed the whole claim of $926,293, and he forwarded that recommendation to the Minister of Railways. It appears further that a day or two after that first statement had been submitted for audit, the G. T. Pacific officials sent to the Minister of Railways four certificates covering the whole of the $926,293, dividing it into four portions according to the different districts being dealt with. Those certificates were signed by the President, Vice-President and Engineer of the Grand Trunk Pacific who certified that that sum had been expended in construction, and of it 75 per cent was to be paid by the government out of the trust fund. The certificates were upon a printed form addressed to the Minister of Finance and Receiver-General, but they were sent through the Railway Department so that they might be certified there by the government engineer, and the government engineer, as I have said, did certify them. In the face of Mr. Shannon's rejection of that large sum the government engineer on the following day passed the whole sum; he could not possibly have investigated the accounts but he allowed the whole sum. We have not yet completed the evidence, and we do not know, but we shall probably hear, that he had an interview with some of the officials of the road, but of that at present we are not informed. Certainly the fact is beyond question that Mr. Shannon reported in writing rejecting those accounts; he was overruled, and Mr. Schreiber, the government engineer, certified at the foot of the certificate given by the railway officers that the sum was correct and should be paid. I shall give presently the exact form of that certificate. The certificate given by the three railway officials was in these words:

> I certify the above statement of expenditure to be correct, that the prices paid for the work are not in excess of the fair value thereof, and that all the proceeds of these bonds heretofore received have been used for the purposes for which the payment thereof was made.

That certificate was signed by C. M. Hays, President; F. W. Morse, Vice-President and by B. B. Kelliher, Chief Engineer. Then at the foot of that, immediately beneath these signatures, Mr. Schreiber signed:

> I hereby certify that I have examined the accounts, books, vouchers, &c., of the company at this office——

He did that, of course, through his subordinate, Mr. Shannon, > —and I find the above statement of expenditure to be in accord with the same; and further my information is that the expenditure as set down fairly represents the reasonable value of the work done.

Mr. Schreiber signs that with Mr. Shannon's report in his hand, he himself not having examined the vouchers at all; Mr. Shannon having done the work and having certified, giving the details to a great extent, that $162,000 of it was not, as far as he could ascertain, work of construction at all. Mr. Shannon says at page 21 of the evidence that that first statement which he audited was subsequently withdrawn by the company and that a new statement was submitted and that he was ordered by the Minister of Railways or his deputy to audit it which he did, and he made that second audit at the end of October, in the same month but later on.

Mr. Power, acting auditor of the two companies, the Grand Trunk and the G. T. Pacific—and I may say here to show what little value there is in an audit as between the two companies, that all the gentlemen who audit accounts on the one side for the Grand Trunk and on the other side for the G. T. Pacific are Grand Trunk officers, every one of them. A Grand Trunk official presents a voucher for a certain amount to the G. T. Pacific. Some other officers, I am not quite sure but sometimes they are the same officers, audit and sign on behalf of the G. T. Pacific, and so it is all right. Mr. Power, the acting auditor, tells us in his evidence, that if the general manager signed a voucher he would not presume to go beyond the General Manager's signature. He did not say he had no right to do it, but he would not do it; it is not the practice to do it. When the General Manager puts his name to a document that is not to be criticised by any official. Mr. Power at page 73 says.

When Mr. Walker the general auditor brought back that first statement from Ottawa, Mr. Walker ordered that it should be destroyed and it was destroyed and a new statement was prepared.

At page 79 Mr. Power says:

Not only the original statement sent to the government was destroyed, but all the copies of it in the company's office.

Is there any significance in that? Why should a company that made up a statement honestly—even though some over-zealous official put in things they were not entitled to put in—why should the company be afraid to keep in their own books the carbon copies of the statement they had issued? Why should Mr. Walker, the auditor, on getting back this statement which had been audited, and fairly and properly audited I should fancy by Mr. Shannon, and which had been certified beyond that audit by the railway department; why should he want to destroy that statement and all copies of it, if everything was honest and above board? What harm could there be for that statement to remain in existence? And what must there be underneath it all to have called for the withdrawal from the government of the accounts sent in, and to have them destroyed, and to have even the copies destroyed. But it is this destroyed statement and the vouchers upon which it is based, that the Minister of Finance says are matters we should not look into. And his followers say, yea. The $160,000 ultimately was not paid, but it was passed through all the forms into the Finance Department and it was checked here—not checked in the ordinary sense—it was stopped there. And forsooth, we are not to look into it, although it is stamped with suspicion by the conduct of the company itself. Mr. Power confirms Mr. Shannon's statement as to the objections, because Mr. Power says:

The rejected items of that first statement were about $160,000.

At page 76, Mr. Power says:

The first statement included as far as he is aware everything that the company had paid whether for promotion or getting a charter or anything else, as well as the cost of construction.

There is confirmation of Mr. Shannon, the accountant; Mr. Power says the first statement included everything, from the work upstairs in this building to the work across the ocean, visits to the Pacific coast, everything was included, all the legal expenses—and apparently there was an array of legal gentlemen because the legal expenses came to $26,000 for the preliminary work. All this was included; and yet the Railway Department knowing that; knowing that not a dollar should go into that account but cost of construction, passed it on to the Finance Department for payment. On page 42 of the evidence, it will be seen that the secretary of the Railway Department, on the 19th of October, 1905, (about a week after the certificates) wrote this letter to the Minister of Finance:

I have the honour by direction to inclose herewith for the necessary action by your department, four certificates dated the 11th inst., of Mr. Collingwood Schrieber, as chief engineer of the government in connection with the construction of the western division National Transcontinental Railway to which position he was appointed by an order in council of that date. Such certificates endorsed on certified statement of expenditure furnished by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, they being as follows:

Then is recited, so much for the mountain section, so much for the prairie section, the total of the sums, and the amount of the 75 per cent. Apparently, although Mr. Power tells us the company was hard pressed for money and were very urgent to get it; apparently the certificates were held up in the Finance Department—not by the minister, I would not charge him with delaying it a day, but by Mr. Courtney, ex-deputy minister who seems to have been very cautious. And although everything in connection with the certificate was in perfect form, so that there was nothing to be done but to issue the cheques, he tells us he took time to consider the course to be pursued, because it was the first case and he wanted to have things regular. During that time, when the certificates were in his hands, he tells us at page 42 of the evidence, that he constantly saw Mr. Shannon about the business of the railway accountant's department, and Mr. Shannon whom he saw so constantly was the gentleman who had rejected the $162,000. The inference from that is, that Mr. Courtney was not so much concerned about the method he was to adopt as he was about the fact that $162,000 was being got out of the government irregularly and improperly. I do not know that there can be any doubt about that. Here were Mr. Shannon and the deputy minister constantly in communication. It is impossible to believe that Mr. Shannon on seeing the deputy minister would have abstained from pointing out that he had rejected $162,000, and that his opinion had been overridden by Mr. Schreiber or by the Railway Department, I do not know which. It is a fair inference that knowledge induced Mr. Courtney to delay putting the matter through as quickly as he otherwise would have done. It appears in the evidence that there was then a conference between Mr. Shannon, Mr. Courtney and the Minister of Finance, and the result of that will appear in some further correspondence which I shall read. On the 9th of November, 1905—this, you will observe, was very shortly after the certificates were sent in—we find Mr. Walker, the general auditor of the Grand Trunk Pacific, writing to the deputy Minister of Railways, Mr. Butler:

Dear Sir,—Will you kindly return statements of expenditure which Mr. Shannon took with him to complete his audit, as I wish to amend them? Also the certificates, which will have to be redrawn to correspond.

Then Mr. Jones, the secretary of the department, writes to the Deputy Minister of Finance:

The department is in receipt of a request from the general auditor of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway for the return of certain statements of expenditure which require to be withdrawn.

Then follows a letter from Mr. Courtney to Mr. Jones:

In compliance with your letter of this day's date, I beg to return herewith four certificates dated October 11, of Mr. Schreiber, as chief engineer of the government, in connection with the construction of the western division of the National Transcontinental Railway, of expenditures as follows.

Then he recites the expenditures. Then Mr. Courtney is asked:

Q. In compliance with that letter did you return the certificates?—A. Evidently.

Q. How did you come to return those certificates?—A. At the request of the Railway Department.

Now, I think a remark may very well be made here as to this extraordinary action of the Finance Department and the Railway Department. Here a railway company puts in accounts for an enormous sum of money that it was not entitled to, and they were certified by three of its officers in words that would show that the company was entitled to it. Those accounts were passed by the Railway Department, the Railway Minister or his deputy sending them on to the Finance Department. They are certified by the proper officer of the government to make them valid in favour of the railway company, and the Department of Finance and the Department of Railways see no difficulty whatever in returning those accounts and certificates to the railway company. Surely common prudence would have told the government that it was improper to place in the hands of the railway company the certificate of the government engineer that they were entitled to the whole of that sum. Would a railway company, who had found a contractor charging improperly large sums of money, and that its engineer had either erroneously or negligently certified the account as correct, return it with the certificate of the engineer to the contractor? I think not. I do not think there is a business man in this country who would have thought for a moment of doing it. On the contrary, if I know anything about railway managers, they would hold on to that paper as against the man who sent it in for future reference, and as a caution to all those in its employ who had to deal with such matters, that it might not occur again. Mr. Boville, the successor to Mr. Courtney, says this:

Q. Was there any question in the department as to the irregularity of the certificates, or the form of the certificates, the lack of proper endorsement on the certificates?—A. The only recollection I have is, as Mr. Courtney said, this was the first transaction and a good deal of care had to be taken with it, as it would serve as a precedent for future dealings with similar transactions. I think you will find this letter is addressed to Mr. Fielding, the Hon. W. S. Fielding. I think those certificates probably came under his view. I think there was a consultation probably between Mr. Courtney, probably Mr. Shannon was there at the same time, and Mr. Fielding may have had something to do with it.

That is the nearest we could get to the facts, because Mr. Courtney's recollection was uncertain. Mr. Boville was in the next room, but he is under the impression that Mr. Shannon was present when it was arranged that these certificates should be sent back from the Finance Department to the Railway Department, in order that they might be returned to the G. T. Pacific Company. So I think we may fairly assume that the Minister of Finance knew what was intended to be done, and acquiesced in it. I do not think there can be any doubt about that. One of the witnesses said that it was quite the common course to pass vouchers from one department to another.

Mr. FIELDING. No, he did not say that. What he said was that it was a common practice for one department to pass documents to another. He did not say a voucher. On the contrary, he said that a voucher would not be withdrawn.

Mr. BARKER. I said voucher, because that is the word used here. He said it was a common practice for one department to send papers to another. What I am arguing is that the Minister of Finance acquiesced in these certificates being returned.

Mr. FIELDING. The hon. gentleman has no evidence for any such statement. The record says they were withdrawn at the request of the Railway Department, and what became of them was a matter for that department.

Mr. BARKER. I was drawing a perfectly fair inference from what appears here.

Mr. FIELDING. No.

Mr. BARKER. Mr. Boville said that the minister and Mr. Courtney discussed the subject with Mr. Shannon, and he must have known that there was this complaint about the $162,000. No one can believe that Mr. Courtney did not tell him that; and what happened? After that discussion the paper was sent to the Railway Department, the Finance Minister knowing that it was to be sent to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company.

Mr. FIELDING. I again state that there is nothing in the evidence to show that. I do not think it is material, but I do not know why my hon. friend continues to make that statement.

Mr. BARKER. I am stating just what occurred.

Mr. FIELDING. But it did not occur.

Mr. BARKER. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement. What I say is that it is impossible to believe that Mr. Courtney did not tell the minister that there was this question of the $162,000 connected with that voucher.

Mr. FIELDING. Mr. Courtney and I discussed the whole subject, and the certificate was held up. My hon. friend took particular pains to say that it was not done by the minister, but by Mr. Courtney. The evidence shows that the minister and Mr. Courtney discussed the matter, and the minister decided, for the time being, the amount should not be paid.

Mr. BARKER. Then, from what the minister now says, it is quite clear that he did know all about this disputed account, that he did know apparently that the vouchers were applied for to be returned to the G. T. Pacific Company.

Mr. FIELDING. I say myself that I was not consulted about the return. I was aware that the papers had been asked for and returned. I do not think the point material, but the hon. gentleman might as well state it fairly.

Mr. BARKER. The hon. gentleman did know then that the certificates had been applied for and had been returned?

Mr. FIELDING. I knew afterwards. Yes, I knew they were returned.

Mr. BARKER. Did he ever ask to get those back into his possession?

Mr. FIELDING. Never.

Mr. BARKER. That is what I was coming to.

Mr. FIELDING. Rather a roundabout way.

Mr. BARKER. The hon. gentleman tells us now what we could not get out of the witnesses—that is all. I have read a letter from Mr. Walker applying for a return of those certificates, page 41. Then I read a letter from Mr. Jones to Mr. Walker. Now, I will read a letter of the 13th November from Mr. Walker to Mr. Jones:

Dear Sir,—I have pleasure in acknowledging return of four certificates per yours of 10th instant.

They were given up, you see, very promptly. Then at page 62, on the 14th December, 1905, I find the following letter from Mr. William Wainwright, second vice-president of the G. T. Pacific, to the serretary of the Railway Department:

Dear Mr. Jones,—I send you herewith the certificates originally signed and which have been withdrawn for cancellation, and which perhaps you will kindly hand to Mr. Schreiber in order that he may destroy them or take his name off, whichever he desires to do.

Then Mr. Schreiber is asked:

Q. Did you receive those certificates back? A. I did.

Q. What did you do with them?—A. I tore my name off.

Q. Have you got them with your name torn off? A. I think not. I handed them back to the Department of Railways and Canals.

And this transaction between the Finance Department and the Department of Railways and Canals we dare not inquire into! All we are allowed to inquire into are the items concerning which there was no dispute. Surely if the bondholders in England hear of this, hear that documents of this kind are thus handed round, they will think they have an extraordinary trustee in Canada. The original statement is taken to Montreal and destroyed, and every copy destroyed, and the certificates are given away by the Finance Department to the Railway Department and then sent to Mr. Wainwright of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and Mr. Wainwright returns them so that the government engineer, Mr. Schreiber, shall tear his name off, and we do not know what has since become of them. Mr. Schreiber is asked :

Q. Who will have those four certificates with your name torn off ? A. I could not tell you, the correspondence ought to show no doubt.

Q. Why did you tear your name off ? A. So that they could not be made use of for any purpose.

But this gentleman saw no difficulty in their being in the possession of the Grand Trunk Pacific for weeks. They were sent back in November and only returned in December. He seems to have become a little alive to business considerations and was anxious to get them back, but instead of keeping them on record with an endorsement stating the circumstances, he tears his name off. That is an odd way of doing business. I do not think that a country store-keeper would do business in that way, and much less would one expect it from the government of Canada.

Now, there is the substituted statement that was sent in. Mr. Shannon says he audited that at the request of the department and his evidence as to the audit and as to certain items in that statement will be found on pages 25 to 29. In this second statement, the corrected statement, the statement that was sent in after that difficulty about improper charges, Mr. Shannon rejected from $70.000 to $80,000 as not proper cost of construction. You will find instances given by him at pages 27, 28 and 29. He says he refused to allow legal expenses $26,000. I perhaps ought to remind the House that this was at the very beginning of the enterprise. They were auditing the accounts for twelve months up to the 30th June, 1905, and here we have $26,000 legal expenses charged to construction and coolly put into the accounts the second time. Then we have a trip to England, $1,132. I suppose to do the work between here and the Pacific it was necessary to cross the Atlantic. Then there are London salaries, $4,666; London directors, $4,866; London expenses, $890; Sir Adolphe Caron, $2,000. And then among the legal expenses are $5,600 paid to Mr. McGivern, of Ottawa, the gentleman who acts for the Grand Trunk Railway upstairs when Bills are going through. There is an item we are told we must not look into—the rejected accounts. Does the House not think that would be a proper item to look into owing to the attempt made to charge it against this trust fund? I think we ought to look into it. I think for the character of this House we ought to know where this $26,000 of legal expenses went, into whose hands it was paid. Was it for services of legal gentlemen or what are called disbursements by legal gentlemen? It is an outrage that we should be told in the Committee of Public Accounts that we must not look into those things. These items were rejected because they were not works of construction, and therefore we are told that we must not look into them. They are accounts rendered twice against this government by this company, and we are not to inquire into the items or learn anything at all about them.

There is another claim that Mr. Shannon rejected and which certainly throws a little light upon the way business was done. He refers to it at pages 25 and 28, as an amount of $46,000 for terminal land. It is divided into two items—F. W. Morse—I understand he is the second vice-president of the company—for terminal lands $20,000 ; Peter Larson—I do not know what his position is or whether he is connected with the company, for terminals $26,000. Well, Mr. Shannon very properly said : If these are terminal lands, I would like to know what is the area of the land you are buying; I want to know whether you are getting this for right of way and necessary terminal area, or does it include any town sites? And, would you believe it, Mr. Speaker, they refused to give him any answer. Mr. Shannon rejected every dollar of that $46,000. And here was this company, having undoubtedly paid out that $46,000, and being undoubtedly entitled to a portion of it for whatever the proper area of that terminus should be, would rather give up the whole $46,000 than explain. And we must submit to that, for that is one of the items that the government say we shall not inquire into. We know that $162,000 of the first statement had been rejected ; and we see now the nature of some of the items brought into the second statement, of which some $70,000 were rejected. And from the nature of the $70,000 rejected in the second statement, we can guess, to a certain extent, what the others may have been. What must have been the nature of some of these accounts forming the rejected $162,000, when, bringing in $70,000, they omitted the balance. And, as I have said, we must not inquire into this ; it is not our business ; the chairman of the Public Accounts Committee rules that it is not a proper subject for inquiry, and the committee sustain him. Suppose that a committee were appointed to investigate the doings and business of a bank or any large financial institution and, in the course of that investigation, it appeared that some of the officials or other parties connected with the bank had been making improper charges —perhaps a forgery here and there—and when the committee ask particulars about these, would not they be surprised if the manager said: You must not inquire about this or that, for we found it was a forgery and did not pay the money, and so you have nothing to do with it—you can come here and look over every regular item in our books, but must not inquire into any irregularity which we discovered before the money was paid. That is the position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Now, I wish to refer briefly to the proceedings in the committee. And I may say here that in view of the disappearance of one gentleman who knows all about these matters, it is of some consequence to learn when somebody got the hint of what inquiries were going to be made in this House. On January 9, a return was ordered of all the vouchers for payments to the Grand Trunk Railway since January, 1904. That brought up the question, I take it, of the surveys on the eastern division. Then, there was a motion for the production of all accounts for payments in respect of the surveys. There was notice of intention to question the government in reference to the guarantee of bonds on the eastern division of the G. T. Pacific. That was on February 20. On February 27, there was a motion in the committee that Mr. Schreiber, Mr. Bell and Mr. Shannon be examined on March 5. On March 5, a motion was made in committee and carried that Mr. H. W. Walker be summoned to appear on March 8 to give evidence respecting the western division of the Transcontinental Railway, and to produce first and second statements submitted to the government for audit, together with all vouchers and papers relating to the items therein. That passed the committee;—I think, perhaps, the last part escaped attention; at all events it was carried and Mr. Walker got notice of the summons. On March 6, a motion was made by a member of the committee who was afraid that the previous summons was not sufficiently specific that a summons to Mr. Walker be amplified so as to more fully describe the papers to be produced on March 8. This motion was negatived in committee by eleven to six. They refused to specify vouchers and papers relating to the rejected items. On March 8, a letter was read from Mr. N. J. Power, acting auditor, that Mr. Walker was absent in Washington, but the summons would be handed to him on his return. Then, on March 8, Mr. Walker not being present Mr. Courtney, Mr. Schreiber and Mr. Boville, were examined. On that day there was a motion that Mr. Walker be summoned to appear on Wednesday, March 13, to give evidence and to bring with him the first and second statements, audited by Mr. Leonard Shannon, and vouchers and papers on which they were based. I should explain that attached to Mr. Shannon's report on October 11, were a number of his own statements referring to the discarded items and his reasons for discarding them. These have been removed. The report is there to-day without Mr. Shannon's statements and there is a memorandum on it that these statements had been removed by direction. The motion was that Mr. Walker be summoned to appear on Wednesday, March 13, and to bring with him any statements and details handed back by Leonard Shannon. An amendment was moved by Mr. E. M. Macdonald, of Pictou, that the latter part of Mr. Ames' motion be struck out—that is the part referring to bringing all the papers. This was equivalent to summoning Mr. Walker to appear without directing the production of the papers required. The amendment carried by sixteen to thirteen, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) voting in support of the amendment. On March 12, knowing that Mr. Walker was to appear next day, a motion was made that Mr. H. W. Walker be notified by telegraph to bring with him and produce on the following day the first and second statements. And thereupon Mr. Johnston of Cape Breton moved that all reference to papers that Mr. Walker should produce should be struck out. And this amendment was carried by twenty-three votes to eleven, both the Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) voting for it.

Mr. FIELDING. And how did the hon. gentleman (Mr. Barker) vote?

Mr. BARKER. I moved the motion so it is to be taken for granted that I voted for it. On March 12 I moved that the proceedings be reported to the House. I spoke upon that motion, and said that we were determined to bring this question before the House to see whether we should be allowed to go into all the accounts. That motion was negatived by 29 to 13. Again the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Finance voted against the motion.

On the 13th of March, Mr. Walker was called, there was no answer. Mr. Power, the acting auditor, was called and was examined as to Mr. Walker's absence. His examination appears on page 67 of the evidence:

Q. You sent that letter to Mr. Howe which has just been read ?—A. Yes.

Q. Was Mr. Walker in Washington at that time ?—A. He was.

Q. When did he return ?—A. On Sunday.

Q. Sunday last ?—A. The document was given to him on his return.

Q. That was on Sunday last ?—A. Sunday I believe.

Q. What is the date of that, the 11th ?—A. The 10th.

Q. The 10th of March. What did he say ?—A. Well, I did not see him myself. He came down next day to the office and then he said he had received it.

Q. Then what ?—A. He said that he had received it.

Q. He said he had received the summons ?—A. Yes.

Q. What about the second summons read today?—A. I received one and he also received one.

Q. When did he and you receive those summonses ?—A. I would not be certain, I think it was Monday.

Q. Monday the 11th ?—A. I think so. As I say, I could not be certain now.

Q. Why is Mr. Walker not here ?—A. He is on his way to the old country.

Q. He is on the way to England ?—A. To the Mediterranean.

Q. When did he go ?—A. He went yesterday.

Q. He went yesterday ? Mr. Walker is the general auditor, he is your senior in the department, is he ?—A. Yes.

Now there was a serious block to this inquiry. Mr. Walker is the man of all others in the Grand Trunk service who knows all about the accounts. He sent Mr. Power, who knew little or nothing of them. He is the auditor of disbursements, but he does not go into the broader questions that Mr. Walker deals with, except in the absence of Mr. Walker. Mr. Power, over and over again, says that he does not know about such and such a thing, he could only state what he had heard. Mr. Power knowing practically nothing, was sent here to give evidence, and of course without the papers. Mr. Walker was asked to bring the papers, but he sent Mr. Power without the papers. I think that is a very extraordinary circumstance, following up all the matters I have referred to. Mr. Walker is the man who gets the first statement back and destroys it, orders it to be destroyed. Mr. Power says it was destroyed by Walker's order. Mr. Walker who handles every account in the first statement and in the second statement, knows every detail, and all about it. He remains in Montreal until two days before he is wanted here, and then he starts for the Mediterranean, where I understand he is to be three months. I do not know whether the right hon. gentleman will keep the session going long enough for us to get him back, but I am afraid we will not do much with him this session. Now the moment that disclosure was made I moved that the proceedings be reported to this House, and I pointed out that as Mr. Walker had gone away we could only get on by getting the vouchers themselves. That as the chairman had ruled that we could not get these vouchers, that we had no right to them, the only way we could get on was to report the matter to the House and ask the House to direct that the committee should have power to look into these things. The Minister of Finance, I think, was a little shocked at the disappearance of Mr. Walker, I think it was a surprise to him that the bird had flown. While, so far as I could judge, every one of his followers on that committee was ready to vote just as he had voted before, the minister found that it would not do, and admitted that under the circumstance the proceedings should be reported to the House; and instantly that committee which was so pugnacious, so determined that we should not get at anything that was improper, became gentle as sucking doves, and not a man said a word. At every stage of the inquiry the Minister of Finance had only to hold up his finger, and every hon. gentleman supporting the government bowed assent. Now perhaps I have occupied more time than was necessary, and I conclude by moving, seconded by Mr. Bristol :

That the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company about October 1, 1905, presented to the government a statement of expenditure purporting to exhibit the sums expended by the Grand Trunk Railway Company on behalf of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company upon construction work on the Prairie and Mountain sections of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway from its inception to June 30, 1905.

That such statement was submitted to the accountant of the Department of Railways and Canals who was instructed to examine and audit the same in accordance with the provisions of the statute and agreements in that behalf.

That said accountant having examined and audited such statement did report thereon in writing to the Department of Railways and Canals (which report is now on file before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts) and did transmit such report with statements attached thereto to the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals on October 11, 1905.

That the said report and attached statements remained in the possession of the government from October 11, 1905, to November 10, 1905, during which time, as public document, they formed the basis of conferences, and communications between the Department of Railways and Canals, the Department of Justice and the Department of Finance.

2. That immediately after the presentation of the aforesaid statement to the government, the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company delivered to the Department of Railways and Canals four certificates signed by the president, second vice-president and chief engineer of the said company, whereby it was declared that the amount which the aforesaid statement set forth as expended had been in fact expended in the manner and as set forth in the said certificates—that such certified expenditure was correct and that the several portions and amounts thereof had been expended on construction work on the Prairie and Mountain sections of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway.

That the said four certificates sent to the Department of Railways and Canals were directed and addressed to the Minister of Finance and Receiver General of Canada. On their receipt by the Department of Railways and Canals the same were further certified on behalf of the government by its general consulting engineer, duly appointed in that behalf, as correctly stating the moneys earned by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in such work of construction, and were duly delivered to the said Minister of Finance and Receiver General so that such minister by virtue thereof should cause to be paid to the said Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company the sums of money thereby certified from funds in the hands of the government for that purpose pursuant to statutes relating to such company. Such certificates authorized payment of large sums of money which had been disallowed in the said audit and which had not been expended in such works of construction.

3. That the said statement of expenditure and the said certificates were and are the property of the Dominion and are essential to the full and proper understanding and investigation of the claims and accounts dealt with therein, and, as records, were and are essential to the protection and safeguard of the public interest, and of the trusts upon which the said funds are held by the government.

4. That certain statements have been detached from the report of the said accountant and have been returned or handed over to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company; and the said four certificates have been mutilated and have disappeared; and neither the statements nor the certificates are any longer in the possession of the government, or under its control.

5. That the claims, payments and accounts upon which the said statement for audit and substituted statements were based be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts for inquiry, investigation and report.

6. That the report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts presented to this House on the fifteenth day of March instant be referred back to the said committee with instructions (a) to inquire into and investigate every payment or claim upon which the said statement for audit and all substituted statements and the said certificates were based and as to the disposition made of the said statements and certificates and for that purpose to examine all necessary witnesses and all papers, vouchers, statements and documents relating to or affecting the same—and to report thereon to this House.

I omitted to say that after the auditing had begun and proceeded for some time the Department of Railways obtained from the Department of Justice a written opinion as to the meaning of the words 'cost of construction,' and the auditor says that he followed the opinion of the Department of Justice in his audit. I may say in conclusion that Mr. Power informed us that, with the vouchers in possession of the Grand Trunk, he can replace the statements referred to.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland). I feel that I will not have to detain the House at any length to answer the speech of considerable length of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) from the very fact that there is, to my mind, very little in the speech which requires answering. A motion was made in the Committee on Public Accounts by my hon. friend for the production of certain papers which were the basis of payments made by the Grand Trunk Railway Company in connection with matters pertaining to the Grand Trunk Pacific construction. That motion was defeated. The hon. gentleman moved that the proceedings of the committee to that time be reported to this House and he has told us that the object of that motion was to secure a direction of this House to the committee for the production of those papers and the investigation of those accounts. I would have thought that the hon. member would have endeavoured, and I suppose he did endeavour, but having endeavoured I would have supposed that he would have better succeeded in convincing this House that the action of the committee was an improper action, that that committee should not have done what it did in refusing to order the production of those vouchers and of the first statement which the hon. gentleman has spoken of. I for one fail to find wherein he has advanced one single argument to show that that committee was wrong in its action. He made a suggestion that if a banking institution was to be inspected, surely the inspectors could go into every item of the accounts, forged accounts and forged documents. I apprehend that hon. members of this House will readily see the distinction between the inspection of a bank and the inspection which is allowed by the Public Accounts Committee. It may be well in the first place to ascertain what the powers of the Public Accounts Committee are and to ascertain what is referred to that committee and what should be inspected by it. It is very certain that the Public Accounts Committee, being a committee of this parliament, can only investigate so far as the powers which are accorded to it by parliament allow it to investigate. It is well established in May's Parliamentary Practice, that a Standing Committee on Public Accounts can only investigate what is referred to that committee. I venture to say that that suggestion will not be controverted, that that committee can only investigate such matters as are referred to it. Now, Sir, what has been referred to the committee in this particular instance? Early in the session, on the 5th of February, on motion of Mr. Geoffrion it was ordered:

That the Public Accounts in volumes 1 and 3 of the Auditor General's Report for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1906, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

On a subsequent motion the remaining volumes of the Auditor General's Report were likewise referred to that committee. After that committee met the hon. member for St. Antoine division of Montreal (Mr. Ames) moved as follows:

That all accounts, vouchers, correspondence and other papers relating to a payment of $352,191.73 to the Grand Trunk Railway Company in connection with the purchase of Grand Trunk Pacific surveys east of Winnipeg, as set out at W—251 and W—323, et seq. of the report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1906, be produced for the use of the Select Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Public Accounts.

And also that the Auditor General be desired to produce:

The original statements and other documents submitted from month to month by or on behalf of the Grand Trunk Railway, upon which the monthly advances, amounting to $310,923.16, set forth at W—326 and W—327 of the Auditor General's Report, were made.

Those accounts were produced and were fully examined and gone into and evidence was taken day after day in relation to the accounts which the hon. member desired to investigate before that committee. During the coure of the taking of that evidence the question of the audit of moneys paid by the Grand Trunk Railway Company towards the construction of the western division of the Grand Trunk Pacific was gone into. That was a proper matter for investigation, because I find that those payments though not set out in detail, are in a bulk sum in the public accounts. Nothing pertaining to the construction of the western division of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway is mentioned in the Auditor General's Report.

All that the Auditor General's Report shows is a statement of payments on account of the eastern division of the Grand Trunk Pacific. In the Public Accounts, page 15, appears the item: Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, special account, payment, $950,174.39. I am told by the officers of the Finance Department that that is a payment in connection with the construction of the western division, and that that aggregates the whole payments made in connection with the construction of that division. There never has been, there is not now, and I apprehend there never will be the slightest objection on the part of the Public Accounts Committee, or any member of that committee, to the production of every document, every voucher, every statement connected with the payment of that sum of $950,174.39. There is no desire to burk investigation. The hon. member (Mr. Barker) knows and every hon. gentleman on that side knows that every opportunity is given them to investigate as fully, and as long as they like, every expenditure which goes to make up that item which includes every dollar up to the 30th of June, 1906, guaranteed by the government towards the construction of the western division of the Grand Trunk Pacific. What right has the Public Accounts Committee to investigate anything further. If a contractor had claimed $100,000 for extras, and if the Minister of Railways should reject $50,000 of that, will any hon. gentleman say that the Public Accounts Committee would have any right to investigate what payments were made by the contractor in connection with that $50,000 so rejected? It seems to me, that case is similar to this. The government of Canada guarantees the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific up to a certain amount. Certain of these bonds were placed on the market and netted to the company about $13,000,000. That money was deposited in various banks in Canada to the credit of the Receiver General, in trust for the Grand Trunk Pacific bondholders. The government of Canada being the guarantors of the payment of principal and interest on these bonds up to 75 per cent, have taken upon themselves to act as trustees for these bondholders and to see that this money is properly, legitimately, and economically expended, and goes into the actual cost of construction. That money does not belong to the people of Canada; that money does not belong to this government, it belongs to the bondholders in England, and it must be used in the construction of the western division of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Barker) says that we should go into matters pertaining to expenditures on the Grand Trunk Pacific, which have not been paid by the government. I maintain that the Public Accounts Committee has no more power to go into such matters than they would have to go into the $50,000 extras claimed by a contractor in the case I have already spoken of.

Mr. LALOR. There is quite a difference, because in this case the government engineer had recommended the payment of the full amount.

Mr. GERMAN. Hon. gentlemen opposite appear to be considerably exercised about the fact that the government engineer recommended the payment of this account. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Barker) had desired to be absolutely fair he would have stated the reasons given by the chief engineer as to why he certified that account. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Barker) thinks that the bondholders in England will have a suspicion of the trustworthiness of their trustees in Canada. On the contrary, after this transaction, the bondholders will feel that they have most trustworthy and reliable trustees who have been very careful to carry out the trust imposed in them. Notwithstanding, that under a mistake the chief engineer has certified that this amount was correct, the Finance Department saw fit to look into it, and the Minister of Finance held it up to good purpose, and demonstrated to the bondholders in England that he was willing and anxious to safeguard their interests, and so he refused to pay $160,000, although it was certified by Mr. Schreiber. I venture to say there is not a man in this parliament, or in Canada who will impugn the honour and integrity of Mr. Schreiber. He has been too long a public servant, he has been too long in the light of criticism, to fear any such charge. I believe it will be recognized by all that when Mr. Schreiber certified to the payment of that account he felt in his heart that he was doing what he should do. My hon. friend from Hamilton should have read what Mr. Schreiber says in reference to that matter, and which will be found at page 59 :

My position was this. In the Act of 1903, chapter 71, it described what construction was. Then in the Act of 1905, chapter 8, it also describes it, but adds one other item which I presume was an enlargement of the first Act, that is : Preliminary expenses. In the first Act these words did not appear. Preliminary expenses, I interpreted to mean expenses preceding construction, the commencement of construction. When these accounts came in and I was dealing with them, the question was raised by Mr. Shannon, and I had a talk with the Minister of Justice about it.

Q. Who was he at that time ?—A. The Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick.

Q. You had a talk with Hon. Mr. Fitzpatrick ?—A. Yes. I asked him whether I was right in including preliminary expenses and he said, yes, he thought so, but I did not explain the nature of the preliminary expenses. Therefore I certified on that, and my report went to the Finance Department, after an order in council had been passed and it remained there a little while, when Mr. Fielding, the Minister of Finance, asked me whether I was satisfied in my own knowledge as to whether the legal expenses were fair and reasonable. I answered him that I undestood the Justice Department to say they were proper charges, but that for his own satisfaction perhaps he had better refer it to the Justice Department, which he did.

Having referred it to the Justice Department, he received a letter from Mr. Fitzpatrick, the Minister of Justice, stating that he did not think these payments came under the head of preliminary expenses. The witness read that letter which is dated November 15, 1905, and is as follows :

Dear Mr. Schreiber,—I cannot think it at all doubtful that the expression 'preliminary expenses in article 1, section 5, of the mortgage schedule (A) to the Act 4 and 5 Edward VII., cap. 98, was intended not to enlarge the scope of the clause in which it was found, but merely to amplify in somewhat more particular detail the matter specified in the corresponding clause in the fifteenth section of the agreement forming schedule to the Act 3 Edward VII., cap. 71.

The clause deals with the cost of surveys and engineering, so far as its provisions bear immediately upon the present question, and I think it quite plain that such surveys and engineering must be incident to the work of construction, in order to their cost falling within the definition of 'construction work.'

It follows, in my opinion, that the words 'preliminary expenses' must be so construed as to include only such expenses as are preliminary to and connected with surveys and engineering incident to the work of construction.

It is very clear that Mr. Schreiber was entierly honest when he certified for the payment o fthe whole amount, believing as he said he did, that it came within the meaning of the term preliminary expenses, as suggested by the Minister of Justice. That being so, the statement goes to the Finance Department with the endorsation of Mr. Schreiber. The question was raised there by the Minister of Finance whether such preliminary expenses should be included in the cost of construction. He decides that they should not, and the Justice Department decides that they do not, and the Finance Department refuses to pay the amount. What is to be done ? The government refuses to pay, the company wants the money. If the company had accepted the amount the Finance Department was willing to pay, I suppose a cheque would have been issued on that statement. The statement is there, with certain items disallowed ; but the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, for purposes of their own, wanted the statement back. Why they wanted it back I do not know, and no one in this House knows, but I submit that they were entitled to get it back. It was an account which the government had refused to pay, and they said : give us back the statement, and we will make a statement which the government will accept as correct. Transactions of that kind are going on continually in the government departments. Whether the Minister of Finance should have given up the statement to the Department of Railways and Canals or not, and whether the Minister of Railways should have returned it to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company or not, are questions which those ministers are quite able to deal with, and I believe they will be ready to justify their actions to the satisfaction of this House and the country. The statement went back to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, and they made a new statement, and left out of it the $162,000 which was embodied in the old statement. The new statement comes, and of that some $47,000 is rejected by the government, and the balance paid. The hon. member for Hamilton and some of his friends claim that the Public Accounts Committee was entitled to investigate not only payments made by the government, but payments not made by the government. I contend that that committee is not for that purpose, but for the purpose of investigating payments made by the government and such payments only. The Public Accounts Committee has power to investigate only such payments as are made by the government and are referred to that committee under the procedure of parliament. The hon. gentleman wants this House to believe that we in the Public Accounts Committee were endeavouring to stifle investigation and to screen the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. I deny it. I have no objection to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company submitting a statement and to the hon. gentleman investigating it if he likes; but I say that committee had no power to compel the Grand Trunk Pacific to produce vouchers for moneys which were not paid by the government. They say: We will not produce them; we do not propose to have this question investigated by a committee of parliament; it is a matter between the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and the Grand Trunk Company, which is to be adjusted later on. The Grand Trunk Railway Company claim that they have paid certain sums in aid of the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, and they claim to be entitled to be reimbursed for those expenditures out of the bonds issued for the construction of that road. The government say they will not consent to it. Then the Grand Trunk Company have a right to turn around on the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and claim the right to be reimbursed, and they say, we do not wish our case to be prejudged by the Public Accounts Committee; and I think they are quite right in taking that position. The hon. gentleman was very particular to read the portion of the evidence regarding the absence of Mr. Walker, who was subpœnaed as a witness. In that connection also he deemed it advisable to suppress a portion of the evidence. Mr. Walker was subpœnaed, it is true, and did not appear. Mr. Power came and stated the reason why Mr. Walker was not present.

Mr. BENNETT. A good one.

Mr. GERMAN. I think he stated a very good reason, that will appeal to reasonable men if it does not appeal to the hon. member for East Simcoe. Mr. Power stated in his evidence that at the time the first subpœna was issued Mr. Walker was in the city of Washington, that he had been there for some time, that he had only returned on the Sunday prior to the meeting of the committee, that on the Monday following, being at the office, he told Mr. Power that he had received the subpœna. If the hon. gentleman had gone on in the evidence he would have found that Mr. Macdonald asked this question:

Q. Did you say Mr. Walker made arrangements to take his trip (to Europe) some time ago?—A. About four or five weeks ago he arranged with the manager for three months leave of absence and also for his passage from Boston this week for himself and family.

Would any reasonable man assert that Mr. Walker having made those arrangements for himself and his family to go to the Mediterranean, on leave of absence from the general manager of the company, should alter his plans in order to come up here and produce vouchers which his assistant, Mr. Power, could produce just as well, and the evidence with regard to which could have been given just as freely by Mr. Power. Surely no one believes that Mr. Walker went on a voyage to evade this subpoena and in order not to give evidence before the Public Accounts Committee. But hon. gentlemen opposite are continually drawing on their imagination. When they are lacking facts to establish what they desire to assert, their invention never fails them. I can see nothing wrong in the decision by the Public Accounts Committee not to investigate those accounts. I do not see how that committee could force the production by Mr. Walker or Mr. Power or the Grand Trunk Railway of those vouchers, even had these people been subpoenaed. We know well that some years ago, when an investigation was being had into certain contracts with Larkin, Connolly & Company, Mr. Michael Connolly, standing in the Committee on Privileges and Elections, refused to allow that committee to look at his book although the book was lying on the table in front of him. When Sir Louis Davies asked the witness to show that book, he replied: You shall not see it unless you take it from me by force. And the committee did not see it.

Mr. BERGERON. Yes, they did afterwards. The House compelled him to show it, and the committee looked at the book just as much as they wanted.

Mr. GERMAN. If the House compelled him to show his book, that escaped my memory; but the committee did not compel him to produce it and could not, and because they knew they could not they reported to the House.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Sir John Thompson himself made the motion.

Mr. GERMAN. I have no objection to my hon. friends taking all the advantage they can, but my point is that the committee could not compel the production.

Mr. HAGGART. That is the reason we are coming to the House.

Mr. GERMAN. I am quite satisfied. This is the proper place to come. I am defending the action of that committee and the vote I gave against a motion for the production of certain vouchers which the Grand Trunk Railway refused to produce and which the committee could not compel them to produce.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. In the Connolly case, it was not the refusal of the committee but the refusal of the witness.

Mr. GERMAN. The Grand Trunk Railway, as I understood from the solicitor—who said it loud enough in the committee so that every one could hear—would not produce those accounts before the committee. That is the position he took. The hon. gentleman has seen fit to bring the matter to the attention of this House, and if this House should order the production of those accounts, I am satisfied ; but I submit we have no more right to investigate those accounts than we have the right to investigate the business affairs of any one of the hon. gentlemen opposite. We have nothing to do with these accounts. We have never paid them and never will. The accounts are in the Finance Department which have been paid up to date, and nothing further will be paid unless hon. gentlemen opposite should get into power when they may perhaps do something of that kind. That being my position and the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) not having given us any authority——

Mr. BARKER. There is no need for it.

Mr. GERMAN. I would suppose that authority would be needed to establish the doctrine that we can go into the investigation of private accounts and the expenditure by a corporation, over which this parliament has no control, so far as its business affairs are concerned. Hon. gentlemen opposite might as well argue that we should go into the accounts of the Canadian Pacific Railway and see how their money has been expended because we have given that company millions of dollars to aid the construction of its railways. We have no more right to go into those accounts than into the payments of the Grand Trunk Railway. For those reasons I shall vote against the motion of my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Barker), who is endeavouring to compel the Grand Trunk Railway to produce their private accounts.

Mr. E. BRISTOL (Centre Toronto). The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. German) has overlooked an essential fact of this case, which is this, that the statements and documents referred to were documents belonging to the government. They did not belong to the Grand Trunk Pacific. The minute that company filed them with the Railway Department, making a claim to moneys which are in the control of this government, they became the property of the government. If I write a letter to the Grand Trunk Railway and drop it into the post, the moment I have mailed it I part with my property in it and have no more control over it. My hon. friend is too good a lawyer to suggest that I would have any right to property in any such document. If a letter which has left my possession and is received by the person to whom it is addressed becomes his property, how much more is this statement No. 1, with the vouchers attached, filed with this government, acted on by the Department of Railways, certified by an official of that department and also by the gentleman who placed it before the government in the shape of a claim, coming to the Department of Justice for consideration and finally reaching the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding)—how much more is such a document the property of the government which should never have been parted with ? If the government had never parted with that document there would be no trouble or talk about investigating the accounts of the Grand Trunk Railway. We are asking that this company which got some of the property of the government should return it. This matter touches the honour of the government. They first of all parted with the document and then failed to get it back. Why did they not get it back? The reason believed by the people is that the document and the vouchers attached cover up a fraud attempted on the people in the shape of bogus claims, which should never have been made.

Let us just deal with this matter for a moment. I find on referring to 'May's Parliamentary Practice,' 11th edition, chapter 21, page 536 :

> Parliament is invested with the power of ordering all documents to be laid before it which is necessary for its information.

There is a broad statement. I am assuming now that these documents are not the property of the people but of the Grand Trunk Railway. There still rests in parliament the power of ordering all documents to be laid before it which are necessary for its information. I submit that this is a matter which this parliament has a right to consider necessary for its information. At page 538 of the same work it is laid down :

> Returns may be moved for, either by order or addresses, relating to any public matter in which the House or the Crown has jurisdiction. They may be obtained from all public offices, and from corporations, bodies or officers constituted for public purposes by Acts of parliament or otherwise.

So that, if the document were the document of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, a company incorporated for public purposes, we should have the right to examine it, if we thought we could serve the public interest or it would be useful for our information. Now, there was not an opportunity on the part of most of the hon. members present to hear this evidence, and as it has been suggested that the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Barker) read only the parts—material to his contention, I propose to read from the evidence—and I hope that hon. gentlemen opposite will see that I give fair treatment to their side of the case—those parts that seem to me material in dealing with the questions before us. At page 6, evidence of Mr. Collingwood Schreiber, section 15 of the Act is read setting forth what is to be covered by the expression 'cost of construction.' This has been read, and I will not repeat it ; but what I will point out to this House and to the people of this country is that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, with Mr. Hays, an eminent railway authority and its president, and, at the head of the system Mr. Morse, one of the ablest men in this country, assisted by a legal staff, as the Department of Justice is, to advise what the company had a right to claim from the people of this country under that clause; mark, not a number of poor farmers unskilled in the law and needing assistance in these matters, but men of high standing occupying great public positions as the heads of a great corporation, having the same opportunity to read the Act as the Department of Justice has and acting under competent advice—this company has the audacity—I repeat it; has the audacity—to file this extraordinary claim with the government and actually to certify over signatures of these gentlemen that these Bills are correct. Suppose that it had been a case in which a claim had been made by a man in the ordinary walks of life against a fellow citizen. If the claimant had the audacity to make such a claim as this, the man against whom it was made would say that it was an effort to obtain money from him by false pretenses and would endeavour to seek redress by other methods than by conciliation and handing back the statement to be torn up. On page 7, I read as follows:

Q. The vouchers——

These are the vouchers we are now discussing.

The vouchers you refer to—where are those vouchers?—A. The vouchers themselves are in the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company's office at Montreal, but the assistant accountant will have copies of each voucher.

Q. I suppose these vouchers are really still in the control of the government?—A. Oh, yes, the government can examine them at any time under the Act.

Q. They are open to inspection at any time?—A. Certainly.

I do not know whether Mr. Schreiber is correct, but, apparently, the view he wished to give the committee was that the vouchers which these gentlemen are at so much pains to prevent us looking at are open to our inspection at any time—as certainly they should be; if they are not, there should be such legislation as would lay them open to our inspection.

On page 8, I find the following:

Q. I do not mean the engineers—I mean the accountants and clerks?—A. I might say this, I have nothing to do with the accountants, beyond that they are making their report to the deputy minister, who refers it to me.

And at page 9:

Q. As a matter of fact, is it not part of your duty—a very important part of your duty—to see that the contract is lived up to in all particulars?—A. It is, quite so, and, as I say, unless I had the proper authority, I should not pass anything that is contrary to it.

Then at page 11, in Mr. Bell's evidence:

A. That was a matter of engineering. That ran into the North Bay branch so that the cost to the commission was $288,863.67.

Then, he goes on to state the result of the audit, which also is not material at present. And on page 12:

Q. They are all Grand Trunk Railway Company vouchers?—A. All Grand Trunk Railway Company vouchers.

On page 13:

Q. There was no audit previous to that you made, was there?—A. Not to my knowledge.

And lower down on the same page:

Q. Now, we will get some information about that. Under whose instructions are you with reference to that work?—A. I report direct to the deputy minister.

That refers to the deputy Minister of Railways and Canals. At page 14:

Q. Have you got those statements here?—A. I have got my report; the report of my audit. Their statement is just a mere list of vouchers.

Q. Their statement is a mere list of vouchers? Do they leave that in your hands?—A. Yes.

Then on page 15; at the top of the page:

Q. At a subsequent meeting, you can produce them?—A. If I get an order from my chief, I will produce them here. I do not know whether they are considered the property of the department or not. They are of no value. Any information they contain you can get from the reports.

He did produce them. On page 17, about the middle of the page:

Q. You are aware, Mr. Bell, I suppose, that at any time the government can go back on this inspection of accounts?—A. I am, sir.

Q. As an accountant, why do you suppose the Grand Trunk Railway keeps its vouchers?—A. We can have access to them of course.

Q. If you want them at any time hereafter?—A. Yes.

So that Mr. Bell, as well as Mr. Schreiber, says that the officers have the right of access at any time to these vouchers. If so, why should not the members of parliament have the same right of access that the officers of the government have? On page 18:

Q. But you do not go into the details of the account as in the case where you allow the voucher?—A. Oh, yes, I give really fuller details where a voucher is disallowed. I give my reasons for disallowing it.

And on page 19:

Q. To whom do you report your objections? A I make my report direct to the deputy minister.

At page 20, Mr. Shannon states that he is comptroller and treasurer of the Intercolonial Railway at present. It is notable that as soon as Mr. Shannon had begun to do most useful work in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific his sphere of usefulness is changed. Part of his evidence is as follows :

Q. And what was your previous position ?—A. I am accountant of the Department of Railways and Canals at Ottawa.

Q. By whom were you assigned to this particular work ?—A. By the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals and the minister.

Q. Were any other officials of the department associated with you in that work ?—A. No, sir. . . . .

I think I started first somewhere about October, 1905, and my first inspection would take in up to a period of, I suppose, a month or two months before the inspection. That would cover, roughly speaking from memory, a period of over a year. . . .

Q. And audited everything prior to that date ?—A. From the very commencement of the work.

Q. From the commencement to what time, would it include September accounts ?—A. No, that would take up to June 30, 1905.

Then at page 21 :

Q. And what would that include, how far would that bring the accounts up to ?—A. That practically went over the same audit again with the addition—no, it was practically the same audit again. The reason for that audit was that they substituted a new one, so I went over the second statement and went over the work again.

Q. What do you mean by substituting a second for the first statement, what was the matter with the first statement ?—A. I took exception to a great many items in the first statement, and I had orders to go and make a second inspection and I made that audit of the new statement.

Q. You had orders from whom ?—A. From the department, the deputy minister.

Q. From the minister ?—A. The deputy minister.

Q. To re-audit what you had rejected ?—A. No, no, not at all, to re-audit the new statement, or rather not to re-audit the new statement, but to audit the statement which was then submitted, the second statement.

Q. They submitted the first statement ?—A. The first statement they submitted was withdrawn.

Q. You had rejected a number of items in it ?—A. It was withdrawn, and then there was a second sent in which I audited.

Q. Have you a copy of the first statement there ?—A. No. . . . . .

Q. Tell us what you can remember about the first statement ?—A. Well, there were certain expenditures that they would not give me any information about, so I would not allow them.

Q. How were these expenses made up ?—A. They were vouchers put in.

Q. How did they read ?—A. Well, they would read 'Legal expenses,' some were under that heading and some were simply 'Amount expended' without any details whatever.

Q. There were no details given ?—A. No, not a particle.

Q. And when you asked for details ?—A. They would not give them to me, so I would not allow them.

On page 23 :

Q. Were you accustomed to classify the cost of construction according to the subheads that are given here ?—A. I took for my guidance as to the cost of construction the interpretation of that particular clause which was given by the Minister of Justice, and I kept that always in view.

On page 24 :

Q. When you were examining from time to time, the books and vouchers of the company at Montreal, who assisted you by way of explanations on behalf of the company ?—A. Well, of course, the general auditor, Mr. Walker, was supposed to be the man I was to deal with, but Mr. McCombe, one of the principal clerks, knew more about it than Mr. Walker did, so that after questioning Mr. Walker several times I was glad to continue my questions with Mr. McCombe, who had greater knowledge than Mr. Walker of the whole business.

Further down on the same page :

Q. Any one else ?—A. Yes, I have had to go to Mr. Wainwright and to Mr. Morse.

Q. For——A. For explanations.

Q. Would the explanations they would give you be verbal ?—A. They would be verbal.

Q. Would you take no memorandum ?—A. No. If the explanations were satisfactory, I would pass the account. If they were not satisfactory, I would throw it out.

At the bottom of the page :

My recollection is that the want of explanation made me throw them out.

Page 25 :

Q. And the want of explanation then would send you to Mr. Wainwright or to Mr. Morse?—A. Send me to Mr. Wainwright or to Mr. Morse.

Q. And the explanations they would give you, none of them are carried on the face of the voucher ?—A. In most cases they were entirely unsatisfactory, and I would not allow them.

Q. In some cases they were unsatisfactory?—A. In most cases.

Q. And were those vouchers passed out for good and all?—A. As far as I was concerned they were.

By Mr. Foster :

Q. That would be a voucher on which you allowed part ?—A. No, Sir.

Q. The voucher would be passed in whole or not at all ?—A. I will give you an illustration of what I mean. There was a voucher placed before me for a considerable sum of money. I asked explanation of it. It represented a purchase of land, and they would not give me the explanation. I wanted to know how much of that land was to be used for railway purposes, for purposes of the construction of the road, and how much might be used for townsites, because I did not think, in my estimate, that they would be entitled to any more than what was necessary for the right of way, and in that case they refused to give me information, and I threw the whole thing out.

Now that last item refers to $46,000 which was divided into two, one of of $20,000 without giving the name, which was Mr. Morse, I believe, the vice-president of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Here is a gentleman occupying a high position making a claim against the government over his own signature, and other officers of equal standing, with every opportunity of getting legal advice, endeavouring to foist upon this country and upon the bondholders the cost of paying for a town site, where they knew as a matter of fact that the company only had a right to get so much railway land as might be required for the purpose of constructing the line. Any more flagrant effort to get money to which the company was not entitled than that, could not well be imagined. Then on page 26 :

Q. You were mentioning 'legal expenses' a moment ago, did you ever refuse vouchers for 'legal expenses' ?—A. I refused a great number for legal expenses.

Q. Why did you refuse them ?—A. Well, some of them had to do with what they call 'preliminary expenses.'

Q. With what ?—A. With what they call 'preliminary expenses.' I will give you an illustration. They had a lawyer here in Ottawa who was here as their representative, and who made a charge every month for legal services.

Q. In what connection ?—A. I do not know outside of legal services. I took the ground that that had nothing to do with construction, and therefore I would not allow it and threw it out. I contended that it could not have anything to do with construction, because there was no construction going on at that time.

Q. Do you recollect the amount ?—A. I could not say the amount, no.

Q. Have you any idea as to the amount of preliminary expenses that they endeavoured to pass ?—A. Oh, there are lots of preliminary expenses in here, expenses that lead up to construction.

Q. But there was a large number of items that they attempted to pass for preliminary expenses which you would not allow ?—A. They would not give me any details.

Q. Have you any idea of what they aggregate ?—A. No, in my statement I notice what I was not aware of before, that I have specified all the vouchers that I knocked out, and the reasons why. They are all set out there.

That of course relates to the second statement only. Then, skipping a few lines :

Q. Take the next one ?—A. For printing in the 'Canada Gazette,' $24, and then there is a voucher of the 'Railway and Shipping World' for a notice of application, an advertisement ; I would not allow that. The next one you see here is 'Department of Public Printing and Stationery—supplemental notice,' which is not as much, $15.40. Then there is the Bank of Montreal, expenses of the Grand Trunk officials to the Pacific coast, $3,000, and I would not allow that. That was for Messrs. Morse and Hays, they put that in there.

Q. They wanted to charge that against the western division ?—A. I would not allow it.

Q. An account there like that $3,000, would that ever come back to you ?—A. Never to me.

Q. Did you have any discussion with Mr. Wainwright about these vouchers ?—A. Mr. Wainwright said that I should have allowed them, and I said, no.

Q. You persistently refused ?—A. I persistently refused.

Q. And you believe they never came back to you in any other form ?—A. I have no reason to believe that they have ever been paid.

Q. You do not have any reason to believe that they have ?—A. No, I do not think so. These (indicating items on statement) are for notice of application.

Q. Yes, all small items. Now then come down here, what is this for, E. S. Rowe, services ?—A. That is a man who was sent out to Winnipeg, a clergyman who was down on his luck, and they wanted to provide for him, and this voucher was made out there ; they were paying him, and he was not doing very much, and I would not allow it.

Mr. Speaker, the Grand Trunk Railway Company evidently consider that charity covers a multitude of sins.

Q. How did they explain to you that it was there ?—A. They had it charged, and I wanted to know in what capacity he was there, and what he was doing, and they could not give me any satisfactory explanation, so I threw it out.

I am glad the expenditure was not in connection with putting the Bill through here at Ottawa.

Q. Evidently the Rev. E. S. Rowe got $125 per month. What is this, Mr. Wainwright, advertising, $325 ?—A. He would not give me any explanation, and I threw it out.

Q. Then there is Wm. Wainwright again, $325 ?—A. Yes.

Q. He would not give you any explanation of that either ?—A. No, and I therefore threw it out. He would not give any explanation about that.

Q. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, directors' fees, $120 ?—A. I would not allow that item, because it was not construction. It was Grand Trunk Pacific directors' fees, but my view was that it did not come within what is meant as construction and preliminary expenses, and therefore I would not allow it.

Q. C. M. Hays, trip to England, $1,132 ?—A. He went there to see the English board, but I would not allow that.

Q. Then there is London office, salaries, $4,666. That is marked 'board entries' ?—A. They wanted to charge in there a portion of the cost of the London office of the Grand Trunk Railway, and I would not allow that.

Q. Grand Trunk, directors' fees, $2,433.33 ?—A. I cut that out, too.

Q. London office, directors' fees, $2,433 ? again, that is $4,866 for London, and you would not allow that ?—A. No.

Q. Salaries and expenses of directors, $890, London office, why would you not allow that ?—A. That had nothing to do with the construction of the railway.

Q. Now with regard to the 'legal expenses.' Sir Adolphe Caron, $1,000, that would mean for promoting the Bill ?—A. I could get no details.

Q. W. J. White, Montreal, $500 ?—A. I do not remember that, I must have had good and sufficient reason for it, or I would not have cut it out.

Q. H. B. McGivern, $1,000 and $900, and $524 ?—A. That they paid to their lawyer, but I would not allow that.

By Mr. Ames :

Q. You refused all those ?—A. I refused all those.

Q. Then there is F. H. Chrysler, $825 ?—A. That was advice in connection with the drawing up of the trust and mortgage deed. As he was one of the lawyers who attended to that and had nothing to do with the construction of the road, I would not allow it.

Q. Then there is H. B. McGivern's account, $1,000, $500, $600, $150, $400, $150, $150, $150, $150, and many others. Did you ask for explanations with reference to this legal account ?—A. I asked what they were for and I could not get satisfactory answers, so I simply threw them out.

Q. That is they could not give you a satisfactory answer as to what the sums have been expended for ?—A. No.

Q. These are additional legal expenses of about $23,000 which you rejected ?—A. Which I rejected.

Q. 'Statement of amounts deducted from expenses to June 30, 1905,' then all these legal expenses, which amount, I see to about $23,322, you refused to audit ?—A. I refused to allow.

Then at the bottom of page 28:

Q. These are the amounts that you threw out ?—A. Yes, amounts that I threw out.

Q. Then there is an amount, 'F. W. Morse, for terminal lands, $20,000' and another, 'Peter Larsen, for terminal lands, $26,000,' chargeable to mountain section ?—A. About $46,000.

Q. $46,000 you refused ?—A. I refused that because they distinctly declined to give me the explanation that I wanted, and I had—I was going to say a fight—but quite a good deal of words over it.

Q. How much did you refuse in all ?—A. I could not say now.

Q. Is the statement added up ?—A. I refused $26,000 of legal expenses and I refused——

Then he was interrupted. Then we have:

By Mr. Ames :

Q. This statement here ?—A. This one representing the total amount as submitted. Here are the deductions that I have made.

Q. Could you roughly run through and say what the total amount is ?—A. There would be $70,000. According to my report that is the total.

Q. 'After making the various changes referred to, the following is the result of my investigation.' How much then did you throw out ?—A. I would have to work that out. Roughly speaking, that one would be $80,000 odd.

Q. How much ?—A. Roughly speaking, about $80,000.

Mr. BRISTOL.

Q. About $80,000 was rejected in that particular report ? Will you take now your second audit and tell us the pages it covered and how much was rejected in that ?—A. That is the next one.

Q. Is there anything prior to that?—A. As I explained before the first statement I audited, they withdrew, and they presented a second one. That is my report upon the second one.

Q. When did they present the first statement which they withdrew ?—A. That covered the same period.

Q. When did they present it ?—A. That would be some time in either September or October, 1905, I could not say.

Q. They presented their first statements in September or October ?—A. Yes, I think so.

Q. By whom was that statement prepared ?—A. By the general auditor of the Grand Trunk Railway Company or under his supervision.

Q. By Mr. Walker ?—A. By Mr. Walker.

Q. And presented to you by him ?—A. Presented to me by him.

Q. What did you do with it ?—A. I started to check it.

Q. Where is it to-day ? A. They asked to have it withdrawn as they had in it charges which they said they ought not to have had, and which belonged to other matters, and so they asked to be allowed to withdraw it. The department allowed them to withdraw it and to substitute a second account.

Q. And when the department allowed them to withdraw it, then they took back the original statement ?—A. Yes.

Q. Who allowed them to withdraw it ?—A. Speaking off-hand I should say the deputy minister or the minister, I could not say now, I know it was withdrawn.

Q. It was withdrawn and handed back to them ?—A. Yes

Q. And it contained all these items which you subsequently refused ?—A. Yes.

It contained all these items which you subsequently refused. This is very important for this reason, that it shows that the only difference between the first statement and the second statement was that in the first they were willing to claim about twice as much for legal expenses as in the second, in other words they cut the legal expenses in the second down to about one-half of what they were in the first.

Q. Do you think it contained any other items than those which you refused in the second audit and those which you passed ?—A. Yes it did.

Q. Were these rejected accounts that you have enumerated contained in the second or amended statement ?—A. Yes, because I draw attention to them here as being thrown out.

Q. Then there must have been a good many more in the first statement ?—A. Yes, there were.

Then on page 31 :

Q. On what grounds did they ask for its return ?—A. I do not know on what ground.

Q. Is there any correspondence on the subject ?—A. No.

Of course the witness is mistaken as to that, he was speaking only of his own knowledge because the correspondence is produced and must speak for itself. Then we have :

By Mr. Macdonald :

Q. And this time a new statement, in which they did not include a great number of items that you had objected to in the first, was submitted ?—A. That is correct.

Then on page 32 :

Q. I see a voucher here that says : 'William Wainwright, $3,000,' you refused to pass that ?—A. Certainly.

Q. Did you ever allow any voucher that represented promotion expenses ?—A. No, never.

Q. Did you ever have some vouchers for large amounts by Mr. Wainwright presented to you which were so indefinite that you rejected them ?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you ever ask Mr Wainwright for an explanation ?—A. I did.

Q. Did you get any satisfactory answer ?—A. There was no satisfactory explanation and I cut them out.

Q. There were presented to you vouchers covering expenditures for large amounts on the part of Mr. Wainwright, which you refused to pass ?—A. Yes, I think there were one or two.

By the Chairman :

Q. What do you call large amounts ?—A. I do not recall from memory, $6,000 or $7,000 probably.

Then at page 33 :

Q. Tell us anything you can about the rejection of certain accounts which Mr. William Wainwright presented, which you have not any definite record of, of which you could not get any explanation ?—A. As to the amounts I could not say now, there would certainly be several thousand.

Q. More than several thousand ?—A. I would not like to say the amount now, because it was over a year ago or more, and I would not like to say. I would ask him, 'What was this for ?' He would not tell me, and I would say, 'Very well, if you won't tell me, I will throw it out,' and I did.

Then at page 34 :

Q. Was there anything particular in these items of Mr. Wainwright's included in the first account which you did not allow which marked them out specially from any other items which you did not allow, on account of not coming within the cost of construction ?—A. No, certainly not.

Q. There was nothing about them that gave rise to any particular impressions ?—A. Certainly not.

Q. As a matter of fact the company were endeavouring to charge up in these two preliminary accounts the expenses of every character in connection with the preliminary inauguration of the company ?—A. I judged so.

Now Mr. Speaker, we have heard quite fully as to the statements referred to and first of all I want to present this idea to the government and to the House, that the Grand Trunk Company in the first place had no right whatever to this statement number one, that it was a document which belonged to the government of Canada and one which they should have kept, as a claim was made against them upon it and it should have been retained with the certificate attached to it or in connection with it. If you reflect for a moment you will see that the sole object that the Grand Trunk Pacific or the Grand Trunk Railway could have had in getting back statement number one, and the certificates attached to it was to cover up what I venture to submit was an attempted fraud on the government and people of this country and on the bondholders because the second statement which they presented was precisely the same as the first except that they eliminated from the second statement some $88,000 which they attempted to steal or to get wrongfully in the first statement. There was no reason in the world, as a matter of business, why statement number one should have been returned, at least there was no more reason why number one should be returned, than that the Grand Trunk should have asked for a return of statement number two, because statement number two was not allowed in whole, $74,000 was taken off number two and $162,000 off number one. What earthly necessity was there for the Grand Trunk to get back the first statement except to shield those unmentionable items on which, as I will show, they were not only unwilling to furnish vouchers but to afford the slightest information. It is perfectly ludicrous if an account is presented and you are willing to pay $662,000 of that account to say that there should be a necessity for a substitution of accounts. There is no difference whether it is paid on the one statement or the other, the company gets only the same amount of money and you have disallowed the same items in number two as in number one except that in number one you disallowed a few more. There was no business necessity of any sort, kind or description for the Grand Trunk to get back into its hands statement number one with the certificate of Mr. Morse and the others that it was a valid statement of expenditure for construction, absolutely none, because the only difference was that they filed another statement in which they presented $88,000 less of the fraudulent claims they made at first. Had the government sent them a cheque in respect to statement No. 1, and said we will allow you $662,000 and no more, nothing would be gained by the Grand Trunk Pacific filing the second statement, for they would simply be putting themselves to additional expense for nothing. Let us see the reason suggested by the Grand Trunk Pacific for asking to get back this statement which did not belong to them. Mr. W. H. Walker, their general auditor writes, on November 9, 1905, to Mr. Butler, Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals. (page 41 of evidence).

Dear Sir,—Will you kindly return statements of expenses which Mr. Shannon took with him to complete his audit, as I wish to amend them.

It was not to destroy them that he wanted them back; it was to amend them. Do you believe that if the Grand Trunk Pacific auditor had written to the Department of Railways that they wanted these statements back to destroy them, the Department of Railways would have allowed him to get them into his possession again? The department would not dare to do so, because it would be the destruction and mutilation of a public document, and every one connected with it would be guilty of a crime. Mr. Walker further says:

Also the certificates which will have to be re-drawn to correspond.

Whose certificates were they? They were the certificates of these railway magnates, men who, above all others, in making a claim of this kind, should have seen that it was an honest, and proper, and correct claim, under the terms of the mortgage trust deed. They naturally wanted to get back these incriminating documents, because, if they did not, these documents would remain for all time on the records of the country, a menace to their reputation, as they are today. I want to lay emphasis on that letter, because, so far as the Grand Trunk is concerned, that letter is the only basis on which this government could have considered the handing over of that document out of their possession. I venture to submit that the Grand Trunk did not give a proper, or a reasonable, or a business reason, for the return of that document. What was it necessary to amend? There was nothing on earth to amend, because they were not going to include, in the second statement, any other valid claims than they had already presented. The fact was they were going to withdraw a certain number of claims that they were so absolutely ashamed of as rotten that they had not the face to keep them on the public records. My quarrel with the government is that they should have allowed an important record dealing with a public transaction to be gotten out of their possession on any such plea. I say, Sir, that if the government do not take action, then they are privy to the destruction of this document. It is the duty of the government to require from the Grand Trunk the return of this document, and the certificates, as their property, and the duty is cast on the Minister of Justice to enforce the law of the land, and to see that neither the Grand Trunk, nor anybody else, no matter how great, how rich, how important, can destroy the public records of Canada with impunity. My hon. friend (Mr. Ames) reminds me that on November 10, 1905, Mr. L. K. Jones, secretary of the Department of Railways, writes to Mr. Walker, of the Grand Trunk:

Sir,—In compliance with the request contained in your letter of yesterday's date, I return herewith, by direction, four certificates, of the president, vice-president, general manager, and chief engineer of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, as to expenditure on the Mountain and Prairie sections of that railway, the same being required, you state, for the purposes of modification.

Where was the necessity for any modification? The only modification they made was to destroy the evidence of their guilt, and to present a new document which was so bad that to the extent of $74,000 it was disallowed by the auditor acting for the government. This is a matter which affects the honour of the government of this country; it affects the honour of the government even more than if they were acting for the people of this country, because they are acting as trustees of these bonds, and it is the first duty of the government to see that these documents are returned forthwith by the Grand Trunk Pacific and placed on the files of the department. If they do not return them, and if they cannot make such explanation as will satisfy the government, then they should be punished. Would anybody in this country have dared to do such a thing, unless they felt their influence with the government, unless they controlled the administration to such an extent, or the friends of the administration to such an extent that they would be afraid to publish them; would any one else in this country have dared to do what the Grand Trunk Pacific did? But something more happened. They have not only destroyed this document, but as soon as this investigation comes up, that very day—if we can take Mr. Walker's statement, and I don't care to take it at the present time—that very day, there was a sudden call for him to get three months' leave of absence. It was just one month, or four weeks, before Mr. Walker disappeared from the scene, that this matter was brought to light in the Public Accounts Committee. No other citizen, unless a railway magnate in the position of Mr. Walker, would dare to flaunt a committee of this House as that gentleman has done. What are we told? We are told that Mr. Walker had gone to Washington. On the 5th of March his department in Montreal knew he was wanted here. Is there any evidence that they sent him a telegram, or made the slightest effort to get him here? There is none. We only know from the witness who attended—and that in an incidental way, because Mr. Walker did not even do him the honour to tell him he had received a notice—we only know in an incidental way that Mr. Walker made arrangements to go to Europe as soon as this scandal came on the scene. I use the word 'scandal' advisedly. My hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) says that Mr. Walker sent someone in his place. Well, I state without fear of contradiction that wherever it was essential for Mr. Power—who was supposed to have come in Mr. Walker's place—to know anything about this transaction, he absolutely knew nothing, and never had anything to do with it. Probably there is some one in the Grand Trunk office in Montreal who does know something about it, but he is not sent here. And so we were not able to get from Mr. Power, in evidence, any information about the items in this document, and indeed he will not even say that he ever discussed any of the items with Mr. Walker. But we do get from Mr. Power this information: That there are to-day in the possession of the Grand Trunk Railway Company the vouchers, or the alleged vouchers, from which this statement 'No. 1' was made up, so that if this House does its duty to the people of Canada and requires the statements and certificates to be produced, Mr. Power says the Grand Trunk can make up a precisely similar statement and hand it back, and also that, if necessary, they could supply the vouchers. We, therefore, have it that one witness has disappeared, and that in his place another witness comes here who knows nothing about the matter. Under such circumstances, the least the House can do for the preservation of its own honour is to require every thing to be produced by the Grand Trunk Railway, or the Grand Trunk Pacific, that can throw any light on this extraordinary transaction. I want to read to the House (page 43 of the evidence) a copy of the report, of date October 11, 1905, made by Mr. Leonard Shannon, the accountant, in reference to this matter; I read the last portion of it, which is relevant to the question before us:

> I would draw attention to the item of proportion of preliminary expenses in the statement of the Prairie section, amounting to $106,433, this being a portion of a voucher submitted to me for $162,000, in round figures, but which subvouchers to the extent only of $106,650 were shown me—an amount in excess of the proportion charged—but the details were insufficient to enable me to state whether they were a proper charge against the Prairie section or not.

Instead of $162,000, it should be $106,433. You will see that only in respect of the $106,433 was there any subvouchers produced, and they were so indefinite that the accountant could make nothing out of them, whereas as regards $55,000 of the amount it appears that there was nothing but a statement from the manager that it was spent and an absolute refusal on the part of Mr. Wainwright and Mr. Morse to give any statement as to how the money was spent. Although these gentlemen refused to give the auditor any such statement, they had the audacity over their own signatures to file a claim against the Railway Department for that very money about which they were unwilling to give the slightest information. I venture to say that that is trifling with the committee and with the people o fthe country. Having had the audacity to certify that that was a proper expenditure, they should have had the manliness to give the auditor some statement as to what it was spent for, whether it was for constructing parliaments or constructing railroads. One would think that $162,000 was a fair amount for preliminary expenses. It certainly is a larger amount than most of us would expect to pay to get a railway charter through this House. But we have this extraordinary state of facts—I refer to the evidence of Mr. Power on page 77:

> Q. Would the promotion expenses be chargeable to, say, the western division, the whole of it?—A. No, they should be pro rata.
> Q. Did you pro rata them?—A. I believe they were.

So that this extraordinary sum of $162,000 for promotion expenses was only the pro rata portion charged to the western division. Under such circumstances I feel constrained to believe that the First Minister will not permit a matter of this kind to go uninvestigated, and that he will not sanction a public document, the property of this country, being taken from the files of a government department where it was placed for the protection of the interests of the people of this country.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE (South Essex). Mr. Speaker, when this debate began I thought there was a very simple matter to be discussed by this House, but after listening to the fiery talk of the hon. gentleman who has just sat down, I have almost come to the conclusion that the Grand Trunk Railway Company ought to be arrested and tried for attempting to defraud, padding accounts and presenting bogus claims, and that the Minister of Finance should be dealt with as a fellow-conspirator with Mr. Schreiber, an old and respected official of the government.

Mr. BRISTOL. Will the hon. gentleman pardon me? I made no attack on the minister of Finance or on Mr. Schreiber, directly or indirectly.

Mr. CLARKE. Does the hon. gentleman take advantage of his position in the House to attack only the Grand Trunk Railway Company and not the government or any member of the government?

Mr. BRISTOL. I thought my attack was fairly plain.

Mr. CLARKE. If the hon. gentleman's attack in such fiery terms is justified, what is to be said of Mr. Schreiber, that old and respected employee of the government, who passed this monstrous charge of $162,000, thinking that it was a proper charge? What are the facts of the case, and what is it that the House has to deal with? With regard to the sum of $162,000, the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company presented a statement to the government. They were not asking the government to pay that sum of money to them out of the moneys of the government. They were asking to have it paid out of their own moneys, moneys which the government of Canada held in trust, not for the bondholders only, not only to see that the guarantee of this country was respected, but primarily for the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. It was the money of that company, money which they must pay, and because, forsooth, accounts between that company and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, which are perfectly proper apparently, are presented to this government hon. gentlemen opposite say it is an outrage for them to ask for an advance to be made out of their own moneys—moneys which they ultimately will have to pay. As I understand, that is the position of this trust fund; it is a debt of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. The only interest the government of Canada have in that sum is to see that they are protected in guaranteeing seventy-five per cent of the cost of the railway to the bondholders in respect to the expenditure of that amount of money. It is only necessary to rehearse what has been done to see how utterly ridiculous is this great agitation over this matter. The government have not paid any of this money that is objected to; the government do not intend to pay any of it.

Mr. TAYLOR. What do they change their auditor for?

Mr. CLARKE. I do not know anything about changing the auditor. Is it suggested by hon. gentlemen opposite that there is a fear that the government is going to pay this sum? One would think, from the scornful terms in which they denounce the transaction, that they thought the money should be paid by the government to the Grand Trunk Pacific Company. I think they pay a high tribute to the Finance Minister by showing that he has prevented this great fraud which they alleged was attempted to be perpetrated, thus saving to the people of Canada $162,000, because that is the result of their argument. An attempt has been made to censure the Public Accounts Committee. I think that committee would have been liable to grave censure if it had given effect to the desires of hon. gentlemen opposite. What is the position of this matter? In the first place, claims are sent into the government, and they must be paid. The government does not come to the Public Accounts Committee to ask whether an account should be paid or not. They are charged with the responsibility of paying it, and they pay it. They bring down their reports to this House, the Public Accounts and the Auditor General's Report, in order that these payments may be investigated, and the Public Accounts Committee is appointed by this House to inquire into such matters as are referred to it by this House. Now, what was referred to that committee? On the 5th of February last the Public Accounts and the Auditor General's Report were brought down and referred to the Public Accounts Committee to examine into. That is the authority they have; they have no power to go further than that, and it would be improper for them to go further. Mr. Bourinot's work on page 546 says:

> It is a clear and indisputable principle of parliamentary law that a committee is bound by and is not at liberty to depart from the order of reference.

The order of reference to the Public Accounts Committee, as I understand it, is to inquire into Public Accounts and the Auditor General's Report, which had been sent to that committee.

Mr. TAYLOR. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to submit a question? I know he does not want to make a false statement, but he has just stated that on the 5th of February the Public Accounts and the Auditor General's Report were brought down and were referred to the Public Accounts Committee. Was he not present to-day when the last part of the Auditor General's Report was brought down and referred to the committee?

Mr. CLARKE. The hon. gentleman is no doubt right. On the 5th of February it was only parts 1 and 3 that were brought down; to-day it is part 2 that is brought down. I am glad to be corrected. This is the way this matter came on in the Public Accounts Committee. Here is their text and headline, and the procedure of the committee reminds me of a preacher who starts out with a text and then forgets all about it and preaches about something else altogether.

> The committee proceeded to the further consideration of the payment of $352,191.73 to the Grand Trunk Railway Company in connection with surveys purchased for the National Transcontinental Railway Company, as set out at pages W—251 and W—323 of the Auditor General's Report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906.

If you refer to the items mentioned there, you will find that the first item is for purchase of Grand Trunk Pacific surveys east of Winnipeg, and the second is a summary of Grand Trunk Pacific surveys east of Winnipeg, taken over by National Transcontinental Railway Commission. The committee were dealing with the items concerning the construction east of Winnipeg but they investigated nothing east of Winnipeg. What they interested themselves in was the expenditure on the Prairie and Mountain section west of Winnipeg. Of course they had the power to do that, but certain gentlemen on that committee, not content with departing form their text to this extent, want to go still further astray and investigate something which is not in the public accounts or the Auditor General's Report at all. That, I submit, they have no right to do. Some hon. gentlemen on that committee may think it proper to look into things which are not the concern of this government, but in my opinion every man in this country will do well if he does his own work and does not give his time and attention to other peoples' affairs. I was not in the committee when this matter was up; but if I had, I would have voted with the majority, and I have not heard any reason given by hon. gentlemen opposite why the Public Accounts Committee should go into matters which do not properly come under the subjects committed to them. But one hon. gentleman has suggested that if the committee had not the right to go into these matters, this House is competent to give them that right. I agree with that view. Parliament can do any thing, but parliament must act with reason. And when we are asked to authorize the Committee on Public Accounts to investigate certain matters, I think that those who submit that request ought to show what public interest is to be served by our doing so. They ought to show what public benefit is to accrue from ordering any committee to waste time and expense investigating a claim in which this government is not interested—a claim that has not been paid and concerning which there is no demand that it should be paid by this government. True at one time a claim was made for certain payments, but that is not so extraordinary after all. Here are two railway companies closely connected, one of which is financing the other. Their officers are practically the same and the items in question will no doubt be charged by the one against the other, and they evidently took the ground that all the expenses in connection with these accounts should be sent in to the government and 75 per cent of the same paid. Those were in the first account which was sent in and which was the beginning of the active discussion between the railway company and the government. The question in dispute was not then understood and was referred to the then Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) for his opinion. Then it was found, in the opinion of the Minister of Finance, backed up by that of the Minister of Justice, that these were matters which did not come within the scope of the original Act under the head of construction expenses. In September or October, 1905, the Grand Trunk Pacific said: We want some money; we have spent over $900,000; here is a statement showing these expenditures. They did not, it is true, send their vouchers. Much has been said about the vouchers. Who should have them? Whose property are they? Are they not vouchers for money expended by the railway company? They are not vouchers for expenditures made by the government. Who then is entitled to keep them if not the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Mr. AMES. Are they in the possession of the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Mr. CLARKE. I do not know whether they are or not. As far as the government is concerned, it does not make a bit of difference whether they are in the possession of the Grand Trunk Pacific or the Grand Trunk Railway.

Mr. AMES. Have we any agreement with the Grand Trunk Railway?

Mr. CLARKE. I do not think that any one who has watched the proceedings for three or four years is going to get up and say that the two companies are not very closely connected. The one is financing the other and the same people are interested in both. Why should we care whether the vouchers are kept in the vaults of the one or the other company? They are vouchers for expenditure by one or the other of these companies and are required in case the same claim might be made a second time upon either of them. It is idle to say that they should be stored away in the vaults of the government and to talk about the people who hold the bonds being alarmed because we do not get these vouchers back from the Grand Trunk Railway and put them into the government vault. What the bondholders and the stockholders are much more concerned in is in seeing our Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) watching these things and safeguarding their interests rather than in knowing whether or not certain vouchers are deposited with the one company or with the other or with the government.

When that first claim was sent in, it contained these items under the head of preliminary expenses. We have the report of Mr. Shannon and I have not heard that he is a man to be attacked or questioned in any way. He was the accountant in the Department of Railways and Canals, and he went to Montreal and examined the vouchers and made his report. His report will be found on page 43 of the evidence. Was there any attempt by him to cover up any thing or defraud or deceive any body? Let us see what he said. On the 11th of October, 1905, he wrote the following letter to Mr. Butler the deputy minister:

Sir,—Pursuant to instruction I made an inspection last week of the books, vouchers, &c., of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway in Montreal, to ascertain the amount of expenses made by the Grand Trunk Pacific upon the Prairie and Mountain sections of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway from its inception to June 30, 1905, and have the honour to report as follows:

Prairie section.

Expenditure..	$241,505 76
Less refunds..	317 28
	$241,188 48
Add proportion of preliminary expenses..	106,433 00
Add proportion of general and legal expenses..	88,465 66
Total..	$436,087 14

Mountain section.

Expenditure..	$ 49,232 82
Add proportion of general and legal expenses..	47,702 57
Total..	$ 96,935 39

The point about his report is that he says that out of a sum of $162,000 which was claimed, he allowed only $106,433 for preliminary expenses. He does not close the matter there but makes special reference to it in the last clause of his report:

I would draw attention to the item of proportion of preliminary expenses in the statement of the prairie section, amounting to $106,433, this being a portion of a voucher submitted to me for $162,000, in round figures, but which subvouchers to the extent only of $106,650 were shown me—an amount in excess of the proportion charged—but the details were insufficient to enable me to state whether they were a proper charge against the Prairie section or not. If it is thought to be a proper charge against this section, then the total of that section as given by me in this report will be correct. If not, that total should be reduced accordingly.

There is a very businesslike report. Mr. Shannon says that items aggregating $162,000 were sent in, that vouchers were not produced for all, and that of the vouchers which were produced certain ones were rejected, and he allowed $106,433. What happened next? That went into the hands of Mr. Schreiber, the engineer of the western division of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Mr. Schreiber consulted the then Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Mr. Schreiber told the Minister of Justice that certain preliminary expenses were in this account and asked if they should be paid. He did not say what the nature of these preliminary expenses were, and the minister told him that, under the Act of 1905, the preliminary expenses were a proper charge, and therefore Mr. Schreiber certified and passed them on.

He sends them in to his chief, and then, on the 19th of October, they are sent to the Minister of Finance. In some way which does not appear by the evidence, between the 19th of October and the 9th of November, the matter was brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance with his deputy minister, Mr. Courtney. Mr. Shannon was present when they discussed the matter, and the conclusion was come to by the minister that this was an item which did not pertain to the construction of the railway, and should be rejected. And that was the end of it so far as they were concerned. And the Grand Trunk Pacific, instead of pressing this claim or saying that they must have the money, asked that the statement be sent back saying that they would send a new one. According to the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) that was a great crime. This statement contained items which, in the opinion of the Minister of Finance should not be there, on the ground that they were preliminary expenses, and, as stated by the Minister of Justice, subsequently in his report, he thought that 'preliminary expenses' meant only 'preliminary' in the work of construction and not 'preliminary' in the sense in which they were charged. But the company asked to have the report back saying that they would send in a new one. It was sent back and was destroyed;—not destroyed for any particular purpose, not destroyed after this investigation was begun, but destroyed as such things are usually destroyed and for the sufficient reason that it had answered its purpose. This was made up of figures from their books, and the books were not destroyed. It was a mere clerical statement, sent in and being rejected it was sent back, and, being of no further importance, it was destroyed. And for this they have been branded as having been guilty of fraud and almost of every crime in the calendar. It is loudly contended that it was a crime for the government to part with the statement. If so, Mr. Speaker, it it is a crime that is committed every day by business people; it is a crime that I have committed very often myself. Surely there is nothing uncommon, when a statement is sent in on a wrong basis, to have it returned that it may be sent in on a right basis. And that was what was done in this case, and, the usefulness of the old statement being gone, the paper was destroyed. For my part, I cannot see that there was any great crime about that. If it were done for an improper purpose, or if any fraud were attempted by its destruction, it would be a different thing. But there was nothing of that sort. The company simply said: We concede your ruling; send us back the account and we will put in a new account from which these items are omitted. They put in the new account, and the account was allowed. And now hon. gentlemen say: We are not satisfied with the action of the Minister of Finance in disallowing it, or with the act of the railway company in doing what we think they ought to have done; we want to go further and investigate a claim for which no account is made, which does not interest the public and relates entirely to the domestic business of these railways. Much has been said about Mr. Walker having disappeared. Well, is it not a common thing in this country for a head official, who is summoned, to send his subordinate to take his place? If you look at the evidence of Mr. Shannon, you see that Mr. Walker, personally, knew very little about the matter. On page 24 of the evidence, Mr. Shannon testified referring to the audit in Montreal:

Q. When you were examining from time to time, the books and vouchers of the company of Montreal, who assisted you by way of explanations on behalf of the company?—A. Well, of course, the general auditor, Mr. Walker, was supposed to be the man I was to deal with, but Mr. McCombe, one of the principal clerks, knew more about it than Mr. Walker did, so that after questioning Mr. Walker several times, I was glad to continue my questions with Mr. McCombe, who had greater knowledge than Mr. Walker of the whole business.

In view of this, is it not idle to make so much ado about Mr. Walker not coming here? These were clerical matters. Mr. Walker does not expend these moneys, or control the finances of the company. He is a man with clerks under him, and we have the evidence of the government auditor, that Mr. Walker personally knew very little about the details of the matter. Of course, it is wrong for a man to disobey a subpœna from the Public Accounts Committee or any other committee of this House; but there does not appear to be any suggestion that it is done from any improper motive. True, to obey the summons was contrary to his convenience; he had taken his passage for the old country. He said: I do not know about this matter of detail as much as the clerks in my office do. Even if he had come, it is a matter that the committee could not go into, because it was not before the committee, and they would be usurping the powers of the House if they went into a matter that was not before them. It appears to me that the motion has no merit; that the Public Accounts Committee acted properly and in accordance with constitutional authority, and that if we pass this motion it will encourage intermedling with the business of other people with which the Canadian public is not concerned.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). My hon. friend from South Essex (Mr. Clarke) seldom addresses this House. With the ability which he possesses and which hon. members know him to possess, we must all regret that when the hon. gentleman does speak he should not have a better case to support. From the outset one could plainly see that his heart was not in his work. And how could it be when we consider this matter in the light of the history of this Grand Trunk Pacific concern? Why, from its very inception, this concern has been regarded by the people of Canada with distrust. What is its history? A great railway company came to this House asking for authority to construct a railway from North Bay to Winnipeg and westward. At the very outset, they were taken by the throat and compelled to desist from the work they had undertaken. A party of Quebec politicians forced them to agree to build their road from the city of Quebec. But, no sooner was it announced that they had made this concession than they were taken by the throat by a party of maritime province politicians, and compelled to agree to another extension. They were subject to punderblundering—which is a new word coined in the United States; and there has been a good deal of this punderblundering. My hon. friend from South Essex has said little, so little devolves upon me to answer. He started out by saying that my hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) had attacked Mr. Schreiber. Well, I heard no word of attack upon Mr. Schreiber. I did hear from my hon. friend from Centre Toronto a plain statement of the facts showing the attitude of the Department of Railways and Canals, and I am ready to reiterate every word that was said by the hon. gentleman. No man will attempt to contradict my statement when I say that it was not the fault of the Department of Railways and Canals that this account did not pass, whatever credit may be given to the Department of Finance. The account was passed on, and passed on under circumstances of the most suspicious nature. Mr. Schreiber, although the deputy head, felt so fearful of the position he occupied in the passage of this account after the intervention and opposition of Mr. Shannon, the accountant of the department, that he sought the assistance of the Department of Justice. And what did the Department of Justice tell him? They told him, practically, that in view of the facts, it was better not to pay the account. Yet, for some unknown reason the accounts were pushed onward by the Department of Railways and Canals. Whether any credit is due to the Minister of Finance or not, I notice that he is quite anxious to condemn the Department of Railways and Canals so that he may get a little praise for himself. I am not sure that the honour and credit of stopping this account is not in reality due to the then deputy minister, Mr. Courtney, rather than to the Minister of Finance.

Be that as it may, I say it is to the credit of the Finance Minister that after this account had run the guantlet—I do not think it had much of a gauntlet to run in the Department of Railways and Canals—it was stopped in the Department of Finance. So much for any attack that has been made on Mr. Schreiber. Now my hon. friend says: What is there in this whole thing? it is only an account dealing with trust money. Why, is not the dignity, the honour and the credit of this country something that we need to guard in the old country? Yet my hon. friend says these are only trust moneys. True, the people of Canada have imposed upon their government the duty of seeing that these moneys are properly administered, but the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Clarke) says that is nothing. Well, the honour and credit of this country, according to the English press, does not stand so pre-eminently high that we need not be jealous of it. Let me read the following that appeared lately in the Yorkshire 'Post' under the date of January 4. The writer who signs himself 'Victim' writes:

It is impossible for him to use language strong enough in warning young architects, engineers and land surveyors to avoid Canada until honest, fair and more straightforward principles are adopted by the Dominion government. He warns the British capitalists and wealthy insurance companies to beware of Canadian agents, whether representing government railways or loan companies.

That is a pretty serious accusation to appear in the public press. Yet the hon. gentleman says, with a wave of his hand, that we should have no regard for the honour and dignity of the government of Canada when it comes to dealing with trust moneys. Now, coming down to the argument that we should not go into these accounts at all by reason of the fact that no details of expenditure are in the Auditor General's Report, that is not the rule, as I understand it at all. The rule is that a committee has every right to deal with public accounts as well as with the Auditor General's Reports. By referring to the public accounts of this year, on pages 14 and 15, you will find these very items on both pages. But even if they were not referred to there, will not the object of the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) be served if this reference is permitted, and if it is allowed to go to the committee?

Then my hon. friend finished up by saying: What about these vouchers anyway? Why, they are all safe in the vaults and in the offices of the Grand Trunk Railway Company at Montreal. Nobody disputes the right of the Grand Trunk to keep those vouchers in their custody; all we are asking is the privilege of inspecting those vouchers, to find reasons why the accounts contained therein were paid. Nobody is asking that the vouchers should be taken from the company, we are simply asking to inspect them. Now what has been the attitude of the Public Accounts Committee on this question? Has it been a judicial attitude? Have hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House met this matter in a judicial manner? Why, when a motion was made on one occasion that a certain witness, Mr. Walker, should produce certain documents, what happened? Hon. gentlemen opposite would not allow Mr. Walker even to come into the room with the documents. They insisted that we should not allow Mr. Walker to be brought there under a duce tecum subpœna at all, they would not even give him an opportunity to come into the Public Accounts Committee to answer for himself; but they were to stand at the very threshold, the guardians of the public expenditure, and practically intimidate this witness, and tell him that he must not answer any questions that were asked him. And further, to fortify themselves these hon. gentlemen, by voting down a resolution to call him, advised him in the first place not to come to the committee; they practically said to him: At all events, if you do come, by all means do not bring the documents with you. Now my hon. friend tries to excuse the absence of this auditor, Walker, and he endeavours to gloss over the fact by saying that Walker was not an important witness. I want to direct attention to page 74 of the evidence where this question was asked of Mr. Power:

Q. What became of the first statement?—A. It was destroyed.

Q. By whom?—A. I do not know.

Q. How do you know it was destroyed?—A. Because I know Mr. Walker gave instructions to have it destroyed, and told me himself it was destroyed.

Q. Coming from your superior officer, he told you himself that he had ordered it to be destroyed?—A. And he asked in my presence——

Q. How do you know he gave orders to have it destroyed?—A. Because he sent for the clerk and asked him in my presence if he had destroyed them.

Now surely my hon. friend will say that a man occupying that position in the Grand Trunk service, who sent to a subordinate clerk to come to his presence and asked him if he had destroyed statements, was not a superior officer of that department. Does the hon. gentleman say that the witness who was produced in lieu of the auditor had power to have done what the auditor did? It is idle for the hon. gentlemen to argue that Mr. Walker has not committed a breach of decency, if parliament has any rights, when he tells a committee of this House that he cares not what parliament wishes him to do, he is going to bid defiance to it. Surely parliament is coming to a pretty pass when every man in the country who may be concerned in an inquiry can simply tell parliament that he is going about his own business, and bid defiance to parliament. It will surely be worse than that for the dignity of parliament and for the government, backed up by a majority, to say that Walker did right, and that any inquiry further along the lines suggested need not be pursued.

Now I do not propose to go into this lengthy evidence, as it is fresh in the minds of the members of the committee. But I do say that the dignity of parliament is at stake in this whole question. From its very inception there has been a well grounded theory that there was something radically wrong in the expenditures of this Grand Trunk Pacific. Viewed from every point, men have banded themselves together in order to attack the honour of the government, or such as they thought it, in the matter of contracting for this railway. What do I read in the 'Canadian Gazette' as to one company that was formed in this country in respect of this very railway? It shows on the part of these gentlemen an idea that there was something radically wrong in this government with respect to the contracts of the Grand Trunk Pacific and that favoured contractors would be able to get advantages from the government itself. Now what happens in the year 1906? A large number of wealthy capitalists came over to this country from Belgium. These gentlemen came, knowing that this transcontinental road was about to be undertaken, and as soon as these men landed in this country, how were they approached? They were told by some person who was behind the scenes that if they hoped to get any advantages in the way of contracting, there was only one way to attain them.

How was that? To go into the open and the honest market and tender? No, Sir, to ally themselves and buttress themselves with friends of the government. That is true, the facts prove themselves. What happened? They were told that there were two gentlemen in the city of Montreal, Messrs. Galibert & Gauthier, one a leather merchant and the other an accountant, and that they had better ally themselves with these two gentlemen because it would likely prove an entry and a passport to securing a contract on the Transcontinental Railway. What more happened in the province of Ontario? I am sorry the Minister of Justice is not in his place. These gentlemen were told that it was necessary for their success in contracting to go up to the village of Aurora, north of Toronto and secure the cooperation of a gentleman there who is president of the Liberal association in that riding, a gentleman who owns a very small business in the way of a foundry and if they wanted to secure another power behind the throne, to enlist the services of J. B. Tudhope, a carriage manufacturer in Orillia. Why? Because Mr. Tudhope was desired by the Liberal party to be a candidate in that riding at the next general election and in all probability if they secured the services of Mr. Tudhope they would be able to secure a contract, Who are these gentlemen? They are high sounding names to associate with these gentlemen in Canada. Here is the notice:

Public notice is hereby given that under the Companies' Act, 1902, letters patent have been issued under the seal of the Secretary of State of Canada, bearing date the 19th day of January, 1906, incorporating Vicomte Louis Charliers de Buisseret, gentleman; Eugene Fichefet, contractor; Baron Constant Giffinet, minister plenipotentiary; Louis Goffin, engineer; Louis Grenier, engineer; Gerard Macquet, engineer; Comte John d'Oultremont (Grand Marechal de la Cour); Armand Rouffart, engineer; Edmont Rouffart, doctor of medicine, all of Brussels, Belgium, except Louis Grenier, who resides at Ghent, Belgium, and Louis Charliers de Buisseret, who resides at Seneffe, Belgium; James B. Tudhope, of the town of Orillia, in the province of Ontario, merchant; Henry W. Fleury, of the town of Aurora, in the said province of Quebec, merchant; Paul Galibert, merchant, and Thomas Gauthier, accountant, both of the city of Montreal, in the province of Quebec, for the following purposes.

Then it goes on to cite the powers to be given to the company.

Mr. PARDEE. What is the company's name?

Mr. BENNETT. The Empire Construction Company of Canada. It startled the villagers in Aurora when they found that these humble individuals from there had embarked with these gentlemen in this imperial company. This is part of the suspicion that has been engendered all through the country.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. Has the Empire Company got a contract?

Mr. BENNETT. I am glad the hon. gentleman has suggested that to me because otherwise I would have forgotten the point. Yes the Empire Company sent a gentleman out here and he got a little afraid of the company and he asked on behalf of the Empire Company that the giving of contracts should be delayed for a week, and I want to say here that some of the commissioners, as I have been well informed, were favourable to delaying the granting of contracts for a week, but the majority prevailed against it and the Empire Company did not tender.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT. It was no fault of the Empire Company that they did not get in on a contract and it was no fault of the gentleman who suggested to the Empire Contract Company the taking in of those four gentlemen that the Empire Company did not get a contract.

So I say from the outset all through the dealings with this Grand Trunk Pacific Company there has been suspicion and grave suspicion, and when we to-day point to accounts which the Grand Trunk Railway Company refused to prevent, when we see men like Mr. Rowe from British Columbia—and it may be in the recollection of some gentleman that this Mr. Rowe was associated with a commission appointed for this government in connection with labour disputes in the west; perhaps for that reason he had been useful to this government, perhaps he had some little string on this government and for that reason the government were very anxious to have Mr. Rowe satisfied, as he was satisfied, with his $125 payment per month.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) aware that Mr. Rowe was one of the campaign orators for the Conservative party in the province of British Columbia in the last election?

Mr. BENNETT. I was not aware that he was one of the orators. Perhaps the $125 a month from the Grand Trunk Pacific stopped and that may have changed the gentleman's politics.

Mr. EMMERSON. Did he go back to his first love ?

Mr. BENNETT. I cannot say as to that, he seems to be fickle from all accounts. Seriously, my hon. friend from South Essex (Mr. Clarke) wil not contend that the honour and dignity of this country is not at stake in this connection. This government is entrusted with millions of dollars belonging to the people of Great Britain who have invested in this country and how is that money to be disbursed ? Is it to be spent in the manner indicated in these accounts or in a proper maner ? That it was improper goes without saying. The Minister of Finance says it was improper and he prevented and disallowed it.

There is so much mist, so much overloading of these accounts that no man in this country will believe that this Bill has been honest, straightforward and above board, and there can only be one possible way to disabuse the public mind of the idea that there has been wrong-doing in connection with this, and that will be by fully investigating these statements and these accounts.

I beg to move that the debate be now adjourned and that it be the first Order of the Day at the next sitting of the House.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—PROVINCIAL SUBSIDY.

Mr. LEFURGEY—by Mr. A. Martin—asked :

Under the proposed arrangements at the recent conference between the representatives of the provincial governments and the Dominion government, relating to increased subsidies and other matters, does Prince Edward Island receive eighty cents per head of her maximum population since she entered confederation, and does she so receive eighty cents per head on this population until her population increases? If not, how or on what basis is the eighty cents per head to be paid ?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). The question of my hon. friend (Mr. A. Martin) is engaging the attention of the Minister of Justice, and my hon. friend will have an answer when the address to His Majesty, of which notice has been given, is brought up for discussion in this House.

RESIGNATION OF HON. C. S. HYMAN, M.P.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Would my right hon. friend inform the House whether or not anything has been heard from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Hyman) as to his resignation, or whether anything is known as to his intention ? I think the House should be informed at the earliest possible moment whether he proposes to make valid the resignation which has been found invalid ?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Since the last announcement I made to the House on the subject, I have had no communication directly or indirectly from Mr. Hyman.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Is anything known as to his present condition of health ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have no information at all.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I think the correspondence will be here in a day or two.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE—REPORT RE GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC CONSTRUCTION.

House resumed adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Barker for the consideration of the sixth report of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe) I had almost concluded the remarks I intended making when you left the chair, Sir, yesterday afternoon, and I promise the House that I shall not take up much of its time to-day. The right hon. the First Minister had the pleasure to-day of introducing two of his supporters from the province of Quebec, but I have no doubt that, however pleasurable that duty may have been to him, it would have given him much greater cause for self-congratulation if those two gentleman had been returned from the province of Ontario. For while the right hon. gentleman has high regard for public opinion in the province of Quebec, I am sure that, under present circumstances, he would have been much more gratified if he could count on the good opinion of the people of Ontario as well for himself personally as for his administration. In all probability, if we are to have another session, there will be two elections during recess, one in North Wellington and one in East Northumberland, and we shall then have an opportunity of seeing how the people of Ontario judge the record of this administration and the right hon. gentleman.

No doubt throughout the debate on the subject before the House, we shall hear from hon. gentlemen opposite about insinuations made on this side on the honour and reputation of members of the cabinet and their supporters. But the right hon. First Minister must recollect that not only are insinuations made from this side but charges also, and those charges are not met in such a manner as to convince either those who may be politically opposed to this government or their strongest admirers, that there is nothing in them. Coming as they do, right in the wake of charges made in this and preceding sessions, the charges now made cannot but inflame to a considerable extent the public mind. Does not the right hon. gentleman know that the country was rather startled a couple of sessions ago when the then Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) publicly announced that grave suspicion existed in his mind and that of his colleagues that members of parliament were taking advantage of their position to share in contracts and profit by the promotion of Bills and participate in emoluments which members of parliament could not, consistent with their dignity and independence, accept. What was the result? The result was the introduction of legislation by the then Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick), which practically made such practices prohibitory. Yet this session the Public Accounts Committee has been kept busy investigating deals which certainly do not commend themselves to fair minded honest people. Take the very document issued by this government, and you will have evidence of improper dealings in connection with public matters. Let me first take up a case to which I specially draw the right hon. gentleman's attention. Take up the Auditor General's Report page B—92. An account is advanced to the Public Works Department. It runs the gauntlet of that department. It is certified to by the minister of that department (Mr. Hyman) as a proper, fair and honest bill, but when it reaches the Auditor General's department, what is the result? In order that the matter may be fairly laid before parliament, I shall read the correspondence.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. This does not appear to be relevant to the question before the House.

Mr. BENNETT. I am going to cite this by way of illustration to show how the expenditure of public moneys is dealt with, and compare that with the expenditure in this instance. With all due deference, Mr. Speaker, I submit that I am within the purview of fair debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the illustration is applicable to the motion to refer the report back to the Public Accounts Committee for the proposed purpose, the hon. gentleman would be in order but otherwise not.

Mr. BENNETT. That is the ground upon which I propose to adduce it.

Port Arthur harbour—Breaking ice in 1902-3.

Audit Office, Ottawa, October 30, 1906.

Sir,—Let me acknowledge receipt of application No. 313 from your department, for $1,402.50 in favour of the Great Lakes Dredging Company for services of tugs breaking ice in Port Arthur harbour, December, 1902, and April and December, 1903.

For accounts of such remote date, there should be an explanation of the delay in rendering the Bill.

It is also usual to obtain orders in council for all services so far removed from ordinary routine that payment does not follow closely upon performance.

Please let me have copies of the engineer's letters ordering the work to be done.

I am, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. FRASER,
Auditor General.

The Deputy Minister of Public Works.

(Note by Auditor General, December 4, 1906—No answer has been received to this letter and the claim of $1,402.50 has not yet been paid.)

Now what does that mean? It means that this Great Lakes Dredging Company, nearly six months ago, had presented to the department the Bill for which the services are detailed, and yet in face of the fact that that Bill passes the Department of Public Works, secures the approval and endorsation of the minister, when it comes to the Auditor General's Department, it is there pointed out that this Bill is not of a nature to commend itself for payment. Is the Bill pressed? Is any thing further done? No, Sir, but six months remain, and this old account, frosted with age, which the Minister of Public Works was quite willing to pay, has not been paid, and apparently up to this day there is nothing to show that it has ever been pressed. Now is that not enough to make the people of this country regard with suspicion and distrust payments that are approved by ministers of the Crown?

Let me instance another case to show the suspicion that is entertained by people in dealing with the Crown. This same company, the Great Lakes Dredging Company, is a company incorporated under a charter of the province of Ontario. There is no question as to the position of that concern, it is a joint stock company. One of the parties who has standing in his name practically half the stock of that company, is a son-in-law of the hon. member for Rainy river (Mr. Conmee); the other half of the stock is held by Mr. Charles Bowman, member for provincial parliament, and his brother, A. F. Bowman. Now these gentlemen are desirous of tendering for hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of dredging at Port Arthur and Fort William, and what do we find from the records and returns brought down last year? We find that when this company tendered for dredging they do it under what, to say the least, are most suspicious circumstances. Turning to the 'Hansard' of last year, under date of May 7, I find that a question was asked as to the contractors who had tendered for that work, and it brought forth the answer as to the Mission and Kaministiqui River Dredging that this Great Lakes Dredging Company had placed a tender before the department at 9 cents per yard, and that Mr. A. F. Bowman had placed a tender for precisely the same work at 18 cents a yard. Now there can be no question as to these persons being the same parties, because a reference to the Auditor General's Report discloses the fact that upon page V-26 Mr. A. F. Bowman puts in a bill for services for a dredge called the 'Dominion' for a large amount, totalling $15,376.36; while on the next page the Great Lakes Dredging Company, for services performed by them, place a large bill, at different dates I am free to admit, for nearly $7,000 for the same dredge. I can show by another instance where certain work is performed by a dredge called 'No. 1,' in the name of A. F. Bowman, and it is placed in the name of the Great Lakes Dredging Company. Now he who runs can read, and any man can understand that this group of contractors, this favoured company, felt that they had such an influence with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. C. S. Hyman) that, had no tender intervened between their tenders at 9 cents and 18 cents, they had such a low opinion, I say, of the Minister of Public Works for Canada, that they suspected he would be privy to and a party to allowing them to withdraw their low tender and substitute their higher tender. There can be no other conclusion reached, it is palpable and plain on the evidence adduced. There is no need of dealing with insinuations from this side of the House, when the public record proves beyond a shadow of a doubt that hon. gentlemen or at least some ministers of the Crown, are regarded by their own friends in the manner that this firm regarded the Minister of Public Works.

Now, Sir, the 'Globe' newspaper has lately undertaken to bolster up this party in the Senate, apparently by reason of the fact that they can see very little in the every day action of hon. gentlemen opposite to commend them where it comes down to an expenditure of dollars and cents. So the other day in the Senate, when it came to a vote on a certain railway measure involving the question of the construction of a bridge in the city of Toronto in which certain railway companies were greatly interested, what was the result? Why, Sir, the result was that because certain hon. gentlemen whose political affiliations are in accord with hon. gentlemen opposite, saw fit not to vote on that particular Bill, the 'Globe' acclaims them from one end of the country to the other as being veritable brands snatched from the burning, and men that are beyond voting on such occasions. Well, the 'Globe' should not have called so loud before they were out of the woods, because if it will puruse the public accounts it will find that there are other Senators of Canada who do not forget, under the shelter of a joint stock company, to participate in large contracts that are not given by tender by the Dominion government.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman will see that this is not pertinent to the question before the House.

Mr. DERBYSHIRE. The same as he delivered last summer.

Mr. BENNETT. I know that the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Derbyshire) is in a hurry to hie back to his green pastures and cows, and he is awfully annoyed when hon. gentlemen rise in this House to discuss any public expenditure. Well, Sir, I have instanced these cases as cases that are to-day under review. I know something of the people of the province of Ontario, and I ask the First Minister to recollect, that from that province he wishes to obtain for his government the highest possible commendation and respect, and it is along the lines of expenditure that public attention in that province is being focused to-day. For that reason, every fair investigation should be given into an examination of these accounts. In some of these accounts are involved the names of a number of gentlemen in this country, the names of a number of gentlemen have been laid before the committee in this connection, and it goes without saying that people are making insinuations as to the character of these expenditures. No man in his senses will believe that the Grand Trunk ever wanted these expenditures to be made. No man will believe that Mr. Hays, president of the Grand Trunk Railway, who occupies in Great Britain a deservedly prominent position as a railway manager, would wish to see the money of this company spent as it has been. I say that it is in the interest of the good names of the men who have been involved in this expenditure, in the interest of good government and particularly in the interest of government administration that every facility should be afforded the Public Accounts Committee to have these matters probed to the bottom—aye, Sir, to the very bottom—and that can only be done by passing the resolution proposed by my hon. friend from East Hamilton which, I think, should commend itself to every fair minded and impartial gentleman in this House.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton). Mr. Speaker, it had not been my intention to make any remarks on this matter which is now before the House. As it appears to me that it has been pretty thoroughly threshed out and as the position taken by the members of the Public Accounts Committee has been thoroughly justified little more need be said along those lines. I have listened to the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) who has just taken his seat, and it does strike one who is not a very old member of this House, that when questions are being debated by the House it would perhaps be for the benefit of the country and for the members of this House if hon. members were to debate the matter that is under consideration. We listened yesterday and we have listened to-day to the hon. member for East Simcoe and he has gone down the whole line from A to Z and discussed everything that has been raked up by himself in this House many times. He has gone into dredging contracts, he has gone into the question of the Empire Construction Company and many other things has he gone into, but as far as I have been able to see or hear there has been nothing particularly said regarding the question under debate as to the accounts of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway. It may be that the hon. gentleman does like to get away from the subject in dispute for the pure and simple reason that he has not a good and valid argument to address to this House as to why his opinions should be upheld. It certainly would look to me that that is the light in which he viewed it because he goes on to speak of the Empire Construction Company and, without making any charge whatever or without saying more than that the Empire Construction Company is composed of certain people, or is about to be composed of certain people who are making application for incorporation, notice of which is published in the Canada 'Gazette,' expresses the belief or says that he knows that they have endeavoured to get a contract from this government illegally, and that the contract which they tendered for was not given to them for the reason that their's was not as good a tender as another tender which was received.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Pardee) will see that he is not confining himself strictly to the question.

Mr. PARDEE. Well, I bow to the ruling of the Speaker, of course, but I was only answering the argument which had been advanced by the hon. gentleman. In so far as this subject under consideration is concerned, what are the facts ?

The facts are that a request was made before the Public Accounts Committee that certain accounts which had not been paid should be produced. There were certain accounts presented to the government for payment by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. These accounts were not paid for the reason that upon going to the Finance Department the minister ruled that the accounts that were put in, or a certain portion of them, should not be paid. Certain accounts were put in, they were withdrawn, another Bill was substituted and because the Finance Department did not pay the accounts that had been put in and which they admitted were not properly put in, the argument of the hon. gentleman opposite seems to be that the department should be censured. I cannot see it in that light at all. I listened to the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) yesterday. I followed him through the speech which he made and through the reading of the evidence which was given before the Public Accounts Committee. The whole trend of the argument and the idea of the evidence which he read was that these accounts were put in, that efforts were made by the persons by whom they were put in, or by the corporation by which they were put in, to get the government to pay them, but that the government had turned them down, had refused to pay these accounts and that consequently the government were censurable therefor. That appeared to me to be the argument which was advanced by the hon. member for Toronto, but instead of the government being censurable in any way at all rather does it redound to their credit that instead of having permitted these, as he terms them, bogus claims, to be paid, they were turned down and not paid. It does appear to me that instead of being censurable for such a course the Finance Department and the office of the Auditor General fulfilled the very object for which these offices were originally created and that they should be commended rather than blamed for the course they took. Even suppose the hon. gentlemen were to have their way and that these accounts were to be produced I ask the House what good would it do if they were produced? The accounts which were not paid are gone. They have not been paid, they have been destroyed; so, what benefit would it be to have them produced now? No one has been prejudiced by the non-production or non-payment of these accounts. In no way has any one been hurt, but rather has it been shown that the government, acting as the trustees of the bondholders, who invested in the bonds of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, have amply taken care of them, and these bondholders have perhaps been better taken care of than they could have expected by the Finance Department. Therefore it seems to me that no wrong has been done to any one by reason of these accounts not having been produced, and as I understand it the only thing that the Public Accounts Committee has a right to inquire into are the accounts brought down in the reports that are laid upon the table by the Auditor General and which are proper subjects for investigation. This account in dispute, amounting to $156,000, does not appear in the report of the Auditor General, consequently it has not been paid and this House has no right whatever to look into that matter for the pure and simple reason that it has not been paid. No person has been hurt, the bondholders have suffered no prejudice whatever and it is of no consequence to any one at all. That appears to me to be the logical and true reasoning that must be applied to the matter. If there had been certain statements put in the report of the Auditor General showing that a payment of $162.000 or $160,000 had been made illegally, that thereby some one had been prejudiced and that the bondholders had been hurt by that payment, that their rights were not being looked after, then, therefore any member of this House or any one else would have the right to come to us and say: We must have every dollar of that expenditure investigated, we must see exactly where that money went, we must know if our interests have not been properly protected and consequently we ask a committee of this House to look into it to the very last possible detail and see wherein we have been hurt.

But, Sir, that has not been the question at all. The only fact I want to bring before the House is that instead of that being the state of affairs it has been absolutely shown, and hon. gentlemen must admit this, that those accounts did come in, that they were not paid and consequently everybody's interest was protected and no good purpose could be served by further investigation along those lines. If any one had been hurt it would have been right that that expenditure should have been examined most closely, but, Sir, the people are protected, the bondholders are protected, every one was protected, the expenditure was not made, the account put in was not allowed, and if the account was not allowed and the expenditure not made then I say that every one has been protected and no possible harm has been done. If you read the evidence taken before the committee and printed, if you follow the very evidence which the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. Bristol) read yesterday, you will see that that fact is beyond question, so that every possible safeguard has been thrown around the expenditure and consequently everybody has been and is being protected.

For these reasons it does appear to me that it is useless to take up the time of the House or of the committee in going into expenditure that has not been made, expenditure that has been absolutely thrown out by the government and which they have refused to pay. No good purpose would be served by further investigation; the committee are doing everything that possibly could be done to show where every dollar of this money went, and to ascertain if it was spent legitimately and if it went into channels into which it ought to go.

Mr. H. B. AMES (Montreal, St. Antoine). The resolution that has been presented to this House by the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Barker) is one that cannot be disregarded. It is a resolution that deals with a great national undertaking and also with a great principle of British liberty. We are, I think, all interested in the successful accomplishment of this great national undertaking. We desire that if this road is to be built it should be built honestly and that it should represent the full value of the investment. We desire that the interests not only of Canada but of the bondholders be protected. In this particular case the government is a trustee. The government guarantee the bonds to the extent of 75 per cent of their issue up to a maximum amount. Had not the government placed this guarantee upon the back of those bonds they could not have been sold in the British market for the price at which they were sold. The £3,200,000 of bonds that were issued in October, 1905, would never have fetched $14,750,000, or 95 cents on the dollar, had it not been for the government guarantee behind them. Therefore it is the fact that the government is the trustee that has inspired confidence in those bonds on the part of the investing public. The proceeds of those bonds have been placed in certain chartered banks of Canada, and they are released from time to time to be applied to the cost of construction of the western division of the Grand Trunk Pacific only on joint application by the Grand Trunk Pacific authorities and the government. It requires that joint demand, that joint certification before a dollar of those funds can be distributed or expended. Then, again, those bonds constitute a liability; the credit of the Dominion of Canada is pledged to the payment, principal and interest, of those bonds. You will readily see that while we are permitted to guarantee bonds to the extent of $13,000 per mile on the prairie section and $30,000 per mile on the mountain section that represents an actual expenditure of $17,000 per mile on the prairie section and $40,000 on the mountain section. It will be readily seen that the less the cost the less the guarantee and the less the guarantee the less the liability of the government. Consequently it is most decidedly in the interest of the government that nothing shall go into cost of construction except what is legitimately chargeable thereto, nothing except what may become a revenue bearing expenditure and, if items are permitted to creep in there, that are not strictly chargeable to the cost of construction, that could never in any way increase the revenue-producing ability of that investment, such items are certainly to be excluded. The bondholders and the government are both willing that the actual cost of construction should be charged; they are desirous, however that that cost of construction should include nothing but revenue producing expenditure; that it should not include promotion costs. The government in its own interest and in the interest of the bondholders provided by statute what should constitute cost of construction, and the government also most carefully provided how the accounts should be checked to make sure that only items legitimately chargeable to cost of construction should enter into the account and be paid for.

Operations on the construction of this western division of the Grand Trunk Pacific commenced in the year 1904-5, and in October of 1905 the company notified the government to make their first audit. The audit was to cover the period ending 30th June, 1905. A statement summarizing all the claims which the Grand Trunk considered to be legitimately chargeable to the cost of construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific was accordingly prepared by the auditor of the Grand Trunk in the offices at Montreal, and that statement was sent through the official channels to the government. The modus operandi is simply this: This official statement is prepared; it is a mere list of vouchers; it contains the number of each voucher, to whom paid, for what paid, and the amount, and the Department of Railways and Canals is notified from time to time that such a statement has been prepared for the express purpose of being submitted for audit for no other purpose except that the government should audit that statement, and then after that statement had been prepared and the government has been notified, the government accountant goes down to Montreal and he audits the statement, checking the vouchers one by one, and making his marks upon the statement as to whether a voucher is or is not allowed, and this statement is the only receipt in detail which remains in the hands of the government; it is the only record left with the government that may show at any future date the items whereby a large sum of money which may be paid on certificate has been paid. It is checked accordingly by the accountant, it has his mark upon it, it becomes a document belonging to the department, a document of record, a document that it is essential should be kept with the government if the government at any future date are to determine what accounts have and what accounts have not been paid.

There are statements of that kind at present in the department. There are the statements that have been submitted to the government in every case except for the first audit. Those statements are known to be at the present time in the possession of the accountant of the government. Members of the committee desired to see those papers, and they have not been permitted to see them in time to discuss them this afternoon.

The first statement, when it was prepared, was for the amount of $926,000. This statement was presented about the first of October, and it covered the period ending the 30th of June, 1905. In due course, Mr. Shannon, the accountant of the department, undertook to make an audit of this statement, and what did he find? He tells us most freely and readily, in the evidence which is printed and in the hands of hon. members, and it should be read by every member of the House who wishes to know the story of this transaction. What does Mr. Shannon say of the items in that statement? He describes at length the various efforts on the part of the Grand Trunk officials to secure his acceptance of their entire account for $926,000, and he says: 'I found many of the accounts unsatisfactory; in many instances they would give me no details; in many instances I made inquiries, and they would tell me nothing as to what the payments were for.' And yet the company had the audacity to present such accounts to be passed by the auditor of the Railway Department and to be paid on the authority of the government, without giving any detail or explanation as to what certain of the moneys had been expended for. I will make a quotation from the evidence of Mr. Power in order that the House may see the character of the statement. The question was asked him:

Q. Was a statement prepared summarizing the claims?—A. Always.

Q. What was that prepared for?—A. For expedition in checking, and for submission to the government on which we expected payment.

The auditor of the Grand Trunk distinctly states that the only purpose for which the statement was prepared was that it might be submitted to the government in order that the government might pay upon it.

Q. That was prepared to facilitate the work and for delivering to the government, was it not ?—A. Yes.

Q. Showing the amount you expected payment for ?—A. Yes.

Now, Mr. Shannon, after he had been through that first statement of $926,000, and after he in many instances had had most unsatisfactory interviews with the representatives of the Grand Trunk, and after he had, although repeatedly asking for them, been refused details on many of the items he was asked to pay, Mr. Shannon makes his report, and it is necessary that I should read a part of it as having a bearing on what I wish to say afterwards :

Pursuant to instructions, I made an inspection last week of the books, vouchers, &c., of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway in Montreal, to ascertain the amount of expenditure made by the Grand Trunk Pacific upon the prairie and mountian sections of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway from its inception to June 30, 1905, and have the honour to report as follows :

Then he states the amounts. At the end of his report there is this significant sentence :

I would draw attention to the item of proportion of preliminary expenses in the statement of the prairie section, amounting to $106,-433, this being a portion of a voucher submitted to me for $162,000 in round figures, but which subvouchers to the extent only of $106,-650 were shown me—an amount in excess of the proportion charged—but the details were insufficient to enable me to state whether they were a proper charge against the prairie section or not.

It is very obvious what Mr. Shannon means by these words : he intimates that a voucher for $162,000 was submitted to him, and that of that amount there were some but unsatisfactory details for $106,650, and that there was $55,000 or $56,000 for which there were no subvouchers whatever. That Mr. Shannon should have been asked to pass $162,000, two-thirds of the amount on insufficient evidence, and one-third on no evidence whatever, shows certainly that the company imagined that this government would not be very particular in dealing with them. When we come to ask Mr. Shannon something about the items that went into this account, we find that Mr. Wainwright figured very frequently. We find also, in obtaining evidence from Mr. Power and others, that it was customary for the Grand Trunk, whenever a voucher was prepared, signed by the general manager, for the advance of large sums of money to Mr. Wainwright, that no questions should be asked. The advances to Mr. Wainwright must have been considerable. Mr. Shannon admits in his evidence that he was asked several times to pass vouchers for large amounts payable to Mr. Wainwright without any information whatever. Can we not imagine what Mr. Wainwright wanted that money for, knowing as we do the work he generally does for the promotion of his company ?

When Mr. Shannon made this report he sent it to the deputy minister, as he was in duty bound to do. It contained the statement, showing that Mr. Shannon had placed his finger on the weak spot, that $162,000 should not be allowed. Shannon pointed this out in his report and sent it to the minister. And let me say here that it appears in this transaction that Mr. Shannon is the man who deserves the encomiums not only of this House, but of the country, inasmuch as it is apparent that he, probably not altogether with the greatest ease, succeeded in checking the payment of a large sum of money which would have been improperly paid if he had not so acted.

But this statement, however necessary it may have been, was only a preliminary. Payment was not made on the statement, but was made on certificate. The certificates were presented to the department by the Grand Trunk Pacific people, generally shortly after the statement had been made up ; and it is well that we should see just how these certificates read, because this is an official application for payments, and upon this form of official application many millions of dollars have already been paid and many millions of dollars will yet be paid. It is headed the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and it is addressed directly to the Minister of Finance and the Receiver General of Canada, an official document intended to reach these gentlemen. It states that the sum of so much has been expended in construction work on the prairie or mountain section of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway, as follows. It makes the distinct statement that the money has been already expended on construction work, seventy-five per cent of which is payable by the government. This is certified to by the president, the second vice-president and the chief engineer of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, and reads as follows :

I certify the above statement of expenditure to be correct, that the prices paid for the work are not in excess of the fair value thereof, and that all proceeds of the bonds heretofore received have been used for the purpose for which the payment thereof was made.

That is the certificate signed by the highest officials of the Grand Trunk Pacific. It states distinctly that the sums mentioned therein have been expended according to law on cost of construction and on nothing else. As I have said, no money can be paid out except on the joint certificate of the railway officials and the officers of the government. Therefore, we find here at the bottom, this further note :

I hereby certify that I have examined the accounts, books and vouchers, &c., of the company and at its office, and I find the above statement of expenditure to be in accord with the same. Further in my opinion the expenditure as set down fairly represents the reasonable value of the work done.

COLLINGWOOD SCHREIBER,
On behalf of the Dominion government.

Here we have a further certificate by the engineer representing the government that he also must be satisfied that every dollar of this money has been spent as alleged, according to law, on cost of construction and on nothing else. When this statement has been thus doubly certified, it becomes payable, and in ordinary instances it would have been paid almost without question. It would be something very unusual if a statement so endorsed and certified was not paid on presentation, almost without question. But when this first account was presented what happened? The day after Mr. Shannon's report we find that Mr. Schreiber, the special engineer deputed by the government to represent them in this matter, reports in his official capacity as the chief engineer of the western division of the National Transcontinental Railway. Mr. Schreiber, in his report, states as follows :

The accountant of the Department of Railways and Canals, having carefully examined the vouchers in connection with the accounts submitted by the Grand Trunk Pacific for preliminary expenses and interest on bonds in connection with the construction of their railway, which expenditure I am aware is such as is usually charged by railway companies to capital construction account, and which expenses the Department of Justice, from the description given them, consider to be such as should be included in the cost of construction, and the accountant having found the vouchers to correspond with the accounts rendered, with the exception of three vouchers aggregating $242.28, which do not form a charge on the mountain section and were deducted accordingly, I have therefore, in my capacity of chief engineer of the western division of the National Transcontinental Railway, certified to the following amounts.

These amounts aggregate $926,293.73. Then Mr. Schreiber continues :

I submit the accounts as corrected duly certified.

This is addressed to the Hon. H. R. Emmerson, Minister of Railways and Canals. An examination of this letter of Mr. Schreiber cannot but lead to two conclusions. In the first place, that he did not truly and accurately represent the position taken by the accountant in this matter. The letter seems to allege—and would, under ordinary circumstances, be taken to mean—that the accountant was satisfied with the payment of the whole sum of $926,000. But this we know was not the case. Mr. Schreiber then has alleged what he knew was not exactly in accord with the facts, namely, that his accountant approved of the payment of the whole amount without curtailment. Those who know Mr. Schreiber, and his long service to this country, will know that he would not have done that had he been left entirely to his own volition. I think the inference can be drawn, without going too far, that Mr. Schreiber must have acted under pressure. Otherwise he would not have written a letter so assuredly out of accord with the actual facts. Then again, he quotes the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick), and states that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) had ruled that these accounts might be included. Evidently Mr. Schreiber had verbal communications with the then Minister of Justice, and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) had apparently told him to pass those accounts, and we cannot but wonder whether the wish was father to the thought in that case. The Minister of Justice of that day (Mr. Fitzpatrick) appears to have given his verbal consent to the passing of those accounts, although we find on the 15th November, when the then Minister of Justice was asked to put his opinion in writing, that the written opinion which he gave is not in accord with his first decision. One cannot but wonder whether Mr. Schreiber, in this matter, is not being made somewhat of a scapegoat, and whether those who induced him to take this position have as yet been fully disclosed.

It has been customary, when discussing this in the House, to give great credit to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) for having prevented, practically at the last ditch, this raid on the treasury. But these hon. gentlemen, who thus glorify the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), forget that in so doing they are placing the ex-Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick) and the Minister of Railways (Mr. Emmerson) in a very unenviable position. If it was so praiseworthy an act for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to stop the payment of these accounts, what about the Department of Railways and Canals, which apparently desired that the whole amount should be paid and was anxious to facilitate its payment? Evidently in that department there are no watchdogs.

But let us again take up this matter of the first claim. This first claim of $926,000 is set forth in the certificates. These certificates were duly forwarded to the Hon, W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance). On the 19th October, 1905, Mr. Jones, secretary of the Railway Department, wrote to Mr. Fielding as follows :

I have the honour, by direction, to inclose herewith, for the necessary action by your department, four certificates—

These certificates aggregated 75 per cent of $926,000.

—for the necessary action by your department.

That means, of course, the actual payment. These certificates had come in the regular channel. Every formality had been complied with, and one would expect that they would be paid out of hand as is the usual custom. But, strange to say, in this particular instance, the certificates were not promptly honoured. I expect that right here again more credit is due the accountant of the Railway and Canals Department than has been given him. I expect it was the accountant who had been misrepresented by Mr. Schreiber's letter, and who took the precaution to set himself right. I think it will be found that Mr. Shannon was the one who gave the Department of Finance an inkling that it might be necessary to investigate carefully before paying the whole $926,000. At all events, notwithstanding the special pleading, the account did not go through. The Grand Trunk Railway were hard up and exceedingly anxious to be paid, and paid promptly. But they were not. The accounts remained a month, three weeks of which time they were in the Department of Finance, and then they were withdrawn. The Grand Trunk Railway Company had for a month been unsuccessfully endeavouring to get the whole amount paid, and it then began to dawn upon them that they had made a mistake. They apparently had experience in the past of such friendliness on the part of this government that they did not hesitate to ask the limit, and it must have been something of a surprise to them to find that they had asked it once too often. Anything in reason would have been cheerfully given, but apparently in this case they went beyond reason, and so we find them starting to beat a retreat and endeavouring to cover up their tracks.

Perhaps they knew that it might be dangerous to leave in the department a statement which the curiosity of a succeeding government, possibly unfrendly, might lead them to examine. Even the railway authorities seem to have felt that there were very good reasons why the statement which they had endeavoured to have honoured in full should be withdrawn. What I cannot see, and what the country cannot understand is why the government should have been so anxious to assist them in beating this retreat, and in covering up the tracks of this attempted raid upon the trust funds. If the company had simply made an attempt to secure moneys that were not properly chargeable to the cost of construction, I can see no reason why the statement should not have been left on file, with the understanding that the government had refused to pay certain items. But the fact that that statement is removed and that that statement was destroyed would go to show that the government also had reason to believe that it was advisable that the statement should be put out of the way. Was it that the vouchers were equally damning to the government as to the company? Is not that a rightful and natural inference to draw from the fact that the government was so ready to give its assistance to this company not only to retreat but to cover its tracks in making the retreat? Had it been an attempt even to hoodwink the shareholders or bondholders, the government might have said: We cannot allow this, but we will allow the statement to stand. But the fact that the government facilitated the withdrawal and destruction of these documents leads us to believe that the government were as anxious as the company that these details should not be known. If the attempt to obtain the trust funds improperly was wrong, then the government that aided in destroying the evidence compounded a felony.

Now, let us see how the government lent its assistance to the withdrawal of these important documents. We find that on the 9th of November, 1905 after the statement had been nearly a month in the possession of the government and after many efforts had been made to have the full amount paid, Mr. H. W. Walker, chief auditor of the Grand Trunk Pacific writes to the Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals saying:

Will you kindly return statements of expenditure which Mr. Shannon took with him to complete his audit, as I wish to amend them? Also the certificates which will have to be withdrawn to correspond.

And Mr. Butler on receipt of this, notified Mr. Jones to write to Mr. Courtney—which was immediately done asking Mr. Courtney to return the certificate. Mr. Courtney returns the certificates to Mr. Jones and Mr. Jones returns them to Mr. Walker stating that he does so by direction for the purpose of modification. And Mr. Walker on the 13th of November writes to Mr. Jones acknowledging that he has received these certificates. I call attention also to the fact that Mr. Wainwright on the 14th of December, 1905, writes to Mr. Jones, and again we hear of the presence of these certificates. They have been returned for purposes of modification. We would naturally suppose that that meant the alteration of the figures to make them represent lesser amount, as is the universal custom. There are on file certificates of all the succeeding payments, or copies of them, and in every case the original amount appears in black ink and the altered amount in red ink. It would be the natural inference that in this case also the certificates would come back with the figures altered. But these certificates go back to the Grand Trunk Pacific and Mr. Wainwright writes on the 14th of December, 1905 :

I send you herewith the certificates originally signed, and which have been withdrawn, for cancellation and which perhaps you will kindly hand to Mr. Schreiber in order that he may destroy them, or take his name off, whichever he desires to do.

Mr. Schreiber, securing possession of his original report, writes, 'Not to be acted upon.' And the mystery is how this did not disappear with the rest of the documents in this case. Where are these certificates ? We cannot learn from any witnesses. Perhaps the defenders of the government may know. These essential public documents have been mutilated and have disappeared.

As to this statement it is important that we should know what became of it. I have described how that statement was prepared; how it was a summary of the vouchers for audit; I have shown how the name and the amount, and what it was for, appeared on each voucher. These are essential details. Why did not this summary of vouchers remain with the government ? Mr. Walker writes to Mr. Butler and asks for the return of these statements that he may amend them. Let us see how the amendment was carried out. I have here the evidence of Mr. Power :

Q. What became of that first statement? —A. It was destroyed.

Q. By whom ?—A. I do not know.

Q. Eh ?—A. I do not know.

Q. How do you know it was destroyed ?—A. Because I know Mr. Walker gave instructions to have it destroyed, and told me himself that it was destroyed.

Q. Coming from your superior officer, he told you himself that he had ordered it to be destroyed ?—A. And he asked in my presence——

Q. How do you know that he gave orders to have it destroyed ?—A. Because he sent for the clerk and asked him in my presence if he had destroyed it.

And that was not all. The Grand Trunk Pacific in preparing these statements naturally kept several office copies?

Again let me read the evidence of Mr. Power :

Q. By the by, did you ever see the office copy of that first statement ?—A. I saw it at the time it was returned.

Q. Now, the office copy, would that be a press copy ?—A. No, carbons.

Q. What became of that carbon copy ?—A. They were all destroyed at the time the new account was substituted.

Q. You destroyed, not merely the document sent in, but the copy of it ?—A. Yes.

Q. Was there more than one copy ?—A. There may have been.

Q. Was there ?—A. I presume there might have been two.

Q. There might have been 150 ?—A. I do not know.

Q. Do you know there were at least two copies ?—A. I think there were.

Q. Were they all destroyed ?—A. Yes, the original account and all the copies were destroyed.

Special precautions were taken to remove all evidence of that tell-tale list of vouchers which it was hoped the government would pass.

And then we have from the evidence a point which is not made quite clear yet, and which, I submit, may possibly be made clearer later on. We have the inference at least, that Mr. Shannon, at the time of that first audit, made some memoranda himself. In his evidence we find this :

Q. Did you initial the statements as you passed them ?—A. No, I ticked over the vouchers to see that I had every voucher before me.

Q. Did you put any mark upon that statement to show that you were not satisfied with it ?—A. If I was not satisfied with any voucher I would make a memorandum as to the reason why I was not satisfied and I would deal with it in my report, the same as Mr. Bell has said in his evidence he dealt with them.

Q. Did you put the mark on the statement furnished to you ?—A. On the statement furnished to me, if I was not certain that a certain voucher was correct I would take a note of it so as to deal with it in my report.

Q. And your statement was left in the department and will show all the vouchers to which you took exception ?—A. Yes, certainly.

It would appear that there were memoranda made from time to time by Mr. Shannon (although that point is not yet cleared up) and can only be cleared up when we have an opportunity to examine Mr. Shannon again. But at all events, if Mr. Shannon, with respect to this first statement, made any memoranda, as we know he did in connection with the second and all subsequent statements, those memoranda too have disappeared, and are not now subject to inquiry. It would seem to me then that the removal of these certificates, that the destruction of this statement, that the disappearance of Mr. Shannon's memoranda, are certainly suspicious transactions.

What do these documents contain that the Grand Trunk Pacific are so anxious to have them removed and destroyed, and that the government is so unwilling should be investigated? Of this $162,000 of rejected accounts in the first statement, part of it came back the second time ; $74,000 were asked the second time that had been rejected the first time. We have a little inkling as to what that $74,000 was made up of, although when we endeavoured to get these statements we were denied the right to do so until this debate is over. We find that among $74,000 certain accounts such as these: Sir Adolphe Caron, several sums totalling $3,500. What and how could Sir Adolphe Caron have rendered in the way of services for that $3,500? What did he do for it? Then we have H. B. McGivern, a young lawyer who is very conspicuous in the Railway Committee from time to time in connection with railway legislation which this parliament has to pass, and we find him down for $6,421 in large sums, which Mr. Shannon came to the conclusion were not legitimate. The Grand Trunk certified that the money had been paid in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific. Is not that a suitable subject for investigation? Why should the government not desire that these accounts be looked into?

Then we have Mr. Wainwright down for several thousands for advertising large accounts each time, but no details of any kind. What he advertised in, nobody knows. Yet we have him down for several thousands among these rejected accounts. Now if Mr. Shannon, in the second statement, rejected $74,000 which was made up almost exclusively of items of that character, what must the $162,000 have further contained? If the Grand Trunk, when they came back the second time, had not the courage to ask for the other $88,000, how must that sum have been made up? We find that Mr. Shannon says there were a good many more items rejected the first time than there were the second time, but that practically everything rejected the second time had been asked for the first time. We do not find when the claim comes up the second time that there is any mention made of that $56,000 voucher, for which there are no details, and regarding which Shannon could get no satisfaction. There is a great mystery that hangs over $88,000 in these accounts, which even the Grand Trunk themselves had not the effrontery to present a second time, and which are comprised in the statement which they withdraw and destroyed, and of which the government has no copy. In fact Mr. Shannon was convinced from his experience, as the evidence shows, that the company was trying to get every expenditure of every description connected with the promotion and the preliminary expense worked into that sum of railway construction. Mr. Shannon was satisfied as to that, and he stated so in his evidence. Now if the sums for legitimate promotion had been presented for payment and details were given, perhaps the company should not come in for great censure. But what we cannot see is why it should be necessary to destroy all record of this.

We find too, in evidence that large advances have been made from time to time in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific to Mr. William Wainwright. Mr. Shannon tells us he could never get any details from Mr. Wainwright as to what he did with that money, that he frequently asked him for them, and Mr. Wainwright would give him no satisfaction of any kind. Some of the amounts were large, $6,000 or $7,000 at a time, said Mr. Shannon, and they were nearly all contained in the first list of rejected accounts. We know from the evidence of Mr. Power that large advances can be made to Mr. Wainwright merely on the certificate of the general manager, that Mr. Power had instructions not to go behind these in any way. We believe that this $56,000 that was rejected in the first place was an account of that character. These large sums given to Mr. Wainwright for which no explanations are asked, for which no details are given, which are simply on the general manager's certificate, what should we conclude that they were for, knowing as we do the character of the work which Mr. Wainwright is expected to do in connection with legislation and promotion? It seems to me that there is one of the reasons why this statement is destroyed, and why the government is so anxious that it should not be revived.

Now when you come to add to these transactions the fact of the difficulty we have had in getting witnesses to give us light, I think you have a combination of circumstances which tends to aggravate the case. The witness above all others most necessary for the Public Accounts Committee, if they would investigate these payments of the Grand Trunk Pacific trust funds, is H. W. Walker, the general accountant of the company. It was by Mr. Walker that the first statement was prepared, or under his direction, it was Mr. Walker who was accustomed to notify the department when the audit was ready, it was Mr. Walker who took Mr. Shannon in charge and assisted him when he came to Montreal, turning him over at last to Mr. McCombe, it was Mr. Walker who was the superior of Mr. McCombe, and who gave him all instructions upon which he acted, it was Mr. Walker's private room that was used, it was Mr. Walker who was frequently consulted, it was Mr. Walker who wrote for a return of papers, and it was to Mr. Walker that the papers are returned, it is Mr. Walker who knows all about the destruction of the documents, and it was by his order they were destroyed. Mr. Walker, it seems to me, is a most essential witness in connection with this case. Now Mr. Walker is well known in Montreal to be a thoroughly honest and honourable man, a man who, if summoned before this committee would tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth. I think it can be easily shown by any one from Montreal that there has been a considerable fluttering in the dove cotes among the Grand Trunk officers during the last few weeks since this investigation has been going on. The Grand Trunk people are pretty well informed as to what is going on here at Ottawa. Even a witness cannot step into a hotel in the evening without being accidentally met by one of their solicitors. They do not keep their lawyers here for nothing, they know pretty well what is happening here in Ottawa. I think, from current rumour in Montreal, that it is pretty apparent that it has been known for some weeks that this investigation was to go on, and that certain important witnesses would be desired. Now that just at this particular time Mr. Walker should chose to ask leave of absence and go to Europe, is a coincidence very difficult to understand. It looks, on the face of it, very much like a premeditated and deliberate avoidance of a subpœna, it looks like an affront to this House, like a defiance to the authority of this House. Mr. Walker received his subpœna, he received two of them in fact, before he left for Europe, but in absolute defiance of them he went away, and he sent here, as was arranged, Mr. Power, principally because Mr. Power knew absolutely nothing about the transaction. You have only to read Mr. Power's testimony, it is simply a tissue of 'I don't know, I can't say, I have no recollection, I have no knowledge.' That is the witness that was substituted for Mr. Walker, and substituted, I say, with malice prepense. Only Mr. Walker knows the essential details that this committee could get at in this investigation, and Mr. Walker is not available. It would almost seem too as if that committee had been to some extent facilitating his departure, or at least facilitating the non-production of the necessary documents. We were very anxious that Mr. Walker should be summoned and be told to bring papers of any kind whatever, and when a resolution was proposed in the committee, that he should bring his first and second statement, the majority of the committee, led by those gentlemen who generally make themselves so exceedingly active in that committee, determined that he should not be asked to bring the papers which were essential to this inquiry. While the committee were determining that he should bring no papers he quietly left for the other side. If the dignity of parliament as viewed by the gentlemen who are facilitating this fiasco, is regarded as being conserved by this proceeding, I may say that the country as a whole and members on this side of the House do not agree with them.

I want to ask frankly whether the government can afford to have this inquiry stopped at this point, whether the government can afford to deliberately say: Here are $162,000 of accounts, we know that these accounts represent moneys expended, we know that the money was paid by the Grand Trunk Railway Company on account of the Grand Trunk Pacific, we know that it was paid in connection with the promotion and preliminary expenses of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and yet we will not allow any investigation that will enable it to be found to whom it was paid or by whom or for what purpose it was dispensed. Does the government want to have this investigation stop at that point? Does the government want to have this whole investigation cease and have the country inquiring as to what these $162,000 could have been paid for when everybody is so anxious to have the matter investigated? Hon. gentlemen say that the public Accounts Committee have no power. I do not pretend to argue whether they have power or not at this present moment, but if they have not power, parliament can give it to them and parliament can give it to them immediately by passing this resolution. This resolution is one that confers upon the committee the widest powers to investigate every thing in connection with this transaction and if parliament passes this resolution the Public Accounts Committee will be in a position to do the rest. It is not a new thing to amplify the powers of the Public Accounts Committee. It has been done again and again. We sometimes desire to examine accounts that run over several years and we have our powers amplified in that way so that we can go back in the Auditor General's Report for two or three successive years and inquire into the whole transaction. That is nothing unusual. It is quite customary and proper that the Public Accounts Committee should have their powers enlarged and parliament can confer on this committee the power which is necessary to enable it to proceed with this investigation. If I may be allowed in support of this contention I might quote from Todd the following extract:

> All public transactions are necessarily official and no public officer would be justified in withholding from official record and access, any document emanating from himself in his official capacity in relation to public affairs.

If no official or officer of the government can withhold a document how can an officer of the government acquire and dispossess the government of an official document as has been done in this particular case? These statements that were withdrawn in this correspondence follow closely the line of procedure laid down in Smith's 'Parliamentary Remembrancer':

The statement withdrawn was on a subject affecting the public.

It was prepared in consequence of legislative requirements.

It was intended for the assistance of the government.

It was freely handed to an official of the government, acting in his official capacity.

Were it still in the possession of the government it would have been quite reasonable to have demanded its production.

It was not marked nor considered confidential.

It would have been produced if demanded.

If all these qualifications hold and if this statement is a document of which the government was possessed, it seems to me that the government had no right to allow that document to pass out of the authority of parliament.

The government and the Grand Trunk Railway jointly guaranteed an enormous sum of money. It may aggregate, before the western division of the road is constructed, upwards of $50,000,000. The partner in this joint guarantee has been trying, to some extent, it would appear, to overreach the persons who loaned the money. Why is the government so solicitous that this wicked partner should not have these transactions brought home to him? Is it not just as well at this particular time to bring him to book lest he forget and lest a similar attempt be made again in the future? We are informed that this statement has been destroyed. We are informed that the copies have been destroyed. This statement is a necessary and essential document to anything like a fair investigation of this transaction. The vouchers are on the files of the company from which the certificate is drawn, there is no physical difficulty to prevent them being produced and there is no reason why they should not be placed at the disposal of the Committee on Public Accounts. The company has not refused to produce them; it is only the committee that has refused to ask for them, and if we desire to have an investigation of these vouchers all that is necessary is to instruct the committee that it secure an opportunity of examining the vouchers and in that way the substance of the statement will again become the property of the government. That is exactly what this resolution calls for. This resolution says:

5. That the claims, payments and accounts upon which the said statement for audit and substituted statements were based be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts for inquiry, investigation and report.

That is the crux of the whole matter. That is all that is asked by the resolution. The resolution would have asked for the statement if the statement had been extant; but the statement had been destroyed; consequently the resolution simply asks that the document from which that statement was drawn be placed at the disposal of the committee in order that it may be examined, inquired into and reported upon.

Now, just to recapitulate before I take my seat, the points I have endeavoured to make: There is no doubt, at least no doubt has been expressed and I think no doubt will be expressed, that $162,000 —true, a very large sum—was spent by the Grand Trunk and has been charged to the account of the Grand Trunk Pacific in connection with the preliminary and promotion expenses. There is no doubt that that money has been spent. It still stands on the books of the Grand Trunk as an unpaid claim against the Grand Trunk Pacific. That extraordinarily large amount is too large, it seems to me, to be absolutely legitimate. The sum is too large for us to pass without at least having a suspicion that it has not all been spent in the way that the Grand Trunk and the government are willing to represent the matter to the public. Grave suspicion there is throughout the land because the circumstances connected with this whole transaction are so extraordinary. If a part of this amount has been used improperly, has been used illegally, has been used illegitimately, then the honour of parliament is at stake and it certainly seems to me that the government makes an admission of fear which is tantamount to guilt when it refuses to permit this payment to be investigated.

Mr. JOSEPH C. WALSH (Montreal, St. Anne's). I have no reason to offer for joining in the debate at this hour, but I have an excuse, that is, I shall be brief. The hon. member for St. Antoine division (Mr. Ames) and the other hon. gentlemen who preceded him have arraigned the Grand Trunk on charges of corruption, fraud and all kinds of penal offences, especially forgery and the taking away of documents. The hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) has endeavoured also to blame the government and to foist upon the government, and especially upon the Public Accounts Committee, the charge that they are screening something from the country at large. Evidently those gentlemen have admitted the fact that nothing has been shown against the government, that no stealing and no complicity in corruption or fraud has been shown against the government and they now want to discover a motive and reason for the government not having been guilty of such misconduct. It seems to me strange that the Public Accounts Committee should be called upon to allow an investigation of a thing that never happened. The government had nothing to do with any attempted fraud on the part of the Grand Trunk—and I do not say there was any fraud—but even admitting for a moment and for the sake of argument that there was an attempt at fraud, it has not been shown that there was any fraud or complicity in fraud on the part of the government. Therefore, I do not see why the government or the Public Accounts Committee should allow the investigation of a matter that is altogether foreign to the subject under inquiry by the committee, that is, whether there was any impropriety on the part of the government or of its officials.

I do not intend to go very fully into this matter, but it seems to me that quotations from Todd and May or from any other author have nothing to do with the case in point. It is a question of discovering whether the government acted properly or not. We have allowed the investigation of something that really has happened, something that may be right or may be wrong, but at least, of something that has occurred. Here, however, there is absolutely nothing, for, as my hon. friend stated a moment ago, it was all presumption, 'the government may presumably do this or the government must do that, it is all a mystery.' I think the hon. gentleman should show that there has been some wrong-doing, that there has been complicity on the part of the government or of the Public Accounts Committee when they screened the government and its officials, and that we should have something presented to us other than all these myths and presumptions.

After all the whole question is a question of a disputed account. The Grand Trunk Pacific presents an account for some $160,000 odd. It may be wrong or it may be right, that matters little. One of the officials of the government, Mr. Schreiber, finding that the account was correct, misinterpreting the statute or following the interpretation of some one, arrives at a certain conclusion and certifies the account. He may have been right or he may have been wrong in doing this. Another official of the government checks him; that is what officials are there for; that is what we have them for. Why not say that the government did not intend to do wrong? Why not, once in a while, attribute good motives to a government or party; why not be generous or charitable and say that if a wrong has not been done the evident intention of the party not doing the wrong was to do right and therefore we must give some credit for that good intention. It seems to me it is going far afield and arguing beside the facts when an attempt is made to blame a government or a Public Accounts Committee for not allowing a discussion on a subject that will throw no light on the transaction under investigation. The hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) has said that we desire to learn something. Out of his own mouth I have learned that he did discover something and that is simply that an attempt was made by the Grand Trunk Pacific—I do not say it, but the hon. gentleman says so—he says, and this resulted from the investigation in the Public Accounts Committee, that the Grand Trunk Pacific attempted to take money from the public coffers. Evidently we have allowed something to be discovered, but if he has discovered that, he has discovered more than I have, because there could be no doubt that the Grand Trunk Pacific may have made an erroneous account and produced that account and subsequently asked to have it withdrawn. That happens every day in the ordinary course of business. What will be lost to the country? The Grand Trunk Pacific will not obtain the $162,000 unless they produce vouchers and it is the vouchers for this amount which has not been paid that the hon. gentlemen are asking for. These vouchers will have to be produced by the Grand Trunk if the company asks for that money, and if they do not ask for the money we do not want the vouchers.

The hon. member brings forward the statement of Mr. Walker. He is absolutely a side issue. He might probably have acted more politely by communicating with the Public Accounts Committee and saying that he could not attend for such and such a reason; he did not show due deference to the committee; he was not courteous, but what has Mr. Walker to do with this question? The Public Accounts Committee did not intend to allow an investigation of the subject; Mr. Walker could not produce the vouchers; he could not show anything; he could simply say that this government, through its officials, did not act in complicity with the Grand Trunk Pacific and allow a fraud to be perpetrated by any company, if fraud was intended, and I do not say it was.

My hon. friend has not been fair in his treatment of the case. How could he presume fraud? In the absence of evidence of bad intention good intention must always be presumed. We cannot accuse a man of crime, forgery, or any of the felonies alleged by my hon. friend in an off-hand fashion; we must show that malice was intended and the Criminal Code and even common sense will not allow us to go so far as to presume anything of the kind. No intent of fraud is shown on the part of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and I do not think my hon. friend had any right to arraign the Grand Trunk Pacific and say that it had been guilty of any crime, or had any evil intentions or made any attempt on the coffers of this country. I think he was unfair in his treatment of the Grand Trunk Pacific as in his treatment of the government, and he goes too far when he asks for an investigation of a thing that never happened. He has no right to ask us to find the motive which prompted the government to do a good action. If I do not place my hand in my neighbour's pocket there is no reason why I should be questioned; I do not do it because I know it is not right, and I have nothing to answer. The members of the Public Accounts Committee simply told the hon. gentlemen, asking to have that investigation, that the government, through its officials, had acted wisely and that neither he nor any member had any right to ask why they had been actuated by those good motives.

I think that the discussion of this question has gone far enough. I rose merely because I wanted to show that we who have been present in the committee simply desired to have the truth brought out and only the truth. We do not want any travelling beyond the realms of truth. We do not want to go into presumptions and possibilities and probabilities, and discover what might have been or what might not have been wrong in other accounts not before us. If there had been any other accounts wrong the Public Accounts Committee would have allowed my hon. friend to investigate and discover the wrong, but the Public Accounts Committee, as I understood their wishes the other day, had no intention of allowing my hon. friend to go forward and travel through any kind of questions that are not relevant, that could serve no purpose except to arrive at the conclusion at which he arrived himself—and he arrived at that conclusion without investigation; he solved this mythical problem and decided that an attempt at fraud was committed by the Grand Trunk Pacific. I have some misgivings about the conclusions he has drawn in reference to that, but if he is satisfied with drawing those conclusions let him do so.

I shall now ask leave to move the following amendment:

That all the words after 'that' when it appears the first time in the proposed motion, be struck out and the following added instead thereof.

The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company presented to the government certain claims for expenditures on account of the western division of the National Transcontinental Railway for the purpose of receiving payment for the same out of the proceeds of the company's securities, guaranteed by the government, deposited to the credit of the Minister of Finance and Receiver General;

That objection having been taken to the claim by the government on the ground that part of the moneys were not properly chargeable to the cost of construction of the said railway the claims were thereupon withdrawn by the company;

That inasmuch as no money was paid by the government in respect of such claims, either out of the fund referred to or out of any other public fund, there is nothing before the Committee on Public Accounts requiring any inquiry respecting the said claims.

Mr. ALEX. JOHNSTON (Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, were it not for the reason that I am under contract with my hon. friend the chief whip of the Conservative party of the House of Commons, I would be tempted to make some extended observations in reply to the remarks of my hon. friend for St. Antoine division, Montreal (Mr. Ames).

Mr. LENNOX. Don't restrain yourself.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I have some regard for my hon. friend for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), who I understand is to take the floor, and I am anxious to fulfil my part of the contract so that he may have the opportunity of making his speech at the earliest possible moment. That is my apology for the few remarks I have to make. My hon. friend from St. Antoine division has treated us to another of those frock-coat orations which he is in the habit of delivering to this House from time to time, which are mere repetitions of what has taken place in the Public Accounts Committee in the last few weeks; and the absolute want of interest shown in the observations of my hon. friend this afternoon is proof positive that both the House and the country are becoming weary of the efforts of the hon. gentleman to instruct the people of this country. Of course we are not all as fortunate as my hon. friend. We are not all walking around the streets and the corridors and appearing in the committee rooms and pounding our breasts and thanking the gods that we are not as other men are. With regard to the transaction immediately before the House, I have this to say, that no member of the Public Accounts Committee has been more faithful in his attendance on that committee than I have been; I have watched every detail of this matter since it started, and there is absolutely nothing in the position taken by our hon. friends opposite. The question between them and this side of the House is a perfectly clear one. Our hon. friends opposite seem to be very much annoyed that the government refused to entertain a claim which my hon. friend from St. Antoine with his usual accuracy says is $162,000. In that statement my hon. friend is about as accurate as he usually is. When I tell the House that he is only about $60,000 out of the way hon. members will not be surprised, knowing that the statement comes from that hon. gentleman. Now, the position which I take as a member of the Public Accounts Committee and which I hope my associates on this side of the House on that committee will take, is this, that any expenditure of public money made by the government of this country is an expenditure to be inquired into in every possible detail by that committee, but that it has no right to waste its time inquiring into claims that some people may have against the government until such time as those claims are presented, approved, and paid by the government. I am not satisfied that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for St. Anne's division (Mr. J. C. Walsh) makes the position I desire to take on this question absolutely clear, and therefore I desire to move in amendment to the amendment, seconded by Mr. Ross:

That the amendment be amended by adding the following: That this House will at all times insist on its right to make, through its committees, the fullest investigation of all public expenditures, but does not deem it necessary or proper to authorize the Committee on Public Accounts to enforce the production of papers that do not relate to any payment of public money.

Mr. HAUGHTON LENNOX (South Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, the fact that we have an amendment and an amendment to the amendment indicates, I think, pretty fully the position in which the government find themselves. Driven from post to pillar, from one position to another, they are compelled to place in the hands of one hon. gentleman an amendment, and in the hands of another an amendment to the amendment, in the hope that in the midst of the confusion they may possibly escape. That idea is borne out by the diversity of arguments, if we can dignify them by the name of arguments, which have been presented by the various gentlemen who have come to the support of the government-arguments which are not directed to the point at issue, but are an effort, evidently concerted, to lead away for the time being, if they possibly can, the attention of the members from the real issue in the case. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat made the statement that what we have to investigate in the Public Accounts Committee are moneys that have actually been paid and that beyond that we should not go. That is a remarkable proposition in face of the fact that not only was an account presented but that account had been certified by large contractors with whom this government is connected at the present time, and with whom it is going to be connected for years to come. That was certified by the most important officials of that company to be correct; that was in the hands of the government for over a month and was passed upon by an official whom these hon. gentlemen are putting forward to-day as an example of an honest and efficient officer, namely Mr. Schreiber. I shall have a word or two to say on that point further on. It will be difficult for the people to understand how an official in an important department, knowing that the government auditor had rejected certain items in an account, could have undertaken to certify that that account was correct. And then when we are seeking to investigate this matter, we are to be confined purely to the question as to how much the government did pay and are not to be allowed to inquire whether the official, who certified to a fradulent account, acted honestly or dishonestly. The hon. gentleman says that the House is weary of these efforts of the hon. member for St. Antoine Division (Mr. Ames). No doubt the supporters of the government in the Public Accounts Committee are very weary of the efforts of my hon. friend, because from day to day he and others on this side are making things a little too hot for the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. Johnston) and others supporting the government. I do not think I need say much about the other hon. gentleman for it appears I have two to answer. I am particularly honoured in that regard.

Mr. TAYLOR. Double barrelled.

Mr. LENNOX. Yes, but the weapon is not as dangerous as some of the arms which are put into the hands of our volunteers. I do not think I would do the hon. gentleman any injustice if I were to say he has not given the matter much consideration. An hon. gentleman who could say that the amount involved was only $160 has evidently not gone very deeply into the matter, and so I might pass over his remarks without comment, were I not led to inquire what was the parentage of the very well worded and thoughtful resolution which he introduced. I think I would not have to go very far out of the government ranks for the draftsman of this resolution; and although it seems to come from an innocent source, it points to the argument that the government are casting about and trying by the most skilful devices and by the most skilfully worded resolutions to draw the attention of the public from the real issue. What is involved in the matter before the House? There is involved the custody and the control and direction of the public records of this country. It involves the question whether the public affairs of this country are to be honestly recorded and whether these records are to be inviolate or to be at the mercy of those who choose to destroy them and rob the people of what they are entitled to at the hands of the government. The documents in question were not merely documents prepared by the Grand Trunk Pacific. They were documents placed in the custody of the government, which were rejected by Mr. Shannon, a government official, which were then submitted to the Department of Railways, which were accepted and certified to by the Department of Railways, notwithstanding Mr. Shannon's rejection, which remained in the custody of the government for a month, and which afterwards were allowed to be taken away and the main portion of them destroyed by the Grand Trunk Pacific. Just examine this matter for a moment. Would any government in the civilized world, under similar conditions, after certain documents had been put in its custody, dare to destroy them? This government has transgressed the constitutional rules of government to a great extent. I ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) if those documents had been filed with his department, and passed upon by his department, would he have dared to destroy them? If he would not dare to destroy them himself, if the government dared not destroy them, how could the government honestly give them into the hands of a railway company and allow that company to destroy them? What the government dared not do directly, they did indirectly by placing these in the hands of the railway company.

Another important question, which the government supporters are endeavouring to get away from is this. In the Public Accounts Committee, the supporters of the government do not wait for the person whose accounts are being investigated to refuse to produce any document that may be asked for, but they take the position that before any such refusal is given they will themselves object to the production of such documents. So eager are these representatives of the people to protect the corporations that they make objections even when none are made by those directly interested. That is what was done in this connection. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken moved for a subpœna. He got it and the subpœna directed that certain papers should be produced. But when the matter came up again, the supporters of the government did not wait for the railway company to object but moved a resolution that Mr. Walker should not be permitted to produce the papers, and consequently instructions were sent him not to bring them. That was the course taken by those hon. gentlemen, and then they stand up here and vie with each other in lauding the honesty of Mr. Schreiber. But nobody on this side has attacked Mr. Schreiber. Mr. Schreiber, however has done that which in the eyes of the country, was wrong, and he is upon trial at present, and we are trying to ascertain whether or not he was negligent, honest or dishonest.

It is a matter that is not to be overlooked, that while Mr. Schreiber says he was guided by the instructions of the Justice Department in allowing the items, Mr. Shannon, who opposed the items before they came to Mr. Schreiber, was also acting under the guidance of the Justice Department. Is it not a matter to demand our careful consideration when we find that Mr. Shannon, acting as he swears under the instructions and guidance of the Minister of Justice, was compelled to reject these accounts, yet, when they have passed Mr. Shannon and come to another gentleman who is acting under exactly the same advice that gentleman says, that acting under this advice he was compelled to pass the account. The public record when it was produced showed what was the deliberate opinion of the Minister of Justice. Hon. gentlemen opposite, seeking something to talk about, laud Mr. Schreiber as a marvellously honest man. And they tell us that we need not investigate the circumstances of the refusal to pay this money or attempt to ascertain the bona fides of these transactions. When these hon. gentlemen laud Mr. Schreiber let it be well understood that nobody is attacking that gentleman's honesty. But we have not forgotten, and are not likely to forget, that if you search the public records of the Treasury Board overrulings in this country in which the former Auditor General was on one side and Mr. Schreiber on the other, you will probably not find one case but the Auditor General was standing for the people and Mr. Schreiber for the monopolist or contractor or grafter who was trying to acquire the moneys of this country. I need not go over the instances, but I may remind the House of the case of Corry & Laverdure. Where was Mr. Schreiber in that case? On the side of the contractors against the people whose rights were upheld by the Auditor General. Take the more recent and even more glaring case, involving thousands of dollars of the Farran's Point canal and M. P. Davis. Where was Mr. Schreiber in that case? On the side of the man who was taking the money of this country dishonestly, and on the other side, on the side of the people, was the Auditor General. And where is Mr. Schreiber to-day? Why, he is the pet of the government And where is the former Auditor General? He is out of office. And Mr. Shannon who rejected these accounts of which we are speaking and who was overruled by Mr. Schreiber—where is he? He stood by the people and by the opinion of the Minister of Justice. He was right, and he followed up the matter until he got the Minister of Finance to finally decide against these items. And Mr. Shannon is no longer in the department, while Mr. Schreiber is again in control.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. May I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lennox) a question? Is he not aware that Mr. Shannon since he made this report has been promoted to a better position, at a higher salary?

Mr. LENNOX. I am not. I am aware that Mr. Shannon is in the employ of the government but he is no longer auditor—he is no longer the watch-dog of the interests of the people of this country and that is the important point.

Mr. CARVELL. May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Where is the evidence that Mr. Shannon acted under the direction of the Minister of Justice?

Mr. LENNOX. I thought the hon. gentleman (Mr. Carvell) was not paying so much attention to the real issue in the committee as he might be. The evidence is that of a witness who stated the other day that Mr. Shannon, the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Finance were in consultation with regard to this matter. I would not want to rob the Minister of Finance of one tittle of the applause to which he is entitled. I recognize to the fullest extent the absolute honesty of the Minister of Finance in the matter. But I think enough of the Minister of Finance to believe that he does not need any bouquets from the government supporters as tributes to his honesty. These hon. gentlemen on the other side seem to think that as soon as one speck of honesty shows in any department it is a manifestation at which they should throw up their hats and shout for joy. The conditions are bad enough, but still I think it is a little unseemly, when it is shown that the Minister of Finance has been honest in this transaction, that hon. gentlemen opposite should treat as an exceptional circumstance and one that should be shouted from the house-tops as a signal victory for their side. What are the circumstances? The Minister of Finance, no doubt, would have acted honestly in this matter of his own motion, had the case come to his knowledge. But it might never have come to his knowledge had that amity and goodwill existed between Mr. Courtney and Mr. Schreiber which exists among some of the officials of the government. So we can well understand that Mr. Courtney having knowledge that Mr. Shannon had rejected this item and that Mr. Schreiber had allowed it, was on the alert. And, even if the Minister of Finance had not been called in at all, it is probably that Mr. Courtney, the Deputy Minister of Finance, and Mr. Shannon would have blocked the way. It is a pity, it is something that I really regret, to see hon. gentlemen on the other side, because of the dismal instances of dishonesty in the various departments, when they find one little patch of light in the darkness driven to make a great display over it and laud as something exceptional and peculiar the honesty of the Minister of Finance.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the matter can be boiled down in very condensed form. Are we or are we not to have public records in this country intact and safe? We had it the other day that one minister decided that there should be no public records of public transactions. He decided that for months and months during the progress of the important Insurance Commission, preservation of the facts was to be left to the uncertain record of memory alone. Then we have in the same department, the unfortunate loss of documents in reference to Judge Henderson. That cannot be avoided. Then, in reference to the purchase of the sub-target gun machine, we have, as will be shown before long, a second agreement falsely reciting the first agreement. Then, we have the case in the Public Accounts Committee to-day of orders in council falsely reciting former orders in council and mistakenly reciting the facts on which a third order in council is based. We have such circumstances as these all along the line. What we want to know is this, must the people come to the conclusion that a document may come into the custody of the servants of the people, may remain there for months, may be identified, passed upon—rejected if you will—and then may be handed out to be destroyed when the government themselves would not dare to destroy it. That is the great issue that is before the people, and that is the important issue, even if we wiped this transaction out of sight altogether. Shall we have honest records, honestly kept and faithfully preserved by the representatives of the people.

Mr. LENNOX.

Amendment to the amendment agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is on the motion as amended.

Mr. SPROULE. I merely wish to draw your attention to the fact that the mover and seconder of the first amendment voted afterwards against their own motion.

Motion as amended agreed to on division.

SUPPLY—COLD STORAGE SYSTEM.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. E. D. SMITH (Wentworth). Mr. Speaker, before going into Committee of Supply, I beg to move the following amendment :

That all the words after the word 'that' be left out and the following words substituted therefor :

It is the immediate duty of the government to take such steps as are necessary to thoroughly ensure, so far as practicable, the safe transportation of Canadian perishable food products from the point of production to their ultimate market.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Mr. Speaker, I have to call your attention to the fact that the hon. member (Mr. Smith) who moved this motion has already on the order paper a motion to the same effect. At page 13 of the order paper of this date there is the following notice of motion by Mr. Smith (Wentworth) :

January 28—Mr. Smith (Wentworth)—Proposed resolution—That it is the duty of the government——

And further, that it is the duty of the government to take such steps as will ensure that all its regulations shall be carried fully into effect.

I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker, whether or not this is not practically the same motion and if so whether a motion covering practically the same subject can be moved at this time ?

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). Mr. Speaker, I would draw your attention to the fact that the motion is not the same. It may be dealing with the same subject, but you cannot get over the fact that it is not only the right but the duty of the opposition to have grievances redressed or to present their views upon any question before this House on the motion to go into Committee of Supply regardless of whether a motion may be on the order paper or not. The right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is aware of the fact that there is no opportunity to reach and discuss any motion on the order paper before the prorogation of parliament, but we have to deal with these questions every time we go into supply because that is the only opportunity we have of presenting our views to the House and the public. Therefore we have a right in my judgment to avail ourselves of this opportunity and I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to keep that in mind when giving your ruling.

Mr. E. D. SMITH. This subject is much wider than that covered by the motion on the order paper. That only deals with transportation on the sea ; this covers transportation on land and sea.

Mr. SPEAKER. It being so close to six o'clock I will call it six o'clock and give my ruling on the matter after dinner.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The decision of Mr. Speaker on the question of order raised at six o'clock is:

The motion on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith) purports on its face to deal mainly, if not entirely, with regulations and appliances as to cold storage, cold air and ventilating chambers in vessels.

The motion now submitted by the same hon. member, by way of amendment to the motion that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the House to go into Committee of Supply, is one dealing with the wide and general question of the safe transportation of Canadian perishable food products from the point of production to their ultimate market.

I think this is not the same question, and does not anticipate a question already appointed for consideration by the House; I therefore rule that it is in order.

Mr. E. D. SMITH (Wentworth). This is a subject of very great importance to the very large class of people in this country engaged in agriculture, as well as to the country at large. The motion deals with perishable food products. Our annual export of these perishable food products amount to over $50,000,000. Their value depends very largely, being perishable, upon their safe transportation from the point of production to the ultimate market. No matter how valuable they may be when produced, unless they are carried to the market safely, that value is very materially reduced. My contention is that the government, during the past number of years, have not taken all the steps which they might have taken to ensure this safe transportation. These products consist chiefly of four or five articles. First of all, meats; secondly, cheese (the greatest in value, being about one-half the whole); third, butter; fourth, fruits of various kinds. These are all products that are more or less concentrated in form. They are the most valuable products, the products which agricultural experts tell the farmers of this country are the products which they ought to grow. They are the products which produce, not only the greatest amount of value from a given number of acres of land, but which take from the land the least amount of nutriment, that exhaust the farms of the country to the least possible extent. Therefore, there are many reasons why this is one of the most important interests in the country—the production of these perishable products for export. They are carried by rail from the point of production to the ship's side, a journey of one or two days. They are then carried across the ocean, a journey of ten or twelve days, and then they are a certain length of time in getting into the hands of the consumer. I have always laid the greatest stress upon the journey across the ocean, because it consumes the greater length of time. It would be of very little use to make sure that the goods were delivered to the ship's side in good condition, if the ten or twelve days' journey across the ocean spoiled them; and it would be of very little use to make provision for their safe handling on the other side for the short time they would be there in getting into the hands of the consumer, if, in the journey across the ocean, they were not properly cared for. Consequently, I have always laid the greatest stress on this portion of the journey, although the journey from the point of production to the ship's side, for the length of time it takes, is equally important.

Originally, these products were all carried practically in one way; they were carried in box cars to the ship's side, and in unventilated chambers or holds of the vessels across the ocean. This was the condition many years ago, and at that time and up to within a very few years of the present day, an enormous loss was sustained on these products. Professor Robertson pointed out, before the Agricultural Committee, about three or four years ago that the loss upon cheese, of which we export about $25,000,000 worth annually, would be about two and a half million dollars in the following year on account of the lack of ventilation in the ships' chambers where the cheese was carried. A careful study of the figures next year proved his estimate to be approximately correct, that we had in that year a loss of approximately two and a half million dollars in the value of the cheese exported from Canada on account of the bad ventilation in the ships. I pointed out in this House, as far back as seven years ago, and showed from statistics, which were corroborated by statistics collected by Professor Robertson and read before the Agricultural Committee, that the loss on apples was not less than 25 per cent, which, as the value of a barrel of apples is more than $2, would amount to at least $1,000,000 a year. This made at least three and a half million dollars that was being wasted at that time on these two products alone. Since that time, I am free to admit and glad to admit, much improvement has been made in the means of transportation on sea, due, I believe, almost, if not quite, entirely to the agitation in this House and out of this House by those interested in this subject. Later on, when this agitation gained force, and the steamship companies took some cognizance of it, some ventilation was provided. That ventilation I contend is to-day, after all these years, still extremely inadequate. I have always maintained that if the ship's holds and chambers were properly and thoroughly ventilated, and the air in those chambers was made of the same temperature as that of the ocean air outside, which could be done easily and cheaply, with practically no expense and at no increased cost to the shipper, we could carry our cheese and winter apples across the ocean in perfect, safe and sound condition without any extra expense or charges to the shipper or the government for the ventilation, the cool air or cold storage for these products. At last—and I wish to thank the minister for this—we have the proofs in our hands that this would be, and should be, and can be the case. I have asked that we should have thermograph records on these boats carrying these perishable products, in all the chambers, in order that we might ascertain with certainty whether on the steamers on which they had fans the fans were going or not, and whether on those that had not fans the temperature was not so high as to damage and destroy the fruit. At last we have a considerable number of those records, and from these records it is not difficult to demonstrate that there is a vast deal of difference between the ships that are ventilated and those that are not ventilated, and that there is a vast deal of difference between the holds and chambers that are ventilated and those that are not ventilated, although they pretend to be, on the same steamer. That is the reason why I have always maintained, and maintain still, that the only way we can possibly secure the safe transportation of these products is for the government of this country to make regulations, and to see that these regulations are enforced, requiring that the temperatures in all these chambers for carrying perishable products across the ocean shall be maintained at the temperature of the ocean surrounding the ship. If that is done, we need not go to the expense of $100,000 for the purpose of fitting up cooled chambers in the ships. I want, first of all, to demonstrate what I contend, that in some of these ships the temperature in one chamber is vastly different from what it is in another. It should not be so, it is not necessary to be so, and at no expense either to the government or the shipper this could be corrected. I will give the dates of sailing from Montreal and three temperatures on each ship—the first, forty-eight hours after the ship leaves port; the second, the lowest point reached on the voyage; and the third, immediately before the ship is unloaded:

These figures show a difference in some cases of as much as 20 degrees; in one of the chambers winter apples or cheese would go across the ocean in perfect safety while in another chamber in the same ship they would be entirely spoiled. Think of perishables being carried across the ocean in a temperature of 80 degrees, as this record shows was the case in two instances. The results would be that the value of the cargo would be reduced 25 per cent if not 50 per cent, and the loss would ultimately fall on the producer in this country. I contend that this was entirely and absolutely unnecessary, and that without any expense the government could provide regulations, and see that these regulations were enforced, requiring every one of these chambers to be properly ventilated and the cargo carried at the temperature of the surrounding ocean air, which would have been perfectly suitable to the carrying of these two articles, cheese and apples. I might point out that at a later date the Minister of Agriculture came before this House and asked for a vote of $100,000 for the purpose of installing in some of these ships what is called a cool air plant, that is, a plant that would produce a cool temperature. The $100,000 was freely granted. It was shown then that the temperatures in the unventilated holds were so bad that these perishable products could not be carried safely, and it was pointed out that it was necessary to do something. I urged then on the minister that what was most necessary was to insure that these chambers should be ventilated, so that the temperature in them would be brought to the temperature of the surrounding ocean air, which would not cost this country one cent. The minister contended that it was necessary to put in this cool air plant. I voted for it willingly, on the ground that even if it did cost the country $100,000, we would then be sure at any rate of having cool air provided in these chambers, so that these perishable products would be carried safely. But I pointed out that the shipper would probably be charged a largely increased rate for carrying in these cool air chambers—which I wish to emphasize are not cold storage chambers—while in all probability the same result could be achieved by securing the ventilation of the ordinary chambers of the vessels. The minister stated at that time that there would be no extra charge for carrying the products in these cool air chambers; but we find that there is an extra charge of from 20 to 40 per cent over the ordinary freight rates. Up to the present time, no shipper can be sure of getting a chamber properly ventilated. Many have paid this extra charge, in order to get the advantage of something which they might have obtained by the ventilation of the chambers without any extra charge. Look at the loss this is to the shippers. They pay from 20 to 40 per cent extra freight for the purpose of securing what they could have secured without paying anything extra; and, moreover, a very large number of those chambers are not ventilated. Some of them do not pretend to be ventilated, while some of them are supposed to be ventilated by what is called a ventilating shaft, which is merely a small chimney from the chamber to the outer air on deck. This is practically of no use. If there were some inlet for the air, as there is in a house through the chinks of the windows and doors, there would be some ventilation by this chimney; but without that, in a ship surrounded by water, there is no ingress for the air, so that that sort of ventilation is practically of no use whatever. Then, we have another system of ventilation called the cowl system. This is a very good system while the ship is in motion. It is the system installed in the Dominion Express cars that carry our fruits to distant markets, and for that purpose it is an excellent system, the air being carried down a duct to the bottom of the car, and then being forced by pressure up through the fruit and going through an outlet at the top. If the shafts attached to these cowls were fitted as they are on the cars, this would be a fairly good system when the ship is in motion; but when the ship is standing at the dock loading or unloading, there is no ventilation.

And if it should transpire, as probably it does sometimes, that the wind is blowing with the vessel at as rapid a rate as the vessel is going, there would then be no ventilation. The only absolute thorough system is the artificial system—driving air into the chamber or sucking it out by fans driven by steam or other means. We have only that in a few of the ships, and the records show that in many of these chambers, in crossing the ocean, even in the hottest months of the year, the temperature was practically 60 and that only for a very short time in the hottest months does it ever reach 65. In nearly all the ventilated steamers, in the hottest months, it never reaches 60, and for ten months it rarely goes above 65. I think for nine months rarely above 50. These are all temperatures nearly as good as those in the chambers fitted up by the cool air plant. With the exception of a very short interval these chambers maintain by ventilation temperature equally as good as those provided with cool air plants. Let me read some comparisons of ventilation versus cold air.

Rec. No.	Name of Str.	Date.	Temp.
11. Vent	'Montfort,'	June 16,	3 d. below 50 9 d. below 60

Record number, 11. Vent.
Names of steamer, 'Fontfort.'
Date, June 16.
Temperature, 3 days below 50; 9 days below 60.

On the same steamer in a chamber that was provided with cold air at an expense of from 20 to 40 per cent additional freight, the temperature never ran below 50 and the average was 60. In other words the chamber ventilated was cooler than the chamber fitted out with cold air provided at an expense of $100,000 by this government, and 20 to 40 per cent additional freight to the shippers.

On September 29 the 'Kildona' record showed in one chamber, a ventilated chamber, a temperature 54 to 52, 54; and in another chamber provided with an expensive cold air plant, a temperature of 54, 52, 50, or practically the same. Only when we reached the other side there was a difference of four degrees.

The 'Lake Champlain' June 30 in a ventilated chamber the temperature was 60, 54, 57. In cold air chamber on the 'Monmouth' on June 30 the temperature was 66, 56, 60. On the 'Latona' in a cold air chamber on the same day the temperature was 66, 50, 56. In other words the ventilated chamber on the 'Lake Champlain' was cooler than the cool air chamber fitted out at heavy expense on the other two boats crossing on the same day.

The 'Sardinian,' with ventilated chamber, on July 7, the temperature was 60, 52, 61; and in the Cervona, fitted with cold air, on the same day the temperatures were 59, 56, 53, or just about the same average.

'Mount Royal,' ventilated chamber, July 24, 67, 54, 58; The 'Kildona,' ventilated chamber, July 21, 67, 57, 64; and the 'Kildona' with cold air chamber July 21, 61, 58, 56.

I do not say that these were the temperatures which all the boats maintained that had cold air, but these were some of them. There were a number of them that carried goods at a lower temperature. What I wish to point out is either one thing or the other —either the temperatures I have read were too high, and if they were too high, it should have been provided by government regulations that they should not have been so high; or if they were not too high, there was no necessity for cool air chambers at all, because ventilated chambers gave exactly the same results.

Most of these perishable products are carried across in one or other of these steamers. Only a very small portion is carried in cold storage, which I have not spoken of yet. Out of our total exports of over $50,000,000, only $6,000,000, is carried in cold storage. Over $45,000,000 are carried on an average in these chambers which, if properly ventilated, would provide all that is necessary. Even yet, only a very small portion is carried in the cool air chambers provided at such expense. In the cool air chambers of this last year, 394,000 packages were carried. In chambers ventilated and not ventilated, there were carried 1,801,500 packages or about four times as much were carried outside the cool air chambers as in them. Many of the shippers no doubt take the chance that they would catch a ventilated vessel and they probably know which vessels usually carry these goods in properly ventilated chambers. They take the chances of carrying them in these chambers rather than pay the extra freight charged for carrying them in cool air chambers. I do not say that cool air chambers are not at all necessary. A shipper may desire to have his goods carried at 40 degrees in July and be willing to pay the extra price, but he cannot be sure that they will be carried at 40 or any other temperature in these cool air chambers, so that he does not know whether he is going to get that temperature at all or not. That is the main contention I have to make, namely, that by government regulation these chambers, whether ventilated or cool air, or cold storage, might be maintained at a temperature suitable to carry safely to market these perishable food products.

The other method of carrying goods is in cold storage. Cold storage is used for the carriage of our butter which requires to be carried at a temperature below freezing point, and also for our fruits which require to be carried at a temperature as close to and above freezing point as is safe. I am bound to say that now most of the steamers carrying butter in cold storage are carrying it at a temperature below freezing point. The minister has said in his report at one time that it should be carried at 10, and at another time at 20. I am not going to cavil about the exact temperature. If the butter is carried below freezing point, I dare say it is not so very bad after all. In some of the chambers, however, the goods were carried above freezing point though very close to it, and I am not going to quarrel about that at present. But that is an easy matter which ought to have been arranged seven or eight years ago instead of only at present. In carrying butter all the man in charge of the plant has to do is to see that he gets it below freezing point. Whether he gets it down to 10, 20, or 30, he is pretty safe and any kind of a man can manage that. But when it comes to fruit, the case is entirely different, yet these men who have charge of the plants seem to think that all they have to do, in carrying fruit, is to carry it above the freezing point. If they get butter below the freezing point all right; and if they get fruit above the freezing point, that is equally all right, but anybody who knows anything about carrying fruit in cold storage knows that to obtain the best results it must be carried as close to freezing point as is safe. A proper cold storage chamber can be kept at an even temperature practically within one degree. It is idle to say that it is necessary that the temperature should fluctate 3, 4, 5, 10, or 15 degrees as it does in some of these chambers. Any one who is acquainted with cold storage knows that that is not satisfactory and that the goods can be carried at an absolutely even temperature for weeks and months. The temperature at which fruits should be carried is immediately above freezing point. Let us examine some of these temperatures and see at what temperature the fruit is carried.

In many of these cases, the temperature jumped up and down four or five degrees or more, and, in many of them, for a large portion of the journey—and not the first portion either—the temperature was from five to ten degrees higher than it ought to have been. I do not wish to imply that this was the case in all the boats. The temperatures in most of the boats were good, but here are a number of cases which I have quoted in which the temperatures were entirely wrong. Now Mr. McNeil, in the committee the other day, said that shippers ought to have confidence. But how can a shipper have confidence when he does not know, when he ships his fruit, that the temperature will not be ten or fifteen degrees higher than it ought to be? He may send off two or three shipments that go through all right. But if, on the third or fourth shipment, the fruit is carried at a temperature that damages it materially, he will probably lose more than he gained on his previous shipments. If these wrong temperatures were unavoidable, shippers might be willing to take some chances, or they might be reconciled to doing what they feel compelled to do now—not ship at all. At the inception of the shipping in cold storage, we had a fairly liberal quantity of fruit shipped—largely for experimental purposes of course; but to-day the whole quantity of tender fruit shipped last season, was 35,000 packages, a large proportion of which was United States fruit. And as to the United States fruits, we know that they can be put in the hold of the vessel or in these unventilated chambers without suffering much injury. They are largely California plums and peaches, and dealers know that these can be put on the shelves and kept for two or three weeks without rotting. It is not necessary to have the finest system of cold storage for this kind of fruits. Of the remainder the greater portion was apples, which, even if placed in a properly ventilated chamber, would probably have gone over in fair condition. I had an experience myself which illustrates this. I shipped three cars of summer apples. One car happened to be put in a chamber that was not a cold storage chamber, while the other went into cold storage. But the man who sold them on the other side said that one was just as good as the other. In other words, the temperature maintained outside the cold storage chamber was just as good as that within the chamber.

Now, the minister may object, and may ask: How are you going to regulate these temperatures? Well, there are many ways of doing it. In the first place a large number of these cold storage chambers and cool air chambers were put in with government money, that is, half the cost of installation was paid by the government. The minister had an opportunity, when granting this money, to make regulations such as he is making now with regard to his cold storage warehouses on land. He is learning wisdom by experience. He has discovered that it is possible to make regulations that will cover not merely two or three years while the subsidies are being paid, but all time to come. The hon. minister missed this golden opportunity in the case of these vessels. Then, again, we are paying to-day subsidies of about $1,000,000 a year for ships to come to our ports. When granting these subsidies, it would not be difficult to insert a clause that the perishable products carried in the cold storage chambers shall be carried at temperature named by the government, or that these ships shall be ventilated according to regulations made by the government, otherwise the subsidy shall not be paid. That is another way. In addition to that, I wish to point out that we have in our statute-books a law that provides that no ship can leave any port in Canada—that is no ship can get her clearance papers—if she carries cattle, until the government inspector has been aboard and inspected the ship to see that the regulations made under Act of this parliament are carried out. In the same way, provision might be made that no ship shall get her clearance papers or touch at our ports unless the company owning that ship is ready to submit to the regulations made by the government. These regulations do not need to be onerous. The regulations with regard to ventilation would simply require these ships to do what all of them pretend to do now, and some of them actually carry out. If the shippers in the west to-day could have a guarantee from the steamship company that their fruit would be carried at a certain temperature desired by the shipper, there would be a large quantity of our fruits offered for transportation. There is no reason why we should not ship peaches to the old country. We have peaches that could be carried and delivered in that market in perfect condition. Scores of carloads could be sent to the English market, and sold at three or four times the profit that is gained in Canada, if the cold storage system were what it ought to be. We can load a car at a point on the Niagara peninsula at six o'clock in the evening, transport it to Quebec and have it put in the cold storage chamber before twenty-four hours have elapsed. That fruit could be landed in the Liverpool market within six days from that time. And, if the cold storage on these ships was what the shippers desired, and if the steamship company would guarantee the temperature as they ought, or if this government would guarantee the temperature, this fruit would be shipped and a lot of money would be turned into the pockets of the people of this country. The problem is an easy and simple one, and I maintain that it ought to be dealt with in an energetic manner by the government. The thing can be done, and it does not need a vote of $100,000 a year from this parliament, either; the minister does not need to ask for a single cent more than is already voted. It is only necessary that he should provide these regulations and insist upon their enforcement.

Now I want to point out that the government or somebody probably with the knowledge of the minister, has actually provided in some of these contracts with the steamships companies, that they should be subject to regulation. Now what would you expect following that? Would you not expect the government to issue regulations?

M. E. D. SMITH.

They have provided in most of the contracts last year that they are subject to regulations. The whole year has gone by, and not a regulation has been issued. In order to make sure of this, I asked for a return showing what regulations have been issued, and I want to read that return because it is very brief, it is a curiosity :

Return to an order of the House calling for a copy of all regulations submitted by the government to Trans-atlantic steamship companies for their guidance in regard to the storage of perishable products, or temperatures to be maintained in cold storage, or cold air chambers, or ventilation required in ordinary storage chambers on their steamships.

The contracts entered into by the Department of Agriculture with the Trans-atlantic steamship companies have long since expired, and there are no such regulations as are called for by this order in existence so far as that department is concerned.

Now if that is not an acknowledgment of impotency beyond description, I would like to know what it is. Here we have actually provided in a few contracts that regulations may be made, but so utterly negligent and careless of the matter have this government been that they have not made any regulations at all. The Minister of Trade and Commerce by inserting that clause in these contracts has admitted that it is necessary, and why has it not been done ? Simply because it would not bring to the minister any applause, perhaps. When he comes down to this House and asks for $100,000 it sounds big, it goes over the country that he is going to spend $100,000 in the interest of the agriculturists, and he goes to the people and asks for their support on the ground that he is doing something for them. To do these things would require nothing but an order in council, we require no money, it would be a plain business affair, but probably it would not bring the minister so much attention as it does to come down to this House and ask for a large sum of money. I cannot imagine any other reason, at any rate it has not been done, nothing has been done by the government, no regulation has been made. We are in the position that those of us who are shippers of goods have got to take what the steamship companies think it to their interest to give us. The minister will say, perhaps, that the steamship companies know their own business, and that if we give them time they will provide the accommodation, that there has been great progress, and I admit there has been ; he will probably maintain that if they are only let alone they will in time provide a sufficient accommodation for the shipment of these perishable products. But what I maintain is that we should not be asked to wait for ten or twenty years when the thing could be brought about in one year. We have now waited many years. This matter has been pressed time and again on the attention of the steamship companies and on the attention of this House, yet up to the present time nothing definite has been done, nothing that will bring about definite results.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the carriage of these perishable products across the sea is the main question, but there is also the question of carrying them on land, and I want to say a word with regard to that. Our goods are frequently placed in box cars. We could not possibly get refrigerator cars if we wanted them. Refrigerator cars are not necessary for winter apples or for cheese. But during a large portion of the year, these cars need to be ventilated. I have urged it before this House, and the minister did one year make an experiment by which a few cars were ventilated, and he stated in this House that the Grand Trunk were going to provide a number of ventilated cars. That was three years ago. Up to the present time practically nothing has been done. I know he will say that the matter of ventilating cars is in the hands of the Railway Commission. That may be true, to a certain extent. But I imagine that no one will contend that because the control of the traffic is to a certain extent given over to the Railway Commission, it is therefore taken out of the purview of this House. I maintain that it is the duty of the government to see to it that the Railway Commission take this matter up earnestly and vigorously, and see that the cars carrying perishable products are ventilated. It means a great deal. In a ventilated car most of these products can be carried with perfect safety ; in an unventilated car, with temperature ten or fifteen degrees higher, they are greatly damaged. Then the goods should be taken care of in some way when they land on the other side. But I will not trespass further upon the time of this House. The subject I feel is very important, it means several million dollars a year to those who produce these perishable food products. I maintain it is the duty of the Minister of Agriculture and of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to take this matter up seriously, and to provide, as is suggested in this resolution, that in future we shall know for a certainty that these goods can be carried safely.

Mr. D. DERBYSHIRE (Brockville). I am sure that we cannot find a great deal of fault with the speech of the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith). I was somewhat surprised that he should complain of the service last year. In the history of our country, possibly, we never had so good a service as we had in 1906, we never delivered our goods on the British market in so fine a condition, nor received as much money for them as we did this last year. In connection with our butter business, we had over 200 cars more than we did the year before, employed in carrying butter on the different railways at Montreal. We also had a very efficient inspector in Montreal who, as soon as the cars arrived in Montreal, made an inspection to see if the butter or cheese was in proper condition, and if it was not in proper condition, the companies received no pay for the carriage, and they were at once notified of the fact, as well as the Dairy Commissioner at Ottawa. That was one great improvement effected last year, when this inspection was provided at Montreal in order to keep a perfect check on the goods as they arrived there, to know what, condition they were in, what cars were to be paid for and what were not. In this respect our service last year was a great deal better than ever. In connection with our cheese business we had 300 cars more in 1906 than we ever had before. These, of course, were inspected in the same way with the same results and reports were made to the dairy commissioner showing how the goods were arriving from time to time. Last year we provided for the first time an efficient service in connection with our fruit, there being iced cars from the farm to Montreal and iced chambers from there to the old country. We had a good service and we gained in the volume of our business last year.

Mr. SPROULE. You do not mean to say that was the case throughout the country?

Mr. DERBYSHIRE. What I am trying to show is that we have been improving from year to year. We have been giving a better service to the producer each year, delivering the goods in better condition than ever before, and this last year was a record breaker in connection with that service.

Mr. SPROULE. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that last year, for the first time, iced cars were carrying fruit from the farm to Montreal?

Mr. DERBYSHIRE. Yes; from all sections of Canada.

Mr. SPROULE. That is simply in the hon. gentleman's imagination. I have never heard of such a thing in the country, and I have seen a large amount of fruit shipped.

Mr. DERBYSHIRE. We had refrigerator car service there last year, with the result that we delivered a large quantity of goods in first-class condition.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. In the western part of the country?

Mr. DERBYSHIRE. Yes. The president of the Montreal Produce Merchants' Association, Mr. Hodgson, in his official report, states that the service was satisfactory. In response to our requests, the minister agreed to start the service three weeks before we usually had it in operation on account of the hot weather coming in earlier than usual, so that the goods were delivered from the beginning to the end of the season in proper condition. The goods were delivered in Montreal in first-class condition last year. In cases where goods did not reach their destination in first-class condition, it will generally be found that it is due to the fact that the shippers did not look after them properly at the time of shipping. They should notify the agents when they require refrigerator cars, make arrangements to have the car available at a certain time and then be prepared to load and ship it. If the goods are put into the car and everything that is necessary to be done in connection with their shipment is done, and if they are promptly delivered, they will arrive in good condition. The great incentive to railways last year to deliver the goods in proper condition was that we had a car inspector at Montreal, who examined these goods upon their arrival, who noted the temperature of the goods delivered, and who reported the result, not only to the railway company, but to the commissioner here at Ottawa. In regard to ocean steamships, in 1902 we sent 80,337 boxes of cheese in cooled air chambers; 1903, 80,284; 1904, 102,238; and in 1905, 127,680. In 1906, 406,029, showing that we made great improvements in the system of handling and delivering our cheese. We not only had at these steamships an inspector to watch the goods as they went in to see that they were placed in compartments at a proper temperature and to see that proper provision was made in the handling of these goods, but the ships which delivered their goods in proper condition were reported, and the shippers were notified as to which vessels were giving the best service. In self-defence these steamship companies had to give a better service, and did give a better service in 1906, under the careful watchfulness of our dairy commissioner at Ottawa. We had men to inspect these goods on their arrival in the old country. When vessels landed at Liverpool they were watched to see at what temperature the goods were kept in when they were delivered. Last year was most satisfactory in that respect, and, as a result of this service, the consumption increased and better prices were obtained. Thermographs in 1905 were 272 and in 1906, 488 in number. There is another thing that happened this last year. The Surrey dock at London was built, and they put in a refrigerator there for the accommodation of the goods delivered, and this constitutes a most important improvement in the method of handling our goods in the old country. Right near Tooley street, the great distributing point of the city of London, we have this accommodation for our produce. There they have the best refrigerator service in the world. These goods are unloaded from the vessel into these refrigerator compartments, and on account of the service they gave last year they placed these goods before the consumer in first-class condition. One result was that steps were taken to improve the conditions in connection with other docks. At Bristol they are going to spend a large amount of money in improving their docks, so that they can receive the goods in as good condition as they are received at London. The goods will be transferred from the vessel into refrigerator compartments and delivered to the proper parties for distribution. These are important improvements, and they show the steady gain that we have been making in connection with our refrigerator service. Of course, we expect an increased service this year. We expect that Mr. Ruddick will devote most of his attention to this work. Last year he had butter, cheese, cow testing and other work on his hands, and his attention was divided, but this year he is going to devote his attention to cool curing and cold storage systems, so that we will have a better refrigerator service in connection with the production and shipment of butter, cheese and fruit, and in connection with the delivery of these goods, not only at Montreal, but also at London, Liverpool, Glasgow and Bristol. We will therefore be able to extend our market, obtain better prices and deliver the goods in a condition which will be satisfactory to the producers in Canada and the consumers abroad. Last year we shipped $6,500,000 worth of butter, and I may say that the report showed that that butter was delivered in fine condition in the old country. We shipped $25,000,000 worth of cheese and this cheese was never delivered in the old country in as fine condition. I know, because I have seen the letters which have been received from our friends in Britain. We never got as much money, and there never was as good a demand or as good prospects as there are for 1907, on account of the careful management of the refrigerator service in connection with the shipment of our butter, cheese and fruit. We shipped $15,000,000 worth of bacon, and it is due to the continuous improvement in the system that we are getting this large amount of money, which is $6,000,000 more than we received in any previous year in the history of the country. We know the value of this $6,000,000 to the people of Canada. It means that every industry in our land will be prosperous, and that there will be increased buying power on account of this large amount of money that they got in excess of that which they received in any previous year. A good deal has been done at the request of the Eastern Dairymen's Association and other associations, by our cool curing rooms in educating the farmers in connection with the curing of their cheese, and it shows the vast improvement that can be made by having this cooling system in operation from the commencement of the life of the cheese until it is finally put on the consumer's table in the British market. It has been so improved that I am sure we will be able to do a great deal better in 1907. I am delighted with the service; I am delighted with what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) has done in connection with the cold storage system. I am delighted that he is now giving the services of Dr. Ruddick to this service so that the whole system, from the factory right through to the British market, can be watched, and I am sure we will see that in 1907 we will be able to do even better than we have ever done in the past. The increasingly satisfactory results, the great improvements that have been made from year to year, are very commendable, and I feel proud of the Minister of Agriculture because he has had the good judgment to secure the improvement of this service, and I have no doubt that even the Conservatives feel proud of the Minister of Agriculture on account of his energy in directing the affairs of this important department of the government of Canada. As I said, I am sure that we will see that the results for 1907 will be even better than for 1906. While the reports that we have had on our goods that have been delivered indicate that they have been satisfactory, still we intend to do better and we will be able to do better in the near future. This will redound to the credit of the Minister of Agriculture and it will place our goods in the position of being, beyond dispute, the finest made anywhere in the world.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG (East Lambton). I am sure after hearing the speech of the hon. member from Brockville (Mr. Derbyshire) it will be folly almost to make any remarks detrimental to the Minister of Agriculture, if we are to believe all that the last speaker has said. He has been telling us of the splendid service and of the excellent minister that we have, and that everything is lovely and delightful, but I want to tell the hon. gentleman that if he goes into western Ontario or even into the Northwest provinces he will find that the Minister of Agriculture and his policy in general are not popular, and that the farmers of this country are demanding that a very different policy from the one being carried out, be very soon instituted with reference to this department.

However, there is before us to-night a very important question, the transportation of our perishable products, not only across the ocean but throughout our country, on the railroads east and west, and I am sure that this House could not devote its time to any question of more general interest. Can ada is favourably situated as regards agriculture. On the east she has the markets of Great Britain, Germany and the continent and on the west of China and Japan. There is no country in the world so favourably situated or so well adapted to the requirements of agriculture, and I am sure that the Minister of Agriculture of the Dominion of Canada has better opportunities than any minister of any other nation in the civilized world. We are not taking advantage of our position in this particular. The Argentine Republic, 6,000 miles from the markets of Europe, has an altogether better system of cold storage than we have to-day. There is no comparison between the boats carrying the goods of the Argentine Republic to the markets of Europe and the boats carrying our products only 2,500 or 2,600 miles. If you will investigate the cold storage systems of the Argentine Republic, New Zealand and Australia and compare the careful manner in which these countries look after their perishable products with our cold storage system and transportation facilities you will readily see that we are a long way behind them in that particular.

Mr. DERBYSHIRE. Why do they not sell their goods for as much money? Why have we 75 per cent of the cheese trade?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If the hon. gentleman goes to the markets of Europe and looks at the Argentine chilled meat going into those markets he will find there is no comparison between the manner in which that meat is cared for from the time it is killed until it goes to the table of the consumer and the manner in which our meats are carried across the Atlantic. If the hon. gentleman will look into the beef trade and the cold storage system that takes the carcases not only from the Argentine Republic, 6,000 miles away, but from New Zealand, 11,000 miles away, and from Australia, 12,000 miles away, to the European markets, he will find that the most careful system of cold storage is installed in the ships carrying those products and instead of the temperature varying, as the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith) has told you, some 15 degrees or 20 degrees, in the carriage of these products the temperature will not vary over 2 degrees or 3 degrees; otherwise it would be impossible to carry the goods from those countries to the European markets. As for the farmers of Canada being able to ship their meats to Great Britain and sell them as chilled meats on the market at practically the same price as fresh meat is being sold there, it is impossible, because they have to accept a system of cold storage which is given to them by the boats coming to our shores, that is, to say the least, inadequate.

With reference to the transportation question in general, there was a time some years ago when we were able to build our own ships and when boats of 2,000 tons were built in the little towns on our coasts; but the building of ships has gone to Great Britain and the continent and instead of boats of 2,000 tons we have to-day ships of 30,000 or 40,000 tons. These boats are made of steel, the insurance on them is less, their freight charges are less, and they are able to carry our goods in better condition than they could have been carried at the time when we were manufacturing our own boats. But still, though our shipping industry is practically out of existence and we have to depend on foreign boats to come to our shores and take away our products, we have, as I claim, practically no control over these boats and over the temperature in them, although we have materially assisted to place the machinery to develop cold storage in the boats that cross the Atlantic. As my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith) has already shown, we have no control over these temperatures and our goods are allowed to go across the Atlantic under conditions that are, to say the least, not favourable. Great Britain and the United States possess to-day the greatest and best transportation system in the world. The United States has invested $10,000,000,000 in railways. Great Britain has invested $750,000,000 in her ships, and has a costly railway system as well. Canada is making great strides in building railways but is paying little heed to her merchant marine or the exportation of her products. The railway statistics for Canada for 1906, give the capital invested in Canadian railways as $1,332,000,000. The following grants have been made towards the railway system by the people of Canada:

Dominion government grants ..	$194,000,000
Provincial government grants ..	43,000,000
Municipal grants..	17,000,000
A total of..	$254,000,000

This amount has been granted towards the railway transportation system of the Dominion of Canada by the people of Canada, so that the people are directly interested in this transportation question and in the railways of our country. In justice to the railways I should say that the Intercolonial Railway and the Temiskaming Railway have been built out of that amount. $500,000,000 of transportation improvements in the United States have been approved of by government experts and are awaiting appropriations for their construction, to assist in the transportation of their products. Canada in the past three years has assumed obligations to assist railways, and improve harbours and rivers to the extent of $300,000,000. This is a large sum for a small nation and only cares for the transportation within our borders. At the same time we are neglecting our merchant marine and the transportation of Canadian products to the markets of the world.

The question of transportation is one of the most important factors in the upbuilding and general development of our country. The hon. member for Wentworth has told us that the Canadian people are paying a million dollars extra freight on their exports, and the transportation of our products is a serious question for the Minister of Agriculture to deal with, not only on our railways, but on vessels. Comparing transportation charges, we find that freight is carried from Liverpool to New York for 7s. 6d. a ton, while from Liverpool to Halifax it costs 15s. a ton, and the freight charges in the opposite direction show the same advantage in favour of the people of the United States. We may boast of our natural products, of our lands and mines and forests, but unless these products can be carried to the markets in proper condition and at low rates, we need not expect the development we should. What Canada needs to-day is a live, active Minister of Trade and Commerce. The hon. member for Wentworth referred to the Department of Trade and Commerce. I want to say that the greatest kind of opportunities are awaiting the thorough development of the trade and commerce of this country by that department, and I am sorry to say that not sufficient attention is being paid to that development. We also need a representative at Washington and one in Germany to look after our interests. We have to-day commercial representatives in several foreign countries, but when you read their reports you find that we are not receiving the advantages we should receive in those countries for the goods we send to them. The United States has the cheapest freight transportation in the world. According to Mulhall the cost of transporting one ton of freight one mile in cents in different countries is as follows: United Kingdom, $2.80; Italy, $2.50; Russia, $2.40; France, $2.20; Germany, $1.64; Belgium, $1.60; Holland, $1.56; United States, 80 cents. A diminution of one cent per ton mile freight in the United States would effect a saving of $100,000,000 a year to the people of that country, so that we can readily see that the Railway Commission in properly caring for the reduction of freight rates in the Dominion will materially aid the farmers. Ocean rates are gradually being reduced in the United States. Grain from St. Louis to Liverpool cost in 1882 via New Orleans, 22·66 cents and via New York, 23·66 cents. In 1905 it cost via New Orleans 10 cents, and via New York 16·62 cents, showing the benefit of water transportation. Freight rates on wheat from Chicago to New York showing reductions per bushel, have been as follows: By lake and canal in 1868, 22·79 cents; in 1905, 5·51 cents. By lake and rail—in 1868, 29 cents; in 1905, 6·44 cents. By all rail, in 1868, 42·6 cents; in 1905, 10·29 cents. Showing water transportation at about half the cost of rail. Ocean rates have also been reduced as follows: Grain from St. Louis to Liverpool:

Year.	Via New Orleans. cents.	Via New York. cents.
1882..	22·66	23·66
1905..	10.00	16·62

From New York to Liverpool:

1864.. .. ..3 3-16 pence.
1905.. .. ..1⅝ pence.

Canada possesses extensive coal deposits at tide water which afford a marine traffic of over 4,000,000 tons per annum. Canada ships a million thousand feet of lumber products annually. Canada's export of grain will soon reach a hundred million bushels. Canada's exports of perishable products are now over $60,000,000, besides hundreds of thousands of tons of other products. The census of 1901 gives the total value of milk produced for direct consumption and for the manufacture of butter, cheese and condensed milk as $66,470,953. It is to-day, I believe, over $80,000,000. Fruit and vegetables are given together, the total being $12,994,900 worth. The total value of fish products in the same year was $19,768,449. For the same year the export value of apples and other fruits was $2,010,016. The export value of cheese and butter for that year was $23,992,614. I am merely giving these figures to call to your attention the immense quantity of these perishable products being produced in our country, and to the fact that too much attention cannot be paid to their proper transportation to the markets of the world. Our sea-going tonnage in and out in 1904 amounted to 15,826,705 tons of which only 1,968,803 tons were carried in Canadian ships, while the United States claimed 3,524,497 tons and the balance went in British and foreign bottoms. The nations of the world are paying every attention to their merchant marines. Germany is creating a merchant marine as the basis of a navy; she is paying nine per cent of the capital invested, and is fast taking away the shipping formerly done by Great Britain in the East Africa and continental trade. France is spending large sums to maintain a commercial position on the sea; Russia has a subsidized fleet; Austria, Holland and Japan are all improving their water transportation, while Canada only takes care of twelve per cent of her trade, the other eighty-eight per cent being carried in British ships and foreign vessels and we have no legislation that has the slightest control over these ships coming to our shores. Last year 1,200,000 tons of coal were carried from Cape Breton up the St. Lawrence under the Norwegian flag, and many foreign ships are doing the coasting trade along our shores. Only a few days ago the members from the eastern provinces were urging on the government the necessity of looking after our shipping and getting back to the position when we had towns along our coasts where a great deal of shipbuilding was done. The traffic on our great lakes has been marvellous. The increase of the tonnage since 1868 has been eighty-three per cent. Last season 60,000,000 tons of produce was shipped from the west to the east, of which less than three per cent was carried in Canadian ships. In 1904 the traffic between the United States shore and the Canadian shore amounted to 15,375,500 tons. The coastwise trade has also made great progress between 1876 and 1904, the increase being from 10,000,000 tons to 45,000,000 tons. We are building hundreds of miles of railway each year, opening up new lands, population is increasing, acreage and production are increasing, and the result is a great car shortage, motive power shortage, main line shortage; so that instead of a bright outlook for the future for our farmers in the matter of transportation, there is a very serious outlook indeed.

In the Northwest at present, it is estimated that 50 per cent of the wheat in Saskatchewan is still out in the fields waiting for railway transportation and the railways are not able to cope with the difficulties in that country. On the other hand, when we come to the eastern provinces, in spite of the development in industrial matters in those provinces, we find that the railways have not been giving us anything like the service we require. Much of the fruit grown in the east was not marketed last year owing to the lack of proper transportation facilities, and the shippers of perishable products do not look forward to better prospects in the near future. Let me draw attention to the fact that the province of Ontario produced last year 12,000,000 barrels of apples and the rest of the Dominion 4,000,000 barrels. Out of that production they were only able to export 1,500,000. Add to that export, the evaporated apples, jams, &c., amounting to another 1,000,000 barrels, and then give the people 3,500,000 barrels to eat, making 6,000,000, and you have still 10,000,000 that were wasted or rotted on the ground or were eaten up by the stock throughout the country. These are estimates which were given by Mr. McNeil the other day in the Agricultural Committee. Suppose on that ten million of barrels, our farmers were to receive a profit of seventy-five cents per barrel, that would amount to $7,500,000. This government are urging the farmers to plant orchards and increase their acreage, to take care of their trees and their apple crop in particular, sending men out to educate them in the proper growing of fruit trees, yet at the same time they are are not looking to the proper transportation and marketing of those products. It is estimated that in the Leamington district last year there was little or no fruit shipped, although it is one of the best apple producing districts we have. In fact the farmers there are cutting down their orchards, believing it is foolish to keep on expending large amounts in the development of these orchards, when they cannot get their fruit into market in proper condition. Whereas the United States last year exported 27,000,000 pounds of dried apples and received in return $2,000,000, this country only exported $212,000 worth. When we come to consider that the total exports of perishable goods out of our country amount to nearly $60,000,000 and compare that with the wheat exported last year, amounting to some $33,000,000, you can readily see that this is one of the most important industries in the Dominion at present. Our total exports were $246,000,000. To the United States we exported $97,000,000, leaving a balance of trade against us of $153,000,000. When we realize that we cannot get a barrel of apples or a package of fruit into that country and are practically in the same position as regards the United States as we are in with regard to the German market, you must agree that two of the most important markets of the world, we are completely shut out of. I want to urge upon my hon. friend the necessity of opening up the German market to the farmers of the Dominion. If he will take into consideration the best interests of our people, he will set about at once investigating the causes and see that the German market is opened up to our perishable products. Let me call his attention to a letter which I have in my hand. It is a letter from one of the members of the International Apple Shippers Association to the Special Tariff Commission.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Carried.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The hon. gentleman from York says 'carried.' Let me say to him that if that is the way in which he thinks the farmers of his constituency want him to treat this matter, he is greatly mistaken. I am satisfied that the farmers of his constituency are as much interested in the German market being open as any farmers in the Dominion. And let me tell him that the day is coming when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) and the men on that side, who are pretending to be the friends of the farmers, will get up in their seats and urge upon the First Minister the necessity of opening up that market.

Mr. CAMPBELL. You did it when you got the chance, did you not ?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The German market was open then and our goods were allowed to go in at the minimum rate. But where are they to-day? Let that hon. gentleman listen to what the United States shippers have to say with reference to this question and he will think differently. I have been urging the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) time and again to see that every effort is put forward to open up that market for the farmers of Canada.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Why did you vote for the surtax ?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I did not. I was not in the House at the time and it is folly for the hon. gentleman to make such a statement.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Did you vote against it ?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I was not here to vote at all at the time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Do you approve of it ?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I want to tell the hon. gentleman that it is one of the curses of this country that we are obliged to have the German surtax placed against us. Does he not believe it would be in the interests of the farmers of this Dominion to have a market like the German market open to the people of this Dominion ?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Would you vote to remove the surtax on German goods ?

Mr. TAYLOR. Did my hon. friend vote to increase the duty on vegetables ?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. If the hon. gentleman will allow the members of this side to take the government benches, they will very soon remove that surtax. I want to call his attention to the fact, that Germany imported over $200,000,000 worth of agricultural products, and yet this country could hardly get a dollar's worth into that market.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Was there ever a time when we got better prices for our products than we do now ?

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Is that any excuse to make for the closing up of a market which is the second best in the world ? Is that the way the hon. gentleman would legislate for the farmers ? The German market imported over $200,000,000 worth of agricultural products. Does he not think it is important for our agriculturists that they should be able to ship in to the German market $66,000,000 worth of wheat or at least a portion of it ? Germany imported $66,000,000 worth of wheat last year, $34,000,000 worth of barley, $17,000,000 worth of rye. I might go on through the list of her valuable imports of the very things that the farmers of Canada are able to grow in abundance. And I believe the hon. member for Centre York (Mr. Campbell) would not dare to go on the stump in his riding and repeat the opinions on this question that he has expressed here to-night. Now, let us go back to what the International Apple Shippers' Association has to say:

> Herewith we inclose you a copy of resolutions passed by the National League of Commission Merchants, New York branch, for your information relative to the recent history of the German tariff controversy.
> The modus vivendi, or temporary agreement, under which Germany now admits American products at the minimum rate of duty, may be abrogated at any time, and unfriendly measures can be expected on the part of Germany unless suitable legislation is enacted at Washington. Without a permanent trade treaty with Germany, a maximum duty on apples of $1.65 per barrel will be imposed, instead of the minimum duty of 50 cents——

Which the United States are enjoying at the present time and Canada not:

> —and a maximum duty on dried fruit of $1.08 per hundred pounds, instead of a minimum duty of 43 cents. This for items pertinent to the fruit trade only. All farm products are similarly taxed.

The United States shipped into Germany last year $5,000,000 worth of apples, and surely that fact is of interest when we consider that we were not able to ship a barrel into that country. The careful handling of these goods of which I have been speaking would mean millions to the people of Canada. For the past ten years, the Conservative members of this House have been urging upon the Minister of Agriculture the necessity of development of this subject. The system has improved, it would be a poor system that would not improve. The railways and steamships are improving their facilities for handling these goods. But what has the government done to better our transportation facilities in this respect ? What legislation have they promoted that would aid the transportation of our perishable products ? You may look the statute-books through, and you will not find one Act of legislation of theirs that is of material advantage in this respect. The minister may say that this session he brought in a measure by which he will spend $100,000 for cold storage on land. But look at the position in which you are placing the people of Canada. The minister will gather the fruit into cold storage. The car comes alongside in which the goods are to be carried to the seaport. And we are able to prove that these cars are at temperatures as high as sixty or seventy degrees. You may control your temperature in the cold storage establishment, but unless you control the temperature on the way down to the ship, and in the ship while crossing the ocean, and in the European market when it reaches there, you cannot expect satisfactory returns. What we need is a general shaking up of the Agriculture Department. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith) has told us that it costs the people of Canada from 20 to 40 per cent more to carry the goods in cold storage chambers than in ordinary chambers. That is a good reason why we should have a more efficient service. We need a forward policy. But, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) is looking after other departments instead of looking after his own. For a few months one year, we find him looking after Militia Department; for a few months the following year he is acting Postmaster General; and this year he has the Public Works Department saddled upon him. It is practically impossible for the hon. gentleman to do justice to the people of Canada when he accepts so much responsibility. We have been urging upon him the necessity of appointing a government weigher at Montreal, but he will not listen to our proposal. Three million packages go out of Montreal a year, and the loss of half a pound in a package means a loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars to the farmers. The dock facilities in Montreal are old fashioned and inadequate. It may be said that large sums are being spent to improve these facilities. But these matters are not receiving the attention from the Minister of Agriculture that they should receive. Now, let me read very briefly from the 'Hansard' of January 24th. I asked:

What was the weight and average temperature of the butter, cheese, eggs, meats, lard, mixed fruits and apples so inspected?

The Minister of Agriculture answered:

Four thousand and nine packages of butter were tested at Montreal and gave an average temperature of about 54 degrees. 1,173 marked packages butter were tested at country shipping points and again at Montreal. The average temperature at shipping points was 52·6 degrees and at Montreal 53·2 degrees. Temperatures are not taken of other produce.

If butter is at a temperature of 52 or 53 degrees from the factory to the port of Montreal, how can we expect to receive fair returns for it when it is sold in the European market? We have no control over the temperature in the ships. On this point let me call the attention of the minister to page 23 of his own report in which the Canadian butter on its arrival in Europe is spoken of:

Soon after the butter shipping season commenced our inspectors again reported that, at the ports of Liverpool and Glasgow, consignments of Canadian butter were frequently allowed to lie on the docks for periods ranging from twenty-four to seventy-two hours.

How can the farmers obtain good results from butter kept in cold storage in Canada, handled in this careless manner in shipment to the port, in crossing the ocean, and on being landed receive this treatment on the docks in Europe?

All the Canadian butter landed at Liverpool last season was not treated in this careless manner, the major portion of each shipment having been removed with commendable dispatch. But the proportion that was usually allowed to remain on the quays was sufficiently large, if damaged, to affect the general reputation of Canadian butter in the Liverpool market.

We only send $7,000,000 worth of butter while Great Britain imported over $100,000,000 worth of that valuable product. What more do we need in order to prove that the butter industry of Canada is not receiving the attention from the Minister of Agriculture that it ought to receive?

The hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Derbyshire) made some remarks about the cheese industry, and told us of the wonderful progress we have made in that respect. Let that hon. gentleman investigate the cheese industry in different parts of this Dominion from some other standpoint than that of a cheese buyer and one of the large exporters of that article, practically controlling the cheese market of this country. Let him read what some of the papers are saying with reference to the care of cheese. I ask the hon. gentleman to take up the minister's own paper, the Montreal 'Herald' of March 1, from which an article is reproduced in the London 'Free Press' of March 5. This is what I find in the 'Free Press':

While the Agricultural Department plumed itself upon having perfected the dairy methods of the country, a recent circular of the Produce Merchants' Association shows that much remains to be done. The newspaper organ of Mr. Sydney Fisher refers to it as demanding 'what seems to amount to a revolution in the trade.' It speaks of 'the crude ways in which cheese continues to be shipped from the factories.' Further, it is said, 'the growing practice of shipping uncured cheese, if persisted in, will ruin the trade. Inspection becomes a farce and the loss of weight is two or three times what it should be. Shame on the factory that allows such a method and on the buyer who will take curd for cheese.'

I want the minister to know that these criticisms are being made, not only in Montreal, but in other parts of the country. I recognize that our factories are not up to the standard they ought to be. If you go down to the fruit convention or the dairy convention, you will hear the member for Brockville lauding the Minister of Agriculture to the skies, and telling what a wonderful man we have in that position. The hon. minister spoke some years ago in the Agricultural Committee about doing away with the curing of cheese. If he will look at the Dairy Commissioner's Report, page 24, he will find that the Dairy Commissioner admitted that if cheese was properly cured and properly cared for from the time it was made until it reached the European market, its price would be increased half a cent a pound. Well, the hon. gentleman may say that he is going to work with these cold storage appliances, that he is going to remedy that evil. But

I want to point out to the minister that although he may place cold storage appliances in different parts of the country, he has no control over the railroads and the temperature on the cars, or the temperature on the vessels crossing the Atlantic.

The minister has been telling the people that he is going to open up new markets to the farmer. It has been nothing but talk. The hon. gentleman has sent an agent to Japan to look after the selling of some wheat, but the amount we shipped to that country was only $37,000 worth in 1904. It will take years to educate the people of Japan to use a large quantity of Canadian wheat, while other markets are being allowed to go by default. We have been urging on him the necessity of trying to remove the embargo on our cattle in Great Britain; and, if I had time, I could quote from some western papers to show that the people of the Northwest are urging upon the minister the necessity of removing the cattle embargo. But he pays no heed to their protests, he simply folds his arms and says that the department is being conducted in the best possible manner. Two years ago a resolution was passed in the Committee of Agriculture recommending the Ministers of Agriculture of the local governments to go in a body across the Atlantic and urge upon the British government the necessity of removing the cattle embargo. But although that resolution was presented to the House, the hon. gentleman has seemingly paid no attention to it. When this government came to power in 1906 there was in his desk, or in the Prime Minister's desk, a contract for a fast Atlantic service across the water, but no attention has been paid to that. The Department of Agriculture has great opportunities, but it is making little use of them.

Transportation on the railroads is a question of enormous importance, particularly the transportation of our perishable products from the east to the west. The member for Brockville perhaps lives in a country where fruit is not produced in great abundance. I would like him to go up into the western part of Ontario and see the tens of thousands of barrels of beautiful apples that rot under the trees, and fruit of many other kinds, all for want of proper transportation to the markets of the world, or even to our own Northwest market. The Minister of Agriculture will say that they are trying to improve transportation facilities to our western country. But I want to urge upon him the necessity of revolutionizing the present facilities for transporting perishable products to that western country, so that the farmers of the east may be able to furnish our own Northwest with a large portion of their fruit products. The dairy conventions, as I said before, are accustomed to laud the minister for what he is doing, instead of criticising him, as they ought to do. The provincial governments deserve great credit for what they are doing for agriculture in the east and western provinces.

If we look at the importation into Great Britain of agricultural products, we find that out of $578,000,000 worth Canada only sent $67,000,000 worth. Now, I want the minister to pay attention to this fact, that vessels brought back from Great Britain last fall some 27,000 boxes of butter, about 1,500,000 pounds, to Canada, not Canadian butter; it was largely butter from the Argentine republic and New Zealand. That butter was thrown on our market, and instead of the farmers in Canada receiving a good round price for their butter, they have not been receiving anything like the price they would have obtained had not this butter been imported. Some attention should be paid to that matter. With reference to that industry, I must say that the minister is not giving it sufficient attention. Surely the industry on which one thousand million depend for their sustenance and two hundred million depend for their daily toil, is an industry that is worthy of the minister's best efforts, and I would, therefore, urge upon him the necessity of taking up this transportation question and dealing with it in an energetic, forward manner, so that the people of the Dominion may realize that he is putting forth his best efforts to serve them and to give them the best possible service for the transportation of their products.

Mr. M. S. SCHELL (South Oxford). Mr. Speaker, the subject which has been introduced in this debate is one that we all recognize to be amongst the most important that could engage the attention of this House. It is not a new one. It has been up before this House for discussion nearly every session of this parliament and it is one that is still worthy of consideration. I am glad to see that the government have appreciated its importance. From the day that they assumed the reins of power they took hold of this question and with an intelligence, enterprise and energy that showed their business foresight and their appreciation of the needs of the country they provided for us a better system of cold storage. I suppose there is no part of the policy of this government that has resulted in more good to the people of this Dominion than the policy that was inaugurated in 1897 when the Minister of Agriculture entered into negotiations with the steamship companies to provide a better system of cold storage for the transportation of our perishable products to European markets. Following up what they undertook at that time they have not relaxed their efforts, they have not stood still, but from year to year they have been pressing forward and improving the methods of shipping our products in every possible way that might suggest itself to them in the interest of the trade of this country. To-day we have one of the best systems of transportation for the carrying of our perishable products that is provided by any country on the face of the earth. There is no country that has better steamship facilities to and from its shores than we have. I am not going to follow the Speaker who has just taken his seat because he travelled far afield, discussing the cattle embargo, the transportation of our wheat from the western provinces, the construction of railways in Canada and the United States, the Australian steamships, the German surtax, and in fact, I do not know what he did not discuss. Hence, I am not going to attempt to reply to many of the statements he made, but, the whole of his discussion was on a par with his statement that some of our steamships now are constructed with a capacity of from 30,000 to 40,000 tons.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Does the hon. gentleman think that statement is not correct?

Mr. M. S. SCHELL. I do not think it is correct.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Then, I think the hon. gentleman is not acquainted with the boats that are being built at the present time. There are boats being built that are even over 40,000 tons.

Mr. FISHER. Name one.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The—well——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. That is all right. I have definite information——

Mr. M. S. SCHELL. A boat of 10,000 tons capacity is considered a very large boat. The hon. gentleman's criticism of the several points to which he devoted his attention is so foolish and of such a character that I am sure a discerning public will relegate it to the scrap heap where it properly belongs. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Smith) seemed to have, I think, I may safely and fairly say, a proper appreciation of this subject and his remarks were practically commendatory of the policy of the government in regard to this system of transportation. He referred to some figures that Prof. Robertson gave before the installation of this service showing the loss that resulted to the country because of the want of proper transportation facilities of our steamships, amounting, as he said, to some $3,500,000 annually. We quite agree with that statement and I agree with the hon. member for Wentworth that the policy that has been introduced has in a very large measure brought to us such benefits that the loss that we sustained heretofore has been overcome and we are now obtaining many millions of dollars annually more for our perishable products than we were in 1897 when the government entered into the first contract with steamship companies for the providing of cold storage transportation. The government had some difficulty in getting our steamship companies to enter into the first contract. They demurred, they were not willing to do it without assistance and our government, seeing the importance of the question, put up half the cost of providing cold storage on the boats of one or two steamship companies as an experiment. The amount of money involved was not very large but was sufficient as an experiment to prove to the people of the country and to the steamship companies that such a service was wanted. That contract was for three years. In 1898 they entered into another contract which was also for three years. After the expiration of these contracts the question had been so fully solved, the need of such cold storage accommodation was so clearly proven that the other steamship companies with whom no contracts had been entered into and also those steamship companies with whom the contracts had been made, but who had not installed that service in their other steamers, saw the necessity of providing such a service in all of their other steamers if they were going to hold their own. At the expiration of these contracts in 1901 the government was not required to continue any further assistance in this direction. It was in 1900, I think, that the government also took up the matter of cool storage with the steamship companies. They again were loath to enter into an arrangement of this kind. It was with the greatest difficulty, we are assured, that the steamship companies were induced to entertain the proposition. However, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) succeeded in making an arrangement by which a cool storage service would be provided on two or three of the steamships as an experiment.

That contract ran for two or three years, I am not sure which, but at the expiration of that time the system of cool storage was demonstrated to be so much in the interest of the trade of this country that all of the steamship companies, practically, plying between our ports and European ports were compelled to introduce the system of cool storage and that without any further assistance from the government. So I say that the initiative taken by this government in 1897 in this regard has not only clearly demonstrated to the people of this country the need of this cool storage system, but has compelled the steamship companies to introduce a system of cool and cold storage in practically every steamship that is plying between our ports and European ports. I want to direct attention briefly to some figures in connection with this cold storage question. I fancy that it is not very generally known how efficient a service is provided for the people of this Dominion by the various steamships operating between Montreal and Quebec and the European markets. We will take, for instance, the steamers going to Liverpool. The Allan line have 5 steamers sailing regularly during the season, having an average capacity of 13,222 cubic feet of cold storage. Of these five steamers all, with the exception of one, have four chambers devoted to cold storage. The total capacity of storage is 66,111 feet.

Going to London the same line have six steamships, providing on an average of 10,232 cubic feet of cold storage. Each of these steamers has from two to four chambers devoted for that purpose. Operating between Montreal and Glasgow, by the Allan line, there are five steamers which are fitted up with an average capacity of 10,242 cubic feet of cold storage space, and each are equipped with two or three chambers.

The Canadian Pacific Railway line have three steamers sailing to Liverpool. I have not the exact amount of space that is devoted to cold storage on the 'Empress of Ireland,' and the 'Empress of Britain,' but the 'Lake Erie' has 24,000 cubic feet. The 'Empress of Britain' and the 'Empress of Ireland' are new boats, but I understand that they have a very large amount of space devoted to cold storage.

To London the Canadian Pacific Railway have but one boat, the 'Montrose,' with four chambers and 28,154 cubic feet of cold storage space.

Going to Bristol there are three steamers, two of which have 39,000 cubic feet. I have not the exact amount of space that is devoted to cold storage on the 'Monmouth,' but at least I suppose it would be on a par with the other steamers, which would show about 15,000 cubic feet.

The Dominion line have five boats with an average space of 33,584 feet.

To Bristol the same line of steamships have three steamers with an average of 37,754 cubic feet.

Then there is the Donaldson line to Glasgow with six steamers, having an average of 30,148 cubic feet.

The Manchester line have two boats sailing to Manchester, having 7,500 cubic feet to each steamer.

The Thomson line to London have six boats sailing with an average of 21,997 cubic feet of space devoted to cold storage.

Summarizing those figures I find that the combined cold storage space on the above named steamships sailing to the above-named ports in 1906 was :

Number of Boats.	Destination.	Sailings.	Cubic feet of cold storage space.
2	Manchester....	10	75,500
6	Bristol	17	156,300
11	Glasgow.....	61	732,185
13	London..	63	1,101,283
13	Liverpool	75	1,752,898
Total 45	.....	226	3,817,666

I shall also give you some figures in connection with cool storage space.

The Allan line have six boats fitted up with cool storage space, with an average of 27,371 cubic feet.

The Canadian Pacific Railway line has one boat, the 'Montcalm,' with 18,688 cubic feet. The Empress of Britain and the Empress of Ireland have each a large amount of cool storage space, but not having the exact figures, I am not including it in my summary.

The Dominion line has three boats with an average of 43,533 cubic feet.

The Thomson line has six boats with an average of 84,100 cubic feet.

The total space given above amounts to 818,116 cubic feet.

There were 82 sailings of these steamers, making a total available space for the season of 4,200,952 cubic feet, distributed as follows :

Destination.	Cubic feet of cool storage space.
Liverpool.....	783,600
London	3,228,912
Bristol.....	93,440
Glasgow	95,000
Total..... .	4,200,952

I have taken a little time to read these figures for the information of the House, because I am confident there is not a member in this House, not a person, apart from those who are closely identified with the steamship services, who has had the faintest idea of the provision made by the steamship companies for cold and cool storage, for the transportation of our perishable products to the European markets. It is something of which this government and the people of Canada have reason to be proud, that from the small outlay that has been made during the years between 1897 and 1902, or 1903, by this government as an experiment to introduce this system on the steamships, such gratifying results have come to. The equipment of these experimental ships by the government compelled all steamship companies, if they wished to prevent the entire trade going to the ships so equipped, to provide a similar service, and as I have said the result is something on which the government and the people of this country have reasons to congratulate themselves.

I wish now to draw attention to another phase of this question, and again in this connection I urge that the government have shown a spirit of progress and business enterprise that is most commendable.

We have heard a good deal in this House about thermograph records, and the criticism has been of such a nature that I verily believe many hon. members have thought that there was ground for criticism, and that the government were not doing much in endeavouring to ascertain whether the service was a good service or not. I want to call your attention to what has been done in that direction. We find that during the last season the government have had 448 thermograph records taken, which are divided as follows: to Bristol 53 charts; to Glasgow, 100 charts; to Liverpool, 159 charts; to London, 128 charts; to Manchester, 21 charts. These were from Montreal and Quebec, and the charts showed the temperature and the conditions of the goods when placed in the steamers on this side and the condition in which they arrived on the other side. From Halifax to Liverpool there were 4 charts; to London, 23 charts. Printed on the face of each chart are the particulars which were asked for by the hon. member for Wentworth in a return he moved for on the 3rd of December. I want to call your attention to some of these records to show you that the government are taking the greatest possible interest to ensure, as far as it is possible with any reason, the very best service that can be given for the carrying of our perishable products; and I want to say that these records, one of which I am now going to present, was just taken at random in the department. I have taken some interest in this question. Even before I came to the House I made somewhat of a study of it, and I want to present to you some facts in connection with these records to show this House and the country that the government are doing something that deserves the thanks of this House and the thanks of the people of this Dominion. The government have inspectors at our ports examining the goods upon their arrival in the cars. They take the temperature of the goods as they come from the cars, their temperature as they stand in the sheds awaiting shipment, their temperature on being placed in the vessel, and the temperature of the vessel. They gather all practicable information in regard to the condition of the goods on their arrival and as they are being put on board the steamers. I have a record in my hand with regard to 34 boxes of Bartlett pears. The steamer was the 'Tunisian,' sailing for Liverpool, on September 7. The record gives the name of the shipper, the name of the packer, the port to which the fruit is destined, the number of boxes, the variety, the grade, the number of boxes examined, if any were found wrong, the section of the Fruit Marks Act violated (if any) the temperature of the shed (in this case 76), the temperature of the fruit (70), where it was stowed in the ship, (in a refrigerator chamber), the condition of the packages (in this case very good). I have also here a record of bacon which went on board the same steamer. There were fourteen lots. It gives the brand under which it was shipped, the name of the shipper, where each lot was stowed in the steamer, the condition of the goods, and general remarks showing how the goods were handled. I have another record in regard to butter. There were nine lots. The same examination was made, and the same particulars reported upon. All this information is available for any one who wishes to examine these records. There is another record here of cheese, of which eighteen lots were shipped. It gives the brand, the name of the shipper, and the condition of the cheese in each case. Special attention is given to the condition in which the boxes arrive at the sea-board and the condition in which they go on board the steamer, and very special attention is given to the places where they are stowed in the different compartments. I have here a record of the thermographs used in this steamer, the 'Tunisian' and in connection with the goods now under consideration. The number of each thermograph is given, where it was placed in the steamer and the goods with which it was placed. Here, for instance, is No. 4380 placed in ordinary storage with cheese; the position being specially described, viz., No. 6 orlop, about 12 feet from aft, bulkhead port side, and one box from amidships. Also No. 4383, placed in refrigerator chamber with butter, with location in chamber also clearly described. Also No. 4529, also placed in refrigerator chamber with apples, pears and lard. Also designating the exact position in which it was placed in the cold storage compartment. Here, which I hold in my hand, is a general report which was issued by the inspector at Montreal, covering various goods that were placed in the different compartments.

Here also is a report from Liverpool showing that at the other end of the line just as important information was gathered as the inspector was securing for us at this end. Here is a report on the condition of some apples and pears that went on board that same steamer and showing also how they were sold in that market. It gives the brand, the shippers' name, the variety of fruit, in what chamber carried, the condition and the quality of the fruit. The fruit was reported to be in excellent condition. This report was made with regard to apples and a similar report was made with regard to pears, giving the brand, the shipper's name, the quantity and condition. I hold here an account of the sale, which gives interesting information to any one who will care to make a study of the question, and I may say that the prices obtained by the apples, which were tender summer fruit, were certainly very remunerative. I have also in my hand one of the thermograph records. People generally do not know what a thermograph record is, but no doubt most of the members of parliament do. When it is placed in a steamer, it begins to operate and leaves a mark on the paper provided for that special purpose. When it was put in the steamer, the temperature was seventy. It was placed in the steamer on September 6, the steamer sailed on the 7th, arrived at Liverpool on the 15th, and the goods were taken out that same day. The thermograph was put in the refrigerated chamber, in which were apples and pears. The temperature was seventy degrees when it was put in. Inside of twenty-four hours it ran down to below fifty and continued at about forty-five not varying two degrees from the first day out of port until it arrived at Liverpool, in all that journey across the Atlantic. There could not be anything better. It was practically a perfect service. The temperature evidently was as low as was required. Some would say that a lower temperature would be preferable, but those tender fruits—and Bartlett pears are known to be the tenderest variety of fruit—even at that temperature of forty-five degrees arrived in perfect condition and were sold at very remunerative prices. A lower temperature could have been obtained if desired. I know enough about the arranging of temperature to be provided by steamship companies to know that you can get them to provide you with the temperature you require, or within four or five degrees of it, provided you have sufficient goods to occupy any considerable space. But you cannot be sure of getting any temperature if you have only a small shipment of any particular article as perhaps that may have to go in with some other goods that will not stand such low temperature. A man shipping poultry can get a temperature of twenty-four or eighteen or twenty or whatever he may require, provided there is considerable portion of the poultry or goods that will stand such a low temperature. The same with regard to fruit. If you want a temperature of thirty-five degrees, and you have a sufficient quantity, the company will give you the temperature almost that you ask for. I want to call your attention briefly to these other records. Here is one for butter as it reached Liverpool. Here are other reports for butter also giving full particulars—giving the temperature of the butter on its arrival, also the temperature in which it was stored, showing that there is a double check on the steamship companies—giving the surface temperature of the butter as well as the interior temperature. I mention this to show how particular the government have been in their instructions to the inspector so that the service is looked after with the greatest possible care. Here is the thermograph record for No. 4,383, showing that the goods were placed on September 6, that the vessel sailed on the 7th and arrived on the 15th in Liverpool, and that the goods were removed on the 17th. The thermograph was placed in a refrigerator chamber with butter. The temperature was 70 when placed. It ran down at once, before the steamer left the port of Montreal, to below 30, and the first day out it had gone down to twenty, and it kept going down gradually all the way in transit until it was about fourteen degrees below freezing point on the arrival of the steamer at Liverpool. This is practically a perfect record for carrying butter. It is a service that could not be improved on, I care not if all the inspectors were put on that the opposition might desire. A better service could not possibly be provided than these records show. I have also here another thermograph record No. 4,380 which was placed in ordinary storage—placed with cheese. This cheese was carried in ordinary storage and not in either cool or cold storage. The thermograph record shows that the temperature was seventy at the outset. It at once went down, when the steamer left port, to fifty-eight, and lowered a little below that to about fifty seven. But it did not vary more than one degree in all the journey from Montreal to Liverpool. That indicates that the fan service must have been practically perfect.

When I read three records such as I have in my hand of goods placed in three different chambers on board the steamer and giving these results, we need not have any fear for the service that is being rendered to the shippers of this country. We cannot doubt that it is the very best. We have the reports of the dealers also in Liverpool acknowledging the efficiency of the service thus provided by our transportation companies. Letters have been referred to, especially the letter that Mr. Hodgson wrote, in which he referred to the service as being entirely satisfactory. There are other handlers of our products in the European markets whose testimony might be given. Let me read a statement from one of these firms relating to the apple industry. Here is a letter from Messrs James Lindsay & Son, Fruit Importers, of Edinburgh. I may say that they are one of the largest firms of apple dealers and commission merchants, as well as direct buyers, in Great Britain thoroughly responsible and reliable people. They say :

We find that inspection is also carried out as to the carrying of goods while on board steamer. Ventilation has been examined and inquired into, also the temperature throughout the journey generally taken, and if anything unusual has transpired it is generally discussed between the inspector and the receivers, so as to improve any defect that may have taken place, or that exists.

Such inspections and reports, we are certain, will tend greatly to the benefit and improvement of the trade between Canada and the mother country.

And here is a letter from Messrs. Simons, Shuttleworth & Company, of Liverpool, also very large handlers of apples at that port.

We certainly think there has been an improvement in the handling of fruit and other produce since your government has maintained inspectors at this port, and we should be very sorry to see them withdrawn. It has also been beneficial to have you report the manner in which the apples have been turning out, not only as opened on the dock, but in the sale room, and with shippers knowing that they are being watched in this manner. We feel that they are using more care in the selecting and packing of the fruit. We, of course, can only speak regarding apples, as that is the only Canadian product that we handle to any extent. We cannot at the moment state where we can see any chance of improving the work that you have been doing since you came to Liverpool, and in our opinion you have looked after the interests of Canadian shippers in splendid shape.

I could give other letters to the same effect showing that our fruit, our cheese, our butter and our poultry are being landed in the English ports in practically perfect condition. I do not say that the service is absolutely perfect. In fact, I believe, that in one respect some improvement may be made. I refer to the one point upon which the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith) touched in anything like criticism of the present service—the fan service for ordinary storage. The government have dealt with the cold storage and cool storage problems, and, so far as these points are concerned, I think we have a service as nearly perfect as it is practically possible to obtain. But some of the steamers have not as good fan ventilation for ordinary storage as they should have. I think that is something the government may well look into, something that they will look into; and, if there is a possibility of providing a better service in this connection, I am sure the government will be only too willing to use their best endeavours with the steamship companies to provide a service which will be in this respect also as nearly perfect as possible. But I wish to say that, even in this respect, the steamships have provided an admirable service. Not so many years ago it was very risky to ship apples to the European market; to-day there is a reasonable certainty, that, even in ordinary storage, the apples or other perishable products that do not require cold storage will be landed in absolutely perfect condition. The hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith) read a great many thermograph records in connection with the ordinary storage. He showed that the temperature in nearly all the steamers ranged from 55 to 65 degrees. That is an admirable temperature for ordinary storage. One steamer to which he particularly referred showed a temperature of about 80 degrees, and another of about 75 or 78 degrees. But nine out of ten of the records he read indicated a service in connection with the ordinary storage which was most admirable. In fact, the steamship companies have themselves seen the necessity, in order that they may cater to this trade, of providing, sirocco fans and other appliances to properly ventilate their steamships. Reference has been made to the American service in this connection. As showing that our service is better than the American, I may say that, even during last season, large quantities of American apples were shipped from the western states over our Canadian railways to the port of Montreal in order that they might have the advantage of our steamship service between Montreal and Liverpool. There were thousands and thousands of barrels of Ben Davis apples shipped over our route in preference to the Portland, the Boston or New York route. What better evidence could we desire than the fact that the American apple dealers prefer the Canadian route and the Canadian steamship service to the American even though their rates are a little lower than ours. Everybody knows that the rate from New York is a little lower than from Montreal; yet every Canadian shipper knows that he would be following a suicidal course, from a business point of view if he were to use the service from the port of New York rather than the Canadian service. I did it once, foolishly and to my own sorrow, losing hundreds of dollars in one season. So, I know what I am speaking about when I say that the service from Montreal is infinitely better than that from New York. There are some boats running from Boston that give an excellent service. But, take it as a whole, the boats operating from Montreal, and from Quebec now that the 'Empresses' of the Canadian Pacific Railway, being too large to come up the channel are operating between Quebec and Liverpool, and from Portland or St. John when navigation is closed give a better service than the American lines. I say we are supplied with the best service of any people on the face of the earth, the people of the Argentine Republic or New Zealand not excepted. We have the best transportation facilities provided by steamship companies that are to be found in any country. This government has done what the government of the United States has never done in the matter of providing a good transportation service by our steamships.

The hon. member for Lambton said that thousands and thousands of barrels of apples went to waste this last year for want of adequate transportation facilities. Now, I want to say that there was no need of a solitary barrel of apples going to waste for the want of good transportation facilities. There was a market for every apple grown in Canada this last year that was fit for export, either to Europe or to western Canada, and there were buyers all over the country glad to get the apples if they could be used. The only trouble this year was that the apples were not very good—windfalls, scabby apples, wormy apples, early apples. The fault is with the farmers, who won't spray, who won't prune, who won't fertilize, who won't cultivate, who won't take care of their orchards; that is the reason why nine-tenths of the apples that are left in the orchards are not shipped—it is because they are not fit to handle for export.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell us the prices that the farmers received for these apples after they had spent a large amount of money in caring for the trees?

Mr. M. S. SCHELL. Yes; they received all the way from $1 to $2 a barrel.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Never less than $1?

Mr. M. S. SCHELL. I don't know of a single barrel that was sold for less than $1, unless it was in the case of some foolish farmer who was too lazy to hand-pick his apples. I am sorry to say there are some farmers who don't like picking apples, and who prefer to sacrifice their fruit than to pick it themselves. But in regard to transportation, the government have not only provided for a service by steamships, but they have also taken up the question of improving the transportation over the railways. This last season there were 1,168 cars iced and paid for by the government to carry cheese to the sea-board; there were over 1,300 cars iced for carrying butter. In addition, the government guaranteed the cost up to two-thirds of a carload, in order to assist this manner of transportation, giving practically a perfect service for the carriage of butter and cheese from the factory where it was produced to the sea-board. This last year they have also made an offer, of which I am glad to see some shippers have availed themselves, of iced cars for carrying apples the early portion of the season; and if the cars are properly iced, and proper care is exercised at the time of shipment to see that the apples are put on board in proper condition, there is no difficulty whatever in carrying our apples, or any other of our tender fruits, from the orchards, or from the point of shipment, to the sea-board. I mention these facts to show that the government are exercising the most intelligent and the most commendable care, and are endeavouring to assist this trade so far as circumstances will justify them in doing.

The hon. member for Lambton referred to the German surtax. I am not going to discuss that, except to say that the German government this last year imposed a duty upon Canadian apples. But this government have nothing to do with that duty. We are not going to get down on our knees and beg the Germans to take off that duty. When we were allowed to ship apples to Germany on the same terms as the United States, a certain portion of our apples went to the German market, but that market was no better than the English market or the French market. I may say that the amount shipped from the United States this last year, as quoted by my hon. friend, namely, $5,000,000 worth, is very wide of the mark; it was about $500,000 instead of $5,000,000 worth that the Americans shipped to Germany.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I beg to differ with the hon. gentleman. If he will take apples and their products, he will find that I was right. Dried apples alone amounted to over $2,000,000.

Mr. M. S. SCHELL. I thought he was referring to green apples.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. No; apples and their products, such as jams. I was well within the mark. If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, to make another remark, I would like to refer to the hon. gentleman's statement that I did not know what I was talking about when I said that boats were being built of 40,000 tons. If he will look at the March issue of the 'Canadian Engineer,' he will find an account of the building of a ship of 40,000 tons, and he will see the picture of that boat and all the dimensions. If he has been following the progress of the shipping industry during the last year, he will have noticed that there are several boats of that nature being built at the present time.

Mr. M. S. SCHELL. Was that a commercial boat? Let me call attention to the tonnage of some of the steamers that are operating between our own ports and Europe, and that will give some idea which of us is right. The 'Empress of Ireland'—I suppose the hon. gentleman knows something about that boat—it is one of the best and largest boats plying between Liverpool and American ports, coming to Quebec, that is 14,500 tons; the 'Empress of Britain' is of the same capacity; the 'Lake Manitoba,' another boat coming to Montreal, is 8,852 tons; the 'Lake Champlain,' 7,392 tons; the 'Lake Erie,' 7,550 tons; the 'Lake Michigan,' 7,000 tons; the 'Mount Temple,' 7,056 tons; 'Montesuma,' 7,345 tons; 'Milwaukee,' 7,323 tons; 'Montfort,' 7,101 tons; 'Montcalm,' 5,505 tons; 'Montrose,' 7,094; 'Montreal,'

6,870 tons; Mount Royal,' 7,064 tons; 'Monmouth,' 4,078. All these boats come to Montreal. So there are only two boats that exceed 10,000 tons.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. This 40,000-ton boat that I speak of does not come to our own ports, but to New York.

Mr. M. S. SCHELL. Nobody would use those very large boats for the transportation of some of our perishable products.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The hon. gentleman said I was exaggerating when I made that statement. I do not do that.

Mr. M. S. SCHELL. Reference was made by the hon. member for Wentworth to the subsidies. There are no subsidies granted for the purpose of providing cold storage or cool storage on steamships. Subsidies are granted especially for the purpose of carrying the mails, and in this connection I want to say that the Department of Trade and Commerce—by whom these subsidy contracts are made, not by the Department of Agriculture—insert a provision in their contracts with the steamship companies that cold storage shall be provided. Here is clause 10 of the contract:

It is understood and agreed that each steamer, while run under this contract, shall be fitted with adequate cold storage accommodation to the satisfaction of the minister.

I may say that although a subsidy was granted to the Allan line last year, which was the only line operating between Montreal and Liverpool, that received a subsidy they as well as other lines, provide a cold storage service whether they get subsidies or not. The clause in the resolution that was introduced by the hon. gentleman stipulating that the government should impose a penalty by withholding the subsidy in case vessels are not provided with proper cold storage facilities is entirely unnecessary as the government do not require to grant a subsidy for the cold storage service. It has already been very effectively dealt with by reason of the trade demand; that is cold storage, cool storage and the best possible facilities have been provided as a matter of competition in trade. So, I say that the reference to the subsidies that are granted is entirely unnecessary. We do not need to exercise any fear in regard to the paying of subsidies or that we will not get the service that we should receive from the steamship companies. I want to congratulate the government, on what they have been doing in this connection.

Mr. TAYLOR. Do it quickly.

Mr. M. S. SCHELL. Well, I suppose the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) does not like to hear very much about this question. I have heard him criticise the government on their curing stations and I have never heard anything that seemed to show as poor judgment as my hon. friend displays when he attempts to criticise the government upon their cool curing stations.

Mr. TAYLOR. If you go much further you will stir him up again.

Mr. M. S. SCHELL. Well, it would not do much harm if I did. The government has taken a very advanced position and I am sure we have every reason to be satisfied with what they have accomplished during the few years in which they have been dealing with this question. The opposition are very prone to criticise but they did nothing during the eighteen years that they were in power; at least, they did very little. If you can point to anything that was done by them it is so small that you would require a microscope to see what was accomplished during the whole of those eighteen years and just as soon as the government come in and undertake to deal with the question they say that there should be something else done. But, I am glad to say that the government have been in the van, that while they have realized that there was something to be gained by an advanced policy they have not been slow to adapt themselves to every condition that presented itself and to adopt such methods as seem practicable and feasible in order to provide not only the best transportation facilities by rail but also to give us the best transportation by our steamships and in that way ensure the carrying of our goods from the points of shipment to the English market, the result of which has been that we have been able to command better prices for our products than are obtained for similar products from other countries that are shipping to the same markets. We have captured the market in England for our cheese. We are obtaining to-day from one to two cents a pound more for our cheese than the price which is obtained by the Americans, we are supplying 75 per cent of the cheese that is imported by Great Britain and we are also obtaining a better price for our bacon, fruit and poultry than our competitors across the line. This is largely due—not altogether—to our better transportation facilities and to the fostering care this government have given to the production of the best possible article on this side and to the transportation of these goods to the markets of the world.

Mr. P. H. McKENZIE (South Bruce). Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say a few words on this subject before the debate is closed. I realize that the hour is getting very late and that we have perhaps stretched out the debate on this subject longer than we should have. I feel sorry that this matter has been brought up without notice having been given because otherwise we might have been prepared to deal with it a little more fully than we are at the present time. I am personally greatly satisfied with the progress which has been made by this government in regard to cold storage and I feel quite satisfied that progress is the motto of this government, that this government are not satisfied that they have done everything that can be done in the direction of cold storage but that they do intend to improve the service in every line possible. Something was said about what had been done in providing improved cold storage on cars. The cold storage car service has been increased this year considerably. Fifty-six different routes leading to Montreal were provided with iced cold storage cars last year for the purpose of carrying perishable products. Likewise the number of thermographs has been largely increased. Some sixty new thermographs were bought by the government this year for the same object; that is, in the endeavour to safeguard the conveyance of perishable products to market. While I am speaking on the matter of a better service of cars leading to Montreal for the products of this country I would like to call the attention of the government to the fact that there are still complaints being made and the special complaint this year seems to have reference to the matter of frosted fruit. In the late shipments of apples that trouble was very marked. I know very well and I have also learned from conversations with apple shippers that it has been a very difficult matter to get railway companies to pay sufficient attention to the shipment of apples during the season which is now about closed but which was in full swing a month ago.

I have been talking with the officials of the Department of Agriculture on this matter and they are very anxious to, if possible, provide safer conveyance for the winter apples of Canada. The very best of our fruit, the fruit which is most appreciated in the British market, goes forward during the period from New Years on, and it is a pity that it should be in any way damaged, and I would call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the fact that this year there has been considerable loss on fruit on account of the extreme cold weather, but at the same time a great deal of that loss has been owing to the carelessness of the companies in not providing proper cars or attending to those cars as they should do. Possibly it would be a good idea to have the railway companies provide trains of cars for shippers of apples at that season and have a man go along with each shipment to see that the temperatures are attended to.

My hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) called attention to the fact that thousands, in fact almost millions, of barrels of apples were lost this year through the want of proper transportation. I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that a great deal of the loss is due to other causes. My hon. friend from Oxford (Mr. Schell) called attention to this matter and I wish to repeat and to emphasize more strongly the fact that the loss has not been altogether due to the want of accommodation in transportation; the fault lies to a much larger extent with the farmers, and here is the testimony of a fruitman who has recently visited South Huron, a constituency that lies very near that represented by the hon. member from Lambton (Mr. Armstrong). This is what he says:

> One line of agriculture, I am sorry to say, seems to be on the wane, I mean fruit growing. There used to be a good many orchards in South Huron, but taking the average, nothing else is so neglected as the orchards are. Farmers say there is no money in fruit. There will never be any money in fruit if more care is not taken of the trees, and a better system followed in disposing of the crop.

That is the testimony in regard to South Huron, and I think it could be given in regard to Bruce, and I am pretty sure it could be with regard to Lambton. When this enormous loss is charged against the want of proper facilities for transportation it is not fairly charged. We are willing to say that some of it is chargeable against transportation in the fall, for at that season of the year we have too great heat in the cars and the apples suffer on that account, but the great loss is due to the carelessness of the farmers in not attending to their orchards and growing a good, merchantable fruit.

There is another matter on which I wish to say a word and that was brought up by the hon. member for Lambton when he spoke about the excellent facilities for transporting chilled meat from the Argentine Republic, New Zealand and Australia. We are much nearer the meat markets of the world than those countries. We have not had to develop the dead meat trade particularly up to this time in our history, but I now recall the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to this fact, that the time has come when Canada should have a dead meat trade, and I think the Minister of Agriculture has had that in view in the Meat Inspection Bill that he has this year passed through the House and that by that measure he has prepared the way so that when Canada embarks in a dead meat trade, as she will have to do at an early date she will place on the market an article above suspicion.

Mr. THOMAS CHISHOLM (East Huron). I wish to say a few words in regard to this matter in which I take a deep interest, but I shall not detain the House at any length. Our perishable products are a very important branch of our export trade. As you are aware, I drew attention to this matter at the beginning of the session. The minister then took the matter up and promised to make an effort to remedy the defects in our system. Before proceeding I might refer, however, to a little incident. I noticed the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. M. S. Schell), who undoubtedly made a very good speech and showed the necessity of this system of cold storage thoroughly and well, but, who unfortunately in his reference to shipping referred to the member from Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) as having made some incorrect statements about the tonnage of certain ships. The hon. member for Lambton gave an example; he told us where he got his information and all that, and then the member for Oxford (Mr. M. S. Schell) read a number of examples that did not come up to the figures quoted by my hon. friend from Lambton. That put me in mind of the story of an Irishman who was called up before a magistrate for having hit another with a shillalah. Two men proved conclusively that they saw him do so. The magistrate asked the Irishman: How are you to get over this testimony; two men swear positively that they saw you hit this man? Oh, said Pat, I can bring twenty men who will swear that they didn't see me hit him. There were two men to prove that they saw him hit the other man and twenty to prove that he did not These other ships like Pat's twenty witnesses have no bearing on this subject at all. My hon. friend from Lambton has proved his case, I think, and it would have been well if my hon. friend from Oxford had omitted that portion of his argument.

I think that too much emphasis is placed on the question of shipping. I have had occasion before to draw attention to the fact that the whole system must be a chain, it must be complete. The shipping part of it is only one part of it; it is just like a bridge, you may finish the two ends of the bridge as completely and nicely and grade them as well as you can, but if you have not the centre arch your bridge is of no use. Similarly, if you have the centre arch and the ends are not graded up the bridge is of no use. The ship in this case is simply the centre arch, and although this matter was taken up in the time of the Conservatives by the Hon. Mr. Montague there is no doubt at all that the system has been greatly improved. I think we must admit that.

But the shipping industry and the carriage of our products on the water have been blamed for many things of which they are not guilty. We must begin on the farm. I liked the remarks of my hon. friend from South Bruce (Mr. McKenzie) on this subject. The farmer will watch his field of grain very carefully indeed and say: Tomorrow we must reap the harvest. But he does not watch his apple orchard so carefully; all apples are not plucked the day they are ripe; they are often left on the trees until the germs of decay have been taken in. It is like a man going on a journey; you may have the best inspector in the world to examine him when he is about to start on his journey and he may be pronounced perfectly healthy, but he may have the germs of smallpox or typhoid in his system and may take sick at the end of the journey. That is the way with our fruit; our fruit often has the germs of decay so thoroughly established in it before it leaves the orchard or even before it leaves the tree that it is impossible for it to arrive in England in proper condition. The fruit should be plucked on the proper day and cooled in a proper way. It should then be kept in a proper condition until it is put aboard of the cars. It may be impossible for us to have cold storage on the cars with mechanical refrigeration, because we cannot get the water to cool the ammonia. It is impossible to have mechanical cold storage on the cars at the present time, but perhaps that may be overcome, possibly by some system of compressed air or some such means as that. It is, of course, an established scientific fact that when a solid turns to a liquid it absorbs heat and when a liquid turns to a vapour it absorbes heat; that is the principle of latent heat which has to be considered. Air, which has been compressed to a liquid, as it expands will absorb heat because a liquid is turning to a vapour, but I believe that we can get cold storage on board cars yet and we must have the land carriages perfect. I like the part of the motion of my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith) referring to the land carriage as well as the water carriage of our products. This whole thing must be a system, and I may say that I believe the minister is now trying to establish a system. I was very much displeased up to this time with the way things were going. I looked around at home and saw hundreds and thousands of barrels of apples going to waste upon our farms, yet no attempt was made to overcome this condition of affairs, and now I think the minister is trying to overcome it.

I feel that we should give the minister time. Let us wait until next year and if he does not do something better than he has done in the past, I shall be as ready as anyone else to find fault with him. It is impossible for him to carry out a system of cold storage in the winter. Next summer will be the time for the test, and I hope the system will be carried out systematically and completely. To do the whole thing on the ocean is an utter impossibility. We are living in changing conditions. A system of cold storage was not required when I was a boy, but it is required now. The competition we now have in the west compels us in eastern Canada to go into perishable products, and if so, we must have them cared for from the time they leave the hands of the farmer until they reach the table of the consumer. I must say that the great difficulty is with the farmers. They do not really understand what cold storage means. They do not understand the scientific principle by which cold is produced in hot weather, nor do they understand that the germs of decay may be in apples which look perfectly sound and healthy. The minister is introducing an educational campaign which may do a great deal of good. Let us give him a chance. This is a new thing, and has a right to be fairly tried. I shall be as ready as any one else to condemn the minister if he does not help the farmers out of this difficulty, but in the meantime I will stand by him in his efforts to give the farmers the cold storage system.

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture). Mr. Speaker, I cannot refrain from saying a few words after the kindly remarks of my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Thomas Chisholm). So far as the motion and the speeches of the mover and the hon. gentlemen who followed him on the opposition side of the House are concerned, they have been pretty completely answered by the remarks carefully thought out and carefully prepared, of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. M. S. Schell). I must compliment that hon. gentleman on the evident pains he has taken to study this question and to gather a mass of facts and details in regard to it which are of the utmost value to the community, and which will be useful to everybody in studying cold storage transportation.

Mr. TAYLOR. Furnished by the department.

Mr. FISHER. Yes, and it is one of the things for which the department may take pride, that we do furnish information of this kind. In the old days, when my hon. friend's friends were in power, they did not furnish information to the public at large at all.

Mr. TAYLOR. My hon. friend has not furnished it to the public at large; he stuffed the hon. member who has just made a speech.

Mr. FISHER. No. My hon. friend has not said anything that he did not take from the public records. To disprove the accusation of my hon. friend I have only to refer to the speech of the mover of this amendment, who said that thanks to the minister and the department he had now information which he formerly could not get. I therefore feel that my hon. friend is really reflecting on his own friends, who have endorsed what I said before I said it, and I am only quoting them when I say that this information is now at the disposal of the public, and even at my hon. friend's disposal if he had taken the trouble to look into it in the exhaustive and careful way in which my hon. friend from South Oxford has done. There are a few things, however, that I would like to say. First, practically the whole accusation is that we have not done enough. One and another on the other side of the House, rather by implication than by actual statement, have shown that we have done so much that they themselves are bound to bring forward the proof in discussing the question at issue. They have had to quote over and over again things we have done which were never dreamed of before this administration came into power. But they claim that we have not done enough. As to my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. E. D. Smith), I can really hardly make out what he is complaining of. He said himself that cool air accommodation was necessary, but that many products were sent forward in the ordinary hold of vessels and did not need cooled air. That is quite true. He gave the proportion of the cheese sent in cool air compartments and the proportion sent in the ordinary holds. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman knows very much about the cheese trade; but if he had thought for a moment he would have remembered that by far the larger proportion of our cheese is sent forward late in the fall or in the winter when it does not need cold air or cold storage at all, but when the ordinary hold is just as good for it, and therefore the shippers of cheese do not take the trouble to send in cooled air or cold storage. My hon. friend himself, however, proved that it was necessary in the summer season, because he showed that the temperatures ranged from 65 to 45 in the ordinary hold and in the ventilated chambers without cooled air, but that where there is cooled air the temperature in the ventilated chambers could be reduced to 40 or 35 or 30, if necessary, and very frequently it is necessary. When the outside air is cold enough, we do not need to cool the air and force it into the hold; but in those months of the year when the outer air is too hot, we need the cooled air and the cold storage chambers. My hon. friend's contention is that they are only needed under these circumstances. He has again proved that what we have done is quite right, and that we have accomplished all that is needed. But there is one point on which my hon. friend and I hold absolutely contrary opinions. It is useless for us to provide cooled air chambers or cold storage if the shippers are going to put into them hot fruit in the incipient stages of decay; and my hon. friend, who is a fruit grower himself, had better take to heart his own lessons and put a thermometer into his own warehouses and cool his fruit there by whatever means he finds necessary, and ship it in a cooled condition, so that when it is put into the cooled air chambers on the ships, it will not heat those chambers. Until he and the other fruit growers do this, they must expect that their fruit will have a wrong temperature in the cooled air or cold storage chambers on the ships. It is ridiculous to suppose that any ventilation or the forcing of cooled air into these chambers will accomplish the cooling of hot fruit, hot cheese or hot butter. I have proved over and over again in the Committee on Agriculture, by means of experts, and before meetings of dairy associations and fruit growers' associations, that the difficulty to-day is not in the maintenance of cooled air in the chambers, but that it is in the fact that the people put hot fruit and hot cheese and hot butter into those chambers and ask us to cool them, when we ought only to be required to maintain the already cool condition of the products. Until the shippers undertake to do that, we have no means of keeping the chambers down to the temperatures at which they ought to be kept. The only alternative is one which I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite would suggest, and that is to refuse to accept such products as are not cooled before being put into the cool chamber or the cold storage chamber. That is a remedy I have been tempted sometimes to adopt, but it would be a very extreme measure to refuse to shippers the opportunity of using our cold storage or cold air chambers simply because their goods were not properly cooled before shipment.

There is another step we have taken this year and that is to provide for subsidizing local cold storages, and I would call on hon. gentlemen opposite to try and do something towards the establishment of those facilities. The object of establishing them is to obviate the difficulty and danger I have just pointed out. I grant that up to the present the facilities for cooling fruit, butter or cheese before it goes into cold storage transportation have not been sufficient for the trade. We have been waiting in the hope that private enterprise would provide those facilities, but private enterprise has failed to do so, and we have passed an Act to encourage their establishment. I would ask all those who have the welfare of Canada at heart to try and aid us in bringing about the establishment of these local cold storages, and I am glad to say that since the Act was discussed, a considerable number of applications have come in for permission to operate under its provisions. I hope that these applications will take material shape. From the departmental standpoint, we shall do all we can to encourage this new departure.

A suggestion has been made—but not made very strongly, I am glad to say—that we have been derelict in our duty, because we have not dealt with the accommodation of these perishable products on their arrival in the old land. Well, I have always maintained that that is outside our jurisdiction and that we ought not to do it. But I am glad to say that in consequence of the enterprise of a private company, the Surrey Commercial Docks Company, cold storage accommodation has been provided in London for all the perishable products arriving from Canada on the lines of steamers sailing from Canada to London making use of those docks. Our shippers will, therefore, be able to get cold storage accommodation for their perishable products on arrival in the old land. Complaints have been made by my officers with regard to the treatment of perishable food products in Liverpool. The result has been that Liverpool was thoroughly stirred to its depths by the criticisms made on its arrangements. In consequence of these complaints, the Allan Line have made arrangements by which this season they will be able to give cold storage accommodation at Liverpool and the Canadian Pacific Railway have obtained permission to erect cold storage warehouses on their docks at Liverpool. So that all perishable products shipped by the Allan or the Canadian Pacific Railway steamers will get cold storage facilities on the docks at Liverpool this coming season. And this has been brought about without the expenditure of public money, but simply by discussion of the needs of the trade. They are the results of the reports of my officers who are constantly watching the handling and management of our perishable food products. Hon. gentlemen opposite by the way, entirely ignore the advantage which has come to the shippers and which has come to themselves, from their own standpoint, in giving them data on which they can base attacks against the administration in this House. How does the information they have come to them? Simply by reason of the fact that the department has to-day, what it never had before, a staff of officers in England, and a staff of officers at the various shipping points in Canada, who watch the traffic all over the railways in Canada, who see all that is going on, who report to the shippers all that occurs, and give us a mass of information which has enabled us to carry out the improvements and the benefits which have accrued to Canadian shippers in the last few years. That is one of our most important accomplishments which hon. gentlemen opposite entirely ignore.

My hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) spoke about a circular letter which he credited to the Montreal 'Herald.' That journal, he said, was my paper, and I need not say he was wrong in that statement. But it was not an original document in the 'Herald' or any other newspaper. It was a circular letter issued by the Produce Exchange in Montreal, who undertook to lecture the manufacturers of butter and cheese in this country. That letter I think myself has largely failed of its object because of its very severe and in many ways uncalled for strictures with regard to a great deal of the manufacture of butter and cheese in this country. I agree there is a good deal of remissness here and there throughout the country, but I venture to say, on behalf of the butter and cheese makers in Canada, that there is no country. with the exception of Denmark, where better intelligence, equipment and enterprise are applied to the manufacture of the dairy products than in Canada. I grant that Denmark, I am sorry to say, takes the lead, but there is no other country in the world where Canada is beaten. No doubt there are still improvements to be made, but I want to tell hon. gentlemen opposite that if there are it is not the fault of the department. We have been lecturing our people, urging them, giving them information, and giving them every opportunity to make improvements, and the great mass of our people have followed our advice and taken advantage of our information and made improvements. There is still, however a residuum of our people who have not taken advantage of our teaching, but they are becoming fewer and fewer every year.

Allusion has been made to the dead meat trade. I would like to see that established in Canada, but the department cannot establish it. If our people eat up all the dead meat in the country and there is no surplus to send abroad, we cannot do anything. If our shippers of cattle prefer to send their cattle abroad alive, that is their right and privilege. I think they are mistaken. I think they would do better to establish a dead meat trade. But the men engaged in the export of cattle prefer to send them abroad alive, and I am not going to ask power to compel them to change their methods, nor would I get it if I did.

Mr. W. JACKSON (West Elgin). Might I point out that while in the country to the south of us they have a dead meat trade, they are sending more cattle alive to the old country than we do. If the dead meat trade is so profitable to the people to the south, why do they not discontinue altogether the sending of live stock to the British market in competition with ours ?

Mr. FISHER. My hon. friend must ask the shippers why they do not do it. I have been urging them to do it but cannot force them.

Mr. W. JACKSON. You are suggesting that they are all wrong and that they would make more money by shipping dead meat instead of live cattle.

Mr. FISHER. I believe they would, but they do not think so, and I am not going to force my opinion on them.

Mr. W. JACKSON. I take exception to the minister's statement, and do not agree with him.

Mr. FISHER. That may be. My hon. friend agrees with the men in the trade, and is perfectly welcome to agree with them. My hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) alluded to the fact that dead meat was carried from New Zealand and the Argentines, but my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. Smith) answered him completely on that point. It is very easy to manage a cold storage system in which the chambers are kept below freezing all the time. My hon. friend from Wentworth pointed out that, so far as butter is concerned, there is no great difficulty in managing cold storage, because it does not matter whether it is ten degrees or twenty degrees below 30. The same thing is true with respect to meat—there is no difficulty where the whole product is frozen before it is put in and kept frozen until it reaches the other side. But when you have a number of different products which require different temperatures, and some of them, at any rate, as the hon. gentleman said, have to be kept within two or three degrees of a certain temperature, it is a much more difficult thing to manage. In fact it is not so easy a problem as the hon. gentleman thinks.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I was referring to the chilled meat trade, which is very different from the frozen meat. They do not dare to allow it to be frozen. The meat is chilled and kept chilled from the point of production in Argentine to the market. I have seen that meat on the London market, where it is sold as fresh meat. For that class of trade very careful attention would have to be paid to the temperature.

Mr. FISHER. So far as Argentine is concerned, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Armstrong) is right ; but the dead meat trade of New Zealand is in meat frozen solid, not chilled. I will not go further into details. I am satisfied with the case as it stands, and I think the country will be satisfied that we are doing what we can, and also that we are making progress, as has been acknowledged by everybody on the other side of the House as well as on this side. We are doing all we can do without disturbing the trade, without interfering with the legitimate work of the trade, without creating more difficulties than we should remove—which would be the case if we went any further than we have done after all, we have to deal with matters and with people as they are. We have not had demands from shippers such as hon. gentlemen opposite are making. We have not had demands from shippers that the steamship companies should give a guarantee, for instance. If a shipper sends his goods by cold storage and they are damaged in transit, he has the same recourse against the steamship company as he would have against the railway company if his fruit were frosted or his potatoes frozen while being transported by train.

There is one point I wish to emphasize—a point which was refered to by my hon.

friend from South Oxford (Mr. Schell). That point is that our cold storage facilities and arrangements are superior to those on the American ports. That is proved absolutely and conclusively by the facts that the American shippers send through our ports and by our lines of steamers in preference to the New York or Boston route. The reports and blue-books show, and the shippers in the United States will acknowledge, that our service is better than the American service. The reports of American consuls in Glasgow and other places in Great Britain show that the fruit from Canadian ports arrives in British ports in better condition than does that from American points of shipment. And these consuls reported to their government that if the American trade in these products is to be improved, they must follow the example which the Canadian government has shown them for the last ten years.

Amendment (Mr. E. D. Smith) negatived on division.

Motion agreed to and House went into Committee of Supply.

Progress reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. What business does the government intend to take up to-morrow ?

Mr. FIELDING. The motion for Committee of Supply will be made and the Minister of Railways and Canals will present his estimates.

Mr. TAYLOR. I understand that the Minister of Railways and Canals will make what we may call his budget speech first.

Mr. FIELDING. That is his intention, and, in committee, he will proceed with his estimates.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before we go into committee, after he makes his speech in reply, the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Worthington) will have a few remarks to make in reference to the Ross rifle.

Mr. FIELDING. By way of motion ?

Mr. TAYLOR. No.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, March 22, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 138) to amend the Railway Act. Mr. W. F. Maclean—by Mr. Lennox.

Mr. FISHER.

ROYAL ASSENT.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House, that I have received the following letter from the Secretary of His Excellency the Governor General :

Ottawa, March 22, 1907.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. the Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber this afternoon at 4 o'clock for the purpose of giving assent to certain Bills which have passed the Senate and House of Commons during the present session.

I have the honour to be, Sir,
Your obedient servant
C. J. JONES,
For the Governor General's secretary.

The Honourable
The Speaker of the House of Commons.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE (Montmagny) Mr. Speaker, I desire to move seconded by Mr. Bourassa :

That the third report of the joint committee of both Houses on the printing of parliament be now considered.

My reason for making this motion is that the committee recommends that the report of the Royal Commission on Life Insurance and the evidence taken before that commission be not printed. I understand that the report and the evidence have been printed in English, and I take it that the effect of the recommendation of the committee would be to prevent these documents being printed in French.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). I understand my hon. friend (Mr. Armand Lavergne) to say that the Printing Committee has recommended that the report of the Insurance Commission and the evidence before that commission be not printed. I presume that the committee framed that recommendation in the light of the fact that the documents had already been printed, and that they simply wanted to guard against double printing. But if the arrangements that were made did not contemplate the printing in the French language, then I agree with the hon. gentleman that that should be done without any motion being made for that purpose, and I think I can say at once that we will arrange to have them printed in both languages.

Mr. H. BOURASSA (Labelle). It is not only that report, but there are many other documents that are recommended not to be printed. There are, for example, the documents of the Transcontinental Railway Commission pertaining to the improvements of the Quebec harbour. Those are documents of importance, because they especially concern considerable interests in the province of Quebec. I do not know whether they are yet printed in English, but they should certainly be printed in both languages. It seems to me that this report was made merely to prevent the translation into French. That certainly is the reason with regard to the report of the Insurance Commission, because I know that one of the gentlemen who was charged with a partial translation has been notified not to proceed with it by the chief translator, who in turn received his orders from the committee. Besides, there are the despatches and orders in council relating to the colonial conference; these are printed in English only. I have not had time to look through the whole list, but I claim that every document that is printed in English should be printed in French, whether it is an important document or not. The moment it is printed in one language it should be printed in both. The only effect of the introduction of this report would be to prevent the printing in French, because the printing in English has already been done.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The rule is there, the standing order of the House, that everything that appears in English must be printed in French also. We will let the matter stand until the chairman of the committee can be communicated with.

SUBSIDIES TO THE PROVINCES.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). On Monday next I shall move the resolution, regarding subsidies to provinces.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I move:

That when this House adjourns on Wednesday next it stand adjourned until Tuesday, April 2.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—REVIEW OF DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals). It has become the custom in this House for the Minister of Railways and Canals to present an annual budget, which heretofore has usually been confined to the affairs of the Intercolonial Railway. I do not know how long that practice has been in existence, but I do know that during my incumbency of the office I have largely confined myself to a discussion of the financial affairs of that railway. I have felt, however, that this year I should make some departure from that practice, and that I should invite the attention of the House to the affairs of the department generally. There has been such an unusual expansion, I may almost say such a marvellous expansion, in the jurisdiction of the department that it is perhaps due to the House that other branches of that department than the Intercolonial should receive some attention in this statement. The importance of the department need not be referred to, but I would recall the fact that certain additional branches have been added to it during the past few years; for instance, one of the largest is the Railway Commission, another is the Transcontinental Railway Commission, and the work and operation of these commissions are certainly of importance, not merely to the House, but to the country at large. Then when we recall the further fact that in this department are employed some 14,000 persons of all classes, it will at once be seen how desirable it is to widen out, even at the expense of being somewhat tedious, the discussion of the affairs of that department. We have in the employment of the Department of the Railways and Canals in connection with canal administration some 3,000 persons. This does not include the employees in the inside and outside service of the Transcontinental Railway Commission. In addition, there are annually employed by the Intercolonial Railway on an average of 9,000 persons, this year 9,589. If you add to these some hundreds employed on the Transcontinental Railway Commission, you will see that in this department, in all its branches, are employed some 14,000 persons. These facts will give some idea of the expansion of that department in recent years.

On former occasions I have not dealt with the expenditure on canals, and I presume it is not expected that I should go in detail into the annual expenditures made upon these canals. But it will be well perhaps when we realize that there are many millions of dollars annually expended on the canal system of Canada, to inquire for a moment as to what that expenditure means, and as to the direction in which these moneys annually voted by parliament have been applied. It is sometimes questioned as to whether parliament is doing its duty in this regard and as to whether it has accomplished anything in connection with this expenditure. When we realize that the total capital expenditure on the canals of Canada during the past ten years has been about $24,000,000 it is brought home to us that this money must have gone somewhere and perhaps we do not stop to inquire as to the special directions in which it has been applied. I am sure it will be of interest to the House and the country to have some reference made to the respective canals and as to the amounts that have been expended in connection with each of them. I find from 1897 to 1906, both inclusive, the expenditure on capital account on the canal systems has been as follows:

Statement showing Capital Expenditure on the Canals from 1897 to 1906.

		Description of work done since 1897.
Farrans Point canal.. .. .. ..$	869,256 81	Deepening, straightening and enlarging prism of canal, one mile long, from end to end; constructing a lift lock, 800 feet long, and entrance piers at both ends, in order to increase depth of navigation from 9 feet to 14 feet. Work commenced May, 1897, and completed November, 1902.
Rapide Plat canal..	661,408 40	Completing the deepening and enlarging of the prism from end to end, 3⅝ miles; constructing lift lock, weir, side walls, &c., at lower entrance. Widening, deepening and improving upper entrance, in order to increase scale of navigation from 9 to 14 feet.
Galops canal..	4,559,479 31	Deepening and enlarging prism of canal from 9 to 14 feet navigation; constructing a lift lock at lower end, 800 feet long, with the masonry weir; lower entrance pier; a new cutting north of the village of Cardinal, faced with stone; further widening upper entrance.
North channel.. .. .. (A straight channel 300 feet wide with 14 foot navigation direct to Galops canal.)	1,539,590 72	This work was begun in May, 1897, and completed in November, 1906. It consisted in widening, deepening and straightening the north or Canadian channel of the River St. Lawrence westward from the upper entrance to the Galops canal to deep water in the river about four miles below Prescott. It also included the formation of a dam across 'The Gut,' between Adams and Ogdens islands to prevent cross current in Galops rapids channel.
River Reaches..	202,158 14	This sum is made up of work done on shoals immediately west of Cornwall canal; buoy boat with engines and necessary equipment; gas buoys; land damages from Galops rapids works; surveys at different places in river between Prescott and Cornwall; superintending engineer's pay-lists; dredging in Lake St. Francis, west end; widening upper entrance Cornwall canal.
Galops channel..	348,080 78	This work consisted of forming a new channel through the Galops rapids, abreast of the upper entrance to the Galops canal—that would give a 14-foot navigation. The work was begun in 1879 and operation ceased in October, 1906. The work embraced in this sum was principally for widening and extending the channel through the upper shoal.
Lake St. Louis..	243,513 66	Completion of the contract for forming a channel about 4 miles long, near Lachine, principally through rock, to give a more direct entrance to the Lachine canal, and suitable to a 14 foot scale of navigation. This work was begun in May, 1895, and completed in December, 1899. It also includes the cost of a hydrographic survey of the lake made in the years, 1900, 1901 and 1902.
Lake St. Francis..	75,906 71	This was for dredging a new and more direct channel through St. Regis bar and at Hamilton island—at the western end of the lake—suitable for a 14 foot navigation. The work was begun in May, 1898, and completed in November, 1901.

Mr. EMMERSON.

Statement showing Capital Expenditure on the Canals from 1897 to 1906.

		Description of work done since 1897.
Cornwall canal..	$1,265,404 14	This canal is 11 miles long from Cornwall at its lower end to Dickinson's landing at the western end. It has 6 lift locks and weirs and two bridges, and is adapted to a 14 foot navigation. It overcomes the Long Sault rapids. The work of enlargement to a 12 foot navigation was begun in August, 1876, when the lower entrance locks and weirs were placed under contract and were completed in a few years. In April, 1884, the contract for the upper entrance works was let, which included the guard lock and regulating weir, &c. This was for a 14 foot navigation, and in 1888 the remaining or intervening portion of the work was let. In 1893 it was decided to make a new channel abreast of sections 5, 6, 7 and 8, and the dams at the northeast and northwest of Sheiks island were formed. The electric power for operating the locks, weirs and bridges, as well as for lighting the canal, is obtained from the lower end of this new reach. The work embraced in the above amount was principally for the completion of the contracts between the upper and lower entrance sections, i.e., the widening and deepening of the prism, three locks and weirs and two highway bridges, as well as the Sheiks island dams. There was also a further widening of the upper entrance in 1899-1902. All the above work was completed in 1902.
Lachine canal..	1,452,937 67	The work embraced in this sum is for a deepening of the prism of the canal between St. Gabriel lock and Lachine, enlarging supply weir, Lachine; electric light and power plant; dredging below St. Gabriel locks; new bridges at Cote St. Paul and at Atwater avenue, also, the slope walls along the upper reach. The 12 foot enlargement was begun in 1873, but subsequently in 1884 it was changed to 14 feet, which was completed in 1888.
Beauharnois canal..	25,000 00	This was for an allowance to the corporation of the municipality of Valleyfield for a drainage culvert at that place.
Soulanges canal..	4,615,266 15	The total cost of this canal is $6,891,174.70, which embraced the formation of a new canal 14 miles long, on the north shore of the River St. Lawrence, to connect Lake St. Louis with Lake St. Francis, overcoming the Coteau, Cedars and Cascades rapids, including four lift locks and one guard lock and the necessary weirs; all adapted to a 14 foot navigation, but with 15 feet of water on the sills; highway bridges and a railway bridge; also power house to generate the electricity to operate the locks, weirs, bridges, &c., and for lighting the canal from end to end. The work was begun in 1892 and completed in 1902. Two-thirds of total cost since 1897.
Welland canal..	3,026,210 96	The work embraced in this amount includes improvements at Port Colborne harbour and elevator foundations, deepening summit level between Thorold and Port Colborne; removing all old bridge piers and rebuilding with longer bridges, electric light and power plant, surveys for a new line, &c.

Statement showing Capital Expenditure on the Canals from 1897 to 1906.

		Description of work done since 1897.
Sault Ste. Marie canal..	$1,095,664 16	The work embraced in this amount is for deepening, widening and straightening both upper and lower entrance channels and increasing the draught from 18 feet to 20 feet 4 inches, the depth on the lock sills; extending entrance piers at both ends and building new railway bridges; but in this sum are also included some balances paid to the original contractors under terms of award to them.
Trent canal.. .. .. (Now open for 6 feet navigation from Healey's falls to Lake Simcoe ports, the distance from Healey's falls to Orillia is 159 miles.)	3,738,663 27	This amount is for completing that portion of the canal between Peterborough and Lakefield begun in 1895, and included a hydraulic lift lock at Peterborough, as well as several ordinary locks, dams, weirs, &c., between that place and Lakefield. It also includes the completing of section No. 1 of the Balsam—Simcoe division—consisting of prism of canal, entrance piers and bridge abutments, begun also in 1895. The two other sections of this division were commenced in 1900 and are now practically completed, comprising an hydraulic lift lock at Kirkfield, highway bridges, &c., as well as entrance piers at Lake Simcoe. A considerable sum, included in this amount, has also been expended for surveys from Lake Simcoe to Georgian bay and from Rice lake to Lake Ontario.
Carillon, Grenville canal..	152,304 10	This was for widening and deepening the lower part of the Grenville canal west of Greece's point. The work was begun in June, 1897, and completed in June, 1900. It consisted of rock and earth excavation, side walls, &c.
Culbute lock and dam..	3,282 00	This sum was paid out for damages to properties along the Ottawa river, arising out of the construction of these works. I may say that this work has since been abandoned.
Rideau canal..	1,565 84	This was for surveys of a proposed western extension of the canal to obtain a more constant supply of water for navigation purposes during very dry seasons.
Tay canal..	2,750 00	Damages to property of L. Gemmell for water supply cut off by the construction of this branch of the Rideau canal.
Murray canal..	1,350 00	Amount paid for dwelling house for bridgemaster.
	$23,879,792 82	Total in ten years.

Mr. BERGERON. Were not these figures with reference to the Beauharnois canal given last year?

Mr. EMMERSON. No. What I have given out is the sum total of the expenditure between 1897 and 1906, both inclusive.

Mr. HAGGART. The expenditure on the Port Colborne canal is what was expended by your department, and does not include the expenditure by the Public Works Department.

Mr. EMMERSON. A statement was presented to the House this session as to the expenditure made at the Port Colborne harbour through the Department of Public Works. The expenditure included in this statement is by the Department of Railways and Canals, on the canal proper.

Mr. HAGGART. Is the work at Port Colborne nearly finished?

Mr. EMMERSON. It will be completed shortly.

Mr. HAGGART. Will it be completed next season?

Mr. EMMERSON. I should think so.

Mr. HAGGART. How much will it take to build the Trent canal from Healey's Falls to the Bay of Quinté?

Mr. EMMERSON. The estimate from Simcoe to the Georgian bay entrance for an eight foot canal on the locks and nine feet waterway is somewhat in the vicinity of a million and a half dollars. My recollection is that the estimate from Healey's Falls to Trenton is somewhere above $3,000,000.

Mr. J. D. REID. In reference to the expenditure on the Cornwall canal, does that include the lighting plant as well?

Mr. EMMERSON. No; I will deal with that later, as I have the data. It will be seen that a very considerable amount has thus been expended for the purpose of improving the transportation facilities for traffic which finds an outlet at Montreal by way of the St. Lawrence river.

I mentioned at the outset that the Department of Railways and Canals had been enlarged by reason of the annexing thereto of the branches known as the Railway Commission and the Transcontinental Railway Commission, and that thereby the work of the department was increased and its importance to the people of this country enhanced. I did not advert to the expansion that has been going on in Canada, especially in connection with the construction of new lines of railway in every section of the Dominion, which have been subsidized by this parliament. The construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway alone is a very important factor in connection with the transportation problem of Canada. But altogether apart and aside from that there are many railways which would be considered of small moment in comparison with the great Canadian Pacific Railway and the great Grand Trunk Pacific or the Canadian Northern system but all these railways, of minor importance in the general eye, are of supreme importance to the communities which they serve and these railways contribute very materially to the total of the expansion which is going on in Canada. It will be interesting, I am sure, to the people of the country to have brought to their notice in concrete form the expenditures which have been made, and the increase in mileage in the railway system of Canada, from 1896 to 1906. Up to 1896, the total mileage of railways constructed in Canada was 16,387, and the Dominion parliament had contributed in aid of the construction thereof the sum of $90.395,692.91. That is to say this sum was the total amount of railway subsidies paid by the Dominion of Canada from confederation up to the beginning of the year 1906.

Mr. HAGGART. That does not include the amount contributed to the Grand Trunk?

Mr. EMMERSON. That does not include anything prior to confederation.

Mr. HAGGART. It is only from confederation down.

Mr. EMMERSON. Only from confederation down, and the amount paid in aid of the construction of the Grand Trunk Railway was an amount paid by the united provinces of Canada as I understand it.

Mr. HAGGART. They owe a certain amount yet, over $20,000,000.

Mr. EMMERSON. I would not be as familiar with that, of course, as my hon. friend, but it is not in any way included in the figures which I am giving.

Mr. BRODER. It was a loan anyway.

Mr. EMMERSON. The figures for each year from 1896 to 1906, are given in the following table:

SUPPLY—REVIEW OF THE DEPARTMENT OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals). Mr. Speaker : Continuing what I was saying when interrupted, perhaps it would be instructive if we were to consider the work of the Railway Commission, which may be considered an adjunct of the Department of Railways and Canals. But, time will not permit of our dealing with that matter. I laid on the table a few days ago, a report of that commission giving very full details of the work done within the past fiscal year. A reference to that report has shown that an immense number of cases have been taken into consideration by the commission ; and I think that a careful perusal of it will lead to the conclusion that the creation of that tribunal and the expenditure necessarily involved in its maintenance are fully justified. On this subject, therefore, I content myself with referring hon. members to that report which has been printed and placed in the hands of hon.

members. On the 10th of December last, I placed on the table the report of the Transcontinental Commission with respect to their work up to the 30th of June last, and there have been placed on the table, from time to time since, reports of the work that has proceeded during the present fiscal year. A few minutes ago, when I was giving the number of employees of the department, I had not under my hand the details of that branch known as the Transcontinental Railway Commission. I find that that commission have in their employ on the surveys and general outside service 1,049 men; in their transport service, 192 men, and at headquarters at Ottawa, 59 men—a total of 1,300. There are employed in connection with the canals 3,074 persons; and the number of employees on the Intercolonial Railway, is 9,589. This makes a grand total of employees in the Department of Railways and Canals of 13,963—in round numbers practically 14,000 persons.

Mr. BLAIN. Is there any increase on the Intercolonial Railway over last year?

Mr. EMMERSON. No, there has been a considerable reduction. Now, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should do wisely if I directed my attention to the matter of railways generally and coming down in this order to the Intercolonial Railway. There have been great changes in the railway system of this continent during even the last ten years. And, certainly any one who covers in memory the period of years that I do must contemplate with wonder the difference between the railways of the early seventies in Canada and the railways in Canada today. Take for instance the period of the opening of the Intercolonial Railway. Let us fix that at July, 1876, which was the time when Mr. (now Sir) Sandford Fleming made his final report to the government announcing that the road had been completed and was ready for operation. The opening of that railway marked an epoch in the history of eastern Canada—indeed the history of all Canada. It was an event which had been looked forward to for years; the building of the railway was a project which had agitated the minds of the people in eastern Canada and Central Canada for a period of at least half a century. But what was that railway then in comparison with the railways of our days? Why, there has been a complete revolution—in the character of the road-bed and the track; in the rolling stock and the furnishings of that rolling stock; in the accommodation for patrons in the railway stations; in all the comforts and luxuries of traffic. In every other branch of railway work, including every part of the operation of the railway there have been changes equally marked. I think we shall all agree that these have been advantageous to those who use the railways of this country.

Of course one might say that when the Intercolonial was completed on the 1st of July, 1876, and when Mr. Fleming, now Sir Sanford Fleming, reported to the government of which he was an honoured official, that that railway was open for operation, the people of Canada might have said: We have built a railway, it is open for operation, our expenditure is ended, our capital expenditure must henceforth cease, we have accomplished our object, we have secured that for which we have been looking for half a century. But we find that if these were their assumptions and their aspirations, they were vain. We now find that from 1876 down to this year of grace, this Dominion has annually expended very large sums on its government railway system, sums which it has paid out of capital account as an investment, and it has become necessary for us to inquire as to that expenditure chargeable to capital account. Was it necessary, has it been in accord with the railway systems in other countries, whether controlled by government or by private corporations? I think we need only to survey this continent to find justification for the action taken by this parliament in annually voting large sums to aid in the maintenance of the Intercolonial, to aid in its betterment, to bring it up to the standard of each year of grace. Because, what was the standard for railways in 1876, at the time of this construction, has ceased to be the standard to-day, and if the Intercolonial of 1876, with the conditions then prevailing, were to be laid down alongside a modern system of railways, it would present as much contrast with a modern railway as there would have been found between Stephenson's railway, running out of Salisbury in 1825, and the Intercolonial of 1876. And yet the year 1876 is not very far back, it is but a brief span to those of us who had the privilege of reaching young manhood at that period, it seems to us but as yesterday. I know that is my experience, it seems but as a day, and yet during that time there has been a revolution, not to say an evolution, in the railway systems of this continent, indeed throughout the world.

Now, the necessity for changes, marked changes began ten or twelve years ago. About that time all the railways on this continent found themselves face to face with a condition of affairs which necessitated enormous expenditures. As a first preliminary, the capactiy of the freight cars was increased until the maximum load was brought up to 100,000 pounds instead of the 40,000 pounds which was the former maximum. The average freight car in use today is 60,000 pounds, a few years ago it was 40,000 pounds, an increase in ten years of fifty per cent. Locomotives have practically doubled in weight, and in price as well. Besides that, they have been improved in a very marked degree. As was the change between the tallow dip of our forefathers in their homes on a winter's night, as compared with the modern electric light, so is the change in that comparatively unimportant matter, for instance, of the headlights of locomotives. But yesterday we thought that a kerosene lamp with reflectors furnished us with a splendid headlight; to-day, if you wish to modernize your railroad system and your locomotives, you must have electric headlights generating their own electrical power. Some ten or twelve years ago the rails were unable to carry this heavier class of rolling stock and had to be replaced. Additional ballasting was required, heavier bolts and fastenings, heavier switch work, all the bridges had to be renewed to bear the heavier rolling stock, longer sidings had to be provided, the yards had to be increased in length and in the number of tracks, larger coal chutes were necessary, more water and larger tanks also had to be provided. In addition, the passenger rolling stock had to be increased in strength. Greater luxuries are demanded by the travelling public, so that much more extensive cars, first-class coaches, sleeping cars and dining cars had to be provided, and a heavier class of locomotives had to be furnished in order to haul these heavier passenger trains. It followed that the railway and machine shops were wholly inadequate to handle the repairs for such heavy locomotives and cars. The tools were too light, the roundhouses too short; the turn tables had to be increased in length and in strength. Formerly two men could go to any locomotive, carrying a side rod and tools to do any work on it; but to-day it requires the services of a crane, operated in many instances by electrical power. In fact the main lines of the railways throughout the continent of America have been practically rebuilt during the last decade. I have been referring to the procedure connected with the railway systems throughout this continent. The Intercolonial Railway necessarily had to be kept up as near as possible, in proportion to the appropriation of parliament, to the standard, and that railway has been following in the paths of the others as of necessity it had to do or go out of business entirely as a modern railway and be closed down. As on all other railways portions of double track had to be built and reductions in grades had to be made. This latter portion of the work on the Intercolonial Railway, owing to its location, has not been carried out to anything like the extent that it has been on the other railway systems in America.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the minister state where the reductions in grade have taken place?

Mr. HAGGART. He says that work has not been carried out.

Mr. EMMERSON. I said it has not been carried out to the same extent. There have been reductions here and there in isolated cases but there have not been the reductions in the grades of the railway such as the interests of the Intercolonial Railway demand and such as would have been made if the Intercolonial Railway were a more profitable institution and if the Canadian parliament would furnish sufficient funds for that purpose. But, some work has been done in that direction. There have been great improvements in respect to the ballasting, all of which work has been paid for out of revenue. I make the assertion that the action of the Intercolonial Railway in that regard is without parallel in the history of the Canadian railways. There never has been one single dollar charged up to capital by the Intercolonial Railway on account of the expenditure for additional ballasting that has been from time to time placed upon its roadbed. The Canadian Pacific Railway, a year or two ago, increased its ballast; that is where there was an average of six inches of ballast it was necessary, for the betterment of the road, to increase it to eight or ten inches. That has been done on the Intercolonial Railway as it was done on the Canadian Pacific Railway, but in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway, on one of its eastern sections, it charged that expenditure for additional ballast to capital account while for every such betterment on the Intercolonial Railway the expenditure has been charged to and paid out of revenue.

Mr. HAGGART. Does the hon. gentleman say that the increased ballasting on the Canadian Pacific Railway has been charged to capital account?

Mr. EMMERSON. I have cited one instance and I have made that statement.

Mr. J. D. REID. Do you know where that was?

Mr. EMMERSON. On the eastern section; east of Montreal. Notwithstanding the efforts which have been put forth by the Intercolonial Railway in connection with its cars there has been a great shortage in its car supply. Owing to the peculiar position of the road there will always be a very large number of its cars away from home, inasmuch as the larger portion of its traffic originates on its line and goes abroad. Less traffic comes to the road from foreign roads which compels us to send our cars abroad without the usual compensation of foreign cars coming in to replace our own. The prompt return of our cars would enable us to give much better satisfaction to our customers. I do not know whether the word is too strong or not but I think I will venture to use it and I will say that the dishonest diversion of our rolling stock by certain American roads is a matter that requires the serious attention of the railway management.

Mr. HAGGART. Hear, hear.

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend says 'hear, hear.' I am glad I can echo his 'hear, hear' in this instance.

Mr. HAGGART. Not only American but Canadian roads.

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend's 'hear, hears' are too often meaningless. In this case they do certainly apply, but I will give the reason why they apply, and I am not saying that in agreeing with my hon. friend I cast any reflection upon the management in that regard, nor are they blameable by reason of it. However, the condition of the Intercolonial Railway makes it impossible for us to square ourselves with the American systems. We have great quantities of pulp wood and lumber traffic originating on our railway. That traffic is destined for the New England and middle states. These cars go into the possession of an American railway. Under the custom applicable in such instances they can hold a car for a certain period of time, then they can pass it on to another railway and that railway, in its turn, can hold that car for a period paying so much per diem. They can only hold it for a certain period and if they keep it for a longer time the per diem charge is larger. But before that time expires they pass it on to another railway and in this way a perfect revolution is kept up. I have seen Intercolonial Railway cars myself away up in the mountains of California just north of San Francisco. I remember that two years ago, when going over these mountains, I saw, away up in the hills, on a secluded siding, one of the best freight cars that we have on the Intercolonial Railway and everywhere over this continent have I noticed these railway cars. But, how can you help it? This question is claiming the attention of the management. There is no international law that will enforce the return of a car and there is no possible application to the courts, which we can make that will bring about redress. Our situation is such that they do not have very much traffic originating with them whereby their cars can come to our road which would enable us to keep them as a retaliatory act, and if we did keep them we could only keep them for a shorter period because we have not those numberless systems that they have in connection with their own roads whereby they can pass these cars from one to the other. We cannot do that and geographically and by environment we are placed at a disadvantage in that regard with the American systems.

Mr. HAGGART. Have you not the same trouble with the Canadian roads?

Mr. EMMERSON. Not to the same extent, because we get more of their cars and we go upon the principle that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. When their cars come we feel, that, they having got a good number of ours, we are justified in keeping theirs in retaliation.

Mr. HAGGART. That is not christian-like; you should not do it because they do it.

Mr. EMMERSON. I know it shocks the sensitive nerves of my hon friend (Mr. Haggart), but I am going to tell the truth on all occasions no matter where the chips fall; I cut the tree down with this little hatchet, I have to tell the truth. On November 8, 1906, the total Intercolonial Railway cars off the line was 4,403, and the total foreign cars on our line 1,652, leaving a shortage, owing to exchange of cars and on branch lines, of 2,028.

There is another feature of the car situation to which I feel I should allude. There are a number of branch lines connecting with the Intercolonial Railway, which serve as feeders for it. These railways were constructed by companies who were aided by subsidies from this parliament in many instances, and by subsidies from the provincial legislatures in all instances. In no instance did the aggregate of the aid received by the companies do more than build the road. It did not enable them to supply a sufficiency of equipment and rolling stock, and in almost every instance there was no capital to enable these companies to continue the operation of the road. They issued bonds, too often at a very large discount, and with the proceeds of these bonds they completed the road, but then their sources of supply were exhausted. As, in the case of the Intercolonial Railway, when it was said to be finished, it was only finished for the moment, so with these branch lines. As year by year passed, the communities served by these lines found that they required to be further finished, to be renewed, to have additional rolling stock. The people were disappointed The parliament of Canada and the legislatures of the provinces were disappointed, because the good that was expected from the construction of the road for the aid given, did not follow. In many instances these railways have been continued, by reason of personal sacrifices of the people living along them. They have been struggling to operate them. In no instance has there been any railway constructed in eastern Canada that has been in any sense a bonanza to its shareholders, and in every instance the accommodation has been inadequate for the communities which they were intended to serve. The Intercolonial Railway seeks to gather up all the traffic it can, and it finds that on certain branch lines there is lumber and other freight to be shipped to the eastern states or to points on the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Railway. But these branch lines have no freight cars. Is that freight to be left lying along these branch lines? The Intercolonial Railway is therefore called upon to furnish cars to these lines in order to get the traffic, and in that way a great many of the Intercolonial Railway cars are put in this service to the disadvantage, in many instances, of its patrons who live along the trunk line. This accounts in some degree for the shortage of cars on the Intercolonial. The usual remedy for dishonest diversions is to refuse to exchange business with the offending road. Unfortunately, in the case of the Intercolonial, if this remedy were enforced it would mean ruin to its best customers, for the reason that the market for wood products is in the United States, and on the lines of the offending roads. It may be of some interest to compare the railway as it was in 1896 with the year 1906, dealing only with the salient features.

Train mileage	3,842,502	7,424,831	93
Car mileage	43,005,684	93,746,123	117

In addition to this, the line has been relaid with 80-pound steel rails, replacing 62½-pound steel rails.

Nearly the entire length has been reballasted.

Bridges have all been replaced, and on a scale adequate for any reasonable increase in weight of rolling stock.

New terminals have been provided at many points, such as Sydney, North Sydney, Halifax, St. John and Moncton.

New roundhouses have been built at Chaudière Junction, Rivière du Loup, Stellarton, Sydney, St. Flavie, Campbellton, St. John and Truro.

A fine modern brick passenger depot has been built at Sydney, another at Pictou, another at Westville, another at Stellarton, another at Antigonish and another at Maccan; one at Windsor, on the line of the Windsor branch, and one at Memramcook, and at many other points. There was one at Drummondville, in Quebec, and a new one at Lévis; in fact, all along the line improvements have been made in this regard at every place, whether of greater or less importance. We have also added a large number of smaller depots for passenger and freight service, wherever the business conditions seemed to warrant. We have constructed two elevators, one at Halifax and the other at St. John. We have given increased dock accommodation and additional sidings as well at both of these important points, which are stopping points in the line of export transportation from this country to European markets.

Every passing track (that is a siding where trains cross on the line) has been relaid and lengthened, and at all important places additional sidings have been added. This has been necessary. The advent of larger locomotives meant additional cars and longer freight trains. The improvements in passenger cars and the additional luxuries that have to be provided to-day, as compared with ten years ago, necessitated more cars and longer trains, and that, in turn, necessitated longer crossing- and passing-sidings. Improvements in one direction necessitated improvements in all directions, and all this meant the betterment of the Intercolonial Railway; it meant the expenditure of money out of capital account in the same way that these expenditures are made, and have been made during the past decade, by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway systems. But the effect of such expenditures on the business of the country and on the railway itself has been beneficial, as is evidenced by the statement which I read to you a few minutes ago, showing the great increase in engine, train and car mileage.

Dealing with the present year in comparison with the preceding one, the following statistical information will, I am sure, be found of interest. I shall give you a comparison of the train, engine and car miles and tons one way, and the earnings, as between the years 1,905 and 1906:

Freight train miles, 1905..	4,404,025
Freight train miles, 1906..	4,730,595
Increase..	326,570
Passenger train miles 1905..	2,892,720
Passenger train miles, 1906..	2,694,236
Decrease..	198,484
Light and shunting engine miles, 1905.	2,103,548
Light and shunting engine miles. 1906.	1,879,680
Decrease..	223,868

The decreases in the last two items are not retrograde movements, but rather improvements, a material advance in the operation of the railway showing that there has been a saving of mileage, especially in the case of the shunting engines. This is a very material advance in the operation of the railway, showing that there has been a material saving in the mileage of the shunting engines.

Mr. HAGGART. Useless trains.

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. Especially the one from Montreal to Halifax.

Mr. EMMERSON. We will talk about that later. My hon. friend is getting impatient. I am sorry he does not possess the patience I have. This lessening of the light and shunting engine mileage shows an improvement in the operation of the road and the saving of unnecessary expenditure. The total engine miles in 1905 was 9,400,293 and in 1906, 9,304,511, a decrease of 95,782. Here is a comparison very much to the credit of the Intercolonial Railway. It shows we had much less engine miles whereas we had an increase in the freight train miles. That is to say we had fewer engines, but what we had were carrying their full capacity. Where you have a large number of engines going over the road not loaded to the full capacity, you are not efficiently operating the road. But where you have large trains operated by engines equal to the capacity of those trains or where you have engines with cars loaded up to the full capacity of the motive power, you are saving in expense of operation and operating the railway efficiently and advantageously.

In freight car miles we had in 1905, 72,739,921 as compared with 78,399,746 in 1906, being an increase of 5,659,825.

In 1905 we had passenger car miles 15,515,356 as compared with 15,346,377 in 1906, being a decrease of 168,979. There again is an improvement and a marked improvement. The total car miles in 1905 was 88,255,277 as compared with 93,746,123 in 1906 an increase of 5,490,846.

Tons, one mile in 1905..	711,049,733
" " 1906..	851,211,445
Increase..	140,161,712
Tons, per engine mile in 1905..	75·6
" " " 1906..	91·5
Increase..	15·9
Passengers carried, 1905..	2,810,960
" " 1906..	2,737,160
Decrease..	73,800

I cannot account for this because I do not know whether it is due to faultiness in the returns from the conductors or what it was, but it appears that while there was a decrease in the number of passengers in 1906 as compared with 1905, there was an increase in the passenger earnings.

The returns of the gross revenue are as follows:

—	1905.	1906.	Increase.

Mr. J. D. REID. Have you the earnings in 1896?

Mr. EMMERSON. No; they were just about one half, but that is not a fair comparison because the mileage of 1896 was not the mileage of 1906. But in 1905 and 1906 the mileage was equal.

Mr. J. D. REID. Then there is an increase.

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, a very material increase—an increase of upwards of $860,000. Let us turn to the expenditures.

Locomotive power, 1905..	$31,115,653 49
Locomotive power, 1906..	2,930,075 83
Decrease..	$ 186,577 66

This decrease in expenditure was effected, notwithstanding the fact that we carried more tons of traffic. And there again the management of the Intercolonial Railway is to be complimented.

Cars, transportation and repairs, 1905..	$2,040,133 13
Cars, transportation and repairs, 1906..	1,617,119 70
Decrease..	$ 423,013 43
Maintenance of way and works, 1905..	$1,722,616 65
Maintenance of way and works, 1906..	1,397,143 62
Decrease..	$ 325,473 03

Now, if this decrease in the expenditure on maintenance of way and works were due to want of attention through neglect in the maintenance of the road at the high standard already attained, we should not be entitled to the slightest credit. But I speak whereof I know when I say that the road has been maintained up to the standard of 1905—yes, and even at a higher standard. In addition, we laid certain rails, the labour in laying which is chargeable to this item of expenditure.

Station expenses, 1905..	$ 937,816 11
Station expenses, 1906..	1,032,764 20
Increase..	$ 94,948 09

Why this increase? We have furnished additional accommodation, we have provided more and better stations; but this does not account for this increase. The cause of this increase is to be found in the fact, and in that fact alone, that there has been a very material increase in the wages paid to telegraphers, station agents, porters and other employees connected with this branch of operation.

Totals of expenditure, 1905.. ..$8,352,761 23
Totals of expenditure, 1906.. .. 7,563,371 25

We had a car mileage loss of $16,065.62 in 1905, and a gain of $121,456.89 in 1906, an increase as between 1906 and 1905 of $137,522.41.

Rental of leased lines in 1905 was $140,000 and the same in 1906.

Grand total of expenditure, 1905..$8,508,826 75
Grand total of expenditure, 1906.. 7,581,914 36

Decrease in 1906.. .. ..$ 926,912 39

That is to say, we lessened our expenditure legitimately by saving and by improvement of operation to the extent of this decrease. The total improvement in the operation of the Intercolonial Railway in 1906 as compared with 1905 was the magnificent sum of $1,787,219.46.

To give these figures they may be summarized as follows :

Let us now turn to the question of cost of operation. The following figures show the condition of the road in this respect :

Cost per train mile	1·166c.	1·021c.
Cost per engine mile	90·5c.	81·5c.

For purpose of comparison the revenue earned per ton of freight, per mile, average of all United States railway, for year 1904, latest published, $7\frac{8}{10}$c. or 32 per cent higher than I.C.R., 1906.

Grand Trunk railway, 6 months ending June, 1905, $6\frac{9}{10}$c. or 19 per cent higher than I.C.R., 1906.

Canadian Pacific Railway, year 1905, $7\frac{67}{100}$c. or 30 per cent higher than I.C.R., 1906.

New South Wales, Australia, $22\frac{7}{10}$c. or 350 per cent higher than I.C.R., 1906.

Average New Zealand Government railway, 1906 ..... 1·85
Average Victorian railways, Australia ..... $1·93\frac{1}{2}$

Mr. EMMERSON.

There are no statistics in Victoria or in New Zealand showing the revenue earned per ton of freight per mile. We only find that in the returns from New South Wales, although I am informed that they are now doing that in another of the Australian colonies. These figures show that the gross earnings on the Intercolonial were only $1·0294, as compared with the average earnings on the United States Railways of $1·94, and on the New Zealand government railway system for 1906 of $1·85. Their earnings were largely in excess of ours, owing to their rates being larger than the rates chargeable on the Intercolonial. These figures refer to the gross earnings. Now the average on the Victoria railways was $1·935.

Mr. HAGGART. What do you mean by $1·935.

Mr. EMMERSON. That is the figures compared with a unit of $1, using the decimal system. Ton mile statistics are not available for the New Zealand and Victorian railways, and while train mile earnings are not as accurate a basis for comparison as the ton mile, it is the only information to be had and as far as it applies, is a measure of the cost of service to the community served by the railway. Taking the Intercolonial as a unit of $1, United States railways, in their gross earnings, average $1.85. That is to say, where we get $1 the United States railways get $1.88, the New Zealand railways get $1.79, the Victorian railways $1.88.

For the fiscal year 1906 we hauled 851,211,445 ton miles of pay freight on the Intercolonial, and as we haul about one ton of tare for every ton of freight, it is fair to infer that we hauled just as many tons of cars one mile. We hauled one loaded car for every 12·47 tons of freight in 1905, and in 1906 we used one car for every 14·22 tons of freight, which means that we made a saving of 120,000,000 mile tons tare over the corresponding last fiscal year. This was due to heavier loads. This is approximately the equivalent of our fast freight trains, Nos. 75 and 76, between Halifax and Montreal, for three months; we made that saving. The increase in net tons hauled is due in part to the full loading of cars of larger capacity built in recent years; and in part, I think, it is due to the fact that special instructions were given, and special care was taken to have those instructions followed, that every engine sent out should, so far as possible, have its full measure of capacity of cars.

The result of the operations of the Intercolonial Railway for the fiscal year 1906 was as follows:

Gross revenue Intercolonial Railway..	$7,643,829 70
Gross expenditure..	7,581,914 36
Difference..	$ 61,915 34
To which must be added profits derived from the Windsor branch..	$ 31,966 34
Total surplus, I.C.R..	$ 93,881 87
Last year, 1905, the Prince Edward Island Raialway made a loss of..	$ 153,133 83
The loss for the fiscal year 1906, was..	$ 36,982 24
Making a betterment of...	$ 116,151 24

I might explain that the accounting system has been brought into harmony with that in use on other Canadian systems and on the American systems of railways, certainly into harmony with the system prevailing on the Canadian Pacific Railway, Grand Trunk Railway, New York Central and other great railways on this continent. Detailed statements of the cost of each item are now placed monthly in the hands of the responsible heads and more ample and accurate statistics are being secured and put in form to enable those responsible for the operation of the railway to bring about improvements. Each Monday morning a statement is made and presented to the head of the department showing what his expenditures were during the preceding week. That can be used in comparison with what these expenditures were the week preceding that. There can be readily made a comparison by the heads demonstrating to them as to whether their expenses are increasing or decreasing, and whether there is economy being shown in the operation of their respective branches.

The disastrous fire that occurred at Moncton in February last totally destroyed the car repair shops and partially destroyed the locomotive repair shops as follows:

	Dimensions of building, feet.
Paint shop, car repairs, a wooden building..	535 x 65
Freight car repair shop, a wooden building..	565 x 78
Car works shop, two stories brick building with all tools..	455 x 78
The roof of the power house was burned, and was otherwise injured.
A brick store house was destroyed..	50 x 40
The boiler shop was seriously injured, all the wood in the roof, &c., being burned..	160 x 100
The machine shop, wood portions destroyed..	230 x 100

All the tools contained in the shops in question were either destroyed or seriously injured.

All shafting, pulleys, belts, &c., were burned up.

Of rolling stock, the following were burned up:

One official car, one first-class sleeping car, one second-class sleeping car, one dining car, four first-class passenger cars, one second-class passenger car, one postal car, two express and bagage cars, five box cars, seven platform cars, one twenty ton coal car, twenty-six other cars were more or less damaged.

Mr. HAGGART. Was there any insurance?

Mr. EMMERSON. No insurance. There has never been adopted in the history of the Intercolonial Railway the policy of insuring any of its property. I believe it is upon the principle that the government having their property widely spread over the country at different points, one portion will insure the other and that if they were to attempt to insure all their property of that character along the line of the Intercolonial Railway the loss in premiums yearly would be very much larger than the loss occasioned by any possible fires would amount to.

Mr. HAGGART. Did you charge these restorations to the revenue or capital?

Mr. EMMERSON. The restoration of the buildings will be charged to capital, the cars and these other things being replaced out of revenue. Immediate steps were taken to provide temporary repair shops at a direct cost of $60,000 which was paid out of revenue. The indirect cost exceeds the direct outlay as the workmen have to perform their duties at a disadvantage. The old site of the shops was too small and entirely inadequate for the requirements of the Intercolonial Railway even at this date. and, certainly having regard to the future, was very inadequate. As a consequence advantage was taken of the fire to secure an area of 288 acres.

Mr. LENNOX. You said that the government provides the insurance itself?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes.

Mr. LENNOX. Do you set aside anything out of earnings from year to year to form an insurance fund?

Mr. EMMERSON. It has never been done in the history of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. LENNOX. It would come out of revenue?

Mr. EMMERSON. The approximate cost of this area was $33,000 and on it we are constructing a new set of shops, modern in lay out, construction and equipment. Contracts have been awarded for the car repair shops, storehouse and locomotive shops. Tenders will shortly be called for the roundhouse, power-house, oil-house and dry kiln. Ample provision for growth in the future has been made in the lay out.

Mr. HAGGART. Have you the full staff on yet?

Mr. EMMERSON. No; I will explain that in one moment. At Moncton and at all terminal and divisional points on the Intercolonial Railway improvements are being made to the end that economical operation may be secured and ensured. Of course the destruction of these shops has very materially embarrassed the Intercolonial Railway in its operation. As to repairs we have very limited accommodations and those of the most temporary character in which such men as we have—and we have not been able to reinstate those whose services had to be dispensed with at the time of the fire—work at a very great disadvantage.

The cost of repairs during the past season has been materially enhanced thereby. We have avoided doing any more work than is absolutely necessary. In a measure, that has affected our car supply, and in a measure—as I will show when I come to invite your attention to the financial results of the first six months of the current fiscal year—it has affected our returns; not in the surface showing of our returns, but with respect to the lessened renewals that we have been able to make in the way of supplying cars that have been worn out or destroyed. During the past fiscal year, as far as possible, we have replaced very many of the cars that were worn out, but we have not been able to replace the cars that were destroyed by the fire. However, during the current fiscal year which ends on the 31st of this month, provision has been made for replacing a considerable proportion of these cars.

Mr. HAGGART. It is now six o'clock, and when the hon. gentleman resumes after dinner I would ask him to be kind enough to make a statement as to what the present arrangements are with the Canadian Pacific Railway, as to running rights on the Intercolonial.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS.

ATLANTIC, QUEBEC AND WESTERN RAILWAY.

House went into committee on Bill (No. 90) respecting the Atlantic, Quebec and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Gauvreau.

On section 1,

Mr. CAMPBELL. This section was amended in the Railway Committee to provide that certain outstanding claims for wages and other expenditures in connection with the construction of the road should be paid to the extent of $50,000. Both parties agreed to have the first section amended to that effect.

Mr. HAGGART. I understand that objection was taken that this would revive claims which had expired under the provincial statute of limitation.

Mr. CAMPBELL. No. That was in reference to certain bonuses which were granted some twenty-five years ago and which have been outlawed. Both parties have agreed that these bonuses have all lapsed, and they relinquish all claims to them.

Mr. HAGGART. If I understood the matter rightly, it was entirely different. No Act of this House could revive any bonuses that had lapsed. The statement was made that debts which had lapsed under the statute of limitation had been revived by this Act.

Mr. EMMERSON. That contention was made, but as soon as it was made the solicitor for the railway interest, Mr. T. Chase Casgrain, consented to the proposed amendment whereby the railway would be liable to the event of an amalgamation, and it was agreed to appropriate $50,000 to the liquidation of this indebtedness pro rata. All parties agree to that.

Mr. J. D. REID (Grenville). I may say that I was present when Mr. Casgrain agreed that an amount not exceeding $50,000 would be paid on these old claims.

Section agreed to ; Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

MANITOBA RADIAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 46) to incorporate the Manitoba Radial Railway Company.—Mr. Bole, read the first time.

Mr. EMMERSON. I move that clause 9 be restored. I am quite aware of the contention made before the Railway Commit tee——

Mr. SPEAKER. A motion of that kind would not be in order.

Mr. LENNOX. I have a motion here which will have the same effect and which is in accord with rule 113. I move that the amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 46) to incorporate the Manitoba Radial Railway Company, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines for consideration.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—REVIEW OF DEPARTMENT RAILWAYS AND CANALS.

Mr. EMMERSON. When we rose at recess, Mr. Speaker, I had finished a recital of some statistics relating to the Intercolonial Railway—statistics that I think will be of decided advantage as information to the people. We are all agreed that the more information regarding that railway there is disseminated throughout the country, the better will it stand in the opinion of the people. It is desirable that the country should have full information regarding its operations. It is one of our greatest public works and as such should be placed in its true light before the public. I had referred to the financial statement, showing the results of the operation of the railway during the year 1906 as compared with the year 1905. It will be interesting to know that the improvement is based upon such facts and conditions as will immeasurably ensure improvement in the future. The result is not merely a spasmodic one to be followed by a retrograde movement but one which is bound to endure. While I was gratified with the showing of 1906, I have very much more reason to be gratified at the result of the operations of the road during the first six months of the present fiscal year, commencing the 1st of July, 1906, and closing the 31st of December of that year. At the end of the first six months the gross earnings of the railway were $4,425,213.28 and the gross expenditure $4,047,556.43 This shows a net surplus of receipts over expenditure of $377,656.85 in the operations of the railway during the six months. I think, that is the best result that the Intercolonial Railway has demonstrated for many a year. And this result, on its face, is the more gratifying because of the fact that there were certain unusual expenditures made during that period but for which the surplus for the six months would have been still larger. One such expenditure which may be specifically mentioned was the satisfaction of a judgment for $56,000, obtained against the railway for damage resulting from fire. A certain area of timber lands in the province of Quebec was destroyed, as a result, it was alleged, and demonstrated to the satisfaction of the court at least, of sparks from a locomotive of the Intercolonial Railway. A petition of right was sued for and granted, and the result of trial was a judgment in favour of the plaintiff to the amount of about $56,000.

Mr. HAGGART. Who was the plaintiff ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Mr. Price, of Price Brothers. This judgment was unfortunate for our financial operations for the six months, for this fire had taken place in 1903, the liability having been thus incurred before I had anything to do with the Intercolonial Railway. Of course, it was claimed on the part of the railway that the fire had not resulted from fire on any property of the Intercolonial Railway, and that there had been no negligence. But the court thought otherwise and so determined.

Mr. MORIN. May I ask the hon. minister a question ? How much loss did the government sustain through the burning of the shops in Moncton last year ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Of course, that would more properly come in in another place, but I may interrupt my remarks to say that it will cost about $1,000,000 to rebuild the shops at Moncton. Of course, the new shops will be on a much larger scale than the old ones were, and better suited to the requirements of the railway and the trade it is doing. I was going on to say, when interrupted, that the results I have just recited with respect to the first operations of the railway during the first six months, as well as the result during the preceding year, were very satisfactory indeed; and they were obtained in the face of very large increase over previous years in the cost of material and labour. For many years the employees of the Intercolonial Railway in my judgment, were inadequately paid. There may have been some excuse for keeping down the remuneration paid to the employees. Although we all recognize that the labourer is worthy of his hire, there may have been some slight excuse for the effort that was made to keep down the wages in the fact that the financial condition of the Intercolonial Railway was not satisfactory and that its earning power did not improve. At the very inception of the road, very low freight rates were established and there was never any change in an upward direction. The passenger rates were placed at a minimum and they have never been increased. These rates were established with a view to promoting trade and communication between the sea-board provinces and the inland provinces. At the same time, the increased accommodation and added luxuries of travel added to the cost of operating the road. Thus the burden of annual expenditure was gradually being raised higher and higher, while earning power was not increased to any material extent. The wages of the men were increased 10, 15 or 20 per cent at a time, but no corresponding increases in freight or passenger rates were made. The result was inevitable—there was no improvement in the balance sheet as the years passed by. During the year 1906, we had to make an effort to increase our passenger rates and our freight rates. During the past six years we have practically added $1,000,000 to the yearly wages of the employees of the Intercolonial Railway—that is, to the same number of employees and of the same general classes, we are paying about $1,000,000 more annually than we paid in the year 1900. In every department there has been an increase. I hope I shall not weary the House too much, but I feel it my duty to show in detail wherein these increases occur. And, while the traffic has been growing, we have not been receiving corresponding results, because of the fact that our expenses have been increasing, not only in the cost of wages but in the cost of material as well. For instance, take the matter of ties for the Intercolonial. In 1897 we paid 16 cents for cedar ties; in 1906 we were obliged to pay 20 cents.

Mr. J. D. REID. They were not bought by tender, though?

Mr. EMMERSON. By tender in every instance.

Mr. J. D. REID. No grafting?

Mr. EMMERSON. No, my hon. friend is too suspicious. Notices calling for tenders were posted throughout the country from one end of the railway to the other. I will read a list of items showing the increased prices that the Intercolonial has been obliged to pay in recent years:

COST OF SUPPLIES TO INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

——	1897.	Increase.	1906.
		Per cent.
Ties—cedar..	16 cts.	87	27–30–32½ cts.

Car wheels	8.75 to 9.25	46	$13.50
Spikes	1.93 to 2.15 kg	12½	$2.25

Rails have advanced in price about 50 per cent.

There has also been an increase in the matter of nails and all kinds of metal; material of that kind has very largely advanced in price. All labour employed in making sidings, excavations and so forth has increased by about 21 per cent during the three years between 1903 and 1906. I cite these instances out of many to show that in every class of material that is used in repairs, in sidings, in ballasting, there has been a substantial increase. In all building material, and in all work required to improve the road, there has been an increase in price to a marked degree. At the same time, along with these great increases in expenditure, there has not been a corresponding increase in the charges made against the patrons of the railway. Only this last summer was there a slight increase averaging about 10 per cent on the freight receipts of the railway; until that increase, there had not been for years an increase in the charges and revenues of the road.

Mr. HAGGART. Was there any increase on the passenger rates, as well as the freight rate.

Mr. EMMERSON. There was some readjustment in the passenger rates, there was some change for long distances beyond one hundred miles, and with respect to suburban rates.

Mr. HAGGART. You do not know how it affected the total?

Mr. EMMERSON. It was not a very material one. I am bound to say that there was a very marked increase in one direction and that was in respect to suburban rates out of cities like St. John and Halifax. For many years they had been receiving special recognition. They had been receiving rates that were far and away below the rates that were charged by the electric railways at any of the large centres. The Intercolonial Railway was carrying people out of St. John and between that point and Hampton, about 22 miles, for practically nothing and the same is true of Halifax. I see that my hon. friend (Mr. Daniel) laughs.

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, they are very far from carrying the people for nothing now, I can assure the minister.

Mr. EMMERSON. We are not charging now as much as the Canadian Pacific Railway are charging west from St. John. I am proud to say that the people of the maritime provinces have not made much complaint. Of course, when you have been carrying people for nothing, if you charge ever so little there will naturally be an outcry and that was the case at many points.

Mr. DANIEL. I understand the suburban rates on the Intercolonial Railway are higher than the suburban rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway out of St. John.

Mr. EMMERSON. I want to say to my hon. friend that I have it on the authority of the general traffic manager of the Intercolonial Railway, who was the special traffic manager in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, Mr. Tiffin, that even to-day, although we have increased the rates out of St. John and Halifax, we have not reached the standard which has been fixed by the Canadian Pacific Railway out of St. John or by the Grand Trunk Railway out of Montreal and other centres. I am speaking not of what I personally know but of what I have been advised by the general traffic manager. The instructions were to have the rates brought up to the standard of the other railways and to-day there will be found on the table of the House, or in the records of the House a return made to parliament showing the passenger rates of the Intercolonial with the corresponding rates charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway and Grand Trunk Railway. Even if we have increased the rates to some extent we have not yet reached the standard. There is not so great a difference as between the freight rates prevailing on these railways and the freight rates prevailing on the Intercolonial Railway, but there is to-day, notwithstanding our slight increase, a wide difference as between the passenger rates of the Intercolonial Railway and the passenger rates of these other railways.

I made the statement some weeks ago in the city of Toronto that the Intercolonial Railway was carrying freight not merely cheaper than any other railway in Canada, not merely cheaper than any railway on the continent of America, but at a lower rate than any railway in the known world and at a later date when some hon. member of this House challenged that statement I did not take up the time of the House in dealing with the question at the moment but I said that I had made the statement and that I would be prepared at a later date to prove the correctness of it. This, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me is an opportunity of which I should avail myself to demonstrate the absolute accuracy of the statement made by me in Toronto and repeated in general terms on the floor of this House at a later date. I have had prepared by the officials of the department a statement showing the charges on the Intercolonial Railway with respect to general merchandise, with respect to special merchandise, such as coal, and with respect to lumber, and I have had them collate information as to the charges made by other railways for similar classes of merchandise. I will read a letter from the deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, who, at my request, had this statement prepared as explanatory of the figures which I will bring to the notice of the House in a few moments and which I will ask to have recorded in 'Hansard,' so that we here may not be the only ones who know it but that the people of the country may realize just what the government system of railways is charging as compared with the charges made by the railway corporations in Canada. Mr. Butler, under date of February 18, writes me as follows:

Herewith I inclose you copy of the Canadian government railway system maximum freight mileage tariff on general merchandise, and also, a copy of the Grand Trunk Railway system standard freight mileage tariff. This Grand Trunk tariff is exactly the same as the Canadian Pacific tariff, from points in the eastern part of the country. The Canadian Pacific tariffs in the west are necessarily somewhat higher.

I have drawn red lines across at points where striking comparisons can be made, and on the face of the mileage opposite it.

I also inclose to you the local comparative rates on coal, in carload lots, on the Intercolonial Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway. In making the calculations, you will observe that I have stated in the right-hand column, the increase over the Intercolonial, in per cent.

I also inclose another comparative sheet, giving the rates on lumber, in carload lots. The G.B.B. tariff would apply to ordinary rates along the line of the railway, and the export tariffs, of course, to export products. The right hand column again gives the increased per cent rate of the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific over the Intercolonial rate.

In the double column of per cents, the left hand figures apply to the G.B.B. rate, and the right applies to the G.B.C. rate.

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) M. J. Butler.

I will only cite a few of these instances, not wishing to weary the House, and I shall ask, without reading them that these figures be incorporated in 'Hansard' if no hon. member objects.

Mr. HAGGART. It is a rule of the House which is strictly enforced that the statement cannot be placed on 'Hansard' unless it is read.

Mr. EMMERSON. Well, I will be very happy to read it.

One is the Canadian government railway system (Intercolonial Railway and Prince Edward Island divisions) maximum freight mileage tariff, to be applied when no special tariff is in effect, subject to the Canadian joint freight classification. There is also the maximum freight mileage tariff attached, and this shows the classes in cents on the 100 pounds and the distance. On distances not exceeding five miles the rates correspond to the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway rates, and over five miles and not over ten miles, they also correspond. Over ten miles, in classes in cents per 100 pounds, we have a classification on the Intercolonial Railway of ten to twenty miles, subdividing in ten mile distances.

Mr. HAGGART. This applies to the general traffic ?

Mr. EMMERSON. This applies to the general traffic, and I shall refer to the special items later. Our classification is ten miles and not over twenty miles; twenty miles and not over thirty miles, and so on, classifying in ten mile distances. On the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway they have a classification for five-mile distances; ten-miles and not over fifteen miles; fifteen miles and not over twenty miles; twenty miles and not over twenty-five miles, and so on. Their classification is divided in five-mile distances. Now, as an illustration of the rates charged on the Intercolonial Railway as compared with the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, we will take the ten to twenty-mile distances, and where we have 12 cents they have 14 cents; where we have 11 cents they have 12 cents; where we have 9 cents they have 11 cents; where we have 8 cents they have 9 cents; where we have 6 cents they have 7 cents, and so on. Then as the mileage increases the difference between the Intercolonial Railway rates and the Grand Trunk Railway and Canadian Pacific Railway rates increases.

Mr. HAGGART. To what extent?

Mr. EMMERSON. To any distance you like.

Mr. HAGGART. Compare the rates on the 30 to 40 miles distance.

Mr. EMMERSON. The Intercolonial has 16 cents (first-class) and the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway have 20 cents for the same class. The margin of difference is small in the beginning, but it increases gradually, widening out as you increase the mileage. On the 300 mile distance, our rate is 40 cents and theirs is 60 cents; where we charge 35 they charge 53; where we charge 30 they charge 45; where we charge 25 they charge 38; where we charge 20 they charge 30; where we charge 18 they charge 28; where we charge 16 they charge 21; where we charge 16 they charge 24; where we charge 14 cents they charge 20 cents, and so on.

Mr. J. D. REID. Do I understand the minister to say that as the distances increased the Canadian Pacific Railway increases their rates?

Mr. EMMERSON. As the distance increases our rates become proportionately lower than theirs. The margin of difference between the rates increases in a greater ratio as the distance increases until we get to the 700 miles when where we charge 52 cents (first-class) they charge $1.06; where we charge 46 cents they charge 93 cents; where we charge 39 cents they charge 89 cents; where we charge 26 cents they charge 53 cents; where we charge 24 cents they charge 51 cents; where we charge 20 cents they charge 38 cents; where we charge 20 cents they charge 39 cents; where we charge 22 cents they charge 40 cents; where we charge 18 cents they charge 37 cents. In every one of these classifications their rates are higher. It is in the interest of the country that the people should know what freight rates are being charged on the Intercolonial Railway, and I shall read them if necessary, but if the House does not object I will hand them into 'Hansard.'

Mr. EMMERSON.

Mr. BLAIN. Are these Intercolonial Railway rates in force at the present time?

Mr. EMMERSON. These are the rates in force. There are special rates for special commodities and special conditions, but these special rates prevail on the other railways as well as on the Intercolonial Railway, and there is a corresponding difference in favour of the Intercolonial Railway so far as the lowness of the rate is concerned.

Mr. HAGGART. Are the Intercolonial Railway special rates, which are so different from the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, not confined to a few articles such as lumber, coal and sugar?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, and the like special rates on the Intercolonial Railway are confined to a few articles like coal, lumber and steel billets.

Mr. J. D. REID. And hay?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, we have unusually special rates on hay sometimes.

Mr. HAGGART. What I asked was, if the exceptionally low Intercolonial Railway rates as compared with the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway rates are not confined to a few articles?

Mr. EMMERSON. No. The general merchandise rates on these other railways is from 50 per cent to 80 per cent and in many instances 100 per cent higher than the Intercolonial Railway rate. Now, I will show you with respect to special rates what the facts are and the difference is just as glaring having regard to the character of the freight that is carried.

Now, we will take the comparative rates charged on lumber in carload lots on the Intercolonial as compared with the rates charged on the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk, and they show that the rates charged on the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk are higher than either the local rate or the export rate charged on the intercolonial.

That shows what the government railway is doing with respect to the export trade of the country. We talk about increasing our export trade to Great Britain; we as a people are solicitous of encouraging that trade. We are inviting the people of Great Britain to purchase from us; our producers and manufacturers are seeking a market there, and the very moment they strike the government system of railways they are encouraged in that. But when they have to deal with the Grand Trunk or the Canadian Pacific Railway they are not encouraged certainly, on the contrary, they are taxed and hampered with respect to rates. Either the one or the other is true—either these systems of railway are charging the people too high a freight rate, or the Intercolonial is charging too low a rate. I have shown you this afternoon that the Intercolonial had a surplus for the last fiscal year of $100,000, after charging the rates of freight which I have recited to you, and after charging the passenger rate which I mentioned a few moments ago. If the Intercolonial during the past fiscal year, with the same amount of traffic and the same opportunities for business, had charged the standard rates exacted by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, instead of being able to show a surplus of $100,000 on the operations of the last fiscal year I would have been able to come before parliament and show a surplus of $2,500,000. And yet, the newspaper press of the country will carp and cavil at the results of the financial showing of the Intercolonial Railway; politicians on many platforms will complain with respect to the operation of this railway. Are not these complaints a result of the fact that the people of this country, even the public men and newspaper editors, are not informed as to the true conditions prevailing on that railway? I think it must be apparent, in the face of the rates charged on general merchandise, that the Intercolonial Railway, in promoting an interchange of traffic between the inland provinces and the provinces by the sea, is giving an advantage not merely to those eastern provinces, but to the producers and manufacturers of the inland provinces. I have taken occasion more than once to demonstrate this fact, that if these low rates had not prevailed on the Intercolonial Railway from the time of its inception to the present moment the manufacturers of Ontario and the producers of the inland provinces would not have found the profitable markets in the maritime provinces which they have found, and the advantage of which they have had during all these years. We sometimes hear the complaint made in this House, it has been made since this country has been a confederation, that the Intercolonial was built solely and wholly for the benefit of the people of the maritime provinces—that they were the only people who enjoyed the advantages of that railway and of the low rates of freight which prevailed upon it. Any one who will stop and consider will realize that honours are easy in that respect—will realize that the people of these central provinces are as much advantaged by these low rates as are the people in the sea-board provinces.

I want to call your attention to the rates charged on coal in carload lots on the Intercolonial as compared with the rates charged by the other railways. For a distance not exceeding five miles, the local comparative rates on coal in carloads is the same on the Intercolonial Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway. For a distance of over five miles and not over ten, the Intercolonial Railway charges forty cents per ton and the other railways fifty cents, or the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway charge 25 per cent more than the Intercolonial Railway. For a distance over ten and not over twenty miles, the excess charge by the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway over the Intercolonial Railway is 20 per cent and so on as shown in this tabulated statement:

LOCAL COMPARATIVE RATES ON COAL, CARLOADS.

There is not such a marked discrepancy in the charges on coal, but certainly there is a distinct margin in favour of the Intercolonial Railway, and I would note this fact that the through rate on coal to Lévis and Montreal is one-quarter of a cent per ton per mile or merely the cost of transporting it. There is not a railway in Canada, nay more there is not a railway on this continent, which is giving such favourable rates in the carriage of coal for such a distance as the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. DANIEL. Is there any difference in the rates between summer and winter ?

Mr. EMMERSON. No, the same rates prevail. Why are these rates made so low? They are made so low for the purpose of giving to the coal mines of Nova Scotia an advantage in competing with the American coal in markets as far west as Montreal and Brockville. I do not think they are able to compete at any point further west, if indeed so far. I think therefore I have demonstrated that the statement made by me in Toronto, namely, that the rates charged by the Intercolonial Railway are lower than those charged by any railway in Canada or in America, or indeed in the world, was an absolutely accurate statement, proved beyond doubt. We hear of the finacial success of the Australian railways which are government operated lines, but I have shown that in all instances the rates charged by the government railway system in Australia are 350 per cent higher than those charged by the Canadian government. If any body will take the trouble to compare the rates charged in Australia with those charged here, they will find that there is a very much wider margin between the Canadian government railway charges in Canada and the charges in Australia than there is between the Canadian government railway charges in Canada and those of the company operated railways in Canada. This is apparent when we look at the statistics. When the Intercolonial Railway, by the expenditure of a dollar, can earn $1.02, the railways in the United States can realize $1.88.

Mr. J. D. REID. Is that a comparison ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, as I demonstrated this afternoon, where, by the expenditure of $1, the Canadian government railway can earn $1.02, the Australian government railway can realize upwards of $1.88, and the company operated Canadian railways can realize upwards of $1.90. Need any one ask why it is the Intercolonial Railway does not have a surplus ? The surprising feature is that the deficits have not been larger. There have been surpluses on the Intercolonial Railway every year since its first inception. From the very moment the wheels of that railway began to turn round in its journeyings from the east to the west down to the present, there has been an annual surplus, but that surplus has not been shown in the public accounts or in the balance sheets of the Intercolonial Railway, nor is it found in the treasury of the country. It has been and is in the pockets of the people.

I have, I know, been the cause of wearying hon. gentlemen of this House in going over these dry details, and I can assure the House that I have not done so without some fatigue to myself. Adversity, I suppose, loves company, and we may both therefore feel that we are even in that respect. If I have wearied the House I have fatigued myself, but I felt it was necessary to bring to the notice of the country information regarding the operations of the Intercolonial Railway, and some of that information is new to hon. gentlemen. I have felt that this information should go on 'Hansard' and be read by the people and in this way be productive of some good.

Let me now turn from the consideration of dry facts and figures to a consideration of the prospects of the Intercolonial Railway. I have discussed its present ; you know its past; let us for a moment talk of its future.

The press of the country and the people of the country are discussing the Intercolonial Railway. The results we have attained are gratifying in contrast with some previous failures ; and I certainly may be pardoned if I speak with some pride of those results. I do not speak with personal pride, of course, for these results could not have been secured by myself, and I claim no particular credit for them. But I want to pay tribute to the army of officials and employees who are engaged on the Intercolonial Railway and each of whom has contributed his share to the successful results of the operations of the last eighteen months. I do claim credit for having had the foresight and judgment, in the first place, to secure as my deputy minister, Mr. Butler, who has no equal—or, at the very least, has no superior —on this continent. But even Mr. Butler with his experience and his knowledge could not have accomplished these results had he not had the faithful and cordial assistance of the other officials of the road. The Intercolonial Railway owes much to Mr. Pottinger, the general manager. The results in the mechanical department show that it owes much to Mr. Joughins, the very competent and efficient head of motive power. And in the person of Mr. Mackenzie, the chief engineer of the railway, the Intercolonial Railway has a faithful official who gives careful and efficient attention to all the duties of his office. Mr. T. C. Burpee's work is clearly evidenced in the figures which I read this afternoon. The reduction in the expenditure on maintenance of way is so marked as to amaze one who knows that these results have been accomplished in the one short year. Mr. Burpee is entitled to receive great credit for his splendid work in his department. I cannot take time to name all those who are deserving of credit, but I would not wish to leave out the name of Mr. Tiffin, the general traffic manager, whose thorough knowledge of the affairs of his department is recognized by railway experts everywhere, nor would I forget the district superintendent, whose efforts have been unsparing and effective. All the way down the line, from the highest official to the newest employees, all have worked unitedly and efficiently with but one aim, and that aim the good of the Intercolonial Railway. The good results have been due also to co-operation of the regular patrons of the road. In many instances we have had to change, to clamp, to repress, to limit, to restrict. Yet, there has been no great complaint; on the contrary there has been a general co-operation on the part of the employees and those who are called upon to patronize the road.

Now, so much for the present. In considering the position of the railway and its prospects for the future, we must deal with conditions as we find them. On former occasions I have dealt with the history of the Intercolonial Railway. I shall not do so this evening. But I ask your attention for a moment to the aims of the road, and, in discussing this point, I must refer briefly to one point in its history. I had the curiosity to read, the other day, the preface written by Sir Sandford Fleming to his report on the construction of the Intercolonial Railway. The name of Sir Sandford Fleming will be inseparably connected with the Intercolonial Railway. He it was who, as chief engineer, located the line, organized the work, superintended the construction and saw the road completed. The preface to his report was written on the 1st of July, 1876, the day the road was declared ready for operation. He said:

> The Intercolonial Railway is national in its objects and character.

And, while he had stated that the expenditures were made, the work completed and the road ready for operation, he goes on:

> Some further expenditure is still necessary but the railway is is a condition to be opened for traffic throughout its entire length.

And, after referring to his retirement from the position he had held, he says this is:

> —because of the completion of the work which realizes the national aspirations of half a century by bringing within a few hours the old fortress of Halifax and the older citadel of Quebec, and which must form an important section of the railway destined, ere long, to extend from east to west throughout the entire Dominion of Canada.

Mr. EMMERSON.

Therein, Sir Sandford Fleming recognized the Intercolonial Railway as a national work and as destined to be part of a great system that was to extend from ocean to ocean. His work was accomplished so far as that section is concerned. He had associated with him Mr. Collingwood Schreiber, C.M.G., who was assistant engineer from the inception of the work to its completion. The names of these two gentlemen must always be associated with the construction of the Intercolonial Railway. And it is most gratifying to know that these men who completed this great national work that realized the hopes and aspirations of our people during half a century although that work was completed over forty years ago, are still with us. I am sure every member of this House will join with me in the hope that they may long be spared to enjoy the honours which they so well merit, and which they have honestly and faithfully earned.

Now I say that the future of the Intercolonial is a matter of concern. Some advocate the giving away of the Intercolonial to another railway system. I have before me an editorial from the Halifax 'Herald' proposing that the Intercolonial be divided between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, the road from St. John to Halifax to be leased to the former and the northern section to Moncton, the Short line, the Pictou branch, the eastern extension and the Cape Breton Railway to go to the Grand Trunk. Now, the Halifax 'Herald' is the organ of the Conservative party in the province of Nova Scotia, and I did not suppose that it was the hope of the leader of the opposition to dispose of the Intercolonial. But if the Halifax 'Herald' truly voices his sentiments, and the sentiments of his party, then we must conclude that that party advocates the transference of that railway to other systems and its annihilation as a government operated system. We often see references in the newspapers to proposals which are being made by at least one of the great railway systems of Canada to secure not merely running rights over the Intercolonial between St. John and Halifax and other eastern points, but secure such a joint user of that railway as will make it a trunk line from Halifax to St. John. We all know that this parliament has pledged itself by solemn agreement and by enactment that at some future time, on the completion of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and when that company has constructed its lines from Winnipeg to Moncton, this country will give, for a consideration, certain running rights not defined over the Intercolonial from Moncton to Halifax and to St. John. What the character of those may be, the future alone must determine. The conditions which then prevail will govern the character of the rights and privileges that will be accorded them. But there are other systems which are anxious to secure certain privileges in connection with the Intercolonial. Now, giving my own individual opinion on the matter, I say that the Intercolonial Railway should never be parted with; that it should never be allowed to constitute any portion of a trunk line that would be controlled by a private corporation. The very moment one of these railways, whether it was the Canadian Northern, the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Pacific, secure such a use of the Intercolonial as would make it, for either one of them, a trunk line through Nova Scotia, that very moment the character of the Intercolonial must of necessity change, because making a trunk line for a private corporation means that such private corporation would enjoy a participation in its traffic, local and general. It would enable such a company at once to secure, between daylight and dark, every feeder to that Intercolonial, and in securing these feeders that company would absolutely wrest from the Intercolonial the traffic which it enjoys to-day. For every train that would pass upon that line operated as a part of a private corporation, there would be removed from that railway a corresponding train that had theretofore been operated by the Intercolonial. Gathering up the branch lines, securing trunk line rights over the Intercolonial, would enable any company to make of the Intercolonial a thing absolutely worthless as an asset of Canada. I am sure that in any discussion that may arise with regard to this matter, the people of Canada will remain true to this one idea, that no step shall be taken that would end in removing from the Intercolonial its feeders; its control over its sphere of influence—the country adjacent to the line extending through the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

I have felt that while the Intercolonial has had to combat many prejudices, and while there have been many influences against it, yet in view of the good it has done to the country, in view of the trade it has promoted, the day would come when the people of Canada, irrespective of section, would join in the desire to have the Intercolonial extended; would wish it to widen out its influence and absorb its feeders, either by leasehold or by some other means.

In the history of Canada, especially of western Canada, we note this striking fact that when you follow along the line of the Grand Trunk Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway, wherever there are independent branch lines, feeders to their main trunk lines, one by one they are gathered in so that after a time the main trunk lines absorb all these branch lines and they are all run as one system. I assume that that is a business course else these great corporations, governed by keen business men, would not have followed such a course. They would not have acquired these lines but they would have left them to run as independent connections of the main trunk line. I have felt that the government of Canada might some day be impelled by the force of public opinion, by the judgment of the people throughout the country, to secure to the Intercolonial Railway as against all other companies the branch lines which constitute the feeders to the Intercolonial Railway. What are these branch lines but instruments to gather up the traffic in the adjacent country side and hand it over to the trunk line system—the Intercolonial Railway. In so doing these branch lines are favouring and contributing to the advancement of the sections and communities which they are supposed to accommodate; nay, more than that they are contributing materially to the growth and expansion of the traffic of the Intercolonial Railway and therefore I say that I believe the day will come when a demand will go out from the people of Canada in favour of the absorption of these lines. I would, Sir, not be content with that. I would feel that in order to clasp closer together those isolated communities and to draw them closer to the communities of the west it would be desirable that the Intercolonial Railway should penetrate farther west, that it should reach the industrial centres of Canada and especially that it should reach the great industrial centre of central Canada—I refer to the city of Toronto. I look forward, Sir, also to this: There are railways starting out from the extreme west reaching forward eagerly and anxiously to an eastern seaport. Many of them are concentrating their efforts upon reaching the great city of Quebec and there reaching a great ocean port, but a port which is closed for many months of the year and I would anticipate that at some not far distant day these railways, converging at the great city of Quebec, will be reaching still farther east, so that they may find, during the winter months, open water upon which the ships would sail that would take the traffic that our railways would gather up in the west and carry to the east. That day may come, I hope it will come—nay, more, I believe it will come and when it does it will settle all speculation as to the future of the Intercolonial Railway. It will for all time settle the question of the value of the Intercolonial Railway as an asset of the Dominion of Canada, and it will certainly bear out this fact, which, I have at least claimed as a fact, that the Intercolonial Railway is a great national asset, that it is of value to the people of Canada both east and west, that it has served its purpose and its mission in the past and that it still has a purpose and a mission to perform and I am sure that when we reach that stage there will be no sectional differences over the matter and that we will all see eye to eye with reference to the manifest destiny of the Intercolonial Railway. Now, Sir, I feel that I have but imperfectly presented the case of the Department of Railways and Canals. I know I have taken up very much of the time of the House in so doing, but I hope the House will pardon me in view of my desire to simply place before the House and the country the information which I thought to be essential to enable the people of the country to form a judgment as to the value of these great public undertakings.

Hon. J. G. HAGGART (South Lanark). Mr. Speaker, I will endeavour at least to be as concise as the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Emmerson) in the remarks which I have to make in answer to the statement which he has presented in reference to his department. In dealing with the subject he has divided it into four heads: First, the canal system, next the Railway Commission, next a description of the National Transcontinental Railway and finally a statement of the position of the Intercolonial Railway. Judging from the detailed remarks of the hon. minister in reference to the Intercolonial Railway what would be the length of the speech that the hon. gentleman would have made this evening if that road had reached from Montreal to the coast and if his aspirations were to be realized what pleasure it would give us to listen to a detailed account of the operations of the railway from Halifax to Vancouver? The hon. gentleman began with the canal system and I will deal with the various subjects in the order in which he took them up. He took us first to the Sault Ste. Marie canal and gave us a description of the work that is being done there. He told us that at the entrance and outlet of the canal there was a little work done that would be completed next season. But, he did not give us an account of the enormous traffic which has been passing through that canal. That fact is in significant contrast to his elaboration of detail in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. From there he took us down to the Welland canal and he stated that the 14-foot navigation was about completed, or was completed, that the works at Port Colborne were in progress and he said that the statement in reference to the expenditure upon the basin had been presented to the House in the report of the Department of Public Works. He told us that the Trent Valley canal would be finished in a couple of years, that the portion from Healey's Falls to the Bay of Quinté would cost in the neighbourhood of $3,000,000, that the portion from Lake Simcoe to the Georgian bay would cost about $1,500,000 and that for an expenditure of $4,500,000 we may expect in a few years to have completed the Trent river system of navigation. He then took us down along the St. Lawrence and stated the expenditure that had been made upon the Galops rapids. Notwithstanding the enormous expenditure on that channel, an expenditure which we on this side of the House denounced year after year, not a boat runs down that channel to-day. But the minister did not tell us that. He told us that on the north shore, immediately in the neighbourhood of the Galops we have a channel of our own which cost us $1,500,000. That was a useless expenditure, and one for which there was no need. For $50,000 you could have removed an island at the head of the canal, and that would have given us ample navigation. But, says the minister the channel we have made is in our own waters. Well, I had an idea that under the treaty of Washington the American side of the river was just as free to us as the Canadian side is to the Americans, and that we have as much right to use their channel as they have to use ours. There we have nearly $1,500,000 thrown away. The hon. gentleman also told us that for a total expenditure of $23,000,000 during the last ten years, we have a complete system of navigation from Lake Superior to Montreal, and, he proceeds to argue that the deficit on the Intercolonial is not quite equal to the $23,000,000 we have spent on the canals. Of course the object of that argument is to endeavour to mitigate the monstrosity of the Intercolonial Railway deficits from year to year. He tells us that there are deficits on the Intercolonial Railway, it went into the pockets of the people of the maritime provinces, who had just as much right to the money as the people of the Dominion had to the expenditure of $23,000,000 on the canals. Well, we all understand that argument.

The hon. gentleman next passed on to the Grand Trunk National Transcontinental Railway which is under his charge. It is a work of transcendant importance to the people of this country, and yet the only information he deigned to give us about it was that there were 1,300 men employed on it, and that taking that number of men together with the number employed on the Intercolonial Railway and on the canals, there were 13,000 employees under his direction. Surely the people of Canada are entitled to some information about the Transcontinental Railway. Surely we should know if it is only going to cost us the $13,000,000 that the Prime Minister said it would cost, or, whether it will cost more. The surveys are now completed, many of the contracts are let, and sufficient information is in the possession of the department to enable the government to tell us what expenditure the country will be liable for. The hon. gentleman should have told us what will be the length of the mountain section, and whether it will be 500 miles as the government said, or 800 miles as alleged per contra.

Mr. TAYLOR. He was ashamed to tell.

Mr. EMMERSON. I referred you to the report.

Mr. HAGGART. The report does not show whether the cost will be as the Prime Minister said, or whether it will be greater, the report does not show whether the line from Quebec to Moncton is shorter and with easier gradients than the Intercolonial Railway. There is no information in the report which is of any use whatever to the people of Canada.

As my time is limited I must pass on to the Intercolonial, the pet subject of the minister. The time has passed for encomiums upon Sandford Fleming and Mr. Schreiber, and half a dozen other wonderful gentlemen whom the minister has dealt with so fully to-night, that you would think they had departed this life and that he was sounding their praises.

Mr. FOSTER. A funeral oration on them.

Mr. EMMERSON. I was giving credit to whom credit is due.

Mr. HAGGART. Let us get at the bald facts about the Intercolonial. The minister said the capital expenditure on the road in 1896 was $55,000,000, and that to-day it is $82,000,000 or $27,000,000 more. Where has that $27,000,000 gone ? What have we got for it. His predecessor in office stated that it would realize to the Dominion more than the interest charge upon it. Is that true ? The ordinary way of calculating the condition of a railway is to make some allowance for the interest on capital expended. The Grand Trunk, the Canadian Pacific Railway, and every other railway provides interest for capital expended which is the first charge upon the road. We can borrow money at 3½ per cent, and 3½ per cent on the $82,000,000 capital account of the Intercolonial means $2,750,000 a year for interest.

First of all, then, before you show a surplus, you should charge up that amount for interest. We have the promise of this government, through its representative in the House, that the difference between $55,000,000 and $82,000,000, which we have expended on capital account on that road, would be returned to us. Then, before we attempt to show profits on the road, we should charge up three and a half per cent on say $20,000,000, or about $700,000 a year. But the hon. gentleman said not a word of this. It is a magnificent asset, he says, and it will be greater still when the road is extended to Vancouver, and when it takes within its grasp all the different feeding railroads in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. What a hint this is to these impecunious railroads in the different provinces, that it may be the policy of this government to buy them up. What a fine election fund the hon. gentleman would be able to provide from a transaction of that kind.

Mr. EMMERSON. Suspicion haunts the guilty mind.

Mr. HAGGART. The Drummond County Railway would not be in it. For building up the eastern provinces of this Dominion and making them content with their lot there would be nothing like purchasing all the feeding lines of the Intercolonial Railway. We have learned how the capital of these railroads is being supplemented in other ways than by a vote of this House. After municipal and other assistance has been granted to them to the fullest extent possible, the government winks at the rolling stock of the government railway being used by them. The Minister of Railways makes the statement boldly and openly that it is with the consent of the government that the whole of the rolling stock of these different lines in the maritime provinces, and I suppose also in the lower part of Quebec, is provided by the Intercolonial, while at the same time over 2,500 of our cars are wandering about the United States, all the way from California up to the Maine boundary. What a state of affairs. What a cause of congratulation to the country upon the management of that road.

Now, let us deal with the hon. gentleman's surplus. The gross earnings of the road in 1905-6 were $7,643,829, an increase over the previous year of $899,690. The gross working expenses were $7,587,914, a decrease of over $1,000,000 ; showing a surplus, as the hon. gentleman says, of $61,915.54. We did not hear a word from him about the capital expenditure ; he never mentioned it. Yet it amounted to $3,765,170, and every dollar of that except $300,000, which was expended for the St. Mary's bridge, ought to be charged to revenue. That would show a deficit upon this road of over $3,400,000. That is exactly the position of the matter. What do the people of this country care about investing their money in capital expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway ? What they want to know is how the money which is taken out of their pockets is expended. They believe that capital expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway should cease. Yet there has been a drain on the resources of the country on that account of over $3,000,000 a year since these hon. gentlemen went into power. What possible asset to the people of Canada has been the expenditure on capital account on the Intercolonial for the last ten years ? When I was managing the Intercolonial in 1896 and in the years preceding, I insisted that the expenditure on capital account should cease, as a capital expenditure, and that it should be charged to the revenue of the road. For the three or four years prior to 1897, when the control of the road came into the hands of the predecessor of the hon. gentleman, the largest expenditure on capital account in any year was $150,000. Now it averages over $3,500,000 a year.

The hon. gentleman plumes himself on his management of the Intercolonial Railway. Let us look at the facts of the case. According to his statement, the expenditure per mile on that road, not including the expenditure on capital account, is in the neighbourhood of $5,200 per year. The earnings of the road are just the same, $5,200. Add the $3,500,000 to the expenditure, and you will see that the cost of running that road is in the neighbourhood of $7,500 per mile per year, or nearly double the cost of running the Canadian Pacific Railway, and largely in excess of the cost of running the Grand Trunk Railway. The expenditure per mile of the Canadian Pacific Railway is in the neighbourhood of $4,500 per year, and that of the Grand Trunk Railway in the neighbourhood of $5,000, while the expenditure on this well-managed road is over $7,000. What are the receipts per train mile? For an expenditure on the Intercolonial of $1.02 per train mile, it realizes $1.02. The cost of running trains on the Grand Trunk Railway is about the same, $1.02 per train mile, while it realizes $1.46 per train mile.

It costs the Canadian Pacific Railway per train mile to run their road $1.31 and they realize $2.10. The hon. gentleman states, and states truly, that the average receipts for running a railway in the United States per train mile is in the neighbourhood of $1.85. Well, if we had that from the Intercolonial Railway we would have a handsome surplus. Why is it that we do not receive that? Why is it that the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway is double or perhaps two-thirds more than that on the Grand Trunk Railway. Are the wages dearer? Is the material supplied dearer than what the Grand Trunk Railway pay for it? Is the coal dearer? Here is a road with tracks running into the coal mines, and yet it costs as much per mile to run it as it does to run the Grand Trunk Railway from one end of its system to the other. The amount required to run a locomotive on the Intercolonial Railway is exactly the same per mile, $1.02, as on the Grand Trunk Railway. Oh but, says the hon. gentleman, we give our people cheaper freight than any other railway on the continent of America. True there are some things the Intercolonial Railway carries cheaper. That road carries sugar from Halifax to Moncton, for the benefit of a factory there, and distributes it throughout the country perhaps cheaper than any other railway would charge. It carries the coal from the mines perhaps cheaper than other railways would charge. But for the ordinary freight and passenger fares, the charges are very little different. I took the trouble to look into this, and I found that for all distances up to 60 miles, while there may be a little difference in the first class, as you go down there is very little difference. Then for all local traffic—that is less than 60 miles travel—the Intercolonial Railway gets as fair prices as the Grand Trunk Railway or the Canadian Pacific Railway and on the same classification. The hon. gentleman says that this year the increase in rates has been 10 per cent over preceding years. Well, when I was on the Intercolonial Railway, I looked into the freight system, and I found that the people of the maritime provinces were paying fair prices for the transport of their goods except in a couple of exceptional cases. For instance from St. John to Halifax, the rates were a little less perhaps than on some other roads. But, as a rule, the local charges on passengers who used that road were a fair remuneration. Here is a road which can purchase supplies cheaper than any other railway in the country can. If the system of tendering which was adopted when I was in the office, is still in force on the Intercolonial Railway, they can buy cheaper than any other railway. People like to sell to the Intercolonial Railway. We could get men to work for us without striking, and get them at as low rates as the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other railway. But we perhaps had not a superabundance of men. We were not driven to the desperate necessity of carrying some counties in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick by having a supply of labour on the road largely in excess of its requirements.

I was amused at the hon. gentleman trying to justify his charging to capital account the property built to replace that destroyed by fire at Moncton. I asked him had he the property insured, and he said no, that the government found it cheaper to insure its own property. But fancy the extraordinary system of charging to capital account instead of the revenue the building put up in the place of those destroyed by fire. After a statement of that kind, we may look for an expenditure next year, chargeable to capital account, caused by the erection of the buildings and machinery to replace those destroyed, of $1,000,000, and that will take a good round sum out of the receipts of the road.

In the minister's statement of the last six months of the fiscal year ending the 31st of March next, he gave a glowing estimate which showed an anticipated excess of receipts over of between $400,000 and $450,000. I did not hear him say whether he included in that the expenditure on account of capital. In fact we do not know what this capital expenditure is. It is very easy, as the late Mr. Alexander Mackenzie said again and again, keeping a capital account, but that simply gives the officers of the Intercolonial Railway a means of covering up their extravagance. If the receipts do not meet the expenditure, then it is the easiest thing in the world to charge against capital account a locomotive or anything else that is purchased, or any expenditure made for the purpose of lengthening the yards, or for repairs or additions to sheds, or in fact anything at all. But why should there be a capital account in the case of this road which has been running for thirty years ? I can understand that when we purchase a road like the Drummond Railway or the Eastern Railway, the cost of that purchase would be fairly chargeable to capital. But by this system of charging all sorts of expenditure to capital account, you are simply deceiving the people.

The hon. gentleman was very lugubrious in depicting the woeful state of affairs which might result, should an arrangement be made with some railway companies for the purpose of giving them running rights over the Intercolonial Railway. The first thing they would do, he said, would be to gobble up the feeding lines of the Intercolonial Railway. Just fancy a live railway company, with running rights over the Intercolonial Railway, gobbling up those feeding lines, not one of which pays a dividend of 1 per cent in ten years. We had the hon. gentleman's predecessor denouncing the arrangement between the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, by which the latter were granted running rights over the Intercolonial Railway to Halifax, as something very iniquitous. He could not understand how any government could be so stupid as to enter into such an arrangement. Well, I have never heard that that arrangement has been terminated. There was a rumour in the newspapers the other day that the Canadian Pacific Railway are insisting upon running rights from St. John to Halifax. It appears that they are compelled, by arrangement with the Dominion government, to have their steamers, after leaving St. John, call at the port of Halifax. They and the Allans company have a contract with the post office department by which each receives one-half of the subsidy given for the mail service between this and the old country. They found it so disadvantageous, on account of arrangements they had made with the imperial government to carry their mail, in a certain fixed time, from Hong Kong and other places on the Chinese coast in which the imperial government are interested to Liverpool, to call in at Halifax, that I understand that they came to this government and said : We shall be forced by necessity even to abandon the subsidy you give and sail entirely from the port of St. John, unless we can make a running arrangement with the Intercolonial Railway under which we shall have the right to see to it that our passengers and freight are promptly shipped to Halifax. I asked the hon. minister if there had been an arrangement made with the Canadian Pacific Railway in reference to that, and what arrangement exists to-day. We have not been furnished with the information. I think the hon. gentleman should have given us the information.

Now, in reference to the benefit accruing to the maritime provinces from the building of the Intercolonial : The hon. gentleman dwelt upon this point and explained it pretty fully and perhaps truly. There is one gratifying result from the building of the Intercolonial Railway and Prince Edward Island Railways. Strange as it may seem in view of the report we sometimes hear, the railway traffic in the maritime provinces has nearly doubled—both passenger and freight—within the last ten years. This is local traffic ; the through traffic has not proportionately increased. We built an elevator in Halifax and another at St. John. We gave exceptionally low rates on the Intercolonial Railway that through grain might reach these places, but they had no effect in diverting grain to the Intercolonial Railway route. By far the greater portion of the increasing receipts of the Intercolonial Railway comes out of the people of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. It is a fair field for railway enterprise and they are doing a magnificent business there. Now, I believe, to a certain extent, in state ownership of railways. Keep out political and grafting influences, and why should not the state run a railway even more cheaply than a private corporation can do. Yet, we find that the cost per mile upon the Intercolonial Railway is two-thirds more than the cost of running the Canadian Pacific Railway. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Emmerson) deny it ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Unquestionably.

Mr. HAGGART. Does the hon. gentleman know the cost of a train mile on the Canadian Pacific Railway ?

Mr. EMMERSON. I gave the exact figures last year making a comparison of the cost of the Intercolonial Railway with the cost on the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway and showing that the Intercolonial Railway was run at less cost than either of them.

Mr. HAGGART. I venture to say that the expenditure upon the Intercolonial Railway, without taking any account of capital expenditure is $5,286 per mile. The receipts are nearly the same. If you were to add a fair allowance for interest on invested capital and also the sums which are now yearly charged to capital but which should be paid out of current account, the cost of running the road would be over $7,500 a mile, which is two-thirds more than it costs the Canadian Pacific Railway, and a good deal in excess of the Grand Trunk. These figures ought to be furnished by the department. The figures that they do furnish show the operating expenses. Well, the operating expenses on the Grand Trunk were $1.02 per train mile, and the earnings $1.46. The expenditure on the Canadian Pacific Railway per train mile, was $1.31, the cost being relatively high, because of the large expenditure on coal for the line north of Lake Superior and other parts at a great distance from coal mines. The receipts on the Canadian Pacific Railway were $2.10 per train mile. The Intercolonial Railway expenditure per train mile, as calculated from figures given in Mr. Butler's own statement was $1.02 and earnings about the same. Now, why should it cost as much to run a locomotive on the Intercolonial Railway as on the Grand Trunk Railway? If you were to add an allowance for capital expenditure, the cost per train mile on the Intercolonial Railway would be $1.52. My contention is that the road is overmanned. The hon. gentleman stated with a good deal of pride—and certainly it is a matter of credit to Mr. Butler, the head of the department—that, with a less train mileage from last year, the road has earned $800,000 more. The same is true of the passenger train mileage. Altogether he shows an increase in gross earnings of $899,000, and a decrease in working expenses of over $1,000,000. Last year I pointed out that there were a lot of useless trains upon the road. What has become of the train that the hon. gentleman said last year was a paying concern?—a train between Halifax and Montreal, starting within fifteen minutes of the Canadian Pacific Railway train and arriving about the same time, competing with the Canadian Pacific Railway for passengers, although the Canadian Pacific Railway train does not stop at nearly so many way stations. Why, of course, the passengers were picked up by the Canadian Pacific Railway. One reason for the decrease in the train mile expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway is the taking off of that train——

Mr. EMMERSON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) will have to correct that statement. That train ran last year the same as the preceding year.

Mr. HAGGART. But does it run now?

Mr. EMMERSON. Yes, and it will run this year. It is a splendid train. It is the pride of Canada.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman spoke about the sumptuousness of the trains on the Intercolonial Railway. Well, they ought to be sumptuous. They have cost the people of this country between $25,000,000 and $27,000,000 within the last ten years. The capital spent upon the road ought to provide a line of locomotives covering nearly the distance between Montreal and Halifax. I notice that all the additions made this year—we have not here a statement of the increase in the number of locomotives chargeable to revenue account, but it is very small—all this goes to capital account for the purpose of allowing the minister to make a nice showing, and he continues the trains——

Mr. EMMERSON. The trains are paying well.

Mr. HAGGART. Trains starting within 15 minutes of each other, express trains running from Montreal to Halifax——

Mr. EMMERSON. The trains are crowded.

Mr. HAGGART. That is a nice way to manage a road. Could not you make one of them an annex of the other, and have only one train carrying passengers through? However, I find that I may be getting as lengthy as the hon. gentleman was in his speech. I have not much more to say. But I must say that it was a disappointing statement in reference to the Transcontinental. But it was a long speech, I suppose that, like a kiss, its strength must be measured by its length. If we measure his speech by its length it was a very eloquent one. But seriously, what a laughing stock the parliament of this country must be to the people. On a subject in which there is so much interest taken as the Transcontinental Railway, the minister who is in charge of it has not a word to say. We have no information in reference to it. We have full details of the price that is paid to every fireman on the Intercolonial, the fullest possible information in reference to the prices of supplies, but there is not one word about the most important fact. He did bring out one new thing to-day, he says that the reason the Intercolonial lost on its passenger and freight rates was because it had to pay so much higher wages. To-day we have had for the first time a comparison between the freight rates on the Intercolonial and those of the Grand Trunk, but we had no comparison of the cost per mile and the receipts per mile between the Intercolonial and other railways. We had a comparison with the train earnings per mile on the Australian roads. But the data to enable the people to judge as to whether the railroad is run properly or not, is the expense per train mile and the receipts upon it, and the expense per train mile, as I have already said, is largely in excess of that of any other road I know of upon this continent, and the receipts are comparatively small. I have nothing more to say, Mr. Speaker, I have done my duty in pointing out to the people of this country the immense expenditures that have been made upon the Intercolonial. We do not begrudge an expenditure in the maritime provinces to any extent. We are not local in our feelings in this section of the country. If the expenditure is made for the benefit of the country we are willing to make it. As long as there is a surplus the people are entitled to their fair share, and the smaller provinces to more than their fair share. But we want to see the expenditure kept within bounds, and that is what the people of this country will demand from us.

Mr. H. J. LOGAN (Cumberland). I am going to follow the example of my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) who has just taken his seat and make my remarks very brief, for two reasons: First, because the hour is late, and secondly, because the magnificent speech of the Minister of Railways and Canals has exhausted the subject so thoroughly, and so well set forth the conditions existing at the present time, that anything I might attempt to add would be, I am afraid, like trying to paint the lily. I want to congratulate the Minister of Railways and Canals, not only upon his speech, but upon his success in lifting the Intercolonial out of the slough of despond in which it seemed to have fallen. He has not taken perhaps sufficient credit to himself, but he has given credit, and I join with him in giving credit, to his deputy minister and to the heads of departments. But I think credit also should be given to the people of the maritime provinces through which the Intercolonial runs, who have joined in most cases, loyally in assisting the minister in the effort he has made to better the condition of the finances of that road. I know that in the constituency in which I live and through which the Intercolonial passes, the people were desirous of giving the Minister of Railways and Canals a fair chance to put the Intercolonial upon a proper business and financial basis; and I believe they have put up perhaps with some hardship, a hardship which I trust will now be removed, for the purpose of assisting him and his department in an effort to preserve the present status of that road. We realize in the maritime provinces that we are only a small portion of the Dominion of Canada, and if there were to be a continuance of deficits every year, sometimes going up into the millions, it would only be a question of time when the rest of the country would get tired of this kind of work, and would insist that the Intercolonial be transferred to some private corporation. Perhaps in the maritime provinces, Mr. Speaker, we are too sensitive in reference to the Intercolonial. When it was built we regarded it as a bond of confederation, to-day we look upon it in some light as the pet child of those provinces. We desire that the ownership of that road shall be continued in the people of Canada, but we desire that it shall be operated in such a way as not to involve deficits. We do not, however, care to see any huge surpluses on that road, because we believe that it never was intended to be a dividend paying institution, but, as I have just said, a bond between the upper provinces and the lower provinces of Canada. The natural markets for the people of the maritime provinces are the New England States. This road was built to some extent to divert trade into an unnatural channel, to turn it away from the United States and direct it to the upper provinces of Canada.

It is a remarkable tribute to the skill of the Minister of Railways and his staff of officials that a road which, year before last, had a deficit of $1,700,000 and over, at the end of the last fiscal year had a surplus of $50,000 or $60,000. During the first six months of the present fiscal year the surplus has been the largest in the history of the Intercolonial, namely, something over $300,000. I desire to congratulate the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals upon this condition of affairs, but I desire especially to congratulate him upon the fact that after having unfolded the book of this road of having made such a showing that the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals, the expert of the opposition upon railway matters, upon rising in his place in this House is not able to make one single charge against the management of my hon. friend or to contradict in one particular his statement, but, in fact, contents himself in the course of his speech by making the bald assertion that the expenditure per train mile on the Intercolonial is greater than it is on the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway, although he had listened here, as the rest of us had listened, last year and this to the Minister of Railways and Canals presenting facts which show conclusively that the expenditure per train mile upon the Intercolonial Railway is not greater than upon either of these roads. I do desire, therefore, to congratulate the Minister of Railways and Canals upon the fact that the conditions are of such a roseate character on the Intercolonial Railway under his management. The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals lays down the doctrine that there should not be any further capital expenditure upon the road. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that I need to appeal to the people of the maritime provincese, but I might very well appeal to the people of the most remote provinces of the west and they would agree with me in saying that it is necessary in this growing time to make capital expenditures on the Intercolonial Railway as it is necessary to expend hundreds of millions of dollars upon capital account upon other great railways of Canada and the United States. We in the maritime provinces do not desire that there shall be useless expenditures upon capital account, but there are certain improvements that ought to be made to the Intercolonial Railway at the present time. Such expenditure will be in the interest not only of the people of that part of Canada, but will be in the interest of the people of all Canada, who are the owners of this road. In the first place I think myself that the first capital expenditure which we should undertake is in acquiring the branch lines which will act as feeders to the Intercolonial Railway. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals has touched upon this question to some extent, but he has not stated it as strongly as I am endeavouring to state it now. I think it is in the interest of the road that we should secure these feeders the same as it seems to be in the interest of railways owned by corporations. Take, for instance, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway; wherever they acquire a trunk line of railway they immediately seek to secure the feeders of that railway, and such, I submit, should be the policy of the government in reference to the government railway. My hon. friend the ex-minister has spoken of the branch roads as not paying one per cent in ten years. There are branch roads that I am acquainted with that are paying handsome dividends every year and have been for years past. These roads should be controlled by the Intercolonial Railway which would derive greater benefit from their operation than by merely taking the traffic from them, as is done at the present time.

I would like to extend an invitation to my good and genial friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals to come down over the Intercolonial Railway. I would ask my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals to provide him with an observation car. Let him sit in the rear of that car and come down over the road and see it, and if he does he will never make such a speech again as he has made here to-night. The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals does not apparently know what he is talking about. There is a tradition down there that upon one occasion when the hon. gentleman was Minister of Railways and Canals he went over the road on a tour of inspection, and it is said travelled in a train at the record speed of any train that had ever gone over that system. I wish he would come back, look around and see the road, which, when he was operating it, was almost grass-grown but which to-day is a great avenue of activity. I wish he could come down and see the road which has almost doubled its rolling stock and which has undergone many changes for the better since it was operated by my hon. friend, and operated, I am afraid, largely in the interest not of the Intercolonial Railway, but of the Canadian Pacific Railway. My hon. friend has referred to the arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway. As a matter of fact, under his administration, the best business in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick was being taken from the Intercolonial Railway and handed over to the Canadian Pacific Railway under the arrangement which he made with that company. Imagine trying to operate that road with every agent having directions in his hands that said to him: You shall not try to get business for the Intercolonial Railway in competition with the Canadian Pacific Railway; you must allow shippers to send their goods as they please. The Canadian Pacific Railway had their agents in every hamlet coaxing the people to send their goods by the Canadian Pacific Railway, while the agents of the Intercolonial Railway were shackled and tied, unable to canvass for their own road. With such a condition of affairs existing is it any wonder that stagnation existed until 1896 when that arrangement was done away with?

Mr. HAGGART. Was not the arrangement that they should not discriminate between the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway with respect to goods when they passed beyond the Intercolonial Railway?

Mr. LOGAN. I am referring to the direction which was given to the agents of the Intercolonial Railway and we know that they were not allowed to canvass for west-bound trade for their own road. There is no question about it. My hon. friend has referred to the fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway are asking for running rights over the Intercolonial Railway. Personally I believe that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be given running rights over the Intercolonial Railway. I believe that they should be able to get their trains into the city of Halifax and to that magnificent harbour, but I do not believe that they should be given the whole of the Intercolonial Railway. I do not believe that we should make such an arrangement as would allow them not only to send their trains to Halifax, but to take the whole cream of the trade of the provinces away from the government railway. The proposition, as I understand it, and I am not going to discuss it, because I promised not to speak at any great length, is that the Canadian Pacific Railway shall have the right to do station to station business in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia on what is the fat portion of the Intecolonial Railway, while the government would have to take the lean part from Moncton away up north and do the best it could with that part of the road. In other words, we would be handing over to the Canadian Pacific Railway the best of our business and trying to operate the most expensive part of our line. I do not think that unless we receive a very large remuneration it is in the interest of the people of Canada that such an arrangement should be made with the Canadian Pacific Railway, but I do believe it is in the interest of Nova Scotia that we should make some arrangement with that railway by which they shall have running rights for their train into the city of Halifax. It is a matter of detail. On general principles I believe we should give them running rights, but that we should not hand over the best of the business of the Intercolonial Railway to the Canadian Pacific Railway or to any other railway. I was very glad to hear my hon. friend making the argument that we in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are not beggars before the treasury of Canada, or, in other words, that we do not have such exceedingly low freight rates. My hon. friend has made the statement that with a few exceptions we pay as high freight rates in the maritime provinces as the people do anywhere in Canada. The only exceptions which he made were the rates in regard to the carriage of sugar to a refinery at Moncton which he said were made lower. Once more, did my hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) put his foot in it, because there is no sugar refinery in the city of Moncton, and therefore there could not be any special rates to the sugar refinery there. My hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) has evidently been asleep since 1896; he has not taken measure of the progress of the country since then. Let him, I repeat, come down to the maritime provinces and see the conditions as they are to-day, and then he will not make such ridiculous statements as he has contributed to the debate to-night.

Now, my hon. friend (the ex-Minister of Railways) has made a very important statement and that is that the Intercolonial purchases its supplies as cheaply, if not more cheaply, than do company-owned railways. That is an excellent recommendation for the Minister of Railways and the administration of his department. But, the ex-Minister (Mr. Haggart) said that on the intercolonial he could get labour as cheap, if not cheaper, than could be obtained on any other railroad. I was sorry to hear that he held such a poor opinion of the workingmen in the maritime provinces, and I am thankful to say that the present Minister of Railways is not looking to get cheaper labour than can be obtained by another railroad; his policy is to give a fair day's pay for a fair day's work, and so he has increased the wages of the Intercolonial employees all along the line.

Mr. Speaker, before I conclude I want to make one or two criticisms of the Intercolonial and my first criticism will be that the road has not enough rolling stock. To-day, the business of the maritime provinces is almost stagnant for want of railway transportation facilities. I know that condition prevails throughout Canada to some extent, but I think it is to be found in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in a more aggravated form than elsewhere. Our people have not cars to move their hay and other produce; coal cannot be forwarded, and stored; in the sheds all along the line are all kinds of freight waiting for transportation. Surely, in view of the encouraging financial condition of the road, as shown by the minister to-night, we ought now be able to secure sufficient rolling stock to alleviate to some reasonable extent the existing condition. We need more motive power on the road, to handle the trains; we need more passenger cars and we need more frequent trains for the accommodation of the passenger traffic. The people of the maritime provinces, have as I have said, joined in helping the Minister of Railways to better the finances of the Intercolonial; and they deserve some consideration in return. Certain trains were taken off the schedule some few years ago, which I think the road can well afford to run to-day. We had formerly, between Moncton and Halifax, two local trains, known as No. 1 and No. 2, which were cancelled in the interests of economy. Since then the service has been defective. The people have been patient, they have had to use through trains for local accommodation, and of course during the winter months these through trains often do not run on schedule time. I admit, that when the through trains are very late, specials are put on, but nevertheless a great deal of inconvenience has been caused to the people of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and I hope the Minister of Railways will now see his way clear to restore that local service. I trust also, that the government will come to my view, and that they will secure the branch lines connecting with the Intercolonial as feeders for that system. I trust that the government will equip the Intercolonial with the very best rolling stock that money can buy, that engines of the most modern type will be secured, and that the people of the maritime provinces will be provided with the passenger service to which they are entitled. Mr. Speaker, I am following one good example of the hon. member (Mr. Haggart) in being brief, and therefore I conclude with again congratulating the Minister of Railways on the very satisfactory statement he has been able to present to the House, and I express the fervent hope that he may be enabled to go on and still further improve the Intercolonial system and the service upon it.

Mr. J. D. REID (Grenville). Mr. Speaker, at this late hour I shall not trouble the House with any lengthened remarks in reply to the statement of the Minister of Railways. The hon. gentleman divided his department into four branches, but I shall confine my remarks largely to his statement with regard to the canals. He stated that from 1896 to the present we had expended $24,000,000 on canals capital account, and amongst this was an expenditure of $1,265,000 on the Cornwall canal. But the hon. gentleman did not tell us how much had been mis-spent on that canal; he did not tell us that mistakes were made in reference to its construction which cost the country thousands and thousands of dollars, and he did not tell us that included in that expenditure was a large sum for the construction of the foundations of the St. Lawrence Power Company plant, the benefit of which is now enjoyed by a private company. He told us that on the Iroquois and Cardinal canal, $4,000,000 had been expended, but he did not tell us that on account of mistakes and changes made, about $1,000,000 of that had been wasted. In addition a location was selected for that canal, which cost the country a great deal more money for construction, than if the location were selected without any reference to party considerations. Then, as to the construction of the north channel of the Galops which cost $1,500,000, that expenditure has also been worthless because that channel cannot be safely used by the large vessels that to-day ply on the river. For some reason or other the pier at the west end of that channel is so built that the entrance is very dangerous to vessels, and already several have been sunk there. As was said by the ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) for the expenditure of $50,000, a shoal of no great area, on which there is only 10 feet of water, could have been removed and a much better and safer channel provided than that which has cost the country $1,500,000.

It was the old channel, which had been used for the last 50 years. But the excuse that was given for the construction of this north channel was that vessels should run entirely through Canadian waters. There is no doubt that in going down through this north channel they have that advantage. But a vessel leaving the Welland canal for Montreal cannot go down the St. Lawrence to Prescott without passing through a portion of the American channel, as there is no Canadian channel direct between Brockville and Gananoque. If therefore it is right to use the American channel west of Brockville, why was it not to be used east of Brockville as well, saying to the people of this country $1,500,000? In every canal that has been built there has been the same difficulty, and for that reason a great deal of the expenditure that has been made by the Minister of Railways and Canals, if it has been actually necessary, has been made in the most extravagant way. The hon. minister, when he was stating the expenditures, did not make any comparisons between the cost of maintaining and operating these canals at the present time and the cost previous to 1896. The only difference in them is that they are now a little deeper. They have the same number of locks, and should not require any more men to operate them, while it should cost less to maintain them for the reason that they are all new. Let me give a comparison of the cost of operating and maintaining these canals in 1896 and in 1906 respectively:

Name of canal.	Cost in 1896.	Cost in 1906.
Welland..	$137,336 21	$186,637 89
Williamsburg	16,690 46	33,438 08
Sault Ste. Marie..	3,432 73	35,964 26
Rideau..	53,314 40	96,315 40
Lachine..	81,110 24	144,773 62
Cornwall..	28,168 10	103,139 90
Beauharnois..	32,651 49	27,932 62

The total cost of running the canals in 1896 was $252,716, while in 1906 it was $886,023.97, showing that $633,307.97 more is paid out annually by this government to operate and maintain these canals than was paid in 1896.

Mr. WM. ROCHE (Halifax). Was the traffic of both years the same?

Mr. J. D. REID. I do not think as many vessels passed through the canals last year as in 1896, but there was more freight, because the vessels are now much larger. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Emmerson) did not state to-night whether it was the intention of the government to deepen the Welland canal. The premier informed a deputation which waited on the government a short time ago that they were considering the matter. The government has spent $1,330,405.41 at Port Colborne, largely towards building an elevator. If the Welland canal were deepened, this elevator would be useful, but I mention it now to show how the government is spending money unnecessarily.

The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals spoke of the Railway Commission as a separate department. That commission has done good work. When it insisted on a reduction of passenger rates a few days ago, it performed a good act, for which I am sure the people of this country are grateful; and if that commission continues its good work, the people of this country will appreciate it very much. But that is the work of the Railway Commission and not of the Department of Railways and Canals. I would like the minister to ask the Railway Commission why it is that in some parts of Ontario there are two different rates on the railways. For instance, between Montreal and Toronto, and between Toronto and Hamilton, there is a rate of 3 cents per mile for first-class passengers and about 2½ cents or 2¼ cents per mile for second-class passengers. Many railways in Ontario have only a first-class rate, while they supply only second-class cars. These railways should be compelled to furnish first-class cars for people to whom they charge a first-class rate. I believe that the work of the Railway Commission is not proceeding fast enough in the interests of the people. I do not wish to be understood as blaming for a moment the members of the commission. In my opinion there is not a sufficient number of them to do the work that requires to be done. They should be either given more assistance or more members should be appointed on that commission so that the work, instead of being delayed for months and years, might be pushed to a conclusion at the earliest possible moment.

The next thing I wish to mention is the Transcontinental Railway department. Every one knows that when the Transcontinental Railway Bill was submitted to this House, there was almost a stampede on the other side. Many of these hon. gentlemen were bound that the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill would not go through until this road from Winnipeg to Moncton was tacked on to it. But hon. gentlemen on the other side, who were threatening to defeat the government, were in a short time—influenced by the newspapers in their different constituencies I suppose—brought to believe that they must support this road. I notice, in the list of accounts unpaid by this Grand Trunk Pacific, that newspapers from Moncton to Vancouver were subsidized to advertise this railway; and to the surprise of us all, we found that it cost those people $162,000 to get a foundation laid for the passage of the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill through this House. Could any one imagine that a charter, which was backed up by the right hon. the First Minister himself and the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Emmerson), should require such an amount to be expended in order to have it become law and enable the company to proceed with the work ? However, the Bill got through, and those who are managing this Transcontinental Railway department have spent some $2,000,000, and we have not had any explanation from the minister. But we had a little sample, not long ago in the Public Accounts Committee, of the way some of these expenditures are made ; and if the expenditures on this road are carried on in any way like what came up at that committee, there is no doubt that thousands of dollars were paid more than should have been for the work done in this department That being the case, what will be the amount which the people of this country will lose through expenditures on such a system ?

Now I shall pass on to the railway department, concerning which I propose to say a few words. The hon. minister said that in 1896 we had 16,387 miles of railways and we had paid in subsidies towards those railways $90,395,692. Since that time the increase has been 5,131 miles, on which subsidies to the extent of $15,338,509 have been paid. The minister takes credit for the building of all these 5,000 miles of railway. I want to say that men like Mackenzie and Mann, the Canadian Pacific Railway and others are the ones that promoted and pushed these railways through.

Mr. EMMERSON. I thought I was very modest about it.

Mr. J. D. REID. Well, my hon. friend tried to make out that the department was responsible for pushing through these 5,131 miles of railway.

Mr. EMMERSON. You must have misunderstood the object of my remarks.

Mr. J. D. REID. That was the way that I understood it. So far as the Intercolonial Railway is concerned, I wish to say that I in common with every one on this side, wish to see it do well and give the greatest convenience possible to the people of the lower provinces ; and I do not believe there is one man who would object to any expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway for the purpose of making it more advantageous to the people of the lower provinces. And in so far as the ownership of the Intercolonial Railway is concerned, I am of the opinion that it should remain under the control of this government. But I was just making a comparison. I see that in 1896 there were 1,155 miles of railway owned and operated by the Intercolonial Railway and that in that year the gross receipts were $2,866,028 or an average of $2,500 per mile. Last year there were 1,739 miles owned and operated by the Intercolonial Railway and the receipts were $7,643,829 or an average of $4,400 per mile.

Mr. EMMERSON. You have included the Prince Edward Island Railway in that.

Mr. J. D. REID. In the first one as well. I take them all together because they are all part of the Intercolonial Railway system. Last year we had 1,739 miles and the receipts were $7,643,829 or an average of $4,400 per mile. That shows an increase of $1,900 per mile last year as compared with 1896. What strikes me as very strange at the moment is that if there is such an enormous increase over the whole system, why are there not more profits ?

Mr. EMMERSON. In 1896 there were more than 1,149 miles.

Mr. J. D. REID. I took it out of the book.

Mr. EMMERSON. That was confined to the Intercolonial Railway, but if you combine the mileage of the Intercolonial Railway and the Prince Edward Island Railways, it would be more than 1,149. You divide by 1,149 in 1896 and now you put it at 1,700 adding in the Prince Edward Island Railway. You should make your division by the actual mileage of the Intercolonial Railway in 1906 as you did with the actual mileage of the Intercolonial in 1896. Your results are very faulty indeed.

Mr. J. D. REID. Does the minister mean that there were more than 1,155 in 1896 ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Combining the two, yes.

Mr. J. D. REID. The minister can see that he would add more to the 1,155 miles, instead of its showing $2.500, it would show a difference much wider than I have indicated. You can understand that I divided 1,155 into $2,866,000. So, if I make it 1,300 or 1,400 miles, it will only tell the more strongly against the argument of the minister.

Mr. EMMERSON. My arithmetic does not agree with that of the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. D. Reid).

Mr. J. D. REID. I have taken the figures out of the hon. gentleman's own accounts, and certainly I have no intention of misrepresenting them.

Mr. EMMERSON. I appreciate that fact.

Mr. J. D. REID. Speaking of the cost of operation, the minister states that the wages bill has gone up. There is no doubt about that. But I do not see that other things have gone up as much as the minister says they have. One reason for the high prices—and the minister knows it—is that, in purchasing these supplies, he does not purchase them direct from the manufacturers.

Mr. EMMERSON. We purchase by tender in every instance.

Mr. J. D. REID. Take the case of ties—the hon minister purchased these from a lawyer, Mr. B. F. Pierson

Mr. EMMERSON. But by tender.

Mr. J. D. REID. On a letter simply—there is no public advertisement

Mr. EMMERSON. Excuse me—

Mr. J. D. REID. Oh, this year,—

Mr. EMMERSON And last year, and every year. Notices are posted up in every station in the maritime provinces, and the lowest tender is accepted. And the price paid to that lowest tenderer is the price we pay to everybody—we do not buy a single tie above the price fixed by the lowest tender. That was the case with Mr. Pierson—he was the lowest tenderer.

Mr. DANIEL. Does the lowest tenderer always get the contract ?

Mr. EMMERSON. His tender is accepted in every instance.

Mr. J. D. REID. As to ties, they have been advertised for the last year or so—

Mr. EMMERSON. And every year.

Mr. J. D. REID. If my memory serves me right, they were purchased by letter formerly.

Mr. EMMERSON. Perhaps the hon. gentleman has in mind something that was done previous to 1896. But I can tell him that as far as ties and lumber are concerned, even before 1896 they asked for tenders.

Mr. BERGERON. In 1900, how many were bought without tender ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Not a tie.

Mr. BERGERON. Why, they bought enough for five years in advance.

Mr. EMMERSON. But all on the basis of the lowest tender. There was a complaint then that too many were bought; last year they made the complaint that I did not buy enough.

Mr. J. D. REID. The hon. minister knows that cases were brought out this year and last year in the Public Accounts Committee showing that expenditures on the Intercolonial Railway were not fair and just. Now, I want to say a word or two about the rates. The minister told us that the rates on the Intercolonial Railway are much lower than those on the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Railway. The hon. gentleman knows that the rates from any part of Ontario to any point in the maritime provinces are exactly the same whether the shipment goes over the Intercolonial Railway or over an opposition road. The arrangement is with the Grand Trunk Railway and the Intercolonial Railway on one side and the Canadian Pacific Railway on the other. The government has men going through the province of Ontario soliciting freight for the Intercolonial Railway, but the rates are identical.

Mr. EMMERSON. The hon. gentleman is speaking of through rates.

Mr. J. D. REID. I am speaking of rates from any point in Ontario to any point in the maritime provinces.

Mr. EMMERSON. And, if the hon. gentleman will pardon me—these rates are very low, due to the fact that the Intercolonial Railway was first in the field and established its freight rates, and the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway have had to conform to them. And it is due to the existence of the Intercolonial Railway that we have to-day, over all the lines to points in the maritime provinces, such low freight rates.

Mr. J. D. REID. But the rate from Toronto to Halifax on the Intercolonial Railway is as high on any other route.

Mr. EMMERSON. Put it the other way—the rates charged by the others are as low as those on the Intercolonial Railway, and these low rates were established at the inception of the government road.

Mr. J. D. REID. What I am pointing out is that on traffic from points in Ontario to points in the maritime provinces, the rates on the Intercolonial Railway are not lower than by other lines which simply means that the government went into an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific Railway on through freight. So far as local rates are concerned, the minister states that they are all the way from 25 per cent to 50 per cent less than on the Canadian Pacific Railway. Take for instance the case of lumber, 50 per cent higher on the Canadian Pacific Railway. Does not the hon. minister think that if he can make a surplus managing the railway as he has been doing with the present freight rates, it is about time that he should see the Railway Commission and make them reduce the rates on the Canadian Pacific Railway to those of the Intercolonial in the matter of lumber? I believe the parties who are producing the lumber do not get the advantage of that difference in the low rate. It is the speculator or manufacturer that is getting the advantage of the low rate instead of the producer of lumber. The same thing I believe applies to all produce along the Intercolonial. I do not believe that the farmers are getting advantage of the low rates. Then the first thing the minister did was to advance the freight rates, and in doing so he took the money out of the farmers. The passenger rates I understand are the lowest on any railway, therefore it would have been more to the advantage of the people in the lower provinces to advance the passenger rates than to advance the freight rates and take them out of the people who are producing the stuff.

I wish to say in conclusion that I cannot agree with the minister in his statement that the expenses on the canal system and on the railway have been made as economically as they should have been. I cannot agree with him that the operating charges are down at the lowest point consistent with safety. I hope and trust that some changes will be made by which they will be put on a different basis. However, I am glad to see that the Intercolonial is being operated by the government. When the minister spoke about the future of the Intercolonial I supposed he would have some announcement to make on behalf of the government, but there was only an expression of his own opinion. Nevertheless, I hope the Intercolonial Railway will remain an asset of the Dominion government and under its control; and if the present minister does not do better than he has been doing in its management, when we get into power we will put it on a proper basis.

Mr. J. W. DANIEL (St. John city). Coming as I do from one of the maritime provinces, I take, in common with all the inhabitants of that part of Canada, a great interest in the Intercolonial. I do not rise for the purpose of criticising the statement which the minister has made but rather as a friend of the railway, and with the expectation and hope that the government will maintain it as it was at the beginning, the great bond of union between the maritime provinces and the rest of Canada. I think we have a right to demand that in the future. The future of the Intercolonial is a question that is giving the people of this country, and especially of the maritime provinces. a good deal of thought. In a few years it is expected that the Grand Trunk Pacific will reach Moncton and then have running rights over the Intercolonial. It has been stated that the Canadian Pacific Railway have made an application for equal rights of user on the Intercolonial between St. John and Halifax, and possibly between St. John and Sydney. I think parliament has a right to a statement from the government in regard to that matter. They have had this application before them long enough now to know what their mind is about it. I think parliament is entitled this evening to a statement as to the intention of the government with regard to this application of the Canadian Pacific Railway for free and equal rights of user on the Intercolonial between St. John and Halifax. It was a disappointment to me, and I think it will be a disappointment especially to the people of the maritime provinces, to find that the Minister of Railways, after taking so many hours over his budget speech, has given no intimation whatever of his own views or the views of the government with regard to that important matter. So it would appear that the Intercolonial, so far as we can see at present, is likely to fall upon evil times. When the Grand Trunk Pacific gets to Moncton and runs over the Intercolonial, then the only part that would remain would be that part between Moncton and Montreal, and that would become apparently a local railway. We can only guess at what would be the result to the Intercolonial if the Canadian Pacific Railway were granted full running rights, equal rights, on the Intercolonial between St. John and Halifax or between St. John and Sydney. Where then will be any justification for the idea of the government that they will be able to make the Intercolonial a paying affair, or make it show even half the results that it does at present? The thing is absolutely impossible. If the Canadian Pacific Railway are going to come in and do business over the principal part of the Intercolonial on the same terms as the Intercolonial, at one stroke will go at least one half the business of the Intercolonial, that is one half the returns. To allow the Canadian Pacific Railway to run a passenger and mail train through to Halifax or Sydney is one thing, but to grant free and full equal rights of user with the Intercolonial itself, is a thing that, it appears to me, ought not to be done in the interest of the Intercolonial itself.

Mr. FIELDING. Is there a proposal that it should be granted free and equal rights? The hon. gentleman has used the word 'free' twice.

Mr. DANIEL. I did not use the word 'free' in the way of getting it for nothing, of course. Instead of 'free' I should have said perhaps full and equal rights of user on the Intercolonial between St. John and Halifax or Sydney. I think that only one result could follow a course of that kind, namely, that the Intercolonial could never become a paying concern, or even begin to pay its way, There was another subject that the minister omitted to make reference to that I think we ought to hear something about, and that is the result of the suit which the Department of Railways and Canals brought against the Grand Trunk Railway for non-performance of contract. That is a suit that was up some time ago and I have not seen any result as yet. I do not know what the result of it is but I think parliament has a right to know the outcome of that suit or arbitration and yet the minister has made no reference to it at all. I fully agree with the remarks that the minister has made in regard to the principal official of the railway. In regard to Mr. Butler I believe that the minister has only stated the simple truth when he spoke of Mr. Butler's capacity as a railway man as he did, also in regard to the other principal officials of the railway. I noticed, however, in a paper published in the city of Ottawa, the 'Evening Journal,' I think it was, last month a statement with reference to an inquest that was held at Beaver Brook as the result of an accident on the Intercolonial Railway. I allude to it because of the peculiar verdict which the jury gave. They say that :

> The trainmen were not to blame and that the primary and actual cause of the collision was the loose system practised by the management of the Intercolonial Railway for the protection of working trains and ambiguous style of order sometimes issued to such trains.

There is the statement made by the jury that was called upon to hold an inquest over a man who was killed in that accident and they make a charge of mismanagement against the railway. I think the minister should take a matter of that kind into his consideration, and it may be that perhaps he has, but he has made no statement in regard to the effect of accidents of that kind or whether such accidents would be rendered impossible in the future in so far as they have been the result of the want of good management on the part of the Intercolonial Railway authorities.

In regard to the financial statement which the minister has made I hope that the railway has got the $93,000 of a surplus. I know that there is a great deal in regard to matters of surpluses in the bookkeeping that is done. It is very difficult, indeed, I suppose almost impossible, for any one who is not thoroughly familiar with the actual accounts of the Intercolonial Railway to say just exactly how much of a surplus there is or how much is just a balance due to bookkeeping. There is good ground for the criticism of my hon. friend from South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) when he says that this surplus of $93,000 is more apparent than real.

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend knows that it was upwards of $377,000 for six months.

Mr. DANIEL. Then, I took the hon. ministers figures down wrong.

Mr. EMMERSON. He was speaking of the previous year. I gave a statement showing that during the first six months the surplus was $377,000 and upwards.

Mr. BERGERON. Is that taking into consideration capital account ?

Mr. EMMERSON. We do not figure up capital account.

Mr. BERGERON. Why not ?

Mr. EMMERSON. Because no other railway in Canada does. We do just as the other railways do. Capital is one account and revenue and expenditure is another.

Mr. DANIEL. I must have got the figures down wrong. There were so many figures given that I might perhaps be excused for doing that. There was a large amount of money spent on capital account.

Mr. EMMERSON. That should not affect the surplus as between revenue and expenditure.

Mr. DANIEL. It does not affect the bookkeeping surplus but it does affect the statement which is being laid before the people of the country as to whether the Intercolonial Railway really had the surplus or not, when they know that while there is an apparent surplus claimed there was also a charge against the country of over $3,000,000 during the past year. While it does not make any difference, as some speakers say, in so far as the matter of bookkeeping is concerned, it does make a great deal of difference as to the ideas which the people of the country will have when they know that while there is an apparent surplus of $93,000 there is also a capital expenditure of over $3,000,000 during the same year.

Mr. EMMERSON. Does not my hon. friend know that the Grand Trunk Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway make capital expenditures, and that if they paid these expenditures out of their receipts they would never have dividends ? They borrow the money. They get authority from this parliament to do that and they expend it in the same way as we do when we get money here and expend it on capital account.

Mr. DANIEL. I am quite aware that the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk and all these other railways have capital accounts.

Mr. EMMERSON. Your idea is that we should not have one. They can have it but we cannot ?

Mr. DANIEL. That was the argument advanced by one of the speakers this evening. I have not advanced that argument myself yet, but the statement I was going to make is that while it is true that these large corporations have capital accounts there is some difference of opinion as to the expenditures that should be put to capital account as between the Intercolonial Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway and other railways.

Mr. EMMERSON. On the authority of Sir Thomas Shaughnessy we do just as the Canadian Pacific Railway do, and I produced the letter of Sir Thomas Shaughnessy to that effect.

Mr. DANIEL. I have heard the minister make that statement before, but as far as I followed him and followed the expenditures he gave as being made on the Intercolonial Railway and charged to capital account it would not bear out his statement in so far as the letter of Sir Thomas Shaughnessy is concerned.

Mr. EMMERSON. There is none so blind as those who will not see.

Mr. DANIEL. Then I would like the minister to apply that to himself because I think it would fit very well indeed. That is the only difference that I would point out between the capital account of the Intercolonial Railway and that of these other railways. There were other matters mentioned by some of the speakers which I will not go into. I will only refer to the prices at which the Intercolonial Railway purchase various articles which they require. I am quite aware that the Intercolonial Railway buy many things as cheaply and as good as any one else does but in some instances we are told that is not the case. The purchase of land at Moncton from Mr. Matthew Lodge is an instance of where the Intercolonial Railway and consequently the people of this country have paid more for land than they ought to have paid. I would like to call the minister's attention to—I was going to say the excuse—but I will not say that—I will say the reply which he made to the criticism upon that purchase. The minister then stated that this was not as bad as what the Conservatives had done, because they bought land at about $2,000 an acre. He used that argument in reply to the charge from this side of the House, that $8,000 was too large a profit for Mr. Lodge on that small quantity of land. I quote from 'Hansard' of 1906, the statement of the minister:

> In 1884, the Intercolonial Railway purchased right adjacent to this property, half an acre from Mr. Milner, and how much did the Intercolonial Railway pay for that? $1,000 for half an acre.

Again he said in the same speech:

> We were able to purchase this land at $1,000, when in 1884, at a time when my hon. friend (Mr. Ames) would have every confidence in the then administration, the Intercolonial Railway bought 55-100 of an acre and paid $1,000.

Further on in the same speech Mr. Emmerson said:

> Judged by the procedure in 1884, when half an acre was purchased by the Intercolonial Railway for $1,000, we in 1904 made a good bargain when we bought at the rate of $1,000 an acre, and not at the rate of $1,000 for half an acre.

The Minister of Finance made the same argument, but no doubt he took his cue from the Minister of Railways and he evidently thought the statement was true. Now, the Minister of Railways should give the country an explanation of this statement of his.

Mr. EMMERSON. There was laid before the committee and the House an abstract of title showing details of this purchase in 1884, and it said that in this transfer of land from Milner to the Intercolonial Railway, there was half an acre purchased by the government for $1,000. Based on that evidence I made the statement on the floor of this House, as cited by my hon. friend. I did not know that the question would come up in this discussion, but I will be prepared to deal with it at a later stage.

Mr. DANIEL. I shall not pursue the matter further now except to state that the land bought in 1884 for $1,000 was six and a half acres and not half an acre.

Mr. EMMERSON. That may be. I only know that the evidence before the committee was that the quantity of land then purchased for $1,000 was a little over half an acre.

Mr. DANIEL. Where did the minister see that statement?

Mr. EMMERSON. When the matter comes up I will be able I think to show it.

Mr. DANIEL. I suppose some one is responsible for leaving out the six acres.

Mr. EMMERSON. My information was obtained from the papers on file in the department, and which were there long before the question came up in committee.

Mr. DANIEL. As the matter will come up again, I shall leave it for the present, but I think it demands an explanation from the minister who let it go forth to the country that the Conservative government bought land in 1884 for $2,000 an acre, while the present government were able to buy it for about half of that amount. Of course that statement is not right, and the minister should set it straight. Now one reason for the better financial showing of the Intercolonial Railway for this year was the absence of the expenditure for the removal of snow which the previous year amounted to $600,000, and which of course had it been incurred this year would have wiped out the surplus.

Mr. EMMERSON. That was in 1905 when there was a deficit of $1,700,000 and part of that was due to the expenditure of $600,000 for snow removal. In the year 1906 in which there was a surplus of $100,000 there was no unusual expenditure for snow removal. In the current year, in which there is a surplus for the first six months of over $377,000 the snow question is not a factor.

Mr. DANIEL. Until recently this has been an exceptionally favourable winter for the Intercolonial Railway in the matter of snow blockades. I do not know what orders the management of the Intercolonial Railway give as to the removal of snow, but I do know that quite recently the Halifax train was ten hours late, and so far as I know there was no attempt made to keep the track clear with snow ploughs between St. John and Moncton, or Salisbury. Although that storm was very severe, and was about central over the city of St. John and extended away off to the westward as well as to the eastward, the Canadian Pacific Railway train which left St. John reached Montreal on regular schedule time. It showed a difference in the management of the two railways in regard to looking after the snow on the tracks which was not favourable to the Intercolonial. The freight rates on the Intercolonial Railway have been raised; but I have noticed, by a return that has been brought down, that they are apparently raised everywhere except between Levis and Montreal, where at nearly half the stations they are lowered. That struck me as being very peculiar.

Mr. EMMERSON. I can very easily explain it. When the Drummond County road was taken over, it was subject to certain rates, which were higher than the rates on other portions of the Intercolonial; and in the readjustment they were made uniform.

Mr. DANIEL. Of course, I accept the minister's statement. Not having the knowledge which I presume he has in regard to that matter, I could only take the rates as given in this return, where I found this anomaly, that while the rates were being raised everywhere in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, they were being lowered on that part of the line between Levis and Montreal. As the various interests connected with the Intercolonial will come up again, I will not detain the House at any greater length at this time; but I would like to impress on the minister that in dealing with the Intercolonial he is dealing with an interest which is very warm in the hearts of the people of the maritime provinces, and that I do not think they will forgive him or any government that does anything to destroy the influence, the power, and the strength of the Intercolonial. I would have been glad to have heard statements from the minister with regard to the immediate future of the Intercolonial; which I have no doubt he could make if he wished to do so; but he has not done so, and we must remain content without them for the present.

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). Mr. Speaker, we have very often heard statements with regard to the Intercolonial Railway similar to what the hon. minister has given us to-day; but we have never yet heard from him an answer to the criticism from this side of the House with regard to his method of keeping the books, or with regard to the question of capital account and ordinary expenditure. My hon. friend to-night, in answer to an interruption of mine, repeated that that should not be taken into consideration. I do not understand why, if you spend $25,000,000 in ten years on capital account, you should not take that into consideration when making a statement of the difference between the receipts and the expenditures of the road. I was more than astonished at the statement of the minister that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Railway Company keep their books in the same way. I differ with him as to that, because I feel sure that these railway companies keep their books in a businesslike way. When the hon. minister next speaks on the subject, I hope he will answer that criticism in a thorough way. My impression is that the Intercolonial has for a long time been run too much on political lines. Some time ago we heard of ties that were bought without tender in such quantities that they would last for five or six years. With such a useless expenditure as that, it is no wonder that the Intercolonial has deficits in the proper sense of the word. But I want to call my hon. friend's attention to something with which I am more familiar. Why should we have spent last year on our canals $600,000 more than we did in 1896? The Beauharnois canal in 1896 cost $32,651.49, while last year it cost $27,932.62, a difference of less than $5,000, although in 1896 there were five men at every lock on that canal, while last year there were only two, a total of 45 men in the one case and 18 in the other.

Mr. EMMERSON. I will tell my hon. friend from memory that the average annual cost of the maintenance of the Beauharnois canal is $20,000.

Mr. BERGERON. We will not discuss that. The figures I have stated were given by the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. J. D. Reid) who said he had taken them from the blue-books. I know that there has been no work of any extent on that canal for three or four years, and the hon. minister does not give any reason why the expenditure has not been more reduced.

Mr. EMMERSON. We increased the wages.

Mr. BERGERON. Not enough for that. Some time ago I asked a question in the House about an investigation which had taken place there. Last summer, a man employed as foreman on the canal was using on his farm during the week the men who were paid by the government to work on the canal. I do not suppose my hon. friend will sanction anything like that. There was an investigation into the matter, because one of the employees who thought that was wrong said so, and threatened to report the foreman to the department. The foreman was a good Liberal, and the other man was also; but the matter became public. The superintendent of the canal suspended the man who had threatened to report the foreman, and it took the whole summer to find out who was guilty and who was not. A commission was appointed to hold an investigation, and of course will be paid. There were also criminal proceedings taken. The men called each other liars and other sweet things, and the matter came before the Criminal Court sitting at Valleyfield about three weeks ago. There were four cases before the court and three Crown prosecutors, and the proceedings lasted about a month. When the case of the man I refer to came on there was a nolle prosequi entered, and the case was dropped. I intend to speak of this matter later on. In the meantime, I would like the minister to show why the expenses of that canal, which was used by only two or three boats last year, are not more than $5,000 less to-day than they were in 1896, when it was largely used for purposes of navigation.

Mr. EMMERSON. They are nearly $15,000 less.

Mr. BERGERON. This is only an instance but there are many others. However I do not want to detain the House longer. But this sum of $600,000 more this year spent on our canals is entirely out of proportion and should be looked into. I am confident my hon. friend wants to do for the best and is really a good trustee of the public money, and I call his attention to this so that when he next makes an eloquent speech like the one we have heard to-night, he may be in a position to reply to those remarks.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Progress reported.

Mr. FIELDING moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. HAGGART. The resolution respecting subsidies to the provinces is to come up on Monday?

Mr. FIELDING. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.20 a.m. Saturday.

ST. MARY'S BRIDGE COMPANY.

Mr. MACPHERSON moved: That Bill (No. 131) respecting the St. Mary's River Bridge Company be placed on the order paper for second reading at the next sitting of the House.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 137) to amend the Gold and Silver Marking Act.—Mr. Macpherson.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES.

Hon. WILLIAM TEMPLEMAN (Minister of Inland Revenue) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 139) respecting a Department of Mines. He said: This Bill is for the purpose of creating a Department of Mines to be administered by a member of the government to be named by an order in council. It is intended to include in the department the mines branch now in the Department of the Interior, and the geological survey at present administered by the Minister of Inland Revenue. The duties to be assigned to the new department will include all questions affecting the mining industry of Canada over which this parliament has jurisdiction.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REPORT OF THE INSURANCE COMMISSION.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). The Senate has passed an address calling for certain papers, being part of the exhibits in connection with the Insurance Report. As these papers are in the custody of the House of Commons, they can only be sent to the Senate by consent of this House. I therefore move:

That papers referred to as exhibits Nos. 682, 686, 688, 737, 738, 740 and 741, in sessional papers be transferred to the Senate.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). I would ask my hon. friend whether it would not be wise to have copies made of them and sent to the Senate; or if the originals are to be sent to the Senate by courtesy, that copies be left with the records branch of our own House—because they are of such a nature that we may require them at any time.

Mr. FIELDING. The clerk of the House will keep a copy of them for the convenience of this House, while the originals are transferred to the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. I see that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) is in his place. He gave notice some time ago that he proposed to-morrow to bring up a certain matter, which has already been discussed. In so far as I could learn, he did not intimate in what way it was to be brought up. Would it be too much to ask the hon. gentleman if he proposes to bring it up by way of privilege or by way of resolution, and if the latter, what would be the nature of his resolution ? I simply ask this for the information of the House.

Mr. H. BOURASSA (Labelle). As I stated when I gave notice, I had an understanding with the Prime Minister and with the leader of the opposition that I would bring up the matter on Tuesday next ; and I think I stated, however, I state now, that I will bring it up before going into supply, on the expectation that there will be a motion to go into supply immediately after the Orders of the Day. I may say that I have not yet worded the motion that I intend to present, so I could not give to my hon. friend the exact terms of the motion. But I may say that as the Prime Minister stated the last time this question was up that he did not see that the commission had made a charge against any member of the House, I intend quoting from the Report of the Insurance Commission that portion which refers to the hon. gentleman from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) on account of the attacks that have been made repeatedly against him by the press of the country, and the references that have been made in this House, in order that the question may be thoroughly discussed.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman cannot yet inform the House as to the nature of his resolution ?

Mr. BOURASSA. No, I really could not, because I have not yet decided its final terms.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid it is a leap in the dark.

Mr. BOURASSA. No, I have indicated my intention clearly. My motion will tend to ask the House to decide upon the necessity of clearing up the insinuations that have been made, either against the hon. gentleman himself, or against the hon. member for King's, N. B. (Mr. Fowler), or the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), or the hon. member for Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Lefurgey), as well as the retort by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler).

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN. Would not a motion of this kind, even if it were brought up in connection with the question of going into supply be a motion of privilege at any period in the debate?

COLONIAL CONFERENCE.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton, Ont.) Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) whether or not there is any foundation for the rumour that he does not propose to attend the conference between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the Prime Ministers of the different colonies?

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Mr. Speaker, in view of the slow progress which has been made by the House, I certainly have contemplated the possibility of my being forced to cancel my trip. I would not like to do so, but I must say that the matter is under consideration now.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. In that case I would ask leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing the importance of Canada being represented at that conference. I think it is a subject that ought to engage the attention of the House at once. I therefore beg leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing the following matter :

The urgent public importance that Canada shall be represented by the Prime Minister at the approaching conference between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and the prime ministers of the self-governing colonies.

Mr. SPEAKER. Has the hon. member the leave of the House?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The resolution of the conference of 1902 in regard to future conferences is very plain as to their scope and as to the persons who are to compose them. It is as follows:

That it would be of advantage to the empire if conferences were held as far as practicable, at intervals not exceeding four years, at which questions of common interest affecting the relation of the mother country and His Majesty's Dominions over the seas, could be discussed and considered as between the Secretary of State for the colonies and the prime ministers of the self-governing colonies. The Secretary of State for the Colonies is requested to arrange for such conferences after communication with the prime ministers of the respective colonies in case of any emergency arising upon which a special conference shall have been deemed necessary, the next ordinary conference to be held not sooner than three years thereafter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The members of the House will pardon me if I do not raise my voice unnecessarily as I should not have attempted to speak to-day except that I regard this matter as of the most urgent possible moment. Canada must either be represented by her Prime Minister at that conference or she cannot be represented at all. That is made perfectly clear by the terms of the resolution which I have just read. That resolution was passed unanimously. The Prime Minister of Canada representing Canada in that behalf was a party to that resolution. There is, therefore, no doubt that this country has been thoroughly committed to the position that these conferences should be held every four years, and that each self-governing Dominion of His Majesty should be represented at these conferences of the Prime Ministers.

The return which has been brought down emphasizes that necessity. I do not intend to comment at the present time, because we have arranged that for Wednesday next, upon any matter of policy or any subject of discussion which might be brought up at that conference. The only point which I propose to touch is the importance that Canada should not be unrepresented on the 15th of April, when that conference opens. This government, on July 20, 1906, passed an order in council, and they passed another order in council on October 17 of the same year in regard to the approaching conference. The only subject which has been brought to the attention of the home government by the government of Canada has been in relation to the constitution of the conference because we have all observed that although Australia, New Zealand, Cape Colony and Natal, I think, have proposed subjects for discussion, no subject has been suggested by this country. However, that will be a matter for comment later on. In the order in council of July 20, 1906, we find the following:

The right Honourable the Prime Minister observes, with, reference to the said despatch, that April 15 usually falls within the session of the Canadian parliament. A change has just been made in the Canadian fiscal year, the effect of which upon the disposal of parliamentary business has yet to be ascertained. It is contemplated that parliament shall meet in November, and that an adjournment for some time shall take place before Christmas. Very important business will engage the attention of parliament at the coming session, and it is not unlikely that the session will continue up to and beyond April 15.

And further on:

The Prime Minister further observes that the attention of the right Honourable the Secretary of State for the Colonies should be called to the form of invitation hitherto extended to the several colonial governments which have been invited to participate in these conferences. Such invitation has been extended to the prime ministers only.

It could not be extended to any other minister in view of the resolution passed unanimously at the Colonial Conference of 1902. Then it continues:

Experience has shown that, having regard to the wide range of subjects which are considered at the conference, the prime ministers of the larger colonies are unwilling to assume the responsibility of dealing with such questions without the assistance of some of their colleagues. Practically, therefore, the conference becomes not one of prime ministers, but one of ministers representing the various colonial governments. If it be deemed expedient, for the reasons above stated, that ministers, other than the prime ministers of any colony should be present, it seems to be desirable that their position in the conference should be recognized, and that they should be included in the invitation extended by His Majesty's government. The Prime Minister, therefore, suggests that the object of His Majesty's government in calling the conference would be better attained if the conference were declared to be a conference of ministers and the invitation expressed in such form as would admit of the attendance of any ministers who might be accredited by any of the governments concerned.

To that the Secretary of State for the Colonies (Lord Elgin) made answer on August 11, 1906:

As regards the second point——

That is the point to which I have just alluded.

—I think that in the case of the larger colonies there is a distinct advantage in securing the attendance on special occasions of other ministers in addition to the Prime Minister, notably the Minister of Defence or the minister in charge of commercial affairs. This arrangement was in fact made at the conference of 1902, and on the same principle other ministers of the Imperial Government beside the Secretary of State for the Colonies have been present at meetings of past conferences, when matters affecting their departments were under consideration.

It does not, however, appear to be necessary to make any alteration in the general constitution of the conference. Any minister whose attendance seems desirable to the prime ministers of the larger colonies could, as before, accompany them and could attend the conference when subjects with which they are specially concerned are to be discussed. In such cases ministers would, of course, be the guests of His Majesty's government.

This government was not satisfied with that answer, and they passed a further order in council on October 17, 1906, the important part of which is as follows:

As to the conditions under which colonial ministers, other than prime ministers, may attend the conference the committee are of opinion that further representations should be made to His Majesty's government. The intimation that such ministers may 'attend the conference when the subjects with which they are specially concerned are to be discussed,' does not, in the opinion of the committee, meet the point raised by the Canadian government in the minute of July 20.

The Secretary of State for the Colonies refers to the arrangements respecting the attendance of such ministers at the conference of 1902, and assumes that they were unobjectionable. The committee have to remark that although it was not deemed necessary at the time to place on record any formal protest against them, the arrangements in question were far from satisfactory. The colonial ministers other than the prime ministers were received only by the courtesy of the conference, and not without objection having been taken to what was regarded by some as a departure from the basis on which the conference had been organized. It seems desirable, therefore, that for the avoidance of misunderstanding hereafter the position of such ministers should be properly defined in advance.

Further on :

If the objects of the conference will be advanced by the presence of such ministers they should only be expected to attend with a recognized status which will be consistent with their position as responsible ministers in their respective colonies.

The committee therefore suggest that furthe representations be made to His Majesty's government expressing the hope that the conference may be treated as one of colonial ministers, the government of each colony being free to send such of their members as they may be pleased to select to represent the colony at the conference, and such representatives to be deemed members of the conference in the fullest sense, with the understanding, however, that in any matters which may be determined by vote each colony shall have one vote only.

It would almost seem from the persistence with which this attitude was put forward by the Canadian government in face of the unanimous decision of the conference, that even so far back as that time the Prime Minister had in contemplation that he would not attend this conference and desired to have some minister appointed to attend in his place. However that may be, the government have already answered themselves, as I will point out, because when Mr. Lyttelton in a previous despatch, in the year 1905, had suggested that the name of the conference should be changed from 'The Colonial Conference' to 'The Imperial Council,' the Canadian government answered him, and properly answered him, that that was a matter with which the conference must itself deal, and that it would not be proper, except at that conference, to make any such change. Well, that is practically the answer that Lord Elgin gave on the 27th of November, and which is to be found at page 19 of the return to which I have alluded. It is a despatch from Lord Elgin, the Secretary for the Colonies, to Lord Grey, the Governor General of Canada, and the important part of the communication is as follows :

I have given the views of your ministers my full consideration, but I regret to say that I do not see my way to concur in their proposal. That proposal appears to me to raise difficulties which can only be satisfactorily settled by discussion at the conference itself.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN

The essential factor in the consideration of this matter seems to me to be, that the proposal of your ministers would involve a change in the constitution of the conference. The conference of 1897 was composed of Prime Ministers, and the resolution of the conference of 1902, in terms of which the present conference has been convened, states : That it would be to the advantage of the empire if the conference were held, as far as practicable, at intervals not exceeding four years, at which questions of common interest affecting the relations of the mother country and His Majesty's dominions over the seas could be discussed and considered as between the Secretary of State and the Prime Ministers of the self-governing colonies. The Secretary of State for the Colonies is requested to arrange for such conferences after communication with the Prime Ministers of the respective colonies. The effect of this resolution, which was passed unanimously, is to reaffirm the principle that the Prime Ministers of the colonies alone are members of the conference. In dealing with the other suggested alterations in the constitution of the conference His Majesty's government have held that the conference itself must consider and determine whether changes are to be made, and it would not be possible, without inconsistency, to depart from that principle in the present instance.

I need hardly say that nothing derogatory to the position of colonial ministers (other than Prime Ministers) was implied at the last conference, or would be implied at any future one, by the fact that they only participate in discussions on subjects with which they are especially concerned. The representatives of the Indian Office and of other departments of His Majesty's government attend on a similar footing. But the arrangement was one which the conference treated as essentially a matter which it was competent to decide, and the Secretary of State as chairman ruled that an alteration could not be made unless there was a unanimous feeling in its favour. It does not seem practicable under these circumstances to adjust by correspondence alterations in procedure even if time now permitted. The proposal of your ministers might well raise questions on such important points as the effect on the duration of the debates, or of the sittings of the conference by a material increase in its members—and the relative advantage to be derived by colonies within easy reach of this country and those which are more distant.

Now, I have already alluded to the fact that Canada has not suggested any subjects for discussion, and it would seem to me a most deplorable outcome that this country, the premier over-seas dominion of the empire, and within easy reach of the mother country, should not be represented at that conference, while distant dominions such as the Commonwealth of Australia, New Zealand and Cape Colony should be represented, although the journey from these countries occupies twice or in some cases thrice as long as does the journey from Canada to London. I would regret it as a most deplorable incident if Canada were not represented. It would in fact result in practically nullifying the work of the conference and in absolutely diminishing its usefulness to the vanishing point.

I have said that the opposition were and are willing to facilitate the attendance of the Prime Minister at that conference; I think they have shown it; I am willing to discuss that if it should be necessary. But I now say to the Prime Minister that if he cannot so regulate his domestic affairs amongst his friends opposite as to enable him to leave the remaining business of the House in charge of one of his responsible colleagues, we are willing on this side of the House to adjourn from Wednesday next for such length of time as may be necessary to enable the Prime Minister to attend that conference so that Canada may be represented there. No doubt that would cause a great many of us inconvenience, but it seems to me the inconvenience should not weigh as any thing in comparison with the paramount necessity that this great Dominion of the empire should be represented by its Prime Minister at the conference. I am prepared to go that far, or I am prepared to make any other reasonable arrangement with the Prime Minister and with the government in that connection. Having said this much, I think I have said all that is necessary for the present, and I therefore conclude by moving that the House do now adjourn.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I would not have had a word of criticism to offer on the remarks of my hon. friend had they all been couched in the same language as those in the latter part of his address. But the insinuations which my hon. friend, for reasons which are unknown to me, chose to make when he said that his opinion was, that even when I was sitting in that conference in 1902 in London, I had in contemplation not to attend this present conference.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I did not say that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It would appear to me that the hon. gentleman said something very like it.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I said that the orders in council of the 20th July and the 17th October seemed to me to afford some evidence that the Prime Minister expected, or hoped, that Canada should be represented at this conference by some person other than himself.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Even that much, Sir, there was no justification for such an insinuation. The observations which the hon. gentleman has founded on these despatches have simply shown this, that as it is my lot at this moment to be Prime Minister of Canada, I am prepared to take my share of the work, whether it be in Ottawa or in London; but whether my work be in Ottawa or in London, I am anxious to have the co-operation of the colleagues who assist me in this work. The despatches which my hon. friend has just quoted do not go any further than to show that my anxiety was not to go to London alone, but to have the assistance of my colleagues in the work to be done there. There are important questions to be discussed at that conference. The agenda which has been published shows what they are. Amongst others, there is the trade question, in which we take a deep and vital interest; and whenever it is my duty to discuss this and connected questions, I would like to have the assistance of my colleagues who have done so much to make the tariff of Canada what it is at the present time, and to bring the trade question up to the standard which it has reached in this country and in the British Empire at large. My hon. friend ought not to be surprised at my anxiety between the duties which call me to London and the duties which detain me at Ottawa at the same moment. I may say that during the last few days I have been under great anxiety on this question, not knowing whether my duties would keep me here or call me away. Up to the present time I may say I have not made up my mind. I have thought that it might be possible for me to postpone for a time my departure from Ottawa. The conference is called and must take place; but everybody knows that the first sittings will not be as important as the later sittings. There are always in such cases certain formalities before the actual business begins. It takes some time to organize and prepare for the work of the conference, so that my attendance on the 15th would not be as important as it would be later on. But I would be only too glad to welcome a proposal to facilitate the business of the House in order to afford me the opportunity to fulfil the duty appertaining to the position which I am entrusted with; and if hon. gentlemen opposite will carry out the suggestion, I do not think there will be any necessity of adjourning the sittings of the House. If hon. gentlemen opposite will put a reasonable restraint upon their flow of eloquence, so that we can confine ourselves to a discussion of the questions before the House, I think it will be possible for me to sail on the 5th of next month, leaving some of my colleagues here till the business of the House is completed. At the same time, I would impress on my hon. friend that it is most important that I should be accompanied on this mission with which the Canadian people have entrusted me, with those of my colleagues who are to work out with me the problems we may have to discuss at the conference; and therefore, since my hon. friend has been good enough to say that the opposition will facilitate the business of the session, I conclude that he will do so with reference not only to my own departure, but the departure of the friends and colleagues whose attendance with me is of the utmost importance to Canadian interests.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). Mr. Speaker, I rise to add my mite of persuasion to the Prime Minister to altogether reconsider his half-formed if not wholly formed determination, of which he advised us in his answer to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and to see whether or not, by the kindly co-operation of gentlemen on this side of the House, and maybe the enforced diligence of members of his own side, and maybe a little mild curbing of the floods of eloquence which occasionally burst forth in tremendous torrents from his own supporters, we might, by all these efforts combined, be able to facilitate the departure of the First Minister on the 5th of next month. It is all very well to say that it is not absolutely important that the Prime Minister representing Canada should be present at the opening of the conference, because the opening period is a period of organization. That is the strength of our position and the weakness of the position first taken by my right hon. friend. It is absolutely impossible that the question of defence or the question of preferential trade, for instance, two very important questions which may be brought up, the latter particularly, shall become burning questions for discussion during the first few days of the conference. But there are other important questions to be brought up by the other members of the conference, the agenda which has been referred to being a very long and very important one. And it is very important for two reasons—first, that if you take out of the opening and organizing period the presence of the representative of the premier colony, in that conference of the colonies, you take out a great deal of the enthusiasm, the incitement, and the strong good feeling which ought to exist. My right hon. friend will thoroughly agree with me in that. The absence of an important or predominating partner in a conference of that kind at the early and organizing period has a very injurious effect upon the spirit and the operation of the conference itself. So that I think my right hon. friend will find that if there is any period when it is necessary for him especially to be there, it is at the opening. Afterwards his ministers can one by one find their way over. Here are their officers, and all the information which it is possible to get, and which can be gotten nowhere better than in Ottawa, can be in process of preparation, as it has been probably before this, and can be completed and got ready for them when they find it possible to leave. Really, what is it that keeps the Prime Minister here? The important policy business, if there has been any policy business this session, is almost or altogether completed. We have gone through the tariff, and we shall discuss and probably dispose of two important subjects this week. The legislation which was promised by the government has been brought down.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER.

My hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) looks very lazy as he contemplates me now, satisfied no doubt that his pièce de resistance has been got rid of. The only big thing which remains, and for which no tears will be shed by some members on the other side as well as members on this, if it does not get through all its stages this year, is the huge Bill, involving altogether new and strange principles, introduced by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver). In my parliamentary experience I have seen case after case of Bills just as big introduced just as late in the session, quietly laid on the shelf to dry and mature and possibly become improved in the process of maturing; and I am quite sure it is not impossible that this ponderous piece of legislation may be left to simmer during the recess, to be taken up again at the opening of next session. With all these things in his favour, with all these vexed questions out of the way, with a council which is in the closest harmony—each member of it with the other and all with himself—with a party absolutely undivided when it comes to certain questions, whatever divisions there may be on others, with a majority of eighty at his back—what is there to prevent my right hon. friend from going to the other side on the 5th of April and taking his proper place in the conference which is to be held there? There is nothing of sufficiently vital importance in the present stage of legislative work or the questions before us, that appears on the surface, to prevent him from going; and if it will do him any good I promise that for my part—and probably some others might promise on this side for their part—if the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) cuts up too rusty in the rear of the government benches, we will bring as much gentle persuasion as possible on that hon. gentleman to induce him to stay his hand until the summer holidays are passed and a new session begins in November, when he can, with renewed vigour, resume the roll he plays so well. Therefore I add my persuasion to that of my hon. friend in the hope that our joint efforts together with all the other circumstances, will induce my right hon. friend to by no means throw the coming conference into confusion, and possibly contribute to its ultimate disintegration, by his absence from it as the representative of Canada. I think I would be perfectly warranted in saying that this conference is to take place, as defined in the invitation, largely because Canada, under the leadership of her governments and the government of my right hon. friend, has made it possible for the idea of an imperial conference to develop step by step until it assumes the form it has taken to-day. My right hon. friend cannot say, and the people of this country will not admit, that there are not common interests between Canada and the sister colonies, and between these colonies and Great Britain herself so important and far reaching as to make it a matter of indifference that one of the premier colonies should be absent from a conference convened, by their own consent and under their own direction, for discussing their common interests. I earnestly hope therefore that the 5th April will see my right hon. friend sailing with favourable breezes and sunny atmosphere out of one of our good Canadian ports, in one of our good Canadian steamers, bound for the old world, to take his part in a conference of the colonies of the empire, consulting together in order that the common interests of this great aggregation of people may be strengthened and improved.

Mr. H. BOURASSA (Labelle). I could hardly resist the most tender appeal made to me by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). But with all due respect to his patriotic views and his affectionate desire that the first minister should leave his country and parliament be prorogued as soon as possible, I cannot altogether agree with him on the necessity of closing this House in order to enable the right hon. gentleman to leave the week after Easter. It is all very well to say that Canada should be represented in any conference which may be organized in London for the purpose of bringing together the representatives of the various parts of the empire. With that idea I have always agreed most heartily. Of course I did not agree, and still disagree, with the idea propounded by the late Colonial Minister (Mr. Lyttelton) in his letter of invitation addressed to the Canadian as well as the other colonial governments. But fortunately for Canada and the empire at large, there has been a change in England. The common sense of the people has gained control, and no doubt the present conference will be held on the sound basis of good old British policy which has heretofore existed. But just because of that change, I fail to see that there is such imperative necessity for our Prime Minister to be there on the 15th of April, if at all. In 1902 the right hon. gentleman very properly opposed the idea of putting these conferences on a basis of perpetuity or on a regular basis, giving them the form of a regular institution within the empire. What he agreed to—and in that I think he has the support of the large majority of the people of Canada—is that whenever the occasion should arise for the representatives of the various colonies in the empire to meet in London or elsewhere, such conferences should be held.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. A period of four years was fixed by the resolution.

Mr. BOURASSA. Quite so, but it is easy to see by the context of the discussion that although a date was adopted at the time, the idea of putting it on a regular basis was not approved of. When Canada accepted the invitation of Her Majesty's government in 1902, her representatives said positively that the only question which, in their opinion, could be discussed with advantage by the representatives of the various colonies, was the question of reciprocal trade within the empire. In reply to the invitation sent them this year, the government of Canada stated that they had no suggestion to make and no programme to bring before the conference. Therefore I taken it for granted that the position taken by the Canadian government in 1902 is still the position now held and which will be held during the coming conference. Therefore the only question then on which the Canadian government have given notice, both to the British government and to the Canadian people, that they were ready to meet the other colonies in conference is the question of trade. I take it for granted that the Canadian representatives have no mandate to agree upon any change in the constitution of the empire or the relations between Canada and the empire regarding either imperial defence or the imperial council itself. There is nothing to warrant the First Minister or any of his colleagues in taking any other position, as far as imperial defence and imperial council is concerned.

Mr. SPROULE. Would it not be regarded as a matter of some importance that the Prime Minister should be present to consider any matters submitted from Australia or New Zealand or any other colonies ?

Mr. BOURASSA. Yes, but to what end ? And on this point I want to make myself clear. So far as defence is concerned, so far as the constitution of an imperial council is concerned, both in the official correspondence and in the attitude taken by the Canadian government during the conference in 1902, the Canadian people have received the assurance that the Canadian representatives would not consent to any change in the political status of the empire or to any change in the military organization of the empire.

Mr. SAM HUGHES. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) kindly point out what authority the Canadian ministers would have for making any such change—adopting any such resolution ?

Mr. BOURASSA. That is what I say—they have no authority to make any change.

Mr. SAM HUGHES. Are they seeking such——

Mr. BOURASSA. No, that is not what I am saying. What I say is that they have no right to go there, and presume the enactment of parliament and contrary to what appears in the correspondence, to take a contrary attitude to that which they took in 1902. With regard to trade matters, the Canadian representatives defined their position quite clearly, at the last conference in a memorandum, which, was, if I am not mistaken, prepared by the Minister of Finance with the concurrence of his colleagues. He stated then that the Canadian government were prepared to act on the line of reciprocal arrangements somewhat further by increasing the preference granted to British goods, if the British people and government were prepared to give a preference to Canada ; otherwise, said perhaps not in these terms—but in effect—the Canadian government and parliament will hold themselves free to reconsider their position with regard to the preference.

The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) has spoken of the necessity of the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) being there at the opening of the conference in order to take advantage of the enthusiasm that may exist. I think we may count upon the wise action of the present British government to prevent any enthusiasm which might carry the representatives of the various colonies beyond the lines of sound policy which should govern the relation of Great Britain and the other parts of the empire. I think we can safely rely upon the representatives of the Campbell-Bannerman government in that conference to prevent that kind of enthusiasm, and therefore, I think it is not exactly necessary that the Prime Minister should be there to take advantage of such enthusiasm.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. He should be there to restrain it, should he not ?

Mr. BOURASSA. I do not think there would be any necessity for that either. I think that the British Liberals will settle it this time, and that no colonial, either a Liberal or a Conservative, will find himself urgently called upon to play the role of a jingo-imperialist at that conference.

Now, there is something more. If you read carefully the correspondence which has been laid before parliament, you will find, first, as I have stated, that the Canadian government have replied that they have no suggestion to make, no programme to offer, nor any subject to propose for discussion ; second that they ask for permission to give a certain standing in the conference to other ministers besides the premier. Upon the latter point, they were given the cold shoulder. Later they stated that the Canadian parliament would be likely to be in session in April and asked if the date of the conference could not be changed to a later time. On that also they were given the cold shoulder. I am not stating this as a reproach to the British government, but as showing that the British government—very sensibly—are not anxious to have such great changes made in the constitution of the empire, nor anxious that all the prime ministers of the colonies should be there in order to adopt momentous resolutions with regard to the policy of the empire. My deep conviction is that the present government in England have continued the invitation issued by the late government because it was issued, and because they did not want—and again very sensibly—to be accused of discourtesy towards the colonies. But the work that the colonial ministers will have to do during that conference is not of such importance that the Prime Minister of Canada should be forced to leave his duties as Prime Minister of Canada, forced to abandon the leadership of the Canadian parliament ; for, the first duty of the Prime Minister is to the parliament of Canada and the first duty of the parliament of Canada is to look after the interests of the people of Canada, to make wise laws for Canada and take good care of the money of the Canadian people. And all this shows very clearly one of the inconveniences of the system which has been propounded, and justifies the attitude, the rather reluctant attitude, taken by the representatives of Canada at the last conference with regard to such colonial conferences as have been proposed. The idea of a colonial conference, I agree, is an excellent one—that the representatives of the the colonies should meet in London once in a while, when need arises, in order to discuss in the most friendly way among themselves and with the representatives of the British government all questions of common interest. This, I say, is an excellent idea. But to give this conference in any way the status of a parliament, to give it priority over the parliaments of the several self-governing parts of the empire, is an idea, against which I, for one, protest. And when the Canadian parliament is sitting, unless the session is about to close, when it is a mere question of a few days, and there is nothing of importance to be dealt with, in fact, unless the Prime Minister can abandon parliament to go to the conference as he would abandon it to go off on any important business in Canada, I claim that the duty of the Prime Minister of Canada, as the duty of the Prime Minister of Australia or any other colony, would be to reply to the British ministry that the first claim upon him is that of the parliament of which he is the head, and not of the empire at large. I agree with the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) when he says : 'Canada first, and the empire after.' The Prime Minister has no right to abandon this parliament at a stage when the security of the institutions of Canada might be at stake.

The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) says that there are no other important matters to come before the House. It may be that there are no other matters of importance in the opinion of the hon. gentleman. But in the opinion of the great majority of the people of Canada, there is one thing of the deepest importance to be settled, and that is the question of the honour of the parliament of Canada itself. There are many members of parliament to-day whose honour is under suspicion. I am not going to enter now upon that subject, because it is the one that I am to discuss tomorrow. But it is far more important than the voting of money or the passing of laws, and parliament should not progrogue before the honour of every member of this House has been vindicated. The Prime Minister has no right to go to London while members of this parliament, including ministers and ex-ministers stand under suspicion of having violated the independence of parliament or of being unworthy to be representatives of the people of Canada. These are the accusations that have been made broadcast in the press of this country. Echoes of these accusations have found their way into this parliament; and I say that this parliament cannot prorogue, and the Prime Minister cannot leave, until the honour of parliament and the honour of the people whom it represents has been redeemed.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). I heartily concur in the statement made by my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) that the first duty of the Prime Minister of this parliament is to this parliament and to this Dominion. But one may make that statement, I am sure, without in any way departing from a sense of the obligation which Canada assumes as a part of the great empire to which we are all proud to belong. So, while I concur with my hon. friend that the Prime Minister must give his first thought and consideration to the duties that rest upon him as Prime Minister, it is nevertheless most desirable—and on this point I differ from my hon. friend from Labelle—and it is not only desirable, but most important, that the Prime Minister should be present at a very early stage of the great conference, and if possible at the very opening stage of it.

Mr. BOURASSA. I have to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to do me justice. He is not differing with me on that point; I agree that it is most desirable that the Prime Minister should be there, if his duty does not keep him here.

Mr. FIELDING. There are duties to Canada which can best be performed in Canada, and chiefly in the parliament of Canada; but there are also duties to Canada which can be performed in other parts of the world, and notably in the capital of the empire. So, I am glad to know that my hon. friend from Labelle does not differ with me in that respect, but agrees that it is very desirable that the Prime Minister should be present at this conference, and present, if possible, at its opening session. I regard this as important, not because Canada has any great proposal of her own to present, not because Canada has any grievance of her own to present. We are in the happy position of being contented with our lot as part of the British empire. We have practically no grievance, and therefore we have not even asked the conference to place on its paper any special subject as to which we desire to make representations. Some of our sister colonies have presented subjects, subjects which interest them, and subjects which are of interest to every portion of the British empire. But whether we are able or not to agree with our brethren from the sisters colonies as to the merits of these proposals, we can all agree surely that if these subjects are to be discussed in a colonial conference, in a conference which is gradually growing in importance, even though we do not ourselves present any subjects for discussion, it is desirable that representatives of Canada, and above all that the Prime Minister of Canada, should be present in order that he may confer with his brethren from the other colonies, and assist them with his judgment and with his wisdom, and at all events, that he should be able to place on record the views which Canada may entertain as respects these various subjects. In this view I regard it as very desirable and very important that the Prime Minister should be present.

So far as the statements of hon. gentlemen opposite are made with the purpose of facilitating his departure, I join in welcoming those statements very sincerely. I do not think there is any reason to complain as to the progress of what I may call the business proper of the House; I do not think there is any ground for complaint that there has been what sometimes is called, in parliamentary practice, obstruction. We have had several discussions which some of us think perhaps were unnecessary, and what I might for convenience call the side-shows of politics. But on the ordinary business of the House, as regards the various measures presented, as regards the consideration of the estimates, as regards all the routine business of the House, I frankly say that we have no reason to complain of the action of hon. gentlemen opposite. The business of the House has been reasonably facilitated, and I have no reason to doubt it will continue to be facilitated.

We must, however, point out that if perchance Canada should not be represented at the conference—and I trust there is no particular need of that 'if'—but if it should turn out that she were unrepresented, it would only be realizing what we had some ground to fear at the beginning. The colonial conference of 1902 met, I think, in the month of June, which is a convenient period for Canada to be represented. When it was proposed that the conference of 1907 should meet in April, we pointed out at once that there was a doubt as to whether Canada could conveniently be represented. My hon. friend the leader of the opposition has read from the despatch; permit me to read from it again in order to emphasize it. In the minute of the Privy Council of the 20th of June, 1906, it is stated :

The Rt. Hon. the Prime Minister observes, with reference to the said despatch, that the 15th of April usually falls within the session of the Canadian parliament. A change has just been made in the Canada fiscal year, the effect of which upon the disposal of parliamentary business has yet to be ascertained. It is contemplated that parliament should meet in November, and that an adjournment for some time shall take place before Christmas. Very important business will engage the attention of parliament at the coming session, and it is not unlikely that the session will continue up to and beyond April 15. For these reasons the Prime Minister observes that the postponement of the conference for a month would be convenient to the Canadian government, and would probably ensure the attendance upon the conference of Canadian representatives who would be unable to attend if parliament were still in session.

That view was presented to the imperial government, and they replied that the 15th of April, which was chosen, would be convenient to the ministers from the other colonies, and they hoped that Canada would not press for a change. Thereupon Canada recognized the difficulties of the situation and in another despatch containing the minute of council passed in October 17, it is stated :

The Committee of the Privy Council, to whom said despatch was referred, submit that with regard to the date fixed for the conference the committee appreciate the reasons against any change and they can only express a hope that the business of the session of the Canadian parliament may be concluded at a early date enough to permit Canadian representatives to attend the conference.

Now if it were found that the business of the Canadian parliament could not reasonably be concluded in time to permit the representatives of Canada to attend the conference, I do not know that anybody would have any ground to complain. There would be a just cause for regret, every member of this parliament, I am sure, would regret the circumstances which prevented Canada being adequately represented upon that occasion. But it so happens that the date for this colonial conference is fixed at a very inconvenient time, and when we pointed out the inconvenience, and we were told that the convenience of the other colonies would be best suited by taking this date, of course, we had to make the best of the matter, and endeavour to comply with the requirements of the imperial government.

Mr. FIELDING.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. This was put forward something more than a month ago.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, it was originally proposed earlier. But my hon. friend will see at once that in anticipating that possibly parliament might still be in session on the 15th of April, we were only anticipating what was reasonable, and what any gentleman familiar with parliamentary practice might have foreseen.

Now with regard to the point as to the status of ministers other than the Prime Minister, I think hon. gentlemen will agree that if these ministers are to be present, it is very desirable their status should be properly defined at the beginning, that there should not be room for any misunderstanding. That was the idea presented by the Canadian government in the several despatches which have been read by the leader of the opposition. The position taken by the British government is, not that we are wrong, but that on the whole it is better that that point should be determined by the conference itself. We thought that perhaps by consultation with the representatives of the various colonial governments the change might have been made by common consent, but the imperial authorities having raised the question that it was one which could be best considered by the conference itself, we have nothing further to say upon it. I can only say in conclusion that I heartily sympathize with every word that has been said in the House as to the desirability of Canada being represented at the conference, and represented by the Prime Minister, not because we have any subject matter to bring forward, not because we have any grievance to present, but because, if these conferences are to be held from time to time, surely it is proper that Canada, the first colony of the empire, should be represented, that she should be represented adequately, and represented above all by the Prime Minister. I trust therefore that on both sides what has been said to-day will help facilitate the transaction of business, not because I think there has been any delay or any obstruction. I hope that we will agree to facilitate business in order that Canada may be represented at the opening of the conference by the right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). With what the Minister of Finance says I am sure the House will cordially agree. There did seem to be a tinge of disappointment in his feeling owing to the fact that the conference was not appointed at a time to suit the convenience of the Canadian parliament, which it seems to me would have been better left out. We must remember that people cannot always get their own way, but it does not necessarily follow that their own way must be wrong. When the majority of the other colonial dependencies have so much at stake, and their representatives would have so much further to come than those of Canada, surely Canada ought to be prepared to concede something, and to make an extra effort to meet the convenience of the other colonies. But I rose more particularly to say a word with regard to the observations of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa). He seemed to say, as between himself and the Minister of Finance, that there was not much difference. I took down his words as I think correctly, and I understood the member for Labelle to say that he was opposed to any conference except it was of the most formal character, one that might last for a day or two.

Mr. BOURASSA. On the contrary, I said I was in favour of the idea, but I was opposed to the idea of making them permanent institutions.

Mr. SPROULE. Well, if the hon. member is in favour of the idea, how can he be opposed to making them permanent, to holding them periodically ? There seems to be a strange inconsistency in his position. If he is in favour of the principle of holding consultations between the colonies and the empire, how can he be opposed to holding them periodically ? I can only tell the hon. gentleman that if he had been in England at one time in the history of the British empire, and not so very long ago, I am afraid he would have been dubbed as a little Englander.

Mr. BOURASSA. Oh, that is dead.

Mr. SPROULE. It may be dead. I have no doubt the hon. gentleman would like it to be dead.

Mr. BOURASSA. In England I would be regarded as a good British Liberal the same as I am here.

Mr. SPROULE. The whole trend of the hon. gentleman's observations fails to show much to that affect. He says that the first duty of the Prime Minister is here, that his first duty is in the Canadian parliament. He saw no reason why we should have that conference at all or why the Prime Minister should abandon his duty here to take part in it. If the hon. gentleman says there is no reason why the Prime Minister should take part in the conference he is opposed to it. He does not see that the time of the colonial Prime Ministers could be advantageously employed at a consultation in regard to questions which may be of value or interest to the empire and the colonies. Therefore I say that in the most natural sense of the term he would be regarded in many parts of the world as a very small Little Englander. In regard to the importance of that conference the hon. member for Labelle says that no obligation rests upon the Prime Minister to be present. The Prime Minister has been there before. He has expressed a desire with other of his ministers to be present at that conference for the purpose of taking part in discussions in regard to questions with which they might be more intimately acquainted than he is. He has taken part in these conferences before. He has also expressed his willingness to take part in them again. He has expressed his opinion that they are valuable both to the empire and to the colonies, and yet if that be so how is it that the hon. member for Labelle can see no reason why the Prime Minister should be present at that conference or why there is any obligation resting upon him to attend. Governments and nations are built up by evolution and that evolution goes on constantly and perpetually. New questions arise as conditions change that become proper subjects for consultation and advice from time to time, and I do not know of any gathering of representatives of the colonies and the mother country that would be more important for that purpose or more desirable than periodical conferences. They have started well. They have been carried on for a number of years; the principle has been accepted and established not only by the colonial premiers themselves but by the mother country as well, and will it be said, after they have been carried on so long, that the premier colony of the British empire shall abandon these conferences and allow them to die from inanition ? That would be practically what it would mean if the first colony of the empire were unrepresented. It is true that the present government have submitted no question for consideration at that conference, but even though they have not there will be a number of important questions discussed there in which the Dominion government is interested, in which the British empire is interested and in which the representatives of Canada might very well give valuable advice. If that be the case then it becomes important that the Premier of Canada be present and others of his ministers as well for that purpose. Even though no question may be proposed by Canada, even though Canada may be satisfied with her relationship with the mother country at the present time, is it not important that her advice which has been sought by the mother country should be given by the Premier of Canada representing the premier colony of the British empire? I think it is most important and most desirable. I think this is one of the most valuable conferences that has been started and kept up for the last half century in the British empire. It is a move in the right direction and to abandon it to-day would be practically to give it its death blow. If that be the case I can understand how desirable it would be that the Prime Minister should be present and be present at the early stage of the conference as well, because it is at the early stage that the trend will be given to the events which transpire afterwards. Whatever may be the trend of events it will be such as will be initiated from the first and if advice is not given at the first in regard to the nature of the conference it will be very difficult to control it in many respects after the work has gone on for a length of time. For these reasons, in my judgment it is very important, in the interest of the British empire, in the interest of the colonies and in the interest of the continuance of the cordial relations between the sister colonies themselves and between the colonies and the empire, that the premier colony of the British empire should be represented. We have shown not only our desire but our willingness, our inclination and our disposition to help in every possible way that we can to facilitate the aim of the Prime Minister to attend that conference, and I think that the government should bring their best efforts to bear upon the work of the House so that they may also facilitate that aim and so that the premier may be able to carry it out at the proper time.

Mr. SAM. HUGHES (Victoria and Haliburton). Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the House and the country will be under a debt of gratitude to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) for the proposal which he has made to facilitate the attendance of the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) at the colonial conference. An interesting episode in connection with this matter is that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has dictated to the Prime Minister what his attitude is to be in the conference, how far he is to proceed along certain lines and how far he is not to proceed along other lines. He waxes very eloquent over the possibility of this conference arrogating to itself the control of the empire at large and undertaking to give to its deliberations the force of law. Now, Sir, let me give the right hon. First Minister a suggestion. Some years ago when the young gentleman, the hon. member for Labelle, was commencing to kick over the traces the First Minister whipped him into line for the time being by appointing him secretary of the commission appointed to deal with questions affecting the relations of Canada and the United States. That nursed the young gentleman along for a certain time, but he has become obstreperous of late. Let me give the right hon. Prime Minister another suggestion. I would suggest that he take him over to England to carry the carpet bag if for no other purpose, or if not to act as secretary; take him over to carry the bundles, and I will give you my word that the young gentleman will be quiet for another couple of sessions or so in the House. Another suggestion that I would make to the right hon. First Minister is this: The House is about to ajourn on Wednesday evening next for some holiday business. I might suggest to the right hon. First Minister that he cancel the motion of which he has given notice and allow the House to sit Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Monday and thus facilitate the business in place of allowing those members from distant provinces to go back to their homes. If that suggestion is adopted the public will be convinced that we are trying to do some business instead of being eager to take holidays. If the Prime Minister has to leave so as to be in England in time for the opening of the conference he can leave behind him some of his colleagues to look after the House. He might leave the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) to give the young men sitting behind him an opportunity of falling in line under that hon. gentleman as the coming leader. Or, in case the Finance Minister has to go, there might be an opportunity for the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Emmerson) or the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) to show his skill as leader. Or we might have a chance to see how the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Templeman) would shine in that capacity, or how the ambitious Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth) or his right hand man would bear the responsibility of the leadership. I offer the suggestion to the right hon. First Minister that he create some post for the hon. member for Labelle and take him away with him, and in the second place I suggest that he cancel the motion and let the House sit on Thursday, Friday, Saturday and Monday. There are four good days during which the members of this House might be conducting the business of this country and not dawdling around the country and taking holidays like a set of school children.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I make no reproach to my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), that he has a different idea as to the importance of this conference, from that which I entertain. But, I desire to say to him that he evidently has not comprehended the resolution which was passed in 1902. He has spoken as if that resolution provided for the calling of a conference only on special occasions, whereas, it is expressly provided that the conferences shall take place at intervals not exceeding four years. I cannot find anything in the context, to which my hon. friend has referred me, which takes away the force of that statement. Resolutions of previous conferences are recited, and then the following is the only context which is of any importance:

It was the general opinion that it was desirable to take a step in advance of that resolution, and while leaving due latitude for any political exigencies which might render it difficult for the Prime Ministers to leave their colonies at a date fixed in advance; at the same time to indicate that the conferences should not wait for some special object, but should take place as a rule at fixed periods unless there is some reason to the contrary.

This, declares that the conference shall be held at fixed periods, and I think my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) will admit I was right in my concepton of the resolution of 1902. My hon. friend from Labelle, in the warmth of debate, went perhaps a little further than he intended to.

Mr. BOURASSA. So far as this is concerned?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. No, but when he stated it was not important that the Prime Minister should be at the conference on the 15th of April, or on any day——

Mr. BOURASSA. I did not say it was not important that the Prime Minister should be present at any conference, but I did say that in view of the position of this government and of the present British government towards the present conference, I did not see any necessity that the Prime Minister of Canada should be at the conference this year at all.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. My hon. friend is fully entitled to his own judgment about that, and I have no doubt he gives it in all sincerity. I differ from this view. For instance, some of the subjects suggested for discussion at the conference are not controversial, such as the question of naturalization, and the question of preferential trade proposed by this very government—for the resolution of 1902 was passed on the motion of the Canadian government.

Mr. BOURASSA. Does my hon. friend imagine that the present British government would favour anything like the preferential trade policy which was propounded by the Canadian government in 1902?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am not imagining anything. but I say that this government put forward in 1902 a policy from which as a government they have not receded—unless we are to judge by some more or less casual expressions of opinion by the Minister of Agriculture and which he says were not given by him as a member of the government, but as a farmer. Apart from that, I do not know that there has been any retractation by this government of the policy they put forward to the imperial government in 1902, and it contained, as my hon. friend from Labelle knows, a pretty distinct intimation to the British government that unless they are prepared to give to Canadian products a preference in the British markets, they might expect to have the preference granted to British products in our market withdrawn whenever it pleased the Canadian government to withdraw it. I would think that these two subjects—not considering at all some of the others which may be regarded as more or less controversial—are of some interest to Canada and the empire, and it would, therefore, be important that the Prime Minister should be on hand on April 15.

My hon. friend from Labelle has referred to matters of some importance which he proposes to bring to the attention of the House to-morrow. If these matters should prove to be of the importance he mentions, and undoubtedly they are important. I would be prepared to insist with him, that the session should not conclude until these matters had received due inquiry and investigation. It was in that view that I suggested to the Prime Minister, that we should not prorogue, but should adjourn for the purpose of enabling him to discharge the duty which he owes to Canada and to the empire of attending that colonial conference.

I would avail myself of this opportunity to refer to the statement made in some newspapers in this country—notwithstanding my declaration in this House on a previous occasion—that there is some arrangement between the two parties with regard to what my hon. friend from Labelle proposes to bring forward to-morrow, and I repeat my statement that there is no such arrangement and that there never has been the semblance or the suggestion of such an arrangement. I want to say, that any statement to the contrary is as false a statement as ever proceeded from the pen or from the lips of any man in this House or elsewhere. I desire to make myself perfectly plain, and clear. and explicit, on that point. There never was a statement more absolutely unwarranted, more absolutely false, than that statement which has been made with regard to myself, and also with regard to hon. gentlemen on the other side, if I am supposed to be included in it. I have had no communication with the government, or any member of the government, or any gentleman on the other side of the House, with regard to what my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) proposes to bring forward. I did have a short conference with my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) on the subject, and he is perfectly at liberty to stand up and proclaim from the house tops what that conversation was about.

Mr. BOURASSA. Does my hon. friend say that I made any statement to the effect that he had entered into an arrangement with the government?

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Not at all. My hon. friend absolutely misunderstands me. I say that I did ask my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) a question as to what he would propose, and that my hon. friend from Labelle is perfectly at liberty to say what took place between us. He knows it did not contain anything in the nature of an arrangement, and my hon. friend from Labelle will do me the justice of saying that.

Mr. BOURASSA. Quite so.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) knows that I did not suggest to him in any way, that he should withdraw, or minimize any matter he had to bring forward against any hon. gentleman on this side of the House. I know he will do me the justice to confirm my statement as to that.

Mr. BOURASSA. I confirm that entirely.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. And further, the interview which I had with my hon. friend from Labelle took place after these statements appeared in the public press, so that there was not even that foundation for them at the time they were made. I shall have something further to say, perhaps, when this matter is debated to-morrow upon whatever resolution my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) may bring forward.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance has stated his position with regard to this conference, very much according to my own view of what is the proper position for us to take. But, I would hardly be inclined to think that the Prime Minister of Canada should not go to that conference, or, that Canada should be unrepresented at that conference merely by reason of the fact that we have no grievance. Perhaps the Minister of Finance did not mean to imply that. Even if we have no grievance, there are important subjects proposed for consideration, and it is only proper that Canada should be represented by its Prime Minister who is the only person that can represent her under the constitution of the conference. It is true that the conference is fixed at a not very convenient time for Canada, but the Minister of Finance will realize that in view of the change in the date for calling the sessions of the Canadian parliament, the month of April would correspond to the month of June under the former system. June he describes as a convenient month. We have frequently sat here in June, in July, and even in August. April will now be very much what June was to us before; and we have to recollect that this empire, of which we are proud to form a part, is so enormous in area that winter to us is summer to those on the other side of the world, who also hold their sessions in the winter season. Therefore it was necessary for the imperial government, in fixing a date convenient for all, to fix it not later than April 15. In doing so they conceded something to Canada, because we know that in the first instance it was proposed on behalf of Australasia and New Zealand that the conference should begin in March. I do not think I have anything further to add except to express the very sincere hope that the Prime Minister will be able, notwithstandng the urgency of any public business in parliament to which of course he owes a very firm duty, to be in attendance at the opening of the Colonial Conference on April 15.

Motion (Mr. R. L. Borden) to adjourn, negatived.

INJURIOUS POST CARDS.

Mr. R. N. WALSH (Huntingdon). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Postmaster General if he is aware that there are going through the mails post cards coated wholly or in part with isinglass, which is extremely injurious to the mail clerks ? The Postmaster General of the United States has prohibited these post cards from being sent through the mails, and I wish to ask the Postmaster General if he intends to take any action in the matter ?

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Postmaster General). I am aware that complaints have been made to the department with regard to such post cards. I think there is already a regulation against their admission. At all events, I will inquire into the matter.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). In view of the approach of the close of the fiscal year, or the fiscal period, as it is quite evident that we shall not have our Supply Bill completed at the opening of the new fiscal year, I wish to announce that I intend to-day or to-morrow to take the first steps towards asking for an appropriation equal to one-fifth of so much of the estimates as may not have already been passed through committee. If that be approved, we shall then introduce a Supply Bill covering all the appropriations which the House has already voted upon and one-fifth of the remainder, leaving the discussion of these to a later stage. I shall be very glad to have the co-operation of hon. gentlemen opposite in promoting that measure when it comes forward to-day or to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. I may say that there will be no opposition to that proposal from this side of the House.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 112) respecting the British America Assurance Company.—Mr. McCarthy (Simcoe.)

Bill (No. 120) to incorporate the Travellers' Indemnity Company of Canada.—Mr. Bickerdike.

Bill (No. 93) to incorporate the Eastern Canada Manufacturers' Mutual Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Calvert.

TRADERS' FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

House in committee on Bill (No. 110) respecting the Traders' Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Johnston.

Mr. MILLER. I wish to move that this Bill be referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce. There seems to be some misunderstanding as to section 16 which was amended to increase the amount of paid-up capital stock required.

Mr. FIELDING. I will assent to the motion, but in doing so I would not like to be understood as agreeing to any change. I think the object of the Bill as it stands is consistent with the general policy of parliament, but I have no objection to it being referred back for further consideration.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL. I think that the Bill in its present shape is not the Bill as it passed the committee. There has been a mistake either on the part of the department or the members of the committee, and it is very desirable it should be referred back.

Mr. FIELDING. I have no objections but I would not like to accept the implication that there is anything to correct. After the Bill was reported by the committee, several members of the committee said they had not understood the effect of a motion which was carried. I did not think there ought to have been any misunderstanding, but inasmuch as some members said they did not understand when they voted, I see no reason why they should not be given an opportunity of going over the Bill again.

Progress reported.

Mr. MILLER moved that the Bill be referred back to the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 129) to incorporate the Winnipeg and Northwestern Railway Company.—Mr. McCraney.

Bill (No. 130) respecting the Algoma Central and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Mr. Dyment.

Bill (No. 132) respecting the Manitoulin and North Shore Railway Company.—Mr. Dyment.

QUESTIONS.

PROVINCIAL SUBSIDIES AND BOUNDARIES.

Mr. LEFURGEY asked :

1. What additions to subsidies or allowances have been made to each of the different provinces since confederation, when, and on what account ?

2. What additions in territory or enlargement of boundaries have been made with respect to each of the provinces since confederation, and when ?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). The first part of the hon. gentleman's question can hardly be answered briefly, but the information is contained in a memorandum which I will send to him and which will serve the purpose. In reply to the second question the only province the boundaries of which have been enlarged by any act of parliament of Canada, is the province of Manitoba, the enlargement having taken place under the Act of 1881. As respects any other province, there have been definitions of boundaries but no enlargements.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the title of the first paper ?

Mr. FIELDING. It is a memorandum prepared by the Deputy Minister of Finance at the time the provincial subsidies were discussed in connection with Saskatchewan and Alberta. I do not remember whether it was included in the parliamentary papers or not. Perhaps I had better lay it on the table and have it included at a later stage.

NEW ZEALAND FLAX.

Mr. ELSON asked :

1. Has the attention of the government been directed to the matter of trying, as an experiment, at the Experimental Farm, the growing of a certain plant known as New Zealand flax, which is favourably spoken of by Mr. J. S. Larke, Canadian commercial agent in Australasia, in Weekly Report No. 155, January, 1907, as being a plant likely to furnish a strong and cheap fibre for the manufacture of binder twine ; and which plant he thinks would grow to perfection in the low-lying or wet lands of certain portions of the Dominion of Canada ; and that the growing of such plant in the Dominion as fibre for twine might result in the manufacture of as good twine as the farmers now get, and at lower prices ?

2. If the government has not already commenced the trial of such experiment, is it their intention to do so ?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture) :

1. The New Zealand flax (Phormium tenax), mentioned by Mr. J. S. Larke in Weekly Report No. 155 of the Department of Trade and Commerce, January 14, 1907, is a sub-tropical plant which has been experimented with in the greenhouse at the Central Experimental Farm, along with other tender fibre plants such as jute, ramie and cotton, for the instruction of visitors. Some six or seven years ago there were several thrifty plants of the New Zealand flax growing in the greenhouse at the Central Farm and early in the summer they were planted out in a suitable bed to test their hardiness. They were well established before winter, but the first severe frost killed them.

The New Zealand flax is a native of New Zealand, where it is cultivated for its fibre, It is also grown in some parts of Australia, in the south of France, in Algiers, California, and other sub-tropical regions; but it is not hardy enough to endure the frosts of northern climates.

2. The government has no intention of attempting to grow this sub-tropical plant as a crop in this country.

HUDSON BAY COMPANY.

Mr. BOURASSA asked:

1. Is the Department of the Interior, or any department of the government, in possession of the original or of a copy of, Colony Register A of the Hudson Bay Company?

2. If a copy only is in the possession of the government, where is the original to be found?

3. If there is no such copy or original, was either one or the other ever in the possession of the government?

4. If there was, when and how did it disappear?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (for the Minister of the Interior):

1. No.

2. What purported to be a copy of Register A was obtained in 1900, through the agent of Dominion lands at Winnipeg. It is understood that the original is in the Hudson Bay Company's office in London.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. It is not known how the copy, referred to in answer to question No. 2 disappeared.

Mr. FISHER. We have looked through the archives and can find no trace of these papers.

LORD SELKIRK'S ESTATE.

Mr. BOURASSA asked:

1. Is the Department of the Interior, or any other department of the government, in possession of the original, or of a copy of the land registers of Lord Selkirk's estate in the Northwest, for the period extending from 1812 to 1835?

2. If a copy only is in possession of the government, where is the original to be found?

3. If there is no such copy or original, was either one or the other ever in the possession of the government?

4. If there was, when and how did it disappear?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (for the Minister of the Interior):

1. No.

2. It is not known where the original is to be found.

3. No.

4. Answered by No. 3.

REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. A. LAVERGNE asked:

1. Is the Minister of Justice aware that the text of the Revised Statutes, at present in force, contains several errors in the text?

2. Will the Minister of Justice take steps to prevent such errors from being repeated in the French version, which is now being prepared?

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice):

1. There are several typographical errors, and these are noted in a page of errata to be published with the fourth volume.

2. The gentlemen preparing the French version have instructions to avoid these errors.

MR. MAGLOIRE GRANGER.

Mr. MONK—by Mr. Bergeron—asked:

1. Is Magloire Granger, notary, of St. Jacques de l'Achigan, an excise officer or any other kind of civil servant?

2. What is his salary?

3. When was he appointed?

4. To replace whom was he appointed?

5. At whose request was he appointed?

6. Did he pass the qualifying examinations?

Hon. WM. TEMPLEMAN (Minister of Inland Revenue):

1. Mr. Magloire Granger is a temporary excise officer in the Inland Revenue division of Joliette.

2. His salary is at the rate of $500 per annum.

3. He was appointed April 3, 1906.

4. Said appointment was to replace Mr. M. Légaré.

5. There is nothing on record showing on whose recommendation Mr. Granger was appointed.

6. The department has no advice to the effect that he has passed the qualifying examination.

SUBSIDIES TO THE PROVINCES.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister) moved the following address:

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty:

Most Gracious Sovereign.

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty for the purpose of representing that it is expedient to amend the scale of payments authorized under section 118 of the Act of parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, commonly called the British North America Act, 1867, to be made by Canada to the several provinces of the Dominion for the support of their governments and legislatures by providing that—

A. Instead of the amounts now paid, the sums hereafter payable yearly by Canada to the several provinces for the support of their governments and legislatures, to be according to population, and as follows:

(a) Where the population of the province is under 150,000.. .. .. $100,000

(b) Where the population of the province is 150,000, but does not exceed 200,000.. 150,000

(c) Where the population of the province is 200,000 but does not exceed 400,000.. .. .. $180,000
(d) Where the population of the province is 400,000, but does not exceed 800,000.. 190,000
(e) Where the population of the province is 800,000, but does not exceed 1,500,000.. 220,000
(f) Where the population of the province exceeds 1,500,000.. 240,000

B. Instead of an annual grant per head to the population now allowed, the annual payment hereafter to be at the same rate of eighty cents per head, but on the population of each province, as ascertained from time to time by the last decennial census, until such population exceeds 2,500,000, and at the rate of sixty cents per head for so much of said population as may exceed 2,500,000.

C. An additional allowance to the extent of one hundred thousand dollars annually for ten years to the province of British Columbia.

We pray that Your Majesty may be graciously pleased to cause a measure to be laid before the imperial parliament at its present session, repealing the provisions of section 118 of the British North America Act, 1867, aforesaid, and substituting therefor the scale of payments above set forth, which shall be a final and unalterable settlement of the amounts to be paid yearly to the several provinces of the Dominion for their local purposes and the support of their governments and legislatures.

Such grants shall be paid half-yearly in advance, to each province ; but the government of Canada shall deduct from such grants, as against any province, all sums chargeable as interest on the public debt of that province in excess of the several amounts stipulated in the said Act.

All of which we humbly pray Your Majesty to take into your favourable and gracious consideration.

He said : Mr. Speaker, the terms of this address, in the form of a notice of motion, has been before the House for some days. I ask, by your leave and that of the House to make the amendment of which I have given notice and which is to be found in the Votes and Proceedings of last Friday. This proposed amendment is to add to the address the following paragraph, immediately after paragraph c :

D. Nothing herein contained shall in any way supersede or affect the terms special to any particular province upon which such province became part of the Dominon of Canada or the right of any province to payment of any special grant heretofore made by the parliament of Canada to any province for any special purpose in such grant expressed.

The object of this petition, which I ask parliament to approve, is to obtain an amendment of the particular disposition of our constitution which provides for and regulates the financial terms existing between the Dominion and the provinces. It is now more than forty years since the various conferences took place which laid the foundation of the Canadian confederation. And it is now exactly forty years, this year, since the imperial parliament giving effect to the resolutions which were adopted by the Quebec conference, passed the British North America Act which brought confederation into existence and which, within its four corners, contains the charter of the Dominion's rights, privileges and liberties. It is undoubtedly a right of legitimate gratification and pardonable pride for us Canadians, that nearly half a century has elapsed before any necessity has arisen for substantial alterations in the enactments of the original instrument. And this is undoubtedly, also, an evidence that the work which was undertaken and carried out by the men who arranged this confederation was well done. In this respect we may claim that we have been more fortunate than our neighbours ; for the ink was scarcely dry upon the Act of Union before new articles were added to it, and almost simultaneously with the Act of Union, ten amendments had been added to the original instrument. Two more were added soon afterwards, and there were also the three additional amendments added at a subsequent period as a result of the awful arbitrament of war, that great civil conflict which took place some eighty years after the original contract was made. Yet, though we may be proud of the manner in which our constitution has stood the test of time, it must be admitted that there are certain features as to the sufficiency of which reasonable doubts were entertained from the first, and as to which strong objections were taken. This applies most particularly to the subject which is now before us, the financial terms of the confederation as established under the British North America Act. Section 64 of the Quebec resolutions contained the following enactments :

In consideration of the transfer to the general parliament of the powers of taxation an annual grant in aid of each province shall be made, equal to eighty cents per head of the population, as established by the census of 1861 ; the population of Newfoundland being estimated at 130,000. Such aid shall be in full settlement of all future demands upon the general government for local purposes, and shall be paid half-yearly in advance to each province.

Sir, it is a matter of history that this particular enactment which I have just read was the subject, in the conference, of very warm and even passionate discussion. It is a matter of history that the very idea which is embodied in the enactment was objected to and resisted by some of the ablest men there assembled, the ground taken being that both sound constitutional principle and sound economic principle united to declare that upon the same shoulders should rest the duty and the responsibility of both raising and applying the public revenue. And it is clear that, as a mere abstract proposition, there is great force in this contention. But it is also a matter of history that if the resolutions were passed in a certain form, if the allowance to the provinces were arranged in a certain way, the reason, the paramount reason, was that without such an enactment and such an allowances the provinces would not have consented to enter confederation. This point was made absolutely clear by Mr. Brown in the speech which he delivered in support of the resolution of the Quebec conference before the legislature of Canada, in 1865. Mr. Brown, speaking first upon the division of legislative power between the Dominion and the provinces, went on as follows :

But, Sir, I am told that though true it is that local matters are to be separated and the burden of local expenditure placed upon local shoulders, we have made an exception from that principle in providing that a subsidy of eighty cents per head shall be taken from the federal chest and granted to the local governments for local purposes. Undoubtedly this is the fact—and I do not hesitate to admit that it would have been better if this had been otherwise. I trust I commit no breach of discretion in stating that in conference I was one of the strongest advocates for defraying the whole of the local expenditures of the local governments by means of direct taxation, and that there were liberal men in all sections of the provinces who would gladly have had it so arranged. But, Mr. Speaker, there was one difficulty in the way—a difficulty which has often before been encountered in this world—and that difficulty was simply this, it could not be done. We could neither have carried it in conference, nor yet in any one of the existing provincial legislatures. Our friends in Lower Canada, I am afraid, have a constitutional disinclination to direct taxation, and it was obvious that if the confederation scheme had had attached to it a provision for the imposition of such a system of taxation, my honourable friends opposite would have had a much better chance of success in blowing the bellows of agitation than they now have. The objection, moreover, was not confined to Lower Canada—all the lower provinces stood in exactly the same position. They have not a municipal system such as we have, discharging many of the functions of government, but their general government performs all the duties which in Upper Canada devolve upon our municipal councils, as well as upon parliament. If then the lower provinces had been asked to maintain their customs duties for federal purposes, and to impose on themselves by the same Act direct taxation for all their local purposes, the chances of carrying the scheme of union would have been greatly lessened.

The objection moreover was not confined to Lower Canada. The lower provinces stood in exactly the same position. They have not a municipal system such as we have, discharging many of the functions of government ; but their general government performs all the duties which in Upper Canada devolved upon our municipal councils as well as upon parliament. If then the lower provinces had asked to maintain their customs duties for other purposes and to impose on themselves by the same fact direct taxation for all their local purposes, the chances of carrying the scheme of union would have been greatly lessened.

This testimony is conclusive. Lower Canada would not have entered confederation if, as a consequence, she had been obliged to resort to direct taxation to levy the revenues necessary to carry on her domestic affairs. What was true of Lower Canada was equally true of the maritime provinces. Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, would not have agreed to enter confederation if, as a consequence, direct taxation had to be resorted to. That was not, however, Mr. Brown's idea. Notwithstanding all the authority which attaches to the name of Mr. Brown, and the reverence which for my part I profess for his memory, I am quite sure that upon this occasion he was not accurate in his estimate. Nothing that has taken place in Quebec since confederation has shown that in that respect they were any different from the people of the other provinces. It is quite true that there was in Ontario as well as in Quebec a system of municipal taxation which had somewhat familiarized the people of those provinces with the idea of direct taxation. But I have not seen that the people of Ontario, in addition to the burden which they had to carry to maintain their municipal institutions, would have been willing to tax themselves to carry on the burden of their legislature. Ever since the British provinces of North America have been granted representative government, the only mode, so far as my information goes, by which they carry on their domestic affairs, their municipal government and their legislatures, has been by means of customs excise duties. Therefore it is not to be wondered at that when the provinces represented at that conference agreed to surrender to the central government the exclusive power of taxation by way of customs and excise, they should at the same time have stipulated as a condition precedent that a certain portion of the revenue thus collected should be returned to them, and a portion sufficient to permit them, without having recourse to direct taxation, to carry on their provincial affairs. This is the reason of the enactment which we have before us in the 64th resolution of the Quebec conference to which I have just called the attention of the House ; it was one of the many compromises which had to be made in order to render confederation possible, and without which probably confederation would have remained but a dream.

Here again we have another evidence of the paramount influence which was exercised by Mr. Brown in the events of that epoch. Sir John Macdonald, although a very effective worker in bringing about confederation, still only entered the field at the eleventh hour. Mr. Brown had been in the field from the dawn of the day, and it was his agitation which brought on the crisis of 1864. When that crisis promised to realize the idea for which he had so long struggled, he allowed no obstacle to stand in the way, he did not hesitate to make the sacrifice of some of his long cherished convictions when he found that such sacrifice was necessary in order to obtain the adhesion and concurrence of all classes of men whose adhesion and concurrence were essential. For instance in the matter of education, though he had been all his life a consistent opponent of separate schools, he did not hesitate to accept separate schools in the new constitution in order thereby to secure the concurrence of the minority in Quebec and the minority in Ontario. In the matter which now concerns us he resolutely set aside his own views and adopted views in which he had but little confidence. The union of the provinces was the supreme end he had in view, and that end was attained.

Upon this point we have not only the testimony of Mr. Brown, but we have also the testimony of another member of the conference of 1864. Col. John Hamilton Grey was a member of the conference as a delegate from the province of New Brunswick. In the year 1872 he published a book in which is to be found a narration of the events which took place at the conference. There is in the book an especially important chapter concerning the contest between the two sides, between those who favoured such an allowance as is now embodied in the Confederation Act, and those who opposed it, and he gives a very interesting narration of the almost superhuman difficulties that stood in the way of a reconciliation of the opposing views on this subject. Speaking first of the method of taxation which then prevailed in the maritime provinces, and to which I have alluded, he goes on in this way :

It was absurd, therefore, to suppose that the delegates from those provinces could consent to any propositions for union that did not make adequate provisions for meeting the existing wants and contributions to which their people had been accustomed. It was equally hard to make the representatives of the people of Upper Canada understand that that was right. In vain was argument used. It amounted to nothing. Unless some compromise could be effected the discussion about union might as well cease. Subsidies were proposed, the expenses of each local government in calculation, reduced to the smallest figure—the general government assumed the burden of every expenses that could possibly be considered of a general character—but still as the distribution was to be by population the provinces of Upper Canada would receive what it did not want, while the others did not get what they did want. Agreement seemed hopeless, and on or about the tenth morning after the convention met, the conviction was general that it must break up without coming to any conclusion. The terms of mutual concession and demand had been drawn to their extremist tension and silence was all around. At last a proposition was made that the convention should adjourn for the day, and that in the meantime the Finance Ministers of the several provinces should meet, discuss the matter among themselves, and see if they could not agree upon something. Accordingly, Messrs. Brown and Galt on behalf of Canada, Dr. Tupper and Mr. Archibald of Nova Scotia, Mr. Tilley of New Brunswick, Mr. Pope of Prince Edward Island, and Mr. Shea of Newfoundland, withdrew for that purpose.

On the following morning they reported the conclusions at which they had arrived. These with some modifications, after some discussion, were ultimately adopted by the convention, reduced the resolutions, and the 'financial crisis' passed away.

This is a graphic description. We can almost see with our eyes these strong and able men, sitting at the council board speechless in face of a deadlock which would have ended in an ignominous rupture of the conference had not some mode of conciliation been found. At last however these men rose to the occasion and discovered a way out of the deadlock by mutual concession. And here again we have presented to us a fact which we must always keep in mind. It is well to recollect, especially in a country composed of so many diverse elements as we have in this confederation, that no great reform can be achieved except at the sacrifice of some opinion, even by those who are the most ardently in favour of it. The true reformer is not he who always adheres stubbornly to his own ideas, but the true reformer is he who, after having earnestly combatted for his opinions, then yields in order to attain some greater end, and to facilitate the change from the old to the new order of things.

These resolutions which I have quoted to the House, and the comments passed upon them by Mr. Brown and also by Colonel Grey, were brought to the attention of the legislative assembly of Canada and there they were the cause of discussion almost as hot and as passionate as had taken place in the conference. The ground of dispute there was very different from the ground of dispute in the conference. The ground of dispute in the legislature was not the question whether or not there should be an allowance to the provinces but the ground of dispute in the legislature was the question whether or not the allowance provided by the resolutions adopted at the conference of eighty cents per head of the population according to the census of 1861 would be sufficient to enable the provinces to properly carry on their own demostic affairs and to provide for their needs and requirements. I do not propose to review the debate that took place upon that occasion. That debate consisted of a series of contradictory and conjectural statements and allegations as to how much would be required by the legislature to properly discharge the duties with which they were entrusted. It is to some purpose to observe that as the discussion went on there arose a strong and consistent opinion to the effect that as the population of the different provinces would increase the principle of the allowance should be changed, that it should not be fixed, but, on the contrary, that it should be flexible and should move on with the increase of population. This opinion was not expressed by the party leaders for the one obvious reason that the party leaders were committed to the resolutions of the conference just as they were brought down to the House but these views were to be found in the expressions of the rank and file of the two parties which had coalesced for the purpose of carrying out confederation. I will not quote many opinions. I will content myself with two, one taken in the ranks of the Reform party, the other taken in the ranks of the Conservative party and both taken from the province of Ontario. One of the most prominent members at that time of the legislative council was Mr. Currie, member for Niagara division. He did not occupy an official position but he was well known as a man of superior abilities and, speaking on this very subject, he expressed himself in this way :

> Notwithstanding the admitted talent of the delegates he contended that a manifest injustice had been done to Canada and especially to Upper Canada, in the distribution of the subsidies to the local governments. Hon. gentlemen must bear in mind that the subsidies change not with population, but remain fixed.

Mr. Alexander, a Conservative member of the legislative assembly expressed himself in almost identically the same language :

> We know that our delegates contended, as we now contend, that it only would have been fair and just that the future subsidy to be paid to each province, of eighty cents per head, should be based upon the census returns to be made every ten years.

This strong opinion coming from the rank and file of the two parties who had bent their energies on framing this new constitution created an impression. That impression however did not find expression in any legislative enactment and for an obvious reason. Shortly after the beginning of the debate upon that question the government had moved the previous question so as to prevent any possible amendment to the resolutions which had been adopted at the conference. These resolutions had to be adopted entirely or rejected entirely. They were adopted in their entirety but the delegates who went to England to supervise the legislation before the imperial parliament of the then existing governments, that is to say of Canada, of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, introduced into the Bill which was submitted to the imperial parliament several important additions in furtherance of the view of those who thought that the provision made in the Quebec resolutions was insufficient. The 64th resolution of the conference became the 118th section of the British North America Act. I have just quoted to the House what was the tenor of the 64th resolution of the conference. Let me now quote to the House the tenor and language of the 118th section of the British North America Act.

Mr. BERGERON. Before my right hon. friend proceeds with that, was it not understood in the discussion that took place at the time that the provinces would have to resort to direct taxation and that this would be just a beginning for them ? Of course there were those who were opposed to that view but was it not generally understood that the provinces would have to adopt direct taxation ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, I do not know that there was any such policy. That view was expressed and forcibly expressed by many members of the legislature, but it was resisted by as many others. It was said that confederation would be endangered if in consequence of insufficient means being provided for by the Quebec conference the provinces had to resort to direct taxation to carry on their domestic affairs. The 118th section of the British North America Act is in these words :

Ontario..	$80,000
Quebec..	70,000
Nova Scotia..	60,000
New Brunswick..	50,000

> Two hundred and sixty thousand ; and an annual grant in aid of each province shall be made, equal to eighty cents per head of the population, as ascertained by the census of one thousand eight hundred and sixty-one, and in the case of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, by each subsequent decennial census until the population of each of these two provinces amounts to four hundred thousand souls, at which rate such grant shall thereafter remain. Such grants shall be in full settlement of all future demands on Canada, and shall be paid half-yearly in advance to each province ; but the government of Canada shall deduct from such grants, as against any province, all sums chargeable as interest on the public debt of that province in excess of the several amounts stipulated in this Act.

The House will see that in this article in the Confederation Act there are two important additions to the provision which had been made in the resolution of the Quebec conference. The first is that apart from the allowance of eighty cents which was provided in the Quebec resolution a fixed allowance, a specific amount, was provided for—$80,000 for Ontario, $70,000 for Quebec, $60,000 for Nova Scotia, and $50,000 for New Brunswick, and that instead of an allowance of eighty cents per head, which, according to the resolution of the Quebec conference, was to remain fixed by the figures of the census of 1861 is was provided that in the case of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia this allowance would increase from time to time after each decennial census until the population of these two provinces had reached the figure of 400,000 souls. Well, Sir, these are the provisions under which the confederation was commenced and has been carried on ever since. Now, I have to observe to the House that even with this addition which was made to the original text of the Quebec resolution time has shown that, if the principle be admitted of a contribution being made from the Dominion treasury to the provinces, the provision made by the British North America Act has proved to be absolutely insufficient and inadequate. The experience of forty years has brought this fact again and again to the attention of the parliament and the people of Canada. If I needed any evidence in support of that assertion, I might remind the House, that not once, nor twice, nor thrice, but periodically and systematically parliament has been asked, at almost regular intervals, to vote in favour of now one province and now another province, appropriations far in excess of anything that had been stipulated in the British North America Act; and, every province which has since joined confederation has entered upon terms in excess of the terms provided for in that Act.

Confederation had only been accomplished two years, when, in 1869 better terms were provided for Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia was given for ten years a yearly allowance of $18,698, and Nova Scotia was also given an additional allowance of $1,186,000 upon the debt which she was entitled to charge against confederation. The door which was then opened never has been closed to the present day. In 1873, parliament was asked to vote to New Brunswick an allowance of $150,000 a year in compensation for revenue derived from the export duty on lumber.

Mr. FOSTER. That was on a little different principle from the other.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Whatever may have been the pretext the financial arrangements made at confederation have been continually changed for one reason or another. In 1873, the adjustment of the public debt chargeable against the Dominion was remodelled, and as a consequence every province of the Dominion was given a new allowance. In 1876, a special grant was made to Manitoba of $26,000 for five years. In 1878, a further special grant of $10,000 a year for three years, in support of education, was made to Manitoba. In 1879, another special grant of $15,000 a year for three years was made to Manitoba. In 1882, the financial terms with Manitoba were completely recast and the new terms were: Fixed subsidy, $50,000; per capita allowance of 80 cents a head based not upon the actual population, but on an assumed population of 150,000; indemnity in lieu of public lands $45,000 a year. In 1884, a new adjustment of the public debt between the provinces was made by which all the provinces were given an increased allowance. In that same year the province of Quebec was given a special grant in compensation for expenditure on the building of the railway from Quebec to Ottawa which is now a part of the Canadian Pacific Railway. In 1885, Manitoba was given another grant. In 1887, a further grant of $20,000 a year was given to Prince Edward Island. In 1898, Manitoba was granted $200,000 in release of money advanced for the construction of a court house. In 1901, Prince Edward Island was given a further sum of $30,000 a year. It will therefore be seen that from the earliest date after confederation up to the present, there has been again and again an extra grant appropriated to one province or another. What is remarkable in this portion of our history is, that all these grants have been made by parliament without any plan, without any guiding principle, but simply as the expediency of the moment suggested, or rather as the financial difficulties of one province or the other were more or less urgent. Such a course may have been found satisfactory for the time being by the province thus benefited, but it undoubtedly must be obvious, that the Dominion as a whole could not be benefited by such a course. I have only to appeal to the experience of the older members of this House who will remember that again and again upon the floor of parliament, the advisability, nay the necessity was urged of dealing with such questions upon a general basis, and recasting the financial terms of confederation so as to have a uniform rule apply to all the provinces. But, though the suggestion was made more than once, it did not take shape until the matter was taken in hand by the provinces themselves. In 1887, a conference took place in the old city of Quebec, the cradle of confederation, and that conference was attended by representatives of Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Manitoba and Quebec. At this conference some of the ablest men of that day were present. I will spare the modesty of some of those who are living and who are now in the House; I will speak only of the dead. Ontario was represented at that conference by Sir Oliver Mowat, whose ability and experience made him conspicuous throughout the Dominion, and he was accompanied by Mr. Hardy and Mr. Fraser, also men of great ability. Quebec was represented by Mr. Mercier, a man whose ability was undoubted. New Brunswick was represented by Mr. Blair, whose name it is sufficient to mention here. Manitoba was represented by Mr. John Norquay, whose rugged ability was acknowledged by all. There were no party divisions at that conference; men of all shades of politics attended it, and the resolutions referring to the financial questions passed at that conference were :

That this conference is of opinion that the basis for the final and unalterable settlement of the amounts to be yearly paid by the Dominion to the several provinces for local purposes and the support of their governments and legislatures, may be found in the proposals following :

A. Instead of the amounts now paid, the sums hereafter payable yearly by Canada to the several provinces for the support of their governments and legislatures, to be according to population, and as follows :

(a) Where the population of the province is under 150,000.. .. ..$100,000
(b) Where the population of the province is 150,000, but does not exceed 200,000.. 150,000
(c) Where the population of the province is 200,000, but does not exceed 400,000.. 180,000
(d) Where the population of the province is 400,000, but does not exceed 800,000.. 190,000
(e) Where the population of the province is 800,000, but does not exceed 1,500,000.. 220,000
(f) Where the population of the province exceeds 1,500,000.. 240,000

B. Instead of an annual grant per head of population now allowed, the annual payment hereafter to be at the same rate of eighty cents per head, but on the population of each province, as ascertained from time to time by the last decennial census, until such population exceeds 2,500,000, and at the rate of sixty cents per head for so much of said population as may exceed 2,500,000.

Mr. BERGERON. The right hon. gentleman has followed in the resolution which he now proposes, the resolution of the Quebec conference word for word.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We have, as I will show presently, adopted exactly the resolutions of 1887. I may say that these resolutions were ratified by the legislatures of all the provinces interested. Nothing, however, took place in the direction of carrying them into effect.

Mr. SPROULE. Might I ask the right hon. gentleman one question ? The subsidies are to be based on 'the population of each province, as ascertained from time to time by the last decennial census.' How will that work in with the provision with regard to Saskatchewan and Alberta, where the census is to be taken every two and a half years ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, every five years. I will explain that in a few minutes. I may say that these resolutions, though approved by the legislatures of all the provinces interested, were not acted on at the time, for several reasons. They were never brought up in this House. The death of Sir John Macdonald, which occurredd a few years afterwards, was one reason. Others were : the agitation over the Manitoba school question, which lasted six years, from 1890 to 1896 ; the change of government, and the agitation over the South African war. But in 1902 another conference took place, also in Quebec. At that conference the provinces represented were Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Manitoba. Ontario and British Columbia were not represented, not because they were not in sympathy with the objects of the conference, but for other reasons. The province of Ontario signified its adherence to the resolutions immediately afterwards, and British Columbia also gave its assent to them, though claiming special treatment for itself. The resolutions adopted by that conference were identical with those which had been adopted at the conference in 1887, with one exception only, that a further allowance was claimed with respect to criminal justice. The resolution on this subject adopted by the conference of 1902 was as follows :

Resolved, that in addition to the foregoing resolution, the Dominion government be requested to consider the matter of the cost of administration of criminal justice conjointly with the other matters submitted, and in addition to the amounts that may be allowed to the provinces under the claims above set forth, to award to each an amount for that purpose commensurate with the expense necessary to be made in that regard.

The resolutions adopted at the conference of 1902 were submitted to us, but we considered it advisable not to take any action upon them, but to invite the provinces to a conference at Ottawa with the Dominion government, where we could hear the reasons which might be advanced in support of the resolutions and the views which might be presented against them. This conference took place in October last.

Mr. FOSTER. Why the delay of four or five years ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not know any reason except that our attention was occupied with other matters. At that conference all the provinces were represented, including the new provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. After debating the matter with the conference, we came to the conclusion that it would be advisable to recommend parliament to act not on the resolutions of 1902, but on those of 1887, as affording a basis for the permanent settlement of a question which had been open ever since the first days of confederation. Such is the history of this particular disposition of our constitution. Such is the situation as it now exists, and such is the prayer now made unanimously by the provinces. The question is, what is to be done ; what is the duty of parliament, and what answer have we to make to this unanimous petition of all the provinces ? Stern constitutionalists have told us to heed not that prayer, as the principle of it is false, and not to extend our aid beyond its present dimensions. Stern economists have advised the same course. I have to observe that the objection urged against this prayer of the provinces is exactly the same as was pressed, but without any success, on the men assembled at Quebec in 1864, to carry out the task of forming confederation. It failed to convince those men, and I do not think it can convince this House, at the present time entrusted with the duty of carrying on confederation. After an experience of forty years, we are in a better position to judge of the value of that objection than those who heard it first. All the force of the objection which was made against the principle embodied in the resolutions of the Quebec conference, and afterwards in the Act of confederation, is the statement made that as the provinces would incur no responsibility in levying the revenue which had to be meted out to them from the federal treasury, the inevitable consequence would be imprudence if not extravagance in the disposition of the same. Now, there is no denying that as an abstract argument there is force in this contention; but there is no denying either that actual experience has not justified this sinister prediction. Of course, it can be shown that in certain provinces serious departures have been taken from prudent administration and wise expenditure; but all the experience of these forty years has shown that wherever such departures have taken place, the people of the province themselves have not been slow to punish the offenders and to insist that the funds provided out of the federal treasury should be expended in a prudent, careful and honest manner, the people themselves realizing that no matter by whom the moneys were levied or by whom they were expended, they came out of their own pockets.

Mr. BERGERON. If it were by direct taxation, they would see it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Though we do not raise our revenue by direct taxation, we give a part of it to the provinces; and the provinces during the past forty years have applied it with judgment and honesty. I do not think the objection has all the force it was at one time supposed to have. Again I come to the question, what is to be done? Sir, we claim that parliament should now do what should have been done long ago. Parliament long ago, instead of leaving province after province to knock at the door of this Chamber and ask for better terms, would have acted more wisely in at once revising the subsidies in a more liberal spirit and in making a general and uniform law to apply to all the provinces. The first case considered would undoubtedly have been that of Nova Scotia. I need not remind the House that Nova Scotia was dragged into confederation by violent measures and that that proud province was for some years estranged from a union, which, if it had been properly approached it would have gladly accepted. The government of Sir John Macdonald, I am bound to say, made an effort to correct this error by providing better terms for Nova Scotia; but, although the object was an eminently wise one, the manner in which it was carried out was open to grave suspicion. When the resolution in favour of giving better terms to Nova Scotia was introduced in this House, Mr. Blake, who was then a young member of the House but who had already attained a remarkable position, moved the following resolution:

That the British North America Act, 1867, has fixed and settled the mutual liabilities of Canada and of each province in respect of the public debt, and the amount payable by Canada to each province for the support of its government and legislature;

That the said Act does not empower the parliament of Canada to change the basis of union thereby fixed and settled;

That the unauthorized assumption of such power by the parliament of Canada would imperil the interests of the several provinces, weaken the bond of union, and shake the stability of the constitution;

That the proposed resolutions on the subject of Nova Scotia involve the assumption of such power;

And that therefore this House while ready to give its best consideration to any proposals to procure in a constitutional way and needed changes in the basis of union, deems it inexpedient to go into committee on said proposed resolutions.

These views, presented by Mr. Blake, were not admitted at the time, but everyone must recognize that there was statemanship in them and that it would have been far better in the early days of confederation not to have allowed the claims of Nova Scotia to be adjudicated upon exclusively, but to have found some method in the basis of union for discussing and adjusting all the claims of the provinces in common. This policy, advocated by Mr. Blake, was, however, not adopted at that time. The same principle was again affirmed in a motion moved by Mr. Holton. The motion was in these word:

That in the opinion of this House any disturbance of the financial arrangements respecting the several provinces provided for in the British North America Act, unless assented to by all the provinces, would be subversive of the system of government under which this Dominion was constituted, and if effected, as proposed by this Bill in favour of one province, without at the same time providing for a general revision and re-adjustment of those arrangements, would be manifestly unjust to the other provinces.

The views again presented there were eminently wise and everybody must regret that they were not adopted in 1869. They, however, became the policy of the Liberal party. They were affirmed more than once on the floor of this House and affirmed with great vigour on another occasion in 1884 by Mr. Blake. That occasion was the aid which was voted to the province of Quebec as compensation for the construction of a railway which is now part of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The province of Quebec was then in rather straightened financial circumstances. It came for help to this House. Mr. Blake did not oppose the resolution moved at the time, but presented again the view that it was not fair to the other provinces to give assistance to one and not to the rest. Any assistance needed—and it was possible the province of Quebec did need assistance—should be given upon a liberal and uniform scale which would apply to all the provinces. Let me call attention to the language which Mr. Blake used on that occasion:

I think that the position of the province of Quebec has demanded for some time past, and is now demanding, the attention of parliament, and, for my part, I have always been prepared to deal fairly by that or by any other of the provinces, but on the condition of equal and fair justice to all. I repeat that it is only fair and reasonable, when a new policy of this kind is being proposed, to consider what its real basis is, to consider what the real condition of the other provinces is, relative to that basis and otherwise, and to see whether what is being proposed as it stands, and without applying proper remedies for the application generally of the new principle you propose, can be called just.

In the same debate, at a later stage, Mr. Blake supplemented the views he thus presented. He said:

I should desire that we should address ourselves very early and very earnestly to the solution of the whole problem by the adoption of some plan whereby, once for all, the question of the provincial subsidies shall be placed on a permanent and lasting basis. I believe it to be destructive of the independence and autonomy of the provinces that they should be looking to Ottawa for favours, that they should be dependent on the central government for carrying on their affairs. I believe it to be destructive to confederation itself that a system should continue under which it may be said: 'Oh, we will go on; we will expend more, we will go into debt, and when we get to a pass that we cannot carry on any longer, the Ottawa parliament must relieve us.' Any sentiment of that kind, any notion on the part of the provincial ministers or politicians or citizens or electors of the provinces, of that kind, must be destructive, in the first place, of good economcal government, in the provinces. and, in the second place, in its influence, moral and financial, on the confederation, destructive ultimately of the confederation itself. Therefore I think it is a pressing and incumbent duty upon us to endeavour, if we can, to devise a plan which will set these matters permanently upon a basis different from that upon which they unhappily stand.

I commend these words of Mr. Blake to the attention of the House, especially the concluding sentence:

Therefore I think it is a pressing and incumbent duty upon us to endeavour, if we can, to devise a plan which will set these matters permanently upon a basis different from that upon which they unhappily stand.

This was the idea we had in view when we met the provinces in conference last autumn. Our object was to find a plan which would permanently set these matters at rest and place them on a basis different from that on which they had stood in the past. Since confederation the plan followed has been to allow one province after another to come to Ottawa and ask for relief, basing its claims on one consideration or another, and then obtaining that relief without regard to the other provinces. The plan we proposed was that we should revise the subsidies given the provinces, with the clear intimation to them that this was to be a final settlement, that no further claim would recognize, that each province must carry on its affairs with the means at its command and must not have recourse to this parliament. We thought we could not do better than have a friendly conference with the provinces, and ascertain what was the most they deemed requisite in order to prevent their coming again to Ottawa and knocking at the door of this parliament.

Mr. BERGERON. Will they not come again?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not know, but if they come again we assume that my hon. friend will not listen to them, and if he will not, I certainly shall not, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. BERGERON. My right hon. friend was not always of the opinion he expresses to-day.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. For my part I rather agree with the views held by Mr. Brown. I do not believe in the principle, but, like Mr. Brown, I admit that if confederation is to exist, it must exist on these lines. I have to differ from my hon. friend. I am a reformer and do not always believe my views are the best, but I approve of the course taken by the man who was the most instrumental in carrying confederation and who, in order to do this, surrendered to a certain extent his own views. My hon. friend, if he wants confederation to continue, must surrender his views as he has done in the past more than once. No man can hope to have confederation perpetuated on a basis which may be according to his ideas of what is right, but not according to those of the majority. It is my belief that in 1864 it would not have been possible to weld the provinces into one great confederation if Mr. Brown had said: No, we shall not give an allowance to the provinces. On the same principle my hon. friend may not approve of a certain policy, and though I may not approve of it, it may be essential to the carrying on of confederation. Though my views and those of my hon. friend may be different, they are not those generally entertained, and for the sake of peace and harmony and good government it is essential that we should adopt the views presented to us by the different provinces. Now, what are the views propounded by the provinces ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If my hon. friends will permit me, I can finish in ten minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) can hardly do that ; I want to ask him a question or two.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I mean I can finish my own speech.

Mr. FOSTER. But I would suggest——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If my hon. friend will give me just a few minutes I will finish. I have only to deal with that part of the conference which has settled the financial terms which are to be given to the provinces. After having looked over the resolution of 1902 and the resolution of 1887, we discarded the resolution of 1902 so far as it related to a claim on the part of the provinces for an allowance on account of the administration of criminal justice. But we adopted the resolutions as framed by the conference of 1887. I have read those resolutions. They provided reasonable increases on what is now paid. The sums paid to the several provinces under the terms of article 118 of the British North America Act make a total of $3,990,000 in round numbers. The sums to be paid under the new arrangement will be $6,336,000, making an increase of about $3,346,000. This will be the added cost to the government of the Dominion.

Now, I come to the question asked of me a few moments ago by my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule). He asked me what is to become of the provision under the Act for Saskatchewan and Alberta. I may say that the question involved is a much wider one than the hon. gentleman put. We have to consider not only the peculiar terms which had been given to Alberta and Saskatchewan but also the terms which had been given to all the other provinces.

Mr. SPROULE. That is with regard to the special arrangements ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, special arrangements have been made at the time of the entry into confederation of each province, that has entered since the Dominion was established, and also special terms have been given to the different provinces at different times during the time confederation has lasted. By special Acts of this parliament every province was granted more than was granted it by the original terms of confederation. We do not propose to repeal what was done in the past. I do not approve the provisions made ; but what has been done has been done. We propose to provide what seems necessary for the future and to leave the past as it is. Therefore, all the different allotments which have been made to the provinces and which are now in force, will remain as they are. What we propose is that, in the future, these provinces shall be paid what is here contemplated in substitution of what is paid under article 118 of the British North America Act. For instance, the province of New Brunswick receives a special allowance for its timber dues—we do not propose to alter that. The province of Prince Edward Island receives a special grant in respect of its population, it being provided that its allowance for population shall not decrease. It will not matter very much, and I believe the other provinces will not object to the payment of Prince Edward Island on this score, and so we do not propose to alter that. So, conditions as they exist in the Dominion will remain as they are, except that the allotment under article 118 will be replaced by the allotment under this resolution.

Now, I come to the question of British Columbia. British Columbia is entitled to special treatment. I think we all agree as to this. British Columbia is, in some respects, our most remarkable province. Its territory is the largest of any ; and the day is not far distant when it may occupy the first position among the provinces in many respects. British Columbia is especially endowed in many different ways. Its climate is not, perhaps, as bracing as the climate of the eastern provinces, but is a most genial climate. Its resources in fisheries are, perhaps, not surpassed by the far-famed fisheries of the maritime provinces. Its resources in timber equal those of Ontario and Quebec. Its resources in minerals are simply beyond calculation. Its resources in agriculture are never talked of, but my humble opinion is that British Columbia's resources in agriculture will some day astonish the world ; the valleys of British Columbia, I believe, in the not far distant future, will equal in productiveness as they equal in fertility the valleys of Switzerland. But the conditions of development in British Columbia are different from those in every other province. We must consider the mountainous character of its territory ; the sparseness of its population scattered over such an immense area ; the difficulty of access from the eastern markets—all these things make the development of British Columbia more difficult and expensive than the development of any of the provinces of the east. Under these circumstances, everybody will agree that British Columbia is entitled to special treatment. Now, what should be that special treatment of British Columbia? It is clearly a matter upon which it is difficult to form an opinion. The claims set forth by British Columbia were very wide of what was given to the other provinces. But we decided not to pass any final judgment upon them. We thought we could not do better than refer the claims of the province of British Columbia to the premiers assembled at the conference last year. We asked this conference to advise us what would be the fair thing to do by British Columbia; we asked them that, prepared in advance to accept their arbitrament and abide by their decision. They advised us that British Columbia would be fairly treated if she were given an extra allowance of $100,000 a year for ten years; and we asked parliament to ratify this and to embody the recommendation in the Address to His Majesty, the King.

Mr. SPROULE. Does the Prime Minister expect the physical conditions to change in ten years?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No. But, in ten years British Columbia will have another transcontinental railway, and many other railways also; she will be brought into close contact with the markets of the east. I believe, and I think my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) will agree with me that in ten years the conditions in British Columbia should have materially changed. British Columbia may become, in my judgment, the first province of the Dominion; with its climate and resources, it must become one of the most important. But at present we realize that British Columbia is entitled to exceptional treatment and that, in the opinions of the premiers assembled here last autumn, was, that for ten years she should have an extra allowance.

Mr. FOSTER. I wanted to ask my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier)—and that is why I suggested that he should break off his address at six o'clock, and resume after recess—to deal with two points, which he seems to have missed: First, as to the basis on which these amounts have been apportioned—how have the government come to the conclusion that these should be the amounts apportioned to the several provinces—and, second, what are the guards by which the right hon. gentleman proposes to make this a lasting and permanent settlement? I wish he would treat these two points before he finishes his speech.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As to the first the answer is easy and obvious. In matters of this kind it is difficult to lay down any basis. Why was the basis fixed in 1864 for the allotment of 80 cents? I have searched for the reason, and the only one I can find is this, that a calculation was made by the Minister of Finance of the various provinces according to the statement by Colonel Grey, by Mr. Brown, by Dr. Tupper, by Sir Leonard Tilley, by Mr. Shea and others, and they came to the conclusion that this would be a fair basis upon which to meet the wants of the provinces. That was their judgment, and in 1906 we took as a basis of judgment of the ministers of the several provinces assembled with us, and told us that, according to their experience, this was the amount they needed in order to carry on their public affairs, they had no other basis than that. My hon. friend asked what guarantee we had of finality. My hon. friend knows as well as I do that there is no other guarantee but the determination of parliament itself. Under the American constitution no amendment can be made unless it has been voted and ratified by three-fourths of the states. We have no such provision in our constitution, the only guarantee we have is the security of the imperial parliament, and it will always be difficult for us to go to England and get an amendment to our constitution. Forty years have now elapsed since our constitutional charter was amended. It is true that we have been doing like the Romans who though they had the law of the twelve tables which could not be altered, still they managed to circumvent that law by enacting other laws. We might do the same thing. But the only guarantee we have is this, that my hon. friend representing one party, and myself representing another party, and the members of parliament generally, will agree that this is to be final. Parliament will not defeat its own intentions, and parliament can always do as it pleases, and the hon. gentleman knows that there is no other finality in all these matters but the will of the people, the will of parliament itself.

Mr. SPROULE. That is something like a remark of Mr. Blake, when he said that the decision was to be finally final.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It was finally final because it was embodied in an imperial Act. When the provinces came to us and asked for better terms, we might have done as our predecessors did, and have them voted by this parliament. But we thought that we should insist upon having the sanction of the British parliament, we desired to be assured that they were embodied in an imperial Act. That is the policy we now propose to this parliament, and it is, I believe, calculated to promote the harmony which is absolutely essential if we are to work out, as we expect to work out, our destiny as a united people. Therefore, I move this resolution, of which I have given notice.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. GEORGE E. FOSTER (North Toronto). Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all listened this afternoon with interest to the historical summary to which the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) invited our attention; as to the beginning of the terms which were afterwards passed from resolutions into an Act, the changes that took place in the process, the discussions which attended the advent of the resolutions and which afterwards took place in the legislature when these, in their ultimate form, were produced. Of that part of his speech, which, I am bound to say, was the main part, I do not think I have very much criticism to make. One looks back with interest to the struggles, twenty, thirty or forty years ago, as men, twenty-thirty or forty years from this time, will look back to the questions which are being agitated here now. As there were principles that were strongly held to in those olden times I hope, when the succeeding generations come to look back to the debates and conclusions therefrom to-day, they will find that there are also principles involved. As compromises had to be made in the olden times, compromises, to some extent, have to be made at the present time, and with a complex system of government and a country of wide extent and varied resources and requirements probably something of a compromise will come into all great questions, especially those which relate to the development of the provinces of this country, and will soften somewhat and determine to a certain extent the ruggedness of the principles that contending parties may hold.

It is something to be proud of that the Act of confederation under which the four provinces at first united and under which the remaining provinces have practically come in has been subject to as little change and has worked as satisfactorily as it has. The right hon. Prime Minister expressed himself as being proud of the fact, taken in comparison with our neighbours on the other side of the line, and commented upon the few changes in vital respects in our own constitution as compared with the more frequent changes in equally or more vital respects in the constitution of the United States. I am not going to say that what man has made man may not change even though what he has made has all the solemnity of a constitution or a pact under which different provinces agreed to unite themselves together. It is quite too much, I think, to ask that the product of the best judgment and best intelligence at a certain period of time, under certain conditions, good though it may be, may never have to be changed on account of the changing conditions and a gradual evolution from the less to the greater which brings up different sets of requirements and which appeals to different treatment. I do not think the ground is well taken that because the constitution is once formed it must be like steel and iron and never changed. At the same time I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, and I think I am in agreement with the majority of the members of this House when I say that the constitution under which different peoples agree at a certain time to bind themselves to live their national lives together under a federal compact ought to be very respectfully treated and that there ought to be more than a common reason for disturbing that constitution. There may even be difficulties, evils and weaknesses developed, but on the other hand it sometimes is a question of pretty even balance whether it is not better to endure those evils and to make head against the difficulties rather than to lead towards frequent change, and thereby to gradually take away from the sacredness and the inviolability of the constitution or the compact and make it a mere matter of agreement that is liable to be changed from the stress of party or political or financial or other exigencies.

I think there is a strong sentiment against interfering with the constitution and against amending it from time to time, unless the reasons for doing so are very strong indeed. There was a great difficulty in the olden time on the financial side of the question and I am not disposed to disagree with the First Minister in his conclusion, that unless compromise had been resorted to and the smaller provinces provided for so as to relieve them from the necessity of facing immediate and even approximate, taxation, we would be to-day a string of disunited provinces without confederation. It is also fair to say, that in 1864 (with the older provinces practically undeveloped, and with almost a total lack of knowledge of the uninhabited territories), it was impossible for any human foresight to accurately gauge what would be the requirements of the country forty or fifty years afterwards. Again, that is an argument that under changing conditions it is not always wrong to change. The Prime Minister criticised the way in which these changes had been made in the past, in the first place because they were piece-meal, in respect to one province at one time and to another province at another time; and in the second place, that they were not made on any uniform and well ascertained basis. The criticism may be proper, but I do not quite see the pertinency of it as applied to the legislation now brought down by the right hon. gentleman. It was all very well to treat us to these inspiring quotations from Edward Blake and other statesmen of the period, but the fact came out immediately afterwards that although the friends and the partners of Edward Blake applauded his fine sentiments, they straight away in practice shattered them to pieces and left their remains lying around this House of Commons to be resuscitated to-day. Piecemeal legislation in the betterment of terms had been passed by Mr. Mackenzie's administration, just as by Sir John Macdonald's administration—it was not done so often because they were not so long in power, but had the Mackenzie administration been seventeen years in power and the Liberal Conservative administration only four years I venture to say you would have seen the situation reversed. The right hon. gentleman criticised the basis and called it special class legislation to this province and special class legislation to the other province. But, in 1907, with all the accumulated wisdom of the forty years of confederation; when he has an opportunity to remedy all these cases of class legislation, and when, were he standing on Edward Blake's platform he could have applied the fund of experience and information gained, and taken up this subject from the very first and rearranged and put upon a uniform basis all these examples of class legislation, and made one final and ample and thorough, and well based arrangement; the Prime Minister, fluent in criticism, fails in practice. He criticises what has been done in the past as wrong, but, when he is making a permanent and final revision, as he claims, in 1907 he does not try to remedy one of these things he criticised. One by one they came to the government and got each province what it wanted, and that the Prime Minister says is wrong. But when they come altogether and get what they want, the right hon. gentleman thinks it is right. That is the only difference between these isolated pieces of legislation and this wholesale legislation of to-day. To my mind it probably is a development which may be suspiciously looked at, that now it has come to be, that the provinces, especially the needy provinces, have learned the force of combination, and how strong a front, if they unite, they may present to the government and force it to do their will.

Mr. BERGERON. They will do it again.

Mr. FOSTER. In comparing the present legislation with the legislation of the past, I do not know that we have gained much. The main part of the Prime Minister's speech was easy to make; it was an historical summary well put together and interesting, but when the minister of a government comes to this Dominion parliament to ask for $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 of an increase, with the possibility of an annual and gradual increase for all the years that are to come, until when we come to the 20,000,000 or 30,000,000 or 100,000,000 people it will amount to a great deal of money; it does seem to me it is incumbent upon that minister to do something more than present certain historical reminiscences to the House. It seems to me that minister should give us reasons why he and his government have come to the conclusion; he should state that the plan he proposes has been examined by the government, and that the legislation will act justly by all of the provinces and be accepted because of its very justness as a permanent and lasting financial arrangement. I appeal to this House as to whether the Prime Minister gave us one single iota of evidence to show that he and his government had examined this matter, and that he could state to the House how they arrived at these sums, and whether they did it by examining the necessities, the geographical position, the different wants of each one of the provinces, and satisfied themselves by that examination, expert and otherwise, that they had arrived at a just and adequate basis.

This is what the Prime Minister has not done, and I venture to say this is what the government did not attempt to do. I venture to say that the government has not expended five minutes of hard consecutive thought and examination on these financial terms, but that they have simply given the provinces what they put forward as their demands. The speech of the Prime Minister shows that. In 1887, certain premiers of the provinces met together and formulated their demands. In 1902, a similar meeting was held, and the old demands were formulated plus one other for an adjustment as to the enforcement of criminal law. That is the only difference between the programme now and the programme of 1887, except that some new provinces have been made, and consequently the exceptions have to be enlarged so as to take in those provinces. We come to the conference of 1906. How many days does it occupy? The prime ministers of the provinces come together. They meet on one day and are welcomed by the Prime Minister; but there is no discussion and no examination. The provincial ministers then go into conclave for the second day, and after they have had their discussion and come to their conclusions they again meet the Prime Minister and his colleagues and tell them what they have done. And so it goes on until the third day, when, if I mistake not, the British Columbia position is taken up and discussed. The British Columbia claim is for special treatment. It is addressed to the Dominion government. The Dominion government, careful of not being overworked, careful of leaving everything that is to be done to the provincial premiers, do not even take the responsibility nor the care to look into the special circumstances of the province of British Columbia and come to their own conclusions as to what British Columbia ought to have and what they would be willing to give; but with easy grace they say to the province of British Columbia: We have not time to look into this; it would be burdensome if we had to take it up and make our examination; we will hand you over to the other provinces; go before the premiers of the other provinces, make out your case before them, and if possible agree, and let us hear what the provincial premiers say with regard to your claim. British Columbia, a province of this Dominion, comes to the Dominion government and asks certain treatment from that government, who alone can accord it, and the Dominion government, instead of treating with British Columbia, simply form a tribunal made out of the sister provinces, and ask that tribunal to give its views with reference to what British Columbia should have. The premiers of the other provinces meet, and the premier of British Columbia puts his case before them, and the next day they meet in general conclave. The premier of the Dominion asks them what they have done, and they say: We have decided that British Columbia, owing to its special position, should have $100,000 a year for ten years. They also had to say that Mr. McBride, the premier of British Columbia, had refused to abide by that decision, had made his claim, and had retired from the conference. There you have the whole thing. Instead of there being any expert examination, any careful looking into the matter by the Dominion government through their financial department, and with the aid of their expert accountants and financiers, it simply amounts to this, that the provincial premiers claimed so much, and the Dominion government came to the conclusion that the easiest way was, as they were in practical agreement, to give them exactly what they asked for, and so get rid of the business as quickly as possible. A four days conference was quite sufficient to clear up this whole matter and lay the burdens on this Dominion for all succeeding years, and it ended in virtually giving to each province what the provincial premiers demanded, and giving to British Columbia, against British Columbia's protest, not what the Dominion government decided should be given, but what the provincial premiers decided would be a fair allowance to British Columbia. In all the history of the rearrangement of financial conditions this is about the easiest on record. Certain claimants want something. They come to the Dominion government with their wants; the Dominion government says, Put them on paper; and then the formality is gone through of putting them into the shape of law and making them operative. From the little detail that has been given us by the Prime Minister, it seems to me that that was just about the course of the operation as it took place. But the Prime Minister asked, what was to be done? Granted that the provincial premiers came to the conclusion that their income was insufficient for their needs, and that they brought that demand to this government and pressed it upon the government, the premier says, what was this government to do? Evidently it did not very long trouble them. What they thought was to be done was to give these provinces just exactly what they asked, with the simple exception of 20 cents per head that was asked for the carrying out of the criminal law in the different provinces. Well, as I have stated before, I think something more was to be done. I think it was the duty of this Dominion government to have made a very thorough examination of the expenditures of those provinces for the last ten or twelve or fifteen years.

In order to see whether, in the first place, there was by these governments a duplication of the expenditures that were made within the province of the Dominion government, and in the second place whether the provinces were extravagant in their expenditures. The Prime Minister might say that we have not the right to inquire into that matter, but when the provinces come to us and plead that their income is not sufficient for their needs and that they must have more, then it becomes the duty of the Dominion government to make a careful and thorough inquiry into their administration. That evidently was not done, but the word of each was taken and the demand of each complied with although there must have been various degrees of efficiency or the reverse in the administration of each provincial government and although the necessities and extravagances of each must have varied considerably. Every province is quite willing to get an extra slice from the Dominion treasury if the Dominion is willing to grant it, but when the provinces come together as a whole and make demands on the Dominion treasury, then the Dominion should see to what extent these demands are due to extravagances of the worst kind and a failure on the part of the provinces to make the most of their own financial resources. If, however, whenever a province gets into deep water financially, we are going to come to its relief, we are putting a premium on provincial extravagance and mismanagement. Instances can be cited from some of the provinces—it is not a pleasant task for one of us to criticise provincial expenditure—in which the most extravagant use of public money has been made and in which they have launched out into schemes for party and patronage purposes, schemes which they never should have touched and which the Dominion government itself, in various parts of its operations, was carrying out. Take for instance the subsidizing of railways. Just as soon as the Dominion began the system of subsidizing railways some provincial governments started the same system in an extravagant, useless and reckless way, as though they had found some new method by which party capital and public patronage could be used to political advantage from a party point of view. Thus we had for some years a ridiculous subsidizing of railways by some of the provinces. With reference to none of these matters does it seem to me the Dominion government has made any careful inquiries, nor is it able to place before us anything more than the general assertion of the Prime Minister that, looking over the whole field, he thinks that provincial affairs have been economically and carefully managed and that consequently no fault is to be found with the provinces on that score.

There is a marked difference between the Dominion and the provinces as regards resources. Direct taxation is one of the sources which local governments have for revenue replenishing their treasury, but it is not the only one. There are resources within the provinces themselves in the franchises of the different provinces—franchises of great value. These have been differently treated by different provinces and differently treated in the same province under different governmental management. Take for instance the province of Ontario. Up to the time the present Conservative government in that province came into power certain classes of franchises, most valuable, were treated differently from what they are to-day. Take the mines and pulp wood preserves, water-power franchises and the like, you have the province of Ontario to-day, in a little district up in its northern territory, actually making out of its use of the public franchises millions of dollars per year, whilst in other provinces these resources are not husbanded, but are given away for a song and consequently are lost as sources of income. Scattered all over this country, in each of the provinces, there are inestimable valuable assets over which this Dominion government has no control, and from which it can never get a farthing. Over these the provincial government have full power, and out of them, if properly looked after, they can get a very large accretion to their revenue, as Ontario at present is getting. It is quite a mistaken idea to think that all the elasticity in this matter of revenue is in the Dominion and that little of it is in the provincial power. When you come to look at it properly, it seems to me that the Dominion is bounded and limited and that the province are almost unlimited. What has the Dominion? It can impose excise taxes and customs duty. Outside of those two and Dominion lands and some little revenue it may get from its Dominion minerals, there is no elasticity in the revenues of the Dominion. We cannot make the excise and custom taxes indefinitely large. There is a limit beyond which we cannot go, and when we have reached that limit, which must always be a moderate one, the only elasticity there is with reference to the Dominion sources of revenue is increase of consuming population.

Mr. FOSTER.

In every province in its mines, fisheries, timber areas, silver, gold, copper and coal areas there are immense franchises which, if properly husbanded, will for the future work out most profitable sources of taxations and income. So that we must look with caution and reserve upon this general statement that the provinces are limited. The provinces also have that wide field of the income tax and succession tax. The succession tax to-day in Ontario brings that government over a million dollars a year, and as the province grows richer and more populated, that inheritance tax, equitably placed and no great burden, will be a vast source of income. The same statement applies to the other provinces. Therefore, the situation is not so bad as it was painted with reference to the inelasticity of provincial sources of revenue and taxation.

Therefore, I think that this government ought to have made a full examination not only into the expenditure of these provinces for a series of years, but also into their available sources of revenue; and, before immense sums of money were voted out of the Dominion treasury, the government should have carefully pointed out to the different provinces both those expenditures which might have been deemed extravagant, and the need of utilizing all the resources in the great franchise of the provinces as available means for replenishing their treasuries. But the government did not do this, and here we are with this large demand, this great charge placed upon the revenue of the Dominion amounting to $6,000,000 at the present day, and, with the guard of the old census limitation of 1861 taken off Ontario and Quebec, a limitless capitation tax for the future, the only change being that when a province attains a certain population all above that population shall be allowed for at the rate of 60 cents per head instead of 80 cents per head. When we have 100,000,000 of people this tax will show in its vaster proportion, but it is just as burdensome and just as large proportionately for the smaller population as it will be for the larger.

So much, then, with reference to the basis upon which these allowances in the re-arrangement have been made. What may be said as to the next point of question, namely that, as you have made another inroad upon the constitution of the country, and as the way has been not only pointed out but actually travelled, how will you place a barrier which will not be readily passed in future? The Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) spoke of this as being a permanent and unalterable arrangement. What element of permanency or lastingness is there in this proposition which was not in any other proposition brought before this House and embodied in Acts of parliament here and in the British parliament?

Mr. SPROULE. None whatever.

Mr. FOSTER. None whatever. In all fairness, let us ask ourselves if there is any use at all, except a blinding use, in applying these terms, 'lasting' and 'permanent' to this proposition which has been placed before us? This will be 'lasting' until the provinces come together again and make another demand based upon changed circumstances and changed conditions. It will be 'permanent' until some government in the future yields to that almost irresistible demand against it and then goes to the British parliament and says: We as a free country having absolute authority over our own finances, ask you to enact that what we have just declared for shall be the law and the constitution for the future. Is it a bar of even a feather's weight that you have to go to the British parliament and ask for that? In certain cases it might be. If it were a question for instance, of the separate or free schools, the British parliament might say: There is a pact upon different lines from this and we must be very sure of the justice and the permanence of the demand before any change is made; or they might absolutely refuse to make any change thus keeping faith with the men who made the arrangement in the first place and who, perhaps, would not have gone into confederation had not that pact been made. But what British parliament will have the right to say to the parliament of Canada when it asks to make provincial allowances of $3,000,000 instead of $2,000,000. Can it say we cannot do it because your present allowance is part of the constitution and it has been enacted by the British House? Consequently these words 'lasting' and 'permanent,' though they sound large and good are not worth a hill of beans—there is not a feather's weight of power in them. This is lasting and permanent until the next raid is made, and until the government of the Dominion again gives way to the raid and the British parliament is asked to change the figures in the clauses fixing the financial arrangement between the provinces.

Now, leaving that, it seems to me that some guards might have been placed. Did it ever occur to the government—it must have occurred to them, for it occurs to every one, and has been mentioned in this discussion—that when you have a spending power that is not under obligation to find the means it spends, you have a spending power that is more likely to tend to extravagance rather than to economy. That is the difficulty in this case. The province of Quebec, let us say, or the province of New Brunswick, spends with a lavish hand and rolls up a debt which it knows it never well can meet. But it does this with sublime indifference to fate. Those in charge of its affairs speak the spendthrift's words: 'It will last our time.' Or, even if they know that in their time the burden becomes too heavy, they say: Well, we can make a raid on their friends at Ottawa and get an extra allowance and so we will even up. And every time this is done there is a greater incentive to repeat it. But, you say, it must be done. But must it always be done? Is it not possible to put some checks on the provinces, that they may not come again and again asking subventions from this federal parliament? I think it is quite possible. For instance there might be a check on the debt-creating power of the province. It is so in the United States. Many states in the union are constitutionally bound not to exceed a certain debt per capita of their population—when they reach that limit they must stop, and when they want to spend a dollar they must find the dollar first. Was there any discussion of such a check in this interprovincial conference, or was the door left wide open so that any of these gentlemen who might be disposed to be extravagant, might, in the next ten years, make another raid upon the Dominion treasury and get what they want? There was another check which, it seems to me, might have been proposed with advantage. When you give a fixed allowance you are in this position: That fixed allowance is enough for to-day; but, ten years from this time the provinces come and say, as they have in this instance, that the fixed allowance is not enough and that they want more. The question is naturally asked: On what basis do you say that you should get more? On the basis that we gave you up the customs and excise, and your customs and excise have increased largely in these ten years, therefore our vested rights in them, so to speak, have increased, and we want an increase in the yearly subvention. Was it or was it not possible that a subvention to the provinces could have been arranged or a percentage plan, giving to them a certain per cent of the excise and of custom revenue, whatever it might be? Then when they came back, as come back they will in future years, that plea would be gone for ever, because, as the customs and excise of the Dominion increased, their subvention would increase as well. There you could make a finality. But with a fixed sum you never can make a finality. Some such arrangement might have been arrived at in order to prevent this everlasting recurrence which I foresee, becoming easier each time that it proves successful, to prevent that everlasting recurrence, finally to the great injury and may be harm to the Dominion of Canada as a whole.

There was another thing that might have been done. Year after year in this parliament we have had questions brought up between the provinces and the Dominion. Take for instance this one. No one doubts in this parliament, and I do not believe a man will be bold enough to deny it, that we are to-day paying for judges whom we ought not to pay for, that in different parts of our country there are judges more than are necessary, and that consequently the public funds are being paid out unnecessarily, and in that sense wrongfully. But we are met by the Prime Minister, whoever he may be at the time, with this statement: But we have no power over that. Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, any one of the provinces can establish judgeships by legislation, and we have got to pay them. That is not true, we have not got to pay them, but it makes a rather awkward predicament as between this government and a province if this government refuses to pay a judgeship. But that is what practically works out. That question was brought up here two or three years ago when Mr. Fitzpatrick was Minister of Justice, and it was agreed that when this interprovincial conference took place that matter would be brought up with the various premiers, and we would see whether some living arrangement could not be come to by which there should be a redistribution and in the end a lessening of the too numerous judgeships which we have. Here you have had your conference, and I have not seen that that question was brought up at all. What more have you? You have discrimination of the provinces against the charters of the Dominion. You have the overlapping of insurance jurisdiction and consequently of insurance expense. You have duplication in branch after branch of work. You have a Minister of Labour here in the Postmaster General, you have departments of labour in the provinces; and the other day we had in the city of Toronto the spectacle of two commissioners of labour, one for the Dominion and the other for the province, both paid officials, both with their staffs, and both working on the very self same thing in order to make easier the settlement of a strike which took place in the province of Ontario. What in the world is the reason why we must have double labour commissioners, double pure food officials, double health boards, double immigration agents, double fishery officers and a whole lot of duplications in public works? There was a time when the public works line was well defined. There was a time when the fathers of confederation and those who worked after them knew what the line was, where public works were performed by the Dominion and where they were held over for the provinces. That line is absolutely obliterated, and to-day this Dominion government does its public works service on the smallest lakes and the smallest rivers in any province of the Dominion, and even goes so far as to build bridges and the like of that. Now was there any reason why, when this financial question came up for review, should not have had those duplications and overlappings done away with, and that a statesmanlike plan should not have been adopted to have all these matters discussed and settled at the same time, so that you might have avoided extravagance and uselessness in expenditure and might have come to proper terms with the different provinces?

To-day, Sir, a doctor goes from one of our provinces into another, and he is not able to practise his profession unless certain sometimes very burdensome, formalities are carried out. A barrister goes from one of our universities and from one of our cities to take up his residence in another province, and he finds that he is no longer a full fledged citizen of this country so far as his right to practise his profession is concerned. The same with other things. Why was not an attempt made to take up these questions with the provinces and settle them together, and so not only to avoid useless and burdensome expenses, but also avoid difficulties which are not making for the oneness and union of this country? To-day a province, in restraint of trade and against the general trade of the country, gets a narrow revenue by taxing a commercial traveller who comes from another province. The man who starts as a citizen of the province of Quebec finds, when he gets into the limits of another province, the bailiff taps him on the shoulder and says: You shall not do commerce in our province unless you pay a tax. And yet we have not had any settlement of that kind at this interprovincial conference. All these things might have been taken up and a great many of them might have been settled. For here was a golden opportunity, and how easily you could have pointed out to some city or some province that they might now very well forego the few hundreds of dollars revenue that they got from taxing commercial travellers from other provinces, when you were giving them these hundreds of thousands of dollars, and an extra revenue out of the Dominion treasury; and it would have been acceded to. The Prime Minister mentioned some of these in the conference but he had not sand to carry them out. He seemed to be there just to give what they asked and to get nothing in return, not even a guarantee that they would allow commerce and trade to run like the current coin of the realm from one part of our country to the other.

There is one other point I wish to take up. I do not believe that the province of British Columbia had fair justice meted out to it at that interprovincial conference by this government. $100,000 said the provincial conference. Yes, $100,000 said the Prime Minister and his government, and $100,000 it must be for ten years. A pertinent inquiry has been made this afternoon: Will these mountains disappear, will the wagon roads be any the less, will the spaces in British Columbia coalesce and draw closer together after ten years? Despite the panegyric in which my right hon. friend indulged in reference to the possibilities of that country he missed a fine opportunity, when he was quoting Edward Blake, for whom he has such a great reverence, in that he did not quote Edward Blake in his fine and airy and ponderous characterization of British Columbia some years ago, as an inhospitable sea of mountains towards which it was futile and criminal to direct the rails of a great transportation system and to endeavour to pierce the mountains in that country. Another illustration of the great changes that take place. But, Sir, as I read the presentment of the Premier of British Columbia as to these immense spaces, the difficulties and cost of travel, the absolute impossibility of having railways through most of the districts, and the lines of wagon roads that have to be built—railroads they are in every respect except that you do not put down sleepers and rails but they are costly and the repairs are interminable and costly as well—I realized the enormous difficulties with which that province has to contend. Taking all these into consideration should not the plea of the Premier of British Columbia have merited better treatment and better success than it seems to have attained at the hands of this government? I wonder if it is true after all that Mr. McBride was bowled out from the conference as an inconvenient member thereof, with the idea that he should be followed to British Columbia, that the strength of the Yukon and this government should be united and that he should be run to his political death as a judgment and punishment for having asked for what he believed to be necessary on the part of his province. Whatever the minister may say to-day you have not a final settlement and it would have been worth a good deal more to have had every province into this arrangement of its own free will than to make any arrangement which leaves one great province—the province of British Columbia—one of the greatest provinces of this country—outside of the pale of a satisfied province, a province with a grievance against this country and consequently a recurrent and constantly recurring demand until that grievance is satisfied. What would have been a few hundred, or a few thousand, or a hundred thousand dollars more to having a province fairly well satisfied with its conditions, abnormal conditions, conditions which are natural and geographical to a large extent and which can never be overcome or gotten rid of, and then have a settlement, which, though it may not be permanent and lasting, would have an element of permanency and lastingness about it and one which all the provinces forming that settlement agreed should be speaking in general terms, a permanent and lasting settlement.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister entered so very fully into the history of this question of provincial subsidies and entered so fully upon the principles which govern the application of these subsidies—that I think I should hardly be able to add anything to what has been said, although I think it might be well to offer a few observations in reply to several points raised by my hon. friend the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). He dwelt at some length upon the points upon which the federal and provincial authorities might differ from time to time. I quite realize that under our federal system of government it is inevitable that there shall be occasionally these questions, especially in regard to the overlapping of legislation. I might even go so far as to say that there would be extravagance on the part of a provincial government; yet, in the discussion of this question of our constitution and the friction, if it might be so called, which arises from time to time, owing to the provincial and Dominion authorities not seeing things in the same light, or owing, in other cases to the overlapping of certain lines of public business where each government is desirous of accomplishing the same purpose, I fail to see that a discussion of all these things is necessary in connection with the matter which is before the House and which relates entirely to the distribution of provincial subsidies. It is necessary for us to grasp firmly the principle upon which these subsidies were granted, and the principle upon which we are proposing to enlarge these subsidies to-day. It is essential that we shall remember that the Dominion was made from the provinces and not the provinces from the Dominion. If we had had one great country with a legislative union and if we had afterwards deemed it wise to divide that country into a number of provinces and to create a federal system, then the central power would have had the right to determine what should be the rights and privileges assigned to the local authorities. But the condition of things was reversed. The provinces existed before the Dominion, the provinces had to be brought together in order that the Dominion might be formed, and the provinces had the right to determine the terms and conditions upon which the Dominion should be created. Now, as a mere matter of political economy, I suppose that most students will say that direct taxation is about the most simple and the most just form of taxation. The student of higher politics will always tell us how much money is wasted in the collection of the revenue by a system of indirect taxation. He will tell us very probably that when a man pays a dollar in direct taxation he is more likely to have a watchful eye on the expenditure of that dollar than if he contributes it in some indirect way, when he does not happen to be aware of the fact that he is contributing it. We will all admit that, but while the student of higher politics will tell us that this is good political economy, the average man in this parliament, the average man in this country and the average man in the provincial legislatures will tell you that it is a beautiful theory but that in practice it cannot be worked out. If we felt that it could be carried out in this way we would simply abolish our customs taxes and excise duties. We would apply direct taxation. But we know that the people will not accept that way, we know that the people will not contribute towards the public exchequer in the form of direct taxation. When the provinces were asked to become parts of a great Dominion they had the right to stipulate the terms and conditions upon which they would enter, and they determined that they would not accept the principle of direct taxation. They determined that they must receive out of the federal treasury a proper proportion of those customs and excise duties which they were called upon to surrender. The principle of avoiding direct taxation, of raising money not only for the purposes of the Dominion but for the purpose of the provinces as well by indirect taxation was recognized by the provinces from the beginning, had to be recognized from the beginning, one is justified in saying; otherwise, the provinces would not have come together. Had the provinces been told at that time, that though they were not to be obliged at once to enter upon a system of direct taxation, they must expect to look forward to it at an early date, I think most of the provinces would have objected. Although for the moment they consented to a limitation upon the subsidy they were to receive, it is only reasonable to suppose they imagined that with the growth of the country their other revenues would be so increased that they would have been able to carry on their public affairs without resorting to direct taxation. It is not reasonable to suppose—as has been suggested in the discussion to-day—that the provinces entered confederation with the expectation that they should be called upon to resort to direct taxation, in a general form, for the purpose of maintaining their provincial governments and provincial legislatures.

The principle upon which the subsidies were fixed at the time seems to me now, as it has always seemed to me in the past, to be somewhat unsound. The principle of a contribution of a proportion of the federal revenues to the provincial treasury was recognized. But, there seems to have been no well defined principle as to the distribution of that proportion. It might have been done on the basis of population—the population of the various provinces increasing from time to time—but that was not done. The population was to limit it up to a certain point, and it was said to the provinces: You shall not have any allowance for population beyond a certain figure. It might have been done in the way suggested by my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) under an arrangement whereby a certain percentage of the customs or excise duties would be assigned to each province. That way was not taken and if we proposed it to-day I do not think it would bring about any different result from that which we have before the House. If it be admitted that the provinces were not expected to resort to direct taxation, but that they were to receive a reasonable share of the Dominion revenues in order that they might make up the loss they sustained in yielding their revenues to the common treasury, then once that principle is acknowledged, it ought to have been acknowledged either on the basis of population without limitation, or, upon a percentage of the customs and excise duties. The question of giving a percentage of the customs duties, if it ever were considered, was set aside, and the records of the debates on confederation do not show that any such proposal was carefully thought out. They did grant the subsidy upon the basis of a limited population. If the principle is good at all for granting the subsidy out of the Dominion treasury on the basis of population, then there should be no limit to that population. You might make a limit as you have done in these resolutions when you come to a very large and dense population, in which case you would not need so much per capita as you would in a smaller province; but I have never been able to see why in the case of the smaller provinces it should be determined that we, recognizing the principle of payment by population, should say: We will give you a share of the Dominion revenues, but the moment your population reaches 400,000 the subsidy beyond that must stop, and you will get no increase. Now, every soul added to the population of a province after the 400,000 limit, adds to the burden of local government. You need more roads, you need more schools, every one of the items which enter into the outlay of provincial government is increased with the increased population of the province. Why, under such conditions, there should be such a limit stipulated, I have never been able to understand. I think the proposal which is involved in this resolution, of a subsidy per head of the population, to continue and increase as the population increases, is a sound one. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) says that in future years the provinces will come to us and demand a larger share, on the ground that the Dominion revenues are greater. They come to-day and because our revenues are greater and because there is no elasticity in the present financial scheme, they ask for increased subsidies. Under the scheme now proposed the elasticity which is lacking at present is created; and should they come again we can answer: You cannot demand more subsidy on account of increasing Dominion revenues, for you are getting a larger share now through increased population. The revenue will undoubtedly keep pace with the population; as the population increases, the revenue will increase and the provinces will receive an increase of subsidy in proportion to their increase of population. That is a sound principle. As I have said, every addition to the population of a province adds to the burdens of the provincial government, and if it is a sound principe to assist the provincial governments at all out of the federal treasury, then that assistance should be based upon population, and without the limitations which have existed in the past and which are now to be removed.

Mr. SPROULE. Where would you be if your revenue was increased out of all proportion to your increase of population ?

Mr. FIELDING. Then the various provinces would get in proportion to their population and I think that would be a fair basis. My hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) belongs to a province where 'representation by population,' was very popular ; in this case it is subsidy by population and I am satisfied it will work out fairly and justly. I have not made the calculation but I venture to say it is highly probable that the percentage of the Dominion revenues given the provinces in 1867, was greater than is the percentage of the present revenue to be given under this scheme. The increased subsidy we grant to them is not very large, while we all know that in the mean time the customs and excise revenues of the Dominion have increased to an enormous extent. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) alluded to this increase of subsidies as $3,000,000 or thereabouts ; it is $2,342,000, and we might as well have the exact sum. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) asked the right hon. the Prime Minister, upon what basis these figures were reached——

Mr. FOSTER. What is the basis ?

Mr. FIELDING. I think the answer of the Prime Minister was a fair answer. What was the basis in 1867, other than the understanding among the provinces of what they thought would be fair and reasonable for the maintenance of their provincial governments. That was the basis in 1867, and why is it not a reasonable basis in 1907. There can be no other basis than a calculation as to what is fair and reasonable sum to enable the provincial governments to maintain themselves in a proper way.

Mr. FOSTER. I had particular reference to the principle upon which the fixed amounts are granted. Perhaps the Minister of Finance will explain that ?

Mr. FIELDING. I will have to answer my hon. friend by saying, that it is on the principle of 1867 which had in view the making up from these several sources what might be a fair and reasonable sum. The subsidy which goes to the provinces goes under two heads ; first, there is a fixed sum for each province——

Mr. FOSTER. For what purpose ?

Mr. FIELDING. For the purpose of supporting their legislatures. Then there is a sum per capita, and the two combined form what is called the provincial subsidy. Under the original British North America Act we had these fixed arbitrary sums granted to the several provinces for the support of their governments and their legislatures, plus the amount per capita. There is no means of finding any basis upon which these sums were fixed other than that the two sums united were calculated to meet the amount which it was thought would be necessary for the maintenance of the provincial governments.

My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) had a good deal to say about British Columbia. It seems to me he is particularly sad because we did not get up a quarrel with British Columbia on the subsidy question. He thinks it very strange that the Dominion should have said to the province of British Columbia : We prefer you would discuss this question of an extra allowance to your province with your brethren of the other provinces. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) seems to think there was some particular reason why this government should have been willing to sit in judgment and determine just how much British Columbia should receive. Why did this conference assemble in the city of Ottawa ? What was the purpose of this conference of the provinces, if it were not that they should come together and by comparison of their needs, and their claims and their resources, agree upon a sum which might be asked in the name of all the provinces from the Dominion.

My hon. friend says it is a very easy way of settling the matter. I am glad that he thinks so. It is a much easier way than it would be for this government to undertake to give a lump sum to a particular province, with the result that all the other provinces would be discontented. It is a well known fact that in the past if, for any cause—and I must assume that the cause was a good one—this parliament gave to any one province a sum of money that was not given to another, there was always a chance for provincial criticism to arise. I well remember, though it was long before I came to this parliament, that when an extra sum was granted to the province of Nova Scotia, it was claimed by members representing the other provinces that they were treated unjustly. Reference has been made to-day to the complaints put before this parliament at that time. Which is the better way—that this government should undertake of its own motion to grant a large sum to a province and leave the other provinces to feel that they were not fairly treated, or to say to all the provinces: We recognize the principle that you are entitled to a larger grant from the Dominion treasury, but we do not wish that there should be any provincial quarrel or jealousy in this matter, and we ask you to sit down and agree among yourselves, if the Dominion government can distribute two millions or more to assist you to carry on your provincial governments, what the basis of that distribution should be, so that every province will be treated fairly and there will be no provincial jealousy. That is the fairest way; and so, when these provincial delegates came together for that purpose, recognizing as they all did the fairness of that position, was it not most reasonable for us to say to Mr. McBride, as we said to Mr. Whitney, Mr. Gouin and all the other premiers: We want you to assist us in this matter; we want you to agree upon a basis for the distribution of this money; we do not want to go before parliament with a quarrel among the provinces on this subject. We went out of our way a little, I think, to say to these gentlemen that we wanted them to be considerate of British Columbia, and I venture to say that they were. With regard to the fixed sum to which my hon. friend has referred as one of the ways in which consideration can be given to the smaller provinces, I cannot tell the exact basis on which the fixed sum was originally arrived at; but the effect of that arbitrary grant to each province was this, that the smaller provinces received a larger per capita allowance than the larger provinces received. In the existing financial arrangement under which we are paying the subsidies there is a considerable advantage to the smaller provinces, if that fixed sum is worked out on a per capita basis; and that advantage, which British Columbia, with the other smaller provinces, is enjoying, is increased by the new subsidy scheme now before the House, because it will be found that the fixed sum adopted in this new schedule gives the smaller provinces more consideration on the per capita basis than they are now receiving. I think the intention of the fathers of confederation must have been to deal in that way with the inequalities of the different provinces. It is a reasonable proposition that one province with a population of a couple of millions will not need at every point as much per capita as another province with a small population. Just as the proportionate cost of any business is reduced as the business expands, so the great province of Ontario could get along with a less sum per head for certain purposes than British Columbia or Nova Scotia or any of the other smaller provinces. I am sure that that idea must have been present to the minds of the fathers of confederation; and, although we have no explanation of it in detail, I am satisfied that one of the objects of that fixed and arbitrary sum which they provided for in the British North America Act was that the smaller provinces would receive greater consideration by that means than they would upon the per capita basis.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. FIELDING. Well, we have, on the advice and at the request of the premiers of the various provinces, accepted and enlarged that principle in the new scale of subsidies, and under it the smaller provinces will receive a larger sum per capita than is paid to the larger provinces, and I think all will agree that that is a desirable end. I think it is well to bear in mind that British Columbia and the other small provinces already receive similar consideration in the existing scale of subsidies. British Columbia will now receive further consideration in the special grant of $100,000 a year for ten years. My hon. friend asks: What will happen in ten years? Will the mountains disappear? No, but we hope that, by reason of the development of that province, in its forest wealth, in its minerals, in its agricultural resources, in its fruit-growing capabilities, which alone are capable of making it a great province, it will have a population ten years hence which will secure to it, under these resolutions, a large and liberal subsidy, so that it will no longer require that special grant, which it requires to-day because it is a province with a great territory, great physical difficulties and a comparatively small population. My hon. friend thought we should enter into an examination of the financial administrations of the various provinces. I think hon. gentlemen will see that it would be impossible for us to take up an investigation of that nature. The provinces are independent——

Mr. BERGERON. Not when they come for money.

Mr. FIELDING. This money is not paid to the provinces as a favour. The grants now given to them are necessary to carry out the spirit of confederation. I do not think we are in a position to dole out gifts of money to the provinces when they can make a good claim on their merits; and if anything has occurred in these provinces which hon. gentlemen in this House do not approve of, I do not think it is for us to call in question the acts of an independent province. What we might think extravagant, the people of the province might regard as a wise and proper expenditure. For example, the hon. gentleman thought it would be well for the provinces to leave railway subsidies alone, because of the liability of provincial and Dominion subsidies to overlap. I will not undertake to speak with regard to all the provinces, but with regard to my own province, with which I am most familiar, I can say that if it had not been for the action of the local government in assisting in the development of that province by railway enterprises over and above what the Dominion government has been doing, I venture to say that, small as its population is, it would not have two-thirds of the population it has to-day. There is a mistaken idea in the minds of some persons that the aid granted by the Dominion government for railways is sufficient to secure their construction. I have no doubt that what occurred in my own province has taken place in the other provinces. Hundreds of miles of railway have been constructed in Nova Scotia with the aid and assistance of the local and Dominion governments ; and with all the Dominion has done—although of late years we have been more liberal with our Dominion subsidies—these railways could not have been built if our provincial government had not come liberally to their aid. Therefore I cannot admit that the provinces are to be condemned for having entered on the work of railway construction, for unless they had done so these railways would never have been constructed, and certainly the province of Nova Scotia would not have been able to keep pace with the others in the march of progress. I can say that there is not a mile of railway constructed in my own province—and I am purposely confining myself to that—which my hon. friend, on a careful examination, would say is not necessary and useful for the development of the country. And if these roads were necessary and useful, and if they could not have been constructed without provincial assistance, surely we ought not to undertake to condemn the local government because, out of their limited means, they did the best they could to assist railway enterprises in the several provinces.

Mr. SPROULE. Did the government take into consideration the changed policy which we adopted years ago of giving the provinces subsidies from the federal parliament for building railways because they claimed that the provincial subsidies were not sufficient ?

Mr. FIELDING. That was not taken into account in the rearrangement of these financial matters but was taken into account in the discussion of the railway question, at all events in my own province. What was the attitude of former governments, and I am not drawing attention to this for the purpose of fault finding ? Of course the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Intercolonial Railway were built as great national roads, but in 1883 the late Conservative government entered on a policy of subsidizing what some call local railways. The grant in aid of these was limited to $3,200 per mile. But there is hardly a road in the Dominion, unless in some exceptionally favoured location, that could be constructed on a subsidy of $3,200 per mile, and consequently that assistance, so well intended, failed to realize expectations. When therefore our government came into power we adopted what is sometimes called the double subsidy. That is to say, up to a maximum of $6,400 per mile, a railway was to receive a subsidy in proportion to the cost of the undertaking. But even with that double subsidy, you cannot get a railway constructed in a sparsely settled portion. If you have a rich district in the fertile Northwest, which has been long settled, and in which there are towns and villages, perhaps you can get a railway built without a subsidy at all ; but in the more sparsely settled districts, neither $3,200 nor $6,400 per mile will secure the road. You need the co-operation of both the local and Dominion governments in order to get a railway through such a section. I give these illustrations from my own province, but no doubt they apply equally to others. To say, as a matter of principle, that a local government should not subsidize railways is to take a mistaken point of view.

The other point made is on the question of permanency. How do we propose to make this final ? Well, all a man can do, in any event of life, is the best he can. Any legislation of the parliament of Canada, whether we used the word 'final' or not, of course we can from time to time amend. But by these resolutions it is proposed that an imperial Act shall be passed providing that, for the purposes mentioned in section 118 of the British North America Act, which deals with the subsidies to the provincial governments and legislatures, the sums therein proposed shall be final. Therefore we do everything possible to make the arrangement final. Can we get over that ? Yes. Even after you get an Act of the imperial parliament saying that this is final, this parliament may from time to time grant moneys for some other purposes and give them to the provinces. I frankly admit that. I venture to say that for the purposes set forth in section 118 of the British North America Act this parliament, after the enactment of this amendment by the imperial parliament, would not grant additional sums. But though we might not grant them in that direct form, we might grant them in some other way. I do not believe we can devise any means which could prevent the people and parliament of Canada spending their own money in the way they may deem most advisable. If therefore, in the face of an imperial enactment, this Dominion parliament should see fit, for one reason or another, to make some special grant to any particular province, nothing that we or the imperial parliament can do will prevent it. But inasmuch as there have been differences in the past owing to provincial jealousies over the provincial subsidies, we have thought it well to make some effort to have the present arrangement made final, in so far as it is possible by human effort to do so, and we have undertaken to do this by asking the imperial authorities to declare that the sums granted the several provinces for certain purposes shall, for those purposes, be final and unalterable.

Mr. BERGERON. I was astonished when I read the resolution we are now discussing. Of course we have had provincial conferences held with the object of obtaining an increase to provincial subsidies. The first took place in 1887. Then there was one in 1902. The first one took place in the city of Quebec, under the leadership of the late Mr. Mercier and all the provincial premiers attended it. But I do not think I am wrong in saying that at that time no one took the demands of the different provincial premiers seriously. If I remember well the province of Ontario, although then well represented by Sir Oliver Mowat, did not expect that these demands would materialize. The whole thing was looked upon, in the province of Quebec at any rate, as a political move on the part of Mr. Mercier directed against the Ottawa government rather than anything else, and it must have been so considered for a long time even by my right hon. friend, because, although he was then a member of this House, he never directly or indirectly made any move here in that direction although it would have been easy for him to have proposed a resolution to that effect calling on the Dominion government to meet the demands of the provincial premiers. However the movement was not looked upon seriously. Nor was it looked upon any more seriously in 1902. It was not until last summer—and I do not want to insinuate that my right hon. friend gave way before the threats of Mr. Gouin—that any one believed the matter would ever come before parliament. As far as the province of Quebec is concerned, I view with a great deal of alarm any attempt to amend the British North America Act.

I am sorry that it should come from the Prime Minister who hails from that province. The amount of money immediately involved, of course, is a secondary consideration. For my part, I am not convinced that the provinces are in such need as has been said this afternoon, and so I think the question is placed upon a false foundation. Now the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) spoke a great deal about what the provinces asked and what they desired, and what they wished, in 1867. I have heard the Liberals on the hustings for the last thirty years, say that the provinces had never been consulted when confederation was established. Confederation was made by the great public men of the day, Liberals and Conservatives, meeting together. I do not find fault with their work—it was a good work. They determined to bring the provinces into one Dominion. That was a good object. But they did not consult the provinces about it. I have often heard a gentleman whom the older members of this House well remember, Mr. Mitchell, speak about his experiences, when he was charged with bringing into confederation the province of New Brunswick in which the government was beaten. Nova Scotia came in against her will. Quebec was not consulted, nor was Ontario. But it was decided that these four provinces should become the Dominion of Canada. When the confederation was framed certain powers were given to the central government and others to local legislatures. But any one who reads with attention the confederation debates will see that, in spite of their differences, all the men there had the same idea—that confederation must be established. Some of the fathers of confederation wanted a legislative union —one government for all the provinces. I think they were wrong. Others wanted the federal system. But, reading the speeches of Mr. Brown, Mr. Dorion and others who favoured a federal union, we find that even they designed that the local legislatures should not be parliaments and should not be expensive. Each province was allowed its separate autonomy, but Mr. Brown said, and so did Mr. Dorion, that the local legislatures were supposed to be economical, they were to have a small membership and their sessions were to be short. Even to-day, after forty years, the Quebec legislature sat, this year, only about five or six weeks, and if they sat regularly the whole week, they could get through their work in less time than that. But the provincial governments have grown expensive. They have created debts. According to the intention of the fathers of confederation the provincial governments were not to run into debt. It is true, they were granted a few dollars of revenue as has been mentioned here this afternoon, but they were supposed to gather their revenue mainly through direct taxation. And there was a reason for that. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has just mentioned it, in saying that direct taxation, as Mr. Holton said, is the best way of taxing the people because they know what their government is costing them and they are more enlightened in their political affairs. It is said that this is an unpopular method of taxation. The fathers of confederation did not so regard it, but looked upon it as the best way for the provinces to raise their revenue. And I think they were right. As I have said, the provinces are not to-day in such great need of money. The Quebec government, the other day, showed a surplus. The government of New Brunswick, which met the legislature a few days ago, showed a surplus. The province of Ontario has an immense surplus. Why should we take money out of the federal coffers, money that belongs to the people of Canada and give it out piecemeal to these local governments encouraging them in lack of initiative and making it unnecessary for them to find money where it should be found—within the province itself? It is a dangerous policy; we are opening a door which may let in great evils into the Dominion, and particularly into the province of which I come.

Now, my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) this afternoon, said, that this would be the end of the raids of the different local governments upon the federal treasury. What guarantee has he of that? It seems to me that these local governments—not carrying the comparison to an offensive length—are like children; give them something and they want more. Why, it began in 1869. Why did Nova Scotia make her demands in that year? There were political considerations which my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) probably knows better than anybody else here. There was one man in Nova Scotia—a great man, who had not accepted confederation—who had to be conciliated. He was to come into the ranks of the party then in power, which he did. But to open the door and make his change of allegiance more easy, he was given the opportunity to say that he had done something for his province by winning better terms for it. That was the first raid on the federal treasury. Then came New Brunswick. Ontario and Quebec did not want anything. Mention has been made of what happened in 1884. Quebec did not ask any favour in that year. But, when the Dominion was guaranteeing a loan of $30,000,000 to a great railway company, the representatives of Quebec in this House thought it a proper occasion to demand justice from the Dominion government for their province. They required a guarantee by the Dominion government of the debt for the construction of the North Shore Railway, asking that the same should be done in Quebec as had been done in Ontario where the road from Callander to Gravenhurst was bought. Quebec did not look upon it as a favour, but as a matter of right. Quebec never made any raid upon the Dominion treasury. But so far as these raids are concerned the Prime Minister has no guaranteee in making this arrangement with the provinces, that the provinces will not come at some future time demanding more. I have said that the local legislatures are too costly. Of course, all we are looking for, whichever side of the House we may occupy, is the good of this country. My opinion is that there are too many politicians in Canada. This country is over-governed. The local legislatures have too large a membership. In Quebec for instance, they have seventy-three or seventy-four members. I am convinced that fifty members could represent that province in the local legislature perfectly well, and the same proportion would be enough for the other provinces. These gentlemen are paid an indemnity. I do not begrudge them that. But, when that question was mentioned at the time of confederation, the indemnity of the local legislatures, was put at the lowest possible figure, and it was declared that the less they were paid the better it would be because they would make their sessions shorter and would to their work better. All this has been changed and the representation in the different provinces has become expensive.

Now there is a danger of over government in this country. The people some day may find that they are too much governed. They might come to that conclusion, particularly if the politicians continue to be like those we have seen, who are ready some of them to offer resistance to the Dominion government if it does not yield to their demands. Some day the people of this country might rise and say: We have too much of that. And I ask my right hon. friend, because I imagine he has the same opinion on that subject that I have, where would we be in that event? If we have to-day the federal system it is due entirely to Quebec, who demanded it. Sir George E. Cartier made a fight on that question and carried his point, contending that Quebec was in a different condition from the other provinces. I said a moment ago that our different local governments are too costly. I want to give my right hon. friend one example; it is a small example, but by small things we can judge bigger ones. Take the way the criminal courts are administered in the province of Quebec. There was a term of the criminal court in my county the other day and there were three Crown prosecutors paid at the rate of $20 a day for a term lasting one month. There were four cases, two were abandoned, one was judged, and one was declared not guilty, and that term lasted nearly a month. People who see these things are scandalized. The right hon. premier may say: The provinces can change that if they like, they have their destiny in their own hands. Well, we know how this is done. We know that to-day when the patronage is at the disposal of the federal government, people are far from doing whatever they want. There is another thing. Take our own government in Quebec. As soon as the session is over, although it is a short session lasting six or seven weeks, the ministers all have to make a trip, I suppose for the benefit of the province. They go around promenading here and there at a cost of $2,000 or $4,000 to the province. All these things involve expense but never mind, it is the Dominion government which provides the revenue. It is finding the money to give with the right hand and with the left hand it hands it over to the local government. I know it may be said tomorrow, particularly by the papers in our own province, that when they get money from the Dominion government it is like getting a present. People are looking for expenditures in their own counties for building wharfs and public buildings. They say: The more we can get out of the government the better for us—just as if the Dominion government did not belong to them, and that it was not their money that was being spent. Some will say there is an opposition in Ottawa opposing such a scheme. It is true I oppose it because I believe it is bad in itself, it is particularly bad for us in Quebec. The more money you give to the local governments the longer you will prevent them from resorting to direct taxation, and only in that case will the people realize where the money comes from and where it goees.

Mr. A. A. LEFURGEY (Prince, P.E.I.). The subject of this address contemplates a step of great importance. Not only does it alter the basis under which the provinces came into the confederation, but it is supposed, from the remark of the premier, to afford relief to the various provinces in regard to money matters for all time to come. The step I think is in some respects a very necessary one. The promoters of confederation were no doubt wise men in their day, but we can see now that with all their ability they could not foresee the events of the present day, and the necessities of the provinces that have arisen during the past forty years. I believe that new situations will arise in the future. The Prime Minister said this is going to put an end to all coming back to Ottawa. The provinces have been coming back and coming back, but this is going to be the final coming back. Well, I think that circumstances will arise in the future that will call for a new readjustment, when the wealthier provinces will be asked to assist those who are poorer. I believe that long before another forty years elapse some of the provinces will becoming back here calling for readjustment and aid. For instance, it has been pointed out to-day that British Columbia is going to get $100,000 extra indemnity because she has some peculiar disadvantages to overcome. It has also been pointed out that in the next ten years the resources of British Columbia will be bringing her in untold wealth, and that she will not need any more assistance. I believe that is perfectly true. But it will not be true of some other provinces like Prince Edward Island and Manitoba, who have no timber resources, who have no mines, and who will not be gathering revenues internally as some of the other provinces will be doing. Right down in Nova Scotia to-day the revenues coming in from their coal mines amount to $643,657 a year. Other provinces like Prince Edward Island have nothing to fall back upon, but the aid they get from the central government and from direct taxation. All the provinces of the Dominion however have found that the revenues granted them from the central government at the time of confederation have not proved sufficient, and they are now coming back for a more equitable distribution of the funds to relieve their needs. As the memorial points out, the revenues allowed to the various provinces under the terms of union have not proved adequate for the carrying on of the local administrations without unduly burdening their existing resources. This address is supposed to suggest a remedy, which the Prime Minister says will be a final remedy.

Now I want to speak particularly as regards the province of Prince Edward Island, and before going into details I want to refer to the history of these provincial conferences. The first conference was held in 1887. Resolutions were drawn up by representatives of all the provinces except Prince Edward Island. Her case was not put forward at all. At that time she was allowed $70,000. There was not even a provision made at that time for the payment of a per capita allowance such as was given to her by the terms of confederation, although Manitoba and British Columbia which came in under precisely the same wording in their terms of union were looked after. Again in 1902, another conference was held and upon this occasion the representatives of Prince Edward Island were present. They apparently made no special claims for Prince Edward Island and the per capita allowance under the terms of union were not protected. But, we find that British Columbia and Manitoba were looked after. In 1906 another conference was held, and our representatives, Hon. Mr. Peters and Hon. Mr. Hughes were sent up with resolutions from their local government authorizing them to accept certain conditions. The conference was held in the city of Quebec. The resolutions of this conference were affirmed with certain amendments in the local assembly of Prince Edward Island. I quote from the legislative assembly reports of Prince Edward Island, April 9, 1906:

Whereas, a conference was held in the city of Quebec on the 18th, 19th and 20th of December, 1902, of representatives of the provinces of Quebec, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Manitoba, duly accredited by the respective governments of those provinces at which the resolutions reproduced in the annexed schedule were passed, and so on.

(c) The population as ascertained by the last decennial census to govern except as to British Columbia, Manitoba and Prince Edward Island, and as to these provinces the population to be taken to be that upon which under the respective statutes and terms of union in that behalf the annual payments now made to them respectively by the Dominion are fixed until the actual population is by the census ascertained to be greater and thereafter the actual population so ascertained to govern.

This is reciting the resolutions as passed at that conference and reaffirming them in the local legislature while amending them so as to include in the per capita representation the protection of Prince Edward Island. We find that at this conference of 1906, Mr. Peters and Mr. Hughes made no attempt to protect Prince Edward Island in regard to per capita representation, although resolutions were passed putting in Manitoba, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta and again leaving out Prince Edward Island. There has been a great deal of dissatisfaction in Prince Edward Island in regard to what was done by the then leader of the government, Mr. Peters. He, in fact, claimed that the interests of the Island were protected. If any body will read over the main address before the House he will see that the section (b) does not protect Prince Edward Island in regard to her per capita allowance. For that reason I put upon the order paper of last Friday a resolution in the following words :

In the case of Prince Edward Island, the population to be taken to be that upon which under the law, in that behalf, the annual payments now made by the Dominion are fixed until the actual population is by any census ascertained to be greater, and thereafter any increase of population so ascertained, to govern.

This is practically reaffirming the terms under which we came into confederation, and which the right hon. First Minister has said to-day means that we shall be paid on the maximum population at any time until our population reaches 400,000 ; that is to say we shall never have a decrease in the per capita allowance but we shall always have an increase. Now, the right hon. First Minister has seen fit—I presume because there has been such a protest in Prince Edward Island because the terms of confederation were not protected by our representatives—to introduce an amendment to the main resolution which will protect the interests of Prince Edward Island in this regard. I might also point out that the Hon. Mr. Peters, on February 25, 1907, in the House of Assembly of Prince Edward Island, said:

A great deal of misapprehension exists as to the constitution of the conference. Sir Wilfrid Laurier called together all the local premiers. The premiers were among themselves to discuss their claims, come to a conclusion about them and then present them. When these subjects had been discussed we sent for Sir Wilfrid. As strongly as I can I want to impress upon this honourable House how this conference was constituted.

The question before the conference had nothing to do with per capita. The question was what each province was to get for a specific subsidy. Before the conference met we knew what we got—$30,000. After the conference had closed it was agreed by every province that we should get an increase of $70,000.

The question of eighty cents a head on population was not discussed except incidentally.

It seems to me that it is a very strange statement for one of our representatives to make when he says that the question of the per capita representation was not discussed at all. It apparently was not in the hon. gentleman's mind because he did not see fit to protect the interests of the province with respect to the allowance that we were getting under the terms of confederation since he was allowing some $5,000 to slip away from the province. It appears to me that from the large amounts that are going to be handed over to Quebec, Ontario and every other province except Prince Edward Island, the per capita allowance is one of the most important things that could be dealt with at the conference. The only sop that was held out to Prince Edward Island was the miserable $70,400 that does not even wipe out the annual recurring deficit in Prince Edward Island. Hon. Mr. Peters further said that the great question was :

The great question was, what shall you get for the support of government and legislation. I do not know how it was arrived at we got $30,000 formerly ; it was based on estimates. At the time we went into confederation it was impossible to decide what the amount should be. Well, time rolled on ; the amount was found not sufficient. But we got along on the $30,000, and are proud to say that the province improved. Then a lot of influences converged to put us in a position to go and demand as a right that which, if we stood alone we would have had great difficulty in obtaining. It was necessary to have the goodwill and the good-fellowship of the other provinces, and we did have it.

The eighty cents a head was granted on account of our giving up our customs and excise. I want to remark here in passing that we gave up in customs and excise to the Dominion of Canada, figuring at the present time on basis that our population is one fifty-second part of the population of Dominion, over $1,115,000 and taking all sources of revenue into consideration we gave up over $1,500,000 and we get back some $211,000 on account of cash subsidy and $500,000 more in other items. But the difference between which we pay and which we receive in return is a large and increasing drain upon our resources. In this regard our payments and liabilities in the confederation are large and we get a very small return. The specific subsidy was granted for government and legislation, and Prince Edward Island got the very small allowance of $70,000 a year. I wish to point out to this House that the gentlemen who represented Prince Edward Island at these conferences did not represent the views of the legislature nor did they represent the views of the people of that province as regards the claims of Prince Edward Island to further consideration. At the conference of 1906, neither of the gentlemen representing Prince Edward Island put forward the claim to our original per capita allowance, nor did they put in any amount for special claims under clause (c) in return 29a which reads as follows:

Resolved—1. That the subject-matter of the resolutions adopted by the conference of the representatives of the several provinces, held at Quebec in December, 1902, and which were shortly thereafter presented to the government of the Dominion and which were ratified by the legislatures of the then existing provinces, except that of British Columbia, be now pressed upon the government of the Dominion for immediate and favourable action, under reserve of the right of any province to now submit to such government memoranda in writing concerning any claims it may have to larger sums than those set out in the said resolutions, or to additional consideration or recognition.

I have here the minutes of the proceedings of the 1906 conference, printed in pamphlet form and handed to the members of the local legislature by the Hon. Mr. Peters, and I find from it that Mr. Peters advanced no claim for any special amount for Prince Edward Island, and appeared satisfied to sanction the small allowance of $70,000 as a full settlement of our claims for all time to come, as the First Minister says to-night. I repeat that neither did Mr. Peters nor the Hon. Mr. Hughes represent at that conference in any sense the real views of the legislature and the people of our province.

Let me point out that the province of Prince Edward Island is now in a serious financial condition. The total debt of the province on September 30, 1906, amounted to $805,853; whereas twenty years ago the debt of Prince Edward Island was less than $10,000. Twenty years ago Prince Edward Island paid $615 annual interest on her debt, whereas this year Prince Edward Island will pay in the neighbourhood of $40,000 interest on her debt. Sixteen years ago Prince Edward Island collected no taxes, but last year the provincial government collected in taxes some $90,000. Twenty years ago the total annual expenditure of the province was $263,000, and last year it was $360,000. The House will readily see that the financial situation of the province is getting to be serious. We began with no public debt in 1879, and we have now a public debt of $805,853. We have recurring annual deficits for the past twelve years of some $45,000 a year. The following figures will show what the condition is.

The receipts and expenditures for the last four years are as follows:

	Receipts.	Expenditure.	Deficit.
1902	$324,670 37	$336.792 48	$ 12,122 11
1903	318,766 17	339,238 11	20,471 94
1904	307,730 50	375,880 13	68,149 63
1905	313,445 02	359,561 99	46,116 97
1906	258,234 90	286,196 44	27,961 54

Mr. LEFURGEY.

Deficit, 1904	$ 68,149 63
Deficit, 1905	46,116 97
	114,266 60
Average deficit for the two years	57,133 30

On account of the Hillsborough bridge which will connect two parts of the railway system on the island, and which should have been built and paid for entirely by the Dominion government, $9,750; we will have also an increase in the interest on the public debt amounting to $2,500. This means that for next year we will possibly have a deficit of $69,383.30. At the conference in 1906, the Hon. Mr. Roblin proposed, seconded by Hon. Mr. Peters, that the commercial travellers' tax be done away with. Now, this tax is largely in restraint of trade, and it is a great shame that the finances of the province are so depleted that the provincial government had to resort to such taxation. It was apparently understood, however, at this conference that if Mr. Peters got this great big sum of $70,000 a year for Prince Edward Island the province would wipe out the commercial travellers tax. This tax amounts to about $7,500 a year, and if it is abolished that would leave a probable deficit next year of $76,883.30. Therefore, the $70,000 which Mr. Peters accepted to relieve the financial condition of the island will leave us with a net deficit of some $7,000 a year to begin with. Prince Edward Island never had enough money from the time she entered confederation to carry on the affairs of the province, and we were absolutely without any resources unless we resort to direct taxation.

We did carry on the government of Prince Edward Island for a number of years without taxation, but with skimping every needed improvement on the island. We at that time drew $200,000 from our capital account at Ottawa, $109,567 in windfalls for piers and other things that tided over the situation, and later we added to our revenue some $50,000, part of it for non-fulfilment of the terms of union with regard to winter communication. We have been dragging on in this half-hearted way, the province not being able to progress. I may say for both the Liberals and the Conservatives, that the provincial administrations of Prince Edward Island cannot be charged with great extravagance. The whole trouble is that we have never had the money to spend. British Columbia and Ontario present cases of large expenditures along lines of different improvements; but they had the money to spend. Prince Edward Island needed these improvements. Prince Edward Island has been forced to be entirely too economical for its own growth. If you take the financial statement of the province of Nova Scotia just issued, you find that that province, out of its revenues, has been able to expend in 1906: on capital account, $817,692.21; on bridges, $113,773.67, and on the Halifax and Southwestern Railway, $692,119.34. Both these last items are valuable assets to the province. Nova Scotia expended on agriculture, in 1903, $36,900, and in 1905, $55,677.29, an increase of $18,777.29; New Brunswick is in very much the same situation, while Prince Edward Island has been able to expend in the year 1906 on capital account only $22,061.57; on bridges, only $4,671.85, and on agriculture, though it is above anything else an agricultural province, only $4,507.69. The result of all this has been that the province of Prince Edward Island has had to resort to direct taxation. We have now a tax on our land, an income tax, a commercial travellers' tax and a tax on banking institutions. We have exhausted almost every available resource for taxation; and yet, with all these taxes, we are up against an annually recurring deficit averaging in the past twelve years some $45,000, and in the past two years, $57,133. And yet the representative of Prince Edward Island, the Hon. Mr. Peters, comes up here to a conference to seek for a remedy, and accepts $70,000 in lieu of all we need. The hon. First Minister says he wants this to be definite, and he wants us to approach the subject in a spirit of fairness, so that we may put the provinces in such a financial position that they will be able to meet their local requirements, and will not be coming back to this parliament year after year. Does the right hon. First Minister mean to tell this House, in face of the case I have presented to-night, the facts of which he can verify in the blue-books, that the province of Prince Edward Island is going to be satisfied with $70,000 a year, with no possibility of an increase in the per capita allowance, while every other province of the Dominion gets from $137,885 up to $789,484, which sums will be growing greater each year? The right hon. gentleman sanctions an alteration of the British North America Act for what purpose? To deal equitably with the provinces; and yet he gives to the wealthiest province of the Dominion, the province of Ontario, $789,434.80, and to Prince Edward Island only $70,000. Moreover, this $70,000 is reduced to very small proportions if you take into consideration the fact that Prince Edward Island is to pay a proportion of this $2,430,000 odd that he is giving to the provinces. The proportion which Prince Edward Island has to pay of this will amount to some $40,000, which reduces the $70,000 to a very small amount to wipe out the annually recurring deficits, amounting at the present time to $57,000 odd. I wish to point out how we stand with regard to education. The amount we spent out of our whole income on education for nine months in 1906 was $126,708.93. We have the poorest paid salaried teachers in the Dominion of Canada. Their average salaries have gone down in recent years, as the following figures show:

Average salary in	1889.	1903.
First-class, male..	$457 93	$336 15
First-class, female..	455 00	202 69
Second-class, male	273 58	236 38
Second-class, female.. ..	205 91	188 60
Third-class, male..	209 03	188 78
Third-class, female..	149 77	144 40

Take this one question of education alone, we are not able, with our present revenue in Prince Edward Island, to keep our teachers at home. We are taxed up to the limit, we have raised taxes from every possible source of revenue, including the tax on commercial travellers, and still cannot afford to pay our teachers sufficient salaries. Year after year they are leaving us for the provinces of the west where they can get larger salaries than we can afford to pay them. One of the great difficulties we have to contend with, says Dr. Anderson, the Superintendent of Education, is the small salaries we pay our teachers. The doctor goes on:

> In every other department of activity the rewards are higher. Consequently young men engage in teaching merely as a stepping stone to one of the more fortunate professions.
> Such being the case there is no permanence in the profession. There is a continual stream of teachers abandoning it, while their places are filled by inexperienced youths. Latterly the same has become true of the women teachers. Not only have they chosen to adopt other professions, but the demand for teachers in the northwest and British Columbia has so impresed them by the liberal salaries which are offered that they, and men too, have turned thither in considerable numbers. Manifestly what must be done is to endeavour to neutralize, if possible, the influence of these attractions by largely increasing the salaries. I know that if a minimum salary of $450 for first-class teachers, as principals in first-class schools, and $350 for the principals of ordinary graded schools, were aimed at and reached, the leakage would be greatly lessened.

I could go on through almost every item of expenditure to show what difficulty we have on the island in conducting our public affairs. Our members are paid practically nothing for their legislative duties. Our roads and bridges are in many cases not up to the standard of those in the other provinces. In nearly every item of expenditure, our province is literally starved. Therefore, as a representative of that province, I have to condemn this address absolutely and in no particular representing our wants and needs.

If you will take the difference in the expenditure of the province of Prince Edward Island, when it came into confederation and compare that with the expenditure in 1905, you will find considerable increases in almost every line. Let me draw attention to the following statement:

—	Expenditure, 1872.	Expenditure, 1905.	Increase.
	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.
Education	64,220 26	122,897 08	58,676 82
Public Works of all kinds	74,219 09	94,504 02	20,284 93
Administration of Justice	5,879 06	19,842 54	13,963 48
Legislature	14,437 09	8,827 87
Executive Council	2,228 21	623 85
Lunatic Asylum	5,105 44	29,358 19	24,252 75
Poor House	4,983 09	4,207 48
Agriculture	3,283 14	5,870 17	2,587 03
Paupers	2,846 28	3,788 90	942 62
	177,201 66	289,921 10	120,707 63

This matter should certainly have had some consideration in the address before the House. But there are also other matters. The right hon. the First Minister read an extract from a speech of Mr. Bake, in which the latter said that all matters of whatever kind, all claims of whatever kind, should be settled once and for all and he affirmed this principle. I want to point out that there are a number of claims of Prince Edward Island not settled. There are the claims arising out of the terms of the union with regard to communication. There are the claims arising out of the settlement of the fore shore question. There is the question of representation which will be dealt with in another direction to-night. There are a number of other claims of Prince Edward Island which were never touched upon by this conference, yet the First Minister calls this a final settlement of all our claims. This address might well be laid over and a business conference held. As the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) has said the conference simply met and shook hands. They met again and passed general resolutions with regard to all the provinces except British Columbia, and then they met again and considered the claims of British Columbia. And from all we can understand, there was very little discussion as to the relative merits of the claims of the different provinces for increased subsidy, and surely none with reference to Prince Edward Island.

I beg therefore to move:

That subsection (a) of paragraph A of the said address be amended by striking out $100,000 and inserting $128,000 in lieu thereof.

I find that Prince Edward Island, when she entered confederation, had the sum of $30,000 allowed her for government and legislation. Under the new arrangement there is no real basis on which the $100,000 is figured. The right hon. the First Minister has acknowledged that, but he said this is a matter of compromise. It is simply a matter of putting down an amount that is supposed to put the province in some way in a condition to meet its obligations. I find that British Columbia, when she entered confederation, had $35,000 allowed her for government anl legislation and that under the new terms she has jumped up to $150,000. Consequently though, there was only a difference of $5,000 between the two when they entered confederation—British Columbia getting $35,000, and Prince Edward Island, $30,000—there is now a difference of $50,000 between them, British Columbia getting $150,000 and Prince Edward Island $100,000. The proposal under this head in the address before us is as follows:

A. Instead of the amounts now paid, the sums hereafter payable yearly by Canada to the several provinces for the support of their governments and legislatures, to be according to population, and as follows.

(a) Where the population of the province is under 150,000 .. $100,000
(b) Where the population of the province is 150,000, but does not exceed 200,000 .. 150,000
(c) Where the population of the province is 200,000, but does not exceed 400,000 .. 180,000
(d) Where the population of the province is 400,000, but does not exceed 800,000 .. 190,000
(e) Where the population of the province is 800,000, but does not exceed 1,500,000 .. 220,000
(f) Where the population of the province exceeds 1,500,000 .. 240,000

The next jump, I find is only to $30,000. What I suggest as a fair compromise under this item is that the adjustment should be made in the same ratio—British Columbia with $35,000 at confederation, is to get $150,000, then Prince Edward Island with $30,000 should get $128,570. The other provinces get larger proportionate increases, except Nova Scotia and Ontario—and except also, of course, Saskatchewan and Alberta, but these, as the Prime Minister pointed out were given special allowance in view of changed conditions, since confederation when they were created provinces. Owing to the peculiar situation of Prince Edward Island, there is every reason to believe, the Prime Minister will see the fairness of giving that province at least the same ratio of increase with regard to government and legislation that is given to British Columbia. I desire to make it clear that I do not favour this address as a final adjustment even with this amendment; but, if the address is to be carried, I think the Prime Minister will see that it should be amended under this head as I propose.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queen's, P.E.I.). I desire to speak on the amendment, and claim the right to speak on the address later on and to move an amendment to it. I think I shall be in order—

Mr. FIELDING. Not unless a further amendment is moved.

Mr. A. MARTIN. I intend to move an amendment.

Mr. FIELDING. On that, the hon. gentleman (Mr. A. Martin) will have the right to speak.

Mr. A. MARTIN. I wish to speak briefly on the present amendment and a little later on to speak on the address. I suppose this amendment will be disposed of before any motion in favour of the address is put ?

Mr. FIELDING. Speaking now, the hon. gentleman exhausts his right to speak on the main motion, but he can speak on his own amendment when he moves it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that an hon. member who moves or seconds an amendment to the motion exhausts his right to speak, and if he attempts to move a second amendment will be out of order.

Mr. FIELDING. Perhaps the hon. gentleman (Mr. A. Martin) had better speak on his own amendment. Perhaps he did not catch the Speaker's ruling—that he will exhaust his right in speaking now.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member seconds the amendment which has been moved, he will exhaust his right to speak. If some body else seconds the amendment, the hon. gentleman (Mr. A. Martin) will have the right to speak.

Mr. A. MARTIN. It does not matter either way. I listened with a great deal of interest to the leader of the government and the other gentlemen who discussed this subject. This proposition has been a long time—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend (Mr. A. Martin) but if he speaks now he cannot move the amendment of which he has given notice.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Cannot I move it now?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, there is an amendment now before the chair which must be disposed of before another is moved. If the hon. gentleman speaks now he speaks to the motion and he cannot move an amendment.

Mr. LEFURGEY. He can move an amendment to the amendment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER. This amendment must be seconded before it is properly before the House. I understand that the hon. gentleman (Mr. A. Martin) is seconding this amendment. If he is doing that he is exhausting his right.

Mr. LAKE. I wish to withdraw my seconding of it.

Mr. SPEAKER. Let me understand the matter. This amendment has been moved by Mr. Lefurgey. I understand that Mr. Lake withdraws his seconding of it. Who, then, is the seconder ?

Mr. FOSTER. I second it.

Mr. O. S. CROCKET (York, N.B.). As has already been pointed out, the allowance which have been set out in this address have been agreed upon between this government and the governments of the several provinces, with the single exception of British Columbia. Therefore, I take it that it is not to be expected that the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will entertain any amendment to these terms. At the same time, I would point out that in this matter, as in most matters that this government has to do with affecting the interests of New Brunswick, that province will suffer a very grievous injustice. I propose, therefore, to attempt to show in what way New Brunswick will be unjustly dealt with by the adoption of the address. In the first place, I would point out the provision concerning that province and its relation—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I understand that the hon. member (Mr. Crocket) intends to discuss something different from the resolution ?

Mr. CROCKET. I am discussing the main motion.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There is an amendment before the Chair. Better discuss the amendment.

Mr. CROCKET. I think it is open to discuss the main motion together with the amendment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I submit that if we go on discussing the main motion while this amendment is before the Chair, we shall be led into endless confusion. There is the amendment of the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Lefurgey) and I think, that we had better dispose of that. Then, if there are remarks to be made on the main motion they had better be made.

Mr. SPROULE. I rise to a point of order. I wish to know if it is not competent for an hon. member to discuss the main motion and the amendment together ? One cannot deal intelligently with the matter, except by making comparisons between the main motion and the amendment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. By way of comparison no, but by way of argument upon the main motion. I would suggest that if we do that we may be led into serious confusion. I understand there are to be amendments moved from the point of view of New Brunswick, of Saskatchewan and of other provinces, and there is one amendment moved from the point of view of Prince Edward Island. Now if you confuse all these amendments I am afraid we will get into a tangle.

Mr. CROCKET. I do not propose to move an amendment, but I desire to discuss the main motion, and I understood from the observations of the Minister of Finance just a moment ago that it was open to any member to discuss the main motion as well as the amendment. I think I am in order in so doing. I was about to point out the state of the law as it affects the province of New Brunswick. Section 118 of the British North America Act, which is the law that is now applicable, reads as follows:

The following sums shall be paid yearly by Canada to the several provinces for the support of their governments and legislatures:

Ontario	$80,000
Quebec	70,000
Nova Scotia	60,000
New Brunswick	50,000

and an annual grant in aid of each province shall be made, equal to eighty cents per head of the population, as ascertained by the census of 1861, and in the case of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, by each subsequent decennial census until the population of each of those two provinces amounts to 400,000 souls, at which rate such grant shall thereafter remain. Such grants shall be in full settlement of all future demands on Canada, and shall be paid half-yearly in advance to each province, but the government of Canada shall deduct from such grants, as against any province, all sums chargeable as interest on the public debt of that province in excess of the several amounts stipulated in this Act.

Now it will be seen that under that section, while the per capita allowance to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec was limited to the population as it was ascertained by the census of 1861, the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick were each entitled to increase their allowance until the population of each province reached the figure of 400,000 souls. Now the Ontario subsidy was in this way limited to $1,116,872 on a population of 1,396,091, that being the population of Ontario in 1861, six years before the confederation agreement came into affect. In the same way the Quebec subsidy was limited under the terms of the original Act to $889,252 on a population of 1,111,596, that being the population of the province of Quebec in the year 1861. New Brunswick began with an annual subsidy of $201,637 on a population of 252,047 in the year 1861. Nova Scotia began with a subsidy of $264,685 on a population of 330,857. That subsidy has been already increased to $320,000, being 80 cents per head on the maximum of 400,000 souls mentioned in the statute. In the case of New Brunswick that province has not yet reached the limit of 400,000, as the population at the last census was 331,120, upon which the present allowance is $264,896. Under the terms of this resolution therefore, while the provinces of Ontario and Quebec take on no increased obligations with respect to the per capita allowance to the province of New Brunswick, the province of New Brunswick is called upon to pay its share of the increased per capita allowance to Ontario and Quebec. Under the present population figures, the subsidy of the province of Ontario will be increased by $629,485, and the Quebec subsidy will be increased by $429,866, of which sum New Brunswick must pay its share, while the province of New Brunswick receives, so far as the per capita allowance, no benefit whatever by the adoption of this address, inasmuch as it was entitled, and is entitled under the present law, to go on increasing its subsidy until its population reaches 400,000 souls. Furthermore the province of New Brunswick, which in this way receives, so far as the per capita allowance is concerned, no benefit and will receive no benefit by the adoption of the address, except in the remote contingency, I fear of her population going beyond the 400,000 mark, will be called upon to pay its share of the per capita tax to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec on whatever increase may occur in the population of those two provinces to the extent of 2,500,000 on the basis of 80 cents per head, and beyond that population, on the basis of 60 cents per head, without any limit whatever. That I conceive to be a very grevious injustice to the province of New Brunswick. It will be seen I think by the observations I have made that the province of New Brunswick receives no advantage whatever from this resolution with respect to the per capita allowance. The advantage enures entirely to the larger provinces. As representative of one of the constituencies of New Brunswick, one of the smaller provinces of this confederation, I think it is my duty to enter my protest against the proposed change.

Mr. SPROULE. Has the hon. gentleman calculated what New Brunswick gets for government and legislation?

Mr. CROCKET. I will deal with that in a moment. Furthermore, the removal of the original constitutional limitation upon the per capita allowance cannot possibly inure, under ordinary expectations, to a province situated as New Brunswick is with its confined boundaries. While we all hope that our population will eventually increase very materially, I do not think the most sanguine citizen of New Brunswick dreams of the population of that province ever reaching the figure of 2,500,000 souls. The fixing of that figure as the limit for the payment of the government per capita allowance, with the provision that beyond that number an allowance of 60 cents per head shall be paid without any limit at all, is a matter which does not affect the case of New Brunswick and which is entirely in the interests of the larger provinces. All we get, I may say, Mr. Speaker, under the terms agreed upon between the government and the representatives of the different provinces and which are embodied in this address which is under consideration, is the increased allowance which is made for the purpose of legislation and of government. We receive an addition of $130,000. Our former grant was $50,000 and now we are to receive $180,000, but I want to point out in this connection that while we receive $130,000 of an extra grant for governmental purposes the people of the province of New Brunswick will be levied upon to the extent of $145,229, being $15,229 more by virtue of this proposed resolution than we receive thereunder. That, I may say, is an imposition upon one of the smaller provinces of this confederation. Worked out to a per capita basis it means that every man, woman and child in the province of New Brunswick will contribute 43·86 cents. 43·86 cents will be levied every year upon every man, woman anl child in the province of New Brunswick to provide for the aggregate of the increases which it is proposed to grant under this address, while the grant that the province of New Brunswick will receive under the proposed resolution will amount to but 39·26 cents per head of the population. That means that every head of a family in the province of New Brunswick will be required to pay $2.19 additional to make up the aggregate of this increase to all the provinces of Canada while for every head of a family in New Brunswick the government of that province will receive from the federal treasury but $1.96. In other words, every family in New Brunswick will be required to pay 23 cents additional every year for the support of the governments of other provinces of this Dominion. That seems also to be a matter in reference to which any representative from the province of New Brunswick has a right to complain and as to which it is his duty to complain.

Another calculation that I have made which perhaps shows more clearly than any other that can be made the injustice which will be entailed upon the province of New Brunswick by the adoption of these terms is that which shows the percentage of increase over the former allowance which was given to the various provinces of the Dominion. I have figured the matter as carefully and as closely as I can and I find that the percentage of increase in the case of the province of Ontario is 66; that is to say that Ontario, under the proposed resolution, will receive 66 per cent more than she formerly did; British Columbia will receive 64·4 per cent more than she formerly did, exclusive of the special subsidy of $100,000 which will run for but ten years; Quebec will receive 62·5 per cent more than she formerly did; Prince Edward Island receives 56 per cent more than she formerly did; Nova Scotia receives 46·7 per cent more than she formerly did; Manitoba receives 43·2 per cent more than she formerly did, and New Brunswick comes out at the small end of the horn with only 41·3 per cent more than she formerly received. So, from that calculation it is very apparent that the people of the province of New Brunswick have a right to complain of the proposed resolution. In consideration of the fact that the province of New Brunswick is one of the smaller provinces of this Dominion, with its boundaries confined, as I have already pointed out, it makes the grievance all the more serious, and I think it ought to appeal to the Prime Minister as something which should be remedied even at this late date and notwithstanding that the delegates of the province of New Brunswick assented to such unfair terms as these. I think no one can read the British North America Act, and especially the provisions relating to the financial assistance to be given to the various provinces, without seeing that it was recognized by the fathers of confederation and by the imperial parliament in the passage of the Act, that some concessions and advantages should be given to the smaller provinces. The hon. the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) to-night spoke of the per capita rate in regard to the different provinces, stating that he thought it would be found that the increases would produce a smaller per capita contribution to the larger provinces than to the smaller provinces, but I do not think that is a fair test of the justice of the allowances which are now being considered, because it seems to me that it was in the contemplation of the fathers of confederation and the imperial parliament that the smaller provinces would require and should be given more per head for the purposes of government than the larger provinces and if a statement were prepared I think it would be found in regard to these increased subsidies that there is but very little difference between the per capita rate as it will apply to the large provinces of Ontario and Quebec and of the very small province of New Brunswick. I think this calculation that I have submitted to the House in regard to the percentage of increase of the various provinces shows that the advantages which the province of New Brunswick as one of the smaller provinces secured in the original terms are now being abrogated and that the effect of this resolution will be to turn the advantage to the great provinces of Ontario and Quebec. If, therefore, this government imagines that the people of New Brunswick will regard this increased subsidy as a boon or a windfall that is coming to them they greatly underestimate the intelligence and common sense of the people of that province. Even if the scheme were an equitable scheme—and I think I have shown that it is very inequitable, particularly in regard to New Brunswick—there is no particular advantage that would accrue to the people of that province because it will be recognized by everybody that every dollar that this government gives to the province they must take out of the province in taxation. The matter amounts simply to this: that the provincial governments are asking the federal government to levy this additional taxation upon the people of the provinces and to pass that taxation over to the governments of these provinces to be expended by them.

I am aware that direct taxation is very unpopular, and I would not wish to be taken as advocating at this time at any rate the adoption of any such policy in this country. But I do say that it would be far better for the people of New Brunswick if, instead of allowing the government, after squandering her resources by improvident, extravagant, reckless and, I fear, corrupt administration, to simply knock at the door of the federal treasury and take all the money it requires to make good the consequences of such mal-administration—it would be far better if the government whose mal-administration has necesssitated the demand, were compelled to itself collect the additional taxation it requires to make up for its extravagance and waste. Under such a system, the people of that province would be more vigilant than they have been, and in that aspect it would have been far better if such had been the course pursued. I rose chiefly to complain of the injustice which was done the province of New Brunswick in this matter, and to point out how that injustice will work out. I only desire now to express my regret that the representatives of New Brunswick at the interprovincial conference have seen fit to assent to terms which are so manifestly unfavourable and unjust to the people whom they represented. In conclusion, I desire also to express my regret that there is no mention in this resolution (which contemplates an application to the imperial parliament for an amendment to the British North America Act) of any desire to amend that Act in respect to the representation of the maritime provinces in this House. That question has already been debated here, and I think the case which was made out on behalf of the motion of the hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Hughes) was a strong case, to which no adequate answer was made. It seems to me that this is an opportune time, when this parliament is asking the British parliament to amend the British North America Act, to remedy the injustice which has been done the people of the maritime provinces in the matter of their representation here. Before this discussion is ended, I hope to have an opportunity of voting for an amendment which will provide for the inclusion of that subject in the address to His Majesty.

Mr. A. MARTIN (Queen's, P.E.I.). This is one of the most important questions that has come before the House this session, and I may say that I have an amendment to offer. In view of the late hour, this subject cannot be disposed of to-night, and if the Prime Minister assents I will move the adjournment of the debate, it being nearly half past eleven now. If the right hon. gentleman does not consent to adjourn, I shall proceed to express my regret that the proposal contained in this resolution is not a full settlement of the outstanding questions at issue between the Dominion and the provinces. The conference paid attention to the financial question, and evidently advantage is taken of the poverty of some of the provinces to throw them a sop, especially the smaller provinces, in order to tide them over their difficulties, and in order to relegate to the background other questions which should have been taken up and decided. I thought my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Hughes) would have come forward with a resolution to increase the representation of the maritime provinces, for I believe it is important that this question should be decided now.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I rise to two points of order. My first point is that the hon. member has seconded the motion——

Mr. SPEAKER. That was withdrawn.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. My second point is that the hon. gentleman is introducing an amendment to a motion that involves the expenditure of public money, and such an amendment cannot be moved by a private member of this House.

Mr. FOSTER. This is worse than the Douma.

Mr. SPEAKER. The resolution now before the House has not reached that stage when it is necessary to obtain the consent of His Excellency.

Mr. A. MARTIN. I thank the member for British Columbia (Mr. Duncan Ross) for coming to my assistance, and I hope I shall be able to return him the compliment some day. My point is that if this year you go to His Majesty asking for an amendment to the constitution and that next year you go to him asking for another amendment on the question of representation it will have a very bad effect. I am afraid the delay means that the policy of the government is not to touch the representation question with their little finger, but to leave it until the maritime provinces get to the vanishing point, when the federal government will come to our relief. That is on the principle of telling a sick person that you will come to his relief when he is dead. I am afraid that in the case of Prince Edward Island the vanishing point will be reached quicker than in the case of any other province, and I think the Prime Minister should act, and act promptly, to give us relief. Then, again, the question of the fisheries is a very important question. There is divided jurisdiction, and the fisheries of Prince Edward Island suffer more from this divided jurisdiction between the provincial government and the Dominion government than perhaps from any other affliction which this government has put upon it. It is not so many years since the oyster fishery alone of that province was worth nearly a million dollars. There is a far different tale to tell about it now. In the case of the lobster fishery, the provincial government, with one set of officials, licenses a lobster factory; the Dominion government also issues a license; the interests clash and as a result the productive fisheries of the province are going to waste.

Now, what about this distribution? This is a proposition that has been on the carpet for twenty years. Well, one would think that in twenty years the government would have had a great deal of time for consideration. They have been in power only twelve years; so they had twelve years at least to consider the question. The late government did not venture to take hold of it, and I think they were very wise, because the best we can say of it is that it is taking money out of one pocket by means of high taxation in order to put it into another. The question is, are the government doing this fairly? If they are, perhaps no great injury can be done, but if it is not done fairly, then, as usual, the weaker provinces are the sufferers. The maritime provinces under these resolutions are going to undergo a system of drying up, a system of exhaustion. It appears to me to be a case that fulfils the scripture of St. Matthew's gospel, which says that 'to him that hath more shall be given, and from him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath.' That is what the government are doing; to the larger provinces which have, they are going to give more, but from the smaller provinces which have not, they are going to take away even what they have. I have heard in this House on various occasions that this constitution is a very sacred document, that it is inflexible and unchangeable. The laws of the Medes and Persians are flexible and changeable instruments compared with the constitution of this country—that is, when the interests of any of the smaller provinces require a change. Then it is like the laws of Draco, written in blood, and unchangeable, indelible. But when the interests of the larger provinces require a change, the constitution is so weak and unimportant that it can be changed as quickly as you con snap your fingers. It is of no force at all when continuous communication with Prince Edward Island is concerned. I am going to examine the merits of the proposition which has been laid before us, and I am going to test it on the scale of the amounts paid for legislation, which I will show is not a very even scale. For instance, the lowest amount paid is $100,000, to Prince Edward Island of course. The next jumps to $150,000. That is a great jump; in all the other cases the increase is $10,000, $20,000 or $30,000. I will take Quebec, to which the allowance is $70,000 under the old scheme and $240,000 under the new scheme; nearly three and a half times as much. The allowance for British Columbia is four and ten thirty-fifths as much as before. If four and ten thirty-fifths more were paid to my province, instead of getting $100,000 it would get $128,000, and why should Prince Edward Island be treated differently from British Columbia? In this distribution, which the Prime Minister said was arranged in a fair spirit, is it fair that British Columbia should have $100,000 extra, besides an increase from $35,000 to $150,000, that is over four times as much as she got before, while Prince Edward Island only gets three times and a small fraction as much as she got before? If Prince Edward Island got the same proportion of increase she would get $128,000, and that would be only a small part of what is due to her. But that is not where the greatest injury is done to the smaller provinces. The hon. gentleman who has spoken on the question considers it as it stands to-day, but this is an arrangement which is expected to stand for the next twenty years, and how much will the subsidies be per capita at the end of that time? In twenty years, with all the improvements going on in this country, with the Transcontinental Railway and the Georgian bay canal, Ontario and Quebec will double their population. That will mean that Ontario, in place of getting as she does now $1,746,357, will then get two or three times that much, whereas in twenty years Prince Edward Island will get no more than she is getting to-day. She will get probably less, the premier's amendment will remedy a defect in the address. These conditions, so far as the per capita tax is concerned, are most unjust to the whole maritime provinces. You have increased the area of Ontario and the area of Quebec, and you are now going to give them 80 cents per head on their decennial census up to 2,500,000, after which you will give them 60 cents per head. In twenty years these provinces will receive twice as much as they are getting to-day. The provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, with their large territory, will also greatly increase in population, but what becomes of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island in this race? They are not in it. In twenty years our per capita allowance will not be much more than it is to-day. I do not wish to detain the House, but I wish to move this resolution in amendment.

That all the interest charged against the province of Prince Edward Island in its debt account with Canada, on account of railways under construction by the province previous to its union with Canada, be refunded; and that no interest hereafter shall be charged the province for such railway expenditure.

I need not dwell on the reasons I have for offering this amendment. Prince Edward Island did not join confederation in 1867, when it was formed, but only joined it in 1873. The first to come in was Manitoba, and when Manitoba came in no expenditure had been made by its government on railways. Nor had any been made by British Columbia when that province came in. The Dominion government built the Canadian Pacific Railway for British Columbia, and I suppose that province's share of the cost, which was borne by this Dominion, would amount to $50,000,000, so that British Columbia and Manitoba came in without being saddled with a solitary dollar for the construction of railways. In 1873, when Prince Edward Island came in, there was under construction by that province about 200 miles of railway which cost it $3,144,000. My contention is that that amount should be assumed by this Dominion because Prince Edward Island handed over to the Dominion that railway when she entered confederation. Instead, however, this road that cost Prince Edward Island $3,144,000 was handed over to Canada for nothing. Not only that but ever since Prince Edward Island has been paying the Dominion five per cent on that money. The first thing this government did was to charge the province with the building of a railway which we handed over to the government for nothing. It was a huge blunder on the part of the province to give to this Dominion that road which cost the province $3,144,000. The Dominion government has continued from that day to this exacting from the island five per cent on that $3,144,000. Is there any proof required of that? Here is a statement of what was charged against Prince Edward Island:

Prince Edward Island is the only province since confederation against which a debt of that kind was charged. If British Columbia had been charged the cost of building the Canadian Pacific Railway up to that province, do you suppose she would have come into the union? If Manitoba had to pay the expenditure made on her railways would she have come in? Why is it then, when you came down to Prince Edward Island, you insisted on that province making you a present of her railway? You took the railway, you compelled Prince Edward Island to finish it and put rolling stock on it, and then kept on operating it and charged against the island five per cent interest on the $3,144,000. That is not the way you treated the other provinces. Some years ago you attempted to bring Newfoundland into confederation and you offered her certain terms. Let us compare the terms you offered Newfoundland with those you insisted on getting from Prince Edward Island. I have here a statement of the debt submitted by the government of this country. The debt of Newfoundland was then given in sessional papers No. 2289, vol. 28, at $15,829,834.73. This is the basis of the proposal of union which was made by Canada to Newfoundland. The net debt of Canada at that time was about $250,000,000 or about $50 per capita and therefore $50 per head was offered Newfoundland the same as was offered Prince Edward Island. The population of Newfoundland was 207,000 which, at the per capita amount of $50 per head, would represent $10,150,000. That is if Newfoundland offered to enter the Dominion with a debt of $50 per head, it would represent a total amount allowed for indebtedness of $10,350,000. The debt of Newfoundland was as follows:

The funded debt of Newfoundland is	$ 9,116,534 73
And under loan, Act 58 Victoria, chapter 2	1,456,000 00
Floating debt	675,000 00
Amount required to complete railway to Port au Basque	3,620,000 00
Amount required to cover cost of Brigus Branch Railroad	312,000 00
Amount to consolidate liability to Newfoundland Railroad Company, namely, $45,000 at 4 per cent for 22 years	650,300 00
Total	$15,829,834 73

The debt allowed is only $10,350,000. So what proposal did they make? They proposed to deduct the expenditure that Newfoundland had made on her railway. Now the expenditure of Newfoundland on railways was as follows:

Cost of Northern and Western Railway to date, December 31, 1894	$ 4,446,000 00
Placentia Railway	525,000 00
Brigus Branch completion	312,000 00
Western Railway	3,620,000 00
Consolidated liability to Newfoundland Railway Company	650,300 00
Total	$ 9,553,300 00

And the government of Canada, with much greater generosity than they showed to Prince Edward Island proposed to deduct from the debt of Newfoundland all that that colony had spent on railways. Now, I claim, and I think claim fairly, that the treatment proposed to be accorded to Newfoundland, and accorded to every other province that has been added to Canada since confederation, is much more generous than that accorded to Prince Edward Island. The interest charged against Prince Edward Island on account of her railway is more than $155,000 a year, a sum which, if placed to the credit of the province yearly, would put her in finances on a fair basis and take her out of trouble. I think if the matter were left to arbitration, the award would be that other provinces had been more favourably treated, and Newfoundland had been offered more favourable terms, and that Prince Edward Island was entitled to terms equally good. Let me refer to the correspondence with regard to Newfoundland. I have here the 'Journal of the Assembly of Newfoundland' for 1894 and 1895, which contains the correspondence between the Dominion government of which Sir Mackenzie Bowell was the head and the government of Newfoundland. The journal says:

> By references to No. 3, it will be observed that the cost of the railway systems of the colony has been deducted from the net public colony (meaning Newfoundland) has been deducted from the net public debt.

That is exactly what we want for Prince Edward Island—the same treatment that was offered to Newfoundland—and I think we are entitled to it. I think there are many members of this House who doubt that Prince Edward Island paid for railways built by it previous to confederation. Well, if the province was not paid for its railway my resolution does no harm, for in that case Prince Edward Island will get no refund. But if the contrary is proven, we will get the refund. I hope we shall never hear a man saying in this House again that the Dominion built 200 miles in Prince Edward Island, when, as a matter of fact, the province has been charged interest ever since confederation on the money spent in building that road. Here is a letter written by Sir Mackenzie Bowell to the government of Newfoundland:

> When Canada assumed the debt of Prince Edward Island, equal to $50 per head, the island was chargeable with cost of its railway and other items. These amounted to nearly $4,000,000. Canada, it is true, owns and operates the railway, but at a large cost annually.
> Canada proposed to assume Newfoundland's debt, equal to $50 per head, part of which was incurred for railways, and in that respect offered her better terms than Prince Edward Island.

The Dominion owns and operates the Prince Edward Island Railway, but Prince Edward Island paid for it. I do not need to detain the House at greater length. I move the following resolution, seconded by Mr. Jackson:

> That the address to His Majesty the King be amended by adding thereto the following paragraph:
> That all the interest charged against the province of Prince Edward Island in its debt account with Canada, on account of railways under construction by the province previous to its union with Canada, be refunded, and that no interest hereafter shall be charged the province for such railway expenditure.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is the motion designed to be exactly in the terms in which it is drafted?

Mr. A. MARTIN. It is simply an additional clause to the address.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is one amendment before the House, and, unless this is an amendment to the amendment, I do not see how I can put it.

Mr. A. MARTIN. This is an amendment to be moved as soon as the other is disposed of. I thought that under your ruling of a few minutes ago, Mr. Speaker, the position was that you were going to take the vote on the first amendment. I yielded the floor to my hon. friend from York (Mr. Crocket) on the understanding that the amendment was to be disposed of and I proposed to move a second amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER. The ruling was that the hon. member (Mr. A. Martin), as he stated at the time intended subsequently to move an amendment, if he seconded the resolution of the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Lefurgey), he could not speak again. However, if this is not intended to be an amendment to the amendment it is out of order at the present time.

Mr. T. S. SPROULE (East Grey). I wish to make some observations upon these resolutions. In the first place, I desire to draw attention to the statement of the Prime Minister that the principle upon which the financial distribution to the provinces was made at confederation was not sound, and as an evidence of that fact he reminded us that from time to time special grants had been made to different provinces, but upon no regular or well defined principle, according as pressure from a particular province became too great to resist. He said that was continued up to the present time, and no government seemed to have moral courage to tackle the question and to put the financial distribution on a sound and correct basis until, as I understood him to say, that was done by the present resolution. If that be so, we would expect to find that the basis of this distribution was entirely different from the other, that it was upon some better principle, and more applicable to the various provinces, some with larger debts and some with smaller debts. With regard to the first distribution that was made in 1867, although it was intended to be a final and complete settlement as between the government and the various provincial governments, it did not turn out to be so, because an amendment was made two years afterwards, and we granted an additional subsidy to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick in 1869. In 1871 and in 1873 we dealt with Manitoba on a different basis. In 1884 the pressure became so great from the various provinces, under an agitation starting from the province of Quebec, where an enormous debt was being rolled up, that it became necessary to relieve the provinces of their debts and assume some of their burdens. For that purpose, we readjusted the debts of the provinces, and the federal government took over a large share of them. We also gave a consideration to the various provinces for railways at that time, and that was done upon two principles: First, that the provinces were short of money to build railways and could not do it without going too heavily into debt, and therefore the federal government inaugurated a new policy by granting subsidies for building railways. That was done on the ground that the provinces were not able to raise the money except by unduly increasing their debt. Then in 1873 and in 1884 the railway debts of the provinces were assumed; in 1885, in 1887, in 1891, in 1898 and again in 1901 the financial relations between the Dominion government and the provinces were amended, and I think once in 1902.

Now, what was the old principle? The old principle was a fixed sum that each province was to receive for its legislature and government, apparently an arbitrary sum, for it appears to have been based on no principle. Ontario was to receive $80,000; Quebec, $70,000; Nova Scotia, $60,000; New Brunswick, $50,000; Manitoba, $50,000; British Columbia, $35,000; Prince Edward Island, $30,000. Now, the Prime Minister says that was not done upon any correct basis, and I agree with him. Then when we come to the amount of subsidy given per capita of 80 cents per head, the larger provinces that were increasing rapidly in population got no increased benefit, they got no additional amount of money. For instance, the subsidy to Ontario, if I remember rightly, was $1,116,000; that remained stationary year after year. The Prime Minister says that was not done upon a correct principle, and that no government had had the moral courage to tackle the question and put it upon a sound principle; therefore, I suppose we must assume that his government has the moral courage to do so. Now, what is the new principle? The allowance per capita is increased according to the increase of population up to 2,500,000 souls. Any surplus population above that amount will get 60 cents per capita instead of 80. Now how does this new system work out? The whole amount to be paid annually is $2,842,000. That is the amount that we have added to the obligations of Canada annually if this resolution passes. Capitalized at 3 per cent, that amount represents a fixed charge of about $75,000,000; that is to say, we have added practically that sum of money to the debt of Canada. So that we can fairly say that there has been added to the debt of Canada by this resolution about $75,000,000. Now, I come to the province with which I am more familiar and how does it work out in that province? Is Ontario paying more than her fair proportion, or is she paying less, or is she paying only her fair proportion? Ontario's population at the present time is 2,182,000. The population of Ontario represents about two-fifths of the population of Canada. Therefore, Ontario would be obliged to raise two-fifths of this $2,342,000. How much would that be? Two-fifths of that would be $936,500. Ontario would have to pay $936,000 annually of that amount. Now, then, Ontario raises two-fifths, but does she get two-fifths of the distribution? Not at all. Ontario gets only $789,486, very much less than two-fifths. Therefore, Ontario is not proportionately receiving her fair share of the distribution and that is an injustice to her. When you come to the distribution amongst the provinces of the amount that is allowed for legislation and government we find that Quebec, having a much less population than Ontario, receives not a much less amount, but the same amount. Quebec gets out of this exactly the same amount for the legislation and government that Ontario gets. Ontario raises much more than Quebec, but Quebec gets as much as Ontario does for both these purposes—$240,000. They are both up to the limit in population that entitles them to $240,000; therefore, they both get exactly the same. That is an injustice to Ontario. In regard to how it works for the other provinces I cannot say because I did not have time to work it out, but I know that it is an injustice to the province I represent, that in that regard it is not fair.

Is this a final settlement? It is all very well to put in the resolution that it is a final and complete settlement. It seems to me that it is only at best a play upon words because it has no significance. We know for a fact that the first arrangement of confederation was intended to be a final and complete settlement, but that it did not prove to be such because we changed it before two years had elapsed and it has been changed almost every year or two since. Now we come down to a general arrangement and we are told that this is a final and complete settlement. I remember that when the arrangement was made in 1884 Mr. Blake asked the question if we ever would reach final finality, and it was declared that that arrangement was a final finality. But it was not. We have no more reason to think that this will be a final settlement than we had in 1867 or in 1884. But I am not going to complain because I recognize the fact that there can be no finality in this matter? What is government? Government is only the doing of what is necessary for the time being according to the conditions, the environments and the necessities of the situation, and as conditions change so must we change the laws, so must we change our financial basis, so must we change almost everything. We make a law to-day; it does not suit the conditions twenty years hence and we either repeal or amend that law. The same principle applies to every department of government whether it is in regard to provincial subsidies or anything else. Government is only evolution, and evolution is necessary if government is to be efficient. It has been so in the past and it will be so in the future. I do not complain of that beyond the fact that it looks entirely uselss to put that in the resolution because it can only serve one purpose and that is of deluding the people into believing that there will never be a raid made on the federal treasury again. This is not final and it will not be final.

Is this a fair settlement to all the provinces? It would require a very long analysis to ascertain if it is or is not, and I frankly confess that I have not made that analysis so that I cannot intelligently direct attention to that phase of the question. Therefore, I will leave that out with the single exception that I will make a few observations in regard to the case of British Columbia. I thought at the last provincial conference that the best case that was made out was by British Columbia's Premier, the Hon. Richard McBride, and I frankly confess that I never could see any justification for the absolute refusal to appoint a commission to inquire into the situation and to ascertain whether the allegations as presented at this conference were on a sound basis or otherwise. I thought it was unfair and I never could see any reason for it. I never could reach the conclusion that the proposition made to grant $100,000 a year additional to British Columbia for ten years was a fair compensation taking into account British Columbia's situation in the confederacy, British Columbia's physical condition and the disabilities with which she must always content as compared with the other provinces. That grant only applies for ten years. If the physical conditions of British Columbia were to change by that time, if they found it easier to build railways and to make roads less expensive to administer justice and do a number of other requisites than the present government must do, then I could understand that this would be fair, but because those conditions will remain the same at the end of ten years as they are to-day, and because those conditions which will mean increased cost of production, in my judgment it is not fair. Now, I thought there was another element that was not given the consideration that should have been given it, and that is the fact that British Columbia, owing to her geographical position in regard to the market and the position of the province in regard to her pursuits and productions, she must always be largely a greater consumer of imported goods than the other provinces, and, therefore, must pay a larger proportion of the taxes. She must pay a larger proportion of the customs and inland revenue taxes because of the fact that she is unable to raise or manufacture the products that she consumes. I think that the Hon. Richard McBride plainly showed that she paid more than her share of the consolidated revenue of the Dominion from these sources, and that although she paid a great deal more than her fair share she got very much less than her fair share out of the revenue that was returned.

I think British Columbia will never be fairly dealt with until there is some allowance made her on that account. The Prime Minister said he would not take the administration of criminal justice into account, but if he desired to ascertain the great disadvantage British Columbia labours under in this respect, he has only to look to the fact that last year we paid $93,000 for the judges of the Yukon Territory which is about $155 a head of the population, whereas the administration of justice in some of the older provinces does not amount to more than 20 cents per head. The conditions in the Yukon are very similar to those in British Columbia, and although the cost of the administration of justice is not so much in British Columbia as in the Yukon, yet it is much heavier in British Columbia than in the older provinces. There is little or no consideration allowed British Columbia on that account except it may be the $100,000 granted for ten years. The Prime Minister told us that this being the result of a conference amongst the provincial premiers it was not for the Dominion government to change it. Well, in the case of the first four provinces that entered confederation their representatives conferred together and agreed upon a basis, but British Columbia did not enter confederation after a conference with the other provinces. Her negotiations were directly with the Dominion government, and because of her isolated condition at that time she was forced to come in, and she had to come in under very onerous conditions. British Columbia has dealt directly with the Dominion alone, and in that respect is in a different position from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec and Ontario. There are undoubtedly exceptional circumstances which justify the claim of the Prime Minister of British Columbia for exceptional financial consideration. Now I wish to ask the Prime Minister about some of the details of the resolutions which he proposes. The resolution says :

(a) Instead of the amounts now paid, the sums hereafter payable yearly by Canada to the several provinces for the support of their governments and legislatures, should be according to population, &c.

I wish to ask the Prime Minister if that will apply to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. In the Alberta Act there is allowed to the province of Alberta a fixed sum for the support of her government and legislature amounting to $50,000 a year. Will the provision of this resolution which says: Instead of the amount now paid, do away with the provision of $50,000 a year in the Alberta Act?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes.

Mr. SPROULE. Then the resolution proposed by the Prime Minister says :

Mr. SPROULE.

(b) Instead of an annual grant per head of population now allowed, 80 cents, the annual payments hereafter to be at the same rate of eighty cents per head, but on the population of each province, as ascertained from time to time by the last decennial census, until such population exceeds 2,500,000, and at the rate of sixty cents per head for so much of said population as may exceed 2,500,000.

The per capita grant to the new provinces is based upon the population ascertained every two and a half years, while this is based on the population of the other provinces taken every ten years.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The population of Alberta and Saskatchewan are taken every five years.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes, but there is an estimated population every two and a half years. Is the per capita grant for Alberta and Saskatchewan to be based on the population ascertained every ten years, or every two and a half years.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The saving clause which I introduced to-day as to grants covers that point.

Mr. SPROULE. We had better be sure about that point, and also as to whether the provisions of this Act repeal the fixed amounts given for the support of the governments of the new provinces.

Mr. FIELDING. They would not get both.

Mr. SPROULE. I ask these questions so that we may know where we will stand in the future. I have nothing more to say at present, but I may have something to say at a later stage.

Mr. WILLIAM ROCHE (Halifax). Early in the evening my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Foster) delivered a lengthy and eloquent dissertation against the principle contained in this resolution. Later on my friends from Prince Edward Island, and my friend from New Brunswick expressed themselves as in favour of the principle of the measure, but complained that the sums were not sufficient—also my hon. friend from Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron) made some observations in regard to the history of confederation. My hon. friend from York, N.B. (Mr. Crocket) contended that the province of New Brunswick was paying for the large sums given to the province of Ontario. To make out his argument it would be necessary that the inhabitants of New Brunswick should pay into the revenue per capita an equal sum to the province of Ontario. I think my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) answered my hon. friend from York, because he proved that the inhabitants of the province of Ontario per capita pay more into the revenue than the inhabitants of the province of New Brunswick or those of the province of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not make that contention at all.

Mr. WM. ROCHE. I think it is true, from his reasoning nevertheless. In place of Ontario being a pensioner on New Brunswick, I think Ontario, being the larger province and consuming a greater quantity of goods per capita, pays to New Brunswick. So that my hon. friend from Grey has an advantage over my hon. friend from York, because his province contributes more to the revenue than does the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. CROCKET. I will ask my hon. friend if it is not a fact that the only way to arrive at a per capita tax of any kind is by dividing the sum you want to reduce to a per capita basis by the total population of the Dominion, which gives you the per capita rate applicable to all provinces alike ?

Mr. WM. ROCHE. No, it is the amount the province contributes to the revenue divided by the population. My hon. friend from Beauharnois made allusion to the manner in which Nova Scotia was admitted to the union. Now some of us in this House have some recollection of that time. I had the pleasure myself of coming to Ottawa in 1867 with the delegates who constituted the confederation. But the delegates from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island met at Charlottetown in 1865 or 1866 for the purpose of constituting a maritime union, and while they were in conference the delegates from Ontario and Quebec came down and proposed to the delegates there assembled a confederation of all the provinces. The provinces of Canada were at a deadlock; they could not carry on government any longer, and it was known that they wished to secure the maritime provinces as a sort of balance and equipoise upon which a scheme of government could be based, and upon which the government of the country could proceed. So the maritime provinces were really necessary for this confederation, and were the principal part of the confederation. A great many people in the province of Nova Scotia and some in the province of New Brunswick also, approved of the principle of confederation, but the people of Nova Scotia were diametrically opposed to the Quebec scheme, and emphatically to the amount of appropriation towards the expenses of local government under that scheme. The people of Nova Scotia resisted that to the utmost of their ability, and when the elections came on afterwards, every man who had taken part in the Quebec scheme of confederation was defeated at the polls with the exception of Sir Charles Tupper. The province of Nova Scotia followed that up by sending a delegation to England to resist the terms. It was not by ageement of those statements in conference that the subsidy to Nova Scotia was increased, but it was because the British government told those men that Nova Scotia must be conciliated. Mr. Howe was the spokesman of the people of Nova Scotia, and the advocates of confederation endeavoured to propitiate him by giving him office and after some time the Nova Scotia members were allowed to go to parliament and vote. In that manner the province of Nova Scotia slipped into the confederation; but the people of the province never approved of it. Let us remember in all these observations that it was not by the original agreement or generosity of those statesmen that Nova Scotia got an additional allowance, but by the compulsion of the British government which ordered those men to propitiate Nova Scotia, and give her a just and sufficient allowance to carry on her government as she had carried it on before. My hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) rather complained that the local governments had become too elaborate, and that idea was also enlarged upon by my hon. friend from Beauharnois. The fact is that when the subordination and inferiority of the local legislatures was proposed, the conference hung fire and was about to disband until some skilful politician introduced the idea of the elaboration of the local governments, and when they heard that Lieutenant-Governors were to to be appointed, with an elaborate paraphernalia, the confederation scheme went on swimmingly. The consequence was that the idea of an inexpensive local government was set aside, and the modern idea of an elaborate local legislature, with an adjustment of its services on a commensurate scale, was approved. But I think none of those statesmen at that time contemplated the rapid expansion and development of the country. I think none of them comprehended what services precisely would come under the local governments; I think none of them knew exactly how the expenses or the powers of the local governments were to be defined. If they did know, all our lawyers who have been arguing in Ottawa, in Toronto, and in London have very much mistaken the case, and were not enlightened by those who preceded them, for ever since that time the various powers have been contended about, and the amounts to be expended in the exercise of those powers have been in dispute. These gentlemen did not contemplate the development which would take place in this Dominion. They did not know the expansion of its revenue or the cost of those services which were included under the term local government. None of them could know whether the resources which were appropriated to the provinces would produce adequate revenue. Conditions were changing; the value of those assets was changing. Those which were available at that time have diminished in value since, and those which were undiscovered and remained in the bowels of the earth at that time unknown, have since proved to be of immense value; so that people looked forward to subsequent readjustments as those conditions would change, and the revenues of the local governments had to be increased, either by the federal government or out of their own resources. Who could tell that the fisheries of the maritime provinces would not be as valuable to-day as they were at confederation or that the forests would be cut down? But we know that the demands of the provinces are increasing.

They want better education. In the province of Nova Scotia there are roads to be maintained and many rivers to be spanned by bridges, and the people are crying out for communication from the inland mines to the seaboard. They require ferries and steamboats, and the coast will always demand of the local government a large expenditure for roads, because it is intersected by harbours every ten miles. It must always be an expensive province to maintain. Just as these men did not know forty years back precisely how these resources would suit themselves to the wants of the people, who is to know forty years hence what will the needs be then? It is on this account that we had to have recourse to periodical arrangements. Perhaps the present arrangement may not be final but it looks as if it would last for a considerable time to come. If New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island did not get enough, under the old arrangement, Nova Scotia never did and never will. What province did get enough? Is it Ontario or Quebec? The hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule)) made an appeal on behalf of British Columbia, with which we all sympathize, because we all admit that British Columbia deserves exceptional treatment. And she has got exceptional treatment. The province of Ontario has never been awake to its responsibilities in this Dominion. It is a splendid province. It is the centre which binds the whole Dominion together. It may be called upon for greater sacrifices but it can bear them. Its territories and resources are expanding. It has a compact figure because it is compact within itself. Its outlying parts are all accessible from the centre. It is the heart and soul of the Dominion and from Ontario should go out those generous impulse which should spread themselves throughout the whole Dominion; and where there is a proposal like this, which will give some revenue to an outside province, Ontario, which has borne the burden in the past, will bear it in the future and afford not only sentiment but material aid to such a province and cause its heart to go out in gratitude to the greater Ontario.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). My hon. friend from Prince (Mr. Lefurgey) must observe, from the opinions expressed, that he can hardly expect to receive much support for his resolution. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), who seconded the motion, suggested that British Columbia has not received the consideration to which she is entitled. The hon. member for Prince (Mr. Lefurgey) however pretends that British Columbia is getting more than her fair share. If, however, Prince Edward Island be given more, that will take from the share of British Columbia.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose we vote on the resolution in each case.

Mr. FIELDING. But this resolution is practically to give Prince Edward Island $28,000 more. If that be done, it will place British Columbia, which the hon. gentleman says is now at a disadvantage, at still greater disadvantage.

Mr. FOSTER. It would be fairly possible to give $28,000 more to Prnce Edward Island and also to give an added amount to British Columbia.

Mr. FIELDING. No, because there is a certain sum to be distributed and the question is how are you to equitably distribute it? If you give any one province a larger share of this total sum, then you place the other provinces at a disadvantage. The hon. member for York, New Brunswick (Mr. Crocket) thinks that New Brunswick is not receiving fair consideration. But if we give a larger proportion to New Brunswick then we place all the other provinces at a disadvantage.

Mr. LEFURGEY. Upon what basis did the hon. minister arrive at the $100,000? British Columbia, which was allowed $35,000 when she entered confederation, is by the new terms allowed $150,000. But Prince Edward Island, which was allowed $30,000, is now only allowed $100,000.

Mr. FIELDING. We have been all over that, and I do not know that I could give the hon. gentleman any more information than he already possesses. I am not discussing this but am simply pointing out that if we give a larger sum to Prince Edward Island and if, as the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) argued, British Columbia is not receiving sufficient, we will be placing British Columbia at still greater disadvantage.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I am only asking that you give Prince Edward Island the same ratio of increase as British Columbia.

Mr. FIELDING. My hon. friend wants to change those resolutions so as to give Prince Edward Island $28,000 more than she is getting. But if British Columbia is suffering a disadvantage by this distribution and you add $28,000 more to Prince Edward Island and give nothing to British Columbia, then British Columbia is suffering that much more disadvantage.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I do not see any reason in that. British Columbia had up to the present only $35,000. When she is getting that increased to $150,000, she cannot make any complaint if Prince Edward Island is treated in the same ratio.

Mr. FIELDING. I am not arguing the question of ratio. It is argued that British Columbia is not getting fair consideration.

Mr. LEFURGEY. Who is responsible ?

Mr. FIELDING. I think she is getting fair consideration, but the hon. gentleman wants to place her at a greater disadvantage by giving this extra grant to Prince Edward Island.

Mr. LEFURGEY. No.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes, it is a question of proportion.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I want you to figure it out as a question of proportion.

Mr. FIELDING. I take the facts as they are. You want to increase the vote to Prince Edward Island alone.

Mr. LEFURGEY. It has been stated that the increase is arbitrary. If Prince Edward Island is not getting enough, why not give an increase to Prince Edward Island regardless of any other province ? If the minister thinks she should have it, why not give it to her ?

Mr. FIELDING. I rather think she should not have it, but if I thought she should, the effect would be that all the other provinces to a small extent would be placed at a disadvantage.

Mr. FOSTER. I see the point my hon. friend is aiming at. It is as though the resolution were based on a proposal by the Dominion government to distribute $2,300,000, which total cannot be varied. If therefore you add $28,000 to Prince Edward Island, it must come off some one else or all the others. But I am not looking at it in that light. I am looking at it in this light. You propose that certain amounts shall be distributed according to population. Those who aggregate a certain amount which, added to the rate per capita, amounts to about $2,300,000 of an increase. The whole thing amounts to about $6,000,000. But it is nowhere stated in this resolution that $6,000,000 shall be granted and no more. If $28,000 more is given to Prince Edward Island and $100,000 more to British Columbia it only operates in this way, that the total amount is no longer $6,000,000 but $6,000,000 plus $100,000 plus $28,000. All you have to do is to add to the amount; and, if parliament directs that the amount shall be increased by $28,000 that Prince Edward Island may get that, and by $100,000 that British Columbia may get that, the government can easily do it. There is no sum of $6,000,000 voted and not to be increased. In fact, it is to be increased. It is only $6,000,000 to-day, but when the per capita allowance is to be paid on the added population, it will be more than $6,000,000.

Mr. FIELDING. Then, according to the argument of the hon. member (Mr. Foster) if we propose to give an additional $400,000 to any province it would make no difference to any other province. But every other province would say that it was affected injuriously by such an arrangement, in that the favoured province received an addition while it received no addition. Take, for instance, the calculation of my hon. friend from York, N.B. (Mr. Crocket). He takes the total sum and reduces it to a per capita basis, then calculates what New Brunswick is to get, reduces that to a per capita basis, and says : You are giving New Brunswick less than she has to pay, and so putting her at a disadvantage. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman's figures ; I think New Brunswick is receiving fair consideration. But his estimate of the figures shows that if you give one province more than the scheme proposes you disturb the basis of agreement between the provinces ; and though, in the case of Prince Edward Island it may be only $28,000, yet by agreeing to it, you are placing every province at a disadvantage as compared with its position in the scheme now before the House. Do I make myself clear ?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) makes himself more than clear. If the proposition is proved, as I think my hon. friend from York, N.B. (Mr. Crocket) proved his, and as my hon. friend from Prince, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Lefurgey) proved his that you are dealing not justly, not on an equitable basis, with the provinces these gentlemen represent, you make it clear that the government is determined to put through a scheme which is not based on equity.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not agree that these hon. gentlemen have made that clear. But, I hold the view that on the question of the distribution in respect of provincial subsidy among the provinces, the best judges of the equities as between the provinces must be the governments of the several provinces themselves. And, if these governments themselves, being the parties most interested, assemble and assuming a certain sum to be distributed, say this is a fair proportion to each province, it is hardly open to any hon. gentleman to come here and say that this government is treating any province unfairly.

Mr. LEFURGEY. The argument of the hon. Minister of Finance amounts to this : He brings down to this House an inequitable agreement, and tells this House that this must go through without change and that all the discussion upon it is mere talk. The representatives of the provinces assembled and agreed upon these amounts, and this House has no authority to change them. That is the hon. gentleman's argument.

Mr. FIELDING. I am going to help my hon. friend (Mr. Lefurgey) by admitting that, practically, that is my argument. Of course this parliament, before passing an address to His Majesty, may add to or take from what is proposed whatever it pleases. But it must be remembered that these resolutions are not being originated by this government; they practically form a treaty among the several provinces of the Dominion. While we may change the verbiage of the resolutions, it would be highly improper to change a dollar of the sum agreed upon.

Mr. SPROULE. What would the hon. gentleman do with British Columbia which did not assent to this arrangement?

Mr. FIELDING. British Columbia assents to these resolutions up to a certain point, but thinks that she should have more. But she does not say she ought not to have anything at all, which would be the effect if the proposal of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) were carried out.

Mr. A. MARTIN. The amendment of the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has the effect of changing these figures.

Mr. FIELDING. No.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Then, it means nothing at all.

Mr FIELDING. The amendment of the leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) simply gives effect to that which we all understood, to that which no province would dissent from. We are dealing with certain specific allowances and these only, and his amendment simply says that nothing contained in these resolutions shall be understood to interfere with any of the special arrangements made with the provinces from time to time. Everybody understood that in the provinces, and the amendment is only to make that clear.

Mr. A. MARTIN. Then, it means nothing will be of no effect.

Mr. FIELDING. I must say that to me it seems hardly necessary; it is probable that even without such an amendment the resolutions would be carried out as intended. The amendment is only to avoid a possible difficulty, and it does not change by one dollar the proportion that goes to the several provinces. But my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) argued in one part of his speech that British Columbia was not getting her fair share and in another that Ontario was not getting her fair share. Well, if you give British Columbia $100,000 more, you must do it at the expense of the other provinces—you take something away from them. The complaint of the Premier of British Columbia, Mr. McBride, is concerning the proportion—not that what he gets is not enough, but that it is not a fair proportion. Again I say, these resolutions form a treaty among the several provinces, and you cannot give what my hon. friend asks for Prince Edward Island without putting every other province relatively at a disadvantage.

Mr. LEFURGEY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) says that they have not changed the financial position by the amendment of the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If the amendment of the Prime Minister means anything, I should think it would change the situation of Prince Edward Island to the extent of some $5,000. Under the clause under which Prince Edward Island came into confederation, the per capita allowance was to be 80 cents per head of the population as shown by each subsequent decennial census until the population amounted to 400,000. The maximum population of Prince Edward Island was somewhere in the neighbourhood of 109,000. Her population decreased, and it has been held, and supported by the First Minister to-night, that in no case could they decrease the per capita allowance of Prince Edward Island to a lower amount. In the resolution before the House section (b) reads as follows:

> Instead of an annual grant per head of population now allowed——

That is altering altogether the terms under which Prince Edward Island came in.

> —the annual payment hereafter to be at the same rate of eighty cents per head, but on the population of each province——

Not as augmented, but > —as ascertained from time to time by the last decennial census, until such population exceeds 2,500,000, and at the rate of sixty cents per head for so much of said population as may exceed 2,500,000.

I think that is a fair interpretation of these two clauses, and Prince Edward stands to lose that difference of $5,000.

Mr. FIELDING. With regard to the position of Prince Edward Island, there is a peculiar expression in the legislation touching the subsidy, the effect of which is that she shall increase her subsidy with an increasing population, but shall not reduce it At one stage we thought that with a reduction of population her subsidy should be reduced, and the officials of my department made a reduction without looking as closely into the provisions of the law as they should have done. When attention was drawn to it we recognized the fact that the subsidy could not be diminished, but must be continued at its present point until it should be augmented through increase of population. Now, we cannot change the terms of these resolutions as respects the distribution of public money. I say that special provision with regard to Prince Edward Island was known to the gentlemen who composed the provincial conference, and I think I am justified in saying that not one of them desired to make any change in relation to it, not one of them desired to deprive Prince Edward Island of that which she possessed. Therefore, this amendment, if it was necessary, simply gives effect to that which we know to be the wish of the Provincial Conference, whereas to change the financial arrangement giving one dollar more to any province at the expense of another would be at variance with the spirit of the resolutions, and would be a breach of faith with Mr. Whitney, Mr. Roblin and various other pemiers who have accepted this distribution as a fair one. I would therefore urge upon the House that we cannot possibly allow motions to pass which will deal with any particular province, but we must either reject these resolutions as a whole or accept them as a whole, subject to any verbal change, but not to any change of amounts.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. LEFURGEY. I am paired with the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan.)

Mr. FIELDING. I am paired with the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden).

Mr. SPEAKER. The question is on the main motion.

Mr. J. W. DANIEL (St. John City). Mr. Speaker, I shall not at this late hour, or early hour in the morning, inflict myself upon the members of this House at any length.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DANIEL. I am glad to see that hon. gentlemen present appreciate that statement on my part. But at the same time, I do not wish to allow these resolutions to go without uttering some small protest with regard to the terms which the province of New Brunswick obtains under them. I noticed that the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) stated that these resolutions were in accordance with the view and were decided upon by the premiers of the various governments of the provinces concerned and he thought that they had consented to these terms because they were absolutely fair and just. I think that in so far as the province of New Brunswick is concerned the minister can hardly attribute the acceptance of these resolutions to the views that he expressed because the Prime Minister and his associates of the province of New Brunswick were willing to accept almost anything they could get because they had run the finance of the province down to such an extent that they were practically in financial extremes, so to speak, and so were glad to get the amount that was given or any other sum that the government chose to accord to them. In forming a confederation the smaller provinces have generally been treated with a greater amount of generosity than has been accorded to the larger ones. There is a good reason for that; it is because the smaller provinces have not the same chance that the larger ones have to expand. They have not in some cases the natural resources that the larger provinces have, they are in an entirely different position and that is the case in regard to New Brunswick. New Brunswick has no minerals or mines, or rather none of great extent, and she has to depend to a very large extent upon the lumber industry for her provincial revenue. As every one knows the lumber industry is a decreasing quantity. It is getting less and less and in a few years New Brunwick will have to depend entirely on her agricultural development and what little lumber may be left; in fact, there is nothing for her to look forward to in a few years but direct taxation of the people. As has been stated here to-night by the hon. minister no one in Canada appreciates the privilege of being taxed especially if that taxation takes the direct form. The terms upon which some provinces entered confederation were different from the terms under which other provinces entered. In other words, the terms of confederation have been uneven. Of that there is no doubt. The statement is made that the proposed resolutions will even up all these things, that it will put the different provinces on the basis of population, but I notice that even in these new subsidies the evening up process is not carried out and that the terms which were accorded to the different provinces remained as uneven as they were before. The hon. member for New Brunswick who preceded me gave a very fair statement of the case of that province and I shall not weary the House to any great extent by going over it again to-night. But, there are one or two things that should be taken into consideration in connection with the terms which should be accorded to the maritime provinces, which, so far, have not been referred to. It will be remembered that some years ago the Dominion of Canada, as it was then constituted, bought from the Hudson Bay Company a large part of the territory that now belongs to Canada—Rupert's Land, the Northwest Territories and other portions of the Dominion. That portion of the territory which was obtained, by a payment by the then federated provinces, from the Hudson Bay Company was appropriated to some extent by the province of Ontario and some of it was afterwards added to the province of Quebec. The maritime provinces which were then in the confederation paid their share of the money that was handed over at that time to the Hudson Bay Company, they received no benefit from that expenditure whatever so far as I know and that payment by the maritime provinces has never been taken into consideration in any balance with this government or in apportioning the amount which should be handed over to the various provinces. The territory which was handed over and which was bought from the Hudson Bay Company form now a large part of what is called New Ontario from which the province of Ontario is obtaining large emoluments. Thus the Rainy River district and the country running up to Albany river have been added to the province of Ontario and large territories have also been added to the province of Quebec, territories which were bought in proportion to their population by the maritime provinces for which, as I say, they have so far received no benefit or recompense in any way whatever. In so far as the original terms of confederation are concerned the people of the maritime provinces entered into confederation on the understanding and with the full and firm belief that the representation which they were given would never be reduced.

I believe every member from the maritime provinces who is here to-night will agree with me, that the people of these provinces would never have entered confederation had they believed it ever would be posible to reduce their representation in the federal parliament. The Prime Minister has stated that this is to be a final and unalterable settlement, and that it will be the first time in forty years that any application will have been made to the imperial parliament to change the terms upon which the provinces entered confederation. I was glad to hear the right hon. gentleman quote the words of Edward Blake: That when an arrangement was made with the various provinces, it should be final, equitable, and satisfactory to the people of the provinces. As we are making this application to the imperial parliament to amend the constitution as to the financial terms, we cannot do better than to include in it an application to have it provided that no province in the Dominion shall have less representation in this parliament than that with which it entered confederation. If that be done, one of the greatest grievances of the maritime provinces will be removed. Quebec, the pivotal province of the whole Dominion on whose population the unit of representation is fixed, has had her boundaries extended since confederation without any recompense or consideration being given to the other provinces. I believe that this is not only contrary to the spirit of the British North America Act, but to the letter of it as well. Section 3 of the British North America Act, of 1871, says :

That the parliament of Canada may from time to time with the consent of the legislature of any province of the said Dominion, increase, diminish, or otherwise alter the limits of such province, upon such terms as may be agreed to by the said legislature, and may with the like consent, make provision respecting the effect and operation of any said increase or diminution or alteration of territory in relation to any province affected thereby.

When the boundaries of the province of Quebec were enlarged, I take it that every province in the Dominion was affected thereby, because the enlargement of the territory of Quebec made it possible to alter the unit of representation in a greater degree than was contemplated by the British North America Act. Up to the present this enlargement has not altered the unit of representation, because the added territory is not peopled, but, with the transcontinental railway going through that very portion of new Quebec, and with the reported discoveries of valuable minerals in the region of Lake Abitibi, and in view of the excellent climate of that region as described by the Prime Minister, there is no doubt that before many years this new territory of Quebec will have a large population, the result of which would be to alter the unit of representation in a manner not contemplated by the British North America Act. I say, Sir, that that cannot be equitably or legally done, without making sufficient compensation to all the provinces affected thereby. The maritime provinces will be prejudiced more than any others, because their limits are circumscribed and there is no possibility of adding to their territory. Without wishing to take up any more time at this late hour, I move seconded by Mr. Fowler :

That the petition to the King's Most excellent Majesty be amended by adding thereto :

We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, also represent that it is expedient to amend the terms of the British North America Act of 1867, relating to the representation of the several provinces of Canada in the House of Commons, so as to provide that the number of representatives of any province shall not at any time be reduced below that which was assigned to it when it entered the union.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I want to call your attention to the fact that this amendment is not at all relevant to the question now before the House, and is therefore out of order. The point could be elucidated, but it is sufficient to quote the standing authority, Bourinot, at page 442 :

Canadian speakers have frequently decided that amendments must be relevant to a motion or question. The English parliamentary authorities have up to very recently laid down the rule that a proposition may be amended, in parliamentary phraseology, not only by an alteration which carries out the purpose of the mover, but also by one which entirely destroys that purpose, or which even makes the proposition express a sense the very reverse of that intended by the mover ; and, in like manner, a motion which proposes one kind of proceeding, may be turned into another of a wholly different kind, by means of an amendment. For instance, where the motion pending was for the House to go into a committee of the whole, on the four per cent annuities Acts, and a motion was made to amend, so as in effect to substitute therefor a motion for certain papers connected with the passing of a decree by the government of Portugal materially affecting the commercial relations of that country with Great Britain, and the amendment was objected to, on the ground that it had no relation whatever to the subject of the motion, the Speaker said that, according to the forms of the House, and the law of parliament, there was no necessity that the amendments should be akin to the question. Sir Erskine May thus stated the former usage in his edition of 1879: 'There is no rule which requires an amendment to be made relevant to the question to which it is proposed to be made, except in the case of an order of the day.' Such a usage as allowing amendments irrelevant to a question, certainly seems opposed to those principles of sound reason which govern English parliamentary law generally. If such a practice were generally tolerated, all the benefits of giving due notice of a motion, and allowing the House a full opportunity of considering a question, would be practically lost. A member would then be in a position to surprise the House at any moment with a motion of importance, and the necessity of giving notice would be superseded to all intents and purposes. It is not, therefore, surprising that the latest English decisions are in accord with those of the Canadian Speakers. Sir Erskine May, in the edition of 1893, however, lays it down as 'an imperative rule that every amendment must be relevant to the question on which the amendment is proposed—except in the case of amendments moved to the question for the Speaker's leaving the chair for the Committee of Supply or Ways and Means.'

The practice in the English parliament to-day is the practice that has prevailed for a long time, that all amendments must have relevancy; but the amendment of my hon. friend has no relevancy to the question before the House.

Mr. FOWLER. The resolution before the House is one to amend the constitution, and the amendment is also to change the constitution. Therefore, it must be relevant. It simply proposes to carry the motion a little further, by amending it with respect to the representation as well as with respect to the subsidies paid to the provinces. Therefore, the argument the right hon. the premier has put forward is not in point.

Mr. FIELDING. The motion is not to amend the constitution generally, but to amend it in a particular matter, and any amendment which does not relate to that particular matter would not be in order.

Mr. DANIEL. The resolution before the House is a petition to amend the British North America Act, and the resolution which I offer is simply an additional amendment to that Act. I think that the right hon. gentleman is perhaps going a little far in objecting to the amendment on the ground that it is not in order. It appears to me that it is simply carrying out his own resolution by going a little further in petitioning for an amendment to the British North America Act.

Mr. SPROULE. Is it not competent to this parliament, when a Bill is before it, to amend that Bill in any direction it likes? We have sometimes imposed on corporations in connection with private Bills amendments which they did not desire. When a Bill is before parliament I think we have a right to amend it in a direction different from what is proposed.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion before the House deals with one specific question, the scale of payments to be made by Canada to the various provinces. The amendment proposes to deal with the representation of several provinces. It seems to me that it is entirely a different question, and that it is not relevant. I would, therefore, rule the proposed amendment out of order.

Mr. A. MARTIN. I move, in amendment——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Spoke.

Mr. SPEAKER. As I understand that the hon. member would not second the amendment, but thereafter spoke to it, I do not think he is precluded from moving an amendment.

Mr. A. MARTIN. I move, in amendment, seconded by Mr. Lefurgey:

That all the interest charged against the province of Prince Edward Island in its debt account with Canada, on account of railways under construction by the province previous to its union with Canada, be refunded; and that no interest hereafter shall be charged the province for such railway expenditure.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. R. S. LAKE (Qu'Appelle). Mr. Speaker, I have another amendment to move to the resolution which is before the House. It has reference to the public lands of the new provinces and the compensation that is being paid therefor, and is, therefore, I presume, relevant to the question before the House. This is a question which has been very much debated in this House during the last two years, one which was discussed at full length in connection with the Bills which were passed granting autonomy to the western provinces. I do not, therefore, intend to detain the House more than a very few moments at this late hour. I do not think, as a matter of fact, that there is one member in this House who will deny that it would be in accordance with the spirit of our constitution that every province of the Dominion should have the full ownership and control of the lands lying within its boundaries. During the discussion of the Autonomy Acts in this House, almost every gentleman who spoke on the other side of the House urged that the spirit as well as the letter of the constitution should be observed in passing legislation in regard to the new provinces.

That was urged over and over again with regard to nearly all the very knotty points which had to be decided. But there was one noticeable exception, and that was with regard to the public lands of the provinces. In the case of the public land, the spirit of the constitution was entirely departed from. All the argument adduced was for the purpose of proving that this parliament would have the right, if it choose to withhold the public domain from the new provinces. The spirit of the constitution having been cast aside, the main argument turned upon the expediency of the case. Some very strong arguments were put up on this side, notably by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier

(Mr. Monk) to the effect that it was not only against the spirit of the constitution, but the actual letter of the British North America Act that these lands should be withheld from the new provinces. No argument, so far as I can find out, was put up to disprove those made from this side except in the one case of the then Minister of Justice (Mr. Fitzpatrick). But while that minister quoted one decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, he rested most of his case upon the precedent established in the matter of Manitoba. He said that this House should consider not only the terms of the British North America Act, but the written constitution together with the intangible constitution which has grown up by practice and usage. It was mainly on that point that he based his argument. It would be unnecessary to point out to the government that they need not have gone so far if they were in search of a precedent. They need only have gone back to 1898 when some of these lands, which come under exactly the same category as those out of which the new provinces were composed, were handed over to the province of Quebec and given into the absolute possession of that province. But while the question of expediency was the chief question which was discussed on the other side, there was one member of the government who went a great deal further than any of his colleagues. That was the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) who frankly declared that it mattered not to him what were the respective rights of the provinces and the Dominion, that in his opinion the lands should pass into the hands of the Dominion government to be administered by that government and not be put up for sale, but administered for the purpose of giving them away to settlers. A good deal of mention was made of a certain report of the Privy Council passed in 1884 with regard to the Manitoba precedent, and that order in council was quoted frequently. But I wish to point out that while the quotations in only one case contained the main argument which was adduced by the Privy Council on that occasion for not handing over the lands of Manitoba to that province, a very subsidiary clause was brought forward as the main argument. That was the clause which began by stating that another consideration had considerable weight with the members of the Privy Council in bringing them to form a decision. That consideration was that it was necessary, in order to maintain the immigration policy of this country, that the control of the land should be in the hands of the same authority as was controlling the immigration. I wish to point out that the condition which made the argument of any value has now completely changed, and that the last reports brought down by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) show that the larger portion of the immigration is now going to the provinces in the east. Therefore, the reason adduced by the government on that occasion can no longer have any weight. I think anybody who went through these debates will agree with me that the government apparently recognize the fact that they had no constitutional argument to advance for withholding the ownership of these lands from the western provinces—at any rate no argument which they considered of any weight—and based the whole of their plea practically on the matter of expediency. But, as I have pointed out, the conditions are now changed and the expediency now no longer exists. If I were to argue the question from the view of expediency, I would say it is inexpedient to depart from the recognized policy of the British empire, that lands within the boundaries of any colony should be vested in the Crown in the right of that colony. I would point out that the argument for retaining control of the provincial lands at Ottawa is on a level with those used in the old days for controlling the lands of a colony from London. The British government attempted to enforce that control with results certainly detrimental to the best interests of the empire. And I would say that so long as the Dominion government attempt to enforce the control of the lands of the western provinces from Ottawa, so long will there be friction in the west.

If I were to argue the question of expediency again, I would say that it is highly inexpedient that some provinces should exist on an inferior plane to others. I would argue that it is expedient that all the provinces should have equal rights; and I would contend that confederation can never be a permanent structure unless it is founded upon the basis of equal rights and privileges to one and all. I would argue that it is expedient that the business connected with the public domain in these western provinces should be conducted from a point so far distant from them as Ottawa. Such an arrangement must lead to many difficulties and must throw many obstacles in the way of the administration of the public domains. These lands can never be so satisfactorily managed from Ottawa, as they can be by the representatives of the provinces themselves. A very large meeting was held in Regina the other day of an organization which goes by the name of Equal Rights Association, a body composed of both Liberals and Conservatives who stand up for equal rights for the new provinces. At that meeting certain resolutions were passed, and amongst them one concerning the ownership of the land. I will put it on 'Hansard':

That the land, timber and minerals of the province——

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Do I understand that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lake) is moving a resolution ?

Mr. LAKE. This is the resolution passed at the meeting of the association held in Regina, I would argue that it is germane to the subject up before the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. Of course, I have not yet seen the resolution that the hon. gentleman has proposed to quote. But, so far as I can gather, the question of the lands is quite apart from the scale of payments to be made to the various provinces of Canada.

Mr. LAKE. But the matter of these lands, of course, has a direct bearing on these payments which are made in lieu of these lands and which are referred to indirectly in the resolutions before the House. The resolution passed——

Mr. SPEAKER. So far as I can gather, the lands are an entirely different question from this scheme of the payments to the different provinces which is the matter before the House. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lake) is in order but I am prepared to hear the point discussed.

Mr. SPROULE. I suppose you will dispose first of the point of order, Mr. Speaker? There is consideration given these provinces in lieu of their lands, and that is provided for under these resolutions.

Mr. FIELDING. No, there is nothing in these resolutions concerning compensation for lands.

Mr. SPROULE. The original Act provides certain considerations to some of the provinces in lieu of their lands. This is to take the place—is it not ?—of the original provision for any of the provinces. If so, it must touch either, what is given in lieu of lands or what is given per capita. I respectfully submit that one of the elements of consideration for which the provinces have received money is their land.

Mr. FIELDING. These resolutions are simply intended to affect the provisions of section 118 of the British North America Act, which provides for two classes of payments to be made to the provinces : One, the fixed sum to carry on civil government, and the other compensation at the rate of 80 cents per head of the population of 1861.

Mr. LAKE. I might point out that the resolution proposed as an amendment by the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) today has a distinct reference to the payment of any special grant hereafter made by the parliament of Canada, to any province for any special purpose in such grant expressed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is simply to say that any privilege given to any province by any special Act outside section 118 is not to be affected by the resolutions.

Mr. SPEAKER. It seems to me that the whole question involved in the motion is the scheme of payments to be made by Canada to the several provinces, and that the question dealing with the land, so far as the provinces are concerned is entirely out of order.

Mr. LAKE. I must of course, bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GEORGE W. FOWLER (King's and Albert). I desire to say a word about the main motion, even though the hour is late, As a representative of the province of New Brunswick I feel that a duty is incumbent upon me to raise a strong protest against the manner in which that province has been used in connection with the increase in this subsidy. I do not know what influence was brought to bear upon the representatives of the province when they met at the conference with the government, but, certainly, New Brunswick is not given its fair share in connection with the distribution that has taken place. The larger provinces seem to have over-awed the smaller ones, and to have secured the lion's share for themselves. As has been pointed out by my hon. friend from York, N.B., (Mr. Crocket) in the very lucid speech he made on this subject, the proportion given to the province of New Brunswick is considerably less than the people of New Brunswick would be called upon to pay to the sum to be distributed. The hon. gentleman has already stated that the amount which we are called upon to pay is something like $145,000 whereas, the amount we receive is only $130,000. That is, the small province of New Brunswick is paying $15,000 more than it is receiving from the increased amount, whereas the larger provinces like Ontario and Quebec which have a wide area and great resources are getting very much more in proportion. The whole amount Ontario receives, is increased 66 per cent over the amount settled at confederation, whereas New Brunswick only receives some 41 per cent—the smallest percentage of any province represented at this conference. Now, it does seem to me that it is the duty of every one of the representatives of New Brunswick in this House to rise in their places and protest against the manner in which New Brunswick has been used in this matter. I should also say a word as to the motion which has been ruled out of order. I think we should have the representation that we were granted at the time we went into the confederation. It was certainly an oversight on the part of the fathers of confederation.

Mr. SPEAKER. A discussion on that would be equally irrelevant.

Mr. FOWLER. Then I simply reiterate that with respect to this latter subsidy, New Brunswick has certainly been gold bricked worse than any province attending the conference.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN (Queen's, P.E.I.). I move that an additional allowance of $100,000 be granted to the province of Prince Edward Island. The Finance Minister said that these resolutions formed a treaty between the provinces. Now I do not agree with the Finance Minister in that statement. I think that the assembled wisdom of this parliament is better capable of judging of the requirements of the provinces than are four or five premiers of the respective provinces meeting together. In 1887, certain premiers met in the city of Quebec and adopted certain resolutions, and we are told to-night by the premier that these are the resolutions upon which is based this address to His Majesty now under discussion. These resolutions are in fact twenty years old, and since they were passed the requirements of the various provinces have changed very materially. In 1887, it would have been a boon to the province of Prince Edward Island to obtain an increased grant of $70,000, but to offer that province to-day $70,000 of an increase is simply a farce. As a matter of fact it is not $70,000, it is only $60,000; because some four years ago an arrangement was made between Prince Edward Island and the Dominion that as soon as the Hillsborough bridge was completed $10,000 should be retained by the Dominion out of the subsidy which is payable to the province of Prince Edward Island in order to meet certain expenditure which was made upon that bridge for local traffic. So we are in effect only receiving about $60,000. What was the object which the fathers of confederation had in granting these subsidies? The first resolution which was submitted to the conference was moved by Sir John A. Macdonald, in these words :

> That the best interests and future prosperity of British North America will be promoted by a federal union under the Crown of Great Britain, provided such union can be effected on principles of justice to the several provinces.

You see the principle was to be justice to the several provinces, but what do we find since these provinces entered the confederation? At that time a large unorganized territory existed and was subsequently purchased by Canada from the Hudson Bay Company at an expense of something like $1,500,000. Since the confederation of the four original provinces there have been added Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Alberta and Saskatchewan have received grants of money and lands far in advance of what the maritime provinces have ever received. Saskatchewan and Alberta have received each the sum of $1,030,000. What is the financial condition of those provinces at present? Last year Alberta had a surplus of $473,252, and this year she has a surplus of $478,252. Now it is proposed to add to that surplus the sum of $130,000. These provinces are indeed put upon a splendid footing, far better than the old provinces ever enjoyed. What is the condition of the people of the maritime provinces? The forefathers of a great many of them emigrated to those provinces between the years 1776 and 1806, and had to hew out homes for themselves, they have worked upon their homesteads, they have raised families, but the population of those provinces has not materially increased during the past fifteen years owing to emigration.

What became of the surplus population of these three provinces? They have gone west and they have gone to the United States. It is asked to-day that great sums be taken out of the public chest of this country and given to the Northwest and that the maritime provinces shall be paid sums insufficient to maintain them decently. What did the resolution of Sir John Macdonald say? It said every province was to be maintained in a proper manner, so that they could make their revenue and expenditure meet, and in order that there should be no resort to direct taxation. What is the result in Prince Edward Island to-day? Instead of being able to run the government without direct taxation the people are being taxed out of the face. All kinds of taxes are resorted to. The taxation on land last year amounted to between $80,000 and $90,000 and notwithstanding the fact that there was, during the years 1904 and 1905 an average deficit of $57,133.30 this government refuses to-day, according to the statement made by the Minister of Finance, to allow in the readjustment of the subsidies, a sufficient sum to enable the government of Prince Edward Island to make both ends meet. Including the payment of $10,000 towards the Hillsborough bridge and an increase in the interest on the debt of about $2,500, the deficit during the present year will be something like $69,633.33, and we are told that the sum of $70,000 will be sufficient to enable this province to make both ends meet. During the year 1904 there were 28 vacant schools. Why? The province was unable to pay sufficiently high salaries to the school teachers and they went elsewhere. They went to Saskatchewan and Alberta where the salaries are twice as much as the people of Prince Edward Island can afford to pay. I think that when that condition of affairs is exposed this parliament should grant to the people of Prince Edward Island a sufficient sum to enable them to run the government in such a way that they would have a surplus as the people of Alberta have a surplus or a sum sufficient to balance their accounts. In the report made by the superintendent of education during the year 1906 to the legislature of the province of Prince Edward Island, he says:

The great difficulty with which we have to contend is the small salaries that we pay our teachers.

Mr. Bennett, who was acting inspector for Prince county schools for a part of the last year, says: 'The increasing number of vacant schools in this county was strongly impressed upon my mind when I had been at work for but a short time.

Mr. Kielly, the inspector for Queen's county, refers to the payment of the teachers and the fact that the best teachers are leaving the profession.

Mr. McCormack, the inspector for King's county schools, says, 'The question of vital importance to us at present is the securing of a sufficient number of teachers to hold schools to say nothing of teaching school. Many schools are now vacant. . . . There is just one effective agency that will remedy this matter and that is the payment of larger salaries.'

How can the government of Prince Edward Island pay larger salaries when this government will not allow them a larger sum to meet the necessary requirements of that province? They have 28 or 30 vacant schools this year, because they cannot get teachers at the present salary and the debt is $805,853. What will the condition of affairs be in that province twenty years hence? I think this is a matter that the Prime Minister should fairly and squarely look at. I do not think that the premier of Prince Edward Island fairly represented the condition of affairs at the conference. He did not make any representation at all notwithstanding the fact that a resolution was passed in that conference in 1906 requesting that a statement from the different provinces be presented for consideration. The premier of Prince Edward Island did not present any statement at all, although the premier of British Columbia and the premier of Ontario did so. The premier of Ontario made a statement of the condition of affairs in that province, and I will just read for the edification of the Minister of Finance an extract from that statement:

You are no doubt thoroughly familiar with the grievances of which Nova Scotia complained at the time that province claimed better terms. You will observe that two of the grounds at least upon which redress is sought are identical. It was upon those two grounds, namely, inadequate resources of local revenue, and physical environment, that after careful investigation, the claims of Nova Scotia were recognized and allowance made therefor. You will remember also that as late as 1885 the grievances of Nova Scotia were still an issue in that province, when the legislature of that province passed a resolution declaring for better terms or secession. The Hon. Mr. Fielding, the present Minister of Finance, was leader of that movement and in the resolutions in question set forth that the disabilities, of which Nova Scotia complained in 1868, still existed and had become accentuated by the lapse of time. While no formal settlement of these grievances took place, nevertheless it is well known that the Dominion government made concessions which appeased the discontent and we have heard nothing more of it. There are, therefore, most substantial precedents to justify our course.

It was upon those grounds that Nova Scotia was conceded further subsidies from this parliament, namely, that it had not a source of available revenue. We received under the original terms of confederation something like $161,000 from this parliament. We received in addition $20,000 for another matter of damages and $30,000 for the non-fulfilment of the terms of union. We received altogether something like $211,000 and we are asked to accept $70,000 additional. What is the percentage of increase which was given to the other provinces?

Province.	Increased subsidy for Govts. and legislatures.	Percentage of increase.
Ontario..	$160,000	200
Quebec..	170,000	242 6-7
Nova Scotia..	130,000	216⅔
New Brunswick..	130,000	260
Manitoba..	130,000	260
British Columbia.. ..	115,000	328 4-7
Prince Edward Island..	70,000	233⅓
Alberta..	100,000	200
Saskatchewan..	130,000	260

Taking the general increases per capita, Prince Edward Island gets nothing; Ontario gets $629,484.80 increase; Quebec gets $429,865.60 increase; Nova Scotia gets $47,659.20 increase; New Brunswick gets $7,885.60 increase; Manitoba gets $81,952 increase; British Columbia gets $61,987; Saskatchewan gets $6,210. Alberta and Prince Edward Island are the only provinces that do not get an increase on the per capita basis. I hold that Prince Edward Island is entitled to as much consideration as British Columbia, which came into confederation on terms that it should get the Canadian Pacific Railway, and it got the Canadian Pacific Railway at great expense to the people of Canada. Prince Edward Island refused to come into confederation in 1867; she entered after a great deal of negotiation in 1873, and five years afterwards it was found the terms granted her were not sufficient to enable the affairs of the province to be carried on. Since then Prince Edward Island, like the other provinces, has been knocking at the doors of the Dominion treasury, and it is now absolutely necessary that Prince Edward Island should receive an increased subsidy to enable her to make both ends meet. The Prime Minister tells us that this is a final and unalterable settlement of the subsidy question. If that be so, then it is for the representatives of Prince Edward Island to show to this parliament that their province is entitled to as much consideration as is British Columbia. If this be an unalterable and final settlement, as the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance tell us, then we should claim damages for the non-carrying out of winter communication since 1901. I can only repeat that the mercantile community and the farming community of Prince Edward Island are to-day at daggers drawn with the Dominion government because of the existing condition of affairs. They pay three times as much for the transportation of their freight as do the people on the Intercolonial Railway for the same distance. The farmers of Prince Edward Island have to pay 10 and 20 cents per hundred pounds more freight for their cornmeal, bran, etc., and they receive 1 or 2 cents a pound less for their pork and beef than do the farmers on the mainland. The rates charged for the three short hauls are excessive. It has been publicly stated that in 1905 the farmers of Prince Edward Island lost $700,000 for want of proper transportation facilities; in March and April, 1906, $200,000 were lost on potatoes alone for the same reason, and this season I venture to say that $500,000 or $600,000 has been lost by the Prince Edward Island farmers because of the stoppage of navigation. I believe that a further sum of $30,000 or $40,000 or $50,000 would about represent the inconvenience and loss which the travelling public has sustained during the last six weeks or two months. Let us take the freight rates on cheese, for example——

Mr. SPEAKER. Does not the hon. member think that this is pertinent to the question of transportation rather than to the motion before the House?

Mr. A. A. McLEAN. I am giving reasons which I think should induce the government to grant further consideration to Prince Edward Island, but in view of your suggestion, Mr. Speaker, I shall drop that subject for the present. Let us look at the expenditure on public works and other services. In 1873 the expenditure of the province on education and public works, administration of justice, legislation, executive council, charities, agriculture and paupers was $155,553.27, and to-day it has increased by $120,707.67. The Dominion government believes that by granting $70,000 they will put Prince Edward Island in a position to make revenue and expenditure meet, but they must remember that in the next fifteen or twenty years the cost of all these provincial services will increase, and that the revenue cannot meet the expenditure unless the province resorts to further direct taxation. I do not believe it was contemplated by the people who formulated confederation that it should ever be necessary to resort to direct taxation in the provinces. The condition of affairs with reference to the fisheries is at present very unsatisfactory, and I agree with the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) that it is the duty of the government to embody in this resolution an address asking for the settlement of the differences between the Dominion and the provinces as to the rights in the fisheries.

If the fisheries of Prince Edward Island were in the hands of that province they would obtain a revenue from the granting of oyster leases, the granting of lobster licenses and matters of that kind. But to-day it is uncertain who has the control of the fisheries of the provinces; and although it is well known to every man in Canada that this condition of affairs exists, the government of Canada does not think proper to ask the imperial government to change the constitution and to get legislation in that way from the imperial government settling the control of the fisheries of this country. We have, as I said before, nothing except agriculture. Nova Scotia last year received from royalties on coal, $643,357. At confederation Prince Edward Island had all the fuel that was necessary, and I presume that the delegates at the conference at Quebec thought there was at that time sufficient fuel in the province to last for all time to come. What is the condition of affairs there to-day? All the wood fuel is gone and we have to resort to coal, so that we actually pay to the province of Nova Scotia as our share of those royalties something like $12,000 a year. We have no lumber; we have to go to the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick for our lumber. If we want stone to build our roads we have to go to Gaspé, in the province of Quebec, or to Wallace, in the province of Nova Scotia; we are not in a position to build permanent roads in Prince Edward Island, because we have not the stone. What were the complaints made by Mr. McBride and Mr. Prior, the present and the former Premiers of British Columbia? They said they would require to build permanent roads all through the province and they put this plea so strongly before the conference that it granted British Columbia $100,000. Our soil is naturally soft, and if we wish to have permanent roads we must import the stone from the adjoining provinces to build them, and we are doing it every day at great expense to the people of Prince Edward Island. This is one of the matters which I wish to ask the premier to take into consideration: I do not think it is fair to ask the people of Prince Edward Island to pay a share of the increase of $789,484.83 to the province of Ontario or a share of the increase of $599,865.60 to the province of Quebec, while we only get what is conceded to us by the conference of 1887 These men have forgotten that conditions have changed, and as the hon. member for North Toronto said, they have taken automatically the figures presented to the conference of 1887 and have given them holus bolus to this House. There is not a particle of system about it. They have simply taken those figures which were put on paper by those men twenty years ago and asked the House to accept them, and we have the statement of the Finance Minister to-night that he did not know on what principle they were made up. No man in Canada knows how they were made up. They were the result of a compromise, and I wish to remind the premier that Prince Edward Island was not represented at the conference of 1887, neither was British Columbia, but British Columbia sent a statement. It was stated to-night that British Columbia assented to the subsidies granted in 1887. It did not, and has not to this day. It is true, it accepted what this parliament agreed to give, but it contended that it was entitled to more. Not a member from British Columbia has spoken on this subject, and we have the evidence of an election which was held in that province a month or six weeks ago, as to what the feeling of the people there is. It shows that they are not satisfied with the subsidies proposed to be granted by this resolution. It has been stated by the premier that it is not proper and not in the interests of confederation that any change should be made in the constitution without the consent of every province of this Dominion. I agree with the premier in that, but I go a little further, and I say that when two provinces object to a change in the constitution, as this is, it should not be carried into effect. When British Columbia was granted a certain sum, that was changing a part of her constitution; when Prince Edward Island was granted a certain sum that was changing a part of her constitution; so that you are changing the constitutions of these provinces without their consent. It is true, the premier came here accompanied by one of his cabinet and voted for the resolutions, but he had no authortiy from the legislature of Prince Edward Island to do so. The authority that was given to him was a resolution passed by the legislature on the 9th of April last, which was in direct contradiction to the vote he gave at that conference. That resolution provided that there should be no diminution in the per capita subsidy to the province of Prince Edward Island; notwithstanding that, the Premier of Prince Edward Island and his colleague voted at the conference for a diminution of the per capita amount, agreeing that it should be based on the census of 1901. The Prime Minister, knowing that there was a great agitation in the province of Prince Edward Island at the present time over this matter, and knowing that a resolution had been passed by the unanimous vote of the legislature of the province, thought proper at the last moment to agree—and that was the meaning of the amendment the right hon. gentleman moved—that Prince Edward Island should be allowed the rate which she had under the resolutions of 1873, and under which she has been paid on the maximum population of 1891. The right hon. gentleman has done what is right for the people of Prince Edward Island in that respect; they were entitled to that; but I would ask him to go a little further and look into the financial position of that province. It is his duty to do that.

It is not his duty to leave that to four or five premiers of the other provinces, who know nothing of the financial condition of Prince Edward Island. It is the duty of the premier and the Finance Minister to look into the finances of each province which receives benefit from the Domnion. What is the condition of affairs in Australia? That Commonwealth granted two thirds of its revenue to the different provinces whereas we do not grant more than a seven and one-half per cent of it. To-day there is collected in Canada in customs and excise over $60,500,000. Our share of that amounts to at least $1,250,000. It has been stated here that we only get some thing like $500,000. That may be a little under the mark but that is about the amount. So that, so far as Prince Edward Island is concerned and according to the statement of Mr. McBride, Premier of British Columbia, these two small provinces are paying a great deal more to the government of Canada in customs and excise than they receive. This is unfair. There should be a fair amount paid these provinces. It has been stated by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Roche) that the provinces by the sea do not pay a fair portion of taxes—that Ontario has borne the burden in the past and will in the future. I do not agree with him. Where do the people of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick get their goods? In Montreal and Toronto. The duties are paid in Montreal and Toronto and are credited to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario, but the people of the maritime provinces pay these duties eventually. I think, Mr. Speaker, that as it is now three o'clock, when honest folks should be in bed, I shall conclude my remarks.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING. I hope that no one will form an opinion of Prince Edward Island from the melancholy and dismal speech we have just heard. If the Island should be judged by that speech and those which occasionally come from some of my respected friends from that province, one would easily conclude that it was the most God forsaken part of the Dominion. I am glad to know it is nothing of the sort.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN. Let the hon. gentleman refer to page 35 of the report of the interprovincial conference at Quebec and he will find what his own opinion of the province of Nova Scotia was.

Mr. FIELDING. I am glad to be able to say that Prince Edward Island, in my judgment, does not deserve the description my hon. friend has given of it to-night. I think the tendency of two or three of my hon. friends to perpetually complain about its condition does injustice to themselves and the island. I believe that there is no portion of this Dominion which, for a long time past, has received fairer consideration from the parliament of Canada than the province of Prince Edward Island. In my opinion the people there do not at all sympathize with the perpetual grievance mongering of my hon. friend and one or two of his colleagues. The island is not doing as well from the point of view of transportation as we would like. It suffers from severity of weather in the winter, but that is made to appear a dreadful condition by my hon. friends who are prone to exaggerate. If anything can be done to improve the transportation facilities, every one in this House will desire that it should be done.

Mr. ALEX. MARTIN. We heard the hon. gentleman say that a few days ago.

Mr. FIELDING. Yes and we have improved the conditions of transportation beween the island and the mainland. They are better to-day than they ever were, much better than they were in the years when the hon. gentleman's friends sat here and were quite content to accept them without making much complaint. The island has been getting very fair consideration in all these things and nobody will be more anxious, I believe, than the members of this House that Prince Edward Island shall have the advantage of every improvement in transportation.

She has been dealt with liberally too in another respect. Twice in a short period she has received special grants of increased subsidy which might have caused comment from the other provinces but were accepted by them in a generous spirit. I am sorry these hon. gentlemen do not appreciate the liberality Canada has manifested towards their province. As respects the present scheme, can any hon. gentlemen say she is placed at a disadvantage? There are two ways in which a subsidy is granted a province. There is first a specific sum allowed for government and then so much per head. The advantage goes to the smaller provinces in the shape of a specific special allowance made for government and legislature. What do I find? Under the present scale of payments, Prince Edward Island, in the matter of allowance for government, if you convert it into an equivalent per capita, stands to-day in a better position than any other province. That is to say the fixed allowance for government—I am now distinguishing between the fixed allowance and a sum per capita—works out a per capita sum in excess of what any other province of the Dominion receives to-day.

Mr. ALEX. MARTIN. I would like to see that proved. Bring it down to figures.

Mr. FIELDING. I am bringing it down to figures. If my calculation is certain——

Mr. A. A. McLEAN. I do not think it is.

Mr. FIELDING. From the best information I can get, the special allowance which is made for government in the case of Prince Edward Island works out twenty-nine cents per head and there is no other province in the Dominion where it is as high. My own province of Nova Scotia gets less per head for that purpose, and the conditions are worse in Ontario. As regards the special allowance for government and legislature, Prince Edward Island is highly favoured, and I am sorry that hon. gentlemen should seek to convey the impression that it is not. Turn to the scale of payments proposed here and not only is the island favoured now but in any change that we may make we give her still further advantage. Dealing with that item of specific allowance for government and legislature—

Mr. A. A. McLEAN. It is the only one we get. You have no right to put it on the basis of population if it is a specific sum.

Mr. FIELDING. I do not put it on the basis of population. I say that provision is made for a payment which works out a larger sum to the island per capita than to any other province. If we take the items of that class and compare them with those proposed under this schedule, what do we find? I find that the additional sum allowed Prince Edward Island under that heading would amount to 67 cents per head while the additional sum allowed to Nova Scotia will only work out 28 cents per head. I expect to be attacked in my own province of Nova Scotia and told that we have not given that province fair consideration. And the case would be worse if we take Ontario or Quebec, because they received a less sum by way of increase than does the province of Prince Edward Island. It is unfortunate, when that province is so fairly and justly and liberally dealt with, that my hon. friend should try to create a grievance. I repeat once more that these resolutions are a treaty between the provinces and cannot be changed except by breach of faith between the provinces. Hon. gentlemen speak as though this were a matter between the Liberal party and the provinces. It is not so, for all parties were represented in that conference. My friend Mr. Whitney was there and became a party to these resolutions. Mr. Foy was present. Colonel Matheson was present. And so was Mr. Roblin, the premier of Manitoba, and Mr. Colin H. Campbell. All these gentlemen united in the opinion that the payments arranged as between the various provinces were fair and should not be departed from. Mr. Whitney issued a statement in which he said: We urge that in the future that no special grant should be made to any one province. Yet this hon. gentleman comes here with a motion in favour of a special grant to one province with the argument that we are not dealing fairly——

Mr. A. A. McLEAN. If the hon. minister will allow me to ask him a question? When that motion was put in the conference had the arrangement of $100,000 to British Columbia been accepted?

Mr. FIELDING. I do not know what that has to do with it. I know that in regard to British Columbia, Mr. Whitney held as strong a position as any one in the conference, that what was done was fair and just, and he refused, and properly refused, to make any change respecting the province of British Columbia or any other. Sympathizing, as I naturally would, as a maritime province man, with any just grievance of Prince Edward Island, I declare that it would be a breach of faith with Ontario, with Quebec, with my own province, and with all the others that participated in that conference to pass this amendment. I do urge that the House should recognize the compact that exists in these resolutions and not adopt an amendment changing resolutions which were agreed to in good faith and cannot be departed from without unfairness to the other provinces.

Amendment (Mr. A. A. McLean) negatived.

Motion (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) agreed to, and address adopted.

On motion of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, House adjourned at 3 a.m. Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, March 26, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

SUPPLY—INTERIM SUPPLY BILL.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply. He said: Mr. Speaker, there is a special matter set down for consideration to-day but I want to ask the assistance of the House for a few minutes in facilitating the passage of a special Supply Bill in accordance with the intimation which I gave yesterday. Perhaps there are some hon. members who are now present, who were not here at that time, and if so I would say that as the fiscal year is about to close and as it is not possible for us to have a general Supply Bill in time for the new year, I propose to take a vote for one-fifth of the items in the main estimates upon which the Committee of Supply have not already passed. The clerks of the House have made careful calculations and I shall ask the House, when we go into committee, to accept the items as prepared by them with the assurance that they are correct. The several stages are purely formal and I shall be happy to have the assistance of the House in putting these items through these stages which I hope will not occupy many minutes and immediately after that the motion to be made by my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) will come on.

Mr. BOURASSA. I have no objection to facilitating the desire of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) only I would like to know if, after this motion has gone through, it will be in order to introduce another motion to go into Committee of Supply or an amendment thereto? I would not like the question of order to be raised by any hon. member because any hon. member of the House can take exception to the presentation of this motion again.

Mr. FIELDING. There will be no such question. I may explain to my hon. friend that the procedure is that after the committee has gone into supply the motion will be made that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again, this day, immediately after which my hon. friend's motion can be made. There will be no objection whatever and we will not consume twenty minutes by this proceeding.

Mr. BOURASSA. I have no objection to helping the House to pass these estimates but I do so on the distinct understanding that there will be no use made of this in order to prevent the debate going on.

Mr. FIELDING. I will give the hon. member an assurance that if there is any delay, I will withdraw the motion and leave it open to the hon. member to bring in his amendment.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There can be no possible misunderstanding when the matter for discussion was set down definitely for to-day and it will be the duty of every member of the House to carry out that arrangement. There is no objection to what my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) proposes. It is understood, of course, as it was understood on previous occasions, that this shall not in any way interfere with the criticism of any items or of any vote upon concurrence which any hon. member may desire to offer.

Mr. FIELDING. Certainly not.

Motion agreed to and House went into Committee of Supply.

Mr. FIELDING. I beg to move:

That a sum not exceeding the amount set forth below be granted to His Majesty on account of the following services for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1908.

I shall not attempt to read the items; but I shall ask the House to accept the assurance of the clerks that the calculations have been carefully made, and that the effect of this motion is to take a vote for one-fifth of these items which have not already been passed upon by the Committee of Supply.

Resolutions concurred in.

Mr. FIELDING. There are resolutions which were disposed of in the Committee of Supply some time ago, but which have not yet been concurred in. I beg to move that these several resolutions which have been passed from time to time in Committee of Supply be now read and concurred in.

Motion agreed to, and resolutions concurred in.

House went into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FIELDING moved:

That towards making good a supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses for the public service for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1908, the sum of $26,038,169.02 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Resolutions reported, read a second time and agreed to.

Mr. FIELDING moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 141) for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1908.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. FIELDING. While I have no doubt the papers are all in proper form, I think it better not to press the Bill to its final stage now. It will be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading.

Mr. SPROULE. Print it in the meantime?

SUPPLY—REPORT OF THE INSURANCE COMMISSION; CHARGES AGAINST CERTAIN MEMBERS.

Mr. FIELDING moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. HENRI BOURASSA (Labelle). I quite understand that the majority of the members of this House should be amused at the fact that in rising to speak on this occasion, I am greeted with the applause of only my good friend (Mr. Armand Lavergne) who sits to my left. I can quite realize that some hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House are not disposed to receive me with all that joy and contentment, with which, under other circumstances, I might be received by them. Be that as it may, I fear the members of this House may be somewhat disappointed in the proceedings of to-day. If it is expected by any one that I am going to engage in that kind of thing which has been so properly described by the President of the United States as the work of the man with the muck rake, I wish to dispel that expectation right now. I have not come here for the sole pleasure of dragging before the public the good name of my colleagues in this House with whom I may have had some political differences, but among whom, so far, I do not think I can count any personal enemy. I wish to say that the motive which impels me to bring this matter again before the House, is one which I think will commend itself to the intelligence of my colleagues. I may, perhaps, be able to claim that I have some advantage in presenting this matter, inasmuch as the future and the fate of either political party, as at present constituted, is utterly indifferent to me. I therefore bring this question forward, not with the view of helping the government to ruin some of their political opponents, nor yet with the view of helping the opposition to bring to task some of the members of the government, or some of the supporters of the government. I bring this question forward because I think it is my public duty to give voice in this parliament to the clamour of public opinion, as it is expressed at the present time throughout all Canada.

The origin of this question is not to be found in the records of this House; its origin lies in the proceedings of the Royal Commission which was constituted by this parliament last year to inquire into the business of life insurance in Canada. Without passing any judgment upon the attitude of the members of that commission, or upon the business men or the companies, that were brought under investigation, I simply state now that certain facts with which the names of members of this House, and the name of a member of the Senate, were connected, were brought to light. These facts are of public notoriety to-day; they are contained in official documents printed under the authority of the Crown and by the consent of the parliament of Canada. Upon those facts the press of the country have been carrying on a campaign of comment, I might say a campaign of slander, for about six months. Comments of such a character have been passed upon the honour, the integrity, the independence of members of this House that neither the accused parties nor those who entertain the opinion that they have been remiss in their duty can allow this session to close without on the one side justifying themselves as public men and on the other side justifying their accusations against these public men.

The matter was brought to a crisis by the action of the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Fowler), who, being attacked by one member on this side of the House, stood up and took the ground, which I am not prepared to condemn, that if he were attacked in regard to what he deemed to be absolutely private matters, he reserved to himself the right to carry the war into Africa and to bring to task some members on this side of the House. Had the matter rested there, I do not say that it would not have been the business of parliament to inquire, but certainly it would not have had the importance that it has to-day, and would not perhaps have necessitated the immediate action of the House. But what makes it the imperative duty of the House not to let this session pass without having the whole matter investigated is the fact that at the present time, owing to these accusations having been spread from one end of the country to the other and repeatedly commented on by the press, public opinion is losing confidence in the integrity of its representative institutions and in the integrity of the members of those institutions. It has come to the point, Sir, that, rightly or wrongly, there exists a strong impression throughout the country that this House, under various pretenses, whether it be that the Prime Minister should go to England next week or that the insurance report is not to be acted on this session by way of legislation, wishes to adjourn because both parties are afraid of the revelations that might accrue, because neither party in this House wants judgment to be passed on itself. I do not say that this is right or wrong; I say this impression is prevailing, and prevailing widely, because of the attitude of the hon. member for King's, N.B., who stood up in this House and stated, in most positive terms: 'If I am attacked I will retaliate.' He did not speak in any general terms, but he stated that he had in his possession data and material by which he could prove that several members of this House, members of the government, were guilty of improper conduct and should be impugned. Now, Sir, all the independent press of the country has taken the attitude of the hon. member for King's, N.B., connected with the reply of the right hon. the Prime Minister, as an offer to saw-off—I repeat again that I do not say it was the intention of the hon. member for King's—with the right hon. the Prime Minister. But after all, Sir, in this House as well as outside, judgment must be formed on the actions of public men from their words and their attitude. The language of the hon. member for King's is so well known that I need not read it again. However, perhaps it might be better to give a few sentences. I will come later on to the whole of what I may call the arraignment of the hon. gentleman. What did he say?

I shall allow no man to make an attack on me——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. Of course, the House will observe that this is a reference to a former debate. I merely call the attention of the House to it.

Mr. BOURASSA. I quite realize that, but I expect that no exception will be taken in this case, because it would be impossible to pass judgment on this matter without referring to a past debate; and although I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I think that under the circumstances the whole House, and especially those connected with the matter, will warrant me in making these references. (Reading):

I shall allow no man to make an attack on me or my character without retorting. I shall discuss the character of hon. members opposite, whether they be ministers or private members, and their connection with women, wine and graft.

There are gentlemen opposite living in very frail glass houses. I have taken a little trouble and pains to gather together some data with respect to some of them; and if I am attacked, I do not propose to allow any such insinuations as were made by the hon. member for Yale and Cariboo (Mr. Ross) to pass without retaliating.

I should be a poltroon if, when I am attacked, I did not defend myself, and not only defend myself, but, having the material, if I did not use that material to carry the attack into the other side.

Let them bring on their scandal, let them produce their witnesses, and their evidence. But, let me tell you, if I am attacked, I shall defend myself, and not only defend myself, but also lead an attack.

Replying to the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Derbyshire), he said:

It rests altogether with his own friends when they shall have it—they will have it as soon as I am attacked. That is all I have to say with respect to the matter now, but I shall have a good deal to say when the time comes.

Now, what was the reply of the right hon. leader of the government to that? When I brought this language to the attention of the House two days later, what did the right hon. gentleman say? He said:

Now, in connection with the other incident, the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) made some very severe statements and some very grave insinuations. The hon. gentleman did not make charges. He told us he had provided himself with certain material, as he said, to carry the war into Africa and that if his conduct was discussed, or charges made against him, then he would take means to defend himself by accusing other parties—making insinuations of a very grave character against some members of the government and of this House, but without making any specific charges. I thought at the moment that the matter was very grave and exceeded the bounds of what might be expected in the heat of debate; still it arose in the midst of a heated discussion, and there might perhaps not be so much importance to be attached to it. If, however, when the report of the commission is before us, and if, as a result of this report, his conduct is impugned, it shall, I think, be his duty to make good the insinuations he has made.

To all common sense people who have heard or read these words, does it not look as if the hon. member for King's had offered a bargain to the right hon. the Prime Minister that unless he was attacked there would be no revelation from him, and that the Prime Minister had accepted the bargain by saying: If there is in the report of the Insurance Commission anything against Mr. Fowler, then it will be his duty to proceed? I would like to know where the connection is between the report of a royal commission to investigate insurance and the relations of members of the government to wine, women and graft? I do not know that the Insurance Commissioners were instructed to inquire into the private or public conduct of ministers of the Crown. I do not know that they were called on to do anything else than the business which they accomplished; and even without any reference to the Insurance Commissioners' report, it would be the duty of the hon. member for King's to make good his threat that he would expose ministers and other members of the House. Now, Sir, apart from the semblance of accepting from the hon. member for King's the offer of a saw-off, the right hon. the Prime Minister admitted in most positive terms that this session could not close without the matter being discussed:

I have not made up my mind that at this moment the time has come for the House to take any action upon the matter which has been brought to its attention. But that the session cannot pass without this matter being brought to the attention of the House goes without saying. For my part, I believe that we should wait until we have the report of the Insurance Commission, and then the whole matter can be threshed out.

On that ground he was met by the hon. leader of the opposition, who stated most positively:

I agree with the Prime Minister that it is impossible this session should close without those charges which have been insinuated either being withdrawn or brought on for discussion or adjudication. So far as I am concerned—and I speak for every man on this side of the House in that regard—we do not propose that this session shall end until that matter has been discussed and until that investigation has been made.

The hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) himself admitted that it was necessary there should be an investigation. Here is what he said at the end of his remarks on that day, the 21st of February:

I quite agree with the hon. leader of the House that the time to thresh this whole matter out will be when the report of the Insurance Commission comes in. Then, whatever action it is necessary to take, I shall take in order to protect myself.

What did happen? I waited some time until that report was not only laid on the table but distributed to members on both sides, and long enough for them to have had time to read it and form their opinions. Then I brought the matter again before the House and quoted these words of the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition which I have just cited. Again the leader of the opposition repeated his offer to go on. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), one of those whose conduct has been most commented on by the Liberal press, stood up in a most manly way and repeated his offer not only to have his own conduct investigated, but to have an investigation into all the charges made and insinuated. He stated that the accusations made, not only in this House, but in the public, against members of the government must be investigated. He stated positively that the matter had become one of general comment throughout the country and that the House could not prorogue without having an investigation. What was the attitude of the right hon. gentleman on that occasion? With regard to the Insurance Commission report, upon which he had based his only reason for waiting before having the charges of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) investigated, he said:

The commission have reported that, in their judgment, there was necessity for legislation and have submitted a blank Bill for the consideration of the House, which is now in the hands of hon. members. Beyond this they did not report; they made no report against anybody.

The commission, he said, had made no report against anybody. After the Liberal press had been for six months branding the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), the member for King's (Mr. Fowler), the member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) and the member for Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Lefurgey) as men unworthy of a seat in this House; after supporters of the right hon. gentleman had said in so many words that the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) was unworthy of a seat in this House; after the whole press of this country had been demanding an investigation—after all this, the right hon. gentleman stood up and said: There is nothing against anybody in the report of the Insurance Commission. I shall come back to that point in a moment.

With regard to the other part of the dispute—the statements made by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler)—what did the right hon. gentleman say? He said:

I do not understand at the present moment how it is possible to investigate anything which has been said by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler). He did not mention any name, he did not mention any offence, he spoke in a general way. And I am at a loss to know at present what charges there are to be investigated.

And this not more than two weeks after the right hon. gentleman had said most solemnly that this House could not adjourn without having an investigation—without having the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) forced to make his charges or withdraw them. What has brought about that change? That is the question I am now going to discuss. That I was stunned by those two statements of the right hon. gentleman I freely admit. But this brings me to this point—and I do not say I am dissatisfied with the fact that it forces me to weary the House for some minutes with some of the findings of that Insurance Commission in that report in which the right hon. gentleman has found no charge against anybody. When I say I am not dissatisfied with the task, I say it purposely, not because it will oblige me, so to speak, to read statements that are of the most damaging character against some of the members of this House, but because it enlarges the scope of this discussion and will lead me to the conclusion that what is required now is not only that the charge of one member against another should be investigated, but that a committee be instituted to investigate and find out who are the honest and who are the dishonest men.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BOURASSA. My hon. friends need not think I am taking this attitude with the idea of posing as a censor of my colleagues. Not at all. If I were to reveal the names of all my friends, either on the Liberal or Conservative side, who have asked me to press this matter forward though they will vote against me, it would be easy to prove that public sentiment, both in this House and out of it, is in favour of an investigation. I shall endeavour to prove that the vast majority of the members of this House—whom I esteem as honest and honourable men—should take upon themselves to make the line clear between the honest and dishonest.

To confine myself to the report of the Insurance Commission, I find that there are two companies with which it deals and with which are connected members of this parliament, namely, the Canada Life Insurance Company and the Independent Order of Foresters. Their inquiry into the business of the Canada Life brought to light the fact, well known in business circles, that the almost absolute control of that company was in the hands of Senator Cox. What is the opinion of the commission on that point?

The absolute control, real or potential, residing in the president and general manager, and in which his stock holding and offices secure him, have to a marked extent influenced the investments of the company, which have been made to serve not only the interests of the Canada Life Assurance Company but also his own interests and the interests of other institutions in which he was largely concerned. He says he has always made the interests of the Canada Life Assurance Company his first and chief concern, but many of the investments made by or on behalf of that company have been made to serve other interests as well. The dual position and conflicting interests of Mr. Cox in many of these transactions have been most clearly defined.

Then the report goes on to cite some of the dealings of the Central Loan and Savings Company. This company was under Mr. Cox's control to such an extent that the report says:

To use his own language, we are to treat it as being himself.

And it adds:

Upon one occasion, referred to hereafter, when he was himself, both directly and in respect of some of his business associates and some one or more of the institutions in which he had a controlling interest, largely concerned in maintaining the market price of a security of this description, he made use of the funds of the company to purchase the security for the express purpose of strengthening or upholding its market price.

Which in common words means that Senator Cox made use of the money of the people insured in the Canada Life to do some stock gambling in his own interest and in the interest of the companies with which he was associated.

Then it goes on with the recital of the purchases of the Dominion Coal Company's stock which Senator Cox caused to be supported by the Canada Life Insurance Company and proceeds:

The transactions by way of purchase with the Central Canada Loan and Savings Company, the other self of Mr. Cox, and with the Dominion Securities Corporation, the creature of the Central Canada Loan and Savings Company were numerous and profitable to those institutions. Following is a summary of them:

I shall not read the House the whole list, but it means that from 1900 to 1906, within six years, Senator Cox caused the money of the Canada Life Insurance Company to be diverted from its natural channels and to be invested, to the small amount of $6,933,000, in stocks in which he was personally interested.

These transactions indicate to your commissioners that the funds of the company were employed with the utmost freedom in transactions with institutions in which Mr. Cox was largely interested. In many of these transactions the conflict of Mr. Cox's interest with his duty is so apparent that the care of the insurance funds could not always have been the sole consideration.

Now, Sir, this is most moderate language but it is far more effective than any scathing denunciation in the mouth and under the pen of a Royal Commission instituted by this parliament and having acted with all the requirement of impartiality—at least so we must assume as long as it is not proved to the contrary. It goes further:

A transaction having a different significance should also be referred to. In October, 1902, a large loan was made by the company to A. E. Ames & Co., upon the authority of the Metropolitan Bank and Sao Paolo stock. At December 31, 1902, the loan amounted to $389,500, and was secured by 3,400 shares of Metropolitan Bank stock and 1,040 shares of Sao Paolo.

I need not tell the House what the connection was between the firm of Ames and Company and the president of the Canada Life.

On that day, being the last day of the year, A. E. Ames & Co. appear to have discounted a note with the Canadian Bank of Commerce.

And here again I need not remind the House what the connection then was between the Canadian Bank of Commerce and Mr. Cox, the president of the Canada Life Insurance Company.

—appear to have discounted a note with the Canadian Bank of Commerce out of the proceeds of which they paid off the loan from the company——

That is the Canada Life Company.

—and the parties went through the form of releasing or transferring the securities; but on January 2, 1903,——

That is two days afterwards,

—the company paid off the bank and received the shares back.

Now Sir, what was that done for?

Although it is represented that this transaction did not result from a desire to conceal this loan from the Insurance Department,——

The reason is given later on——it was certainly calculated to have that effect, and it is impossible to give credence to the theory that there was any real paying off of the loan, in view of the circumstances.

There should be borne in mind also the letters of September 10, 1902, and December 15, 1902, from the department to the Minister of Justice in which securities of the Sao Paolo class were being questioned. It is difficult to believe that there was no connection between the raising of the question by the department and the temporary calling in of the loan at the critical date of the annual return.

Again, Sir, in plain language which can be understood by every man in this country, what does this mean? That Senator Cox, being president of the Canada Life Assurance Company, helped his son-in-law, the head of the firm of A. E. Ames and Company, to make false entries in the books of the Canada Life Assurance Company in order that the insurance inspector could not detect that the Canada Life Assurance Company, under the guidance of Senator Cox, was lending the money, the trust funds of the people interested in that insurance, on securities which had been questioned by the Department of Insurance—and notice to this effect had been served on the Canada Life Assurance Company—and yet the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) can discover no findings against anybody in that report.

Let us take the position now of the Independent Order of Foresters, the investigation of which has given rise to such comment upon the honour and integrity of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) stated before that commission that he was going to appeal before a higher tribunal. We have been sitting in this House some months and whether hon. members believe as the hon. member for Wright (Mr. E. B. Devlin) seems to, that the hon. member is unworthy of a seat in this House or whether like myself they simply wait until an ex-minister of the Crown, a man who has enjoyed the respect of the people of this country, a man who has moulded the policy of his party and his country, has cleared his reputation—we have waited until that hon. gentleman would call upon that higher tribunal; and if to-day I bring the name of the hon. gentleman into these questions it is not because of my being a political opponent of the hon. gentleman, but it is because I consider that the reputation of our public men, and especially of ministers and ex-ministers of the Crown, is not such a thing as should be trifled with, and my earnest wish is that that hon. gentleman should take this occasion to clear himself and to repudiate all the charges that have been made against him.

But all I have at my disposal at the present time is that report of the Insurance Commission, and what do I find there? After having reviewed the proceedings of the Independent Order of Foresters, the extravagant way in which they had tried to organize their business in foreign countries, the unfortunate and nasty proceedings with which an ex-minister of the Crown, an ex-member of this House, was connected—I mean Dr. Montague—then the commissioners take up the history of the Union Trust Company. I need not relate to the House how and under what circumstances the Union Trust Company was formed, everybody knows, and I leave it to the words of the commissioners to define the situation.

There is nothing uncertain in the policy so outlined and advised, and it was the policy which, in its development, determined the status of the Union Trust Company as a large and bold operator with the moneys of the Foresters forming its capital.

The company was not intended to obtrude its paternity upon the public with whom it was to do business, nor was it deemed prudent that the personnel of its directors should indicate its relation to the order. In his letter of May 27, 1901, Mr. Foster advises :—

But whilst in reality the Trust Company will be controlled by the Foresters, it is not best that that point should be emphasized to the public—but rather the contrary. To that end we should, I think, be most careful in the selection of directors.

Now everybody knows how the Union Trust Company was formed and how it became, for all practical purposes, the investing department of the Independent Order of Foresters. The commissioners say :

In March, 1902, Dr. Montague, who was then Deputy Supreme Chief Ranger of the order, took up the idea of making a large purchase of lands in Manitoba and the Northwest. He associated with him in interest the Supreme Chief Ranger, the Supreme Secretary and Mr. Foster, the managing director of the Union Trust Company. The idea involved borrowing from the order the funds necessary.

Now it goes on reciting one of the deals made with regard to lands, and says :

The Trust Company seems to have subsequently been made the depository of further cash advances by the order, to be handed over to the syndicate of four to buy further lands.

And it must not be forgotten that the Union Trust Company was for all practical purposes the hon. member for North Toronto, who was the general manager and financial adviser of that company, and that the syndicate of four which received the money from the Trust Company to buy lands included the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster).

All these advances as made, were supposed to be added to the mortgage security to which reference has already been made. The Swan river lands were similarly purchased in the same year, the quantity being 9,920 acres and the price $52,080, and the conveyancing being arranged as in the other cases.

In connection with the purchase of the Carrot river lands, a commission of $10,000 was due by the vendors to one Pritchard, their agent. Of this commission Mr. Foster received one-half, of $5,000, causing a cheque of the Union Trust Company to issue to his order for the amount, and deductng it from the first payment to the vendors. This, he says, he divided equally among the members of the syndicate, and he speaks of it as a reduction made by reason of his efforts, in the price of the land, rather than as a commission.

Then it goes on reciting the opinions of the different winesses and it adds:

Assuming the money to have represented a reduction in price, it seems difficult in view of the trust on which the Union Trust Company, to its managing director's knowledge, held these funds, to understand the division of any portion of them among the borrowing syndicate.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend allow a question now and then ?

Mr. BOURASSA. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask him if he has ever read that trust that is referred to there?

Mr. BOURASSA. I have read what is in the evidence ; I have not read the exhibits because they have not been published.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I caution my hon. friend, because I know he wishes to be fair, that it might be well for him to examine some of the documents before he takes as law and gospel the statement made by three gentlemen who, if they were in this House, would not be more than the equals of my hon. friend.

Mr. BOURASSA. I think I will clear the mind of my hon. friend as well as of any other gentleman, because his objection might apply to any point I am going to make out of that report. I will conclude by saying that in justice to the hon. gentleman we must give him a chance to make his case in this House as a public man. The only thing upon which I can now base my opinion and statements, the only thing upon which the ministerial press has been slandering the hon. gentleman, is this document and the evidence printed only a few days ago. Therefore the hon. gentleman cannot object to my reading the report as I find it. I am thoroughly British, and I hold no man guilty unless he is proved to be guilty. But at the same time, I say that until the hon. gentleman has appealed to a higher tribunal, he must act upon this report or ask for it to be revised if it is unjust to him. As long as he does not do so, we must accept the report as we find it. Let me repeat the last sentence.

What the moneys were deposited with him for was to purchase land to be added to the security held by the Independent Order of Foresters.

It goes on to recite the transactions between Mr. Roblin and Mr. Whitla.

The price offered by Mr. Foster in his letter to Pritchard of December 23, 1903 (exhibit 666) was $5.25 per acre, with, 25 cents per acre as commission, thus netting you $5 per acre.'

In his letter of January 5, 1904, to Mr. Whitla's firm, he reminds them that 25 cents per acre is to be paid as 'commission on sale' and he says this can be deducted from the cash payment, which was $1.25 per acre or better; 'you can send a cheque therefor signed by the vendors in favour of myself.'

The reply asks him for a cheque for the cash payment, 'less commission as per agreement'. The cash payment was $1.25 per acre on the 9,920 acres, or $12,400. For this Mr. Foster caused two cheques of the Union Trust Company to issue, for $9,920, or $1 per acre to Mr. Whitla, and for $2,480, or 25 cents per acre to himself. In this letter of February 2, 1904, Mr. Whitla, inclosing the cheque for $9,920, he says he is 'retaining the $2,480 commission'. The witnesses as to the transaction are Mr. Foster, pages 2647-2648. Mr. Roblin page 3131 et seq., and Mr. Pritchard pages 3046-3048. They differ in some respects, but the main features of the transaction are not effected by these differences. The $2,480 received by Mr. Foster was not in this case divided with the other members of the syndicate, but is professed to be held to await the final settlement of their accounts inter se. It is not apparently anywhere on deposit, or earmarked in any tangible form, and its diversion to either the private account of Mr. Foster or to the account of the syndicate was, like that of the $5,000, inconsistent with the trust upon which the funds were held.

Sir, these are the only words now before parliament and before the country. They import that the hon. member for North Toronto has misused a trust of which he was a trustee. Is the hon. gentleman ready to remain under that accusation? Is the Prime Minister, in order apparently to avoid an investigation into the conduct of some of his own colleagues, ready to say that these words from the Insurance Commission are not some of the most damaging words that were ever uttered by a tribunal against any man standing before that tribunal? On the one hand, the hon. gentleman is accused by the commissioners of having formed this syndicate in order to take the trust funds of which he was manager and loan them to himself as a member of the syndicate; secondly, that he has received a commission either from the party that gave him the money to be held in trust, or from the syndicate of which he was a member. This is the summing up by the commission.

Mr. FOSTER. Might I ask my hon. friend to make that statement again, because it was a little confused as it reached my ears, and I would not like it to go that I am assenting to it.

Mr. BOURASSA. I repeat, first—and I am simply giving the opinion of the commissioners as I find it. The commissioners find, first, that the hon. gentleman became a member of a syndicate of four who received money from the Union Trust of which the hon. gentleman was the manager, and bought lands for themselves, for their own profit; and secondly, that during that transaction not only did the hon. gentleman take the money of the trust and gave it to the syndicate of which he was a member, but he received twice during the transaction personal advantage.

Mr. FOSTER. All of which, as contained in my hon. friend's statement, is absolutely a misrepresentation.

Mr. BOURASSA. Does the hon. gentleman claim it is a misrepresentation of the words of the commissioners?

Mr. FOSTER. It is a misrepresentation as the echo, whether it be a true and absolute echo of the commissioners or not.

Mr. BOURASSA. Well, I accept the correction of the hon. gentleman, because I leave it to the judgment of the House if the way in which I have summed up the words of the report is not a faithful echo. I read it three times without forming my judgment upon it, because I waited until the hon. gentleman brought up this report for discussion in the House. I will go further and will say that in justice to the hon. gentleman this House must give him a chance to defend himself.

Now the transaction which has created the most noise and called forth the most damaging comment with regard to several members of the other side, is not the portions of the report which I have just quoted, but it is regarding what is known as the Great West Land Company in which the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Fowler), the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Lefurgey) are concerned. The report goes on to state that in the fall of 1903 Rufus H. Pope, an ex-member of this House, and Mr. G. W. Fowler, M.P. for King's, N.B., commenced negotiations with the Canadian Pacific Railway for the purchase of land on behalf of a syndicate including, with themselves, Messrs. W. H. Bennett and A. Lefurgey.

In their efforts to finance the undertaking, Messrs. Pope and Fowler were brought into communication with some of the persons interested in an Ontario corporation known as the New Ontario Farm and Town Site Syndicate, whose incorporation had taken place on March 25, 1903. There were five shareholders in this corporation, each of whom owned one share of its stock, and it was said to have had some options in connection with lands in Ontario which were not supposed to be of any value. In the course of negotiations between the Pope and Fowler syndicate and this company, under circumstances and for reasons which have not been made clear to the commission, Mr. Foster, the general manager of the Union Trust Company, and Mr. McGillivray and Mr. Wilson, who were directors of the Union Trust Company, found their services enlisted.

It goes on to give the negotiations between the two syndicates.

On May 30, 1903, this conveyance was completed (it is part of exhibit 483). By it Messrs. Pope and Fowler transferred to the Union Trust Company as trustee the right or option to inspect, examine and purchase the lands mentioned in the agreement between Messrs. Pope and Fowler and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company of April 24, 1903, at a price which was to net them a profit of $1 per acre over the $3.50 which they were to pay to the railway company.

By this agreement it was further provided that Messrs. Pope and Fowler were to be paid the $1 per acre, approximately $200,000, profit, $50,000 in stock of the New Ontario Farm and Town Sites Syndicate, and the balance as follows: one-sixth or approximately $25,000 on November 1, 1903, and the rest in five instalments of approximately $25,000 each, payable, —and so on. That is of no importance.

The avowed intention of Messrs. Foster, McGillivray and Wilson from the beginning was to make the profit last named of fifty cents per acre for themselves, and it is difficult to believe that the beneficiaries undisclosed in the agreement of May 30, for whom the Union Trust Company was made trustees were not intended to be Messrs. Foster, McGillivray and Wilson, subject, of course, to their getting in such rights as the old members of the New Ontario syndicate, who had failed to finance their half of the proposition, might still be entitled to maintain.

Mr. Foster thinks that when this agreement was made, on May 30, 1903, and up to June 4, when certain further conveyancing took place, to which reference will be made in a moment, there had been no idea of the Trust C being brought in to advance moneys. He is, however, manifestly mistaken with regard to this, because on June 3, he brought, as manager, before the board of the Union Trust Company, the very proposition that that company should loan to the New Ontario Syndicate a sum not to exceed $140,000, for the manifest purpose of enabling the agreement of May 30 to be carried out.

Then it goes on to recite the resolution and it adds:

When, therefore, the conveyancing of June 4 is approached, it is manifest that the Union Trust Company had become bound to finance the proposition.

—on account of the resolution brought in by the hon. member for North Toronto as manager of the company. The report adds:

There is no reference in the minute to the personal interest of Messrs. Foster, McGillivray and Wilson.

I ask again, can the hon. member for North Toronto leave that report in the public archives of this country, in documents that will be referred to and quoted in generations to come, much more damaging than if they were uttered in the violent language of the popular tribune or in the violent lines of an anonymous article, in words which convey to the mind of anybody who is not familar with the facts, that the hon. gentleman, as manager of a trust company, caused that company to loan money in order to enable him to make a profit for himself without disclosing his connection with the transaction? I say again in justice to the hon. gentleman that we must ask him to make that transaction clear.

Mr. FOSTER. As another mild caveat, if either the hon. member himself makes the statement, or if the commission makes the statement that nothing was disclosed to the Union Trust Company the statement is not true in either case. It may be true that nothing is disclosed on the minutes but there are documents as well as minutes and it is a common practice to refer to documents but not to spread the matter on the minutes. If they make the statement there that because it is not disclosed in the minutes therefore there was no disclosure it is a misrepresentation. They knew that it was disclosed and therefore I say again that it is another misrepresentation.

Mr. BOURASSA. Quite so. If it was disclosed without anything having been written in regard to the matter then I will be most happy to afford the hon. gentleman a chance to prove it. I repeat once more that it is not my conclusion, it is not my judgment, but the words which I have just read from the report which are much more damaging than a straight accusation, because they say there is no evidence that the hon. gentleman ever divulged his private interests to the company. Now, the negotiations went on, and finally the syndicate formed by Mr. Pope and the three hon. gentlemen I have just mentioned agreed with the Union Trust Company and the name of the New Ontario syndicate was changed to the Great West Land Company.

Later in the same month Messrs. Pope and Fowler gave directions to the railway company to convey certain blocks of land in pursuance of the dealings that had taken place.

About the same time Messrs. Pope and Fowler authorized the railway company to convey also 8,640 acres, and the conveyance was accordingly made. The arrangement with regard to this is stated to have been the same as with regard to the other lands, Messrs. Pope and Fowler turning them over directly to the company and receiving a profit of $1 per acre, and Messrs. Foster, McGillivray and Wilson receiving a profit of 50 cents per acre. At this date they were the sole members of the executive committee of the Great West Land Company—having been appointed at a directors' meeting.

And so on.

On the 8th July, 1903, Mr. Foster reported to a meeting of the board of the Great West Land Company—— —that Messrs. Pope and Fowler had some additional land for sale and he is authorized to go on and complete the bargain.

It was thereupon resolved that Mr. Foster be authorized to purchase the additional lands, paying therefor $5 per acre, $1 per acre in stock, paid up and non-assessable, and the balance in six yearly instalments, &c. The arrangement made between Messrs. Pope and Fowler and Mr. Foster with regard to this, and which was carried out, involved Messrs. Pope and Fowler making their profit of $1 and Messrs. Foster, McGillivray and Wilson theirs, of 50 cents per acre, as, in the other case. The minute makes no disclosure whatever of the personal interest of the three members of the executive in the transaction.

They go on further and they say :

It does not appear that the personal interest of these gentlemen would ever have been disclosed had it not been discovered upon an inspection of the stock-book of the Great West Land Company to the production of which vigorous and prolonged objection was made. It should be borne in mind that in this transaction, as well as in the main transaction, the Union Trust Company was finding all the funds necessary to carry the lands.

So, my hon. friend will see that, in the words of the commissioners themselves, we have nothing so far to enable us to form any judgment but that the hon. gentleman is impugned in that he did not disclose this transaction to his principals of the Union Trust Company and that they say it was not made public until an inspection had been made of the stock-book of the Great West Land Company which inspection was resisted for a time.

Mr. FOSTER. Which again is not true.

Mr. BOURASSA. Quite so ; but I am quoting the report. To simplify matters I would suggest that every time the hon. gentleman wants to make an objection to the report he should make it. Whenever he thinks that in my summary I go beyond the words of my report he will please indicate it to me. The report goes on to say that Mr. Stevenson, one of the directors of the Union Trust Company, became alarmed at these transactions and brought the matter up for discussion in order to find out whether it would not be better for the Union Trust Company to exchange their position as holders of the land and become mortgagees. There are various transactions and various meetings, but strange to say, and here again I wish the House to note the guarded and half disclosed words of the commissioners, the resolution which authorized the transaction is said to have been passed, and it is also stated that there is no evidence that the directors were present.

The directors' attendance book contains no record of a meeting of this date, nor any signature of directors.

Undoubtedly a mortgage was prepared and executed, and undoubtedly a formal release and abandonment of all the stock representing advances was also prepared and executed. Nor is it at all in doubt that a formal assignment by the company and by the president, Dr. Oronhyatekha, was made to Messrs. Foster, McGillivray and Wilson of the 237½ and 100 shares respectively.

Here are lines that do not contain any violent words, but the significance of the suggestion, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) cannot let pass without having it probed.

The 337½ shares were divided with practical equality between Messrs. Foster, McGillivray and Wilson.

None of the three gentlemen concerned seem to have seen any impropriety in taking part in the discussion at the board of the Union Trust Company of a question in which their interests were so vitally opposed to those of the Trust Company.

And here again I ask, can this statement pass to the country under the sanction of parliament, without the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) having an inquiry put through ? How can the Prime Minister now say, that the commissioners have found nothing against anybody ?

Now in the conclusion of that report, the commissioners say :

Your commissioners have no doubt that accumulated insurance funds are, in every essential particular, trust funds. They belong to the policy-holders and not to the shareholders. The directors are not in possession of them as trading capital in any sense or to any degree. They are not subject to trading risk. They are held in trust for investment and to be enventually paid to those whose moneys they are. Being trust funds the function of the directors in regard to them is the function of trustee. Once the subject is put upon this simple basis the criterion for determining the propriety of any particular dealing by the directors with these funds also becomes simple. Ought a trustee to do this with trust funds ? Once this is recognized as the test, all difficulty disappears.

If the concentration or individualizing of control is made the means of diverting the trust funds from the trust purpose, even temporarily, this fundamental law is broken. If vehicles of investment which are outside the statute governing investments are employed, the law is broken. If permitted vehicles of investment are employed to aid the private interests of the trustee, the law is broken again. No trustee is permitted to occupy a dual position with regard to his trust. He cannot be upon both sides of a transaction.

Don't you see the three little letters of the name 'Cox' painted in there ?

No director should be permitted to have any personal interest whatever whether as principal, agent or beneficiary in any property which is the subject of investment by his company, or in any of his company's transactions. Underwritings and syndicates for the handling of securities should be forbidden altogether. Nor should there be any dealing between an insurance company and any other company of which any director of the insurance company is a shareholder.

We have the statement of the commissioners, that the Union Trust Fund was nothing else than the Order of Foresters; that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was the manager of that Trust Fund, and that he lent money to syndicates in which he was interested, and that besides he received a commission. How can the Prime Minister now stand before the country and say that there is no finding in this report?

Now, Sir, what more could be expected from that commission? It was not a Court of Assize. When the Prime Minister told me on the 21st of February that we had better wait until the report came down, did he expect that these commissioners would act as a grand jury and say: We convict the member of North Toronto as being unworthy of his trust. That was not the business of the commission. The business of the commission was to investigate where the money of the Forester's Insurance Society went. They did so, and with respect to the company with which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) was connected they say, that it was improperly dealt with both with regard to the kind of investments, and to the interest the manager of the Trust had in these investments. Of course nobody expected that this insurance report ought to be legislated upon this session. However, I may say here in the names of hundreds of thousands and millions of policy-holders in Canada, that there is certainly as much necessity for insurance legislation this session, as there is for the Minister of the Interior bringing down, four months after parliament is convened, a Bill having for its object the revision of all the laws governing the lands of Canada for twenty years past.

But, leaving aside the question of legislation, it is not so much legislation that is expected from parliament and from the government. What the people interested in insurance companies expect from us, is, that we will show a strong hand in the inspection of the companies. What justice can be expected from a parliament and from a government, the leader of which says, in face of this report that there is no finding against a single member of parliament? Sir, if the Prime Minister should oppose investigation now, if the Prime Minister does not give the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) a chance to clear himself, or, if he should call on parliament to support him in absolving the member for North Toronto, what confidence can the people of Canada have in the justice of this government or in the justice of this parliament? What relief can the policy-holders expect, if in the face of a report presented by commissioners named by this government, stating that one member of parliament has been untrue to his trust, this parliament should say: we absolve that member in order that we may avoid an inquiry into matters that have nothing to do with insurance. That would be of bad omen indeed for the insurance policy-holders of Canada. I present this matter in the same light to the government and the opposition, to the Liberal party and to the Conservative party, and I say, that if you leave the matter as it stands now, the saying to-morrow will be: That Senator Cox and Mr. Foster have paired, and that the pair has been accepted by the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. It is the first time we ever paired.

Mr. BOURASSA. It may be, and it is a very bad occasion to commence pairing, and, so far as the public reputation of these two gentlemen is concerned, it would be the last time they would ever have the chance to pair because they would disappear very soon from public life.

I have not yet touched the case of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler), of the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) and of the hon. member for Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Lefurgey). When the right hon. gentleman stated the other day that we must await the report of the Insurance Commission, and when he stated later on that he found nothing in that report, he could not have in mind those three hon. gentlemen, because if the Insurance Commission had as part of its duty to report either for or against the member for North Toronto as manager of a Trust Company, they had no business whatever to report against these three hon. gentlemen. The way these three hon. gentlemen came to the front, is simply as stated by Mr. Shepley, when he said, in reply to the objection raised by the hon. member for King's:

> We are not trying to impugn you, but we want to know what has become of the money of the Independent Order of Foresters.

And, in looking to what had become of that money, they found that the hon. member for King's, the hon. member for East Simcoe, and the hon. member for Prince, P.E.I. had received some of that money.

Mr. BENNETT. Will the hon. gentleman please state in what part of the evidence it is shown that I received from the Union Trust Company or from any person else, the $6,000 of my own money I put in that transaction?

Mr. BOURASSA. I will explain that in a moment, and my hon. friend will find that I am not at all trying to deal unfairly with his conduct.

I will explain that in a moment, and my hon. friend will find that I am not at all trying to commit him. I say that Mr. Shepley wanted to see what had been done with the investment. It was found that in the transaction which had taken place between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and these hon. gentlemen, and between that syndicate and the Union Trust Company, these hon. gentlemen sold to the Union Trust Company at a higher price certain lands which they had purchased from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. As far as that is concerned, I immediately say to my hon. friend that I do not see any impropriety in it. Again, as in the case of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), as in the case of the Hon. Senator Cox, I have not come here to charge these hon. gentlemen. But what has happened? That evidence had scarcely gone to print before the whole Liberal press of the country took it up and branded those three hon. gentlemen as being unworthy of seats in this House. Let us lay aside, if you like, the accusations which were made before this session; but since the opening of this session, indeed, in this month of March, the Montreal 'Herald,' one of the most respectable organs of public opinion in this country, although a party organ, one that has always been regarded as an impartial one among the party papers, has published eight or nine articles, in which it accuses in so many words the hon. member for North Toronto, the hon. member for King's, N.B., the hon. member for East Simcoe and the hon. member for Prince, P.E.I., of improper conduct, of having concocted together and completed one of the greatest pieces of graft that was ever committed in this country; and in four of these articles doubt is expressed as to the ability of three at least of these gentlemen to hold seats in this House, because, as it says, it seems as if they had accepted favours from Mr. Daniel Mann in order to have their transaction completed, and had repaid that service by opposing the Grand Trunk Pacific Bill. Now, Sir, these are no ordinary accusations. These are no more the accusation that these hon. gentlemen have taken money from the Independent Order of Foresters. We have the direct charge that they have received favours from a railway magnate who has to deal with this parliament every day, and the 'Herald' asks with what favours they have been repaid that service. But, Sir, leaving aside the Montreal 'Herald,' I will take up a paper which is justly considered, or at least claimed by many people to be, the most honest paper in Canada, a paper which, although usually siding with the Liberal party, is considered by every one to be entirely self-supporting and to be imbued with high ideals of morality and justice; I mean the Montreal 'Daily Witness,' which, in its issue of the 12th of March last, had the following remarks with regard to this transaction:

The original speculators, Messrs. Fowler, Bennett, Lefurgey and Pope, turned over the land in a few weeks to a syndicate, the members of which were Messrs. Foster, McGillivray and Wilson, at a price of $4.50 an acre, thus netting the considerable sum of two hundred thousand dollars. It was stated, however, before the Insurance Commission, that at the very time the Foster-McGillivray syndicate was paying the Fowler-Bennett syndicate $4.50 an acre, another syndicate, composed of Messrs. Foster, Montague and Dr. Oronhyatekha, was purchasing similar land from the Canadian Pacific at $3.50 an acre. It is clear that Mr. Foster was either, as member of the syndicate, paying a dollar too much for the Fowler-Bennett-Pope land, or as a member of another syndicate paying a dollar an acre under the market price. If the latter is true, what was the quid pro quo expected by the Canadian Pacific from these Conservative gentlemen? If, on the other hand, he paid the Fowler-Bennett-Pope crowd two hundred thousand dollars more than their land was worth, then, the shareholders of the Union Trust Company, whose money Mr. Foster was dealing with, are clearly that much out of pocket. A parliamentary inquiry should not only clear up these points, but should bring to light other matters that are now only hinted at.

Mr. FOSTER. Will my hon. friend allow me a remark on that?

Mr. BOURASSA. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. If he is friendly to the 'Witness,' he has scarcely done it a good turn by reading that article, but he has certainly done me and I think this House a good turn. I imagine that my hon. friend would take this view from that, that I, standing in one place, was on the one hand paying a dollar more in respect of lands than I could purchase them for at the very same time, standing in another place, from the same quarter. This is the fact, is it not?

Mr. BOURASSA. Yes, that is the fact as stated by the 'Witness.'

Mr. FOSTER. There is absolutely not a modicum of truth in that statement. I was buying other lands at that time, and whereas I paid the Pope-Fowler-Bennett syndicate $4.25 in cash, together with 25 cents in stock, $4.50 in all, I was paying at the very same time between $4.90 and $5.25 for lands not a bit better. There is absolutely such a misrepresentation in that that one wonders why so reputable a journal, without looking into the facts of the case, would put it into its sheet.

Mr. BOURASSA. Mr. Speaker, I am most happy at the interruption of the hon. gentleman, as I shall be at any interruption he makes, because every time he gets up he simply proves my contention that this matter should be cleared up. Last year or two years ago the hon. gentleman thought he owed it to his dignity as a member of parliament and as a public man to bring to the bar of the House a young man who occupied, after all, not such a responsible position in the press of the country, because forsooth he had accused the hon. gentleman of saying things disagreeable to the French-Canadians and the Catholics. For six months past the whole ministerial press of the country has been charging the hon. gentleman with being untrue to his trust, with being a dishonest man, with being unworthy of a seat in this parliament; and yet the representatives of these journals have not been haled before the bar of this House. I do not know that the editor of the 'Witness' has received a single assignation from the hon. gentleman to appear before a court to answer for this most damaging statement; the hon. gentleman says it is not true, but he has done nothing to punish the writer of it. If my hon. friend will prosecute him, perhaps he will avoid the necessity of taking off his hat and getting up to make explanations. I am speaking most earnestly, because up to this time, in spite of political differences, I have always looked upon the hon. gentleman as one of the leading men of this country, and my earnest hope was that after the statement the hon. gentleman had made before the Commission on Insurance, he was going to appeal to parliament. I expected him to appeal to parliament. He may have had good reasons for not doing so, and he will no doubt state them; but so far he has not appealed to parliament. But it is never too late, Sir; it is never too late for a man of the standing of my hon. friend to take advantage of an opportunity to clear his honour; and therefore I quite understand that under the circumstances he has not taken the trouble to call before the bar of the House the journalists who have accused him of so many nefarious deeds, though he did it on one occasion in regard to statements far less detrimental to his honour. I take for granted, therefore, in view of the statements which the hon. gentleman has made this afternoon, in view of his contradiction of the findings of the commission, in view of his contradiction of the charges in the Montreal 'Witness,' that he will be the first man to stand up and support me in my proposal to have an inquiry that will give him all the opportunity he desires, to reinstate himself in that position to which, laying aside all party differences, I shall be most happy and proud to see him return.

Now, Sir, what happened in this House? I do not think I exaggerate when I state that many weeks before parliament was called together, not only did the public at large expect that this would be one of the first questions to be taken up, not only did the public expect that swords would be drawn before long and that blood would be spilt, but members of the House expected it. It was the current rumour in the lobby—the hon. member for East Simcoe has stated it. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) has said it. It was current rumour. The first thing that seemed to indicate this as part of the ministerial programme was the statement made by the hon. member for Wright (Mr. E. B. Devlin), in the discussion on the address, that he was greatly surprised to see the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) in his seat—that, after the revelations which had been made, he thought that the hon. gentleman would never have the audacity to take his seat in this House.

Mr. FOSTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA. Some time later, on the 7th of February, the member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) referred to that land speculation with which the names of the hon. member for King's (Mr. (Fowler), the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Lefurgey) have been connected. He was immediately challenged by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) to proceed with his charges, and I repeat that I am glad to find that at every juncture of this unfortunate affair, that hon. gentleman is perhaps the one who has shown the most courage and who has always demanded an investigation. On the 21st of February the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) again challenged the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell). What did that hon. gentleman reply? He said—and I am not saying he was wrong—that he had no charge to make but that the matter was one of public notoriety. On the 19th of February the hon. member for Yale-Carriboo (Mr. Ross) challenged the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler), and then came the explosion. Since that time what has become of the whole campaign which had been carried on for six months in the various ministerial papers? What has become of all those threats? What has become of all those investigations which were threatened? When is that general clearing up to take place, which was announced so many weeks and months before parliament met? At the outset the right hon. the first minister said the matter was so grave that the session could not pass without its being investigated. The leader of the opposition endorsed that stand, although to my mind he was not clear enough, because he confined his statement too much to gentlemen on his side of the House. It had however this queer result that it got the Prime Minister to take under his protection hon. members on the other side. After the whole ministerial press and several members on the government side had announced that they were going to bring these hon. gentlemen before the bar of public opinion, there was dead silence and those hon. members found shelter under the maternal wings of the First Minister. Is it surprising that the impression should prevail in the country that there has been a saw-off in this business?

Now I want to make myself clear and be fair to the right hon. gentleman as well as those whose names have been connected with the matter. I am ready to help them in destroying that impression, but if that is not done to-day, and done completely, the impression will prevail to the great detriment of public honour in this country. It has been stated of late that there is nothing to investigate. Of course I admit that we cannot touch Senator Cox in this House; but it is the duty of the government, acting through its members in the other House, to have that gentleman brought before his peers and clear himself or stand the result of an inquiry. With regard to the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) it may be said, as was said lately in a ministerial paper, the Montreal 'Herald,' that his dealings with the Independent Order of Foresters are not subject to the authority of this House. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) himself said the other day that if he had some dealings with a grocery store, that would be no business of the parliament of Canada. I agree with him, but after the attitude taken by parliament last year, after that Royal Commission issued to those three gentlemen to investigate into the operations of insurance companies, the insurance business of Canada is no more in the same category as that of a grocery store. The parliament of Canada has taken upon itself the responsibility of making good to the hundreds of thousands of Canadian citizens who hold insurance policies that they will be protected against such practices as the commissioners appointed by the government claim the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) has been guilty of. Those commissioners have reported against the hon. gentleman and have strongly advised this House to make it impossible for such things to happen in the future. Are you going to inspire confidence in the people of Canada by saying now: Yes, we are going to commit all the insurance managers, but we will blind ourselves and see no finding against the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster)? We will preserve him in our ranks because forsooth if we did not, that might result in some damaging business in our own ranks being inquired into. This is no mere trade question or party question. We have taken upon ourselves the responsibility of controlling the insurance business. Two things must be done. We cannot base action on this report; we cannot pass judgment on the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) but must give him the fullest opportunity that can be found under British justice and British parliamentary procedure. If we want to be taken seriously by the people of Canada, if we want to inspire confidence in the pepole, if we mean to do what we have promised with regard to the insurance business, we must, before everything else, deal with the case of the hon. member who has been connected with that business, which is no longer private business but the business of parliament.

But, as I have said, this commission of inquiry was not appointed for the purpose of impeaching any member of parliament. This inquiry had for its object an investigation into the operations of all the insurance companies. The name of an hon. gentleman was connected with one of them, and the result of the inquiry is the report I have quoted. The result of that report is those articles which have appeared in the press from time to time within the last six months. The result of that inquiry is also the statements which have been made in this House. And I claim we have gone either too far or not far enough. We must go further and give the hon. gentleman ample opportunity to justify himself before the people of Canada, because everything which touches the honour of any member of this House, especially an ex-minister of the Crown, touches the honour of the people. I shall be most happy if the hon. gentleman can refute the report of this commission, but he cannot stand under that report, and parliament cannot stand silent and motionless under the accusations made against him.

I immediately agree that the question which arises with regard to the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) cannot be raised with regard to the three other hon. members named in the report. They are not and they cannot be accused of having been untrue to a trust, which I claim is now a public trust, since we have taken upon ourselves to deal with the insurance business. But the direct accusation made against those hon. gentlemen by various newspapers and carried over the whole country is that they received special favours either from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or from one of the directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company; and a straight charge is made against them by at least one government newspaper, that on account of that they have lost their right to their seats in this House. How can we know if that is true or not unless an inquiry is held, not for the purpose of bringing to light these transactions as the Insurance Commissioners brought them to light, but in order to see whether the comments based on that report are or are not true? We are bound, every time a public document leaves a suspicion as to the honour of a member of parliament, as long as this public evidence remains there uncontradicted, to give a chance to these hon. gentlemen to clear themselves. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has twice during this season required the investigation to take place. The hon. member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Lefurgey) has made the same statement, asking for an inquiry. Therefore, I say that in justice to these hon. gentlemen we must of necessity either give them a chance to clear themselves or we must find out whether or not the accusations sent broadcast both within and without this House by supporters of the government that these gentlemen are unworthy of seats in this House, are true; the accusations should be probed to the bottom, and if they are true these members should be treated accordingly.

It has been asked, and will probably be repeated to-night: Why do you not make a charge yourself? Why do you not take the risk? I shall be perfectly candid with the House and with the government; I am not going to give to the government or to the opposition a chance of making me the scapegoat in this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BOURASSA. I know very well that it would have been most tasteful for several members of this House to say: All right, we will give you a committee; then proceed with your charges. Mr. Speaker, I have some knowledge of the parliamentary history of my country, and I know very well that when a government wants to block an inquiry it can always do it—and this has been done in the past. I know very well that when the whole Liberal party attempted to bring to task an ex-Minister of Public Works and the member for Quebec West, in the late Conservative government, they would never have succeeded had they not been helped publicly and privately by members of the Conservative government, who gave them papers to go on, and then lent them the help of the Justice Department to complete their investigation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BOURASSA. But there is more than that. On the one hand there are those accusations against the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), the member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), the member for King's (Mr. Fowler) and the member from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Lefurgey). What are those charges? Are they of the kind of personal charges which must be made by one member of parliament in order that the public and parliament may be made cognizant of the facts? No, Sir; the charges that are made are to be found in the interpretation to be put on public documents, and in this I agree with the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell), that this is not a case of personal insinuation or charge, it is a matter of public notoriety, and that matter has been made public because of the action of parliament, for parliament has instituted that commission of inquiry; these facts have come to light, and it is the duty of parliament to complete its own work, as far as its honour is concerned, as far as the standing of these gentlemen is concerned; and, therefore, I say it is the duty of parliament to proceed with the investigation.

There is more than that. If the charges were made, if personal charges would be required, they ought to be made by such men as have the same opinion of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) as that held by the hon. member for Wright (Mr. E. B. Devlin) and as the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) has of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler), because the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) has never retracted what he stated any more than the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) has retracted his charges. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) has stated that he had no charge to make, because it was a matter of public notoriety, but that he was ready to pass judgment on the member for King's as soon as a committee was instituted.

Now, Sir, I go further. The campaign which has been conducted in the press of the country for the last six months has put public opinion in such a state of enervation and suspicion that it is not only the accusation of this man against that man that must be probed, but there is a demand for a general inquiry as to the conduct of any member of parliament or any member of the government against whom charges are insinuated daily in the corridors of the House, or on the street, or through the columns of the newspapers, by people who apparently know enough to brand these men as unworthy of seats in this House, but who have nothing to say of them in public. For my part, I know nothing else beyond what there is on public record, and, if that is needed, I am ready to state now that so far as the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and the member for King's (Mr. Fowler) are concerned, I believe that they at least stand committed, on the documents that are before the House, in such a way that parliament must go further; there need not be any more personal charges, and the government should take the responsibility of holding and conducting the inquiry, and should not leave it to the personal charge of a member of this House.

There is more than that. I say the government should take hold of this, and the machinery of the Department of Justice must be put into action in this matter, because otherwise it will be a farcical inquiry like many that have taken place in this House; and unless the machinery of the government, the machinery of the Department of Justice, is to be called into action and made to work with all earnestness and all good faith, nothing will come out of the investigation.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend really seriously suggest that the Minister of Justice should be set to investigate me?

Mr. BOURASSA. No, I did not say that——

Mr. FOSTER. Or his machinery?

Mr. BOURASSA—but I claim that if the committee is appointed and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) is brought on trial there, that the legal officers of the Department of Justice should be at the disposal of that committee just as they were at a time that a colleague of my hon. friend was brought before a committee, I mean the Minister of Public Works in the last Conservative government, of which my hon. friend was a member. Does my hon. friend object to that? Does he claim that the government of which he was a member then acted unfairly? I claim they acted properly, and the Conservative party have always claimed credit for having done all in their power to let the full light into that matter. Why should they be laughed at by one of those whose name is impugned, because we know that the government can act in such a way as to throw light upon such a subject of inquiry. I have stated that in the case of the late government, not only was the legal machinery of the government placed at the disposal of parliament in order that light should be thrown on the subject, but some members of the government went as far as to betray themselves in order to get rid of an old colleague, of whom they were tired, and of whom they wanted to make a scapegoat.

A strange thing is the attitude taken by the government organs on this matter. 'Le Canada,' the organ of the government, the representative of the government in Montreal, came out the other day with an article saying, in substance: Why have an inquiry? We rest satisfied, we Liberals are satisfied that the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) should remain under the suspicion which the records of the commission throw upon him; if he wants an inquiry made, let him ask for it; all we want—it amounts to this—is that we should be free to go and slander the member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), the member for King's (Mr. Fowler) and their confrères, as we have done so long, and we have no interest in asking that there should be light shed on these subjects.

Sir, I say that public opinion is not at all satisfied with what has been done and will not be satisfied until this matter has been ventilated. I note a strange coincidence: the difference in attitudes, the difference between ferocious attacks that have been made during the last six months against the members of the opposition, and the present mild attitude on the ministerial benches where they seem ready to allow these gentlemen to go scot-free, coinciding with the attack that was made by the member for King's (Mr. Fowler), his threat that if the war was carried on against these gentlemen he would make himself clear. Now what were the words the member for King's used? First of all, the right hon. gentleman on the 8th of March, said that there was nothing, so to speak, in the statement of the member for King's:

He did not mention any name, he did not mention any offence, he spoke in a general way, and I am at a loss to know at the present moment what charges there are to be investigated.

Now let us compare the judgment of the Prime Minister with the words of the hon. member for King's. The first shot was aimed at the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Duncan Ross):

Go on; tell us the whole story. Let us have the whole story, and we will show your connection with Mr. Hill.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. With reference to the statement just read by the hon. gentleman, I have given it an emphatic and categorical denial in this House. The hon. gentleman cannot repeat it under the protection that it had been made previously by another hon. gentleman in this House. He must either make it on his own responsibility as a member of this House, or not make it at all, or not even read it at all.

Mr. BOURASSA. My hon. friend has gone a little ahead of time. He must not be in such a hurry as the hon. member for North Toronto was, because if he had waited five minutes I was going to tell him——

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. No. I want to keep the hon. gentleman straight.

Mr. SPEAKER. Is it a point of order?

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I rise to a point of order. If hon. gentlemen opposite desire to allow the member for Labelle to go on under the protection that the statement he is reading has been made by another hon. gentleman, I do not propose to allow him to do so. I have denied that statement and the hon. gentleman has no right to repeat it now unless he does so on his own responsibility as a member of this House.

Mr. BOURASSA. I am not only glad to satisfy my hon. friend, but it is necessary for my argument that I should read his statement, and I am going to read it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the point of order is well taken, that an hon. gentleman having denied a statement in the House, it should not be repeated in the House.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I am prepared to let the hon. gentleman read that statement, but if he does he must read it on his own responsibility as a member of this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The member for Yale-Cariboo must either take a point of order or not. If he takes a point of order, I have already given my ruling upon it.

Mr. BOURASSA. If I may be permitted to explain myself——

Mr. SPEAKER. I think no further explanation can be made now after the ruling has been given.

Mr. BOURASSA. May I be allowed to prove that the statement made by the right hon. gentleman that there were no names and no offences mentioned in the language of the hon. member for King's is disproved by the words of the hon. member for King's himself, especially in view of the fact that the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo has denied the statement containing names and offences? The argument I want to make is, not that the hon. member for King's has made a charge, but that the right hon. gentleman has made a mistake.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point raised was that the statement made by the member for King's concerning the member for Yale-Cariboo having been denied by the latter, it cannot be repeated, and that is my ruling.

Mr. BOURASSA. Well, then I must take another course; anyway the statement is there. But the member for King's also says that he will 'give the true inside of the Hyman story.' Here is a name, here is a fact; what does it mean? I do not know what it means. How can I make a charge upon these words? Do I know what the member for King's had in his mind when he used these words? What is the true inside of the Hyman story? A minister of the Crown resigns and goes to the south for his health. He is asked by the Prime Minister to retain his seat in the Cabinet. Various transactions and sessions of a committee go on for three months, and the hon. member for London, or the Minister of Public Works is still where he was at the beginning. And here is a member of parliament standing up in this House saying that he knows the true inside of the Hyman story. What that means I do not know. Is it a matter of private concern or is it a matter of public concern? Does he mean that the Minister of Public Works has been derelict in his duties, or that he has been guilty of improper conduct? I do not know; the member for King's knows, and unless the member for King's is given an opportunity of formulating his charges we should not know. And although the Prime Minister has said that the member for King's has made no statement of fact, yet it goes to the public that the member for King's knows the true and unrevealed reason why the Minister of Public Works has tendered his resignation. More than that, the hon. member stated:

> I shall allow no man to make an attack on me or on my character without retorting. I shall discuss the character of hon. members opposite, whether they be ministers of the Crown or private members, and their connection with women, wine and graft.

Is this not an accusation, Mr. Speaker? Is there no fact mentioned here? It is exactly because the accusation is general that it is the most damaging. Of which minister or ministers is it true? It is either true or it is untrue. If it is untrue, can the Prime Minister allow for a moment this damaging accusation to hang over the heads of his colleagues? And if it is true will he allow suspicion such as that to hang over two ministers of the Crown as hon. ourable as those in front of me, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Finance? Now, Mr. Speaker, I claim that in this statement there is not only one of the most damaging accusations that has ever been made against public men, but it is all the more damaging because of the lack of definition in it. It may apply to any one, it may apply to twenty, it may apply to thirty. Although hon. members of this House may be disposed to dismiss it with a laugh, I may tell them that in their laugh there is a trace of cynicism which the people of Canada will resent from this time until the charges have been cleared up. If you think that this matter is going to be settled by a mutual laugh on both sides of the House, I think you are greatly mistaking the morality of the people of Canada. Now, not only did the member for King's make this accusation, but he stated that he had material, that he had been gathering data, and this is what makes his charge entirely different from any other charge or insinuations that have ever been made in this House by a public man.

Now, I have been warned that my hon. friend from King's, N.B., was going to go for me—such is the usual expression—because I may have on this occasion or on that occasion, thrown suspicion upon this member of the government or that member of the government. Well, Sir, I will be ready to take up that question whenever it comes along. I will not oppose any rule of order as my hon. friend from Yale tried to do this afternoon. I am ready to have it discussed at any time. I am not going to plead innocence in regard to violence of debate. Each of us, perhaps with a very few exceptions, has indulged in some violent language here or there; but the material difference—and I wish the House to remember this—between a common charge or a common insinuation that may have been made in this House and the present one is that the hon. member for King's says: I have the material, I have the data which I will bring to light if you attack me. Then, on the other hand, the right hon. Prime Minister gets up and says: There is nothing against hon. gentlemen on that side of the House and I find nothing in the words of the hon. member for King's. If the intelligent press and the intelligent people of this country take this as a proposal to saw-off in order to prevent the culprits from being known, or in order to prevent accusations from being further ventilated, it is not my fault and it is not the fault of any member of this House, or rather it is not the fault of any one who has so far remained silent on this question. It is certainly borne out and more than proved by the words of the hon. member for King's and the attitude of the Prime Minister.

Now, Sir, it may be said and I have stated in this House that accusations of immoral conduct are not perhaps within the jurisdiction of this House. I must say that when I made that statement I was entirely ignorant of what may have been in the mind of the hon. member for King's. I may say, whether rightly or wrongly, that I do not come into frequent contact with ministers of the Crown and perhaps that is one of the reasons why I did not understand what the hon. member for King's had in his mind. But, Sir, rumours are going all over the city of Ottawa, and insinuations are made right and left in the corridors of the House by members of parliament and by outsiders. I do not want to believe them, I hope they are untrue, but if one-half of them be true it is not only the right but it is the imperative duty of the government to intervene.

In regard to the morality of any minister of the Crown here again as in many other instances my guiding principle is the one which has been applied for many years past in the conduct of the government in Great Britain ; and the principle in regard to the morality of any British Minister of the Crown is the one which William Ewart Gladstone adopted and applied in the case of a man far abler and far more useful to the people of Great Britain than can be any minister of the Crown who has been cited as being in the stocks, and that man was Sir Charles Dilke. Sir, if half of what is circulated around the corridors of this House is true—I do not know whether it is true or is not true—but if half of it is true I say that it is the duty of the Prime Minister to interfere as Mr. Gladstone had to interfere with the private conduct and private life of Sir Charles Dilke, and if the Prime Minister is remiss in his duty it is up to this House to know the truth from the man who has the data and material to give and to see that justice shall be done. Otherwise it is not only three or four men who will be held in the stocks but it is the whole government, the whole majority of this House that will be held in the stocks by the public opinion of Canada because they do not want the truth to be known and the culprits to be punished. Again, it may be said that there is nothing to investigate, because, in the words of the hon. member for King's, there are no names given and no personal references. I do not know if the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Duncan Ross) will again raise a point of order, but his name having been mentioned, and he having denied in the most undoubted terms the accusation which was made against him, does he think that is all that is necessary or does he not wish the hon. member for King's to retract his statement ? Is it sufficient that the public and the House should judge as between the affirmation of the hon. member for King's and the denial of the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo ? It may be sufficient to comply with the rules of the House but it is not sufficient for public opinion and my hon. friend must understand that if he is what I hold him to be, an honourable public man, he cannot leave matters in this way and he must ask the hon. member for King's either to retract or prove.

In regard to the Hyman story too, I claim that it is the duty of the government not only towards their colleagues but towards the people of the country at large, if the hon. member for King's had anything in his mind—and perhaps he had nothing—to prove it. The hon. member for King's is known not to be a coward. If the hon. member for King's would get up and say : I spoke in a moment of excitement and I withdraw that statement because I know it is not true as it was simply uttered in a moment of excitement, everybody would forgive him. But, if he really knows or has any reason to believe that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Hyman) is not a worthy member of this House or of this government, if he knows that the Prime Minister is not acting properly towards his colleague the Minister of Public Works, he should be called upon at once to make his word good and give us the 'true inside of the story.'

In regard to the general accusation about wine, women and graft, I claim that if any ministers of the Crown—the truth of which accusation I do not know, and I am only giving general facts—are connected with wine and women in such a way that it has become a matter of public scandal, if they have used the property of the government to carry on their profligate acts, if they have been put out of hotels and public places of amusement because they have been guilty of misconduct with women, and if anybody has a knowledge of these facts he must make them public. If I had the least particle of evidence I would make a charge, but I have not. But I repeat that it is a scandal if the government and parliament do not take any action and do not see that a purification takes place.

Now, Sir, in regard to graft ; it is no more a question of personal conduct. It is a question of public interest. In regard to morals, of course it may be that the standard of morality is not as high in this country as it is in England. It is here stated and it is a fair point of view to take that if it be that the people of Canada do not insist upon the standard of morality that prevails in England we have no business to inquire into that matter. I am ready to agree with the judgment of the House as far as that is concerned, but I do not believe that the people of Canada have not the same standard of morality in regard to their public men, and in this I agree with the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) who said himself recently in speaking of the public men of this country that you cannot entirely disconnect the private and the public life of a man. There are many things in the private life of a man that should not be investigated and especially in regard to the life of a private member of parliament who is responsible only to his electors. I agree that his electors may properly be his judges, but I say in regard to a minister of the Crown that it is up to the Prime Minister, it is up to the leader of the government to see that his cabinet is composed of men who are a credit to his party, a credit to the country and who cannot be cited as being the cause of scandal before the country. Why should these things be the subject of a personal charge ? I cannot make a charge. If I knew, I state again, that I would make a charge. If I had a tittle of evidence in my posession I would make a charge. But the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) has made a charge ; he has stated he had the data, he has stated he had the material. I am not ready to say to the hon. member for King's, as one newspaper said, that if he excuses himself and does not reveal what he has declared he can reveal, he should be branded as a coward or a slanderer. I would not go that far. I am not disposed in this matter to be violent with the accusers or the accused. All I say is, that both the accusers and the accused should be brought before a committee of this House, so that the truth may be known, so that justice may be rendered to whom justice is due, whether it be for their vindication or for their condemnation. What I claim is that these exchanges of charges and insinuations have been spread so broadcast, and have been so bandied about by newspapers representing the different parties, that it is no longer a question of personal accusations by a few men against another few men ; it is a question of the necessity of the parliament of Canada vindicating its own honour and the reputation of our public men.

Of course, it may be questioned whether the form of procedure of parliament does not require that a specific charge should be made; but my answer is, that things have gone beyond that point when legal quibbling and equivocation about parliamentary procedure should intervene to stop inquiry. The making of a personal charge is an excellent idea when a member of parliament may know a thing of his own knowledge. But, when we have to inquire into a matter of public notoriety, as in the case of the four opposition members whose names have been published far and wide in the Liberal newspapers, it is no longer a case of making a personal charge, it is a case of inquiring into a matter which has become publicly notorious. In the case of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) it is no longer a question of a personal charge, because we do not know what is in the mind of the hon. gentleman ; we do not know whom he wants to attack ; we do not know what he wants to charge against them, and unless he is given an opportunity to make his charge, parliament will rest under that cloud of suspicion which has been raised throughout the country.

Now, Sir, not only should that inquiry be held by parliament under the authority of parliament, and not only should the government take the initiative in the matter, but the inquiry should be broad enough so that every one who has a clear statement to make against any minister of the Crown or against any member of the House, should be at liberty to come before that committee and to make his statement, provided of course his statement is supported by evidence and that the charge is one which the House has jurisdiction to hear. If the House leaves this unfortunate affair to stand as it is at present, it is going to be made a party tune for both sides of politics. Liberal newspapers and Liberal stumpers will keep on charging the members that have been named on the other side of the House ; and the Conservative press will keep on stating that the member for King's was courageous enough to threaten the government and that the government had not the courage to take up the challenge, because the case of the Liberal members was so bad that they were afraid to persist in the accusations which their own newspapers and their own speakers had hurled against their opponents for so many months. What the public opinion of Canada requires is not an inquiry so that both parties may find enough mud to throw at each other, but a thorough inquiry which will enlighten public opinion, and which will enable parliament to maintain its reputation by punishing the culprits and absolving the innocent. It may be said that it is too late in the session for such an inquiry. That argument is not good. It is never too late for the parliament of Canada to redeem its honour. It is never too late for the government of Canada to ask parliament to support it in vindicating its honour. It is said that the Prime Minister must go to England. Whatever our personal opinions may be as to the necessity of the Prime Minister going to England, every true Canadian must believe that the Prime Minister cannot represent the people of Canada at the imperial conference while general accusations of graft and corruption stand against the fair name of Canada and her parliament. The Prime Minister cannot go to London with the session adjourned in a hasty manner, so that these accusations which have been made public and scattered broadcast and which have been repeated in this House by members of parliament, should remain uninvestigated and left to be forgotten, nobody exculpated, and nobody punished, and the parliament of Canada retaining its honour only because of the gag. The truth must be known; it must be known now, and therefore I move seconded by the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Armand Lavergne):

That the report of the Royal Commission on Life Insurance and the evidence connected therewith have made public various transactions in which members of this House participated—namely, the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), the hon. member for King's, New Brunswick (Mr. Fowler), the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), the hon. member for Prince, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Lefurgey);

That such transactions have been commented upon, by several organs of public opinion, in terms reflecting upon the honour, the integrity and the independence of the above-named gentlemen;

That references to such transactions have been made in this House, during the present session,—namely, by the hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell), on the 7th and 21st days of February, and by the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Ross), on the 19th day of February—in terms indicating that, in the opinion of those two hon. gentlemen, the above-named hon. members are guilty of improper conduct;

That on the 26th day of November last, the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin) referred to the hon. member for North Toronto as being unworthy of a seat in this House, on account of the transactions above-mentioned;

That on the 19th of February last, the hon. member for King's, New Brunswick (Mr. Fowler), addressing the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Ross), stated: 'We will show your connection with Mr. Hill—and we will give you the true inside of the Hyman story too,' and added, 'I shall discuss the character of hon. members opposite, whether they be ministers or private members, and their connection with women, wine and graft';

That these statements have become a matter of general comment and have aroused public opinion throughout the country, so that an immediate inquiry is imperative;

That the Prime Minister and his colleagues, being the principal guardians of the honour of parliament, should take the initiative in such an inquiry;

That the government should therefore ask the House to constitute a special committee to conduct a strict and impartial inquiry as to whether any ministers of the Crown or members of parliament have improperly made use of their positions as such for their private gain or have otherwise been guilty of personal misconduct under such circumstances or of such a character as to justify the intervention and censure of this House;

That any charges that may be preferred against any member of the government or of the House should be formulated before that committee, and that members of this House or other persons who have material or data at their disposal with reference thereto should divulge them to that committee;

That such committee have power to employ and hear counsel, to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses on oath or affirmation, and to report to the House during the present session.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS (Yale-Cariboo). Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of suggesting that, as this is a historic document, it ought to be correct as to historic fact. I wish to state that neither on the 19th of February nor on any other day did I make reference in this House to the insurance report.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton. N.B.). Mr. Speaker, as my name has been mentioned in the resolution moved by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and as it has also been referred to a number of times by the hon. member in the remarks he has made this afternoon, I feel that I need offer no apology to this House for asking for perhaps half an hour's time in order to discuss the question now before the House. I feel that it is matter of great importance to the policy-holders of the Independent Order of Foresters, of whom I believe there are from 50,000 to 60,000 scattered all over Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific who have been paying their money into the fund of that order, hoping to receive the benefit thereof, either for themselves upon their attaining the age of 70 years or for their representatives after their death, in the form of life insurance. There is a difference in the general policy adopted by the Independent Order of Foresters from that of the ordinary old line companies. The Independent Order of Foresters, being a purely mutual company, has for its basic principle, the idea that when a member dies, an assessment shall be made on the other members which shall bring in sufficient to pay the indemnity due. In order to put this company on a little safer and stronger basis, its officers some years ago decided to increase the dues. By that means they were able to provide a reserve fund as an extra security to the policy-holders. The company, through its managers, the late Dr. Oronhyateka, who spent the best years of his life in connection with it, worked out what I believe is a pretty good scheme of insurance. But they felt that their investments were not properly made, and that some scheme should be devised for giving the policy-holders greater security than they had had up to that time. Therefore about the year 1901 it was decided to incorporate what was called a trust company for the purpose of better investing the funds of the Foresters. I am not going into the history of the formation of the Union Trust Company. I understand that they first bought out a small trust company, the assets of which were not very valuable; but in the end the Union Trust Company was bought out, and the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) was placed in charge of it as manager. Before that hon. gentleman took charge, there was some correspondence between him and the late Dr. Oronhyateka as to the lines on which the company should be incorporated; and I wish to place on record portions of a letter written by the hon. member for North Toronto, containing his views as to the lines on which the trust company should be organized and the amount of capital it should have for carrying on the business. This letter, which was written on the 30th day of April, 1901, appears at page 133 of the report of the Insurance Commissioners :

> I have thought carefully over the matter from my own standpoint and from that of the company and of the order of which you are the head and its large and steadily increasing financial interests which necessitate great care and responsibility in the matter of investments. It seems to me that a trust company with a small paid-up capital and depending alone on the general field for its business would require many years and much hard work to place itself in position to return any considerable profit to its shareholders. The field is not a wide one, and is already pretty well occupied by older and well established companies. . . . To make our business foundation broad and firm we should make sure of a generous paid-up capital so as to give confidence to our patrons and provide a basis for operations on an active and enterprising scale. We cannot afford to go limping along at slow gait.

That is practically the substance of the letter. As a result of that letter the Union Trust Company was organized with an authorized capital stock, if I remember rightly, of $2,000,000. A small amount of the stock was purchased by the hon. member for North Toronto, not then a member of this House, by Mr. McGillivray, a former member of this House, by Mr. Wilson, a lawyer somewhere in the province of Ontario, by a Judge McDougall, and by a Mr. Schofield. Though it is very immaterial, my recollection is that the first three named gentlemen took $1,000 each and the other two $3,000 each. That would make altogether $7,000 of capital put in by outside people.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know whether I am to follow my hon. friend in correcting him in every particular, but he is quite at sea as to the facts.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend, I presume, will have a chance to follow me, and if I make any misstatements of fact he need not grumble, because he will have every chance of making whatever capital he can out of the matter. I do not know that I am right as to the amount of outside capital, and I do not know that it makes any difference, because the hon. gentleman will not deny that in the end the capital stock was increased to $2,500,000, and that before he severed his connection with the company every dollar of that stock had been sold and the money paid in and turned into his hands as manager, and that of that $2,500,000 at least $2,490,000 was the money of the Independent Order of Foresters. Therefore the hon. gentleman handled a fund of which $2,490,000 was the property of the Independent Order of Foresters, and about $10,000 was the property of four or five other gentlemen. I do not think my hon. friend will be able to controvert these facts if he will keep himself close to the record. The point I am making is that the funds of the Union Trust Company were the funds of the Independent Order of Foresters. I know that my hon. friend is going to take the ground which he took before the insurance investigation, that it is nobody's business what became of the funds of the Union Trust Company—that at least it is not the business of the Foresters of Canada and not the business of this parliament. He is going to say that the Royal Insurance Commission was appointed to investigate insurance companies, and not trust companies. He is going to say that because the insurance company purchased the stock of the trust company, therefore the funds of the trust company became a separate entity, entirely disassociated from the Order of Foresters, and consequently neither the Insurance Commission nor this parliament had jurisdiction to investigate its transactions. It might be possible to so argue from a strictly legal and technical standpoint, but the hon. gentleman cannot get away from the fact that all this money he was investing was the property of the Independent Order of Foresters. When he was investing the funds of the Union Trust Company, he was investigating the funds of the Foresters. Therefore every Forester has an absolute right to ask the hon. gentleman to give an account of his stewardship, and we have the right to probe to the bottom the manner in which he invested the funds of the Foresters, because when he invested the funds of the Union Trust Company he was really investing the money of the Foresters.

I propose to discuss the manner in which the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), as managing director of the Foresters, invested its funds. I know that he said before the Royal Commission, and not long ago in this House, and will no doubt say again, that it is nobody's business how he invested these funds, that he made money for the Foresters and we have no right to interfere.

Mr. LENNOX. What are you going to say yourself?

Mr. CARVELL. If my hon. friend will have a little patience I will try and tell him, and I do not think he need be nervous over it. No one will ever accuse him of dabbling in funds or buying lands or anything else so that he need not become nervous. I propose to say something about the transactions of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster)—the purchasing of property and the investing of the funds of the Union Trust Company. I shall do so as rapidly as possible, but will necessarily have to go into some detail. The first transaction to which I intend referring—and that is in the order of time—is the purchase of certain lands in Manitoba called the Carrot river lands from a syndicate, the president of which was certainly his political and I presume his personal friend. I refer to Mr. Campbell, the Attorney General at that time, and I believe still, in Manitoba. Some time in the year 1902 a gentleman representing this company came to the hon. member and offered him something like 40,000 acres of land at $5 per acre. The hon. gentleman purchased the lands without any great effort, so far as I can find out, to get them at a lesser price. These lands were sold to the Union Trust Company as trustee, and my recollection is that they were paid for, not by the Union Trust Company money, but by money of the Independent Order of Foresters. However, that is a matter of no importance because there is no distinction between the two. These lands were offered the Trust Company at $5 an acre and were purchased at that price, but a commission of twenty-five cents an acre was allowed, amounting to $10,000. And it is a fact that one-half of that commission was paid the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), which, he says, was subsequently divided up among three or four other gentlemen. What is the reason which the hon. gentleman gave the commission for accepting this $5,000? It was that to some extent this commission was a slight payment for services he had rendered the company in cutting down the price of this land and getting it at a cheaper rate than the company otherwise would have had to pay. Let us look at that for a moment. At that time the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) was managing director of the Union Trust Compny in the receipt of a salary of $5,000 year. What for? Was it not to manage the funds of the Trust Company? Was it not to buy lands, if the purchase were considered a proper form of investment? And if he were able to buy these lands for $5,000 less than the owners of them got, who was entitled to the $5,000? Who was paying the hon. gentleman for his services when he was saving this $5,000 to the Trust Company? And by what right does he say he was entitled to keep it? That is one reason why this matter should be discussed in this House, and it is one of the matters my hon. friend will no doubt attempt to explain. I agree with the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) to that extent, although I begret that I cannot agree with him in all the deductions he has made from the evidence. It certainly, however, is the duty of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) to explain, in a little more detail and a little more explicitly, the reason why he considered he was entitled to pocket the $5,000 which rightfully belonged to the Union Trust Company.

Now, I come to the next transaction in the order of time—the purchase of about 10,000 acres of land from the Hon. Mr. Roblin—a gentleman who was also not entirely unknown to my hon. friend, upon whom my hon. frend looked as a personal and certainly a political friend. When that transaction came up, the hon. gentleman was entitled to some little credit for keeping down the price. The evidence shows that a man named Pritchard, then private secretary to Mr. Roblin, came to the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and offered him this land at $7 an acre. The hon. gentleman said that that was a pretty big price, that they could not pay that price and would discuss it later on. He was going to Europe and would discuss it when he came back. When he came back Pritchard wrote him a letter in which he said the price would be $5 an acre and a commission of twenty-five cents per acre. Now the hon. gentleman did cut down the price from $7 to $5.25 per acre, but how much did the owner of the land get out of it? He got $5 per acre, and the hon. gentleman admits that he got twenty-five cents per acre or $2,500, and he admits that that money went into his pocket; and until there is an accounting it will not go out. The accounting, it is needless to say, has not taken place. I wonder how many months and years it will before it does. The accounting, it is needless to say, has not taken place yet. I wonder how many months or years it will be before the accounting does take place. Have I a license to insult people, the hon. gentleman asks? I would tell my hon. friend that I have a license to discuss what is contained in the evidence, and if I wanted to use the word 'insulting' I might refer to my hon. friend to the fact that when I referred to this in a jocular way some six weeks ago I was brought to book, and I think I may say in an insulting manner.

I come next to a transaction which will probably take a little more time to discuss because it is a little more complicated, I refer to the British Columbia transaction, although it is perhaps not the next in the order of time. The British Columbia transaction involves other gentleman than the hon. member for North Toronto, and I may state frankly that I have no quarrel with the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler); I have no quarrel with his associates for making all the money they possibly could and all the money they did make out of this transaction. I have no quarrel with any gentleman who goes out in the open market and buys land and sells it for as large a profit as he possibly can do, and I have nothing whatever to say regarding the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) or the hon.

member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) or any other member of this House, excepting wherein, so far as I can see, it has a direct bearing on the funds of the Union Trust Company and upon that portion of the funds which the members of the Independent Order of Foresters have the right to investigate and to claim, if it belongs to them.

The first thing that happened in the order of time was that some time in October the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) took an option from a Mr. Ryan, of Toronto, on a certain piece of property in British Columbia called the Kamloops Lumber Company, and I want to be fair with the hon. member and to state that at that time he took two options, took an option for $250,000 and another one at $200,000. I have read these options, they are practically alike, excepting that in the one the consideration is $200,000 and in the other $250,000, and he had three months in which to take up that option. Subsequently the option was taken up and the hon. member for King's purchased the land, or rather entered into an agreement with Ryan to purchase the land on the 26th January, 1904. There again, there were two options, one being for $225,000 and the other for $170,000 and those two options are in practically the same words, excepting as to the price. My hon. friend from King's (Mr. Fowler) I am sure will contend, he did in his evidence, that he absolutely bought this land, and he says the document shows he did. I may tell the hon. gentleman that I have read the document over and I find that he did buy the land except that there is a reservation contained in the documents by which they may be voided if certain things happen, that is if there is any question of title the option is inoperative, it becomes null and void and the hon. gentleman has not bought the lands and Ryan has no claim against him. I want to put the matter fairly because I have no object in putting it in any other way.

The next thing to which I want to draw attention is the fact that the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) says that he bought the land in his own right and on his own initiative, yet it was a fact that on the 19th day of December, that is something over a month before he got his second option from Ryan, a resolution was passed by the directors of the Trust Company as follows:

A proposition was laid before the directors by the manager in reference to providing money for the purchase and working of certain timber berths in British Columbia as described in a memorandum of agreement entered into between Peter Ryan, of Toronto, and Geo. W. Fowler, of Sussex, N.B., giving an option to the latter by the former, and the manager was instructed to continue the negotiations——

There I call attention to the use of the words 'continue the negotiations' showing that negotiations had been in progress before this.

—and secure the reports of the examiners now upon the property on the understanding that if the reports are satisfactory the Trust Company will advance the money required to purchase the property and take a controlling interest therein.

This, you will bear in mind, was on the 19th of December, or about five weeks before the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) actually purchased the land from Ryan, or rather took a document which made a conditional purchase. Now it is as plain as the noon day sun that there must have been some negotiations going on at this time between the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) and the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and it is also a fact that at that time there were two gentlemen in the west who were examining this land not for the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) but for the Union Trust Company. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. These gentlemen went west some time in the latter part of November or the first part of December. They were on the land on the 19th of December, because it is so stated in the minutes of the directors of the Union Trust Company, and on the 6th day of January a letter was written by Messrs. McCormick and Irwin, and it turned out later on that these gentlemen were interested in the transaction from the beginning. A letter was written by these gentlemen to the Hon. Mr. Fisher, Temple Building, Toronto. I shall not read the letter because it refers very largely to lands not subsequently purchased by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) from Ryan. The letter refers nearly altogether to lands included in the first option and excluded from the last one. Up to this point my hon. friend will not deny that these men were sent out by the Union Trust Company because the evidence shows they were sent out by that company and before I am through I shall read the evidence to my friend and will satisfy him beyond the shadow of a doubt that these gentlemen were sent there by the Union Trust Company and were paid by the Union Trust Company. Won't I? Well, I will show them that they were paid by both, if my hon. friend wants that side of it. I will show him that they received $300 from the Trust Company and $13,000 from my hon. friend if that satisfies him any better, because that is the evidence. Now these gentlemen—if my hon. friend will have patience he will have a chance——

Mr. FOWLER. I propose to take the chance.

Mr. CARVELL. I know you do. If these gentlemen are sent out by the Union Trust Company, I might ask why did they not report to the Union Trust Company? My hon. friend will say that they did. True, they wrote a letter to the manager of the Union Trust Company, on the 15th of January, from Enderby, referring to lands not in the transaction at all, but I have here exhibit 678, directed to George W. Fowler, Esq., M.P. It is a letter signed by W. Irwin and Geo. McCormick, dated Toronto, February 1, 1904, and it gives in detail a list of the different properties, it sets forth in glowing terms the advantages of these properties, it shows the money to be made out of them, it shows the value of them, it strongly advises Mr. Fowler to purchase them and, more than that, it recommends that a certain portion of this, that is the Albert-Canyon lands, should not be purchased, and if the Albert-Canyon lands were not purchased, that the purchase price be reduced by $20,000. This is on the 1st day of February, 1904, but the hon. member for King's, four days before this, had taken the second option. The Albert-Canyon lands were not included in the second option, therefore the member for King's must have had a private report from these gentlemen, because if he had not had this report, how would he have known enough to leave out the Albert-Canyon lands in the second option?

Mr. FOWLER. If so, what?

Mr. CARVELL. If so, then these gentlemen were reporting to Mr. Fowler.

Mr. FOWLER. The hon. gentleman is all mixed up.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

Bill (No. 131) respecting the St. Mary River Bridge Company.—Mr. Dyment.

SUPPLY—REPORT OF INSURANCE COMMISSION—CHARGES AGAINST CERTAIN MEMBERS.

Mr. CARVELL. Mr. Speaker, when the House took recess I was discussing the purchase of the Kamloops Lumber property, or the Ryan property, by the Union Trust Company and I stated that I have no objection to the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Fowler) or any other member of this government purchasing property as long as it is properly done and making a legitimate profit out of it. I wish to repeat that statement and I also wish to state that I do not understand that the hon. member for King's, the hon. member for East Simcoe, or the hon. member for West Prince occupy any fiduciary relation regarding the funds of the Independent Order of Foresters and are certainly under no obligation to protect them any more than any other gentleman in the Dominion of Canada is. It is not my purpose to discuss the details of this transaction. As I stated before recess there were two options, the difference between them being $55,000. The only point that any person can make on this question, in so far as the hon. member for King's is concerned, is that if he were acting as the agent of the Union Trust Company, then of course, he should account to the Trust Company for the money. If he were not acting as the agent of the Trust Company then he had a perfect right to sell the property for half a million dollars or any other amount that he could get instead of $225,000.

The next transaction that took place was the purchase of what is called the Shuswap property; that is the property owned by Shields and in which, I understand, Mr. McCormick was interested. I understand that that property was purchased by the hon. member for King's for $40,000. Practically at the same time, or within a week afterwards the Okanagan Lumber Company, the company owning mills and timber limits and formed practically by Mr. Hale, who was then a member of this House, Mr. McCormick an ex-member of this House, Mr. Irwin, Mr. Bellis and Mr. Bull, sold out their interest through the hon. member for King's to the Union Trust Company for the sum of $217,000, including land, mills, limits, timber ready to be cut and lumber. These three properties were put together in what was called the Kamloops Lumber Company and by the original arrangement the Union Trust Company was to take 51 per cent of the stock and the member for King's and Messrs. McCormick and Irwin between them were to take 49 per cent of the stock. Not only were the Union Trust Company to provide all the funds, including the 51 per cent which they were to furnish in stock, but they were to advance the money to the other three gentlemen as a loan and were to take their private guarantee and these three gentlemen were to have 49 per cent of the stock in the new company. There can be no fault found with this proposition provided the prices paid for these properties were fair and reasonable. I may say that the property took a wonderful jump in price, but I am willing to admit that property did go up in price in British Columbia. As far as the Okanagan Lumber Company was concerned this property was purchased in the autumn of 1903 for $40,000. They spent $25,000 on the property which brought the amount up to $65,000 and in May or June it was sold at $217,000, but, I must say that in so far as I can see there is nothing wrong with that transaction with which this House has any right to interfere. The only reason I have for referring to this question at all is the fact that some time after this—nearly a year I think—a declaration of trust was made by the hon. member for King's whereby he declared that out of 660 odd shares which he held of the capital stock of the Kamloops Lumber Company he held 300 in trust for the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster). I think that the hon. member for North Toronto, in accepting this stock, placed himself in a position which I would not wish to accept and which I think the hon. gentleman would not accept again if he had a chance to do it over again after considering the consequences. However, that is a matter for the hon. gentleman to decide. It is true—and I want to be fair about the transaction—that later on, through the pressure exerted by Mr. Stevenson who was then vice-president of the Foresters Company, all of that property was given up to the Union Trust Company and therefore neither the hon. member for King's nor the hon. member for North Toronto made anything out of this stock. The whole thing went back to the Union Trust Company. That is all I have to say about the British Columbia business.

I might for a short time discuss what may perhaps be called the main issue and that is the Northwest Land Company. Here I want it distinctly understood that in so far as any obligation which any of these people were under in regard to the handling of trust funds can in no way apply to the three hon. gentlemen whom I have named here, but it can only apply to the hon. member for North Toronto. It seems that some time in the summer or autumn of 1902 a political pilgrimage of hon. gentlemen opposite was taking place in the Northwest—a pilgrimage by the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) accompanied by a number of his most influential associates and amongst those associates were included the hon. member for King's, the hon. member for East Simcoe, the hon. member for Prince, and Mr. Pope, then member for Compton. It was thought that it would be a profitable thing to purchase land and try to make some money out of it. With that proposition I have no fault to find.

I have nothing to say about the private arrangement. As I understand it, an arrangement was made by which the member for King's (Mr. Fowler) and Mr. Pope were to become the agents of the others for the purpose of purchasing this property. According to the evidence, they went to the office of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and they were furnished with a plan, and they left that plan in the office and went back in about an hour, and when they returned a thin red line was drawn across the plan to indicate the route which the Canadian Northern Railway would take along the Saskatchewan river. That plan was then taken to the office of the Canadian Pacific Railway who owned the land, and after some dickering the land was purchased at what I must say was a very low price. There was evidence given that the land agent at Winnipeg refused to sell the land at $3.50 an acre at first. The agent was taken down to Montreal and I know not whether any persuasion was used, but I do know that when that land agent made his trip to Montreal these hon. gentlemen were able to get 200,000 acres for $3.50 an acre. The next stage in the transaction was a letter written by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) to the hon. member for Prince (Mr. Lefurgey) and though this letter is very well known, I do not think it has yet been placed on 'Hansard,' and so I will take the liberty of reading it :

October 4, 1902.

Dear Lefurgey,—We have succeeded beyond our wildest hopes. We wired D. M., and he met us at the train, Toronto, and took us to his office, and gave us the route so far as located ; of course, under cover of the strictest secrecy, so keep it mum, except to Borden, Bennett and yourself. We expect to have a wealthy Englishman named Lister and Col. Pellatt in the combine with us. We have increased the thing to 200,000 acres. On arriving here we interviewed Sir Thomas Shaughnessy and have every reason to expect most generous treatment as to terms and price. He said we should get the best that was going. We want to arrange a meeting there when the party returns to Montreal. Tell Messrs. Borden and Bennett about the meeting. It will be necessary for at least two of us to go this fall and locate, as it could not be done in the spring, and that is one of the things that must be arranged at the meeting.

GEO. W. FOWLER.

Shortly after that the member for King's and Mr. Pope went to the west, went over the land, made a selection, came back to the land office, and nothing more was done until the spring. Before they went it was understood that this company was to be limited to ten members, that each of the ten was to receive an equal division of the profits, and that each was to deduct a certain amount for expenses. It is in evidence that at least some of them put up $200 a piece, and Messrs. Pope and Fowler went west. I presume that $200 they put up all around went towards paying their expenses. In the month of March these hon. gentlemen had not been able to make their financial arrangements and it looked as though the thing was off. Finally, according to the evidence, they had to put up $60,000, and the member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) and the member for Prince, P.E.I (Mr. Lefurgey), put up $6,000 each towards the first payment. The balance was raised by MacKenzie & Mann endorsing a note of the hon. member for King's and Mr. Pope. They raised something over $40,000 in this way and were able to make the first payment to the Canadian Pacific Railway on these lands. Later on, these two gentlemen—because legally the option was the property of these two gentlemen alone—sold these lands to the New Ontario Town Site Company, and it is in evidence that at that time, practically the only persons interested in this were Messrs. Foster, McGillivray and Wilson, who were directors of the Union Trust. They were sold at an advance of one dollar an acre which would make $200,000 profit, and of that amount, $150,000 was put up in cash and $50,000 was to be paid in stock of the company which was to be organized. At the same time that this arrangement was made, evidently another arrangement was made by which the lands were to go into the hands of this syndicate at another advance of fifty cents an acre, amounting to $100,000, and the first arrangement was that this $100,000 should practically all go to the member for North Toronto and Messrs. McGillivray and Wilson. I want to be fair in this matter and I should say that it was not the intention that this was to be paid in cash at the time. I think the statement was made this afternoon that the money was to be paid in cash—and the hon. member for North Toronto very properly contradicted that. It is true that the Union Trust Company agreed to finance the matter by putting up the $150,000 in cash which went to the gentlemen composing the syndicate. They were then to put up the payments which would become due to the Canadian Pacific Railway on the option. And they did put up the option money, until finally they had altogether about $950,000 invested. It is also true that some arrangement was made at the request of the member for Prince and instead of taking the $100,000 profit in stock they only took $95,000 in stock, and the other $5,000 was distributed among the members of the syndicate. Then certain portions of the stock was given to different persons in order to qualify them as members of the Trust Company. Sir John Boyd got ten shares to qualify him as a director and Mr. Schofield got ten shares for the same purpose. Afterwards Sir John Boyd bought a small number of shares which were his own private property. Then there were ten shares distributed to Messrs. Foster, McGillivray and Wilson to qualify them, and 237½ shares were given to the Union Trust Company as a bonus to pay them to some extent for financing this transaction, and at the same time there were 100 shares given to Dr. Oronhyatekha also as a bonus, and it was understood all the way through that this stock was given to the company and Dr. Oronhyatekha as bonus stock in order to pay them to some extent for carrying through the transaction. A resolution was put on the minutes of the Trust Company, that the directors of the Trust Company would leave the matter open and they would have the right either to make advances as a loan to the syndicate, or as stock, whichever they chose. It must be remembered that the same gentlemen largely who were directors of the Trust Company were also directors of the Land Company. It is certain that the three most active members of the Trust Company, Messrs. Foster, McGillivray and Wilson, were practically the three owners of the Land Company. The first year the thing went along in this way; it was somewhere between heaven and earth; it was no debt which the members of the syndicate owed to the Trust Company, and neither did the Trust Company have any stock for their advances. Finally, in March, 1904, it was decided by resolution of the Trust Company that this should be taken as stock, and that from that date the syndicate should owe nothing to the Trust Company. This advance was placed in the form of stock, and now the Trust Company held the 337½ shares of stock and they held paid up shares for all the money which they advanced outside of that. It amounted to $200,000 or $300,000 at the time this decision was arrived at, but they had to go on and advance money so rapidly that in December, 1905, they had about $980,000 invested in the transaction. I know that the hon. member for North Toronto will state, as he stated before the commission, that we have no right to investigate this matter or to talk about it—that there is nothing wrong about it, that it is a perfectly straight transaction like buying a horse for one price and selling it for another. He will state that because they did not take out their profits of $95,000 in money, therefore they did not put themselves in the position of handling the trust funds; but the hon. gentleman fails to recognize the fact that at least one year after this transaction took place, by advancing to himself and his associates who were, like himself, trustees of these funds they were advancing to themselves $150,000 or $160,000 for which the trust company had no guarantee whatever.

Mr. FOSTER. What does the hon. gentleman say—that the Union Trust Company had no lien, no guarantee? The Union Trust Company had an absolute mortgage on everything as well as the stock.

Mr. CARVELL. If the hon. gentleman had permitted me to finish my sentence, he would have known what I was going to say.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman was unfortunate in the way he began it.

Mr. CARVELL. I say that up to 1904 the trust company had no guarantee or mortgage or anything else except the fact that the Great West Land Company, which was the successor of the New Ontario Townsite Company, was a debtor to the Union Trust Company for the amount of money that company advanced except $1,400 for which it held stock. I repeat the statement, and my hon. friend cannot gainsay.

Mr. FOSTER. The statement is absolutely wrong.

Mr. CARVELL. The hon. gentleman will have a chance to show wherein it is wrong. From 1904 down to the 28th of November, 1905, the Trust Company had no security for the advances except the stock of the land company. If the stock was all right, the Trust Company was all right. My hon. friend fails to realize that when the Trust Company were advancing their funds to the tune of $900,000, my hon. friend and his associates were not personally liable for one dollar of those advances. They stood in the position of reaping any advantages from the transaction, while they could not possibly lose a dollar if things went the other way. That is the thing for which I find fault with the hon. gentleman and for which the people of this country and the Foresters are finding fault with him, and that is the position which I think it is the duty of the hon. gentleman to attempt to clear up. I admit that there was no loss made, but in what different position does that place my hon. friend? He stood in a position to make profits until the change took place, and where, if loss occurred, the Union Trust Company or the Independent Order of Foresters sustained the loss. I come down to 1905. Things were getting rather interesting in this year or year and a half in the Union Trust Company. Mr. Stevenson, the vice-president, was asking some very unpleasant questions, and was forcing the directors of the Union Trust Company to take a very different course from that which they had been taking in the past. In October or the early part of November, 1905, it was virtually decided by the managers of the Foresters to change the position in which these advances stood; instead of being in the position of stockholders in the land company, they would surrender their stock and take a mortgage, and it is true that after the 28th of November, the Trust Company did have a mortgage on all the lands of the Great West Land Company for the advances they had made. My hon. friend cannot show anything in the evidence to the contrary of what I have stated. There is a transaction, however, to which I must refer, in connection with the transfer of this stock. To my mind it places my hon. friend in a position which I do not say is wrong, but where it is up to him to explain the transaction as it occurred. On the 7th of November there was a meeting of the directors of the Trust Company, and they discussed, cursorily I should say from the minutes, the propriety of surrendering the stock which they held for their advances and taking a mortgage for the amount. On the 13th of November another meeting of the directors of the Trust Company was held, and it is stated in the minutes that the same directors were present at this meeting as were present at the meeting of the 7th of November. Again on the 28th of November a third meeting was held in which the form of mortgage and form of assignment were brought up and were ratified by the directors. Now, it is a fact that at every meeting of the directors of the Union Trust Company from the organization of the company down to the 13th of November, 1905, a book had been kept on the table and had been signed by the directors. This was the first order of business. I have examined that book. It was among the exhibits. I have it here, and it is open to any hon. gentleman who wishes to examine it; and I state that down to the meeting of the 13th of November no meeting of the directors was held at which at least four directors did not sign that book. It may be true, as stated in the evidence, that if a director came in late, he signed it later on, but, so far as that book is concerned, it was signed by every director present at the time the meeting took place. I find on referring to this book that there are no records whatever of a meeting having been held on the 13th of November nor on the 28th of November, although it is true that the minute book of the directors shows that a meeting did take place and that certain business was transacted at that time, namely, the surrender, not only of the stock which they held in the Great Northwest Land Company, and the taking of the mortgage, but the giving up of the bonus stock, the one hundred shares which they got from Dr. Oronhyateka. I do not wish to cast any reflections upon anybody; I am not going to give any opinions of my own as to what took place or what did not take place at those meetings. I merely state the fact that this book contains no record whatever of the directors who were present at those meetings, whereas every other meeting of the directors of the Trust Company held in the four or five years of its existence was reported in this book by the directors present signing their names. There is another thing it might perhaps lead to.

Mr. FOSTER. Might I interrupt my hon. friend to ask him a question? For what purpose has he introduced this matter so far, unless he wishes this House to infer something? Does he consider himself in a position to make an inference, in so many words, and state it on his own responsibility?

Mr. CARVELL. I would prefer giving the inference my hon. friend drew. I refer you to page 2628 of the evidence. The hon. member had been examined at length upon this book, and had given his version of it, and this is what took place between Mr. Shepley and the hon. gentleman. Let me read it, because my hon. friend has asked me what inference I would draw. I draw no inference, but am willing to give the House the inference my hon. friend himself drew:

Q. Now then the other point, Mr. Foster?—A. The other point is this: It was, as I gave in my testimony, the rule to have that attendance book signed before we went on with the business and it was done in nearly every case. But two things might happen. It might be signed by a part of the directors at the beginning, and others coming in later might either sign it before they went out or they might not sign it until a day or a week or maybe not until the next meeting. A blank would be left and maybe a pencil mark or something like that and they would get their names in. But to argue that because the names were not put down in the book, there could therefore be no meeting, seems to me to go against the doctrine of possibility entirely.

I want to give the benefit of the whole thing to my hon. friend, and therefore I shall read his explanation:

Q. Have you understood that anything was being argued at all? We are just trying to get at the facts, you know?—A. I cannot help but see the conclusions that are absolutely come to from the evidence given in that way. Any person outside simply comes to this conclusion, 'ah, there was no meeting, therefore there was a concocted meeting.'

I wish to give the version of other gentlemen who were present at this meeting. It was stated in one of these minutes that at the meeting of the 13th a resolution was moved by Mr. Stephenson and another resolution, seconded by Mr. McGillivray, and that a resolution was moved at the meeting of the 28th by the Hon. G. W. Ross, and seconded, I think, by Mr. John I. Davidson, and I just wish to refer briefly to the evidence of some of the gentlemen on that question. The evidence of Mr. Stephenson will be found on page 145 of the Insurance Report, and I shall not take up time by reading it. I shall, however, refer briefly to the evidence of Mr. Davidson, because he was a man who attended nearly every meeting of the directors and took pride in the fact that he was always present and signed the book. On pages 2602 and 2603 Mr. Davidson gave the following evidence:

Q. What do you remember to have heard during that discussion with regard to the bonus stock?—A. My recollection is the bonus stock was never discussed.

Q. Your recollection is the bonus stock was never discussed?—A. I may be entirely wrong.

Q. You have no recollection of its being discussed?—A. No.

Q. Don't you think you would recall it if such an important thing as that were discussed?—A. I would think so, but the idea of its not belonging to the Trust Company has never entered my head.

Q. Then do you remember this little book?—A. Yes.

Q. Is that what you mean by the directors' meeting book?—A. Yes.

Q. What was the custom with regard to your signing your names in this book?—A. The directors present signed every minute.

Q. Have you any doubt about that at all?—A. No, none.

Q. And if you do not find your name here, you do not expect to find a minute in the minute book?—A. No.

Q. Are you clear about that?—A. Quite.

Q. Then I show you the book first, and I think that it is our own admirable signature at the top?—A. Yes, I thought you could not read it.

Q. I have seen it a good many times recently. November 7, 1905, 10.30 a.m., and the and the first signature is John I. Davidson, and the next meeting in the book appears to be December 26, 1905?—A. Yes.

And I see your signature there as well?—A. Yes.

Q. Was there any meeting of directors between those two dates?—A. I should say not.

Q. There is a record in the regular minutes of the Union Trust Company, what is said to have been a meeting of the board of directors, at which the same directors were present as at the meeting of the 7th, yourself among other things, it was resolved that the Union Trust Company, when taking the mortgage for its advances, should give up its bonus stock. I tell you that appears upon the minutes?—A. Who moved the resolution?

Q. It is attributed to Mr. Stephenson. Do you remember any such meeting or any such resolution?—A. Giving up the bonus stock?

Q. Yes?—A. No, I do not. Who seconded that resolution?

Q. It is said to have been on the 13th November, although there is no signature to correspond with it in the directors' meeting book?—A. Who seconded it?

Q. It is said to have been seconded by Mr. McGillivray?—A. I have no recollection of it.

Q. You have no recollection of any such meeting?—A. If the name is not in that book, I cannot understand how a meeting could have been held.

Then later on, in the next column, page 2603, I find this statement:

Q. What do you think? Having regard to all these circumstances, can you say with certainty, having regard to the fact that you do not find your signature in the attendance book and having regard to the fact that that subject was never brought to your attention, have you any doubt there never was any such meeting?—A. I do not think there would be any minutes in the book unless there was a meeting, but the minutes would be signed of course.

Q. No, the minutes are not signed. That is all you can tell me about it?—A. The minutes have always been signed, and the attendance always has been entered in the book as far as my recollection goes.

That is the evidence of Mr. Davidson. I shall not trouble the House with the evidence of Mr. Ross or Mr. Stephenson. They are just as clear and emphatic that there could not have been a resolution. Mr. Stephenson is asked if he could have moved the resolution they say he did and was brought back the second time; and, after thinking the matter over, he said he had given it mature consideration and was satisfied he could not.

Mr. FOSTER. What my hon. friend is trying to prove is this, that a certain agreement founded on certain resolutions, covering a mortgage, covering the giving back of two different lots of stock, such as have been detailed by my hon. friend, who has done me the courtesy of allowing me this interruption—he has read the evidence of Colonel John I. Davidson to the effect that he had no recollection of any such resolution or any such stock being given up, or any proposal to give it up, or any mortgage agreement by which it was given up—am I correct in that?

Mr. CARVELL. Practically so.

Mr. FOSTER. Quite correct. Now, I hold in my hand the very instrument itself, the very instrument which Mr. Shepley fingered, which the commission should have looked at, and that very instrument details every particular, and it is signed at the end by John I. Davidson as chairman.

Mr. BENNETT. Take it back now.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a sample.

An hon. MEMBER. Back out.

Mr. CARVELL. Back out? Why that is not in the evidence. What are my hon. friends talking about, I am discussing this thing from the evidence, I do not know what documents my hon. friend may have in his pocket.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend must allow me, that is not manly, if he will allow me the expression.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. FOSTER. It is not parliamentry to get out of it that way. What document have I in my pocket? I give him my word as a member of parliament—and he will take it—that the document I have in my pocket is the document which Mr. Shepley and the commission had before them, the document signed by Col. Davidson himself as chairman of the meeting which finally passed those resolutions and that mortgage and made that transfer of stock, the very instrument with not only the signature of Col. Davidson, but the signature of Mr. Van Dusen as chairman of the shareholders meeting of the Great West Land Company, both of them side by side, the very instrument which Mr. Shepley had in his own hand, which he saw and fingered but as to which neither he nor the commission give the least indication in the evidence that they called and asked for or the report they founded on on that, that the document bore the very signature of the very man who swore that he had no recollection of it.

Mr. CARVELL. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough now to answer a question or two? Is the hon. gentleman referring to the minutes of the next meeting of the directors of the company, that will be some time about the 4th or 5th of December?

Mr. CARVELL.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the meeting, Sir.

Mr. CARVELL. If my hon. friend had only given me a little notice I could have furnished that, I think, from the evidence.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh no, you could not.

Mr. CARVELL. Could I not?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh no, it is not there.

Mr. CARVELL. Well, I will show you what is here. There are here the minutes of a meeting of directors held on the 30th day of December, 1905. Is that the document to which my hon. friend refers?

Mr. FOSTER. It is the shareholders meeting but he is going to find it in the evidence. Go on.

Mr. CARVELL. I want to be fair with the hon. gentleman. I had the evidence of the directors, of course if that is not the document, I cannot say anything about it, because it is not in the evidence, and my hon. friend is at liberty to make any use of it he likes.

Mr. FOSTER. You will find it in the exhibits if you look it up.

Mr. CARVELL. As my hon. friend seems to doubt the evidence of Mr. Davidson I will be under the necessity of taking a little more time in order to call another gentleman to the box and that is Mr. Elliott G. Stevenson. Mr. Stevenson had given his version of this transaction a day or two prior to this and he had been fairly positive that he could not have moved this resolution, and could not have been present, that no such transaction could have taken place as was related in the minutes of the meeting. But to make it doubly sure he was recalled on the 17th November, 1906. We find at page 3106 of the evidence:

Q. Have you given further consideration to the question of the meetings that were held when certain bonused stocks were directed to be returned to the syndicate composed of Foster, Wilson and McGillivray?—A. I have read very carefully all that has been said on that subject with a view of refreshing my recollection. I have recalled the circumstances of that day and I can only say that after going all over it I am confirmed in the view that I originally had, that I never understood that any stock was being turned over for the mortgage or on account of that transaction except the stock representing the cash advances, and that the bonus stock was never included or considered or thought of. My recollection in that respect is just in accord with Colonel Davidson's and Mr. Ross's.

Q. Would you say as to the possibility of any such resolution being made by you formally or informally at any meeting?—A. It is absolutely impossible. If I had written any such resolution as is said I certainly would have recalled it, because I would have had the matter in mind.

Q. And you say that no such a resolution was prepared by you?—A. I say that no such a resolution was prepared or offered by me.

I do not know where my hon. friend could ask for more explicit evidence than that. I do not know anything about Mr. Stevenson; my hon. friend knows more about him than I do. My hon. friend knows whether he is a gentleman whose evidence should be taken in any court in this country, and my hon. friend knows whether he is a gentleman whose word will be taken by the people of the Dominion of Canada when this matter comes to be threshed out. I shall not trouble the House by reading the evidence of the Hon. Geo. W. Ross which is on exactly the same lines as that of Mr. Stevenson and Col. Davidson.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh no. If my hon friend will allow me, Mr. Ross's evidence differs in one very important particular from that of the others and it is in this particular. Col Davidson in all honesty, I am not saying that was not his opinion or that he did not honestly hold that opinion, and I am not saying that Mr. Stevenson's was not an honest opinion honestly held according to his belief and recollection, but there was this difference between the evidence of Mr. Ross and the evidence of Col. Davidson and Mr. Stevenson. The evidence of Col. Davidson and Mr. Stevenson would go to the conclusion that if there were not in the signature-book on a certain day the signature of the directors that that would be for him proof that no meeting had been held, because the general rule was that the first thing to be done was for those present to sign the directors' signature-book; but when the Hon. Geo. W. Ross was questioned, whilst he had no recollection of the stock and no recollection of the meeting, when he was asked that question: 'Would you take it that there was no meeting from the fact that there were no signatures in the signature-book,' he differed from the others in saying that he could not at all say that, that there might have been a meeting and it might be possible that the signatures had not been taken in the signature-book, there being of course two books as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. CARVELL. I am sorry I am taking up so much time but I am under the necessity of reading the evidence of Mr. Ross and I think the House will agree that my hon. friend has not correctly interpreted the intention which Mr. Ross intended to convey.

Mr. FOSTER. That is my recollection of it.

Mr. CARVELL. At page 2615 we have:

Q. There is a minute on page 25 of the minutes of the meeting of the 28th November at 3 p.m., at which the following gentlemen are recorded as being present:—Mr. Ross, Mr. Foster, Mr. Wilson, Col. Davidson and Mr. McGillivray, and after a statement that the minutes were read and approved, the minutes proceed, 'The solicitor of the company, pursuant to the instructions of the board at its meeting of November 7, read the agreement and mortgage between the Union Trust Company and the Great West Land Company. After some discussion it was moved by the Hon. G. W. Ross, seconded by Col. Davidson, that the form of agreement,' (reads resolution.) 'And that the proper amount be filled in by the general manager.' Do you remember that agreement being placed before the board and discussed?—A. I do not remember it.

Q. Do you remember moving such a resolution?—A. I do not.

Q. Do you think you would have forgotten if so important a matter as that was discussed at a meeting so recent as the 28th November?—A. Is that the agreement in which the surrender of stock was provided for?

Q. Yes?—A. Yes, I think I would remember it.

There is the evidence of the three gentlemen. I want to be fair and to state that the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) says that not only is this not true but that the matter was discussed and that he rather advised against it, that he thought it was not a wise move but that the company should not give up the bonus stock. I leave it for the country at large, I leave it for every person who reads this evidence, and I presume and hope it will be read all over the Dominion of Canada—to say whether the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and Mr. Wilson on the one side are right, or the three gentlemen I have named, the Hon. Geo. W. Ross, Mr. Stevenson and Col. Davidson are correct in their recollection of the transaction.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid I am troubling my hon. friend, but I fear he did not catch the point and has consequently read a part of the evidence to which I was not alluding.

Mr. CARVELL. I thought so, yes, I thought that.

Mr. FOSTER. But wait one minute. The point I was discussing was as to whether there was or was not a directors' meeting based upon evidence that there were not signatures in the directors' signature book. That is what I was talking about, and I stated that whilst Col. Davidson's evidence led to the conclusion that if there were no signatures in the signature-book there would have been no meeting held on that day, when Mr. Ross was questioned on that point he did not go so far; he said he would not say that because there were no signatures in the signature-book that therefore there was no meeting of the directors. That is the point I wish to make.

Mr. CARVELL. I understand the hon. gentleman's point, and there may be evidence to bear out his contention. But Mr. Ross is very positive that he did not move the resolution which is credited to him.

Now, Sir, I have discussed the transactions of the Union Trust Company with regard to these land propositions so far as I think it necessary to do so. I would not be addressing this House to-night were it not for some references made to me by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), and I crave the pardon of the House for being compelled to refer to that hon. gentleman. That hon. gentleman felt, the moment this matter was brought up, that the burden was on him to raise a row with somebody. I very innocently, as I thought, referred to this question when I was addressing the House on the 21st of February, I think, regarding the transactions of the Robins Land Company, and I said that I did not know it was a crime for a person to buy property in Canada at one price and sell it at another; that I would have been willing to leave the matter to the determination of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) and the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), and I went so far as to say that I would not mind putting the member for East Simcoe in the box, and he at once wanted to know if I was making a charge against him. Nothing had taken place until the 21st day of February, when the hon. gentleman was discussing the question raised by the member for King's in the matter referred to here as the 'explosion' by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and my hon. friend was attacked with one of those violent brain storms with which he is afflicted on certain occasions. Being attacked with this malady, of course he had to attack somebody else, and instead of attacking the parties to whom he evidently intended to refer, he made the mistake of attacking the innocent member for Carleton, N.B., a man who had not made any charges against him, who did not have any charges to make against him. On a former occasion I told the hon. gentleman that if he would have patience he would probably hear the western lands transaction discussed to his satisfaction. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope my hon. friend is satisfied, I hope he is satisfied with the discussion that has taken place here during the last three or four weeks. I am bound to say that I was fair enough to say to the hon. member on the 21st of February that of the three members mentioned, the least blame could be laid to him of any of them. I think that was fair, but he was not magnanimous enough to appreciate it; and, in my absence, on the 8th of March, he was attacked with another violent brain storm, and he repeated the same charges against me, calling me a coward, I think he called me a braggadocio, and wanted to know if I was going to stand up in this House and make charges against him. I told him on a previous occasion that when an opportunity arrived I would not hesitate to discuss this matter as I viewed it, and I would leave the House to decide whether I was right or wrong. I have done that. I was not the cause of the trouble, I was not the agent to buy the land for him, I was not responsible for buying the land, and if he did not get a fair deal I am not responsible for it. The hon. gentleman need not pour out his vials of wrath upon me, because I had nothing to do with it. I have not any charge to make against him, as I said before. The hon. gentleman started out with something he was not equal to, he started in to buy land, and if he had not had good assistance he never would have got the land. He did not do anything about getting it, he did not do anything toward reselling it, he did not finance it, he had to go to New Brunswick to get a man to finance it for him.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman makes a statement that he knows is utterly at variance with the facts. Every dollar I put up in that concern was my own money, and I never got a single cent from any one else.

Mr. CARVELL. I did not say it was not his own money, I believe it was his own money. What I said was that he had not the ability to buy this land himself, he had not the ability to finance this land himself. He put up the magnificent sum of $6,200, and my hon. friend from King's had to finance about $50,000 during the first four months of the transaction. He put up nothing but his $6,000, and he got it back. I have nothing to say against the hon. gentleman. It would be useless to talk about him. If it is any benefit to him to stand up here and call people cowards and ask if they have any charges to make against him, then he is welcome to it, and I have not a word to say more about it. I apologize to you, Mr. Speaker, for having taken up three or four minutes of the time of this House in discussing the hon. gentleman, and I promise you that never again, so long as I have a seat here, will I ever bother my head or take up the time of this House in discussing the hon. member for East Simcoe.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have presented this case before you. I think it is fair for members of this House and people of this country to discuss the transactions of the hon. member for North Toronto regarding his handling of these trust funds. I must say that I cannot vote for the resolution presented by the member for Labelle, and for these reasons: The hon. member for Labelle wishes a committee appointed to investigate, in the first place, as I understand it, the transactions of four gentlemen whose names have been mentioned here with regard to their connection with insurance and trust funds. My answer to that is that these matters have been discussed and have been investigated by a better tribunal, I think, than could be possibly obtained in this House, by a tribunal possessing no more ability than a committee of members of this House, but a tribunal which had the time at their disposal necessary to make a thorough investigation. That tribunal has reported the results of their investigation, and we have dealt with them this afternoon. Now, as to the other matters, the hon. member for Labelle wishes a committee appointed to discuss the private affairs of different members of this House. In the first place, I beg to dissent from that proposition in its entirety, I do not think that is a proper matter for investigation. In the second place, the hon. member for Labelle has refused to take the responsibility of making a charge, because he says that neither the members of the Liberal party nor of the Conservative party are going to make a scapegoat of him. Therefore, if we appointed a commission the member for Labelle would not be prepared to come forward with his charges. The commission would probably meet together and appoint a chairman, appoint a secretary, and ask somebody to come on with a charge. Nobody would come on with a charge, and the matter would fall to the ground. Therefore, it seems to me it would be utterly futile to carry out the suggestion of the member for Labelle, and for these reasons I shall vote against the resolution.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE. Does the hon. member suppose that either the member for Labelle or myself, as seconder of the motion, know what is in the mind of the hon. member for King's?

Mr. CARVELL. Well, I am not in a position to answer what my hon. friend for Labelle and my hon. friend for Montmagny (Mr. Armand Lavergne) have in their minds, I am not a mind reader.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). Mr. Speaker, the motion which has been placed in your hands by my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) is certainly the most extraordinary which, in the course of a long parliamentary life, I have ever seen, it is certainly unique in its character. It is to be observed in the first place that my hon. friend has chosen to bring this motion in the shape of an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply. It was open to my hon. friend to bring his motion in the shape of a substantive one which could have been met upon its merits and in all its aspects. My hon. friend is aware that by the method which he has adopted discussion is circumscribed and that there is not free scope to amend or present the different aspects of his motion. According to the rules of this House the motion has to be taken in its entirety, voted up or voted down, and it is not susceptible of any amendment. If there be in that motion truth and falsehood the truth has to be rejected with the falsehood or the falsehood has to be accepted with the truth. If there is in it that which is proper or improper the same rule will apply; it will have to be accepted whether proper or improper or rejected whether proper or improper. Therefore, it is, to say the least, an extraordinary proceeding on the part of my hon. friend, at the outset professing to be so anxious to have a fair inquiry into this matter, to limit the scope of the discussion as he has done.

Now, Sir, my hon. friend has told us something about his motive. His motive, as he has told us in bringing this motion to the attention of the House, is to clear the atmosphere in which we live, is to ascertain where are the honest men and where are the dishonest men. I can only say to my hon. friend from Labelle that every man in this House is an honest man, that every man in this House has a right to walk with his head erect, that every man in this House has the right to his character until that character has been taken away from him, not by insinuations, not by the tittle-tattle of the street, but upon a charge made by some one who has the courage to make such a charge. It will not do to say that there are rumours. Of course there are and there may be rumours, but since when in a British parliament and under British institutions have rumours been a matter of investigation? If there are rumours against me, or against any of my colleagues, it is open to any man to take up these rumours and to bring them forward in the shape of a charge which I can meet, to which I can oppose my denial or in regard to which I can offer my explanation. But, Sir, it is absolutely unprecedented in any British parliament that the House of Commons has ever investigated or has ordered one of its committees to investigate rumours. The House of Commons has never, either in this country or in the mother country, ordered an investigation except upon a charge which the man against whom it is levelled can face and to which he can give an answer. That is the position, however, which my hon. friend has taken in this motion of his. Let me call his attention—because I believe he has written this in a hurry—to the conclusion of his motion:

> That the government should therefore ask the House to constitute a special committee to conduct a strict and impartial inquiry as to whether any ministers of the Crown or members of parliament have improperly made use of their positions as such for their private gain or have otherwise been guilty of personal misconduct under such circumstances or of such a character as to justify the intervention and censure of this House.

Against whom is this levelled? It is levelled against the 214 members of the House of Commons. It is open to anybody to appear before this committee and to make a charge against any member of this House, against the hon. member for Labelle himself. He, strong in his fortitude and in his rectitude, may say that he would not object, but I do object that the privileges of the members should be invaded unless there is cause for the invasion. I do object that the rules and regulations under which parliamentary life has been carried on should be discarded. Let us appoint a committee to investigate and who is to be the accuser? Anybody may be the accuser and nobody may be the accuser. Let this committee be granted and what shall be the evidence? Anything may be evidence and nothing may be evidence. There is nothing substantial. But this committee would be a committee of inquiry at random, to be disposed of nobody knows how, to be guided by nobody knows whom and to come to a conclusion nobody knows where. The hon. gentleman tells us that he would not take the responsibility of conducting the investigation. He tells us that he is not going to be made a scapegoat in this matter, but he says that it is the duty of the Prime Minister to take that responsibility. It is the duty of the Prime Minister certainly to see that every charge which is brought against a member is investigated, and if my hon. friend from Labelle will bring such an accusation against anybody certainly he will have the fullest opportunity to make it good. But, I protest against the idea that the House of Commons is to be turned into an inquisition. The House of Commons is not an inquisition. The House of Commons is the guardian of its own honour and it is its duty to see that every member shall have fair play and justice. My hon. friend has stated that there is a saw-off between the two sides of this House. Although I refer to this again I would have supposed that there would not have been any necessity to do so in the face of the denial twice repeated of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) that there has been no saw-off at all. I would have expected after the denial of my hon. friend the leader of the opposition, twice repeated, that the hon. member for Labelle would not have undertaken to-day as he has done before to assert that there has been a saw-off.

Mr. BOURASSA. What I stated to-day was that there has been a saw-off between the hon. member for King's and the right hon. Prime Minister. I did not say that there had been a saw-off between both parties.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If that be the distinction all I can say to my hon. friend from Labelle is, and I think it will be corroborated by the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Fowler) that he and I have not exchanged a word during the present session. I met him once or twice to say good-day and that is all. There never has been any communication between the hon. member for King's and myself. For what reason should I choose to have a saw-off in this matter? Because it has pleased the hon. member for Labelle to levy some insinuations against certain colleagues of mine? I shall come to that presently and I shall tell him that I have no reason to fear any investigation and that there is no occasion for my resorting to any saw-off. The hon. member said more. He accused me of having had a saw-off with the hon. member for King's but he went a little farther—I took a note of his words at the time—and he said that I had taken the opposition under my 'maternal' care.

Well, Sir, had I been accused of taking the opposition under my 'paternal' care that would have been bad enough, but to be accused of taking them under my 'maternal' care is a good deal more than I can appreciate. The opposition does not need any care from me; the opposition is able to take care of itself; but, I have this to say to my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa), that in the position which I occupy, entrusted as I am under our parliamentary system of government with grave and important duties, and having the responsibility of being leader of the House, I owe justice and I owe fair play to every member of the House, no matter on which side he may sit. I have had to give a good deal of thought to the different aspects of this question. My hon. friend has thrice brought it to the attention of the House, and though I am a pretty busy man otherwise I have had to give a good deal of attention to the discussions we have had upon this subject. My hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) wanted to have an investigation, as the result of certain words spoken by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) on the 21st of February last. I had to see what was to be done, and what my duty was under such circumstances, and when the question first arose I stated in the House that we should wait until we had the report of the Insurance Commission. When we did get that report, I stated then that we should have a discussion upon it before the session closed. My hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) is more lucky than I am, since he has been able to read the whole evidence and the report of the commission. I have not read the evidence. I have glanced through the report; I afterwards took it up to read it when I had more leisure so as to form my own conclusion, and, if I am to speak my own mind at the present moment, I must declare that I am not prepared to say what the conclusion I have come to is; and what action should be taken by the government upon this report. I had hoped that long ere this we would be able to have the discussion, but we have not been idle in this House in the meantime, and I hope still that we may have a discussion warranted by the report, before the session closes.

But, my hon. friend (Mr. Bourssa) goes further, and he says in the first part of his motion :

That the report of the Royal Commission on Life Insurance and the evidence connected therewith have made public various transactions in which members of this House participated, namely, the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), the hon. member for King's, New Brunswick (Mr. Fowler), the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), the hon. member for Prince, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Lefurgey) ;

That such transactions have been commented upon, by several organs of public opinion, in terms reflecting upon the honour, the integrity and the independenc of the above-named gentlemen.

Now, I would have been glad, and the House would have been glad to have had the conclusion of my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) upon this report. I followed his speech very closely and I noticed that he avoided telling us what was his own conclusion. He told us of the conclusion arrived at by newspapers, and he told us what was reported on the street, but he did not tell us what his own views were. I can tell my hon. friend that I have nothing to withdraw from what I said upon a former occasion, and to which the hon. gentleman took exception. I then said in the House :

The commission have reported that in their judgment there was necessity for legislation, and they have submitted a blank Bill for the consideration of the House, which is now in the hands of hon. members. Beyond this they did not report, they made no report against anybody.

I meant of course, that they made no report against any member of parliament, and I have nothing to withdraw from that statement. The commission have made certain statements, but they have not made a report against this member of the House or that member of the House, on which this House could base a motion. I may have my own views, I may agree with the findings and some one else may disagree from them ; my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) disagrees from some of the findings, and he has given his reasons, but I am not prepared at this moment to agree or disagree with the hon. gentleman. This will come later on, but for the present I have to say that I have nothing to retract what I said on a former occasion, when I stated that in my humble judgment the report has not concluded against any member of the House. For my part, I cannot see there is any reason to have any further investigation upon the facts disclosed by the commission. The evidence appears to me to be as complete as could be taken under the circumstances, and I do not know that another investigation would add to our knowledge of the facts that have been disclosed by that evidence. Therefore, I do not know that the House, should in justice to itself, agree to the conclusion of my hon. friend from Labelle.

I now pass to another part of the motion. The hon. gentleman states that we should have an investigation into certain private matters which have been in circulation in this House, he says, and in the streets and elsewhere, against certain parties. I have stated on a former occasion that the hon. member for King's, N.B., did not name any body, and that he has made no charges against any one. My hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) told me to-day, that I was mistaken in that, and that this hon. member for King's had named Mr. Hyman Minister of Public Works, when he used the words 'he would give the reason why Hyman resigned.'

Well, Mr. Speaker, I have to perform at this moment a rather painful duty, but it is a duty which I must discharge in justice to myself and in justice to my colleague the Minister of Public Works, and when I have made the explanation the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) will understand why I would not be anxious to saw-off with the member for King's. There have been a great many rumours against my colleague, Mr. Hyman, there is no use to deny it. There have been rumours in this House that he was shamming disease and that he was not really sick. I believe that idea has been dispelled and that it is no longer entertained by any body. I believe that every body knows that when Mr. Hyman left the House he was in very bad health and was a very sick man indeed. But that was not the only rumour. The atmosphere was thick with rumours, and last fall, about September or October, a certain rumour came to me and I spoke to a mutual friend who is now in this House and hears my words, and I said to him : I have been a friend of Hyman for many years ; you are still more a friend of his than I am ; you are more intimate with him than I am ; I have heard this and you have heard it also : Go to him and tell him he must let me know what truth there is in this. That rumour was in connection with a certain person. My friend went to Mr. Hyman and Mr. Hyman sent me word that there was not a word of truth in that rumour. I have to take the House and the country into my confidence ; I wish it were otherwise. This statement made by the Minister of Public Works at that time has since been corroborated by a telegram which was read in the committee some few weeks ago, and which was sent by Mr. Hyman to Mr. Duffield, in which he says :

Any statement or insinuation that my resignation either as member or minister was prompted by other motives than those contained in my letter to Sir Wilfrid Laurier are absolutely untrue.

When I had Mr. Hyman's own word about the matter, then, when he offered me his resignation for reasons with which the House is familiar, I concluded that I would not accept his resignation and therefore, knowing what I believe to be the truth, there was no reason whatever why I should consent to a saw-off with the member for King's. The hon. gentleman Mr. Fowler) told us that if attacked he would do this and he would do that. That is his own concern, and at the present moment I have nothing to say to it. But that is not all. There are other rumours also, and if I understood my hon. friend from Labelle aright he wants us to investigate these rumours. Now, it is not a very agreeable task on the floor of parliament to have to comment upon such statements as we heard this afternoon. But this afternoon the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) speaking of my duty to the House, speaking of my duty to the public, speaking of my duty to the government, told me that I was bound to take cognizance of certain rumours that were going around the streets. He told us, among other things, that ministers of the Crown—I took a note of his words at the time, have gone into hotels with women of ill-repute, and then the hon. member (Mr. Bourassa) said that if any body knows that he should come forward with the proof, or words to that effect. Then the hon. gentleman said : If I had the proof I would bring it forward.

These are the very words made use of : 'If I had the proof I would bring it.' All I have to say to my hon. friend is, if he has not the proof, why does he mention it at all? The rumours which have been floating in the air at last fell into the gutter, and the hon. gentleman gropes in the gutter and brings those rumours into the House. Is it to investigate things of that kind that my hon. friend asks for a committee to be appointed? Is the House of Commons to investigate charges of that kind? The House of Commons can investigate charges of corruption in a public man, but I never yet knew that the House of Commons in England or in this country made itself a police court to investigate charges of this character. The hon. gentleman, however, has taken it upon himself to bring this matter to the attention of the House and, teaching me my duty, he has given me the example of Mr. Gladstone in the case of Sir Charles Dilke, and I suppose it was the same in the case of Mr. Charles Parnell. It is true that on a certain occasion Mr. Gladstone advised the friends of Parnell to compel him to withdraw from parliamentary life, but when was this? It was when the offences of Parnell had become public; when they were the subject of a judgment of a court; it was at a time when his offences were no longer a private affair, but had become a public scandal. Well, Sir, if there was anything of that kind against a friend or colleague of mine, it would be my duty to do as Mr. Gladstone did, but am I to be told that I must make myself a detective, to go about looking for private offences in order to take action upon them? Sir, if a matter of that kind came to my notice I would do as I did when I heard Mr. Hyman's name mentioned in connection with certain matters. As a member of the government, as his leader, I thought it my duty to call his attention to what was reported of him, but I do not know that I am called upon to act upon rumours and the tittle tattle of the streets. I am bound to act only upon facts, and when these facts are brought to my knowledge, I think I shall have the courage to do my duty to my friends, to my colleagues, to my party, and, if I may say so, to my country. It is unprecedented to have a motion such as we have had to-day brought to the attention of the House of Commons. If the hon. member for Labelle or any one else has charges to make against myself or against any of my colleagues he is welcome to make them. Let him do it in a parliamentary manner; let him formulate his charges and an investigation shall take place immediately. Let him substantiate anything that he has in his mind and that he thinks ought to be investigated and to-morrow the investigation shall be granted, even if it should cause the session to last three months longer. But, Sir, I protest, in the name of parliamentary life, in the name of parliamentary dignity, against the speech that was made this afternoon by the hon. member for Labelle. Public life has its duties and its responsibilities, and it has perhaps more to suffer than to enjoy; but, after all, there is one thing which we should, on one side of the House or on the other, always endeavour to maintain, that is to say, that in our daily conflicts we should fight fair and square, and never strike below the belt.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN (Carleton, Ont.). Mr. Speaker, it is to be regretted that the Prime Minister, as leader of the House, should not have seen fit to arise in his place after the hon. member for Labelle had concluded his address and place before the House the position which he thought the House should assume in view of the speech which has been made and the resolution which has been moved. Instead of that, it was very evident to us who were observing the right hon. gentleman with the expectation that he would arise, that he made a certain signal to my hon. friend from Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) and my hon. friend from Carleton arose in his place and did that duty which I suppose had been allotted to him—made an attack upon my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) in connection with that inquisitorial commission which has performed certain work assigned to it by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. It is to be regretted that the Prime Minister adopted this course and waited till after eight o'clock while that attack was going on—an attack calculated and designed to injure the reputation of my hon. friend from North Toronto if it should not be answered. Sir, tactics of that kind may be according to the view of the Prime Minister as to what is just and right towards hon. members on this side of the House. He professes a great desire for justice and fair-play, but they are not exactly in accordance with my idea of what is justice and fair-play. The right hon. gentleman has used some strong language with regard to my hon. friend from Labelle. I am not here to speak for that hon. gentleman. In certain of the criticisms which the Prime Minister has passed upon him I would be perhaps inclined to concur to some extent, but the Prime Minister must bear in mind that he himself stated in this House on the 21st day of February that the matters referred to deserve the attention of the House, and he then gave his pledge to the House that they should be investigated before the close of the session. Said the Prime Minister :

> I do not think it is fair to attack the private conduct of any man in this House unless it has become such a matter of public scandal that the presence of that man should not be tolerated in an assembly like this. I will not discuss that feature at present. I have not made up my mind that at this moment the time has come for the House to take any action upon the matter which has been brought to its attention. But that the session cannot pass without this matter being brought to the attention of the House goes without saying.

Well, the right hon. gentleman has not indicated in his speech to-night in what way this matter is to be further brought to the attention of the House. Let us look for a moment at what the circumstances are, and also at the resolution of my hon. friend from Labelle. The Prime Minister has taken the position I have just now indicated. He found fault in the first place with my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) because my hon. friend brought this motion to the attention of the House by way of an amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply. But I cannot believe that if the right hon. gentleman had desired the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) to bring this matter to the attention of the House as a question of privilege, the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) would not have been willing to adopt that course. Why did not the right hon. gentleman, as leader of the House, suggest to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) what I think would have been the proper course, namely, that instead of bringing this motion by way of amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply he should have brought it forward as a question of privilege.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Better ask my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa).

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am willing to put the question to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), if I am to be referred to him for an answer to a question which I think might be properly answered by the minister. Might I then ask my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) why he did not bring this matter up as a question of privilege?

Mr. BOURASSA. Of course, I do not want to give any reply that might be regarded as a breach of confidence. If my right hon. friend will allow me to repeat the two conversations which took place between us, I am ready to do so, but not otherwise.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have no objection.

Mr. BOURASSA. The first time I went to the right hon. gentleman I suggested that this resolution should be brought. as a matter of privilege, on a motion to adjourn the House. He suggested that it should be brought in in amendment to the motion to go into Committee of Supply. Later on he asked me if I would not bring it as a motion of privilege, but I adhered to the first suggestion made by him.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. As my hon. friend has given his version, I may give mine. I suggested to him, when he asked me whether he would bring it as a motion to adjourn, that that would never do, but that he should bring it as a motion to which we could move an amendment.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I am not prepared to settle any difference between the two gentlemen, but it seems to me that if I had occupied the position of the First Minister I would at once have suggested to the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) that a matter of this gravity should be brought forward as a matter of privilege, and that to all intents and purposes, it is one proper to be brought forward in that way and not brought on a motion to go into Committee of Supply.

The right hon. gentleman has referred to a statement in the resolution with regard to comments in the public press, rumours current throughout the country, and the condition of public opinion. I am very much disposed to agree with him as to the value to be attached to such comments; but there is something more in the resolution than that, there is reference made to matters which the right hon. gentleman himself has declared must occupy the attention of the House before its adjournment. If I took precisely the view which my right hon. friend takes of this resolution, I would be inclined entirely to concur with him, but I do not understand the resolution in that way. The resolution is that the government should ask the House to constitute a special committee to conduct a strict and impartial inquiry as to whether any ministers of the Crown or members of parliament have improperly made use of their position as such for their private gain, or have otherwise been guilty of personal misconduct, under such circumstances or of such character as to justify the intervention and censure of this House. I entirely agree with the Prime Minister that it would never do for parliament to constitute itself into an inquisition with respect to the private conduct either of members of parliament or ministers of the Crown. But I also agree with what has been said by the Prime Minister, and by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) as well, that private conduct may be of such a character as to amount to public scandal, which would call for the intervention of the Prime Minister himself. There is no doubt about that. The Prime Minister himself is, in the first place, the guardian of the honour of parliament. But he is something more than that. He is the guardian of the honour of his cabinet as a whole. He has to select his colleagues. He can go to the Governor General at any time and ask that the resignation of any member of his cabinet shall be required. Of course, it would be only in an extraordinary case that he would take a stand of that kind by reason of the private conduct of any member of his cabinet, and I am not for one moment suggesting that I know of anything which should induce him to take action of that kind. I am not making any insinuations, but merely laying down what I consider a broad public principle as to the duty imposed upon the Prime Minister in the first place as regards members of the House, and in the second place as regards members of his cabinet.

The right hon. gentleman understands this resolution to be a roving commission. I do not so understand it. If I had been proposing the resolution with regard to this particular matter, I would not have framed it exactly as my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has done. But I do understand the resolution he has submitted to the House to be one which, in the end, requires charges to be made before any investigation can be held. In the paragraph of the resolution which follows that quoted by the First Minister, we have this :

That any charges that may be preferred against any member of the government or this House should be formulated before that committee, and that members of this House or other persons who have material or data at their disposal with reference thereto should divulge them to that committee.

The right hon. the First Minister has referred to rumours, rumours around the corridors of this House, rumours in the public press, rumours circulating throughout the land. Therefore, it seems to me we should have a tribunal appointed before which any of those charges could be made, and before which any man who has anything to say against any member of this House, or of the cabinet, should present himself or for ever after hold his peace. It does not seem to me, therefore, that this resolution has the far-reaching character suggested by the right hon. gentleman.

The right hon. gentleman says that this would amount to an inquisition. Let me tell him that the inquisition proposed by the hon. mmber for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), even if it had all the characteristics which the First Minister suggests, would not be one-tenth as cruel and ruthless and unsparing as that inquisition which he sent out and which investigated the private affairs of hon. gentlemen on this side. Any man who went before a committee of this House would have the right to appear by counsel and be heard, but my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) had no right to employ counsel or to be heard. He perhaps could employ counsel, but the counsel whom he employed were not permitted to cross-examine witnesses, or to adduce evidence on his behalf, if I understand the proceedings correctly. My hon. friend from King's, N.B. (Mr. Fowler) whose name was brought into that connection was not permitted to cross-examine witnesses by counsel. What does the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) think of an inquisition of that kind, degenerating in the end to nothing more than a political inquisition as he knows, and no one knows it better than he does.

Mr. FOSTER. Except the Minister of Justice (Mr. Aylesworth).

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. What does he think of an inquisition of that kind ? He talks about justice, and fair play to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Why, Mr. Speaker, the aim was not only to get at the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) and the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for Prince, P.E.I. (Mr. Lefurgey)—the idea was to get at the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden). That was the main object and attempt of certain developments which took place before that commission, there is no doubt about that. When the right hon. gentleman tells us that he shrinks from the cruelty and injustice and inquisitorial power which could be exercised by a tribunal of this kind I ask him to reflect upon the proceedings of that commission which had for four or five weeks my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster) before it without even vouchsafing to him the privilege of going upon the witness stand and telling his story, I venture to think that under the circumstances we on this side of the House at least cannot very much appreciate the high-sounding phrases uttered by the Prime Minister to-night when he has declared to us that he cannot venture to agree with my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) because the proposal would amount to a political inquisition.

My hon. friend the member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) has dealt with some matters which have been discussed and considered in the report of this commission. I do not propose to attempt to answer the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell). The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) is here and I venture to predict that before this session is over the member for North Toronto will put his case before the judgment of parliament and before the judgment of the people of this country and he will be prepared to stand or fall by the verdict of parliament and of the country with regard to that. I would have thought when the hon. member for Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) had made that attack against men—no not against men, because he was very careful not to say very much about the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Fowler)—I should have thought that when he realized that that inquiry had been carried on against men who had not the right to be represented by counsel or to cross-examine a witness, that the instincts of British fair play——

An hon. MEMBER. He has not got any.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN—and the training which he had as a lawyer, would have taught him that he should have supported the motion of my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) instead of voting against it. Every reason that he gave was a reason for supporting that motion and he concluded by telling us that he could not support it because it was too wide-reaching and inquisitorial in its character, and yet he stood up here to-night and read, for the purpose of injuring the political reputation and the personal character of my hon. friend from North Toronto (Mr. Foster), the evidence and the report of a commission which did not allow that hon. gentleman to make his defence before it. That may be his idea of British fair play but it is not mine.

I would not have couched this resolution in these terms, nor would I have proposed this exact procedure, but I am prepared, inasmuch as this resolution refers to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, inasmuch as the remarks of my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) have touched upon the personal character of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, inasmuch as he has expressed his view as a member of parliament that there should be an investigation—and I think he took some responsibility in adopting the course which he did, and to this I will refer later on—inasmuch as he has done this, I am not prepared to vote against this resolution. I have pledged myself to two things in this House and I propose to stand by them to the end. I have pledged myself that I have not made and that I would not make any arrangement with hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House about any matter touched upon in the discussion during the past session which have been commented on by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), and I have pledged myself also that if any hon. gentleman in this House took steps to forward an inquiry touching the position of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, who are my colleagues and associates, I would give my best efforts to probe the matter of that inquiry to the bottom. Therefore I am not disposed, for the sake of any parliamentary precedent, for the sake of any hair-splitting, or for the sake of anything that has been uttered by the Prime Minister, and especially in view of the construction which I put upon this resolution, I am not disposed to vote against this motion and I shall record my vote in favour of that resolution although I wish that the procedure suggested had been different and that the resolution had been couched in somewhat different terms.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). To a very considerable extent the speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) was devoted to a censure of the Insurance Commission. I do not think that censure was well deserved. I think the gentlemen who composed that commission are citizens of sufficient reputation throughout the country to lead my hon. friend (Mr. R. L. Borden) to believe, on reflection, that probably he has not done them full justice. I do not think there is any room to doubt that the gentlemen composing that commission entered upon their work with the desire to do that which was their proper mission. However, I do not wish to dwell on that to-night at all, but rather to suggest to the hon. gentleman (Mr. R. L. Borden) that even if the Insurance Commission acted unwisely, even if the Insurance Commission was unfair to some hon. gentlemen whose names have been drawn into the matter, even if there is good ground for the complaint of my hon. friend that this Insurance Commission did not act wisely and well, that would be the poorest kind of reason for supporting the motion that has been presented to the House by my hon. friend from Labelle. So far as an investigation into insurance affairs is concerned, I think it would be difficult for a committee of this House in any reasonable time, even if they should sit for weeks, or for months longer than is contemplated, to conduct any full inquiry. It would not be reasonable to suppose that they could go into an extended review of the work of the Insurance Commission. Is it proposed that the witnesses should be recalled? I think a moment's reflection will show that the investigation that has taken place, be it fair or be it unfair—and I do not enter into that aspect of the question—has been a very full investigation, a much fuller investigation than could possibly be entered upon by a committee of this House. Now my hon. friend from North Toronto, although he has not spoken at length on the subject, has indicated that in his judgment the commission was unjust to him, and no doubt at his own itme and at his own convenience he will take his own means of putting his case before the House and before the public in a way that shall best commend itself to his judgment. So much then on the question of the Insurance Commission.

Now as to the other question which the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) has referred to, and which is after all the main question, namely the rumours and gossip and tittle tattle of the street, I say there is no justification whatever for these matters being made the ground of a grave proposition in parliament to investigate the conduct of any man. Parliament is indeed jealous of its own honour; more than that, parliament should be jealous of the honour and reputation of every member no matter on which side of the Speaker he may sit. Parliament should be so jealous of the honour of every member that it would not permit any man to be arraigned on insinuations or innuendoes, but will demand that if any member is to be condemned he should have the opportunity of meeting his accuser; that a statement shall be made that this man had committed some wrong which renders him unfit to sit in the parliament of Canada; that a charge shall be presented to the House by some hon. member who either knows the fact or has information which he believes, and is able to present to the House in good faith; then, upon an accusation of that character, and then only, should this parliament permit any one of its members to be arraigned and subject to possible condemnation. I appeal to hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House to consider whether we are at liberty to deal with this gossip and street rumour. My hon. friend says there is gossip in the lobbies affecting some hon. members, therefore give us a committee; the hon. member for Labelle says there are rumours in the public press affecting some hon. member, therefore give us a committee. Surely, Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen on both sides must see that it is beneath the dignity of the parliament of Canada to deal gravely and seriously with such rumours and such gossip as that. I submit again that we owe it, not only to the honour of parliament as a whole, but we owe it to the honour of every individual member, that no member of this great congress of the nation shall be called upon to defend himself against gossip, rumours innuendoes and slander, but that if he is to be accused he shall be accused in an open, honourable and manly way, where he will know who his accuser is and that he shall have an opportunity of meeting him in fair and open contest.

My hon. friend the leader of the opposition says that he has announced before and he repeats now that if anybody would take the responsibility of making an accusation against any member of this House he will undertake to assist him in an investigation. Quite right; a very correct position to take. But what is the situation to-day? Has any man made any accusation? My hon. friend from King's and Albert (Mr. Fowler) has not made any accusation. He has made some suggestions which may possibly, in the minds of some persons, amount to accusations. If the hon. member for King's and Albert has in his possession information which would justify him in making an accusation against any member of this House, I take it for granted that he knows his duty, and that he will be prepared at the right time to come forward and lay his charge and let the accused answer. But there is no charge; the hon. member for King's and Albert is not prepared; at all events up to this moment he has made no charge. The member for Labelle makes no charge. He particularly declares that even if this committee be granted he will make no charge. Well, see what a farce this committee would be. A committee would be appointed, a fishing committee to investigate the private life of every member of this House—because there is no limitation in the motion of the hon. member for Labelle, his motion is that this committee shall afford an opportunity to any member who wants to come forward and assail the reputation and private life of any other member of this House. Is that a dignified position for this parliament to take? Is that dealing fairly between man and man? Is this Canadian House of Commons prepared to accept this street gossip, and say that, although no man makes an accusation, although no man stands up in this House and complains of any other, because there is gossip in the street, because there are paragraphs in the newspapers, we are gravely invited to appoint a committee of the House of Commons to inquire into the private life of every hon. member, whether he sits to the right or to the left of the Speaker?

I regret to find that my hon. friend the leader of the opposition has felt it his duty to support this resolution. I feel that he, along with the right hon. the Prime Minister, are the joint guardians of the honour of this House, and in my judgment they should both feel that they owe it not only to the House as a whole but to every individual member, that private life shall be protected, and that we shall not grant a fishing inquiry of this sort unless some one is prepared to come forward and make a formal accusation. I do not say that a man's private life shall in no case be investigated ; I admit that the private life of a man may be such as to unfit him to hold a public position. But surely before we grant a committee to investigate the private life of every member of this House, we should have somebody stand up here and make an accusation in the usual way. I therefore humbly submit to this House that there is not the shadow of a ground for asking for an investigation to take place. If the member for King's and Albert feels it to be his duty to make a charge against any minister or any member of this House, he knows well the proper way to do it. If the hon. member for Labelle feels that he has information, though he may have no knowledge, if he has information which he is able to say, as he presents it to the House, that he verily believes to be true, that he is informed and believes that certain things are taking place which reflect upon the honour and the fitness of any member to occupy his seat in this House, then I take it for granted that these gentlemen will, in a proper way, and in accordance with parliamentary rules and procedure, make their accusation, and then a committee shall be granted. The right hon. the Prime Minister has said, and I scarcely need to repeat it now, that if any hon. gentleman in this House is prepared in the usual and parliamentary way, in that parliamentary way which is provided for the protection of the honour of the House and of every member in it, if any hon. member is prepared to come forward and make an accusation in such a way, then undoubtedly an investigation shall take place. The right hon. the Prime Minister has given an assurance that if such a step is taken a committee shall be promptly granted. I submit to the House that until the matter is brought forward in the way provided by the rules of parliament, this House should not lend itself to the passing of a motion calling for such an investigation as that which is contemplated by my hon. friend for Labelle.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE (Montmagny). I seconded this motion, and so far I have seen no reason to regret it. However, I do regret one thing, and that is that I did not speak before the right hon. leader of this House, and that I did not share with my hon. friend for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) the strong condemnation which the right hon. gentleman directed against my hon. friend for Labelle. This debate, Mr. Speaker, is perhaps the most important debate that ever took place in the history of this parliament. While that may not be the opinion of the supporters of the government, it was their opinion until the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) brought them to terms. What are the facts? The hon. leader of this House and the Minister of Finance have taken such a course that I think it is well again to state the question before the House. The hon. member for Labelle has given the facts this afternoon in detail; I will give them in a nut-shell. The Royal Commission on Insurance has come to certain conclusions against certain members of this House.

But what we know is that after the inquiry of the commission the Liberal press all over Canada repeated these accusations, or at least made the report of the Insurance Commission the basis of accusations and charges against members of this House. Members of this House have repeated those accusations against their fellow members, and those accusations were repeated in articles in the press and an immediate investigation was demanded by the Liberal press. Such was the situation that a member of this House, the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Duncan Ross) brought the matter again before the House and then the hon. member for King's, N.B., (Mr. Fowler) said : If you attack me I will attack you and in my attack I shall prove the connection of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House with wine, women and graft. Everybody knows that there was a great change. Everybody knows that there was a general hush down, everybody knows that the Liberal press which had been so fierce and savage against the hon. member for North Toronto and the hon. member for King's, N.B., quieted down and was silent and we saw these very same papers which had violently denounced these hon. gentlemen saying that there was no ground for an investigation, that there was nothing before the House. There was a general hush down. Then, my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) thought fit to bring the matter before the House. It was brought up and the two leaders of the different parties agreed that an investigation would be necessary, but not until the report of the Royal Commission on Insurance would be brought down. The report was brought down. The report was printed and distributed to the members, and then the right hon. leader of the House said that there was nothing to investigate. What are the reasons for that change ? Are these reasons to be found in the threat made by the hon. member for King's ? If so, then I say that there is all the more ground for demanding an investigation. If the threat of the hon. member for King's to reveal certain things can create such an intense fear on the part of the ministry and on the part of the Liberal press what will be the effect of the truth when it is revealed ? It seems to me that there is every reason for an investigation when we see that the whole of the press which has been attacking members of this House and when we see that members of this House who have been saying, as the hon. member for Wright said, that the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) was not fit to sit in this House assuming an attitude of silence.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lavergne) will allow me I do not remember ever having made the statement that the hon. member for North Toronto was not fit to sit in this House.

Mr. A. LAVERGNE. Well, I remember the statement, but of course, I accept my hon. friend's denial. Perhaps I am not quoting him correctly but I remember that he said in the debate upon the address that every one was surprised to see the hon. member for North Toronto in the House.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN. That I admit having said, but not what the hon. member for Montmagny said.

Mr. A. LAVERGNE. Well, it is a different thing but it creates the same impression. Now, since the hon. member for King's has made this threat the hon. member for Wright has not repeated the statement that he just says he made.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN. Has the hon. member for Montmagny any insinuation to make or any inference to draw from the fact of my not having spoken since?

Mr. A. LAVERGNE. What does the hon. gentleman say ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN. I am asking the hon. member for Montmagny what he means by the statement he has just made ?

Mr. A. LAVERGNE. I say that the hon. member for King's has made a general charge against members on this side of the House and I do not know if my hon. friend from Wright is not one of the accused. From my personal knowledge of the hon. member for Wright I would readily believe he is not one of them, but I do not know? How do I know? The hon. member for Labelle this afternoon wanted to know who were the ministers that the hon. member for King's was aiming at ? I would like to know who are the members whom the hon. member for King's is aiming at, and think, Mr. Speaker, that this very interruption of the hon. member for Wright shows that it is necessary to have an investigation to clear the atmosphere of this House. We are told that there are no charges but at the same time the tone in which we are told that seems to say : Do not search too much because you might find some charges. I want to have a committee of investigation and I want these charges to be brought before this committee or to be withdrawn by the hon. member for King's if he cannot prove them. This House is under a deep cloud and I think it is our duty to dissipate that cloud. I want to know if we are going to shrink before our duty ? We have been accused, of having connection with women, wine and graft.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. A. LAVERGNE. I may not use the terms that have been used by the hon. member for King's, but I am sure I am expressing what he had in his mind. This matter is a very serious one.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. A. LAVERGNE. Some of my hon. friends are laughing because they feel sure now that the majority will vote down the investigation. But, I really do not know that they would take the matter as such a joke if the investigation had been accepted by the government. These charges are most serious. I do not want to intervene in the private life of any member of this House, but let us take the last charge of the hon. member for King's. Who are the grafters in this House ? The hon. gentleman says that he has the material, the data in his hand, to prove what he has said and we have on the other side the Prime Minister stating that there have been no charges made. Mr. Speaker, the charges have been made. They have been made by the hon. member for King's. That is the real issue. It is not rumours, as the hon. Minister of Finance has said, that we want to investigate. We want to investigate the charges which have been made by the hon. member for King's and either these charges are true or they are false. If they are true there is no doubt that an investigation is necessary and that the House should deal with the guilty as it thinks fit. If they are false the investigation is still more necessary to rehabilitate the House of Commons in public opinion where, I may say, it is very much degraded. Public opinion is aroused on this question. It is so much aroused that we saw the other day in the 'Toronto World' a cartoon which was most expressive. How do we know if it is true or not without an investigation ? That cartoon suggests a serious reflection on four members of this government, or three ministers and one ex-minister.

How are we to discover if these accusations are true. I submit, Sir, it is the duty of this House to dispel every doubt and every cloud that rests on the honour of the House and on the honour of the ministers so that such dreadful cartoons as have appeared in the Toronto 'World' may never appear again. Respect for parliament is fast disappearing in this country. The press is aroused, public opinion is aroused, and yet to-night, the Prime Minister, the guardian of the honour of parliament, declares that an investigation is not necessary, that no charges are made against any members of this House and that every member of the House is an honest man. Well, Sir, the Liberal press did not say that every member of this House is an honest man until the member for King's made it shut up. Members on this side of the House do not say it of hon. members opposite, and it is not what the independent press says which has published pictures of ministers in the stocks of public opinion. But the true reason, the hidden reason, why there is not to be an inquiry is, that the Prime Minister may go to the Imperial Conference, and that his trip may not be delayed. It seems to me that prima facie the interests of Canada should be in front of imperial interests, but there is one thing that is quite sure, that is that the leader of the House could go to England and that the investigation could go on all the same. In 1897 the right hon. the Prime Minister was in London representing the first colony of the empire and doing honour to the first colony of the empire; in 1902 he was again representing Canada and doing honour to our country. But this year, if he goes to the Imperial Conference, with the shadow that is resting on the Canadian parliament, the people will see in the Prime Minister of Canada not the representative of the first colony of the empire, but the representative of a parliament where the true motives of action are wine, women, and graft.

Mr. SPEAKER. The statement just made by the hon. member is such a serious reflection upon the members of the House, that it is not in accordance with parliamentary decorum and should be withdrawn.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE. I bow to your ruling, Sir, and I am ready to withdraw my objection just as soon as the hon. member for King's has withdrawn his charge.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member should withdraw the statement.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE. Mr. Speaker, I submit to the rule; my words are there. We have been told that the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Bourassa) is too broad, and that under it we could investigate the private life of every member of this House. I deny that. What the motion says is this:

That the government should therefore ask the House to constitute a special committee to conduct a strict and impartial inquiry as to whether any ministers of the Crown or members of parliament have improperly made use of their positions as such for their private gain or have otherwise been guilty of personal misconduct under such circumstances or of such a character as to justify the intervention and censure of this House.

There is not a single reasonable man in this House who can see in the wording of that motion any power to investigate the private life of every member of this House. It has been said that the hon. member for Labelle has made no charges. How could the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bourassa) make the charges which are yet only in the mind of the member for King's? The member for King's says he has data; he has not disclosed that data, but if this motion be granted he will be obliged to disclose it. My hon. friend from Labelle and myself are not the guardians of the honour of parliament. That duty rests with the Prime Minister and that is why the motion asks that the government should take action; and provide the investigation. By voting down this motion and preventing investigation, we are neglecting our duty which stares us in the face and which the people of the country demand we should discharge. The people of Canada have put their confidence in the present government and it is due to them that they should now know if the government is worthy of that confidence.

Hon. GEORGE E. FOSTER (North Toronto). The motion which has been offered by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) is a definite motion made to effectuate a definite purpose, and, it is not in my opinion germane to the discussion of that motion, and the decision of the House upon it, that any member of the House should branch off into a general discussion of the evidence, and exhibits, and report of the Insurance Commission. At least, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to do that, I have been kindly invited on several occasions this afternoon by the member for Labelle, to explain myself, to defend myself, to guard my honour, and he has kindly offered me this opportunity that I may avail of it to do one or all of these things. I thank the member for Labelle. I am grateful to him for his solicitude for my honour and my reputation, but I must respectfully decline, on a side issue of this kind, to make my statement or to enter into the doings, the constitution, the duties, or the results of the Insurance Commission. But, the member for Labelle may rest entirely assured that this session of parliament will not have seen its final day until I shall have taken occasion (not by a side wind, but all of itself) to make some few remarks with reference to that precious commission and with reference to its report. In order to clear the air just a little and to prevent my having to recur to this again, I may say to you Mr. Speaker, and to this House, and to this country that without making up my mind hastily—and I am not prone to hasty judgment—I have come to the deliberate conclusion down in my heart (it will stay there as long as I live, though I live to be as old as Methuselah that one of the most diabolical attempts has been made under the shadow of that commission to asperse and if possible destroy the character of a fellow member of this House, that has ever been known in the history of governmental commissions. I, Sir, shall never change that opinion.

There is no evidence that can be brought that will make me change what my own eyes have seen, what my own eyes have read, and what my own observation has brought to me from day to day. I hope the member for Wright (Mr. E. B. Devlin) has gotten over the shock that my presence gave him in the early part of the session. I know the exquisite qualities of my hon. friend. I know that he is perfection itself, and I could not but be grieved by the pained expression I saw upon his countenance when, rising to speak—I think it was on the address—he happened to catch sight of the member for North Toronto and was shocked. Now, there has been a good deal of talk as to the origin of all this. Will you let me give you my idea of its origin? Is it not a rule of this House that no member shall say anything offensive of another member? And if Mr. Speaker, and the leaders of this House, and the members of this House, would endeavour to curb themselves—perhaps I am a little hasty, and perhaps I offend sometimes in the same direction; but if that were done, and done consecutively, and done with pressure from the chair, and with pressure from the leaders, we would have been spared a great deal of this exhibition to which we have been treated, and which I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, is not aiding the dignity of this parliament and is not entrenching it in the affections and the respect of the country whose respresentative it is. When the leader of the government so far forgets himself, as the leader of the government forgot himself to-night, in a discussion which ought to have had nothing to do with an attack upon any member of this House on account of what occurred in the commission, and deliberately stopped the course of the discussion, and relinquished the position which was his by right and by duty, to immediately follow my hon. friend from Labelle and give the House the benefit of his views with reference to this motion; and, instead of doing that, from preparation previously made, signalled to the member for Carleton, N.B., to lead an attack upon the member for North Toronto, it did not add much to that kindly spirit of fairness which we need to cultivate in this House, and without the cultivation of which we shall have numerous repetitions of scenes of this kind. From the time that commission opened its doors in Toronto in September—yes, and before that—until it closed its doors in this city, and afterwards, there has not been an hour or a day in which the pen and the tongue of slander have not been used against myself and other members of this House, for no reason under heaven than that it might help to kill a political opponent and blast the reputation of men whom, in their hearts, they respected and whom they feared as political opponents, and whom they chose to fight, brave men that they are, under the cover of an Insurance Commission. I respect the powers that be as long as they respect themselves; but three men seated on a bench and dubbed a Royal Commission on Insurance, fishing from one end of this country to the other, outside of the scope and province of what was committed to the commission, does not add to my respect for the name by which they were called, nor for the office which they were appointed to fill. From the time that commission opened its doors until it closed them, there was evident, beneath, on each side, in the centre, on the top, the wild desire to rope in members of the Liberal-Conservative party, no matter where they might have to seek them, no matter how far afield they must go for them. Under heaven, what reason was there for investigating the fact that a man, in 1903, travelling in the Northwest, bought some lands, held them, made payments on them, sold them to a company or to a syndicate, and that syndicate sold them to a company, and that company obtained a loan from the Union Trust Company, and the Union Trust Company had its stock largely subscribed by the Foresters' Insurance Company? What reason, under heaven, was there, but a political reason, which sent Mr. Shepley and Mr. Tilley, under the instructions of the Minister of Justice, travelling all over this country, trying to find out just what conversations those gentlemen had in that four or-five-times-removed transaction? Did it affect, to a single iota, the securities that the Union Trust Company held for the money it had advanced? Not in the least degree. When a purchase of land was made from Mr. Whitla, and the price was clear, and the payments were clear, and even the commission was clear—for, Mr. Speaker, nothing of that was kept under nor concealed; everything was open and above board, and passed through the books of the Union Trust Company and the books of the Foresters, every bit of it—what reason was there, when Mr. Shepley came up against that, and found who sold the lands to the syndicate, why he should spend hours in trying to find out whom Mr. Whitla got the lands from or whom he represented? One reason was, the only reason—to some people a good reason—to my mind a most petty reason—in order, if possible, to connect Mr. Roblin's name with the transaction.

These are examples, and only a few examples, of what I propose to go into to the very bottom before this House, and I invite the men who were going to muzzle me, and who talked of doing it on the streets and in the clubs of Toronto—I invite those men and all who wish to co-operate with them to prepare their ammunition, and to making their pleas, and to gather up their insinuations, and to prove themselves sturdy warriors in this prey of vultures on reputations higher than their own. I invite them to come, and I will meet them as a man face to face, and I will argue it out with them, though I never expect to make my case with the Minister of Justice, nor with the rabid partisan; but I will put a case before this House and this country that any unprejudiced man, I believe, will support me in; and no more than that can I do. I have lived too long to feel that every wasp that buzzes and stings is fatal to a man's life and inimical to his bodily existence. At the same time, wasps are not pleasant and stings are not nice. They are the lot of a public man, and I take the bitter with the sweet and the stings with the rest of it: but down in my heart there is the consciousness that the face of clay cannot put a dishonourable public act to my discredit since I entered public life in 1882. My private reputation is in my own hands and in the hands of my friends and will be judged for what it is worth. But, Sir, I have travelled a little out of the line I indicated when I got up a moment ago. My hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) put a conundrum to me. All these papers, he said, have been publishing hard things about you and criticising you severely and I am somewhat surprised that you should have kept silent so long. And he said that I was not silent in the Cinq Mars case but brought that young gentleman before the bar of the House for something he had written against me. True, Sir, I did, but I did it merely for the sake of example, and my life would not be worth living if I were to follow up every newspaper reporter and critic who wrote not only hard things but absolute lies about me. I would not have a moment's rest if I had to hunt down that genus from day to day and from year to year. The bar of the House would have to be five times enlarged if I were to bring before it all those guilty of such attacks. And then there is this other little circumstance to be borne in mind, with reference to these editors and writers who have been attacking me, that I doubt if I would have the constitutional right to call them to the bar of the House because they are not guilty of violating any privilege of parliament. The hon. gentleman suggested that I should appeal to the higher tribunal and said that I had made a promise to that effect. True I did make a statement of the kind once in the city of Toronto, but I did it under pressure. I had had then no experience of Royal Commissions, but my ignorance has since been completely dispelled. I know something about them now. Talk about the Czar of Russia, talk about any inquisition you can find in any community in the world, talk about absolutism anywhere, you will not find anything that compares with the Royal Insurance Commission, such as was constituted by this government and which carried out an inquiry during the last few months in this country. That commission was appointed to investigate the working of insurance socities, but its scope was self-enlarged to such an extent as to inquire into matters of every description provided the Liberal-Conservative party could be prejudiced in some way by the inquiry. You go before that Royal Commission and get the best counsel you can—and I know to my cost that counsel are very expensive—you pay them very heavy fees and then they are hampered in every possible way in conducting your case. Why, Mr. Shepley at one time seemed very much annoyed because my counsel wanted to put certain questions and said to him in so many words: Sit down, sir, you have no rights before this court. I said to the commission: That throws a rather lurid light on these proceedings. I have here my counsel but apparently he has no rights before this commission. Yes, said Mr. Shepley, he has no rights but those of courtesy. My hon. friend from Carleton, N.B. (Mr. Carvell), if he would stop a moment to think, if he would rid himself of the idea that he has to look at this matter as an unreasonable partisan in order to curry favour with the party he supports, would know that my case could not be favourably put before that Royal Commission with any fairness or justice, when my counsel had not the right to cross-examine or put any question save through the government or prosecuting counsel. Therefore it would make a reasonable man view with some little tenderness and some little limit of forbearance the evidence and——

Mr. CARVELL. Was not the hon. gentleman given the privilege of making out a statement at his leisure and filing it with the Royal Commission as a part of his evidence and did he not do so, and is that statement not contained in the evidence as printed?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman did ask, by the grace of the commission, and was graciously permitted to make a short statement. It was not allowable to make out statements and put them in typewritten form at your leisure, your whole case, and put it in, that was expressly forbidden, but I was allowed—and I was charged to be as short as possible—to make a final statement which will be found in the evidence but which covers a very few points and which is short, of course, as it had to be under the circumstances on those points.

Under those circumstances before a commission with those powers, those methods and that method of procedure, I felt from day to day that I was not having fair play, and so I did at one time state that I should appeal to a higher tribunal. That tribunal is this parliament and this country whose representatives we are. To that I propose to appeal, but I propose to do it in my own way and to choose my own time.

Now, Sir, it is a grave point with me just how far private matters should be joined to the representative as a part of his representative position and brought into this House. I do not think I can agree with my hon. friend from Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) on the point which I thought he elaborated a little this afternoon. If I were conducting a grocery business and if somebody outside caviled at the way in which I conducted it and said I was not doing it fairly, or rightly, I do not think that would be a matter that should be brought into the House of Commons on which I could be twitted, on which insinuations could be given out or on which an inquiry of any kind by parliament should be instituted. If I give light weight, if I sell adulterated goods, the laws of the country deal with me, and they are to be put in force against me. But the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) rather thought that if that grocery business under the unlimited exercise of powers by a Royal Commission, were brought up and investigated by a Royal Commission, and somethings with reference to it were put in the report of the commission that then it would become a subject which this parliament could take up and into which it could command an official inquiry in respect of me as a member of parliament in the conduct of my grocery business. I think my hon. friend from Labelle will see that he will have to do a little sifting and a little elimination ; he has to settle with himself, in the first place with reference to that commission as to how far they transcended the scope of their commission and the reasonable extent of their duties. If they went beyond that and took hold of a man's private business, which they never should have touched, I think he will agree with me that the mere fact of my affairs having been touched by the commission and so brought into the report is not any warrant why a committee of investigation should be called for in my case with respect to that. That is my position. But I go just as far as I went the other day to say that the time does arrive when private character or lack of it, is to be taken into account in a House of parliament in some way or the other. You may let the offending member or the supposed offending member, if you like, settle the score with his constituents who sent him as their representative, and the fact that he has to go back to his constituents and get a renewal of their confidence, will induce caution in that respect, or ought to ; but I think that it should go even further. The tribunal with reference to ministers is the Prime Minister himself. He calls the individuals of his cabinet, he cannot disassociate his call of a member to his cabinet from these other considerations and he should be as sensitive and as jealous of the honour of every member of his cabinet as a man of his wife, as a father of his child, and the Prime Minister of any country has in that respect the keeping of this matter and the judgment of this matter largely with himself. But the course in Great Britain is plain enough. If a representative of the people or a member of the cabinet in his outside private life, renders himself amenable to the law and is convicted by a process of the law, then the course is plain, parliament has a perfect right to purge itself of the criminal and so to make its atmosphere purer and better. But I do hold that it is a delicate proceeding to undertake to regulate the private lives of people and to do it by a partisan committee of the House of Commons. It is a very delicate and sensitive thing to undertake. Let any member take it to himself ; supposing I am called to defend my moral character and my private business character before five members of this House, three of them my political opponents and two of them my political adherents, it almost goes without saying in these days that you will have an ineffective tribunal, that you will get ineffective justice and that the investigation will probably make it worse than it was in the beginning.

Mr. BOURASSA. Has the hon. gentleman noticed that the scope of the powers of the commission would be limited by this last sentence of the substantial paragraph in the motion ?

> Of personal misconduct under such circumstances or of such a character as to justify the intervention and censure of this House.

Therefore it does not relate to private matters that do not come within this description of matters that justify the intervention and censure of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. But who is to be the judge of that ?

Mr. BOURASSA. The House.

Mr. FOSTER. In the first place I think it must be the committee.

Mr. BOURASSA. Under the authority of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, under the authority of the House, and I would rather not be sent up to a partisan committee of the House. So much with reference to that. I think we are justified in saying with the member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) that outside in the country there is a great deal of thinking going on and there is a good deal of speaking that is being done, and I look upon that with respect and with hope. All of us want a House of Commons which shall be a credit to Canada in its composition, in its mental ability, in its standing and in its moral character. Our country is so good that no parliament can be too good for it, and it should be and it is a hopeful sign that the country takes cognizance of these things that are being said and affirms its belief in and its desires for the best and steadiest and brightest and strongest parliament that we can possibly have in this country. As I said before I do not propose to carry this discussion very far to-night.

I must make one remark with reference to my hon. friend from Carleton County, N.B. (Mr. Carvell) for fear I might not think of it when the discussion comes up again. Does he think that it was fair treatment to try to represent me as being in fact the sole arbiter of, the dispenser of, the disposer of, the trust funds of the Independent Order of Foresters? I do not belong to that body, I am not an officer of that court, I have not and never had one iota of influence or power as to the disposal of its funds, or the investment of is funds, in any shape or manner. It may be good party tactics, but I doubt it, for a member of this House to attempt to create the impression that I had everything to do with the disposition of the funds of the Foresters, and that the Foresters have a right to call me to account for the disposition that has been made of them. I think my hon. friend himself will see that that was not quite a fair representation of the case. That impression is abroad, does my hon. friend wish to deepen it, strengthen it? It is open to him to do it if he wishes. I have a letter in my possession now from a man whom I believe to be a well thinking and well disposed man. He lives in a distant place, he has caught the headlines of the newspapers, and he writes me a letter which is one way affecting. He had some knowledge of me years ago, but he writes to me now in this way: I am an ill man, I have a wife and two children, do you think it was right for you to squander, to dispose of, to recklessly expend and cause the loss of the money which was to go into the funds of the Independent Order of Foresters for the support of my wife and children when I die? Do you think that you can meet a just Heaven with that blood upon your conscience? That man is honest about it, he has read the headlines, he believes that I have gone through the whole of the Foresters' funds, and that there is nothing left for his wife and children when he dies. At the other end of the scale—but I am not going to say it is the highest end of the scale—is an article in 'Le Canada' which I have in my desk, published in the metropolitan city of Montreal. In almost the same sense, but in different words, it has pointed out a similar accusation, and I am branded as being the destroyer, the pilferer, the reckless dispenser, the spender and wrecker of the funds designed for widows and orphans. Now does my hon. friend from Carleton want to join hands with that sort of thing? He knows me, he knows me from my youth up, and he knows in his heart that that is not a fair characterization of me. Why join hands in that kind of warfare? It is not the best party warfare, and it will not result in the best advantage. But to my hon. friend from Carleton, and to 'Le Canada,' and to all others let me say, that if I am to be shouldered with the responsibility of having made all the investments and of having had no one to curb me, I have at least this consoling reflection, that if you take the four or five years of the management, the share I had in it, of the Union Trust Company, you have four years of constant and I believe almost unexampled prosperity in the history of trust companies in Canada. Every one of those investments which your precious commission always took care to style speculations, every one of those investments has resulted in large cash profits. To my mind they were made for that purpose, and in the firm faith that they would come to that result. I want to state this, that if the impression has got abroad that the Foresters' funds have been depleted through my management of the Union Trust Company, it is absolutely untrue. The Foresters' funds have accumulated profits of very large proportions out of every investment that was made, partly through my management, and with the concurrence of the directorate of which I formed part. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to pursue this subject further to-night, but I do intend to take the very earliest opportunity of placing my views with reference to this commission, and incidentally alongside of that, make my defence and my statement to this House and to this country, and my hon. friend from Labelle may rest assured that the session will not end until that has been done.

Mr. EMMANUEL DEVLIN (Wright). I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the question before the House, but only to refer to a remark of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Armand Lavergne). He made an allusion in a joking way, and as I do not suppose he meant any thing serious by it, I will not take it seriously. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) has upon two occasions chosen to refer to certain remarks made by me at the beginning of this session. I have listened with a good deal of interest to the speech delivered this evening by the hon. member for North Toronto. I admire his ability, I do not know that he has a peer in this House as a debater. At the same time, I do not wish to take him as my political guide, nor do I propose to remain silent when he castigates hon. members right and left. The hon. member for North Toronto made reference to certain remarks of mine which will be found at page 117 of 'Hansard,' where I said;

Sir, Mr. Hyman won his seat; Mr. Hyman could have held his seat. And still he is not in his place to-day. Why? Because he is an honourable gentleman. Would the hon. member for North Toronto, I ask, do the same? If so, let him do it. There are many in this country who think it high time that he ask his constituents whether he still retains their confidence.

The hon. member for North Toronto seems to have felt very much aggrieved at these words. But I was then using the tu quoque argument and if the hon. gentleman will refer to page 47 of the 'Hansard' he will find that in dealing with the case of Mr. Hyman he himself said:

It is no light thing, the revelations which have been made in the London elections, taken in connection with the history of election contests in this country and with the debates in this House and the proceedings in the committees in this House—no light thing but rather a grave and serious thing which has resulted in the resignation of one of the ministers of the Crown. That is, Mr. Speaker, if he has resigned, and upon that I cannot form an opinion which is satisfactory to myself.

He goes on to say:

And if what took place showed that he had no right to his seat it shows still more that he had no right to administer one dollar of the public money of this country until he has cleared his skirts with reference to that.

Does not the hon. member for North Toronto think that Mr. Hyman has some feelings left? Does the hon. member for North Toronto think that I was out of place in standing up in this House and trying at least to defend a colleague and a sick man? If he thinks that after all the words he has used this evening or all the words he has uttered on a previous occasion that I would fail to defend a colleague or a political friend when occasion required, then I assure the hon. gentleman that he is very much mistaken.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY (North Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to detain the House at any great length, but I do desire to give a reason for the vote which I am going to give to-night and also to express the view which some hon. gentleman may agree with and some may not that the motion and the speeches which have been made to-night are not relevant to the matter sought to be put at issue in this debate. But before doing that I would like to refer to one or two remarks made by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) in reference to the Insurance Commission. He stated that the reason or the cause of the appointment of that commission was that it might seek out and find some Conservative members of parliament for the purpose of traducing them in their private or public capacity.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has mistaken me.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY Then I have misunderstood the hon. gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. The first part of it I did not say, but I do stand sponsor for the statement that after they were in working order they were used for that purpose.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. Well, I did not misunderstand the hon. gentleman, but I think he did not say what he intended.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what I intended.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. The impression that he sought to leave on one's mind was that the commission was appointed for that purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. L. G. McCARTHY. In order that there may be no misunderstanding about it we must have regard to the facts and circumstances which occurred just prior to its appointment. The House will remember that there was a great disturbance in reference to insurance in the republic to the south of us and that a commission or committee was appointed, that an investigation took place and that transactions of a most serious nature were made known to the public. After which great clamour took place in the newspapers of Canada with the result that the insurance companies of Canada were investigated by a Royal Commission. It was for that purpose that this commission was appointed. That, I think, clears up any doubt that may have arisen in the mind of any hon. gentleman as a result of the remarks which fell from the lips of the hon. member for North Toronto.

Then, the next point I desire to refer to is the question of the rights of counsel before that commission. The hon. gentleman has correctly said that counsel were not permitted to ask any questions except through the counsel appointed by the government. That was objected to not alone by the hon. member for North Toronto on behalf of the Foresters, but by every other insurance company that appeared before the commission and like rights were meted out or allowed to each insurance company. No different right were accorded to one insurance company over another, so that all companies and all parties who were being investigated were accorded the same treatment by the commission. Then, I would like to ask the hon. member for North Toronto why it was that he did not make the announcement, which I was pleased to hear him make to-night, and which is the attitude I have taken when discussing this matter with members of this House, that the report of the Royal Commission on Insurance was one that dealt entirely with insurance and that in so far as it affected any individual or private person in the Dominion of Canada it was to be taken as correct pro confesso until it was attacked by him or on his behalf. I submit to the hon. gentleman that we should take that position. In so far as it appertains entirely to the question of insurance we will deal with that when we deal with the Insurance Bill, which, I think everybody agrees, cannot be dealt with at this session. If it attacks any person improperly in his public or private capacity, then his remedy is to bring that evidence up here, make an attack upon the findings of the commission and defend himself by adducing further evidence if he can in opposition to the report of the commission. If that is a fair statement of the situation, and I think the hon. member for North Toronto will agree with me that it is, then why and wherefore is all this discussion by the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) to-day? Where does it lead us to? What result does he seek to attain? Up to the present moment or until the hon. member for North Toronto spoke, save the demand of the hon. member for East Simcoe for an investigation in answering those who had spoken, the findings are taken as the judgment of the Royal Commission. If you attack them all, well and good, but surely this House does not require any further investigation to determine anything in regard to the evidence which was heard by that Royal Commission which has now been laid on the table of the House. What result is expected to be attained. Although we are told by the hon. gentleman who has spoken in this House that the facts as found are not correct, let us assume for the purpose of this argument that they are correct; what can this House do? He says that there are things in that report which make it impossible for a man to sit in this House. Is that correct? Is that the real situation? Can we expel any member of this House by reason of the facts found in the Royal Commission's report? If we cannot, wherefore an investigation? What is the investigation for? What is the result that we can hope to attain by such an investigation? I am at a loss to understand it. I cannot understand it. I think this has been surrounded by a maze and a haze by the hon. member for Labelle in his speeches and by the press during the discussion which we have had during the past two months in regard to the matter. If you could say that on the findings of this commission you could expel a member from this House there might be something in it, but I do not understand such to be the law. We have an Act which prevents members of parliament from doing certain things. If the independence of Parliament Act has been contravened then this House should take notice of it. The hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) says we should have a standing tribunal for the purpose of investigating such matters. We have; beyond a shadow of a doubt we have. If that Act has been contravened, if any member has been guilty of corruption we have a standing tribunal. The Committee on Privileges and Elections is ready at any time to take up such a question, because it is constituted for that purpose among other things. Therefore, in so far as any act of corruption or any other act in contravention of the independence of parliament is established we have a standing tribunal ready to investigate that matter. Now, if what has been found or what has been declared does not contravene the independence of Parliament Act, what does it contravene? What is the innuendo or insinuation alleged against any member of this House? Is it that he has misappropriated funds? If he has the tribunal by which he should be held is not in this House. We have our constituted courts for the investigation of these matters both in a criminal and a civil way. If any hon. member has been guilty of misappropriating funds or embezzlement there is a tribunal to deal with that question. The question can be tried either in our criminal or civil courts. If they have been guilty of such an offence the civil courts are open to those who lost money to recover it; if on the other hand a criminal offence has been committed, then the criminal courts should be resorted to. If any law affecting the honour and the right of a member to sit in this House has been infringed, then let that be pointed out, and let the matter be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. If the jurisdiction to deal with it does not rest in that committee then it does not rest anywhere in this parliament, and it must go outside the House to the civil or criminal courts. As to the report of the Insurance Commission, it is my view now and it has always been my view, that there is nothing in that report which concerns the honour of this House, in the sense which is sought to be attached to it. If it can be proven that any member has contravened the Independence of Parliament Act, then let us have an investigation before the Privileges and Elections Committee, which is the tribunal specially constituted for that very purpose. The argument on that branch of the subject, applies equally well to the allegation with reference to, wine, women, and graft. I take it that a charge of graft amounts to an absolute charge of corruption, and if proven it would disqualify the member against whom it is proven, from sitting in this House. It is a serious charge indeed. But, has any one ever heard of a British subject being taken before a tribunal without some definite charge being made against him which he is given an opportunity to answer? Be it the most trivial offence or be it the gravest, British fair play and British justice protects the man charged; first he is indicted, then he is brought before a grand jury, and if a true bill be found he is tried. But to-day, we are asked to grant a committee to investigate allegations, without a single man being named, and without any pretense of a charge. If there is a charge of corruption against any member, let that member be named and let the charge be stated, and let the trial come before the Privileges and Elections Committee. If my argument be sound then if there is any charge of graft, that is the way to deal with it. I do not know quite what is meant by the reference to wine and women, but I assume, from the discussion that it means an allegation of immorality. If any hon. member has transgressed in that respect he is amenable to the laws of the country, and surely we have lived too long under British institutions to say that under British law there is not a remedy to right such an evil, if it exists. If any man has been guilty of an offence against the civil law or against the criminal law outside of this House, is there not a properly constituted tribunal to try him and to punish him if he is guilty? Has any one ever heard of a parliamentary committee being appointed to investigate such insinuations as have been made in this House? I think not. I agree with the hon. member for North Toronto, and I have been saying it for some time, that this kind of discussion does not tend to enhance the reputation of the Canadian House of Commons throughout this country or throughout the world. Never were my feelings more hurt than to-night, when the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Armand Lavergne) said that our Prime Minister having on former occasions gone to England with honour to represent the premier colony, he would this year go to represent, what the hon. member was pleased to call, wine, women and graft. Things have come to a pretty pass, if, to gain any kind of political kudos, or in order to put ones self in prominence before the country, such speeches have to be made as that which we hear from the member for Montmagny. This country will not countenance such a thing; no Britisher will listen to them, without reproving such remarks made by a member of parliament to be telegraphed throughout the world. Now, suppose we investigated to our hearts content all that this motion calls for, what would be the result? Suppose you find that five men in this House are of the most dissolute habits, where is your remedy? After you have had your investigation and washed your dirty linen, could you expel these men or any one of them? No, you certainly could not. But suppose parliament should expel such a man, and he returns to his constituents and is re-elected, what can you do about it? The tribunal which must decide in the end is the member's own constituents. Bradlaugh refused to take oath in the British House of Commons; he was expelled on more than one occasion, he went back to his electors and was re-elected each time and presented himself at the bar of the House and finally he had to be admitted to his seat. And so it is, that should you expel a man, he goes back to his constituents and his constituents pronounce upon his case in the end. It seems to me that we have been wasting much time uselessly over this matter. It seems to me that no matter how much investigation we have in this House in respect to these matters which I have alluded to, it is the people of the constituency who must decide as to whom they desire to represent them in this House of Commons. And to the people it is my opinion perfectly safe to leave it.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS (Yale-Cariboo) before the question is put I want to say a word——

Mr. TAYLOR. I rise to a point of order; the hon. gentleman has already spoken.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not recollect that the hon. member has spoken.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. I rise to a point of order in connection with this resolution:

The resolution states:

> That on the 19th of February last the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler), addressing the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo, stated: 'We will show your connection with Mr. Hill.'

I have already categorically denied in this House, that I have had any connection with Mr. Hill which would affect my independence as a member of parliament, or, that I have had any connection with Mr. Hill directly or indirectly, or with the Great Northern Railway Company. I now express the hope that the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) will take advantage of the earliest opportunity to withdraw any imputation which may be contained in that statement. I will leave that to the hon. member for King's. But, Mr. Speaker, having denied that charge from my seat in the House, you have ruled to-day that the matter cannot be discussed nor referred to. I now find that this statement of the member for King's is resurrected and placed in a resolution submitted to this House. I take this point that I having denied this statement the House is bound to accept that denial, and if it does accept it, the statement cannot be resurrected in a resolution submitted to this House, and to that extent this resolution is out of order, and I would like to have that statement expunged from it.

Mr. BOURASSA. Might I, on the question of order, give this explanation, that the statement made in the resolution does not at all imply that the House should concur in the statement of the hon. member for King's, but that a committee of inquiry should be appointed, before which the hon. member for King's should make good the statement which he has not withdrawn. There is nothing in the resolution going in the direction of implicating the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo. It simply puts before the House a statement which has been made, and which has been denied, but which has not been withdrawn, and therefore it is among those statements which should be investigated by the House.

Mr. DUNCAN ROSS. Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me to make this point clear, as far as I am personally concerned, it is of no moment to me; but I want to establish this fact, that neither the hon. member for Labelle nor any other member has a right to submit such a resolution to the House unless he does it on his own responsibility as a member. He has no more right to do this than he has to pick up the gossip of the street and fling it at members of the House. My point is that if the hon. member for Labelle is going to move this resolution in this particular form, he must expunge from it any reference to myself, unless he assumes responsibility for that reference.

Mr. ARMAND LAVERGNE. Mr. Speaker, speaking on the point of order, the hon. member complains that the statement made against him, which is quoted in the resolution, is false, and that he has already denied it. It is evident that the statement, not having being withdrawn, should remain in the resolution, because it is one of the reasons stated why the investigation should take place. Since the statement has not been withdrawn, it remains before the House with the hon. gentleman's denial, and it is for the committee of investigation to find out where the truth is.

Mr. SPROULE. I disagree with the hon. gentleman entirely. When a statement is made in this House, and it is emphatically denied by the member to whom it refers, it is the duty of every member of the House to accept that denial, and it is not competent for any member of the House afterwards to repeat the statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. As I understand the matter, the statement was originally made by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler). It was categorically denied by the hon. member for Yale-Cariboo (Mr. Duncan Ross). That denial, under the practice of the House, is accepted, and the statement cannot subsequently be renewed. It can no more, it seems to me, be renewed in the words of a resolution offered to the House than it can be in the speech of a member addressing the House. I think, to that extent, the resolution is out of order.

Mr. BOURASSA. I have no objection to withdraw those words.

Mr. H. H. MILLER (South Grey). Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to take up the time of the House more than for a very few minutes; but I wish to say that I think that any man or number of men who attack the reputation of any public man, or any number of public men, without having a reasonable justification for the attack, do a great injury and a great wrong—not only a wrong to the person attacked, but a great public wrong, because when you lead the great public to have less respect for the lawmakers of the country you at the same time cause them to have less respect for the laws of the country. Graft and immorality in high places, if it exists, is made an excuse for graft and immorality all along the line; but if, as some of the speakers who have addressed the House today would lead us to believe, it is the current belief in this country that the men constituting the Canadian House of Commons are not at least as honest, as honourable and as patriotic as the people who have sent them here, I believe that for that belief there is no foundation whatever. I at all times and in every place, whether speaking to one man or to a number of men, have made the statement and endeavoured to emphasize it, as it was my honest opinion, that the 214 men who compose the Canadian House of Commons are, as a body of men, equal in honour, in probity and in integrity to any equal number of men that you will find congregated together for any purpose in any part of this Dominion, nor can any political capital be made by any attempt to blacken the reputation of the men upon either side of the House alone, for if men are led to believe that evil exists they will conclude that the bad is not confined to one side, but is general. If the people of this country are prone to believe that the character of the men composing this House is not as good as it ought to be, what is the matter and who are to blame? I think the press of the country is somewhat to blame if that belief exists to any general extent. I do not blame the press in general. I think, as a rule, the press of this country endeavours to be fair; but there are some newspapers, some editors and some reporters who, for some reason, are not careful as to what they say with regard to the character and the reputation of public men.

Actuated sometimes by bitter partisanship, at other times it may be by personal malice, at other times through a greater or less degree of ignorance, and again it may be simply through a desire to be smart, newspapers say with regard to public men that which has a more evil result than is intended by the men who pen the words. I remember during the first session of the present parliament a newspaper published in the city of Toronto had in its columns what purported to be a letter from its reporter at Ottawa, in which it was stated that the corridors of the House of Commons were so filled with women of evil character that it was difficult for one to walk through the halls and corridors of the House, and that the amount of strong drink consumed by the members at Ottawa was something astonishing. That was a libel which no newspaper man should have written and which no newspaper should have published. Again, a short time ago, I read in a newspaper in reference to the death of two members, one on one side and one on the other side of politics, men respected and loved by all the members of the House, whose death we regarded with regret and sorrow, a remark one finds it difficult to account for.

Commenting upon the number of deaths in the House of Commons, that newspaper wondered whether it was light work and high living which caused the deaths of so many of them. That was a statement in which there was doubtless no intentional malice. It was simply a foolish statement made with the idea of saying something smart. Again sometimes preachers and moralists, for some purpose or another—and for what pupose I can scarcely conceive—make statements they should not and which reflect discredit on members of the House and public men generally. It was stated in the press the other day that a minister somewhere in western Ontario, speaking of parliament and of the conduct of members of parliament, said that at the opening of the session all the evil and immoral women in the country flocked to the capital. I hope that that is not true. I would be sorry to think that any minister of the gospel would make any statement so utterly unjustifiable and without foundation. But I would ask whether, even in the opinion of the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution, we should appoint a committee to investigate every idle, foolish and foundationless newspaper and other rumour and report? Members of the House of Commons themselves are, some of them, largely to blame for that belief which is said to exist in the country. The hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), speaking in this House on the 21st February last, appealed for sympathy in language to which no one could bring objection. He said:

There are some gentlemen on the other side of the House who seem to think that this is a very laughable affair. But to a man who has a conscience, and human feeling, who has not lost all sensitiveness, who has friends and values them, who has dear ones and loves them, it is not all the nicest and sweetest of conditions that he has to pass day by day through accusations veiled and insinuations made and has simply to pass them off at one side and take the bitter with the sweet in the public life he has chosen as his career.

No one can find fault with that appeal of the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), but, as he has said to-night, he has sometimes been guilty himself. Speaking in this House last session, he was scarcely fair, when he made a bitter attack on the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton). That hon. gentleman was absent but he had the privilege, and availed himself of the privilege, of defending himself afterwards. But the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) at the same time attacked Mr. Preston and Mr. Smart, who had not the privilege of replying and could not make the reply they might have if they had been members of the House. He should have remembered that these men too have feelings and have those who are near and dear to them.

As regards the insurance matters with which the hon. gentleman's name has been connected, I quite agree with him and the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) that the investigations of the Insurance Commission are not a subject which should be made a matter of inquiry by any committee of this House. I do think that the hon. gentleman, now that he has had time for reflection and looks back upon his action and that of his associates in connection with the Union Trust Company and the Independent Order of Foresters, will agree in thinking that it would not be wise if our laws were so made and continued as to permit managers handling trust funds to handle them as he did those of the Foresters. It seems to me that the real outcome of the insurance investigation must be this, that our laws may be so amended as to prevent a recurrence of that sort of thing. The hon. gentleman has sought to make a little capital by posing as a martyr. I do not think he has any right to seek to excite sympathy in that respect. He is endeavouring to convey the impression that the insurance commission was made use of for the purpose of blackening his reputation and destroying his character.

Mr. TAYLOR. Do you not think so yourself?

Mr. MILLER. No, and I will tell you why. The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) found a statement in the report of that commission which he considered a reflection on Senator Cox. Well, every body knows Senator Cox to be a leading Liberal. The report therefore criticises not only the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), a Conservative, but Senator Cox who is a Liberal. And I have a letter here from an insurance company complaining of unfair treatment by that commission, yet no one connected with that company is known as a prominent politician on the one side or the other. But of course, every one who has been adversely criticised by that commission feels that he has been unfairly used. On that same day that the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster) made his appeal for sympathy, the 21st of February, the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), said :

Hon. members opposite may laugh, but I have some feelings and so have those who are near and dear to me.

But that hon. gentleman last session we found making attacks upon whom and for what? Upon the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Conmee) because his son-in-law happened to be connected with a company which had a government contract. He also attacked the member for North Ontario (Mr. Grant becaues a brother of his had bought twenty-eight acres of Indian land at $5 an acre from the government. He also made charges against the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Campbell) because the company with which he was connected had put in the lowest tender for the supply of flour to the penitentiaries, and had been awarded the contract. The hon. member for Labelle himself (Mr. Bourassa) has not been sinless in this respect but has done his share in a general way towards discrediting members of this House. Speaking in 1896 —and his remarks will be found on page 3010 of 'Hansard,' he said :

If both political parties in this parliament are really desirous, not of lowering the dignity of parliament, but of raising the level of morality and the standard of independence in this House, they should make an agreement that every member going out of this parliament shall not receive one cent from the electoral fund of either party to carry on his election. This will mean a large economy to this country because we have to face the facts as they are, and we know very well that the money which is spent in election by both parties does not fall from the heavens. It is subscribed by people who expect to be repaid and it is repaid by the country in the end.

Sir, the question is sometimes asked : How is it that there is so little independence of conduct in the parliament of Canada ? The root of that question lies in the fact that most of the members of the House, except the wealthiest ones—and sometimes even the wealthiest ones, acting in this respect, as they do in respect to the indemnity, are not the last to go to the committee to get their funds —are under a kind of moral pledge, as our code of political morality would put it, of supporting their party tooth and nail under any kind of circumstances, because their past elections have depended and their future elections will depend on the funds which are given to them by their party.

And in response the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) said :

I get nothing from any such fund.

Now, Sir, I charge this that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) had no business to rise and that he had not the facts to warrant him in rising and saying that most of the members of the House on either side had their election expenses paid or partially paid by funds subscribed by either one party or the other. As an effect of that statement we have found repeated more than once in the Toronto 'World' the statement of the hon. member for Labelle. (Mr. Bourassa) that that comment was made and that nothing was said in reply except by the worthy editor of the Toronto 'World.' All around me are members on the Reform side,—and for all I know the same thing applies to members on the other side—every cent of whose election expenses were paid out of their own pockets and not contributed to out of any party fund whatever, I was astonished and astounded this afternoon when the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) referred to a report received from some gossiping source that some one connected with this parliament had been turned out of a hotel because of disreputable and immoral conduct with which two or three women were connected. I think it should be beneath the dignity of any member of this House who is not prepared to produce evidence, to say that he has heard some miserable gossiping story of that kind. Any member should be ashamed to repeat such a story within the walls of the House or elsewhere. I have always thought that the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa) was at least sincere ; I have always respected him as a man who desired to be sincere and I trust he will not, by continuing the conduct that he has pursued in the last few days, justify people in putting him in the same class with that other man who many long years ago in a public way and public place is said to have exclaimed : God I thank Thee, that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican.

One word as to the utterance of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler). That hon. member said that there are two legitimate lines of defence : one is to prove the charge that is made against him to have no foundation in fact and the other to attack the other fellow. My hon. friend from King's and Albert (Mr. Fowler) follows the second line of defence, that is to attack the other fellow. It seems to me it would have been better had he taken the other ground, the higher and better ground of proving there is no basis for the charge made against him. My hon. friend from King's (Mr. Fowler) has practically said: I have information that will incriminate certain members of this House, but I have my price; if you will be quiet, if you will not investigate certain matters that are threatened to be investigated, then I will keep silent and not say anything at all and not give out the information I possess. He should withdraw his charges or make them definite. Now, Sir, it seems to me that the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden), if to-night he votes as his words indicate he will, is making a very, very cheap bid for a little temporary handclapping and temporary popularity. If he had the notion or the idea of voting for the resolution before he heard the speech of the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Lavergne) I cannot see how he can still have that idea and still intend to vote for that resolution. What does my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Armand Lavergne) say. He says: The other day there was a picture in a Toronto paper of four men in the stocks and unless we have a committee we cannot tell whether that picture be true. Are we to have parliamentary committees to investigate pictures and say whether they are true? What is a cartoon in a newspaper? The very brazen impudence of the cartoon—generally good natured, but still brazen—is the life, is the spice of the cartoon. I may say that a little while after that cartoon appeared in the Toronto 'World,' I saw another cartoon in the same paper showing the leader of the government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the leader of the opposition (Mr. R. L. Borden) in very scanty attire, in the neighbourhood of a bath tub. Well, if the hon. member for Montmagny has his committee appointed to investigate the four men in the stocks, might not some other man ask for some other committee to investigate that cartoon, and where will our committees of investigation end? Another important point, the resolution moves for a committee to investigate the character of any member of the House against whom any person may bring a charge. I would like to know what members in the House are going to form that committee? Pick out your members where you will, five, six, nine, twelve or fifteen and constitute your committee and the very hour your committee is appointed some one brings a charge, maybe without any foundation at all, against one, two or three members of that committee. Then who will constitute your committee?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. MILLER. I have said all I intend to say, and am quite willing to let the matter go.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe). I had intended to make some remarks on this famous investigation on this so-called Insurance Commission, the head of which was Judge MacTavish, county judge of Carleton. I may say, in passing, that Judge McTavish is not unknown in the province of Ontario as being a gentleman well adapted for commissions. Those who come from Ontario will remember that he was on the famous West Elgin commission, and I do not think the Ross government had any cause to complain of the part he played in it. On another occasion he was tacked on by this government to an inquiry that had been threatened into certain elections in Ontario and lastly, but not least, he was tacked on as the head and front of this commission. However, at this late hour I do not intend to go into the evidence and of the unwarranted manner in which my name was dragged before the commission by the commissioners or the counsel, Mr. Shepley. There will be another opportunity, and I do hope and trust that, as aspersions have been cast on gentlemen on this side of the House, the government or some gentlemen on that side will assist us in having a full and fair investigation so that at least we will have the satisfaction of knowing that all the statements made by some gentlemen throughout the country and on which they have harked back to-night with great docility are of no value and that that great moral editor, the moral editor of the 'Globe' will, in that unctuous manner that characterizes all his utterances, take back all that he has said and that if the majority defeat this resolution he will declare that all that has been said by gentlemen on that side of the House is utterly untrue and needs no investigation.

House divided on amendment Mr. Bourassa.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We will take up a few minor Bills.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.15 a.m. Wednesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, March 27, 1907.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

REPORT OF AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE—NORTH ATLANTIC TRADING COMPANY.

Mr. MONK. In connection with the fifth report of the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization which has been presented, I desire to move :

That the fifth report of the Select Standing Committee of Agriculture and Colonization be taken into consideration on Thursday, the fourth day of April next, and that it be the first order of that day.

In this motion I have particular reference to the refusal of the witness, Mr. Beddoe, to answer certain questions put to him in connection with the North Atlantic Trading Company.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MONK. When the report of the committee is taken into consideration, as stated in the above motion, I beg to give notice that I shall move as follows :

That this government has entered into certain agreements with a syndicate or association of persons known as the North Atlantic Trading Company, for carrying on an immigration propaganda in continental Europe, said agreements beginning in 1899 ;

That large sums of money have been from time to time paid by the government of Canada to the said North Atlantic Trading Company under the said agreements and considerable amounts are still pending between the government and the said company ;

That C. H. Beddoe, accountant of the Department of the Interior, a witness examined before the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization, during the present session, as appears by the report of the said committee, was officially sent to Europe by the Department of the Interior, upon the refusal of the Audit Department to sanction the payment of some claims of the said Trading Company, in order that the said Beddoe should examine and audit the accounts of the said company and ascertain if the said company had expended in immigration propaganda the amounts it was bound to expend, under its contracts with the government ;

That the said accountant, having proceeded to Europe and made his report upon the said audit and being examined before the said committee, has refused to answer the questions put to him, concerning : 1. The names of the agents and sub-agents of the North Atlantic Trading Company in Europe, mentioned in his audit report as having received money, in execution of the contract ; and 2. The names of the printers to whom moneys are alleged to have been paid by the said company in execution of said contract, the whole as mentioned in report of audit ;

That the said accountant offers as a reason for his said refusal a promise made by him to the officials of the said North Atlantic Trading Company to the effect that he would keep said names secret ;

That it is and has always been the undoubted right and privilege of this House of Commons to have all the information which it may desire regarding public matters of any kind and description, coming within the jurisdiction of parliament, and the refusal of the witness to answer under the present circumstances constitutes a breach of such privilege ;

That the said C. H. Beddoe be summoned to appear at the bar of this honourable House according to the law and usage of parliament, on..... at four o'clock in the afternoon, to answer such questions as may be put to him by Mr. Speaker or other members of this House and receive such injunctions, orders and monitions as to this honourable House may seem fit.

Mr. MONK.

Bill (No. 142) to incorporate the Abitibi and Hudson Bay Railway Company.—Mr. Logan.

FEES REMITTED.

Mr. LOGAN moved :

That in accordance with the recommendation contained in the fourth report of the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills, the charge of $100 paid on Bill (No. 105) to incorporate the United Baptist Womens' Missionary Union of the maritime provinces, be refunded.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION ACT—AMENDMENT.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 143) to amend the Immigration Act.

Mr. SPROULE. Explain.

Mr. OLIVER. In the Act of last session, it has been found that adequate provision is not made for dealing with stowaways and this Bill will remedy that defect. It has also been found that in dealing with the deportation of those of the criminal classes, the existing law does not provide a due form in which the process is to be carried out. This Bill provides for that.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read a first time.

QUESTIONS.

MR. J. C. CHAPAIS.

Mr. LAPOINTE asked :

1. Is Mr. J. C. Chapais, of St. Denis de Kamouraska, in the employ of the Department of Agriculture ?
2. What is the nature of his duties ?
3. What is his salary ?
4. On February 16 last did the said J. C. Chapais perform his duties as employee of the said department
5. If so, what did he do, and in what locality?
6. Did the department pay any sum to the said J. C. Chapais for his services on the said date of February 16, 1907 ?
7. Did the department pay any sum for travelling expenses to the said J. C. Chapais for February 15, 16 and 17, 1907 ?
8. Did the said J. C. Chapais send in any account for travelling expenses for the said dates ?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture) :

1. Yes.

2. Mr. Chapais is the Assistant Dairy Commissioner. He gives advice to farmers and others by correspondence, addresses farmers' meetings throughout the province of Quebec and lectures at St. Hyacinthe Dairy School.

3. $1,500 per annum.

4 and 5. Mr. Chapais was summoned by subpœna to attend Court at Rivière du Loup on the 16th of February as a witness in the case of Raymond vs. the St. Denis School Commissioners, and spent the whole day at that place.

6. Mr. Chapais was paid his full salary for the month of February, 1907.

7. Yes, the travelling expenses from St. Hyacinthe to St. Denis in the performance of his regular duties on the 15th of February.

8. Only for the expenditure mentioned in No. 7.

MANITOBA LAND DEEDS.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette) asked :

1. Is the government in possession of any deed from the heirs of Lord Selkirk to the Hudson Bay Company, for the residue of Lord Selkirk's estate, about the year 1835 ?

2. Are the maps and plans of the Peter Fidler survey of 1814 and 1817, and the Kempt survey of 1822, in the possession of the government and accessible to the public ?

3. What means are within reach of the people of Canada to trace the grants of land made prior to 1835, and to connect them with the present system of allotment in Manitoba ?

Hon. SYDNEY FISHER (Minister of Agriculture) :

1 and 2. Not in the archives branch.

3. A systematic search is being made by the government for all papers bearing on land grants in Canada and already many plans and papers have been found. The records at the head office of the Hudson Bay Company in London, and the documents taken to Scotland by Lord Selkirk, are being transcribed for the government. Copies of these documents may possibly furnish the information desired.

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. CLEMENTS —by Mr. Taylor—asked:

1. How many miles of Grand Trunk Pacific has been constructed ?

2. What is the mileage in actual operation ?

3. Where are the terminals of any lines being operated?

4. Are the box cars constructed by the Grand Trunk Pacific used on the Grand Trunk Pacific lines or on Grand Trunk Railway lines?

5. If used by the Grand Trunk Railway lines, what consideration is paid by the Grand Trunk Railway for their use to the Grand Trunk Pacific, or to the government?

6. Does the government guarantee apply to the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific rolling stock?

7. If so, has the government permitted the Grand Trunk Railway to use Grand Trunk Pacific rolling stock for the benefit of the Grand Trunk Railway, without remuneration?

8. What authority has the Grand Trunk Railway to use the cars of the Grand Trunk Pacific?

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals) :

1. No portion of the line has been completed.

2. None in regular service.

3. None.

4. The Grand Trunk Pacific are purchasing cars in order to be ready for the opening of the railway, and for this purpose will require a large number ; orders have been distributed among the car manufacturing plants to the extent of their capacity. The capacity of the car works of the country is approximately 5,000 a year and the estimated requirements of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway is 20,000, so that in order to secure the work in Canada, it is needful that the orders should be distributed over a period of years. They are not being used on the Grand Trunk Pacific, as the road is not yet in operation, but are being used on the Grand Trunk and such lines as it interchanges business with.

5. Per diem rates according to car service rules.

6. No.

7. No.

8. Agreement between the companies.

W. T. R. PRESTON AND SOUTH AFRICA.

Mr. LENNOX asked :

1. Has the government yet obtained information to enable it to answer the question re W. T. R. Preston, appearing in 'Hansard' on the 14th of February last under my name ?

2. Has it been ascertained that Mr. Preston contributed the letters referred to ?

3. What action has the government taken in the matter ?

4. If not yet advised, what is the cause of the delay ?

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Minister of the Interior). The government has received copies of the London 'Daily Express,' dated Monday, February 11, in which occur the words quoted in the question of February 14, asked by Mr. Lennox, to which reference is made in this question. The words are as follows : 'South Africa can more readily support millions of population between Table Mountain and the Zambesi than Canada between Winnipeg and the Rocky Mountains.' These words occur in the context, which is as follows :

Taken as a whole, the climate of South Africa is one of the most wonderful in the world; the soil is equally an amazement and a marvel in its fertility. The reading of history establishes the fact that there once roamed throughout the veldt of British South Africa enormous herds of animal life. As late as thirty years ago (and his statement is made on the authority of an eye-witness) the northern veldt of the Transvaal and Orange Free State was at times literally black with the native deer of this country. This may be referred to as an analogy of the conditions in South Africa, in respect to animal life a few decades ago, with that part of western Canada lying between Winnipeg and the Rocky mountains, which now takes rank with the most valuable agricultural land in the world.

If, as is thus established, the veldt between Table mountain and the Zambesi, furnished sustenance for millions of animal life, it is fair to assume, if no other reason can be adduced, that the country is capable of supporting population. The Dutch settlers have proved, in the moderate extent to which they have carried out farm operations, that a return unequalled in other colonies can be readily had here for a very moderate expenditure of farm labour.

Despite commercial depression, there is a spirit of hopefulness in the people. Colonists are seldom otherwise than optimistic. But on every hand there is a demand for a policy that will bring permanence to commercial conditions, and which is wisely taking the form of a call for an addition to the agricultural population.

Judging from the experience of Canada and New South Wales, that appears to offer the only reliable remedy to the discouraging commercial situation. The study of the conditions throughout the world proves that no country can hope to flourish on only one industry and more especially if it is of a mining character. To expect South Africa to prosper because millions of value in the products of the mines are exported annually is contrary to all economic laws. The development of the agricultural possibilities of South Africa is more important than all the mining opportunities that may be capable of development on the continent. Wealth derived from the cultivation of the soil in any country invariably remains a permanent asset.

South Africa can more readily support millions of population in its agricultural possibilities between Table mountain and the Zambesi than Canada can between Winnipeg and the Rocky mountains. Established facts are the proof of what Canada can do on this point. Agricultural development and intensification in farm culture will create new markets, and bring in its train the establishment of manufacturing industries, without which no country can hope to have attained the full measure of its strength or power.

In promoting agricultural settlement, natural and climatic difficulties may have to be overcome in certain districts, but science has mastered these elsewhere. Prejudices may have to be allayed incident to the introduction of a new agricultural population, but statesmanship and patriotism can solve that difficulty.

The whites of South Africa may abandon all hope of solving the native problems on proper lines, or even of maintaining their influence with the native population, unless there is considerable addition to their own forces. To fail in their responsibilities on this point is to abandon duties that have become national in their character and magnitude.

British statesmen and British capitalists are alike interested in every phase of this South African question. They all have much at stake in the future of this country. Every colony would welcome South Africa joining in the march of material prosperity that has marked colonial development and government in the other British possessions during recent years.

But to reach that point, South Africa, with the co-operation of such forces as may be enlisted at the seat of the empire, must bend never-failing energies to the full development of her agricultural resources and possibilities, and to secure an increase to the European rural population of the continent. To attain that end is worthy of the best efforts of empire building.

Mr. LENNOX. The minister has not answered the third question.

Mr. OLIVER. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. In view of the terms contained in the letter, the government does not consider that any action is necessary in the matter.

Mr. LENNOX. May I ask the minister if he has read the whole of the letter ?

Mr. OLIVER. No, I read about half of it, but I read the part that pertains to this matter.

RELATIONS OF CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether or not Mr. Bryce, the British Ambassador at Washington, is conducting any negotiations through the British government between this government and the government of the United States respecting any matters that have been under discussion in the past concerning the relations of Canada and the United States ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I have no doubt that His Majesty's ambassador at Washington is at the present time, and has been since his arrival on this continent, discussing with the United States government many questions affecting Canada. No official discussion or negotiations are taking place at this moment.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. There is no correspondence ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. There is no correspondence. Mr. Bryce is here himself to-day.

THE NOVA SCOTIA JUDICIARY.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Justice the fact that I have a further letter from a prominent member of the Nova Scotia bar, stating that on acount of the resignation of Sir Robert Weatherbee, the late Chief Justice, the same condition of inconvenience has arisen in that province as lately obtained. It is only fair to say that this is in part due to the fact that the new judge, Mr. Justice Drysdale, has not been sworn in, or if he has, his firm is engaged in a great many of the cases that are coming up for consideration in the court. But that inconvenience would be obviated if another judge were appointed almost immediately. I understand that the criminal session of the Supreme court of Halifax is now engaging the attention of Mr. Justice Meagher. That leaves only three judges to deal with the work of appeal and the chambers, outside of Mr. Justice Drysdale.

Hon. A. B. AYLESWORTH (Minister of Justice). I have not previously heard anything of the condition of things described by my hon. friend.

CHARGES AGAINST MEMBERS.

Mr. H. BOURASSA (Labelle). Before the Orders of the Day are called I would like to give notice to the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Fowler)—and I am giving him long enough so that he may be able to take cognizance of it—that on Thursday next I shall bring up as a question of privilege the accusations made by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Fowler) and shall move a substantive motion in order to invite the hon. gentleman to substantiate his accusations or withdraw them.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (Prime Minister). I would prefer, if it were equally convenient to my hon. friend and the House, that he say Wednesday instead of Thursday.

Mr. BOURASSA. I have no objection, but I want a vote and Wednesday is not convenient because, if the discussion is not ended at six o'clock, we cannot go on with it as the House does not sit that night.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I intend to move on Tuesday that the House will have morning sittings and that Wednesday be subject to the rule of evening sittings as well as the other days.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (North Toronto). Would it be out of the way to invite the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Bourassa), if he makes a motion with reference to the hon. member for King's, N.B. (Mr. Fowler) that he should include himself in that motion and put himself alongside the hon. member for King's? He should also include the hon. member for Montmagny (Mr. Lavergne).

Mr. BOURASSA. My hon. friend is free to bring in any motion with reference to myself and bring up any statement of mine, and if he can make his motion good, I shall be glad to uphold him.

CORRECTION OF 'HANSARD.'

Mr. J. G. H. BERGERON (Beauharnois). I rise to a question of privilege. In the unrevised 'Hansard,' at page 5460, I am reported as having used these words: 'Some of the fathers of confederation wanted legislative union—one government for all the provinces. I think they were right.' What I really said is, 'I think they were wrong.' I corrected 'Hansard for the revised edition, but having received letters asking explanation; I think I should put the matter right.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We all accept the explanation.

CUSTOM DUTIES.

Bill (No. 134) respecting the duties of customs—Mr. Fielding—read the second time and House went into committee thereon.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) or Customs (Mr. Paterson) whether or not they have been able to gather and bring down for the information of the House certain matters about which I made inquiry in connection with the item relating to agriculture?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance). I intimated at the time that some of the questions would be difficult to reply to, but that as far as possible I would get the information. I have gathered the information and will send the hon. gentleman a memo of it.

On section 3,

Mr. FIELDING. This is no change in the subsidy but the Department of Justice thought it a better form of drafting to serve precisely the same purpose.

On section 16,

Mr. FIELDING. I move to strike out the words '12th February' and insert '31st March' in the twelfth line. Since the date was fixed in these resolutions there have been some changes and we have taken the last day of March as the most convenient.

Amendment agreed to.

On schedule (c)—prohibited goods—section 1209.

Mr. FIELDING. I move to insert the words 'or in any other British country. This is the provision under which the imitation of British goods of well known brands is prohibited. The amendment is designed to include not only goods from Great Britain, but also goods from any British colony.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. If there is no objection, I would prefer to have the Bill remain in committee. It probably could not be read the third time to-day in any case.

Mr. FIELDING. Or, the Bill could be reported and allowed to stand for third reading. That might suit the hon. gentleman's (Mr. R. L. Borden's) purpose as well.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I would rather have it remain in committee. I do not think any time would be lost.

Hon. WILLIAM PATERSON (Minister of Customs). Unless there are any strong reasons against it, the Department of Customs would be glad to have this Bill finished, so far as the House of Commons is concerned. to-day. We are to have an adjournment for nearly a week. But when the Bill passes the Commons, considering that this is a matter which the other House will not be likely to change in any degree, the Customs Department will venture to have the Bill printed. Requests are pouring in, and have been pouring in from the business community, asking for copies of the tariff, and asking for information as to the rates on specified articles. This multiplies correspondence. It will be a great saving of time and labour if we could send printed copies of the Bill. If there were any questions I could answer now—if that would answer the purpose—I would be glad to answer them.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I hardly think that would cover it. But, unless the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) mistrusts the majority behind the government I think he can consider the Bill passed just as much as though it had advanced this stage.

Mr. PATERSON. It means printing thousands of copies, and I do not like to take that responsibility without being sure that there will be no further changes. The opposition have been able to effect changes in the Bill already, and there is no saying what they may do yet.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I appreciate the complimentary mood in which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) finds himself to-day. Still I would prefer to have the Bill remain in committee unless the hon. gentleman is very strongly opposed to that course.

Mr. PATERSON. Of course, I must yield. I have placed before the committee how urgent it is in the interest of the business community that progress should be made. My only object is to meet their wishes.

Mr. BERGERON. The Bill cannot pass its third reading to-day anyhow.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. I do not wish to delay the business; but I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) would be just as safe in going on and doing his printing now as he would be if the Bill were to pass the committee and stand for third reading.

Mr. PATERSON. If, the hon. gentleman (Mr. R. L. Borden) can assure me of that—

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. Just as safe. For, if it stands for third reading, we can move to have it sent back to committee again.

Mr. PATERSON. Oh, I mean the third reading and all. It might as well remain in committee if you do not give us the third reading.

Mr. R. L. BORDEN. We could not do that.

Mr. PATERSON. Then it might as well stay in committee.

Progress reported.

WINNIPEG TERMINALS — CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY AND GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved second reading of Bill (No. 128) An Act respecting the Winnipeg Terminals of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. He said: I do not know whether it is usual to discuss such Bills as this on the second reading. If any explanation is desired I shall be glad to give it.

Hon. GEORGE E. FOSTER (North Toronto). Are the powers of municipalities guarded?

Mr. EMMERSON. This does not affect municipalities.

Mr. W. J. ROCHE (Marquette). Is there not a plan referred to in the Bill that should be laid on the table?

Mr. EMMERSON. There is a plan in connection with the agreement. I may say that the Bill is to confirm an agreement between the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific whereby certain lands bounded by Main and Water streets and the Assiniboine and Red Rivers which are most conveniently situated for terminals, are to be used by these companies jointly under a terminal company in which both shall be interested. Part of these lands is held by the Canadian Northern on lease from the Northern Pacific with option of purchase. In view of the fact that the whole property is covered by various issues of bonds and debentures of the Canadian Northern and their predecessors, it is not competent for that company to convey the land in fee simple and in lieu of that they have conveyed to the Grand Trunk Pacific and to the government, in common with themselves, in equal shares, possession of these lands and the right to use the same for terminal purposes for a term of 999 years. The Grand Trunk Pacific and the government are to be assured the use and possession under this Act, confirming the agreement. This is notwithstanding the issue of any bonds or debentures.

The idea is that the present buildings are to be removed and the new terminals constructed according to certain plans which are annexed to the agreement and which I can have here in the committee quite readily. The Canadian Northern are to do this work under a superintendent of construction who is to be appointed by the Canadian Northern and the Grand Trunk Pacific subject to the approval and removal at the instance of the government. Prior to that, and during the time when the Grand Trunk Pacific is lessee of the eastern division of the Transcontinental, the Canadian Northern own and enjoy a half interest in the terminals and the Grand Trunk Pacific and the government own the other half interest. If and when the Grand Trunk Pacific ceases to be the lessee of the eastern division, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the government shall each enjoy independently a one-third undivided interest in the terminals. While the Grand Trunk Pacific is the lessee of the eastern division the terminals will be operated by a so-called Terminals Board, composed of two persons, one appointed by each of these railway companies. If and when the Grand Trunk Pacific ceases to be the lessee of the eastern division of the Transcontinental line, the Terminal Board shall be composed of four persons, two to be appointed by the Canadian Northern and one each by the Grand Trunk Pacific and the government.

The compensation to be payable is regulated as follows: First the lands are to be put in at a fixed valuation of $2,625,000, upon which interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum will be payable, the Canadian Northern assuming one-half of this interest and the Grand Trunk Pacific and the government together contributing the other half. The Grand Trunk Pacific and the government together will pay to the Canadian Northern in equal shares annually one-half of 4 per cent on the above sum of $2,625,000. This is prior to and during the time when the Grand Trunk Pacific is lessee of the eastern division. I have stated that this fixed valuation of $2,625,000 is to bear interest at 4 per cent, one-half of which is to be paid by the Canadian Northern and the other half by the government and the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Upon the cost of all improvements to be made on the lands bought in the first instance and from time to time as further improvements are determined upon, there is to be paid an interest of 4½ per cent. That is to say the original valuation agreed on by the company will bear a rate of interest at 4 per cent, but upon all expenditures subsequently made for improvements there is to be paid interest at the rate of 4½ per cent.

Mr. HAGGART. Why have the government to pay anything of that?

Mr. EMMERSON. Because the government owns and has the eastern division of the National Transcontinental Railway.

Mr. LANCASTER. But it leases it to the railway, does it not?

Mr. EMMERSON. But it is part of the original expenditure. The government itself would necessarily require as a part of that railway terminals and it is a part of the capital expenditure in connection with the eastern division. For that period of time it is an interest charge and is to be borne by the government itself, but after a certain period it becomes wholly payable by the Grand Trunk Pacific. This valuation and this interest becomes for a time a part of the capital invested in the eastern division, upon which the Grand Trunk Pacific are to pay a rental in the shape of interest.

If and when the Grand Trunk Pacific ceases to be the lessee of the eastern division the compensation provided for, as I have described, shall be borne as follows: The Canadian Northern, one-third; the Grand Trunk Pacific, one-third; and the government the remaining one-third. As the provisions in clause 20 of the agreement of the 29th of July, 1903, the schedule in chapter 91 of the statutes of that year, are scarcely applicable to leasehold properties of the description comprised in the agreement, terms analagous to those contained in clause 20 have been adopted.

That is to say, first, that under clause 20, the interest upon the cost of construction, prior to the execution of the lease, is borne by the government and charged to capital account; second, for the first seven years of the lease the interest is borne by the government absolutely without being charged to capital account; and third, for the next three years interest is borne by the government and charged to capital account to the extent that the net earnings of the Grand Trunk Pacific fall short of three per cent. Under the Winnipeg terminals agreement the portion of the compensation payable by the government prior to the execution of the lease will be charged to capital account. After the first seven years the compensation will be payable by the government absolutely without being charged to capital account and for the next three years the compensation will be payable by the government and charged to capital account in the same proportion as the government contributes for the balance of the eastern division. While the Grand Trunk Pacific is the lessee of the eastern division, the expenses of the maintenance and operation of the terminals are to be borne by the two railway companies on a wheelage basis and naturally thereafter, if the eastern division of the transcontinental railway were operated by the government itself, or at any time that it is so operated, then the government would become a partner in the transaction and pay its one-third of the cost of maintenance and operation on a wheelage basis, the same as the two companies now, under this agreement, divide equally be-
