ST. PATRICK'S DAY

TRIBUTE TO ST. PATRICK AND THE IRISH PEOPLE

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I should like to draw to the attention of colleagues that today is St. Patrick's Day.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Kelly: I believe that it is important to draw this day to the attention of colleagues, because, with the exception of Senator Kirby's tie, which I saw a minute ago, I see few green ties or other evidence of a green nature to mark the occasion.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): On a question of privilege, I would point out the colour of my tie!

Senator Frith: Under the new rules, I don't think you can rise.

Hon. C. William Doody: I would like to point out my green tie.

Senator Frith: These points of privilege are all out of order under the new rules.

Senator Kelly: Nonetheless, honourable senators, I think it is a sad day—I see Peter Bosa has his green tie on. Thank you, Peter. I think it is a sad day that things of an Irish nature are forgotten, as they have been.

In times past, there was one senator who always sang an Irish song on March 17. The only person I know in this chamber who has a thoroughly beautiful voice is Senator Frith, and I thought perhaps he would do us the honour.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Kelly: If he will lead us we will all join in.

Senator Roblin: Something from the Mikado.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Kelly for the compliment. I ask that the Speaker instruct the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to go down to the House of Commons and invite the Prime Minister to come here and sing "When Irish Eyes Are Smiling," and, if he has time, to get Mr. Reagan here to sing it as a duet, and we will wait.

Senator Kelly: As my final statement on this address, St. Patrick's Day is a time when we should all be nice to one another.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I also want to note—in an indirect way, admittedly—that it is March 17, 1992. If Senator Murray's government, to quote his words, "respects democracy", election day, as of St. Patrick's Day, 1992, is but 249 days away.

However, if Canadians are governed by, and I quote Senator Murray, "a cowardly government, a government that is contemptuous of democracy", the day of reckoning could still be 635 days away.

THE ESTIMATES, 1992-93

TABLING OF SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the Supplementary Estimates (C) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1992.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY CBC/NFB FILM PRESENTATION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, March 18, 1992, I will move:

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, you will be glad to know that during our break the citizens of Canada did not forget their opposition to the iniquitous GST and have been sending in petitions that I now have the honour to present. They are all here in the file, all signed in handwriting by our fellow citizens. The summary is as follows:

First, the petitions are headed as previously . . .

[Translation]

—that the new universal federal tax of 7 per cent on goods and services passed by the Conservative government will create major, unfair and inhuman difficulties for Canadians and, for these reasons, etc. we humbly call upon senators and members of the House of Commons, who are the true representatives of the people, to do everything they can to oppose this new goods and services tax, and we demand that an election be called immediately.

[English]

From Quebec, 27 petitions with a total of 548 names; from Ontario, 11 petitions with a total of 248 names; and from New Brunswick, two petitions with a total of 39 names.

In Quebec, the petitions come from Barrante, Jonquière, Lac Mégantic, Laval, Longueuil, Montreal, Napierville, Portneuf, Rouyn, St-Isidore, St-Léonard, Sennetere, Sherbrooke, and Val d'Or; in Ontario, they come from Brampton, Etobicoke, Kitchener, Mississauga, North York, Niagara Falls, Oakville, Rexdale, Stoney Creek and Toronto; and in New Brunswick, they come from Miscou, Notre-Dame, Petit-Rocher, St-Léolin and Shippagan.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I too have the honour and the privilege to present petitions signed by 180 citizens of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia who oppose the goods and services tax, especially as it applies to books, newspapers and magazines. They point out that traditionally, books and periodicals have always been exempt from tax in Canada, at least since Confederation, if not from time immemorial. This exemption was based on the fact that—

[English]

. . . the uninhibited dissemination of the printed word, as a cornerstone of democracy, culture, education and a literate and productive society, will be negatively affected by GST application.

That is why they opposed it and still oppose it. These petitions come mainly from Stephenville and Corner Brook, Newfoundland.

There are also other petitions signed by 301 citizens of British Columbia who oppose the goods and services tax, especially on books and periodicals. These petitions come mainly from Penticton, Oliver, Delta and Surrey.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY ON CHILD BENEFITS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have two questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The first relates partly to some legislation before us. Yesterday Statistics Canada confirmed that Tory times are tough times. In 1981 there was but one food bank in the entire country. There are now 292. In 1990 one of every nine children in Canada received emergency assistance from a food bank, not just once but on average 3.5 times a year. In 1991, 2 million Canadians, including 700,000 children, were expected to receive aid from food banks.

I want to know if the government is not concerned about those statistics. If it is, why is it refusing to withdraw Bill C-32, which extends the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan? Why has it deindexed family allowance payments? Why has it imposed a brand of new tax, the GST, on children's clothing and medicines? And, lastly, why, instead of using the money for children living in abject poverty, is it spending $500,000 on an advertising campaign, a propaganda campaign, about its proposed child benefit program?

We have the government fattening up on advertising accounts while hundreds of thousands of children trudge to food banks for basic nourishment.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with regard to the changes announced in the budget with respect to child benefits, as I pointed out in my speech here a couple of weeks ago, those changes are intended to, and do, provide more assistance to families on low incomes.

If I recall the statistics correctly, there are no losers—there are only winners—for those people with family incomes up to the mid $50,000 per annum range.

I may say that that policy has been very well received; even some habitual critics of the government are prepared to say, and have said, that it is a step in the right direction to end universality in the family allowance program and provide more assistance to those families who are in greater need, and in particular the working poor.

With regard to the Canada Assistance Plan, we had that discussion at second reading of Bill C-32. The bill is now in committee. If the honourable senator wishes, we can discuss it again at third reading. However, as I pointed out at the time, that bill provides that Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, the three provinces directly affected, will have the federal contribution increased by as much as 5 per cent.

Five per cent is higher than the increase in the cost of living. It is considerably higher than the increase in federal government program expenditures in recent years, and it is, I think, a greater increase than many of those provinces—certainly Ontario—are providing to their municipalities, universities, schools and hospitals by way of increase.

The honourable senator wants to know what we are doing about the adverse economic circumstances which so many people encounter. The short answer to his question is that we have recently brought in a budget and we are pursuing a policy that will create 500,000 new jobs between now and 1993 and 1.5 million new jobs in a somewhat longer time frame.

All the signs are that the economy is rebounding—the signs both here and in the United States—and I trust that the honourable senator will rejoice in those developments.

Senator Frith: If the results are as predicted I will certainly rejoice. I am glad that the Leader of the Government in the Senate took the opportunity to put those words on the record. We will see what are the practical results of those words. I take it we can expect these 500,000 new jobs between now and 1993, if I heard the leader correctly, and we can perhaps make a note in our calendars to see whether between now and 1993 that is the result of the words he has put on the record.

In the longer term, we will have to see. There may be a new government in office by that time. In that case we can be sure that Senator Murray will rise to take credit for the additional jobs that will have taken place or been earned by then.

● (1430)

JUSTICE

CANCELLATION OF COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith: My second question deals with the Court Challenges Program. I take it we will be getting legislation that will include the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program along with the cancellation of other initiatives and institutions. I want to give the Leader of the Government an opportunity to comment, not necessarily today, but today and later if he wishes, on a letter by Madam Bertha Wilson, former Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, written on March 4 to the Minister of Justice. I will put the letter on the record—it is only a few paragraphs—in order to give him an opportunity to comment later, if he prefers.

Dear Minister:

I am writing to express my dismay and distress over the recent cancellation of the Court Challenges Program.

I have on numerous occasions publicly expressed the view that it is totally illusory to confer rights on people who do not have the means to enforce them and I assumed that the expansion of the Court Challenges Program following the advent of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms was an effort to address this problem.

I fully appreciate, of course, that all governments are currently in a period of financial restraint but I must say that I have difficulty with a policy that places the burden of that restraint on those who can least afford to bear it.

I saw for myself when I was a member of the Supreme Court how invaluable this Program has been to minority groups and to the disadvantaged. It has clearly been well and efficiently administered and has resulted in an excellent input into many very significant "test" cases. I am sure that my former colleagues on the Court, if asked, would confirm that view. Indeed, I believe that I can say with complete confidence that the public has unquestionably received full value for its money on this particular Program.

If there is any possibility that the Government's decision on the Court Challenges Program might be reversed, may I respectfully add my voice to what I am sure is a chorus of disapproval of the cancellation of this very imaginative and worthwhile program.

I remain,

Yours very sincerely,

Bertha Wilson

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, given that the letter from the distinguished former Madam Justice Wilson was addressed to my colleague Ms. Campbell, I will be glad to ask Ms. Campbell to let me have a copy of her reply so that I can table it here or read it into the record.

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY ON CHILD BENEFITS

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I would like to pursue further the response that the Leader of the Government gave to Senator Frith's question about child benefits. The Leader of the Government says that the government's white paper has been well received. Indeed, as he and all senators know, the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has done a considerable amount of work on the problem of child poverty. Some of the proposals in the white paper are in concordance with the recommendations of the Senate committee. Some of the thrust of the proposals is indeed very desirable.

However, the numbers that the Leader cites are, I think, questionable. I wonder if he will be willing to give us some more information on them, because calculations made, not only by those of us who are amateurs, but by others who are not, indicate that families on lower incomes will receive not a penny more than they would have received in terms of child benefits if this plan should not come into effect. That is in the first year. Because of a lack of indexation, of course, those benefits will subsequently be reduced.

Furthermore, it has been suggested by some social welfare analysts that the government's proposal will lock the working poor into poverty by providing an incentive not to earn more than will be reimbursed on the extra earnings plan for the working poor. On both those areas separately, the analyses that I have seen indicate that this proposal in amounts of money is of no greater benefit than is currently received and will very quickly be a reduced benefit. I wonder if the Leader of the Government would like to comment further.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I would not without further reference to the Department of Finance tables, some of which were published with or shortly after the budget. I will obtain those, and other information provided by the Department of Finance and the Department of Health and Welfare, and provide it to the honourable senator and to the Senate.

Senator Marsden: Thank you. In that case, the Leader of the Government might also want to look at the analyses that have been published in the press in Mr. Len Shifron's column. He is usually a very careful analyst and he has looked at the Department of Finance's figures. The Leader of the Government may also wish to note that in his defence of the Canada Assistance Plan, the costs to the provincial governments have risen considerably because the federal government has passed on costs and because, of course, the provinces have reduced revenues. Therefore, his analysis of the Canada Assistance Plan bill is not an entirely accurate description.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there is no cap, as the honourable senator knows, on our contribution to the seven provinces that, by way of shorthand, we call equalization recipients. The cap of 5 per cent increase is on those provinces that do not receive equalization. We continue to pay 50 per cent, do we not, of eligible expenses under the Canada Assistance Plan in seven of the ten provinces of Canada.

Senator Marsden: Well, honourable senators, I suggest the Leader's reply is a bit disingenuous, because it is in two of those three provinces that the greatest numbers of refugees arrive in the country, who are very often drawing benefits from the public purse. That is not a criticism. That is merely a commentary. The Leader of the Government will also know that the very largest number of poor people in this country live in the province of Ontario, for which benefits have been capped, so the relationship between the distribution of costs and the redistribution of benefits is a loose one in terms of the Canada Assistance Plan.

Senator Murray: I put the figures on the record the other day when we were debating this matter at second reading. A five per cent increase in the case of Ontario is quite a considerable increase. As I recall, overall, there is an increase of something like $100 million provided for Ontario in the fiscal year that begins in April, to a total of $2.2 billion for that province. We are talking about something in excess of $6 billion, nationally. This is a very considerable contribution to all of those provinces for those programs.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, perhaps the Leader would also like to put on the record the rise in welfare costs for the three provinces that are under this cap. I think it is the relationship between costs—the genuine needs—and this 5 per cent amount that is the difficulty here.

[Translation]

FEDERATION OF FRENCH-SPEAKING AND ACADIAN COMMUNITIES

PARTICIPATION IN CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCES

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am sorry I did not give him prior notice. It is a bad habit of mine, but I hope my leader will forgive me.

My question concerns a press conference that was held yesterday. I have a press release which was probably distributed at this conference held by the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadiennes du Canada.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate give us the assurance that he will do everything he can to ensure consideration is given to the federation's request for a meeting with Prime Minister Mulroney, as soon as possible, to discuss a number of complaints, some of which are not entirely justified?

In my preamble, I feel I should set the record straight, because the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadiennes, unlike some reports in the media, never asked to sit at the constitutional table.

In fact, the federation corrected those reports this morning.

It asked to be consulted during the current constitutional process on any clause with an impact on the future of our communities. According to the federation, this request was confirmed verbally, but not in writing, by the Prime Minister's Office. They also wish to be actively consulted when study groups examine clauses that refer to linguistic duality.

There is a substantial difference between asking for a seat at the constitutional table and their other requests.

I think you will agree, honourable senators, that I have always supported our francophone federations and associations whenever I was able to do so. In this particular case, although I support a number of the federation's recommendations and requests, I would like Senator Murray to confirm that he will do everything he can to facilitate the process. However, I think the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadiennes went to little too far when they said in their press release that if it were not for the federation and the community's efforts, and if Francophones had depended on the federal government to help them, linguistic duality would have disappeared from the agenda a long time ago. I think this is an exaggeration, because there are no grounds for making such a statement. The federation went on to complain that the Court Challenges Program was being sabotaged, although the government explained why it had to make this decision.

The federation complained about the way agreements between Ottawa and the communities in Manitoba and Alberta were treated. I believe those programs have been very useful and will likely continue to serve these communities very well. We should get back to this later on.

I would urge the federation to be a little more careful with its criticision in future.

However, I would also appreciate an answer from Senator Murray.

Hon. Philippe Gigantes: Could we find out what the question is, honourable senator?

Senator Simard: I know that Senator Gigantes is occasionally distracted—it happens to everybody. The records of the Senate will show that my question was asked twice. I repeat it again.

Will Senator Murray encourage Prime Minister Mulroney to meet with the spokespersons of the Federation to discuss the many issues that concern them, including the Court Challenges Program, agreements between Ottawa and the Francophone communities and also whether they of Federation can play a role on the constitutional committees that are to begin this week or next week at the latest?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, regarding the association's criticisms of the present government, we must remember that the federal government and the provinces wanted to entrench recognition of linguistic duality as a fundamental characteristic of the federation in the Meech Lake Accord. Unfortunately, the Meech Lake Accord did not pass.

We discussed that question extensively in this House. I will tell my friend, Senator Thériault, that the federal government did everything it could to improve their recognition; for example, we tried to use the word "promote", but to recognize the linguistic duality as a fundamental characteristic of the federation would have been unprecedented. It would have meant a step forward for the linguistic minorities of our country. I can only refer to the words of the former Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. D'Iberville-Fortier on that subject, whether my friend Senator Thériault likes it or not.

That being said, we must also remember that, in 1988, this government had the Canadian Parliament approve a new Official Languages Act whose regulations are beginning to be applied in the area of the language of service. Later, some rules on the working language and on equal representation within the Civil Service will be implemented. Those are two of the fundamental principles of the new legislation.

I will be pleased to submit to the Prime Minister's Office a request for a meeting on behalf of the Association des communautés francophones.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question.

From the answer given by the Leader of the Government in the Senate in reply to Senator Simard, can we conclude that he will give us his support in the deferred vote which will be taken later on?

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators. I am happy with the assurances given on that issue by my colleague, Mr. Corbeil, Minister of Transport.

THE CONSTITUTION

ENSHRINEMENT OF BILL 88

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I have a second question. I thank Senator Murray for his support in relation with the previous question.

My second question concerns an old issue of many years, concerning a request made a few months ago by the New Brunswick government (according to the papers of that province) asking the federal government to enshrine in the Constitution some of the principles expressed in Bill 88, an act recognizing the equality of the two linguistic communities in New Brunswick.

You will recall, honourable colleagues, that I raised that question on several occasions. I am doing so once more today.

Even if I remain optimistic, we must remember that when Meech died, the project to enshrin this provincial bill was delayed. I had warned my colleagues of this House and the people of New Brunswick that the strategy adopted by the New Brunswick government, lead by Mr. McKenna, was bad, that it was out of place and that the Canadian Constitution, allows for the enshrinement of Bill 88 through a bilateral agreement, whether there were constitutional talks or not.

But Mr. McKenna decided to act differently and to tie the request for enshrinement to the Meech Lake Accord. He got it all wrong and he seems ready to make the same mistake again.

I ask Senator Murray whether to his knowledge the federal government still has a request to entrench Bill 88 in the Constitution? We all know how difficult these new negotiations are, of course! I for one think that those difficulties might delay this entrenchment which over 80 Canadian organizations have been demanding for four years.

Senator Murray, I await your reply.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that this is still the subject of discussions at the official level between New Brunswick and the federal government.

If Senator Simard wants more information on this matter, I will consult my colleague, Mr. Clark.

Senator Simard: Thank you, Senator Murray.

I accept your answer, but we will remain vigilant and ask questions here and elsewhere.

I hope that Mr. McKenna will give up this strategy of again linking the Acadians' request to the negotiation of constitutional agreements on subjects that require, for some, eleven First Ministers and, lately, the native people as well, and for others, the consent of seven out of ten provinces having 50 per cent of the population.

NEW BRUNSWICK

IMPOSITION OF SURTAX ON WOOD PRODUCTS—EFFECT ON BUSINESS

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I apologize to you; it is not my habit to take too long! I leave that to the Liberals, who do not unlike me, always have access to the Leader of the Government in the Senate! I must ask one last question on a completely different subject, but it still concerns the Premier of New Brunswick.

As far as I know, the Premier of New Brunswick, Mr. McKenna, is the only Canadian, certainly the only New Brunswicker, who was glad about the American decision last week to impose a surtax on softwood lumber from New Brunswick and all of Canada. Has the Leader of the Government in the Senate or someone else in the government understood what the Premier of New Brunswick meant when he said that it might be good in the long run?

Has the federal government studied this statement by the Pemier of New Brunswick, which surprised and shocked business people and workers in the forestry industry in that province?

Senator Murray, I await your reply.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I was not aware of the statement attributed by Senator Simard to Permier McKenna.

Nevertheless, I will be pleased to draw the attention of my colleague, Mr. Wilson, to the question raised by Senator Simard. If there are any comments from my colleague, Mr. Wilson, I will be pleased to bring them up here in due course.

Senator Simard: Thank you, Senator Murray.

THE CONSTITUTION

FRENCH-SPEAKING CANADIANS OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it seems to me that the questions raised by Senator Simard require a supplementary.

The government decided last week to include in the process the government of the Northwest Territories, which represents approximately 60,000 people, and that of the Yukon, which represents about 30,000 people and four native associations . . .

[Senator Murray.]

I want to say at the outset that I am very happy that the government has decided to include them. My question does not concern the fact that they were included. It concerns those who have not been included, that is about one and a half million francophones who live outside Quebec.

What role did the government intend to give to those groups who have a particular interest in the constitution with regards to their protection in the future? It must be very clear that those groups have to rely on the federal government for protection.

Therefore, will they be included also? Will the government ensure that those groups have a say in the matter, just like the others groups who were included last week?

● (1450)

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before the Leader of the Government answers that question, I must advise senators that, under rule 23(7), which limits Question Period to 30 minutes, the 30 minutes are now over. However, I believe the leader may want to answer the question, owing to the fact that it has been posed.

[Translation]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): There again, honourable senators, I can consult with my colleague, the President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. But for now, I do not want to leave Senator Molgat unsatisfied.

The hon. senator will not dispute that linguistic minorities are not on the same footing as the governments of the northern territories, which will be at the table as a government. Representatives of the native people will be at the table because we are discussing native self-government.

We must also recall, as Mr. Bisson of the Federation himself admitted yesterday, that the situation of Francophones outside Quebec is different from the situation of native people. Many groups expressed their opinion to the Beaudoin-Dobbie Committee and the official-language communities were represented at all constitutional conferences. Mr. Clark and the Prime Minister are committed to pursuing the consultation process begun with the Federation.

We have made a great deal of progress on recognizing linguistic duality and this question will be discussed with the provinces in the same way as all other proposals.

[English]

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a number of delayed answers to oral questions raised on February 13. There are responses to a question from Senator Marsden regarding Sri Lanka, one from Senator Molgat regarding the effects and monitoring of depletion of the ozone layer, one from Senator Molgat regarding the possible reactivation of a disused rocket station, another from Senator Molgat regarding the costs of financing health care programs under medicare, and one from Senator Frith regarding cross-border shopping. There is a response to a question asked by Senator Kenny on February 18 regarding the tenth anniversary of the Ocean Ranger disaster and, finally, a response to a question asked by Senator Olson on February 28 regarding federal support for the grains sector.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SRI LANKA—HUMAN RIGHTS ABUSES—CANADIAN ROLE

(Response to question raised by the Hon. Lorna Marsden on February 13, 1992)

Consideration has been given to a role for the Commonwealth or to the United Nations in promoting a process of negotiation and dialogue to bring about an end to the fighting in the North-East.

Initial offers of assistance by Commonwealth Members have been declined by the Sri Lankan Government of President Premadasa.

Canada and like-minded countries are monitoring the situation closely and are considering a further offer of assistance in response to indications of a more favourable reception.

Canada would be prepared to play a coordinating role within the Commonwealth or among like-minded countries to provide an international intervention to promote a ceasefire and initiate negotiations between the Government and Tamil representatives.

THE ENVIRONMENT

EFFECTS AND MONITORING OF DEPLETION OF OZONE LAYER—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Environment Canada operates monitoring stations in Toronto, Saskatoon, Goose Bay, Edmonton, Churchill, Resolute and Alert that measure the status of the ozone layer. Some stations have data going back to 1960, so the results can be compared to long-term changes.

Canadian scientists have pioneered research measurements of the arctic ozone during the last six years. This year, additional Canadian measurements, from balloons as well as ground-based equipment are being made. About thirty balloon payloads will be flown from Alert and about ten from Resolute, Eureka and Iqaluit, the latter synchronized with flights of NASA aircraft. Data are being exchanged between Environment Canada, European countries and NASA.

Through its Green Plan Initiative on Stratospheric Ozone, the government will establish a permanent high arctic ozone observatory for high-technology measurements as part of an international network to study ozone depletion. The observatory will facilitate research that will increase our understanding of arctic ozone depletion and its effect on ozone levels in Southern Canada, and help determine the effectiveness of control measures on ozone-depleting chemicals. The facility, which will be completed later this year on Ellesmere Island near Eureka, will place Canada on the leading edge of ozone science. A special laser will be designed and made in Canada to measure Stratospheric Ozone. Other highly-sophisticated scientific equipment will be developed and operated at the observatory in partnership with Canadian universities and scientists from other countries.

Environment Canada has no plans to close the Mould Bay weather station or any of its Northern weather stations involved in ozone monitoring. The Mould Bay facility, which at this time does not carry out ozone-monitoring activities, is being modernized to make it more cost-effective in its capabilities as an upper air observatory.

POSSIBLE REACTIVATION OF DISUSED ROCKET STATION FOR MONITORING OF OZONE LAYER

Environment Canada does not see any need to re-establish a rocket-based monitoring program. Technology allows Environment Canada scientists to monitor the ozone layer with ground-based equipment and with delicate instruments sent by balloon to the stratosphere.

MEDICARE

COST OF FINANCING HEALTH CARE PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

With respect to funding for health care, federal transfers to the provinces which support health care services remain large and continue to grow.

Established Program Financing (EPF) expenditures for Medicare from 1987-1992 are as follows:

1987-88: $12.59 billion

1989-90: $14.25 billion

The following are EPF health expenditures for 1991-1992, broken down into cash and tax categories:

Cash
Extended Health Services	$ 1.4 billion
Insured Health Services	$ 5.1 billion
Tax	$ 8.1 billion
Total	$14.6 billion

When both the EPF and equalization programs are included, federal transfers to the provinces which could be used to help fund health care were $28 billion in 1991-92.

CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE

MEASURES TO LIMIT BENEFITS OF CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

(Response to question raised by the Hon. Royce Frith on February 13, 1992)

The Free Trade Agreement is to be phased in over the period of ten years thus, a complete verification of Mr. Andre's statement of 1987 is not available at this time. However, it is possible to outline some of the benefits the FTA has so far provided to Canadian consumers.

It is estimated that the first two rounds, under the FTA, of tariff acceleration on U.S. imports has resulted in approximately $122 million in lost revenues to the federal government— revenue that has gone instead to Canadian companies and consumers. Round 1: Approximately $100 million in duties foregone. Round 2: approximately $22 million in duties foregone. Round 3 is currently under way, with over 260 industry submissions being considered for early tariff reduction.

Some examples are provided below to highlight what the reduction of tariff levels mean in terms of consumer savings.

Item	Tariff—	Retail price(-) (Consumers Dist.)
telephone answering machines	8%	4%
curling irons	10.3%	6.5%
rice cookers	10.3%	10%
basketballs	11.3%	10%

The Consumer Price Index is beginning to reveal the positive impact of the FTA in its yearly figures.

*This increase due to the Implementation of the GST, but has since worked through the system and is no longer an inflationary factor.

NEWFOUNDLAND

10TH ANNIVERSARY OF OCEAN RANGER DISASTER—REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION

(Response to question raised by the Hon. Colin Kenny on February 18, 1992)

A bill entitled "An Act to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and other Acts in consequence thereof" (C-58) was given first reading in the House of Commons on February 20, 1992. The objective of this bill is to address all outstanding recommendations of the Hickman Royal Commission on the Ocean Ranger Marine Disaster, which investigated the events leading to the loss of the drilling unit.

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

AGRICULTURE

FEDERAL SUPPORT FOR GRAINS SECTOR—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by the Hon. H.A. Olson on February 28, 1992)

Of the $800 million in emergency assistance for agricultural producers under the Farm Support and Adjustment Measures II (FSAM II) program, $700 million is directed to grains and oilseeds producers across Canada and $100 million is for other sectors.

By December 31, 1991, $115 million had already been paid to Prairie grains and oilseeds producers; by March 31, 1992, an estimated $308 million will have been paid to complete the first payment instalment. A second instalment of $266 million will be paid beginning in April, for a total of $574 million.

Payment of the first instalment of $1.1 million to grains and oilseeds producers in the Atlantic region began in February. A second instalment of $0.9 million will be paid beginning in April, for a total of $2 million.

The FSAM II payment for grains and oilseeds producers in Québec is $27 million.

FSAM II payments of $97 million for grains and oilseeds producers in Ontario and British Columbia are being made in two instalments; mailing of cheques for the first instalment, forecast at approximately $38 million, began in February. The remainder will be paid in a second instalment beginning in April.

The method of delivery of FSAM II to grains and oilseeds producers varies according to the circumstances of each region. This accounts for the differing timing of delivery.

For the Prairies, payment is based on Canadian Wheat Board (CWB) permit book data in 1990/91. A first instalment of $5 per seeded acre has been made; a final instalment will also include a payment on eligible forage and summerfallow at a rate of 25% of the payment on seeded acres.

For British Columbia and Ontario, payments are being made in two instalments using the data base collected under the Net Income Stabilization Account (NISA).

Québec has already assisted producers through their existing stabilization program; FSAM II funds will reimburse the province's stabilization fund.

For the Atlantic provinces, payments are being made in two instalments, based on seeded acres. The payment level will vary depending on the crop.

LOUIS RIEL

RECOGNITION OF HIS UNIQUE AND HISTORIC ROLE AS FOUNDER OF MANITOBA AND CONTRIBUTOR TO DEVELOPMENT OF CONFEDERATION

Hon. Duff Roblin, for Hon. Senator Murray, pursuant to notice of earlier this day, moved:

That the Senate take note that the Métis people of Rupert's Land and the North Western Territory, through democratic structures and procedures, took effective steps to maintain order and protect the lives, rights and property of the people of the Red River;

That the Senate take note that, in 1870, under the leadership of Louis Riel, the Métis of the Red River adopted a List of Rights;

That the Senate take note that, based on the List of Rights, Louis Riel negotiated the terms for the admission of Rupert's Land and the North Western Territory into the Dominion of Canada;

That the Senate take note that these terms for admission form part of the Manitoba Act;

That the Senate take note that, after negotiating Manitoba's entry into Confederation, Louis Riel was thrice elected to the House of Commons;

That the Senate take note that, until his death in 1885, Louis Riel led the movement which fought for the maintenance of the rights and freedoms of the Métis people;

That the Senate take note that the Constitution Act, 1982, recognizes and affirms the existing aboriginal and treaty rights of the Métis;

That the Senate take note that since the death of Louis Riel, the Métis people have honoured his memory and continued his purposes in their honourable striving for the implementation of those rights;

That the Senate recognize the unique and historic role of Louis Riel as a founder of Manitoba and his contribution in the development of Confederation; and

That the Senate support by its actions the true attainment, both in principle and in practice, of the constitutional rights of the Métis people.

He said: I move that the resolution previously read to the House in connection with Louis Riel now be debated.

In my capacity as a third generation citizen of the province of Manitoba, and in view of my territorial designation as the senator from Red River, I ask this house to approve a resolution of reconciliation and recognition with respect to Louis Riel, one of the giant figures in the history of my province, and with respect to his people, the Métis people of Western Canada.

In this present time of national introspection, it seems to me both a propitious and a favourable event, and that the circumstances are welcome that such a motion should be discussed in the Parliament of Canada, and certainly in this chamber.

One hundred and twenty-three years ago, in 1867, on the eve of the purchase of the territory of Rupert's Land from the Hudson's Bay Company by the new Dominion of Canada, the Red River settlement was a lonely frontier community described by some as a settlement on the eastern shore of an immense prairie ocean. It was isolated in the centre of North America with no good communications to the rest of this continent. In that place lived some 12,000 people, almost half of them Métis of French and Indian origin, almost half of them Scotch or English mixed blood, with perhaps several hundred people of either Indian or white backgrounds. In the harsh environment, this small community fought to survive on a dying Buffalo hunt, on the remnants of the fur trade, and on the precarious basis of a primitive agriculture.

In 1869, prior to any consultation with it, as far as I am aware, this small community was confronted with the takeover of their community by Canadian powers, which were largely unknown to them. After 200 years, the old order of the Hudson's Bay Company as the rulers of Rupert's Land was coming to an end and was being replaced by a new order from Canada, that itself being a new creation among the nations of the world.

The Red River people themselves were divided by race, language, and religion. This division could add nothing to the harmony or consensus that was so badly needed in the situation with which they were faced. Yet, local rights and local customs demanded respect, and local consent was an essential condition to sound policy.

It was the man Louis Riel who, not without opposition, spoke for the people. It was Louis Riel who articulated the demands of the plainsmen and the settlers. It was Louis Riel who organized a provisional government which had majority support in the community, and who led this small people, as the representatives of Canada approached the Red River from the east.

Louis Riel's role and part in these proceedings was a dominant one. He was the President of the short-lived provisional government to which I have referred. His was a strong voice in laying down the provisions of the Manitoba Act of 1970 that the Red River people could accept. Indeed, through him, the very name of "Manitoba" was attached to this new geographical province that was being created.

Yet, in this constructive process, by the perversity of human affairs, a Métis drumhead court martial decreed the death before a firing squad of a rash Canadian dissident named Thomas Scott. That tragic event in 1870 cast its malign shadow, not only on the province itself but right across the political spectrum of the new Canada of those days.

However, that tragedy was itself quite overshadowed by an even more calamitous decision that was taken some 15 years later when Louis Riel was tried and hanged in Regina in 1885 on the charge of treason. This act was one whose consequences could not be imagined and which had a shattering and long-remembered effect on the psyche of the Canadian nation.

Those 1885 events, of course, were after 1870, long after Louis Riel's part in Manitoba's creation was over, and nothing can take away from his role as a founder of my native province.

Now, in 1992, the passions of those far-off and distant days are perhaps but the faint echoes of history in the minds of those who even remember them. Now is a time when we have come to the conclusion that we can look at our Manitoba history squarely, with all its bittersweet emotions. We may conclude that in that history there is enough honour, tragedy and compassion for all.

Louis Riel lies buried in the churchyard of St. Boniface. His family is still to be found in Manitoba, and his people, the Métis of the western plains, are some 150,000 strong and more. With us, they are the heirs of the legacy to Louis Riel.

So this resolution is about reconciliation, but it is also about recognition; recognition that there are legitimate rights pertaining to the western Canadian Métis people in 1992.

As we struggle through the current constitutional obsessions, let us remember the interest of our Métis fellow citizens in what is taking place. It is far from clear what current events can or should hold in store for them. But now is the time to do our best to recognize, to consult, to conciliate, and to satisfy, as best may be, the legitimate hopes and aspirations of those people. They are the heirs of Louis Riel. We have an obligation to remember their part in the history of our country. We have a resolution before us which attempts not only to reconcile but to recognize the place these people occupy in the history of our country. It is my hope, honourable senators, that this resolution will be a step along the way of the future and the way of justice and equity.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak on this matter, but I wish to refer to statement number 6 in the motion, and perhaps the senators who have tabled this resolution can enlighten me. I read this motion for the first time this afternoon and I have not had an opportunity to research it as I might.

Statement 6 reads:

> That the Senate take note that, until his death in 1885, Louis Riel led the movement which fought for the maintenance of the rights and freedoms of the Métis people.

It is my recollection that Louis Riel, after 1870, left Manitoba and moved to the western territories, and then south of the border. During that period, for some decade and a half, one of the leaders—or the leader—of the Métis movement was Gabriel Dumont. If that is correct, perhaps the government might consider amending that sentence to read:

> . . . until his death in 1885, Louis Riel was a leader of the movement which fought for the maintenance of the rights and freedoms of the Métis people.

[Senator Roblin]

We are all concerned about history, but we should be meticulous about our concern for history, if I am correct.

Senator Roblin: If I understand the question correctly, my honourable friend is questioning some of the phrasing or the wording included in this resolution. I must confess to him that I did not see it myself until about five minutes before I rose to speak. Although I was aware of the subject, I was not aware of the precise terms in which these various sentences were phrased. I am sure no harm will come from examining them carefully, but I would rather hope that we could avoid taking an action of that kind. Once you start opening up these various clauses, you open up many other subjects which perhaps other folk would like to see included in the very elaborate and minute statement that is contained in this resolution. It is not a subject that lends itself to an easy decision, nor to an easy correction.

I should like to take my honourable friend's question under advisement—at least, I would ask those who are responsible for drafting this resolution to take it under advisement.

My own opinion is that we should make no change unless it is absolutely essential. Once we start that process, heaven knows where we will end up.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would it be possible to get a copy of the resolution if Senator Roblin has it?

Senator Roblin: I would be happy to give it to my honourable friend. I thought that it was distributed to everyone in the Senate.

Senator Molgat: No, it did not get here.

Senator Grafstein: I appreciate Senator Roblin's response. Gabriel Dumont was a great figure in Canadian history. His memory has not been very well commemorated here or in any place. I thought it would be appropriate at this time to raise that point, particularly because he played such a crucial role in the life of the Métis and of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Riel: Honourable senators, if I may join the debate on the question raised by Senator Grafstein, I would have to say that it is probably because Louis Riel was always considered as the leader of the movement which fought for the Métis people. There were also Dumont Ambroise Lépine and a few others mentioned in history books. Second, the motion 8245 it is Riel who led Manitoba's entry into Confederation. That is one of the most important fact that has to be recognized. That is why, if we have to make a list of all the deserving people who have run or protected the Métis in those days, we will have to amend this motion extensively. I am not saying this to contradict in an unkind way my friend Senator Grafstein, but simply because I have had the opportunity to read the motion ahead of time. I think it is just fine the way it is.

It would be appropriate, if Senator Grafstein has specific points to make on the events that took place and participation in these events, that he should make a speech. Therefore, from a historical point of view, the records of the Senate would show that due consideration was given to the role played by others beside Riel and that it was not for family reasons or for glory or because all those events were so dramatic that we try and reconcile today with words such as the ones used in this motion.

I wanted to say that I cannot let this motion pass without speaking to it. I approve it entirely. I agree completely with the terms of this resolution. They are suitable for yesterday's situation and that of today. In short, this motion, in plain language, can be summed up as: Louis Riel has served his country well.

I heard on television the speeches made in the other place by the members for Churchill and St. Boniface. I read the speech made by the President of the Privy Council. This motion is particularly interesting because it is an action of redress, the recognition by Parliament that a citizen has been wronged in paying with his life at age 43 his dedication to a just cause. I never favoured nor supported the requests for pardon made in the past in favour of Louis Riel because I felt it was admitting faults not our oewn. Even though Louis Riel and his followers resorted to extreme measures, we have to admit that the Metis claims were legitimate. Every time the issue of pardon came up, I wanted to know to whom pardon had been granted up till now and if it had been for crimes, of small or medium importance. In short, the pardon in question applies to a criminal matter.

Here we are dealing with a strictly political matter. If we had to take an example, we should go back to the United States, some 20 years earlier, after the Civil War, when no secessionist leader was hanged. Yet Riel was hanged. He had not called for secession, indeed he brought a new province into his country.

Today's resolution, a resolution of reconciliation as Senator Roblin called it, satisfies my sense of unity of opposites as they say in philosophy, the harmony of opposite tensions, as in the lyre and the bow, as expressed by an English author, i.e. to a remarkably unfair treatment there must be an exemplary redress.

I consider the resolution before us today, which I hope will be passed, to be an exemplary redress. It is also intended for the Metis nation as the Metis called themselves at that time. If I have the time under own Rules, I would like to tell you briefly how I am related to Louis Riel. According to Quebec's Civil Code, we are distant collateral relatives, since we are related in the twelfth degree. In the collateral line, the degrees are reckoned by adding up the generations from both collateral lines up to and not including the common ancestor. I am not descended from Louis Riel, and he is not descended from my family branch. We have a common ancestor, Jean-Baptiste Riel, who came to Canada around 1694. There is something very special or remarkable about this man; he was born in Ireland circa 1670.

This being St-Patrick's Day, I am happy to rise to pay tribute to this ancestor of mine. In 1704, at his wedding on Du Pas Island, close to Lavaltrie, north of Montreal, according to documents still existing, he said he was the son of Jean-Baptiste Riel and Louise Fountain or Lafontaine, from the parish of St. Pierre, in the cathedral town of Limerick, in Ireland. I have a copy of his marriage certificate and even of his marriage contract, confirming his place of birth. Also as proof, there are letters of naturalization, as were called at that time the naturalization documents entered in the record of decrees and deliberations of the superior council for the year 1710, volume 6, page 115, letters in which the Versailles royal authorities granted the French nationality to listed English citizens, among which was an Irishman called Jean-Baptiste Riel, whose place of birth is indicated.

So that makes us one of the oldest Irish family in the country, whether senator Doody likes it or not! Anyway, I do not think a poor soldier, from the King's army, would have invented, on his wedding day, the name of Limerick and the church in St. Pierre, in the town of Limerick, since this city and this church do exist, as I learned one day during the 1967 World Exhibition. As a member of the board of directors, and as the etiquette would have it, I was always seated next to the Anglican Lord Bishop of Montreal, a man called Kenneth McGuire. Beside being a real gentleman, the Anglican Bishop of Montreal spoke perfect French, as do graduates from English universities, and he was from Ireland. We talked on several occasions, and one day, I told him: You are from Ireland, Your Grace. He said, of course. Then, I told him: Well, I have an ancestor from Ireland, from a town called Limerick.

He was baptized in the Church of St. Peter. He told me: That's funny, I was a curate once in the same church, in Limerick. I thought for a minute and then I said: It couldn't be the same church, because you are an Anglican and we are Catholics. He said: No, at the time it was a Catholic church. We had several changes back and forth like that in Ireland. So then he said: But you won't find any records on your family if you go to St. Peter's, because in Ireland, all church records were burned several times.

And then he looked at me with his blue eyes and said: I must say Jean-Baptiste is not a very Irish name.

To satisfy my curiosity, I went to Limerick and I stopped at St. Peter's Church, and of course I found nothing. I was anxious to see the records to find out whether our ancestors were really Irish or had come to Ireland from France to fight against King William III, who defeated James II at the Battle of the Boyne in 1680. Since my ancestor, Jean-Baptiste, arrived in Quebec in 1692 or 1694, this was not impossible. Unfortunately, I couldn't find any records to prove it.

To get back to Louis Riel, we can trace our ancestry to two different branches of the family. I was born two and half centuries and eight generations after the first Jean-Baptiste arrived. On our side of the family, I am related to him, twelve times removed. I could still inherit, according to section 634 of Quebec's Civil Code, which provides that relations beyond the twelfth degree do not inherit. I am just at the limit. However, since my ancestor had fourteen children, and we can suppose this went on for several generations, I would probably have to share my inheritance with a lot of cousins, because the family "prspered and multiplied", although not as much as the Tremblays and Lévêsques in Quebec.

Now that is settled, from my extensive reading on the subject I have concluded that Louis Riel was brilliant as a child, and that is why Monsignor Taché, Bishop of St. Boniface at the time, felt he should be educated to become a priest and then come back out west and minister to the Métis. It was the custom in our distinct society for parish priests or bishops to decide who among the younger members of their flock would be destined for the priesthood. Many of us got our education this way, because it was still common practice when I was a boy. So Monsignor Taché sent Louis Riel to the Collège de Montréal when he was twelve years old, towards the end of the 1850s. He was given a sound classical education by the Sulpician Fathers and was regularly in the top ten of his class. The Collège de Montréal still has his marks, because unlike the church records in Ireland, the records at the Collège de Montréal were never burnt and were, in fact, carefully preserved.

Perhaps I should point out that when the parish priest felt that a student was promising and might have a vocation—meaning that he might go on to the priesthood—he was sent to a so-called collège classique or petit séminaire, and a benefactor was usually found to pay for his room and board.

Monsignor Taché, bishop of St-Boniface, had a regular benefactress in Montreal in the person of Mrs. Masson, whose husband, Joseph Masson, had made his fortune in the fur Trade and the building trade.

Mr. Masson was on the board of the Bank of Montreal. In fact, he was the vice-president of the board, which is saying a lot. He had built a small castle, a manor if you wish, for himself in Terrebonne, which still exists. It now houses a Quebec government educational institution.

Mrs. Masson paid Riel's way through college, where he earnestly studied French, Latin and Greek. Riel's prayer book, written in ancient Greek and annotated in his own writing, is kept at the National Archives. One can appreciate how good and fluent his French was by reading the well-turned literary writings he has left behind. For those who are interested, the Library of Parliament has a collection of the works of Louis Riel that have been published over the years.

So, Riel spent five or six years at the Montreal College. Incidentally, this institution run by the Sulpicians is the oldest and certainly one of the most renowned college in Montreal. By virtue of a settlement made on them by Louis XIV, the Sulpicians were the seigniors of the island of Montreal. The classical teaching was highly rated and their religious teaching was strict and akin to the Jansenistic doctrines of that time.

But what can a college boy do during the summer? Louis Riel could not leave Montreal for Red River at the end of June and come back by the beginning of September. The trip took two to three months one-way in those days, travelling part of the way by sear (on the Saint-Lawrence and the Great Lakes) and the rest by land, riding in a Red River cart or on a horse.

So, Mrs. Masson was putting Louis Riel up for the summer holidays and the atmosphere he lived in was excellent because Mrs. Masson was known for her charities as well as for being well-mannered and well-educated lady with a lot of class. Not only did she assist Louis Riel financially to enable him to pursue his education, but she also helped the young Adolphe Chapleau who later became Premier of Quebec, a minister under Sir John and a member of the Cabinet, who refused to grant a pardon to Riel. Adolphe Chapleau ended his career as Lieutenant Governor, with the title of Sir Adolphe.

The point I want to make with the Masson House is that there it contained a well-appointed library. The books had been bought by Louis-Joseph Papineau during his exile in Paris for Mrs. Masson, a friend of Mrs. Papineau.

There were Close ties between the Massons and the Papineaus. Louis-Joseph not only acquired the books for the library but also designed the ex libris for Mr. Masson. These facts are all in a book entitled "Société canadienne-française aux XIXe siècle," by Gérard Parizeau, the most competent and serious historian of XIXth century Quebec.

You may be sure that the Masson library bore the distinctive Papineau signature. It contained for the most part books on the French Revolution and books revealing a liberal way of thinking for those times. That is where young Louis Riel discovered the Charter of rights promulgated by the French Revolution, the "Déclaration des droits de l'homme et du citoyen", which provided inspiration later on in 1869-1870 when he drew a list of rights he imposed for Manitoba's entry into the Canadian Confederation. That was the first Charter of rights in Canada and it came 100 years before the Canadian Charter and before that of Quebec.

Louis Riel's education was therefore the result of two influences: one religious and classic under the guidance of Sulpicians and the other, through books of a liberal philosophical nature according to what was considered as liberalism in France and in Lower-Canada in those days.

We know what liberalism was in the XIXth century. According to historian René Raymond, it was a certain philosophy based on knowledge and truth.

> The mind must be capable of finding truth by itself, without any constraint, and a common truth must ensue from the colliding of opinions. The parliamentary system only reflects on a political level that belief in the virtue of dialogue. Such a philosophical view of knowledge implies that any dogma imposed by the Church must be rejected and that truth's relativity and the value of tolerance must be asserted.

Needless to say the Catholic Church of those days condemned that philosophy.

When he was around 18 Louis Riel and he was supposed to go into philosophy. He learned about the death of his father.

Travelling back to the Red River for the funeral was out of the question. Alone in Montreal, far from his native land, he made a very important decision: he would not pursue his studies. Some have wonder why, since he was a good student and was doing well. I do not have a confirmed explanation but I have an interpretation.

The decision to drop out of school also meant that he was giving up the idea of becoming a priest. One has to wonder whether it is the decision not to become a priest that resulted in his dropping out of school.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Riel, I must remind you of the Rules. However, the honourable senators may wish that Senator Riel finishes his speech.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Riel: One has to wonder whether it is the decision not to become a priest that resulted in his dropping out of school. This is a situation that some of us that studied in classical colleges and small seminaries, have experienced. I have personally seen it happen.

One of my fellow students in college dropped out. He told me: I cannot do this to my benefactor, my family, my teachers, and so on. He thought this would be disloyal, so he became a garage owner. He may have done better than if he had become a lawyer or a priest, but that is another question.

This situation created a mental block for our young hero. I believe that he dispelled this trauma and this feeling of guilt by pursuing a youthful dream, perhaps quite normal, namely to transmit his philosophy of freedom, equality and fraternity to his people from the Red River and to all the immigrants of the world that would join them. You can find that in his writings.

Louis Riel then spent some time in the law firm of Sir Georges Etienne Cartier, to whom he made an ode as was the custom, and then in the office of Rodolphe Laflamme, if I am not mistaken. We know that Sir Georges was the lawyer for both the railroads and the Sulpicians, which is not necessarily a contradiction. As for Laflamme, he was a red radical from the Canadian Institute of Montreal and he pleaded against the Sulpicians in the Guibord case.

Two or three years later Louis Riel is back at the Red River. He is well educated, he can speak French, English and some local dialects, and he will play a major role in the protection of the rights of the Metis but also of all the residents of the area by obtaining that the Canadian government recognize their rights. He was instrumental in having the fundamental act of Manitoba passed, as well as the list of rights, and he obtained the recognition of linguistic and religious rights in Manitoba, just like those that Quebec had.

I could go on and talk about the role of the Catholic church in the events that took place. I could talk about the role of Donald Smith who would later become Lord Strathcona, and for whom I have a lot of respect. Lord Strathcona became the Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company and later President of Canadian Pacific. It is said that he would have cleverly distributed some dollars of the time, real dollars, to solve the problem but that Louis Riel, a young idealist of 23, would have refused.

Apparently, these dollars were given to other people for charity work.

Anyway, in November 1885, the Canadian Pacific held the famous ceremony of the Last Spike, with the famous painting showing Lord Strathcona. It was on November 7th. As for Louis Riel, he was hanged a week later, on November 16th. All this was told to me, about twenty years ago, by a former president of the Canadian Pacific, who allowed the company to float a major public borrowing which it just needed.

You might ask why Louis Riel wanted to found a religion. I think I can skip over that point.

I mostly have something to say about the effect. What you should not forget is that the hanging of Louis Riel had the effect of a nuclear bomb in the province of Quebec. It produced an enormous emotion which was maintained, sustained and used by talented politicians. It permitted Honoré Mercier to form the first nationalist Party which brought together Liberals, Conservatives and Beavers, that is the ultramontane Conservatives of that era. Honoré Mercier won the elections in 1886, riding on an emotional wave never seen before in Quebec.

Louis Riel's hanging led to a series of inflamed and well-attended public meetings. One of these was held on the Champ-de-Mars, in Montreal, where two great orators of the time, Honoré Mercier and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, spoke to a crowd of 50 000 people the day after Riel's death. My memory is not so good, but one of those two men started his speech as follows:

> "Too late, it is too late, my brother Riel has died."

and Sir Wilfrid made the following statement:

> "If I had been along the Saskatchewan River, I too would have raised my rifle."

As I have said, people in Quebec were very upset. I doubt there was ever a stronger emotion. Il was stronger than in 1837, because in 1837, the Church had forbid participation in the uprising. If you took the trouble to read the speeches delivered by Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Honoré Mercier, you would find the words "distinct society", which goes to show that words arouse different reactions depending on the persons and the times in which they are uttered. Montaigne expressed that very well more than 400 years ago when he said:

> Grammar is the source of most of the world's troubles.

In October 1968, the Government of Saskatchewan, under Premier Ross Tatcher, unveiled a monument to Louis Riel in front of the provincial Parliament building in Regina. The Premier invited Canada's new Prime Minister, Mr. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, my fellow university student and friend, who took me to this ceremony. There was a great banquet with many guests which was a big success. I beleive the erection of that monument showed, even back then, the spirit of redress that we find in today's resolution. It was already in the air a long time ago.

Today we have before us a resolution based on consensus. This consensus is supported all across Canada. I mentioned the monument in Regina. We have to mention as well the monument in Winnipeg which dates back to about the same time; the Louis Riel Games in Edmonton; the postage stamp of a few years ago; the opera presented for Expo 67; several plays, a movie, many books, in fact more books on Riel than on any other Canadian politician, including Quebecers.

I am happy to add that a few years ago in Montreal, the Catholic School Board, under the chairmanship of Mrs. Lavoix-Roux, our colleague, gave the name of Louis Riel to an important high school, the Polyvalente Louis Riel.

I have no doubt that a national consensus has existed for a long time in Canada concerning the need for a change in attitude towards Louis Riel and for redress regarding the Métis people as they were called.

That is why I fully support this motion. Thank you for allowing me to explain.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, unlike my honourable colleague Senator Riel, I cannot claim to be a relative even in the twelfth degree of Louis Riel. On the other hand, I have the advantage of having lived with the Métis people in Manitoba.

I come from a small village a long way from Winnipeg a village predominantly Métis and French-speaking and I have lived with these people I dearly love, and have the highest regard for, but who unfortunately have been misunderstood for the longest time, as Louis Riel himself was misunderstood.

Frankly, I blame our school system for that. As far as I am concerned, one of the great Canadian tragedies is that we have never managed to agree on one single Canadian history. We teach a French Canadian version of history in French-speaking schools, and a English Canadian version in English-speaking ones. Riel is therefore portrayed as two very different persons.

As I discovered, painfully at times, having left my small home town to study at the University of Manitoba and from there, after training in the Canadian Officers Training Corps, I joined the Regiment in Winnipeg, the Royal Winnipeg Rifle, one of those that fought Riel in Batoche. I can tell you that, in my Regiment, they viewed Riel very differently from me. On those occasions when we cheated, we would be taught French Canadian history in my school. It was an English school you see.

That is to say that there is a misunderstanding across this country. Let us not delude ourselves into believing this motion that I do support, is going to make everybody happy. There is still a lack of understanding. I want Canada to go beyond that. Someone should produce a history of Canada that really tells what happened in our country, one that we could accept and all be proud of, instead of presenting two points of view and having this difficult attitude that we see so often.

[Senator Riel.]

I therefore support this motion. Indeed, I think that one could go further and I even predict that one fine day Riel will be recognized as a Father of Confederation.

Consider the situation in Manitoba back in 1869. The Hudson's Bay Company, which until then was the government, was giving up. There were talks with Canada, for which the people of Red River felt no particular attachment. Were it not for Riel and his group, Manitoba could very likely have joined the United States. In fact, there was an American consul in Winnipeg at that time and he was doing all he could to attract this colony to the United States. We know what the American attitude then was.

So what did Riel and the Métis people do then? He ensured that Manitoba entered Confederation honestly, with demands that the people of the region had made themselves and that the government had accepted. Given that, I do not see why he cannot be accepted as a real Father of Confederation as far as Manitoba is concerned. Maybe the country is not prepared to go that far now. For now, I find this resolution worthwhile and I support it.

[English]

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, during Senator Riel's very learned and fascinating speech, I had an opportunity to obtain from the library a book entitled Strange Empire by J. K. Howard which recounts the history of the Métis rebellion. The role of Louis Riel and also the role of Gabriel Dumont is considered.

May I refer honourable senators to page 307 of that volume, where it is indicated that, when Batoche came into being in 1870, its leading citizen was Gabriel Dumont. He was 32 years old at the time.

Later on, there is a statement that Gabriel Dumont was chosen President in the territory they called Saskatchewan, and the group expressly said it had no intention of setting itself up as an independent state. In effect, I think this book lays a strong historical claim to also treating Gabriel Dumont as a Father of Confederation when dealing with Saskatchewan.

Strange Empire also explores the very fascinating tale of the relationship of the these two men, Gabriel Dumont being the military leader and Riel being the political leader. When Riel was imprisoned, Gabriel Dumont set up an underground railway, if you will, to see if he could rescue Riel. Riel at the time, so says this history, expected that the government of the day, Sir John A.'s government, would grant him clemency. The government of the day did not move for clemency, and Riel was executed.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to make an extensive speech about Gabriel Dumont, other than to say that one military genius once told me that Gabriel Dumont was the only Canadian military leader never to be defeated in a single battle when there was an equal number of forces. I think the history of Gabriel Dumont as a military leader and as the first provisional president, I believe, of Saskatchewan, should also be noted on this historic occasion.

I have no objection to the motion as it stands, other than to add these words so that we may more fully understand the very intricate and complex role of history and the role of Gabriel Dumont in the history of the Métis people.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I will not take much of the Senate's time in debating this motion today. I wish I had had more notice in order to do a better job in speaking to the motion so that I could properly recognize this great man, who is a hero in the eyes of the aboriginal people of Canada. He is a great hero especially in the eyes of the Métis people of Canada.

I rise today merely to say I am pleased with this motion, as far as it goes. It properly recognizes and puts into perspective some of the true history of Louis Riel and the contributions he made not only on behalf of the aboriginal people but also on behalf of Canada. In the history of Canada—often it was too little history—which we were taught in our schools, the story of the aboriginal peoples was badly told. Louis Riel was portrayed as a rebel, a villain, a traitor. Those were the characteristics attributed to this person whom we have now come to believe was a real hero on behalf of our people at the time.

Honourable senators, I am glad that this resolution has been brought forward. I am happy to support it. Perhaps, if the constitutional conference process goes on a little longer, we will have all kinds of history coming out and being told in the proper light.

I was thinking last Friday night that the speech given by the right honourable Joe Clark in that conference was quite extraordinary. It was one of the better speeches in recent times to be given by a government minister. He wrapped everything together—the history and some admissions. If we could read between the lines of history, and could place people in the situations to see what really happened, we would see that some terrible actions were taken by people we now think of as great . Nevertheless, Mr. Clark made quite an extraordinary speech. And this is an extraordinary resolution to be making in these times. I am happy to support it.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I also wish to endorse the resolution as presented, but I want to draw your attention to a modern historical fact about Louis Riel.

Almost since I returned to Saskatchewan in the 1950s, we have had each summer a dramatization of the trial of Louis Riel played by amateur actors. It has often run through the whole summer tourist season. We have a tremendous tourist season in Saskatchewan, as you can imagine, made up chiefly of people passing through on their way to the mountains or from the mountains. We have encouraged many of them to go and see "The trial of Louis Riel". If you had witnessed the dramatization that went on in that courtroom scene and heard the speech given by Louis Riel as his closing speech before the jury were dismissed to make a decision, you would agree it is a most moving episode. I think it has run now in Regina for over 25 years, chiefly in the summer months.

I should tell you also that one of my very good friends, who is a lawyer in Regina, had made such a career of playing this role that he continued to wear Louis Riel's beard for many, many years until he gave up the role. I bring that to your attention to add to the affair.

Unfortunately, they told me last year, when I went there, that that was the last year in which the play would be performed. I hope they will renew it again this year, considering all the accolades that have been made about Mr. Riel and his contribution to Western Canada and to the Confederation of this country.

One other historical fact is of interest. Batoche has become, if you will, almost a sacred place to the Métis of Saskatchewan. Each year there is a celebration called "The Return to Batoche", and the people are caught up in an almost religious agony. "The Return to Batoche" occurs every summer in Saskatchewan.

Thank you, senators.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the Budget presented by the Honourable Don Mazankowski, P.C., Minister of Finance, on Tuesday, February 25, 1992.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, a number of studies on children living in poverty in Canada have been done in the last few years. Senator Marsden referred to the study which our Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology did, which was tabled in the Senate in January 1991. Some of us who worked on that particular study are now somewhat comforted and pleased with the hours that we spent. In the new child benefit package announced in the Budget, although we may not see everything we had wanted, some of us do see a direction that is encouraging.

I want to speak just on those reform benefits for a few moments this afternoon, honourable senators, to get a perspective of where we are going. We do know, of course, that governments cannot buy their way out of poverty; nor can they eliminate child poverty. however, collectively, we can work together toward that most desirable end.

In September of 1990 the Prime Minister co-chaired the World Summit for Children at which 71 of the world's leaders committed their governments to act on behalf of the world's children. Last May the Throne Speech reiterated our commitment to children. It stated the objectives simply: to see Canadian girls and boys better educated, better protected and better nurtured so that they can make their own contributions to Canada's future.

Last December we completed another major step by ratifying the Convention on the Rights of the Child. The Prime Minister ratified the convention with great pride because it was an illustration of Canada's belief that children, indeed the world's children, matter. Now we have before us in this budget the outline of the proposed new child benefit program.

I believe, honourable senators, it is a major step forward. I know not everyone in this chamber would agree with me, but I can only interpret the program that we are promised as I see it from many years' involvement in social policy. It is a $2 billion step forward towards improving federal support for children and for families. The new proposed child benefit will consolidate the existing family allowance, the child tax credits and the dependent child credit into a single monthly cheque beginning January of 1993. The child benefit will also include an additional amount for the low income working family—the working poor as they are commonly known, and that additional benefit will top up at $500 per family.

It is a big step and I am quite happy about it. It builds on existing federal programs which total $15 billion annually for children and for families. It supports the roles of other governments and organizations. The most important thrust that I see is that it sets the stage for further important steps in this area of social policy concern.

We have had a bit of a patchwork over the years. There have been perhaps 20 separate occasions when these programs have been added to and adjusted by legislation or by a motion in the other place and approved here. Perhaps we are now going to get something that is a little more organized.

There are some key aspects, honourable senators, to the proposed new child benefit package. It is simpler, as you have read. It is one monthly cheque, there is no red tape and it is not taxable. It is fairer. It is designed for the children who need it the most; it is designed for low-income working parents and it is based on family income, not on the lower income of two adults living together or a husband and wife with only one income taken into consideration, which really put a heavy tax on couples.

It is more generous, with $2 billion spread over five years. As you search the Estimates you will find the $500 supplement. All families with a joint income of less than $50,000 will gain. The proposed benefit package gives a faster response to changes in family circumstances. That is very important. It is also fiscally responsible, and, unless programs are fiscally responsible, there is little guarantee that they will have any longevity.

There are some basic elements in the new child benefit package that I should highlight. There is one annual benefit per child, which is divided, of course, into 12 monthly payments. There is a supplement for three or more children of $75 per child per year. There is also the $213 supplement for children under seven. That amount, of course, is per year. The benefit reduces at $25,900 net for the family income, and there is a new earned income supplement. That income supplement starts kicking in at $3,750 and at the rate of 8 per cent of the earned income; it starts phasing out at about $21,000. The maximum for the working poor is $500 per family.

It has certain impacts on family. The level of benefit is the same for all families in the same category. The winners are the larger families, which will receive more. Families with $10,000 to $20,000 earned income will get the full $500 bonus. Those are the working poor again. Virtually all the single parent families will find themselves in a stronger position, as will the vast majority of one-earner families and the majority of two-earner families. The high-income families, of course, are the losers.

Money alone, as we all know, was not the solution. Many children in our country are at risk. They are hungry, they are abused, they are neglected. I was pleased to learn, when I listened to the minister's comments and read his statements, that he is going to start negotiating with the provinces, with our native people and with other community leaders to develop a program to assist children at risk. He has promised us that package, honourable senators, in the very near future. We are all looking forward to the details that we will find there.

When your committee was looking at this problem we were again dismayed at the poverty and the results of poverty to which native children were subjected, and the circumstances in which they were forced to live. It was very depressing to hear the witnesses talk about such poverty. Although we knew that our aboriginal children were the most at risk and the poorest of our children, it was brought home time and again by the witnesses.

As the minister negotiates and discusses these matters with, and learns from, our native leaders, and as he learns from our provincial and community leaders, it will be most interesting to see the end result as they collectively develop programs to strengthen the environment for these children, because we simply cannot allow them to live the lives they are currently living. We have to do better for them.

The problems facing these children are multitudinous, especially for those living in poverty, whether families of the working poor or families on social assistance. I know that some of you have asked why the children in that second group, those who are living in families which must exist on social assistance, are not being helped more, when the working poor are being helped more. There are very few federal government programs that will help the working poor. This is one of the first times that a strong program is starting to emerge which will give those working poor parents some encouragement.

The very cost of working has never been considered in regard to their take-home pay. I hope the minister will come back to deal with those living on social assistance alone. As you know, that is the group that is paid for jointly by the provinces and the federal government. In a previous study done by our committee we noted that when payments to individual citizens were increased by the federal government that increase did not always go into the pocket of the person for whom it was targeted. Rather, the province would reduce its contribution, in one instance, by the total amount of the federal increase. In other words, they were dealing with it as an another transfer payment. One province was absorbing 100 per cent of all individual transfers and the other provinces, with the exception of Alberta, were charging back or escaping a percentage of their responsibilities. As the federal payment went up, theirs would go down.

Obviously, there will have to be negotiations with the provinces and a commitment by all governments in Canada to attack poverty before we can make real progress in that direction.

The problems facing our children are many and varied and require a range of solutions. We continue to rework and update our approach to supporting children. I believe very strongly that governments today need to face today's realities with solutions designed for today, not solutions that were designed for yesterday. The world is changing very quickly. Our young people are so important to the future of our country that they must be supported at the level of thinking, planning and negotiating so that we can help them grow up to be productive and contributing citizens in our country.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I am very glad that Senator Robertson has spoken on this proposal. I think it would be helpful if she could give us the answers to one or two questions, in preparation for the debate which I am sure is coming.

First of all, I wonder if Senator Robertson knows who will receive these monthly payments? As we all know, the family allowance has traditionally gone to the mother, and that has been considered a crucial factor.

Secondly, I wonder if she would comment on the lack of indexation, which I had referred to earlier.

Thirdly, Senator Robertson said the winners are the poor families and high-income families are the losers. Of course, high-income families now have their child benefits taxed back, for the most part, except for the nanny's section, which is increased and not decreased. The average family income in this country is now just over $51,000. Would it not be more correct to say that the real losers are not the high-income families, but the families whose incomes are just over $51,000? They are the ones who will receive no benefits, including no more family allowance, and who will be the real losers.

Senator Robertson: With respect to your latter question, Senator Marsden, the winners are those families earning up to $50,000, but there are still small benefits going to those earning up to $60,000. That has not been completely phased out at that level.

Perhaps I should rephrase that: The losers, you say they are losing now. Yes, they are losing now. It is being taxed back. Perhaps I should have said that if high-income families thought they would gain any benefit from this program, they were wrong. Perhaps my phrasing was incorrect.

I want to talk about indexation, a matter that you and others have raised in the chamber from time to time. I see the approach that the government is taking in this regard as providing a vehicle for government in the future to deliver benefits to children. In our committee, we talked about the bookends. We have the Guaranteed Income Supplement at one end for senior citizens, but there was nothing much at the other end for the children. Those of us who sat on that committee, if you will remember, Senator Marsden, looked at a guaranteed income supplement for children. Call it by whatever name you wish, I see this children's benefit as a vehicle for getting that other bookend in place.

In line with that notion, the three programs that the new children's benefits will replace are also now subject to the 3 per cent freeze. However, I would look at the child tax credit. I would not look at family allowance. Since the 3 per cent freeze has been in place, family allowance has not increased by much. It is only after the 3 per cent that you have increases. However, although the child tax credit was also under the same legislation, it has increased significantly over the years because it was targeted to the poorer families.

I am confident that regardless of which party forms a government in the future, that government would be very hard pressed not to make major increases to this progran from time to time as they did with the child tax credit because it was targeted. I am not worried by the 3 per cent control because I think that guarantee must be included in there. We are now in an era of low inflation, and it looks as if we will be in that era for some time. I suggest to you, for instance, that in 1983-84 when we had the 5 and 6 per cent ceiling and inflation was certainly in double digits, poor families were in a more difficult position then than they are now. If you do not have control, those who support an increase that reflects the yearly cost of living or of inflation are saying at the beginning of the program that that is enough money. If you go back to our committee, we generally agreed that if we could ever start a program like this, guaranteed income for children, it would probably take eight or ten years before we got to a level of support that would make a meaningful impact on poverty.

I see this program as a vehicle which will give any government the opportunity of directing those dollars to those most needy. However, you have to have some fiscal responsibility. I do not think you can let any program float away with a cost-of-living index. I believe fiscal responsibility is terribly important, but fiscal responsibility does not take away from the government the opportunity and the ability to increase that program from time to time as the moneys are available.

With respect to the question of who will receive the payments, the cheques will come, as the family allowance cheques did in most cases, to the mother. The cheques will continue in that manner.

On motion of Senator Marsden, debate adjourned.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

ELEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Eleventh Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (Budget—Canadian Financial Institutions), presented in the Senate on 27th February, 1992.

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: I understand Senator Kirby submitted this report. The only thing I have to say is that this report concerns the budget of the Senate, which has been accepted by the committee concerned. I move that the report be adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Yes.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Graham, calling the attention of the Senate to the ramifications of the sale or proposed sale of certain rail lines in Canada.—(Honourable Senator Bonnell).

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, this item has been on the Order Paper for some 13 days. According to the new rules, if I do not speak to this matter today, it will be dropped from the Order Paper. I would prefer to leave it on the Order Paper for another few days until the Inquiry that is taking place is concluded and the Transport Committee has made its report.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bonnell: However, rather than doing that, I will speak on it today in order to bring to your attention the work of the Transport Committee under the chairmanship of Senator MacDonald. He is doing a great job for Nova Scotia and a good job for his government, as well as a good job, I hope, on behalf of the people of Cape Breton, because he is showing what a tragedy it will be for Nova Scotia and Canada if the CNR walks away from these rail lines. It would leave the people in real distress in Cape Breton if this line were passed over to some private operator who, perhaps in another year, would go bankrupt and put the land up for sale and maybe sell the stations and sell half their equipment so that no one else could operate in the years to come.

If this rail is sold there is no guarantee that it will ever be operated again by anyone. If someone from the United States of America, or from Japan or some other nation, is given a contract to take over the shortline, there is no guarantee that he will not take financial advantage of the situation in about a year, saying that it is not making any money and starting to sell off the assets. In the meantime Cape Breton would be left with many industries in need of that rail. They are now hauling 75-foot rails from the steel works over that line. Those rails are a tremendous weight and it is dangerous to transport them on a highway. No truck that I know of can haul those 75-foot rails. A regular highway would never withstand the weight of those rails even if they were carried by those great big 18 wheelers. Apart from that, many of the other industries in Cape Breton also need this rail line.

I am afraid that there will be a repetition of what happened in Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland. The first thing they did in Prince Edward Island was to say that it was not profitable to carry passengers. So they did away with the passenger trains but kept the freight trains. It was not many years before they began neglecting the rail. They put no money into repairing the railroad and eventually said that it was not profitable. No one would use the rail because of lack of safety and they would not put a load on the track. They did not encourage or promote the use of freight trains on the track, and finally they did away with the freight trains. So we no longer have freight trains in Prince Edward Island. As if that was not bad enough, they then started to sell the rails. Now we do not even have a rail line. Perhaps some day we will get a good government that will put the rails back. The rails are gone now. They would have to start from scratch again, just as they did in 1873.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): They will sell the road bed next and then they will sell the whole island.

Senator Bonnell: I would not be surprised if they did sell the road bed. If they gave it back to the farmers to grow some good potatoes then we would not have the federal government turning them down because of the PVY-n virus, and preventing them from exporting their potatoes anywhere, even to the other provinces in Canada. That is what happened in Prince Edward Island. It will happen in Cape Breton Island and it will happen from Truro to Sydney. It happened in Newfoundland. I used to travel on the old Bullet line in the 1950s. I used to go from Port-aux-Basques straight through to St. John's on the Bullet. It is gone now.

Senator Murray: When did that go?

Senator Bonnell: I do not know the year, but it went since I travelled on it and I am not that old.

Senator Marshall: The early 1970s.

Senator Bonnell: The early seventies according to Senator Marshall. He knows all about Cape Breton and Newfoundland. He knows how bad the situation will be, as far as all Cape Bretoners are concerned, if this freight train from Truro to Sydney is taken away. It will be a disaster if the CNR is allowed to do this. We need a strong government and a strong committee to recommend to that government that they not allow it to happen.

I do not believe that the province of Nova Scotia is too anxious to have it put on their heads, because immediately once the CNR backs out then I would think it would be up to the provincial government of Nova Scotia to make regulations and rules for transportation of rail in their province. I do not think they are too happy about that. I did not have the opportunity to go to all the hearings, but any that I went to were interesting and informative.

This is an important issue. We are waiting for Senator MacDonald's report. I know with his heart in Nova Scotia and his feet in Nova Scotia—in fact, he comes from Nova Scotia—that he will be thinking of Nova Scotia when he brings in that report. If he needs me to go and help him make a motion, and support it, to ensure that the CNR stays there and operates that rail, I will. As far as I know it is still profitable and they are simply trying to make some kind of excuse so that it appears not to be profitable.

Senator Frith: No, they admit that it is profitable. It is marginally profitable.

Senator Bonnell: "Marginally" means that it is profitable. There are a lot of margins right now and a lot of people going bankrupt because they have no margin of profit. But that rail spur is still marginally profitable. But if they can make it unprofitable so that they can get out of it gracefully they are likely to try to do so.

Senator Frith: Senator MacDonald will not let them get away with it.

Senator Bonnell: With those few remarks, honourable senators, I should like to wait until the full report comes in. Perhaps I will have a chance to debate this again when the report enters this chamber. Thank you very much.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

FISHERIES

FOREIGN OVERFISHING—DEPLETION OF NORTHERN COD STOCKS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall rose pursuant to notice of February 18, 1992:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries: The Marketing of Fish in Canada "East Coast Fisheries", dated December 1989; and specifically as it relates to the recommendations applicable to the present state of the fish stocks due to foreign overfishing.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise to speak to this Inquiry because it will serve to emphasize the warnings the committee heard back in 1987. We heard then from witnesses who gave evidence of the very issue which is so unsettling and critical today. I refer to foreign overfishing and the action of the government, which was forced to reduce the quotas for Canadian fishermen by 35 per cent. They are down from 185,000 tonnes to 120,000 tonnes.

Certainly, honourable senators, the state of the fisheries should be no more alarming today than it has been for the past many years. Indeed, the gradual and continuing reduction of stocks by foreign overfishing and the serious state of the fisheries in the seventies and even before prompted Canada to extend its jurisdiction to 200 miles back in 1977, some 15 years ago.

I think it should be noted that the declaration of extended jurisdictions, which everyone was lead to believe would solve all the problems of fisheries, created other problems; namely, two boundary disputes—one with the United States in the Georges Bank-Gulf of Maine area which was resolved by reference to the International Court of Justice in The Hague in 1984 and one with France which claims a 200-mile economic zone around the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon off the southern coast of Newfoundland. This last issue is one that seems to have been largely unforeseen in 1977, but one which has since become an ongoing irritant for all concerned and as yet is unsettled.

A study in 1988-89 showed the need for a reduction in fishing in area 3PS in order to rebuild and stabilize cod stocks because of uncontrolled harvesting by the St. Pierre and French metropolitan dragger fleets. The committee was told that France may have exceeded by four times its assigned quota in the zone 3PS, a particularly critical area to Newfoundland inshore fishermen which has not been mentioned since. I intend to deal with the St. Pierre and Miquelon issue separately at a later date. At that time, I will describe my visit to that area in 1976, and relate some very revealing stories as a result of that visit.

Dealing with the northern cod issue, on March 5, 1987, Mr. Ron Bulmer gave evidence before the committee. He was then president of the Fisheries Council of Canada, which represents some 182 corporate entities in the fisheries with a membership that includes seven provincial organizations. Certainly, it is one of the most responsible fisheries groups in Canada. Mr Bulmer said this while giving evidence before the committee:

> This problem of overfishing has reached that kind of priority level where the government and other ministers must support the Minister of Fisheries. Let's get this problem broadly aired, let us make the senior members of government external affairs, finance and the Prime Minister himself absolutely aware of it, and let us get it on the list of objectives so that every time they are meeting with France, Brussels, South Korea or even Washington, fish is not a nonissue in those discussions.

I repeat, that was five years ago. On May 24, 1988, another witness, a hard-working and industrious fisherman, offered these words to the committee:

> We fishermen are not too familiar with all this foreign policy stuff, but I am sure that we could rattle some cages if Canada had the political will to do so.

Honourable senators, I do not restrict those remarks to any particular government.

The President of the Fisheries Council, Mr. Ron Bulmer, told us—not only the committee but certainly the Government of Canada and everybody that would listen in North America—more about the state of the fisheries as reflected in a paper they produced entitled, "Foreign Overfishing: A Strategy for Canada". Here is one of the warnings in their report. I notice everybody is interested.

Senator Frith: I am listening and even taking notes.

Senator Marshall: He said:

> Unless foreign overfishing of the stock is significantly reduced and the stock is rebuilt to its full capability the aspirations of long-term and sustained prosperity envisioned when Canada gained management control over the northern cod stock will remain unfulfilled.

Another warning:

> . . . the magnitude of overfishing of these stocks outside Canada's jurisdiction is alarming and increasing. The ability of the Spanish and Portuguese fleets to continue to fish these stocks at levels that are totally uneconomic for the Canadian fleet is highly discouraging regarding the long-term prospects for these stocks.

This is what Mr. Bulmer told us in the executive summary:

> Overfishing by foreign fleets of Canada's straddling stock has reached the point where their long-term viability to the Canadian fishing industry is in jeopardy. The current approach is not working. The Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization (NAFO) is proving itself to be ineffective as a mechanism to adequately protect Canada's interests. NAFO participants such as Spain and Portugal and non-NAFO fleets from South Korea, Mexico and the United States of America are overfishing important cod and flatfish stocks by 110,000 to a 130,000 tonnes—

That was in 1987, five years ago, and we have just reduced the stocks for Canadian fishermen to 120,000 tonnes, less than they are fishing

> —as much or more than the new Canadian quotas. The quality of transboundary fish caught by foreigners outside our 200-mile limit in 1985, seven years ago, represents an annual market value of about $150 million.

I wonder where was the screaming then when we had all those warnings and no one would listen to our report or to the detail of the investigation that the Fisheries Council of Canada made through NAFO? Mr. Bulmer went on to say:

> There is obviously a strong incentive for these fleets to continue to escalate their fishing efforts outside the Canadian zone. If uncontrolled, this activity by the foreign fleets will threaten the livelihoods of fishermen and plant workers dependant on these fish stocks. In view of the magnitude of the problem, the Fisheries Council of Canada calls on the direct participation of the Prime Minister of Canada and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to develop with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans a concerted action plan to eliminate the foreign overfishing of those stocks which are vital to the Canadian industry and to many fishing communities in Atlantic Canada. In addition, the Government of Canada should now embark on a long-term strategy to enable Canada to gain functional jurisdiction on the nose and tail of the Grand Banks.

[Senator Marshall .]

This is what everybody is screaming about today and it came down from the Lord. Five years ago they were warned about this. Mr. Bulmer elaborated on that theme in his opening statement to the committee. I am sure many members of the committee who are here today would remember. Senator Rossiter, Senator Cochrane, Senator Thériault and Senator Corbin asked some very pertinent questions that day. This is what Mr. Bulmer said in his opening remarks:

> Let me say I agree with you that this is an issue that is actually more serious than the Canada-France issue which you have been looking at over the last couple of weeks. To put it in perspective, you were looking at a total of about 14 vessels from the French metropolitan fleet and 6 vessels out of St. Pierre and Miquelon, and the impact they would have on fish stocks in Atlantic Canada.

He went on to say:

> I hold in my hand today the North Atlantic Fisheries Organization circular dated January 30, 1987 which indicates, through that organization, the number of European NAFO member vessels planning to come to our coast this year to sit, basically, outside the 200-mile limit and fish.
> Gentlemen, this list alone comprises 164 trawlers which intend to come to our coast this winter, spring and summer, for fishing activities. So I put that in the context of the approximately 20 vessels you have been talking about—

Meaning the committee.

> —around St. Pierre and Miquelon. This list is only from companies who are members of The North Atlantic Fisheries Organization—basically the East Bloc countries, Japan and European members. In addition, you would have all of the vessels that would be coming from countries which are not members of that organization, for example, the United States of America, South Korea, et cetera.

Mr. Bulmer then said:

> To bring that point home, on the cover of our pamphlet we used a picture that was taken in the action room in the Scotia Fundy, where they record with their overtracking how many vessels are sitting outside the coast. Each of these maps represents the country and the number of vessels from that country which were spotted on a given day in 1986. There were 146 vessels.

● (1640)

I understand that Mr. Rabinovitch, the Assistant Deputy Minister of Fisheries, was at the United Nations screaming over the same problems that we told him about five years ago.

> From these maps, you can see the 200-mile limit. You can see the number of countries that are licensed and have reason to be inside our zone. You can see by this cluster of maps the number of vessels which were sitting on what is called the nose and tail of the Grand Banks, fishing cod and flatfish stocks. You can see where cod and American plaice, as examples, extend outside the 200-mile line. If you compare where fish are with where the foreign fishing pressure is, you very quickly get an appreciation of the impact of 146 trawlers, without quotas in most cases, sitting out there fishing.

Honourable senators, the committee took heed of those remarks of the wise counsel, Ron Bulmer, and we made some recommendations. Leading up to those recommendations, we stated in our report, the committee's advice is similar to that proposed by the Fisheries Council of Canada and the Oceans Institute of Canada that we visited, and the Northern Cod Review Panel (the Harris panel) which was doing a report and an examination on the fisheries at the same time at a cost of over $511,000 while we were doing the same thing and reaching the same conclusions.

> Extending Canadian jurisdiction beyond 200 miles would involve members of the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization (NAFO) agreeing to give Canada functional management jurisdiction over the straddling stocks in the organization's regulatory area. Such action would not be for Canada to claim a sole right to harvest straddling stocks on the high seas; rather, its purpose would be to preserve Canadian interests and the interests of the international community in the conservation of these stocks. Such authority is arguably implicit under Article 116 of the third United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea (UNCLOS III), which grants countries the right for their nationals to fish on the high seas—a right which is, however, made subject to the rights, duties and interests of coastal states. The essence of Article 116 would then allow coastal countries like Canada the right to establish conservation measures for straddling stocks, even on the high seas in the absence of international agreement. Limited extensions of jurisdiction have also been suggested; for example, a provisional extension could be declared until an appropriate resolution process is agreed to or until a negotiated agreement acceptable to Canada is reached.

Honourable senators, Recommendation No. 6 of the 42 recommendations we have in our report states:

> That the federal government step up sanctions beyond port closures, which they had been doing, and the curtailment of preferential access to surplus fish stocks within the 200-mile limit to bring pressure on those countries that overfish the so-called straddling stocks.

The Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans should have developed a strategy five years ago to establish full, functional Canadian fisheries jurisdiction over the whole continental shelf.

We made 41 other recommendations, honourable senators, including Recommendation No. 9, worthy of mention, which states:

> That a major peacetime role of the Canadian military should be surveillance of Canada's coast lines.

They are squealing about that now. The Minister of Fisheries responded 13 months after our report. I did not even receive it during my term. Senator Robertson was good enough to get it for me.

The then Minister of Fisheries stated that issues relating to overfishing on the continental shelf outside Canadian jurisdiction are of active concern to the Government of Canada. In allocating fish surpluses to Canadian requirements, the Government of Canada encourages foreign fleets to respect conservation of these stocks. With respect to jurisdiction, the policies of the Government of Canada are, and must continue to be, in full accordance with the Law of the Sea Convention of the United Nations.

As I said before, Honourable senators, it took the then Minister of Fisheries a year to give that blistering response.

I can tell the members of the committee something they did not know before. When we tabled the report, I gave it to one of the officials at DFO for whom I had great respect, who was an expert in all phases of the fishery. He responded two weeks after he read the report. It took the minister and all the other officials in the department over a year to respond. Why? Because the report emanated from the Senate.

The gentleman whom I had consulted said that the most important consideration, following on the work of your committee, will be the implementation of the recommendations after government and industry have had an opportunity to complete their assessment. I believe DFO has to take the lead and initiate action after comments have been received and compiled.

He commented on Recommendation No. 6, our main recommendation. He said that NAFO is definitely not working. The Prime Minister, together with External Affairs and Fisheries, must do as the Senate committee recommended. We missed the boat on the French deal in connection with 3PS by not taking a different approach, and I expect St. Pierre/Miquelon will come out a clear winner unless our negotiators are very astute.

On Recommendation No. 9 he stated that not only should we utilize the military, but the Canadian Coast Guard should be operating patrol ships for fisheries surveillance.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say today. I thank Honourable Senators for giving me the extra time. In the coming days I hope that I will be able to deal with other issues in more detail, such as the St. Pierre and Miquelon issue, the extensive report we did on the seals and the recommendations we made on those matters.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION

HISTORICAL PERSPECTIVE OF THE DISTINCT SOCIETY OF QUEBEC

Hon. Paul David rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, February 19, 1992:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to his historical understanding of the distinct society of Québec.

He said: Honourable senators, to me the distinct society concept, which has given rise to stormy debate for a number of years, is an undeniable fact, and I would like to go back in history to prove the legitimacy of Quebec's demands in this respect.

On June 3, 1987, the ten provincial Premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada signed the Meech Lake Accord, which recognized that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.

As you know, the accord was rejected after the parties failed to ratify it within the requisite three-year period.

Critics of the accord wanted Quebec to be like any other province and maintained that this recognition constituted a threat to the survival of a united Canada. History tells us otherwise.

Act the end of the seventeenth century, French colonial authorities acknowledged that the Canadeans in New France were different. They—the French colonial authorities—realized a new nation was developing. At the time, the term Canadiens or Créoles du Canada applied to those Francophones who had settled permanently in the St. Lawrence valley, and the term Français referred to those who were temporary residents. France recognized the distinct identity of the Canadiens. Perhaps the best definition was given by Guy Frégault. Referring to the Francophone people who constituted Canadian society in North America at the end of the French régime, our historian writes:

> Its history gave it a distinct personality . . . Generally speaking, the Canadiens became aware of their ethnic individuality . . . These were people who carved out a country for themselves. When it came time to defend and then rebuild it, they were practically on their own. Today their country is their own creation. It belongs to them, and they belong to it, and that is what motivates their national feeling.

One understands how surprised the British were after the conquest in 1760. Historian Robert de Rocquebrune wrote:

> When the English arrived in this country, they found a people: the Canadiens.

In 1763, the Royal Proclamation established a civilian government. Although it tolerated the free practice of the Catholic religion, it nevertheless favoured a policy of assimilation. The existence of such a policy is proof that a distinct society was alive and well in North America.

[Senator Marshall.]

In London, they realize that the Royal Proclamation does not produce the expected results and they revise the strategy. We are in 1774, the year of the Quebec Act.

This bill is not unanimously approved. Member John Cavendish says:

> I believe it essential not to give back their laws to Canadians. They will forever resort to those laws and customs, which will continue to make them a distinct nation.

It is to be noted, honourable senators, that more than 200 years later we still hear the same arguments.

On June 22, 1774, King George III gave Royal Assent to the Quebec Act.

With this Act,

. . . writes Jean-Charles Bonenfant, . . .

> the British Parliament implicitly accepted the survival of the French civilization.

It is important to remember that the Quebec Act was passed at the time of the Revolution of the thirteen Anglo-American colonies.

The establishment of the United States of America resulted in an important migration movement to Canada: More than 30,000 Loyalists settled in the British colonies; of that number, some 7,000 came to Quebec.

At the end of the 1780s, the British want a country that is an accurate picture of the motherland (which seems to me to be quite normal) and Canadians demand a parliamentary system, provided that they can control their own destiny.

In England, they are quite aware of the fact that they cannot alienate the important French population in Quebec. So, when introducing a bill, the British Prime Minister William Pitt said:

> The first important objective is to divide the province into two sections to be called Upper and Lower Canada, and to give each a local legislature. This division, we hope, can be made so as to give each element a vast majority in its section . . . By dividing the province in two, the present causes for controversy will disappear and, in Lower Canada, added the Prime Minister,

> since the residents are mostly Canadians, their Assembly will be adapted to their particular customs and ideas.

So, not only did William Pitt recognize the existence of a distinct society in his colony, but he consolidated its position. The Constitutional Act, which received the Royal Sanction on June 10, 1791, officially recognized of the two majorities of the time.

At the beginning of the Nineteenth century, the distinct society has its own political party and its own newspaper, both called Le Canadien. This distinct nation openly speaks on behalf of the "Canadian nation". That expression irritates Governor James Craig, who wrote in 1810:

> Their habits, their language and their religion have remained as different from ours as they were before the Conquest. In fact, it seems that it is their wish to be considered a distinct nation.

Alexis de Tocqueville also noted that when he came to Quebec in 1831:

> Lower Canada is a different State. In Lower Canada, the French population outnumbers the English population by 10 to 1. It forms a compact group. It has its own government and its own Parliament. The French population truly is a distinct nation.

As you can see, honourable senators, the notion of distinct society goes back further than Meech Lake.

The Constitutional Act of 1791 established the foundation for a parliamentary system by granting a House of Assembly. French-Canadians will soon become familiar with all the complexities of the system. They would use this assembly efficiently to assert their rights and protect their culture. However, it was a source of problems as the English-Canadian government of Lower Canada was required to have its laws passed by a French-Canadian assembly.

From 1791 to 1837, there were many conflicts and indeed two rebellions, in 1837 and 1838. London reacted by sending Lord Durham to investigate. He would say in his report, and I quote:

> I expected a conflict between a government and a people; I found two nations warring in the bosom of a single state.

We were in 1839, and I draw your attention to the fact that he was not talking about a distinct society, but about two nations.

London solved the problem by bringing together both Canadas. Passed in 1840, the Union Act was supposed to eliminate the distinct society. But it brought the opposite. British people, who came to United Canada in thousands, chose to live in what was to become Ontario and farther west. The assimilation of the distinct society proposed by Durham was a failure.

In spite of its new minority status, the distinct society became progressively more assertive and constantly claimed its right to protect its own language, culture and economy. Confrontation between representatives of the two peoples never ceased in Parliament. From 1854 on, ministerial instability was such that Canada became unmanageable.

A new direction was needed; it was to be Confederation, which became effective in 1867. As Jean-Charles Bonenfant wrote:

> "Confederation became a reality because English Canadians needed French Canadians to be part of it . . ." And > that French Canadians wanted federalism to guarantee their survival. They wanted a Quebec where the French Canadian majority would control its own destiny. But at the same time, they accepted that an extraordinary protection of the English-speaking minority of Quebec be entrenched in the Constitution.

We should note, honourable senators, that from Conquest to Confederation, nobody ever denied, nor necessarily approved, the existence of the distinct society.

During its first few decades, the Canadian Federation was plagued by crises which showed its fragility. We were reminded today of the Louis Riel case, but we could mention the issue of the schools in Manitoba and New Brunswick, and the two crises of the conscription.

We must add to those conflicts the constitutional issues which were and are still the subject of numerous commissions.

In 1953, Maurice Duplessis, the premier of Quebec, formed the Tremblay Commission, which tabled its report in 1956. The commissioners reaffirmed the distinctiveness of the Quebec people. They wrote:

> Because of its history as well as the cultural character of its people, whatever we may say, Quebec is not a province like the others. Its speaks for one of the two ethnic groups that founded the Confederation.

The Laurendeau-Dunton Commission on bilingualism and biculturalism, named in 1963, came up with the same conclusions recognising the distinct society.

In his personal journal, which is fascinating reading, André Laurendeau asked realistically, in 1964, the question which is still haunting us today:

> How do we fit the minimum demand of French-Canadians into the maximum acceptable to English-Canadians.

The question is blunt and unequivocal. A year later he wrote:

> How can we integrate, without stifling it, the New Quebec which has been emerging since 1959?

Many realized that time was running out and that one could no longer ignore in all impunity the Canadian reality, at a time when Quebec was undergoing its quiet revolution. I am thinking in particular of Walter Gordon, former minister of Finance in Ottawa, who wrote in 1966:

> Time has come to realize that Quebec is not a province like the others . . . The revolution in Quebec makes it now essential that the English element recognizes and accepts that fact.

Twenty-five years after these pronouncements, we are still asking ourselves the same questions. Yet, in 1963, Prime Minister Pearson was saying:

> Quebec is much more that a province within our Confederation, because it is the heartland of a people: In fact, it is really a nation within a nation.

In 1979, the Commission on Canadian unity, better known as the Pépin-Robarts Commission, would reach the same conclusions. According to the commissioners, > Quebec is and will remain basically French, both linguistically and ethnically. In this respect, it is highly distinct from the rest of Canada.

On May 20, 1980, during the Referendum, Quebecers pledged their trust in renewed federalism. However, this was followed by the patriation of the Constitution on April 17, 1982, without the signature of the Premier of Quebec.

Communications between Quebec and English Canada had broken down. It became essential to reopen the dialogue and start a process of national reconciliation.

This reconciliation, which was mentioned several times earlier today in connection with the Riel motion, reconciliation "with honour and enthusiasm", was the prime objective of the present Prime Minister Brian Mulroney.

Honourable senators, I think it was a serious mistake to kill Meech Lake. If the accord had been ratified, it would already have settled a number of major problems in connection with the renewal of Canadian federalism. Granted, it would have been imperfect in the eyes of some Canadians, but at least we would have made some progress.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the senator has already exceeded his speaking time. Is it your pleasure to allow him to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

● (1700)

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Leave is given, but not without noting that it is really becoming a little absurd to interrupt a speech like this because the 15 minutes has gone by. It is not as if we are so pressed for time that we cannot wait another five minutes for Senator David. I want it noted on the record so that when the committee deals with this matter, we can come up with something a little healthier than this 15 minute limit, which is absolutely absurd. What has happened is just another illustration of the absurdity. That being said, please continue, Senator David.

Senator David: Honourable senators, I thank you for allowing me to carry on. I need four or five more minutes. So we were saying that if the Meech Lake Accord had passed, we would have covered quite a bit of ground.

We would have been able to concentrate on the other aspects of a federalism adapted to the demands of this day and age.

Is it too soon for me to rejoice because more and more Canadians urge the government to recognize the specificity of the distinct society? I am reminded among others, of economist John McCallum who, in a moving appeal to Canadians from other provinces, urged them to recognize our distinct society. Alliance Quebec, in its submission to the Beaudoin-Dobbie Commission also said unequivocally that Quebec should be recognized as a distinct society. Very recently, at the conference in Toronto, we also noted the same positive attitude. Those stands come at an appropriate time because we have a rendez-vous with history and we will soon have to cut this Gordian knot. Like André Fontaine, the former director of the newspaper "Le Monde" wrote:

> Each people inherited a past that has left too profound a mark to suddenly disregard it. The question now comes down to whether Canadians are interested in living in a country that recognizes a distinct society of 6 million people.

However, the notion of distinct society seems to present a problem of interpretation. The word "distinct" itself seems to be a problem. Several people maintain that in English, the word "distinct" carries a connotation of superiority. I must admit that all my etymological research on that word has not enabled me to confirm that claim.

In my opinion, at least in Quebec, the notion of distinct society was never meant to refer to anything other than the feeling of being different that prevails since 1760.

We cannot deny our past and we do not have the right to jeopardize the future.

I hope that it is still possible for Quebec and Canada to reach a compromise. This will require a good dose of mutual understanding and acceptance of our differences.

But is it not our openmindedness, our tolerance and our respect for individuals that have made Canada the envy of the world? We have to continue to apply those principles. Time is of the essence. As we look to the Twenty-First century, the numerous challenges that Canada must face in every field compel us to react urgently with maturity, common sense, restraint, energy and optimism to the Constitutional amendments which, even if they are imperfect, would represent a tremendous step ahead for all Canadians.

In concluding, I want to thank Mr. Philippe Poulin whose research work has enable the drafting of this speech, which is a summary of the work that we hope to present in the near future.

I thank you, honourable senators, for having listened to me with an open mind and, hopefully, with satisfaction.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, will Senator David allow me to ask him a question?

Senator David: Yes, certainly.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I was very interested in Senator David's presentation. Following your reasoning, what position do you take on Chief Ovide Mercredi's recent demand concerning the distinct society and native people? How do you see it?

Senator David: Honourable senators, look, I will tell you quite frankly that the native problem is so complex that I first wanted to find out what "distinct society" has meant throughout history to be sure that it was not interpreted differently today than it was 100, 150, 200 or 300 years ago.

I admit that I am not learned enough in history to answer your question correctly. It is clear in my mind that native people as a whole constitute a distinct society. That is common sense, I think. In my research, I wanted to determine as precisely as possible the historical facts before and after the Conquest that were recognized even by France, from which we are descended. The French recognized that about a hundred years later, we were already different from them, all the more so the English-speaking population of Canada. I would like to be able to answer your question, but to do that, I would like to have the time to do some really serious research.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, you say that both before and since the Conquest, French Canadians were always recognized as a distinct society. The native people are then even more distinct, since they were here before the whites and existed as peoples. Do they not have just as much right to call themselves a distinct society using exactly the same criteria that you have stated?

Senator David: Honourable senators, we are playing with words to a certain extent. I used the word "distinct" because it was used in the Meech Lake Accord. I am willing to have a deal with the aboriginal peoples. There will be a different word that will represent any philosophy you want. That analysis was made within the accord which, unfortunately, failed. Quebec wanted to be recognized as a distinct society. That demand goes back 350 years, whereas Ovide Mercredi's demand was made a few days ago.

Senator Molgat: Mr. Mercredi will tell us that his demand goes back 10,000 years since they were already here. I have another question which concerns my own group. For us, francophones who live outside Quebec, like Senator Simard, Senator Corbin, Senator Thériault who is not here at the moment, French is our first language and English our second language. Do we not belong to a distinct society?

Senator David: I think you belong to the same society as our ancestors. When I said there were six millions francophones, I was talking about the millions in Quebec and probably the million or so francophones who live outside Quebec. We cannot isolate each group and say there is a distinct society in Quebec, another one in Vancouver, another one in Moncton, another one here and another one there. I see the whole province as a distinct society. I think Quebec must be very thoughtful, very understanding, very warm and very generous towards all francophone populations outside its jurisdiction.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I would have a lot to say about what Senator David just said. I will reflect on that and will talk about it at a later date. Therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. Jean-Maurice Poitras, for Senator Kirby, pursuant to notice of Friday, February 28, 1992, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matter of bills and estimates as are referred to it.

Honourable senators, Senator Kirby has asked me to speak on his behalf. I want to say that the report which has been submitted dealt particularly with research on all sections of the bills concerning the financial institutions, and I move that the report be adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Poitras, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lewis, that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matter of bills and estimates as are referred to it. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, does that mean that it deals with the pre-studies?

The Hon. the Speaker: So, is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise on the third reading of this bill. I spoke on the motion in amendment put forth by Senator Frith, a motion which unfortunately has just been defeated due to the overwhelming majority of the government.

However, I would not want to pass up the opportunity of underlining the importance that amendment had for certain senators, on the government side, especially Senators Simard and Bélisle.

They are, like many of us on this side of the House, members of a linguistic community in Canada referred to, in a derogatory way, as the linguistic minority. However, both they and I consider ourselves to be good Canadians, good French-speaking Canadians.

I believe that neither they nor I are ready to say that the battle is over and the war is lost. Absolutely not! We will continue to stand in this House, to put forth well-founded arguments to show that our linguistic claims are not based on discretionary power wielded by the government, by a letter signed by some minister who could be gone tomorrow, and his decisions with him. This is no way, in a democratic parliamentary system like our own, to enact legislation and to confirm established rights, because if we let matters stand, French-speaking Canadians outside Quebec will see a gradual erosion of other rights, until they are nothing more than objects of speculation for future researchers.

I am not ready to witness the erosion of rights for which we have been fighting as long as Quebec has been fighting for recognition as a distinct society. Francophones living elsewhere in the country are every bit as entitled to their distinctiveness as are Quebecers.

The saddest part in all this is that Quebecers are our closest relatives. I recently heard a senator opposite state that there are economic imperatives, that business is business, that transfer of these airports to private companies has been negotiated, that the contract is almost finalized, that the ink is dry on the documents, that we must sign, that this is a rush job.

I agree that the omelet, that it is time to move on to something else. But we ought not go from the frying pan to the fire. You'll get your omelet, but not at the expense of official language minorities elsewhere in Canada. That is what you are doing when you refuse reasonable and well-thought out amendments set forth by this side of the House. This is not party politics, honourable senators. We are not about to launch a filibuster in this regard. You have the majority, you can tighthen the noose anytime you want to do so. I challenge you not to do so. It is in this spirit that I am speaking today.

What I want you to understand is that if you pass up the opportunity provided by this bill, your officials will be tempted to do likewise with other bills. That would be regrettable. These days, we are so very aware of Quebec's self-centredness. I was blessed and pleased to grow up in a mixed society where my culture, my language and my faith were recognized and respected. I was not living in Quebec.

I was blessed and pleased to study in Quebec. I consider Quebecers to be my brothers and sisters, but I am not convinced that the Quebecer tilling his soil in Sainte-Anne de la Pocatière, working in the aluminium plants in Bécancourt, in the Lac-Saint-Jean area or elsewhere, or working for a logging company, is prepared to accept a certain mindset according to which business is business and minorities can be left to fend for themselves.

I was about to say that on February 27 last, a senator was urging us to pass the bill so that the contract could be signed. Everthing was ready for Dorval, for Mirabel, for Edmonton and for some other airport.

I agree, this makes good sense. But why crush a minority at the same time? Why say let's sign now and we'll see to your needs later? That was said in this House, and I am very sorry to have heard it.

Most Quebecers who have lived in a minority group have not lived with such group long enough to know the full meaning of being in a minority. You have to work twice as hard. Often, you have to pay more taxes and put up with insults, with having doors slammed in your face. This we have seen and this we have put up with; we are though, we can get through the situation.

Little by little, over the years, we convinced the federal government and the government of New Brunswick to recognize our rights. Many programs have been launched in other provinces also. Good will was shown to linguistic minorities in most Canadian provinces. And now the great federal manager says that we can give up acquired rights and linguistic advantages under certain conditions. We are ready to do so. If we are prepared to be high-handed with business, we are ready to make some concessions in linguistic matters. If these rights were maintained, these concessions would not be anymore costly for the companies which will grab the airports, rent them or manage them for sixty or ninety years. It will not cost them an arm and a leg, no, not at all.

Earlier today, I adjouned the debate on amotion of Senator David. I will come back to that subject now and then. For today, I will be content—how much time do I have left?

The Hon. the Speaker: Eight minutes, Senator Corbin.

Senator Corbin: At the Transport and Communications Committee, on November 21, 1991, Mr. Goldbloom, the Commissioner for Official Languages, responded to a specific question by Senator Molgat—this can be found on page 49, Issue 3, Proceedings. Senator Molgat asked, and I quote:

> Senator Molgat: Otherwise, this would in fact be a weakening of the Official Languages Act for these airport employees, woult it not?

An Mr. Goldbloom replied:

> Mr. Speaker, honorable senator, I would like to say something that concerns me greatly. Throughout history, there are great swings in trends. At times, the trend is towards nationalization, at others, towards privatization.
> I—

Mr. Goldbloom said:

> —have trouble imagining two Canada, a public Canada and a private Canada, which would be very different one from the other. I am of the opinion that if, at a given point in time, for reasons of economic order and efficiency, it is decided to privatize, and if this privatization alters the pattern of services to the public and working conditions, and if, a few years later, another government decides to nationalize and is obliged to recreate what had been dropped during the previous privatization, we would put ourselves in a situation where it could be difficult to maintain Canada's cohesion, as a country with two official languages, and that is why, like Mr. Fortier—

Mr. Goldbloom's predecessor

> —it would have been preferable to have the Official Languages Act apply fully.

And Senator Molgat added, for clarity:

> So the big question in examining clause 4—

Of Bill C-15

> —is as follows: we ought to put back into clause 4 as worded here Parts V, VI and VII.

Of the Official Languages Act. And Mr. Goldbloom said:

> That would be my recommendation.

So, honourable senators, it must be remembered that the Commissioner for Official Languages is a creature of both Houses of the Parliament of Canada, just as the Auditor General is a creature of the House of Commons.

It would seems to me that if we are serious about protecting the interests of linguistic minorities, we must carefully consider the recommendations of the Commissioner for Official Languages who, more than any of us, is aware of the conditions of minority linguistic groups in Canada. His files are extensive. He knows what is going on throughout the country.

Therefore, further to the Commissioner's recommendations and to respond to the expectations of linguistic minorities in the country, in Quebec, New Brunswick or elsewhere, I propose, seconded by Senator Molgat:

That clause 4 of Bill C-15 be deleted and replaced by the following:

4. Where the Minister has sold, leased or otherwise transferred an airport to a designated airport authority, on and after the transfer date Parts IV, V, VI, VII, VIII, IX and X of the Official Languages Act apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to the authority in relation to the airport as if

(a) the authority were a federal institution; and

(b) the airport were an office or facility of that institution, other than its head or central office.

For any honourable senators who might interested, I have French and English copies of this motion in amendment.

I thank you, honorable senators.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honorable senators, at the moment, we are fighting for the integrity of this country—

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Gigantès, I am sorry to interrupt you, but I think I must first submit this motion in amendment to the Senate.

● (1730)

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Corbin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat:

That clause 4 of Bill C-15 be deleted and replaced by the following:

4. Where the Minister has sold, leased or otherwise transferred an airport to a designated airport authority, on and after the transfer date Parts IV, V, VI, VII, VIII, IX and X of the Official Languages Act apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to the authority in relation to the airport as if

(a) the authority at this were a federal institution; and

(b) the airport were an office or facility of that institution, other than its head or central office.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

[Translation]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, could I put a question to Senator Corbin?

Senator Corbin: Yes, Senator Murray.

Senator Murray: Senator Corbin, in what respect is your amendment different from the one we just voted on?

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Corbin: Senator Murray, I would like to ask you to look at Senator Frith's amendment and compare it to mine. You will see that I am adding parts taken from the Official Languages Act. I think they are Parts V, VI and VII in that Act.

If I am not mistaken, the amendment of Senator Frith—he will correct me if I am wrong—was to provide for the general and total application of the Official Languages Act, was it not?

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would like to support what Senator Corbin is saying. We are fighting right now to keep the country together and we are fighting against those in Quebec who seek, out of honest conviction, to split it apart. One of their constant arguments is that federal bilingualism is just window dressing, that there is no such thing, that it is not taken seriously and that, on this side of the Ottawa River, we are always willing to do away with it.

So, I beseech you not to reject Senator Corbin's amendment, because you would be providing separatists with new ammunition. Whether they care or not for minorities—some do not—they will say: What did we tell you, bilingualism is window dressing, it is just smoke and mirrors.

I urge senators from Quebec on the other side to vote in favour of this amendment to help the country survive. It is a small price to pay, and you should be willing to pay it.

Thank you.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I do not know exactly where we are and whether the amendment of Senator Corbin is still before the Senate, but I would like to join with Senator Eymard Corbin and others in asking my colleagues in the Senate to think carefully about their decision, before rejecting the amendment of Senator Corbin.

As a francophone from outside Quebec—apparently we cannot say French-Canadians any more, because people in Quebec, and especially Quebec intelligentsia, do not like this expression which still rings true to me.

I am know talking solely to senators from Quebec, like my French-speaking colleagues and even English-speaking ones from New Brunswick. Some, here today, worked with Senator Simard and others, in a previous life, for the development of the French fact in New Brunswick.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that my colleagues in the Senate should realize that this is not a matter of confidence towards the government. All my life I hve been part of a caucus and I know that some times, for reasons of solidarity, one is almost compelled to support a bill that is to become government policy. As my colleague Senator Gigantès put it succinctly, this is an excellent illustration of a senator taking a non-partisan decision on an important matter.

As a francophone from New Brunswick, I anticipate with sorrow that day not too long from now, when my fellow citizens from New Brunswick who don't speak French will not feel at home at Montreal's airport. Indeed, because of Quebec's official unilingualism, chances are we won't hear much English in Montreal in a few years.

When this happens, do you think the anglophones from Halifax, Winnipeg, Ottawa or Moncton will let us be bilingual, will let us use the French language? And then my dear colleagues, for several years now especially since I have been in the Senate, during the long discussions on the Meech Lake Accord—and Senator David mentionned this afternoon—I heard it but I had work to do in my office . . .

The Hon. the Speaker: Honorable senators, pursuant to rule 13(1), as you all know, I must leave the chair at six p.m. If the senators wish to ignore the clock . . .

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honorable senators, we have no objection that Senator Thériault concludes his remarks even if it means that we should perhaps agree to adjourn until to-morrrow at two p.m. because otherwise in accordance with Standing Orders we would have us to come back at eight p.m. to-night to close the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honorable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Thériault: Thank you, honourable senators, I did not want to take too long, but I lost my train of thought. I will conclude by saying that I was at Meech Lake and reporting what senator David for whom I have so much respect said about the Accord and the position of certain Canadians during these talks. I would like to remind my friends on this side—and it might not be necessary—that I was one of the few Liberal senators to openly support the Meech Lake Accord. I did so because as a francophone I thought, and still do, that it was terribly important for Quebec to remain within Canada. But since Meech, when I hear and when I read what is written and said in Quebec by some . . . . . and I am still convinced that they do not represent the majority, it is increasingly difficult for me as a francophone outside Quebec to support Quebec's current position.

I wonder if, deep down, those who opposed the Meech Lake Accord were not right since we can now see that the same thing is happening again, namely that those who speak or pretend to speak for Quebec are rejecting the Francophones outside Quebec. As Senator David said, thanks for your sympathy, but we have had it with your sympathy. What we, Francophones outside Quebec, want are our rights. One would tend to believe that we would have the support of our fellow Quebeckers. But each time they have the opportunity to do so, we see the opposite. As Senator Gigantès said, if you really want this country to stay united, you can prove it to the Canadian people by supporting the motion or amendment introduced by my colleague, the Senator Corbin. Thank you for your time.

Senator Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honorable Senators, I move that the debate be adjourned.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate is adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Wednesday, March 18 1992, at 2 p.m.

THE LATE ROGER LEMELIN

TRIBUTES

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, everyone, his friends, his family, the people in the Saint-Sauveur district in the "Town Below" in Quebec City, we all knew that Roger was terminally ill, when two days ago he died of cancer, a matter of months after the brutal diagnosis he was given last summer. Still, we knew him as a stubborn fighter who would never give up, and we could not help hoping, despite medical evidence to the contrary, that the disease would go into remission, that it would stay that way for a long time, and that he would have time to write the book that was already complete in his head, as he said in that wonderful and moving interview with Réginald Martel which appeared in La Presse about two or three weeks ago. He wanted to write this book to do something for other cancer patients, to help them rise above their condition, which he shared and overcome that feeling of despondency and despair they had upon arriving at Hôtel-Dieu Hospital, a feeling he had been spared, as he said in his interview with Mr. Martel.

It was not to be.

Today, we mourn a great Quebecer and a great Canadian, whom Gaston Miron called one the founders of the modern Quebec novel, which he was and will remain in the history of our literature. Two names always come to mind: Roger Lemelin and Gabrielle Roy. The Town Below, Roger's first book, was published in 1944; the second, The Plouffe Family, appeared in 1948. In between, in 1945, The Tin Flute appeared, by Gabrielle Roy, a Franco-Manitoban. These three novels marked the beginning of the modern era described by Miron. The setting had shifted from the rural world of Maria Chapdelaine, by Louis Hémon, of Thirty Acres by Ringuet and Menaud, maître draveur, by Félix-Antoine Savard, to the urban environment, thus reflecting the migration from rural Quebec to the cities after the First World War.

Neither author focused on the well-to-do urban Quebecer. In the case of Lemelin, the setting was a working-class neighbourhood in Quebec City, while Gabrielle Roy chose Saint-Henri. All three novels have something else in common which is particularly revealing: the family is the focus of the story, and the role of the mother is significant, which reminds us of the lively description our former colleague, Senator Le Moyne, gave of the French Canadian mother in one of his essays published under the title Convergence.

The novels Roger Lemelin wrote in the 40s were best sellers and they reached a relatively broad readership. However, this was nothing compared to the audience The Plouffe Family would have on television, not only in Quebec but across Canada. As Odile Tremblay reported in yesterday's Le Devoir:

> The series, which was also broadcast on the English network, had a combined rating of an incredible 4.4. million viewers, a record at the time.

To quote Gaston Miron:

> With The Plouffe Family, Roger Lemelin for the first time gave Quebecers an image with which they could identify, an image they learned to love.

I think one could hardly improve on this metaphor for the significance of Lemelin's work and the man himself to the community that gave him his roots and whose deepest values he expressed so admirably.

Honourable senators, in the summer of 1988, in a situation similar to today's, I had to pay tribute to another very close friend, Jean Marchand, who also had just died. Jean and Roger became friends when we were in our early twenties. I was fortunate to share the same friendship with them both. Their friendship for me never failed, despite the difference in personalities. I believe that we all shared the same friendship for each other. You will therefore understand why I conclude in the same terms for Roger as I did for Jean. Everything that was said on the radio and on television and everything that has been written in the newspapers in the last two days shows, it seems to me, that Roger Lemelin made a mark on his time as very few other Quebecers and Canadians did. The tribute that we pay to his memory and that is paid to him from all quarters is one befitting a great man. He was indeed a great man.

May his soul rest in peace in the hope of the resurrection. To his wife Valéda, to his children and the other members of his family, on behalf of my wife Pauline and myself, I offer the most heartfelt and warmest condolences.

Hon. Maurice Riel: Honourable senators, I want to join Senator Tremblay in paying tribute to the memory of Roger Lemelin.

Roger Lemelin was typically Québécois, quite French and deeply Canadian. He was also a writer of quality, a smart businessman and a dynamic individual. He was unique. He was part of Quebec life for at least two generations.

The Plouffe Family, a television series based on one of his novels, was the most popular TV drama in Quebec 25 years ago. He is our only writer to capture the story of a poor working-class family in Quebec City's Lower Town in Au pied de la Pente douce and to achieve the same success in La famille Plouffe, about a poor working-class family in east-end Montreal.

In both cases, he realistically depicted the life of a class of Quebec society from which he had come. In both cases, he showed their joys and their sorrows.

It was quite a feat for a Quebec novelist to reproduce a slice of life of Quebec City and of Montreal in two different novels of the same period. This proves the extent of his talent and his keen sense of observation.

He told me one day that his model was the American writer Truman Capote. I think it was in his character to write photographic pictures of events in a clear, direct, precise, unornamented style.

● (1410)

He was a member of the Académie Goncourt, which is a rare honour for a non-Frenchman. He was very close to Hervé Bazin, who is the current president of the Académie, and the quality of their style shows their generation. He was also an intimate friend of Maurice Druon, secretary for life of the Académie Française. He sent me his last book, "Le Crime d'Ovide Plouffe", with a handwritten dedication in 1982. He said:

> To Maurice Riel, I hope that you will include this book in your collection of favourite novels. In friendship, Roger Lemelin.

I would not want to take too long today; there is so much to say. Roger Lemelin enjoyed life, he was a good salmon fisherman, a good chess player and a good traveller. He did everything with great energy and gusto.

He was also a great journalist. He was editor in chief of La Presse, Montreal's great French newspaper. He made fun of the provincial authorities who had required him to obtain, under Bill 101, a francization certificate for his company, La Presse, the French newspaper!

Roger Lemelin, a Quebecer through and through, was also a convinced federalist. His ideas on the subject are in a book called Les Voies de l'Espérance (the ways of hope) published in 1979; in it, he refers to Senator Tremblay. He sent me a personally dedicated copy in February 1980. I ask you all to read this book, because it is timely. I found this sentence on page 67, which he wrote in 1971 for a conference in Vancouver, twenty-one years ago:

> I say that our large ethnic group is a distinct nation within Canada, like it or not, even if you disagree.

His book is filled with comments that make sense, like

> The real power today is communication.

I urge you to read this book, which I think is quite up to date.

We would really need Roger Lemelin these days. We mourn the passing of a man of conviction, a great writer and a friend.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, allow me to subscribe wholeheartedly to the tribute that was just paid by Senator Tremblay to his friend Roger Lemelin, as well as by Senator Maurice Riel.

I am certainly not able to speak so well of this great Canadian. In fact, my colleague, Senator Tremblay, has the advantage of having been Roger Lemelin's friend and neighbour for a long time. As for me, I would not even dare to claim that Roger Lemelin was my friend. However, there was between us what I would call a warm and friendly complicity that made delightful those few moments that we shared over the years.

We had a lot of common friends, but we also shared values, as well as ideas on journalism and publishing. We both firmly believed in Canada and in federalism. As everyone knows, Roger Lemelin played a major role during the referendum in 1980.

I had an indisputable admiration for Roger Lemelin which I tried to hide from him as best as I could. The man I admired was not primarily the writer, the delightful novelist whose fame spread across our borders a long time ago, nor the great master of journalism who gave a certain brilliance to the newspaper La Presse during the ten years, I believe, that he presided its destiny. The person that I admired was the real man: both fiery and shy, generous and naive, he was an impulsive person that always pursued his enthousiasm, his convictions and even his fits of rage to the limit. He was a sort of great knight, and I have not met three of those in my whole life.

Roger Lemelin received all kinds of honours. He succeeded in everything that he tackled, just like a rash teenager (novels, journalism, television, cinema and even the business world). He used to say of himself that he was "a lucky jack-of-all-trades that was abled to pursue several careers". He could have added Pablo Neruda's line: "I admit that I have lived." But this person, the oldest one in a poor family of ten children, who became millionaire, always kept his heart in the right place and remained a man of courage to the very end.

He was a passionate democrat, a liberal in every sense of the word, a tireless champion of Canadian federalism. While so many intellectuals from his generation, distinguished professors or small teachers, famous writers or simple penpushers, more less became separatists to be accepted if not loved by the young generation, Roger Lemelin never flinched. He remained himself: a man of freedom.

Whether they know it or not, whether they have read "Au pied de la Pente douce" or ignore the very existence of that novel, all Canadians are poorer today than they were two days ago for they have lost a free man.

At those bad times when intolerance is too common, when the poison of nationalism numbs the minds that were still valiant recently, when the foolishness of our elite is everywhere in the media like in a conquered country, in those bad times, the death of a single free man is a national castatrophe!

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I know that you are anxious to know about the election clock. The government that respects democracy has 248 days left for the reckoning, and the cowardly government, the government that is contemptuous of democracy, has 634 days.

CBC

OMISSION OF NEW BRUNSWICK FROM NATIONAL PROGRAMMING

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have in my hands a Toronto Star article of March 17, 1992—

Senator Barootes: Burn it.

Senator Frith: I heard that the other night on television in a show about German Nazis.

Senator Corbin: This article, which was brought to my attention just now, is titled "New Brunswick snubbed again." The story is datelined Fredericton. It is a CP story. It says:

> New Brunswick must feel that it's the illegitimate child of Confederation.

I certainly object to that wording. The story continues:

> Although the province's fathers were part of this country's founding family, the CBC has a habit of overlooking this Maritime province in its national programming.

In fact, we do not have a CBC English network for both radio and TV in New Brunswick. We have radio, but we do not have television. The story goes on:

> New Brunswick has been snubbed again by being excluded from a 125th-anniversary program, scheduled to air across Canada on Thursday night.
> The Barbara Ann Quigley Ensemble of Moncton was told last week its performance of a French-English song has been cut from the 90-minute special, The National Doubt, because of time constraints.
> "I am really outraged by the decision," Quigley said in an interview yesterday.
> "When you're talking about a program on Canadian unity and a province is deliberately left out, especially New Brunswick—Canada's only officially bilingual province—you can't help but feel, well, picked on."
> The folk-jazz quartet was the only New Brunswick act in the show, a musical comedy that takes a satiric look at the plague of "national doubt" engulfing the land.

Honourable senators, I never thought that New Brunswick would be snubbed that way by the CBC, but in fact I am not surprised that we have been.

[Translation]

The CBC French network is no better than its English counterpart—

Hon. Norbert Thériault: It is even worse!

Senator Corbin: I agree with you, senator Thériault. We could put them both in the same category of the worst sinners. Every day, they talk on the news coming from Montreal about Quebec and English Canada whether the subject is, for instance, constitutional negotiations, constitutional studies or constitutional talks. This is what we get from those two great networks.

Canadians are fed up with those national networks which only discredit national realities every time they get the opportunity. Thank you, honourable senators.

On motion of Senator MacDonald (Halifax), report placed on Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding ruling 59(1)(a), I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hastings:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have the power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

If given leave, and before the question is put, I will explain my motion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Explain why you want leave.

Hon. Efstathios Barootes: Explain to the teacher, will you please?

Senator Nurgitz: Briefly, the purpose behind all of this is that meetings were set for that committee this week dealing with the Young Offenders Act, and witnesses were called to appear, but owing to the late sitting of the Senate the committee was delayed. As a member of the committee, Senator Hastings chastised me last evening because we had witnesses waiting from three o'clock on but we did not start until after six.

Senator Hastings could perhaps speak for himself, but it is fair to say that he wanted to adjourn the meeting. The committee took the position that it would be an added affront or an added insult to them, so that we did continue and sat until eight. With legislation before a committee, with witnesses called, and in that particular situation with a witness from Edmonton, Alberta, whom we were hoping to send home on a flight at seven o'clock last night—but for whom the Senate of Canada will pay for another night's stay in a hotel—we did stay and hear the witness.

The purpose of my asking for leave and, as a result, asking for the adoption of this motion is recurrence of this very matter. We have two witnesses today, and it turns out to be somewhat unsatisfactory just to have the meeting when the Senate rises. That is just not stable enough.

Therefore, this is a request. We are asking witnesses to attend, but we do not treat them very well by having them sit around from three o'clock until the evening.

I agreed with the criticism that I received yesterday and I undertook to present this motion today. I ask for leave and ask for the adoption of the motion so that we can, in a more orderly and business-like fashion, get on with that legislation. Thank you, honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I hope that when the committee reviewing our rules undertakes that review it will try again to come to grips with this question of meetings of committees while the Senate is sitting, because I sympathize with Senator Nurgitz. I doubt that there are any senators here who, as members of a committee, have not found themselves in the kind of position Senator Nurgitz and his committee found themselves in last evening.

We do have this problem that these requests are recurring almost every week. Every committee needs this sort of permission. This is stretching it considerably, but one almost thinks that it might be more orderly for us to have a committee of committee chairmen to which the Senate could apply for leave to sit, notwithstanding that the committees were sitting.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, in seconding the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, I would point out that on this occasion, and on this occasion only, I will second the motion in order to facilitate the work of this committee.

We are faced with this damnable expression, "when the Senate rises". To set the time of a meeting for when the Senate is sitting is just not compatible with an orderly or business-like manner of conducting either Senate business or the business of a committee. It happens that there are Tuesday nights, Wednesday nights and Thursday nights, and, indeed, all day Monday and all day Friday—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear hear!

Senator Hastings: —at which times could be set and committees could meet. This procedure of having committees meet when the Senate rises is just not acceptable.

Senator Frith: At least some of the witnesses must work more than three days a week.

Senator Hastings: I certainly support the chairman of the committee on this occasion only. From now on committee meetings can be set at times when witnesses and members can be there.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the question is put, in view of the fact that earlier in this session I was the one who rose on every occasion when leave was asked for this purpose, and pointed out on each occasion the problems that I thought it presented for the Senate, I want to repeat what I have said previously. This is in accord with what my colleagues have said.

This practice presents a very serious problem for the Senate. We have to deal with the matter. It is up to our friends on the government side to settle this.

As far as I am concerned, I do not think we can function with committees persistently coming to the Senate and asking for leave to meet while the Senate is sitting. The Senate sittings must have priority. If that means that committees must meet on Mondays and Fridays, then committees must meet on Mondays and Fridays. We must persist and continue with the work of the Senate. It is regrettable late in the day, when there can be important matters discussed here, that we find a large number of senators away in committees and not here to participate in the debates of the Senate. After all, our sessions are not that long. There is no reason why, when we are sitting, senators should not be here in the chamber, participating and listening to what is being said.

[Translation]

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, I would like to follow-up on Senator Frith and Senator Molgat's comments. As you know, a meeting of our Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders is set for March 26, 1992. You have no doubt been notified. God forbid that you get the idea that all initiatives have to come from this side. Senator Frith raised a point when he said: "Should something not be done to address the problem stated most clearly by Senator MacDonald? When indeed can committees meet? Can they keep meeting while the Senate is sitting? I have a suggestion for you, Senator Frith and Senator Molgat. We are meeting on March 26. You could submit some concrete proposals for us to consider, the same way we intend to submit to your committee amendments to certain rules of the Senate. I think that, for the sake of good understanding between the two sides of this House, it would be useful that you too make suggestions.

I would go as far as to say that the Chairman of our Committee, Senator Robertson, intends to send for your consideration written proposals as soon as we come up with something concrete. That is what I suggest you do. It is high time we have more co-operation in this House regarding our rules. I would not want you to think it is entirely up to us to make suggestions all the time. If you have good, concrete, clever ideas for us to consider, submit them, the same way we intend to submit ours to you.

Hon. Eymard Corbin: As you did last June. Well done!

Motion agreed to.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP STUDY—NOTICE OF MOTION TO PERMIT ELECTIONS MEDIA COVERAGE

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Thursday, March 19, 1992, I will move that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be empowered to authorize the coverage of its public proceedings on Canadian citizenship by photographers and electronic news media, without disrupting the proceedings too much.

TIBET

ANNIVERSARY OF NATIONAL UPRISING—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: By popular demand, honourable senators, I have the honour, again, to present petitions signed by 610 citizens of Alberta who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Peace River, Grande Prairie, St. Isidore, Grimshaw, Valleyview, Lethbridge, Spruce Grove and Stoney Plain.

[Senator Grimard.]

I have even more petitions signed by 3,200 citizens of Ontario who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions come mainly from Windsor, Essex and Tecumseh.

This makes a total of some 3,800 signatures. If I were on the other side of this House, I would frankly be embarrassed to see that 3,800 Canadian citizens signed this petition. They wrote their name and address to tell the government that they reject a tax which we have all had to endure for more than a year.

Frankly, I would be embarrassed if I were in Senator Simard's place. His outbursts are meant to hide his embarrassment!

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

ARTICLE XI—CLARIFICATION OF CANADA'S POSITION—MEETINGS OF HEADS OF STATE—EXCLUSION OF CANADA

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question or two respecting what has happened recently at the GATT. I am aware that Canada presented a paper on its position in response to requests made by various countries respecting some suggestions made by Mr. Dunkel. I wonder if the leader could advise the house as to what Canada's position was, and is, respecting Article XI.

The second part of my question has to do with meetings that will take place starting tomorrow, I believe, between Helmut Kohl of Germany and the President of the United States. These meetings will be such that Canada and many other nations will not be at the table. They are apparently intending to make some decisions to deal with the impasse respecting the negotiations that are going on in Geneva at the moment. I am wondering what Canada's position is with regard to the concept of a couple of other countries taking on the task of negotiating matters that are so vital to Canada.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, to take the latter part of Senator Olson's question first, there is nothing new, and surely nothing scandalous insofar as the honourable senator is concerned, in the leaders of two countries such as the United States and Germany having a bilateral meeting, which is what is happening between Chancellor Kohl and President Bush in Washington. I may say, however, with regard to Canada's position, and especially with regard to agricultural matters, that Prime Minister Mulroney, in very recent days, has been in touch with both the Chancellor and the President. Both of these leaders are well aquainted, well informed and up to date on our position.

Regarding the first part of the question raised by Senator Olson, it is true that on March 4 we tabled our draft initial offers on agriculture to the multilateral trade negotiations.

These dealt with market access, internal support and export competition in the context of a balanced multilateral trade agreement. We did not offer any tariff equivalents for supply management of products because—and this is the answer to the honourable senators question—our position continues to be that we wish to see these products governed by import quotas under a clarified and strengthened GATT Article XI.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am not suggesting that there is anything scandalous about the heads of state of Germany and of the United States having a meeting. It is what they are having the meeting about that is important. I wish the honourable minister would not try to hedge on the question I asked. They have announced that they will be discussing the matters that have led to the impasse of the GATT negotiations that have been going on now for nearly five years. These are matters that are vitally important to Canada and to a number of other nations, and those nations concerned will not even be represented when these discussions are taking place and perhaps decisions are being made. Is that the way Canada is to be run?

Senator Murray: Again, honourable senators, I hope Chancellor Kohl and President Bush do discuss the impasse in the GATT negotiations, particularly with regard to agriculture, and I hope they make progress on that matter. It is no secret that there is a very sharp difference of opinion, especially on agriculture, as between the United States on the one hand and the European Economic Community on the other.

If those two leaders, President Bush of the United States and Chancellor Kohl of Germany—which is a major player in the EEC—can make some progress then the world, including Canada, will be the better for it because we have an enormous stake in trade liberalization and a successful Uruguay Round.

Senator Olson: That means that Canada's new position is that we will leave these vital negotiations to someone else to settle for us at a time when we will not even be at the table. If that is the policy of the government, which seems to be the implication that the minister is leaving with us, that is fine. I think the producers in Canada will be interested to know that that is so.

If that then is the case, can we also take it that, because of some of the opinions that have been expressed by these two leaders from time to time, or at least by the spokesmen in the negotiations for their two countries, that their wishes and views will take effect, or come to pass, namely, those relating to Article XI and the sacrifices that may have to be made in the adjustment for the sake of other trade factors. Will these items also be in the package?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we Canadians who engage in a great many bilateral discussions with our trade partners relating to the multilateral negotiations can hardly object or quibble if two other countries—any two other countries—choose to sit down and discuss these matters. Again, there is nothing unusual in the fact that the Chancellor of Germany and the President of the United States should meet, and certainly it should surprise no one that at or near the top of their agenda should be a discussion of the multilateral trade negotiations, the Uruguay Round, the successful outcome of which is of such great importance to us and to the world.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, if I ever heard a cop out, this is it.

WESTERN SAHARA

IMPLEMENTATION OF PROPOSED PEACE PLAN—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, perhaps I may bring the questions back to the Western Sahara. I asked a question on November 19 on the implementation of the proposed peace plan and Canadian participation. The response came on December 10 when the minister answered my questions about the presence of Canadian observers in MINURSO, which is the U.N. Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara. I asked about the press and the conditions in the refugee camps and I warned the minister that I would continue to follow this question.

Again in early February I gave notice to the minister then asked a question about the peace plan in the Western Sahara, and the minister replied that we have 36 military personnel monitoring the ceasefire with the U.N. mission, including the military commander who is a Canadian. Honourable senators will find these responses on pages 742 and 901 of Debates of the Senate.

Honourable senators, those questions were asked in February. Through my own initiative I have now received a report from the Office of the Secretary-General MINURSO and, more particularly, a report from the United States Senate Committee on Foreign Relations dated January 1992, a staff report on the Western Sahara. I would like to bring to the attention of the Senate some of the findings of this U.S. Senate Committee. They have defined some difficulties, and I will give a couple of examples:

> The U.N. Mission for the Referendum in Western Sahara (MINURSO) peacekeeping force has been severely hampered by a lack of assistance and political support from the United Nations hierarchy in New York. The lack of assistance is demonstrated by the United Nations' repeated refusal to provide even limited logistical support to the U.N. Military Observers in the field. As a result, the Observers are forced to assume an overwhelming load of logistical and administrative duties, which prevents them from carrying out their peacekeeping duties.
> The United Nations' refusal to respond politically to MINURSO's reports of ceasefire violations in the Western Sahara has undermined MINURSO's credibility with both parties.

I am abbreviating this. However, here is a more crucial one that the minister may be interested in:

> MINURSO's military observers (including 29 officers of the U.S. armed forces) . . .

But including even more Canadians.

> . . . have been forced to live in unnecessarily harsh—and sometimes life-threatening—conditions. The soldiers in the field do not have sufficient food, fuel, shelter, or supplies to carry out their mission. The soldiers cite Moroccan intransigence and U.N. ambivalence as the source of their current difficulties.

It would seem to me, honourable senators, that there is not much point in asking the minister further questions in this vein, although I am sure he has done his best to get answers and I do not lay the blame at his feet. However, someone, I suggest, is not giving the minister accurate accounts of what is going on in the Western Sahara with respect to our peacekeeping forces, or indeed with the attempt to implement the U.S. peace plan or hold the referendum that has been promised for 16 years.

My question to the minister is: What does he intend to do to ensure that whoever supplies him with answers to these questions gives him better answers? We have already established that the Canadian Press have no intention of covering this story about that fact that we do not appear to get any information. Our military people must know about this situation, because they, after all, have a larger presence than the U.S. military, and yet last January, when the U.S. Senate Committee was getting this report, the minister was still giving responses to my questions that revealed none of these difficulties.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not in a position to comment, certainly not off the cuff, on the report of the United States Senate Committee on that matter. It is, however, no secret that the process that we all hoped would lead to a referendum is—I will not say it is going nowhere fast, but it is not going anywhere in any great hurry.

I am aware that there were reports—denied by the United Nations—of irregularities in the civilian administration. One of the special representatives of the Secretary-General and the head of the mission resigned a couple of months ago and, according to the last report I had, the United Nations had appointed an interim head of the mission and was still searching for a permanent head.

I am told that, as recently as March 3, the Secretary-General had reported renewed efforts to resolve outstanding issues and had set a target date of June for doing so within the current peace plan.

I cannot go beyond that today. However, I will examine the honourable senator's question and I will ask my colleague, Mrs. McDougall to examine it as well to see whether a fuller report can be brought in here on that situation as soon as possible.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could find out whether our 36 military personnel referred to in his answer to me of February 13 are indeed living under life-threatening conditions in the field. That would seem to me to be a highly significant piece of information that the Parliament of Canada ought to have.

[Senator Marsden.]

Senator Murray: Highly significant but, with respect, I suggest not completely surprising given what we know about the situation in that part of the world. I will look into the matter, however.

THE SENATE

DELAY IN PRODUCTION OF DEBATES

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government is regarding the Debates of the Senate. We do not yet have the Debates of the Senate for yesterday, and I understand we will not have them until tomorrow. This is occurring time and time again.

Can we find out what the problem is and what we can do about it? In what way can the Senate take action to ensure that it does not happen on a too frequent basis?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I could not agree more with the honourable senator that this is an extremely unsatisfactory state of affairs for everybody. I do not know what is at the source of the problem. It was raised some weeks ago, and the Speaker on behalf of the administration tabled a report. I would suggest that we ask the Internal Economy Committee, which meets tomorrow morning, to undertake to look into the matter with a view to taking our business elsewhere if we cannot get some satisfaction from what used to be called the Queen's Printer and is now called the Department of Supply and Services.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

THIRD LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE—FAILURE TO RATIFY TREATY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, at a time when we are aspiring to be world leaders in environmental matters, I would like to draw your attention to a situation that is to a great extent frustrating these aspirations. I speak of the Third Law of the Sea Conference and the international treaty that was negotiated in 1982 for signature and ratification by nations around the world. Of the 119 countries, only 53 have ratified to date, and only 60 ratifications are required before this treaty comes into force.

Honourable senators, Canada has not ratified this law. This is puzzling, because up until 1982 we were at the forefront of the negotiations.

My question to the Leader of the Government is: When does he expect Canada to ratify this convention?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not know the answer to that question. I shall have to ask for a report from my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Senator Kenny: If I may, honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government at the same time to inquire why Canada has not yet ratified this convention.

Senator Murray: I shall do so.

CBC

OMMISION OF NEW BRUNSWICK FROM NATIONAL PROGRAMMING

Hon L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, following the statement made earlier by my colleague Senator Corbin, when he quoted the article concerning the CBC, I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he would be kind enough to check with whoever is responsible for the celebrations. I know that government cannot, and will not, dictate to the CBC what it should do, but surely in a case like this enquiries should be made as to how and why New Brunswick was the only province left out of that proposed telecast.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I saw the news report to which both Senator Corbin and Senator Thériault refer. let me say that I share their dismay at this turn of events. I will certainly ask my colleague Mr. Perrin Beatty, who reports to Parliament for the CBC, to ask that corporation for an explanation of this matter.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

MARKETING OF GRAIN—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question to the minister has to do with the policy of the government regarding the Canadian Wheat Board. As the minister will know, this has been a very important instrument in western Canada for the orderly marketing of grain, and has been, for the prairie farmers in general, their very definite choice as a marketing system. Yet we find that, bit by bit, there seems to be an erosion of the board and of its maintenance.

Recently, new measures were announced to provide for the private export to the U.S. of Canadian grain, whereas previously all exports were by the Canadian Wheat Board. Recently, as well, because of budget cuts, apparently inspections of grain leaving the country by truck are being reduced or eliminated. That means that from now on there will be no control on Canadian trucks carrying grain into the United States. There has been a suspicion on the part of many Westerners since the implementation of the free trade agreement that the policy of the government was indeed under American pressure to let the Wheat Board disappear bit by bit.

Could the minister tell us clearly what the position of the government is? Is it supporting the Wheat Board, or does it want it, indeed, to disappear?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the latter part of the honourable senator's statement is one of these bogeys that arise from time to time in connection with criticism of the free trade agreement. As the Honourable Roy McLaren accurately predicted several years ago, the opposition would be blaming the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement for every sparrow that falls from the air.

The position of the government with regard to the Canadian Wheat Board has not changed. We support the Canadian Wheat Board. As for the background to the private exports recently authorized, I will ask my colleague Mr. Mayer, the minister responsible, for a statement on that matter, and I will bring it in in due course.

NATIONAL FINANCE

INCREASE IN DEFICIT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I hold in my hand a press release from the Minister of Finance giving the figures for the first three quarters of this present fiscal year, indicating that at the end of December—that is, after three quarters—the actual deficit was $26.8 billion, or approximately $8 billion higher than the year before.

Does that mean that we are heading for a $40 billion deficit in total, when we get the fourth quarter, by following the pattern set for the first three quarters?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Not at all, honourable senators. My colleague the Minister of Finance forecast in his February budget that the deficit for fiscal 1991-92 would come in at $30.5 billion. We have no reason to change that forecast.

Senator Olson: Was the forecast such that there was going to be an $8 billion increase in this fiscal year over the last fiscal year, and, if so, is there going to be an improvement in the amount of $7 billion or $8 billion between January 1 and the end of March?

Senator Murray: Well, honourable senators, the numbers that count are the numbers for the full fiscal year, and the number at $30.5 billion for 1991-92 would certainly not represent an $8 billion increase over the figure for 1990-91.

CANADA POST

LITERACY OF PRIVATE ENTERPRISE MAIL CARRIERS

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government would be kind enough to ask the minister responsible for the Post Office if he could kindly intervene so that in the postal district J9H 5E1 in Quebec, when the private enterprise carrier hired to deliver the mail wants a day off, he or she will not have himself or herself replaced by someone who cannot read. I have been getting mail addressed to Mr. Joe Clark's daughter, and similar things have been happening elsewhere. We send it on unopened, of course. It would be nice, though, if you did point out that it is necessary to be able to read to perform that job.

• (1510)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I accept both the representations and the assurances of the honourable senator. I shall convey them both to Mr. Andre.

TRANSPORT

ARROW AIR CRASH IN GANDER, NEWFOUNDLAND—CRIMINAL INVESTIGATION COMMENCED BY U.S. FEDERAL AVIATION AUTHORITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It concerns the terrible air disaster that occurred a few years ago in Gander, Newfoundland, just before Christmas, known as the Arrow air crash.

It has come to my attention that the Federal Aviation Administration of the United States has started a criminal investigation into the worst disaster that ever occurred in Canada, a disaster which involved the deaths of 256 people. Up until now the Government of Canada has refused to re-open this case, even though Mr. Justice Willard Estey concluded in his report that the findings of the Canadian Aviation Safety Board were erroneous.

Is the government aware of the investigation that is now being carried out in the United States? Will the Government of Canada insist upon taking part in this investigation which would afford the people of Canada the opportunity of obtaining full particulars and any information from the American military and other authorities there? Is the government prepared to undertake such a task?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the question that the honourable senator has put concerning a tragedy and an investigation into a tragedy which was the source of considerable controversy for a long time, both here and in the United States. I shall have to ask my colleague, Mr. Corbeil, the Minister of Transport, to let me have his comments on the questions that the honourable senator has put.

JUSTICE

CANCELLATION OF COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I wish to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate that is based on a question asked yesterday by my colleague, the Leader of the Opposition, concerning the Court Challenges Program. He referred to a letter which had been written to the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Kim Campbell, by the former Supreme Court Justice Bertha Wilson. I wanted to refresh the memory of senators with what was in that letter. However, unfortunately, we do not have Hansard, as Senator Molgat pointed out.

I might just refer to comments that Bertha Wilson made in addition to the letter with reference to the cancellation in the last budget of the Court Challenges Program which, as all senators know, has been in place for some five years to enable the most vulnerable in our society to benefit from the Charter of Rights and Freedoms by having an opportunity to take their cases to court in order to protect them from arbitrary and unfair actions following through from government law.

On hearing of the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program Ms Wilson said:

> I'm stunned . . . As a Supreme Court judge, I saw what an invaluable contribution this program made. It was exciting; it made you think governments can't be all that bad. And then . . . bingo! This policy makes the people who can least afford it bear the brunt. There's no point in giving people rights if they don't have the wherewithal to go to court.

Has the Leader of the Government in the Senate had an opportunity to receive from the Minister of Justice her response to Bertha Wilson? I am sure she would have wished to respond quickly to that letter.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I am sure she will, honourable senators, but my colleague, Mrs. Campbell, is in Vancouver attending meetings at the present time, at least she was yesterday, and I have not had an opportunity to discuss the matter with her. As soon as I have such an opportunity, I will of course do so and obtain a copy of any reply that she sends to the former Justice Wilson.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have another question to ask of the government leader. Leaving aside the correspondence between the minister and the former Supreme Court Justice, will he use his authority within the federal cabinet to have the government take another look at this action that was taken by the Minister of Finance? This is a program which helps the vulnerable—aboriginal people, racial and ethnic minorities, disabled Canadians, as well as women, who, through the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund, have probably made more use of this program to protect their rights through the courts on gender issues than any other group.

Given that members from all parties in Parliament support this program most heavily, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate use his good offices within cabinet to have another look at reinstating this program?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator will understand when I tell her that I can only undertake to convey her representations to my colleague, the Minister of Justice, and to ask if that minister wishes to comment on them in any way.

Senator Fairbairn: Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate could also convey these representations to his friend the Minister of Finance. At a time when we are apparently funding something called a Museum of Humour in Montreal, it seems a little incongruous, in terms of where our priorities are, that we should be cutting from federal expenditures the ability of minority groups, the disabled, women and other vulnerable Canadians to be able to defend themselves in the courts against violations of their rights under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

THE ECONOMY

FIRST MINISTERS MEETING—ATTENDANCE OF PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. There is a report from Canadian Press that Prime Minister Mulroney has told the premiers he does not have time for anything more than a one-day meeting on the economy this month—not two days as expected—and they better have their homework done.

In a recent letter to B.C. Premier Mike Harcourt, acting as provincial coordinator, apparently the Prime Minister flatly rejected preliminary plans drafted by provincial and federal officials for a two-day meeting in Ontario. Instead, Mr. Mulroney said he wants a one-day session on March 25 because—and I emphasize this—of the busy schedule of meetings on constitutional reform.

Can the people of Canada infer from this that the Prime Minister and his government place a higher priority on solving the constitutional problems of Canada than on Canada's serious economic problems?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before the Leader of the Government answers the question, I must advise you that the 30 minutes allotted for Question Period have now expired.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I am sure the Leader of the Opposition would agree, honourable senators, that the two issues—the unity of the country and economic prosperity—areintimately related.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a response to the question raised on February 27, 1992 by the Honourable Senator Stewart regarding the Harris Report on northern cod stocks.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

DECLINE OF NORTHERN COD STOCKS—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT REPORT

(Response to question raised by Hon. John B. Stewart on February 27, 1992)

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans has sought to integrate information from inshore fishermen into the process of stock assessment. Back in 1987, the Task Group of the Newfoundland Inshore Fishery was commissioned by the Honourable Tom Siddon to provide an independent analysis of the factors which had influenced the decline in inshore catches.

The Task Group, which included independent scientific experts from Europe, U.S.A. and Canada, concluded that, while there had been a decline in inshore catches, the total biomass of the northern cod stock had been increasing. The Task Group attributed the decline of inshore catches to a combination of factors. These factors were: 1) changes in fish availability resulting from predator-prey and/or environmental conditions; 2) differential mortalities imposed on offshore stocks migrating to inshore fishing grounds; 3) overall decline in inshore fishing effort and/or redeployment of fishing effort to other target species, and; 4) potential overfishing of inshore stock components by inshore fishermen in southern areas. The first three points thus confirmed the findings of the Canadian Atlantic Fisheries Scientific Advisory Committee (CAFSAC) but the Task Group also noted that there was a reasonable possibility that declines in inshore catches in some inshore areas had been due to heavy fishing on groups of cod that live most, or all of the time in inshore waters. The Task Group also indicated that the analytical techniques employed by the Canadian scientists were standard contemporary methods for stock assessment.

This is where we were at the end of 1987. In fact, as the inshore catches exceeded 100,000t in 1988 (from a level of 72,000t in 1986), these findings provided the most likely explanation of the declines in inshore catches in the mid-eighties.

In January 1989, CAFSAC reviewed the most recent information on the northern cod stock and concluded that the stock was far less abundant than they had estimated in preceding years. The assessment also implied that the stock would remain stable, i.e., no growth, no decline, with a TAC of 235,000t. These reductions in productivity were related to the poor production of fish in 1983 and 1984 and to a reduction in the growth of cod throughout the eighties. The news of lower than expected productivity for this important stock was responded to immediately by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who announced, on February 12, 1989, an independent panel to review the scientific advice on northern cod. The Panel was chaired by Dr. Leslie Harris, President and Vice Chancellor of Memorial University of Newfoundland. The Panel included two eminent fisheries biologists, namely Dr. Lee Alverson, who chaired the Task Group on Northern Cod Inshore Fisheries in 1987 and Dr. John Pope of the Lowestoft Laboratory of the United Kingdom. The Panel concluded that the most recent CAFSAC advice was "in the right domain".

There is a tendency to forget that the marine environment is not static, but changes over time. In that respect, the marine environment is no different from that of the land where droughts, floods, or other environmentally-induced disasters are known to occur. Droughts and floods are difficult to refute as the cause of hardship because they themselves, as well as their impacts, are so visible to us. Changes and disasters in the marine environment are more difficult to demonstrate as they are only detected through their impact on fisheries, which can themselves be affected by other factors (e.g., overfishing). This leads us to 1991, when it seems that unusual environmental changes occurred. In fact, the lack of capelin and the decline in the availability of cod in 1991 coincide with the occurrence of unusual environmental conditions off Labrador and Newfoundland. For both capelin and cod, the catch levels cannot by themselves explain the sudden changes in abundance and distribution. In sum, both cod and capelin are part of an ecosystem that seems to have changed in 1991 as a result of large scale changes in environmental conditions. As well, it seems clear that the growth of seal herds in recent years has placed considerable additional pressure on capelin stocks, and possibly through them, or directly, on cod.

AIRPORT TRANSFER (MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS) BILL

THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED—DEBATE RESUMED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Grimard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, for the third reading of Bill C-15, An Act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employees' pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports.

And on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator Corbin, seconded by the Honourable Molgat, that clause 4 of the Bill be deleted and replaced by the following:

4. Where the Minister has sold, leased or otherwise transferred an airport to a designated airport authority, on and after the transfer date Parts IV, V, VI, VII, VIII, IX and X of the Official Languages Act apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to the authority in relation to the airport as if

(a) the authority were a federal institution; and

(b) the airport were an office or facility of that institution, other than its head or central office.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to thank Senator Corbin who presented this amendment yesterday and explained why we are convinced that this amendment should meet with the unanimous approval of this Chamber, if we support the principle of the Official Languages Act. I also wish to thank Senator Thériault who spoke subsequently.

I think we should realize what this is all about. This is not a partisan matter. It is about the Official Languages Act. The issue is not being raised by us but by the Commissioner of Official Languages—in fact, by both.

To refresh your memory, perhaps I may recall that on June 17, Senator Frith read here in this Chamber a letter he received from the Commissioner of Official Languages at the time, Mr. D'Iberville Fortier, a letter that was dated June 14, 1991. Since Senator Frith read the letter, I am not going to read it again, but I simply want to mention Mr. Fortier's conclusion. The following appeared in the English version of the Debates of the Senate of June 17, at page 222.

[English]

In conclusion, you may recall that the Act to privatize Air Canada maintains towards this enterprise all of the obligations under the Official Languages Act. I therefore strongly recommend that you intervene in the debate so that Section 4 of Bill C-15 be amended to ensure that all of the provisions of the Official Languages Act continue to apply to the designated airport authorities. Any weakening of the current policy would seem to me to constitute an unacceptable and unjustified step backward.

It could not be clearer. The Commissioner of Official Languages, who has a mandate from both Houses of Parliament to ensure that the Official Languages Act is recognized and implemented, said categorically that if we pass the bill as it is now without amendment, we would be going against this Act.

What has happened since then? We have a new Commissioner of Official Languages. He was asked the question when he appeared before the Committee on Transport and Communications on November 21, 1991, as my colleague, Senator Corbin, read yesterday. I repeat, I asked the question myself. Here is the question:

When we look at clause IV and the following clause, we should put 5, 6 and 7 back in clause 4 as proposed here.

And Mr. Goldbloom replied:

That would be my recommendation.

Honourable senators, we must look at this issue in a non-partisan way. Speaking of Senate reform— I started a debate on that matter a while ago. One thing that I would want for a new Senate is that we look at issues in a non-partisan way. We are not here as Liberals or Conservatives but as representatives of the Canadian people to ensure the legality of what the House of Commons does, to represent the regions, minorities and Canadians in a non-partisan way. I think that is what the Senate should do.

I understand you perfectly well. I know that under the present constraints, things do not work that way, unfortunately, but that is the direction in which the Senate should move if we are to perform our duty to Canadians properly.

Let us return to the Official Languages Act. You will recall that the first law was adopted in 1969, I think. In 1985-86, with a new government in place, the law had been on the books for several years and the various commissioners had recommended changes. The government said that it wanted to make some changes. This is what the government said in its Speech from the Throne on October 1, 1986. The speech was read right in this Chamber, as you know. Her Excellency the Governor General said:

[English]

> Official bilingualism is an indispensable feature of our national character. Seventeen years after its enactment, Canada's Official Languages Act now needs to be revised. Appropriate legislation will be introduced in this session to ensure as well that this Act conforms with the Canadian Charter of Rights.

[Translation]

The question was important enough for the government to refer to it in the Speech from the Throne. What happened afterwards? On february 8, 1988, in the House of Commons, the Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn, now His Excellency the Governor General, presented a new Bill C-72, and here is what he said:

[English]

> I am pleased to rise today to begin the second reading debate on Bill C-72, an Act respecting the status and use of the official languages of Canada. This bill marks an important milestone in the development of our country.

[Translation]

The then Minister, now our Governor General, was thus emphasizing anew the importance of this legislation.

What was the reaction? Some objections were made by members of the House of Commons. I want to quote from a few articles published at that time in the newspapers. Here is for example what the Toronto Star said about that legislation.

[English]

> It ensures that both English and French speaking Canadians can work in their own language in all federal institutions in Ottawa and Hull as well as in specified bilingual regions of the country.

[Translation]

What a surprise, this article is entitled: "No Retreat on Bilingualism". The government was committed.

Here is another article from the Globe and Mail, dated of May, 25, and I quote:

[English

> Bilingualism bill critics retreat. On June 25, 1987, three cabinet ministers, with a big show, introduced the bill, making it appear as though Canada would be turned upside down by it.

• (1530)

> It was not so much what was in the legislation, as what Tory ministers said it would do, that created the controversy.
> Then Treasury Board president Robert de Cotret talked all about the Government jobs that would become bilingual, saying: "The senior management will also have to be able to function in both languages. Data programs will have to be available in both languages."

Let me continue with another article, "Ottawa rejects call to back down on language bill":

> The federal government will not back down on tough language legislation to promote bilingualism, Justice Minister Ray Hnatyshyn says.
> "The basic principles of this bill remain sacrosanct"... "The commitment of the government remains clear."

[Translation]

It is true that some of them had objections.

[English]

> But some Tory critics of bilingualism warned that the language battle is far from over and vowed they will fight for further amendments to change the controversial legislation.
> "The battle ain't over until the fat lady sings,"

[Translation]

But the government remained firm. Here is another quotation:

[English]

> "PM fires rebel on languages as bill passed".

[Translation]

Therefore, honourable senators, it was a very important bill both for the government and for the country. The government could be very proud of that bill.

Congratulations also came from elsewhere. The then Commissioner of Official Languages, Mr. d'Iberville Fortier said:

[English]

"Fortier's praise may be calm before language storm". The article reads:

> The new Official Languages Act makes Canada "a model for other countries," says D'Iberville Fortier, Commissioner of Official Languages.
> The act "is a splendid tool not only for language reform but for building a stronger Canadian identity while fully respecting Canada's diversity," Fortier says.

[Translation]

Here is another document from the Library of Parliament entitled "Official Bilingual Act". It was prepared in 1988 by someone who was certainly not partisan, being an employee of the Library of Parliament. Here is what it says, in reference to the preamble:

[English]

> The very presence of a preamble, rare in public law, is evidence of the importance accorded to the Act by the legislator . . .
> The preamble specifically mentions sections 16 to 20 of the Charter, language of work, equitable participation and the commitment on the part of the federal government to advancing bilingualism, official language minority communities and cooperation with provincial governments.

[Translation]

That is what the government itself was saying, what is was suggesting and what the Commissionner of official languages was supporting. We now have before us a bill the Commissionner of official languages said flatly and unequivocally:

> This bill is contrary to the Official Languages Act.

Let me ask you this, honourable senators, regardless of your background. (Here is what your government said a little while ago. Yes, I do congratule them on that.) Is it not time to act, to set aside partisanhip and to act on a matter of principle?

The matter is especially important, I would say, for us francophones outside Quebec. For us, the Official Languages Act is of paramount importance. The problems we have stressed and will continue to stress, if need be, must be understood. Bilingualism is not popular with everyone in this country, as you know. Senator Simard spoke most eloquently on this issue, and I know how much effort was put into the last election in his province by the CORE group. They came in second, not the Conservatives, the CORE people. And what is their main goal? To abolish bilingualism.

People must understand our difficult situation. They must understand how much we, francophones outside Quebec, had to fight to keep our language. I can tell you that I have been a provincial member for many years back home. Senator Roblin was the leader of the government at the time. Each year, my colleagues from the Liberal Party would table before the House a bill to allow us to have French as our language of instruction. And each year, Senator Roblin and his party turned down this simple request to add the word "French" in our school law. We were denied that. It is only years later, not when my children started school but when they were in the sixth grade, that the law was finally changed and we were allowed to teach in French in my province. People must be made aware of these problems across the country. That is why the Official Languages Act is essential for us. I am telling all of you, honourable senators, and particularly my French-speaking colleagues who spoke on the distinct society concept yesterday, think about just how important this act for us.

Senator Lavoie-Roux, senator Bolduc, and I will not mention senator Grimard, who is the sponsor of this bill. I am asking you, honourable senators, to understand the problems that we have. The Official Languages Act is essential if we want to maintain bilingualism in this country, if we wlant to maintain both languages. If you believe in that, if you believe that speaking two languages is an important asset, if you believe in the Official Languages Act, I am asking you to put aside all partisanship and to support senator Corbin's amendment.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, without repeating everything other senators and myself have said during several sessions on this bill, before Christmas as well as last fall, and even last week, I would like nevertheless to appeal to my colleagues from both sides to support this motion.

I can tell you I would not moved such a motion. I thought I had launched a debate, with the help of a few colleagues, on how to improve the way in which the right of francophone employees to speak their language at work will be treated by the future regional organizations which will administer these airports. I would not have done it not because I am one of those who give up easily, especially when such a linguistic question affects my fellow citizens of New Brunswick and the linguistic minority of Canada. I said to myself, if to this date no one has been able to convince my colleagues, anglophone as well as francophone, but especially my francophone colleagues from Quebec, perhaps I can suggest another amendment which, after the authorities refusal to enforce the Official Languages Act, would at least result in maintaining the application of the Official Languages Act in New Brunswick, the only officially bilingual province in the country.

At one point, I had to admit that support was not there. Perhaps I failed to convince my colleagues.

As the motion in amendment of Senator Corbin has the same intent as the amendment I supported yesterday, and as it is before the Senate, I will support it. I do hope that other senators from this side will do the same.

First, it was said and confirmed that between 70 and 75 per cent of Canadians approved of the Official Languages Act and its application in federally regulated areas or in parapublic institutions, such as airports. Privatization should not so easily excuse us from not applying this principle.

Second, I remind my hon. colleagues about all the arguments we heard these past few months against our insisting on the protection garanteed by the Official Languages Act. We were told about competitiveness, about cost saving for these regional authorities.

Honourable senators, I remind you that, even if we still have not gotten that legal protection, it is offered somewhat differently, through the leases. I take the word of two ministers and the word of my leader of the Government in the Senate, who say it will be done. So, cost saving no longer matters.

Cost saving is no longer an issue. If another minister or another government fulfills the present government and the present ministers' commitment, and maintains the same provisions in the future which require local authorities to comply with their employees' right to work in their language . . .

● (1540)

So, it is no longer a question of economy. Therefore, it seems to me that the only issue left is that of sending this bill back to the House of Commons. There are no other issues left!

If the Senate is to operate according to the Constitution, asking that Bill C-15 be sent back to the House of Commons is not a sin or an unusual mesure. Of course, some think that in the constitutional context this could lead to a more or less stormy debate.

Is it not a small price to pay in order to preserve, in our legal texts, including the Official Languages Act, this right that is being taken away from us today in the name of privatization?

I believe that the consequences of the precedent being set are unpredictable and could be very serious. Senator Molgat just talked about an eventual reform of the Senate. All kinds of combinations and permutations are possible. Among others, the Beaudoin-Dobbis report talks about a reformed Senate. It is recommended that, in the case of bills or pieces of legislation that include linguistic considerations, a second majority will be required.

Honourable senators, it is wise to include such a measure in a constitutional amendment; this means that there could be times when minority rights might be affected in a negative way.

I would like to establish link between the motion on double majority and this debate. I want to warn those who might delude themselves regarding this famous concept of a double majority.

Dear collegues, if, during this debate I cannot convince my Francophones colleagues in the Senate to support us in protecting the rights of our minority in New Brunswick, because this bill goes against higher and more important interests, or against a provincial act in Quebec (because this is indeed argument that I heard from some parliamentary collegues) can I really put my trust in a constitutional amendment in a reformed Senate that would provide the protection promised from the double majority rule? I doubt it.

I support the motion to amend and I hope to be able to rely on the Francophone majority from Quebec in the Senate! Honourable senators, I ask you to ponder my request.

Honourable senators, I do not want to repeat myself but I think that we are making a serious mistake with bill C-15. This is an unacceptable precedent. The government and my collegues in the Senate should support the amendment before us, even if it bothers the government and forces the House of Commons to resume some debates. The price to pay is really not high given the possible consequences of bill C-15.

Honourable senators, I will therefore support the amendment of Senator Corbin. I hope that some of my colleagues will do the same. I will not introduce any other motion for amendment. I have already informed my caucus of that because I have always believed that Acadians do not need two slaps per day or per week. One is more than enough! Acadians were disappointed with the outcome of the vote yesterday, and they will be disappointed again today if Senator Corbin's motion is rejected.

I wish each of us would give this some thought. Substantial improvements have been made to the scope of Bill C-15, in view of the fact we have been given ministerial assurances that with regard to the leases the problem regarding the employee's working language could be minimized. But, as we know, six months or six years down the road, any new government or minister could easily cancel these guarantees with the stroke of a pen.

In closing, I want to add—and I am only reiterating what I told you two or three weeks ago—that I do not trust at all some of the people, whom I know well, people from Moncton . . . It may not be for tomorrow, but they did inform the government that they would be ready to look after the running of the airport in Moncton, or in Dieppe rather. It is actually located in Dieppe, which is a truly French town. Moncton being what it is, I can see from here the "knights" from the Board of Trade, the Rotary Club and others taking away the vested rights of the workers to work in French.

The Moncton area, it is no secret, as Senator Thériault, knows, is no stronghold of the Acadian pride and of the will to fight for the Acadians, even if a few people do. Those who will be in charge of the airport are not the fiercest advocates of the cause or the rights of the Acadians or of those of Anglophones for that matter when they are in the minority.

So, I shall support this motion in amendment put forward by Senator Corbin. Personnally I don't think that the Senate has to reach a decision on this bill today. I hope that other honourable senators will want to think about it for another day, so why not postone the vote until tomorrow? Or even until next week? We are told to rush, because they have been getting ready to be privatized for five years in British Columbia and in Montreal. So what! What difference is one or two weeks going to make if this means giving us the time to think things over in order to send back to the House of Commons. A bill which would include Senator Corbin's amendment?

Thank you, honourable senators.

● (1550)

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to add a word on this amendment. I hope that you will forgive me for referring to some events of some 30 years ago when I was a member of the Laurendeau-Dunton Commission. I am bound to say that at that time, 30 years ago, I could not have believed that institutional bilingualism, which we eventually recommended, would have advanced as far as it has. It was legislation that was introduced by a Liberal government and as Senator Molgat has pointed out, has been stoutly defended by the ensuing Conservative government.

It is as a former commissioner and someone who has been involved for some time in this field but not someone who can give any lessons to Senator Simard, or Senator Murray or Senator Beaudoin or Senator Bolduc, or any senators here that have been involved in the trenches, that I speak to you today. Senator Simard has spent most of his political life—at least a good part of it —fighting these battles, much more than I have. So I do not come here to preach but simply to give a perspective and to explain not to Senator Simard, or Senator Thériault or Senator Molgat or Senator Gigantès, or any of the others of a like mind, why we are making a bit of a fuss about this and why we have an opportunity to do something non-partisan here for the benefit of our country.

I want to speak to those of you who wonder why we are making such a fuss about this when you, I am sure, are tempted—in fact perhaps convinced—to accept the undertakings of the minister, because I accept them too. I am not suggesting that they are not reliable. However, there is a principle that is involved. Thirty years have gone by building what now is represented by the Official Languages Act. What is happening here is a small chisel mark on what has been built—nothing that will bring the whole thing down, nothing that will make the operation of this act impossible, but a mark neevertheless. Those wondering why we are making a fuss about it say, "But we got the undertakings of the minister and we all accept them. No one here quarrels with them or says that they are not reliable."

We are told by others that the law will operate and that the airports will operate because this is but a small part of this important bill. Why are we picking this one little part of this bill to make such a fuss about? For those of you who so wonder, and who are inclined not to make a fuss about it, it is simply for the reasons underlined by Senator Simard and by Senator Molgat and others. We now have, as we know, two official language commissioners saying that it is an important development because it could be the beginning of a new regime that states that the Official Languages Act gradually will not apply to situations and not apply to certain statutes because other administrative arrangements are put in place. That is all we are saying. Do not do it that way. It is not a matter of a large right and a large wrong. It is a matter of the principle of the beginning of another way of establishing the official languages regime, which is not as reliable or as solid as the Official Languages Act.

That is why Senator Corbin's amendment is better than my amendment was because all it does is say, "Let us have these provisions, the applicable provisions of the Official Languages Act, apply". It is a positive amendment; mine tended to be a negative one by removing something. All that is being asked, and all that I have asked members on my side and members on your side to support, is simply to say, "No, we do not want a new regime that substitutes administrative measures for the Official Languages Act. We want to send that message—all of us—back to the House of Commons. This is the Senate speaking to the House of Commons, not the Conservatives or the Liberals, saying to the House of Commons, "No, we think this act should stay and should apply and not have a part of it supplanted by administrative measures."

[Senator Frith.]

I am sure, honourable senators, that if we do send it back to the House of Commons they will accept such an amendment because they will be aware that all of us are prepared to support the rest of the act.

[Translation]

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we make a decision, I think it is essential that I correct some facts and that I remind you of some others that were omitted in today's discussion.

There was talk about Messieurs D'Iberville Fortier and Goldbloom's concern relating to the lack of some provisions in this bill. Nobody mentioned, for instance, that Mr. Rainboth, the Deputy Commissioner of Official Languages, after being informed of Minister Corbeil's letter, responded as follows, and I quote from the Debates of the Senate of February 27th last:

● (1600)

[English]

> As Dr. Goldbloom indicated to you in your recent meeting, he is currently in favour of the application of Parts V and VI of the Official Languages Act to local airport authority leases in prescribed regions.

I think that is a sentiment shared by all of us.

> It would have been preferable for such a provision to be included in the legislation to provide a continuing guarantee, but I am confident that in the absence of such a provision Dr. Goldbloom would support an alternative measure such as that which you are proposing to introduce.

It was signed by Peter L. Rainboth who is Deputy Commissioner of Official Languages.

Senator Frith: It was not Dr. Goldbloom who said that.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We can assume that Mr. Rainboth spoke in the name of his superior, and since then we have no reason to believe that Dr. Goldbloom is not in agreement with those sentiments. Otherwise I am sure we would have heard from him.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I must remind the Senate that amendments similar to the one we debated yesterday and the one before us today were put to the House of Commons, both in committee and in the House, and they were refused. If you want to know why, you must consult the record! However, we must not forget the fact that—

06● RO[

Senator Frith: Let it be on their heads, then.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is not the point. Let them take their responsibilities. If this law goes back to the House of Commons amended as suggested, we have every reason to feel that it may not be introduced in the house, or even get on the order paper.

Senator Olson: Why?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Because they have already refused. It is an assumption and a suggestion which I ask you to reflect on. You may not agree with it but it is a strong possibility.

Senator Frith has also said that he is in agreement. He does not doubt the minister's intentions in carrying out the commitment in his letter. I assume that all of us feel the same way. There are now four agreements ready to be signed: one in Dorval-Mirabel, one in Edmonton, one in Vancouver and one in Calgary. Only one of them will be touched by this letter and its commitment, ironically enough affecting the other official language to the one which preoccupies our colleagues from New Brunswick.

At present there is no airport in New Brunswick that I am aware of that is even close to becoming subject to an agreement with the federal government similar to the agreements that are ready to be signed. There have been indications of intentions, but I think we are months, if not years, away from a final decision.

Senator Corbin: This is a general law.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is correct. I would like to suggest that the intentions of this house and the sentiments which are shared on both sides can be brought to the attention of the government, and we can express the hope that when the Official Languages Act is looked at again, an appropriate amendment can be introduced.

Meanwhile, I fear—and although this has been said before, I have to repeat it again—that to send the bill back with an amendment will mean a delay in its passage and return to us for an indefinite period. It will mean the end of negotiations and the impossibility of implementing four agreements. I would think, with the commitments given by the minister in his letter and the support given them by the Deputy Commissioner of Official Languages on behalf of the Commissioner, that this would be enough for us to refuse this amendment.

Senator Gigantès: Would Senator Lynch-Staunton answer a question?

Senator Barootes: No.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I will listen to it.

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Is he your master's voice? Were you implying that only the Francophone minority in Moncton is important? There are Francophone minorities and Anglophone minorities that are involved in the other airports you have mentioned. That is why we are thinking of something general. You were saying that Senator Simard and Senator Corbin, who are from New Brunswick, worry about New Brunswick. Properly so; you are quite right. Then there are Francophones in Alberta. They, too, deserve protection.

Senator Simard: There are Anglophones in Montreal.

Senator Gigantès: There are Anglophones in Montreal. And you said that you trust the minister. Amen. Accidents happen. After the next election neither you nor us may be in power. We might get Mr. Manning, and then we would have to fight in the trenches, and it would be harder to change a law than to change a contract. That is what we are talking about.

What you are saying is that the protection of the minorities of Canada, the protection that they have been promised, matters less than a commercial contract. This is the position you are taking.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I do not think that is a fair interpretation. We are talking about the application of both languages in certain sectors, based on the requirements of the Official Languages Act itself, in certain designated areas of Canada which exclude Vancouver, Calgary and Edmonton. I am not saying that because we are fixing on Montreal and New Brunswick we are ignoring minorities elsewhere. What you must remember is that the Official Languages Act does not apply to all of Canada equally.

Hon. Eymard Corbin: I have a question for the honourable senator if he would be so good as to reply. The Deputy Leader of the Government stated that there would be tremendous difficulties in the other place if the bill were to be returned with an amendment. Could he be more specific and tells us who it is who would object to such a reasonable amendment? Is it the NDP, the Bloc Québécois, the Liberal party, the independents? Where is the problem and what is it?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I can only repeat, honourable senators, that the House has already turned down an amendment similar to this one, and we can only assume that it will maintain that position.

Senator Corbin: If I may, in the form of a comment, put another question. My experience in Parliament is that there have been situations in the past that were reversed. In our Canadian parliamentary tradition there have been situations such as the one you are alluding to if today we were to accept the amendment and return it to the House. Off the top of my head, I cannot give the specifics but, having served in the House of Commons for 16 years and having occupied the Chair in the other place for some time, I remember, in a vague way but nevertheless it is there — and I certainly stand to be corrected and humbled if I am wrong — instances where exactly the opposite of what you are fearing has, in fact, happened.

If we were to go back into parliamentary history, we would find a number of other instances. The appeal today is to reasonableness and nothing else. You have heard everyone who spoke. In terms of the business part of this bill, we are in favour of it. I certainly think it is a grand experiment. In terms of acquired rights I believe we are doing a disservice to Canada by supporting a bill which will withdraw rights that already exist. If there is reason for the existence of a Senate, it is for reasons such as this.

[Translation]

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, could the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate answer a question? If I misunderstood, I am sorry. Did he say that if we accept the amendment proposed by Senator Corbin, the House may perhaps reject it totally. Did I understand correctly?

I have a second question. If I remember correctly, sometime before the end of the year, the first time I looked at this bill on the Committee on Transport and Communications of which I was not a member, we were told that it was vital that this bill be passed without delay because major contracts, to be signed in Montreal and elsewhere, depended on it. That was three or four months ago.

Is the situation still the same?

It is not the first time that governments are faced with proposals from private companies eager for contracts and are told: This has to be passed yesterday. Very often the bill relevant is passed a year later and it works just as well. How do you explain that? Did I misunderstand you? I thought I heard you say that the House of commons would refuse the amendment?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I said that during debate on this bill in the House of Commons, an amendment similar to the one we are discussing today was refused. The fact that the government is offering a letter to which is appended a letter from the Commissioner of Official Languages rather than taking the risk of having the bill returned to the House to have an amendment passed, should indicate that a similar refused would be likely.

Senator Frith: So they would never change their minds because of what the Senate said?

[Translation]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, in regards to the agreements ready to be signed, there is some kind of urgency because each day, each week, each month that goes by is costing these authorities money since they have only expenses and no income.

We did not blithely delay tabling of this Bill. Since December we have been working with the departments and the government to prepare a document which would appease all the worries and the concerns we all share and most of all our francophone colleagues from outside Quebec. The best we could do, and we think it is excellent, is obtain a guarantee from the minister that similar clauses would be added to the agreements in all cases where official languages legislation now applies. We have a letter from Dr. Goldbloom's assistant where he says he also would have preferred an amendment although, he says, this is better than nothing, it is acceptable. This is where we stand.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, could Senator Lynch-Staunton admit that this gives us the opportunity to show that the Senate is a House of Parliament equal to the other House as is stated in the Constitution? There is no partisanship involved here. For once, could the government not accept the fact that Tories, Liberals, independents, anglophones, francophones and ethnic minorities have agreed to ask the House of Commons to review its decision?

[Senator Th]

Do you not think this could be an important historical moment in what might be the last years of a dying Senate?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, the intent of the Senate has already been brought to the attention of the government; government is already aware of the wish of many senators.

Senator Thériault: I am talking about the Senate, not about senators.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Well the House of Commons was made aware of the general feeling of this House on that issue. The answer was what we have here. I cannot say more.

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, I would like to come back to what the Deputy Leader of the Government said earlier. One major principle has been mentioned over and over again. I hope you have not forgotten about it. The government does not want to force a private company to respect the working language dispositions, because, as you know . . .

Senator Thériault: The truth is coming out!

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: I love this senator!

Senator Grimard: Are you finished? I will tell you something. If you look at the speech I made on second reading of this bill, I said and I will repeat it today, there is nothing wrong with that. The government does not want to ask a private company to which it is transferring rights to respect parts V, VI and VII which are, and I hope you made the distinction . . .

Senator Thériault: That is exactly why we made it.

Senator Grimard: That only applies to the working language, not the service language. As far as the service language is concerned, those rights are enshrined in Bill C-15. That is quite clear. There is no need to address the issue, since the service language is protected, and all the appropriate dispositions of the Official Languages Act apply in full. That is one thing. But we are also talking about the working language here.

There is a distinction to be made about the working language when the government decides to sell or lease to private companies. To ask companies to abide by part VII and to promote both French and English . . .

Senator Molgat: Is there something wrong with that?

Senator Grimard: Let me finish first, and if you have questions, I will answer them. We can force the federal government to take measures to promote both French and English, but it is not as easy to ask a private firm which is definitely trying to compete, because, as I explained when I gave the government's point of view during the debate on second reading, everyone is competing these days. Montreal has to compete with Boston, with New York.

But one thing is for sure, and I hope it is clear in your mind, the public will be adequately served, as required by the Official Languages Act. The problem, and I am not ashamed to say it again, stems from the policy the government has followed. The government does not want to impose on a private company the obligation to abide by other parts of the Act, as you would like to do.

[English]

Senator Frith: That is what the whole act is about. If you are doing business with the federal government, you have to. That turns the clock back 20 years.

[Translation]

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, would you take a two-part question? If what you say is right, why would the minister promise to specify compliance in the contract rather than through the act? Secondly, do you think that a francophone worker in some private company administered by anglophones would like to be told "speak white"?

Senator Grimard: I think that the minister took a step forward when, following the suggestions that were made to him, not only by the other side of the House but by us, he committed himself in a letter that the contracts would specify compliance with the language of work provisions, of the Official Languages Act. I think that is a step forward.

We must still face reality. When the Montreal Airport Commissioner appeared before us, he specifically told us that he could live with the act as written. There was no problem in Montreal. I echo the words of our Deputy Leader of the Government, who told us earlier that, in fact, we wage a battle. I have a lot of respect for New Brunwickers. I understand their problem. We wage a remote control battle, because we are currently solving the problem of Montreal, Vancouver, Calgary and Edmonton.

When we talk about Moncton, there are absolutely no discussions going. It is only a wish, an intention. I suggest, and I say frankly, that essentially (I know you did not like it, but I will repeat it) the government does not want to require a private company to comply with the language of work provisions of the Official Languages Act.

I have given examples. Let's take Air Canada for instance. Everything has been laid down. The working language has been laid down. The service language has been laid down, and it is fine, since Air Canada is a unit all across Canada. It is only one unit, whereas airports are different entities.

In every other privatization done by contract or in legislation, it has never been a requirement to enforce the working language provisions. Why do it today?

Hon. Norbert L. Thériault: May I ask a very simple question to Senator Grimard? Would you take the same attitude if the government had decided to privatize Canada Post?

Senator Grimard: Honourable senators, this is a very interesting question you are asking. I consider Canada Post and Air Canada as identical. I think they should be treated the same way. Honestly, again, Canada Post is a national entity while airports are local entities. As far as I am concerned, Air Canada and Canada Post are on the same level.

If it was privatized, Senator Thériault, I believe then the government would have to apply the same principles as in the case of Air Canada, that is to enforce fully the Official Languages Act.

Senator Corbin: Senator Grimard, I have listened closely to your argument since the beginning of that debate in the Senate but I have failed completely to understand your logic as regards the distinction between "national unity" on the one hand and "local industry" on the other.

It turns out that in the field of . . . .

The Hon. the Speaker: Are you asking a question, Senator Corbin?

Senator Corbin: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: So be it. Otherwise, your rising to speak would have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Corbin: I have the right to close the debate?

The Hon. the Speaker: Pursuant to our Rules, you will automatically close the debate if you take the floor.

Senator Corbin: I was only rising to ask senator Grimard a question. You are telling me that, if no other senators wish to speak, I could close the debate with another intervention. Is that it?

Senator Grimard, managing airports at the local level is not like growing potatoes, where the farmer can decide on its own when the time has come for ploughing, seeding, watering, spraying, et cetera.

Airports in Vancouver, Montreal, Moncton, Saint-Léonard, in New Brunswick, are all part of a national network. Inside this network, areas of jurisdiction can be transferred. Under the present system, the control is in the hands of the federal government, so how can you say bilingualism is not a consideration? Are you telling me that if the airport in Edmonton, Moncton, or elsewhere is transferred, and if a French-speaking employee from Montreal is transferred to Edmonton or Moncton, he will have to use English as a working language, even if he used to speak French at his workplace in Montreal? That is what one could conclude from you reasoning.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Senator, could you ask your question?

Senator Corbin: Senator Lynch-Staunton, I have asked my question. I am one of the most reasonable senators in this place. When I have something to say, I say it and then I sit down. I have never wasted the time of anyone here. Let me finish, so that senator Grimard can answer.

You seem to forget that the transportation network in Canada is like a seamless web and is controlled by one authority, the federal government.

The system of official languages will come unravelled if it is no longer under federal jurisdiction. It is as simple as that.

The minister's letter referred to here is a strictly arbitrary measure that is good only as long as the person who signed it remains in office. After he goes, the letter is worthless. If Mrs. Martin became Minister of Transport, do you think she would subscribe to Mr. Loiselle's commitments or to those contained in that letter? She told us in committee that she wanted nothing to do with official languages.

Many questions have not been answered, Senator Grimard. We French-speakers who live in provinces other than Quebec are extremely concerned about what is happening.

I would ask you as a friend. We had words in the past, but it was not out of malice. As a friend, would you answer my concerns today?

Senator Grimard: Senator Corbin, as far as the minister, Mrs. Martin, is concerned, I was in the committee when she spoke. She did not say that she did not care a hoot about official languages. She said that it was not her problem at that point and that there were people in her department who could explain the situation.

I think that some people, not only in her department, were questioned by the committee, in particular Mr. Auger from Montreal. You were there, Senator Corbin. You know that Mr. Auger represented not only the Montreal airports and Mirabel but that he said he was the official spokesman for the other three airport authorities.

Mr. Auger told us that he was quite content to live with the bill. Where we disagree is when you do not seem to understand the difference between a national organization like Air Canada and a local entity like an airport authority.

When you deal with Air Canada, whether it be in Rouyn-Noranda, Moncton, Montreal, Vancouver or some other place, you deal with that ariline from beginning to end, but when you go to the airport in Moncton, Rouyn-Noranda or Montreal, for example, you deal with local authorities.

Air Canada is run the same way in Rouyn-Noranda, Moncton, and Montreal. But the airports I just mentioned are not run the same way and that is why I use the expression local entity. I may be wrong, but it seems to me that there is a great deal of difference between the enforcement of official languages at Air Canada and in dozens of airports run by different entities and local authorities throughout Canada. That is what I am trying to explain. I have nothing to add in answer to your question.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, since no other senator wishes to speak, I rise to close the debate.

Senator Frith: You do not close the debate on third reading.

Senator Corbin: I was informed that I could do that.

Some Hon. Senators: Question.

Senator Corbin: Can I or can I not speak on third reading? I heard Senator Frith say that I cannot.

Senator Frith: No, I said that you do not close the debate. No one closes the debate on third reading. You have spoken on third reading and moved the amendment. Therefore it is quite right that you cannot speak again.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, while the matter is being researched, I will close the debate on the amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, Rule 36 states:

> A senator who has moved the second reading of a bill—

That is not the case here.

> —or made a substantive motion or an inquiry shall have the right of final reply.

That is not the case here. Therefore, I will put the question.

It was moved by the Honourable Senator Grimard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux:

> That this Bill be read the third time.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: In amendment, it is moved by the honourable senator Corbin, seconded by the honourable senator Molgat:

> That the Bill be amended by striking out Clause IV and substituting the following therefor: Where the Minister has sold, leased or otherwise transferred an airport to a designated airport authority, on and after the transfer date Parts IV, V, VI, VIII, IX and X of the Official Languages Act apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, to the authority in relation to the airport as if
> (a) the authority were a federal institution; and
> (b) the airport were an office or facility of that institution, other than its head or central office.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators opposed to the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I would ask for a 30-minute bell.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

The Senate adjourned to the call of the bell.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-62—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Tuesday, March 17, 1992, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine the subject-matter of Bill C-62, An Act respecting telecommunications, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, the last time we discussed pre-study was when the four finance bills came before us last fall, and the actual discussion on pre-study was in October. I think that is recent enough that I do not have to raise again the arguments in favour of pre-study. The bill that we are talking about meets the requirements and conditions for pre-study. It is highly complex and legible. It is written in a language that sometimes is difficult to understand at first sight, and it covers a topic of extraordinary importance—telecommunications.

● (1650)

The background of the bill is that it follows a Supreme Court judgment in 1989 which clarified the question of jurisdiction over telecommunications. Following that, the cabinet requested that a new bill be drafted to implement the telecommunications policy. The bill contains policy objectives that aim essentially at increasing competitiveness of Canadian telecommunications. It applies to all telecommunications carriers under federal jurisdiction and establishes federal-provincial consultation mechanisms. It refers to the CRTC and its powers. It contains references to licensing conditions and intends to promote the Canadian ownership of telecommunications infrastructures. It responds to concerns over privacy—and these are just some of the highlights of the bill itself.

Honourable senators, we feel strongly that a pre-study at this time—it had just been given first reading by the House on February 27—would be of great value to the government.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): To the House and to the government; that is right.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes, of which we are members.

Senator Frith: That is what the Senate is here for—namely, to be of help to the House of Commons and to the government!

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is exactly it. The Senate is here to improve on legislation at the earliest stage possible, especially when there is legislation of a highly complex nature such as this bill.

Senator Frith: We understand what you think the role of the Senate is.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: As a matter of fact, I think I can convince my honourable friends opposite by stating that in 1981 a distinguished member of this house—Senator Frith—said that a bill, which had been read for the first time at the time, "will not, of course, be available for study by the Banking Committee until it has received second reading." Senator Frith went on to say—and I know that he is one who is consistent in his feelings on principles—

Senator Frith: Don't count on that.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: —that, when dealing with complicated legislation, it is consistent with parliamentary tradition that the Senate committees give particularly careful consideration to such measures as to refer the subject matter to a committee in advance. I don't think I could find a finer reference.

Senator Frith: He was much less distinguished then than now.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: In brief, honourable senators—

Senator Frith: At least his judgment was impaired at the time.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: It was moved by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin that the Standing Senate Committee on—

Senator Frith: No, I moved the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do I not have to put the motion first?

Senator Frith: I hope you put the motion before you let Senator Lynch-Staunton go on and on the way he did. That was a bit unkind.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I did not go on and on.

Senator Frith: I retract. He only went on; he did not go on and on.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I will put the motion first.

Senator Frith: You should have put it before he spoke.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine the subject-matter of Bill C-62, an Act respecting telecommunications, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move that Senator Lynch-Staunton's comments be taken as read after the motion was put and I then move the adjournment of the debate.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Thank you.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

THIRD REPORT—RESPONSE TO RECOMMENDATIONS—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have some difficulty with the results of the third report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which I tabled on February 18 last. My report urged the government to table, without further delay, the response to the recommendations contained in the report, "Its Almost Too Late", and to announce its decision to implement forthwith at least the first three recommendations, which concern the plight of the merchant seamen.

I was given support for the report by Senator Molgat, Senator Roblin, Senator Kinsella and Senator David, although the thrust changed. There was a suggestion by Senator Molgat that I should probably include an invitation to the minister to appear before the Senate. Senator Roblin countered that he should appear before the Senate Sub-committee on Veterans Affairs. The end result was that we adopted the report unanimously. However, I still do not know where I stand with respect to who invites the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Do I do it on behalf of the sub-committee? Does Senator David do it as the chairman of the Social Affairs, Science and Technology committee, or does the Speaker do it on behalf of the Senate? If the intention is to invite the minister to appear before a Committee of the Whole, then I would like advice as to the position of the Senate. I am willing to write to the minister, but I would ask for some direction in the matter.

Hon. Paul David: It was my impression, Senator Marshall, that the recommendation was that the minister should be invited to the Sub-committee of Veterans Affairs, but I am told that the invitation should come from the chairman of the committee itself. Therefore, I will take this responsibility.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): As far as we are concerned we will be quite happy to have the minister appear before a Committee of the Whole. That would permit all senators to participate in questioning the minister and hearing what he has to say on this important subject. We would be quite happy if the invitation was to the Committee of the Whole. In fact, we would prefer that to having it in the committee itself.

Senator David: But the same result could be achieved in a committee. We know that such an invitation will go to the minister; he will come to the committee and then all senators can attend the committee. In that way there will be as many senators at the committee as there would be in the house, I think.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON A RENEWED CANADA

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, dated 28th February, 1992 (Sessional Paper 343-416A).

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honorable senators, the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on a Renewed Canada tabled its report on February 28, 1992. This all-party committee made up of 30 members began its work on September 25. It has received 3 000 brief and 2 000 letters, heard 700 witnesses and held 78 public hearings which lasted 227 hours.

The committee had the honour to meet provincial Premiers, Bob Rae, Joe Ghiz, Clyde Wells, Frank McKenna, Don Cameron, Roy Romanow, Gary Filmon and some hon. members, government members as well as the hon. André Ouellet from the steering committee, were able to have private discussions with Premier Robert Bourassa. Committee members heard the comments and conclusions of several provincial committees on the Constitution.

I congratulate every member of our parliamentary committee, made up of 17 Tories, 10 Liberals and 3 New-Democrats, for the enormous task they have accomplished. With your permission I should like to mention the work carried out by how Senators MacEachen, Barootes, Teed, Stollery, Oliver, Hays, Meighen, Beaulieu and De Bané. I also thank other senators who have come and help us from time to time. The working pace was extremely fast and hard to keep. A parliamentary committee never had to study in such depth and with so little time both the Canadian federal system and the parliamentary system of government.

The report of this parliamentary committee tabled on February 28, 1992 is 90 per cent unanimous. The three significant differences had to do with the Senate powers and two other main topic concerning the distribution of powers: culture and regional development; the other differences are rather minor.

Let us briefly analyse the ten major items of the report.

● (1700)

[English]

1: The Senate. A product of British parliamentary tradition, our Senate, like the House of Lords on which it is modelled, is not elected. For decades, and especially for the last two, the Canadian Senate has been the subject of many proposals for reform. Our parliamentary committee could have advocated the German form of upper chamber, as did the Pepin-Robarts Committee in 1979, or a form used in another federation.

The committee could have suggested the abolition of the Senate. To do that, however, would have required unanimity, and a number of provinces wish to keep the Senate so that they can have a say in one of the central institutions of the country. We therefore suggested to Parliament and its members that senators be elected, as the government suggests in its proposals dated September 24, 1991. Since a strong movement within Canada wants a Senate that is elected on a proportional basis and for a fixed term, as we noticed at the Calgary constitutional conference, we recommended that senators be directly elected according to the principle of proportional representation for a fixed six-year term.

The House of Commons will have the last word: the government will not be responsible to the Senate, the Senate will not be a confidence chamber, nor will it have ministers; the Senate's veto is a suspensive one in every case: six months in principle and 30 days for the supply bills.

After lengthy discussions, we finally recommended a Senate that is equitable, not equal. We have taken into account what we have heard in our hearings and in the conferences. This Senate may have 109 or 154 Senators as proposed by the majority: Ontario and Québec having each 20 per cent or around that, the West 40 per cent— the same proportion as if the Senate were egalitarian—and finally the Atlantic provinces 20 per cent. A double majority is provided for in the case of bills related to language or culture.

We retained a Senate that is part of a parliamentary system, not a presidential one as the American one. At his press conference on March 3, 1992, Premier Bourassa opposed a presidential style of Senate and, we think, rightly so.

It goes without saying that this newly-proposed Senate will play an important role in reaching the final constitutional agreement. Quite clearly, it will be part of the ultimate compromise.

The Liberal members of our Committee, dissenting, proposed a Senate with an absolute veto except in the case of supply bills; the Senate's veto would then be suspensive only for supply bills.

2) Aboriginal Peoples

The parliamentary committee recommends the entrenchment in the Constitution of the inherent right of aboriginal peoples to self-government. The legislative powers of this government will be established through negotiations between the federal, provincial and territorial governments and aboriginal peoples. Aboriginal rights continue to be justiciable immediately. Equality between native men and women is stipulated since the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms would apply to natives. The parliamentary committee has not yet defined the term "self-government". That remains to be done.

I want to say here that a conference on aboriginal matters was held in Ottawa last weekend (March 13 to 15) and many questions were dealt with, such as equality between native men and women, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, a charter of rights written by natives themselves, the inherent right of aboriginal peoples to self-government and aboriginal rights.

The last few days, the honourable Brian Dickson, a former Chief Justice, gave a description of what inherent rights could be. He mentioned that certain laws must apply to aboriginal peoples, such as the Criminal Code and the Canadian Charter of rights and freedoms, in order to prevent legal chaos, and that native self-government must realistically take many forms and not only one: treaties, special powers, constitutional guaranties.

We saw last weekend that the four leaders of aboriginal nations have a place at the negotiating table, and there is a lot more work to be done to further define this future form of self-government.

The debate on distinct aboriginal societies is not over yet. Sections 25 and 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 recognize implicitly the distinctiveness of aboriginal peoples. It would be desirable to find a synonym instead of using the same expression to reflect the distinctiveness of First Nations.

3) Economic Union

Profound changes were made in the economic union proposal the government presented on September 24. The Montreal Conference clearly indicated that the federal proposal should be changed. A new form of economic union was developed at the end of February and accepted by all three parties. A new section 36.2 was recommended for inclusion in the Constitution Act, 1982.

4) Social Charter

The federal NDP and Premier Bob Rae of Ontario suggested a social charter. Once again a formula that was agreeable to all parties was found during the last few days. A new section 36.1 will be included in the Constitution Act, 1982.

The Parliamentary Committee recommends that both statements of principle concerning the economic union and social charter should not be justiciable. They do recognize values that will be a guidance to parliamentarians, but they should not be interpreted by the courts.

5) Canadian Common Market

A Canadian common market is provided for. The notorious section 121 of the Constitution is amended to include the free movement of persons, capital, and services. The three parties agreed on this.

● (1710)

[English]

With regard to the Supreme Court, the committee followed very closely the Meech Lake Accord. We proposed that there be three justices from Québec, trained in civil law, on the bench of the highest court of the land. Supreme Court justices would be appointed by the federal government from lists provided by the provinces. In case of a deadlock, the Chief Justice may appoint a judge on a temporary basis according to a simplified mechanism inspired by section 30 of the Supreme Court Act.

7: Immigration:

On this point also the committee followed the Meech Lake Accord. Let's say here that our report is endorsing in substance and in principle the five conditions of the Meech Lake Accord and adds considerably with respect to the reform of the Senate, the division of powers and the inherent rights of the aboriginal peoples.

With respect to the amending formula, we propose five options: (1) the four regional vetoes already recommended by the Beaudoin-Edwards report; (2) the Meech Lake Accord unanimity rule for the central institutions; (3) a formula inspired by the Pepin-Robarts report (referenda in four regions); (4) the 7/50 formula automatically involving Québec in decisions regarding amendments to the central institutions; and (5) the 7/50 formula, involving Quebec in all decisions. The final choice among those five options is left to the conference of the eleven first ministers.

With regard to section 40 of the Constitution Act, 1982, which deals with the transfer of provincial legislative powers to the federal Parliament under the 7/50 formula, we propose that financial compensation for provinces opting out be extended to all provincial powers or competences, and not only to education and other cultural matters as it is actually the case.

[Translation]

9) Distinct Society

The Committee recommends that the concept of distinct society be entrenched in Section 25 of the Charter of Rights and, by way of the Canada Clause, in the Constitution.

The notion of distinct society can be traced back to the Quebec Act of 1774 by which the Parliament of Westminster introduced French civil laws to Quebec, then a British colony. This was maintained in 1867 in sections 92.13, 94 et 98 of the British North America Act. In the Constitution of 1867, in agreement with Sir John A. MacDonald, Sir Georges-Étienne Cartier used the same expression, i.e. "property and civil rights", which first appeared in the Quebec Act of 1774.

The wording used to describe distinct society and linguistic duality drew some criticism. Some find the word "vitality" used in the distinct society and linguistic duality clause disturbing.

The word "promotion" in the definition of a distinct society is still present in our report and the word "vitality" appears when linguistic duality is discussed. The Supreme Court will, we feel, perceive a difference between the two. The word "promotion" seems stronger in our view.

10) The division of powers

This is at the very heart of federalism. In all federations, there is a question of centralization and decentralization. This is the very essence of a federal system. Federations vary over time, from one place to another, and from one another.

The division of powers has always been of great importance to Quebec.

One can speak of asymmetry. Our report brings it up. Asymmetrical aspects appear in the Constitution of 1867, a thing which many tend to forget. The spirit in which the Halifax Conference took place in mid-January was for us a breath of fresh air in this regard. Let us hope that this spirit survives in Canada. There will be a great need for it in the coming months and in the government's final offer. One can imagine in this respect, if need be, 1) a few concurrent powers with federal paramountcy in some case, and provincial paramountcy in others; 2) direct asymmetry could also be used, as in the case of culture; 3) it would be possible, finally, to restrict its exercise in certain fields through the federal spending power.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senator, I have been very patient, but your time is up. I am being told that you should conclude your remarks.

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I will not withhold consent, but I do want to point out that if we have rules like the 15-minute rule, we should apply them uniformly to all senators.

● (1720)

However, it has not been applied that fashion. In several cases honourable senators opposite have prevented me from speaking longer than 15 minutes. Let us not be confused. Justice for some senators should be the same as for all senators. I will not refuse leave now, but there will be times. You will find out how stupid this rule is.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: On the same point of order, honourable senators, while subscribing to Senator Olson's comments, I want to say that I think also it is appalling to break a rule considering the circumstances in which these rules were imposed on the Senate without the participation of the official opposition.

Whatever argument the other side can serve, these are your rules, you asked for it. You wanted to curb the opposition. You wanted to limit our democratic right of speech. It is a sad situation, and the more so because when we get into a major debate like this one, a fundamentally important one, we will use a double standard. Leaves will be granted and we will not dare object because we would be regarded as mean-spirited if we did, seeing of the importance of the debate.

Since last Fall, the Committee on Standing Rules was supposed to meet, but it did not for good reasons. Although the chairperson was ill, the Committee should have met and set about to amend these rules that are seriously harming the operation of this institution. We feel hurt in our right to speak and in turn you are too, you could be hurt too without the generosity and open-mindedness of senators sitting on this side of the House, and for this reason I will not oppose an extension of time for Senator Beaudoin.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, while I share the point of view expressed by my colleagues, I think it would be unfortunate if we did not permit Senator Beaudoin to complete his statement. I would suggest that, in light of the importance of the debate on the Canadian Constitution and the report, we ought to agree now that whatever rule exists with respect to time limits should be waived to those senators who are speaking on this particular item. That would apply to Senator Beaudoin and to any other senators.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): I think I am partly at fault here. The Deputy Leader of the Opposition and I agreed that both the co-chairmen of the joint committee and Senator MacEachen, assuming that he would start off for the other side, would have pretty well unlimited time. I guess I assumed that word would have been passed on on both sides. I know now that I should have made an announcement about this matter before, and we would have avoided this unfortunate discussion.

Senator Stewart: What about the rest of us?

Senator Olson: What about the rest of us? Are we to be second class senators? We have just as much right as any other senator, with the exception of the Leaders on each side. That is all.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I am talking about an agreement between the deputy leader and myself.

Senator Olson: I don't know what your agreement is. I don't want to hear it.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If we cannot agree on an agreement then we cannot agree on anything.

Senator Olson: We will not be second class citizens; that is my point.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: You did not let me finish my statement.

Senator Olson: I heard your statement and I know what it is.

Hon. Duff Roblin: I think Senator MacEachen has offered a constructive suggestion which we ought to seriously consider. I thank him for it and I feel pretty sure it will meet with the approval of all members of this house without exception.

While I am on my feet I want to express a personal opinion on one item of the rules. On the whole I like the rules. They are just fine. However, I do think we ought to revisit the question of time limits with respect to 15 minutes on senators' speeches. It seems to me that it is more draconian than we need to accept. Indeed, it is in the best interests of this chamber that we not do so. A time limit more in the neighbourhood of 30 minutes would deal with any question of efficiency that we might be concerned with and, at the same time, allow a little more elbow room for those who have something to say and want to say it.

While I am not a member of the committee that will deal with this matter, I cherish the hope that they will take this particular topic under consideration. As far as I am concerned, I would not be opposed if we changed this 15-minute rule to something a little more convenient for the purposes and operations of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, before asking for consent for the honourable senator to continue, I must tell you that I was not aware that there was an agreement made between the leaders, but as a rule I have been lenient to a certain extent—

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Let us not belabour it. I apologized for not having informed the chamber. Let's get on with the more important subject.

Senator Olson: Let us be fair to senators all over this chamber and not start to set up special classes of senators. As someone who has been a victim of this rule, I feel probably a little more strongly about it than some other senators might. The rule has been exercised towards me, I think, three times. I feel pretty sensitive about someone else deciding how long I can speak when some other senators get more time.

I have nothing against any other senator, but I do not believe any senator's rights are superior to my rights in this chamber. Let us get that straight. If there is to be these kinds of deals, as you call it, and other arrangements set up, then let us stop them right now. If that is what we are leading into then I can tell you that unanimous consent is not forthcoming.

Senator MacEachen: I had thought that we might attempt to solve this particular problem, namely how we deal with the debate on the constitution which is extremely important.

Senator Olson: That is no more important than some of the things that I brought up in this chamber.

Senator Barootes: My good Lord, man!

Senator Olson: Nor more important than the economic plight of farmers out there. Let us not set up different kinds of debates. I tell you that equality, at least in this place, ought to prevail and I intend to see that it does. I will not withhold consent today but I do not accept for any reason rules that will create different classes of senators.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I think that I had a solution to the senator's difficulty, namely equality. I proposed that in this debate, which I described as an important debate not a more important one, Senator Beaudoin be given unlimited time, and that any other senator who wishes to speak be given the same treatment, thereby establishing and firmly anchoring in the agreement the principle of equality so strongly put forward by my colleague to the right. I must say that he has been uncharacteristically forceful today. He only exhibited similar forcefulness when he addressed the chief justice of the court, and that was a historic day.

Senator Olson: They fixed that, too, with their rules.

Senator MacEachen: Can we agree seriously to deal with the matter in this way? Otherwise well be in a mess.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): As far as we are concerned we are quite prepared to agree to that suggestion made by Senator MacEachen. Therefore we are quite prepared to proceed in that way and have it ordered for this debate, which is undoubtedly an extremely important debate for Canada. When you take the long view, it is very rare that senators have abused the time of this house. The problem with the rules is that we are harking back to the GST debate of last year and we are imposing rules because of that situation. However, we are not in that state in the Senate now and I think we could have much more relaxed rules.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed that Senator Beaudoin continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Beaudoin: If I may speak, I am sure I will terminate my remarks before 6 o'clock.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Beaudoin: So I was talking about the paragraph dealing with the asymmetry mentioned in our report. I start again with the first sentence. There are in the Constitution of 1867 some forms of asymmetry people often tend to forget. And as I said, the spirit of the Halifax conference in mid-January was like a breath of fresh air in this respect. Let us hope that this spirit is not dead. We will need it in the months to come and for the final proposals. We can imagine here, if necessary, and it is explained in the report, a few rival powers with a prevalence sometimes federal, sometimes provincial; one can use a direct asymmetry, and finally it can be limited by using the federal spending power.

As far as federalism is concerned, the fundamental dilemma has always been the same one in Canada: the English-speaking provinces generally want a strong central power and Quebec on its part likes a some decentralization.

Senator Corbin: I am sorry, honorable senator, but I would like to ask you a question on a point of order which is crucial. You talked about Quebec and the English-speaking provinces. But there is one province which is not English-speaking, it is New Brunswick which is an officially bilingual province. I would ask you to take that into account.

Senator Beaudoin: Then eight English-speaking provinces and one province—

• (1730)

[English]

Senator Sylvain: No wonder the country is going to hell.

Senator Corbin: If you find that a laughing matter, laugh your heart out. It is a shame that you take that attitude in this house.

Senator Roblin: I don't lose my temper as easily as you do.

Senator Corbin: I can control myself, but I find that despicable.

[Translation]

Senator Beaudoin: It is relatively easy. Quebec wants some decentralization, while other provinces are generally calling for centralization.

True asymmetry, concurrent powers, federal spending power: three ways to resolve this dilemna for Canada, and for one of its provinces, Quebec. One also can, if necessary, provide in the latter case for direct payments to the provinces.

We looked at the distribution of powers in 24 areas: residual power, declaratory power, immigration, legislative delegation, labour market training, tourism, forestry, mining, urban affairs, recreation, housing, spending power, culture, inland fisheries, personal bankruptcy, marriage and divorce, broadcasting, safeguard mecanism for intergovernmental agreements, also family policy, health, education, social services, energy and regional development. We are recommending changes and transfers, as well as the status quo in some cases. I repeat, twenty-four powers. Therefore I just don't know what to think when I hear critics say that the distribution of powers was not addressed.

We have made recommendations. From now on, section 93.B will say that Quebec will have exclusive authority in cultural matters. Section 93.A will say that labour market training will be a provincial matter. Section 95.A will say that delegation of legislative authority will be possible under certain conditions. Immigration as defined in section 95.B will be enshrined in some other form. From now on, the parameters of the federal spending power will be further refined. Agreements between Ottawa and the provinces could be guaranteed in the Constitution through a new mechanism provided in the new Constitution itself. Two federal jurisdictions: inland fisheries and personal bankruptcy, will now be concurrent powers. Two federal matters will be on the table: marriage and divorce. We suggest transferring these to Quebec because of its Civil Code, which is part of the definition of the distinct society. Family policy is also on the constitutional table.

I would like to get back to the federal spending power. It has existed for half a century, or I should say since 1937 at least, as a result of a decision of the Privy Council, twice confirmed by the Supreme Court of Canada, in recent years. Including it in the Constitution means we can at the same time define its parameters and limits and allow the provinces to exercise the right to opt out with full compensation. I think this is a good way to renew Canadian federalism. I think it is very important, especially for Quebec. The federal spending power is not unique to Canada and is certainly not unique in the world. We find it in the United States and Australia, for instance. Quebec, of course, accepts equalization payments under section 36, which is quite normal.

We should also realize that from now on, the provinces will take part in developing national objectives.

I realize that for Quebec, the division of powers is the most important point.

Perhaps I may recall two passages from our report concerning the parameters of the federal spending power. They reflect our thinking in this area and which unfortunately seem to have been overlooked.

> It is proposed that federal monies usually spent in a particular area (tourism, forestry, recreation, housing, urban affairs and mining) would be unconditionally turned over to the province for use in this area upon signing an agreement. Any continued use of the federal spending power in the field would be conditional on the approval of the province.

We recommend adding to these six areas those of regional development, family policy and energy, which are not mentioned in the federal proposals.

The report also says:

> Any continued use of the federal spending power would be conditional on the approval of the province, subject to the ability of the federal government to maintain programs clearly identified as related to national objectives.

I am talking about interventions in provincial areas and shared costs programs.

In conclusion, what does the future hold?

It is up to the federal Cabinet to update its proposals. It can improve on the committee's report. It will be able to use two resolutions: a 7/50 formula and the unanimity rule. At the end of May, the government will be able to table its offers before the two Houses, thus providing an answer to the committee report on the renewal of Canada.

It is only from that point on that we will be able to talk about true federal offers.

Our committee made an in-depth study of parliamentarism with the Senate reform, the Canadian federalism and the division of powers. Like we said, never has a parliamentary committee had such a mandate since 1867. We did everything we could. Only the future will tell if our committee did the necessary groundwork.

There is no doubt that, ultimately, each major issue will be a determining factor: first, the division of powers; second, the aboriginal self-government; third, the elected Senate; fourth, the distinct society. To those four main issues, we must add (and that is very important) the amendment formula, as well as the presence of three judges at the Supreme Court of Canada.

Honourable senators, this is how I can summarize as briefly as possible the ten most important points in this report. I am well aware that, at times, the text is somewhat technical and there is also some legal jargon, but we had to try to be accurate and to go straight to the joint because there is little time left.

I am very pleased that, in spite of some dissenting opinions, we were at least able to present a report that was 90 percent unanimous on a topic that not only dealt directly with the division of powers but also with parliamentarism as well as with the very complex issue of aboriginal self-government. Thank you very much.

● (1740)

[English]

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I propose to adjourn the debate and to speak later—possibly early next week. That will not prevent any other senator who wishes to speak in the meantime from doing so. I would not stand in anyone's way by taking the adjournment. It is not that I am not prepared to speak; it is that I am overprepared. My job is to try to reduce that preparation to manageable proportions.

Before I sit down I want to thank Senator Beaudoin for what he has presented today—namely, the summary covering so many points, which was quite useful, and also the references which he has made to members of the committee. He should be complimented for his chairmanship and for the dedication he has shown during the course of the committee hearings and the subsequent preparation of the report.

As I will indicate in my speech, Senator Beaudoin and I have somewhat different perspectives as to the meaning of the report in certain areas and also as to the importance of the dissenting views. It is true that it is a unanimous report in the sense that all members of the committee signed the document, but we were unanimous about quite a number of very important items and we were unanimous in that agreement. But we were also unanimous in disagreement.

We were unanimous in agreement and unanimous in disagreement because the signatures were attached to a report containing unanimity and dissent. For example, when one looks at the final report, particularly with respect to Senate powers, one cannot regard that as anything but as a major, substantial difference of opinion, the resolution of which in my view will determine whether we have an effective, equitable or equal, and elected Senate. I think Senator Beaudoin would agree that that dissent alone is of major consequence. It is of even more significance in the sense that the report of the committee diverged sharply from the proposals of the Government of Canada on the question of Senate powers. The Government of Canada provided in its proposal an absolute veto in the normal correspondence of the legislative process, and a suspensive veto was attached to matters of national importance, while appropriation and tax bills would not come to the Senate.

Mr. Clark, in his significant speech in Calgary on the powers of the Senate, said that an analysis of legislation which had gone through Parliament over the past three years would indicate that, had the proposals of the government been implemented, 80 per cent of that legislation would have been covered by an absolute veto. That certainly lifted my spirits, because I thought that we would have the basis of an effective second chamber.

I am still mystified personally why the members of the committee retreated from that government proposal — and it is a major one. It is a creation of the committee, not a creation of the government, unless the government changed its mind and instructed the Conservative members of the committee to go along in a certain way. But you must remember that one of the tests — at least one of the helps that one can have in examining the report of the committee—is to look at how the committee diverged from the proposals of the government. It certainly did not slavishly follow the proposals of the government at all. The Senate is a very important case.

Senator Beaudoin has referred to the recommendation on the proposal of the Government of Canada.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, may I have permission not to see the clock?

Senator MacEachen: No. I want to finish by adding one other illustration as to how the committee diverged from the proposal of the Government of Canada, which was a regrettable divergence.

The Government of Canada sought a new head of power to manage the economic union. If that had been approved, there would have flowed therefrom considerable repercussions with respect to the management of fiscal policy, the consultations with the provinces on matters within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces, and other matters. The federal government sought a new power — I thought a rather gentle, new power for itself. That has been modified, to use an eloquent phrase used by Senator Beaudoin, to the extent that it will not be a power at all. It will be a goal, an objective of government included in the Constitution, or a guide. But it does not empower the Government of Canada in any way to exercise the responsibilities that it sought under that proposal.

I think one has to look at how the committee, influenced in some cases by public opinion, influenced in some cases by the conference, and influenced in other cases by its own internal dynamics, reached different conclusions, and I would hope to talk about this later in more detail.

At this moment, I am wondering what the status of this report is in the constitutional process. Is it the document we thought it would be—that it would become an important basis of the proposals of the Government of Canada? Has it got, as it were, the elasticity or the sturdiness or the strength to survive, for example, the disapproving vote in the National Assembly of Quebec? Has that deprived the committee report of its ability to become a valuable document in this process? I ask that question, and I ask another question.

We were pleased to see that a multilateral meeting of provincial officials, certain premiers, and native leaders was held with Mr. Clark. One had the impression that new working groups were established as if to begin the work anew. That is the impression I received—not that I am hurt personally at all. I did, from time to time, attempt to tell my colleagues in the Liberal caucus not to exaggerate their importance, but I did not believe that we would pass into history as rapidly as we appear to have done. And I wonder whether the report which was delivered and spoken about today is the basis of the work of the multilateral officials? Or are they starting, as is my impression, from the beginning? I think it would be unfortunate if the contents of the report were overlooked.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): May I suggest that, with the exception of Motion No. 29 standing in the name of Senator Stewart and Motion No. 30 standing in the name of Senator Marshall, all remaining Orders, Motions and Inquiries be allowed to stand. There was no agreement on this by the way.

Hon. Gildas Molgat: On that point, I think if we do that, we should ensure that those that we are not calling do not lose a day in their timings. I think that would be very unfair. We should ensure that they remain at whatever number they are at now.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I want to add to what Senator Molgat has said. I had not thought of that aspect of it, because of our current agreement. There is also another consideration which is satisfied by today's accord between the two parties, and that is that today we did not have Hansard printed. Apparently it is going to be available only tomorrow. I would simply suggest that, if that occurs again in the future, the calendar not move until Hansard is available. For example, today, I wanted to respond to Senator Marshall's comments, but because I did not have his excellent statement of yesterday in print form there was no way I could do that and risk misinterpreting or distorting his words. I simply put that in the pile with everything else.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Hon. John B. Stewart pursuant to notice of March 17, 1992, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs have power to sit at four thirty o'clock in the afternoon, on Tuesdays, March 24 and 31 and April 7, 1992, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY NFB FILM PRESENTATION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall pursuant to notice of March 17, 1992, moved:

> That the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the contents of the CBC/NFB series "The Valour and the Horror" and report upon the said production to determine the authenticity of the three part series, viz., Savage Christmas: Hong Kong 1941; Death by Moonlight: Bomber Command; and In Desperate Battle: Normandy 1944, due to the mounting unfavourable reaction of the said production.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, to keep the election clock duly recorded, as of today, using Senator Murray's criteria, a government respecting democracy has 247 days until election, whereas a cowardly government, a government that is contemptuous of democracy, has 633 days until reckoning day.

Senator Barootes: Who is going to do this when you are away?

Senator Frith: Make me an offer, Senator Barootes. I know I can count on you.

REPUBLIC OF SOUTH AFRICA

NATIONAL REFERENDUM—COMMENDATION BY CANADIAN BRANCH OF COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I should like to advise the Senate that the Canadian Branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association has today sent a short letter to His Excellency the Ambassador of the Republic of South Africa which states as follows:

Dear Mr. Ambassador:

My colleagues on the Executive Committee of the Canadian Branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association have asked me to convey to you, and through you, to your Parliament, our admiration and respect for the effective way in which your government has sought and received such strong support from South Africans for its programme of constitutional reform.

I am, dear Mr. Ambassador,

Yours sincerely,

C. William Doody (Senator),
Chairman.

INTERNATIONAL DAY FOR ELIMINATION OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

COMMEMORATION OF SHARPEVILLE TRAGEDY

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, March 21 is the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination.

The world community has chosen this specific date in memory of the Sharpeville tragedy which occurred on March 21, 1960, in South Africa. We might note this year the developments occurring in that part of the world. We are encouraged by the results of the vote earlier this week, which is in the direction of helping to destroy the apartheid policy. Canada should continue to urge the speedy elimination of all forms of racial discrimination.

In Canada tolerance and understanding must be the only currency in our interpersonal relations. For, when we are intolerant and discriminate against an individual, we not only diminish the quality and the opportunity of that individual's life; we also deny ourselves the potential of that individual to be and to achieve the best that he or she can be.

Important legislative and program initiatives must continue to ensure that racism finds no place in Canadian society. It is also important to see section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms give constitutional expression to the right of all Canadians to be equal before and under the law without discrimination because of race.

Honourable senators, it is helpful to recall that Article I of the International Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination, to which Canada is a contracting party, provides that: "the term 'racial discrimination' shall mean any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference based on race, colour, descent or national or ethnic origin which has the purpose or effect of nullifying or impairing the recognition, enjoyment or exercise on a equal footing of human rights and fundamental freedoms in the political, economic, social, cultural or any other field of public life.

Across Canada we must continue to take steps to ensure that all Canadians are on an equal footing when it comes to the enjoyment of equality rights. Therefore, it will be important to develop a national schema, perhaps involving a partnership among the federal and provincial governments, law societies and other sectors, to provide for a new and creative Charter of Rights enrichment program.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CBC MINI-SERIES "THE VALOUR AND THE HORROR"

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, since I did not have the opportunity yesterday to support Motion No. 30, I wanted to draw to the attention of the Senate some of the letters and articles appearing in the newspapers with respect to this matter. I will take up my three minutes in reading parts of one letter from the Ottawa Branch of the RCAF Prisoners of War Association.

The president, Mr. A. Little, said this, in part:

> ". . . at worst, [The Valour and the Horror] is seen as another attempt, as in the case of Canada's top fighter ace of WWI, Billy Bishop VC, to desecrate the memory of all of our nation's heroes and our comrades of the Navy, Army, The Merchant Marine and the Royal Canadian Air Force—Fighter Command, Bomber Command and Coastal Command, both sexes, who fought valiantly and well in the service of our country; of those who as Prisoners of War gave up months and years of their youth; of those Prisoners of War who were murdered, sometimes on a whim, while an unarmed and defenceless captive; of those young Canadians who were injured or who gave of their limbs and suffered constant pain since that time; and of those who paid the ultimate price and who now lie buried in a far off foreign land . . ."
> Perhaps the greatest indignity of all, was not inflicted by the Italians, the Japanese, or the Germans, but is that now being inflicted by the Canadian government sponsored CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION and by certain members of the media who enjoy the LIBERTY AND FREEDOM OF SPEECH, purchased for them at such great costs by those whom the CBC and some media members now so viciously seek to destroy.
> The inaccuracies such as an airman's hat badge on an officer's hat, and the reference to special awards to our brothers in fighter command, lend nothing to the program's authenticity and can be overlooked, but the deliberate attempt to highlight real or imagined conflict between French speaking and English speaking members of the services at this time when Canada needs compassion, NOT conflict, should be cause for dismissal of any employee of a Crown Corporation, who, using taxpayers' dollars, engages in such practices.

EFFECT OF CUTBACK

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I will not repeat my earlier remarks on this subject, except to remind senators that it is just about a year ago at this time that the Government of Canada gutted our shortwave service, Radio Canada International, and for all practical purposes silenced our voice to the world.

Senator Frith: I'm sorry, they gutted our what?

Senator MacDonald: Will my time start again?

Senator Frith: Yes, please. I just did not hear what you said. They gutted our what?

Senator MacDonald: Gutted our shortwave service, Radio Canada International, silencing our voice to the world.

Senator Frith: I just needed the one word. Sorry I asked. I just wanted to hear what you were talking about.

Senator MacDonald: Today, as a matter of fact, I received a letter—and it was ironic that I received it today. It is from a Mr. Heseltine of London, England. He writes:

> I cannot believe that the government would cut RCI's small budget for economic reasons. The only reason I can see for the effective closing down of RCI is that the government thinks it is irrelevant. If this is the case then I believe the government has not been well briefed.—

To which I say, "Amen." He continues.

> . . . It is a sad fact that there is virtually no coverage of Canada available in Europe apart from RCI, and from the Canadian Forces Network which is about to be closed. Excluding coverage of the Olympics, I have heard little information about Canada broadcast by European stations during my 8 years in the UK. There seems to average about one or two short pieces in the papers a year. By contrast, the Times regularly publishes items about events in Australia. Yet Canada's GATT concerns and the Constitutional debate have not been mentioned. Canada says it is a leading contributor to the Yugoslavia peace forces. Yet all the news items in the UK fail to mention this. We are a forgotten and unknown nation.
> From another perspective, information broadcast here about the U.S.A. could well be defined as prejudicial and certainly misleading of life in North America in general. As there is virtually no local information about Canada it is certain that Canada's image is greatly tainted by this brush. By effectively abolishing Canada's voice to the world, we lose any chance of rebutting this inference . . .
> With respect, it is not an unnatural question to ask what right has Canada, particularly on behalf of other peoples, to have a voice in diplomatic, and indeed extra-diplomatic circles unless it shoulders part of the burden that is required to give those peoples access to broadcast services which they may otherwise be denied or unable to afford.
> At its lowest, not fostering RCI is inconsistent with Canada's role as an international mediator, peacekeeper, and observer of human rights.

Today, I received information that this Sunday, in Quebec City, the Challenges for International Broadcasting Conference will invite 35 nations that have international shortwave services to attend. The host broadcaster of this conference is Radio Canada International. What hubris! What hypocrisy!

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, Senator Finlay MacDonald's statement leads me to a statement of my own. I agree with him thoroughly. He brought the matter to our attention last year, as I recall, when the decision was made. I believe we should proceed with an inquiry on this matter. I know the honourable senator presently has a major inquiry going on about rail sales in Nova Scotia. Once that is concluded, I believe we ought to have an Inquiry on this subject. If the honourable senator himself, as Chairman of the committee, feels that he cannot bring such an Inquiry forward, then we will see to it that it happens. The subject is of major importance to Canada, a country which depends for most of its income upon international trade, and hence, on being known across the world.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCES

ACCESSIBILITY TO FRANCOPHONES OUTSIDE QUEBEC

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I was really surprised to read in La Presse of Thursday, March 19, this morning, that Mr. Bouchard snubbed Francophones outside Quebec. That was the headline of a Canadian Press article. I quote:

> "Even if they asked for it, Francophones outside Quebec will not be at the table as native people are. There are a million Italians and they ask nothing of us."

The Minister of Health, Benoît Bouchard, made this stinging comment yesterday, on the eve of today's constitutional meeting.

I think that Mr. Bouchard does not know his Canadian history. For example, he does not know that these so-called Francophones outside Quebec, a pejorative term that some Quebecers like to use from time to time in the same way that the French CBC likes to refer to "Quebec and the English provinces", which shows a base ignorance of Canadian history, because these so-called Francophones outside Quebec were outside Quebec before Quebec even existed. They were in Port Royal, in Nova Scotia and around the Gulf of St. Lawrence even before Quebec existed.

I have no objection to being told honestly and openly that unfortunately, there is give and take in these negotiations, but to be told that as Francophones outside Quebec we have no business there shows ignorance, if not worse, something for which certain persons on the federal political scene should see their political psychiatrist.

QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL UNITY

PROPOSED REFERENDUM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the government leader in the Senate. There are reports that the Prime Minister is frustrated. While actually commenting about the excellent results of the referendum in South Africa, he was persisting in his refusal to have one in Canada. But at that time he apparently appeared frustrated with how quickly other countries, including South Africa, have resolved major political problems while Canada continues to flounder in its constitutional quagmire. There is an alleged quotation from him which states:

[Senator Molgat.]

> The Soviet Union remakes itself in weeks, German unification takes place in months, and Canadians can't agree on the wording of a Canada clause in decades.

My question for the Government Leader in the Senate is: Can that be interpreted as the Prime Minister blaming other Canadians for the failures that he bemoans, or is it the admission of a politician—an admission of his own failure and that of the Government Leader in the Senate in their efforts over the past many years at nation building? If it is such an admission of failure, it would be most refreshing.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Neither of the above.

Senator Frith: I would not have thought so.

Some Hon. Senators: Here, here!

Senator Doody: Have another shot at it.

Senator Frith: I am just about to. There is a doctrine in law that says the Queen or King can do no wrong. That has been obviously incorporated as the slogan of this government because never ever have I heard them admit, through the Leader of the Government in the Senate or otherwise, that they have ever done anything wrong in eight years.

Senator Simard: You have not been listening all the time.

Senator Frith: Point them out to me. I would love to see them. Thank you, senator.

Senator Simard: You were away on your tour.

Senator Frith: Is senator Simard undertaking to give me those submissions and put them on the table in the Senate?

Senator Simard: I would love to.

Senator Frith: I should like to see those admissions of wrong. I know that he admitted they were wrong on a bill the other day, but that is the only one I can think of.

THE SENATE

DELAY IN PRODUCTION OF DEBATES

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is for the Chairman of the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee. Since I raised the matter of the late publication of the Debates of the Senate in this House yesterday and that an answer was given at a meeting of the Internal Economy Committee this morning, I consider important that the answer be repeated in this House and recorded in the Debates. Since the question has been formulated, could the Committee Chairman repeat the answer given this morning?

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: I wish I could, senator, but I fear that I might be somewhat unfair in doing so. If you would allow me, I would be happy to have a complete answer which could be tabled at our next sitting.

Hon. Senator Molgat: By all means, senator. Please excuse me, I should have given you advance notice, but this came through my mind just as I was taking my seat. Noting that the Debates had not yet been distributed, I felt that I should raise the matter. I am quite willing to wait until our next sitting for a complete answer. That would be fine.

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Chairman of the Internal Economy Committee. We have not yet received the Debates for our last sitting, yesterday.

The Debates for our previous sitting, the day before yesterday, was distributed only this morning. This delay in printing Debates appears to have been caused by a greater than usual number of interventions in French over the last two days. I find this excuse unacceptable in an institution which wraps itself in the Official Languages Act. You seem to have an answer which you appear eager to provide. I am all ears.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, the question from Senator Corbin brings back to my mind at least part of the answer given this morning. I think it is true, and it could be verified, that generally speaking 10 to 15 per cent of Debates are in French, and 80 to 85 per cent in English. This seems to have created some problems, or at least it is part of the answer.

I agree with Senator Corbin and, as it seems to be a first, in a way, I rejoice that we should be using more French in the Senate that we ever did. If this is part of the problem, we will certainly make sure that we take the necessary steps to correct it.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I have another question for the chairman of the Committee on Internal Economy.

Last summer, two students were hired by the Senate administration to do an inventory listing of what we have in our offices. In September, I received a copy of the inventory list for my own office. I am not complaining about the fact that a personal item was on that list, I am complaining about the fact that despite two requests, since September, to the person in charge of that service, the list has still not been corrected. Nothing was done. However, what I object to the most is the fact that I received that inventory in English only. I asked the person responsible—I can give you his name anytime—or, rather, my secretary asked on my behalf that I be provided with an inventory in French with the necessary correction for the item which is my property.

In December, since I had not received an answer, I called this civil servant myself to remind him that there was an Official Languages Act which applies to the Senate and all federal institutions, and that I demanded to receive promptly the inventory list in French.

Among other thing, he told me: "Senator Corbin, I think you are being negative." Because I demanded that this document be provided to me in French I was accused of being negative.

I am asking for your advice in your capacity as Chairman of the Committee on Internal Economy. What should I do now, after several months of repeated requests, to ensure that my rights and privileges as a francophone senator are observed by officials of this institution?

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Senator Corbin, I understand your frustrations despite your repeated requests for remedial action which did not materialize. I am also astonished that you, as a member of the Committee on Internal Economy . . . You were present on February 13th . . .

Senator Corbin: The agenda was so tight that, unfortunately, I could not have the floor.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Senator Corbin, I think this accusation is entirely frivolous!

I don't think anyone is prevented from speaking at meetings of the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee or one of its sub-committees.

In any event, I think you could have discussed this matter with me privately. You felt it was appropriate to do so in this Chamber, but suppose tomorrow, a dozen senators rise and start asking me questions about their daily hassles! Well, if you must, you must! I made a note of your request, but I am surprised you decided to raise the matter here, although you never mentioned it to me before.

Senator Corbin: After all, you chair the committee!

This is not the first time I mentioned the problems we have as Francophones in the Senate. You promised . . . Let me finish. First of all, this is not a minor hassle. The reason I didn't mention it before is that I am extremely patient.

I wanted to give this person a chance. Obviously, it was a case of bad faith.

Last fall, you promised that the first item on the agenda at the beginning of this year would be the quality of French and English in our official records.

Is this on the Committee's agenda, Senator?

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, it is. In fact, I am grateful that Senator Corbin insists on raising the issue of the quality of French or the availability of French versions of certain texts or motions.

I always said I agreed with him. In fact, a request was duly filed with the Clerk of the Committee. The issue is identified as an item that is supposed to appear on the agenda very shortly, I believe.

However, other priorities as well have been indicated by the Budget Sub-Committee or the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee. I can assure the senator that the matter has certainly not been dropped. He has every right to bring it up again in this Chamber, but I simply wanted to say that I imagine the problem must have existed even before I became chairman of this committee. I hope you will show the same kind of perseverance you did today, but patience, honourable senators!

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

BRIEFINGS FOR OPPOSITION MEMBERS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government is no doubt aware of the debate going on about the government briefing members of the Opposition on the North American Free Trade Agreement. I wonder if the Leader of the Government could tell us what measures have been taken to brief provincial elected representatives on that trade agreement?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I must confess that I do not really know the answer to that question. During the free trade negotiations with the United States there were perhaps a dozen meetings at the first ministers level, occasional meetings at the ministerial level and quite freguent meetings, many of them conducted by conference call and the like, among officials.

Senator Frith: The provinces were much noisier about the whole thing then.

Senator Murray: I am aware that there have been ministerial meetings on this matter and some official contact but I would have to enquire to see whether there is a schedule of meetings planned on these negotiations. Meanwhile, I should also point out that what we call the SAGITs, the Sectoral Advisory Committees are, I think, in place and the private sector consultations are ongoing.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, I would be grateful if the Leader of the Government would provide us with whatever schedule of briefings there is, including those briefings that have already taken place and, in particular, if we could know what opportunity provincial governments have had to put items on the agenda.

Senator Murray: Yes.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCES

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

It arises from the fact mentioned by Senator Corbin at the beginning of today's sitting. I raise it because I saw a headline in Montreal's La Presse dated today saying that Mr. Bouchard rebuffed the Francophones outside Quebec.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate find out from his colleague Mr. Bouchard why he snubbed Francophones outside Quebec?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, I can not comment on a newspaper article, but I will be pleased to consult my colleague Mr. Bouchard for clarification on this matter.

[Senator Lavoie-Roux.]

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I appreciate the answer given by the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

As Francophones outside Quebec, we have had to fight for our rights from the very beginning, especially because many Anglophones in Canada do not know what our people needs.

Apparently, to be recognized, one must be a people! In Acadia, we believe that we are a people. Now it is no longer Anglophones who cause us problems but rather Quebec's new elite.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I cannot let that comment by Senator Thériault pass so easily.

I can tell you that I for one was shocked when I saw the headline of that article which spoke of "rebuff". That is not the word Mr. Bouchard used, obviously.

After I got over my momentary shock, honourable senators, I can tell you that I prefer to remember Benoît Bouchard's major contribution in resolving several Acadian issues in favour of the French-speaking minority, although Mr. Bouchard's inapt choice of words in this case is unfortunate—

Senator Thériault: By what authority is Senator Simard answering my question?

Senator Simard: Yes, I am answering your question.

Senator Thériault: By what authority?

Senator Simard: Well, go ahead and ask whatever you like, but let me decide what I want to say and how long my answer will be.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I let Senator Simard proceed, although it is entirely against the Rules of the Senate.

A question was directed to the Leader of the Government, who is the only person who may entertain such questions, unless we are talking about a chairman of a committee. Those are the Senate rules.

However, Mr. Speaker, if you are prepared to let Senator Simard speak, I have no objection, but I can assure you we will do likewise.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: No respect for the Rules of the Senate!

Senator Simard: I noted your objection.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Senator Simard, we all did!

BRIEFINGS FOR SENATORS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I understand, honourable senators, that we have a new Leader of the Government. Senator Simard is now answering questions on behalf of the government and we congratulate him on that promotion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell: Now I don't know whom I should direct my question to.

Senator Simard: You have a question?

Senator Bonnell: I have a question.

Senator Simard: We are taking notes.

Senator Bonnell: I am not making a speech, although some senators try to have a debate in the middle of Question Period in order to use up our time.

In the proposed free trade agreement between Mexico and Canada—and I don't know if the United States is still in it or whether it is the hamburger in the sandwich between Canada and Mexico, because President Bush is no longer talking in the way he is supposed to do at these great conferences.

I understand that the Canadian Chamber of Commerce has been given a briefing. We in the Senate of Canada, the senior house of Parliament of this nation, have not been given a briefing. I was wondering if officials might come before the Senate and give us a briefing. We could invite them into a Committee of the Whole and, if necessary, have a closed-door hearing so that neither the press nor anyone else could hear the secret, whatever it is, that they do not want the public of Canada to know. At least they might be able to advise us, the representatives of this nation in the Upper House.

Could we expect such a briefing from the Government of Canada concerning this free trade agreement?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take under advisement the question of the honourable senator, and the apparent desire of honourable senators opposite to obtain more information on these negotiations. I will consult with my cabinet colleague Mr. Wilson on that matter.

Meanwhile, I assure the honourable senator that Parliament will have the opportunity, as it did in the case of the free trade agreement with the United States, to review and debate the legislation implementing any North American free trade agreement that is arrived at.

Senator Bonnell: Thank you, honourable senator. In years gone by, when I first became involved in politics, the government always informed the legislature of what it was doing before it informed the Chamber of Commerce. The government used to make announcements in the legislature. certainly, the Parliament of Canada should be told first, but now the Chamber of Commerce is told first, the representatives of the country are told next, and the people of the country come last of all.

THE CONSTITUTION

ADVISABILITY OF NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Let me ask another question. I noticed that, yesterday, the Prime Minister told us how pleased he was with the referendum that took place in South Africa. Because of that referendum, has the Prime Minister now realized what a great tool it is for getting the public opinion of a country? Is he prepared to have a referendum in Canada concerning the Constitution?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not sure that the history of our country would bear out the assertion that the honourable senator has made. All I can tell him is that in the last Speech from the Throne the government undertook to consult the public on constitutional matters. This has been done through the Spicer Commission, the Beaudoin-Edwards Committee and the Beaudoin-Dobbie Committee. I do not exclude the possibility that there will be other consultations of various kinds before the matter is resolved.

We have never excluded the possibility of a national plebiscite or referendum.

Senator Bonnell: I understand. In other words, honourable senators, we thought we could cross our "t"s and dot our "i"s any way we liked. When the honourable senator was the minister responsible for federal-provincial relations, we could not cross "t"s or dot "i"s or change anything. We had a seamless web. Apparently it is not a seamless web any more. We might some day have a referendum on the Constitution so that the people of Canada can be informed of things before the Chamber of Commerce.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM—REMOVAL OF TRADE EMBARGO—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Let me ask a further question concerning the referendum in South Africa. Since the referendum went so strongly for the "yes" vote, has the Government of Canada given any consideration to removing the trade embargo against South Africa so that we can perhaps sell the Canadian goods we are losing our export markets for in the rest of world?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that matter is now under consideration.

Senator Bonnell: By whom? By senator Simard or yourself?

Senator Frith: Senator Simard is duly taking notes.

JUSTICE

CANCELLATION OF COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

The President of Treasury Board has eliminated a vital program, the Court Challenges Program. The abolition of the program will affect hundreds of groups and individuals who have already started a challenge at the trial level. What will happen to trials that are either at the appeal stage or otherwise? Will the government fund them right to the end?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not what the arrangements are in those cases that are already before the courts, but I shall ask for a definitive reply for my colleague.

MEETINGS OF HEADS OF STATE—EXCLUSION OF CANADA

Hon. H.A. Olson: I would like to ask one question. Could the Leader of the Government give us a progress report on how the Chancellor of Germany and the President of the United States are conducting our international trade negotiations?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not seen any communiqué—perhaps my honourable friend has—from that meeting between the Chancellor of Germany and the President of the United States. Those two national leaders are having a bilateral conference, as is their habit, as is their right, as we Canadians do ourselves with our trading partners. More power to them. I hope they can make some progress, not only on bilateral but on multilateral issues. I simply hope that the honourable senator will be able to put aside his unbecoming paranoia about this matter.

Senator Olson: My paranoia is related somewhat to the seriousness of the problems involved. It is not an ordinary meeting. It is a meeting that they have set aside to substitute for a multinational meeting that was taking place in Geneva at which all 109 countries had a right to be at the table and to state their positions.

What troubled me yesterday was that the Leader of the Government indicated that that was quite all right with this government. We could withdraw and let those two negotiators decide what the trading negotiations for Canada were going to be.

If that is the position of the government, then we have abdicated our responsibility in favour of the leaders of those two nations. However, I can tell you this: Article XI will never survive because both of those negotiators are opposed to it. Is that what we intend to do with the position we have taken respecting Article XI?

Senator Murray: I am sure the honourable senator hopes Article XI will not survive, but we are doing everything possible to ensure that it does survive and, indeed, that it is strengthened and clarified. It is simply incredible that the honourable senator should object to the fact that the Chancellor of Germany and the President of the United States are meeting to discuss a range of bilateral and, of course, multilateral issues, near the top of which would be the Uruguay Round. We are at the table with some hundred other countries.

Senator Olson: Are you at the table at those meetings?

Senator Murray: Let me finish. We are at the table at Geneva with some hundred other countries in a very important multilateral negotiation. We have discussed the issues bilaterally with just about all of our major trading partners. I have told the honourable senator in another connection on several occasions how the Prime Minister of Canada has been in touch with President Bush, with Chancellor Kohl, with Prime Minister Major, with President Mitterand, with the Italian government, with the Japanese, with the European Community. These are all bilateral discussions between our Prime Minister, our ministers and officials, and theirs. They concern the issues that are at stake at the multilateral negotiations. What in the world is wrong with that? That is the way business is done in the world. The honourable senator knows that. I cannot understand why he is abusing the time of the Senate to raise these false fears.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have just one more supplementary question. I would tell the Leader of the Government that there is no false illusion about the pain and the suffering and the financial devastation that is going on in the grain sector of western Canada. If the Government of Canada has not received that message yet, it is my duty to be sure that I bring it to the attention of the Leader of the Government every single day that we meet. I have been trying to do that. So far, you have responded with absolute and abject failure on Canada's part in trying to negotiate the deal so we can get out of this mess. If you do not think it is serious, that is up to you.

I will tell you that your government is down to about 6 per cent support in Alberta, primarily because of this issue. I intend to get up on my feet and ask you about this matter every time that I can to convey to you at least the seriousness of this situation. It keeps getting worse.

What I am asking is: How long do you think those people can survive? You get up and you say, "Well, we sent some money in 1985 and 1986." That happens to be six or seven years ago. They have had no net income since that time because of the failure of this government to carry Canada's representations successfully into the GATT negotiations. If that does not impress the minister as to why I am asking these questions, then I simply do not understand what does.

Senator Murray: Well, first of all, the honourable senator was talking about Article XI. That is an area where we are—

Senator Olson: Article XI is linked with what I was talking about. It relates to farm subsidies.

Senator Murray: That is correct. First of all, the honourable senator was talking about Article XI, where we still are attempting to obtain strengthening and clarification and where the Dunkel text, for example, is not acceptable. Now the honourable senator is talking about the prairie grain economy, and I very much regret that what he is saying is that the Dunkel text is a failure so far as the prairie grain economy is concerned. I think that is not the impression that many in the prairie grain sector have. That is not an opinion that is shared by many. I think you would find that many people in the prairie grain sector are of the view that the Dunkel text would represent real progress in terms of their interests.

Senator Olson: I would just like to advise the minister—and he should know this without me having to tell him—that there are a lot of people in the prairie grain sector who believe that this government is pitting one against the other, and that Europe and the United States are negotiating on the basis that if we do not give on Article XI with respect to all that is involved there, then they will not withdraw the export subsidies that seriously affect the prairie grain economy. If the minister is now standing up and saying that there is no relationship between the two, then everyone who has been a participant in those meetings has received the wrong impression except him.

All I am asking is, are you taking this seriously? You can only survive so long. The end has come when the bank closes on you. You know that your government's monetary policy exacerbates that situation. Every time the dollar goes down a little bit, you move in and wreck that too. I am just asking if you intend to take the plight of these farmers seriously and start to do something constructive about it.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, what I tried to—

The Hon. the Speaker: Before the Leader of the Government answers, I must point out that the 30 minutes of Question Period are up.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I presume that the declaration of the honourable senator is a confirmation that, so far as the measures that directly impact the western grain economy are concerned, he finds the Dunkel proposals acceptable.

Senator Olson: You don't need to presume that.

Senator Murray: Then he would reject them?

Senator Olson: I neither reject nor accept that. What I am rejecting is the attitude of this government at the meetings. They have failed.

Senator Murray: Make up your mind. Come on.

The Hon. the Speaker: Delayed Answers.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, before the Delayed Answers, I would like to take a few moments to congratulate the government.

Some Hon. Senators: For what?

Senator Bonnell: Isn't that interesting. For what? I had to do a lot of digging, and I don't know whether—

An Hon. Senator: Is Question Period over, or isn't it?

Senator Bonnell: This is not a question. It is a compliment. You are about to get a compliment. Listen to me. The government—

The Hon. the Speaker: Question Period is of 30 minutes duration, and we have finished.

Senator Bonnell: I don't want to ask a question. I want to give them an answer instead.

The Hon. the Speaker: I think you—

Senator Bonnell: Answer Period. It is now Answer Period. That's what we're in.

The Hon. the Speaker: You are out of order, Senator Bonnell. I called Delayed Answers. There are no Delayed Answers. Orders of the Day.

AERONAUTICS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move the third reading of Bill C-5, to amend the Aeronautics Act and to amend An Act to amend the Aeronautics Act.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: Does anyone intend to speak to the bill?

Hon. M. Lorne. Bonnell: I want to speak to it. This is third reading of a bill, isn't it? It is debatable.

Honourable senators, Question Period is now over.

An Hon. Senator: We are on the bill.

Senator Bonnell: There is a motion before the House. The motion is debatable. Is that right?

Senator Frith: That is right.

Senator Bonnell: Or is that, like Question Period, out of order ?

Senator Barootes: Tell us about the fixed link to P.E.I.

Senator Bonnell: You are out of order.

Honourable senators, consideration of this bill is a serious matter— especially after the earlier debates in the Senate today concerning what happened in Internal Economy relating to the reasons why the Debates were not printed, and so forth.

However, I want to say that things are not all bad, because Senator Murray yesterday heard a great speech from our good friend Senator Corbin about how our French quartet, the only one from New Brunswick, was taken off the CBC programming and could not get on that great national program The National Doubt nor the program scheduled to celebrate Canada's 125th anniversary. Within 24 hours, he had the CBC change the decision, get that French ensemble from New Brunswick back into the television station in time to go on tonight so we that can all watch that program for ninety minutes.

Also, the bilingual program from New Brunswick will now be broadcast on CBC because of Senator Murray's strong action and because Senator Simard brought that matter before the Senate today. Perhaps it is because Senator Simard is now in the cabinet and is answering the questions. That is all I have to say on that motion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): The Opposition supports this bill as it did in the other place. I just want to put on the record that there have been some reservations expressed, I think, on all sides, about whether or not the same degree of attention that is given to improving the environmental and other aspects of airport activity should also be given to trying to divert air traffic from overcrowded airports, such as Pearson, to other areas. This legislation is a step in the right direction as far as organizing and mitigating some of the unsatisfactory aspects of airport activity, but there still remains a lot to be done.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald, that this bill be read a third time now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

AIRPORT TRANSFER (MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS) BILL

THIRD READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Grimard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, for the third reading of Bill C-15, An Act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employees' pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports.

Hon. B. Alasdair Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I want to make a few observations arising out of comments made by the Minister of State for Transport when she appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications at the time that the committee was considering its final report with respect to Bill C-15. The bill, of course, relates to the transfer of certain airports.

I want to clarify some of the issues which arose during the Minister's testimony. I refer to Transport and Communications issue number 4, page 17, November 27, 1991. In order to put it in the proper context, I have to quote myself:

> Senator Graham: It scares me that the government is handing over all this authority to the LAAs [the local airport authorities] to negotiate with an airline the landing fees at a particular airport over which they have control. The ramifications of that are immense.
> Mrs. Martin: Can you give me an example of the ramifications you see?
> Senator Graham: The ramifications are that airlines could be priced out of the market. The cost in a particular region of the country could sky-rocket, and ordinary people, in the extreme situation, might not be able to travel because the cost would become prohibitive. It is tough enough now to travel. I may be wrong and it may be that the government will retain some regulatory control in this respect to keep a cap on it, or perhaps it will monitor the situation, but you have not said that.
> Mrs. Martin: . . . this is not unique to Canada. Landing fees are set outside Canada.

[Senator Frith.]

Well, the fact of the matter, honourable senators, is that landing fees are not set outside Canada. The ICAO, the International Civil Aviation Authority, states only that if landing fees are introduced, they should reflect and be related to the costs of those services; no more, no less. The Minister is not being properly informed if, to use her words again, landing fees are set outside Canada. It is my understanding that landing fees are essentially within the control of the Government of Canada.

We also had a brief discussion relating to the government's proposed cost recovery program. I refer you again to issue number 4, page 18, of November 27. Again I am quoting myself here to put it in the proper context:

> Senator Graham: Again, minister, with the greatest of respect, one of the reasons we have governments and regulations is to protect the people. When the people suffer from the market system, if it is out of control, then the country suffers. We have seen examples of that over many years. That frightens me, Madam Minister.
> I have heard, Mr. Chairman, of the possibility of landing fees at some airports in regions of the country going up by as much as 25 per cent or 35 per cent. I have also heard that landing fees in other airports will not go up at all, or perhaps only marginally.
> Mrs. Martin: In what areas of country would they go up 35 per cent and 25 per cent? Who is saying this is what will happen?
> Senator Graham: Some published reports have identified, for example, Halifax, as one of the areas.
> Mrs. Martin: Do you know where these reports were published? I would like to get a copy of them . . .

Just as a sample of the kind of copy that Mrs. Martin was asking for: From the "Yarmouth Vanguard, The Voice of South Western Nova Scotia", dated October 23, 1990, the headline is "Transport Canada's user fees endangering future of Air Nova." It quotes the director of marketing for Air Nova, Bruce MacLellan, in a speech in Yarmouth as saying:

> [He] warned a disproportionately large percentage of the costs will be borne by regional carriers in the prairies, B.C., and Atlantic Canada, and the flights that will be hurt the most are going to be the short haul flights, like the ones operating between Yarmouth and Halifax.

Again from the Fredericton "Daily Gleaner" of Saturday, October 27, 1990, the headline is, "Airline Ticket Prices May Go Up 27 Per Cent". I quote from the first paragraph:

> When combined with the new federal Goods and Services Tax which starts in January, 1991, a proposed increase by Transport Canada of airport service fees paid by airlines could drive up ticket prices by as much as 27 per cent, says the Air Atlantic comptroller Charles Cook.

From the Globe and Mail of October 26, 1990, the headline, is "Air Carriers balk at hike in airport fees", and I quote from the story, dateline St. John's, Newfoundland:

Transport Canada's plan to increase airport user fees for airlines will hit Atlantic Canada hardest, forcing up ticket prices and threatening service to the region, say officials of Air Nova, a big Atlantic carrier.

"It's without question a serious threat to the viability of our operation, spokeswoman Mary Keith said yesterday.

It's cheaper for us to fly out of Vancouver or Toronto than it is in Atlantic Canada.

The proposed increase in user fees, part of a cost-recovery program that Ottawa wants to implement . . . would make landings in eastern Canada more expensive than anywhere else in the country, Ms. Keith said.

Those costs would total about $1 million for Air Nova next year [1991] and would be passed on to consumers, she added.

In a letter to federal MPs, marketing director Bruce MacLellan said the recovery plan would eventually make Halifax the most expensive of nine major Canadian airports, including those in Toronto, Montreal, and Vancouver.

Landing a Boeing 747 in Halifax would cost about $2,676 compared with $616 in Toronto, while a Dash-8 landing in Halifax would cost $121.60 compared with $37.60 in Vancouver, Mr. MacLellan said.

Other Atlantic centres such as St. John's, Fredericton and Charlottetown would likely be more expensive than Halifax. Smaller regional planes will see higher increases than larger jets.

That would have a very direct effect on my home airport of Sydney, Nova Scotia, because, according to cost projections by Air Nova, under full implementation, and this is with respect to landing fees only, the cost per metric tonne for a Dash-8 aircraft landing in Sydney would go up six times, for Halifax four times, for Yarmouth five times, for Fredericton six times, for St. John five times, in Moncton six times, in Deer Lake, Newfoundland, five times, in Gander and Goose Bay by four times.

I bring that to your attention, honourable senators, as sort of a private pre-study that I have been doing with respect to possible legislation which would have adverse effects on the regions of the country.

I want to quote briefly from an editorial in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of May 10, 1991, entitled, "User fees can kill service":

To increase revenues and make airports more self sufficient, Transport Canada has proposed increases in user fees and new taxes . . . .

The traveller by air already is paying a hefty airport tax on top of his ticket cost.

If the price is further hiked to cover higher charges against the carriers for airport use, it will be surprising if the number of those travelling does not decrease.

That will encourage the airlines to withdraw services from smaller centres where a cost effective operation is not possible and that, in turn, would be most regrettable in Atlantic Canada where geographical factors make travel by air so desirable.

Finally, honourable senators, I want to refer to comments made by the minister which indicated her perception of the Halifax International Airport. Again, I refer you to page 18 of Issue 4 where Minister Martin said:

Halifax will not be in a position where it will be competing with Toronto, New York or some place else. It is providing local service within the Halifax area.

That is the kind of comment that boggles the mind. It is the kind of comment and lack of understanding that drives us in the regions of the country bananas. I am sure that such a statement would raise the eyebrows of members of the Halifax Board of Trade and similar organizations in Nova Scotia and would, indeed, I believe, raise the eyebrows of officials in Transport Canada.

Even the management of the Halifax International Airport would greet that statement with keen astonishment and astounded amazement.

I have some statistics which indicate the level of activity at the Halifax International Airport with respect to itinerant aircraft movements. They indicate that in 1990 there were 1,700 transborder movements. In the same year there were 500 of what they call overseas movements. The projection for overseas movements for 1993 is 600. The projection for 1995 is 700.

I inquired of the Ministry of Transport what it was doing with respect to promoting Halifax as an international airport. I refer briefly to a letter which was received in my office from John Spinks, the director of marketing for Transport Canada, dated December 12, 1991. It says:

Reference your recent inquiries with Halifax International Airport concerning development of new international/transborder services, we are pleased to attach hereto an outline of a Gateway Marketing Program which we hope to have in place early in the new year.

I am going to quote a couple of paragraphs from that statement from Transport Canada. It reads:

Officials at the Halifax International Airport have been discussing with representatives of the Province of Nova Scotia and the Halifax-Dartmouth Port Development Commission the possibility of establishing a joint gateway marketing program for Halifax International Airport.

Gateway programs are aimed at enhancing an airport's role as a gateway to a region, country or continent for international or transborder traffic.

The focus of a gateway program is to expand or improve an airport's commercial air services to or from foreign countries.

Honourable senators, Halifax wants to compete with Bangor. It wants to compete with Boston and New York. It even wants to compete with Montreal and Toronto. Indeed, it wants to be the Vancouver of the Atlantic coast.

As a footnote, I had the honour, in 1972, of cutting the ribbon on behalf of the Government of Canada for the major new addition at the Halifax International Airport. Even at that time there were great prognostications about the future of Halifax as an international airport.

No one in the regions of the country wants to opt out of the responsibility of paying our way. All we want is for the system to be fair and equitable and for all regions of the country to have an equal opportunity to develop. That is exactly what section 36 of the Constitution Act, 1982, is all about. For your edification I would like to close by quoting Part III, section 36 (1) with respect to equalization and regional disparities:

> Without altering the legislative authority of Parliament or of the provincial legislatures, or the rights of any of them with respect to the exercise of their legislative authority, Parliament and the legislatures, together with the government of Canada and the provincial governments, are committed to
> (a) promoting equal opportunities for the well-being of Canadians;
> (b) furthering economic development to reduce disparity in opportunities; and
> (c) providing essential public services of reasonable quality to all Canadians.

That is all we ask, honourable senators.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this week the Senate has missed a marvellous opportunity to stand for principle instead of political expediency. We have before us a bill which, for absolutely non-partisan reasons, we had every reason to return to the House of Commons. That advice came to us from an independent government official responsible to Parliament, the Commissioner of Official Languages.

The Senate had an opportunity to show the independence which it ought to have, an opportunity to do something for the good of Canada, and we missed that opportunity.

[Translation]

I am even more disappointed with the position taken by my French-speaking colleagues, except for Senator Simard and Senator Bélisle, and particularly with my colleagues from Quebec who maybe do not need the Official Languages Act as much as we do.

Its one thing for you to chose to ignore those of us from outside Quebec who have been fighting for a long time through serious hardship, but for you to vote against something vital for us is something else altogether; it is disastrous.

Those of you on the other side who believe in the Official Languages Act, if you do believe, how can you act in such a way?

You know that you will have nothing to say if we, the people from outside Quebec, adopt as our motto the one we see on your licence plates: "I remember". This being said—

[English]

I do not agree with this bill in any case. This is a further attempt by the government to dismantle systems in Canada which are necessary in Canada. We are not the United States—either in tradition, in business concepts, in geography or in economic problems.

• (1530)

We are a linear country with small outlying pockets of population and one big pocket in central Canada. We cannot expect to run things in this country the same way as the Americans do. That is the reason that Canada over the years has had government involvement. We have said we simply cannot operate the same way as the Americans; we simply cannot operate in a pure market economy.

With this bill we will have more Americanization and more damage to the weaker regions, such as the Maritimes and the region of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Once again, this is only to the advantage of the big provinces.

[Translation]

I sit down, but I won't forget.

[English]

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay".

Mr. Speaker,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Charles D. Gonthier, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 19th day of March, 1992, at 4.00 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Donald H. Oliver moved the second reading of Bill S-8, to regulate the manufacture and importation of motor vehicles and motor vehicle equipment to reduce the risk of death, injury and damage to property and the environment.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to open second reading debate on Bill S-8, to amend the Motor Vehicle Safety Act and repeal the Motor Vehicle Tire Safety Act.

The two laws which regulate vehicle and tire design and construction have contributed significantly to reducing highway accidents, injuries and deaths on Canada's highways. The bill that I am tabling today incorporates the Motor Vehicle Tire Safety Act into an updated Motor Vehicle Safety Act.

The bill reflects the experience of administering these two acts for more than 20 years. It makes 21 changes and addresses such current issues as motor vehicle emission standards, child restraint safety and the importation of vehicles from the United States. In short, honourable senators, this bill makes miscellaneous clarifications and updates of existing authority in response to legal advice and comments from the Standing Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations.

Improved safety standards have contributed to a reduction in traffic deaths in Canada from a peak of nearly 7,000 in 1973 to below 4,000 for the first time since 1962. This is particularly noteworthy considering that vehicle registrations in Canada have doubled since 1973 to nearly 17 million.

The changes provided for in this bill will ensure the continued efficient regulation of the Canadian and international automobile industries. The bill will also enable the most stringent national emission standards in the world to be introduced in parallel with that of the United States as part of a coordinated North American air quality initiative.

The Motor Vehicle Safety Act is being fine tuned to ensure that international vehicle manufacturers provide Canadians with the safest, most environmentally-friendly vehicles. Improved transportation safety and emission controls are vital for Canada's well-being during the 1990s and beyond. And a competitive vehicle industry and transportation system depends upon effective and timely regulations.

Both acts establish a "notice-of-defect" requirement for safety defects. Each year, automobile and tire manufacturers conduct some 150 notice-of-defect campaigns in Canada, which involve one million vehicle recalls. Many defects are found in production and are corrected before any serious damage occurs. Other campaigns result from investigations by Transport Canada inspectors.

The bill contains mostly detailed amendments, which I have already referred to, that maintain the intent and functions of the existing acts. The changes will clarify industry's needs to keep records and the right of Transport Canada safety inspectors to access information, including documents that could be useful to the investigation of alleged safety defects. These provisions will contribute to increased efficiency of Transport Canada's monitoring and enforcement programs.

One of the key initiatives is new authority for Transport Canada to regulate safety standards for vehicle child restraint safety devices. With the concurrence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Transport Canada will take full responsibility for child restraint safety standards.

Manufacturers of child restraint systems will be required, under the legislation's notice-of-defect provisions, to establish an owner's registration system for child restraints. This will help manufacturers to identify and contact owners who have defective units.

Clearly, the automotive industry has gone through major changes since 1970, when the Motor Vehicle Safety Act was first introduced. Approximately 22 years ago four domestic companies dominated sales in Canada. The original act was aimed at those domestic manufacturers while making parallel provisions for vehicle importation, which was a relatively unimportant issue at that time. Today, however, there are more important players in the auto industry, including big companies from the far east and Europe. Some of these automakers even have plants in Canada and are supplying a large number of vehicles to Canadian consumers.

In addition to Canada, the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement includes a phased-in lowering of customs barriers to the benefit of commercial and private consumers and Canadian industry. The bill I am presenting responds to these changes by making the regulatory process more efficient as it affects the evolving auto-manufacturing industry and consumers.

A major aspect of the changes contained in the bill deals with the procedural matters especially in the development of complex technical standards for the dynamic and highly-technological auto industry.

I would like to emphasize, honourable senators, that the best safety and emission control designs and devices will be incorporated into Canadian vehicles as soon as practicable. I would also like to reassure the automotive industry that the proposed new safety and emission regulations will in no way impede continued competitiveness. Four-fifths of all vehicles made in Canada are exported to the United States, and vehicle retail sales take place on either side of the border.

The bill addresses all companies in the same way, whether they manufacture or import vehicles. It also provides mechanisms for adopting standards of the U.S. or other countries with a minimum of delay—a particularly important feature for Canadian manufacturers who build for both U.S. and Canadian markets.

With respect to the importation of U.S. used cars into Canada, the bill provides authority to regulate the safety of such vehicles so that they meet Canadian standards—for example, by installing additional equipment such as daytime running lights—before they are registered for use in Canada.

I have touched on some of the safety provisions in this bill. As I mentioned earlier, the bill also has an environmental protection commitment. Canada is fortunate to have relatively clean air available to most of its population. We do, however, have some urban smog and we share full responsibility for some of the world's air quality problems.

Just as road transportation is vital to our prosperity and competitiveness, so too must the vehicles we make and import be as clean as possible. Vehicle emission control, therefore, is a central part of Canada's "green" environmental protection strategy. The bill contains several measures aimed specifically at ensuring cleaner air for Canada. First, there is authority to recognize U.S. and other government certification-of-vehicle standards which will cut the requlatory burden and costs to industry, a provision which is consistent with the commitment made by this government in the recent budget.

Secondly, the bill provides for a phased-in system of standards and credits which provides Canadian industry with the same flexibility in planning emission compliance as that in the U.S. The bill and its modifications are strongly complementary to the government's green plan. There should be no direct costs either to major international companies or to smaller manufacturers. Any costs that do result from this bill will result from new or improved safety or emission devices that are justified by the benefits they will provide.

In conclusion, honourable senators, the amendments to the Motor Vehicle Safety Act contained in this bill will benefit safety in many ways. They will also benefit industry, trade and competitiveness by making regulations more flexible and responsive, and they will also contribute to the government's protection agenda under the green plan. I look forward to discussion of this important legislation which will be of benefit to us all. Its speedy passage will enable Transport Canada to continue its road and motor vehicle safety programs in the most efficient and effective manner.

On motion of Senator Graham, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Charles D. Gonthier, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable Deputy Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Aeronautics Act and to amend An Act to amend the Aeronautics Act (Bill C-5, Chapter 4, 1992).

An Act to provide for certain matters respecting official languages, employees' pensions and labour relations in connection with the transfer of certain airports (Bill C-15, Chapter 5, 1992).

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I suggest that all remaining orders, motions and inquiries be allowed to stand, although I understand Senator Hébert may have a motion.

CHANGE IN COMMITTEE MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Jacques Hébert: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(i), I move that the name of the Honourable Senator Neiman be added to the list of senators nominated to serve on the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Motion agreed to.

THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): We do not have any problem with the suggestion of the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, as long as motions are allowed to stand in the same order. We will not lose one day of debate, will we?

[English]

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, we agreed to that proposition yesterday, and we certainly agree to it today. However, we would not want it to be considered a precedent. Let's do it for at least two days and look at it again.

Senator Molgat: I will rise on every occasion that we do it. It is simply for the protection of honourable senators who have motions or inquiries and who would find thus themselves with one less day of debate.

Senator Frith: The big black 15 facing them!

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 24, 1992, at 2 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the chronological application of Senator Murray's test for a government is as follows: To apply his test to a government that respects democracy, Canadians will cast their ballots within 242 days, but a government that meets his test of being cowardly and contemptuous of democracy still has another 628 days.

Senator Thériault: Too long; too long.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM—COMMENDATION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, a number of years ago, I served as Canadian Parliamentary representative to the Special Committee of the United Nations. In that capacity, I set forth Canadian policy on South Africa and our nation's condemnation of apartheid.

Recently, on my own initiative, I made a private visit to South Africa. While there and without any restrictions, I met with a wide cross-section of the South African community. Individuals I met included representatives of almost all of South Africa's political parties, academic leaders, church representatives, politicians, blacks, whites, and coloureds.

The sea change under way in South Africa is awesome. The consensus from all sides suggests that South Africa is moving inexorably towards adoption of a modern, multi-racial, democratic constitution. Despite the formidable challenges ahead, there is a fundamental optimism shared by blacks and whites alike that the task will be accomplished. All of us should welcome these dramatic and positive developments in South Africa and the beneficial implications that they have for the future of all of Africa, and indeed for the world.

The recent referendum has provided ample evidence that most white South Africans welcome change, and that a solid majority want to put behind them the years of racial separation, discrimination and apartheid. Building a new multi-racial, democratic constitution will not be an easy task. Indeed, Canadians are aware of just how difficult constitution-building can be. One suspects, however, that ultimately, both in South Africa and in Canada, the common sense of the moderates will prevail as both of our countries seek to rebuild their constitutions.

South Africa is a complex society but the good will is there. On all sides—business, the universities, the churches, the political parties—one theme is repeated again and again: We can build a new South Africa and we intend to do it. Should South Africa be successful in its efforts to establish a democratic, multi-racial form of government, that nation could be a powerful force for good in the effort to bring economic health and prosperity to all of Africa. Indeed, there will be clear economic benefits for Canada when relationships between our two countries have been normalized.

I want to pause and say I think that, by and large, the current government has done a good job with respect to South Africa, just as the predecessor Liberal government did. Canadian initiatives have been positive and helpful; they have contributed toward constructive solutions. In anticipation of an accord in South Africa, some preliminary work should be done now in the area of commercial and economic relations. The fact is that there have been 51 trade missions in South Africa in 12 months. With the exception of one unofficial and informal mission from Canada, all 51 missions—of which several, I understand, were at a high level—have come from other countries. Indeed, the Chinese have established a trade-office in Johannesburg.

Canadians should be prepared to encourage and support the move toward greater democracy in South Africa. Individual visits to South Africa and a greater degree of contacts in all areas, including academic, economic, cultural and sports, can only be helpful at this time. Our Canadian government is now encouraging private visits, as some honourable senators are aware.

When a preliminary constitutional accord has been put in place, it is expected that the Commonwealth sanctions imposed at New Delhi will be lifted. That will be a good day for South Africa and for the Commonwealth. A moment ago, I spoke of visits to South Africa. Apart from constitution-building considerations, the tourist values alone in that beautiful country make any visit worthwhile.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

OPEN SKIES TREATY

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I wish to underline and draw the attention of honourable senators to a significant and important event today in Helsinki. I refer to the signing of the Open Skies Treaty. Signatories to the agreement will include 24 countries of NATO and former Warsaw Pact countries.

The successful conclusion of the agreement is of significance and importance to Canada, since it was Canada that joined Hungary in seizing the initiative in 1989 and subsequently hosted Open Skies conferences in Ottawa and Budapest in 1990. During the difficult negotiation period since 1990, it was Canada that kept the proposal and initiatives alive and on track. It should be noted that Canada will host and chair the first session of the Open Skies Consultative Commission in Vienna starting in April and continuing to the end of June.

The treaty is, first and foremost, a confidence-building measure under which all states will engage in collaborative and intrusive exercises within the territories of the other states. It will provide some possibility for aerial verification of arms control agreements within the region, and for the sharing of technology of sensors and related equipment. The treaty is of particular importance to smaller or middle-sized countries that do not have access to satellite or other remote sensing possibilities. It will give them a concrete incentive to mount cooperative programs to realize the full benefits of the treaty.

Over these last three years, the Open Skies negotiations have been a matter of continuing interest to the Subcommittee on Verification and Technology of the North Atlantic Assembly, which I have had the honour to chair.

I am certain honourable senators would wish to join me in commending Ambassador David Peel and members of the Open Skies negotiating team from External Affairs on their achievement and the successful conclusion of this initiative.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

RECOGNITION OF ROLE OF MERCHANT SEAMEN

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I wish to make a statement concerning merchant seaman and the merchant navy. I understood that the minister was to appear before a Committee of the Whole or before the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs to answer questions on when he intends to take some actions on behalf of these veterans. As yet, I have not heard that the minister is either coming before a committee of the Senate or intends to do anything about this matter.

The time has come for us as members of the Senate to support the Sub-committee on Veterans Affairs, Senator Jack Marshall and the honourable George Proud in the other place in working on behalf of these navy veterans who were out in the North Atlantic during the war in slow ships with no guns to protect themselves. They were completely dependent upon the Navy. On many occasions they were left on their own, and many of their number were lost at sea.

When World War II began in September 1939, Canada's merchant marine consisted of only 37 ships and 1,400 merchant seaman. When the war ended in 1945, their number had grown to 180 ships and 12,000 mariners. Sixty-seven Canadian ships were lost during the war, and of the 7,705 seamen credited by the Department of Transport with sailing in dangerous waters, 1,146 were killed and 198 were taken prisoner. Many of these were taken prisoner in Germany and Japan and were held for months, and even years, in the terrible conditions of the prison camps.

It is time that the government took action. I demand that the minister appear either before a Senate Committee of the Whole or the Sub-committee on Veterans Affairs and tell us whether or not he intends to give this matter some consideration or why he does not intend to support the cause of these merchant seamen.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CBC MINI-SERIES "THE VALOUR AND THE HORROR"

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, last week I stated my intention to make reference to letters and extracts to support my motion that we examine the series of films, "The Valour and The Horror". Today I will read a letter from the son of the commander of the Canadian Army, General H.D.G. Crerar, indicating his dismay at the reference to General Crerar as a blunderer who sent men to their instant death. Nothing could be further from the truth. He also sent me a copy of a letter that General Dwight Eisenhower wrote to Mrs. Crerar in 1965 on the death of her husband, General Crerar.

I quote:

> Thursday I learned the shocking news of the death of your distinguished husband. Because, during the war days, he was a close and valued associate I thought it fitting to issue a public statement immediately. However, I should like to write to you a more personal note because of the respect, admiration and affection that I felt toward your late husband.

● (1410)

> General Crerar was notable not only because of his great professional skill and qualities of leadership but because of his personal character, including his selflessness. He was not one to seek the limelight for command headlines; he was one of those great souls whose only ambition was to do his duty to his troops and to his country.
> While my contacts with him were sporadic and infrequent since the war, I still would like you to know that not only I but thousands of Americans share the burden of grief that you must now feel.

I hope that many Canadians out there—and I am sure there are many—would want us to examine this film, which is a defamation to our Canadian forces.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its seventh report concerning its review of the expendi-

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Leblanc (Saurel), report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-64, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move that the bill be given second reading tomorrow.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Deputy Leader of the Government has discussed this matter with me. I have had the opportunity to read the Hansard from the House of Commons outlining the reason for the urgency. I realize that the request comes from the Northwest Territories. This is not a delay. Nor is the fact that this matter is before us only now the fault of the government; it is for other reasons. The request coming from the Northwest Territories has a deadline of next Tuesday, March 31, so that their laws will not be out of order. therefore, I am prepared to give leave on behalf of the Opposition to proceed tomorrow.

[Senator Leblanc.]

Motion agreed to, and bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading tomorrow, Wednesday, March 25, 1992.

Hastings: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, March 26, I will call the attention of the Senate to the signing of the Open Skies Treaty at Helsinki on Tuesday, March 24, by 24 member states of the North Atlantic Treaty and the former Warsaw Pact, and the importance of the treaty as a confidence-building procedure.

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have some petitions which deal, as before, with the GST, and request, as before, that the tax be repealed, that the legislation establishing the tax be repealed, that the administration therefore be dismantled and that there be an immediate election. So the form is as with other petitions that I have presented.

Senator Simard: Do you support that request?

Senator Frith: Of an immediate election?

Senator Simard: Are you ready?

Senator Frith: Of course, yes. Make us an offer.

Senator Simard: I am making a note.

Senator Frith: On the basis of last week, Senator Simard seems to have a new status. He is being introduced or brought in to the chairs and thrones of power gradually, honourable senators will have noticed, by answering questions. When Senator Murray is asked questions, sometimes, just as the Prime Minister in the House sort of nods back to one of his aids, Senator Murray turns to Senator Simard and Senator Simard answers the question.

Senator Simard: In that case I was asking a question.

Senator Frith: I want it noted that Senator Simard is taking notes, and I want it understood that we are too.

Senator Simard: Are you prepared to run in that election?

● (1420)

Senator Frith: What we might call a member of their shadow cabinet is now making a suggestion that we should have an election. We are asking, and these Canadians have been asking, week after week, month after month, almost year after year, for an election, and Senator Simard says that they are considering it. Let's hear it for Senator Simard.

Now we come to the petitions which to his benefit and credit, always attract the attention of Senator Simard. When the people speak, Senator Simard listens.

The list of cities on the petitions from Quebec are Amos, Chambly, Charlesbourg, Dollard-des-Ormeaux, Iberville, Kirkland, LaPrairie, Longueuil, Montréal, Pierrefonds, Repentigny, Rouyn, St-Ambroise, St-Côme, St-Hubert, St-Lien, Ste-Geneviève, Sherbrooke, Val d'Or; from New Brunswick, Bas Caraquet, Burnt Church, Caraquet, Evangeline, Le Goulet, Moncton, Paquetville, St-John, St-Léolin, Shippagan, Village Blanchard; and from Ontario, Kapuskasing.

In total, we have from the province of Quebec 23 petitions with 486 names; New Brunswick, 25 petitions with 103 names, and Ontario, one petition with 20 names. We have a total of 29 petitions with 609 signatures.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I too have the honour to present petitions signed by 20 citizens of Pokesudie, New Brunswick who oppose the goods and services and also demand elections as soon as possible.

I also have the honour to present petitions that come from the province of Ontario, mainly from Toronto, Oshawa, Little Britain, Whitby, Ajax, Pickering, Cobourg, Bowmanville and Port Perry, for a grand total of 1,045 signatures. They are all Canadians who, like Senator Frith, are counting the days until deliverance!

QUESTION PERIOD

DRAFT TEXT—VULNERABILITY OF CANADIAN INDUSTRIES TO U.S. AND MEXICAN INTERESTS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate about the NAFTA, the North American Free Trade Agreement negotiations, and the drafts that we have not been privileged to see. I ask him if he would go on the record and tell us whether it is true that the following statements or matters are dealt with in this way in the draft material to date: Leaving our textile industry vulnerable. Would that be a fair description of the drafts to date?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): No, honourable senators.

Senator Frith: I would like the Leader of the Government to be on record on all of these questions. Another statement is that it opens up the Canadian telecommunications industry to the United States and Mexican interests?

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators. We have no intention of opening the Canadian telecommunications market beyond what is now allowed.

Senator Frith: Land transportation services?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the honourable senator could go through every item that he has found in the Toronto Star and ask me to comment. I do not think that is a very productive way to proceed. Let me just tell him that there was a draft sometime in December. That draft has been evolving in the meantime as discussions continue among the three parties. One thing that is quite inaccurate to suggest is that there is any agreement. There is no agreement until there is an agreement.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will not be surprised that the Leader of the Government and I do not agree on what is productive. That is an interesting choice of words, incidentally, because it is production exactly that we are interested in. Let me ask him, then, if he can comment on why we are giving away negotiating cards such as the card that we might have had and that will be dealt away by Mr. Epp's anticipated announcement about the energy sector, similar to the mistake we made prior to the FTA negotiations when we dismantled FIRA and the NEP?

● (1430)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the premise to the question is inaccurate and, therefore, the question itself is academic.

Senator Frith: The premise being the giving away of cards?

Senator Murray: Yes, honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Apparently there is nothing in the agreement on the environment, a labour code, or employment standards. Are our Canadian textile workers expected—by our negotiators—to compete with Mexican manufacturers who need worry little about polluting the environment, and whose workers earn $1 dollar an hour and who live in orange crates, or so we are told?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Mexico's exports of textiles to Canada are currently very low. Indeed, our whole trade with Mexico is not very great in quantitative terms. We do as much trade with North Carolina as we do with Mexico.

As far as textiles or anything else is concerned, if there is a trilateral agreement, that agreement in all the sectors that we are interested in would contain adequate phase-in periods for tariff reductions.

Senator Frith: I do not intend to go through the entire list, but I have two more on which I invite a response. First, apparently, as with the FTA, there is nothing on subsidies. Perhaps we could get some information on that matter. Of course, the position has been taken by some that this is one of the major flaws in the FTA. Some people think it was not a flaw.

Am I correct in saying that subsidies are to be postponed and not dealt with in the NAFTA, as they were not in the FTA?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I cannot help my honourable friend with that matter. As I indicated, the whole matter is still under negotiation.

Senator Frith: Is there draft material and are there negotiations going on on the question of subsidies?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am not in a position to answer that question in detail. I will see what information Mr. Wilson can properly bring forward at this time.

Senator Frith: Is it true that the FTA is, in effect, being renegotiated because of the NAFTA negotiations, although this government has always taken the position that it would not renegotiate the FTA?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I answered that question on at least one occasion some considerable time ago.

Senator Frith: Remind us.

Senator Murray: There will be no changes in the FTA, except those changes to which both parties have agreed. As far as we are concerned, the only changes we would contemplate would be changes that would improve the situation from Canada's point of view.

Senator Frith: My final question, honourable senators is the following: In order to at least reduce the speculation, can we anticipate receiving more information as to what the real situation is and not be reduced to gleaning any information we can get from the newspapers?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think I have been very forthcoming today.

Senator Frith: We end as we began, on a note of disagreement.

MEXICO—LABOUR STANDARDS—RELOCATION OF CANADIAN PLANTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. There have been disturbing reports from Mexico that some of the "highly paid" textile workers in Mexico—the alleged wage rate is said to be $1 an hour—have recently had their wages reduced to 60 cents an hour. Another progressive advance for humankind!

Perhaps the Leader of the Government would undertake to provide us with the following relevant labour statistics from Mexico: the average wage earned by women; the average wage earned by men; the number of social benefits enjoyed in that country.

A company based in Toronto purporting to be willing to assist Canadian companies to pull out of Canada and relocate their plants in Mexico is telling prospective clients in Canada: "We can save you up to $30,000 a year per employee by pulling out of Canada and relocating your plant in Mexico." Is that the type of policy the Government of Canada supports, the idea of having companies in this country counselling Canadian manufacturers to get out of Canada as quickly as possible because they will save at least $30,000 a year in employment costs?

I would be pleased to provide the documentation inspiring this question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate so that he knows this is not merely a newspaper story, but is, in fact, material from a letter that has been received by many companies in Ontario.

Let's have the full facts about labour standards in Mexico and what Canadians may be required to compete against.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): With regard to the latter part of the question, honourable senators, I would be very glad to look at the document that the honourable senator has received to see if there is any comment that the government should make about it.

With regard to wages in Mexico, I think it should be pointed out, first of all, that about 2 per cent of all the goods that we buy abroad come from Mexico—

Senator Perrault: That was before the free trade deal.

Senator Murray: —notwithstanding Mexico's relatively low wage rates. Wages are a relatively small part of the cost of production, perhaps 20 per cent or less. Coming from a province that lives on trade, the honourable senator must know that the world's great traders are not the low wage countries. They are the high wage countries such as the United States, Canada, and Japan.

Senator Perrault: The Leader of the Government in the Senate must be disturbed by these reports. The phraseology is very interesting. One of the pamphlets that I read said, "The happy and productive Mexican worker is willing to work for far less money than they do in Canada."

Why don't we invite some of these "happy" Mexican workers up to Canada to testify before a Senate committee on this subject? Let's have representatives of the Mexican trade union movement testify so that we get the facts first hand.

I am very disturbed when I see that type of campaign being waged to entice Canadian industries to close down here and go to Mexico where their products can be manufactured by these "happy and productive" Mexican workers.

Senator Murray: A very few moments ago my honourable friend was criticizing the government for not doing enough to promote trade with South Africa. I wonder where South Africa's wage rates stand in comparison to Mexico's?

Senator Perrault: I did not criticize the government for its stand. I support the policy of the government, and I said that very clearly. When those economic sanctions are lifted, however, there will be opportunities for Canadian trade with South Africa; opportunities which should be exploited.

The Chinese government has recently established a trade office in Johannesburg. We are really not in the play at all down there, as the Leader of the Government in the Senate knows.

In any case, South African wage rates are substantially higher than wage rates in Mexico. That is no defence of South Africa, however. Vast changes would have to be made in that country before they can move ahead economically.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DEPARTMENTAL TRANSFERS OF FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICERS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, not so very long ago the government decided to transfer to the Department of Employment and Immigration those professional foreign service officers who, until now, have comprised the Social Affairs stream of the Department of External Affairs and International Trade. The Social Affairs stream officers are those people who help you if you have lost your passport or are in difficulty, and they also advise on other matters. This has had a severe impact on the department, on services provided to Canadians abroad and, above all, on the individuals whose careers have been quite affected.

I have two questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The first concerns the lack of consultation. This announcement was made, apparently, without any consultation with the most senior members of the Department of External Affairs, and certainly not with the Professional Association of Foreign Service Officers, and yet it was the Prime Minister who was the force behind the PS 2000 project and document which implies a whole new era of consultation. Can the Leader of the Government tell us why the normal and the new consultative processes were not followed in this case?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not in a position to reply to that question in detail. I shall have to ask my colleagues, Mrs. McDougall and Mr. Valcourt, for a reply, and I shall bring it in in due course.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, it would be a pleasure to have that reply brought in. However, I might add that the Association of Foreign Service Officers, having written to the minister twice, is still awaiting a reply or consultation.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY—GENDER IMPACT OF DEPARTMENTAL TRANSFERS

Hon. Lorna Marsden: May I ask the Leader of the Government another question in this matter that is equally serious. There are three streams in External Affairs: Political-Economic, Trade, and Social Affairs. There are 1,367 officers in those streams. I am interested in the gender equity impact.

Social Affairs has the largest proportion of women. Some 30.23 per cent of the officers in Social Affairs are women. In the other two streams no more than approximately 16 per cent are women. By removing the Social Affairs stream from this segment of External Affairs, the Department of External Affairs will see its proportion of women drop to 16.22 per cent, which I believe will make it the lowest in the federal government.

Has the government considered the gender impact of this move?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be happy to draw the attention of my colleagues to that question as well.

THE SENATE

REPRESENTATION OF WESTERN CANADA

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates also to the Debates of the Senate of Thursday, March 19, 1992.

My question has to do with the under-representation of Western Canada in this chamber. I wish to draw to the attention of honourable senators the fact that—

Senator Frith: There is always section 26.

Senator Barootes: There is a lot of jaspering going on. If honourable senators would listen, they would hear that it is a rather well-thought-out question, and I would like Senator Frith to hear it.

Senator Frith: We will be the judge of that.

Senator Barootes: I would like you to hear it. It is very difficult to hear when your mouth is open.

Senator Frith: The truth is that you can hear better with your mouth open.

Senator Barootes: I bring to the attention of this place the fact that Saskatchewan has officially only three sitting members in the Senate, although we are entitled to six. God knows that six is extremely low for our province.

Senator Frith: He does?

Senator Barootes: We are at the present time devoid of three of our sitting members.

Senator Haidasz: How about coming up with the names of three farmers?

Senator Barootes: I knew that we should not have been quiet when Senator Frith was asking his series of questions of the Leader of the Government. I thought he might give us the same respect and dignity.

There are, however, eight members of the Senate who are designated as divisional senators. Two of them are from the western division. Senator Johnson could fill the vacancy that exists in Manitoba. Senator Berntson, who is a divisional western senator, could fill one of the three vacancies that exist in Saskatchewan. That leaves us two light, because, in addition, there is a vacancy in Alberta.

There is considerable under-representation in the west, and some of those vacancies have existed for a considerable period of time. Is it possible to ascertain when those vacancies may be filled and when it will be the pleasure of the Prime Minister to take some action thereupon? We would like to have those Senate seats filled before the two other members and I, who remain here working so hard and diligently for our province, die from overwork.

Senator Haidasz: How about some farmers?

Senator Frith: Senator Beaudoin would want them elected, would he not? Call an election!

Senator Haidasz: Alberta wants an elected senator. Let someone neutral like Senator Simard answer the question.

Senator Simard: We have them scared now.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as Senator Barootes and all honourable senators are aware, it is the Prime Minister's prerogative to recommend to the Governor General the names of people to be summoned to the Senate. As the honourable senator has pointed out, there are presently three vacancies in the Senate. Two are from his Province of Saskatchewan, and one is from Alberta.

I will be glad to convey the honourable senator's representation to the Prime Minister; and, if I may say so, to add my own, because I believe that—

Senator Frith: Your majority is getting a bit thin.

Senator Murray: Discussions are going forward about Senate reform, but the business of the government and of the country must go forward—

Senator Simard: Despite Liberal senators.

Senator Frith: There might be some Liberal names on that list.

Senator Murray: —until there is some resolution of that question. Indeed, as the honourable senator points out, it is only fair that provinces be fully represented in this place. Therefore, it certainly seems to me to be a good idea to proceed as soon as possible to fill the vacancies in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: Is this the comedy hour?

PATENT PROTECTION FOR PRESCRIPTION DRUGS

Hon. Lorne M. Bonnell: Honourable senators, I would like to return to the North American Free Trade Agreement for a moment to find out if it is true that Canada and the United States are recommending to the Mexicans that they get 20 years' patent protection on drugs rather than the 10 years provided in the Patent Act. Are Germany and the United States working together through GATT to do the same thing in order to give 20-year protection to the patent drug companies?

[Senator Barootes.]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot comment on negotiations between Canada and the United States and Mexico on that matter. I would simply remind the honourable senator that the draft GATT agreement tabled by Mr. Arthur Dunkel in late December recommends such an extension of the patent period and that Mr. Wilson, speaking for the government, has indicated our agreement with that proposition and our intention to proceed in that direction.

Senator Bonnell: In other words, the government has made a decision to raise by 100 per cent the price of drugs to the elderly, the poor and the disabled in this country.

Senator Barootes: You were wrong then, and you are wrong now.

Senator Murray: It was one thing for the honourable senator to do that scare-mongering when the legislation was before the Senate. Now that events have proved him wrong, I should have expected him to show rather more humility about the matter.

The fact is that prices of prescription drugs in this country have increased by less than the consumer price index since Bill C-22 went through Parliament.

Senator Thériault: Says who?

Senator Murray: Says Statistics Canada. I will bring the figures in for the honourable senator.

Senator Haidasz: They are wrong again.

Senator Murray: Senator Haidasz says Statistics Canada is wrong again. That is the third time in as many weeks that I have heard that from Senator Haidasz.

● (1450)

DRAFT REPORT—AVAILABILITY OF TEXT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): My question to the Leader of the Government is a follow-up on a question of Senator Frith's. When can we expect to see the draft report on the Mexican-U.S.-Canada trade agreement? When will we have a draft?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator will see an agreement, if and when there is an agreement. The draft that he and I refer to is a movable feast. It is an evolving document.

Senator Molgat: Is there a reason why the Senate does not have that document? Why, on this very major enterprise, are we not, as representatives of our various regions, aware of what is being discussed?

Senator Murray: I can tell the honourable senator, or Mr. Wilson can, what is being discussed, in the sense that I can tell

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, what I have indicated is that a certain offer was made, I believe, by the government, by Mr. Wilson, to representatives of the parties in the House of Commons and that I would speak to Mr. Wilson with a view to having the same offer made to honourable senators. Of course, I would include in that honourable senators from the government party.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Would that be on condition that whatever it was that you divulged to legislators would have to be kept secret by those legislators?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I would to have ask what conditions those arrangements were made under in the House of Commons.

Senator Gigantès: Well those were the arrangements in the House of Commons, and as a former journalist, I remember the trap that they tried to set for journalists by saying, "I will tell you something if you accept that it be off the record." They generally told you something you already knew, and then you could not try to criticize them because they would squeal that you were breaking their confidence. Is this the same confidence trick that you are trying to play?

Senator Murray: Let me say that we will do our best not to put the Honourable Senator Gigantès in the way of temptation.

Senator Gigantès: You do not have to. It is your existence that tempts me.

WORLD CONSERVATION

WOOD BUFFALO NATIONAL PARK—ENVIRONMENTAL EFFECTS OF BENNETT DAM

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning Wood Buffalo National Park. As I am sure he is aware, last month, Wood Buffalo, the country's largest national park and home of the largest free-roaming herd of bison in the world, was reviewed by the World Conservation Union and declared a world heritage site in danger.

● (1500)

The World Conservation Union was concerned specifically about the Peace-Athabasca Delta in the middle of the park. Due to British Columbia's Bennett Dam, the delta has almost completely dried up. This delta is one of the largest in the world and provides necessary and ideal wetland for the park's wildlife.

Honourable senators, why is the government allowing this delta to dry up? I ask the Leader of the Government when can we expect enough water to be released from the dam so that the delta will return to its original state? As a supplementary to that, I would like to know what is the status of discussions with B.C. Hydro which I understand are taking place to address this problem.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with regard to both questions, I shall ask my cabinet colleague Mr. Charest, the Minister of the Environment, for a report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must advise you that this is the last question, according to our rules.

Senator Haidasz: Closure, closure.

NATIONAL FINANCE

OLYMPIA & YORK DEBT CRISIS

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate undertake to make a statement to the Senate as soon as possible on any discussions between the Government of Canada and Olympia & York, and in that statement disclose any proposals that have been worked out between the two parties for the alleviation of the cash flow problem that Olympia & York is supposed to be suffering?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the short answer to the question is in the affirmative.

OLYMPIA & YORK DEBT CRISIS—GOVERNMENT LOAN GUARANTEES

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether it is true that the Minister of Finance will again take money from the taxpayers of Canada to grant loan guarantees to Olympia & York to help them alleviate their $20-billion debt crisis?

Senator Murray: No.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I would like to give the Leader of the Government advance notice that tomorrow I will ask him a question on government aid—

The Hon. the Speaker: Hon. senator, according to our rule, that is advance notice. You will ask your question tomorrow. I said it was the last question.

Hon. Thomas H. Lefebvre: Follow your own rule!

The Hon. the Speaker: I ask you to follow the order, Senator Simard.

Hon. Senators: Order.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS
THE SENATE

DELAY IN PRODUCTION OF DEBATES

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, you will recall that last Thursday, Senator Molgat asked me about the delay in publishing the Debates of the Senate. I undertook to give him a more thorough answer today and I am eager to do so.

him what our objectives are in those negotiations. I would be glad to do that, but we do not place in the public domain the documents we are using for negotiating purposes.

Senator Molgat: The minister says "... we do not place in the public domain ...", yet last week, in the Manitoba legislature, when questions were being asked of the premier there, specific reference was made to a draft copy. I quote directly from a Winnipeg Free Press article of Thursday, March 19, wherein there is a reference to Manitoba's Conservative premier:

> Filmon confirmed yesterday his government had received a draft copy of the positions put forward for a potential agreement by Mexico, Canada and the United States.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Not available to the Senate.

Senator Molgat: It goes on to say:

> Industry and Trade Minister Eric Stefanson, who has been analysing the free trade briefs, said he believes Canada's position at the negotiating table is not far from Manitoba's.

How can you say that it is not in the public domain? You are prepared to give it to a provincial premier who is prepared to discuss it with members of his cabinet.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Because he is a Conservative.

Senator Molgat: But we, in this chamber, are not allowed to see the draft?

Senator Perrault: We cannot see it in British Columbia either.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know what document Premier Filmon may have, but I would presume it is the same document that we have given under a procedure that I do not have a description of at the moment—

Senator Perrault: It is indescribable, all right.

Senator Murray: —but that we have shared with opposition members in the other place.

Senator Molgat: Why are we not entitled to have at least as much as a provincial premier? We have a responsibility in the same way as he does.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Because we are only the Senate.

Senator Murray: I do not know what document Premier Filmon or any other premier may have. I suspect it is the same document that the government has offered to share with the opposition leadership in the other place.

Senator Frith: But not in the Senate.

Senator Murray: The subject came up last week. I will inquire to see what the government can properly share.

Senator Frith: With the Senate?

Senator Murray: No, not with the Senate; with representatives of the opposition in the Senate.

IMPACT ON CANADIAN LABOUR

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Is the Leader of the Government convinced that negotiations for a trilateral free trade pact will also be in the spirit portrayed by Professor Roger Lipsey in his analysis of the U.S.-Canada trade pact in a book that your government was distributing in great numbers to instruct us during those days?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I said, I am perfectly prepared, and Mr. Wilson is even better prepared, to discuss the objectives of Canada in entering the NAFTA negotiations. Our objectives are barrier-free access to the Mexican market—which is of 80 million people, not an inconsiderable market in terms of size—and it is to obtain, in this trilateral arrangement, improved access to the United States market and enhancement of the investment climate in Canada.

Senator Gigantès: But Mexican workers replacing Canadian workers in making automobiles, for instance, are paid $1.40 an hour. Every time a Canadian worker is replaced, there will not be an automobile sold to those Mexican workers to compensate for the automobile that is not made here. What happens to Canadian workers who are thus displaced?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is making quite a number of assumptions in his question. Earlier today, I discussed the share of production costs accounted for by labour. It is about 20 per cent.

In any case, the honourable senator talks about Mexican labour replacing Canadian labour in building automobiles. I do not know what that has to do with the negotiation of the North American Free Trade Agreement.

In terms of our relationship with the United States, we have had the Canada-U.S. Auto Pact in place since the mid-1960s.

Senator Gigantès: If we open up our market to cars produced in Mexico, our manufacturers, most of them Tories, will move down there. Mr. Lipsey said, in that book which you were distributing, that the most important thing about the U.S.-Canada free trade agreement would turn out to be that Canadian investors would be able to invest in the United States without any impediments. Might I suggest to the Leader of the Government that the majority of the people in Canada are not interested in investing in Mexico, are not interested in investors who invest in Mexico, but are more interested in jobs here?

DRAFT REPORT—AVAILABILITY TO SENATE

Hon. Pat Carney: I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. You just made an offer to share a draft document or to seek permission to share a draft document on the NAFTA deal with representatives of the members of the opposition in the Senate. Would you undertake to seek the same permission to share that document with members of the government caucus, possibly through the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs?

At the meeting of the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, the Clerk gave several reasons. One is the delay due to printing problems. I am told that management at the plant have been implementing changes and have cooperated with Senate staff to produce the Debates in a more timely manner.

A second reason is the speed at which we can obtain translation from the Department of the Secretary of State. The Under Secretary of State and Senate staff are trying to find ways to give the Senate the translations as quickly as possible.

A third reason concerns our reporting service. That is what Senator Corbin referred to. Suddenly, we had a larger proportion of French than the usual 15 per cent. One or two days last week, at least 50 per cent of the proceedings were in French. Steps are being considered so that this problem does not recur when a greater proportion of French is used.

A final point that was not mentioned by the Clerk but which I think the Senate should consider is that more and more, it seems, Senate committees are sitting at the same time as the Senate. The staff required for transcribing the proceedings are in a rather difficult situation when committees and the Senate sit simultaneously. This question should be examined because it leads to extra work when the number of persons provided to record the Senate debates was sufficient. We should look into this extra work load.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a number of delayed responses to questions raised in the Senate on February 27 by Senator Marsden regarding the KAON project, and also by Senator Marsden on the elimination of the Science Council of Canada; on March 17 by Senator Marsden on the effect of government policy on child benefits; also on March 17, by Senator Simard regarding the enshrinement of New Brunswick's Bill 88 in the constitution; on March 18 by Senator Kenny regarding the Law of the Sea Convention; and on the same day, by Senator Lewis regarding the Arrow air crash in Gander; on March 19 by Senator Wood on the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program; and also on March 19, by Senator Thériault, a question regarding accessibility to Francophones of constitutional conferences outside Quebec.

KAON PROJECT—CANADIAN FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

The federal government is not considering other projects as alternatives to the KAON Factory. The federal government made an offer of $236 million to the Government of British Columbia towards the construction of the KAON Factory on September 19, 1991. This offer is still valid. Recently, the Province has appointed a negotiator, and discussions with the federal government have been initiated.

The February 18, 1992 article in the Vancouver Sun was a misinterpretation of the recent creation of the federal Interagency Panel on Subatomic Physics (IPSP), chaired by the Deputy Minister of Industry, Science and Technology Canada. The IPSP was established to provide an ongoing process for determining Canadian priorities in subatomic physics, and to assist the federal government in reaching policy decisions on support for research and facilities in this field. The IPSP is provided with scientific advice by the Nuclear and Particle Physics Advisory Panel (NPPAP) recently established by the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council (NSERC). The NPPAP, among other things' will provide advice on Canadian scientific priorities with respect to major subatomic physics research initiatives such as the Superconducting Super Collider in Texas, and the Large Hadron Collider in Switzerland. These panels will not re-examine the priority for KAON, a project on which the federal government has already made a firm offer.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY ON CHILD BENEFITS

(Response to question raised by the Hon. Lorna Marsden on March 17, 1992)

The new proposal does not ignore low income families. For example, a family with one child, earning $20,000, can receive as much as $1,733 per year—an increase of 40%.

Also, under the Child Benefits Program a greater proportion of the assistance to low income families would be placed in the hands of the recipients when it is needed most—on a monthly basis. A family with an annual income of $20,000 and with one child would, under the proposed plan, receive $114 monthly, as opposed to the $35 presently received a month. These payments will be adjusted annually for increases in the consumer price index in excess of 3 per cent.

Families with children receiving social assistance receive thousands of dollars more than families surviving on low-wage jobs. For example, a single parent on social assistance receives an additional $4,500 for their first child, on average, depending on the province.

The earned income supplement is designed to provide extra help to those low income working families who receive little or no social assistance. It represents an incentive for low income parents to participate in the work force.

THE CONSTITUTION

NEW BRUNSWICK—ENSHRINEMENT OF BILL 88

(Response to question raised in the Senate by Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard on March 17, 1992)

Further to an exchange of letters between the Right Hon. Joe Clark and the Hon. Edmond Blanchard of New Brunswick, talks have begun between federal officials and New Brunswick on the best way to provide constitutional protection for Bill 88 (equality of the two language communities). These talks are continuing.

Nevertheless, it is premature to take a position on the final outcome of these discussions. New Brunswick's Special Committee on the Constitution will not table its report until March 31.

Furthermore, in their agreement of March 12, 1992, the first ministers agreed that no government would take any unilateral action on the Constitution while the current process is under way. This process is to end on May 31, 1992.

THE RATIFICATION OF THE LAW OF THE SEA CONVENTION

Canada is working in consultations under the auspices of the U.N. Secretary General to resolve problems related to the Law of the Sea Convention's impact on the sea-bed regime. It is our view that the Convention and Canada's interests are best served through our efforts to make it universally acceptable. We should have a clearer picture of whether this is possible by the end of the year.

While Canada continues to be one of the major proponents of the Convention, ratification, at a time when the costs of an international sea-bed mining regime remain unclear, would not be prudent.

ARROW AIR CRASH IN GANDER, NEWFOUNDLAND—CRIMINAL INVESTIGATION COMMENCED BY U.S. FEDERAL AVIATION AUTHORITY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by Hon. P. Derek Lewis on March 18, 1992)

The Canadian Aviation Safety Board has already investigated the accident. Because of the inconclusive results of this investigation, Mr. Justice Willard Estey was asked to review the Gander investigation and he concluded that a further investigation was not warranted.

There has been continuing speculation on the events leading to the accident. The government is aware of current speculation concerning a forthcoming documentary on U.S. television, of possible new evidence and of a possible U.S. government reaction.

To date, no new evidence has emerged but should any come to light, the government will assess it and act accordingly.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION—INQUIRY

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, perhaps I could ask the Leader of the Government when the government proposes to deal with Order Paper Question No. 60, which was put down on February 12, 1992, concerning certain persons appointed to the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I will make inquiries, honourable senators.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Roch Bolduc moved third reading of Bill C-32, An Act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, Bill C-32 is a most unfortunate piece of legislation. It is highly punitive to the social sector. With Bill C-32, the government is choosing to cut back on the money available for the poorest of the poor in our country. The government knows that this legislation, if passed, will lead to less shelter for the homeless, less food for the hungry, less protection for the abused, less help for the disabled, and less hope for the vulnerable.

The government tells us its hands are tied. It tells us that this is why it has to cut back on health care, on post secondary education and on social assistance payments. The government, of course, has been cutting back on the social sector since it gained power in 1984, through partial de-indexing, through freezing, through the cutting of transfers.

On the other hand, the Minister of Finance has found additional money for other matters. For example, $150 million for defence spending in the upcoming fiscal year, and another $400 million for extra defence spending for 1993-94, among other new funds found. The government has chosen to make poor people the victim of its plans to get their part of all government budgets out of recession by transferring costs on to provincial and, therefore, municipal governments.

● (1510)

As an Ontario senator, I want to look at the legislation before us as it affects my province. This bill limits the Canada Assistance Plan payments to Ontario, B.C. and Alberta. Fifty-four point nine per cent of Canada's poor children live in those three provinces.

Senator Murray: It limits the increase to 5 per cent per year.

Senator Marsden: Indeed. It limits those payments to those three provinces where 55 per cent of the poor children in Canada live. Child poverty is increasing faster in Ontario than in any other province. More than half of the country's increase in child poverty each year is taking place in Ontario. According to the latest statistics, Ontario's child poverty rate is increasing at 34 per cent a year. In my province, 323,000 children under the age of 16 live in poverty. There are 12,000 street kids estimated to be living in Toronto alone.

Ontario has the highest per capita food bank usage of any province. The number of food banks in Ontario has grown from four, when the Conservative government came into power in 1984, to 88 at the end of 1991. Thirty-nine per cent of food bank recipients in Ontario are under the age of 18. One hundred and forty thousand people use food banks every month in Toronto alone. That is an increase of over 100 per cent in four years.

Since the government first capped social assistance payments to Ontario in 1990, the provincial unemployment rate has increased from 6.3 per cent to 9.7 per cent. It is the government's policies that have led directly to quite a lot of that increase in unemployment. The number of unemployed people in Ontario has increased from 331,000 to 512,000. There are 16,000 unemployed people in Kitchener-Waterloo, a medium-sized but important city in Ontario. There are 32,000 unemployed people in Hamilton and 39,000 unemployed people in the national capital region. In Metro Toronto today there are 211,000 unemployed people, and the unemployment rate in Metro is 10.5 per cent. Canada's largest city now has an unemployment rate higher than the national average.

Last month the number of unemployed people in Canada rose by 22,000, and 19,000 of these newly unemployed people live in Ontario. Welfare payments by the province of Ontario have increased by 40 per cent in this fiscal year. Ontario and its municipalities are now obliged to spend $5.45 billion a year on welfare, which is almost as much as the $6 billion spent on education.

It is against this background that we have to consider Bill C-32. The government has contributed very heavily to this recession. The government has caused or contributed heavily to the situation in which more than half a million people in my province are unemployed. The government has contributed to a situation which has resulted in Ontario's welfare payments sky-rocketing by 40 per cent in a single year, and now the government wants to pass this bill which will reduce federal transfers for social assistance to Ontario by $1.559 billion in the coming year.

The federal government's overall economic policies, combined with the limitation on Canada Assistance Plan payments, have had two primary effects in Ontario. First, Ontario has been forced to restrict the amount of money available to individual welfare recipients so that those welfare recipients fall further and further below the poverty line. Second, Ontario has been obliged to cut back on all social assistance programs other than welfare.

The income of a couple with two children receiving social assistance in Ontario is now more than $6,300 below the poverty line. Is it any wonder they end up at food banks? The income of a single person on welfare in Ontario is now more than $5,400 below the poverty line. Is it any wonder that he or she cannot find a decent place to live? Indeed, last week when I was speaking at a meeting in Toronto, a number of older single people approached me on this subject.

What happens to all those social assistance programs which are not direct welfare programs? In the Kawarthas, the Children's Aid Society is no longer able to provide counselling to all the sexually abused children who need it. In Lanark, they have had to eliminate the program providing play therapy for severely neglected children. In Toronto, provincial social workers now carry an average case load of 424 each. In Ottawa, the provincially-funded shelters are all full; there is simply no more space.

As a direct result of the federal government's actions, my province is unable to bring all its citizens up even to the poverty level, and there is no money available for the necessary programs to help people break out of poverty permanently. The situation is truly tragic. We know that children living in poverty are more likely to have health problems, more likely to drop out of school, more likely to get in trouble with the law, and more likely to end up on welfare, and yet there is no money available for programs to stop that cycle.

The Senate has discussed this issue extensively. We know that in Ontario 61 per cent of families headed by single mothers are poor, but there will be no new employment, training, counselling or child care programs to help those women get off welfare. There is no money available for the programs to help street people—often called bag ladies—to help the mentally ill, or to help the hopelessly addicted. Although people are perhaps giving more generously than they have before in charitable forms, much more is needed. And there is no money to deal with the problem of poor children experiencing a death rate that is 50 per cent higher from all causes, than other children.

Honourable senators know about this because of the Senate report on child poverty. We know that the country will lose income tax over the next 20 years. Unemployment insurance payments will be extended and all kinds of income will not be earned because of the failure to deal with the problem of children in poverty, and the government's new program will not help very much. The situation is a national disgrace and a human disgrace. This bill, if passed, will leave a permanent scar on thousands of children and families.

There is another example of how this government's policies are deepening the poverty crisis in Ontario. In 1988, over our objections, the Conservative government introduced a new refugee determination system. The new system has not been a success. Fifty-eight thousand people applied as non-sponsored refugees in Canada from 1988 through 1990. Only 34 per cent of those applications were resolved. So there is now a backlog of 38,000 refugee claimants from the new system. Where do those claimants end up? Twenty-seven thousand of those refugee claimants are in Ontario, at an annual welfare cost to the province of Ontario of $155 million. That is up from $93 million three years ago.

The federal government created a badly flawed new refugee determination system but refuses to provide any serious assistance to refugee claimants, and Ontario citizens are left to foot the bill. Let me be clear. You cannot blame legitimate refugees for the actions of the federal government. It is not the fault of refugee claimants that the welfare bill in Ontario is soaring. It is the fault of the Conservative government. We know the costs of direct welfare payments to refugees living in Ontario. The unknown costs are, of course, even higher. We cannot deny emergency medical care for refugees and yet, of course, that increases hospital expenditures. We cannot deny emergency social services to refugees, and yet that increases the drain on social agencies. No one has yet been able to put even an approximate total figure on this problem, but the Catholic Immigration Centre in Ottawa estimates that refugees make up 30 per cent of its work load.

Honourable senators, this is just one example of how this government has made choices which strain the social fabric of Ontario and leave a gaping hole in the social safety net in Ontario. The federal government has made their choices and the federal government has left poor people with choices. For example, families living in poverty can choose between buying shoes for their children or feeding them adequately. Families living in poverty can choose between living without heat or living without electricity. Those families living in poverty can choose which food bank they want to line up at today.

Approximately 3.8 million people live below the poverty line in Canada; 2 million people use food banks in Canada; 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed; nearly 1 million people are on welfare in Ontario. This government's answer to those tragic numbers is to cutback on federal assistance for social services. The government's answer is to pass on the costs to Ontario, the province in which child poverty is increasing at the fastest rate; the province in which unemployment is increasing at the fastest rate; the province in which refugees are increasing at the fastest rate and the province in which food banks are increasing at the fastest rate.

That is this Conservative government's answer, and the answer is dead wrong. The legislation, Bill C-32, is wrong. The legislation is not only heartless but also shortsighted and foolish. I urge honourable senators to vote against this bill.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I intervened briefly in the course of the debate on second reading. I will not repeat now what I said then. I would simply like, in two sentences, to place a couple of facts on the record, specifically with regard to Ontario.

Federal payments under the Canada Assistance Plan will be capped at 5 per cent per annum to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. With regard to Ontario, the federal payments under the Canada Assistance Plan, between 1985 and 1990, increased by an average of 17.5 per cent per year. No reasonable person believes that that rate of increase could long be sustained.

The payments from the federal government to Ontario under the Canada Assistance Plan are now well in excess of $2 billion annually. Without disagreeing with the facts the honourable senator has placed on record with regard to refugees, and so on, that is a very substantial contribution to the eligible costs of Ontario under the Canada Assistance Plan. That province is certainly not increasing its payments to municipalities, universities, schools and hospitals by 17.5 per cent per annum or even by 5 per cent per annum.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I should like the government to respond, because to pull a number out of the air without taking a look at the general revenue picture of Ontario would be misleading.

During the period of time that the Leader of the Government in the Senate just mentioned, how much revenue flowed into the federal coffers from the province of Ontario? What percentage of the total of taxpayers' revenues in Canada flowed from Ontario to the federal government?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is repeating an argument or making as his own an argument that has been made recently by Premier Rae. No one disputes the fact that, if Ontario taxpayers, corporate and personal, are contributing more than 40 per cent, or whatever the amount is, to the federal treasury, that same amount is not flowing out to Ontario taxpayers directly. We do have equalization in this country and we do have other national programs, as the honourable senator is well aware.

I would argue that the residents of Ontario, like the residents of Alberta, British Columbia and residents from all provinces, benefit from being part of the great national unit that is Canada.

Senator Grafstein: Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate could give the precise number that flows back to Ontario. I believe Premier Rae said that Ontario contributes 43 per cent of all tax revenues. I do not know if that is just tax revenues or revenues from all sources—income tax, as well as other revenue sources. Is that number correct? If that number is correct, could he then indicate to the Senate and to the honourable senators from Ontario what percentage of the total tax revenues flow back into Ontario based on our population? Are we getting our per capita share?

Senator Murray: That is the old argument about check book federalism or fédéralisme rentable, as it has been called elsewhere. The people of Ontario and successive governments of Ontario have never tried to demand that the same amount of money that flows into the federal treasury from Ontario should flow out of the federal treasury directly to Ontario or to Ontario's taxpayers. Ontario residents, like the residents of all other provinces, benefit from being part of the great national federation.

Senator Grafstein: But in fairness to the public debates in the country, other premiers have been raising the question of economic federalism and the benefits back and forth that flow from economic federalism. Honourable senators from Ontario would like to know what percentage of those total dollars that flow from Ontario flow back to Ontario, particularly in these times of economic need.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I would not want to provoke honourable senators from other parts of the country by going back to the time of Confederation and discussing the benefits that the national policy has brought to Ontario and to the industrial heartland of Canada over the years. This is not an argument that will get us very far.

My only point in response to Senator Marsden was that federal payments under the Canada Assistance Plan had been increasing from 1985 to 1990 at an average of 17.5 per cent per year, and this was not a rate of increase that could be sustained for very long.

Senator Grafstein: I will not belabour the issue, but economic federalism and the Confederation covenant was changed by this government in terms of the free trade agreement. Part of the Confederation argument that sustained a protection for Ontario was removed when the government decided to enter into a free trade agreement with the United States.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the free trade agreement is two years now in operation.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: And 500,000 thousand jobs have been lost!

Senator Murray: It is an agreement that will be phased in over 10 years. If Senator Gigantès and others simply want to come in here to echo the arguments of Ms. Maude Barlow and others, that is their privilege. But Ontario, as much as if not more than most parts of the country, has a vital stake in the restructuring and the revitalization of the Canadian economy and in freer trade, which throughout history has always meant for increased real incomes for everyone involved.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question from a different perspective. The honourable gentleman stated that the transfer payments to the Canada Assistance Plan grew at a rate of 17.5 per cent, which, I agree with him, is a substantial increase. But what about the other side of the ledger? How many refugees flow to Ontario? How many new clients does the government have to cater to that join the ranks on a daily basis? What is the 5 per cent relationship to those needs?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator should be careful about that argument. It is a fact that increases in the number of refugees do impose added costs on governments during certain periods of time, but it should not be assumed that all of the refugee claimants are welfare recipients.

• (1530)

Senator Bosa: Senator Marsden cited some figures that were pretty staggering.

Senator Murray: I agree.

Senator LeBlanc: This government is not staggered by anything.

Senator Gigantès: Not by compassion, anyhow.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I recall that this matter was before the courts sometime ago. I was not present for the debate on second reading and the issue may have been dealt with at that time. If so, I apologize, but I wonder if the government leader could bring me up to date on how this legislation impacts on the court action that was brought by, I believe, British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. If I recall it was a constitutional argument that the government did not have the right to cap the Canada Assistance Plan payments.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think the Supreme Court of Canada reversed the decision of the British Columbia Court of Appeal on that matter.

Senator Everett: So the issue has been settled by the Supreme Court?

Senator Murray: Yes.

On motion of Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-62—VOTE DEFERRED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.:
> That the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine the subject-matter of Bill C-62, An Act respecting telecommunications, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wants to have these comments apply to this motion on Bill C-62 as well as to the motion on Bill C-48.

We last dealt with pre-study in a substantive way on October 23, 1991 when the government used its majority to refer the subject matter of Bills C-4, C-19, C-28 and C-34 to the banking committee. I will come back to those particular bills.

First let me deal with the statements made by the Deputy Leader of the Government in support of his two motions—I take it that his comments apply to both of them. First he set up some criteria that I was not familiar with. He said in part with regard to Bill C-62:

> The bill that we are talking about meets the requirements and conditions for pre-study.

[Senator Murray.]

I do not know where he got those requirements and conditions for pre-study. In any event, he went on to say that the requirements and conditions are as follows, so I take it that they are the "Lynch-Staunton criteria":

> It is highly complex and legible.

That cannot be right.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): It should be "technical".

Senator Frith: He goes on:

> It is written in a language that sometimes is difficult to understand at first sight,—

That is criterion No. 2. There are lots of people who would say that that would go for anything in English.

> —and it covers a topic of extraordinary importance—telecommunications.

Those are his criteria. He also establishes as a doctrine—which we can call the "Lynch-Staunton doctrine"— the following:

> The Senate is here to improve on legislation at the earliest stage possible, especially when there is legislation of a highly complex nature such as this bill.

I know of nothing in the Constitution that says that, but nevertheless that is the "Lynch-Staunton doctrine." He said:

> —when dealing with complicated legislation, it is consistent with parliamentary tradition that the Senate committees give particularly careful consideration to such measures as to refer the subject matter to a committee in advance.

That is in reference to something I had said earlier, and I will make a comment about that also.

I believe, honourable senators, that Senator Lynch-Staunton is confusing his job with the job of the Senate. I remember when I sat in his chair, I saw my job just as he sees it, namely to get the legislation through the Senate. I saw my job as getting the Senate out of the way as quickly as possible and getting the government's legislation through.

Senator Simard: Are you telling us that you were wrong then?

Senator Frith: No, not yet, not on this subject; not at all. That is his job. That was my job when I was there. I was not wrong then. He is not wrong now. We were neither wrong, then nor now.

Senator Barootes: That was easy enough to do with a three-to-one or four-to-one majority.

Senator Simard: So you were right then; you are right now; you are always right.

Senator Frith: No, I am not always right.

Senator Simard: You are riding the fence again.

Senator Frith: You have it wrong again. You are confused as to who is right and who is wrong. Senator Simard has it wrong. Let me say it again, because he is a slow learner.

Senator Simard: You will have to do better than that.

Senator Frith: On the subject of the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, it is his objective to get the government legislation through the Senate as quickly as possible. That is his job. It was my job when I was there, but it is not the job of the Senate. That is where Senator Lynch-Staunton is wrong.

Let us come to those bills that we referred to the Banking committee sometime ago for pre-study. We opposed the motion for reasons that had been placed on the record a number of times. Our position has not changed. If anything, it has been reinforced by what subsequently occurred with respect to those bills dealing with financial institutions.

Senator Barootes: It is the "MacEachen doctrine" that you are speaking of.

Senator Frith: No, I am not.

Senator Barootes: Yes.

Senator Frith: You are not paying attention. It is very difficult; we have to keep repeating. Now we have to get it straight for Senator Barootes.

Senator Barootes, we are now talking about what happened to Bills C-4, C-19, C-28 and C-34, the last time we did pre-studies.

Senator Barootes: Prior to that we had no pre-studies under the "MacEachen doctrine".

Senator Frith: He nods, but I doubt that he really understands. However, I will go on.

These bills were given first reading on December 10, 1991. They were all given second reading and referred to the Banking committee on December 12, 1991. On the following day, December 13, 1991, they were all reported out of committee and given third reading. Three days; four bills. Three days for more than 1,300 pages of very complicated law dealing with banks, trust companies, insurance companies and cooperatives; all would meet the "Lynch-Staunton criteria".

What happened in committee on December 12, 1991? The committee met a 5:03 p.m. and 51 minutes later completed its formal examination of these more than 1,300 pages of legislation, recommending that they be passed without amendment. Four bills, 1,300 plus pages, 51 minutes. That might be a world record.

Senator MacEachen: Requiring pre-study.

Senator Frith: You will recall that during the GST study the government leader raised a question of privilege on the grounds that the Banking committee had not conducted a clause-by-clause examination of the bill, which by coincidence was also numbered C-62.

On September 26, 1990 Senator Murray cited approvingly Citation 763 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition, which reads:

> The function of a committee on a bill is to go through the text of the bill clause by clause and, if necessary, word by word, with a view to making such amendments in it as may seem likely to render it more generally acceptable.

"Clause by clause, word by word", Senator Murray argued. In 51 minutes I doubt the committee had time to go page by page or even part by part. Did the staff even have time to bring into the committee room enough copies of the four bills for all members? They would have needed a wheelbarrow. Those are mostly matters of particularity rather than principle.

When we debated the motion to refer the subject matter of those four bills to committee, Senator Everett said that although he was not opposed to pre-study in principle and had not been so opposed, he nevertheless opposed the motion because, and I quote:

> Pre-study has become a manner of getting Senate interference out of the way.

That is the Lynch-Staunton objective, but it is not the proper constitutional objective of the Senate.

Senator Everett argued:

> What started out legitimately . . . has now become a system of shunting the Senate aside . . . pre-study has become an emasculation of the sovereign rights of this body.

That was at page 491 of the Debates of the Senate, October 23, last year.

We now have a motion before us to authorize the pre-study of Bill C-62 and C-48. C-62 was given first reading in the House of Commons on February 27, 1992. Not only has it not been referred to committee in the other place; it has not even been brought forward for second reading. The government thinks so little of the bill that it has not bothered to find time to move the second reading motion; yet it cracks the whip at the Senate, and the members opposite start jumping to do the government's bidding. After witnessing this embarrassing display, it is hard to argue with Senator Everett's choice of the word "emasculate".

Well, when it comes time to vote, and the government supporters rise with their wrenches in hand to go for the loosening and eventual dismantling of what the constitution establishes as the role of the Senate, we will vote against it. We will vote against this pernicious process for reasons both of particularity and principle.

I mentioned earlier that Senator Lynch-Staunton had said that I had previously spoken in favour of pre-study. I agree now with Senator Everett—and I have said before that I do—that it has now developed into a process, or, as Senator Everett describes it, an emasculation of the role of the Senate under the Constitution.

I have quoted on previous occasions what H. L. Mencken, that great cynic and agnostic, said in similar circumstances. When asked what he would do, if when he died the first thing he saw was Jesus and the twelve apostles before him, he said:

> I would say, "Gentlemen, I was wrong."

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I have a few words of comfort for Senator Frith. Some years ago I was a strong advocate of pre-study, and I have moderated my view somewhat. I do believe in the general conditions which Senator Lynch-Staunton set down for the pre-study of a bill, but I have also come to believe that the consecutive study of bills is a tradition and it should not be set aside.

I am constantly surprised that, when the curfew was placed on pre-study a few years ago, nobody on that side seemed to defend the occasion when pre-study might be considered necessary. There was a total unanimity in opposition to pre-study. It seemed to have happened overnight.

With regard to the four bills which you referred to, Senator Frith, I totally agree with you. I cannot see four bills of that nature being referred to pre-study and finished in a day or two days. I think that is a mistake. I regard pre-study as a wonder drug. You do not use it for a cut on your finger; you use it when you have a hole in your chest. Otherwise, you develop an immunity to it.

Surely a case can be made in this place that under certain circumstances a bill as complicated as the Telecommunications Act could stand some scrutiny by a thoughtful committee. I might add that, from my brief experience with it, committees have a lot more freedom sometimes to suggest amendments, cause amendments, make observations, influence a minister. It is not taking away anything from the eventual power of the Senate to refer the matter to a committee once the bill has come to the Senate. Surely an argument can be made under certain circumstances that certain bills require a detailed week-after-week, month-long examination of the subject matter of those bills.

Senator Frith: Why in advance, though?

Senator MacDonald: Why not?

Senator Frith: Because of the fact that the Constitution was set up that way. That is why.

Senator MacDonald: No. It is because of the fact that during that period of time a great deal of useful work can be done in matters of amendments. The committee is free in a pre-study in a way in which they are not necessarily free when the bill is referred to a committee after it has received second reading. I know of examples of that type. I really cannot understand why there has been such an adamant attitude toward pre-study since the famous year in which the practice was discouraged.

I have admitted that my original attitude has moderated somewhat, but it has not disappeared. I am quite prepared to make an argument for the pre-study of a bill that clearly deserves pre-study, and I think, frankly, that any request for pre-study should stand out. If you do not like Senator Lynch-Staunton's conditions, I think there are others that can be added.

Senator Frith: Should the House of Commons pre-study Bill S-8? It is complicated. It is quite long.

Senator MacDonald: I do not think it is very complicated, with all due respect. That is as far as I wanted to go. I wanted to agree with you on the matter of the four bills to which you referred, and I wanted to admit that my previous support of pre-study has moderated. However, I do believe there is a case to be made for certain important bills, and I think under those particular circumstances any chairman that enthusiastically recommends the examination of the subject matter of a bill should be held accountable, if he is responsible for bringing in a bill and then, in a casual, frivolous way, brings back a pre-study in a day and a half or two days. That just defeats the whole purpose of it.

I certainly support the motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton in this instance.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we decide on this, I would not want the impression left on the record that the committee , if it held any meetings at all on these bills, met for only 52 minutes. In actual fact, pre-study took place for two days, and the report of the committee on its pre-study efforts is in the Debates of the Senate, November 28, 1991.

I would also like to refer honourable senators to some comments made by the deputy chairman of the committee, Senator Kirby, during third reading debate on December 12, 1991, when he said:

> There are really two things that I think honourable senators ought to note about the bills which are before us today. The report of the committee was tabled in this place on November 28. It contained a total of 16 proposed amendments to the package of four finance bills.

That is the value of pre-study—

> Twelve of those 16 amendments, or 75 per cent of the proposed amendments, were in fact adopted by the government.

Finally, in his last comment, he said:

> Frankly, it is a tribute to members on both sides that we were able not only to come up with a unanimous report but with a report which was sufficiently solid that three-quarters of our recommendations were accepted by the government.

That is the deputy chairman of the Banking committee, Senator Kirby, on the value of pre-study.

● (1550)

Senator MacEachen: May I ask the deputy leader whether these amendments were accepted within the Senate committee?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes, they were, senator.

Senator MacEachen: Surely, even with the authority that Senator Kirby can establish for himself, that does not confer a merit that could not equally be achieved on a study of a bill after it has received second reading? I agree that it is nice to have amendments, but these amendments could come in the normal course. I am glad, however, that the answer was not that we sent the amendments over to the House of Commons and they made them; at least that evil was avoided.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton seconded by the Honourable Senator Roblin:

> THAT the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications be authorized to examine the subject-matter of Bill C-62, An Act respecting telecommunications, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating there to.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

Senator Frith: They always do, no matter what they say.

Senator Molgat: Mr. Speaker, we asked for the "yeas" and "nays" for a recorded vote, but there will be a request for a deferral.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Mr. Speaker, according to the Rules of the Senate, I ask that the vote be deferred until tomorrow.

[English]

Senator Molgat: Can we have an understanding that if the whips agree to an earlier time than 5.30 p.m., that would be agreeable?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If the two whips can have an entente, the vote will be taken before 5.30 p.m. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SEVENTH REPORT ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the seventh report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce—proposed expenditures), presented in the Senate on March 19, 1992.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I move that this committee report be adopted.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Oliver, seconded by the Honourable Senator Di Nino, for the second reading of Bill S-8, An Act to regulate the manufacture and importation of motor vehicles and motor vehicle equipment to reduce the risk of death, injury and damage to property and the environment.

Senator Molgat: Perhaps I may ask the Deputy leader of the Government, is it not the intention to proceed today with Bill S-8?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Unfortunately, the mover of the bill is not present, so that order has been stood.

Order stands.

CONSIDERATION OF EIGHTH REPORT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the eighth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Special Joint Committee for a Renewed Canada—expenditures), presented in the Senate on March 19, 1992.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

[English]

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I wonder whether the Senate could be given some additional information, in either a formal or informal fashion. There is an item for "professional and other services, $644,000." Who was engaged? Were these retired judges of the Supreme Court? Obviously, these are well paid persons. Could we have a breakdown on that item, not necessarily now but in some convenient form?

[Translation]

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, this information was given to the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

From memory, I can tell you, for example, that Roger Tassé was among these professionals. André Raynauld did economic studies and Mr. Purvis was also an economist. I can tell you that we did not think the total amount of $644,000 would be spent. We will have to come back with more information when all the accounts are in.

We will then be pleased to provide Senator Stewart with a final list of individuals who were paid to work for the Special Joint Committee for a Renewed Canada.

[English]

Senator Stewart: I am sorry, I am not sure that I heard the honourable senator correctly. As I understand it, she is now telling us that the $644,000 may not be the total required to pay for professional and other services and that when the total is available to her committee she will give us a breakdown of those who supplied the professional and other services, together with the amount of remuneration paid to each such individual.

Senator Lavoie-Roux: Exactly. What I said is that it is unlikely that the whole amount of $600,000 will be spent. I suppose we all hope so. But in any case, when the final data is given to us, I would be glad to convey it to Senator Stewart with the names and the amount of money being spent on each of them. I hope that is convenient?

Senator Stewart: That is satisfactory.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

CONSIDERATION OF NINTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the ninth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented on March 19, 1992.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I move that the ninth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration be now adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion, honourable senators?

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned until next sitting of the Senate.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, dated 28th February, 1992 (Sessional Paper 343-416A).

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I draw upon the memory of the Senate to remind that an agreement was made last time with respect to time, from which I hope to benefit before I finish.

I do not intend to cover all of the elements of the committee report. The elements which I will omit are, nevertheless, as important, such as aboriginals and the distinct society, to mention only two of the elements with which I will deal. My comments will be directed to the reaction to the report, to the division of powers and to the process itself. I will make some passing references to the economic union, the common market and the council of the federation.

The two most difficult areas are, not surprisingly, the division of powers and the Senate, which is why I chose them for treatment.

At the moment, we do not know the precise status of the report of the committee. It may have passed into history, overwhelmed like its predecessor, the Charest report, by initial negative reaction. The Prime Minister's assessment of the report as the most generous and substantial in 125 years did not deter Mr. Bourassa's evaluation of it as too vague and flawed by a domineering federalism; a disapproving conclusion of the National Assembly in an almost unanimous vote; and a pronouncement from Mr. Masse that the report would not sell in Quebec; it did not contain enough in the way of powers for Quebec.

It should be stated that committee members, for reasons of stated policy on the part of the Quebec authorities, were unable to hear directly the views of either the Government of Quebec or the committees of the provincial assembly. Accordingly, we had no direct opportunity to assess what was required precisely to please, satisfy or meet the demands of Quebec.

The Allaire report was mentioned frequently, and usually associated with an opinion that it was not to be taken as a reliable guide, owing to the impression that the Quebec government itself does not view the Allaire report as realistic.

Despite this shortcoming, we were not without strong expressions of a Quebec viewpoint led by our colleague and chairman, Senator Beaudoin, who purported—and I believe justifiably so—to be able to help us in understanding what Quebec wanted. He was not alone. Representatives from Quebec, senators and MPs who sat on the committee from the three political parties, were forceful in putting forward the Quebec viewpoint. Committee members as a whole, not only the members from the Province of Quebec, struggled with the reality of a Quebec referendum.

The litmus test was whether the report would be a basis for a winning referendum in Quebec on the federalist option. That test was pursued quite consistently, at times to the exclusion or the downplaying of other valid considerations.

The committee understood very well that part of its task. It was to reach out to Quebec. It was to accommodate. It was to send strong signals to Quebec. It was especially to recognize Quebec's distinct society and to ensure that Quebec had the means to maintain and strengthen its language and culture.

It is difficult for me to understand why the negative reaction so quickly to the contents of the report, particularly in view of the strong input on the committee from those who had direct knowledge of what exactly were the viewpoints of the Province of Quebec.

However, the reaction was not all negative. We had a contrary view from Mr. Jean-Pierre Blackburn, MP, who, throughout the hearings, even exceeded the zeal of Mr. Phillip Edmonston in pressing forward the Quebec point of view. Mr. Blackburn described the committee report as a "masterpiece".

The adverse reaction, however, may not be the full reality. Perhaps the adverse reaction is more related to other factors than it is to the contents of the report itself. The full reality can only be uncovered by an examination of the report itself, the process itself, culminating in the contents of the committee report, and beginning with the release of the government's proposals entitled "Shaping Canada's Future Together".

The mandate of the joint committee was to examine and report on the proposals of the government. The committee went beyond that mandate. Not only did the committee deal with the proposals of the government, it added new proposals of its own, enriching the package offered by the government, especially under the division of powers. I did not personally like that expansion of items not recommended by the government, not solely for technical reasons, but mainly for substantive reasons.

The second part of the document "Shaping Canada's Future Together" was entitled "Preparing for a more Prosperous Future". That description was a misnomer because, instead of prescribing for a more prosperous future, it really contained a series of proposals having to do with the rearranging and the reorganizing of how power is to be exercised by the senior levels of government. It is impossible to evaluate the significance of the report without examining the proposals under this heading, and even more importantly how they were dealt with by the committee.

Bear in mind, when these proposals were first made, they were generally regarded as decentralizing.

Some very reliable people saw them as a significant shift of power to the provinces. If that decentralist flavour existed in the government proposals, it was certainly enriched by the committee, and that enrichment was undertaken mainly to accommodate Quebec's wishes.

The single new power sought by the federal government, that is, a power to make laws for the efficient functioning of the economic union, did not survive its critics. Some regarded it as a federal power grab, and some saw it as constitutionalizing the Conservative economic agenda. For others who were prepared to go along—that included myself—it appeared as hollow inasmuch as it could only be enacted and implemented with a provincial consensus equivalent of that required for a constitutional amendment. However, the federal wish to have a new power to manage the economic union fell by the wayside.

As that proposal fell by the wayside, the Council of the Federation, whose function would be to implement decisions and vote on proposed legislation under the proposed new head of power, got such rough treatment at the Halifax conference on the division of powers that it too fell by the wayside and disappeared from sight. Therefore, the federal attempt, regarded as feeble by some and aggressive by others, to claim a new defined role in the management of the economy, was totally frustrated. At bat in the power game, the Government of Canada scored a zero. Let me emphasize, because I think it is important, that the federal government gained no new power for itself through the process, and, generally, there was little interest among members of the committee in adding to federal powers.

The proposals for a Canadian common market to be achieved by the free movement of labour, capital, goods and services across provincial boundaries without undue restraint was approved by the committee, as it ought to have been. It is surprising that even this proposal, which was not a conferring of new power on any government but a restraint on the actions of government, had its many critics.

With those items out of the way, I should like to turn to the proposals that were intended to enhance the role of the provinces, their freedom of action and their power. There are two categories to be dealt with. The first includes training, immigration, culture and broadcasting. The second category includes tourism, forestry, mining, recreation, housing, municipal and urban affairs. These six items or areas came to be described as "the six sisters", members, as we were to learn later, of a rapidly expanding family of powers.

With respect to the first category, namely training, immigration, culture and broadcasting, the committee built upon the bare bones of the original proposals by describing and detailing possible new regimes of administration and finance. That task was not particularly easy, especially with regard to manpower training and culture, because questions of one's vision of Canada and the nature of federalism had to be faced head on.

In this connection, the overwhelming conclusion of the Halifax conference in favour of a strong central government and against any general devolution of powers to the provinces is most relevant. It was rather striking that at that conference there was absolutely no sympathy for a weakening of the national government in favour of a strengthening of the provincial governments. The contrary was the case; namely, to preserve the strength of the national government.

In that connection, a further opinion of the conference is also relevant, and it was that a means had to be found to accommodate the needs of Quebec within the context of a strong national government. It is within the context of this philosophy, namely, no general devolution of powers to the provinces and the desire to accommodate the special needs of Quebec, that we can make sense of the methods chosen by the committee to deal with the proposals already mentioned.

As you probably know, with respect to manpower training, the recommendation of the committee is that any province, by an act of the legislature, can opt in, so to speak, affirm its exclusive jurisdiction in this field, and subsequently negotiate an agreement with the federal government which would clarify the responsibilities of each level of government and establish a regime for the exercise of the federal spending power.

Through such an agreement, it is expected that Quebec, for example, could attain its full objectives in the manpower field. The key here, of course, is the extent to which the Government of Canada modifies its activities, withdraws from the manpower field, and restrains its use of the spending power.

What we can say through this recommendation on manpower is that a door has been opened enabling any province to seek and achieve an enhanced role for itself in the manpower field. We can also say that every province which wishes, through an act of the legislature, can choose the same option and achieve its objectives.

That is a bit of detail on manpower. Similar steps were taken in the field of culture and broadcasting. Present arrangements for immigration are recommended for protection against unilateral amendment.

Members of the chamber who wish to do so can get a glimpse of the sweeping character of the recommendations of the committee on culture and broadcasting by going to the detail in the report at pages 77 to 80; but perhaps culture deserves a few special words.

In summary, and for Quebec alone, it is proposed that there be a constitutional amendment that would provide for exclusive provincial jurisdiction in the field of culture; that a subsequent agreement can be signed in which the respective roles of the federal and provincial governments would be defined, and in which would be stated the ability of the provincial government to make direct grants to individuals and organizations in the field of culture, by which the province could be compensated for these activities from which the federal government has withdrawn; and the aspirations of Quebec are expected to be achieved in a much better way through this method than heretofore.

I should mention that the original proposals of the government did not call for a constitutional amendment of any kind. The proposals simply offered to any province an agreement on culture in which would be defined the respective roles of the two governments.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): An agreement which could be entrenched in the Constitution?

Senator MacEachen: Yes, that is correct.

● (1620)

The committee advanced that idea further by suggesting a constitutional amendment along the lines that I have suggested. The Government of Canada did not recommend the constitutional amendment on cultural affairs. That suggestion is the creation of the committee, as is the withdrawal of the original proposal to negotiate cultural agreements with all interested provinces. The committee states that it would be premature at this stage to negotiate cultural agreements with any other province except Quebec, so that there is prescribed a singular regime in the field of culture, a constitutional amendment, and a subsequent agreement.

I should say that these new proposals on culture were advanced quite late, well after the full committee and the drafting committee held their final business meetings, coming to my attention as a Liberal member of the committee on February 24. The deadline for the report, as we remember, was February 28.

[Senator MacEachen.]

Our work was further complicated by the last-minute addition of regional development, energy, and family policy, which appeared as three new sisters to be added to the previous list of six. Inland fisheries and personal bankruptcy were also late arrivals on the agenda. These were recommended to be made concurrent powers with federal paramountcy and were to be managed by intergovernmental agreements similar to those already implemented or proposed in the field of immigration.

It is clear to me that neither the committee members nor the public at large had an opportunity to examine the implications of including these five additional fields, namely, regional development, energy, family policy, inland fisheries, personal bankruptcy. The inclusion of such important fields as energy and regional development, at this stage, came as a complete surprise and certainly shocked Liberal members on the committee.

Senator Murray: Your dissent on regional development, for example, was not with a view to maintaining the status quo, as I understood it. Your dissent was in favour of paramountcy for the provinces in regional development, a shared regime.

Senator MacEachen: The dissent was to consider making regional development a concurrent power with provincial paramountcy. I believe that was the suggestion.

Even with that, given my own personal point of view, I did not feel there was time available to make a thoughtful recommendation on regional development—

Senator Murray: I thought it was quite good.

Senator MacEachen: —whether they were to be included among the so-called six sisters or the nine sisters or in any other category.

As I was saying when Senator Murray raised his question, you will have noticed that I have been discussing 15 fields of governmental activity which are, or will become, the subject matter of intergovernmental agreements, outlining in concrete terms ways by which one or more provincial governments can increase the exercise of powers.

In the field of broadcasting, a proposed agreement would bind the CRTC, would deal with the issuance of new licences in the provinces, would prescribe language-related content requirements, and the desirable balance between private public, special interests, and community broadcasts. This is a possibility that, hitherto, provinces have never exercised. We, of course, on the Liberal side registered a dissent on this point because we did not believe that the CRTC should be bound by the terms of any such agreement.

In the fields ruled by concurrency, immigration, inland fisheries and personal bankruptcy, the existing agreement—such as that, presumably, on immigration—can be used as a guide to determine ways and means whereby provincial requirements might be satisfied in inland fisheries and personal bankruptcies.

The committee report lays out for all to see the set of principles which should guide governments in establishing a future regime in the remaining 11 fields: Culture, manpower training, and the now nine sisters: tourism, forestry, mining, recreation, housing, municipal urban affairs, regional development, energy, and family policy.

Such a new regime would carry out the intention of the government, which was as stated in its proposals: "..to recognize the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces" and "..how best to exercise its own responsibilities in a manner appropriate to the sector".

As to the guiding principles that would, as it were, reflect themselves in these agreements to be negotiated or proposed for at least seven fields of governmental activity, they appear to me to be the following. They are, in my view, quite significant. They certainly break new ground.

They are: Provincial leadership and provincial authority to control the initiation, design and delivery of programs in each field; withdrawal by the federal government from all or part of its activities; appropriate financial compensation by the Government of Canada to the province affected; future use of the federal spending power is to be conditional upon provincial consent; clarity now will inhibit the federal government initiatives in the future; and agreements reflecting these principles would be constitutionally effected.

The principles that I have outlined are not associated with each and every field of activity as outlined in the report, but it does not require much imagination to know that they will be the principles that will be invoked when such agreements are proposed in any of these eleven fields that I have mentioned. Of course, the objective is to bring about an attenuation of federal activities and federal spending in these fields.

Senator Beaudoin himself acknowledged that these ideas are a major assault on the federal spending power. That is what this exercise is principally about in all these fields. It is to restrain, through agreement, the activities of the federal government.

While on the subject of federal spending power, I should state that the proposal of the government on Canada-wide shared-cost programs and conditional grants was rejected and replaced by a version resembling the Meech Lake formulation in which appears, instead of "national standards", the still troublesome phrase "meeting national objectives".

Senator Murray: I do not like to interrupt so frequently, but of the nine sisters, as the honourable senator calls them, how many, if any, would be under exclusive federal jurisdiction? Most of them, including family policy, municipal affairs, housing, mining and energy, are already, at least in large part, within the provincial jurisdiction under our Constitution.

Senator MacEachen: That is quite clear and it is made clear in the government proposals. One asks oneself why the federal government chose all these fields of activity which were, in the main under the law, fields of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. The answer, of course, is that they are fields in which the federal government is very active through the use of the federal spending power and that the purpose of putting them forward in these proposals, at least as I interpret the intention of the government, is to achieve a considerable federal withdrawal of activities in these fields, particularly in the province of Quebec. That is certainly the interpretation that is clear from the committee report and that is clear from the discussion.

Senator Murray: There are other ways of putting that.

Senator MacEachen: Yes, there are other ways. Instead of the federal government's restraining its spending power, one can say that one must fully respect the exclusive provincial jurisdiction. But the reality is that the Government of Canada, through the spending power, has a full right to be active in these fields, and it has so been proclaimed by the courts. That is the reality.

Senator Murray: "Full exercise" is inconsistent with "the division of powers". That is a matter for interpretation.

Senator MacEachen: That is not just Justice Dickson speaking, I trust.

I can understand and fully accept what Senator Murray has said, that these are areas, in the main, of provincial jurisdiction, but they were chosen as the principal proposals by the Government of Canada and the committee, given this mandate, attempted to try to make some sense of them in terms of the evolving opinion that we met, both at the conferences and before the committee, taking into account what seems to be a very strong attitude in Canada at the present time that there should not be a general devolution of powers to the provinces. There was only occasional support for that. I think that Senator Beaudoin acknowledged that in his report.

I should say a word on other proposals that Senator Beaudoin has mentioned. On the residual power the answer of the committee is no. On the declaratory power the answer is divided. On interdelegation the answer, though positive, is replete with safeguards suggesting considerable apprehension on the part of members of the committee with respect to the concept of interdelegation.

What is my opinion about these proposals on powers? I think they go very far. And it may be, when they are all taken together, that they have gone too far and they may have overloaded the system at the present time, because they do have considerable implications for the reorganization of the exercise of power, including the spending power, and they have not only financial but political implications.

It may be that they have not yet sunk in. When they do sink in I think people will be more inclined to agree with the Prime Minister that the impact of this report is substantial than to agree with others who have stated that it is too vague. I have the further view that, because of the large number of areas chosen, and because of the variety of techniques suggested for the achievement of objectives, we have put an obstacle, unintentionally, in the way of having people easily understand what has been proposed.

In any event, what about the Senate? Insofar as the committee is concerned, it might as well have held its hearings on another planet, because the committee report failed to listen to the west and to the Atlantic, and it confirmed that in the Parliament of a renewed Canada, Quebec and Ontario will continue to prevail even when vital regional interests are at stake. The committee failed in its task with respect to the Senate by recommending an elected, ineffective, inequitable Senate.

The Conservative members on the committee must bear the principal responsibility for this outcome. I must say that I was very surprised. It is no excuse to say that the NDP joined them in the conclusion. The NDP have come a long way in even contemplating the existence of a second chamber, let alone one with power. Until recently, members of the NDP could hardly utter the word "Senate" without foaming at the mouth.

The committee did not listen. It did not listen to what they heard in the east, in all the Atlantic provinces and in the west, and it did not listen to what it heard at the Calgary conference. The Calgary Conference on Institutional Reform supported the government's proposal that legislation, as a general rule, be approved by both the House of Commons and the Senate, and it opposed prohibiting the Senate from dealing with money bills or issues of national importance.

The Calgary conference went beyond the proposals of the Government of Canada. There were seven workshops at the conference and only one of them concluded that a suspensive veto would make the Senate sufficiently effective. There was an overriding consensus that the Senate must be effective so as to provide a strong voice at the federal level for regional interests.

What is surprising to me is that the Conservative members rejected the proposals of the government. They rejected the wish of the Calgary Conference which wanted more powers for an elected Senate than those recommended by the government. I cannot understand that outcome and, quite frankly, I do not. What I do understand is that the outcome has placed a major obstacle in the way of constitutional settlement if these proposals are pushed by the government.

The government originally proposed that an elected Senate should have the power to defeat all bills except those of particular national importance, which it could delay for six months but could not defeat. Appropriation bills and bills flowing from a budget were not to come to the Senate except, as stated later by Mr. Clark, bills concerning legislation such as the GST and the NEP which altered in a fundamental way the tax system. It was made clear in early testimony that the definition of appropriation bills would be narrow and include only those emanating from supply. Subsequently in his speech at the Calgary conference, Mr. Clark came down on the side of a narrow interpretation of matters of national importance, with the result, according to his analysis, that in the last three years only eight of 96 bills would be affected under the rubric of national importance, and most of these would not be of great importance. Eight would fall under the category of national importance and would, therefore be subject to a suspensive veto.

The process of the definition of appropriation bills and "national importance" was significant in widening the legislative scope of a new, elected Senate. In his Calgary speech Mr. Clark made the point as follows:

> The powers we propose are substantial. We have reviewed the bills that have come before the Senate over the last three years. There were 96. A Senate like the one we propose would have had a veto over almost 80 per cent of those bills, and an absolute veto over 70 per cent.

In other words, the Senate could have defeated 70 per cent of those bills. If it so wished, it would have the constitutional authority under the proposals made by Mr. Clark and the government. That is my commentary.

I go back to Mr. Clark, who concluded by saying, "Legitimize by democratic authority, that is real power." Well, Mr. Clark's real power expressed in the over 70 per cent and the absolute veto is now zero in the committee's recommendation, because the committee has totally removed the concept of an absolute veto. It is totally a suspensive veto. The House of Commons, in the words of Senator Beaudoin, will always have the last word.

Mr. Clark also spoke of the purpose of the Senate, which is to balance the weight of the most populated provinces. We have yet to be told how a renewed Senate, equipped only with a suspensive veto, can ever balance the weight of the most populated provinces because they, through their majority in the House of Commons, will always have the last word. Under this idea the new Senate could disagree, but it would be only temporary because the Commons would then say, "We want to decide this matter. We have heard you but we do not agree with you, and therefore we are going our own way."

In Calgary, having heard this analysis by Mr. Clark there, I asked for and was given detailed information that backed up his general assertions that the new Senate would have real power. I must say I was encouraged. I had thought that in his analysis the concept of a Senate with real power had come quite far. Nevertheless, I thought that there were certain things that had to be dealt with, including the ability of an elected Senate to have some role in tax, borrowing and supply matters. I was impressed with what Mr. Clark said at the Calgary conference. All the participants heard him and they said, "We want you to give more power to the Senate than you have proposed. We do not agree with the government that the Senate should have no role in taxing, borrowing and supply matters."

Now we have this major retreat by the committee, rejecting as it does Mr. Clark and the Calgary conference. I venture to say that no other major finding by a conference, whether in Halifax, Montreal or Toronto, has been rejected by the committee in the way it rejected the major findings of the Calgary conference on the question of Senate powers. That was a major finding. In Calgary, they wanted an elected Senate, an equitable Senate and an effective Senate with real power. That was overlooked. Of course, the committee has not helped the cause of Senate reform. It has given it a major setback.

In my opinion, the abolition of the Senate is now a better alternative than the kind of Senate described in the committee report which, though elected, will have less power than the hereditary nonelected British House of Lords in a unitary state, and that is a fact.

In defense of its bizarre conclusions, I heard one committee member from the House of Commons state that even though the new Senate would not have effective legislative power in the Constitution, its status as a body of elected persons was bound to give it power. I am not convinced. I asked that member of the House of Commons to consider the plight of the 137 members of the opposition parties in the House of Commons at the present time. They are all elected. How much power do they have legislatively? Very little; none, I think, except when it suits the government. That is the way it has been and will be for a long time.

An elected Senate with a suspensive veto will join the ranks of the elected members of the opposition parties who, though elected, have their views consistently rejected by a government which disagrees with their views.

The purpose of an elected Senate giving power to the regions is to permit the regions to say no occasionally and to make it stick. Otherwise, why bother? That is my view. I thought we were getting there, but the committee gave us a big setback. I favoured an equal number of seats for each province in a new Senate. That was unattainable and I accordingly strove to come as close as possible to equality. That is why I and other Liberal members of the committee supported a distribution of seats for the provinces as follows: Four for Prince Edward Island, eight for all other provinces, except Ontario and Quebec with 16 each, and one each for the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, a total of 94 seats.

I regard all of the options outlined in the report as not so good, and I do not recommend certain of the options calling for a Senate of 154 members. It cannot be taken seriously. It can only be based on the assumption that if we are going to have an effective Senate with no real power, then its numbers can be greatly increased.

May I conclude, honourable senators, by saying a word about the process which we have all gone through and which we survived under the leadership of Senator Beaudoin. I think it is important to say a word about the process. Because of the deadline set by Parliament, the preparation of the report was telescoped into a limited time frame, causing the abandonment of reasonable procedures and their replacement by ad hoc and at times bizarre arrangements. The result was that a lot fell between the cracks, to say the least.

Upon conclusion of the final hearings in Ottawa, a group of members of the committee, consisting of representative of both houses and the three political parties and called the drafting committee, was charged with the responsibility of producing a final report for submission to the full committee. After several meetings of the drafting committee, it was clear that whatever progress could be made was being made. You had to be quite generous in making that conclusion. Whatever progress was being made was at a snail's pace and at the price of declining goodwill and increasing frustration within the drafting committee. Something had to be done.

The opposition members then said to the government members, "You produce the report, show it to us, and we will tell you what we think." That occurred about 11 o'clock on the night of February 19. That was a fateful decision, though necessitated, as I said, by the decline of consensus building within the drafting committee and the rapid approach of the deadline for the report. By that decision, we got on a merry-go-round, and we could not get off. From then on, neither the drafting committee as a whole nor the full committee ever met for the purpose of discussing the report or resolving the difficulties and differences which now abounded, not only within each party, but among the parties themselves.

The evolving draft text, which changed more rapidly than the weather system at Lake Ainslie, and which was kept in a central location for the purpose of preserving its confidentiality, could be received by members of the committee from the staff and examined on site by committee members. To avoid press leaks, no members of the committee could take the text out of the room. Nevertheless, faithful accounts of the evolving text regularly appeared in the press.

Well, I gave up very early on that arrangement. I did so following a full afternoon reading until almost 6 o'clock the then text, several hours' worth, only to be told later by my colleagues that my efforts were overtaken by a new text bearing the time of 5.45 of the same day. Another colleague, I think on the Thursday of the final week, called up at about 2.30, with the intention of reading the then text. He was advised, "Wait until 4 o'clock. We expect a new text by then."

Keeping informed in a responsible way on new substantive additions to the text was difficult enough. It was impossible in the time available to reach responsible judgments on the implications of adding, for example, regional development to the list of powers for which intergovernmental agreements could be negotiated, and involving, conceivably, a drastic limitation of the role of the federal government in such a politically sensitive field.

In these circumstances, the sole method of communication was through a single representative from each party who conveyed to the other parties the views and reactions of his colleagues to the evolving text of the committee report. The process ultimately ended up as three men in a room with legal advisors plus, I would imagine, the chairs of the committee.

I will just conclude by saying that the Liberal members held their final meeting as a group on Friday afternoon, February 28, at which we reached an agreement on all outstanding items and at which we discussed the main outlines of our dissent. Our final views were then conveyed by Mr. Ouellette, who, in continuation of his shuttle diplomacy to the other parties, did his best to have them incorporated into the final text.

We read on the following Monday, when the report was delivered to us, how well we had done. Our anticipation was somewhat similar to waiting to read the final chapter of a mystery thriller, whose conclusion was to be revealed to us in the final paragraphs. Now, that is the process.

The committee, I think, as a whole met for the last time on the Thursday, February, 11, and the drafting committee on February 17, and the process from that time on was conducted in camera behind closed doors. The last meeting of the drafting committee occurred on Wednesday, February 19. The full committee met in camera on the evening of February 27, at which meetings copies of the then text were distributed, following which we departed to our respective eyries to read it.

That was Friday. On Thursday night we had met in camera. The report was distributed to us, and we all went off separately in party caucuses to read the report. Then late on Friday the committee met again to hear from the party representatives that agreement on essentials had been reached and reflected in a rough draft and deposited with the committee clerks. The work of drafting continued on until the wee hours of Sunday morning, causing a postponement of the final press conference until Sunday afternoon. The committee members were not engaged in this final stage; hence the anticipation of reading the final report was akin to reaching the dénouement of a mystery thriller.

I think that this unusual conclusion of a committee report, which was intended to add to the process of understanding throughout the country, had to be concluded in the manner I have described. It simply urges us all never to become associated with deadlines in the future.

In conclusion, I should say, honourable senators, that it is true, as Senator Beaudoin has stated, that there are substantial items on which we are all agreed. He said that we had 90 per cent unanimity. In my view, I think it is not possible to put a percentage description on the extent of our agreement. We did agree on very many important items. We did disagree on other items, including the Senate and the sharing of powers. It is surprising that, in the light of our final process, we achieved as much. In view of the limitation of the process used in preparing the report, it is not surprising that members of the committee have a tenuous attachment to certain ideas and perceptions appearing in the committee report.

However, I would like to conclude by saying that, in my view, it would be unfortunate if the committee report, the work and some of the insights that are contained therein were ignored and if they were categorized in one-line descriptions without those descriptions being backed up by a serious examination of the proposals. I have tried to do that in only two fields, namely the division of powers and the Senate, but there are other very complicated areas still not covered by what I have said.

I thank honourable senators very much for their indulgence.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, debate adjourned.

[Senator MacEachen.]

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall, calling the attention of the Senate to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries: The Marketing of Fish in Canada "East Coast Fisheries", dated December 1989; and specifically as it relates to the recommendations applicable to the present state of the fish stocks due to foreign overfishing—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, last week Senator Marshall made a speech that deserves warm praise, from every point of view. The senator deserves this praise because when he refers to the problems of the Atlantic fisheries, he speaks from the heart. He also expressed his concern for the future facing the fishermen of Newfoundland and Labrador, and whether this generation and future generations will still have a future in the fisheries.

This is because cod and certain groundfish stocks are, we might as well admit it, becoming endangered species. Granted, during the past twenty or thirty years—some people would even say the past century—these fish stocks have been subject to cyclical changes whose causes we have not always been able to identify. Even today, many scientists say there are environmental factors we know so little about, unlike the environment on the surface of this planet which they claim to know quite well. I am not so sure about that, however, when I listen to the morning weather forecast by Environment Canada, which is usually far off the mark, compared with what actually transpires.

However, certain forecasts are important, because figures can be extrapolated for the population of certain species of fish on Canada's east coast, and on that basis quotas can be set for deep sea and inshore fisheries.

Recent protests, as Senator Marshall reminded us, came after a drastic cutback in fish quotas for the current year. People were quick to blame overfishing by certain foreign countries and foreign fishing vessels, with Spain and Portugal as the main culprits. In addition to these two countries, which are bound by an agreement, it was said that Korea, Mexico and other countries that do not belong to the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization, were also overfishing these fish stocks, especially cod.

I thought it was unusual and even a bit sad that Senator Marshall should call our attention to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries, and more specifically, its report on the east coast fisheries, the third report, dated December 1989, to demonstrate once again, five years after certain witnesses testified before the committee, that nothing has changed and that as far as conservation is concerned, we have made no progress at all. Even worse, during that time a number of ministers decided to completely ignore what experts had to say about a very serious situation.

For instance, we had a Fisheries Minister, Bernard Valcourt, who instead of looking at this with an open mind and accepting scientific evidence that cod stocks were at risk, treated the people who produced the Harris Report as a bunch of purists. He did not reduce cod quotas during the time he was Minister of Fisheries. Of course, this made him very popular with the owners of big trawlers. I imagine he was also popular with the captains of European and other fishing vessels, but in the long run, this led to the very serious crisis we have today, which has caused a general outcry, not only among fishermen on the east coast and plant workers in Newfoundland, especially, but throughout the political community in Atlantic Canada. The four Atlantic Premiers once again deplored the federal government's poor management of the coastal fisheries.

However, if the federal authorities had had the good sense to read and reflect on our 1989 report, they probably would have taken the necessary steps to prevent the depletion of our cod stocks. I may recall, with Senator Marshall, and I think this is extremely important, and it was also the focus of the arguments of the four Premiers, with the exception of the Premier of Prince Edward Island who refused to comment, but in any case, the Premiers of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick demanded that the federal government act on its responsibility in this area. This is entirely in line with the recommendation no. 6 of the Senate Fisheries Committee, which appears on page 66 of our report. I will give you the quote in French, if you will bear with me, it is on page 66. Here is recommendation no. 6, which was a major recommendation:

> (6) That the federal government step up sanctions beyond port closures, which they had been doing, and the curtailment of preferential access to surplus fish stocks within the 200-mile limit to bring pressure on those countries that overfish the so-called straddling stocks.

Those are the stocks that go over the 200-mile limit established by Canada. The recommendation continues:

> The Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans should develop a strategy to establish full functional Canadian fisheries jurisdiction over the whole continental shelf.

Honourable senators, I think that sooner or later Canada will have to extend its fisheries jurisdiction over the whole continental shelf, not only because some nations that adhere to the North Atlantic Fisheries Treaty do not follow the letter nor the spirit of this agreement, but also because those nations deliberately fish in an outright criminal fashion from an environmental and ecological point of view, in spite of being regularly reprimanded not only by Canada but by other nations who also fish in those waters off the Canadian coast. We are talking in particular about Portugal and Spain.

What can we do, given the lack of concern of those countries? The Premier of Newfoundland, Mr. Wells, has asked the federal government to send its armed forces. The Premier of Nova Scotia has made the same request. The Premier of New Brunswick has urged the federal government to exercise its full jurisdiction and to ensure that the international agreements and treaties are respected.

Unfortunately, the federal government seems to have been sleeping for five years. There has been this rather quick turnover of ministers in different portfolios who, unfortunately, do not know anything about fisheries on these East Coast of Canada. That is a fundamental problem.

We give this portfolio to incumbents who do not know anything and who are at the mercy of these so-called experts and of the political feelings in their region, and that is a serious mistake when you are faced with a critical situation such as that of the cod stocks on the East Coast.

So, the ministers keep changing; they go from one portfolio to another. But the Prime Minister of Canada remains in place. What has he done during this whole period?

He refuses to let our navy send a clear message to the Portuguese, the Spanish and the others who take advantage of the situation and overfish in a criminal fashion, as I said, thus jeopardizing the renewal of those stocks.

It seems to me that Senator Marshall's message was clearer. The political authority of the country, as well as the person who symbolizes this authority (I am not talking about the Queen or the Governor General; I am talking about the Prime Minister of Canada) must intervene vigorously, quickly and firmly to try to prevent once and for all these abuses in the field of fisheries.

Canadians themselves must exercise self-control—that goes without saying; they have often been reminded of it. Our report contained recommendations for better reporting and more accurate statistics.

Internationally, we must launch an offensive led by none other than the Prime Minister of Canada, the present incumbent and the one who will come after him.

I think that if the present Prime Minister is really interested in continuing to serve Canadians in the position of honour which we have entrusted to him, he must not react negatively by saying that we will not send destroyers and corvettes to teach a lesson to those engaged in criminal illegal fishing outside the 200-mile limit.

He must visit the leaders of those countries, Portugal, Spain and so on, sit down with their political leaders and tell them, "Listen, Canada has enough of being bothered by your fishermen. That's enough! You are endangering an ecological resource that is unique in the world's oceans, one that was exploited even before Canada's written history by Basque, Breton and Norman fishermen and by many others unknown to history.

It was talked about as an inexhaustible resource, in the same way as the passenger pigeons that darkened the sky and are no more today.

The Prime Minister of Canada, whoever he is, can take some glory from improving Canada's laws. He can improve its institutions. He can provide pensions and generous benefit programs for the less fortunate. But the Prime Minister of Canada who allows this extraordinary resource to die will have to answer to history.

For this reason, with Senator Marshall, the Maritime premiers, the fishermen and representatives of the factory and fish processing workers, I demand that the Prime Minister of Canada intervene vigorously, firmly and in sustained fashion as soon as possible, before it is too late.

Thank you, honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

TIBET

THIRTY-THIRD ANNIVERSARY OF NATIONAL UPRISING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino rose pursuant to notice of March 18, 1992:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the thirty-third anniversary of the Tibetan National Uprising.

He said: Honourable senators, thank you kindly for allowing me to speak at this late hour. I will not be too long.

Honourable senators, Tibet, the mythical Shangri-la, was a free and independent nation until 1949 when the Chinese sent their powerful army to enslave these defenceless people.

On March 10, 1959, 33 years ago, these peaceful men and women, after 10 years of brutal and deceitful occupation, rose to protect their lives, their rights and their heritage, only to be unmercifully crushed by the Chinese army.

In the summer of 1990, I was privileged to have experienced this majestic jewel sometimes called the "Land of Snows". What was to be the most wonderful and fulfilling experience of my life turned out to be—yes—fulfilling and wonderful, but also sad, frustrating and infuriating. In many corridors of that far away land, I met gentle, non-violent people at peace with themselves, their neighbours and their environment, people who seek enlightenment through non-violence and are in communion with all other living things. I met men, women and children with a rare honesty of spirit pursuing a way of life foreign to most western standards, which made me reassess my own values, too often based on material things. Most of them were nomads and country people away from the influence of their Chinese oppressors.

The people I met in the cities were still gentle and peace loving, but in their faces I saw fear and confusion.

My colleagues and I were approached many, many times by persons, especially monks, who with very few words and gestures gave us messages of despair. A few spoke some English and their words were particularly disturbing. We were told of killings, rapes and beatings. We were told of forced abortions and sterilizations. We were informed of outrageous human rights abuses, abuses which have received widespread acknowledgment and condemnation worldwide. Many have accused China of genocide.

A particular touching moment for me occurred in the capital city of Lhasa when visiting the Jhokung Monastery, Tibetan Buddhism's holiest place. In a dark corner, a crumpled note was thrust into my hand. When I looked around, I saw a young man with fear in his eyes awaiting my reaction. Let me read the note to you. It is headed up, "Tibet Free".

> Dear foreign guests and leaders from any countries of the world, we would like to give you a brief explanation of Tibet. There is no any doubt that Tibet has been an independent country from 7th century during the King Song Tsan Gon Pos reign, because we have an evidence which is still exist in front of Jhokung temple. There are three stone pillars. The taller of them carries bilingual inscription of the Tibetan-Chinese agreement. In this agreement, it is very clear that Tibet is independent country and way back over about many years of Chinese occupation, Tibetan people have no any human right as human kind should have but we have very strong courage to strive for independence so that we should continue to struggling with Chinese, because this is unavoidable duty of Tibetan. However, we hope to have any kinds of support from any countries of the world and to understand Tibet very clearly. Wish you have Tibet a nice trip in. Thank you very much—1990.

The grammar and some words may be incorrect, but the message is clear. It is a plea, a cry for help for an end to Tibet's nightmare.

The Tibetans want their freedom and independence. They want their rightful leader, the Dalai Lama, back. They want a stop to the oppression and the human rights abuses, a stop to the environmental devastation and to China's population transfer, a subtle form of genocide.

Tibet is one of the great tragedies of the century because it is so far away and, possibly because Tibetans are so gentle and non-violent, so very vulnerable, the world is mostly ignoring them.

On May 23, 1991, the U.S. Congress and the Senate passed the following concurrent resolution:

> Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), that it is the sense of the Congress that Tibet, including those areas incorporated into the Chinese provinces of Sichuan, Yunnan, Gansu, and Qinghai, is an occupied country under the established principle of international law whose true representatives are the Dalai Lama and the Tibetan government in exile as recognized by the Tibetan people.

● (1730)

The United Nations, on the 3rd of March, 1992, tabled the following resolution:

> Concerned at continuing reports of violations of human rights and fundamental freedoms in China, including severe restrictions on the rights of freedom of expression, religion, assembly and association, as well as measures which threaten the distinct cultural, religious and ethnic identity of persons belonging to minorities.

1. Takes notes of the summary records of the debates on this question during the forty-third session of the Sub-Commision;

2. Also takes note of the note by the Secretary-General on the subject;

3. Further takes note of the reports of the Special Rapporteurs on torture, on summary or arbitrary executions, on religious intolerance, and the report of the Working Group on Enforced or Involuntary Disappearances.

4. Calls on the Government of the People's Republic of China to take measures to ensure the full observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms of Tibetans, as well as those of all its other citizens;

5. Invites the Government of the People's Republic of China to continue to respond to requests by special rapporteurs for information;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the Commission on Human Rights at its forty-ninth session on the situation in China, particularly Tibet.

His holiness the Dalai Lama has proposed the following Five Point Peace Plan:

1. Transformation of the whole of Tibet into a zone of peace;

2. Abandonment of China's population transfer policy which threatens the very existence of the Tibetans as a people;

3. Respect for the Tibetan people's fundamental human rights and democratic freedoms;

4. Restoration and protection of Tibet's natural environment and the abandonment of China's use of Tibet for the production of nuclear weapons and dumping of nuclear waste;

5. Commencement of earnest negotiations on the future status of Tibet and of relations between the Tibetan and Chinese peoples.

The Dalai Lama's peace plan is a very reasonable proposal, one all governments should find easy to support.

Honourable senators, those of us who have experienced the people and culture of this wonderful corner of our world have been forever changed. On behalf of that young man in the Jhokung Monastery and all other Tibetans, I urge our government and the rest of the world not to abandon our distant brothers and sisters.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was very interested in the comments of Senator Di Nino. I wonder if he would permit a few questions. I am sorry, he may have said it at the outset of his speech, but if so, I missed it. Could he tell us when he was in Tibet and was it a private trip or was it an official delegation?

Senator Di Nino: I was in Tibet in the summer of August 1990 on a private visit.

Senator Molgat: I have a subsequent question to that, because of some of the problems that arose recently with Canadian Parliamentarians visiting China: Was he able to move about freely and talk to whomever he wanted?

Senator Di Nino: If I can take a moment to just explain to you that the visit was an authorized visit, as all must be, as I understand. No private visits of individuals are allowed in Tibet, but the Chinese government does allow groups to go in. I guess they need the hard currency.

The organization which sponsored this particular trip is the Sierra Club, an environmental club out of California. Six Americans and I travelled through other parts of Asia, but in particular the Tibet trip that we are talking about was accompanied by both a Chinese and a Tibetan guide. The guides were there at all times. Most of the trip took place principally as a hike through the mountains. We did a trek to the base of Mount Everest. But when we got to the cities, we were given pretty good freedom to move around, although one of the guides was always with us.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Could I also ask a question of Senator Di Nino relating to the resolution of Congress? May I ask if he is prepared to move such a resolution here in the Senate because, if so, I would be glad to support it.

Senator Di Nino: I would be prepared to move a resolution of that nature. It would certainly please my Tibetan friends in Canada. But in particular, I would hope, as the Dalai Lama has asked, that the countries basically recognize his peace plan. I believe that would be a more appropriate resolution, rather than to copy one from a different country.

Senator Frith: I suppose they might be put together. The wording of the U.S. Congress resolution could be a part of the resolution of this house by preamble or otherwise, and still incorporate the five-point peace plan.

Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO PERMIT ELECTRONIC MEDIA COVERAGE OF CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP STUDY ADOPTED

Hon. Paul David, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, March 18, 1992, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be empowered to authorize the coverage of its public proceedings on Canadian citizenship by photographers and electronic news media, without disrupting the proceedings too much.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should simply like to ask Senator David a question. I thought he might give us an explanation.

The committee has been sitting for some time now, has it not? In view of the fact that hearings have already been held, why are you only making this request at this time? Or I am mistaken?

Senator David: You are not completely mistaken, only partially, considering that the first sitting of that particular committee was held last Tuesday. Our next meeting, at which time evidence will be heard, is scheduled for this evening, at six o'clock. It is because of special circumstances that this motion, which incidentally was tabled on March 18, could be presented earlier for concurrence.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL FINANCE

SEVENTH REPORT

Tuesday, March 24 , 1992

The Standing Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

SEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which were referred the expenditures proposed by the Estimates for the fiscal year ending 31 March 1992, with the exception of Privy Council Vote 15 (Official Languages), has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of 13 June 1991, examined the said Estimates and herewith presents its final report.

Background

Following the reconstitution of your Committee on October 24, 1991, members decided to undertake a study of Public Service reform and the Public Service 2000 initiative. A number of individuals were invited to testify during November and December, and hearings resumed after the Senate returned from the Christmas adjournment in mid-February. The witnesses have included: deputy ministers and other senior officials of the Privy Council Office, the Treasury Board Secretariat, the Canadian Centre for Management Development, the Public Service Commission, and several line departments; the Auditor General of Canada; and representatives of Public Service unions and the Public Policy Forum. These hearings are continuing, and your Committee plans to table a report on the study prior to the summer adjournment.

The use of Treasury Board Vote 5 - Government Contingencies, and the reporting of such use to Parliament, have been of interest to your Committee for several years.[1] In effect, by approving Vote 5 in the Main Estimates, Parliament provides a contingency fund to the Treasury Board that can be used at the government's discretion to supplement the votes of departments and agencies. The wording of the vote in the Public Accounts is as follows:

> Government Contingencies - Subject to the approval of the Treasury Board, to supplement other votes for paylist and other requirements and to provide for miscellaneous minor and unforeseen expenses not otherwise provided for including awards under the Public Servants Inventions Act and authority to re-use any sums allotted for non-paylist requirements and repaid to this appropriation from other appropriations.[2]

The "other appropriations," from which Vote 5 is repaid in respect of non-paylist allocations, normally must appear in the next set of supplementary estimates, prior to the end of the fiscal year in which the allocations were made. Although Treasury Board formally requests Parliament's approval of such appropriations through the supplementary estimates, they are really information items, since the money already has been transferred to another vote and in effect spent. Thus the purpose of Parliament's approval is to reimburse Vote 5 in order that the full amount approved in the Main Estimates for non-paylist requirements may be available for subsequent "miscellaneous minor and unforeseen expenses."[3]

Because allocations for non-paylist requirements from Vote 5 are reimbursed through supplementary estimates -- normally presented to Parliament a minimum of three times per year -- it is possible for the annual total of such allocations to exceed substantially the actual size of the vote approved by Parliament at the time of Main Estimates. Indeed, if the Treasury Board were to use the entire amount of the vote for reimbursable, non-paylist requirements in each of the periods between the three sets of supplementary estimates, and if Parliament approved the full amounts of those supplementary estimates, the expenditures under Vote 5 could theoretically be three times larger than the vote approved in Main Estimates. Concern over the implications for parliamentary control of expenditure represented by this possibility, and a corollary interest in whether the size and use of Vote 5 had increased over time, led your Committee to ask Treasury Board officials for detailed historical tables on Vote 5 and to prepare this report.

Paylist Requirements

One principal use of the Government Contingencies Vote is to supplement other votes to make up for paylist shortfalls.[4] When the salary budgets of individual programs are established for the Main Estimates, full provision is made for previously negotiated salary increases that will become effective during the forthcoming fiscal year. Invariably, however, there are employee groups for which contract settlements have not been reached or for which existing contracts will expire during the year. In such cases, the salary budgets of the affected departments are provided with a standard amount that tends to underestimate actual salary awards. Salary budgets also include provision for pay-related benefits such as severance pay, maternity benefits and overtime, which can fluctuate dramatically.

This practice generally results in paylist shortfalls for particular programs, even though the level of program activity has not increased beyond that approved in the Main Estimates. The shortfalls are then made good by allocations from Vote 5 to the affected departments. According to the Treasury Board, inclusion of paylist allocations in subsequent supplementary estimates > would require the inclusion . . . of items in identical terms for most departments and agencies and would result in an inordinate increase in the size of the supplementary estimates document without a corresponding increase in its informative character. It is for this reason that allotments for paylist purposes are not recouped.[5]

Accordingly, transfers from the Contingencies Vote to other votes for paylist purposes remain as permanent charges to the Vote at year-end and are so recorded in the Public Accounts. In 1990-91, for example, departments and agencies received a total of $576.4 million, most of it to cover additional paylist requirements associated with a substantial pay equity award.[6] The level of Vote 5 was set unusually high in the 1990-91 Main Estimates in anticipation of this award, and the Vote was not reimbursed in respect of these payments through supplementary estimates.

Miscellaneous Minor and Unforeseen Expenses (Non-Paylist Requirements)

The other principal use of the Government Contingencies Vote is to pay for "miscellaneous minor and unforeseen expenses" of departments and agencies. Under this authority, the Treasury Board can provide funding from Vote 5 for any number of items not provided for in existing appropriations. The Treasury Board has expressed the view that its use of the Contingencies Vote for these non-paylist purposes "has intentionally been much more restrictive than that authorized by Parliament."[7] By this is meant that the Treasury Board is authorized to use Vote 5 without returning to Parliament for further authority; the expenses incurred would then be permanent charges to the Vote, and would appear as such in the Public Accounts. The Board's explanation continues:

> Although a later section of the vote provides authority to reuse sums which are repaid from other appropriations, there is no requirement that such sums be repaid or that the items funded be included in Supplementary Estimates . . . In practice, however, the contingencies vote has been used as a temporary funding mechanism pending approval of Supplementary Estimates. Only in rare cases, when timing prohibited the subsequent passage of Supplementary Estimates, has the Vote been used to make permanent transfers for reasons other than paylist shortfalls. The one exception to this rule is its rare use for

"awards under the Public Service Inventions Act" which are permanent charges to the Vote.[8]

A department may seek access to the Contingencies Vote at the same time as it receives approval to include an item in supplementary estimates. This may be because it has an urgent cash requirement but an insufficient balance remaining in the applicable departmental appropriation. Alternatively, if the department lacks sufficient authority to make a specific payment, the Treasury Board may authorize access to the Contingencies Vote pending passage of the Appropriation Act that grants the necessary authority. In either case, the Board requests reimbursement of the Vote in the next supplementary estimates, where it indicates the previous uses of the Vote in footnotes under the applicable departments that state, "Funds in the amount of $X were advanced from the Treasury Board Contingencies vote to provide temporary funding in this Program."[9]

The use of the Contingencies Vote as a temporary funding mechanism, and the reimbursement of the Vote through subsequent appropriations, have the advantage that parliamentary scrutiny of Vote 5 allocations normally is provided at least three times a year when supplementary estimates are tabled. An attendant disadvantage, since supplementary estimates are invariably approved without change, is that Parliament, perhaps unwittingly, permits the Treasury Board to re-use the full amount of the Contingencies Vote (less paylist requirements) for further "miscellaneous minor and unforeseen expenses." The amount requested under Vote 5 is normally about 1 per cent of voted budgetary Main Estimates, except when unusually large paylist requirements are anticipated. However, as the attached table, "T.B. Vote 5 - Government Contingencies," indicates, the Board's authority to re-use the non-paylist portion enables it to spend considerably more than the authorized amount of the Vote in most fiscal years. For example, in 1989-90, the Vote level was $360 million, or 0.84 per cent of Main Estimates, but paylist and non-paylist expenditures for the year totalled $842.8 million, or 2.0 per cent of Main Estimates. In 1990-91, Vote 5 was set at $775 million, or 1.75 per cent of Main Estimates, because it included an extra $375 million for the Equal Pay initiative. Paylist requirements, as mentioned above, totalled $576.4 million, leaving only $198.6 million for miscellaneous minor and unforeseen items. Because of the reimbursement and re-use provision, however, miscellaneous minor and unforeseen items amounted to $818.0 million. When the paylist requirements were added, total expenditures under Vote 5 were $1.394 billion, or 3.1 per cent of the Estimates.

When setting the amount of the Government Contingencies Vote at the time of the Main Estimates, the Treasury Board presumably takes account of Parliament's willingness to vote appropriations in supplementary estimates that have the effect of reimbursing the Vote. An examination of the uses of the Vote during the eleven years 1980-81 to 1990-91 inclusive shows that only in 1988-89, when paylist requirements were unusually small, did expenditures under the Vote fall short of the amount originally approved. It should also be noted that, because non-paylist allocations under Vote 5 are reimbursed by subsequent departmental appropriations and do not constitute a permanent charge against the Vote, they do not appear in the Public Accounts. However, Treasury Board officials have advised the Committee that they prepare a comprehensive, annual report for the Auditor General on the uses of Vote 5 during the previous fiscal year.

Recommendation

The Committee recommends that the Treasury Board Secretariat provide to the Senate National Finance Committee, as soon as possible following the end of each fiscal year, a complete report on the uses made of Treasury Board Vote 5 - Government Contingencies during that year, to include the following information:

- Details of amounts transferred from Vote 5 to supplement provisions of other votes, showing, by department, the amount, the vote supplemented and the purpose of the vote; these transfers to be tabulated for both paylist requirements, which are permanent charges to Vote 5, and miscellaneous minor and unforeseen expenses, which are normally reimbursed through supplementary estimates appropriations (this information could be tabulated in the form currently published in the Public Accounts for paylist requirements only);

- A historical review of allocations from Vote 5, for the current and at least ten previous fiscal years, showing:

- the amounts of voted budgetary Main Estimates;

- the level of Vote 5 in the Main Estimates, along with any additional amounts voted in supplementary estimates;

- Vote 5 as a percentage of voted budgetary Main Estimates;

- paylist, non-paylist and total Vote 5 allocations, including any amounts paid under the Public Service Inventions Act;

- the amounts of total voted supplementary estimates;

- non-paylist Vote 5 allocations as a percentage of total voted supplementary estimates; and

- the amounts of Vote 5 that were lapsed at the end of the fiscal year; together with any necessary explanatory notes.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC
The Chairman

9. As recently as 1989, such footnotes were supplied only in respect of Vote 5 allocations to cover grants authorized in advance of the supplementary estimates. Since that time, the Treasury Board has expanded the use of footnotes to include most categories of expenditure. It is therefore possible in principle, by adding up the footnoted items, to determine total non-paylist allocations from Vote 5 that have been authorized by the Board since the previous main or supplementary estimates.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the clock is still ticking. A democracy-respecting government, which we hope this one is, has 241 more days of life. However, if, as some contend, this government is cowardly and contemptuous of democracy, to use Senator Murray's—

Senator Simard: Will you stop that foolishness?

Senator Frith: You caught me at exactly the right time. I was just going to quote Senator Murray when you used the word "foolish". How appropriate. You have an unerring sense of timing, Senator Simard. So the time remaining for this cowardly, contemptuous and, as Senator Simard would describe it, foolish government is 627 days.

Hon. Michel Cogger: Honourable senators, if anyone is interested and if the good Lord smiles upon him, the Honourable Senator Frith will be in this house for an additional 2,423 days.

Senator Frith: And how about you, sir?

Senator Gigantès: Have you given up on Senate reform?

Senator Cogger: I have not figured out my number of days, but I will be here to pay tribute on the day the honourable senator leaves.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I wish to contradict my friend on this side, because I have done a very careful count, and we on the government side—

Senator Hastings: You few.

Senator Barootes: —will only have to suffer the present Leader of the Opposition, I say, for 2068 days. We can count it again. At the end of 2068 days the government, the PC government sitting on this side of the Senate, will have disposed of Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: Why doesn't everyone stand up and say how long they will be here, how they meet the "Cogger" test?

THE ECONOMY

ABOLITION OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I want to pass from the tragedy of the possible length of your stay in office to something that is more interesting to consider. I want to talk about the abolition of the Economic Council of Canada.

Senator Hastings: Shame!

Senator Gigantès: All of us are either successful acquisitors or unsuccessful acquisitors. Throughout history the successful acquisitors have been able to push the unsuccessful acquisitors around. Not to put a moral point on it, the unsuccessful acquisitors would have liked to be in the shoes of the successful acquisitors.

When democracy was invented, it gave one vote per person, whether they were successful or unsuccessful acquisitors. The successful acquisitors began having serious problems until they realized that the good old method of controlling information, of giving insufficient or slanted information to the unsuccessful acquisitors, could help them win votes. Hence, Conservative victories in various countries time and time again. I mean, the people of the United States elected Reagan; the people of Britain elected Mrs. Thatcher, and the people of Canada elected Mr. Mulroney, and therefore have deserved all the hard times that have come since.

The Economic Council's days were numbered when it told the truth about your free trade agreement. They produced a study which said that, if the free trade agreement went through, then the number of jobs created in addition to those that would normally be created over ten years would be something like 100,000. They specified in a footnote what that would be in addition to, and it turned out, as I pointed out in those days, that they were saying the growth rate of jobs in the first ten years of the free trade agreement would be lower than the growth rate of jobs in the preceding ten years.

Even worse, they said in another part of their report that, should we not sign the agreement and the Americans took the worst possible retaliation they could take, in those same ten years 10,000 fewer jobs would have been created. That is 1,000 fewer per year than if we signed the agreement. Now, that was truly undercutting the false information the government and all the successful acquisitors on its side were buying advertising to give.

The second time the Economic Council put a gun to its head was when it said two reports ago that you cannot solve the economic problems of this country, indeed of any country, if you do not deal with the problem of unemployment. Now, this goes against the doctrine of the successful acquisitors, who have been successful as acquisitors because the only thing that ever mattered to them was acquiring money, because they considered human beings and machines as the same sort of thing: factors of production.

Once it had told the truth, the Economic Council broke the rule of the acquisitors, and they had to fire it.

THE ESTIMATES, 1991-92

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C) PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Fernand Leblanc: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its eighth report concerning its review of Supplementary Estimates (C) for 1991-92.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates and Minutes of the Proceedings of this day and form part of the permanent records of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, p. 1182).

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Leblanc (Saurel), report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

TENTH REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the following report:

Wednesday, March 25, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its

TENTH REPORT

Your Committee recommends that Contingency Plans for Emergencies in the Senate be adopted and implemented.

The principal feature of the Plans, if adopted, would be for the Senate Protective Service to organize and train itself to handle any security matter up to life-threatening situations. The Plans would also permit the Senate Protective Service to call for assistance from outside authorities, such as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Ottawa Fire Department. This would be in cases of life-threatening situations.

This is a significant change ot Senate security policy. If the Plans are adopted, the Senate Protective Service will develop training procedures with the House of Commons and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to coordinate the implementation of these Contingency Plans.

Respectfully submitted,

THÉRÈSE LAVOIE-ROUX
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Lavoie-Roux, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

FISHERIES

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Eileen Rossiter, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries, tabled the committee's report concerning the expenses incurred by the committee during the second session of the Thirty-Fourth Parliament.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have petitions headed:

> The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your Petitioners . . .

That is the normal heading. It refers to the 7 per cent Goods and Services Tax adopted by the Conservative government.

It cites the unprecedented assault on the income of Canadians and prays and calls upon the Senate to reject the Goods and Services Tax. It states also that Canadian producers are carrying out their job by flooding the market with product, but that they cannot produce money.

The wording is not exactly the same as all previous petitions on this subject, but is like many previous ones.

The particulars are as follows. The Quebec petitions are from Asbestos, Danville, Drummondville, Durham Sud, East Farnham, Richmond, St-Hyacinthe, Thetford Mines and Trois Lacs. The New Brunswick petitions are from Grand Bay, Hampton, Queens County and St. John.

The summary is as follows. From Quebec there are five petitions with a total of 76 names. From New Brunswick there are eight petitions with a total of 147 names. The totals for today are: 13 petitions, 223 signatures.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I also have the privilege of presenting petitions signed by 518 residents of Ontario who object to the goods and gervices tax. Most of these petitions are from Toronto, Willowdale, Pickering and Mississauga.

Honourable senators, I have another petition signed by 1,441 residents of Ontario who object to the goods and services tax. It is really too bad I don't have time to comment. The petition itself is rather interesting. It has three columns, and each petitioner could check off what he would ask the Prime Minister to do.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: You don't have time. It's against the rules.

Senator Hébert: Honourable senator, I simply wanted to point out that you might find this interesting reading. So there are three columns which indicate, respectively: Kill the GST, Hold a Referendum, Call an Election. Petitioners were practically unanimous on all three columns. Thank you.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FIRST MINISTERS MEETING—ATTENDANCE OF PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On March 18 last, in reference to the fact that the Prime Minister was only able to clear one day to deal with the economy at a meeting with the premiers, I asked the following question of the Leader of the Government:

> Can the people of Canada infer from this that the Prime Minister and his government place a higher priority on solving the constitutional problems of Canada than on Canada's serious economic problems?

The Speaker then intervened, saying:

> Honourable senators, before the Leader of the Government answers the question, I must advise you that the 30 minutes allotted for Question Period have now expired.

As it turned out, the Leader of the Government proceeded not to answer the question, although he did say:

> I am sure the Leader of the Opposition would agree, honourable senators, that the two issues—the unity of the country and economic prosperity—are intimately related.

There was no possibility of following up on the question at that time. I can say, of course, that this and many other issues are linked, but that does not deal with the question. We have a follow-up because I now understand that included in these perhaps intimately related issues is the question of Mr. Mulroney's visit to New York, which was a two-day visit. This was more time than the Prime Minister was able to give to the premiers to discuss the economy.

What I want to press here is the priorities being given. On the same basis, can we infer that a meeting in New York with United States journalists and others and the unity of the country—that is, the constitutional issue—both take priority over economic prosperity? It would seem they do on the basis of the time devoted to them by the Prime Minister.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The Leader of the Opposition appears to forget that this is the third occasion in less than four months that the Prime Minister and the provincial premiers have been meeting.

Senator Frith: It might also easily be the third or fourth occasion that he has devoted time to the United States, to United States press, and to other issues. That is hardly the point. The point is, can we infer from the time spent on these issues that there is a priority, and that the economy of the country apparently is at least third in that order of priority?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition was asking me the other day—and is asking me again today—to try to quantify, in some fashion that would perhaps be suitable for a computer, the priority that one attaches to the unity of the country, on the one hand, and the prosperity of the country on the other. It is not a matter of assigning a greater or lesser priority to one over the other. The vast majority of Canadians would agree that both of these considerations are vital, and I think they would agree with me, upon reflection, that the two are intimately linked.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not know the basis upon which the Leader of the Government claims that most Canadians would not have any priorities on these questions because, as a matter of fact, polls show that Canadians do have priorities and that their priority is the economy.

But I take it that we have a government in power now with no sense of priorities on these subjects. I think it is reasonable to infer from the answers given by the Leader of the Government that although Canadians apparently do in fact have such priorities, the government does not.

NECESSITY OF ELECTION BEFORE FINALIZING AGREEMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, speaking of priorities and ticking clocks, is the government prepared to have an election before it finally negotiates and signs a North American free trade agreement?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should have thought my honourable friend had been chastened by his last experience in that regard, when "Let the people decide" was the great cry. The people did decide in 1988.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am glad to hear the Leader of the Government laughing that one off, because we would be glad to be re-chastened. Please, make us an offer. Just try it, and we will be quite happy to be re-chastened if it turns out that way.

So the answer is that the government does not want to have an election before it enters into this agreement that will have serious and broad consequences for Canadians, because it does not want to re-chasten the opposition.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is important that we be present and involved in those trade talks, if only to defend our own interests. We think that there is a considerable amount to be gained for Canada and for all of North America with freer trade. Of course we believe that. It is fundamental to our government's policy.

Having said that, I should point out again that less than 2 per cent of our trade is with Mexico.

Senator Doody: It is 1 per cent.

Senator Frith: According to Mr. Wilson it is 2 per cent.

Senator Murray: While there are opportunities for us here, the honourable senator should not try to describe the outcome of the negotiations in such grand terms.

Senator Frith: I take it, then, that again the people of Canada can infer that the government analyzes the importance of the NAFTA negotiations on a scale of two out of 100 in importance to Canadians. Is that right?

Senator Roblin: This is a sophomoric discussion.

Senator Frith: Oh, well, the postgraduate huffs his way out by calling questions sophomoric.

Senator Molgat: The minister is not going to respond?

Senator Frith: What was the answer?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators—

Senator Frith: You picked the 2 per cent figure; I did not.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I pointed out that less than 2 per cent of our trade is with Mexico and I cautioned the honourable senator not to attach more importance than is warranted to the negotiations and to the outcome of those negotiations, in reply to which I believe he made a comment which I did not hear. But in any case, I think it does not demand a reply from me.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, let us be sure we understand the answer that was given. As to the importance of the NAFTA negotiations and the need for an election before such an important step is taken, the answer was that, in effect, it is only important to the extent of the 2 per cent of our trade that we have with Mexico. The answer that was given was that we should not blow it beyond the proportion of 2 per cent. If that is the answer, namely, that this government considers that the consequences of the North American free trade negotiations amount to 2 on a scale of 100, then that answer is recorded.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I was terribly encouraged to see Senator Molgat rise a few moments ago. I was encouraged to think that in the 30 minutes that we have at our disposal for Question Period the Leader of the Opposition was going to allow one of his colleagues to ask a question.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Frith: What a pompous—there is a "P" word that goes with that.

DRAFT REPORT—AVAILABILITY OF TEXT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question concerns the trade agreement. Yesterday I asked the minister questions about Premier Filmon, the Conservative Premier of Manitoba, having received the draft of the Mexican-U.S.-Canadian trade deal. Could he inform us if he has found out anything further as to how Premier Filmon got that draft? As I indicated, Premier Filmon discussed it with members of his cabinet. Are we going to get a draft?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I did not inquire specifically about what document Premier Filmon has in his possession in this regard. I did follow up briefly with Mr. Wilson this morning on the questions that were raised yesterday concerning the access of honourable senators to briefings and to information concerning the NAFTA negotiations.

My information is that an offer was made in the other place by the government to the members of the trade subcommittee of a private briefing on the understanding that the members of that committee would agree to the confidentiality of the briefing and that immediately following the briefing there would be some access to written documents for the purpose of discussion at the committee.

I am informed that this is effectively the same arrangement that obtains in respect of briefings for the private sector, the trade advisory—

Senator LeBlanc: Tom D'Aquino.

Senator Murray: Tom D'Aquino is a friend of my friend. When I knew him he was in Mr. Trudeau's office. He is a good Liberal, as far as I know. I do not know why my honourable friend, not for the first time, raises the name of Mr. D'Aquino in some pejorative fashion. He is a friend of my friend. He worked in Mr. Trudeau's office.

Senator LeBlanc: At that time he was not a spokesman for the trade deal and foreign investment.

Senator Frith: You got that "sit down", did you, that little wave from the great height?

Senator Kenny: Let the record show it.

Senator Murray: I understand it is the same arrangement that obtains with regard to the Trade Advisory Committee and to the briefings for the provincial authorities as well.

I did not conclude my conversation with Mr. Wilson, but I think I am safe in saying that we would be prepared to discuss those same arrangements with the appropriate committee of this place, which I think would probably be the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate.

Senator Molgat: When the minister pursues his questions on this matter, could he find out for us whether it was under this basis that Premier Filmon obtained the report, when the report was given to him, and also whether it was given to all premiers in the country at the same date and on the same basis?

In view of the fact that my honourable friend refers to this draft report, I have here a draft report. It is dated 31 December, 1991. I will not read it all, of course, because it does cover quite a few pages, but to establish what the document is, it says:

Chapter 1—Objectives and Scope

Article 101: Establishment of the North American Free Trade Area

The Government of the United Mexican States, the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States of America . . . consistent with Article XXIV of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, hereby establish the North American Free Trade Area.

DRAFT REPORT—DOCUMENT TABLED

Senator Frith: Perhaps you had better table that document, if you are going to read from it.

Senator Bonnell: On a point of order, honourable senators, I think that if he is going to read from this document he had better table it.

Senator Molgat: It is my only copy. I just want to read a little more and then I will table it.

● (1430)

Article 101: Establishment of the Free Trade Area

The Parties signatory to this Agreement, consistent with Article XXIV of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, hereby establish a free trade area.

As I said, I could continue. This part is dated December 31, but there are other sections dated January 16 and February 21. It is a substantial document. I will table it to make it accessible to all members.

Is this the document that has been sent to Premier Filmon?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not seen the document that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has just tabled. All I can tell him is that at the end of December, a draft text setting out the proposals of the three parties, the three countries, was put together. That is why he will find, if this is the text that he has just tabled, a great many things in square brackets, because they refer to matters that are not agreed to. This draft text is a compilation of the proposals of the three countries, and, as I indicated to him yesterday, it has been undergoing almost continuous change since the end of December. It is, as I said, a movable feast.

EFFECT ON AGRICULTURAL PRODUCERS

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: To follow up on the free trade agreement, I read in the Toronto Star—

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Again! Is that your bible? He continues to read the Liberal bible.

Senator Bonnell: I use the King James version. I do not know what you use.

It says in this Toronto Star article of March 25, 1992, that:

The federal government appears ready to cave in to U.S. demands that Canada scrap its system to protect dairy, egg and poultry producers from a flood of cheap imports . . .

That is, from the United States and Mexico.

In a proposed draft text of a North American Free Trade Agreement released yesterday, the Mulroney government suggested that the three parties live up to the GATT commitments to convert import quotas into tariffs, which would then decline . . . ..

The GATT talks are foundering on agricultural issues, though Canada is virtually alone in its insistence on maintaining supply management and import quotas.

International Trade Minister Michael Wilson insisted yesterday that Canada's defence of supply management has not wavered.

Senator Simard: End of quote.

Senator Bonnell: At the same time:

The draft agreement was dated Feb. 21, the same day that Deputy Prime Minister Don Mazankowski assured 40,000 protesting farmers in Ottawa that his government would not negotiate away supply management.

Yet that very same day his government signed an agreement with Mexico and the United States to do away with the same supply management. Is this another great lie to the public and the farmers in Canada?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before the honourable senator waxes too indignant about these matters, he should be careful about some of the assertions he has made. He says, for example, that we have "signed an agreement". No agreement has been signed. I told the Senate yesterday—

Senator Bonnell: You are prepared to sign an agreement.

Senator Frith: He is cautioning you to be careful. Be a good boy and do what he tells you.

Senator Murray: I am glad to see that the senator is editing his blues on the spot, or in advance, as it were.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: What has that to do with the importation of cheap milk that will have the effect of shutting down our dairy farms?

Hi. Are you waving at me? A senator with a flexible wrist on the other side.

Senator Barootes: I hope you do not have flexible wrists.

Senator Gigantès: You know me better than that.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I can give a fairly short answer to the question put by Senator Bonnell. The answer to the question is, as he will see, that the references to tariffication in the draft text relate to nonsupply-managed agricultural products.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government assure me that the Government of Canada and he, a member of that government, will protect the supply management of the poultry farmers, the egg farmers and the milk producers of this country, especially in the Gaspé region of Quebec, in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and in Nova Scotia in any North American Free Trade Agreement or GATT negotiations?

Senator Murray: The matter is at issue in the GATT negotiations, as my honourable friend knows. We have indicated that the Dunkel text is, in that respect, not acceptable to us, and that is why, in the proposals that we put forward at Geneva in early March, we did not offer any tariff equivalents for supply management commodities. Our position continues to be to seek a strengthening and clarification of Article XI.

STONE CONSOLIDATED PAPER

RESOLUTION OF CONFLICT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, my question is further to the advance notice I gave at the end of Question Period yesterday, when I was called to order by the Speaker.

My question concerns the settlement of the dispute between Stone Consolidated Paper and its employees.

For the benefit of those who may not be familiar with the matter, the McKenna government's involvement was instrumental in reaching a settlement. We are of course vastly relieved, as are the company's employees and Bathurst residents, considering the importance of this company for the town's economy.

Senator Hébert: What is the question?

Senator Simard: I am getting to my question, Senator Hébert. And we don't need Senator Molgat to teach us how to ask questions.

My question is as follows: Considering the fact that Mr. McKenna's offer, which consisted in paying $3.5 million to an American company which last year paid its shareholders $43 million, including $12 million for Mr. Roger Stone; considering that the offer by the Province of New Brunswick did not guarantee the company's survival beyond June 1993; considering that $2 million of the $3.5 million that were offered will be used to pay employees a 5.5 per cent wage increase provided in their agreement as of June 1993, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us if the federal government was invited to be party to this settlement and whether the federal government was in fact involved in this offer under one of the federal-provincial programs?

[English]

Senator Frith: Try to insult the right person, if you insist on being insulting. Try to control yourself, senator.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I wish to raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Senator Simard: Mr. Speaker, you brought me back to order yesterday. I would ask you to get those people opposite to shut up and allow me to ask my question.

Senator Frith: You are not allowed to do that. It says that you cannot do that. You cannot have any order in Question Period.

Senator Simard: I will make a note of that. You try to speak later on in this chamber or tomorrow, and you will see what will happen.

Senator Frith: Fine. I expect that.

Senator Simard: That is not a threat; that is a promise.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. First of all, I would like to advise senators that under rule 23(1), there are no points of order during Question Period.

Secondly, I would ask that preambles to questions be shortened and that the question be put as expeditiously as possible.

● (1440)

Senator Simard: The questions will be as short as the preambles to the questions coming from the other side.

[Translation]

So you understood my question, Senator Murray!

Hon. Michel Cogger: Repeat it, please!

Senator Simard: Was the federal government asked to participate in this offer under any federal or provincial programs, known or unknown, through ACOA or otherwise? Secondly, did it take any part in this settlement?

I am among those who believe that the McKenna government was swindled, that it was had in promising to pay $3.5 million when its annual deficit for 1991-92 is up to $232 million and Mr. McKenna takes every opportunity to blame the federal government for the size of the deficit.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Simard, you have asked the question. We should not have a statement. That is a different story. Please ask the question. There should not be a speech after that.

Senator Simard: I have asked the question. The question is on the record.

Senator Frith: The government is filibustering!

Senator Thériault: Do not answer, for God's sake!

Senator Sparrow: There was so much noise in the house that I could not hear. Would you repeat the preamble for me, please?

Senator Thériault: You do not know what a deficit is!

[Translation]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, this question is exclusively in provincial jurisdiction. As far as I know, the federal government did not take part in this initiative, but I will check my answer with the Minister responsible for ACOA, the Hon. John Crosbie.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS—USE OF UNILINGUAL ENGLISH DOCUMENT

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I would have liked to ask the Chair of the Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders this question, but for some reason she is away.

I will therefore put the question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, especially since he is on that committee.

I ask him the question in his capacity as Leader of the Government in the Senate and also as a former joint chairman, with me, of the Committee on Official Languages.

At noon, I received a document from Senator Robertson, "Review of the Rules of the Senate— a collection of proposed revisions, observations, comments, etc. Working document, French copy to follow."

I no longer know where I as a Francophone fit in this institution!

You know better than anyone, Senator Murray, about the efforts made in the past to have the Official Languages Act respected.

One would say that nothing changes, people are more entrenched in their positions. I am on this committee with Senators Cogger, Grimard and Thérèse Lavoie-Roux; four Francophones on an 18-member committee.

The committee will meet at 11 a.m. tomorrow. We are sent that at the last minute, although this committee has been constituted since last fall. However, for undoubtedly legitimate reasons, meetings were not held. At the last moment, we are given a text in English only. Of course mention is made of typographical errors in the French version. But on substantive issues, we have nothing in French.

Tell me then. As a Francophone in the Senate, must I sit down and shut up, ignore everything that is going on and work in English? Or is there still a glimmer of hope for people like me whose mother tongue is French so that we can work on an equal footing with Anglophones in this institution?

My being bilingual changes nothing! My working language is French. I have had enough of these situations!

You are the leader of your caucus. You are the government's spokesman in this House. You have a say in choosing chairmen and publishing documents. Tell me how I am to act.

Will I have to get up every day to point out such things that keep on hitting us? The English version is never lacking; it is always the French one, I remind you!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, although it is not a government document or even, to my knowledge, an official committee document, but rather a document from Conservative senators on that committee, I still accept the criticism from Hon. Senator Corbin.

[Senator Murray.]

Any documentation for honourable senators, wherever it comes from, should and must be in both languages.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Hon. Senator Lavoie-Roux chaired that committee, did she not, I think? No, it is Senator Robertson!

Why did Honourable Senator Thérèse Lavoie-Roux not complain? Why did she say nothing about it?

Why do the French-speaking senators on that committee who sit on that side of the House not complain and not say anything?

THE SENATE

APPLICABILITY OF RULES

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government. Since we have this new rule whereby Question Period is only of 30 minutes' duration, would the leader ensure that his government members do not make 15 and 20-minute speech before they ask a question. When they do that, there is then no time left in which to ask any questions.

We should change the rule back to accommodate an unlimited Question Period. That is the only time during which the opposition in this house may ask a few questions of the government.

Senator Simard: Well, read the Toronto Star!

Senator Cogger: What is the question?

Senator Bonnell: If honourable senators wish to make an address or a speech in this house, they have three or four minutes at the beginning of the session in which to make their statements. However, to make those statements about the New Brunswick woodworkers—

Senator Simard: What is wrong with having New Brunswick's problem aired in this house? You tell me.

Senator Gigantès: It is a great province, especially since you left it. Since you left, it the government has improved!

Senator Simard: Talking about a sister province like that is terrible.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, according to rule 23(7), Question Period is now over.

Senator Molgat: Your rules, not ours!

The Hon. the Speaker: But as a gesture, I will allow one more question. Senator Marsden was up first.

Senator Frith: We are getting all these gestures from the Leader of the Government and the Speaker.

COMMUNICATIONS

ACCESS TO READING MATERIALS—EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I should like to thank the Leader of the Government for his delayed answers to two questions yesterday, one on NABST and one on KAON. They were very helpful.

Could the leader give an equally helpful reply on a copyright matter? It appears that the Minister of Communications, the Honourable Perrin Beatty, has brought forward a new policy which one again will limit the access of Canadians to books. Having applied the GST to reading material, there will now be a constraint on book distribution—that is, at libraries or schools, or any Canadians wishing to buy books from a wholesaler will be confined to purchasing such books through a Canadian agent.

I am very much in favour of supporting the Canadian book publishing industry and distributers, but nonetheless we have to deal with the fact that in this country, where distribution is a problem in any industry, it is much faster and sometimes less expensive to buy a book directly rather than to go through a Canadian agent.

Would the Leader of the Government explain to us why the government would put this restraint of trade in place, especially at this time?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the one thing I can tell the honourable senator today on that matter is that the various policy changes Mr. Beatty has brought in in that field have been subject to the widest possible consultation in the country. I would like to leave it at that for the moment.

I will undertake to obtain a proper reply to the precise question that the honourable senator has put.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, it might help the Leader of the Government to know that the booksellers are very unhappy with this proposal. I refer him to a story in the Kitchener-Waterloo Record of Saturday, March 14, by Mr. Robert Reid which explains this. That may help him to give a full response.

Senator Gigantès: Nothing will help him; he is past all hope.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella moved the second reading of Bill C-64, An Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

He said: Honourable senators, in the fall of 1990, Bill C-92, An Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act, was tabled to ratify and give effect to the amendment made by the Government of the Northwest Territories to its Official Languages Act. That amendment changed the deadline for the French translation as well as for the printing and the publication of the Statutes in both official languages from January 1, 1991, to March 31, 1992. Without this amendment and its subsequent approval by Parliament, virtually all the Statutes of the Northwest Territories would have become inoperative. Bill C-92 was passed before December 31, 1990, and the deadline was therefore changed to March 31, 1992.

Since then, the Territories have printed and published, in bilingual form, the Revised Statutes of 1988 as well as the three related volumes of supplements. All this legislation has been in effect since July 15, 1991. Since January 1, 1990, all the new Acts have been passed in both official languages. Therefore, all the Acts (Orders) having force of law in the Territories are bilingual.

The problem that remains then has to do with the regulations, which include orders and proclamations. We have been told that the first volume, which contains approximately 800 pages of regulations, was just recently printed, that the second volume would be sent to press this week, and that the third volume should be sent to the printer in April. Consequently, the Government of the Territories will not be in a position to complete the translation, the revision and the printing of the second and third volumes before the March 31, 1992 deadline. Last November, the Government of the Northwest Territories informed the federal government of the problems that it was experiencing. The federal government then provided additional help by seconding, through Secretary of State, a word processing operator, and by concluding an agreement whereby the revisors of the Canada Gazette would revise the French version of the regulations. In spite of this help, senior officials from the Northwest Territories are of the opinion that the regulations will not be ready for several months, that is until June 1992. Consequently, they asked for an extension of six months and we believe that the deadline should now be September 30, 1992, unless they experience other unforeseen problems on. On March 12, 1992, the Territorial Legislature amended accordingly its official languages order.

It is of course regrettable that the Government of the Northwest Territories is unable to meet its own deadline set fifteen months ago. However, important progress have been made and it would be irresponsible for Parliament to allow a set of important regulations, dealing among other things with health and safety, to become inoperative. The Government of the Territories might have to ask the courts to recognize the applicability of unilingual regulations, in spite of the fact that those regulations would be invalid, as was the case in Manitoba when the Supreme Court ruled that the province was in a state of emergency and that the Court had to render unilingual acts operative during the minimal period necessary to maintain the primacy of the law, as well as to translate and re-enact of that legislation.

Finally, it is important to note that the amendment does in no way undermine the provisions of the Territories' legislation regarding government services in French, which came into effect on January 1, 1991.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, rule 19(3) states:

> If senators have occasion to have private conversations in the Senate Chamber, they shall go below the Bar, otherwise the Speaker shall order them so to do;

I do not want to do this. However, I am having difficulty following the speakers because there is so much private conversation and I urge senators to abide by this rule.

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to thank Senator Kinsella for the clarifications provided to us this afternoon. As I indicated yesterday, we were prepared to take this bill a step further today so that it can be ready for Royal Assent next Tuesday. We do not wish to delay its passing, in view of the fact that the problem lies with the Northwest Territories and not with the government.

Where I really object to rushing bills through beyond what is provided for in our rules is when the government, in my view, is responsible for the delays all of a sudden wants the Senate to move quickly and adopt a whole bunch of things.

In this case, as far as I can see, this is a letter dated March 13—it is quite recent—from Mr. Dennis Patterson, a parliamentarian from the Northwest Territories. He explains the problem in his letter.

Again, if I suspected dilatory tactics on the part of the government of the Territories, if they were not doing their very best to make headway with translation, I would say that, quite frankly, it might be time to set a deadline. I think this is the second extension that is requested. But, when I read Mr. Patterson's letter, it reads for instance:

[English]

> ... My department has been working flat out and has airlifted help from Ottawa in addition to assistance supplied by the editors of the Canada Gazette. Even with that help, the Department of Justice expects the revision will not be completed until the end of the summer.

He continues:

> The government of the Northwest Territories has worked hard and opened a considerable amount of (federal) money to meet the obligations established by Parliament. All of the statutes are now published completely in bilingual form and all bills proceed through the Assembly in both English and French.

[Translation]

I think it is obvious that they are doing their best. Therefore, the problem is a technical one. Their request for an extension until September seems reasonable. I hope however that, come September, we will not receive yet another such request. For this once, I agree and we will not delay the approval of the bill. My caucus and myself give leave for this bill to be now read the second time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

REFERRAL TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill read the third time?

• (1500)

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, with leave forthwith.

[Translation]

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, from what I understand, there is enough time to refer this Bill to a committee. If that is so, I thought we might refer it to the Committee on Aboriginal Peoples, since the legislation deals with the Northwest Territories, where natives make up most of the government.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If it is to go to committee, it should go to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

On motion of Senator Kinsella, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

GREECE

ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF COMMENCEMENT OF WAR OF INDEPENDENCE

Leave having been given to revert to Senators' Statements:

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, on March 25, 1821, Archimaudritis Ghermanos raised the flag of independence in Greece, parts of which had been under the Turks for some five centuries. During those five centuries the Greek spirit had not died, but under overwhelminging power by the Turkish Empire the Greeks could not rebel. By 1821 Turkey had been sufficiently enfeebled that, after a struggle that lasted eight years, modern Greece saw freedom and was able to establish itself as an independent nation with its own language. Ever since, it has been an ally of what we consider here our coalition. We have always been on the side of Britain and France in all wars and we have been good allies.

In World War II, Greek resistance was sensationally successful. The Greek Islands of the Aegean were liberated by a unit of 1,000 Greeks commanded by my father. They were facing 10,000 Germans. They killed 5,061 Germans and lost 19 of their own. The Greeks are good allies for us Canadians. I am proud to be a Canadian first of all and I am proud of my Greek blood, and this is a day when Senator Barootes and I celebrate this Greek blood we have.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I only wish to ally myself to the statements made by my good friend, Senator Gigantès, and to express the hope that all of us will take this opportunity to celebrate, not only the anniversary of the independence of Greece, which began in the modern era in 1821, but also that it was from the roots of that race that we in this country embody most of the principles of culture, civilization and democracy which we enjoy today and which I hope we will continue to enjoy. I congratulate my confrere for bringing this matter to our attention.

CANADA DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE TO CONDUCT PRE-STUDY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard, on behalf of Senator Lynch-Staunton, pursuant to notice of Thursday, March 19, 1992, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject matter of Bill C-48, An Act to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation and to amend others Acts in consequence thereof, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

Honourable senators, I can tell you right off . . .

The Hon. the Speaker: Are you proposing a motion.

Senator Simard: I thought I was speaking to a motion that was already before the House. If this is not the case, I would like to move that the Senate undertake a pre-study of the subject-matter of Bill C-48. I can guarantee, honourables senators, that there will be no preamble or question during this intervention. This is simply a request.

[English]

On Thursday December 12, 1991, the Minister of State (Finance and Privatization) introduced Bill C-48. After debate at second reading on Wednesday, February 5, 1992, the bill was referred to the Finance Committee for examination. Hearings in that committee are ongoing.

The bill expands the range of options available for dealing with troubled financial institutions. Under the existing Canada Deposit Insurance Act, the CDIC is empowered to institute proceedings to bring about the winding up of an insured financial institution that is insolvent or about to become bankrupt. Bill C-48 proposes that under specified conditions the CDIC could recommend that the shares and subordinated debt of a federal institution, insured by CDIC, be vested in the CDIC. The CDIC would then run the institution while it searched for a way to rescue the institution without winding it up.

A considerable number of questions have been raised about the bill, questions that I will address shortly. The issue I would like to address first, however, is the need for a pre-study of Bill C-48 by the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. On February 3 in the Globe and Mail, Mr. John Evans, the president of the Trust Companies Association, said:

> We are encouraging the government to proceed and get this through. Our sense is that there is some urgency. This bill provides the powers the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation needs to come to a quick resolution of problem institutions.

He has reiterated this point in testimony before the finance committee in the other place. Furthermore, the Canadian Bankers Association has publicly supported the concept of the bill but has argued strongly that changes are needed to improve it.

• (1510)

A pre-study by the Senate Banking committee will serve two valuable purposes: First, the committee will be able to bring its expertise in the area of financial institutions to bear on the bill, in order to make constructive suggestions before the bill leaves the other place. This will serve the second purpose; that is, to expedite the movement of this bill through both chambers so that any situations involving problems do not drag on, raising questions of confidence in the system.

In the other place, a number of questions have been raised about the mechanics of the bill. I would now like to address some of those questions to indicate some of the issues that the Senate will have to deal with.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, in general, witnesses who appeared before the finance committee of the other place indicated some problems.

As a matter of fact, the Department of Finance already made certain changes to its bill. However, some important issues remain to be addressed. The committee has not yet completed its work.

The first issue relates to the need to protect depositors when negotiations are initiated regarding an institution in trouble. We must ensure that any lack of cooperation by shareholders and directors does not lead to hasty decisions that would penalize depositors. Some people also expressed the desire to have all senior creditors compensated. It is an important matter, a matter of equity.

Another issue worth mentioning is the possible proposal of an alternative mechanism. That alternative would require that the restructuring process take place at the assets level, which could facilitate the procedures under the existing legislative framework. The process now proposed in the legislation is complex; an alternative that could simplify the process would have to be examined more closely.

In closing, I could add that other issues were raised such as the right moment to assess the institution (when the vesting order is made rather than after), the members of the board of directors and the participation of the CDIC on that board. There are divergent interests in this matter and it would be necessary to clarify the issue keeping in mind that the first priority is the protection of depositors.

[English]

These are important issues which will require careful consideration. In beginning our study now, we can ensure that our deliberations are timely and effective.

[Translation]

Therefore, to invoke the usual arguments of our Deputy Leader in the Senate, this is a highly technical bill that has a considerably large scope. A pre-study could lead the government to bring forward some amendments to Bill C-48, amendments that are not being considered at the moment.

[English]

I truly believe the case for pre-study is strong, and I invite the opposition to abandon their well-known strategy in this matter and accept my request for a pre-study.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, in rising to reply to some of the points that Senator Simard just made with respect to the government's request for a pre-study of Bill C-48, there are two or three points I would like to make before this issue is resolved.

Before making those points, let me say at the outset that I have not been absolutely opposed to the pre-study of bills as a matter of principle. I think this is well known in this chamber. For example, on the four finance bills which were considered this the fall by the Banking committee, I supported pre-study.

I am opposed to the pre-study of C-48, however, for the following reasons, and I pick up on a number of the points Senator Simard has made. He said quite correctly that the leaders of several of the financial institutions such as the Trust Companies Association and the Canadian Bankers Association are in favour of proceeding with legislation that deals with the general subject matter of Bill C-48, namely, the powers that the Superintendent of Financial Institutions is to be given in order to deal with a financial institution experiencing difficulty. The purpose of the bill is to give added powers to the superintendent to deal with situations when an institution is in trouble before it becomes a crisis. Therefore, in fact, a number of industry associations are in favour of this legislation.

It seems to me, however, that there is a significant problem associated with pre-study of this particular bill. The problem is, as Senator Simard pointed out, the Minister of Finance has already stated in the other place, and indeed I believe publicly to the press, that he intends to introduce significant amendments to the bill that is now before committee in the other place. In fact, because the government has not yet decided on what those amendments will be, the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce would be left in a position of doing pre-study on a bill that is not the government's bill.

The government's bill, by the Minister of Finance's own admission, will be substantially changed to reflect many of the criticisms of the bill which industry associations and other knowledgeable commentators have made. The government has clearly indicated through its own minister that it intends to change the bill substantially, not merely to amend it with very minor changes that are essentially technical changes. Rather, the government has indicated that it will make substantial changes in order to respond to the criticisms that have been made of the bill.

It seems to me that for the Senate to proceed with the pre-study of a bill when in effect we do not have the major principles of the bill before us flies in the face of what I have always understood to be the purpose of pre-study. In fact, in my time in this chamber, I cannot recall ever being asked to pre-study a bill the content of which we did not know. That, in and of itself, strikes me as a rather bizarre and ridiculous situation.

The second observation I would like to make really refers to part of the debate which went on in this place yesterday with respect to whether or not your committee should pre-study Bill C-62. In the course of that debate, the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, Senator Frith, quoted what he called the "Lynch-Staunton criteria" with respect to whether or not legislation ought to be pre-studied. One of those criteria clearly set out by Senator Lynch-Staunton some time ago is—and I am now quoting both from Senator Lynch-Staunton and from yesterday's Debates of the Senate—that if a bill is to be pre-studied, it should "cover a topic of extraordinary importance."

I find it difficult, if not impossible, to understand how the government could argue that Bill C-48 meets that test when in fact the bill has been designed in response to a report of a Royal Commission by former Judge Willard Estey. That report was given to the government six years ago, in 1986. If it has taken six years to go from a Royal Commission report to a piece of legislation, it seems to me that it is impossible to argue that the bill meets the test of "extraordinary importance" which Senator Lynch-Staunton has himself laid down as a criteria which must be met before pre-study.

My second observation is that in introducing the bill in the other place, the government ministers, both the Minister of State for Finance and the Minister of Finance himself, said that the bill was a response to and a means of implementing Judge Estey's recommendations of 1986.

I say parenthetically for senators who are not familiar with the history of this matter that Judge Estey was asked to conduct a Royal Commission into the collapse of two Alberta banks, and it was out of that Royal Commission that he recommended that the Superintendent of Financial Institutions be given increased powers to deal with cases where a financial institution was in trouble.

The dilemma, however, is that the government introduced the bill in the other place, saying that it was implementing the recommendations of Judge Estey, only to find out that Judge Estey has said, both in public statements and in the committee of the House of Commons—and indeed in writing to the chairman of the Banking committee of the House of Commons—that in fact the real mistake with the bill is that it does not implement his recommendations. It is precisely because of the rather devastating attack by Judge Estey on the draft of the bill tabled in the other place that the government has decided to rethink its major policy elements.

Indeed, in material readily available to senators, there exists in Hansard of the other place a series of proposed amendments to Bill C-48. They are amendments which Judge Estey labels "essential revisions". He does not merely call them "desirable amendments". They contain roughly a dozen major significant policy amendments. These are not minor amendments, but amendments which would change the entire process and the entire set of powers which the Superintendent of Financial Institutions would have if the Superintendent were faced with a problem in a financial institution.

Bill C-48 has been described by Judge Estey as requiring a major revision. The government has said it was attempting to implement what Judge Estey recommended six years ago. On the basis of criticism from not only Judge Estey but a number of expert witnesses who appeared at committee hearings in the other place, the government has said it will change substantially the policy elements of the bill. Given these facts, it is inappropriate that we pre-study a bill whose fundamental policy will be changed by the government. It seems to me that leaves us in the position of pre-studying a bill whose fundamental contents we do not know.

Therefore, proceeding with a pre-study of this particular bill is not only totally foolish, but a significant waste of the time of the Senate's Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Having heard what Senator Kirby had to say, honourable senators, I want to put on the record that we on this side would be prepared to give leave to the government to withdraw this motion.

It seems to me, honourable senators, that this is an absolutely spectacular example of a bill that should not receive pre-study.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY BILL

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Oliver, seconded by the Honourable Senator Di Nino, for the second reading of Bill S-8, to regulate the manufacture and importation of motor vehicles and motor vehicle equipment to reduce the risk of death, injury and damage to property and the environment.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, the motor vehicle safety bill was introduced by Senator Murray in the Senate on March 17. Essentially, the bill repeals the Motor Vehicle Tire Safety Act and amends the Motor Vehicle Safety Act, incorporating the former. Bill S-8 establishes national safety marks. It deals with vehicle and equipment standards, vehicle emissions, notices of safety defects and regulation making.

I thank Senator Oliver for his introduction and explanation of the bill. When speaking to Bill S-8 on March 19, he explained that when the Motor Vehicle Safety Act was first introduced, four domestic auto makers dominated sales in Canada. Today, there are other significant and important players from other countries in the Canadian auto industry.

The presence of such major international players necessitates changes to the Motor Vehicle Safety Act to ensure that, as Senator Oliver said, "... international vehicle manufacturers provide Canadians with the safest, most environmentally friendly vehicles."

However, if this bill is to have any real value, the changes it proposes must lead to substantial reductions in motor vehicle emissions, which are the single largest source of ozone and carbon monoxide emissions.

The bill is not too cumbersome, and I wish to look at some specific clauses of the proposed legislation.

Clause 3 deals with national safety marks and establishes national safety marks as national trade marks. These national safety marks can only be used by companies authorized by the Minister of Transport on a vehicle or equipment of a prescribed class. The minister will grant authorization if the vehicles or equipment the company manufacturers or distributes conform to the prescribed standards, including emissions standards. These standards will be found in regulations which will be approved subsequently by the Governor in Council.

Clause 4 of the bill provides that no company may ship from one province to another any vehicle or equipment manufactured in Canada, unless it has a national safety mark applied to it. I wonder what the full consequences of this provision might be other than to increase the size of the federal bureaucracy.

I wonder how this measure will affect Canadian manufacturers who, obviously, are struggling in the current recession. Are the provinces comfortable with this proposal? This may be a good initiative with respect to the manufacturing of entire vehicles, but what kind of equipment are we talking about?

Schedule I of the bill defines equipment as, first, tires; second, child restraint devices; and, third, restraint devices for disabled persons. That is not a lengthy list. I wonder, for example, why seatbelts or normal restraint systems are not included. In my opinion, the intent should be the same.

Clause 7(2) deals with exceptions for certain importations. A vehicle that does not meet our standards may be imported into Canada, if the purchaser signs a declaration that the vehicle will be brought up to the standards before it is registered with provincial licensing authorities. I wonder what kind of follow-up there will be to ensure that the undertaking in the declaration has been met and that the rubber does not hit the road, so to speak, until all obligations are complied with.

Clause 8 deals with emission credits. The bill proposes a system of so-called emission credits for vehicle manufacturers and importers. Under this system, companies can obtain such credits in three ways. One way is to produce a vehicle that more than satisfies the requirements of the established standards. This, of course, would be the most beneficial way to reduce emissions.

Another way to obtain credits would be to buy them from the federal government. To me, this seems self-defeating. If a company cannot conform to established emission standards, it does not really matter because it can get round those standards by buying credits from the government. I wonder if this would not be tantamount to purchasing a licence to pollute.

If the company for some reason or other cannot buy credits from the government, then it can buy them from companies which themselves have surplus extra credits.

● (1530)

Bill S-8 proposes to make those credits transferrable from company to company.

I understand that the credit system established in the United States' Clean Air Act is similar to the one proposed in this Bill. The overall goal of their system is to provide a least-cost option that allows the cheapest suppliers or producers to overachieve and handle a disproportionate share of the burden. Less efficient competitors can then buy credits.

However, honourable senators, the less efficient ones are the ones doing most of the damage, evidenced by the fact that they cannot get their own credits. I wonder why we are not introducing measures to cut emissions across the board, not just for those who can afford it? Are we in danger of establishing a double standard when it comes to emission controls?

In my opinion, this whole section will require a very careful examination and a much clearer explanation and rationale in committee.

Section 9 deals with vehicle exemptions. To further diminish the impact of the bill, a Canadian or foreign car manufacturer could request an exemption from the prescribed standards. If conformity with the standards would create substantial financial hardship for the company, the company could be exempted. If conformity would impede the development of new safety or emission control features that would be equivalent or superior to the prescribed standards, the company could be exempted. If conformity would impede the development of new kinds of vehicles, vehicle systems or components, again, the company could be exempted.

I want to observe, honourable senators, that these exemption provisions give the Governor in Council what I would judge to be an extraordinary level of discretion.

With respect to registration, under Bill S-8, a company that manufactures, imports or sells vehicles or equipment will be required to maintain a registration system as prescribed by regulation. As I mentioned earlier, by equipment we mean tires and restraint systems for children and disabled people. The registration system will include the name of any person who has purchased such equipment. This will help to facilitate the inspection process and aid manufacturers and sellers to contact consumers in the case of safety defects. This is particularly desirable in the case of child restraint devices.

Clause 14 deals with inspection. The legislating of standards, such as the ones in this bill, and punishments for offenses are of no use unless there is a watchdog to ensure the standards are being met and, when they are not met, that penalties are paid. The proposed amendments will give the Minister of Transport the authority to designate an automotive expert to act as a watchdog. I wonder if these automotive experts who would be inspecting vehicles and equipment will receive a salary. If so, will payment come from the federal government? The bill is not clear about this.

I want to draw this particular point to the direct attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate because I am concerned that if this bill does have financial implications, because of the appointment of an automotive inspector or inspectors, a question arises about the necessity of a Royal Recommendation. I am not proposing to raise a point of order, but perhaps Senator Oliver or Senator Murray could assure us that this particular point has been addressed.

Approximately how many inspectors are we talking about? Will this create a new level of bureaucracy, new employment, or both? Would these inspectors be individuals presently within the employ of the federal government? What role will the provinces play? Are there any implications with respect to provincial legislation?

I leave that clause and turn to clause 17 which deals with offenses and punishment. The punishments that can be imposed for contravention of the Act are substantial. If a corporation is found guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction, it is liable to a fine of up to $100,000. The fine for a company found guilty of an indictable offence can be as high as $1,000,000. An individual convicted of breaching the act could face a $10,000 fine and/or a term of imprisonment of up to two years. However, honourable senators, realistically, what are the chances of any corporation being fined?

First, as I said earlier, a corporation can always buy credits for its inability to conform to prescribed emission standards. Secondly, it can plead for exemption from the standards on a number of grounds. So, really, enforcement will only be as good as the inspection system that is set in place.

In conclusion, honourable senators, the main thrust of Bill S-8 is to establish emission standards, which everyone will agree are urgently needed in this country and throughout the world. However, since these emission standards will be set by regulations made by the Governor in Council, the legislation will have no teeth until the regulations are made.

I am concerned that the credit system the Bill establishes will not ensure that prescribed standards are followed. Rather, it will ensure the development of what may be termed "credit trading". For some companies, it may be cheaper to purchase the credits than to employ measures to reduce emissions and conform to other standards. And, as if that were not enough, a company unable to conform could always apply for an exemption.

Although we believe that the government's initiative is indeed very praiseworthy, we are not yet convinced that this bill in its present form represents the best way to achieve what all Canadians want, namely, a safer and cleaner environment. We look forward to a thorough examination of this bill, and of the philosophy and rationale underlying the government's approach, when this bill is examined, as expected, by the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if the government will have a look at the comment made by my colleague regarding the possibility of the need for a Royal Recommendation, because if that is so, then I think we should reconsider proceeding further with the bill at this point. Perhaps we should have a legal opinion on the matter.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I heard the question raised by my friend Senator Graham during his speech. I had hoped that perhaps by the time he sat down I might have some prepared document that I could refer to in dealing with this question. I do not have such a document at the moment, but I shall certainly endeavour to obtain one.

For the moment, let me simply observe that members of the House of Commons, including—and perhaps especially including—ministers of the Crown sitting in that place, are quite jealous of the royal prerogatives in these matters, and they would be the first, I think, to raise an objection if it were suggested that a bill requiring a Royal Recommendation was to be presented anywhere but in the House of Commons, and by anyone other than a minister of the Crown.

● (1540)

Having said that, I shall obtain a more considered and formal reply and place it on the record at the earliest opportunity.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—NOTICE OF MOTION TO INVOKE THE PROVISIONS OF RULE 40

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bolduc, seconded by the Honourable Senator Grimard, for the third reading of Bill C-32, An Act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to stand the debate on this bill until tomorrow, when I will be prepared to speak.

Hon. John Lynch Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Bill C-32 is a bill which we expect to vote on, pass and give Royal Assent to by the obvious deadline, which is March 31 at midnight. I have had discussions with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition on at least two occasions, trying to come to an agreement on time allocation so that we could meet that deadline. Unfortunately, at least for our side, we have not been able to extract a commitment that a vote would be taken, at the latest, on Tuesday, the 31st of March.

Therefore, having exhausted the voluntary approach, I wish to give notice of the following motion:

THAT pursuant to the provisions of Rule 40 and in relation to Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, not more than six further hours of debate be allotted to the consideration of the said bill at the third reading stage;

THAT when the debate comes to an end or when the time provided for the debate has expired, as the case may be, the Speaker shall interrupt, if required, any proceeding then before the Senate and put forthwith and successively every question necessary to dispose of the remaining stages of the said bill;

THAT any recorded vote on the said questions shall be taken in accordance with the provisions of Rule 40(4).

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the Budget presented by the Honourable Don Mazankowski, Minister of Finance, on Tuesday, February 25, 1992.—(Honourable Senator Robertson).

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I will confine my remarks on the budget to the policies followed by the Bank of Canada. While the budget addresses itself to fiscal policy and to the level of taxation in Canada, it cannot be effective unless it dovetails with the monetary policy set out by the Bank of Canada. Of course, as honourable senators know, the ultimate responsibility for monetary policy in Canada rests with the Minister of Finance and, through him, on the government of the day.

The policy of the Bank of Canada, as enunciated by Governor Crow, is that its objective is price stability. That is achieved through the control of liquidity within the monetary system; in short, the control of the expansion of money and credit.

I happen to agree with the policy that is enunciated by the governor, and certainly with his view that continuing accommodation by monetary policy of the expansion of the economy will result in inflation. The prescription is often put forward by people that perhaps a gentle form of inflation will lubricate the economy and make it operate a great deal better than the stringency that has been employed by the central bank in the last couple of years.

Unfortunately, gentle inflation does not work. As we saw through the sixties and seventies, gentle inflation becomes, after a period of time, virulent inflation and decisions on the economy are skewed away from proper productivity and toward protecting oneself from the ravages of inflation.

Monetary policy works through the demand side of the equation, and I agree again with the governor that it involves very long lags. For that reason there is no quick pay-off. Those who expect some quick pay-off from the operation of monetary policy will, of course, be disappointed, and the governor is quite right to hold to his course.

The actions of the central bank in Canada have been very stringent. M-1, which is the indicator of nominal spending, is up 4.1 per cent at the present time versus 8.7 per cent last August. M-2, which is the indicator of inflation, is up 6.1 per cent versus 8.7 per cent last March. Just to put that in context, I said up 6.1 per cent. A 2 to 3 per cent inflation target is achievable if M-2 is growing at a rate of 7.5 to 8.5 per cent. In other words, the growth of M-2 at the present time would indicate a more stringent inflationary result than the governor and the Minister of Finance have predicted and hoped for. They are hoping to start at the end of 1992 at a 3 per cent increase in inflation, going down to 2 per cent by the middle of 1994.

The policy at the present time—that is the indication of inflation—indicates a much more stringent effect of the policies of the government, and that inflation will likely fall well below the targeted limits.

One has to say that the enunciated policy has been successful. Inflation is at its lowest level in 20 years. It is the lowest of the G-7 countries. Interest rates are down and, as of this morning, the exchange rate with the U.S. has fallen to 83.91 cents.

But what is the cost of this policy? Unemployment is at 10.4 per cent. Manufacturing is operating at 70 per cent of capacity. Manufacturing shipments are at a five-year low and plants are closing, as we all know, or very often moving to the United States. Cross-border shopping has become almost an epidemic. Even in January same-day trips were up 13.6 per cent over the previous month.

● (1550)

Senators are aware of the devastation of the retail trade and the consequent devastation of shopping centres across this country, most especially concerning the retail trade in clothing.

One wonders if there is some way of combining the objectives of the governor with some sort of relief. I suggest, honourable senators, that there is. That can be achieved by lowering the exchange rate.

The Canadian dollar at present is 5 per cent above the 1980 trade-weighted average of the countries with whom we deal. With the United States, it is 10 per cent over the average of 1980. It has been shown, time and time again, that parity pricing with the United States—that is, what a dollar will buy here and what the same dollar will buy in the United States—is 80 cents. In other words, the Canadian dollar should be at a level of 80 cents in comparison to the American dollar. I suspect that parity pricing would indicate, in light of recent tax increases, to be less than 80 cents.

Let us have a brief look at Mr. Crow's approach. He states that they do not target interest or exchange rates in setting monetary policy. All they are concerned about is the internal integrity of the Canadian dollar. However, let us look at what happened.

The exchange rate dropped recently. Immediately, the Bank of Canada tightened liquidity within the system, interest rates went up, and the exchange rate adjusted upward. At the same time, the central bank was very active in buying Canadian dollars in the foreign exchange market. For Mr. Crow to say that he does not target interest or exchange rates is a complete misreading of the truth and of the facts.

Senator Gigantès: It is a lie. Do you mean a lie?

Senator Everett: In parliamentary terms, one cannot use—

[Senator Everett.]

Senator Gigantès: He is not a member of the Parliament. You can.

Senator Everett: In parliamentary terms, one cannot use that point.

Senator Gigantès: But that is what you mean.

Senator Everett: No. I am saying it is a misapplication of the true facts. Mr. Crow states that internal integrity of the currency is what his target is. He states that a concomitant of that may affect exchange rates and interest rates, but he himself, as a matter of policy of the bank, does not target exchange rates or interest rates. I am saying to you that we have evidence that when the exchange rate took a drop, Mr. Crow reacted to hold it up. Surely that indicates that the level of the exchange rate is some sort of target.

Senator Gigantès: So he is guilty of a terminological lack of rectitude; is that it?

Senator Everett: I am not sure how to answer that. I thought I had explained fully, senator, what I think of the targeting—

Senator Gigantès: Well, you do not like the word "lie", so I gave you a parliamentary euphemism.

Senator Everett: I do not like the word "lie". I do not like to use it, and I do not think it is necessary to use it, nor do I think it is necessary to accuse Mr. Crow of anything of that nature. What I am saying is that his policy, which is enunciated in terms of the internal integrity of the Canadian dollar, is more than that; that he is, in fact, targeting the level of interest rates and the level of exchange rates.

Mr. Crow, in agreement with the government, also gives us targets for inflation and lectures us on the level of wage increases within the economy. Yet, it is interesting to note that he will not disclose the level of his own salary or how much it has increased during the period he has been lecturing others in keeping their wage increases under control. What we do know is that the average salary in the Bank of Canada in 1991 was up 6.6 per cent versus public sector increases in the same year of 3.5 per cent and private sector increases in the same year of 4.3 per cent.

Governor Crow states that the broad objective of monetary policy must be to enhance the standard of living of Canadians. Well, if that is the case, is the only criteria the internal value and integrity of the dollar? Clearly not. You cannot just zero in on the internal integrity of the dollar. You must be concerned with the level of interest rates. You must be concerned with the exchange rate.

What the Bank of Canada hopes is that our inflation rate will be less than that of our trading partners. As a result of that, our exchange rate, which will stay high, will represent a new parity pricing, because our inflation rate will hold prices down; their inflation rate will cause their prices to go up. It may happen that way, but do not forget that I said earlier that monetary policy operates with very long lags. So if it is to happen in that way, it will be a very long and very painful process.

We are inclined to think that by lowering inflation we will somehow put ourselves in the same position as Germany, namely, of having a very sound, hard currency in which people will want to invest. That is the central thrust of the policy of the Bank of Canada. They want a lower inflation rate. However, the problem with that is that, because of our deficits, and most especially our current account deficit, the low inflation rates which the Bank of Canada is achieving will not necessarily be equated by foreign investors with the Canadian dollar being a hard currency.

The difference in parity pricing between the United States and Canada has largely, in the last while, been due to tax increases. Just look at them: Tobacco, gasoline, transit, tuition, electricity, water, reality rates, and you can go on and on, to say nothing of the effect on prices of marketing boards. In fact, that is where the increase in prices is coming from, not from the private economy as such. As a matter of fact, the industrial product price index, which is based on the price of manufactured goods in Canada, is lower today than it was three years ago. Our trade surplus in 1991 was $7.4 billion, down from $10.9 billion in 1990.

It is true that we are in a bind. We introduced all sorts of social programs and landing nets in the sixties and the seventies. They were small at the start, but after a while they took on a life of their own. That was fine. We were able to accommodate them, and inflation pushed up revenues by virtue of people moving into higher tax brackets. However, not only did inflation push up revenues, it pushed up costs. It pushed up costs eventually faster than revenues. Instead of raising taxes, we indulged in deficit financing, and that is the problem that we have today.

The only way out of this situation is increased production and increased productivity. It seems to me that we should look at the effects of a lower exchange rate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to inform the honourable senator that his time is up.

Senator Gigantès: I want to answer the Honourable Senator Everett.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Does the honourable senator have unanimous approval to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Stewart: Again and again it is demonstrated that this rule is foolish.

● (1600)

Senator Everett: I thank honourable senators for their courtesy.

I am suggesting that the target of a lower exchange rate—that is, one that will more properly represent parity pricing and one that is in the 80 cent or lower level in relation to the U.S. dollar—is a valid and sound policy prescription for the central bank. It will increase productivity, and through increased productivity and production there will be funds for investment, again increasing productivity. There will also be a greater amount of buying of goods in Canada instead of through imports; a diminution in cross-border shopping; an improvement in the travel deficit; and, most importantly, improvements in the current account deficit.

The question we have to ask ourselves is: Will such a policy prescription have an inflationary effect? It is true that it will require an increase in the monetary aggregates. A five per cent fall in the dollar would add one per cent to consumer prices in ordinary circumstances, but given the stringent position of the central bank and the level which M-1 and M-2 are at today, I contend that it will have very little, if any, effect on consumer prices.

Over and above that, an adjustment in the exchange rate is a one-time adjustment. The governor, in his annual report and in the speeches throughout this last year, has underscored the fact that the increase in direct taxes such as the GST has a one-time effect. Once accommodated, they no longer affect the rate of inflation. The same is true for an adjustment in the exchange rate. It is a one-time effect and in the present climate, in my judgment, it can be accommodated.

However, it will have a very beneficial effect. It will stop the devastation of this economy, which is going on right now as a result of central bank policy. It will allow progress by greater sales through our exports and by the reduction of imports so that more of our domestic product can be bought by Canadian retailers.

Do not forget that I am not talking about an egregious reduction in the value of the Canadian dollar, one that would insulate inefficiency. I am talking about one that brings the Canadian dollar to parity pricing with the American dollar.

Even if my prescription were not accepted and it was proven to be ill-advised, I contend that it will happen in any event and we will be powerless to stop it.

At the present time foreign lenders hold $260 billion of Canadian debt. Our current account is in extreme deficit at an annual rate today of $32.2 billion. That is four per cent of the gross domestic product, which is higher than any major economy in the world. Our trade surplus is now only $3.7 billion in 1991, and our non-trade deficit is $35.9 billion. Most of that is composed of the travel deficit, dividends and interest that are flowing out of the country. That has only started.

The provinces have been borrowing in foreign countries at an accelerating rate. But non-government borrowing due to the recession has been at a very low point. It will increase. We can expect that if something is not done, the reliance on foreign borrowing will grow and that the out-flow of moneys to service our debt will increase to a very high level. At that point the dollar will fall, whether the governor wants it to or not.

That borrowing is caused by the difference in rates between here and the rest of the world. Have a look at the difference in rates between here and the United States. On three-month treasury bills the rate in Canada is 7.20 per cent as against roughly 4.25 per cent in the United States. On 30-year bonds it is 9.15 per cent versus 7.94 per cent in the United States.

People will argue that interest rates have come down and they will argue that the spread has narrowed. But if you can buy some goods at a store at 30 per cent below another store, you will deal with the first store. If that spread drops from 30 per cent to 15 per cent you will still deal with that store because it is a better deal. Financing is going on in the United States and throughout the world by provinces and by the federal government because the rate advantage is there. That will continue, and as it continues the pressure will build up for an egregious drop in the Canadian dollar.

Senator Everett: My feeling is that the government should no longer resist the change. The policy option is open to reduce the value of the Canadian dollar. Not doing it is extremely harmful to the economy. We are seeing the results of it today. It will happen anyway. If the reduction is made it will have benefits for the economy. I do not believe that it will be inflationary. We are better to do it now while we might have the opportunity to control it rather than getting into a position where the pressures have built up, perhaps to be exacerbated by constitutional difficulties and to see a freefall of the dollar that perhaps we could not control.

I have been talking about this now for well over a year. The time is getting short. The change in policy must be made. I know that you back the governor all the way, but I appeal to the government, because you have the final responsibility for monetary policy, to make that change.

● (1610)

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I can only add my voice to the treatise of Senator Everett. Certainly, we should listen to him when it comes to letting the value of the dollar drop. But we should also ask ourselves, why has his sound businesslike advice not been taken by a government that is supposed to represent business interests?

It is a philosophical point. The budget that Mr. Mazankowski has presented, just like those presented by Mr. Michael Wilson in the past, followed the philosophy of Margaret Thatcher and Ronald Reagan: you feed a horse some oats and eventually a grain or two will come out at the other end for the sparrows to eat. So you lower taxes for the rich, you raise the interest they can earn on their money, you make it easy for them to take their capital abroad and you grind the faces of the poor through taxes.

This is presented as a policy for fighting the deficit. What the policy does is make the rich richer and the poor poorer and consumption falls because the poor, unfortunately, are much more numerous than the rich. That lower consumption plus higher interest rates drives farms and small businesses to bankruptcy and increases unemployment, all in the name of fighting inflation.

There are other ways of fighting inflation than allowing interest rates to rise. Walter Thurow of MIT has suggested the use of the income tax system, and that excessive demands by unions that exceed 5 per cent year over year will be totally taxed away. The same thing can be done with profits, including capital gains. However, that would not please the rich. Rich lenders, rich depositors like high interest rates; they make a lot of money.

[Senator Everett.]

What I am saying will be characterized by right wing senators as being passé. Job creation has proven to be the best way to compress deficits and, therefore, the best way to compress national debts. Take the OECD statistics and look at which are the countries with the lowest debt as a percentage of GDP, year after year after year. They all happen to be countries that make job creation a central part of their economic policy. Why? I am giving you 1989 figures. They can be increased by the inflation rate since then.

The average unemployed person in Canada in 1989 earned $15,000 before he or she lost his or her job. For that $15,000, they produced $15,000 of goods or services. That is what a wage or a salary means. A person is paid for the goods or services turned out. When they become unemployed, they still cost society $15,000—about $9,200 in unemployment payments and the rest in lost revenue and increased social costs. We have the same cost per person whether that person is employed or unemployed. However, when the person is unemployed, he or she does not produce $15,000 worth of goods or services. Therefore, if we are paying that person unemployment insurance or welfare, without that person making any addition to the gross domestic product and therefore without being able to pay sufficient taxes to finance all these programs, then we have a deficit and we add to the national debt.

The countries that have understood this mechanism are those that have no national debt. Norway has been running a surplus for the past 17 years because of following such policies.

We are told that if we use such methods, the people with money to invest will not invest here; that they do not like such constraints; that government annoys them, and they will go elsewhere. There are sufficient savings generated in Canada that we can keep from running away. If our private investors will take their marbles and go elsewhere, then we should say that pension funds cannot invest even 1 per cent—nothing, no part of their funds—abroad. They must invest it all in Canada. That would generate sufficient investment within the country to create jobs.

Honourable senators will hear very strong propaganda against what I am suggesting. It is perfectly natural that you would hear such propaganda. Who hires economists as consultants at very high fees? Business people who think the opposite of what I think. Who buys newspapers and fires a decent editor and replaces that decent editor with an editor and an economic editor, both of whom are a cross between a pterodactyl and tyrannosaurus rex? Rich people do. It is not the people who cannot afford—yes, you know of that which I speak, Sir.

Senator Doyle: Carry on.

Senator Gigantès: The people who have funds seem to prefer to take their money and invest it in places where workers will work for starvation wages compared to the wages here. This era will come to an end and sooner than we think, I hope. The European community will show the way. It will say to its investors, "Of course, go ahead, take your money and invest it in Iraq. We will not allow you to sell back to us what you will produce in Iraq." This will happen. By inadvertence, perhaps without knowing what they are doing, the Americans might elect a president who will follow suit on the European community. Then we will enter a new era where trade will be calculated in terms of jobs; where one of these big blocs will say to another bloc, "I will import one of your products and lose 10 jobs provided you import one of mine and let me create 10 jobs."

This is not the invisible hand; this is not the free market; this is not free trade, but let us not forget that Ricardo said free trade works only in conditions of full employment; it does not work otherwise, and the unemployed have votes. We live in democratic societies and the countries of Europe will use their votes sooner rather than later to say that they do not want to export jobs.

Felix Rohatyn, a banker who is the managing partner of Lazard Frères in New York, wrote a sensational article quite some years ago saying that we cannot ignore our producers. We will not be able indefinitely to export jobs to Korea, Taiwan, Singapore and Japan. The time will come when we will have to say, we trade in jobs.

What I propose can be made to work. It can be demonstrated, and there have been people who have made this demonstration: notable, able economists. We have to ask ourselves: Why is such advice ignored by Thatcherite, Reaganite, Wilsonite, Mazankowskiite governments? Because of a philosophical block—Eat the poor. Get a receipt.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the report of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, dated 28th February, 1992 (Sessional Paper 343-416A).

Hon. John Buchanan: Honourable senators, I do not intend to take too much time this afternoon, but I do believe it may be important that I say something with respect to the constitutional process and the various conferences that have been held over the last 14 years in Canada. I have been fortunate—some might say "unfortunate"— to have participated in every conference since 1978. I was a signatory to the 1981-82 accord, the Meech Lake Accord of 1987 and the constitutional agreement of 1990. It is important to note that intense negotiations have been held on constitutional conferences going way back to the 1960s, culminating in 1971 with an unsuccessful conference. There was then a delay for eight years to about 1979, culminating at that point in the patriation of the Constitution and the other matters of the Constitution Act, 1982, and then coming forward again to 1986, 1987 and to 1990.

I think it is important that we take a look at the process that was followed because there has been some discussion and criticism about process, particularly on the Meech Lake Accord and events leading up to it. Therefore I think it is important that we look back at the process that was followed between 1979 and 1982. There is a good review of the history of this process by Jack Pickersgill in the Toronto Sun or the Ottawa Sun, I am not sure which. Every member of the Senate should read it because it indicates clearly what actually happened in 1982, in 1987 and in 1990, and it puts some of the criticism to rest.

I recall the 1979 conference, which was the first one I attended on the Constitution. I recall the 1980 conference, the 1981 conference, and the final meetings in 1981 leading to the signing, by Her Majesty the Queen in 1982, of the Constitution Act, 1982.

Let us look at the process. There has been a lot of criticism about Meech Lake. The criticism was that it was a pressure-cooker negotiation. It was held behind closed doors for a week in 1987 and again in 1990 in the Conference Centre for about one week.

Let us look back at 1979, 1980, 1981. I was there. The conference held over in the Conference Centre in 1979 was not a lengthy conference. It set up the parameters of what the governments of the day wanted to achieve with respect to the patriation of the Constitution, some discussion on the new idea of the Charter of Rights and an amending formula. In 1980-81, more meat was put on the negotiations. A phenomenon occurred at that time when one of the provinces, namely the Province of Quebec, left the negotiating table, and I will recall that day as long as I live.

Therefore in a process that was to involve ten provinces and the Government of Canada, we ended up with nine provinces and the Government of Canada. We ended up in a process where there was very little public participation, if any, as I recall. We ended up in a process where none of the provincial legislatures were even consulted by any of the premiers, including myself. I will accept some of that blame. I signed a document which was probably the most profound, all-encompassing document involving the Constitution of Canada since 1867. I signed it but it never did go to our legislature, and it was never the topic of a public discussion in any of the provinces, as I recall. That was the process.

It was even worse than that, because the Prime Minister of the day decided that we premiers were irrelevant to the situation, that it was totally unnecessary for us to even be in the room, that our signature was not required at all. He was willing to go it alone with the Government of Canada, until some of us decided that things had gone too far, and the Supreme Court of Canada was consulted.

The Supreme Court of Canada decided that Mr. Trudeau was wrong, that the provinces had to be consulted, and that there must be a consensus of the provinces in the Constitution reform or amendment package. So we went back to the table. We were not in an open conference centre very much of the time. We were upstairs in the same room in 1981 where we were closeted in 1990, not for one or two days but for two and a half or three days at a time. We even stayed over on a beautiful Sunday afternoon, when we took a break and went for a cruise down the canal.

Senator Bonnell: That cleared your mind.

Senator Buchanan: It did.

Senator Molgat: You did not roll any dice, though.

Senator Buchanan: I can tell you there was more than dice thrown in that room.

Senator Frith: What does that mean?

Senator Buchanan: Let's not worry ourselves about process if you go back to the 1978-1982 conferences on the Constitution.

So we bring things ahead now to the conferences of 1986, which commenced with a premiers' conference in Edmonton, where Premier Bourassa brought forward his five points, which I thought were logical and reasonable. Many of us thought that they should be committed to paper quickly and agreed upon, but that was not to happen, at least as quickly as all that.

There are many who say that the process from 1986 to 1987 and on into 1990 was totally flawed because there was no public participation, because it was a pressure-cooker kind of negotiation, because there was little consultation. That is absolutely incorrect. I was there from 1978 to 1982, from 1986 to 1990. There was very little difference in the kind of negotiations that went on, other than the fact that in the 1978-1982 talks there was a move to exclude the provinces entirely.

That certainly was not the case in the period from 1986 to 1990. It has been said that Meech Lake was flawed; that there was no discussion by the provinces, or that there was very little discussion, that is in the overall picture, by the provinces or the people within the provinces. But that is not so.

Senator Frith: When you say the provinces, the—

Senator Buchanan: The people within the province. The people within the provinces, as contrasted to the period from 1979 to 1981-82 when, as I recall, there was no public participation and none by the legislatures whatsoever.

Senator Frith: Just the premiers.

Senator Buchanan: Just the premiers.

Senator Frith: Always the premiers, throughout the whole scene.

Senator Buchanan: We signed the documents. Nothing was ever referred to our legislatures, and that, looking back, was probably wrong.

Senator Stewart: Was that true in the House of Commons?

Senator Buchanan: I will accept part of the blame for that, because I participated in it, but that is not to say it was right.

[Senator Buchanan.]

Senator Frith: You are referring to the provinces, not the House of Commons.

Senator Buchanan: I am talking about the provinces. But now let us look at Meech Lake and what happened. In 1986, the premier of the province of Quebec brought forth his proposals.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Incidentally, in fairness, senator, at the time you are speaking of, there was no constitutional provision that required the participation of the legislatures, whereas the 1981-82 formula did require the participation of the legislatures.

Senator Buchanan: I entirely agree. What I am doing is contrasting—

Senator Frith: I thought you were rolling them all into the same ball.

Senator Buchanan: I am not rolling them into one. I am simply saying that those who complained and criticized Meech Lake should look back at what did happen in the 1981-82 accord, where there was very little public participation and no participation or ratification by any legislature. I am not saying it was necessary, because at the time it was not.

Senator Frith: But at the time of Meech Lake, there was a constitutional provision requiring the legislatures—

Senator Buchanan: Agreed. I have no difficulty with that. I know all about it.

Senator Frith: That distinction is important.

Senator Buchanan: Well, the distinction is important, but I am not saying that here. What I am contrasting is the criticism of Meech Lake by certain people who were present at the time when the 1981-82 accord was agreed to. The same people who now criticize and have criticized Meech Lake were present in the period from 1979 to 1982.

Senator Frith: But the constitutional conditions were different for Meech Lake.

Senator Buchanan: That does not matter. I am talking about those people who criticized the process in 1986.

Senator Frith: But the—

Senator Simard: Order, please.

Senator Buchanan: Thank you.

Senator Frith: Senator Simard walks in in the middle of the debate and calls for order.

Senator Simard: That is right.

Senator Frith: With his newspaper under his arm.

Senator Buchanan: Honourable senators, in the period from 1986 to 1987, it has been said that there was very little participation other than by the Government of Canada and the premiers. That is not true either. Between 1986 and 1987 there were intense negotiations by officials from all ten provinces and the Government of Canada. There were various meetings held between the premiers, and many meetings held by individual premiers with the Prime Minister throughout that period culminating, as I have said, in 1987 at Meech Lake. After negotiations which lasted into the night, we were able to get ten premiers and a Prime Minister to sign an accord. I believe that was the first time that an accord of that type had been agreed to by every province in Canada and by the government of Canada.

It was an historic event. I recall we were all very pleased: pleased with ourselves, pleased with our officials, pleased for the country, pleased for the people of Canada. I remember that the premier of Quebec was pretty pleased with it, too.

Senator Molgat: The people were not pleased.

Senator Buchanan: The people were pleased with it. I am glad he said that, honourable senators. I recall between 1987 and 1990 there were very few people in this country who criticized Meech Lake. I recall that at the Sheraton Hotel in Halifax I spoke to a national organization in 1987 after we had signed the Meech Lake Accord, and I said how proud I was to have been present to see Canada come together with a new constitutional amendment. I got a standing ovation for it at the time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Molgat: But you couldn't have read any of the polls. Every poll in the country said the reverse.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order, please.

Senator Buchanan: Remember this: It was fine by ten premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada. This was the first time such an accord had been signed, and there was unanimity.

Senator Molgat: Every poll disagreed.

Senator Buchanan: Oh, come on. Come on.

Senator Molgat: Absolutely true.

Senator Frith: He is trying to tell us the facts. We have to accept those facts, too.

Senator Buchanan: It is interesting to look back to those years. The process was not complete in 1987 because, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, we had to go through a three-year waiting period which commenced when the National Assembly of Quebec ratified the Meech Lake accord on June 23, 1987. Then the clock started to tick for three years to June 23, 1990.

Senator Frith: And submission to legislatures.

Senator Buchanan: That is right. Ratification by the legislatures. I was very pleased that we in Nova Scotia were one of the first, or among the first, of the provinces to ratify it, followed by every province in Canada, including Newfoundland, except Manitoba and New Brunswick. It is history, of course, what happened after that.

I think it is important to note that during the period from 1986 to 1990, there was much public participation. There were no pressure-cooker tactics, as some people in this country have complained. There was public participation from Vancouver, Victoria, all the way right to Newfoundland.

Senator Frith: That was the beauty of the 1981-82 formula. It was not required.

Senator Buchanan: It was not the beauty of the formula. The Prime Minister of the day tried to kick every province in Canada into negotiations. The only reason it did not happen is because the Supreme Court of Canada intervened and told him he could not do that.

Senator Frith: I do not understand why you are not proud of what you did.

Senator Buchanan: I have already indicated that I was.

Senator Gigantès: You signed it.

Senator Buchanan: I signed it. Absolutely, I signed it. I quite agree with it. I look back now and wonder if the country would have been better off if we had not signed it, but history will record whether we were right, wrong or indifferent.

Now we come to 1990. Every province had signed in 1987. There were provincial elections in some provinces. One province, New Brunswick, had not ratified the accord, but subsequently agreed to do so. That left basically two provinces. In one of them, Newfoundland, the accord had been ratified, but then the ratification was voided by the action of the new Clyde Wells government.

I think it is important that we look at what happened in 1990. We met in the Conference Centre in Ottawa, and then we concluded over a period of five or six days in the room upstairs. Nobody in that room would agree with critics who say it was a pressure-cooker atmosphere. It was not. It was an atmosphere where we wanted to reach an agreement with the two provinces that still had not signed the final accord. The participation was there. The public participation had been there. The provinces had all been consulted. The House of Commons and the Senate had ratified—-

Senator Frith: What?

Senator Buchanan: The Meech Lake Accord.

Senator Frith: We had not.

Senator Buchanan: Perhaps the Senate had not. I said some things about the Senate at that time that I take back, by the way.

Senator Frith: That is why I raised the point.

Senator Buchanan: I am allowed to change my mind. I suggest the Senate can be, and will be, a very vital institution in the constitutional life of Canada. How is that?

Senator Frith: That is good. That is very good.

Senator Buchanan: Now—

Senator Frith: Very acceptable repentance.

Senator Buchanan: I think we should also note again that those people who complained about and criticized the Meech Lake Accord were the same people who were present in the period from 1979 to 1981 during the negotiations for the repatriation accord, the Charter of Rights, et cetera. In fact, one of the players, presently a premier, and a few others negotiated clauses of that repatriation agreement in a kitchen in a hotel here in Ottawa.

Senator Frith: You mean some. Not all of them.

● (1640)

Senator Buchanan: I was informed about 2 o'clock in the morning that an agreement was imminent, and that it had been negotiated in the kitchen.

Senator Gigantès: Why did you sign it, then?

Senator Buchanan: Who was the chief negotiator in the kitchen?

Senator Gigantès: You signed it.

Senator Buchanan: It was not the Prime Minister.

Senator Gigantès: You signed it.

Senator Buchanan: That is irrelevant.

Senator Gigantès: Your signature is on it.

Senator Buchanan: I am suggesting to you that those people who complained about pressure-cooker tactics are the same people who were themselves in the kitchen, negotiating.

Senator Simard: Who was the leader?

Senator Buchanan: Oh, I think you know.

Senator Simard: Tell us, please. Please, we insist.

Senator Buchanan: His name was Jean Chrétian.

Senator Simard: Oh, the Liberal leader.

Senator Buchanan: And the other gentleman was Roy Romanow.

An Hon. Senator: The saviours of Quebec.

Senator Frith: You are not saying all the critics of the Meech Lake Accord were in the kitchen? It was a big kitchen.

Senator Buchanan: They are the ones who complained about pressure cookers. There are many pressure cookers and pots in the kitchen of the Chateau Laurier Hotel. So why should they complain?

Senator Frith: But thousands of people criticized that agreement. Were they all in the kitchen?

Senator Buchanan: No, no, I just named two of them.

Senator Frith: Were there not any Tories in the kitchen?

Senator Buchanan: There may have been.

Senator Gigantès: But you are only sure of the others, I see.

Senator Buchanan: But that does not make it right.

Senator Corbin: It does not matter. It is all history, now. Get on with the present. What is your solution?

Senator Buchanan: Oh sure, it is all history. Get on with the present and the future. Never mind the past. I will tell you something: History will record that there were people who signed documents who backed off on their signatures.

[Senator Buchanan.]

Senator Barootes: Welshed is the word.

Senator Buchanan: I signed the documents and I followed through. But right over here in the Conference Centre there was a premier who signed a document and made a commitment and he did not follow through with that commitment, and I believe that is why we are in the kind of a mess we are in in Canadian society today. I was there and I heard him say that the accord would go to a vote in the Legislature of Newfoundland, and it did not go to a vote in the Legislature of Newfoundland. I believe that if it had gone to a vote, it would have been ratified, and we would not be where we are today, as far as the constitutional crises is concerned. And I can prove that to you.

Senator Barootes: And what party was he in, John?

Senator Buchanan: It was not the Tory party and it was not the NDP.

Senator Gigantès: It was past the deadline. It failed the test in Manitoba.

Senator Barootes: And what was he? An acolyte?

Senator Frith: It had already failed in Manitoba.

Senator Buchanan: No, it had not. There could have been a signal come out of Newfoundland. Also, constitutionally—I do not have too much time for some constitutional lawyers, but constitutionally, I was told at the time and maybe believed it, there may have been a way, if Newfoundland had ratified, that Manitoba may have been able to ratify later. The Leader of the Government in the Senate is not here, but he told me, and I believe just about everything Senator Murray tells me.

Senator Gigantès: You believe everything Senator Murray tells you? He told us about the free trade agreement, that we had a binding agreement.

Senator Buchanan: Some other interesting things with respect to the Meech Lake Accord happened between 1987 and 1990.

Senator Gigantès: I supported Meech Lake, personally.

Senator Buchanan: I recall speaking to a group of the top business people in Canada, in Toronto. After I explained my interpretation of the distinct society clause and the interpretation that would be placed on it in the Constitution as a result of the 1987 accord, and we talked about the spending power and the national cost-shared programs, then we had a question and answer period. This is the misunderstanding that has been projected throughout this country by certain politicians and by somee members of the media. One of these gentlemen got up and said, "Look, all of this could have been avoided if you had not allowed Premier Bourassa in the Meech Lake Accord to invoke the notwithstanding clause." I could not believe it. I looked at him and I said, "The Meech Lake Accord? The notwithstanding clause was put into the Constitution by way of a constitutional amendment in 1982." "Oh, no," he said. "It was Meech Lake."

I told him: "I was there. It was not Meech Lake." Then he said, "Well, maybe you are right; if you were there, I guess you would know better than I." But then he said, "Mr. Bourassa used the notwithstanding clause for the first time in this country." I said, "Wrong again, it was used in Saskatchewan by Premier Devine. I believe it was used also in British Columbia. I am not sure." But I knew that Robert Bourassa had not used it for the first time. It had been used before.

Then another gentleman stood up and said, "Look, we could have avoided a lot of this problem if you had not said the three years would have to elapse. Why did Mr. Mulroney do that?" he said. I said, "There you go again. Mr. Mulroney had nothing to do with the three-year waiting period. I did, and if I am to blame for it, I will accept part of the blame. But Mr. Mulroney had nothing to do it. The Prime Minister of the day was Pierre Elliot Trudeau, and his chief advisor was Jean Chrétien who sat behind him, along with my dear friend from Lake Ainsley, Senator Allan J. MacEachen."

Senator Frith: And their dear friend John Buchanan, who signed it.

Senator Buchanan: Yes. You keep saying that. I have admitted that. In fact, I may as well tell you what happened. I did not sign the thing myself. Quite seriously. I was called back to Nova Scotia because of a death in my wife's family, and Edmund Morris signed it for me. Edmund Morris took the glory of signing for the province of Nova Scotia.

Senator Frith: Are you repudiating that signature? Did he not have your authority?

Senator Buchanan: Oh yes, total authority. Total authority.

Senator Frith: Poor chap. That was close.

Senator Buchanan: Let me tell you what else happened. We each had our offices over in the Conference Centre. There was a note that came to my desk, "Premier Morris, call your office as soon as possible." So they really thought, because he signed it, that he had become the premier, just by some quirk of fate.

Senator Frith: That you did repudiate.

Senator Buchanan: Yes, I did repudiate that. But it is very important that we look at the criticism and the source of the criticism and the kind of criticism that certain people have made about the Meech Lake Accord.

I have heard people say that Premier Wells was right; that Premier Wells was right not to put the vote to the Newfoundland Legislature; that he was right not to agree to have it ratified, after having promised. I was there, I heard it. In fact, it is in writing. I have the document right here.

Senator Barootes: He was afraid to put it to a vote. They would have ratified it.

Senator Buchanan: For the last three years we have again been in a turmoil over the Constitution. When we look at the report of the honourable Senator Beaudoin and Dorothy Dobbie, we find something very striking. We find in that report basically the same situation we had in the Meech Lake Accord. In fact, the Beaudoin-Dobbie report goes much further in my opinion than the Meech Lake Accord. The Meech Lake Accord stated this in the interpretation of the Constitution of Canada about the distinct society status of Quebec. I will read it very carefully here.

> The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians centered in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada . . .

Great words, and absolutely correct, by the way. And (b):

> . . . the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.

How much more clear could you be? As I said to the Agriculture Association of Canada back in the spring of 1990, my interpretation of that was quite simple. First, in Quebec some 80 per cent of the people speak French. That is their mother language, French. In the rest of the country, 80 per cent or more of the people speak English. So Quebec has that niche in Canadian society where its language is distinct. It is a distinctive part of Quebec society.

Second, you just have to go into the province of Quebec and you know it immediately. In rural areas and in some of the towns and even in the cities the culture of Quebec is different by far than that of the rest of Canada; much different.

Many members of the Agriculture Association, particularly those from western Canada, were not happy with the distinct society clause. They had misunderstood it. It had been misrepresented to them. I told them that the third and the most important point is that the basis of society is the rule of law. In the province of Quebec their whole system of law is founded on the French civil code. I was trained in the English common law, as were lawyers in every province in Canada except the province of Quebec.

How simple it is to understand, when you put it in those terms, that Quebec is a distinct society within Canada. It is very simple. I had many of them ask me later, "Is that all it means?" I said, "That's it, that's what it means." They said they had heard it from a constitutional lawyer. I told them to pay no attention to the constitutional lawyers. The problem is developing because of a constitutional lawyer who believes himself. He was his own advisor. I will not name him. You all know who I mean. He was his own advisor. You know the old saying about the lawyer who has himself for a client.

Senator Frith: What about one who is not a lawyer like Senator Murray?

Senator Buchanan: I did not hear him spouting constitutional law at any time, but I heard the Premier of Newfoundland doing it all the time. He even dismissed a former senator of this house.

So the Meech Lake Accord defined what the distinct society is all about. The honourable Senator Beaudoin and Dorothy Dobbie, in their report, said basically the same thing. The distinct society clause is in the Canada clause where we all agree as Canadians that Quebec is distinct within our Canadian society. Second, the interpretation of the Charter of Rights shall take into consideration or be in a manner consistent with the recognition that Quebec is a distinct society. That is basically the same as Meech Lake. And the same gentleman who would not accept the Meech Lake Accord now turns around and says, "That sounds all right to me; that sounds fine." The reason he gives is that they have now defined what the distinct society is all about. Your report, sir, is basically the same as the Meech Lake Accord as far as the distinct society clause is concerned.

Let us look at some others. The national cost-shared programs of the Meech Lake Accord were very simple. Those provinces that wanted to opt in or out had the right to do so, with compensation if they opted out, provided that they had a program compatible with the national program. There is no difference at all, as I see it, from the Beaudoin-Dobbie report. It is the same type of situation as in the Meech Lake Accord.

The interesting thing is that those who criticized the Meech Lake Accord for that spending power clause and the cost sharing opting out or in by provinces, seem to forget that we have been doing it for many years in this country. All we were doing in Meech Lake was putting into writing in the Constitution that which had been practised in this country since the 1950s. There were all kinds of national cost-shared programs moving into provincial fields. We had them in 1950s, the 1960s and the 1970s, but they were not in the Constitution. We were simply putting them in the Constitution; that is all there was to it. Agreements on immigration were in the Meech Lake Accord. Again, there is the same kind of situation in the Beaudoin-Dobbie report.

There were a few others I jotted down. The Supreme Court is an interesting one. I had some people tell me that it was ridiculous for me to have agreed to sign the Meech Lake Accord because they did not agree that Quebec should have three judges on the Supreme Court. I said that Quebec has always had three judges on the Supreme Court. They said that they were told that that was new, that Quebec does not have the right to have three judges. I said that Quebec has always had three judges, as far as I can recall.

Senator Frith: Is that a distinction in your own wording? Did you mean that to be a distinction? You said they will always have, or they have always had the right?

Senator Buchanan: They have always had, as far as I know.

So we were again just putting into the Constitution that which had been practised in this country for years. The reason for three judges of the Supreme Court being from Quebec is that they were trained in the French civil code. How could you sit in judgment on the Supreme Court of Canada on a case from the province of Quebec if you were trained in the common law in one of the other provinces? So it was important that at least three of the judges be from the province of Quebec. It is simple. So the Meech Lake Accord had put into writing in the Constitution that which had been practised in this country for years. The Beaudoin-Dobbie report has done the same thing with regard to the Supreme Court.

The amending formula changes in the Meech Lake Accord are interesting. I look at that and I look at the Beaudoin-Dobbie report, and the amending formula changes are basically the same. One might say that the Meech Lake Accord is on all fours with the Beaudoin-Dobbie report. However, that is not correct. The report that we have before us now goes further than the Meech Lake Accord. It talks about the delegation of powers from the provinces to the federal government. It talks about transfer of powers. It talks about aboriginal rights and it talks about Senate reform, as did the Meech Lake Accord, in a different way. The report we have before us goes much further, in my opinion, than the Meech Lake Accord.

It is interesting also to look at the Meech Lake Accord with respect to the Senate. I tell myself that I am either fortunate or unfortunate, because if the Meech Lake Accord had been ratified I would not be here. I would not be here because the Meech Lake Accord, as I recall it, had a clause stipulating that any senator appointed after the passage of the Meech Lake Accord would be appointed by the Prime Minister on the recommendation of the premier of a province. That would mean that I would have had to appoint myself here, and I would not do that.

Senator Corbin: Well, how did you get here?

Senator Buchanan: I did not appoint myself.

Senator Corbin: Tell me how you got here.

Senator Buchanan: You tell me how you got here.

Senator Corbin: I asked you first.

Senator Buchanan: I am here because I make a good senator.

Seriously, I think all reasonable people will agree that the reasons for the death of the Meech Lake Accord were folly. They just did not hold up. And the proof of it, of course, is that now we have a committee report before us which is basically Meech Lake plus a bit.

I want to make another point to clarify the whole situation. It would be absurd for me to stand here and say that nothing was achieved in the 1981-82 accord. There certainly were achievements. We patriated the Constitution. For the first time, we had a Charter of Rights in the Constitution. We had an amending formula, but it was badly flawed because one of the major partners in the country was not there, the province of Quebec. And that was not our fault. I am not saying that was the fault of the people present: the Prime Minister, the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, Jean Chrétien or any of us. They left of their own volition. They walked out and they had their reasons for doing so. History will record why they went out and people will discuss it. I really do not think they wanted an agreement, but that is just my opinion.

One thing that happened after that was a commitment to the people of Quebec that they would be back in the constitutional family of Canada at a later date.

That was a commitment. In 1986, we started the process to bring Quebec back into the constitutional family of Canada, and it was thwarted in 1990 by a person who today says he now accepts what he would not accept in 1990. It is as simple as that.

I hope for the sake of this country, honourable senators, that this report will be passed. I know it will be negotiated. It will be discussed in public. It will be discussed by the premiers. It will be discussed by all kinds of people. There must still be a lot of public participation, but at the end of the day, honourable senators, I hope it will be passed by the House of Commons, that it will be ratified by every legislature in this country, and that we can get on with the business of the economy of this country and put the Constitution behind us.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I will have an awful lot to say in answer to Senator Buchanan. I will speak for a while, and then move the adjournment of the debate. You have said it is an unlimited number of hours, right?

I supported the Meech Lake Accord; it is in writing, in a book I wrote, terminated in November 1989. I supported the Meech Lake Accord. I support the Beaudoin-Dobbie report, or as Mrs. Dobbie would prefer, the Dobbie-Beaudoin report, but I claim that the Liberal dissidents in various places improved the report. The facts will prove this so.

I was glad to hear Senator Buchanan say that the government of Quebec walked out in 1981. Historically speaking, there is no way the premier of a party dedicated to taking Quebec out of Canada could have signed that report and kept control over his party. He could not have. So he could not sign it. The choice Mr. Buchanan and others faced was, do we stop everything because a separatist party refuses to sign an accord which is necessary for the country, and why is it necessary for the country? What is the problem?

The problem always is, in a federation, the division of powers. How will you apportion the division of powers? You must have an amending formula, other than going over to London and asking London's permission. An amending formula was needed. We had a Charter of Rights, but it was not constitutionalized. We constitutionalized that. We repatriated the Constitution. Those were three preconditions before proceeding to the redistribution of powers.

Why was a Charter of Rights necessary? Because those who believe in a Charter of Rights—and it is a clear majority of the country that believes in a Charter of Rights—feel that there must be a limit to what a government can do to the rights of an individual citizen. Governments are there to serve citizens, not to oppress them. So a Charter of Rights was necessary.

That said, it was then open to all the provinces to proceed with the next stage, which was to discuss the distribution of powers. Quebec said, "No way; absolutely not; we will not." It was Mr. Levesque's government that was in place. Having refused to sign the Constitution of 1981-82, he could not then accept to discuss the division of powers within the framework of that Constitution. That is where we were.

What did the people of Quebec think? Look at all the 1982 polls. There was not one below 58 per cent approval for Mr. Trudeau. In answer to questions such as, "Do you think Quebec will be better off after this Constitution than before it?" some polls scored as much as 70 per cent. So things were like that. A step that was necessary was taken.

I now beg the Senate to allow me to adjourn the debate. I will discuss what comes next tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Gigantès, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES, 1991-92

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON MAIN ESTIMATES—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the seventh report of the Committee on National Finance concerning the Main Estimates, presented in the Senate on March 24, 1992.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, I had prepared some fairly long notes to discuss the report, but since it is rather late and we are to vote soon, at 5.30, I believe, I will just say that in the report, we talked about the study we are now doing of Public Service 2000.

I want to assure the Senate, of course, that this is not a pre-study of Bill C-26, because it has not even been referred to us. This study was unanimously accepted by the committee members. I see some members of the committee here and they can support me on that.

Furthermore, we decided to look into the use of vote 5. I think that the use the government makes of this vote is sometimes necessary but at other times not. We make some recommendations on the examination of this vote 5, which is very important. It can be used and is now used to spend without going through Parliament. Expenditures are made before Parliament is informed and authorizes them.

Our committee recommends that Treasury Board provide a full report at the end of the fiscal year on use made of that budget item, in case the government needed to use it. Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. John Stewart: I wish to say a few words with regard to that part of this report that deals with Treasury Board Vote 5. Perhaps the best way to begin is by reminding honourable senators what the vote says. It is Vote 5, and it refers to government contingencies—"subject to the approval of the Treasury Board to supplement other votes for pay lists and other requirements, and to provide for miscellaneous, minor and unforeseen expenses not otherwise provided for, including awards under the Public Servants Inventions Act, and authority to reuse any sums allotted for non-pay list requirements and repaid to this appropriation from other appropriations."

In analyzing those words, we see that moneyis being made available to the government for three distinct purposes. First, money from Treasury Vote 5 may be used to supplement other votes for pay list requirements. The reason supplementation may be necessary is that the government, when it draws up its estimates, cannot anticipate what salary and wage arrangements it will make with Crown employees. Therefore, there has to be some flexibility in the appropriation made by Parliament.

The second purpose for which Vote 5 may be used is to supplement other votes in the Estimates—that is, votes for "other requirements". Third, money may be used for "miscellaneous, minor and unforeseen expenses". There are these three different categories for which money may be used from Vote 5.

The second part of "vote" states that Parliament gives authority to re-use any sums allotted for non-paylist requirements and repaid to the appropriation from other appropriations. That means that part of the contingency appropriation may be used again and again. What happens is that when a set of supplementary estimates is brought in particular departments or agencies are given money for specified purposes. In some cases the purpose already has been financed by money taken from Vote 5, the contingency vote. When a Parliament appropriates specifically for that purpose in supplementary Estimates,the department or agency in question repays the money to Vote 5. Thus those sums paid out from Vote 5 for "non-pay list requirements" are repayed, and may be used again by the Board. Consequently, the amount of money spent as a result of Vote 5 in a fiscal year will be considerably larger than one might think if one simply looked at the size of the contingency vote in the Main Estimates.

For the fiscal year ending March 31 Vote 5 was $400 million; in the new fiscal year it will be $450 million. But that figure should not mislead anyone. At the end of this fiscal year the vote will have been recruited or restored by departments as a result of Supplementary Estimates, perhaps to 60 per cent of its original level.

If one looks at a set of Supplementary Estimates one can see what happens. I take up Supplementary Estimates (C) for 1991-92 and on page 31, under "the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency", I see that Parliament is being asked to vote an amount for this agency but at the bottom of the page we are told that funds in the amount of $500 thousand were advanced from Treasury Board contingency vote to provide temporary funding for this program. What will happen is that when the appropriation bill based on Supplementary Estimates (C) has been given Royal Assent, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency will repay $500,000 to the Treasury Board.

Honourable senators will appreciate that Treasury Vote 5 is a key vote because when Parliament enacts it a large sum of money, namely, $400 million or thereabouts, placed at the discretion of the government. But it works out to more than that as the various sets of supplementary estimates come along and have the effect—to use the words I used before—of recruiting or restoring the Treasury Board vote—not to its full amount because it is only in the case of "other requirements", not the pay list requirements.

You will notice, honourable senators, that the report contains various recommendations. We found in the committee that Treasury Board was very cooperative both with regard to giving information on how this vote has been used in the past and in trying to devise ways in which Parliament could be given information regularly in the future about use made of the vote. What we have asked for is a running report throughout the year as to what is happening under Vote 5 and also at the end of the year a summation as to what has been done.

I want to applaud the chairman and all the members of the committee, except myself, of course, for the attention that they have given to this important matter. The committee has done good work. In addition, the officials of Treasury Board have been first rate in this regard. If the committee's recommendations are followed up, the way the contingency appropriation totalling now more than half a billion dollars has been used will be much more transparent in the future than it has been.

This is a good report. All the members of the committee think that it is a good report.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, if I am not mistaken, this is more like a report by the chairman of the committee. I myself am a fairly active member of this committee, but I am afraid that other work prevented me from reading the report as I usually do. However, to my knowledge, and I stand corrected if I am wrong, committee members as a group did not have an opportunity to comment on the content, style, form and substance of the report.

If that is the case, I would ask the chairman of the committee to simply answer my question. If committee members did not have an opportunity to consider the report and make a contribution, the report must be considered as the chairman's report.

Senator LeBlanc: Honourable senators, the report was prepared on the basis of comments made in committee by committee members themselves. This is not a report that was dreamed up. Because time was of the essence, it was prepared on the basis of comments by members. Obviously, I could have taken another two or three sittups to ask members to revise the report, the text, syntax, spelling mistakes, and so forth. I could have done that.

However, since March is drawing to a close and Senator Lynch-Staunton seems in a hurry to get all the money bills through the Senate as soon as possible before the March 31 deadline, I thought I could dispense with asking the entire committee's permission to do so.

If Senator Simard has any comments or is dissatisfied with the report itself, let him comment by all means.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must suspend the proceedings pursuant to rule 67 (3) and call in the senators for a vote to take place at 5:30 p.m. We will proceed with the same subject after the vote.

The debate was suspended, and the Senate adjourned to the call of the bell.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(a) I move:

THAT the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today, and that Rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

I will explain, if permitted.

Senator Molgat: I have had a brief discussion with the deputy chairman of the committee on the matter and I am prepared to grant leave. I would hope that Senator Nurgitz would explain the reasons why.

Senator Nurgitz: Absolutely. Honourable senators, through miscommunication when Bill C-64 received second reading this afternoon, several senators were informed that the committee would sit at 4.30 p.m. I am unaware why that took place and I will inquire because it was the intention, time permitting, that it would sit when the Senate rose.

Since 4.30 p.m. members of the Department of Justice and several witnesses have been waiting.

I understand that it is not a complicated bill. It is rather important for the Northwest Territories to have this bill. It is an extension of some previous law. My understanding is that within half an hour we could complete the study of the matter. In any event, not to preclude how long senators wish to speak in committee, if we could have permission it would be expedite matters.

Senator Molgat: Is it expected that Senator Nurgitz will report at tomorrow's sitting?

Senator Nurgitz: Yes, honourable senators, assuming that the committee approves it.

The Hon. The Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

THE ESTIMATES, 1991-92

CONSIDERATION OF EIGHTH REPORT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I think some clarification is in order at this point, considering my comments a few minutes ago and those made by Senator LeBlanc (Saurel).

Believe me, I do this only because I feel this is something we should be extremely careful about. When the eighth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance was tabled, members of your committee had not, as a group, had an opportunity to read, consider and if necessary make certain corrections in the report's presentation and content. So I simply wanted to draw the attention of our colleagues and Canadians to the fact that this was the chairman's report. It does not make the report any less credible.

It does not in any way reflect the impartiality of the chairman, Senator Fernand LeBlanc. It was never my intention to insinuate that he had ulterior motives. In fact, this was simply a warning, based on the fact that as a group, committee members had not had a chance, probably due to lack of time, to read or correct the report. I hope the chairman, Senator LeBlanc, won't hold this against me.

Personally, I intend to read the report and, although Senator LeBlanc said otherwise, I think he will agree that although these are not recommendations as such, the way testimony before the committee or the report itself is written may depend on who does the writing.

That is exactly why when reports were prepared in the past, we had some very lively debate, reflecting each member's interpretation and in many cases, it helped us reach a consensus.

That was all I had to say.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there are just two minor matters I would like to mention.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

I simply want to ensure that the facts read into the record by Senator Simard . . . and I support his position that, if at all possible, we should have enough time for consultation so that the report is truly the committee's report.

If I am not mistaken, if there was any pressure, I believe it came from the government and committee members. Is that correct?

Senator Simard: I suppose there was some pressure. The government wanted to have this report.

However, whatever the reasons, I wanted to set the record straight, without wishing to accuse anyone. Certainly not our chairman, who has always been a model of generosity and impartiality.

Senator Frith: This is something we should remember in connection with committee procedure.

Honourable senators, it is quite possible I will have nothing to add to the debate on this report by the National Finance Committee, but because I was busy with something else, I intend to read Senator Stewart's comments between now and tomorrow's sitting.

Therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Scrutiny of Regulations (Central Registry of Divorce Proceedings), presented in the Senate on 27th February, 1992.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on that report I have been waiting for an opportunity to congratulate the Chairman and the members of that committee from our side and from the other side for their work in this last report. The report appears to describe a rather outrageous procedure and state of affairs. There was an article in the newspaper this morning about an apology.

May I ask the Chairman of the committee and the proposer and sponsor of this report whether we are waiting for something else to take place? I am prepared to wait to more formally congratulate the committee, but I want the chairman to know that his work has been noted and that I cannot imagine any reason for delaying the adoption of the report.

[Translation]

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, I want to thank Senator Frith for his compliments. They are even more flattering, coming from him. I am grateful to him.

The reason I ask for adjournment of the debate is that we have a committee meeting tomorrow. As you mentioned, our report is based on figures provided by the Department of Justice. Clearly, the Committee was right to prepare its fourth report because it is obvious that the Department of Justice has not complied with its enabling legislation.

Nevertheless, as you said, Senator Frith, we received a letter from the Minister of Justice telling us that the figures given to us by her department were incorrect. We had based our conclusions on the figures submitted by the department. Then we received a letter that the figures were inaccurate. The letter said that we should receive other figures shortly. I think it is interesting for the committee, as you say, if I were to read you the conclusions of the minister's letter.

● (1740)

[English]

I apologize for the fact that incomplete information was provided to the committee, and I regret any inconvenience occasioned as a result.

[Translation]

That is the letter mentioned this morning in a column in the Citizen. In closing, I want to say that we are waiting for the figures. We want to look at them. Then I will be able to comment on our committee's fourth report. I note your comments and congratulations and I will convey them to all my colleagues.

Senator Frith: Thank you for the explanation. I understand now.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL SOCIETY OF CANADA—BILL TO AMEND ACT TO INCORPORATE—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Castonguay, seconded by the Honourable Senator David for the second reading of Bill S-7, an Act to amend An Act to incorporate the Royal Society of Canada.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, because I have adjourned this so often, I want to put on the record that I had hoped to speak to this matter tomorrow. However, I probably will not have my notes ready until next week. I have explained that to Senator Tremblay, the sponsor of the bill, and he seems to be content.

Order stands.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY NFB FILM PRESENTATION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay:

That the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the contents of the CBC/NFB series "The Valour and the Horror" and report upon the said production to determine the authenticity of the three part series viz Savage Christmas: Hong Kong 1941; Death by Moonlight: Bomber Command; and In Desperate Battle: Normandy 1944, due to the mounting unfavourable reaction of the said production.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to explain our position on this order, but I want Senator Marshall to be here. In fact, I would like to speak to Senator Marshall before I do so. I ask that this item stand.

Order Stands.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER PROPRIETY AND CONSTITUTIONALITY OF AMENDMENTS TO RULES OF THE SENATE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Stanley Haidasz, pursuant to notice of February 27, 1992, moved:

That the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders be authorized to consider the propriety and the constitutionality of the changes and amendments to the Rules of the Senate, adopted by the Senate on June 18, 1991; and

That the Committee report no later than June 11, 1992.

He said: Honourable senators, at times it seems that we need reminding that parliamentary democracy in Canada is truly a precious thing. It was achieved, not easily, but by the struggles of Canadians who were committed to freedom of speech, principles of honour, and responsible government. Unfortunately, freedom of speech in Canada's Parliament has been undermined within the past year by changes to the rules of procedure in both houses. I believe that the more draconian changes in the Rules of the Senate were illicit because of the manner of their adoption, that is, without the confidence of a double majority necessary for such new principles as closure. What is more important, several Senate rules are, in the aggregate, evidently unconstitutional.

Many honourable senators objected strenuously last year to the rules revised by the then committee on Standing Rules and Orders, precisely on June 18, 1991. The revisions were not examined in detail with a view to their constitutionality by interested senators. Immediately upon the adoption of the new rules last June, I defended every senator's privilege on June 19, proposing a motion in remedy. I believed at that time that rescission was the safest way for setting aside major constitutional pitfalls to these rules until corrective amendments could be discussed. That motion, unfortunately, was killed by adjournment for 15 sitting days.

May I add that the adjournment certainly seemed less than fair and impartial for a proposed remedy to a question of privilege. It was the first manifestation of the dangerous and unparliamentary nature of these rules themselves.

As honourable senators now see, the motion before us does not put the question of whether to rescind the present rules. This house may want to avoid so drastic a measure if possible.

I am content today to refer the rules to the committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders so that it may apprise the Senate of the legal and constitutional dangers inherent in them and propose suitable remedies to these faults. By the present motion, the stated committee would dutifully hear the testimony of expert parliamentary counsel. It should take into account recommended amendments and other remedies to the faulty present rules.

In 1906, when the rules last underwent extensive revisions, the Senate regularly constituted itself into a Committee of the Whole for several months. The pains taken in 1906 preserved the final proposals from a constitutional pitfall, that of redefining powers and privileges of the Senate without an act of Parliament. As well, after the report stage, the Senate put a resolution asking that the proposed rules come into force. This was carried by consent since objections had already been ironed out in the committee process. Thus forged, the Rules of the Senate, though subject to some further updating in the 1970s, served this house through two World Wars, conscription, the Great Depression, and several harrowing filibusters. The GST filibuster may have rekindled a desire to advance the cause of expediting government business, but in the untempered zeal of reaction, drafters of the restructured rules went too far even for their stated aims.

Several of the revisions to the long-standing customs of this house were blind to the Constitution of Canada, as I shall shortly outline. Neglect of this calibre undermines peace, order, and good government. Government business is recklessly exposed to public disrespect by the disregard of propriety and the proven pillars of parliamentary democracy, namely parliamentary privilege and parliamentary custom.

Honourable senators, for reference by the Senate and its committees to this debate in Hansard, I would like to summarize in seven points my findings, after research and consultation with parliamentary experts.

● (1750)

1. The order of reference to the former Committee on Standing Rules and Orders did not authorize it to alter the basis and authority of custom and practice. The new rules displacing this authority of custom and practice are therefore ultra vires the order of reference.

2. Several new rules rescind formal standing resolutions that forbade closure and that accorded priority to prima facie questions of privilege. Such rescissions, honourable senators, require a two-thirds majority to be sustained under both the present and the former rules. This double majority did not hold on June 18, 1991.

3. The new rules can now delay the treatment of a bona fide case of broken parliamentary privilege until after Orders of the Day. This, I maintain, is tantamount to contempt of Parliament and can compromise the validity of government business and, therefore, legislation.

4. The new rules alter the equality in powers and privileges of all senators. To do this requires an act of Parliament according to the clear requirement of section 18 of the BNA Act.

5. The new authority of the Speaker, unaccountable to practice or custom, is a highly irregular change to Parliamentary tradition and what is called lex parliamenti. This requires, at the least, a constitutional amendment. I refer honourable senators to the Canada Act, 1982, section 42(1)(b).

6. The powers of a government-appointed speaker, elevated by these rules, affects the independence of the two Houses of Parliament. This new imbalance likewise requires constitutional amendment.

7. New powers of the Senate Speaker, coupled with his partiality, have the effect of enhancing cabinet power, and this, I maintain, derogates from the balance of provincial rights and powers defended in some measure by the Senate's regional representation. The Constitution Act of 1982 requires passage by provincial legislatures for such a change to be made; and I refer you to the Canada Act, 1982, section 38(2).

Honourable senators, I will leave the precisions of these grounds for review of these rules for presentation before the committee.

It must be clear by now that the new closure rules and the elevated stature of the Speaker of the Senate were radical changes to custom. Entitling the Speaker to determine the sufficiency of debate in a prima facie question of privilege, or to enforce speech limits—shorter for most senators than the limits for their leaders in caucus—means a new definition of privileges in this House. This requires an act of Parliament as indicated in the BNA Act at section 18.

While closure in the Senate may be admissible, since closure is suffered in both Houses in Britain, the process of introducing closure in this House requires a double majority. For adoption of closure in the Senate is, in pith and substance, the rescission of a standing resolution as old at least as 1906, that all senators in this House shall have the right to speak on a matter to their own satisfaction.

Other changes, however, cannot be ratified even by unanimous consent. New capabilities ascribed to the Senate Speaker, such as to postpone assembly on his own initiative or to rule without accountability to practice and custom, go beyond the limits of power defined by the BNA Act. I again refer you to section 18.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, under both the old rules and the present rules, I must advise you that at 6 o'clock I may leave the chair, unless you wish to ignore the clock.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Government): Ignore the clock.

Senator Haidasz: Thank you, honourable senators. Constitutional amendment is required to create new powers in the Senate, or new balances between the Senate and the House of Commons, or between the provinces and the federal cabinet, which, as I mentioned, is required by sections 38 and 42(1) of the Constitution Act of Canada, 1982.

The enhanced influence of the Prime Minister through the appointed Speaker of the Senate, who now effectively enjoys the rule of this chamber, undermines the sacrosanct principle of independence of the two Houses. It diminishes the power of regional representation in the Senate, and derogates, in the result, from the relative powers of the provinces. I refer you again to section 38(2) of the Constitutional Act 1982 which is to protect the regions from just such a destabilization.

In short, honourable senators, our rules as changed on June 18 last year, to advance government business, have wide and portentous ramifications throughout the country. The current rules confer outlandish powers where there was no authority to confer them.

The chairman of the former Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, and the Leader of the Government, wanted to streamline proceedings to render them more transparent to laymen, to enable more senators to contribute to debates on legislative initiatives and, with more aplomb, come to decisions as a legislative body. These wonderful ideas express aims we all embrace; but, in the method and in the result, it is manifest even to cursory examination that the changed rules in the Senate undermine a whole era of honourable civilitude that we had in this Upper House. During the 14 years that I enjoyed here, this House was a place of gentlemanly debate until the change of rules came about last June.

It is especially unparliamentary, honourable senators, that the present rules denote the position or authority of custom and practice in the Senate. Reasons for a Senate speaker's ruling now refer only to the rules themselves and to whatever written authorities the Speaker may choose to adopt.

To clarify the role of custom and to emphasize its authority, I refer honourable senators to the works of Josef Redlich, who contributed greatly to the understanding of Parliament. In his three-volume treatise, entitled The Procedure of the House of Commons, on page 4 of Volume II, he reminds us:

> Custom . . . was the original source of the internal law of Parliament, and . . . contributed more to its development than anything else.

Redlich also cites the redoubtable Sir Edward Coke's treatise on customs:

> As every court of justice hath laws and customs for its direction, some civil and canon, some the common law, others their own peculiar laws and customs, so the High Court of Parliament hath also its own peculiar law, called the lex et consuetudo parliamenti.

Therefore, honourable senators, where the Senate rules denote custom and practice, they undermine the foundation and the pillars, the soul and the very essence of our Canadian parliamentary system. The present rules create a Commons-like speaker while simultaneously severing him from lawful accountability. That is why I should like to propose to the committee that the Speaker of the Senate be elected by senators, and perhaps even be from the party which is not in power.

● (1800)

Honourable senators, it may be a happy thought that the order of reference to the former Committee on Standing Rules and Orders empowered it "to propose to the Senate amendments to the rules from time to time," but nothing there orders the revision of customs.

Changes to the rules which hinge on so central a revision of the nature of a House of Parliament observant of custom and its lex parliamenti, or rule of law, were simply, I maintain, ultra vires the scope of the former Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Haidasz, according to the rules now in force, you have used your allotted 15 minutes. Is it the pleasure of honourable senators to extend the allotted time?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Haidasz: Thank you again, honourable senators.

I cannot help but believe that honourable senators opposite must also be having sober second thoughts as to whether there really was a clear, pressing necessity of haste to gut unilaterally the former long-standing customs of the Rules of the Senate, especially at this eleventh hour of a frantic scramble to reform the Senate and to renew our coexistence in a federal state.

In conclusion, I urge honourable senators, especially the members of the new committee now charged with Privileges as well as the Standing Rules and Orders, to assess the threats to parliamentary privilege in these present rules. Privilege, I submit, is the entrustment upon each of us of the right of the governed to be properly governed. In a true democracy—a free democracy—parliamentary privilege cannot be contracted off nor traded away. Above all, it cannot be ruled out.

Honourable senators, let us in a civil manner take a sober second look at these rules. Parliamentary counsels and experts sustain the claims I lay before you today. Joseph Maingot, Q.C., expert on parliamentary privilege regarding the rules as changed last June, wrote to me saying that, most likely, "the lex parliamenti has been stretched to accommodate these changes and the procedure used in their adoption."

Honourable senators, I ask you, would it not be judicious to examine carefully the legal and constitutional significance and liceity of these rules?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2:00 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES, 1991-92

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Wednesday, March 25, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

EIGHTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which were referred Supplementary Estimates (C), 1991-92, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, March 17, 1992, examined the said Estimates and herewith presents its final report.

Your Committee held one meeting to review these supplementary estimates, on Thursday, March 19th, at which officials of the Treasury Board Secretariat appeared as witnesses.

Supplementary Estimates (C) are the third and final supplementary estimates for the 1991-92 fiscal year. They total $673.1 million, consisting of $1.1771 billion ($1.1456 billion budgetary and $31.5 million non-budgetary) to be voted and a net reduction of $504.0 million (a $577.1 million budgetary reduction plus a $73.1 million non-budgetary increase) in statutory expenditures. Estimates tabled for 1991-92 (Main Estimates plus three sets of supplementary estimates) total $161.280 billion, of which voted expenditures amount to $50.275 billion or 31.2 per cent and statutory expenditures are $111.005 billion or 68.8 per cent.

The budgetary portion of these supplementary estimates is $568.4 million and raises total budgetary estimates to $160.660 billion. The latter amount exceeds by $1.660 billion the framework for budgetary expenditures of $159.0 billion that was presented in Part I of the 1991-92 Main Estimates. The Committee's report on Supplementary Estimates (B), 1991-92, indicated that budgetary expenditures would be less than total budgetary estimates because: the 1991-92 spending authority of the Department of National Defence had been reduced by $400 million; $421 million, representing changes in the estimated value of the government's financial assets and liabilities, had been charged to the deficits of prior years; and other reductions and anticipated lapses were estimated to total $1.9 billion; giving an overall reduction in budgetary expenditure of $2.721 billion.[1] Additional decreases in budgetary expenditure have now been identified, including the freeze on discretionary operating expenditures and new hiring that was announced on January 27, 1992 by the Minister of Finance to apply to the remainder of the 1991-92 fiscal year. The overall expenditure reduction for 1991-92 is now $5.2 billion, as shown on the attached table from the Treasury Board, "Summary of Expenditure Framework and Estimates for 1991-92," as follows:

Reductions, anticipated lapses and spending freeze	2.2
Amounts charged to prior years' deficits	1.2
Reduction in defence spending	0.4
Reduced Public Service pension costs due to revised actuarial assumptions and impact of proposed PS pension reform legislation (Bill C-55)	1.5
Total (with rounding)	5.2

This $5.2 billion reduction lowers total budgetary expenditure for the 1991-92 fiscal year to $155.5 billion, or $3.5 billion less than the Main Estimates projection of $159.0 billion.[2]

Twenty-two allocations to fourteen departments were made from Treasury Board Vote 5 - Government Contingencies to provide temporary funding for non-paylist items listed in Supplementary Estimates (C). Treasury Board has supplied a list of the Vote 5 allocations and undertaken to do so whenever your Committee reviews supplementary estimates in future. Since these funds, totalling $72.9 million or 6.2 per cent of expenditures to be voted, have already been spent, those portions of the departmental appropriations that correspond to the Vote 5 allocations are essentially information items. Approval of Supplementary Estimates (C) will have the effect of reimbursing Vote 5 by the full $72.9 million. By contrast, allocations from Vote 5 to cover paylist shortfalls do not appear in supplementary estimates, are not reimbursed and thus constitute permanent charges to the Vote that will be shown in the Public Accounts.

The amount of the Government Contingencies Vote was $400 million in the 1991-92 Main Estimates. This amount has now been decreased permanently by allocations totalling $55.9 million to cover paylist shortfalls during the fiscal year. Currently, the Vote has been reduced further by the $72.9 million advanced for items in Supplementary Estimates (C), leaving a balance of $271.2 million. If Supplementary Estimates (C) are approved, the balance in T.B. Vote 5 will be $344.1 million, which will lapse on March 31, 1992.[3]

$767.6 million is being requested for Vote 30 (Grains and Oilseeds Contributions) of Agriculture Canada. This appropriation represents 67 per cent of total budgetary expenditures to be voted in these supplementary estimates, and if approved will more than double the current amount of Vote 30. The funds will be used to pay $768.9 to the Canadian Wheat Board to reimburse the 1990-91 deficits of its wheat, amber durum wheat and barley pools accounts, which resulted from low world market prices. There is also a $15 million statutory item to cover increased payments under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

In the department's Agri-Food Program, additional statutory expenditures of $111.7 million are being incurred for revenue insurance, gross revenue insurance and crop insurance under the Farm Income Protection Act and for co-operative associations under the Agricultural Products Co-operative Marketing Act.

At the time of Supplementary Estimates (A), the Committee was informed that total net farm income for 1991 was forecast to be $3.3 billion. Of this total, 24 per cent would be net market income, while the remaining 76 per cent would come from various government program payments. By contrast, in 1981, net market income accounted for 73 per cent of total net farm income, with the remaining 27 per cent consisting of program payments.

The estimates of the Department of Agriculture in the 1991-92 Main Estimates were $1.888 billion. Additional appropriations were approved in the first two sets of 1991-92 supplementary estimates: $428.0 million in Supplementary Estimates (A), all voted, and $1.1676 billion in Supplementary Estimates (B), consisting of $422.6 million voted and $745.0 million statutory. If Supplementary Estimates (C) are approved, the estimates of Agriculture Canada will increase by a further $888.3 million to $4.373 billion for the whole of 1991-92. The total of the increased appropriations for this department in all three sets of 1991-92 supplementary estimates is $2.485 billion -- $1.618 billion voted and $867 million statutory -- which represents an increase of 132 per cent of the $1.888 billion approved in the 1991-92 Main Estimates.

In Chapter 10 of his 1991 Report, the Auditor General of Canada reported the results of his Office's comprehensive audit of the Department of Agriculture's Farm Safety Net Programs in both the Agri-Food and Grains and Oilseeds sectors. The audit found significant weaknesses in the department's analytical capability -- in particular, an inability to refute two major foreign studies of Canada's farm subsidies that concluded that Canada is unfairly subsidizing its farmers. As well, none of the major farm assistance programs had been evaluated between 1985 and 1990, and for none was there a clear statement of the program's objectives. Programs that are required to be self-sustaining were in fact incurring large deficits, and special emergency programs, such as those for drought assistance, may not even have been necessary. In any case, although the federal government indicated that it wanted the provinces to pay 50 per cent of the drought relief assistance, it paid most of the funds to farmers before any of the agreements with the provinces had been negotiated.

The Farm Income Protection Act of 1991 replaced many of the farm safety net programs by new programs, albeit without the benefit of up-to-date evaluation findings. The new act requires the department to prepare a review of the new programs within five years. It also contains a number of broad principles to be met by all programs, including:

- They should be production and market neutral so that farmers will adjust to market signals;
- The level of protection under each tripartite agreement [between the federal government, the provincial governments and producers] should be consistent among agreements, and treatment of all classes of products should be equitable; and
- Programs should recognize the need for future changes emanating from Canada's obligations under the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade (GATT), the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement or similar trade agreements.[4]

The Auditor General's findings, coupled with the extremely large increases in funding for Agriculture Canada in all three sets of supplementary estimates for 1991-92, lead your Committee to conclude that the department may be spending hundreds of millions of dollars on farm assistance programs in an ad hoc manner, with little idea of the precise objectives or impacts of these programs. Furthermore, the expenditures seem intended to insulate and protect farmers from market forces, rather than to encourage them to respond and adjust to market signals as the Farm Income Protection Act requires.

Your Committee recognizes that a number of unfavourable factors -- principally low world grain prices -- have adversely affected the agricultural sector. However, it wishes to indicate its concern about the 132 per cent increase in the 1991-92 estimates of the Department of Agriculture after the Main Estimates were approved, and believes that it should be possible to forecast a significantly larger proportion of the department's financial needs when the Main Estimates are prepared. It is hoped that it will not be necessary for the government to request such substantial additional resources for this department's programs in the 1992-93 supplementary estimates. Your Committee also notes with concern the unfavourable results of the Auditor General's comprehensive audit of the farm safety net programs of Agriculture Canada, in particular the lack of any systematic evaluation of these programs in recent years. It urges the department to send the Committee its program evaluation plans in order to provide some assurance that the very large appropriations of the department are being spent effectively and that the objectives of its programs are being met.

Because interest rates in 1991-92 have fallen further than was projected in the 1991-92 Main Estimates, the statutory costs of servicing the public debt have declined by $1.700 billion. This is reflected in a decrease of that amount in the supplementary estimates under the Public Debt Program of the Department of Finance. Despite this reduction, the government's 1991-92 borrowing authority was exhausted on January 29, 1992, since which time borrowing requirements have had to be met by the issuance of Treasury Bills subject to Section 47 of the Financial Administration Act. In the Fiscal Transfer Payments Program of the same department, fiscal equalization payments are declining by $507.0 million while fiscal stabilization transfers are increasing by $195.6 million, for a net reduction in statutory payments of $309.4 million. These large changes are principally the result of slower economic growth associated with the recession, especially in the province of Ontario.

The appropriation of $16.8 million for the Department of National Defence - Emergency Preparedness Canada increases the estimates of this agency by over 100 per cent. It consists almost entirely of contributions for disaster assistance to the provinces of Manitoba, for forest fire costs in 1989, and Quebec, for a portion of evacuation costs related to the Oka emergency in the summer of 1990.

Associated with the end of the fiscal year, there are several major increases and reductions in statutory transfers to provinces and individuals. Under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, there are increases in contributions to the provinces of $897 million from the Department of National Health and Welfare for health care costs and $418 million from the Department of the Secretary of State for post-secondary education. As well, Health and Welfare requires $231.9 million for additional payments under the Canada Assistance Plan (CAP), even though the annual growth rate of CAP expenditures to the three provinces currently ineligible for fiscal equalization payments has been constrained to 5 per cent, and $13 million for additional Family Allowance payments. However, statutory payments for Old Age Security and associated programs are decreasing by $473 million because of reduced indexation associated with the lower rate of inflation.

A large number of grants and contributions, totalling $160 million, will be made by the Federal Office of Regional Development - Quebec. This new agency, for which the Minister of Health and Welfare is currently responsible, appears in the estimates under the Department of National Health and Welfare. Funds to cover these payments will be transferred from two votes of the Department of Industry, Science and Technology.

Finally, a number of $1 votes appear under the estimates of the Departments of the Solicitor General - Correctional Service of Canada and of Supply and Services. These will establish four new revolving funds for special operating agencies in accordance with the 1991 revisions of the Financial Administration Act.

2. However, the Minister of Finance has projected a 1991-92 deficit of $31.5 billion, compared to the deficit target of $30.5 billion announced in the February 1991 Budget. The larger deficit reflects slower-than-expected economic growth and tax revenues.

3. The Committee's final report on the 1991-92 Estimates discusses the use of the Government Contingencies Vote in greater detail.

Communications

Vote 2c — Government Telecommunications Agency Revolving Fund - Pursuant to Section 12 of the Revolving Funds Act, to increase from $30,000,000 to $64,000,000 the amount by which the aggregate of expenditures made may exceed the revenues referred to in that section.

Explanation — The GTA's revolving fund is being increased from $30 million to $64 million. First, an increase of $10 million for GTA to start billing client departments in arrears, as telephone companies do. This more effective billing procedure should not have any financial implication on the framework, as the delays to obtain payments will be offset by the delays for departments to make their payments. The second increase, which amounts to $24 million, is for GTA to take over (be an intermediary) the billing of local charges to departments and integrate it to its own billing. This measure should save administrative costs to departments and prevent late payment penalties.

External Affairs & International Trade Canada

Vote 11c To increase the loan guarantee authority of the Minister authorized by External Affairs Vote 11b, Appropriation Act No. 3, 1991-92: a) from $25,000,000 to $27,000,000 for loans to the Government of Romania; and b) from $10,000,000 to $11,000,000 for loans to the Government of Bulgaria.

Explanation The G-24 (a coordinating body of OECD countries of which Canada is a member) agreed to undertake a concerted effort to provide balance of payments support for Eastern European countries undertaking major programs of economic adjustment with the support of the International Monetary Fund. Canada has chosen to provide this support to the governments of these countries in the form of loan guarantees against loans to be issued by Canadian financial institutions.

The provision of loan guarantees to Romania ($25M) and Bulgaria ($10M) was included in Supplementary Estimates 'B'. Soon after securing authority to proceed with the loan guarantees, however, the department realized it would require authority to guarantee amounts in excess of the loan principal.

Canadian financial institutions providing the loans require the guarantee to cover other items such as accrued interest, interest on interest and administration fees. The option of reducing the amount of the loan principal, and thus staying within the total amounts originally approved for the guarantees, was rejected in light of the public commitments and statements of the intent of the Government of Canada to actively and fully support economic reform in these countries. It was accordingly decided to seek authority to increase the amount of the loan guarantees to cover the additional items required by the financial institutions.

Indian Affairs and Northern Develor ent

Vote 7c Indian and Inuit Affairs - To reduce from $64,000,000 to $62,881,096 the amount that may be outstanding at any time under the Indian Economic Development Account established by Indian Affairs and Northern Development Vote L53b, Appropriation Act No. 1, 1970.

Explanation The Indian Economic Development Fund Direct Loan Program is a lender of last resort for Indian businesses. DIAND is winding down its direct loan programs; direct loans are now generally made through the Dept of I-S-T-C in keeping with the "one window" approach to business financing under the Canadian Aboriginal Economic Development Strategy (CAEDS).

In August 1990, TB approved the underlying principles related to the sale of DIAND's existing loan portfolios. The reduction in these Supplementary Estimates of outstanding authority in the Indian Economic Development Account reflects the sale of a portion of DIAND's outstanding direct loan portfolio in keeping with the wind down of DIAND's activity in this area.

Indian Affairs and Northern Development

Vote 32c Northern Affairs - Pursuant to Section 29 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize the Minister on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada and in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the Minister of Finance, to guarantee loans up to but not exceeding in the aggregate $17,000,000 to Curragh Resources Inc. until December 31, 1996.

Explanation The purpose of this note is to secure authority for the Minister of DIAND to provide a loan guarantee to Curragh Resources Inc.

Curragh Resources Inc. operates mining operations in Faro, Yukon, which account for approximately 20% of Yukon GDP. As a result of overexpansion, Curragh is experiencing a severe cash flow problem, which prevents it from obtaining market financing of $40M to undertake an 18-month project to remove overburden from the Grum deposit to gain access to the ore. Failure to proceed with the stripping will result in closure of the Faro operations by the end of 1992.

In December 1991, Curragh approached the federal government to request a loan guarantee of $40M. DIAND and Finance officials are currently reviewing this request. The proposed loan guarantee would be shared equally with the Yukon (37½%) and a financial institution (15%) (the federal share being 37½% of $40M, i.e., $17M).

Although Curragh recently received $60M from the sale of its interest in Asturiana de Zinc (a Spanish smelter), and is continuing its efforts to raise cash through sale of other assets, its cash flow is such that government assistance is likely to be required in the near future.

Explanation — TB 817331, November 28, 1991. This item authorizes the write-off of a loan (debenture) with an outstanding balance of $1,090,358 principal and $132,261.62 accrued interest (total $1,222,619.62).

The company ceased operation in June 1989, when a receiver was approved by the secured creditor, Bank of Montreal.

This loan held second position with respect to recovery behind the Federal Business Development Bank. The FBDB incurred a loss on its recoverable loan.

Solicitor General - Correctional Service

Vote 11c CORCAN Revolving Fund - Pursuant to Section 29.1(2)(b) of the Financial Administration Act, to authorize the Solicitor General of Canada, effective as of April 1, 1992, to make expenditures out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, in accordance with terms and conditions approved by the Treasury Board, for the purpose of carrying on the operations of CORCAN including: authority for the Minister to spend for the purposes of the fund any revenues received in respect of those purposes; and, the aggregate of expenditures made for the purposes of the fund shall not at any time exceed by more than forty-five million dollars the revenues received in respect of the purposes of the fund.

Explanation In order to equip offenders to become productive members of society, the Correctional Service currently provides occupational development (prison industries) programs carried on under the name CORCAN for about 14% (1650) of its offender population. CORCAN will have increased operating flexibility effective April 1, 1992 as a result of the granting of Special Operating Agency status and the establishment of a revolving fund.

A revolving fund is, in effect, the government equivalent of a commercial line of credit. Several funds are in existence in other departments. CORCAN will make all expenditures with withdrawals from the fund and will deposit its sales receipts to the fund to reduce its net balance owing and consequently its interest cost.

Supply and Services

Vote 15c Supply and Services - To authorize the Minister to delete from the accounts of the Supply Revolving Fund an amount of up to $1,910,000 for the close down costs of the Canadian Government Photo Centre.

Explanation On December 15, 1989, the President of the Treasury Board announced a number of initiatives designed to make government operations more efficient and to save tax dollars. As part of this exercise, the President announced that the in-house production facilities of the Canadian Government Photo Centre and the Canadian Government Expositions Centre would be closed down.

In consultation with staff from the Office of the Comptroller General, it was determined that the preferable method to address the extraordinary close-out costs incurred by SSC in this case, was to allow the department to write-off a corresponding amount of accumulated deficit from existing drawdown authority within the Supply Revolving Fund. This is accomplished by printing a $1 item in Supplementary Estimates.

Approximately $1.9 million in close out costs were identified of which, more than half relate to accommodation costs to be paid to Public Works as part of the terms of sale of the production facilitates to employee groups. An additional $700K represents a loss on the sale of inventory and capital which must be recovered in the Supply Revolving Fund accounting.

Explanation NTCL, a former Crown corporation, was privatized in 1985. As part of the sale, the Crown assumed a $7M debt. In 1988, TB 809229 amended the sale agreement whereby NTCL paid $3M in full payment of the debt. The delay in showing this amount in SE (needed to adjust the Accounts of Canada) was occasioned by a required amendment to the FAA to enable forgiveness of a debt of a non-Crown corporation. Only the $4M in principal owing appears on the Books of Canada and only $4M is considered budgetary. The Vote wording includes parliamentary authority to also forgive interest of $1,708,516.

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Murray's democratic colleagues have 240 days to election, whereas those of his colleagues who are cowardly and contemptuous of democracy have 626.

Speaking of days, I would like to comment on the work that Senators Cogger and Barootes did yesterday to work out the number of days during which, as they put it, they are going to have to put up with me. I considered it a great compliment. Thank you very much for letting me know how much you look forward to the fact that I will not be here giving you trouble.

THE LATE BARBARA FRUM

TRIBUTES

Hon. Solange Chaput-Rolland: Honourable senators, as I rise in the House today to speak to honourable senators on both sides of this chamber, I do so with sadness in my heart at the passing away of Mrs. Barbara Frum, a great friend of ours and of all Canadians.

Those who knew her, and many did, know how keenly this loss will be felt by the media and by all Canadians. She was one of our greatest journalists, on a level with Anne Sinclair in France and with top journalists in Canada and elsewhere.

She had an uncommonly incisive intellect. I knew her like most people did who were involved in radio and television at the CBC for the past 25 years. Her courage and her determination to live were greater than her fear of dying. She first knew she had this terrible disease, leukemia, 25 years ago. People around her never realized she was ill. I do not want to take up too much of your time, honourable senators, but I feel I must pay her the most heartfelt tribute the journalist I still am, at heart, can give.

[English]

Barbara Frum's loss will be felt from coast to coast and by all Canadians, whether they watch CTV or CBC or some other network. She was a grand journalist. Perhaps more than anyone else here I know that journalists are often not well liked, but Barbara Frum had the quality of respecting the people she interviewed. Yes, she was tough sometimes, and sometimes we didn't like her interviews, but, tough or not, for the most part she always showed great respect for the persons she interviewed.

As a Quebecer and as a journalist, I want to say to you very simply that her death will be deeply felt.

[Translation]

God bless you, Barbara Frum.

[English]

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, on January 11, 1982, Barbara Frum dropped into our house. With the exception of my wife, she has come back more often to our place than any person I know.

Through The Journal, she has soothed my tattered nerves and aroused my flaming anger, and very often on the same night. She has driven my wife to her most familiar quotation, "Why don't you wait till she's finished?"

Perhaps, honourable senators, it would be more appropriate in paying tribute to Mrs. Frum to list the places in which she has established her fame as the country's most perceptive interviewer working in the English language.

She was a splendid print journalist, as Maclean's, Saturday Night and the Globe and Mail can attest.

On As it Happens, and for 10 years on The Journal, she handled the important stories, and, by simply changing the tone of her voice, reflected the anxieties of her time. It was not uncommon at party conventions to see people line up for her autograph, while political leaders went looking for attention.

In her line of work, there are many celebrities—none of them as well known, as much admired, or as often quoted as Barbara Frum.

Although I knew her, no one ever asked me, "What is Barbara Frum really like?" Why was that? It was because each of us knew exactly what she was really like: well-informed, curious, terribly concerned, and always on our side.

Barbara Frum, in her time, was the most influential woman in English Canada.

A great controversy has been churning on the front pages of Quebec newspapers this week over what became of Barbara Frum's final interview. It was one of the hundreds of interviews that she had done in coverage of Canada's unity crisis. She drew us into her own dedication to national survival. The Order of Canada was among the honours she had received. No one answered better to the Order's motto: "They desire a better country".

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

THE HONOURABLE JACK MARSHALL

TRIBUTES ON CONTRIBUTION TO CANADIAN VETERANS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF MINISTER OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, more often than not, when we pay tribute and show respect in this house, it is to the deceased, and I join my colleagues in their tributes to Barbara Frum. However, my purpose in standing today is to pay homage to one of our colleagues, my good friend Senator Marshall.

This morning the Minister of Veterans Affairs announced that the Government of Canada will recognize, finally, the contribution made to this country by those who served in the Merchant Marine during the war.

We should all say "Thank you" to Senator Jack Marshall for this announcement. He has shown by his determination that even a single senator can achieve something if he works long and hard enough at it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I would certainly not want to take anything away from Senator Marshall, but I wish to congratulate the Leader of the Government in the Senate for his quick action after my speech the other day in which I demanded that this action take place. He got to the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the minister acted quickly. Today, he made his announcement in Halifax.

Senator Simard: You are not going to take credit for that action.

Senator Bonnell: I did not ask for credit. I am giving the credit to whom it belongs, the Leader of the Government.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE—INELIGIBILITY OF VETERANS OF KOREAN CONFLICT

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Now that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has made this announcement on behalf of the merchant seamen, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate bring to his colleague's attention the fact that veterans of the Korean conflict are not eligible for War Veterans Allowance, or for the VIP treatments, if they served after the summer of 1953. Yet, the Governor General has honoured these veterans with a medal for being in the Korean War up until 1954. Consequently there is a group of Canadians, veterans of the Korean conflict, who have been neglected and who are ineligible for War Veterans Allowance and the VIP treatment.

● (1410)

Would the Leader of the Government do the same work as he did on behalf of the mariners and get right back to his colleague the minister and see if I a decision cannot be made on behalf of those veterans of the Korean conflict who are still waiting for the VIP treatments and for the War Veterans Allowance?

THE LATE BARBARA FRUM TRIBUTE

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I would like to join with my colleagues opposite who paid tribute to Barbara Frum. She was everything that has been said. She was a splendid journalist, but in addition to that she was a great member of the community, a model for many people in the community. She was a generous contributor to the life of Toronto and other places in our country, and her loss will be very deeply felt.

I am sure we all want to send our sympathy to all the members of her family who are undoubtedly suffering deeply.

EASTERN CANADA

URGENT NEED FOR HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, further to the conference that ended in Toronto yesterday, we now know that the Prime Minister of Canada once again promised to become involved in improving the roads in the Maritime provinces and Quebec.

However, this is not the first time that the Prime Minister has recognized the urgency not only of repairing roads but also of building new ones in Eastern Canada, since he already admitted that it was necessary in the last federal election campaign. Now he is repeating the same thing.

I am pleased to learn that the Prime Minister recognizes the urgency of such a program. Nevertheless, we need to know when his words will be followed by concrete action. According to some journalists, the Minister of Finance, who also attended the Toronto meeting, has still not loosened the purse strings.

So all I am asking the government to do is to continue its good intentions and to follow them up. Let them announce for the next road-building season in Eastern Canada, this coming summer, which is fast approaching, what the federal government's share will be so that the provinces can start their construction sites working this year.

ALBANIA

VICTORY OF DEMOCRATIC PARTY IN ELECTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I wish to draw the attention of this house to the recent victory of the Democratic Party in Albania in watershed elections signifying an end to 48 years of communist rule.

The 65 per cent support achieved by Dr. Sali Berisha's party is a remarkable event in itself because Albania was for years renowned for its isolation within a seemingly impregnable Stalinist fortress. This is Europe's poorest country and most of us know it to be a totalitarian wasteland far removed, over the last few years, from the mainstream of Gorbachev-style reformism.

Therefore, honourable senators, these elections represent a dramatic change of fortune for an oppressed, marginalized peoples. Albanians have demonstrated a dynamic political will which has impressed much of the international community.

The results prove to be particularly compelling for me, as I am proud to call Dr. Berisha a friend. We last met as co-leaders of a 75-person delegation from 23 countries during the Bulgarian election of October, 1991. At that time, he encouraged me to visit Albania for the forthcoming spring elections.

I spoke with him just last week before his recent triumph. I was greatly moved, as he had entreated me in his earlier phone calls to act quickly and make arrangements to monitor the elections last Sunday. He feared that the Commissars, the old-style communists, would try to rig the elections again. Unfortunately for me, I could not go. However, as we know, Dr. Berisha's fears, while justified, were not borne out. Upon his victory, he stated joyfully to 60,000 jubilant supporters that the long night of communism had ended.

Dr. Berisha has been the bold catalyst to the unleashing of democratic forces in Albania. But I know he is fully aware that the commissars have many faces and that their assault on the recent democratic revolution is multi-faceted. The new commissars in post-election Albania are starvation, economic ruination and disease. They are the commissars of the new apocalypse. Their dominion will be assured and the course of democracy imperiled without large-scale injections of Western aid.

I want to remind honourable senators that the people of Albania have courageously voted for freedom, and they stand on the threshold of a new age. They have emerged from a long, dark night. These poor and marginalized people have dared to believe that they can construct a fair society, respectful of laws of which they themselves are the authors. It is difficult to imagine that they could have journeyed all this way only to meet defeat at the hands of the commissars of the new apocalypse.

Yet they will not translate this extraordinary act of will into a lasting democracy without our help, without our parallel commitments to building up the social and economic structures intrinsic to political pluralism. I call upon all Canadians to recognize this extraordinary event in Albania with generous medical, technical and food aid.

TRIBUTE ON CONTRIBUTION TO CANADIAN VETERANS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF MINISTER OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am prompted to rise because of remarks by my island colleague, Senator Bonnell.

I am one of those who have been so impecunious through most of his life that he has usually asked for credit rather than extending it. I took notice of the discussion about where credit should be given. I believe it is quite right to say that our colleague, Senator Marshall, is entitled to great praise and great acclaim at the announcement to which Senator Bonnell and Senator Thériault referred.

[Senator Graham.]

I remember some months ago I was in Charlottetown where DVA is now centered, as it properly should be. Senator David and Senator Bonnell were there with Senator Marshall. As we entered that building, one of the leading members of the bureaucracy of that place said, "Here comes Senator Marshall, the greatest friend the Canadian veterans have." That was the finest accolade and a most deserved one.

I am very proud of the present Minister of Veterans Affairs. I think he is a good and sensitive man in the tradition of the Honourable Dan MacDonald, the Honourable Alf Brooks and the Honourable George Hees, great people who have dealt with that very important and compassionate portfolio. I wish to join in a tribute to Senator Marshall.

DRAFT REPORT—DISTRIBUTION OF TEXT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday I was finally able to obtain a copy of that elusive draft report on the Mexican trade deal, which I have been requesting for a few days. My colleague, the honourable senator from Prince Edward Island, asked that I table the report, which I did. I have enquired since as to the possibility of having copies made. I am told that if honourable senators wish to have a copy, they can ask the Table for a copy to be produced. I assume that Senator Carney, who had earlier indicated the same interest as I had in this matter, would be one of the first to make such a request, but I am sorry to see she is not in her seat. However, I want honourable senators to know that copies are available from the Table.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Richard Stanbury, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, March 26, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

NINTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-64, An Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, March 25, 1992, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

RICHARD J. STANBURY
Deputy Chairman

• (1420)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Honourable Senator Stanbury a question? I was unable to attend the committee. Did the matter of the length of delay arise?

As the honourable senator is aware, we had been asked before to provide extra time and we are doing it once more. Did we receive assurance that this time the delay will be sufficient to get the job done?

Senator Stanbury: Honourable senators, we asked that specific question of the official. He said that the Northwest Territories Council had assured him that they would have it finished. The third volume has yet to be completed. They stated that they would have it completed in June, but the time limit given by this bill is September 30. He said that he had assured himself to the best of his ability that the people of the Northwest Territories believe that that gives them plenty of time. It should be the last time we will deal with it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 77 citizens of Ontario who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions come mainly from Toronto and Scarborough.

I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 86 citizens of New Brunswick who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions come mainly from Fredericton, Oromocto, Salisbury and Moncton.

[English]

That is a total of 157 Canadian citizens who are particularly angry with the government, the first government since Confederation so insensitive in matters of culture as to apply a tax—the GST—on books and periodicals.

We all remember how sad certain senators on the other side were when we debated an amendment to exempt books and periodicals, but they all voted with the government and against culture.

QUESTION PERIOD

TRANSPORT

DRYDEN INQUIRY—RELEASE OF REPORT—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the report of the Honourable Virgil Moshansky, the Commissioner of the inquiry into the 1989 Air Ontario crash at Dryden, Ontario, was made public today. This was an accident which killed 24 people. For those who were concerned about the government's haste to deregulate, there is little joy in having their fears confirmed. The report details how the increased workload for Transport Canada in this new era of deregulation was not matched by a commensurate increase in resources. At page 870 of the report, the commissioner says:

> The resource squeeze stemmed from the almost simultaneous introduction of two federal government policies in 1984, namely Economic Regulatory Reform of the air carrier industry and deficit reduction, a program imposing fiscal restraint on federal government services. The combined effect of these two policies created a difficult set of circumstances for Transport Canada personnel responsible for Air Canada safety.

My first question is: Why did the government, even though warned time after time, do nothing to ensure that Transport Canada had the resources needed to ensure the safety of airline passengers and thereby perhaps avoid the death of these 24?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not know whether the honourable the Leader of the Opposition is in his last few words quoting from the report or giving his own interpretation of the report. In any case, as the honourable senator has pointed out, the report of the commission of inquiry headed by Mr. Justice Moshansky was released only this morning by my cabinet colleague the Minister of Transport, Mr. Jean Corbeil. I am not in a position to reply to questions on the report this afternoon. I have asked that a copy of the report be sent to me so that I can table it and that a copy of the statement and commentary made by Mr. Jean Corbeil this morning also be brought here so I can table it for the information of honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is reasonable. I have had a chance to look at some parts of it and have had some help with some parts of it from my assistants. Since the Leader of the Government, understandably, I suppose, is taking the question as notice, let me be sure that he understands what some of the other questions are, and he can deal with them all at once.

In my first question I was talking about warnings. I was not just talking about rumours or hearsay, because in 1985 the Nielsen Task Force recommended the immediate "increase in resources devoted to licencing certification and enforcement in the regulation of air safety." At page 62 of the Nielsen Task Force volume entitled "Economic Growth: Transportation"—I want the record to show these references so that the Leader of the Government can find them quickly—it says:

> Experience in the United States since the beginning of the transition to economic deregulation has shown quite clearly that a greater burden falls to the safety regulator. Even now, this outcome of economic regulatory reform in Canadian air transportation is being felt by Aeronautical Regulatory Services staff. It is evident that an increase in resources is essential to preserve the integrity of the safety system while providing an acceptable level of service to the aircraft manufacturing and the air carrier industries. Failure to attend to these resource needs in a timely fashion is not an acceptable alternative given the nature of the work carried out.

That was in 1985, that warning. Then in 1986 the Douglas report, named after its author, Donald Douglas, warned that deregulation was making the task of ensuring safety, "far more complex than it was prior to 1984." As with the Nielsen report the Douglas report also pointed up the need for increased safety resources. In 1986 the Lafleur memorandum produced by R. S. Lafleur, Director General, Aviation Regulations, warned, and it is cited in the report of the commissioner at page 885:

> I am concerned that due to resource limitation, particularly as a result of staffing freezes, the Aviation Regulation Directorate is not fully able to carry out the regulatory program.
> . . . every time a position becomes vacant, the staffing freeze prevents us from staffing it in a timely fashion. As a result, the Program is losing strength rather than gaining it.

Justice Moshansky notes that there was no reply made to this warning. He says at the bottom of page 885:

> The fact that there was no response to the memorandum can only be regarded as a serious omission on the part of senior management in Transport Canada.

I come to the last couple of references I have for the leader to look at. In January 1989, only two months before the Dryden crash, Mr. Neale MacGregor, acting chief, air carrier operations, wrote to the director of flight standards. As cited at page 910, he said:

> As one can see, air carrier inspection is no longer capable of meeting even minimum requirements necessary to ensure safety. In fact, it is no longer able to assure the Minister of the safety of large air carrier commercial air service in Canada.

So the system appears to have broken down. Also, when the honourable senator is consulting his colleagues he might consult his colleague Mr. Mazankowski, because I find in December, 1985, Mr. Mazankowski said:

> I would like to indicate unequivocally that this government will neither propose nor permit any economic regulatory reform that might be detrimental to safety standards. That is the policy of this government.

[Senator Frith.]

But at pages 913 and 914, under Findings, the report of the Commissioner reads:

> Based on the information before the Commission, the Aviation Regulation Directorate was not adequately prepared to perform its functions in the latter 1980s.
> The warning flags raised early in the 1980s and repeatedly thereafter had seemingly negligible effect. The forcasts of safety assurance deficiencies were soundly based and progressively confirmed, yet there was no proper response by the senior management of Transport Canada in the form of urgent planning or action to meet the inevitable challenge.
> It was known that significant increases in personnel would be required to meet demand, yet such increases were not authorized let alone required . . .
> Had the Transport Canada Aviation Regulation Directorate been in a position to discharge all its responsibilities in an effective and timely manner, some of the factors that contributed to the Dryden accident may not have arisen.

I have another quotation but from Mr. Mazankowski. This is from June 6, 1986:

> Some have claimed that transportation safety may be at risk because of our economic regulatory reform initiatives. I want to assure . . . all Hon. Members of the House that safety will not be compromised. My reform proposals deal only with economic regulation.
> Our commitment is that we will neither propose nor permit any economic regulatory reform that might be detrimental to safety standards. Safety programs will continue to be strengthened to achieve improved levels of safety in each mode.

That was in 1985. So honourable senators, I think it is not an exaggeration to say that this report is a damning report on the effects of the two points that the commissioner starts out with; that is, deregulation and the restriction of the necessary funds to guarantee safety.

● (1440)

I am obliged to the Leader of the Government in the Senate for undertaking to consider this report and to give us some answers to the questions arising from these citations.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I thank the Honourable Leader of the Opposition for placing these points on the record and I assure him that I will do my best to obtain a considered reply from my cabinet colleague, the Minister of Transport.

Let me just complete today's exchange, if I may, by stating for the record that the Canadian aviation system is safe and proven to be so. Significant improvements in the safety record in Canadian aviation have been made over the past decade or so. Indeed, the record will show that in 1991 Canadian-registered aircraft were involved in 35 per cent fewer accidents than 10 years previous.

Senator Frith: I understand the position taken and I am sure we can consider what the Leader of the Government in the Senate has said in light of those citations, as he will in his considered reply.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY ON CHILD BENEFITS

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, earlier this week the Leader of the Government in the Senate tabled a delayed answer to a question that I had asked on the subject of child benefits. The response appears on page 1126 of the Debates of the Senate. My question had suggested that low-income families would be no better off in the coming year if the system proposed by the government were put in place.

In his answer the Leader of the Government in the Senate states:

> . . . a family with one child, earning $20,000, can receive as much as $1,733 per year—an increase of 40%.

He refers, as he does every time someone raises a question, to his budget speech. I encourage senators to look on page 1023 of the Debates of the Senate to see what was suggested in that speech about child benefits.

Senator Murray stated:

> . . . a low income family with one child can receive as much as $1,520 a year, an increase of almost 50 per cent over the present situation.

Honourable senators, I ask you, on February 28 a family with one child receives $1,520, an increase of 50 percent, and on March 24 a family with one child receives $1,733, an increase of 40 per cent. In effect, the income has gone up by $213 while the percentage increase has declined by 10 per cent.

In my original question, I was referring to an article published by Len Shifrin in The Toronto Star in which he states: "But can't Mulroney and Co. ever be honest about anything?" Mr. Shifrin stated that families who now receive $419 per year for a child and a refundable child tax credit of $601 for a total of $1,020 under the new system would receive exactly the same amount: $1,020—$500 or $713 less than the senator's figures.

I realize that one can talk endlessly about numbers and set conditions on them. Although I do wish that Senator Murray would be consistent at least from one month to the next on these numbers, I do not want to quibble. I would rather ask a question: Will the basic benefit per child be $1,023 per year, as Mr. Shifrin says, or will it be one or the other of the numbers that the senator has suggested?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have not had a chance to analyze the response that was tabled on March 24 from either the Department of Finance or the Department of Health and Welfare in respect of my earlier statements in the discussion of the budget.

I do agree with the honourable senator that on the face of it there appears to be some discrepancy between the figures I tabled earlier and the statistics that are to be found at page 1126 of Hansard. I will try to clear up this discrepancy at a very early date and bring in the official figures.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, that would be helpful. In the speech of February 28, the Leader of the Government in the Senate stated on the subject of child benefits:

> We are adding another $400 million a year and we are targeting assistance to those who need it most.

Honourable senators, on his part, Mr. Shifrin states:

> And what penchant for disinformation impelled Finance Minister Don Mazankowski to claim "the new system will increase total federal child benefits by $400 million per year"?
> It won't.
> The old and new systems will overlap in the early months of 1993, when the last of the 1992 tax refund payments and the first of the bigger monthly payments will both be made—just as Canadians head for the polls, it should be noted—so total outlays in those months will be inflated.
> But under the new system itself, in all the years thereafter, outlays will only be $300 million higher than now.

Furthermore, of course, it should be pointed out that that extra money is being gained by changing the tax rules so that common-law couples are treated as married.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate sort that out? Is it $400 million only because of the tax refunds for 1992, or is it to be $400 million in 1993 and every subsequent foreseeable year?

Senator Murray: Yes, honourable senators.

ENERGY

LEVELS OF FUNDING FOR CONSERVATION PROGRAMS—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, on October 4, 1990 I placed a question on the Order Paper regarding levels of funding for energy conservation programs. I placed the question on the Order Paper again on September 17, 1991.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate please advise me when I am likely to receive an answer to this question and why it is taking so long?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall make inquiries.

TRANSPORT

DRYDEN INQUIRY—TABLING OF REPORT

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, while I am on my feet, may I table the four volumes of the report of the Commission of Inquiry into the Air Ontario crash at Dryden, Ontario and at the same time table the statement by Transport Minister Jean Corbeil and a document entitled "Government of Canada Initial Response to the Commission of Inquiry into the Air Ontario crash at Dryden, Ontario" in both official languages.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

VIMY—CEREMONY AT CANADIAN MEMORIAL

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have had several inquiries regarding a ceremony which will take place on April 9 at the Canadian Memorial at Vimy for the 50th anniversary of the raid across the English Channel which involved 5,000 Canadian troops.

Who are the 12 Canadian veterans who will attend this ceremony and how were they chosen?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I shall make inquiries, honourable senators. I would suggest that is the kind of detailed information that is best sought by way of a written question.

Senator Wood: I thought this might be a faster way of getting an answer.

JUSTICE

CANCELLATION OF COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, I asked a question on March 19 with regard to the Court Challenges Program. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate had an answer to that question yet.

There are 377 cases still pending and we do not know how they will be funded.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I am virtually certain that we tabled a reply under delayed answers to the question of the honourable senator concerning the Court Challenges Program. In any case, I know that I saw the reply. I am virtually certain that it was tabled and if it has not been, it should be tabled very soon.

EASTERN CANADA

HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION—FEDERAL FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

He heard what I said at the beginning of the sitting on the economic conference in Toronto. One result of this conference is a commitment from the Prime Minister for a federal contribution to repair and build certain roads in Eastern Canada, the Maritime provinces and Quebec.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate give us more details? For example, has a timetable been set for the federal contribution? Also, how much would it be in all and over how many years would it be spread? What details can he give us today beyond the meagre report we were able to read in some newspapers?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I must admit that the first ministers' press release issued yesterday is not very detailed.

I will quote some sentences that concern this question of infrastructure:

• (1450)

[English]

> First Ministers agreed that investing in infrastructure to create short- and long-term economic benefits is a priority for Canada. They also recognized the central role that infrastructure can play in unifying the country. They agreed to give priority consideration to the proposals for a national highway system and directed their ministers of transport in consultation with their ministers of finance to explore ways of proceeding in the near future. This work should include examination of funding issues and implementation priorities consistent with fiscal constraints.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I am trying to see now whether the Prime Minister said anything more about it.

He simply said:

[English]

> Consensus area achieved by the first ministers includes the reduction of interprovincial trade barriers, infrastructure spending, the need for a better cross-border tax collection system.

[Translation]

On that, Gérard D. Lévesque, Quebec's Minister of Finance, said that he was satisfied with the federal commitment and he added that Quebec had projects ready to go ahead without delay.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Will the funds be released starting this year? I have in front of me, for example, the report by Chantal Hébert, Le Devoir's special envoy. She writes:

> . . . Prime Minister Brian Mulroney announced that Ottawa would draw on some of its existing funds for a road repair program.

That leads me to believe that such funds exist, for the current fiscal year or the one about to begin. Thus I take it for granted that the work could begin this summer. Am I right to draw that conclusion?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, unfortunately, I do not have any information on this question.

I repeat that in their communiqué, the first ministers undertook to look into what they call "funding issues and implementation of priorities consistent with fiscal constraints".

I will be pleased to consult the Prime Minister or even my colleague the Minister of Finance to see if he has more information on this question.

DRAFT REPORT—DISTRIBUTION OF TEXT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a number of questions regarding the Mexican-U.S.-Canadian trade deal. Before I proceed, I want to remind honourable senator, who may not have been in the chamber when I spoke about the draft report, that copies of the draft report which I deposited yesterday are available by requesting them from the Table of the Senate.

My first question is whether the Minister has been able to find out to whom the draft copies went previously? We know that Premier Filmon has one, but then yesterday I heard on the air that Premiers Rae and Romanow were saying that they had not been participating in it and it was important that the provinces do. Are we to conclude that they did not get a draft report?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I regret that I do not have a full reply to that question. I will attempt to find out whether the document to which the honourable senator refers has indeed been sent to provincial premiers or anyone else.

As I indicated the other day, I am aware that briefings had been made available to members of Parliament in the House of Commons and that there had been discussions at both the official and political level with provinces and discussions as well with trade advisory committees in the private sector. I will attempt to find out whether that document to which the honourable senator refers has, in fact, been shared with anybody, and, if so, with whom.

I think I should also add, since the honourable senator referred to his question of yesterday and the document which he tabled, that there was a document completed at the end of December containing the positions of the three countries. That, as I said yesterday, is why so much of it is in square brackets. Those portions that are in square brackets are matters that are not agreed and are still being negotiated.

As I also said, that document has been under almost continuous change ever since December. It is an evolving document. The honourable senator can attach whatever importance to it that he wishes, but I think that clarification should be placed on the record.

PROVISION OF ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have a further question on the same proposed agreement. Will there be any provision for adjustment assistance? One will recall that, at the time of the discussion of the FDA, there had been promises by the government that there would be generous adjustment provisions for those industries and those workers who were going to be harmed by the FDA.

Subsequently, Mr. de Grandpré, I believe, headed an inquiry or a study for the government on the subject; he concluded by saying that nothing could be done or nothing needed to be done. It was just beyond the capacity of government to do anything because apparently they would not be able to find out who was going to be hurt. That is what he said.

In the case of the Mexican deal, it appears that there are some studies that indicate some specific areas will be hurt. Will there be adjustment programs?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, to be fair to Mr. de Grandpré, I believe what he said—and indeed, he said it before a Senate committee as I recall—was that no new programs were necessary, that the existing programs in Employment and Immigration, the existing programs in Industry, Science and Technology, and the various departments that are concerned with industrial adjustment and with the adaptation and training of the work force, were sufficiently broad to be applied to almost any needs or any eventuality in the period following the signature of the free trade agreement. That is what he said.

● (1500)

As I stated yesterday, there is really no comparison between our trade with Mexico and our trade with the United States. I think that Mr. de Grandpré's statement about the existing programs, which have been added to and amplified since that time, would hold true in the present case.

Senator Molgat: Prior to the signing of the FTA, the government had specifically promised there would be adjustment programs. Certainly the workers of Canada expected that there would be adjustment programs. That was what had been said to them prior to the signing of the agreement. Was the government unaware of these other programs which the minister says fill the gap? Why, then, did they promise there would be adjustment programs?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there are and have been adjustment programs, and a lot more money has been invested by this government into training and retraining programs. The honourable senator must be aware of the Labour Force Development Strategy that has been implemented in close cooperation with the private sector, and which has as its goal the training and retraining of Canadian workers to take advantage of opportunities and to respond to the demands of a more competitive world economy.

Senator Molgat: My honourable friend cannot be talking to Canadian workers, because if he did he would find that the adjustment that they found is mainly an increase in Unemployment Insurance premiums and a decrease in unemployment coverage. That is really what the workers have found.

RELATIONSHIP OF PRESENT FREE TRADE AGREEMENT TO PROPOSED TRILATERAL AGREEMENT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, continuing on with respect to the Mexican arrangement, if that arrangement proceeds will it then supersede the FTA? Will the FTA continue as an agreement on its own and this arrangement be another separate agreement on top?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before the Leader of the Government answers, I must advise honourable senators that Question Period has now been proceeding for more than 30 minutes.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a trilateral agreement, if signed, does not supersede the FTA. The FTA is in place, and any change to the FTA would require the consent of both Canada and the United States. We would not agree to any change in the FTA except one that demonstrably improves the situation from Canada's point of view.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us whether NAFTA talks—

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Haidasz, order please.

Senator Haidasz: —have anything to do with cuts to medical insurance services to the sick people in Canada? That is important. Would he kindly answer it?

The Hon. The Speaker: I have advised honourable senators that the time is up on Question Period.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have responses to questions asked on December 9 by Senator Bonnell regarding mail service in P.E.I; by Senator Molgat on March 18 regarding the Canadian Wheat Board; on the same day, by Senator Marsden regarding the Western Sahara; and a questions asked March 25 by Senator Simard regarding the resolution of conflict, Stone Consolidated Paper.

CANADA POST

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—PROCESSING OF MAIL IN HALIFAX

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorne Bonnell on December 9, 1991)

Canada Post is proceeding with its business plan to provide more efficient postal service to Prince Edward Island residents. This will be achieved by: consolidating a new combined mail processing and letter carrier depot facility (DCF/LCD) in the Charlottetown area; maintaining a corporate retail outlet (CRO) in the downtown core; and implementing the Process Rationalization Program in P.E.I.

As part of the Process Rationalization Program, local "on island" P.E.I. mail processing will be carried out in Charlottetown. All P.E.I. forward lettermail will be processed in Halifax; parcels and bulk mail will be sorted in Moncton. To ensure mail is efficiently collected and forwarded immediately to the appropriate processing facility, twin-boxes will be introduced in the urban communities of Summerside and Charlottetown. Situated side-by-side, the twin Street Letter Boxes (SLB's) will be clearly marked to ensure on-Island (local) and off-Island forward mail is deposited in the correct SLB. This program will allow Canada Post to improve the efficiency of mail processing and collection and delivery activities in Charlottetown, Summerside and throughout P.E.I. (local "on-island" mail), as well as for forward "off-Island" mail.

However, this rationalization of P.E.I. processing does not preclude the possibility of the provincial postmark appearing on "off-Island" mail. Mail entering the system outside of the Charlottetown and Summerside centres will be processed locally and thus bear the P.E.I. postmark.

The Process Rationalization Program was successfully introduced to many other communities in 1990 and has played an important role in improved operational efficiency and delivery standards in those areas. Service standards will be maintained.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas Molgat on March 18, 1992)

The Canadian Wheat Board (CWB) and the Canadian Grain Commission (CGC) recently announced a program which should result in reduced costs to producers on shipments of CWB grain for export by truck. Under the program, wheat and barley will be included in the CWB's pool account without physically entering the country elevator system. Elimination of the truck unloading and reloading requirement will enable grain companies to offer lower service costs to producers.

There will be certain requirements, however, related to the weighing, grading and documentation of the transaction. Producers should contact their elevator agents to negotiate a price for services to be rendered. The elevator company, in turn, will notify the CGC of the charges. Producers must also submit a representative sample of the delivery to the CGC. In addition, producers must still obtain an export permit from the CWB and pay the difference between the initial payment and the export price to the CWB. The delivery will also be subject to quota.

Wheat and barley sold by producers into the United States by truck must still be marketed through the CWB. The changes do not affect the CWB's authority for export marketing of wheat and barley to all destinations including the United States.

WESTERN SAHARA

IMPLEMENTATION OF PROPOSED PEACE PLAN—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

MINURSO was established to monitor the cease-fire of September 6, 1991 agreed between the Polisario and Moroccan forces in Western Sahara and to organize, conduct and proclaim a referendum on the future of the territory scheduled for January, 1992.

While remaining dedicated to the process, from the beginning the parties to the conflict have had serious disagreement over the criteria for eligibility to vote in the referendum.

The disagreement has stalled the Referendum process. The U.N. Secretary General reported to the Security Council on February 28 that he is making a renewed effort to resolve all outstanding issues that block implementation of the plan. The Secretary General on March 24, appointed a former Pakistani Foreign Minister as his new special representative for Western Sahara. He is giving this effort until the end of May when he will review the situation if an agreement has not been reached.

The disagreement has also delayed the provision of full logistical support to the military personnel who are monitoring the cease-fire under very trying conditions.

These difficult conditions, and the reasons they had to be endured, have been well known to the UN and to the military personnel involved. The UN has improved the logistical situation.

In his report, the Secretary General pays tribute to the contribution made by the peacekeepers in maintaining the cease-fire over the past six months under conditions which, he states, tested to the limit their discipline and commitment to the cause of peace in the service of the U.N.

This is a testimony to the professionalism of the 34 Canadian Forces personnel involved in the mission and to the leadership of the Canadian General Officer who is commanding the military component of the mission.

DELAYED COVERAGE OF CONSTITUTIONAL DEBATE—RESPONSIBILITY TO PUBLIC—GOVERNMENT POSITION—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question with regard to delayed answers to questions. On December 17, 1991, I presented a written question regarding the coverage by CBC Newsworld of the William Kennedy Smith rape trial and the coverage of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada. That was on December 17.

I can appreciate that perhaps Radio Canada is not anxious to answer the question, but surely it is one that they could have answered in those intervening months. The question is not that complicated.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Today it is the Tyson rape case.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will make enquiries about that matter. I would be quite interested to see the replies to the question myself.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION TO INVOKE PROVISIONS OF RULE 40—POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING DEFERRED

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, March 25, 1992 moved:

> That, pursuant to the provisions of Rule 40, in relation to Bill C-32, An Act to amend the Canadian Assistance Plan, not more than six further hours of debate be allotted to the consideration of the said bill at the third reading stage;
> That, when the debate comes to an end or when the time provided for the debate has expired, as the case may be, the Speaker shall interrupt, if required, any proceedings then before the Senate and put forthwith and successively every question necessary to dispose of the remaining stages of the said bill; and
> That, any recorded vote on the said questions shall be taken in accordance with the provisions of Rule 40(4).

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a point of order, I submit that this motion is irregular and therefore not receivable. By its terms, it proposes to move:

> That, pursuant to the provisions of Rule 40, in relation to Bill C-32, An Act to amend the Canadian Assistance Plan, not more than six further hours of debate—

These words are important.

> —not more than six further hours of debate be allotted to the consideration of the said bill at the third reading stage.

Now, if we look at Rule 40, it reads as follows:

> 40. (1) At any time while the Senate is sitting, the Leader of the Government in the Senate or the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, from his or her place in the Senate, may state that the representatives of the parties have failed to agree to allocate a specified number of days or hours for consideration of any stage of consideration of any adjourned debate on any item of government business.

Senator Lynch-Staunton did that yesterday.

If so, at that time the said Leader or Deputy Leader may give notice of the terms of a motion to allocate a specified number of hours or days of debate on the said stage of consideration of the said item. Such motion shall be placed on the Orders of the Day under "Government Motions" for the next sitting day.

(2) In the event of a motion being moved pursuant to section (1) of this rule, the motion shall provide for at least:

(a) a further six-hours debate on any substantive motion, except as provided below;

(b) a further six-hours debate on a motion for second reading of a public bill;

(c) one calendar day (in the period Monday to Friday) for a standing or special committee or a Committee of the Whole to report a bill back to the Senate, failing which, at midnight on that day, the bill would be deemed to have been reported back without amendment; or

And this is important:

(d) a single period of a further six-hours debate, in total, to dispose of both the report and the third reading stages of a public bill.

It is quite clear that this motion is given under rule 40(2)(a), because the words that are in 40(2)(a) are a further six-hours debate—not "at least a further six-hours debate"—on any substantive motion, except as provided below. Notice the words are "a further six-hours debate." That is what the rules provide for when closure is being applied to a substantive motion. The motion in Bill C-32 is not a substantive motion. Rule 4(27) states as follows:

● (1510)

"substantive motion" means an independent motion neither incidental to nor relating to a proceeding or order of the day already before the Senate;

Obviously, the drafters of the closure provisions in the rules were aware of what they were doing, because they made a separate provision for closure of "a further six-hours debate". I ask honourable senators to note that it is not ". . . a single period of a further six-hours debate, in total . . .", as rule 40(2)(d) provides, but simply "a further six-hours debate on any substantive motion . . ."

This motion uses the provisions of closure to apply to a substantive motion under the rules, and improperly exercises that authority under the rules to give notice of a motion, or to move closure on the third reading stage of a public bill.

If it wanted to achieve its apparent purpose, the motion ought to have read, "That, pursuant to the provisions of rule 40, in relation to Bill C-32, an act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, a single period of a further six-hours debate . . ." It does not so state. The Speaker will not know what period of time is allocated. Is it a debate of six hours or a single period? There must be some reason for using different wording.

Because this motion is, therefore, irregular, trying to exercise authority under the rules to do one thing, when it is trying to do something else, it is not receivable. Pursuant to the rules, it is not amendable and therefore ought to be ruled by the Speaker as inadmissible.

If the government wants to slap closure on Bill C-32, it should get it right. It will have to give notice of another motion.

I ask for a ruling on this point of order.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is rather difficult to follow the ingenious reasoning of the honourable senator.

Senator Frith: Oh, you are bright enough for that, I think.

Senator Murray: I simply wish to invite the attention, first, of Your Honour to rule 40(2)(d). I contend that the motion, which provides for not more than six hours of debate for the rest of the third reading debate on Bill C-32, falls squarely within that provision.

Senator Frith: And you didn't use it.

Senator Murray: It falls squarely within that provision.

Senator Frith: It does not. It does not state "a single period".

Senator Murray: I am not sure whether the honourable senator is trying to argue that, because the report stage and the third reading stage are mentioned in rule 40(2)(d), the motion should have been brought forward at the report stage—

Senator Frith: No.

Senator Murray: Or whether he is arguing—

Senator Frith: You should have used that wording.

Senator Murray: —that the wording of the motion does not include the words, "a single period". I do not see for a moment what difference it makes in terms of what is the intent of this motion.

Senator Frith: Because you can have six hours of debate that are not in "a single period". That is why. The rules state that.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the fact of the matter is that the rules under this order provide that the six hours must be debated in a single period.

I do not see for a moment what difference it makes that the three words, "a single period", are not included in the motion that the Deputy Leader of the Government has put forward. The motion that he has put forward provides, in conformity with rule 40(2)(d), that, indeed, a further six hours—no more than six hours—be devoted at third reading of Bill C-32.

I would ask Your Honour to take this matter under advisement and to rule that Senator Frith's point of order is not in order.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am happy to be able to say that the Leader of the Government is right. He did find it difficult to understand the point.

However, the Speaker will have an opportunity to read his observations and mine, and we will hear from him on it, I am sure.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have a suggestion. Perhaps I can consult for 15 minutes and have the Speaker pro tempore continue with the Orders of the Day and come back to make a ruling right away. Is it agreed?

Senator Frith: If the Speaker thinks that there is only 15-minutes' worth of consideration in it, that might give us an idea as to whether he has followed the point or not. Let us have 15 minutes to try to figure it out.

The Hon. the Speaker: If I need more time, honourable senators, I will take more time. I am simply suggesting 15 minutes.

Senator Murray: Let me draw Your Honour's attention to the provision I was looking for earlier. It is rule 40(5), which makes it clear that whether the words "a single period" are in the motion for time allocation or not, it is a single period that is envisioned by this rule. The rule states:

> (5) When an Order of the Day has been called, to which a specified period of time has been allocated for its consideration, and is under consideration:
> (a) at the ordinary daily hour of adjournment, the Senate shall not adjourn but shall continue consideration of the said Order of the Day until the debate has concluded or the time provided for the debate has expired, whereupon the Speaker shall proceed to put the question or questions;
> (c) when the Senate would otherwise take its dinner hour interruption in accordance with the provisions of rule 13, the sitting shall not be interrupted until the debate is concluded, or the time provided for the consideration of the Order of the Day has expired, whereupon the Speaker shall put the question or questions necessary to dispose of the Order of the Day;
> (d) whenever the question has been put pursuant to the provisions of sub-paragraph (c) above, any standing vote requested in relation thereto shall be taken in accordance with the provisions of rule 67;

● (1520)

Honourable senators, if you take all of the provisions relating to an Order of the Day in respect of which an allocation of time order has been passed by the Senate, it is very clear that that debate must proceed without interruption in a single period of time. So it is hardly necessary, indeed it would be superfluous, to add the words "a single period of six hours". The debate must take place in a single chunk, if I may put it that way, of six hours. That is clearly what the rules as a whole state.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do hope that the Speaker will listen to what Senator Murray has said and will indeed read those two extra sections to which he has referred, and will note that they do not answer the point. They answer the question of any interruption that takes place under any of those subheadings.

I also question the point made by Senator Murray, namely, that the words, "a single period", are superfluous. If they are superfluous why were they put in (d) and not in the other paragraphs? The Speaker will know, I am sure, that when interpreting any provision, rules of interpretation require that it be read with a view to giving meaning to words that are added or included.

Senator Murray's point is, to use his own words, that those words in (d) are superfluous and that they ought not to affect the interpretation of the paragraph simply because they are not in the other subsections. If they are superfluous, then of course you are reading them out of the section. Why were they put in if they are not to be given a separate and special meaning?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, let me try to answer the question about why the words "a single period" are in (d). The words "a single period" are in (d) because (d) relates to two stages, being the report stage and the third reading stage, and therefore the words "a single period of six hours" refer to a time allocation which would cover those two stages of the debate. But I leave it in the hands of Your Honour and your advisors.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the speaker pro tempore will take over and I will consult and try to come back with a ruling as soon as possible.

CANADA ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer moved the second reading of Bill C-13, an Act to establish a federal environmental assessment process.

Honourable senators, today I have the honour to introduce in the Senate a bill that is extremely important for the environment in this country: the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

This legislation has been eagerly sought and, to a very substantial extent, by Canadians. What we have before us today is the result of some four years of labour by Canadians from coast to coast to coast. The bill has been subject to and has benefited from three separate rounds of public consultation.

The bill is a direct response to the needs expressed by those who attended these consultations to voice their opinions.

The implementation of this bill will mark a new approach to the way the government makes decisions and assesses those decisions. The provisions of this bill will affect more than 80 federal departments and agencies, the residents and governments of each province and territory, aboriginal people and their communities, and proponents.

The bill, which revamps the Canadian environmental assessment review process, will have an impact on virtually every Canadian whose life and environment might be altered for better or for worse by any development project. It will give them the opportunity and the forum in which to voice their concerns with respect to such development.

The bill will bring increased efficiency, more consistency and more cost effectiveness to the way we evaluate the environmental consequences of economic development. It will make environmental factors equal partners with social and economic concerns. Before I explain the provisions of this Act, I would just like to take a moment or so to discuss the historical context.

[English]

The history of the Canadian environmental assessment process is relatively short. It was in 1973 that environmental assessments of federal projects were formalized by a cabinet decision. This decision was followed and reinforced by several cabinet directives during the 1970s.

In 1984, an Environmental Assessment and Review Process Guidelines Order in Council established the regime under which we today study the environmental effects of proposed projects. This Order in Council was originally intended as a guideline. Nonetheless, as a result of several court decisions, that guideline became a law of general application.

One unintended result of these court decisions was to breed uncertainty into the environmental assessment review process itself. Uncertainty is a commodity we cannot afford. It can, if left unchecked, cause credibility to decay, and like any quasi-judicial process, an environmental assessment process must be credible, and it must also be seen to be credible, if it is to be effective.

That is why the government was pleased to have matters resolved, as they were so recently, in the Supreme Court of Canada ruling regarding the Oldman River project. That decision by our highest court provides welcome clarification of federal jurisdiction over the environment. The court recognized the national government's constitutional right and its responsibility to conduct environmental assessments as part and parcel of its decision-making process. The court also recognized that responsibility, for the environment is shared between federal and provincial governments. Its ruling will help clarify the respective role of each jurisdiction.

In so finding, the court has helped to reduce uncertainty and to promote a cooperative approach between and among the jurisdictions involved, the same approach of cooperation and participation which underlies this legislation.

Bill C-13 will put in place new procedures and improved methods which directly address the defects described by the court.

● (1530)

It was in recognition of the shortcomings in the EARP, as the environmental assessment review process became known, that the federal government took steps to begin reforming the review process.

[Senator Ottenheimer]

In 1987, the then Minister of the Environment released a discussion paper, "Reforming Environmental Assessment". The release of the Green Paper was coincidental with the release of the report of the World Commission on Environment and Development which, among other things, called for a strengthening of environmental assessment procedures at all levels of government.

Public comment and recommendations from three rounds of consultations have been incorporated into the bill. Beyond these three public opportunities for comment, in an unusual step, before being passed in the other place, the final version was poured over by lawyers from the Canadian Environmental Network.

The bill before us now is a synthesis of the knowledge, experience and expertise of as broad a spectrum of environmentally knowledgeable and sensitive Canadians as one could hope to find.

I can also inform honourable senators that this legislation describes an environmental assessment process which is kilometers ahead of the status quo.

[Translation]

If the current environmental assessment procedures can be characterized as uncertain and unclear, then the proposed reforms must be described as definite and precise. What is before us today is modern legislation intended for a modern world.

We have before us legislation which provides a strong foundation for environmental assessment procedures for the 90s and indeed for beyond. It will do this by ensuring that the adverse environmental effects of a project under study are identified, evaluated and addressed early in the planning stages before decisions are irrevocably cast.

It would do so by strengthening public participation in the assessment process and by providing the opportunity to and encouraging those who may be affected by a proposal to influence federal government decisions about it.

Furthermore, for the first time in the history of the federal environmental assessment process, legislation will provide two options for public scrutiny of major projects. As part of the new process, mediation will be suggested as a new option, while public scrutiny by a commission will remain as the other option.

When implemented, the new Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will give substance to the principles of sustained development. It will ensure that environmental factors are studied as diligently as economic and social considerations.

[English]

The new environmental assessment procedures will encourage the federal government to make decisions that integrate environmental and economic considerations and that move us closer to our stated goal of achieving sustainable development.

This bill talks in terms of "integrating" environmental and economic factors rather than balancing them. I believe that this more positive definition of sustainable development will result in assessments that are based on more modern environmental principles.

The bill clearly indicates that all environmental assessments must include consideration of a number of important factors. These include the environmental cumulative effects of a project and their significance, as well as measures to mitigate potential problems. Notably, public comments must also be considered.

This bill also makes clear that some projects—those likely to have significant adverse environmental effects—will be subject to broader and more in-depth studies. The assessment process will focus on those activities which warrant closer scrutiny while avoiding unnecessary or frivolous examinations.

Furthermore, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will require project proponents to develop and implement followup and monitoring plans. This will ensure that any mitigating measures are effective.

The bill describes a process that is effective, efficient and comprehensive in scope.

Native concerns will also be accommodated in this act. The government has included both "traditional aboriginal uses of the land" and also "heritage resources" under the definition of "environmental effect" in assessing projects.

During the course of the three rounds of consultation, some participants suggested that the discretionary language in the act was an attempt by the government to court-proof this legislation. Nothing could have been further from the truth. Nonetheless, as a result of this concern, the government has removed as much of the discretionary language as possible.

As well, the government has defined "mitigation" as a "substantial reduction" or "effective control" of the environmental effects of a project. This, too, was in response to concerns expressed in public consultation.

The use of the term "significant environmental effect" throughout the bill is also in response to concerns expressed in public consultation.

In the United Nations Convention on Environmental Impact Assessment in a Transboundary Context, "significant" is the sole threshold level, the operative word. Canada is a party to the Convention, and the government hopes to ratify it in the near future.

Another issue which was raised in the course of the consultations was the absence in this legislation of "the need for" and "alternatives to" projects. The bill gives the Minister of the Environment the power to include in an assessment these and any other appropriate factors.

Furthermore, the government has included in this bill guidelines for the selection and appointment of mediators and review panels. This amendment responds directly to those environmental and industry groups and associations who underline the need for stated criteria to ensure high standards for mediation and panel reviews. The bill sets out those standards.

As a result, we have before us today, in my opinion, legislation which will give this country an environmental assessment process that speaks to the expressed needs of Canadians.

I thank honourable senators for their attention. I am sure this bill will receive interesting and informative debate in this chamber, and I look forward to participating in the examination which it will be given in the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Colin Kenny: I wish to adjourn this debate in my name until Wednesday next, as per the agreement we have had, but I would want it understood that if any senators speak now, or between now and then, I will still have up to 45 minutes when I speak next Wednesday.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: I should like to ask the honourable senator a couple of questions.

Hon. Pat Carney: The Speaker recognized me.

Senator Gigantès: The debate is adjourned, but he is prepared to let other people speak.

Senator Carney: Honourable senators, I am pleased to speak during the debate on Bill C-13, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. In the time allotted to me today, I would like to address—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, now that the debate has been adjourned, is there an agreement so that Senator Carney can speak?

Senator Gigantès: So that I can speak. I stood up before she did. I stood up first.

Senator Carney: I did.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not think we need to have any dispute here, because we will hear from both of you.

Senator Carney: I was on my feet first.

Senator Frith: I understand that. There is no desire not to hear Senator Carney. I want to hear from Senator Carney.

Senator Gigantès: So do I.

Senator Frith: Once it was determined that he had not adjourned the debate—

Senator Roblin: Has he or has he not?

Senator Frith: —Senator Gigantès wanted to ask the sponsor a question, which is normally what happens before somebody else speaks. In other words, it is just a normal sequence to ask the previous speaker questions and then someone else speaks.

Senator Carney: But the invitation was to speak on the bill, and I rose on that point.

Senator Gigantès: But I wanted to ask a question before you—

Senator Carney: Possibly you could ask your question after, since I responded to the invitation to speak on this issue.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Carney was on her feet before Senator Gigantès.

Senator Frith: Yes, but at that point, you had adjourned the debate.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, the practice has always been—

Senator Carney: To recognize those on their feet first.

Senator Gigantès: —to ask questions before speeches, questions of clarification.

Senator Carney: Mr. Speaker, you have recognized me. May I continue this debate?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: You have the floor.

Senator Carney: Honourable senators, in the time allotted to me today, I wish to address an issue that has received much attention in recent days, although obviously not in this chamber, and indeed an issue central to this bill. I am referring to the issue of cooperation.

● (1540)

Honourable senators, I believe that cooperation on environmental matters, especially on environmental assessment, is absolutely imperative. I say this because of the interrelated nature of the natural environment itself.

Honourable colleagues, the lack of attention given this important bill by my colleagues should be a matter of public record. As I started to say, colleagues, in my private life as a socioeconomic consultant, I had the opportunity many years ago to notice the quarrelling that went on between environmentalists themselves, where the mammals people did not agree with the fish people, who did not agree with the vegetation people. It is important to notice, too, that the interrelated nature of the natural environment is now recognized.

To illustrate my point, I should like to quote from "Our Common Future", the landmark report of the World Commission on Environment Development, which was referred to by my colleague, the senator from Newfoundland. It states:

> Ecological interactions do not respect the boundaries of individual ownership and political jurisdiction.

Nothing could be closer to the truth. Governments and geographers draw lines on maps but wind, water, fish and birds ignore them. In turn, pollutants respect no borders, often travelling great distances and degrading our air, water and land, and often far away from the source of contamination.

One example that we can consider is how traces of toxaphene, a pesticide that has never been used in the Arctic and scarcely used at all in Canada, have been found at Alert on the tip of Ellesmere Island in our so-called pristine north. In fact, toxaphene was primarily used in cotton fields in the southern United States.

We can see that the need for cooperation on environmental matters is important, given that responsibility for our often complex environmental problems lies with many levels of government—federal, provincial and territorial. This shared nature of environmental jurisdiction makes cooperation vital if we are to achieve a sustainable future for all Canadians.

I am pleased to inform the honourable senators that the bill before us today facilitates and enhances continued cooperation in partnerships on the environment that will help foster the spirit of cooperation and help Canadians to anticipate and prevent environmental problems before they occur. It is important that we note that the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act is consistent with a set of cooperative principles for environmental assessment which was developed by the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment. These cooperative principles suggest a variety of ways to promote cooperation on environmental assessment. Bill C-13 provides mechanisms for such cooperation at each and every stage of the environmental assessment process.

At this point we should read into the record a quote from the communiqué by the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment who met at Globe '92 in Vancouver. I am quoting from the section called "Environmental Assessment". It states:

> Ministers noted that Bill C-13 is now in third reading . . .

—it is now before this chamber, senators. The communiqué goes on to state:

> . . . and stated that the focus should be on negotiating bilateral federal-provincial agreements as soon as possible to ensure effective joint environmental assessment procedures. Such agreements would also help eliminate duplication of assessments.

The act promotes cooperation with other jurisdictions in screening the environmental effects of a project and in conducting more in-depth, comprehensive studies. Such early consultations with other jurisdictions is particularly important in determining the extent and scope of environmental assessment because working together to screen a project means only having to do it once. That is very important in the bill before us.

Second, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act provides for cooperation in the actual review process for a project proposal. These cooperative provisions are essential because, as my honourable friends are well aware, proposed projects can often involve more than one jurisdiction and, as such, cannot proceed until decisions are made by several parties.

For example, a project may be regulated or licensed by more than one federal department or agency—there are something like 80 agencies involved in the preparation of this act—and therefore require approvals from each federal authority. In addition, a provincial government, a foreign state or municipality can also have jurisdictional interest in a project.

As such, in some cases another jurisdiction may have responsibility to undertake a federal review of the project. This other jurisdiction could be a federal department or agency, a federal regulatory authority, a provincial government, a body set up under a comprehensive land agreement, a government of a foreign state or an international organization of states. In these cases, the Canadian Environment Assessment Act allows for the establishment of joint panel reviews with other jurisdictions. Such a measure, senators will realize, avoids duplication and potentially reduces costs and saves time, which is important in environmental assessments.

Joint processes will not compromise federal standards. To ensure that joint process is consistent with the federal process, the federal minister responsible for making a decision on the projects must appoint the panel chairperson or co-chairpersons and at least one other member of the panel. The minister must also set or approve the panel's terms of reference and ensure that the public has an opportunity to participate in the assessment.

In other cases a federal review body may already exist that would make a suitable review panel. In order to promote cooperation in the review process the bill provides that an existing federal review body can be named as a substitute for a review panel. As with the joint federal process, the federal minister must be satisfied that the assessment is consistent with the requirements of the act. Further, the public must be given an opportunity to participate in the assessment, and the assessment must be submitted to the minister and published.

My colleague, the honourable senator from Newfoundland, has touched on some of those provisions.

The act contains another provision to promote cooperation and the review process. It imposes on the federal government a legal requirement to consult with other affected or interested jurisdictions when a project is referred for full public review. An important result of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will be that the federal government cannot make decisions on a project that affect other jurisdictions without prior consultation.

Third, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act provides for the establishment of administrative agreements for effective and efficient federal-provincial partnerships in environmental assessment. Environment Canada already administers some 400 very successful multilateral and bilateral federal-provincial agreements. Clearly, the foundation for similar agreements on environmental assessment is well prepared.

Under the proposed act the Minister of the Environment can enter into agreements or arrangements with any jurisdiction for the purposes of coordination, consultation and exchange of information related to the assessment of environmental effects of projects. These features of the bill that are designed to promote cooperation are essential in light of the recent Supreme Court decision on the Oldman River Dam.

I should like to remind honourable senators that in that case the court recognized the federal government's responsibilities to conduct environmental assessments when it makes decisions. It also recognized the very important point that there is a shared responsibility for the environment between federal and provincial government. This cooperative approach underlines the proposed Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. Of course, it also underlies Canada's Green Plan and all other federal environmental initiatives.

It is no wonder that this critical piece of legislation contains so many provisions for cooperation and consultation. The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act has been built in consultation with thousands of Canadians in each and every province and territory. Participants included federal, provincial, territorial, and municipal governments, major industrial and agricultural associations, unions, environmental groups, and, of course, individual Canadians.

Work on reforming the federal environmental assessment process began in 1897, as this chamber has been told, with the release of a green paper on this issue. Subsequently, hundreds of Canadians participated in a series of regional meetings. A national workshop was held in March 1988 and my colleague from Newfoundland has outlined some of the actions that followed at that time.

Before ending my intervention in this debate, I would like to point out that this bill has received a lot of support from western Canada. I would like to read into the record a statement from the Canadian Petroleum Association which is very much involved in energy projects, of course. It had the following to say:

> The Canadian Petroleum Association has taken a very active part in the consultation process of Bills C-78 and C-13 as the issues are particularly relevant to the upstream oil and gas industry which we represent. We see the Bill as a timely and positive step in resolving uncertainties faced by project proponents. The orderly framework prescribed by the act and anticipated in Regulations will increase certainty and understanding of the assessment process. The CPA will continue to work with all stakeholders in the further consultations to develop efficient and effective regulations.

This is signed by Ian R. Smyth, the president. I would also like to remind senators that the western press has been very complimentary on this issue. Here is a quote from the Edmonton Sun which says:

> When a piece of environmental legislation has the support of the Tories, the Grits, the Reformers the Canadian Environmental Assessment Caucus and the Canadian Petroleum Association, you can be pretty sure it's sound comprehensive law.
> When it's opposed by the New Democrats and the Bloc Québècois, you can be dead certain of it.

There is another quote from the Calgary Herald saying:

> Good for Jean Charest. The federal environment minister's decision to stand firm on a new environmental assessment bill, in spite of heated opposition from Quebec Environment Minister Pierre Paradis, is a reminder to all who fret that constitutional harmony will be pursued at any cost.

He goes on to say how important it is that these environmental matters be addressed. There is even a quote here from the Victoria Times-Colonist which notes that last week the Commons gave final approval to a bill which will require environmental assessment of projects within the federal jurisdiction. It goes on to review the bill and ends with the statement:

> . . . the fact is Tories and Liberals as well as the reform party overwhelmingly supported this law. The only reason that the NDP did not is because they think it is not tough enough.

There may be some who still feel that way. I should point out that individual NDP members have spoken in favour of this bill.

In closing, I would like to point out that I am happy to have had an opportunity to speak on this bill at this stage and I hope that senators realize that the participation of Canadians in the implementation of the act can help us develop a stronger, more cooperative federal environmental assessment process for current and future generations of Canadians. It was developed in cooperation with Canadians; it will be implemented in cooperation with Canadians. It is a bill that Canadians want and need now.

I hope honourable senators will see the merits of this urgently needed legislation and help to expedite the passage of Bill C-13.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, before I repeat the motion put by Senator Kenny, does Senator Gigantès want to ask a question of the sponsor of the bill?

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I hope senators will allow me 30 seconds of reminiscence. Once when my father was military governor of Athens, cadets from the naval college and from the army college asked him to decide who should salute the other first, and he said the one who is most polite, so I let Senator Carney speak without further protest.

I would like to ask the the sponsor of the bill, in view of the extremely delicate constitutional equilibrium act that your government is engaged in, the whole nation in fact, were all the necessary efforts taken to make sure that this bill could be presented sufficiently well in Quebec, well in advance so as to avoid the storm of media opprobrium in the Quebec press that is falling down on the rest of Canada and us federalists? Was any serious effort made to explain all the things that Senator Carney was saying about cooperation? Could it not have been possible to discuss this particular issue with the federal minister and the provincial minister of environment in Quebec, and come out with some connuniqué saying some things like—as the Liberals have suggested in there dissidence to the Beaudoin-Dobbie report—this could be an issue where there would be provincial predominance?

Senator Carney: Perhaps I could I answer that question. The Supreme Court has already indicated that the federal government has concurrent jurisdiction in this matter. I refer the honourable senator to the act.

Senator Gigantès: It is concurrent. "Concurrent" as I understand it, means, at the the same time, the two. There is nothing in the judgment of the Supreme Court which says the federal government cannot say that in this particular issue we will cooperate with Quebec in the assessment and accept that Quebec will do the assessment in order to avoid the problems. I was asking the sponsor that question.

Senator Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I probably will not be able to reply in a manner that will necessarily be satisfactory to the Honourable Senator Gigantès. Certainly, I am of the opinion that the government, being composed of intelligent, sensitive and knowledgable men and women—one might agree or disagree with them—

Senator Gigantès: Fallible at times.

Senator Ottenheimer: —but they are certainly that—intelligent, knowledgable, sensitive, and interested in Canadian unity—gave consideration to all the relevant aspects. I can only assume that. I am not a member of cabinet. Obviously the priorities or requirements are several. There are environmental aspects. As Senator Gigantès mentioned, there are obviously constitutional and inter-governmental aspects, international aspects and obligations, and national and provincial aspects. So as to the first part of the question, I assume with reasonable confidence that the government gave due weight to all the diverse important matters which were at hand.

● (1600)

On the second aspect of it, or what I think was also implied in the question, it is firmly my understanding that this legislation deals with process. It does not pretend to, nor, in effect, does it in reality, alter in any way any area of jurisdiction at any order of government. It provides a process in which those various orders of government would exercise the legitimate jurisdiction that they have without changing in any way the parameters of those jurisdictions.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Kenny, seconded by the Honourable Senator LeBlanc, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I am not going to speak at length on this bill. I do not intend to do that until third reading. However, I would like mention one point, if I may, and draw attention to some people who were instrumental in crafting the bill.

Rarely in Hansard in the House of Commons does one read such fulsome praise from members of all parties heaped on the minister and the parliamentary secretary.

On Motion of Senator Kenny, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Before I call another order may we have an indication of when we can expect the Speaker's ruling? Would you say ten minutes?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Perhaps in 10 minutes.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I do not want to get into a debate which would be interrupted indefinitely. Perhaps we could deal with Bill S-8 and see if we can dispose of that.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY BILL

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Oliver, seconded by the Honourable Senator Di Nino, for the second reading of Bill S-8, An Act to regulate the manufacture and importation of motor vehicles and motor vehicle equipment to reduce the risk of death, injury and damage to property and the environment.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday I adjourned the debate, but I had asked the government leader a question as to the matter raised by my colleague from Cape Breton, Honourable Senator Graham, regarding the need for a Royal Recommendation. I wonder if the leader has an answer.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank the Deputy Leader of the Opposition for reminding me of that. I have taken counsel and I have brought my music on the subject of why Bill S-8 did not receive, or indeed require, a Royal Recommendation.

It is the view of the government that the bill does not require a Royal Recommendation because it does not contain any clauses appropriating new money from the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

I would like to make the following points. The Senate is aware that the requirement for a Royal Recommendation flows from section 55 of the Constitution Act, 1867, and that the recommendation is only required if a bill proposes to authorize the expenditure of public money. According to Erskine May, Twentieth Edition, the expenditure must be "a new and distinct" one.

In Bill S-8 there is no authorization for the spending of public money. There is an existing Ministry of Transport with an existing statutory regime which was already authorized by Parliament under the Motor Vehicle Safety Act and the Motor Vehicle Tire Safety Act.

The new Bill S-8 is simply a technical revision and re-enactment of the current regime. The powers given to the minister in S-8 already exist. There is no substantive change to those powers.

It is the view of the government, and I believe honourable senators would find it the view of counsel—in the other place at any rate—that a Royal Recommendation is not required in these circumstances.

Senator Molgat: I thank the minister for his statement. In view of some of the matters that counsel in the other place have sent us, where there were some grave doubts about whether they had followed the proper course on Royal Recommendation, I do not know that we should completely accept their point of view.

However, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES, 1991-92

SEVENTH REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Leblanc (Saurel),seconded by the Honourable Senator Gigantes, for the adoption of the Seventh Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Main Estimates 1991-92), presented in the Senate on 24th March, 1992.

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, I wanted to draw attention again to what Senator Stewart said yesterday on this order in case it escaped any senator's attention. As he pointed out, the committee has very usefully highlighted a very important aspect of the Estimates, namely, the question of the rolling over of the votes or items under votes—as he calls it "recruiting" them back.

The result is, as he pointed out, "Vote 5 is a key vote, because when Parliament enacts it a large sum of money", in this case $400 million, "is placed at the discretion", effectively, "of the government." But it works out even to more, as he states, than $400 million when "the various sets of supplementary estimates come along and have the effect—to use the words I used before—of recruiting or restoring the Treasury Board vote—not to its full amount because it is only in the case of 'other requirements', not the pay list requirements" that this recruitment by the supplementary estimate takes place.

The good news is that the Treasury Board was very cooperative on this point and the committee has established a relationship and an arrangement with the Treasury Board whereby the Treasury Board is—and I quote again from Senator Stewart's statement—"trying to devise ways in which Parliament could be given information . . . in the future" as to how the vote was working.

What we have asked for is a kind of running report throughout the year as to what is happening under this contingency vote and also at the end of the year a summation of what has been done, and various other things.

I know that this particular type of vote has attracted the attention of the committee previously. I would like to compliment all members of the committee and the Chairman for setting this arrangement up and asking that, if they get interim reports from the Treasury Board pursuant to any arrangement they set up, will corresponding interim reports be made to the Senate so that we can follow the progress of that vote. I say that because, unless I am mistaken, when Senator Doody was Chairman of the National Finance Committee and we were in government, he also had concerns about certain aspects of that type of vote.

● (1610)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it was moved by the honourable Senator Leblanc (Saurel), seconded by the honourable Senator Gigantès, that this report be now adopted.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted to.

THE ESTIMATES, 1991-92

CONSIDERATION OF EIGHTH REPORT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on consideration of the Eighth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Supplementary Estimates (C) 1991-92) presented in the Senate on March 25, 1992.

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, in its report on Supplementary Estimates (C), the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance detailed its review of the main and supplementary estimates referred to the committee for consideration. Supplementary Estimates (C) are the third and final supplementary estimates for the 1991-92 fiscal year. Instead of going through the details of this report, I would prefer to mention some of the highlights.

[English]

The budgetary portion of these supplementary estimates is $568.4 million and raises total budgetary estimates for 1991-92 to $160.660 billion. This amount exceeds by $1.660 billion the expenditure framework of $159.0 billion that was presented in last year's Main Estimates. However, on January 27, 1992, the government imposed a freeze on discretionary expenditures and new hiring for the remainder of the fiscal year. This freeze, along with lower defence spending, reduced public service pension costs and the usual year-end lapses, is providing $5.2 billion of savings, and will reduce 1991-92 budgetary expenditure to $155.5 billion.

The report points out that the Treasury Board Government Contingencies Vote—Vote 5—was used to provide temporary funding for 22 proposed expenditures of 14 departments, totalling $72.9 million. If Supplementary Estimates (C) are approved, the appropriation bill will have the effect of paying this amount back to Vote 5.

Members of your committee, as Senator Frith pointed out, have long been vigilant about the use of Vote 5 since it is a device that allows the government to make appropriations without waiting for the approval of Parliament. Because of our persistent and knowledgeable questioning over the years, Treasury Board has now agreed to provide to the committee, to accompany every set of supplementary estimates, a list of the Vote 5 allocations by department, along with the other tables prepared by the Board that are normally attached to our report.

As you are aware, the Committee's final report on the 1991-92 Main Estimates deals with the subject of the Government Contingencies Vote in more detail.

[Translation]

Sixty-seven per cent of the total budgetary expenditures to be voted in Supplementary Estimates (C) will be used for a single vote of the Department of Agriculture, Vote 30, under the heading "Grains and Oilseeds-Contributions", and the $767.6 million being requested will be used to reimburse the deficits of the Canadian Wheat Board's various grain pool accounts which resulted from unusually low world market prices. The Supplementary Estimates also provide for substantial additional statutory expenditures for the Department of Agriculture.

When the 1991-92 Main Estimates were tabled over a year ago, the estimates of the Department of Agriculture totalled $1.888 billion. Since then, the department has asked Parliament to approve a substantial increase in the original votes, in Supplementary Estimates (A), (B) and (C). The total of the increased appropriations is $2.485 billion, which represents an increase of 132 per cent over the amount approved in the Main Estimates for the entire department! According to our committee, the department should be able to provide a quicker and more accurate forecast of trends in world grain prices and other significant economic indicators, to ensure that the forecasts in the Main Estimates are a more accurate reflection of the resources it will need to operate farm programs during the entire fiscal year. In 1991-92, the Main Estimates failed to forecast with any degree of accuracy the expenditures that Parliament would be asked to approve.

The report also mentions that in his 1991 report, the Auditor General was critical of the Department of Agriculture and, more specifically, that between 1985 and 1990, none of the major farm assistance programs had been evaluated and that there was no clear statement of the objectives of these programs. In our committee's January 1991 report on the Government of Canada's program evaluation system, which was the focus of our review at the time, we mentioned similar cases of failing to evaluate major statutory programs, and the Auditor General's conclusions appear to confirm the existence of this somewhat disturbing trend at the Department of Agriculture. In 1991, for instance, the Farm Income Protection Act replaced many of the farm safety net programs by new programs for revenue insurance, gross revenue insurance and crop insurance, for which additional statutory expenditures totalling over $90 million are provided in Supplementary Estimates (C). However, Parliament has no way of knowing whether these new programs are better managed than the previous ones, which attracted the Auditor General's criticism.

I believe the Department of Agriculture has yet to prove to the committee's and the Senate's satisfaction that it is able to manage both new and existing programs efficiently and effectively. We would appreciate being kept informed of its plans for program evaluation. The committee may also decide to ask departmental representatives to appear before it when it reviews the 1992-93 Main Estimates. In that case, the subject may be raised again in our interim report, about three months from now.

Thank you, honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—MOTION TO INVOKE PROVISIONS OF RULE 40—SPEAKER'S RULING SUSTAINED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton:

That, pursuant to the provisions of Rule 40, in relation to Bill C-32, An Act to amend the Canadian Assistance Plan, not more than six further hours of debate be allotted to the consideration of the said bill at the third reading stage;

That, when the debate comes to an end or when the time provided for the debate has expired, as the case may be, the Speaker shall interrupt, if required, any proceedings then before the Senate and put forthwith and successively every question necessary to dispose of the remaining stages of the said bill; and

That, any recorded vote on the said questions shall be taken in accordance with the provisions of Rule 40(4).

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, during consideration of Motion Number 2 moved by Senator Lynch-Staunton, Senator Frith raised a point of order to the effect that the wording of the motion was irregular and therefore out of order.

[Translation]

I listened to the points raised in the point of order and I read Rule 40. I note that Rule 40 applies to the motion now before the Senate because it allows six hours of debate on the motion.

[English]

The words "single period" in Rule 40(2)(d) are applicable to the situation where you have a report stage and third reading. In this case, since we have only third reading before us, Rule 40(2)(d) still applies. If this motion is passed, a further six hours of debate is allocated before the vote must take place. I therefore rule that the motion is in order.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): I cannot accept that lying down, or sitting down for that matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the ruling please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. The Speaker: Will those honourable senators opposed to the ruling please say "nay"?

Some. Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, pursuant to Rule 68, I ask that the vote be deferred as provided for therein.

[English]

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not believe you can defer a vote on a Speaker's ruling.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Can you point out to us the rule where it says you cannot?

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: I remind Senator Hébert that Rule 18(4) reads as follows:

> Except in accordance with the provisions of Rule 38(5), all decisions of the Speaker shall be subject to appeal to the Senate, and such an appeal shall be decided forthwith, without debate.

[English]

Do you wish me to repeat that in English?

Senator Hébert: Yes.

The Hon. The Speaker: It is Rule 18(4).

> 18(4) Except in accordance with the provisions of rule 38(5), all decisions of the Speaker shall be subject to appeal to the Senate, and such an appeal shall be decided forthwith without debate.

Call in the senators. Is there agreement between the Whips? The bell will ring for one hour.

The Senate adjourned to the call of the bell.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked.

Honourable senators, the question is: Shall the Speaker's ruling be sustained?

The Hon. the Speaker: I declare the Speaker's ruling sustained. Let the doors be opened.

MOTION TO INVOKE PROVISIONS OF RULE 40 CARRIED

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in support of this motion I would like to trace the progress of Bill C-32 since its introduction, explain some of its content and summarize the reasons which justify time allocation which, based on experience so far, should allow ample time for serious debate while respecting the government's need for passage at the end of the current fiscal year.

First reading of the bill was given on February 11th after third reading by the House of Commons the day before. The Senate adjourned on February the 13th. On February 18th Senator Kelly opened second reading by saying, in part:

> . . . the bill before us simply extends that limitation . . .

By that he was referring to the 5 per cent limitation on Canada Assistance Plan transfer payments. He continued:

> . . . for three more fiscal years namely 192-93, 1993-94 and 1994-95.

The limit was first applied in 1990-91 and 1991-92 through the Expenditure Restraint Act, Bill C-69, passed by Parliament one year ago.

It is important to stress that Bill C-32 is an extension of known government policy and existing legislation rather than something new, only recently introduced. In closing his remarks Senator Kelly said:

> Since another budget is almost upon us, I think it is incumbent to move this bill forward as quickly as possible.

Senator Frith adjourned the debate on the 18th of February. The Senate then adjourned until the 27th of February. On the 28th, the debate was resumed by Senator Frith, the bill was read a second time on division, and referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance after Senator Molgat reminded the committee that the Rules of the Senate in Appendix 1 provide that when a bill before us is one in which a province or territory has a special interest, the government of that province or territory be invited to make written or verbal representations.

The Senate then adjourned until March 17. The committee contacted the 12 provincial and territorial governments by fax on March 3rd. At its meeting on March 18th, members of the Committee on National Finance were informed that no reply had been received from any province or territory, not even an acknowledgement—this 15 days after they were advised by fax.

It was then decided to report the bill without amendment and the Senate was so advised on March 19th, the following day.

The Senate adjourned to March 24th, the debate was resumed that day, two days ago, by Senator Marsden, and adjourned by Senator Hébert. Contact was made that same day with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition to ascertain his party's intentions regarding C-32 as the government wanted it decided on or before the end of the fiscal year, as Senator Kelly had already pointed out five weeks earlier.

I was informed that two Liberal senators had indicated to him their intention to speak, and that there could be more, so that no assurances would be given that a vote would be allowed on or before March 31st. The same reply was given yesterday when I contacted my honourable friend opposite. Two senators, he said, wanted to speak, one on Thursday, as Senator Fairbairn confirmed yesterday, and one on Tuesday, March 31st, with perhaps one more, so that the assurance again sought that a vote would be taken by the government's deadline was denied.

Such is the background to the decision to move time allocation on Bill C-32. It is our contention that little can be accomplished by stretching the debate out indefinitely and that the six hours provided by time allocation will be more than sufficient to increase everyone's knowledge of the pros and cons of Bill C-32, if indeed there is much more, if anything, which can be added to a debate which, in effect, is an extension of one which goes back some two years, that is, to the 1990 budget.

Every effort is made to accommodate the opposition when it comes to reaching an understanding on the progress of legislation, scheduling of speakers, and other matters which concern our sittings. I have no doubt that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition will bear me out on this. At the same time, however, the government does have a timetable which we on this side have a responsibility to respect.

Considering the urgency imposed by the little time left between now and the end of the fiscal year, the fact that, while C-32 is recent, its subject matter does date back two years, and that the bill itself calls for a three-year extension of known government policy, I am certain that most members will agree that not only would an indefinite extension of the debate add little to one's appreciation of C-32, but that the six hours permitted under time allocation may be even more than sufficient to allow the bill to be given a thorough airing. I therefore urge senators on all sides to support this motion.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not quarrel too much with what the Deputy Leader of the government has said, although I might have to go over in detail the statement made by him as to the conversations I have had with him. However, I would like to point out that this is the first time that this Draconian measure has been used in the Senate. I emphasize "Draconian" because the method used to change the rules that were imposed on the Senate—imposed, because remember, never before in the other place or in this place were the rules changed by the method used by senators opposite. Always in both houses rule changes were made by having joint committees sitting over lengthy periods of time to change the rules. That has always been the method, but that is not at all the method that honourable senators across used.

My first point is the method by which these rules were changed. A number of you here have sat in the other place and you know that that was how it was always done in the other place, both in the case of the last change and when Senator Lefebvre was chairman of that committee. It was a joint method of arriving at the change of rules. Honourable senators opposite simply did not approach this in a bipartisan way. It was unilaterally done by them.

My second point is that the method of closure is even more stringent than that used in the House of Commons. It is a much tighter operation to force decisions and prevent discussion in this chamber. The House of Commons is more lenient than what you propose.

Let us come to this bill itself. Senator Lynch-Staunton properly indicated that the bill passed the House of Commons on the 10th and was introduced here on the 11th. That is true. There was no delay. Today is the 26th of March, but my friend introduced the closure motion on the 25th. That is less than a month and a half.

Let us look at what happened in the other place to determine why there is such a great rush to pass it through this chamber. It was introduced in the other chamber on the 18th of September, 1991. Second reading was moved on the 23rd and completed on the 30th. The committee did not meet until the 19th of November, although there was a great rush. We had to pass this bill. It had to be put through. It is really necessary that it be done quickly.

Between September 30th and November 19th the bill spent more time sitting doing nothing between second reading and committee stage than has been allowed in the Senate in total, for all stages.

● (1650)

The government says it is in a rush; it has to get this through. However, it was prepared to wait a month and a half before moving the bill along from second reading to committee stage.

The bill went into committee on the 19th of November. It came out of committee on the 27th of November. What happened then? Nothing until February.

Senator Frith: November, December, January: Three months.

Senator Molgat: Again we have a bill where there is a great rush and it must be put through the Senate now. We have this gag order across the way, the result of which is that we must push this bill through right away. Where is the logic?

This is an independent chamber, a chamber that should not be under the thumb of the government, a chamber that should not be operating at the whim and wish of any cabinet minister. This chamber, an independent body, ought to make its own decisions. That, however, is not what is happening.

Senator Haidasz: We are not slaves.

Senator Molgat: I submit to honourable senators that if there was a great rush for this bill, then the House of Commons ought to have proceeded in a very different way. They can spend almost five months in the process, and this house barely a month and a half. That amounts to a gag order, the worst gag order imaginable. That is how my honourable friends see the role of the Senate.

Senator Haidasz: It is unconstitutional.

Senator Molgat: That is certainly not my view of the role of the Senate. We are not here simply to put a quick stamp on the bills that the House of Commons wishes to pass. If the government was honest about having a rush on this bill, it would have moved in the House of Commons in a very different way.

I come back now to those members who wish to speak on our side. I knew that Senator Fairbairn intended to speak, and she so indicated. Senator Perrault indicated to me that he wished to speak. He had commitments in his own province of British Columbia and could not be here until Tuesday. Therefore, he is not in a position to speak on the subject until Tuesday.

I might point out that this bill is of particular concern to three provinces. Senator Perrault's province, British Columbia, is one. The province of Alberta is another, and Senator Fairbairn will be speaking. Senator Marsden, who comes from the province of Ontario, the other province affected, has already spoken, as did Senator Frith in the initial instance.

It was my desire to give Senator Perrault the opportunity to speak. It is true that I could give no absolute commitment that no one else would speak. Very often in the course of debate, as we all know, other individuals, on hearing a speech, decide to join in the debate. I do not deny that a bit, but I think that is the role of the Senate.

This issue is of a major and immediate concern to the three provinces I have mentioned. As well, it has an impact on all provinces, because this is the beginning of the erosion of the system that this government is proceeding with. It is on that basis, honourable senators, that I submit the House of Commons did not rush this thing through. It has been here less time than the recess in the House of Commons—less time than the House of Commons took between second reading and committee stage. We are now being forced by this rule that has been imposed on the Senate to proceed and forever hold our peace. That is an absolutely unreasonable proposition. I am absolutely opposed to it. The government is wrong. Honourable senators on the other side are simply letting the government decide what ought to be done instead of making the decisions here in the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has stated in his opening remarks that the reform of the rules in this place and the other place—

Senator Haidasz: Deform.

Senator Murray: —have invariably been a bipartisan exercise and that the majority had never imposed its will on the minority either here or in the other place when it came to a reform of the rules.

My memory goes back to 1968 and the most far-reaching overhaul of the rules of the House of Commons that had been made in a generation. That overhaul of the rules was led by the President of the Privy Council, the House Leader in the House of Commons in the Trudeau government, Mr. Donald Macdonald, over the vociferous objections of both opposition parties and imposed on the minority by the majority in that place. If my memory serves me correctly, it was imposed by closure. I may not be right on the last point, but I am certainly accurate in my recollection that the opposition fought those changes tooth and nail and that they were finally imposed on the opposition parties by the Liberal majority in the House of Commons.

I do not know that the House of Commons is any the worse or any the better for the reforms that were introduced at that time. For one thing, they did away with the old practice of conducting the Estimates in Committee of the Whole House, and they removed from the opposition the ability to use supply as a real weapon in holding the government to account. That is a loss for the opposition. On the other hand, it is argued that sending the Estimates to committees for detailed examination has been an improvement in the conduct of public affairs and in the ability of Parliament to have a meaningful role in scrutinizing expenditures and holding ministers to account. The point, however, is that they were imposed by the majority over the objections of the minority, and it was the farthest thing from a bipartisan exercise that you could possibly imagine.

With regard to the arguments advanced by Senator Molgat, the amount of time that Bill C-32 took to clear the House of Commons is "à-propos de rien", in my humble opinion. The question that should concern honourable senators is whether there has been ample opportunity here for a debate and an examination of Bill C-32 in its various stages. The chronology has been placed on the record by the Deputy Leader of the Government. Second reading was moved by our colleague, Senator Kelly, on February 18th. The Leader of the Opposition took the adjournment on that date, and there were several adjournments agreed to by the government to accommodate Senator Frith following that. We did not call it on February 19th or on Thursday, February 27th, in an effort to accommodate the Leader of the Opposition; indeed, at the request of the opposition leadership.

Finally, 10 days after Senator Kelly had opened debate on second reading, Senator Frith spoke to second reading. At that time, I intervened in the debate and the Senate divided, and on a standing vote, we moved the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Honourable senators are aware that on March 18th, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, Mr. Mazankowski, appeared to explain the bill and to reply to questions from members of the committee. It has already been placed on the record that others were invited and given an opportunity to attend, including representatives of provincial governments who might be concerned about the bill.

● (1700)

On March 19 the bill was reported without amendment. There is no evidence in the record that anyone on the opposition side protested that more time was needed in the committee, that further witnesses should be called or that there were further amendments to be considered. The bill was reported on March 19 without amendment.

Third reading was moved by Senator Bolduc on Tuesday, March 24, 1992. We have had speeches by Senator Marsden, a very brief intervention on my part, and in the interim we have had serious discussions between the leadership on this side and the Leader of the Opposition with a view to agreeing on a date when we might expect to have the final vote on third reading taken.

It was not possible to agree. I appreciate very much the point that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition makes. Even when the leadership agrees these matters are ad referendum to caucus. He had had indications that at least two of his colleagues wished to speak. It is always possible that there is a third, fourth or fifth who may wish to speak. But no agreement was possible nor do I think—and Senator Lynch-Staunton or Senator Molgat can correct me if I am wrong—that there was an indication that best efforts would be made to have a vote by a certain time on a certain date.

There is no obligation on the part of the opposition to agree to that sort of thing—none whatsoever. Were I in his place I might take the same tack, I do not know. There is no obligation on the opposition. They are perfectly within their rights not to agree to anything—perfectly within their rights. On the other hand, I hope it will be clear—it certainly is clear from the reading of the rules—that the government, the majority in this place, is perfectly within its rights to invoke those rules that permit us, when an agreement is it not possible—

Senator Haidasz: The rules are unconstitutional, as I mentioned yesterday.

Senator Murray: I thank the honourable senator for that interjection. But we have the rules.

Senator Gigantès: They laugh at the Constitution.

Senator Haidasz: They break all the rules, even the Constitution!

Senator Murray: The honourable senator—

Senator Haidasz: That is "consent of Parliament"!

Senator Murray: —referred to this allocation of time rule as draconian. He says that it is far more restrictive than the allocation of time provision that exists in the House of Commons rules. I do not know that that is the case. I have not done an analysis on it. I would suspect that the difference between the two is not great.

What I also know, and what all of us here know, is that there is hardly a legislative assembly operating in our system of government with which any of us are familiar or have ever heard of that does not have some mechanism for allocation of time, closure, or some way to bring a debate to an end in good time. It is not all that draconian at all.

The opposition has a perfect right to refuse to agree to anything, as they have done in this case. We, for our part, have a right to invoke the rules and to ask for a vote on a reasonable allocation of time order. This one will provide for six more hours of debate at third reading of Bill C-32; six hours which would surely give the two senators whom Senator Molgat mentioned, namely Senator Fairbairn and Senator Perrault, ample opportunity to speak, and perhaps a third, fourth or fifth Liberal senator or perhaps a Conservative senator who may feel inspired to take part in the debate.

Honourable senators, that is about all I wish to say for the moment. We will be glad to proceed to a vote on this allocation of time motion in due course, and from there to consider when we shall resume debate on Bill C-32.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as the Leader of the Government has said, each side is perfectly within its rights to resort to the rules and exercise what rights it has under the rules.

To use a phrase that he also used, we mean to fight tooth and nail against the imposition of closure here. We want to fight tooth and nail on CAP, so I guess we will have a vote.

Upon exercising the rights which he invites us to exercise, and he having exercised his, as I read the rules we will have a vote and the vote is deferred until 5:30 tomorrow.

Senator Murray: No.

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Haidasz: Until 5:30 Saturday.

Senator Frith: Yes. Read the rules.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We did.

Senator Cogger: Read rule 41(1)(c).

Senator Frith: Yes, let us look at it. It says:

> Except as provided below . . .

This is found on page 41. It is rule 40(4). Correct? It states:

> except as provided below . . .

Note that. It goes on to state.

> . . . the provisions of rules 67 and 68 shall apply to the taking of any standing vote in relation to every Order of the Day to which time is allocated for debate, pursuant to rule 39 or 40 and shall be considered within the following provisions:

Rule 67 would provide for a one-hour bell. But what the rule says is "except as provided below". And what "below" says is:

> (a) except as provided in sub-paragraph (b) below, when debate on such an Order of the Day . . .

And the Order of the Day that is referred to is the Order of the Day in rule 40, which states that Senator Lynch-Staunton's motion "shall be placed on the Orders of the Day under "Government Motions" for the next sitting day", which he did and which we did.

We raised a point of order. We had a vote on it. We have now heard that the government means to proceed with the matter. It is now on the Orders of the Day. That is where we are. The rule states:

> except as provided in subparagraph (b) below . . .

That does not apply in this case because it is after 5:30. It goes on to state.

> . . . when debate on such Order of the Day is concluded . . .

Which is what we are doing, and as far as we are concerned it is concluded.

Senator Murray: Not until Senator Lynch-Staunton speaks.

Senator Frith: He can go on if he wants to, but when that happens, "or when the time provided for such debate expires", which is two and one-half hours, the vote is deferred. There is a period of two and one-half hours provided for the debate on Senator Lynch-Staunton's motion. When that expires, or when the debate is concluded, the vote should be deferred. As far as we are concerned it is concluded, but if you want to keep talking, that is fine. Whichever happens—either the two and one-half hours or when you are finished talking about it, then:

> . . . the Speaker shall forthwith put the question without any further debate or amendment and any standing vote requested in relation thereto shall be deferred until 5:30 o'clock in the afternoon on the next day thereafter on which the Senate sits.

Senator Haidasz: That is right.

Senator Frith: What could be clearer? It says that rule 67, which you want to invoke, namely, a one-hour bell, applies "except as provided below". That is what the provision below says.

I am sure that what will happen is you will say something opposite and the Speaker will rule against us. The rules do not seem to matter, anyway. But that is what the rule says, and we are ready for the vote.

● (1710)

Senator Murray: I presume my friend has risen on a point of order, in response to which—

Senator Frith: I am debating the motion. I am saying we are ready for the vote.

Senator Murray: May I then be permitted to place on the record, because a point of order has been raised—

Senator Frith: Please listen to the reply, Mr. Speaker, because I know you will do exactly what he says.

Senator Murray: My friend has not asked for a ruling I take it?

Senator Frith: Let's have a vote. I just want the rules applied.

Senator Murray: Let me read Rule 41(1) on page 45 with regard to a government motion to allocate time:

> When an Order of the Day for a motion to allocate time for the consideration of any item of government business is called:
> (a) the same shall not be adjourned and no amendment thereto, nor other motion, except that a certain Senator be now heard or do now speak, shall be received;
> (b) the Speaker shall interrupt any proceeding then before the Senate and put every question necessary to dispose of the motion not later than two and one half hours after the order is called; and
> (c) any standing vote requested in relation thereto shall not be deferred and shall be taken subject to the provisions of rule 67(1).

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Frith: Go back to the other, which says that rule 67 applies except—

Senator Murray: Just a minute. Rule 67(1) says:

> Unless previously ordered or elsewhere provided in these rules,—

I contend that Rule 41(c) provides otherwise.

Senator Frith: Now extend that to 44.

Senator Murray: It goes on:

> —when a standing vote has been requested in accordance with Rule 66(3), the bells to call in the Senators shall be sounded for 60 minutes unless otherwise ordered, and with leave of the Senate.

What we have here is that two and a half hours after the debate on the time allocation—

Senator Frith: Or when it is concluded.

Senator Murray: Or when it is concluded, but the maximum of two and a half hours after the debate on the time allocation motion has commenced, His Honour has to interrupt the proceedings and put the question to dispose of the motion. Any standing vote cannot be deferred but is subject to a 60-minute bell unless there is agreement otherwise. That is my reading of the rules.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, since the Leader of the Government has turned this into a point of order, and I think quite correctly, Rule 67 is the one that he wants your honour to apply. The rule says—and I guess somebody who drew these rules did not notice that they said that 67 is to apply—"except as provided below, the provisions of rules 67 and 68 shall apply." What is provided below? What is provided below is that the vote is deferred until 5:30 in the afternoon of the next day. You could say there is an inconsistency between the two but you must read such inconsistencies in the hope that you can make sense of them. The only words that help us make sense are the words, "except as provided below, the provisions of rules 67 and 68 shall apply." So rule 67 does not apply in the situation described at the top of page 42, which is precisely the situation we are in. So I agree with the leader with regard to rule 67. That is exactly where you go. All roads lead you to rule 67. But having arrived at 67 you say, "Well, that is to apply. Rule 67 is to apply on the basis of what is said at the bottom of page 41, namely sub (4), but when you read (4) it says that rule 67 does not apply in certain special circumstances." They happen to be the very circumstances we are in; namely, that the time for the debate has either expired or the debate has expired and then there is a standing vote. It shall be put. That is what it says. The speaker is to stand and put the question and then it is to be deferred until 5:30 in the afternoon.

I guess we need a have ruling because the only sense you can make out of the two rules is to read the words, "except as provided below".

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I think it is very clear on page 45. Rule 41(1)—

Senator Frith: It is clear on page 42.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is a procedure for a government motion to allocate time. It is very specific.

Senator Frith: That is what this is.

The Hon. the Speaker: I will not repeat what Senator Murray said, but it seems to me quite clear and I do not see how it can be construed otherwise.

Senator Frith: Do you want to read only one page, Mr. Speaker? Isn't it just as clear on the other page?

The Hon, the Speaker: I want to read where it refers to a motion to allocate time.

Senator Frith: Of course, that is the only part you will read!

The Hon. the Speaker: That is where it applies. It is quite clear to me.

Senator Frith: I figured it would be! What is the point? You only want to read one page, the one that suits the government!

The Hon. the Speaker: I have listened to your arguments!

Senator Frith: You stand up, Mr. Speaker, and you say that it is quite clear, and then you read the page the leader told you to read. Well, read the other page!

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry, Senator Frith, I have read them and I followed your argument also!

Senator Frith: That's fine. We know who you will support!

Senator Corbin: The Speaker is participating in the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am not participating, I am answering.

Senator Frith: Do what you want! Get it done! What do you want to do?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I suggest we call it 6 o'clock, and we will return at 8 o'clock.

Senator Frith: No. You are supposed to proceed right through at this stage.

Senator Murray: My friend is confused.

Senator Frith: Sure!

Senator Murray: Well he is. He is confused between the rules that relate to a debate on an allocation of time motion and the—

Senator Frith: What are you going to do? You are the Leader of the Government. You ram everything through. What do you want to do? If you want to adjourn, let's do it! It is five to six.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator—

Senator Gigantès: How about the day you told him to tell us the vote was 5 minutes later than it was?

Senator Frith: Just get it done. I don't want to listen to your lectures or any of your smarmy comments.

Senator Barootes: Crybabies.

Senator Frith: Don't stand and lecture me. I know you are a real expert on all these things. Do what you want to do as Leader of the Government and don't play professor.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator at leisure will want to reread the record today and for his assistance—

Senator Frith: Don't do that. Stop making those comments telling me what I should do.

Senator Murray: I know the honourable senator—

Senator Frith: I can't stand those smarmy replies. What a pathetic performance. Stop it!

Senator Murray: You are going to take the Senate Hansard home to bed with you and you are going to want to reread the record. For your assistance—

Senator Frith: I hope also the Leader of the Government will take the Hansards home and see what a pompous ass he is. Get the job done and don't stand there lecturing, Mr. Bumble, Senator Bumble! Do what you want to do!

Senator Murray: Give me an opportunity to say—

Senator Frith: I won't give you an opportunity to lecture me on the rules or what you think I should be doing tonight with Hansard.

Senator Murray: Let me then have a word with my colleagues on this side, since my words are falling, if not on deaf ears, certainly on hostile ears on the other side. The fact of the matter is that the Leader of the Opposition is confusing the rules that apply to an allocation of time motion with the rules that apply to an Order of the Day—

Senator Frith: There you are, good children. Nod away!

Senator Murray: —with respect to which an allocation of time motion has been passed. He is quite confused about that.

Senator Frith: I can understand why those opposite are letting him lecture them.

Senator Murray: With regard to an order of the day in respect of which an allocation of time motion has been passed, we could not call it 6 o'clock, but would have to go right through. With regard to an allocation of time motion itself we are obliged to stop at 6 o'clock and come back at 8 o'clock. So I think Your Honour would want to call it 6 o'clock.

Senator Frith: If you will look at the rules, it says this is an Order of the Day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Murray, do you want me to call it 6 o'clock or do you want me to put the question?

Senator Frith: Put the question and let's get it done, and have no more lectures from Senator Murray!

Senator Murray: If it is the wish of the honourable senators opposite, then I suggest that Your Honour put the question.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I want to remind honourable senators opposite that the current rules they are talking about, and which they are trying to apply today, have been brought in without the requisite double majority of votes which the present rules and the previous rules require.

● (1720)

Therefore, these rules are invalid. The grave mistake of contempt of this "free" Parliament is being compounded.

I appeal to all honourable senators opposite to do everything they can to persuade their leader in this house to withdraw this motion of closure. It is in contempt of Parliament and against the freedom of Parliament. Every senator in this house has a right to speak until he is satisfied that he has stated all that he wishes on a certain matter. You are compounding the grave mistake made on June 18, 1991 when these rules were brought in without the required two-thirds majority.

The Hon. The Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton seconded by the Honourable Senator Atkins:

> That, pursuant to the provisions of Rule 40, in relation to Bill C-32, An Act to amend the Canada Assistance Plan, not more than six further hours of debate be allotted to the consideration of the said bill at the third reading stage;
> That, when the debate comes to an end or when the time provided for the debate has expired, as the case may be, the Speaker shall interrupt, if required, any proceedings then before the Senate and put forthwith and successively every question necessary to dispose of the remaining stages of the said bill; and
> That, any recorded vote on the said questions shall be taken in accordance with the provisions of Rule 40(4).

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. The Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before I move the adjournment of the Senate, I thought I should mention to honourable senators that the House of Commons passed two supply bills and a borrowing bill which have arrived here. We can meet tomorrow, and I am prepared to move that we meet tomorrow, for the purpose of receiving those bills and giving them first reading, in which case, under the rules, we would begin the debate on second reading on Tuesday. If it were the wish of honourable senators, we could give them first reading tonight and begin second reading on Monday and not have to come back here tomorrow. I leave it to honourable senators. I simply mention there are three bills, two supply bills and a borrowing authority, that have arrived here. The first two supply bills are matterse with which we would want to proceed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): They are here now?

Senator Murray: They are here now.

Senator Frith: We have them now.

Senator Murray: I would have to ask leave to revert to Introduction and First Reading of Government Bills in order to have second reading on Monday. If honourable senators wish, I could revert to Introduction and First Reading of Government Bills. We could do that now, not meet Friday, and come back Monday for second reading.

Senator Frith: Well, honourable senators, all that is being asked for is leave to revert. The bills are here. If the bills were not here, we would not give leave, but the bills are here. In that case, I cannot see any reason why we should not revert.

While I am on my feet, I am still so naive about these new rules. Are we not supposed to continue now with Bill C-32?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, no. There is nothing in the rules that requires us to undertake the debate on Bill C-32. Once we begin the debate on Bill C-32, we must continue with that bill until its conclusion and have a vote. It would be our intention to call Bill C-32 in time to ensure that those six hours of debate are available.

Senator Frith: Bill C-32 is not now before us?

Senator Murray: It is not. We can call it at our discretion. It is our intention to call that bill so that those six hours of debate take place before midnight on Tuesday, March 31. We now have some leeway there. If honourable senators wish to give leave to revert to Introduction and First Reading of Government Bills, we can give first reading to those three bills and come back on Monday to begin second reading.

Hon. Pat Carney: We were prepared to sit tomorrow. Are you suggesting that we will not be sitting tomorrow?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators—

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: We made a big sacrifice to stay here tonight.

Senator Murray: If honourable senators give leave to give first reading of those bills tonight, it would not be necessary for us to sit until Monday. If honourable senators do not give leave to give first reading to those bills tonight, we will meet tomorrow and give first reading to those bills then and come back Monday.

Senator Frith: What would you do on Monday when you came back?

Senator Murray: Well, I think in any case we will call Bill C-32.

Senator Gigantès: Have you just thought about this now, or do you want to think about it a little longer?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, when the Deputy Leader of the Government spoke to me about how we would be handling the supply bills, I told him then that, as far as we were concerned, we would be following the regular order of business; that is, with the normal delays and just proceeding as is normal.

My reason for saying that, quite frankly, was not an attempt to embarrass anyone, but really an attempt to again put pressure on the House of Commons. They delay things constantly and then give it to us here in the Senate. Senator Doody went through the same experience on many occasions.

Senator Frith: I went through it over there.

Senator Molgat: They just continue to proceed in the same way. At some stage, we have to stand up and say "Enough is too much". That is the reason why I said no, and that we will insist on the regular order of business.

It had been indicated to me that the bills would pass the House of Commons tonight at six and that we would therefore have to sit on Friday, on Monday and on Tuesday in order to follow the sequence. I said if that is the way it must be then that is the way it must be.

I think many of our colleagues have arranged their plans so that they would be here tomorrow and also on Monday. If we do not give leave now to revert, what will happen is that we will sit tomorrow and sit Monday. If we do give leave to revert, that does not change the order of things. We will not sit tomorrow, but, regardless, we have to sit on Monday. Monday is in the system, whatever we do. Whether there is leave to revert or no leave to revert, we sit on Monday.

In view of the fact that we will not be changing the normal sequence of notice and so on, under those circumstances I would be prepared to give leave to revert.

Senator Carney: I have a point of order. I would like to voice an objection. Because of the way that the air transport is for western senators, when we are told we will be sitting on a Friday, we make those kinds of arrangements. It is not possible to get here for a Monday sitting if you are from western Canada.

Senator Molgat: The problem is we will sit on Monday in any case. Regardless of what we do, we sit on Monday. That much is settled.

Senator Frith: Senator Carney, are you not giving leave? Are you refusing leave?

Senator Murray: Senator Carney expressed an objection.

Senator Carney: I expressed an objection on the grounds that we were told we would be here on Friday. Because of the way the planes fly, we cannot be here on Monday until about 4.30 or 5 o'clock, when the Senate has usually risen. I am just making the objection that the Senate is not taking advantage of the fact that western members like myself can be here on a Friday.

Senator Gigantès: I think we should show solidarity with Senator Carney and not give leave. Let us show solidarity with Senator Carney.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators, to revert back?

Hon. Senators: Yes.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Murray's democratic colleagues have 236 days in which to call an election. His cowardly and contemptuous of democracy colleagues have 622 days.

THE BUDGET

REVIVAL OF ECONOMY—STATEMENT OF SENATOR EVERETT

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like you to cast your minds back to what Senator Everett said the other day in his speech on the budget. He made an excellent technical speech on getting the economy started again. He talked about two ways in which this can be done. One is the supply side way, which involves higher interest rates, taxing the middle class and cutting the taxes of the rich. The other way is the demand side way, where the reverse is done. He said that both ways can work, but that there are lags in both solutions.

Of course, Senator Everett is right. The difference, however, between the two is that the one solution, the one that helps the demand side, is compassionate, while the other is a typical Tory solution because Tories care only that it doesn't cost them money.

MANITOBA

CHILD POVERTY—CLARIFICATION OF NEWSPAPER ARTICLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise today because of an article that appeared on the front page of the weekend edition of Canada's self-declared national newspaper, the Globe and Mail. It indicated that a child had died in Manitoba of starvation. I should like to set the record straight because, while the article refers to an incident that occurred some years ago, one infers from the paper that it happened recently.

The death did occur, although it was some five years ago. It was a most unfortunate circumstance. It was not a straight case of starvation. There was food available, but there was a lack of understanding as to the nutritional requirements of the child.

In my opinion, the headline gives a false impression of the situation in Manitoba. That is not to say that we do not have a problem with child poverty. We do. We have a serious problem. To my regret, I know that my province is the worst in the country in this regard. I deplore it. However, frankly, the newspaper story was inaccurate and gave a false impression.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT, 1867

125TH ANNIVERSARY OF ROYAL ASSENT

Senator Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, 125 years ago yesterday on March 29, 1867, Queen Victoria gave Royal Asset to "An Act for the Union of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and the Government thereof; and for Purposes connected therewith". The act was adopted in the House of Lords where it was first introduced on February 12, with minor amendments in the House of Commons on March 8, and with concurrence by the Lords on March 12.

I urge all colleagues to read the debates in the Lords and the Commons leading to the adoption of the BNA Act. They are filled with thoughtful insights on the purpose of the union, the role of its respective members, and the benefits expected from Confederation. They should certainly be must reading for those directly involved in current constitutional discussions.

Honourable senators, allow me to quote from the Earl of Carnarvon's speech in the Lords during second reading, he being the sponsor of the bill:

> My Lords, I now pass to that which is, perhaps, the most delicate and the most important part of this measure—the distribution of powers between the Central Parliament and the local authorities. In this is, I think, comprised the main theory and constitution of Federal Government; on this depends the practical working of the new system. And here we navigate a sea of difficulties. There are rocks on the right hand and on the left. If, on the one hand, the Central Government be too strong, then there is risk that it may absorb the local action and that wholesome self-government by the provincial bodies, which it is a matter both of good faith, and political expediency to maintain: if, on the other hand, the Central Government is not strong enough, then arises a conflict of State rights and pretensions, cohesion is destroyed, and the effective vigour of the central authority is encroached upon.

> The real object which we have in view is to give to the Central Government those high functions and almost sovereign powers by which general principles and uniformity of legislation may be secured in those questions that are of common import to all the Provinces; and, at the same time, to retain for each Province so ample a measure of municipal liberty and self-government as will allow and indeed compel them to exercise those local powers which they can exercise with great advantage to the community.

May those who today are navigating the same sea of difficulties be inspired and motivated by a similar spirit of compromise and understanding which allowed the passage of the BNA Act 125 years ago this month.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 29 residents of the province of Ontario who object to the goods and services tax. These petitions are mostly from Toronto and Mississauga.

QUESTION PERIOD

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

CURRENT NEGOTIATIONS ON ARTICLE XI—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government for an update on the current negotiations at GATT, whether in Brussels or Geneva. Perhaps, while he is commenting, he could tell us whether or not President Bush and Chancellor Kohl were able to do something to move these negotiations out of the impasse in which they seem to be.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have very much to add to what I said here last week. There is some reason to hope, as a result of Chancellor Kohl's meeting with President Bush, that the German Chancellor would use his best efforts, and not inconsiderable influence in the European Community, to try to effect a rapprochement between the positions of the United States and the EEC. Those discussions are continuing.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the GATT negotiations, everyone agrees, are hung up on the question of agricultural subsidies. Last week I was asking some questions about whether Article XI would survive in this situation.

I will make a short speech about that matter at some other time. I will not do it now.

EXPORT ENHANCEMENT SUBSIDIES—EFFECT ON CANADIAN PRODUCERS OF GRAINS AND OIL SEEDS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, today I am particularly interested in whether or not we can give any hopeful signals to the grain and oil seeds producers who have been suffering severely depressed prices because of the export enhancement subsidies that have been paid by both the European Economic Community and the United States. We are now at the beginning of the planting or seeding season for several crops, including oil seeds and grains. It would make a significant difference to the planting plans of producers if they had some indication as to what may happen when the time comes to sell the crop that will be planted in the next few days?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I am not sure what signal my honourable friend is seeking with regard to the question of agricultural subsidies. The other day, I thought I heard him suggest that the Dunkel text, as it affects the interests of the western grain producers, was unacceptable.

Senator Olson: It is unacceptable. We expected the Canadian government to advise the other countries represented at those meetings that this attempt to play off one group of producers in Canada against the others is unacceptable; in other words, it is unacceptable to say that we either accept the amended terms and conditions with respect to Article XI of the GATT, or you will not be able to effect any relief for the grains and oil seeds sector in the international market. It is up to the Canadian government to carry that message into those negotiations.

However, it is not my intention put the government or the Leader of the Government in the Senate on the spot with respect to that matter. What I am interested in is what producers can anticipate with respect to the 1992 crop of grains and oil seeds. I realise that no one can guarantee anything until the negotiations are complete.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, early in March, the Canadian government made its position clear in writing with regard to the agricultural sector: market access, internal support programs, and export competition. We made our position quite clear on that, as we have been doing for some considerable time with regard to Article XI.

As I indicated last week, Prime Minister Mulroney had been in touch with both President Bush and Chancellor Kohl before their meeting in Washington. The objective that they all seek—a successful completion of the Uruguay Round—will not be possible unless the deadlock between the United States and the Europeans is broken.

Senator Olson: I take it from that that the minister is saying that producers in Canada, Australia, Argentina or wherever cannot look forward to any improvement. In other words, you do not have any specific indication that Canada or other countries are having any success in reconciling the differences between the European Economic Community and the United States respecting export enhancement subsidies?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there is widespread agreement in the world that these subsidies have almost grown out of control.

Senator Olson: That is right. I agree.

Senator Murray: The other day, I saw a figure that in the past 10 years production subsidies had increased by 30 per cent in the OECD countries and that they now amount to something like $300 billion U.S. This is clearly a distortion of markets and a terrible drain on taxpayers and consumers throughout the industrialized countries. We continue to work for the alleviation of that situation.

The honourable senator is aware of the quite reasonable and phased reductions that were proposed in the Dunkel text. The proposals with regard to those subsidies are reasonable and a good basis for negotiations. Mr. Mayer, the Minister of State for the Wheat Board, made many of these points at a meeting of OECD countries this week.

● (1420)

To come back to the reply I gave to the first question, we have some reason to believe that the discussions between President Bush and Chancellor Kohl will at least result in some more intensive consideration by the Europeans as to their position. We believe that the Chancellor of Germany has an important role to play in Europe in effecting the kind of rapprochement between the Europeans and the United States that we all agree is desirable.

FISHERIES

DEPLETION OF COD STOCKS—FOREIGN OVERFISHING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if this government—and, more particularly, the Prime Minister—intends to take any initiative now and not wait for the Brazil conference before intervening in the serious matter of cod depletion in the Northwest Atlantic which is caused, as the leader knows, by foreign overfishing—that is, critical overfishing. It is my personal view and the view of others in this house—and I am sure Senator Marshall would not mind endorsing my words—that something has to be done now. To wait much longer could cause even greater problems.

My question is: What is the Prime Minister now doing to put a stop to this serious matter of foreign overfishing that is well beyond allowable quotas by NAFO members and others?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend could not have missed the reports that have been issued, not only in the past few days but also over a period of months, detailing the initiatives that have been taken by the government and by various ministers, notably Mr. Crosbie, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Mrs. McDougall, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as well as the Prime Minister, to exercise whatever influence we can ande apply whatever pressures we can in the world community, in particular in Europe and, more particularly, on the Spanish and Portuguese to respect reasonable quotas.

Even the quotas set by the North Atlantic Fisheries Organization are not respected by the Europeans because the Portuguese and the Spanish feel free to ignore them. We are bringing to bear whatever diplomatic and political pressure we can on all of those countries to ensure some respect for the stock, which is really some enlightened self-interest on their part because we all lose from the abuse of those stocks and their depletion.

CONTINENTAL SHELF—POSSIBLE EXTENSION OF JURISDICTION

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, those words are of little consolation to people who stand to lose their income this year, and they are a multitude. This is not a new situation; it has been developing for a number of years. A committee of this house, chaired by Senator Marshall and of which I was a member, waved the red flag on this issue some years ago. It seems that nothing has been done. Indeed, there were times when the fishing quotas were left standing as they were, thereby encouraging over- exploitation of the cod stocks. We are really concerned that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans—inasmuch as he may be agitating—is not moving much in terms of forming governmental or public opinion. We are not making the headlines in Europe, as was the case with the seal harvest some years ago.

● (1430)

Surely something dramatic has to be done. The Prime Minister can call President Bush on this and that issue, and he can talk to Soviet leaders on this and that issue, which is good for world peace and neighbourly relations. Surely he can pick up the phone and talk to two or three people in other nation states and tell them frankly what he thinks of the situation. If they do not want to abide by the rules, then Canada, I think, should take the next logical move—that is, if things do not change fast, we should extend our fishing jurisdiction to the whole of the Continental Shelf, because that is what the problem is about.

Senator Murray: I appreciate the points made by the honourable senator but he is making a proposal for what he agrees would be a dramatic gesture, the efficacy of which is undetermined if other efforts fail. I want to assure him that all other efforts are being made and have been made within the past few days. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is meeting with representatives of the government of Spain to discuss this matter. The Prime Minister has been in touch personally with the representatives of the European Community as such, and with various European national governments on the matter.

The Prime Minister intends to place this issue front and centre at the G-7 meeting in Munich in July. Therefore all of the efforts that the honourable senator would expect the Canadian government to take in Canada's interests are, in fact, being taken and pressed vigorously.

NEWFOUNDLAND FISHING FLEET—PEACEFUL DEMONSTRATION—INTERNATIONAL IMPLICATIONS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is somewhat on the same subject but slightly different. At this moment I understand that a fleet of fishing trawlers from Newfoundland is heading out to the Grand Banks. While I think their intentions are purely peaceful, when ships are at sea there could easily be collisions, particularly if there is bad weather, which might be misunderstood as aggressive action. The situation has the potential for possible serious international implications for Canada. Has the government, through the military or through other means, taken any steps to try to ensure that there are no serious difficulties?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the short answer to the question is yes. Mr. Crosbie indicated as much the other day. We do have the coastal patrols and they are available in the event that they are wanted or needed. Beyond that, I simply underline again that this is a nonviolent and peaceful demonstration on the part of the fishing industry, the fishermen, the union and the fishing companies in Newfoundland in an attempt to draw international attention to the serious plight of the North Atlantic fishery.

AGRICULTURE

PRODUCERS OF GRAINS AND OILSEEDS—GOVERNMENT SUBSIDY—FORMULA FOR PAYMENT

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Perhaps the minister would take notice of a question respecting the payment of the balance of the $700 million that the government indicated it would put up to subsidize the grains and oil seeds producers sometime either at or before seeding in 1992, I believe. I realize that an interim or preliminary payment has been made. However, at the time of that payment the producers were not aware of the terms and conditions or the formula that would be used for determining the payments. I wonder if the leader could find out now whether the formula has been fully determined and, if so, what is the amount based on that formula and when the final payment will be made?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I shall do so, honourable senators.

JUSTICE

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM—RESTORATION OF FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It goes back to questions that the Leader of the Opposition and myself asked a week ago concerning the Court Challenges Program, the funding for which was cut from the last federal budget. I wonder if the Leader of the Government, first, has received any indication from the Minister of Justice of what her response was to former Supreme Court Justice Bertha Wilson's letter concerning this matter and, second, has the minister himself presented the views of members in this house—indeed, I note that they are shared by all parties—about the restoration of funding for this unique and very successful program?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall take an early opportunity to consult with my cabinet colleague, Miss Campbell, on this matter.

Senator Fairbairn: At the same time, honourable senators, perhaps the Leader of the Government could ascertain whether the Prime Minister himself was aware of the cutting of the funding for the Court Challenges Program, or perhaps this was one of those items that from time to time slides into a budget and passes unnoticed until it is actually made public.

Senator Simard: Nothing slides through.

Senator Fairbairn: Nonsense.

Senator Simard: Not on an important document like the budget.

Senator Fairbairn: I wonder if the leader could ascertain that?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I can only tell the honourable senator that there are very intensive discussions of policy preceding the presentation of a budget by the Minister of Finance. In addition, there are numerous and quite detailed briefings of the Prime Minister personally by the Minister of Finance and his officials prior to the presentation of a budget. I think the honourable senator must assume that the Prime Minister is fully aware and supportive of the policy and details of the budget.

Senator Olson: It is the consequences we don't know about.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would hesitate to make that assumption. I find it difficult to assume that the Prime Minister would be supportive of the removal of the court challenges program. It flies in the face of policy directions he has taken over the past several years. Certainly, the cost involved in comparison to the immense advance that was made through this program would make me hesitate to make that assumption.

Senator Murray: The assertions of the honourable senator are matters for debate.

Senator Olson: You did not know you would cause a recession.

FIRST MINISTERS CONFERENCE IN TORONTO

CONSTRUCTION OF HIGHWAYS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Eymard Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he could give us more details today in response to the question I asked him last week regarding a highway construction and repair program promised further to the conference held in Toronto last week.

As I recall, in response to my question, the Leader of the Government in the Senate said that he did not have much information, much detailed information on the subject. Is he better informed today?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Not today, honourable senators.

THE BUDGET

CANCELLATION OF SCIENCE COUNCIL OF CANADA—STATUS OF STUDY ON SUSTAINABLE AGRICULTURE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In the budget the government cut out a whole series of councils and advisory bodies to the government. One of them was the Science Council of Canada.

Some two years ago the Science Council of Canada undertook a profound and serious study of Canada's sustainable agriculture. It was a very serious study looking into the future of agriculture. My honourable friend knows how important this field of activity is for Canadians; it is important, not only for those engaged in agriculture, but with respect to the food that Canadians eat.

Could the leader tell us where that study now stands? With the cancelling of the Science Council, will the work that has already gone into the study be completed? Will we be getting the results of the money already spent? What is the program?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will try to bring in a report in the next few days as to the status of projects that were under way, not only at the Science Council but at other councils such as the Economic Council of Canada, when the decision to wind down those bodies was announced.

PUBLIC WORKS

EXCLUSION OF MARITIME FIRMS FROM CONSTRUCTION OF FIXED LINK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John M. Forrestall: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a very broad, general question at this time and serve notice that it will be a matter of continuing concern, not only to myself but I am sure to other maritime senators, particularly those from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

There were reports in the Atlantic press this morning that, given the present course of events, the awarding of tenders—I am not sure of the appropriate term at this point—tenders or letters of understanding with expressed interest in building a fixed link between New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island will lead to a virtual exclusion of access to employment opportunities and material supply for Maritimers.

I am asking the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether or not he can give us some indication that the government is aware of the concerns expressed by responsible leading groups in Atlantic Canada, particularly in the Maritimes, with respect to this matter. If he is, perhaps he could respond. If he is not, perhaps he could alert himself to the situation and seek some counsel from his colleagues in government so that we might be reassured that, in the future, a maximum rather than a minimum beneficial outcome will accrue to maritime entrepreneurs, businessmen, engineers, environmentalists and all of the people who will be involved in such a massive undertaking.

To say the least, I say to the leader and colleagues, the news this morning and the questions raised over the weekend were quite startling.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I must confess that I have not seen the reports to which my honourable friend refers, nor do I understand the basis on which those fears could be engendered—fears, if I understand the honourable senator correctly, of an exclusion of maritime contractors from the work of building a fixed link.

[Senator Molgat.]

We believe that construction could start as early as this calendar year. I do not understand the basis upon which those fears could have been engendered. I will ask for a report from my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, and bring it in as soon as possible.

Senator Forrestall: Honourable senators, perhaps I could suggest to the leader that the fears are expressed primarily on the basis that the three contenders have no significant or substantial maritime base whatsoever, but rather are from central and other parts of Canada. I have no comment with respect to the validity of the concerns that are expressed. However, because they are not from Atlantic Canada, responsible Atlantic Canadians are now raising some views that are alarming, to say the least.

I would hope that the leader could, at an early opportunity either later this week or next week in response to this question or from some other platform, express the hope of the government itself that maritime businessmen and entrepreneurs will have, to the degree that it is possible, some resolution, some indication, some message, some signal that maritime businesses and the engineering community will in fact benefit from this massive undertaking.

I appreciate the Minister's response and I hesitate to pursue it any further. I recognize that perhaps he has not had an opportunity to read the comments in the press this morning.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I accept the representations of the honourable senator. He will not be surprised to know that I agree with them.

One of the objectives in encouraging work towards a fixed link to Prince Edward Island is precisely to generate the economic activity in the maritime provinces that that region is lacking at the moment. We see tremendous opportunities for existing and future, yet-to-be-created, enterprises in the maritime provinces in this project. There are opportunities within the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and its mandate to encourage local industry to be in a position to benefit from the fixed link construction, even to the point of designating a particular geographical area and bringing special measures, special government incentives, to bear in that area for that purpose. We are not without tools of our own, and the provincial governments are not without tools of their own, to ensure that local business in that region benefits to the maximum extent from this project.

Having said all that, I will ask for some more formal assurances on the matter from my colleague, Mr. MacKay.

DRAFT REPORT—DISTRIBUTION OF TEXT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, last week I asked questions regarding the distribution of the draft report on the Canada-Mexico-U.S. trade deal to the provincial premiers. I asked who had received it, who had not and when.

If the responses are in delayed answers to oral questions, I will wait.

● (1450)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The Deputy Leader of the Government has a reply to that question in the Delayed Answers.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have three Delayed Answers to Oral Questions, all on the North American free trade agreement. Two questions were asked on March 19, one by Senator Marsden regarding provincial consultations, the other by Senator Bonnell on government policy regarding briefing for parliamentarians, and one question was asked March 24 by Senator Molgat on the draft report and its availability.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

BRIEFINGS FOR OPPOSITION MEMBERS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

The Government has regularly consulted with provincial representatives. On a formal level, since the launch of negotiations last June, there have been three meetings of federal-provincial trade ministers, at which NAFTA was discussed. The federal-provincial committee of officials on NAFTA met 11 times during that same period. All provinces were also provided copies of the draft NAFTA text through their ministers for trade and received detailed briefings on the document.

In addition, there have been more informal consultations. The chief negotiator has regularly briefed the provinces on the outcomes of ministerial level NAFTA negotiations, and has chaired separate sessions on particular issues, such as services, agriculture and autos, for example. Provincial officials have also worked directly with members of the negotiating team on issues of particular interest to them.

The following is a schedule of meetings held with provincial representatives since the NAFTA talks formally began.

Drafts are released to all provinces at the same time during the meetings of provincial and federal trade officials. Texts have been distributed twice since formal NAFTA negotiations began (January 31, 1992 and February 27, 1992).

Premiers, cabinet ministers and other necessary officials have access to the drafts. The drafts and briefings are given under conditions of secrecy—a need to know basis.

The draft text Premier Filmon referred to on March 19, 1992 was the one resulting from the week of February 21, 1992—Canada-U.S. Dallas meetings.

The "Dallas" draft was provided to the Premier and all other provinces on February 27, 1992, through provincial trade officials.

BRIEFINGS FOR SENATORS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

(Response to question raised by Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell on March 19, 1992)

During the autumn and winter of 1990, the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade of the House undertook detailed hearings on the NAFTA, with the full participation of the previous minister for International Trade and his officials. Since the launching of the negotiations, the Minister for International Trade met with the Trade Sub-Committee of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade on February 12. Canada's Chief Negotiator provided a further briefing to this same Sub-Committee on March 19. Moreover, on Monday, March 30, Chief Negotiator Weekes met with the Canadian Parliamentary delegation to the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group which includes both Members of Parliament as well as Senators.

Mr. Weekes has also agreed to appear before the Senate Foreign Affairs Committee. This meeting has tentatively been scheduled for Tuesday, April 7, 1992.

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before proceeding to government business, we should all be reminded that Bill C-32 is now subject to allocation of time. Under the rules, once the debate starts, it must proceed without interruption for up to six hours. There can be no adjournment. That means that if we were to call Bill C-32 right now, one of the senators intending to speak on the bill, Senator Perrault, would not have the opportunity to do so. However, I know Senator Fairbairn wishes to speak also.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: I am ready to proceed at any moment.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Senator Fairbairn was ready to speak on Thursday, and she is still ready to speak.

May I suggest that we call the bill tomorrow, which will allow both Senator Fairbairn and Senator Perrault to speak. We can call it at about this time. If we need the six hours, we will use up the six hours. It is important to note, however, that if we agree to postpone debate until tomorrow, the vote will take place tomorrow. It will not be deferred. I leave that for discussion and decision.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have had a discussion with the Deputy Leader of the Government in this regard. I pointed out to him that Senator Perrault, who comes from one of the affected provinces, could not be here today. As you know, coming from British Columbia means leaving the day before. I suggested to the deputy leader that, instead of calling it today, if we could call it tomorrow, that would allow Senator Perrault to speak. I thank him for agreeing to that. I know of no other speakers on our side, so I see no problem in finishing tomorrow. It is certainly not my intention to call for a deferred vote.

THE ESTIMATES, 1991-92

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C) ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bolduc, seconded by the Honourable Senator Grimard, for the adoption of the Eighth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Supplementary Estimates (C) 1991-92), presented in the Senate on 25th March, 1992.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella moved the third reading of Bill C-64, An Act to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1991-92

SECOND READING

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Appropriation Bill No. 4, 1991-92.

He said: Honourable senators, the bill before us today is Appropriation Bill No. 4, 1991-92, which provides supply for all of Supplementary Estimates (C) for 1991-92. The final Supplementary Estimates for this year total approximately 1.177 billion voted dollars, while statutory expenditures are decreased by $504 million, for a net increase of $673 million. This brings the total tabled Estimates for 1991-92 to $161.3 billion. Supplementary Estimates represent approximately 2.1 per cent of the Main Estimates levels for the year.

These Estimates were tabled in the Senate on March 17, 1992, and were immediately referred to the Standing Committee on National Finance. Treasury Board officials appeared before that committee to answer questions on these Estimates on March 19, 1992. Senator Bolduc gave highlights of the committee's report last Thursday, and now we are being asked to approve $1.145 billion in budgetary expenditures, which is within the government's previously announced expenditure framework. Major items include $769 million for Agriculture Canada for reimbursement of the 1990-91 wheat and barley pool account deficits, and $63 million additional payments for legal aid and young offender contributions.

Revisions to the cost projections of certain statutory programs are also included in these Estimates. These revisions are primarily based on changes to economic assumptions and demographic factors. Major items include: a $1 billion increase in Established Programs Financing transfers to the provinces for health care and post-secondary education; $232 million in additional payments under the Canada Assistance Plan; a reduction of $473 million in anticipated transfers to seniors resulting from lower inflation rates; and, as a result of lower interest rates, a reduction of public debt charges in the amount of $1.7 billion.

There are some 52 $1 votes in these Supplementary Estimates. A listing of these votes containing additional explanations for the 17 miscellaneous votes have been provided to members of the committee.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand Leblanc: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words on Bill C-65.

Like Senator Lynch-Staunton said, this bill was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. It was recently brought back to Senate with all the necessary annex. Those were provided in particular by Treasury Board, which I want to thank for having given us the information that we requested regarding expenses or votes on an item of one dollar and also other votes to reestablish vote no. 5.

On Friday, through Senator Bolduc, we provided the details of our study on these Supplementary Estimates, the last ones for this year, and we have—

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, I apologize for interrupting Hon. senator Leblanc, but it seems to me that the simultaneous translation system does not work. My colleagues on this side of the House are complaining that they are not getting the English translation of the hon. senator's speech. I understand that the system is now working.

Honourable senators, I think it is because my pile was too thick and may prevented the interpretors from hearing my voice.

As I was saying, this is the last supplementary supply for the year ending on March 31, 1992 that the Committee on National Finance reviewed thoroughly. The Committee has received answers to all the questions asked by the senators that were present. In particular, we insisted on getting answers to the votes of one dollar that are mostly transfers between certain items of the same department. We also discussed vote no. 5 in particular, that we must refund. But now that the fiscal year will end, the monies remaining under that vote will automatically be erased and there will be a repeat for the year 1992-93.

I want to thank in particular the Treasury Board, which has provided us, as you have seen in the Debates, all the additional documents that we asked for sometime ago, in order to better understand the votes that we have to deal with. The Committee itself did not raise any particular issues. It did not ask us not to table the report. So, we have tabled the report. It may be that the content of this report did not get absolute approval from all senators. However, we must point out that it is a very good report. I am very proud of it and I thank you.

SECOND READING

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-66, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1993.

He said: Honourable senators, Appropriation Bill No. 1, 1992-93, provides interim supply for the first three months of the new fiscal year. The 1992-93 Estimates were tabled in the Senate on February 27, 1992, and immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

This appropriation bill contains $13.988 billion of "voted" items which are required to meet government expenditure requirements to the end of June while the Main Estimates are being reviewed by the various committees. A second appropriation bill will be tabled prior to June 30, 1992, to secure release of the balance of the Estimates.

This bill contains a general proportion of three-twelfths of all votes, plus additional proportions for some 35 votes. The additional proportions are required mainly to meet payments of a seasonal nature in some programs, to meet payments in accordance with certain agreements, and the need in other instances to make major payments before the end of June.

I should point out that, as usual, in no case is Parliament being asked to pass the entire amount of a vote.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. (Saurel) Leblanc: Honourable senators, Bill C-66 derives of course from the recently tabled budget which has already been referred for consideration to the Committee on National Finance but because of work already underway that had to be finished first, we have not yet started considering the new budget. However, we are trying to schedule an initial meeting with the minister for this Wednesday to kick off our review of the budget.

Of course, no objection can be raised to Bill C-66 since it is customary for the federal government to request some appropriation to be granted as soon as possible so that cheques can be issued and to ensure the continued operation of this country's finances.

So, once the Committee on National Finance has considered the new budget in full, we will gladly report back to you.

[Senator Murray.]

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1992-93

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody: moved the second reading of Bill C-61, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing on April 1, 1992.

He said: Honourable senators, I have just a few words to say at the second reading stage of the borrowing bill, Bill C-61. Under this bill, the government is requesting authority to borrow a total of $24.7 billion for the 1992-93 fiscal year.

Let me briefly summarize the highlights of the bill. It includes the three standard elements of most borrowing authorities: the financing authority to cover financial requirements for 1992-93; an amount to cover Exchange Fund Account earnings; and a contingency reserve. There are a number of technical changes to link the borrowing authority provided by the bill more closely to the fiscal year requirements, and a provision for an additional borrowing authority of $3.9 billion to cover borrowings conducted in fiscal year 1991-92 under section 47 of the Financial Administration Act:. Some of these measures bear some elaboration.

Bill C-61 provides for authority to cover the government's anticipated requirement for borrowings to meet the financial requirements that were reported in the recent budget. There is also a provision in the bill to cover Exchange Fund Account earnings. These earnings are retained in the Exchange Fund Account and are therefore not available to fund general government operations.

The $3 billion reserve provides for unforeseen contingencies related to foreign exchange transactions, seasonal swings in borrowing requirements, and delays in passing next year's borrowing authority act. I might mention that this figure of $3 billion is the same amount requested in the last five borrowing authority bills.

I referred a moment ago to an additional provision in this year's bill to cover the refunding of bills issued in 1991-92 under section 47 of the Financial Administration Act: up to a cap of $3.9 billion. If the government were to issue less than the $3.9 billion requested, the residual would be deducted from the 1992-93 authority. The 1989 act had a similar provision but without the cap.

The government's financial requirements for 1991-92 increased by $5.9 billion, as reported in the budget. Along with the $3 billion contingency reserve already provided, the government is asking through this bill for $3.9 billion of additional borrowing authority. This includes a $1 billion reserve against uncertainties associated with factors such as foreign exchange transactions. If Bill C-61 did not contain this clause, refundings of 1991-92 bills issued under section 47 authority would be charged against regular 1992-93 borrowing authority, even though the money was raised in this fiscal year.

Let me briefly highlight the technical changes in the legislation. In 1992-93, borrowing authority may only be used after the 1992-93 fiscal year begins. The borrowing authority covers the full fiscal year beginning April 1. This ensures refunding authority for the securities maturing in fiscal 1992-93 but before this bill receives Royal Assent.

Any unused borrowing authority under this bill over $3 billion will be cancelled on March 31, 1993. This preserves the government's nonlapsing reserve into the next year in the event that new borrowing authority is not provided before the beginning of 1993-94.

The similar $3 billion reserve granted in last year's borrowing authority would be cancelled, either on March 31 of this year or on the date that Bill C-61 comes into force, whichever date is later. This standard provision ensures that the $3 billion reserve cannot be carried forward after a new borrowing authority bill comes into force. However, because the government has been operating under section 47 of the Financial Administration Act: since the end of January, this provision will have no significant impact this year.

I would also like to provide the chamber with a brief status report on the government's debt operations for 1991-92 up to the end of January. About $26.8 billion in net new market debt has been issued so far this year under the domestic debt program. Marketable bonds accounted for $14 billion of this total, and 78 per cent of these were sold at auction. This has proved to be a cost-effective method of distributing bonds. By the end of January, the sale of Treasury bills had raised $10.25 billion in new funds.

Also, last fall's Canada Savings Bond campaign, with bonds bearing interest at 7 and a half per cent, resulted in total sales of $9.6 billion. This was an increase of $2.9 billion from last year. Once the CSBs matured or redeemed in that period were taken into account, the campaign yielded a net amount of about $3.5 billion. Taking into account all redemptions so far in the fiscal year, the stock of CSBs outstanding has increased by about $2 billion. Canada Savings Bonds represent more than 10 percent of federal market debt outstanding.

Honourable senators, it is my intention to refer this bill to the Standing Committee on National Finance at the appropriate time. I am sure that the officials who appear at that committee hearing will be only too pleased to answer any technical questions honourable senators might have.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On the motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned to the next sitting of the Senate.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Oliver, seconded by the Honourable Senator Di Nino, for the second reading of Bill S-8, An Act to regulate the manufacture and importation of motor vehicles and motor vehicle equipment to reduce the risk of death, injury and damage to property and the environment.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Oliver moved this bill and Senator Graham spoke to it on our behalf. I would just like to add a few comments which I think are important in this particular case, following upon Senator Graham's words.

Bill S-8 bill originates here in this house. It has had no study in the House of Commons, and so it is very important for us to do the basic study on this bill in depth, and then to send it to the House of Commons with any necessary proposed changes included in it. That means we must be prepared to spend time on the bill to ensure that we obtain input from all possible interested parties.

We have been trying to identify the parties who might have an interest or who could give us some valuable information in this regard. In general terms, I can think of, for example, the automobile manufacturers themselves, and there are a number of them in Canada; the labour unions involved in the automotive industry; the Canadian Automobile Association, which represents many of the automobile users in Canada, may have views on this; consumer groups who may have a different view on what we are trying to do with this bill; environmental groups who have an interest in emission controls in particular; and safety agencies who have a general interest. I believe there is also a particular safety agency dealing with highway safety.

I think it is important that we advise these people that the bill is before us, that the main study will be done here in the Senate, and invite them to look at the bill and let us know whether they wish to appear before our committee.

We have asked the Library of Parliament to identify for us some particular groups who might have something to say. I have given you the general terms. The Library of Parliament recommends some very specific groups. For example, STOP, which is a 22-year-old citizens' environmental group based in Montreal who have played a leading role in the area of motor vehicle air pollution control. Another one is the Canadian Acid Rain Foundation. This group is very much concerned with motor vehicle emissions and the prevention of SO_2 release and ground level ozone formation.

The Library advises us that, through their sister organization in the United States, they are up to date on current American Legislation. They are interested in the potential implications of harmonized Canada-U.S. legislation.

Another group recommended is the Windsor & District Clean Water Alliance. Although the title might lead you to believe that this is an environmental group interested only in water safety, they are also very much involved in motor vehicle issues.

Those are some of the specific and the general groups. We do not want, by any means, to add more burden to the Transport committee which already has a pretty heavy load on its deck, but since we are the first to deal with the bill, it is very important that we do a very good job on it and that we contact all of these groups.

I suggest we distribute the bill widely to these groups, if that has not already been done, and give them sufficient time to look at it so that they are not rushed into coming to us with their recommendations. I would hope that when we are finished with the bill, we will send to the House of Commons a perfect package, a package that they will have no reason to question or to change, and which would be to the credit of the Senate. I know we can do it. We have done it before. However, we need to give ourselves the time and the resources to do it. That is my recommendation.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to inform the Senate that if the honourable Senator Oliver speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of the bill.

● (1520)

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I appreciate the remarks of Senator Molgat. The remarks could be repeated when the bill goes to the Committee on Transport and Communications in order that the chairman of the committee can consider the views of all members of this chamber as to who ought to be brought forward to give some assistance and to make representations on the bill. Your general suggestion of having the bill widely circulated is a very good one and I am sure that the chairman of the committee will take that into consideration.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this be bill be read the third time?

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On motion of Senator Oliver, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer, seconded by the Honourable Senator Ross, for the second reading of Bill C-13, An Act to establish a federal environmental assessment process.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I understood that this was adjourned by the honourable Senator Kenny. He is presently on an official trip with one of the committees but I believe that he had the agreement of the mover of the bill that it would be left in his name until his return, which I think will be on Wednesday or Thursday at the very latest. Anyone who wishes to intervene, of course, is quite welcome to do so.

Order stands.

THE BUDGET

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the Budget presented by the Honourable Don Mazankowski, P.C., Minister of Finance.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, the pleasure and satisfaction of talking about the government's budgetary measures increase year after year, because I realize more and more, like the Canadian public, that the direction it gives to the economy since it took office in 1984, is proving to be right, profitable and far-sighted. It is clear that this government did away long ago with short term solutions.

We said many times that the federal government's deficit had to be contained. Gone are the years where current account spending exceeded revenues, something which generates deficits and borrowing to be repaid by our children. To borrow to invest is understandable, but to borrow to buy your daily bread is unacceptable. How could we, with a clear conscience, ask future generations to pay, for example, for health care we were providing today.

We are seeing the fruit of the Mulroney government's efforts and we can now envision the day when our federal budget will be fully balanced and we will be able to start repaying the debt left over by Liberal governments.

[English]

This budget has been well received by the population, by the business community, by the financial institutions, by many groups and by the press. On the front page of the Globe and Mail, readers could see "Budget Gives Taxpayers a Break". The front page of the Telegraph Journal read, "PCs Deliver Good News Budget".

[Translation]

L'Acadie nouvelle was saying: "Mazankowki makes some people happy".

[English]

I do not recall such a positive and almost unanimous reaction to any federal budget. In my opinion this proves that the population recognizes the necessity for fiscal restraint as it has been implemented by this government.

[Translation]

The New Brunswick Finance Minister, a Liberal cabinet minister, the honourable Maher, (this should be of interest to Senator Corbin) also applauded to the initiatives put forward in this budget, and I want to point out his support in particular.

By the way, it should be noted that, as regards tax matters at least, the province of New Brunswick and the federal government are on the same wavelength.

Honourable senators, we must recognize that the reason this budget is so widely supported is that it is based on the consultation process put in place by the government and that it accurately reflects the advice received during those consultations carried out over a period of nine months in which participated Canadians from all walks of life.

Canadians want realistic, lasting solutions. Government responded by maintaining its policy of looking for long-term solutions instead of depending on sporadic programs and capital expenditures to create temporary jobs.

The Canadian people recognize the need also to control expenditures and cut the deficit. Government responded by cutting spending once more for the current fiscal year and committed to continue over the next five years, with no corresponding cut in services. Defence spending is cut for instance.

Canadians also want—they told us so—a more efficient government. So, this budget responds to these demands for a streamlined government. As a matter of fact, measures have been announced to either privatize, eliminate or consolidate 46 government organizations.

Canadians also want assurances regarding training to be prepared to meet tomorrow's job requirements. Among other things, additional assistance is provided to post-secondary students. The Canadian people feel that we should assist Canadians with disabilities, and the federal budget contains specific measures for them.

Canadians have often formulated the wish that social programs should better meet basic needs and be targetted at the most needy people. The Budget is a social investment. It proposes the most important reform in social benefits of the last ten years. The new system is geared to family and children, and it is targetted at those whose income is the lowest. Benefits could reach $144 per month and per child, which represents $1,733 per year.

Canadians wanted a tax reduction, and the Budget provides precisely that: a reduction of the 1 per cent surtax as of January 1994.

So, The Budget was well received because it meets the legitimate expectations and wishes of Canadians.

Even if the government did not accept the suggestions made by the NDP and the Liberal party to invest massively in public works to stimulate the economy, as was done in the past, the present government recognizes existing needs and is willing to participate in necessary and viable projects. I can think of the fixed link with Prince Edward Island, as well as the will of the Mulroney government, as the Progressive Conservative members and senators from New Brunswick were hoping, to negotiate an arrangement with our province to repair the Trans-Canada highway. I am convinced that Senator Corbin will be pleased to hear, once again, about this will to proceed as quickly as possible, since he made a request to that effect last week and, I believe, earlier today.

This ambitious project to repair the Trans-Canada highway in New Brunswick, which could cost as much as $2 billion, will have a considerable economic impact, both in the short and long terms. The benefits of that project will be felt by the provincial contractors, as well as the provincial and national travelling publics.

The government wants first to ensure that any new project will have a real economic impact.

Economic recovery may have seemed, and indeed was, slow but Canada is not the only country in that situation. However, we will come out of it stronger than ever, and for a long time, thanks to the measures implemented. The progressive reduction of the surtax and the increase from 25 to 30 per cent of the capital cost allowance rate for manufacturing and processing machinery will pump millions of dollars into the economy in the years to come.

Unless one is totally partisan, it must be recognized that the government has succeeded very well in bringing interest and inflation rates, as well as the Canadian dollar, to more favourable levels. These essential elements of the economic recovery are now giving the Canadian industry a chance to be more competitive on international markets. Results are bound to follow, in fact, more than 500,000 jobs are expected to be created this year.

● (1530)

[English]

Senators, it is not by throwing massive sums of money around that economic prosperity is achieved in the long run; these solutions are of the past and belong to the past. We just cannot borrow to satisfy our needs and ask our children, future generations, to pay for luxuries afforded ourselves.

That policy advocated by the Official Opposition and its political and traditional allies, the NDP, is a policy of the past and can only result in the "one step forward - two steps backward" tune. Other half-baked policies of the Official Opposition such as the fact that a future potential Liberal government would renegotiate the free trade agreement and would chop the GST are irresponsible solutions that could only lead to economic instability for our manufacturing sector as well as to greater costs for all Canadian retailers.

Senator Molgat is taking notes, and I am sure he will remind his party that—

Senator Molgat: That is exactly what I am doing.

Senator Simard: —the Canadian electorate deserves better alternatives from the Olsons, MacEachens, Andre Ouellets, Jean Chrétiens and others, the same people who were ministers in years-gone-by Liberal governments, who are the present Liberal Party thinkers and who are aspiring to form this "new" future Liberal government.

[Translation]

The Leader of the Liberal Party, Jean Chrétien, told us a few days ago that he was tired of the constitutional debate and did not want to talk about it anymore.

Honourable senators, that eloquently shows how limited his perception is. Does he not know that the climate of political uncertainty directly influences those who have a major role to play in the economic recovery?

Does he not know that the constitutional question must be resolved as soon as possible for the sake of Canadians' welfare and prosperity? Realistic Canadians know very well that we must keep on talking about the constitutional question until it is resolved favorably.

I for one hope that Mr. Chrétien's recent statement will be beneficial because it will at least help to remind us that he and his party were largely responsible for the constitutional fiasco in 1981 and the death of the Meech Lake Accord ten years later.

Honourable senators, in this debate, I cannot overlook the position taken by the Premier of Ontario. What a change of attitude from his predecessors! They were recognized as mediators on the national scene, pillars of federalism. They were eager to help the other provinces through Ontario's contribution to the federal government's distribution system. Unfortunately, the policy has changed.

Now the Premier of Ontario and his government talk about what they can get out of the federal government. Of course Ontario has some difficulties but they are no more serious than those that the Atlantic provinces or some Western provinces have had for many years. The recession has hit the United States, we agree, and that is part of our problem. However, we cannot blame the President of the United States for all our problems—we all know that.

That is why our government has preferred to implement new policies and new directions for future prosperity. Old remedies that have been taken out of mothballs or the unproven remedies of the Liberals and the NDP's complaints do not provide the solutions needed for today's problems.

When Premier Bob Rae of Ontario was asked whether he would apply to recipients of his transfer payments the same policy that the federal government was applying to the provinces, he answered, "We can't pass pass on something we don't have." Well, Mr. Rae, neither can the federal government increase its transfer payments since it cannot afford to. The Ontario premier talks about a social charter without knowing what it might cost!

Mr. Rae should do what his colleagues in the other provinces and the federal government are doing, namely rein in his province's spending.

Honourable senators, I will not list or read out all the measures contained in the 1992 Budget. You had an opportunity to find out about them in the media and in the documentation made available to you.

[Senator Simard.]

I will therefore conclude by repeating my enthusiasm and my satisfaction at reporting on the progress made in managing the federal finances since 1984 and pointing out how successful this management has been.

The policies in place, the fight against inflation which has been partly, if not fully, won, affordable interest rates for long-term investments, sounder national finances, a Canadian dollar at a more competitive level, are all ingredients of a recipe that will certainly lead to an economic recovery that will create jobs and prosperity for all Canadians. Thank you, honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned until next sitting of the Senate.

CANADA DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO CONDUCT PRE-STUDY

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Simard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doyle:
> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject-matter of Bill C-48, An Act to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Kirby last week outlined why we feel that this matter should not proceed to prestudy. He made a very good case, following Senator Lynch-Staunton's proposed rules for prestudy, that this of all bills did not qualify. Senator Kirby referred to Mr. Justice Estey's comments and that Mr. Justice Estey was not at all in favour of this bill.

I thought I should put on the record some of Mr. Justice Estey's specific statements. He refers to the bill when he is being asked a question about it.

> "I don't want it thought they're doing what I recommended, because they're not," Estey said in an interview yesterday.
> "That is like saying, 'Well, I painted your car, just like you asked.' But you painted it green and orange with spots all over when I wanted it black."

Then he proceeded to write a letter to the House of Commons Finance Committee Chairman, Mr. Murray Dorin. In that letter, he urges the adoption of "necessary vital additions" to the legislation.

Later on:

> The problem, as Estey sees it, is that the new legislation fails to provide regulators with the tools needed to do that.

Honourable senators must understand why it is that Mr. Justice Estey is saying these things. He was asked by the government to do a study on two bank failures in Western Canada. As a result of that, he made a report to the government, and the government says that Bill C-48 is coming out of that report. Estey is telling us clearly that that is not so.

He goes on to say, and he is referring here to the Alberta bank failures:

> "When there's an explosion, the soot falls on everybody," Estey said.
> But as it stands, bill C-48, "is just a funny little skeleton without any muscles or meat on it."
> And "with (its) passage . . . the Canadian public will be left with the prospect of facing another financial debacle without any more protection within our community than in 1985 when the Alberta banks collapsed". . . .

● (1540)

Later on in this same article, Mr. Justice Estey said:

> . . . the CDIC, whose board is composed entirely of bureaucrats, also needs to employ more industry representation if it is to successfully carry out its new responsibilities.

Mr. Justice Estey then goes on to state:

> No other jurisdiction I've investigated has excluded that kind of know-how from its regulatory agency.

Here we have a situation where the government says that Bill C-48 is as a result of the study by Mr. Justice Estey, who spent a good deal of time on this matter at a very critical period when there was a lot of concern about the stability of the Canadian banking system. He made these recommendations. The government says, "We will prepare a bill". They come out with Bill C-48, and this is Mr. Justice Estey's reply.

What will we be faced with? We will be sending this bill for pre-study, clearly a bill that is not satisfactory; a bill that, the Chairman of the House of Commons Finance Committee agrees is not good; a bill that will require a whole lot of changes. Where will we be then? It would be much more sensible for the government to withdraw the bill let us deal with Bill C-48 as a bill in the first instance as we are doing with Bill S-8. Give us the responsibility, because we have the capacity here in the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee to undertake that study.

For us to study a bill that the House of Commons will amend in the process, and where the originator of the ideas for the bill clearly says that it is wrong, is going the wrong way. The bill needs a lot of rework. The Senate is the proper place to do it, but it is foolish to have the House of Commons presently studying it and probably making amendments to it while we are doing the same thing here. Let us put it in one place and do the job properly.

I submit that the House of Commons should withdraw the bill, reintroduce it here as a new bill, and allow the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to deal with the bill and do a proper job. However, pre-study of the bill at this stage, when the House of Commons might well change the bill, is the wrong way to go.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, I am very happy that Senator Molgat raised as many questions as he did. In fact, it is for that very reason that we are requesting a prestudy.

You will remember, honourable senators, that Senator Kirby based all of his presentation on the fact that he did not understand what was the basic principle underlying that bill and that he thought it would probably change.

During the senator's presentation, the minister of Finance and his officials were sending to our members on the committee and to the other House a series of amendments, some 20 pages long, that Senator Kirby knew about. Failing the publication of the study, these amendments were prepared in response to the demands of Justice Estey, to the requests of the bankers' association, etc.

In fact, I think it is the fundamental reason for our request and the reason why I agree with the prestudy. These are major elements of modification and, before they are adopted as is, I believe, as does Senator Molgat, that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce can add some more changes and that, in so doing, we will have contributed to the making of a better legislation. As things stand today, it seems to me the study of those amendments is essential because we must understand them better in order, if necessary, to suggest improvements.

That is the essence of our request Senator Molgat. Allow me not to agree with you. I feel it would be in the best interest of the Senate that we have an input in this if we want that bill to become the best legislation possible in the matter.

Senator Molgat: Will Senator Poitras allow me one question?

Senator Poitras: Of course, Senator Molgat.

Senator Molgat: Senator Poitras, would it not be more logical to first study this bill in the Senate and then to let the committee do exactly as you proposed?

What will happen now is that you will submit a series of amendments which will probably go directly to the minister who will present them to the House of Commons which, in turn, will send us a bill modified according to the work done by the Senate Committee. I will admit this will improve the legislation but it will do nothing for the Senate!

It ensues that the Senate always seems to be inactive. In fact, it is working very efficiently, but the other House always gets the credit. It is not a question of publicity or anything like that. It is about the importance of the work done in the Senate, in my opinion. It would be more logical for the bill to be first studied here and for you to review it. I know you would do such a study very well; therefore the end result would be a bill with a better substance than the proposed one.

Senator Poitras: Honourable senators, I think we must not overlook the necessity of such a legislation given the very difficult situations that arise in the finance industry. Many more are developing and we must increase our control.

This bill is now in the other House, ready for third reading. If we had to start over, I believe this would create delays, which is not in our common interest. We could have gone that route. But since this is the way things are, I suggest that we carry on from here.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honorable senators, I listened with great interest to Senator Molgat's comments and Senator Poitras'answers.

It is obvious that these two honorable senators, who hold such diametrically opposite views, will never find some common ground. However, as Senator Molgat so rightly observed, the Senate has traditionally considered, studied and debated in detail that kind of bill in this Chamber.

With a bill of this kind, the Senate has always played an essential, if not a paramount role. I wonder why this government wishes to go against tradition by refusing the Senate an opportunity to deal first with a question which it knows far better than the members of the House of Commons.

A quick look at the Senate's history will reveal that it is in this Chamber that the most attention has always been given to that type of bill. I challenge anyone to prove the opposite.

Something happened. I think that the problem is due to the fact that the government, which has a majority in both the House of Commons and the Senate, simply wants to impose its views, set up its own timetable, hear the least possible comments from the public and its critics and ram through its this bills at its discretion.

I have not heard a single comment from honourable senators opposite which would lead me to conclude that we are first and foremost concerned with the public's interest. We speak here today to espouse the government's interests, and not to protect the public's interest. I have not heard a single comment from my colleagues opposite in this regard.

For example, I have just received at noon a press release from the minister of National Revenue, who intends to dip into personal insurance policies. These funds have always been sacred. The savings component of insurance policies has always been sacred, inalienable, which no government has ever dared touch because these funds were set aside for retirement.

This is money invested over the years by Canadian citizens, out of their net income. Here is a government that now wants to dip into these funds, and bleed the canadian taxpayers even more.

This is no doubt a proposal that the Senate should study first. I would say that, an the face of it, I would be tempted to object to what the government is doing but I am prepared to give them time to further explain their actions.

The taxpayer has now reached a point where there is no breathing space left in his savings, in his insurance policies or anything else. In this particular matter, an Act to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act, it seems to me that Canadians, male, female, single, married, have the right to voice their views.

[Senator Poitras.]

Judge Estey, which Senator Molgat has quoted, also has the right to be heard. I have the feeling that it is because such a well-known personality has raised his voice that the government is accelerating the process in order to exert more pressure on the Opposition, both in the House of Commons and in the Senate, to push its bill through before the alarm rings in this place.

Senator Poitras may shake his head all he wants, but he should be careful not to dislocate it. I heard his kind words, expressed as always in a holy tone of voice which I always find so moving! I know he is not telling the whole truth. I am not saying that he lies, I would not dare. It would not be parliamentary.

He has a knack, just like Senator Simard a moment ago, to highlight the bright side of the picture while obfuscating the other. This other side is where the interest of Canadians lies and the official Opposition takes Canadian interests at heart.

That is why I support Senator Molgat's position.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable Senators, I must advise you that if Senator Simard rises to speak, this will have the effect of ending the debate on this motion.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable Senators, I wish to add a few words only.

I think my colleague, Senator Poitras, covered the whole matter in answer to Senator Molgat's question. I certainly do not wish to reiterate the points I made last week when the motion requesting a pre-study was introduced.

Even Senator Molgat must agree, I feel, that although we all recognize Judge Estey's high degree of competence and impartiality, it remains up to the government to make decisions.

● (1550)

Honourable senators, given the urgency of the situation, we must then insure that new and more efficient mechanisms are provided for the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation.

So the government decided to proceed as it did. Its request to speed the study of this bill so that it could be reintroduced to the Senate is totally acceptable. As I was going to say, of course, the government cannot answer and probably did not answer all requests and suggestions made by Judge Estey. I think it acted on several of his recommendations.

Unfortunately, I did not read the 20 pages of amendments that were released last week and on which the committee in the other place will have to vote clause by clause tonight. I was just informed about that a few minutes ago. So, these amendments are in the public domain. They were agreed to in committee and the committee will report to the House.

I would be surprised that the Government would rush the proceedings in the other House and get third reading to-morrow or the day after. So this means it could give us time to look at the amendments. If the motion for a pre-study should pass, we could begin our work. Should it be the wish of committee members, Mr. Justice Estey and all interested parties or those who could contribute to this debate will have the opportunity to do so.

With all the goodwill in the world, the Government cannot always agree to the recommendations made by experts, even when it is Mr. Justice Estey.

So for all those reasons, in my opinion, it would not be responsible to start the whole process again as it might cause considerable harm to people with savings in troubled institutions. I can tell you that some members of your committee on several occasions have met with the Minister who simply listened to some concerns expressed by the public and by us. I hope I can find some amendments prompted by those criticisms.

Honourable senators, I urge you to support this motion to enable us to work and take all the time we need for Senator Corbin's inner peace and peace of mind. I can say that there are honourable senators on both sides of this House who care for the saving of the Canadian people.

Ten or fifteen years ago, when the committee was chaired by a most distinguished senator, Senator Hayden, I heard the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce referred to as the bank shareholders committee. Whether it was true or not at the time—I have no way of knowing—it is certainly not the case now.

I am among those who have had the opportunity to question witnesses and to often offer comments to the effect that the days when bankers practically wrote the banking legislation in this country are definitaly over and gone. I think that both sides of the House will agree on that. Members of the committee and their staff are able to protect the public and to do the best job possible.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: The Honourable Senator Simard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Poitras, moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject-matter of Bill C-48, An Act to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

Is it your pleasure, Honourable senators, to adopt this motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the report of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, dated 28th February, 1992 (Sessional Paper 343-4(16A).

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, last Wednesday, Senator Buchanan, who was a principal actor in the debates and negotiations that led to the constitutional revision of 1982, in answering questions raised by me, said that he, and most people in this chamber, did not think that the government of Mr. René Lévesque could have signed that Constitution without its resulting in that government's disintegration in the National Assembly.

After all, Mr. Lévesque's followers included many who were not for sovereignty association, but for independence; not for a renewed federalism, but for tearing down the Canadian federation. Since he was the leader of this disparate group, Mr. Lévesque could not very well put them through the difficult hoop of accepting a renewed federalism.

I said last time, and I hope honourable colleagues will forgive me if I repeat it because it is important, that what the 1982 Constitution did was bring back to Canada the right to amend the Constitution, give to individual citizens in Canada certain guarantees in a charter of rights so that when constitutional changes were made with the new amending formula, individual citizens would have some rights that could only, with very great difficulty, be touched by governments—not just provincial governments; provincial and federal.

The last step then was, with these new tools, to proceed to a redistribution of powers in order to adapt the federation of Canada to the new demands brought upon it by technology, by changes in the world economy. But this last stage did not take place, because the government of Quebec, a principal, interested, party, refused to participate in this last change and refused to sign the Constitution of 1982.

Both the government of Quebec at the time and the National Assembly of Quebec voted against signing the 1982 Constitution. I do not regard this as the act of people who were being capricious or destructive. They were, as we all are, prisoners of their past history, prisoners of their myths; we all are prisoners of our myths.

There are certain myths that are terribly important and which are not taken into account often enough. One is a myth that all conquered people have. Those who are of English descent or assimilated British descent, that is, Scottish, Irish, and Welsh, who feel comfortable in their English domination, do not understand this. They really do not. They have never been conquered. They happen to be one of the few western nations that have not known in their history a foreign conquest—not unless we go back to 1066.

There is a trauma that conquest imposes, which time does not seem to heal regardless of how many centuries pass. It sits there gnawing at the stomach of the conquered.

In Quebec, as in many of the countries of Europe which won their liberation in the 19th century and in those which have won it quite recently, school teachers, sometimes in hiding, taught the ancient myths of their formerly independent state. Gibbon, the great British historian, taunted the Greeks when they were under the Turks for having fallen so low after having been the people who raised high the torch of western civilization. That taunt by Gibbon was used by the dependent and conquered Greeks as a taunt to throw at one another and generate among them a war of independence which came to fruition in 1829. So that myth remains.

There are other myths. Trade unions in Quebec are, by and large, anti-anglo-Canadian. Some of that is due to the fact that when the trade unions were rising the bosses were anglo-Canadians; the fight was against the bosses. The bosses are now franco-Canadians, but put the language, the myth I told you about previously, and the memories together—the memories being that, generally, the foreman was unilingual Anglophone and the worker was unilingual Francophone—and it is a culture of workers versus bosses in Quebec that is different from the rest of Canada. Suspicion of the boss and fear of oppression by the boss exist also in English Canada and in the United States. However, in English Canada, a worker could defend himself, explain himself to the foreman. In Quebec, often a worker could not. Therefore, the unions today in Quebec have an anti-boss culture which has translated itself into an anti-anglo-Canadian culture.

The political establishment and the media of Quebec today, which is a very unclerical society, are really intellectually the descendants of those priests who rose in their village churches and preached the freedom of the French-speaking North Americans from the subjugation of English-speaking North Americans. Here they are, these defrocked priests, or people who would have been priests, writing in the press, speaking on the radio and television, and fighting for this freedom—this myth.

It may be easy to condemn, but during the years of Turkish occupation the Greeks had the myth of Alexander the Great. There is a long poem in which it is said that a mermaid would stop ships at sea to say, "Does Alexander the Great live?" If the sailor was imprudent and said, "No, he is dead," the mermaid would sink the ship. If he said, "Yes, he is alive and he rules the world," she would let the ship pass. This was the myth of the resurgent Greeks getting their freedom.

We have these myths, and myths make it difficult to get facts across. Myths make it difficult for people who have been brought up with them to believe those who do not share the same myth. Myths make for such songs as the one by Claude Gauthier called "Le grand six pieds", or the big six-footer. In that song a six-foot tall Quebec worker has problems with his foreman who, of course, is a unilingual anglophone. The big six-footer picks up a four-by-four and breaks the head of the anglophone foreman. The foreman is buried in a cheap pine coffin. In Quebec, audiences, especially among the young, get up to this day to cheer when that song is sung. This is the sort of thing we are facing.

There are other modern Quebecers who say, "I'll believe what you tell me about figures, yes. Quebec will suffer after separation, whether because it takes time to replace structures that will go down, or because there will be bitterness which will disrupt normal trade and normal economic exchanges. Whatever it is, I grant that Quebec will suffer, but there is a price to pay." These young people say, "But to have independence makes that price worthwhile."

One then answers them with the remark, "But in the modern world, independence no longer means what it meant in the nineteenth century." The most separatist of the "indépendantistes" in Quebec want economic ties with Canada. There will be Canada on both sides of it. The minute that is taken into account, it is realized that limits must be placed on the freedom of foreign commercial dealings, and that curbs must be placed on what is done to the environment. The rights of others cannot be disregarded to cross territory by air in peacetime—peaceful transit as it is known. All these things take the notion of nineteenth century independence and transform it into something that is more a label than a reality.

The independent nations of the European Community are now creating binding ties which will make that community resemble Canada, strangely enough, in the not too distant future. Regional economic development is now done through decisions of the European Parliament—not by national parliaments but by the European Parliament which decides to send subsidies to southern Italy, to parts of Portugal or to parts of Greece.

There will be a common currency. Tariff barriers are gone. Non-tariff barriers will be abolished this year. If it does not take place this year, then it will be done next year. There are all these problems of standards. Some things can be kept out of a country by saying that it is not up to standard. There was even the risible problem as to when an English sausage is a sausage.

I say to these young people that all they are talking about is a label. It is the same shirt. It will be made by the same people in Hong Kong. I say, "You just want to put one of those labels that says 'Independent' on it. It will cost you an awful lot of money, just as the same shirt, if it comes to you with a plain, ordinary label or no label at all, will cost you $20. If 'Christian Dior' is on the identical shirt, then you will pay three times the price."

They say, "I know what you are saying, but the label is worth it". Why is the label worth it?

If you are a Deputy Minister of a provincial government and you have to deal with an Anglo who is a Deputy Minister of a federal government, then the idea that he is superior to you will gnaw at your stomach. You want to be on a plane equal to him. If you are a provincial minister and he is a federal one, or a federal Prime Minister, then he calls the meetings which you have to attend.

If you were born into this myth, it matters. That is why we have a serious problem. That is why this terrain is one in which fools rush in where angels fear to tread.

Honourable senators may not have noticed that in this terrain I have been scrupulously non-partisan and non-critical. Let us give a charitable interpretation to what the party opposite has done. Let us say it did what the British have always done, which is to co-opt the people I am talking about, the elites of Scotland, Wales and Ireland, bringing a firebrand into the establishment, sending him to Oxford on a scholarship, getting him elected to the House of Commons where he might become a minister in His Majesty's cabinet. He is co-opted.

If we want to be charitable, and I do not want to take positions, let me be nice to members opposite. Let me be charitable and say that, perhaps, Mr. Mulroney was trying to do the same thing when, in 1984, he said to himself, "I will co-opt many of these nationalists and bring them into my party and give them positions of power, just as Trudeau did in many ways. Let French power continue in Ottawa. Perhaps that will not only give me political victory, it will give me an instrument that is the political organization of nationalists, which will give me a large number of seats in Quebec. Maybe that, in turn, will defuse this crisis. It will defuse this harsh feeling these people have in their bellies."

I would like to point out to Senator Simard, who has just come into the chamber, that here am I—and you all know me, I really have a big mouth—being moderate, understanding, non-partisan, for the sake of the country. I do not attack his leader on constitutional issues. He attacks mine. Yet my leader wants to solve the problem every bit as much as does his leader. I could say—and I could make a very good case—that a large part of the problem was created by your government. I do not want to do that. I am saying, this is a terribly difficult, dangerous, delicate area. All partisan discourse should be dropped, and it should be dropped as well by people like Senator Simard. Otherwise, we will not have a Canada.

Those who oppose Canada in Quebec are in the grip of "the myth," and when you are in the grip of the myth, there is not very much you can say except to attack any attempt that would make your journey towards independence come off the rails.

Senator Beaudoin produces a report with Mrs. Dobbie who insists that it is the Dobbie-Beaudoin report. Senator Beaudoin insists it is the Beaudoin-Dobbie report, and we in the Senate, of course, agree with him. What does that report say? It is an attempt to recognize that a federation has to evolve. It recognizes that Quebec wants a different status than do some of the poorer provinces. The poorer provinces are very worried that if the Constitution is changed, Article 36, Part III of the 1982 Constitution will somehow go by the board. They will be allowed to suffer economically. They will get no help to keep their services at a decent national level. They say this can only be done if we have a strong central federal government which collects enough money to redistribute it. This is becoming more complicated than it used to be two or three years ago because Ontario is now suffering. I will even restrain my partisan instincts and not claim that Ontario's problems are to some extent due to your government.

However, there are problems. The poorer provinces, the Maritimes, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, are very worried that the federal government may become weaker and poorer to the extent that it will not be able to help them anymore. They are, of course, opposed to the idea that the extra powers wanted by Quebec should be given to every province. So how do we get out of that?

Faced with the demand by every province to be recognized as equal to any other province, what do we do? We do not want trouble. We want to get at least seven premiers agreeing to the change. But Mr. Getty says Alberta will not be a province that is in any way lesser than any other province. That means, "If anybody has a veto, I have a veto." Mr. Wells says the same thing.

That already leaves eight provinces. British Columbia says, "I cannot be treated as part of a region. I am a region in myself." We are down to seven. This has become very dicey, and very difficult.

Therefore, Senator Beaudoin and his committee cohorts from all three parties came up with the central idea that all provinces will be offered the same rights. I disagree with what you proposed on the Senate. I will make a five-minute speech on that, perhaps, later on. However, to continue, the proposal is that all provinces will be offered everything that is offered to any other province. But not all provinces are required to adopt the proposal if they do not wish to do so. Those provinces that worry about the federal government losing too many jurisdictions because those provinces would then suffer, they need not take up those jurisdictions. Other provinces might take them up, but the principle that the rich provinces should pay for the poorer ones would remain.

There are some jurisdictions that are not totally transferable to anybody. I was giving an example in La Presse the other day about a New Brunswick power station that would not have scrubbers. It was to burn coal, and the toxic fall-out would go into the Gaspé. This is environment. This is energy. The electricity from this power station would be sold to the United States—that is international trade. Are we talking federal? Are we talking provincial? What is it?

We in the Liberal Party propose that, in cases like that, there would be a device saying: We will proclaim some jurisdictions concurrent and give the preponderance to the provinces.

There is another trap connected with this: the trap of the grocery list. Here is your list; here is my list. Go to the grocery store. You buy the oil and the tomato paste, I will buy the noodles. Well, countries are not grocery shopping expeditions.

The Allaire report is a grocery list. That was one of our traps. It was put there at the beginning because Leon Dionne and various others said, "Let us ask the maximum so that we can retreat", whereas at Meech Lake we asked the minimum and we did not get it. So we produced the maximum, with suggestions like this. With the myth-makers who want an independent Quebec, the maximum has become the minimum.

But a grocery list approach to Constitution making does not make sense. Everybody understands that. The myth-makers themselves understand it. This is the Trojan horse. If they can sell Allaire as the minimum acceptable, they can embarrass a sufficient number of legislators in the National Assembly of Quebec, and they make anything less than the Allaire solution unacceptable. Well, the Allaire solution would not work in an organization of states such as the European Community. There would be no European Community with that kind of premise.

So the Beaudoin-Dobbie report was criticized in the Quebec press by those enthralled by the myth before they read it. It was obvious from some of the articles that they did not know what the report contained. I was interviewed by many of them and they had not read it. They were telling me that it contained things which I knew it did not contain. We have that problem and it is a serious problem. The report has good things in it, although I think the dissensions of the Liberal Party are justified, especially with regards to the Senate.

There is no way that we can get six provinces other than Quebec to sign a new constitutional accord if we do not have a reformed and more powerful Senate, an elected Senate. I would claim even an equal Senate.

Does that mean the Senate should be able to overturn the House of Commons on all things? No. It also does not mean, as Senator Beaudoin proposed and upon which we dissented, that the House of Commons should be able to overturn a Senate block by a vote of 50-plus-1 of those present and voting in the House of Commons. They may pass a bill by 50-plus-1 of those voting. They then send it to the Senate, and the Senate rejects it, perhaps for good reason. When that bill goes back to the House of Commons, the same 50-plus-1 who voted for it can take down the Senate block and the bill will pass.

That is not a Senate with any power at all and there is absolutely no point in having it.

You could improve that by saying that the Senate could not block a House of Commons measure except by a vote of two-thirds of all senators present and voting. To overturn such a Senate opposition, the House of Commons would also have to have a vote of two-thirds. That being the case, to resolve the dispute you would inevitably have to have the kind of conferences which they have in the United States between the House of Representatives and the Senate. It has worked there for 200 years and it could be done here too. If we are going to do that, I cannot for the life of me see why there would be opposition to the idea of an equal Senate.

I will take five minutes to show you how an equal, elected and effective Senate could work. There is a way of giving Quebec a veto on constitutional change, the extra powers it wants, plus three judges on the Supreme Court, while giving other provinces the strong central government they want, all without using the unanimity rule.

We must start with the list of which powers belong to Ottawa and which to the provinces, and I have spoken about this. It will have to be concurrent powers and there will have to be some reshuffling of the powers. Let us devise a list that would win a referendum in Quebec, then ask the remaining provinces, in a referendum run by each of them if they wish, whether they want the Quebec list, or a shorter list which would leave them with a strong central government. Thus, all provinces would have been treated equally because they would have been given the same choice as Quebec. This meets the points raised by Premier Filmon, Mr. Anderson of the Alberta Committee on the Constitution, and Mr. Getty.

The rest can be achieved through a Triple-E Senate whose powers would vary, depending on the nature of the legislation. Such an elected Senate could debate and criticize, but not block matters pertaining to the federal government's taxation or borrowing. I say that, because the Commons, like it or not, would not accept less and we cannot pass a constitutional change if the Commons does not want it. Those of us who sit in our caucuses know that members of the House of Commons are very touchy about this.

For a previously agreed list of matters deemed to be of national importance, the equal and elected Senate that I propose would be able to block, by simple majority, but only for six months, legislation passed by the House of Commons. That could be varied to the two-thirds that I suggested earlier.

In all matters pertaining to changing the distribution of powers—after the reform, not before—as between Ottawa and the provinces and the institutions of the Canadian state, a bill or resolution adopted by the House of Commons could apply to any particular province only if it were approved by a majority of the elected senators from that province. I will come to how to elect the senators shortly. It is proposed here that the veto be exercised at an earlier stage, that is the stage of the resolution of the federal Parliament. A province would be able to block that resolution. Without that resolution the amendment to the Constitution could not pass.

By giving each province a veto within the Senate over an amending resolution we would not need to change the amending formula by unanimous consent of the provinces because would merely be amending the powers of the Senate, and that could be done by seven provinces representing half the population. I would refer you to The Constitution Act, 1982, article 42(1)(b).

Thus, after the current round, Quebec would have a veto over changes to the Constitution, but only inasmuch as these apply to Quebec. The other provinces would have a similar veto. Quebec would be able to block amendments to the Supreme Court Act, Chapter 26, section 6, which gives the province three Supreme Court Justices. This meets the objections of those who want provinces to have equal veto powers and the objection of British Columbia to being incorporated in a western region for veto purposes.

It can be challenged. I agree that someone could say that we should not be using article 42(1)(b) for this. However, if there is agreement by seven provinces and the others say that we do have the veto, we do have a Senate with more powers, and we let it pass, and no one challenges it before the Supreme Court, then it can be passed that way. It can be finessed. We are at a time when we have to use every bit of finessing possible.

As for any new federal program in a field of provincial jurisdiction, a majority of the senators from each province could decide that their province would withdraw from such a program with full compensation. In all other matters a simple majority of the elected senate proposed here would be able to block the Commons.

How do we elect the senators? Why not leave this to the provinces? I would suggest to Quebec that its senators should be elected members of its National Assembly, and naturally they would be members of the party in power. They would be sent to sit in the Senate while that particular party was in power. The National Assembly of Quebec and any Quebec government could not object to that. These are not separate senators who could become stronger than the Premier of Quebec, stronger than the provincial government, which is one of the great fears. They would be members of the provincial party in power in the legislature.

Other provinces might choose direct election. Why not? These would be elected people. No one could say that they were not elected. Before a provincial election, the party in power could even say, "From among our candidates these are the ones we will send to the Senate, if you elect us." This assures Quebec that its senatorial contingent would represent the Premier's views. This seems to be what worries Quebec.

If a province has assumed the jurisdiction totally, its senators would have no vote under category (B), which is the important matters that the Senate can only block for six months. They would have no vote under (D), which is withdrawing from a federal program. If they have withdrawn from a program they would not vote on any matters dealing with that program. They also would not have a vote on (E), which is matters of simple majority pertaining to that jurisdiction from which they have withdrawn.

This partly meets the objections of Mr. Al Johnson that, if a province assumes certain jurisdictions totally, then in matters pertaining to those jurisdictions the province's representatives in the federal Parliament should not have a vote. They would have a vote in the House of Commons but they would not have a vote in the Senate.

This also partly answers the objections of Mr. Stéphane Dion, a political scientist in Quebec, whom Lysianne Gagnon keeps quoting as saying that Quebec would lose influence because it would not be able to vote on matters from which it withdrew. It would lose some influence, but only in the Senate, and in the Senate it would have the powers that it wants on all other matters vital to Quebec. I realize this may sound far-fetched, but it is not; it is simply different to what we are now doing.

One of the problems with changing constitutions, not only here but everywhere else, is that we are rooted in what we already know. It is hard, when you are rooted in what you already know, to contemplate something totally different, something which may not be exactly what you hope. You always hope you can somehow repair the old house; a coat of paint, for God's sake. Let us tear down a wall or two, maybe repaint the old brick outside, which is chipping, or repair the roof.

Sometimes it is better to make radical changes, but they are difficult to do. We would have a Senate which is elected, which would not be the American Senate of the Western dream, but which would nevertheless give the poorer provinces equal representation and considerable powers for their governments to exercise within the federal Parliament, except in matters that would paralyze the government.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I must warn my colleagues that it is unlikely I can complete what I have to say within the usual time limit. I would hope, in that event, they might favour me with permission to conclude what I have to say today.

Senator Molgat: There is no limit on this one.

Senator Roblin: I am glad to hear that.

We heard a very interesting speech from Senator Gigantès, a curious mixture of things which I call "thought starters" and, on the other hand, proposals which seem quite remote from any real or practical application. I shall mention one or two of those in the course of what I have to say, because they deserve comment.

I must express my interest in the way in which Senator Gigantès has outlined for us the "emotional myths", as he described them, that have seized hold of a large part of the people who live in the province of Quebec. It may well be that he has described that myth accurately, and if he has, it underlines the difficulties that face us as we try to find a new way forward for this country.

I have to say, however, that emotions are held not only in the province of Quebec but in other parts of Canada. I am not sure they are equally as strong as the emotions held in Quebec, but they exist and they are real. They must be taken into account. We have seen something of that in recent days with the statement of the Premier of Alberta respecting the Triple-E Senate.

The danger of following provincial emotions, which is the concept within which I include these various situations, is that they represent a recipe for disaster. What we are looking for in Canada today is people who believe in Canada. We want to see people who are loyal Manitobans, as I trust I am, but at the same time I consider that my primary allegiance is to my country, Canada. Until we can establish that frame of mind and that emotion from one end of this country to the other, including the province of Quebec, we may find that the problems we face are very difficult indeed to surmount.

I am here to say today that I have not lost my faith in the spirit of Canadianism or the patriotism of our people or their emotional attachment to the idea of Canada as being the one that defines their lives, that defines this nation. It is from that point of view that I approach the report of the committee that is before us. What I have to say on that account is perhaps a little dry, the dry bones of a report, rather than the pulsing emotions which lie behind these various matters.

I do want to join with those who have expressed a word of appreciation to the men and women who wrote the report for the job they have done. I give my special compliments to our colleague, Senator Beaudoin, who took on a very difficult task. I thank the men and women who wrote this report because they were able, to a remarkable degree, to find a consensus and to come together on the things they suggested we should consider. It was not a complete consensus; there were important areas where opinions differed, but the fact that the consensus was as broad as it was is something for which I am indeed grateful.

I say that this is a good report. I am quite willing to give it an "A". I do not think anyone thinks it is the last word on this topic, because we know very well that the government, this Parliament, the legislatures, the aboriginal people, Canadians, all have to consider these matters. I am sure there will be substantial changes in the further refining of the ideas in this report, but the report has substantial merit in that it cuts through much of the random talk that has surrounded this issue for the last six or twelve months to focus our attention on the main problems that are before us.

I was interested to note that the second chapter of this report deals with a couple of myths about the structure of the Canadian nation. I hope a good many people will read the committee's comments on this point, because I believe they have real meaning. They deal with the myth of the equality of the constituent states as a sacred principle of federalism. Anyone who knows anything about Canadian history knows that our provinces have never been equal in all particulars, and sometimes unequal in important particulars. This myth of equality, which has been propagated, I am sad to say, substantially in my part of the country, is one which does not bear the critical eye of examination.

The committee deals with the concept of watertight compartments; that we can divide the functions of government so exquisitely in the federal system that there is no overlap or connection between what the provinces do and what the federal governments do. The committee emphasizes instead that what we are seeking to deal with here are the problems of interdependence between the regions and the people in the provinces of Canada as expressed through the provincial legislatures or through the federal Parliament. I am happy to see that these matters received thoughtful consideration in this report.

[Senator Roblin.]

In what I have to say, I will not try to examine all aspects, because there are some important topics such as aboriginal rights, the proposal for a social covenant, what we should do about the residual or the declaratory powers, and the amending formula itself that should be left for another day, but I shall say something about the division of powers that is suggested in this document. Of course, I will also speak about the proposed reform of the Senate.

However, before I get to those two points, I should say a few words about the new head of power that was sought by the federal government in its original proposal; a law it wishes to bring in which it hopes will improve the effective functioning of the economic union. At first reading, it sounds like a good idea, but I think even its authors saw the difficulties involved in trying to make this work when you consider the fact that the government married this new head of power with a formula that calls for the consent of 50 per cent of the population and 7 provinces for what was being suggested under this new head of power. One need only consider for a moment that if the province of Ontario, for example, decided that it did not want to do this and declined to go along with the 50 per cent of population and the 7 provinces that were in favour, one has to question what the usefulness of the exercise would be.

That particular illustration goes to the heart of the difficulty. As far as I can recall, there is no province that welcomed this idea. The very nature of a federation presents problems when you consider it, because what provinces do in Canada is not the same; they vary. What one province does, another province does not do. They have different needs. It follows from that that they have different economic and different fiscal requirements which must be considered.

Having said that, however, is not to say that real economic coordination is not a highly desirable or an essential feature of our governmental organization in this country; but it is to say that what the report suggests in connection with this matter is a better approach, in my opinion, than a request for a new head of power.

The report wisely proposes an amendment to the Constitution, and I quote the words of the committee, "to work cooperatively to strengthen the economic union."

● (1650)

This is the place to start. We will not get improvements in our economic coordination between our two levels of government by a new law. The best place to start is to express a principle. Put that in the Constitution and then you challenge the public men and women of the day to give effective life to the principle that is so enshrined. In that way we can work through a process of practice and experience and the effluxion of time and the establishment of conventions—in other words, the very means by which our whole institution of Parliament has come to pass—we can work it, try it and see what we can do to get along.

I suggest that the report of the committee to approach the question of the economic cooperation, of the economic organization of the federation, in this way is a useful idea. If you take that view it naturally follows that the new council of the federation that has been proposed is redundant, and it is. The committee proposes, however, another mechanism that meets the case equally well, and that is that there should be an annual meeting of the First Ministers. This is a well-established practice. It would do no harm to enshrine it as an annual meeting of the Constitution, although I would be quite happy personally if it were left outside the constitutional provisions, because the First Ministers can and do meet to consider social and economic matters now. This proposal of the committee builds on the current practice. Its guiding principle—and the guiding principle that has to motivate all of us—is that there should be a consensus in the joint management of joint concerns. That is the principle that should be followed in connection with the new head of power that was proposed by the present administration.

But the report has a clear view on another matter, namely, the need to perfect the economic union of the nation and to provide for the mobility of persons, goods, services and capital. I hope that that policy is vigorously pursued; that we cut through the local inertia and preference that we find today in many of our policies that are adhered to by our provincial governments. You need only mention the prosaic noun "beer" to illustrate the kind of idiocy that goes on in this country in connection with local preferences.

At the same time, the committee recognizes that there are legitimate concerns as to the retention of certain powers in this field by provincial governments, and quite an astute suggestion that there should be a dispute-settling mechanism. As we pursue this problem of perfecting the economic union, we act in a practical manner and we also act in a manner that gives people who may have concerns that they feel are not fully developed in connection with this matter an opportunity to have their day in court with a dispute-settling mechanism.

I want to come to one of the main issues contained in the document that the committee has prepared, namely, the distribution of powers. This is a key area that is addressed in the report and is a key area that is facing the nation—that is, what should we do about the distribution of powers? It is conceded on all sides that some attention has to be paid to this matter, particularly if we are to have any hope of satisfying the interests of the province of Quebec.

The change that the report proposes in the distribution of powers is exceedingly important because it declares our vision of Canada and it declares the nature of our federation. Obviously, any change must be considered with all due attention. Our task is to look at those changes which are necessary to include a satisfied Quebec within our vision of Canada. From what has been said previously on this whole topic, it hardly is necessary for me to stress the difficulty of this particular exercise. I want to deal with the particular items that are included in the report.

We must recognize and it is well stated that there are limits to the changes that we can make in the distribution of powers in our country. These limits are defined by balance and equity and the national interest—all difficult terms to define. All require judgment and political common sense. The report respects these limits to which I have referred. Unless we can be sure that we have a national administration that is able to act in the national interest, as a national government should, we are running into a problem which we will find difficult to solve.

However, I want to look at the 16 topics that the report recommends for provincial paramountcy or for increased provincial input. The question I have to ask myself is: Which of any of these recommendations inhibit Canada from acting as a national government in any vital particular? That seems to be the test in the distribution of powers that is before us now. Scarcely any of them break new ground, quite remarkably. Tourism, forestry, mining, recreation, housing, municipal and urban affairs—all are well-developed provincial activities at the present time. Some of them are within the provincial sphere entirely. It is not an area in which we can feel that a federal presence is indispensable for their proper operation.

If we deal with the question of energy, I define that to my own satisfaction as a branch of natural resources, and natural resources are within the provincial sphere of the Constitution right now. They have long been within the provincial sphere. That presents me with no particular difficulties.

I doubt if the federal powers for the nation are crippled by provincial paramountcy in family policy, inland fisheries and personal bankruptcy. We can stand those without any stress on the nature of our Confederation.

When it comes to "manpower training", I am sure some eyebrows will be raised, but is manpower training so different from the function of education, which has been a fundamental provincial power ever since 1867? I think not. There may be some merit for coordinating manpower policy in order to ensure that provincial activities in this field recognize the national character of some of the job situations that arise and the requirements of the national economy. Some consideration has to be given to that issue, but it is not incompatible with a provincial paramountcy in that particular direction.

Under the heading of "Immigration" we are confirming or "constitutionalizing" our current practice, which has been given effect for the last 20 years or so with reasonable satisfaction to all concerned.

The most significant of the powers, to my mind, is the suggestion that culture should become an area of provincial paramountcy. When we face that issue we have to recognize that we are dealing with one of the most significant demands of the people of the province of Quebec, and one which is a reasonable recognition of the necessity, as they feel it, to pursue their role as a distinct society.

● (1700)

Therefore when I review the 16 areas in which the distribution of powers is laid out in this report, I do not find any of them to be deal-breakers. One can argue on any particular one with justification that there is another view, and I expect we will hear about that one of these days. On the whole, they are powers which I as a Canadian would not find objectionable were we to concede the principle of provincial paramountcy or provincial activity.

There is a useful rule of thumb that we can often apply—it is certainly applied in the European Community—called the "principle of subsidiarity". The principle of subsidiarity involves assigning responsibilities for administration to that level of government which is best able to perform it and which is closest to the people. It is not a principle that one can adopt without any consideration in all circumstances, but it seems to me that it is a reasonable standard of judgment when one deals with this question.

The report's recommendations on the division of powers I believe are substantial. I think they are realistic. This report takes fully into account the role of the national government in setting standards, in equalizing opportunities and services, and performing national functions within Canada and within the world community. I think our nation will survive without a serious derogation of its responsibilities or capacity to act as a national state if these delegations are made.

I am very conscious, though, of the remark that was made in the previous discussion on this subject dealing with the nature of independence and the nature of nationality in these days. I think many of us are stuck in a bit of a time warp when we think about these things. After listening to much of the debate about free trade, I am certain that a lot of Canadians are stuck in a time warp on this thing. The world is moving on and the concepts of independence that suited the people who wrote the statute of 1867 are not the concepts that we will find workable in the world we face today.

The report also has some good things to say about the use of federal spending power, and that has been a source of great difficulty and contention in days gone by. I think they make some useful suggestions about the use of the federal spending power and shared cost arrangement. The report, I am glad to say, respects the principle of parliamentary control of expenditures that Parliament makes under the use of federal spending power and the shared cost arrangements. It also lays down the premise that, as far as existing programs are concerned, they should be subject to firm terms and conditions and should be reinforced by a dispute-settling mechanism where differences of opinion arise, as they most certainly will. That is a practical idea. They suggest that if federal power is used again for new subjects or new activities, it should be subject to the opting-out provision on the part of those provinces that do not like it, with compensation, provided that the province is meeting the federal objectives in a different way.

I rather like this idea because in 1982, when the Constitution was being debated in this chamber, that was one of the suggestions I made at the time. I still think it is a pretty good idea. It may also provide an indirect discipline on the use of the federal spending power if it is subject to those conditions. On reflection, that may not be such a bad thing.

[Senator Roblin.]

That seems to me to cover all I want to say about the division of powers and the use of the federal spending power, that kind of thing, strictly within the text of the report that is before us. I am conscious that many other matters remain in connection with this question of the division of powers which will undoubtedly be discussed. At present, I am limiting myself to the report made by the committee.

I want to talk now about Senate reform. I support Senate reform, and I have said a good deal about it in days gone by. I have changed my mind from time to time as matters have developed and my thoughts have matured. However, I am still in favour of Senate reform.

When Senator MacEachen discussed the report of the committee with regard to Senate reform, he described the Senate as "elected, ineffective, and inequitable". I will start by agreeing with him on the elected part. I am pleased that the report of the committee wants this Senate to be elected by proportional representation. In that way we will make sure that minority opinion is heard, which is perhaps not able to find expression in the House of Commons with the "first-past-the-post" system. Proportional representation in the Senate is the means whereby minority opinion has a better chance to receive representation than it does in the House of Commons.

If anyone has heard and listened to the suggestion of minority groups throughout the country, and that there should be some special provision for them in the Senate, they will know what I am talking about. However, I do not believe the special kind of representation they ask for—namely, by appointment or allocation of seats—is the proper way to go. If we bring in the system of proportional representation, particularly if four people are to be elected at any one time—I would like to see five but four will do for a start—we will make it possible for groups that otherwise would not have elected representation to be elected to this chamber.

There is one thing about the suggestions of the committee on which I demure. The committee suggests proportional representation but not the single transferable vote as well because it is confusing and cumbersome. I think they should take another look at that matter. It is neither confusing nor cumbersome insofar as the voter is concerned. When the voter goes into the ballot box, what does he see under PR or PR plus STV? He sees a list of candidates. I hope they will not be in party order but in alphabetical order. How does he vote? He votes by number. The first choice is marked number 1; second, number 2 and if there are 30 people on the ballot he can go all the way to number 30, if he feels like it, although personally I think the voter should be allowed to stop when he has had enough. When he goes into the ballot box, whether it is PR or PR with a single transferrable vote, it makes no difference; his voting procedure is the same.

Where the cumbersome part comes—and I have to grant this—is when it comes to counting the vote. That is a little difficult, but the ordinary voter does not count the vote. That is done by the people at the electoral office who know what they are doing.

Why am I so emphatic about this particular system? I have to tell senators that I was first elected on the system of proportional representation with a single transferrable vote where four members were to be elected. This was the rule in the city of Winnipeg in 1949 when I ran as an independent in the election of that year for the legislature of Manitoba. So I know the proportional representation, single transferable vote system works and works very well. After all, it elected me. I have to admit that I was the low man on the totem pole and that I only made it by the skin of my teeth. In any event, that is history. I agree with an elected Senate.

Let's come to the "ineffective" part. What do you want an elected Senate to do? That is the fundamental question. What does "effective" mean? On page 55 of the report the Liberal members of the committee state their view of the matter. They believe that the fundamental objective of Senate reform is to provide more effective control of the executive. At first glance one might ask, what is wrong with that? Upon reflection, there are problems. They propose to do this by giving the Senate an absolute veto except for matters of appropriation and budget bills. On all other categories of legislation, there is to be an absolute veto.

Let us take a look at this concept of executive.

Senator Stewart: Was that the government's official proposal?

Senator Roblin: Whether or not it was the government, I really do not know nor care. I am dealing with what is in the committee's report.

● (1710)

The executive does not exist in a vacuum. It is not a separate order of government around here as it is in some places. The executive is indissolubly tied to the House of Commons. Control of the executive rests ultimately on the House of Commons. If one seeks to control the executive then it follows that one is really seeking to control the majority in the House of Commons. In other words, if the Senate can overrule the Commons, to that extent the Senate becomes a confidence body.

What are the consequences, intended or unintended, of this very large grant of powers? I put it to you that such a Senate would not counterbalance the House of Commons; it would overwhelm the House of Commons and would do it at will. The principle of regional interests as represented in the Senate could emasculate the principle of representation by population, which is represented by the House of Commons. Dear old George Brown would have a hard time with that one; it is sad comedown for the principle of "rep. by pop."

When Senator MacEachen spoke—and I hope he was speaking for more than himself and the Liberal Party—he had a more modest ambition, a more modest hope. He said, and I quote from his speech of March 24:

> The purpose of an elected Senate giving power to the regions is to permit the regions to say no occasionally and to make it stick.

Now, that is an attractive proposition. I have to admit that at one time I had the same idea. However, once having thought about it a little, I have to say that my hope is indeed hopelessly naive. There is no reason to think that things would work out that way; that an elected Senate would say "no" occasionally to the House of Commons and make it stick.

Everything we know about government systems and everything we know about the parliamentary system means that if power is given to someone it can be depended upon that if it can be used, it will be used and in ways, perhaps, that no one who sponsors such a motion would have thought possible. That is what I call the unintended consequences of the suggestion put forward that the Senate should have an absolute veto in the terms expressed by the Liberal dissent in the report. If the Senate and the Commons do not agree, that is a recipe for deadlock.

It seems to me that a deadlock-breaking mechanism is part and parcel of the grant of power, particularly the grant of veto power to an elected Senate. The report recognizes this, because it suggests that the House of Commons should have an override. However, the report is not very clear about what that should be. I should like to elaborate a little on that theme.

I want first to make a critical comment about some of the suggestions that Senator Gigantès made as to how the Senate should operate under the system that he proposes. Senator Gigantès proposed that senators representing a province in the Senate could dispose of any matter that affected their own province. I am not exactly quoting him because I do not have his words in front of me. However, the idea was clear that he was relying upon senators from a particular province to opt their province in or opt their province out of proposals that were made that affected that province.

That idea has a fundamental flaw, and that is that senators should not be making decisions as to what provinces do or do not do. That is the prerogative of the legislative assembly and of the government of that province. To suggest that the Senate should confer upon the provincial representatives in its chamber the right to say "yes" or "no" to matters that affect their province seems to me something that really would not stand much examination. I think that we will have to discard that idea. However, I thank Senator Gigantès for it because he is on the right track. He knows that something has to be done to deal with this question of deadlock. I do not think this particular system will work, so we will have to keep on looking.

I also think that the proposal of Senator Gigantès that senators should be elected on a provincial basis through the provincial legislature in some way or another is also an idea which will not fly. Over the course of time, senators will come to this chamber with very distinct and different principles and a very different power base. It seems to me that delegating to provinces the manner of electing or choosing senators is something which we should not waste much time on because it simply will not work.

I should like to say what I would do. I hope there may be some constructive ideas to suggest. I want to elaborate on the theme of this report, that there should be override of some sort, and to offer a number of suggestions, and they are only suggestions. They can be considered alone, they can be considered together, they can be considered consecutively or alternatively—all those possibilities are open.

If one wants to deal with the question of deadlock when the Senate vetoes what the House of Commons wants to do, then surely the Senate has to abide by the rules of what happens in the House of Commons when the government is defeated there. When the government is defeated in the House of Commons, the normal recourse is to dissolve the house and have an election. If the Senate defeats the government, particularly on matters which are described as matters of confidence—and that would require some careful definition—then it should be subject to the same sanction. In other words, the Prime Minister should have the right to dissolve the Senate if the deadlock cannot be broken in any other way, and let the public decide what they want done; let the electorate give their view.

If the Senate defeats a government confidence matter in this chamber, no matter what it is, the government should have the right to dissolve the Senate, if it seems to the government that this would be the only solution left to it.

There are other ways of dealing with the question of deadlock. One that is attractive to me is that the Senate can only overrule the Commons by means of a qualified majority. It has to be more than just a passing fancy, so to speak; it has to be a considered opinion of a considerable majority in the new chamber. I would suggest that a qualified majority should be 65 per cent of those present and voting. One can think of variations on this theme that would appeal to various members of the chamber.

There is also the question of joint sessions. If the two chambers do not agree, they could have a joint meeting and have a vote on the subject and the majority would rule in those circumstances. That should not be dismissed out of hand because there may be occasions when it could be quite valid.

The question of conferences between the two houses was raised. In theory, that sounds good, but it has never worked here. Perhaps it is because we have not really tried, and perhaps that requires more consideration than it has received so far. If one were to follow that route of having a conference to iron out the difficulties between the two house, it is useless to look at the American precedent as a suitable pattern for us because it probably would not work. That is probably why it has not worked so far. There have to be some special rules laid down as to how these meetings should be held and how a decision should be arrived at, and that is a very large project indeed.

The point I want to make is that the question of breaking deadlocks is fundamental to designing a new constitutional situation where the Senate is both elected and effective. If we can come to a conclusion on the question of dealing with deadlocks, then so many of the other issues about being effective become manageable.

[Senator Roblin.]

Honourable senators, I am not the first person who has thought about this. Those senators who have read the Canada West Foundation reports will find that in the last formulation, if I remember it correctly, they had a formula whereby the House of Commons could overrule the Senate with a certain prescribed majority.

● (1720)

If you look at the report of the Alberta Select Committee on Senate Reform, they of course do not think the Senate should have any power with respect to money or taxation bills. In all other bills, if there is a Commons majority greater than the majority in the Senate, then the Commons should have an override. I am not just sure how that concept will work. All I am trying to tell you is that people outside this chamber who have an interest in an effective Senate have come to the conclusion that some form of deadlock-breaking mechanism is essential if things are going to work well. Other variations will undoubtedly suggest themselves to members of this chamber, and I will not labour this topic any more.

I now come to the question of numbers. This appears to be a very sensitive issue in some parts of our country, particularly in the province of Alberta. I think we have to give it careful consideration. We did start with equal, but equal what? We started with three equal regions: the Maritimes, Quebec, and Ontario. Each had 24 senators. When the West came along, after a few people began to move out there, they were made another region, and therefore we had another 24 senators from the West. Then we had a few ringers, if I can inelegantly describe them that way, from the Northwest Territories and Yukon and Newfoundland. That altered the balance a little bit.

We started out with equal regions, and now we are being asked to switch to equal provinces. If we were starting from scratch, I think that would be a pretty good idea, although I am not sure that the question of Prince Edward Island wouldn't raise its head even if we were starting from scratch.

We have a situation in Canada where some provinces, and I think particularly the province of Quebec, have a concern about their representation in the Senate. I think they will be just as reluctant to give up their present influence in the Senate as the province of Alberta will be to give up the idea of an equal number of senators from each province. We have a real problem here. It is not going to be solved by people taking intransigent positions.

I think we are going to have to realize that some kind of compromise will be needed. In my opinion, we should go as far as we possibly can towards this idea of equal numbers of senators for the provinces of Canada. We should do our best. However, I think we should recognize at the start that it is unlikely that the ideal would be attained, and that we can merely do our best. If we are able to do that, I have some hope that other Canadians who are wedded to the question of equality will find considerable satisfaction in the improved representation in the new Senate that comes along. We should get as close to equality of provinces as we can, but be prepared to settle for some kind of reasonable compromise.

Honourable senators, I thank you for having listened to me for so long. I have just a few words to conclude with. Canada has one federal government, ten provinces, and two territories, to say nothing of the interests of the Aboriginals and other Canadians. All of these bodies have a great interest and the greatest of responsibilities in constitutional amendments. I think the principle that we have to recognize is that no one is going to get all that he asks for. All must be prepared to give something, and, in the end, all must agree. All must agree that the whole is greater than the parts and that no part can be as happy and as prosperous if it leaves this whole. It is better to live together than to expose our future to risks that we cannot now know and which the Fathers of Confederation had to face in their day.

Honourable senators, this report is a meaningful effort to direct our hearts and our minds toward a happy issue of our present travail.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I do not intend to keep the Senate long; however, some statements have been made over the weekend that I think should be drawn to the attention of the Senate, particularly when we are considering a constitutional package, because it seems to me we are on a track that leads to an impasse. That is not conducive to finding the kind of compromise that Senator Roblin has spoken about, something with which I fully agree. We have to find some kind of compromise, or the package is just simply not going to be accepted.

Before I go any further, I want to offer my congratulations and commendation to the committee, particularly the co-chairman and members of the other House, who spent a great deal of time and effort to present the chambers of Parliament with the committee report that is before us. I do not agree with all of it, and that is not unusual. They spent a great deal of time on it, and it is a very useful discussion paper.

The reason I think I should make a few comments today on this topic is that the Deputy Premier of Alberta, Jim Horsman, who really has been leading the constitutional amendment exercise in Alberta, has said absolutely and categorically that they will not sign an agreement if a Triple-E Senate is not included. Of course it is not included.

I also made a speech in this chamber indicating that I do not agree with what is required in a Triple-E Senate, because I do not believe it will work. First of all, I don't believe the House of Commons is ready to endorse a Triple-E Senate, because they realize, as do I, that you would be creating what I used to call a monster. You would be creating, if not a monster, a very powerful institution in the Senate. The transfer of real power from the House of Commons and from the First Ministers meetings would be enormous, so much so that I am sure they just simply are not going to accept it. If that is what we are faced with, then it seems to me that we have a responsibility to find another way.

The first "E" in a Triple-E Senate stands for "equal." That means every province would have the same number of senators. The "elected" part of it is not a great problem for me, except I really do not think that we need two institutions that are a mirror of each other. I am sure in practical politics that is what would happen; so I am not in favour of that either. However, the other "E", the effective part, is important.

I appreciate what Senator Roblin has had to say. I appreciate what other people have had to say. However, they keep dancing around as to whether we could have a formula with a substantial majority on certain matters and only a short-term suspensive veto on other matters such as financial bills and so on.

I have talked to quite a few people in Alberta, including members of the government, and what they want is a redistribution of real, effective, power so that they are not constantly subject to the tyranny of the central provinces, which is what they claim. It is not always Quebec either, by the way. That is why I say we have to find another way.

I will have a word or two to say in a few minutes about at least one way, and perhaps other ways, of effecting this redistribution of power. I think that we in this chamber should try to find a way, because, honourable senators, there is no doubt in my mind at all that a new Senate, whether it is elected or not, is unacceptable, without the authority to redistribute power to some of the outer provinces of this country.

● (1730)

Premier Wells has said it is unacceptable. Premier Getty has said it is unacceptable. Even the Premier of Manitoba said on February 12, "I believe very strongly that the Triple-E Senate is the best model, and we have to keep working toward it." So there are three premiers who are of the same mind, and there will probably be more before long.

The Premier of Ontario has said—and I forget his exact words—that there is no market in Ontario for the terms and conditions of a Triple-E Senate. We are already below what is required to accept the package. We are continuing down this road trying to find a package that is acceptable to all 11 governments, but one which is at least acceptable to the required majority, which is seven provinces with 50 per cent plus of the population.

I suggest to honourable senators that it is already clear that what is in the report will not make it. It is not acceptable. I could bring up the fact that even the Quebec legislature has turned down the report. Perhaps some adjustments can be made to it.

My major criticism of the report is that it contains no provision for the aspirations of western Canadians who want some redistribution of real power. They think they can find it through a Triple-E Senate. I do not happen to agree that that can be and ought to be part of the structure. However, there was no attempt in the committee's report to address that matter.

What is being discussed here is really a wimp of a chamber. It will have no real power at all concerning a great many matters that are important to western Canada.

My point today is that I do not think it is a good idea to keep on down a road that we know now will lead to an absolute impasse. I say that for several reasons. The first is that the province of Quebec has a deadline about a referendum and so on. There have been some comments made by the Premier of Quebec that there may be some modifications to that notion. I am not entirely sure as to what that means. In any event, he has not come away from the position that they have to have an offer of some kind that they can accept. Obviously, there cannot be an offer unless the other provinces are willing to endorse it.

What I am trying to point out is that that idea seems to have run into a severe block, exacerbated by what happened at the Progressive Conservative convention held in Alberta over the weekend. The Right Honourable Joe Clark was at that convention. He is the minister responsible for putting together a package. I was not at the meeting, but I was in Calgary. There is now an extremely serious situation because the Premier of Alberta told the convention, with the Right Honourable Joe Clark present, that that package was unacceptable. He went even further than that. He said that it is about time that members of Parliament elected in Alberta, including the Right Honourable Joe Clark, started to support that province in its quest for a Triple-E Senate and all that goes with it, instead of coming out west and telling us that we cannot have it.

That is fairly tough talk among members of the governing party. I do not want to be too partisan about all this, but it is fairly serious to me, if we are to believe the seriousness of the consequences of meeting what the Premier of Quebec claims are his requirements.

A new Senate without the authority that it needs, one such as is described in the report, is obviously unacceptable to western Canada, and to more than one province in western Canada. I think we should make some effort to modify that position.

I am sure Premier Getty would appreciate my repeating what was said. He was asked why he is insisting that his demands in this regard must be met now. Honourable senators will recall that former Premier Lougheed, when he was chairman of the constitutional conference in Calgary, said, "I do not think we should allow a Triple-E Senate to be a deal breaker." In other words, we should not allow the full amount of what Alberta and other provinces have been asking to break an agreement that might be an offer satisfactory to all the other provinces, and particularly to Quebec.

Premier Don Getty has rejected that idea. As I said a moment ago, why is he so insistent now that this package be brought forward? He said, "Hell will freeze over before our concerns are considered, unless they are in the package this time." It could be quite a while before that takes place. That is why he is concerned. He does not believe there will be another opportunity in his political lifetime to correct this imbalance of power.

[Senator Olson.]

I will not go over all the reasons why some of the criticisms were levelled at the government of which I was a part. Some of the criticism from western Canada has been levelled at the present government for certain things that it did. Senators opposite know the details of them as well as I do—Winnipeg certainly does. There were two or three things that happened. That is what is being used to sell the idea to western Canadians that a Triple-E Senate is absolutely essential to correct those matters.

As I said, we are going down the wrong road if we think we will ever have a Triple-E Senate as defined by the Deputy Premier of Alberta, the Honourable Mr. Horsman. I also believe that such a measure would never get past the House of Commons, in any event. We had better find another way.

I said earlier in my speech that I think there is a way, although I will not deal with it at great length. I think this chamber can and ought to take its responsibility as the house of the regions and carry regional interests in a way which will give them a higher priority among the members of this chamber, something which is apart from affiliations to the two traditional political parties. That would help to overcome a lot of other problems as well.

● (1740)

I do not know if anyone else from Western Canada feels as strongly as I do about this matter. I feel strongly about it because that is what the people out there think. This redress has to be made or there will be no acceptable package. I believe that very sincerely. The Premier of Alberta said it again this past weekend. He said it in such a way that there could be no misunderstanding whatsoever of his meaning, and the Right Honourable Mr. Clark was in the room. It is time for us also to take it seriously. We must find a way.

I want to complete my remarks by commending the Prime Minister for beginning to stand up for Canada. As an aside, I think he should have done it a long time ago. A few days ago he made a speech in Baie Comeau, telling the separatists what a great disservice they are doing to Canada and what the tremendous cost will be to Canada and to Quebec. I commend him for taking that position now because that may be the eventual result that we Canadians will have to face.

If Quebec does go ahead with its referendum, there will be a campaign of some kind persuading people to vote on one side or the other. We had one, as you know, in 1980. That was a very intense campaign. We may get to that again. In the meantime, we must take seriously what Canadians in some other regions of Canada, in this case western Canada, are prepared to accept in this package.

I have to say, and I do not want it to be misunderstood, that I do not think the report before us seriously takes into account what western Canadians told the committee. Is there any provision in this report for the aspirations of a Triple-E Senate and the transfer of power to that chamber, and what that could do for the western provinces? If it is there, I was not able to find it. In fact, there is not much in the report about that subject.

I heard the co-chairman of the committee say that the redistribution of powers and dealing with all the things that Senator Roblin spoke about, that is what is important to Quebec. They want those things. I do not disagree. I think a lot of them should be accommodated. I think western Canadians are ready to do that. I think the majority of western Canadians are ready to accept "distinct society", even if there is more to it than simply words in the Constitution, even if they are also given the powers to promote whatever is involved in that definition of "distinct society".

Having said that, there must also be some consideration for the aspirations of western Canada for some additional influence and real power, real muscle, whatever you want to call it, in the Parliament of Canada. Their choice would be through a Triple-E Senate.

Honourable Senators, there are many other things we could talk about. I have exhausted my opportunity to speak on this debate although it has only been for a few minutes.

Senator Molgat: You can adjourn the debate.

Senator Olson: I cannot be here tomorrow. I am going to a meeting at Meech Lake. However, we have heard two excellent speeches that have gone into great detail.

Senator Roblin: Make that three, counting your speech.

Senator Olson: I am not sure that that was so great, but I have heard two speeches which went into the details of some of the proposals in the report and agreed with a large number of them, and I do, too. They found some criticisms and suggested some alternatives. I am sorry I have not done that. I have read the report and I am interested in it, but I am concerned that, day after day, week after week, the months will go by and we may be heading into an impasse.

I am not sure how seriously you take that possibility. If you believe a lot of people who are trying to convey the view that this is a tremendously serious matter insofar as the future of Canada is concerned, then I hope we can take this seriously, that we can listen to the voices of western Canadians and the voices of others from the outer fringes of Canada. I hope we can find some way to accommodate their aspirations as well.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Olson would consider a question? I intended to hold my question till another time, but you have told us that you do not intend to resume this speech.

As we know, the proposals put forth in the committee report, insofar as the powers of the Senate are concerned, fall considerably short of the Senate powers proposed initially by the government. I do not know why the committee felt that the government's proposals should not be supported.

My question to you, Senator Olson, is this: Do you think the government's proposals with regard to the powers of the Senate might have satisfied the government of Alberta? I realize that the Premier has now said, after the committee report, that it has to be an unadulterated Triple-E Senate. Let us suppose that the committee had come out with a report closer to that of the government's proposal. In terms of practical politics, what do you think would have been the position of the government of Alberta in that case?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not know if I should even try to reply to that question or to speak for the government of Alberta with any authority.

Senator Stewart: You know the shape of opinion out there.

Senator Olson: Yes, I understand the question. I think that a simple suspensive veto would be unacceptable to Alberta and to a lot of Canadians. A 30-day suspension for money matters, for example, does not mean anything. Most bills get 30 days' delay already, somewhere along the line. On very important matters, even a six-month suspensive veto is inadequate. I think that is the position they would take. However, I think it is still possible to negotiate some kind of authority and power in the Senate that will give very serious consideration to regional interests on the outer fringes of Canada, whether west or east, and that we should try to work toward achieving that.

As a matter of fact, the Senate, in its present form, could do a great deal of that if it so chose. I am no more critical of anyone else in this Senate than I am of myself. I have been just as partisan as anyone can be, particularly when I was Leader of the Government here. I had a job to do, and that was to get the government's program through the Senate.

Senator Molgat: You were always very gentle though.

Senator Olson: I hope so. I think I was always fair. But the bottom line is that my job was to get the government's program through. Everyone understood that, and I understand it now. I have no problem with that.

However, the government and people of Alberta believe that certain things take place here which give preference to central Canada simply because of the representation by population which is the basis of this place. As long as we are structured on that basis, the Conservatives supporting the Conservatives and the Liberals supporting the Liberals will have the highest priority. I believe that that can be changed. We may be able to talk Premier Getty and the Albertan people into accepting that. We would have to act in a highly responsible way. I understand that and I am ready to do it. I am sure my friends opposite are also ready to do that so we would not abuse it. There is no doubt that we have enough authority now, although we do not use it very often.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Would you take one more question, senator? It is not a difficult question. Do you believe that the word "suspensive veto" is a contradiction of terms, or an oxymoron in modern language? In other words, "veto" means "veto". "Suspensive veto" merely means "delay". Do you believe that that is a contradiction of terms, sir?

Senator Olson: I do, particularly the way you put it, but it is the only term I know at the moment for holding something up for up to six months. Perhaps "suspensive veto" is not the right word. However, I am quite frankly not satisfied that even a six-month suspensive veto is adequate to satisfy the aspirations—

Senator Barootes: I am not talking about the length of time. I am just saying that the word "veto" means "dead", "done". Do you believe that the words "suspensive veto" should be replaced by something like "a delay" or "a holdup", and that the word "veto" should not be in there?

Senator Olson: I believe that you have given the definition and it is more accurate the way you put it. "Veto" probably means that, but "suspensive veto" is a term that has been around for a long time.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): There must be a good Greek term for it. Much of our legal language comes from Greek sources. In any event, I am prepared to adjourn the debate because I am sure there are other senators who wish to speak.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, considering the hour, may I suggest that we let stand all remaining orders, motions and inquiries?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have no personal objection to that, but I think that when we do that we should check to make sure that no one does object. Another point I would make is that it is understood, whenever we do this, that the numbering ceases.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: If you remember to ask.

Senator Molgat: Well, we did this last Thursday night. I wonder if we could have it understood, as a regular practice, that when we agree to adjournment in this way, to stand everything, that the numbering does not tick off for that day.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is that agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2:00 p.m.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Monday, March 30, 1992

The Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations has the honour to present its

FIFTH REPORT

(Report No. 50- Public Service Employment)

1. Pursuant to its permanent reference, section 19 of the Statutory Instruments Act, and the order of reference approved by the Senate on June 20, 1989 and by the House of Commons on June 27, 1989, the Joint Committee draws the attention of both Houses to the Public Service Employment Regulations ("the Regulations").

2. Section 21 of the Public Service Employment Act ("the Act") confers on public service employees the right to appeal against an appointment made, or which is proposed to be made, by closed competition (i.e. a competition restricted to public service employees) or without the holding of a competition. Under section 31 of the Act, a public service employee may also appeal to the Public Service Commission ("the Commission" or "the PSC") against a recommendation made by the deputy head of a department that the employee be released or demoted on the grounds that the employee is incompetent in performing the duties of his position or is incapable of performing those duties.

Appeals are heard by appeal boards appointed by the PSC to conduct an enquiry at which the person appealing and the deputy head concerned, or their representatives, are given an opportunity to be heard. On an appeal against a personnel selection process, a board may decide that the appointment under appeal be confirmed or revoked, or that a proposed appointment be made or not be made. In the case of appeals taken pursuant to section 31 of the Act, the board may accept or reject the recommendation for release or demotion.

3. On May 5, 1988, your Committee presented to both Houses its Ninth Report of the Second Session of the Thirty-third Parliament (Report No. 43). The report was concurred in by the Senate on May 9, 1988. In the Ninth Report, the Joint Committee stated that the Public Service Employment Regulations "lack the necessary procedural safeguards to ensure that the appeal process is consistent with the basic requirements of fairness and equity" and concluded that > the rights of appeal granted pursuant to section 21 and 31 of the Act are undermined by the failure of the Public Service Commission to adopt appropriate regulations providing the procedural safeguards discussed in this Report. The Committee would also emphasize that administrative simplicity and flexibility should not be allowed to override the protection of the interests of the individual by legally entrenched and legally enforceable means.

The Joint Committee recommended that the Commission adopt regulations setting out the essential requirements applicable to the following matters:

- disclosure of relevant information to potential appellants;
- Public Service Commission opinions as a prerequisite to section 21(1) appeals;
- notice of hearing of appeals.

4. Pursuant to Standing Order 109 of the House of Commons, the Committee requested that the government table a comprehensive response to the Ninth Report. A response prepared by the Commission was tabled in the House of Commons on September 29, 1988. In its response, the PSC rejected the recommendations of the Committee in their entirety, maintaining that its administrative procedures are adequate and need not be included in the Regulations.

5. The position taken by the Commission is that it prefers to deal with the matters identified in paragraph 3. of the present Report through policy guidelines, which allow for a greater degree of "flexibility". Thus, the overall issue concerns the choice of the proper means to govern the appeal procedure. Should the rights of participants in an appeal process be protected by legally enforceable rules or by policy guidelines which at the end of the day are binding on neither staffing authorities nor the PSC? The Committee is strongly of the view that it is one thing for directives or policy documents to explain or complete the application of regulations, but quite another for these to be used as substitutes for regulations. Administrative convenience should not be mistaken for flexibility. Policy directives may be ignored or changed without notice; regulations must be adhered to.

6. When the Commission's response to the Ninth Report was considered, members of the Committee expressed dissatisfaction with it, and the Committee decided to pursue these matters. The Chairman of the Commission appeared before the Committee to discuss the PSC response on February 22, 1990. Additional submissions, both written and oral, were also received from representatives of the Public Service Alliance of Canada. Finally, a number of interested individuals provided written submissions which the Committee took into consideration as well.

7. DISCLOSURE OF INFORMATION

In the Ninth Report, the Committee recommended that the Regulations provide for mandatory and full disclosure, to any unsuccessful candidate or the candidate's representative, of all particulars relevant to the decision appealed against.

The Commission has stated that disclosure does take place as a matter of practice and pointed out that the common law principles of fairness and natural justice require full disclosure of evidence by one side before the other can be required to respond or present its case. While full disclosure does, for the most part, take place at the appeal hearing, it appears, however, that such disclosure does not take place prior to the appeal hearing in all cases. When he appeared before the Committee in November of 1990, the Executive Vice-President of the Public Service Alliance of Canada stated with respect to the present disclosure policy: "What is presently happening is that some departments comply and some do not comply. Some departments will not let the candidate know what has happened, and you end up with a long, dragged out, costly appeal process for no reason." This stands in contrast to the view of Chairman of the PSC that "In the many conversations we have had with the unions they, generally, have been very pleased that disclosure is happening."

In addition to ensuring that an appellant can properly prepare his or her case, full disclosure prior to the appeal hearing helps narrow and define the issues to be dealt with by the appeal board, thus increasing the efficiency of the process. Moreover, there is agreement on all sides that early and full disclosure has the effect of reducing the number of appeals, since some potential appellants upon being fully informed may realize that they do not have grounds for appeal and proceed no further.

The Chairman of the PSC suggested to the Committee that regulations requiring full disclosure would be no more effective than the present policy directives, as recalcitrant departments would be as likely to ignore one as the other. The short answer to this assertion is that legal consequences and remedies arise where regulations are contravened or "ignored" by a department. This is not the case with administrative policies. In any event, your Committee has more faith than the PSC seems to have that public servants are aware of their duty to obey the law.

In the Ninth Report, the Committee recommended that the Regulations preclude the use in an appeal of any document or information of which the appellant has no knowledge or that has not been communicated to the appellant. Where new information is sought to be used at the hearing stage, the Regulations would require that the proceedings be adjourned, thus giving the appellant an opportunity to review the new information. Your Committee wishes to emphasize that it was never suggested, as the PSC appears to have assumed in its response, that information not provided to the appellant prior to the hearing could never be used in determining the appeal.

Moreover, the PSC's statement that a provision excluding evidence not properly disclosed would be "extraordinary" is clearly inaccurate. Where a discovery process or other disclosure mechanism is provided, it is commonly the case that failure to disclose may result in the exclusion of the evidence in question. To give but two examples, subsection 30(2) of the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission Rules of Procedure provides that where a party to a hearing fails to comply with a notice to produce and allow inspection of documents within the prescribed time "he may not put any documents in evidence to which the notice relates unless he satisfies the Commission that he had sufficient cause for not complying with the notice." Similarly, section 48 of the Canadian International Trade Tribunal Act provides that where a person provides information to the Tribunal and designates that information as confidential so as to prevent its disclosure to other parties, and where the Tribunal ultimately finds the designation to be unwarranted, the information shall not be taken into account in the proceedings for the purposes for which it was provided unless the Tribunal obtains that information from some other source.

In its response to the Ninth Report, the Commission also expressed concern that a rule excluding evidence not previously disclosed to the appellant "would have the appearance of protecting the appellant, rather than treating all parties equally." Since, however, the information which will be relevant at the appeal is that on which the original decision was based and is information under the control of the department, such a rule would in fact ensure that all parties are treated equally, since it is only the appellant who may not be in possession of all of the relevant information.

In the course of the appearance before the Committee of the Chairman of the PSC, one further difficulty with regard to regulations requiring full disclosure was noted. The Chairman stated:

> There may be some documents or portions of documents which, because of their sensitivity or confidential nature, should not be disclosed other than within the setting of a hearing. I am talking of certain materials such as appraisal reports, police reports, technical information, and confidences of the Privy Council. It is important that those be disclosed within the setting of a hearing and that people not have copies of this information ahead of time which they would keep for themselves.

While this concern is valid, it does not constitute an insurmountable obstacle. For instance, in its brief to the Committee the Public Service Alliance of Canada proposed a mechanism whereby a department seeking to withhold particular information could request that the matter be determined by an appeal board at a pre-hearing conference. Should the appeal board decide that the department has sufficient reason to withhold information (or to restrict access to it), the board's final decision on the appeal would include reasons why an exception to full disclosure was allowed.

It should be borne in mind that the issue of disclosure arises whether the appeal is made under section 21 or section 31 of the Act. Since, however, appeals under section 31 relate to a recommendation that an employee be demoted or released for incompetence or incapacity, the consequences for the employee concerned are particularly serious. There are no disclosure provisions in the current Regulations requiring that the employee be given the reasons for the recommendation or access to the evidence on which it was based prior to the appeal hearing.

8. STATEMENT OF GROUNDS OF APPEAL

In the Ninth Report, it was noted that subsection 45(1) of the Regulations required that every appeal brought under section 21 or 31 of the Act "state the grounds on which the appeal is based". The Committee observed that in the absence of a legal right of access to the pertinent information, appellants could not be expected to meet such a requirement. The PSC recognized in its response that "an element of unfairness" existed. Rather than establish a requirement of full disclosure, however, the Commission adopted the simple expedient of removing the requirement to state the grounds of appeal from subsection 45(1) of the Regulations (see SOR/90-622, registered on August 29, 1990). The PSC has stated: "Since appellants tend to state the grounds for appeal in very vague terms, removal of this requirement would create no difficulty for anyone". Given the absence of any requirement for full disclosure, it comes as no surprise that appellants were forced to state their grounds in "very vague terms".

In explaining the recent amendment to subsection 45(1), the Commission has indicated that "there is no prejudice to departments or selected candidates in learning of the grounds of appeal of an appellant at the hearing of the appeal since the rules of natural justice entitle them to an adjournment should the appellant's grounds take them by surprise." It would therefore seem that the amendment is likely to increase both the duration and complexity of appeals, while in no way enhancing the ability of appellants to obtain access to all relevant information prior to the hearing of their appeals. Such an amendment can only be characterized as a retrograde step.

9. PUBLIC SERVICE OPINIONS AS A PREREQUISITE TO SUBSECTION 21(1) APPEALS

Subsection 21(1) of the Act provides that any public service employee may appeal against the appointment without competition of another person, but only after obtaining an opinion from the PSC that the unsuccessful candidate's "opportunity for advancement has been prejudicially affected" by the appointment. An appeal board cannot consider an appeal under subsection 21(1) until such an opinion has been given by the PSC. The Ninth Report recommended that the Regulations be amended to provide that the PSC must render its opinion within a fixed period of time. Where the PSC will not be in a position to give its opinion within the prescribed time, it would notify the employee who requested the opinion of its inability to do so and set out, in a written notice, the time by which it proposes to give its opinion.

The Commission responded that it was "not opposed to such a regulation but since it would be unenforceable, the Commission is not convinced that regulating itself would resolve the numerous problems which result in delays in rendering an opinion". Testifying before the Committee, the Chairman of the PSC indicated that this "unenforceability" referred to the incapacity of the PSC, given present resources, to render its opinions in a more timely fashion. Evidence given by the Chairman of the PSC indicated that for 1988, the most recent year for which such statistics were available at the time, about 68 per cent of subsection 21(1) opinions were rendered within three months. Some cases, however, took 12 months or longer.

Where the PSC fails to render its opinion in a timely fashion, the employee's right to appeal under subsection 21(1) of the Act is effectively undermined. Administrative constraints within the PSC itself cannot serve to justify a denial of the employee's right to have his or her appeal heard promptly. The creation of a legal requirement that opinions be rendered in a timely fashion can only serve to enhance this right.

The Chairman of the Commission has stated to the Committee that "it is rare for tribunals, boards, commissions or courts to be required by law to decide a matter within a given period of time." With due respect, it is nothing of the sort. Subsection 18.22(1) of the Tax Court of Canada Act provides: "The Court shall, other than in exceptional circumstances, render judgment on an appeal referred to in section 18 not later than sixty days after the day on which the hearing is concluded." The Canadian International Trade Tribunal Act requires the Tribunal to report on each inquiry commenced by it not later than 180 days after the inquiry is commenced (s.29(1)). Provision is made for extending this period for up to 90 days (s.29(2)). Subsection 39(1) of the Procurement Review Board Regulations, made pursuant to the Canada-United States Free Trade Agreement Implementation Act, requires the Board to issue a determination on a complaint within 90 days after the filing of the complaint. Subsection 39(2) of the Regulations permits this time to be extended in exceptional circumstances, provided that these circumstances are set out in writing. The foregoing examples serve to illustrate the nature of the requirements recommended by the Committee in the Ninth Report.

The Committee had also recommended that the Commission enshrine in the Regulations its practice of allowing both parties to be heard prior to rendering an opinion for purposes of subsection 21(1) of the Act, as well as that of giving reasons for its decision. The position of the PSC in this regard is that since it is now its practice to furnish reasons and an opportunity for the parties to be heard, regulations requiring that this be done would add nothing to the present regime. Again, this response evidences the Commission's inability to grasp the fundamental distinction between a procedure based on the good will of the PSC and one required by law. The intransigence of the PSC in this regard is particularly incomprehensible given that regulations dealing with these matters would simply reflect present practices and procedures.

10. NOTICE OF HEARING OF APPEALS

In testimony before the Committee on May 16, 1985, the Director General of the Appeals Directorate of the PSC assured the Joint Committee that although section 47 of the Regulations only requires appeal boards to give three days notice of a hearing, in practice the notice period is never less than two and a half weeks, and indicated that he fully supported an amendment to the Regulations requiring a longer notice period. Subsequently, in his letter of July 29, 1985, the Director General, Staffing and Management Category Programs, confirmed that the Regulations would be amended to provide for a 14 day notice period as recommended by the Committee.

In its response to the Ninth Report, however, the Commission stated: "the flexibility which a minimum three-day notice provides should not be lost. ... The Commission therefore does not propose to amend at this time section 47 of the Regulations." In effect, the PSC reneged on its undertaking while admitting that only the minimum notice is given in some cases.

In the course of testimony before the Committee, the Chairman of the PSC indicated a renewed willingness to increase the notice period provided for in section 47, stating: "we have no basic problems with what you are proposing to us." It is the hope of this Committee that the relevant amendment will now be undertaken without further delay. The Committee would also observe that it is possible for the Regulations to allow for a shorter notice period upon the consent of the parties.

11. The Commission has consistently argued that present administrative procedures and guidelines are adequate, and that the principles of natural justice and fairness already require the sort of procedural guarantees which the Committee has recommended be included in the Regulations. While recognizing that the PSC has made efforts to strengthen its guidelines with respect to appeal procedures, the Committee cannot stress too strongly that such procedures, relying as they do solely on the willingness of departments and the PSC to apply them, can never be a substitute for legally binding regulations. Where procedural safeguards can be clearly and concisely set out in regulations it is preferable that this be done, rather than relying on the courts to afford protection through the application of common law principles at the culmination of expensive and time-consuming court proceedings. Individuals should not unnecessarily be forced to resort to the courts to obtain recognition of their right to fair and due process. Moreover, the adoption of regulations could not but serve to enhance the perception that the appeal process is one characterized by fairness.

12. RECOMMENDATIONS

Your Committee reaffirms its recommendations that the Regulations be amended to:

i. Provide for full and mandatory disclosure to any unsuccessful candidate or the candidate's representative, upon request, of all particulars relevant to the decision appealed against;

ii. Provide for full and mandatory disclosure to an employee of the grounds on which a recommendation that the employee be released or demoted is based;

iii. Preclude the use in an appeal under section 21 or 31 of the Act of any document or information of which the appellant has no knowledge or that has not been communicated to him;

iv. Provide that a department wanting to withhold or limit access to information must have the matter determined by the appeal board at a pre-hearing conference. Where the request is granted, reasons why an exception to the full disclosure rule was allowed would be included in the final decision on the appeal;

v. Provide that the PSC must render its opinion pursuant to section 21(1) of the Act within a fixed period of time. The Regulations could also provide that where the Commission cannot give its opinion within the prescribed time, it must notify the employee who requested the opinion of its inability to do so and set out, in a written notice, the date by which the Commission will give its opinion;

vi. Guarantee the right of employees and departments to make representations to the Commission in relation to their claims under section 21(1) of the Act and reflect the existing practice whereby the PSC always gives reasons for its section 21(1) opinions;

vii. Extend the notice period for appeal hearings to two weeks from the present three day minimum requirement.

13. While it considers it important to reiterate these recommendations, your Committee holds out little hope that they will be implemented. The position taken by the PSC with regard to the Committee's earlier recommendations has done little to negate the unfortunate impression that the Commission is more preoccupied with avoiding the imposition of binding rules of conduct on departmental administrators and on itself than it is with the need to implement an appeal system that is both fair and seen to be fair by participants and that furthers the Commission's duty to uphold the merit principle.

14. BILL C-26, PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO THE PUBLIC SERVICE EMPLOYMENT ACT

Bill C-26, tabled in the House of Commons on June 18, 1991, proposes significant changes to the provisions of the Act mentioned in this report. Passage of the Bill will thus undoubtedly lead to major revisions to the Regulations as well. It should be emphasized, however, that the principles underlying the recommendations made by your Committee in both this report and the Ninth Report will be equally relevant to amendments to the Regulations following upon the passage of Bill C-26, and it is your Committee's hope that any such amendments will reflect these principles.

Bill C-26 would repeal section 31 of the Act, thus removing all reference to demotion or dismissal for incompetence or incapacity from the statute. It would also amend section 21 of the Act by removing the requirement that an employee seeking to appeal against the appointment without competition of another person must first obtain the opinion of the PSC that the employee's opportunity for advancement was prejudicially affected by the appointment. All appeals pursuant to proposed section 21(1), both with respect to appointments without competition and appointments following closed competitions, could, however, only be made "in the circumstances ... provided for by the regulations of the Commission."

Proposed sections 21(3) and 21(4) of the Act would establish an additional appeal process. Section 21(3) provides that where it is ultimately determined that there was a defect in the process for the selection of a person for appointment "the Commission may take such measures as it considers necessary to remedy the defect." Pursuant to section 21(4), where a person is appointed or about to be appointed as a result of such measures, an appeal may be taken under section 21(1), but "only on the ground that the measures so taken did not result in a selection for appointment according to merit." It is also worth noting that the regulation-making powers set out in clause 23 of Bill C-26 expressly authorize the making of regulations "respecting the disclosure of personal information obtained in the course of an investigation, inquiry or procedure for appointment under this Act."

Proposed sections 34.3 to 34.5 would provide for an employee's recourse on "deployment", defined as "the transfer of an employee from one position to another". An employee who is deployed and any other employee in the work place to which the deployment is made could lodge a complaint that the deployment was not authorized by, or made in accordance with, the Act or that it constituted an abuse of authority. An employee who lodged a complaint or whose deployment was the subject of a complaint, and who was not satisfied with its disposition, could refer the matter to the PSC for investigation. The proposed amendments would also grant regulation-making powers for the implementation of this scheme, and your Committee reiterates that any such regulations should reflect the principles upon which its recommendations, as set out in both this report and the Ninth Report, are based.

A copy of the relevant Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence (Issue No. 10, Third Session, Thirty-fourth Parliament) is tabled in the House of Commons.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Murray's democratic colleagues have 235 days to call an election, and his colleagues who are cowardly and contemptuous of democracy have 621 days.

ABORIGINAL LANGUAGES DAY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: I would like to draw to the attention of senators that today is Aboriginal Languages Day, a time to reflect upon the fundamental importance of education and communications to the future opportunities for our aboriginal Canadians—education and communications, not just in our languages but in theirs. And that is basic to the survival of aboriginal pride and history and culture in this country and the incentive for young people in the aboriginal communities to strive for learning and involvement.

Each senator will have received a letter from the National Chief of the Assembly of First Nations who has asked us to reflect on this matter today. I just want to quote one paragraph from that letter in which Ovide Mercredi says:

> This land is the homeland of our mother tongues. Canada is our motherland. If our languages disappear from Canada, part of the history also disappears. If our languages disappear from Canada, they cannot be retrieved from another land.

In the poster which accompanies this letter from the Assembly of First Nations and the Native Council of Canada is another very meaningful quotation which tells us, "If we can speak and understand our language, our elders can then tell us who we are."

Honourable senators, this is an effort well deserving of our support.

THE CONSTITUTION

RESPONSE TO BEAUDOIN-DOBBIE REPORT

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, yesterday, after I spoke on the Beaudoin-Dobbie report, the honourable Senator Roblin spoke. He made a number of points. One was that an elected Senate with powers would act as a curb on the executive and, therefore, on the House of Commons. I suggest that our Constitution of 1867, which established the Senate, had precisely that aim; that is precisely what the founding fathers declared as the purpose of the Senate.

There is another federation with a Parliamentary system like ours—not a congressional one. I am referring to Australia which also has a senate with power to curb the executive, that is the lower house, and it gives the prime minister the power of double dissolution. But there is another point. Very eloquently, Senator Roblin said we must first feel Canadian to be able to solve the country's problems, that he himself is a loyal Manitoban, but he is first a Canadian. I compliment him for that. I am first a Canadian also.

However, these myths in Quebec that I was talking about have made a profound difference there. I know too few Quebecers who are Canadians first. They are, first, Quebecers. The problem we have to face is how to find a constitutional accommodation between 20 million people who feel Canadian first and whatever their province is second, and 6 million who feel they are Quebecers first and Canadians second.

If Senator Roblin thinks that is not important, I invite him to look around the next time he is in caucus and try to count among his colleagues who are Francophones from Quebec those who are Canadian first. In this chamber I can name Senator Bolduc, who I think is Canadian first; I think Senator Beaudoin is Canadian first, as is Madame Chaput-Rolland, and after that I will speak no more. I leave it to Senator Roblin to judge them.

DEBT SERVICING AND REDUCTION ACCOUNT BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-21, relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, April 2, 1992.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 150 residents of the province of New Brunswick who object to the goods and services tax. These petitions are mostly from Saint John, Hampton, Sussex, Oromocto and Saint George.

I have also the honour to present petitions signed by 25 residents of the province of New Brunswick who object to the goods and services tax. These petitions are mostly from Fredericton, Grand Falls and Oromocto. This is a total of 275 residents of the beautiful province of senator Simard who, so far, never presented a single small petition signed by his fellow New Brunswickers, either for or against the GST.

I thank you.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, while it might be after the fact, its being 14 months since the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs tabled its report entitled "It's Almost Too Late", I have the honour to present a petition which I have today received from J.J. Strong of St. John's, Newfoundland, containing the names of 36 Newfoundlanders supporting the recommendations contained in that report, and applauding the recent announcement by the Minister of Veterans Affairs of the recognition of merchant seamen as veterans.

I would smuggle in a word of thanks to Senator Thériault for his kind words on March 26, and express the fact that, despite the criticism the Senate receives from across the country, the Senate can perform its duty for regions and for minorities. I am proud that the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the government have seen fit to grant all benefits to merchant navy veterans.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

ABOLITION OF SENATE—STATEMENT OF MINISTER

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate that I would ask him to take up with his colleague, Mr. Clark.

Recent news stories state, for example, "Clark Menace les Provinces D'abolir le Sénat". The English version reads, "Clark Threatens to Abolish the Senate". This is part of the negotiating process and is a reaction to a statement by one of the provincial premiers.

I must say that I am surprised at Mr. Clark's statement. It sounds like an attack—I hope an uncharacteristic attack—of delusions of grandeur, or even megalomania. I must confess that I have had certain attacks, which I have had to put down, of respect, affection, even admiration for Mr. Clark. I cannot imagine him saying that.

Senator Barootes: Read the rest of his statement.

Senator Frith: If he did not know much about the Canadian Constitution before his recent obligations—I expect he did know plenty about it—he certainly does know a lot about it now. For any member of the government or the House of Commons or the Senate to say to a provincial premier, "I might abolish the Senate," indicates an unbelievable lack of knowledge, which I do not believe is true in his case.

Of course, Mr. Clark cannot abolish the Senate; the Prime Minister cannot abolish the Senate; the House of Commons cannot abolish the Senate; the Senate cannot abolish the Senate; one provincial premier cannot abolish the Senate; two cannot; three cannot; four cannot; five cannot. It takes all of them put together—the House of Commons, the Senate and all of the provincial premiers—to abolish the Senate.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate will give Mr. Clark the opportunity, through him, to explain to the Senate that he never had such an attack of megalomania that would mean that he thinks he can abolish the Senate.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition should not infer from a headline or even from a news report that Mr. Clark is unaware of the fact that it would take the consent—

Senator Frith: Quite right. That is exactly why I want you to ask him.

Senator Murray: —of Parliament and the 10 provinces to abolish the Senate.

Having said that, the abolition of the Senate is always one of the options that are discussed when the question of Senate reform comes up. One or two provinces have favoured it. There is a political party in this country that has always favoured it. There are some who think that some of the models for Senate reform are so bad that abolition would be preferable. So abolition is a matter that is always under discussion when the subject of Senate reform comes up.

I shall draw the honourable senator's question—if it was a question—to the attention of my colleague.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Government for his characteristic lecture. Of course, that is not necessarily an inference. The point of the question was to give Mr. Clark an opportunity, through the Leader of the Government in the Senate, to tell the Senate that that would not be a proper inference.

THE ECONOMY

FIRST MINISTERS CONFERENCE—ONTARIO ECONOMIC ANALYSIS TABLED—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL RESPONSE

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, last week at a meeting of the federal-provincial first ministers and ministers of finance, the Ontario government tabled an economic analysis describing Ontario's apparent asymmetrical or unbalanced receipt of transfer payments for social purposes from the Government of Canada. The press reports following that meeting, or during the meeting, stated that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance violently disagreed with Premier Rae and the Ontario government's economic analysis.

My question is this: Has the government of Canada prepared its own written analysis, and would it make it available to the Senate in response to the Ontario government's position?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The answers are yes and yes, honourable senators.

Senator Grafstein: When?

Senator Murray: I don't have the document in front of me, but there is one, and I will be glad to bring it in.

THE CONSTITUTION

STATEMENT BY THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It stems from the headline of an article in the Journal de Montréal where minister Benoît Bouchard is quoted as saying:

> I will not fight machine guns with a pocketknife.

Mr. Bouchard, the federal Minister of Health and Welfare, keeps refusing to go and defend his government's position in Quebec.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Says who?

Senator Thériault: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell this House what Mr. Bouchard's statement means when he states that he will not fight machine guns with a pocketknife?

Senator Murray: What is the nature of the question? I hear what the honourable senator has just said. All I want to know is the specific nature of the question the honourable senator is asking me and wants an answer to.

[English]

Senator Frith: You be a good boy and listen to how things should be done!

[Translation]

Senator Thériault: I think my question was explicit. What does the minister mean by that or what is he saying?

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Ask the minister himself. You are in the wrong Chamber.

Senator Thériault: Between Senator Frith and Senator Simard, there is not much room left for me. Is minister Bouchard comparing the Beaudoin-Dobbie report to a pocketknife and the Allaire or Bélanger-Campeau report to machine guns? What does he really mean? He is not the only one involved in that statement. Bouchard and Loiselle are as well. They are the three musketeers of separatism in the Canadian government. What does he mean? Is he not satisfied with the Beaudoin-Dobbie report? If that is not the case, what does he want then? Why fight with Quebec?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I would be glad to refer the question to my colleague, Mr. Bouchard and to ask him whether he would like to comment on the statement that appeared in the Journal de Montréal. That being said, I am not surprised to see that Mr. Bouchard and his government colleagues would much prefer to defend constitutional proposals that are supported not just by the federal parties but also by the other provinces.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, Mr. Clark is not reluctant to go to Alberta to defend the government's position or the Dobbie-Beaudoin report on Senate reform. The Prime Minister of Canada does not hesitate to go to Quebec. In fact, he went last week, and thank God we have at least one member of the government defending the Canadian position in Quebec.

How can the Leader of the Government in the Senate and all my Senate colleagues from Quebec justify their complete silence, when their Prime Minister is prepared to go and defend Canada's position in Quebec, and meanwhile, they are neither saying nor doing anything at all for our country in Quebec? They are members of the government. They are not only members of Parliament from Quebec but they are members of the federal government. What kind of attitude is that?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Senator Thériault is wrong about the position taken by Mr. Clark, the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. Mr. Clark is not defending the Beaudoin-Dobbie report on the Senate. Mr. Clark is defending the concept of Senate reform, the details of which have yet to be negotiated. Mr. Clark is defending this concept while urging all parties to approach the issue in a spirit of compromise. That is what the government ministers are defending. They are defending the concept of Canada, a united Canada. I can't help it if the media do not always report every statement by every minister.

I can give the honourable senator the assurance that my cabinet colleagues from Quebec and the other provinces share his commitment to Canada.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, in an interview or a debate that I saw on television, when told by a provincial colleague from Alberta that if he did not change his position, he would be beaten in the next election, Mr. Clark said, as any minister in a Canadian government should say:

> It is more important for me that Canada remain united than that I be re-elected.

That is the kind of position we should expect from any minister in a Canadian government. That is the sort of position that Messrs. Bouchard, Loiselle and so on should take in Quebec. If they are not prepared to take such a position, they should resign from the Government of Canada and go to the Government of Quebec. That is the position that all my fellow senators from Quebec should take if they really believe in our country.

Senator Simard: You are in no position to teach us a lesson.

Senator Thériault: The media report it every day. Of all the ministers in the federal government, only Brian Mulroney is ready to go to Quebec and defend federalism. It is sad to see our country in that state. Canadians have lost confidence.

Canadians do not know if some important members of the Government of Canada are for separation or Canadian unity.

Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. After the statement that the Minister of National Defence made last week or the week before, how can he be allowed to go back on the federal government's promise to build a depot in Moncton, in the Maritimes? A formal promise had been made and announced. He made that promise without saying whether he is for separation or for Canada. Are Canadians not right to wonder what is going on in this country?

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate ask Mr. Masse—Before making the decision to build a $100-million depot for National Defence in Montreal, should we not at least wait for the result of the referendum and see what side Mr. Masse takes in Quebec?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the decision of the Minister of National Defense was made in the light of the changes in foreign policies as well as Defense policies that we have witnessed around the world. The situation has changed drastically, and so have the budgets of the Department of National Defense. Already in the last four or five years, the government has cut maybe $5 billion in the expenses projected for the future. It was a matter of centralizing some depots in Montreal and Edmonton. The decision was made strictly for financial and economic reasons, and to improve the efficiency of the Department's operations.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, it is still the same figure of $100 million; it is always the same figure. It was $100 million for Moncton, and now it is $100 million for Montreal. The decision has been made. How many other decisions made by the present government are strictly politically motivated?

I am convinced that people in New Brunswick would be able to accept this new setback if, at least, they could be sure that this facility for Canadian militia will be located in a Canadian province.

Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate prepared to say today that if Quebec is no longer part of Canada, this facility will not be constructed in Montreal?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my questions follow those of Senator Thériault. Immediately after the Beaudoin-Dobbie Report was tabled, the Prime Minister said, I regret not having his exact words, that it was an excellent report. The Prime Minister spoke very highly of this report. Is that the position of the Department? Is that a departmental decision or is it purely a decision made by Mr. Mulroney?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Beaudoin-Dobbie Report is a report prepared by a joint committee of the Canadian Parliament. The report as such is not binding on the government. The honourable senator knows that it is the intention of the government to examine all the recommendations made in the report, and consult the provincial governments before formulating a series of official proposals. As I said earlier, a series of proposals that would not only have the support of federal political parties, but also of provincial governments.

Senator Molgat: I understand that very well. Nevertheless, the Prime Minister made a formal and very favourable statement concerning this report. My question does not have to do with what the government will do: It has to do with this statement made by the Prime Minister. Was that the position of the department or simply the position of the Prime Minister?

I want a clear answer. I do not want long evasive speech. Is it simply what the Prime Minister thinks, or is it what the department thinks?

Senator Murray: It is what the Cabinet thinks. Of course, the Prime Minister speaks on behalf of us all. It is not only a question of ministerial solidarity; the Prime Minister was right in praising this report as the best offer ever made to Quebec. We all share this opinion of the Prime Minister.

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Even Mr. Masse?

• (1430)

Senator Murray: Yes, even Mr. Masse doesn't challenge the Prime Minister's assessment of the report, and he never did.

Senator Gigantès: And Mr. Loiselle?

Senator Murray: I said all.

Senator Molgat: So this is clearly a position taken by all members of cabinet.

Senator Murray: Every single one.

Senator Molgat: A cabinet decision is binding on all ministers. There are no two ways about it. So why isn't Mr. Benoît Bouchard and others with him not prepared to go and defend Canada, and this includes Mr. Loiselle and Mr. Masse? Why aren't these ministers prepared to go and defend Canada in Quebec? Are they federal ministers or are they Quebec ambassadors to cabinet? If they are federal ministers, and if there is a cabinet position, don't they have an obligation under our political system and according to their own conscience to go out and defend positions taken by cabinet.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition spends his weekends in Manitoba. My cabinet colleagues from Quebec spend their weekends in Quebec, where they vigorously defend Canada.

Senator Thériault: And the interests of Quebec?

Senator Molgat: So why did he say he was not prepared to go and fight to defend Canada? He was unwilling to go to battle with a knife. The Prime Minister stated the Beaudoin-Dobbie report was outstanding, and you told me it was a cabinet position, but this minister said it was just a knife against a battery of machine guns and he was not prepared to defend the report.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I said before, according to the Prime Minister's assessment of the Beaudoin-Dobbie report, this is the best offer ever made to Quebec. However, the government is not committed to every single one of the report's recommendations. The content of the constitutional proposals remains to be negotiated by the federal government with the provinces. Eventually we will have a whole series of official proposals to put forward. The honourable senator is aware of the timeframe that has been set. As far as Canada is concerned, Minister Bouchard and all my cabinet colleagues from Quebec, like our colleagues from the other provinces, are constantly defending Canada in their own regions.

Senator Molgat: Mr. Minister, you are beating around the bush, as usual, whenever there is a question you don't like. But let's get back to the point. You gave me the assurance that cabinet agreed with the Prime Minister's statement. If cabinet agreed with what was said by Mr. Mulroney—as you will recall, he was lavish in his praise, and I am sorry I don't have his exact words—if that is the case, doesn't this mean that Ministers Bouchard, Masse and Loiselle have an obligation to go to Quebec and say so?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the three ministers referred to by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition all fully endorsed what the Prime Minister had to say about the Beaudoin-Dobbie report.

Senator Molgat: Can you quote chapter and verse? A minister is reported as saying he wouldn't do it. He said he wouldn't. It was like using a knife against a machine gun. You are telling me he will. Give us just one example, one instance.

Senator Murray: Mr. Masse, Mr. Bouchard and Mr. Loiselle have all three fully endorsed the Prime Minister's statement that the Beaudoin-Dobbie Report was the best offer Quebec ever had.

Senator Molgat: Mr. Minister, we would be delighted to hear about a speech by one of these three ministers. Bring us a speech that shows they said something positive about Canada and the Beaudoin-Dobbie report. If you are so sure, bring it in. We can wait.

Senator Thériault: Honorable senators, I am going to quote for you what Mr. Benoît Bouchard said:

> The Prime Minister, and he is supposed to as head of the Government, has decided to be very clear. But it is not because Loiselle, Masse, other Ministers or myself don't wave the Canadian flag standing out on the barricades . . .

Senator Simard: It is senator Hébert who said that last year!

Senator Thériault: . . . are not waving the Canadian flag. Then, what flag are they waving?

[Senator Molgat.]

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bolduc, seconded by the Honourable Senator Grimard, for the third reading of Bill C-32, to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, with the imposition of closure on this piece of legislation, there is absolutely nothing we in this chamber can say or do that would result in any change whatsoever to Bill C-32. However, I do not want to miss an opportunity to register a vigorous protest on behalf of my province of Alberta on the substance of the bill and the unilateral way in which the federal government proceeded with it.

Bill C-32 extends the five per cent ceiling on the Canada Assistance Plan payments from two years to five years for Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, who are net contributors to the equalization dollars redistributed to the remaining provinces. The federal government estimates that it will cut over $2.1 billion from Canada Assistance Plan transfers to these three provinces over the five-year period. But the provinces' own estimates of their losses are considerably higher.

Ontario estimates that the cap on Canada Assistance Plan payments will cost it $1 billion in 1991-92 alone, while B.C. will lose about $148 million in 1992-93. Alberta's Treasurer, Dick Johnston, estimates that this plan will cost the provincial treasury $35 million this year, and more than $200 million in 1992-93. These additional costs are a direct result of more families falling victim to the nation-wide recession and to the severe downturn in Alberta's energy resources and the agriculture industry.

Since Alberta is my home province, I would like to consider for a moment the number of Albertans who depend upon social assistance and the adequacy of the program. In 1990, before the recession really hit, 148,800 Albertans, of whom at least 40 per cent were children, depended on the Canada Assistance Plan for basic food, clothing and shelter. In December 1991, 173,100 Albertans—46 per cent of whom were children—were dependent on Canada Assistance Plan payments. Of those, nearly 45 per cent were members of single parent families.

Consider further, honourable senators, that the number of food banks operating in my province has risen from one in 1981 to 40 in 1991. Consider, too, that of the 2 million people depending on Canada's 292 food banks, some 700,000, or 40 per cent, are children under the age of 18.

Indeed, in my own city of Lethbridge, Alberta, there was a report about a week ago which said that Lethbridge children under 18 account for nearly one-half of the clients at one of the city's two food banks. The Director of the Food Bank Society in Lethbridge said, "We are starting to cut back. We simply haven't enough supplies any more. We are just hoping to stay in business for another year."

Bill C-32 is one in a long series of deepening and, perhaps, irreversible cuts to social programs taken by this government since 1984 to meet its stated objectives of reducing the federal deficit and downsizing government. These cuts began in 1985 with the partial deindexing of child benefits, and continued on through the clawback of family allowances and old age pensions.

These cuts included tightening and retightening unemployment insurance and cutting back again and again on social housing allocations, and yet again in the recent budget. They included enormous cutbacks in training funds, the means by which people climb out of unemployment and off welfare. Now, unemployment insurance money is being directed at training at a time when large numbers of Canadians need the full benefits of that fund to support them at a time of massive job loss and lay-offs.

The impact of all this cutting and recutting on provincial and local programs—and, in turn, on low-income and low-skilled Canadians in every region—has been horrendous. Inevitably, these cuts are being borne by Canadians and communities who can least afford it.

While Alberta, British Columbia, and Ontario are Canada's wealthiest provinces, in fact these provinces are also home to more than 50 per cent of Canada's poor. Let us remember that the so-called welfare poor of this country, regardless of what province they live in, are in reality mostly children and single mothers.

The largest single category of Canada Assistance Plan beneficiaries—37 per cent—are children. The remainder include the parents of these children, many of them single, and Canadians suffering from chronic disabilities, poor health, low or non-existent job and social skills. The purpose of the Canada Assistance Plan is to alleviate these desperate concerns. Canada Assistance Plan funding matches provincial dollars in providing basic social assistance to these poorest of Canadian citizens. These funds also match provincial dollars to provide dental care for those on social assistance, essential services for disabled people, foster care for abused children, safe housing for abused women and subsidized child care for low-income families.

However, the deep and continuing recession combined with job loss due to, among other things, free trade and globalization is placing extreme pressure on an ever-increasing number of Canadian families, many of whom are at or near the end of their unemployment insurance benefits, which means they will have no choice but to join the welfare rolls.

My concern for these high-risk families deepened when, in the latest budget, this government discarded its three-time promise of a national child care program and universal family benefits with the elimination of the family allowance. Low-income families are supposed to be the big winners with this latest rejigging of the child benefits program. However, an analysis by the former director of the National Council of Welfare, Ken Battle, shows that the enrichment of monthly benefits for low-income families will look good only for about as long as the time it takes to get past the next election. Then, year by year, the partial deindexation of the benefit will cause it to erode continuously. By the end of the decade, Mr. Battle predicts that a single parent with two children earning $15,000 in 1993 will lose 20 per cent of his or her benefit, and that a couple with two jobs, two children and a $20,000 annual income will lose the same 27 per cent.

Honourable senators, all these changes will do nothing at all for families on social assistance.

Mr. Battle has termed partial deindexation as a "fiscally powerful and politically invisible mechanism" that allows Canada to siphon money from social programs. Bill C-32 is just another element of this deceptive approach.

This legislation is disturbing on a number of fronts. It is part of the net effect of dismantling national programs that were originally established to provide Canadians with a social safety net and basic standards of services. These programs were built over decades on a firm base of nationally-held values: values of social equity and the desire to ensure a basic standard of care for those who cannot care adequately for themselves.

These values grew out of the harsh experiences of the depression, and the realization that a country cannot be sustained by offering the people no hope on any front. It did not work for R.B. Bennett and it will not work for this government, either.

Another area of concern with this bill is the ease with which the federal government undertook unilateral action to limit its financial responsibility under long-standing federal-provincial agreements. That action was challenged in the courts. There was a victory in the appeal court in British Columbia, but, finally, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that, in law, the federal government has the power to change unilaterally the conditions or terms of any federal-provincial agreement. But what is offensive here is that the Mulroney government's decision to exert this power in this manner has cast serious doubts on all federal-provincial cost sharing agreements.

That leads to my next concern, which is how far this government believes it can push its goals and objectives of increased efficiency and reduced national government without weakening irreparably the already tenuous links that hold this country together.

The series of national programs that Canadians and former governments fought to put in place comprised a type of social contract with Canadians in every part of this country. Equalization, the Canada Assistance Plan, Established Programs Financing formed the three arms of that contract. Since 1984, both the Established Programs Financing and the Canada Assistance Plan have come under repeated attack. Since 1986, the EPF funding formula has been cut, cut again, frozen, and refrozen at 1989 levels until 1994-95.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

At the same time, the federal government has seriously weakened its own power to enforce the principles of the Canada Health Act which govern medicare.

In the spring of 1991, the National Council on Welfare published a study called "Funding Health and Higher Education", suggesting that, if the current trend continues, every last penny of federal cash for health and higher education under the 1977 fiscal arrangements will disappear within a few years.

Alberta Treasurer Dick Johnston has noted that:

> It is generally agreed that federal cash transfers for health and post-secondary education will dwindle to nothing within 15 years.

Now we have Bill C-32 legislating a three-year extension of a ceiling that has been on the Canada Assistance Plan for the last two years in Alberta, Ontario, and British Columbia.

Next we may see a ceiling on this plan for the have-not provinces. In fact, Manitoba joined the court challenge for exactly that reason—because they feared that a ruling in favour of the federal government would set a precedent for further unilateral off-loading of other programs cost-shared with the provinces. I suspect that we will see a further whittling away as long as this government is in power, until the Canada Assistance Plan finally goes the way of the Family Allowance.

The Conservative approach to social spending has been described as "social policy by stealth". All it takes is a two- or three-month battle in Parliament to put these formulae in place, and then inflation does the government's dirty work for it.

Let us make no mistake about it, honourable senators. We are entrenching an "underclass" in our country which will become generational. It may be difficult if not impossible to change it. The cost in human terms to the lives of individual Canadians is tragic and it will have major consequences for the future development and prosperity of this country and its position in the world.

Children, after all, are a nation's hope. When more than 1 million of Canada's children are today living in poverty, within their families, on the streets, dropping out of school, unable to learn, hungry, and developing a visceral anger and frustration against the system, we are indeed jeopardizing the future of this country.

Do we really care? I suggest that when our government and our Parliament legitimizes a pattern of withdrawal from taking this reality and tackling it head on, we as lawmakers incur a tremendous load of blame.

Bill C-32 is part of this pattern. It deserves to be defeated.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear.

Hon. William M. Kelly: I wish to say in advance that I believe under the new rules I am required to limit my remarks to 10 minutes. I may be a minute or so over, but, if so, I would ask in advance for permission to complete my remarks.

Honourable senators, I believe I said most of what I wanted to say on Bill C-32 when I spoke at second reading.

The Hon. the Speaker: I want to correct the statement of Senator Kelly. He has 15 minutes, not 10.

Senator Kelly: I may have misread it. Under time allocation I believe it is 10 minutes.

Senator Gigantès: Who is right? You guys wrote the rules.

Senator Frith: This might be a good time to get it straight, before we start the clock.

Senator Gigantès: It would be nice to know for when our turn comes.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, as briefly as possible today, I feel compelled to respond to Senator Frith's remarks made in this place during second reading on February 28. I say in all candour that, since arriving in the Senate, I have learned that Senator Frith can always be counted on for a good show. I always look forward with great anticipation when he arrives in his place to pour forth fire and brimstone on the government's latest initiative. He did not disappoint us in the thespian qualities which he once again demonstrated in his remarks on February 28.

Honourable senators, I cannot hope to match Senator Frith in eloquence.

Senator Perrault: No, you can't.

Senator Kelly: That's right. I said it first. I say in all honesty that his speech was an excellent, perhaps even brilliant, summary of the obviously heartfelt concerns that some groups, individuals and provinces have about the kind of action demonstrated in Bill C-32. I recognize that federal transfers to provinces for education, health, and social assistance are emotional issues. But, honourable senators, we should not let emotion cloud our judgment or, much worse, cloud the facts.

Senator Perrault: No, don't let emotion affect anything. Don't let emotion affect your grants to big business.

Senator Kelly: Senator Frith's remarks are sprinkled with words or phrases such as, "taking money", "cut back", "cutting federal transfers to the provinces under the CAP act" and so on. The inference, and I am sure it would be unintended, could be that the federal government is reducing in absolute terms its transfers to Ontario, British Columbia, and Alberta under CAP.

In fact, as we all know, honourable senators, all Bill C-32 does is continue to cap the growth of federal transfers to Ontario, B.C. and Alberta at 5 per cent per annum, which I might point out is higher than the anticipated rate of inflation. It will still result in an increase of about $100 million to Ontario, $36 million to B.C., and $26 million to Alberta.

One could also infer, perhaps incorrectly, from Senator Frith's remarks that Bill C-32 represents a new policy, a new departure from established policy and precedent. Again, all of us realize that this is just not so. As I mentioned in my remarks at second reading, Bill C-32 continues the limits announced as part of the budget in February 1990 and in place since that time. It was for that reason and for that reason alone that I, in my remarks at second reading, referred to this measure as simple and straightforward, a remark that Senator Frith found offensive.

Honourable senators, it is simple and straightforward, and I do not apologize for using that phrase, because the bill seeks simply to continue a policy and legislation that have been in place for some time.

Senator Frith: How long?

Senator Kelly: Since February 1990.

Senator Frith: Under this government.

Senator Kelly: Yes, but it was announced and thoroughly discussed and described at that time.

Senator Frith: I take it you were not implying that it was a precedent laid down earlier.

Senator Kelly: I will say to Senator Frith I do intend to deal with some of the past situations that existed in the same circumstances.

● (1510)

Some of my colleagues opposite might like Canadians to infer that limiting transfers to the provinces began with this government. Once again, honourable senators, we know, of course, that that is not true. Reductions in transfers began in fiscal 1982-83 when the federal government actually cut Established Programs Financing payments to the provinces by almost $1 billion over the period to the end of 1984.

It is probably unnecessary—and perhaps childish—for me to point out that these cuts were imposed by the previous government under a previous Minister of Finance, whom we now number amongst our distinguished colleagues, at a time when the entire country, particularly Ontario, was struggling out of the worst recession in years. Those limitations were imposed by the federal government when Ontario was grappling with high unemployment, high dependence on welfare, a high level of child poverty and an eroded tax base. I might mention as well that the cuts were imposed on all provinces, even the relatively poor provinces which were less able than the others to make up the difference.

Honourable senators, I meant to check the records, but I assume that Senator Frith was equally condemnatory of that initiative when it was proposed in this place as he now is of the bill before us today.

Senator Frith: Didn't you check and find out?

Senator Kelly: I did not. I must say with some embarrassment however, Senator Frith, that I was critical of it at that time as well.

Senator Frith: In the absence of checking, you were prepared to assume.

Senator Molgat: You should use your research funds.

Senator Kelly: There is one other point I should like to make in response to Senator Frith, and I make it with some trepidation. I usually like to avoid using lengthy lists of statistics in any debate. Having said that, I asked the statisticians at StatsCan to run some numbers for me. I am sure Senator

Frith and some of his colleagues will find these numbers interesting.

For example, StatsCan advises me that the federal government's total expenditure for social services was $9.85 billion in 1974-75. It rose progressively to $33.2 billion in 1984-85, and for 1991-92 is projected to reach $54.5 billion. Those of you who are handy with figures, or with calculators handy, will see that the increase since 1974-75 has been almost six-fold, and the increase since 1984-85 has been almost 64 per cent. I might point out that federal spending on social services in 1981-82, the years covering our last serious recession, was $21.8 billion, less than half of what it is today.

Federal, provincial and municipal funding for social services, which was about $15.5 billion in 1975-76, is now more than four times that amount, some $66.7 billion, having risen inexorably year after year. Total spending on social services by the three levels of government was $29.7 billion in 1981-82, less than half of what it is today. In my own province of Ontario, which Senator Frith referred to as being disadvantaged by Bill C-32, expenditures on social services and social welfare were $1.8 billion in 1975 , $3.3 billion in 1981, and about $9.6 billion in 1990, up from $8.5 billion in 1989.

Honourable senators, my point is—

Senator Frith: Before you leave those figures, does that lead you to say that Ontario is not disadvantaged under Bill C-32?

Senator Kelly: In absolute terms, yes, it is not disadvantaged.

Senator Frith: What does "in absolute terms" mean?

Senator Kelly: I think that what we are arguing about here is the rate of growth. We are not talking about cuts. We are talking about whether 5 per cent is a sufficient rate of growth.

Senator Frith: We are talking about the effects of the legislation, and the poor cannot eat absolute terms. You cannot put butter on absolute terms, whatever it means. The fact is that they lose money.

Senator Kelly: I am simply saying that Senator Frith would have us infer that there is less government expenditure going into welfare and social services when actually there is substantially more than ever before in our history. If the argument is whether there is enough, then I think that argument could go on forever. But I do not like the suggestion that there is a cut, because there is not a cut.

Senator Frith: Ontario is disadvantaged. You are not suggesting that Ontario is not disadvantaged by Bill C-32. The social programs are disadvantaged. Do you accept that?

Senator Kelly: No.

Senator Frith: You do not?

Senator Kelly: No, I do not accept that.

Senator Frith: You do not? Very well; carry on. That does affect how seriously we take the rest of what you say, but carry on.

[Senator Kelly.]

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, for prudent fiscal management governments require a much higher degree of financial certainty than has hitherto been the case, especially when governments do not control the actual outlay of money. The contributing government wants legitimately to know how much it is in for, and to establish a limit to its exposure. To do otherwise certainly, in my opinion, is to give up on any responsible approach to fiscal policy and deficit management. There is not a bottomless pit.

The federal government is not alone in this pursuit. The NDP government of Ontario, not a government known for its fiscal conservatism, has imposed rigid limits on expenditures in the health care sector, all in pursuit of financial certainty. We are all aware of last year's OMA agreement which imposes thresholds on physicians' OHIP billings and, by a complex formula, imposes a cap on total utilization of the OHIP pool. Other health care practitioners have had their OHIP fee-for-service schedule frozen at last years' levels, or levels characteristically below the rate of inflation. OHIP funding for out-of-country health care services has been severely restricted. Funding to Ontario hospitals has similarly been limited, a point to which Senator Frith alluded in his remarks.

These cuts cause a certain amount of hardship and inconvenience. That is understood. But the indisputable fact that we have to confront is that a new day has dawned. Uncontrolled government expenditures have to become controlled. Fat has to be squeezed out of the delivery systems. I do not think there is a person here who would not argue in support of the suggestion that our delivery systems need very careful scrutiny, far more than they have ever had before. I think this bill can force that situation to take place and be dealt with.

Since the federal government does not control the actual delivery of the dollars to health care and social services at the provincial level, the only effective mechanism available to it is to establish a limit on the willingness to fund that delivery.

The fact of the matter is that all levels of government must exercise fiscal restraint. There is no point in one level of government trying to do it alone. I think it is fair to say that some of the provincial governments, including the government of my own province, have come a little bit late to this realization. I note, as I have before in this place, that the previous Ontario government increased its expenditures on an annual basis approaching an average of 10 per cent while the economy was, on its own, experiencing a substantial growth.

Senator Barootes: Would you believe 14 per cent?

Senator Frith: If you suggest it, probably not.

Senator Kelly: This free and uncontrolled spending was a factor contributing to an overheated economy. It also served to neutralize the federal government's concerted campaign to reduce its own operating expenditures and borrowing requirements.

Honourable senators, why should the federal government shoot itself in the foot by contributing to free spending through uncontrolled or unlimited CAP, EPF or any other federal-provincial transfers.

I also note in passing that, in general, the need for fiscal restraint has not yet impacted on local government. I note from Statistics Canada figures for February 1992 that local government employment actually increased by 1.3 per cent during the last quarter of 1991 compared to the same quarter in 1990.

Honourable senators, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, expenditures for social services is certainly an emotional issue, but I think we do a disservice to all when we get caught up in the emotion and begin to lose sight of or confuse the facts. The facts are that more money than ever before, from every level of government, is going into the social services about which Senator Frith was so eloquent. Federal spending on social services is substantially larger than it was during the 1981-82 recession over which the previous government presided.

Senator Thériault: Why do you not explain why?

Senator Kelly: We are talking here about a proper management of government doing the best it can with the resources it has, and getting away from the idea that all it needs to do is borrow money, raise taxes or do something else to feed money into the system; that it need not worry about how efficiently its programs are delivered, just keep the money moving. You cannot do that any longer, honourable senators. It just is not on.

● (1520)

Honourable colleagues, I suggest we cut through the fog of distortion that has been laid down around this bill and recognize it for what it is, another step in this government's fiscal management strategy, not to cut, not to reduce, but to control.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I assumed when Senator Kelly smiled through almost all of that speech that it was just his natural amiability.

Senator Barootes: It is his engaging personality.

Senator Frith: He was unable to deliver it with a straight face. I ask him if he can answer this question with a straight face.

Senator Barootes: Stop smiling.

Senator Frith: Would he have made that speech if Bill Davis were still the Premier of Ontario?

Senator Simard: You do not have to answer that.

Senator Frith: Let the record show that Senator Kelly smiled.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: I have two questions to put to Senator Kelly, if I may. First, did Senator Kelly intend not to address the point that Senator Frith made, which was that increasing welfare payments by 5 per cent, when the number of welfare recipients is increasing by 39 per cent, is not a policy that will put food in the mouths of hungry children? Why did he not answer that question?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I made an effort to make the point that, unless we impose limits on the increases in many of these areas, there will be little or no initiative directed toward improving the efficiency of the delivery of these services. I believe a lot of work must be done on that. Just saying it will not be enough.

Senator Gigantès: I have a second question.

Is Senator Kelly saying that the government will force people to starve so that the rich can re-examine how little charity to give?

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry, honourable senators, but the 15 minutes are up. I should also point out with respect to Senator Kelly's previous statement that the 10-minute time limit is on the motion.

Senator Frith: It is on the motion for time allocation.

The Hon. the Speaker: The motion for time allocation is 10 minutes except for the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition, and each speaker will speak no longer than 30 minutes. That is rule 41(2)(a) and (c). You were allowed 15 minutes.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, a few days ago a public opinion poll in the province of British Columbia revealed that the popularity of the Conservative federal government has declined to 6 per cent. In British Columbia, we make beer with more spirit than that.

There are many reasons for this pronounced dislike: The thoroughly botched constitutional process; the reactionary GST tax; the indifference to the plight of the poorest in society; and certainly, as far as British Columbia is concerned, the feeling that B.C. has become a special victim in the government's transparent attempt to transfer many of its obligations to the provincial and municipal governments. It claims, and we heard the claim again today, that it is waging a valiant war against waste and profligate spending.

Well, the ploy is not working in my province of British Columbia. Canadians on the West Coast know what this game is all about. A federal government which claims that it is involved in an exercise of fiscal and financial good management is attempting to make provincial and municipal governments the villains. The new Tory party line is, "the provincial governments are the big spenders, despite our efforts to save money and reduce taxes".

The very week the government asked us to support this bill was the same week it announced that the Boeing Corporation would be forgiven a $13 million loan to facilitate the sale of Canadair to Bombardier Corporation. There is quite a lineup at that corporate food bank waiting for handouts—and they are getting them!. Listen to this: The cost of writing off this grant to Boeing Corporation is in addition to the $589 million in subsidies and investments from the federal and other levels of government.

Senator Barootes: Do you want them to close the plant down and put everybody out of work? Is that what you want?

Senator Perrault: This was the same week that rumours abounded that Canadian taxpayers would be called upon to rescue one of the major corporations in this country, which is in some financial trouble. This comes at a time when thousands of young Canadians are being hounded and harassed by collection agencies to pay their student loans. They simply cannot find work. No bailouts for them; no loans forgiven. The government has the money to contribute $5.5 million to build a national humour museum. In itself, that profligate action by the government is a form of sick humour.

There is little to laugh about these days. You hound the students, you take money away from the poor and the indigent, and you give money for a humour museum and to the Boeing Corporation and to de Havilland—everybody who lines up at the gate.

The Tory government takes a perverse joy in punishing certain specified provinces: British Columbia, Alberta, and Ontario. It is alleged that we are the so-called "have provinces". As a result, we are supposed to be prime targets for Tory discrimination.

People are pouring into British Columbia from all over Canada. They are landing on our local welfare rolls. The cost to local governments is simply enormous. As a result, the welfare rolls are growing, food banks are empty, bread lines are endless, and the federal government continues its mad dance with disaster, shoving its obligations on to the shoulders of the provincial and municipal taxpayers, forgetting all the time that there is only one taxpayer.

In the sixties and seventies, a Liberal federal government and the provinces established a jointly funded system of public health care and other programs. This is being reviewed today. The federal government committed itself to share the cost of those programs, and Canadians have long considered them to be a benefit of Canadian federalism. But those great social programs are now under assault by a Conservative government, which is in the process of what that government has described as "off-loading" them. The other, less polite, description of this off-loading process is "buck-passing".

What are the tactics? Reducing, or eliminating outright, certain federal transfers; limiting the growth rate of federal transfers so that the federal government's share of a program costs diminishes; imposing new conditions which narrow eligibility for federal cost sharing, or fully or partially withdrawing federal government services, thus increasing demands on corresponding provincial services.

Federal off-loading measures have affected a wide range of cost-shared programs including health care, post-secondary education, social assistance, economic developments and services to aboriginal peoples.

Of course the federal government wants to reduce the deficit and the debt, but its efforts to avoid associating itself with any program cuts are pathetic and represent an abdication of real leadership.

Conservative apologists will argue that the provinces are only being asked to bear their "fair share" of restraint. That is the line being used. However, cuts in provincial transfers represent 47 per cent of federal savings under the expenditure control plan, even though provincial transfers make up only 20 per cent of federal program spending. This proportion would be considerably higher if the current effects of off-loading measures implemented before 1990-91 were included. For example, the 1992-93 cost to British Columbia of Established Programs Financing restraint measures introduced before 1990-91 is about $750 million.

Federal off-loading actions have other effects. The effect on British Columbia of off-loading measures implemented since 1982 is $1.4 billion in 1992-93. This is equivalent to more than 75 per cent of our province's projected deficit. The total for all provinces is $11.4 billion. Provinces have had to raise taxes or increase debt to make up this federal shortfall. There have been increased demands on related provincial programs as a result.

Translated into hard, cold, economic facts, beginning in 1991-92 and by the year 2000, this so-called "federal restraint program" will involve a total loss of $33 billion for the province of British Columbia. And this government talks about "cooperative federalism".

We have thousands of people streaming into British Columbia from all over Canada looking for work. We have to pick up an enormous tab for this process—yet you put a 5 per cent cap on us? You should be ashamed. No wonder the federal Conservatives are at 6 per cent in the polls, and plummeting even at that.

The most important effect of federal buck-passing may be the rapidly growing federal-provincial fiscal imbalance. In other words, off-loading has greatly widened the gap between program responsibility and revenue capability of the two orders of government. Most of the growth in public sector spending is occurring in health care and other social services, areas of provincial jurisdiction.

Future predictions indicate that this trend will continue. Provincial spending on health, education and social services measured as a per cent of gross national domestic product will rise significantly in the future, even with expenditure restraint measures. By contrast, federal contributions to the provinces in these areas are projected to decline. Therefore, at the same time as provincial costs are rising, federal off-loading is reducing the funds available to provinces. Without corrective action, the fiscal imbalance between the federal and provincial governments will widen. A rapidly growing fiscal imbalance between the two senior orders of government in the Canadian federation is unsustainable and must be addressed jointly by both orders of government, and without the cynical, political buck-passing, which has been a feature of this government's operations since 1982.

● (1530)

As honourable senators are aware, since 1967 the federal government has provided funding through the Canada Assistance Plan to assist with provincial expenditures on income assistance and other social services for those in need. Under the original CAP agreement, federal payments equalled 50 per cent of eligible provincial expenditures. As part of its so-called Expenditure Control Plan, the federal government has imposed a special and discriminatory 5 per cent limit on the annual rate of growth in our provinces.

The three provinces that receive nothing in equalization—namely B.C., Alberta and Ontario—are contributors to Confederation and they are pleased to contribute, but they do not want to be victims of discrimination.

Honourable senators, the five per cent will continue until the 1994-95 fiscal year. The result is that B.C. must now fund 100 per cent of social assistance costs over this arbitrary threshold. This is wrong, immoral and unfair. As a result, we will see a reduction of more than $1.3 billion in B.C.'s CAP receipts over a five-year period—that is, from 1991 to 1994-95. British Columbia along with Alberta and Ontario, are the targets. This policy reflects the federal government's mad desire to redistribute provincial transfers at the same time as reducing them.

Discriminatory targeting has been chosen despite the fact that federal CAP funds are themselves transferred directly to persons in need, and the size of income assistance in a province is not closely related to the province's fiscal capacity. These programs are designed to help individuals.

Equalization is provided to those provinces that could not otherwise provide adequate levels of services to their residents without resorting to unduly high levels of taxation. Now, federal off-loading has also affected the fiscal equalization process. British Columbia is not eligible for equalization payments and, therefore, not directly affected by these changes.

Do you still wonder why there is little Conservative support in the province of B.C? Changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act which came into effect in 1990 will cost our province an estimated $60 million in increased income assistance costs in 1992-93.

The federal government has reduced its share of British Columbia's reforestation costs by $50 million.

In the mid-1980s, the federal government purchased $58 million worth of labour force training from B.C. Under a new agreement, the federal government gives only first consideration to provincial institutions for purchases up to a maximum of $26 billion in 1992-93. Are you trying to shut down the engine of economic growth in the west, at a time when there is a desparate need to retrain the unemployed?

As well, the federal government has reduced its payments to B.C. for the cost of child welfare services to off-reserve status Indians by $6 to $8 million a year.

Buck-passing has raised our province's costs in many other areas, including farm income stabilization, crop insurance, police services, economic development, social housing and correctional facilities.

The combined negative impact on British Columbia of federal cuts to smaller programs is at least $160 million in 1992-93.

In 1991, the federal government redesigned the unemployment insurance program. As senators are aware, the number of weeks of employment required to qualify for unemployment insurance was increased and it became more difficult to get benefits out of the program. As a result fewer people were eligible for unemployment insurance. This put pressure on provincial income assistance budgets and those of the municipalities, particularly in 1991 when employment growth slowed.

At the same time the federal government restricted the amount of income assistance that it would cost-share with my province and with Ontario and Alberta, as I mentioned earlier. This has had the effect of transferring to my province and to others the major portion of the incremental costs of providing food, clothing and shelter to a growing number of unemployed who are coming to B.C. from all over the country. These costs are reflected in income assistance expenditures. They are large and continue to increase rapidly. Increased income assistance expenditures are the results of policy decisions to increase the levels of benefits and rapidly expanding case loads. Case load growth has been the major factor.

Approximately 280,000 people in B.C. are now receiving income assistance, if dependents are counted. The rising number of people receiving income assistance can be attributed to a number of causes, including the slowdown in the economy, the work force expanding more rapidly than the jobs are being created, partly because of job-seekers who have come to B.C. from other parts of the country, and people from abroad. No wonder the people of B.C. are angry. To my friends on the other side of the chamber I can only suggest that you are leading us into ruin.

April 20 will mark the 339th anniversary of Oliver Cromwell's speech to the infamous Rump Parliament. Cromwell said on that occasion, "You have stayed in this place too long and there is no health in you. In the name of God, go!" I commend the words of Cromwell to that supine and silent group of government apologists who occupy seats on the other side of the chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I had not intended to participate in this debate but it occurred to me as I listened to the other senators opposite and on this side that this measure is not properly labelled. In truth, it is an invisible constitutional bill. It establishes forever and a day within my province an eleventh province. That eleventh province is an invisible province whose people reside within the boundaries of Metropolitan Toronto.

This province is composed of 140,000 people, about the same size as Prince Edward Island. It is composed mostly of a third of our children. The people of this province do not have enough to eat; do not have sufficient clothing. That means that at least once or twice a month they have to get their weekly food at a food bank. During this period of growth in Ontario, the food banks have increased from 40 in the early eighties to over 140 food banks at the present time.

Essentially, honourable senators, we are institutionalizing by constitutional means an eleventh province in my province, except that these people have no voice. They have no power; they have no progress; they have no upward mobility to move from their state. As my honourable colleague the senator from Alberta said, we have established an under class. That under class is not getting smaller; it is growing.

There is, after all, honourable senators, a failure of our old Constitution. There is an attempt by the government to establish a new type of Constitution which will entrench this under class.

In every book that I have ever read of political science, I have been told that the purpose of government was to do three things: first, to feed the hungry; second, to provide clothing and shelter to those who need it; and third, to provide social justice. That is the permanent test of political philosophy in every book that I have read concerning the history of the growth of democracy. Surely, on those three simple tests, this bill fails, and because it fails, it should be withdrawn.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I want to speak briefly on behalf of the people from the Maritimes and, in particular, those from New Brunswick. It is no secret that over the years—and especially since the Tories came to power in 1984—a large number of people from the Maritimes have had to leave for either Ontario, Alberta or British Columbia. It is no secret that when the economy goes bad, generally speaking they are the first ones to suffer and to lose their jobs.

● (1540)

Over the years, people in the Maritimes have not been very happy that somehow since Confederation the provinces of central Canada, particularly Ontario, have progressed while they have gone down. Nevertheless, through the federal-provincial programs Ontario has always contributed in large measure to the well-being of the people in the Atlantic provinces and the poorer provinces.

For the life of me, I cannot understand, in a time when we are in a constitutional crisis, why the federal government would say to the three best-off provinces, "Regardless of the number of people you have depending on social assistance programs, we want to decrease your expenditures by 5 per cent. Senator Kelly, who I understand comes from the Toronto area, knows very well that in the 1981-82 recession or depression—call it what you like, because for a lot of people these recessions are depressions—the poor were never affected as they are today.

I come from a small village and I know a lot of poor people who have had to move to Toronto to look for jobs. They sometimes call me or write to me in desperation. When you are poor in Toronto and cannot pay your rent, or when you have to use every cent you have just to pay the rent, you need social assistance to feed and clothe your children. It is the people who are affected. It is not the government of Ontario. It is not government at all. Can't you see the difference between people and governments? The number of food banks has grown from about 75 to 300 in the past few years. Thousands of kids in Toronto don't have enough food. They are hungry. Don't you care?

More and more, this country is becoming like the United States and other countries where the rich get richer and the poor starve to death. People in government and business do not seem to understand that, when the working people are not working and have no money to spend, business goes down. That is one reason why the people of Canada have lost confidence in the government. Why is it that consumers are not spending? It is because they have lost confidence.

For the past seven or eight years the social safety net, which has been in place for decades, has been under attack from every side. Fishermen and farmers tell me that they are worried. People 50 years of age are worried that, if the trend continues, by the time they are 65 there will be no old age pensions. There will be no family allowance. Therefore, they are not spending their money. The fishermen in my community had a good season last year, but they are not spending their money. They are hanging on to it because they are scared.

The Unemployment Insurance Program has also been attacked from all sides. The people are worried and they are not spending. They have lost confidence.

Legislation like this bill that Senator Kelly is defending, and all other such legislation that his government has imposed on the people of Canada since coming to office, has destroyed the confidence of the poor people. They are worried. The older people and seniors tell their sons and daughters about the 1930s. There was wealth in Canada in the 1930s but where was it? They found out when war broke out. But at least when the war measures were put in place the people regained their confidence, and for 30 or 40 years the people of Canada had confidence in their institutions. Sure they changed governments, but who cared? I was not worried when the Liberal Government of Canada was defeated in 1978, because I thought we would have a continuation.

I am worried now, not for myself, perhaps, but for the poor people of Canada. Every day when senators rise to defend this kind of legislation they show that they are forgetting about people and thinking in terms of parties and power; they are thinking of themselves, people with power and money, and forgetting the reasons why people should have confidence in elected governments.

For God's sake, it is time for you to change. It is time for you to go back to what you were saying before 1984, that the social safety net is a sacred trust. If you had lived by that commitment you could have stayed in power two or three terms; it would not have mattered. Now it matters because you have destroyed the confidence of the people of this country. I am worried that the whole country will pay the price. For God's sake, wake up.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, having been, in the other place, Parliamentary Secretary to two Ministers of National Health and Welfare, I was proud of the social legislation of the Liberal governments between 1963 and 1984, and of the great progress that was being made in establishing a social safety net for Canadians, especially as it would look after them in times of hardship, such as during the present depression. However, today we have reached third reading on Bill C-32, and I feel sad. I am sad, not only because this piece of legislation will hamper the needs of the provinces with respect to welfare payments for their disadvantaged people, but also because this piece of legislation is taking place under a cloud of diminished parliamentary democracy in this chamber.

● (1550)

This legislation is being passed under the cloud of closure. For the first time in the Senate's history, we are having closure on a piece of social welfare legislation. The Conservative government and senators opposite should be ashamed of their action today; doubly ashamed because this feature of closure was brought in improperly. It was brought in in June of last year on a mere majority. A major change to our rules such as introducing closure to our debates should have been passed by a two-thirds majority, as required both by the present and the previous Rules of the Senate of Canada.

Honourable senators, this method of forcing legislation on the Senate is so improper that provincial governments should not only challenge this bill in the arena of public opinion but also in the high courts of this country. British Columbia challenged this piece of legislation and won in their court, but they lost in the Supreme Court of Canada, unfortunately.

In my province of Ontario, the Minister of Finance has estimated that this ceiling on the CAP will cost the province at least $1 billion in the fiscal year that ends today. I have heard other estimates that in future years it will cost double the amount each year until 1995, when this legislation is supposed to expire.

Unfortunately, the people who will suffer under this legislation are the poor people; the poor who are getting poorer every year in Canada. The type of government that we have here, this so-called neo-conservatism, reminds me of heartless Reaganism in the United States and Thatcherism in the United Kingdom.

There are a few other remarks I would like to make. As a physician, I deplore the deterioration of the quality of health care in my province of Ontario, thanks to the federal government which has no heart for the poor and the sick of this country. More and more hospitals are closing more and more beds, laying off nursing staff and other help in the hospitals.

We know that the costs of health care have escalated out of all proportion to inflation, to quality of health care, or to the minimal growth of Canada's population, even with abundant immigration. However, this past winter and the one before, the Auditor General of Canada severely criticized the federal Department of Health and Welfare for its shoddy accounting practices, and also for its several apparent exorbitant expenditures such as travel allowances, presumably including the cost of shipping persons to other locales because medical service was not available locally.

The shadows of inside arrangements and price fixings are not dispelled by a department that is still two years in arrears for its books and full accounting of its spending. More important, honourable senators, the federal Department of Health and Welfare and the provincial ministries of health have, in one generation of 20 years and especially in the past decade, racked up expenditures some 15 times the cost of Medicare in its early years. I ask, has the health of Canadians degenerated fifteen-fold or has the population of sick people increased to such an extent that the cost of socialized services has escaped into orbit?

I would like to point out to honourable senators that in this period of time the single distinctive historical event, besides an increase in labour wage settlements and unionization of health care professionals, is the widening practice of performing procedures that are not health care at all. Here I mention the procedure of abortion, which is actually not health care.

Even in the other place NDP member Dawn Black, a proponent of access to abortion as a social good—something to which everyone should have equal access—concedes that abortion on demand has created a crisis in health care in Canada. In 1990 alone, over 95,000 recorded abortions were performed on Canadians, inclusive of some 1,500 performed in border states under the pretence of health care. As a result of this apocalyptic destruction of a small population, the actual number of young women of child-bearing years has been decreasing in Ontario. This is a direct result of the fact that they were not allowed to be born. The high numbers of abortions have, in 23 years, eliminated many women from our midst.

Honourable senators, there is no escaping the facts being debated here this afternoon. It is inadequate for the government, indeed for any government, merely to apply a poultice to the growing canker of high costs of health care in the provinces. Limiting transfer payments will only rub salt into these gaping wounds. What is needed, in truth, is a study of expenditures in non-elective procedures, in incidental outlays, in the failure of cost controls, in the need for expensive wage settlements and for lay-offs.

What must seriously be taken into account is whether or not this extra so-called "health procedure" is criminalized in statute, and whether or not it belongs in the federal jurisdiction alone and is not eligible health care.

Last year Superior Court Justice Kennedy in Nova Scotia pointed out that, in pith and substance, abortion belongs in the field of criminal law, a solely federal jurisdiction. Bill C-32 should be returned to the other place and reintroduced, perhaps, in an omnibus bill to specify with greater care and detail what is payable to the provinces for Medicare and what is not eligible health care.

Honourable senators, we had this great economic summit last week here in this city and it seems to me that it just crashed to the ground. It appears that the federal government does not see the needs of the provinces. It also appears that the federal government is blind to the needs of the people of the provinces. It is also very evident that the federal government is dumb. Yes, it is plain dumb and it has no compassion. It has no understanding of the hardships that Bill C-32 will bring upon the people of the provinces.

I appeal to you, honourable senators, to open your ears, your eyes, and your hearts to the poor people who are going to be wronged by this legislation. Let us stop Bill C-32 from passing.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL SOCIETY OF CANADA—BILL TO AMEND ACT TO INCORPORATE—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Castonguay, seconded by the Honourable Senator David for the second reading of Bill S-7, an Act to amend An Act to incorporate the Royal Society of Canada.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, when Senator Castonguay also spoke to this bill on second reading on February 28 last, he mentioned how the Royal Society of Canada was incorporated by an act of Parliament in 1883. When reading the Debates of 1883, one is struck by how closely the Royal Society of Canada was modeled after the Royal Society of England and France's l'Academie.

The sponsor of the original legislation in the House of Commons, Mr. Tassé, took pride in the fact that that Queen Victoria herself—and at the north end of our gallery there is a handsome bust of Her Majesty, as she then was, looking down on this debate—approved of the initiative. Mr. Tassé told the house:

> Presumptuous though it may appear for mere colonists, as we are generally called, I am proud to say that it has received the cordial approbation of her Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, who, we are happy to realize, at all times manifests the most lively interest for the development of literature, arts and sciences, not only in the United Kingdom, but wherever Her Imperial Sceptre extends—over Her vast domains on which the sun never sets. Far is it indeed from our aspirations to rival the famous Royal Society of England; but we wish to follow in its footsteps, inspired by its example, by its glorious traditions, and lay the foundation for a grand and powerful literary institution in this great land of Canada.

That was March 19th, 1883, at page 262 of the Debates.

Mr. Tassé also took pride in a letter received from Camile Doucet, permanent secretary of the French Academy. Senator Simard, and perhaps Senator Murray, might be interested in this. I would like to be able to read from this letter in the language in which it was originally written, but unfortunately the House of Commons Debates were not published in French until 1896. So although the secretary of the French Academy wrote to the Royal Society in French, and although Mr. Tassé read the letter to the House of Commons in French, only an English translation is available in the House of Commons Debates.

In any event, what I am about to read is a part of the letter, as translated, that the permanent secretary of the French Academy, Camile Doucet, wrote to the Royal Society of Canada.

> The Academy thanks you for having informed it of your organization, and for having done so with so much cordiality, and in language so elevated, so pure, and so French. The old Academy of France delights to extend its right hand of fellowship to the new born Royal Society of Canada, and wishing that it may, after 300 years of existence, be as flourishing as her elder sister has the happiness to be to-day.

I should say that the quote I had, not only of the letter but from Mr. Tassé's speech says, interestingly:

> After Recess.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF CANADA

Mr. TASSÉ (Translation)

So not only the letter was written in French, but Mr. Tassé's entire intervention was in French but was only published in English. It was not available in French.

The objects of the society were set out in the preamble of the 1883 legislation. They were "to encourage studies and investigations in literature and science", to publish original works and papers "of merit", to "offer prizes or other inducements for valuable papers on subjects relating to Canada", to aid in research, and, "to assist in the collection of specimens with a view to the formation of a Canadian Museum of archives, ethnology, archaeology and natural history".

Bill S-7, which amends the 1883 act, does not change the preamble, though some of it does now seem dated, particularly the reference "to assist in the collection of specimens with a view to . . ." establishing a museum. Time has, blessedly and impressively, overtaken the "with a view to" part.

We, of course, now have a network of museums, be they under federal or provincial jurisdictions. Federally we have, among others, a National Archives and Museum of Natural History, and provincially the institution which comes most readilyto my mind,—which is understandable, I suppose—is the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto.

In any event, Bill S-7 leaves the preamble unchanged. The key amendment in the bill before us is the repeal of section 1 of the 1883 act, which severely limits the holdings of the society. Section 1 provides that the "annual value of real estate held at any one time for the actual use of the Society shall not exceed $4,000." I do not know what the magic is in $4,000 for property, but that, of course, appears with regard to property qualifications of senators also. Though $4,000 may have been a princely sum in 1883, today it would not even pay the property tax on a commercial building, and Bill S-7 proposes that the society continue to have the power to acquire and dispose of real and personal property, but without limit as to value. That is the key provision before us.

● (1640)

What is interesting is that, although the limitation of $4,000 in real property occupied but two lines of section 1 in the 1883 act, the section itself is more than one page long for this reason: It contains the names of all the founding members of the Society. I have an observation I want to make about that, but perhaps honourable senators may be interested in first hearing some of those names. They might ring a familiar bell for general or special students of history.

The first name I refer to is John William Dawson, who was the principal of McGill and a geologist. These descriptions, incidentally, do not appear in the 1883 act; just the names appear. I provide this additional information for whatever edification it might be:

—John William Dawson who was the principal of McGill, a geologist, and the first Canadian-born scientist of worldwide reputation.

—The Honourable Pierre-Joseph-Olivier Chauvreau, who was a lawyer, a senator, premier of Quebec, and dean of Laval's law faculty.

—Sir Daniel Wilson, who was one of Canada's best-known scholars, and the first president of the University of Toronto.

—Sir John George Bourinot—a name that will be familiar—whose work on procedure we still refer to.

—Alfred Richard Cecil Selwyn, a geologist, after whom the Selwyn mountains that straddle the Yukon-Northwest Territories were named.

—George Lawson, Canada's first professional botanist and founder of the Botanical Society of Canada.

—Charles Baillairgé, member of the fourth generation of the Baillairgé family of architects, sculptors and painters. Charles Baillairgé designed over 180 buildings, supervised construction of the Parliament buildings in the 1860s, and was the chief engineer for Quebec City for more than 30 years.

—Robert Bell, also a geologist—that so many of these prominent Canadians were geologists and scientists indicates the importance of Canada's mineral resources—who surveyed Northern Ontario for the transcontinental railway and was one of Canada's leading explorers of the Far North.

—Sir William Osler, writer, educator and at the turn of the century probably the best known physician in the English-speaking world. He became the first professor of medicine at Johns Hopkins University in the United States, and then Regius professor of medicine at Oxford.

[Senator Frith.]

—Napoleon Bourassa, architect, author, painter and sculptor, one of Canada's leading 19th Century artists.

—The Honourable Félix-Gabriel Marchand, lawyer, journalist and playwright who, in 1897, became premier of Quebec.

—Lieutenant-Colonel David Denison, a military historian of international repute and commander of the Governor General's Body Guard that fought in the 1866 Fenian Raid.

—John Macoun, explorer and Canada's foremost naturalist. He alone discovered more than 1,000 new species of plants. His collection of flora and fauna became the foundation for the National Museum of Natural Sciences.

—Joseph-Clovis-Kenner Laflamme, priest, scientist, professor of geology and physics at Laval. When he died in 1910, he was acknowledged as being the leading scholar in French Canada.

—The Reverend William Lyall, writer, philosopher, and professor at Dalhousie. His major works concerned the bringing together of the emotions and intellect in man.

—The Reverend John Clark Murray, scholar, philosopher, and a fighter for women's political and educational rights.

—John Watson, the only Canadian philosopher ever to be invited to give the prestigious Gifford Lectures in Edinburgh, Scotland, author of eight books and more than 200 articles.

—Louis-Honoré Fréchette, playwright, unofficial Poet Laureate of French Canada, the most important man of letters in 19th Century Quebec.

—Sir Sanford Flemming, about whom I suppose I need not say anything.

I know I can say personally that I can remember that my father, although he was famous for many more things, was a civil engineer, and in his earliest career actually did surveys out west for the old Grand Trunk Railway. I remember him talking of Sir Sanford Flemming who did the same thing, among other things, but achieved more distinction than my father did in that field. Of course, as you know, Sir Sanford Flemming is famous for much more than that.

Honourable senators, these are the names that loom large in the history of our country, but which, unfortunately, fewer and fewer Canadians have any knowledge of.

That brings me to an important part of this bill, because with the repeal and replacement of section 1, those names are to be struck from the act which incorporates the Royal Society of Canada. I do not think that is a good idea. It is something that the committee should look at.

I mentioned earlier that Bill S-7 does not change the preamble which contains the objects of the Society. However, the preamble begins with the words, "Whereas the persons hereinafter mentioned have . . ." It then goes on to say what they have joined to do, the names that I have just mentioned, these distinguished Canadians in our history. They joined together to form the Royal Society of Canada.

If the preamble remains unchanged but the names are removed through the repeal and replacement of section 1, apart from the unfortunate removal of the names of these distinguished Canadians, there will be a certain inconsistency, because the preamble says, "Whereas the persons hereinafter mentioned have . . .", and then when you read on in the new bill, you do not find those "hereinafter mentioned" persons. As I say, if the preamble remains unchanged but all the names are removed through the repeal and replacement of section 1, we will have a consolidated bill which in the preamble refers to persons who are not named and do not exist—names that have been chucked into the dust-bin of history.

Perhaps Senator Castonguay could help me with this. His remarks of February 28 made no mention of any change to the objects of the corporation or to the preamble which contains those objectives. I can only assume that this is not what was intended by the directors of the Royal Society of Canada. I cannot imagine that the Royal Society in Britain or l'Acadamie in France would ever change a bill that would remove the names of the original founders. I do not think we should do so.

In addition to replacing section 1, Bill S-7 repeals sections 5, 6 and 8 of the 1883 legislation.

Section 5 provided that the by-laws of the Society were to continue as the by-laws of the new incorporated entity. As Senator Castonguay mentioned, this provision has been overtaken by time. Sections 3 and 4, which deal with the making of by-laws, gives the Society all the authority it needs in this respect.

Since section 6 of the 1883 act provides that the officers of the Society will continue as the officers of the newly incorporated Society, I do not think that 109 years later these individuals still require the protection that that provision afforded them.

Finally, section 8 is being deleted. This is how that provision reads:

> No person otherwise competent to be a witness in any suit or prosecution in which the Society may be engaged, shall be deemed incompetent to be such witness by reason of his being or having been a member or officer of the Society.

Senator Castonguay mentioned that section 8 was being repealed because it had served its purpose. I do not quite understand that. Perhaps we can explore in committee what that purpose was and how time has rendered it redundant.

The last item I wish to deal with is section 9 of the original act, which reads:

> The Society shall make annual reports to the Governor-General and to both Houses of Parliament, containing a general statement of the affairs of the Society, which said reports shall be presented within the first twenty days of every Session of Parliament.

• (1650)

I was somewhat puzzled as to why that section was not being deleted by Bill S-7, and this is why. Though the Royal Society of Canada is obligated to report annually to both Houses of Parliament, it did not so report in 1991 or in 1990. It last reported, as best I could determine it, on October 3, 1989—two and one-half years ago. Section 9 requires it to report within 25 days following the start of a session. We have been in the Third Session of this Parliament since May 13, 1991, and there is still no report. Why do we want to have this directive of the Parliament of Canada if the Royal Society prefers to ignore it—apparently with impunity?

Do not misunderstand me, honourable senators; I am not suggesting that section 9 should be repealed, but the committee should look at either removing it—which I hope they do not do because I think we should have the report—or in some way making it clear that we expect compliance.

I do not believe that any of us have difficulties with the primary objective of Bill S-7, namely the removal of the $4,000 real property limitation, but I cannot say that I am captivated by some of the drafting that has been employed in Bill S-7 in an attempt to achieve this straightforward objective, and I have explained why.

What am I asking the committee to particularize in its study of this bill? Well, the bill before us sweeps out the door the names of giants in Canadian history. I do not think we should do that. The end result is that it produces a new Royal Society of Canada Act that is internally inconsistent. Perhaps the committee will be able to provide us with a solution, or at the very least some answers, as to why this approach was taken. I am sure that it was just an oversight—that is, I hope it was.

While it is undertaking this study, perhaps the committee could determine why the society is asking that section 9 remain in the act, particularly since it has shown little inclination to abide by it recently. I also mentioned that it might be singularly appropriate for the committee to have a look at the reason why section 8 has become dépassé, because there is no explanation for it. It may very well be that it has, but I ask the committee to impart that.

In closing, honourable senators, I made it clear at the beginning that we support this bill at second reading in the expectation that some of these irritants, or should I say discrepancies will be addressed by the committee.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, first, a few words of explanation as to why I am speaking after Senator Frith. Indeed, Bill S-7 is in my name. Unfortunately, I have been unable to attend the Senate the day the bill was to be read a second time, and Senator Castonguay was kind enough to take my place on that occasion.

So, at his request, I am rising today as if I had introduced the bill myself on second reading. I wish to thank the honourable senator for having stood in for me.

About Senator Frith's comments, I think that, as he said himself, considering that the bill will be passed unanimously on second reading, the proper time to deal with his comments is at the committee stage.

Incidentally, I must say that I was very impressed by the account of what had become of the founders of the Royal Society, particularly by their request as the result of which Her Majesty authorized the creation of the Royal Society.

Indeed, in the early days of the Royal Society, many distinguished people contributed to Canada's history. I think in particular of P.J.O. Chauveau who, as Senator Frith mentioned, was Premier of Quebec at the time of Confederation.

He also was, in those days, Minister of Education or Minister of Public Instruction as he was called then, after having held the position of Superintendent of Public Instruction in the Province of Canada. Having worked in that field most of my life, I realize that this great figure did play a very important role in shaping my perception of Quebec's history, especially in the field of education.

Strangely perhaps, Félix-Gabriel Marchand, who later became Premier of Quebec, was also involved in education which was one of his goals. While he was Premier, in 1896 or 1897, he tried to restore the Ministry of Public Instruction which had been abolished in 1875. He managed to put his legislation through the Commons so to speak, I mean the equivalent of the House of Commons, the National Assembly.

It is the Senate, or its equivalent the Legislative Council, which killed the bill creating or re-establishing the education department.

Time has changed. Anyway, we could go on about all the famous people who helped create the Royal Society of Canada. Senator Frith did it to a certain extent. I took the liberty of adding a few details on some of them. This being said, I propose that the Senate pass unanimously Bill S-7. After that, I will propose that the Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Tremblay, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, pursuant to rule 136(8) I must interrupt the proceedings. The Senate will now adjourn during pleasure to await the arrival of the Honourable the Deputy of the Governor General.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Murray's democratic colleagues have 235 days to call an election, and his colleagues who are cowardly and contemptuous of democracy have 621 days.

ABORIGINAL LANGUAGES DAY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: I would like to draw to the attention of senators that today is Aboriginal Languages Day, a time to reflect upon the fundamental importance of education and communications to the future opportunities for our aboriginal Canadians—education and communications, not just in our languages but in theirs. And that is basic to the survival of aboriginal pride and history and culture in this country and the incentive for young people in the aboriginal communities to strive for learning and involvement.

Each senator will have received a letter from the National Chief of the Assembly of First Nations who has asked us to reflect on this matter today. I just want to quote one paragraph from that letter in which Ovide Mercredi says:

> This land is the homeland of our mother tongues. Canada is our motherland. If our languages disappear from Canada, part of the history also disappears. If our languages disappear from Canada, they cannot be retrieved from another land.

In the poster which accompanies this letter from the Assembly of First Nations and the Native Council of Canada is another very meaningful quotation which tells us, "If we can speak and understand our language, our elders can then tell us who we are."

Honourable senators, this is an effort well deserving of our support.

THE CONSTITUTION

RESPONSE TO BEAUDOIN-DOBBIE REPORT

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, yesterday, after I spoke on the Beaudoin-Dobbie report, the honourable Senator Roblin spoke. He made a number of points. One was that an elected Senate with powers would act as a curb on the executive and, therefore, on the House of Commons. I suggest that our Constitution of 1867, which established the Senate, had precisely that aim; that is precisely what the founding fathers declared as the purpose of the Senate.

There is another federation with a Parliamentary system like ours—not a congressional one. I am referring to Australia which also has a senate with power to curb the executive, that is the lower house, and it gives the prime minister the power of double dissolution. But there is another point. Very eloquently, Senator Roblin said we must first feel Canadian to be able to solve the country's problems, that he himself is a loyal Manitoban, but he is first a Canadian. I compliment him for that. I am first a Canadian also.

However, these myths in Quebec that I was talking about have made a profound difference there. I know too few Quebecers who are Canadians first. They are, first, Quebecers. The problem we have to face is how to find a constitutional accommodation between 20 million people who feel Canadian first and whatever their province is second, and 6 million who feel they are Quebecers first and Canadians second.

If Senator Roblin thinks that is not important, I invite him to look around the next time he is in caucus and try to count among his colleagues who are Francophones from Quebec those who are Canadian first. In this chamber I can name Senator Bolduc, who I think is Canadian first; I think Senator Beaudoin is Canadian first, as is Madame Chaput-Rolland, and after that I will speak no more. I leave it to Senator Roblin to judge them.

DEBT SERVICING AND REDUCTION ACCOUNT BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-21, relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, April 2, 1992.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 150 residents of the province of New Brunswick who object to the goods and services tax. These petitions are mostly from Saint John, Hampton, Sussex, Oromocto and Saint George.

I have also the honour to present petitions signed by 25 residents of the province of New Brunswick who object to the goods and services tax. These petitions are mostly from Fredericton, Grand Falls and Oromocto. This is a total of 275 residents of the beautiful province of senator Simard who, so far, never presented a single small petition signed by his fellow New Brunswickers, either for or against the GST.

I thank you.

[English]

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, while it might be after the fact, its being 14 months since the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs tabled its report entitled "It's Almost Too Late", I have the honour to present a petition which I have today received from J.J. Strong of St. John's, Newfoundland, containing the names of 36 Newfoundlanders supporting the recommendations contained in that report, and applauding the recent announcement by the Minister of Veterans Affairs of the recognition of merchant seamen as veterans.

I would smuggle in a word of thanks to Senator Thériault for his kind words on March 26, and express the fact that, despite the criticism the Senate receives from across the country, the Senate can perform its duty for regions and for minorities. I am proud that the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the government have seen fit to grant all benefits to merchant navy veterans.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

ABOLITION OF SENATE—STATEMENT OF MINISTER

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate that I would ask him to take up with his colleague, Mr. Clark.

Recent news stories state, for example, "Clark Menace les Provinces D'abolir le Sénat". The English version reads, "Clark Threatens to Abolish the Senate". This is part of the negotiating process and is a reaction to a statement by one of the provincial premiers.

I must say that I am surprised at Mr. Clark's statement. It sounds like an attack—I hope an uncharacteristic attack—of delusions of grandeur, or even megalomania. I must confess that I have had certain attacks, which I have had to put down, of respect, affection, even admiration for Mr. Clark. I cannot imagine him saying that.

Senator Barootes: Read the rest of his statement.

Senator Frith: If he did not know much about the Canadian Constitution before his recent obligations—I expect he did know plenty about it—he certainly does know a lot about it now. For any member of the government or the House of Commons or the Senate to say to a provincial premier, "I might abolish the Senate," indicates an unbelievable lack of knowledge, which I do not believe is true in his case.

Of course, Mr. Clark cannot abolish the Senate; the Prime Minister cannot abolish the Senate; the House of Commons cannot abolish the Senate; the Senate cannot abolish the Senate; one provincial premier cannot abolish the Senate; two cannot; three cannot; four cannot; five cannot. It takes all of them put together—the House of Commons, the Senate and all of the provincial premiers—to abolish the Senate.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate will give Mr. Clark the opportunity, through him, to explain to the Senate that he never had such an attack of megalomania that would mean that he thinks he can abolish the Senate.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition should not infer from a headline or even from a news report that Mr. Clark is unaware of the fact that it would take the consent—

Senator Frith: Quite right. That is exactly why I want you to ask him.

Senator Murray: —of Parliament and the 10 provinces to abolish the Senate.

Having said that, the abolition of the Senate is always one of the options that are discussed when the question of Senate reform comes up. One or two provinces have favoured it. There is a political party in this country that has always favoured it. There are some who think that some of the models for Senate reform are so bad that abolition would be preferable. So abolition is a matter that is always under discussion when the subject of Senate reform comes up.

I shall draw the honourable senator's question—if it was a question—to the attention of my colleague.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Government for his characteristic lecture. Of course, that is not necessarily an inference. The point of the question was to give Mr. Clark an opportunity, through the Leader of the Government in the Senate, to tell the Senate that that would not be a proper inference.

THE ECONOMY

FIRST MINISTERS CONFERENCE—ONTARIO ECONOMIC ANALYSIS TABLED—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL RESPONSE

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, last week at a meeting of the federal-provincial first ministers and ministers of finance, the Ontario government tabled an economic analysis describing Ontario's apparent asymmetrical or unbalanced receipt of transfer payments for social purposes from the Government of Canada. The press reports following that meeting, or during the meeting, stated that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance violently disagreed with Premier Rae and the Ontario government's economic analysis.

My question is this: Has the government of Canada prepared its own written analysis, and would it make it available to the Senate in response to the Ontario government's position?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The answers are yes and yes, honourable senators.

Senator Grafstein: When?

Senator Murray: I don't have the document in front of me, but there is one, and I will be glad to bring it in.

THE CONSTITUTION

STATEMENT BY THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It stems from the headline of an article in the Journal de Montréal where minister Benoît Bouchard is quoted as saying:

> I will not fight machine guns with a pocketknife.

Mr. Bouchard, the federal Minister of Health and Welfare, keeps refusing to go and defend his government's position in Quebec.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Says who?

Senator Thériault: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell this House what Mr. Bouchard's statement means when he states that he will not fight machine guns with a pocketknife?

Senator Murray: What is the nature of the question? I hear what the honourable senator has just said. All I want to know is the specific nature of the question the honourable senator is asking me and wants an answer to.

[English]

Senator Frith: You be a good boy and listen to how things should be done!

[Translation]

Senator Thériault: I think my question was explicit. What does the minister mean by that or what is he saying?

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Ask the minister himself. You are in the wrong Chamber.

Senator Thériault: Between Senator Frith and Senator Simard, there is not much room left for me. Is minister Bouchard comparing the Beaudoin-Dobbie report to a pocketknife and the Allaire or Bélanger-Campeau report to machine guns? What does he really mean? He is not the only one involved in that statement. Bouchard and Loiselle are as well. They are the three musketeers of separatism in the Canadian government. What does he mean? Is he not satisfied with the Beaudoin-Dobbie report? If that is not the case, what does he want then? Why fight with Quebec?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I would be glad to refer the question to my colleague, Mr. Bouchard and to ask him whether he would like to comment on the statement that appeared in the Journal de Montréal. That being said, I am not surprised to see that Mr. Bouchard and his government colleagues would much prefer to defend constitutional proposals that are supported not just by the federal parties but also by the other provinces.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, Mr. Clark is not reluctant to go to Alberta to defend the government's position or the Dobbie-Beaudoin report on Senate reform. The Prime Minister of Canada does not hesitate to go to Quebec. In fact, he went last week, and thank God we have at least one member of the government defending the Canadian position in Quebec.

How can the Leader of the Government in the Senate and all my Senate colleagues from Quebec justify their complete silence, when their Prime Minister is prepared to go and defend Canada's position in Quebec, and meanwhile, they are neither saying nor doing anything at all for our country in Quebec? They are members of the government. They are not only members of Parliament from Quebec but they are members of the federal government. What kind of attitude is that?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, Senator Thériault is wrong about the position taken by Mr. Clark, the Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. Mr. Clark is not defending the Beaudoin-Dobbie report on the Senate. Mr. Clark is defending the concept of Senate reform, the details of which have yet to be negotiated. Mr. Clark is defending this concept while urging all parties to approach the issue in a spirit of compromise. That is what the government ministers are defending. They are defending the concept of Canada, a united Canada. I can't help it if the media do not always report every statement by every minister.

I can give the honourable senator the assurance that my cabinet colleagues from Quebec and the other provinces share his commitment to Canada.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, in an interview or a debate that I saw on television, when told by a provincial colleague from Alberta that if he did not change his position, he would be beaten in the next election, Mr. Clark said, as any minister in a Canadian government should say:

> It is more important for me that Canada remain united than that I be re-elected.

That is the kind of position we should expect from any minister in a Canadian government. That is the sort of position that Messrs. Bouchard, Loiselle and so on should take in Quebec. If they are not prepared to take such a position, they should resign from the Government of Canada and go to the Government of Quebec. That is the position that all my fellow senators from Quebec should take if they really believe in our country.

Senator Simard: You are in no position to teach us a lesson.

Senator Thériault: The media report it every day. Of all the ministers in the federal government, only Brian Mulroney is ready to go to Quebec and defend federalism. It is sad to see our country in that state. Canadians have lost confidence.

Canadians do not know if some important members of the Government of Canada are for separation or Canadian unity.

Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. After the statement that the Minister of National Defence made last week or the week before, how can he be allowed to go back on the federal government's promise to build a depot in Moncton, in the Maritimes? A formal promise had been made and announced. He made that promise without saying whether he is for separation or for Canada. Are Canadians not right to wonder what is going on in this country?

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate ask Mr. Masse—Before making the decision to build a $100-million depot for National Defence in Montreal, should we not at least wait for the result of the referendum and see what side Mr. Masse takes in Quebec?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the decision of the Minister of National Defense was made in the light of the changes in foreign policies as well as Defense policies that we have witnessed around the world. The situation has changed drastically, and so have the budgets of the Department of National Defense. Already in the last four or five years, the government has cut maybe $5 billion in the expenses projected for the future. It was a matter of centralizing some depots in Montreal and Edmonton. The decision was made strictly for financial and economic reasons, and to improve the efficiency of the Department's operations.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, it is still the same figure of $100 million; it is always the same figure. It was $100 million for Moncton, and now it is $100 million for Montreal. The decision has been made. How many other decisions made by the present government are strictly politically motivated?

I am convinced that people in New Brunswick would be able to accept this new setback if, at least, they could be sure that this facility for Canadian militia will be located in a Canadian province.

Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate prepared to say today that if Quebec is no longer part of Canada, this facility will not be constructed in Montreal?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my questions follow those of Senator Thériault. Immediately after the Beaudoin-Dobbie Report was tabled, the Prime Minister said, I regret not having his exact words, that it was an excellent report. The Prime Minister spoke very highly of this report. Is that the position of the Department? Is that a departmental decision or is it purely a decision made by Mr. Mulroney?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Beaudoin-Dobbie Report is a report prepared by a joint committee of the Canadian Parliament. The report as such is not binding on the government. The honourable senator knows that it is the intention of the government to examine all the recommendations made in the report, and consult the provincial governments before formulating a series of official proposals. As I said earlier, a series of proposals that would not only have the support of federal political parties, but also of provincial governments.

Senator Molgat: I understand that very well. Nevertheless, the Prime Minister made a formal and very favourable statement concerning this report. My question does not have to do with what the government will do: It has to do with this statement made by the Prime Minister. Was that the position of the department or simply the position of the Prime Minister?

I want a clear answer. I do not want long evasive speech. Is it simply what the Prime Minister thinks, or is it what the department thinks?

Senator Murray: It is what the Cabinet thinks. Of course, the Prime Minister speaks on behalf of us all. It is not only a question of ministerial solidarity; the Prime Minister was right in praising this report as the best offer ever made to Quebec. We all share this opinion of the Prime Minister.

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Even Mr. Masse?

• (1430)

Senator Murray: Yes, even Mr. Masse doesn't challenge the Prime Minister's assessment of the report, and he never did.

Senator Gigantès: And Mr. Loiselle?

Senator Murray: I said all.

Senator Molgat: So this is clearly a position taken by all members of cabinet.

Senator Murray: Every single one.

Senator Molgat: A cabinet decision is binding on all ministers. There are no two ways about it. So why isn't Mr. Benoît Bouchard and others with him not prepared to go and defend Canada, and this includes Mr. Loiselle and Mr. Masse? Why aren't these ministers prepared to go and defend Canada in Quebec? Are they federal ministers or are they Quebec ambassadors to cabinet? If they are federal ministers, and if there is a cabinet position, don't they have an obligation under our political system and according to their own conscience to go out and defend positions taken by cabinet.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition spends his weekends in Manitoba. My cabinet colleagues from Quebec spend their weekends in Quebec, where they vigorously defend Canada.

Senator Thériault: And the interests of Quebec?

Senator Molgat: So why did he say he was not prepared to go and fight to defend Canada? He was unwilling to go to battle with a knife. The Prime Minister stated the Beaudoin-Dobbie report was outstanding, and you told me it was a cabinet position, but this minister said it was just a knife against a battery of machine guns and he was not prepared to defend the report.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as I said before, according to the Prime Minister's assessment of the Beaudoin-Dobbie report, this is the best offer ever made to Quebec. However, the government is not committed to every single one of the report's recommendations. The content of the constitutional proposals remains to be negotiated by the federal government with the provinces. Eventually we will have a whole series of official proposals to put forward. The honourable senator is aware of the timeframe that has been set. As far as Canada is concerned, Minister Bouchard and all my cabinet colleagues from Quebec, like our colleagues from the other provinces, are constantly defending Canada in their own regions.

Senator Molgat: Mr. Minister, you are beating around the bush, as usual, whenever there is a question you don't like. But let's get back to the point. You gave me the assurance that cabinet agreed with the Prime Minister's statement. If cabinet agreed with what was said by Mr. Mulroney—as you will recall, he was lavish in his praise, and I am sorry I don't have his exact words—if that is the case, doesn't this mean that Ministers Bouchard, Masse and Loiselle have an obligation to go to Quebec and say so?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the three ministers referred to by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition all fully endorsed what the Prime Minister had to say about the Beaudoin-Dobbie report.

Senator Molgat: Can you quote chapter and verse? A minister is reported as saying he wouldn't do it. He said he wouldn't. It was like using a knife against a machine gun. You are telling me he will. Give us just one example, one instance.

Senator Murray: Mr. Masse, Mr. Bouchard and Mr. Loiselle have all three fully endorsed the Prime Minister's statement that the Beaudoin-Dobbie Report was the best offer Quebec ever had.

Senator Molgat: Mr. Minister, we would be delighted to hear about a speech by one of these three ministers. Bring us a speech that shows they said something positive about Canada and the Beaudoin-Dobbie report. If you are so sure, bring it in. We can wait.

Senator Thériault: Honorable senators, I am going to quote for you what Mr. Benoît Bouchard said:

> The Prime Minister, and he is supposed to as head of the Government, has decided to be very clear. But it is not because Loiselle, Masse, other Ministers or myself don't wave the Canadian flag standing out on the barricades . . .

Senator Simard: It is senator Hébert who said that last year!

Senator Thériault: . . . are not waving the Canadian flag. Then, what flag are they waving?

[Senator Molgat.]

CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bolduc, seconded by the Honourable Senator Grimard, for the third reading of Bill C-32, to amend the Canada Assistance Plan.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, with the imposition of closure on this piece of legislation, there is absolutely nothing we in this chamber can say or do that would result in any change whatsoever to Bill C-32. However, I do not want to miss an opportunity to register a vigorous protest on behalf of my province of Alberta on the substance of the bill and the unilateral way in which the federal government proceeded with it.

Bill C-32 extends the five per cent ceiling on the Canada Assistance Plan payments from two years to five years for Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, who are net contributors to the equalization dollars redistributed to the remaining provinces. The federal government estimates that it will cut over $2.1 billion from Canada Assistance Plan transfers to these three provinces over the five-year period. But the provinces' own estimates of their losses are considerably higher.

Ontario estimates that the cap on Canada Assistance Plan payments will cost it $1 billion in 1991-92 alone, while B.C. will lose about $148 million in 1992-93. Alberta's Treasurer, Dick Johnston, estimates that this plan will cost the provincial treasury $35 million this year, and more than $200 million in 1992-93. These additional costs are a direct result of more families falling victim to the nation-wide recession and to the severe downturn in Alberta's energy resources and the agriculture industry.

Since Alberta is my home province, I would like to consider for a moment the number of Albertans who depend upon social assistance and the adequacy of the program. In 1990, before the recession really hit, 148,800 Albertans, of whom at least 40 per cent were children, depended on the Canada Assistance Plan for basic food, clothing and shelter. In December 1991, 173,100 Albertans—46 per cent of whom were children—were dependent on Canada Assistance Plan payments. Of those, nearly 45 per cent were members of single parent families.

Consider further, honourable senators, that the number of food banks operating in my province has risen from one in 1981 to 40 in 1991. Consider, too, that of the 2 million people depending on Canada's 292 food banks, some 700,000, or 40 per cent, are children under the age of 18.

Indeed, in my own city of Lethbridge, Alberta, there was a report about a week ago which said that Lethbridge children under 18 account for nearly one-half of the clients at one of the city's two food banks. The Director of the Food Bank Society in Lethbridge said, "We are starting to cut back. We simply haven't enough supplies any more. We are just hoping to stay in business for another year."

Bill C-32 is one in a long series of deepening and, perhaps, irreversible cuts to social programs taken by this government since 1984 to meet its stated objectives of reducing the federal deficit and downsizing government. These cuts began in 1985 with the partial deindexing of child benefits, and continued on through the clawback of family allowances and old age pensions.

These cuts included tightening and retightening unemployment insurance and cutting back again and again on social housing allocations, and yet again in the recent budget. They included enormous cutbacks in training funds, the means by which people climb out of unemployment and off welfare. Now, unemployment insurance money is being directed at training at a time when large numbers of Canadians need the full benefits of that fund to support them at a time of massive job loss and lay-offs.

The impact of all this cutting and recutting on provincial and local programs—and, in turn, on low-income and low-skilled Canadians in every region—has been horrendous. Inevitably, these cuts are being borne by Canadians and communities who can least afford it.

While Alberta, British Columbia, and Ontario are Canada's wealthiest provinces, in fact these provinces are also home to more than 50 per cent of Canada's poor. Let us remember that the so-called welfare poor of this country, regardless of what province they live in, are in reality mostly children and single mothers.

The largest single category of Canada Assistance Plan beneficiaries—37 per cent—are children. The remainder include the parents of these children, many of them single, and Canadians suffering from chronic disabilities, poor health, low or non-existent job and social skills. The purpose of the Canada Assistance Plan is to alleviate these desperate concerns. Canada Assistance Plan funding matches provincial dollars in providing basic social assistance to these poorest of Canadian citizens. These funds also match provincial dollars to provide dental care for those on social assistance, essential services for disabled people, foster care for abused children, safe housing for abused women and subsidized child care for low-income families.

However, the deep and continuing recession combined with job loss due to, among other things, free trade and globalization is placing extreme pressure on an ever-increasing number of Canadian families, many of whom are at or near the end of their unemployment insurance benefits, which means they will have no choice but to join the welfare rolls.

My concern for these high-risk families deepened when, in the latest budget, this government discarded its three-time promise of a national child care program and universal family benefits with the elimination of the family allowance. Low-income families are supposed to be the big winners with this latest rejigging of the child benefits program. However, an analysis by the former director of the National Council of Welfare, Ken Battle, shows that the enrichment of monthly benefits for low-income families will look good only for about as long as the time it takes to get past the next election. Then, year by year, the partial deindexation of the benefit will cause it to erode continuously. By the end of the decade, Mr. Battle predicts that a single parent with two children earning $15,000 in 1993 will lose 20 per cent of his or her benefit, and that a couple with two jobs, two children and a $20,000 annual income will lose the same 27 per cent.

Honourable senators, all these changes will do nothing at all for families on social assistance.

Mr. Battle has termed partial deindexation as a "fiscally powerful and politically invisible mechanism" that allows Canada to siphon money from social programs. Bill C-32 is just another element of this deceptive approach.

This legislation is disturbing on a number of fronts. It is part of the net effect of dismantling national programs that were originally established to provide Canadians with a social safety net and basic standards of services. These programs were built over decades on a firm base of nationally-held values: values of social equity and the desire to ensure a basic standard of care for those who cannot care adequately for themselves.

These values grew out of the harsh experiences of the depression, and the realization that a country cannot be sustained by offering the people no hope on any front. It did not work for R.B. Bennett and it will not work for this government, either.

Another area of concern with this bill is the ease with which the federal government undertook unilateral action to limit its financial responsibility under long-standing federal-provincial agreements. That action was challenged in the courts. There was a victory in the appeal court in British Columbia, but, finally, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that, in law, the federal government has the power to change unilaterally the conditions or terms of any federal-provincial agreement. But what is offensive here is that the Mulroney government's decision to exert this power in this manner has cast serious doubts on all federal-provincial cost sharing agreements.

That leads to my next concern, which is how far this government believes it can push its goals and objectives of increased efficiency and reduced national government without weakening irreparably the already tenuous links that hold this country together.

The series of national programs that Canadians and former governments fought to put in place comprised a type of social contract with Canadians in every part of this country. Equalization, the Canada Assistance Plan, Established Programs Financing formed the three arms of that contract. Since 1984, both the Established Programs Financing and the Canada Assistance Plan have come under repeated attack. Since 1986, the EPF funding formula has been cut, cut again, frozen, and refrozen at 1989 levels until 1994-95.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

At the same time, the federal government has seriously weakened its own power to enforce the principles of the Canada Health Act which govern medicare.

In the spring of 1991, the National Council on Welfare published a study called "Funding Health and Higher Education", suggesting that, if the current trend continues, every last penny of federal cash for health and higher education under the 1977 fiscal arrangements will disappear within a few years.

Alberta Treasurer Dick Johnston has noted that:

> It is generally agreed that federal cash transfers for health and post-secondary education will dwindle to nothing within 15 years.

Now we have Bill C-32 legislating a three-year extension of a ceiling that has been on the Canada Assistance Plan for the last two years in Alberta, Ontario, and British Columbia.

Next we may see a ceiling on this plan for the have-not provinces. In fact, Manitoba joined the court challenge for exactly that reason—because they feared that a ruling in favour of the federal government would set a precedent for further unilateral off-loading of other programs cost-shared with the provinces. I suspect that we will see a further whittling away as long as this government is in power, until the Canada Assistance Plan finally goes the way of the Family Allowance.

The Conservative approach to social spending has been described as "social policy by stealth". All it takes is a two- or three-month battle in Parliament to put these formulae in place, and then inflation does the government's dirty work for it.

Let us make no mistake about it, honourable senators. We are entrenching an "underclass" in our country which will become generational. It may be difficult if not impossible to change it. The cost in human terms to the lives of individual Canadians is tragic and it will have major consequences for the future development and prosperity of this country and its position in the world.

Children, after all, are a nation's hope. When more than 1 million of Canada's children are today living in poverty, within their families, on the streets, dropping out of school, unable to learn, hungry, and developing a visceral anger and frustration against the system, we are indeed jeopardizing the future of this country.

Do we really care? I suggest that when our government and our Parliament legitimizes a pattern of withdrawal from taking this reality and tackling it head on, we as lawmakers incur a tremendous load of blame.

Bill C-32 is part of this pattern. It deserves to be defeated.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear.

Hon. William M. Kelly: I wish to say in advance that I believe under the new rules I am required to limit my remarks to 10 minutes. I may be a minute or so over, but, if so, I would ask in advance for permission to complete my remarks.

Honourable senators, I believe I said most of what I wanted to say on Bill C-32 when I spoke at second reading.

The Hon. the Speaker: I want to correct the statement of Senator Kelly. He has 15 minutes, not 10.

Senator Kelly: I may have misread it. Under time allocation I believe it is 10 minutes.

Senator Gigantès: Who is right? You guys wrote the rules.

Senator Frith: This might be a good time to get it straight, before we start the clock.

Senator Gigantès: It would be nice to know for when our turn comes.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, as briefly as possible today, I feel compelled to respond to Senator Frith's remarks made in this place during second reading on February 28. I say in all candour that, since arriving in the Senate, I have learned that Senator Frith can always be counted on for a good show. I always look forward with great anticipation when he arrives in his place to pour forth fire and brimstone on the government's latest initiative. He did not disappoint us in the thespian qualities which he once again demonstrated in his remarks on February 28.

Honourable senators, I cannot hope to match Senator Frith in eloquence.

Senator Perrault: No, you can't.

Senator Kelly: That's right. I said it first. I say in all honesty that his speech was an excellent, perhaps even brilliant, summary of the obviously heartfelt concerns that some groups, individuals and provinces have about the kind of action demonstrated in Bill C-32. I recognize that federal transfers to provinces for education, health, and social assistance are emotional issues. But, honourable senators, we should not let emotion cloud our judgment or, much worse, cloud the facts.

Senator Perrault: No, don't let emotion affect anything. Don't let emotion affect your grants to big business.

Senator Kelly: Senator Frith's remarks are sprinkled with words or phrases such as, "taking money", "cut back", "cutting federal transfers to the provinces under the CAP act" and so on. The inference, and I am sure it would be unintended, could be that the federal government is reducing in absolute terms its transfers to Ontario, British Columbia, and Alberta under CAP.

In fact, as we all know, honourable senators, all Bill C-32 does is continue to cap the growth of federal transfers to Ontario, B.C. and Alberta at 5 per cent per annum, which I might point out is higher than the anticipated rate of inflation. It will still result in an increase of about $100 million to Ontario, $36 million to B.C., and $26 million to Alberta.

One could also infer, perhaps incorrectly, from Senator Frith's remarks that Bill C-32 represents a new policy, a new departure from established policy and precedent. Again, all of us realize that this is just not so. As I mentioned in my remarks at second reading, Bill C-32 continues the limits announced as part of the budget in February 1990 and in place since that time. It was for that reason and for that reason alone that I, in my remarks at second reading, referred to this measure as simple and straightforward, a remark that Senator Frith found offensive.

Honourable senators, it is simple and straightforward, and I do not apologize for using that phrase, because the bill seeks simply to continue a policy and legislation that have been in place for some time.

Senator Frith: How long?

Senator Kelly: Since February 1990.

Senator Frith: Under this government.

Senator Kelly: Yes, but it was announced and thoroughly discussed and described at that time.

Senator Frith: I take it you were not implying that it was a precedent laid down earlier.

Senator Kelly: I will say to Senator Frith I do intend to deal with some of the past situations that existed in the same circumstances.

● (1510)

Some of my colleagues opposite might like Canadians to infer that limiting transfers to the provinces began with this government. Once again, honourable senators, we know, of course, that that is not true. Reductions in transfers began in fiscal 1982-83 when the federal government actually cut Established Programs Financing payments to the provinces by almost $1 billion over the period to the end of 1984.

It is probably unnecessary—and perhaps childish—for me to point out that these cuts were imposed by the previous government under a previous Minister of Finance, whom we now number amongst our distinguished colleagues, at a time when the entire country, particularly Ontario, was struggling out of the worst recession in years. Those limitations were imposed by the federal government when Ontario was grappling with high unemployment, high dependence on welfare, a high level of child poverty and an eroded tax base. I might mention as well that the cuts were imposed on all provinces, even the relatively poor provinces which were less able than the others to make up the difference.

Honourable senators, I meant to check the records, but I assume that Senator Frith was equally condemnatory of that initiative when it was proposed in this place as he now is of the bill before us today.

Senator Frith: Didn't you check and find out?

Senator Kelly: I did not. I must say with some embarrassment however, Senator Frith, that I was critical of it at that time as well.

Senator Frith: In the absence of checking, you were prepared to assume.

Senator Molgat: You should use your research funds.

Senator Kelly: There is one other point I should like to make in response to Senator Frith, and I make it with some trepidation. I usually like to avoid using lengthy lists of statistics in any debate. Having said that, I asked the statisticians at StatsCan to run some numbers for me. I am sure Senator

Frith and some of his colleagues will find these numbers interesting.

For example, StatsCan advises me that the federal government's total expenditure for social services was $9.85 billion in 1974-75. It rose progressively to $33.2 billion in 1984-85, and for 1991-92 is projected to reach $54.5 billion. Those of you who are handy with figures, or with calculators handy, will see that the increase since 1974-75 has been almost six-fold, and the increase since 1984-85 has been almost 64 per cent. I might point out that federal spending on social services in 1981-82, the years covering our last serious recession, was $21.8 billion, less than half of what it is today.

Federal, provincial and municipal funding for social services, which was about $15.5 billion in 1975-76, is now more than four times that amount, some $66.7 billion, having risen inexorably year after year. Total spending on social services by the three levels of government was $29.7 billion in 1981-82, less than half of what it is today. In my own province of Ontario, which Senator Frith referred to as being disadvantaged by Bill C-32, expenditures on social services and social welfare were $1.8 billion in 1975 , $3.3 billion in 1981, and about $9.6 billion in 1990, up from $8.5 billion in 1989.

Honourable senators, my point is—

Senator Frith: Before you leave those figures, does that lead you to say that Ontario is not disadvantaged under Bill C-32?

Senator Kelly: In absolute terms, yes, it is not disadvantaged.

Senator Frith: What does "in absolute terms" mean?

Senator Kelly: I think that what we are arguing about here is the rate of growth. We are not talking about cuts. We are talking about whether 5 per cent is a sufficient rate of growth.

Senator Frith: We are talking about the effects of the legislation, and the poor cannot eat absolute terms. You cannot put butter on absolute terms, whatever it means. The fact is that they lose money.

Senator Kelly: I am simply saying that Senator Frith would have us infer that there is less government expenditure going into welfare and social services when actually there is substantially more than ever before in our history. If the argument is whether there is enough, then I think that argument could go on forever. But I do not like the suggestion that there is a cut, because there is not a cut.

Senator Frith: Ontario is disadvantaged. You are not suggesting that Ontario is not disadvantaged by Bill C-32. The social programs are disadvantaged. Do you accept that?

Senator Kelly: No.

Senator Frith: You do not?

Senator Kelly: No, I do not accept that.

Senator Frith: You do not? Very well; carry on. That does affect how seriously we take the rest of what you say, but carry on.

[Senator Kelly.]

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, for prudent fiscal management governments require a much higher degree of financial certainty than has hitherto been the case, especially when governments do not control the actual outlay of money. The contributing government wants legitimately to know how much it is in for, and to establish a limit to its exposure. To do otherwise certainly, in my opinion, is to give up on any responsible approach to fiscal policy and deficit management. There is not a bottomless pit.

The federal government is not alone in this pursuit. The NDP government of Ontario, not a government known for its fiscal conservatism, has imposed rigid limits on expenditures in the health care sector, all in pursuit of financial certainty. We are all aware of last year's OMA agreement which imposes thresholds on physicians' OHIP billings and, by a complex formula, imposes a cap on total utilization of the OHIP pool. Other health care practitioners have had their OHIP fee-for-service schedule frozen at last years' levels, or levels characteristically below the rate of inflation. OHIP funding for out-of-country health care services has been severely restricted. Funding to Ontario hospitals has similarly been limited, a point to which Senator Frith alluded in his remarks.

These cuts cause a certain amount of hardship and inconvenience. That is understood. But the indisputable fact that we have to confront is that a new day has dawned. Uncontrolled government expenditures have to become controlled. Fat has to be squeezed out of the delivery systems. I do not think there is a person here who would not argue in support of the suggestion that our delivery systems need very careful scrutiny, far more than they have ever had before. I think this bill can force that situation to take place and be dealt with.

Since the federal government does not control the actual delivery of the dollars to health care and social services at the provincial level, the only effective mechanism available to it is to establish a limit on the willingness to fund that delivery.

The fact of the matter is that all levels of government must exercise fiscal restraint. There is no point in one level of government trying to do it alone. I think it is fair to say that some of the provincial governments, including the government of my own province, have come a little bit late to this realization. I note, as I have before in this place, that the previous Ontario government increased its expenditures on an annual basis approaching an average of 10 per cent while the economy was, on its own, experiencing a substantial growth.

Senator Barootes: Would you believe 14 per cent?

Senator Frith: If you suggest it, probably not.

Senator Kelly: This free and uncontrolled spending was a factor contributing to an overheated economy. It also served to neutralize the federal government's concerted campaign to reduce its own operating expenditures and borrowing requirements.

Honourable senators, why should the federal government shoot itself in the foot by contributing to free spending through uncontrolled or unlimited CAP, EPF or any other federal-provincial transfers.

I also note in passing that, in general, the need for fiscal restraint has not yet impacted on local government. I note from Statistics Canada figures for February 1992 that local government employment actually increased by 1.3 per cent during the last quarter of 1991 compared to the same quarter in 1990.

Honourable senators, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, expenditures for social services is certainly an emotional issue, but I think we do a disservice to all when we get caught up in the emotion and begin to lose sight of or confuse the facts. The facts are that more money than ever before, from every level of government, is going into the social services about which Senator Frith was so eloquent. Federal spending on social services is substantially larger than it was during the 1981-82 recession over which the previous government presided.

Senator Thériault: Why do you not explain why?

Senator Kelly: We are talking here about a proper management of government doing the best it can with the resources it has, and getting away from the idea that all it needs to do is borrow money, raise taxes or do something else to feed money into the system; that it need not worry about how efficiently its programs are delivered, just keep the money moving. You cannot do that any longer, honourable senators. It just is not on.

● (1520)

Honourable colleagues, I suggest we cut through the fog of distortion that has been laid down around this bill and recognize it for what it is, another step in this government's fiscal management strategy, not to cut, not to reduce, but to control.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I assumed when Senator Kelly smiled through almost all of that speech that it was just his natural amiability.

Senator Barootes: It is his engaging personality.

Senator Frith: He was unable to deliver it with a straight face. I ask him if he can answer this question with a straight face.

Senator Barootes: Stop smiling.

Senator Frith: Would he have made that speech if Bill Davis were still the Premier of Ontario?

Senator Simard: You do not have to answer that.

Senator Frith: Let the record show that Senator Kelly smiled.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: I have two questions to put to Senator Kelly, if I may. First, did Senator Kelly intend not to address the point that Senator Frith made, which was that increasing welfare payments by 5 per cent, when the number of welfare recipients is increasing by 39 per cent, is not a policy that will put food in the mouths of hungry children? Why did he not answer that question?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I made an effort to make the point that, unless we impose limits on the increases in many of these areas, there will be little or no initiative directed toward improving the efficiency of the delivery of these services. I believe a lot of work must be done on that. Just saying it will not be enough.

Senator Gigantès: I have a second question.

Is Senator Kelly saying that the government will force people to starve so that the rich can re-examine how little charity to give?

The Hon. the Speaker: I am sorry, honourable senators, but the 15 minutes are up. I should also point out with respect to Senator Kelly's previous statement that the 10-minute time limit is on the motion.

Senator Frith: It is on the motion for time allocation.

The Hon. the Speaker: The motion for time allocation is 10 minutes except for the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition, and each speaker will speak no longer than 30 minutes. That is rule 41(2)(a) and (c). You were allowed 15 minutes.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, a few days ago a public opinion poll in the province of British Columbia revealed that the popularity of the Conservative federal government has declined to 6 per cent. In British Columbia, we make beer with more spirit than that.

There are many reasons for this pronounced dislike: The thoroughly botched constitutional process; the reactionary GST tax; the indifference to the plight of the poorest in society; and certainly, as far as British Columbia is concerned, the feeling that B.C. has become a special victim in the government's transparent attempt to transfer many of its obligations to the provincial and municipal governments. It claims, and we heard the claim again today, that it is waging a valiant war against waste and profligate spending.

Well, the ploy is not working in my province of British Columbia. Canadians on the West Coast know what this game is all about. A federal government which claims that it is involved in an exercise of fiscal and financial good management is attempting to make provincial and municipal governments the villains. The new Tory party line is, "the provincial governments are the big spenders, despite our efforts to save money and reduce taxes".

The very week the government asked us to support this bill was the same week it announced that the Boeing Corporation would be forgiven a $13 million loan to facilitate the sale of Canadair to Bombardier Corporation. There is quite a lineup at that corporate food bank waiting for handouts—and they are getting them!. Listen to this: The cost of writing off this grant to Boeing Corporation is in addition to the $589 million in subsidies and investments from the federal and other levels of government.

Senator Barootes: Do you want them to close the plant down and put everybody out of work? Is that what you want?

Senator Perrault: This was the same week that rumours abounded that Canadian taxpayers would be called upon to rescue one of the major corporations in this country, which is in some financial trouble. This comes at a time when thousands of young Canadians are being hounded and harassed by collection agencies to pay their student loans. They simply cannot find work. No bailouts for them; no loans forgiven. The government has the money to contribute $5.5 million to build a national humour museum. In itself, that profligate action by the government is a form of sick humour.

There is little to laugh about these days. You hound the students, you take money away from the poor and the indigent, and you give money for a humour museum and to the Boeing Corporation and to de Havilland—everybody who lines up at the gate.

The Tory government takes a perverse joy in punishing certain specified provinces: British Columbia, Alberta, and Ontario. It is alleged that we are the so-called "have provinces". As a result, we are supposed to be prime targets for Tory discrimination.

People are pouring into British Columbia from all over Canada. They are landing on our local welfare rolls. The cost to local governments is simply enormous. As a result, the welfare rolls are growing, food banks are empty, bread lines are endless, and the federal government continues its mad dance with disaster, shoving its obligations on to the shoulders of the provincial and municipal taxpayers, forgetting all the time that there is only one taxpayer.

In the sixties and seventies, a Liberal federal government and the provinces established a jointly funded system of public health care and other programs. This is being reviewed today. The federal government committed itself to share the cost of those programs, and Canadians have long considered them to be a benefit of Canadian federalism. But those great social programs are now under assault by a Conservative government, which is in the process of what that government has described as "off-loading" them. The other, less polite, description of this off-loading process is "buck-passing".

What are the tactics? Reducing, or eliminating outright, certain federal transfers; limiting the growth rate of federal transfers so that the federal government's share of a program costs diminishes; imposing new conditions which narrow eligibility for federal cost sharing, or fully or partially withdrawing federal government services, thus increasing demands on corresponding provincial services.

Federal off-loading measures have affected a wide range of cost-shared programs including health care, post-secondary education, social assistance, economic developments and services to aboriginal peoples.

Of course the federal government wants to reduce the deficit and the debt, but its efforts to avoid associating itself with any program cuts are pathetic and represent an abdication of real leadership.

Conservative apologists will argue that the provinces are only being asked to bear their "fair share" of restraint. That is the line being used. However, cuts in provincial transfers represent 47 per cent of federal savings under the expenditure control plan, even though provincial transfers make up only 20 per cent of federal program spending. This proportion would be considerably higher if the current effects of off-loading measures implemented before 1990-91 were included. For example, the 1992-93 cost to British Columbia of Established Programs Financing restraint measures introduced before 1990-91 is about $750 million.

Federal off-loading actions have other effects. The effect on British Columbia of off-loading measures implemented since 1982 is $1.4 billion in 1992-93. This is equivalent to more than 75 per cent of our province's projected deficit. The total for all provinces is $11.4 billion. Provinces have had to raise taxes or increase debt to make up this federal shortfall. There have been increased demands on related provincial programs as a result.

Translated into hard, cold, economic facts, beginning in 1991-92 and by the year 2000, this so-called "federal restraint program" will involve a total loss of $33 billion for the province of British Columbia. And this government talks about "cooperative federalism".

We have thousands of people streaming into British Columbia from all over Canada looking for work. We have to pick up an enormous tab for this process—yet you put a 5 per cent cap on us? You should be ashamed. No wonder the federal Conservatives are at 6 per cent in the polls, and plummeting even at that.

The most important effect of federal buck-passing may be the rapidly growing federal-provincial fiscal imbalance. In other words, off-loading has greatly widened the gap between program responsibility and revenue capability of the two orders of government. Most of the growth in public sector spending is occurring in health care and other social services, areas of provincial jurisdiction.

Future predictions indicate that this trend will continue. Provincial spending on health, education and social services measured as a per cent of gross national domestic product will rise significantly in the future, even with expenditure restraint measures. By contrast, federal contributions to the provinces in these areas are projected to decline. Therefore, at the same time as provincial costs are rising, federal off-loading is reducing the funds available to provinces. Without corrective action, the fiscal imbalance between the federal and provincial governments will widen. A rapidly growing fiscal imbalance between the two senior orders of government in the Canadian federation is unsustainable and must be addressed jointly by both orders of government, and without the cynical, political buck-passing, which has been a feature of this government's operations since 1982.

● (1530)

As honourable senators are aware, since 1967 the federal government has provided funding through the Canada Assistance Plan to assist with provincial expenditures on income assistance and other social services for those in need. Under the original CAP agreement, federal payments equalled 50 per cent of eligible provincial expenditures. As part of its so-called Expenditure Control Plan, the federal government has imposed a special and discriminatory 5 per cent limit on the annual rate of growth in our provinces.

The three provinces that receive nothing in equalization—namely B.C., Alberta and Ontario—are contributors to Confederation and they are pleased to contribute, but they do not want to be victims of discrimination.

Honourable senators, the five per cent will continue until the 1994-95 fiscal year. The result is that B.C. must now fund 100 per cent of social assistance costs over this arbitrary threshold. This is wrong, immoral and unfair. As a result, we will see a reduction of more than $1.3 billion in B.C.'s CAP receipts over a five-year period—that is, from 1991 to 1994-95. British Columbia along with Alberta and Ontario, are the targets. This policy reflects the federal government's mad desire to redistribute provincial transfers at the same time as reducing them.

Discriminatory targeting has been chosen despite the fact that federal CAP funds are themselves transferred directly to persons in need, and the size of income assistance in a province is not closely related to the province's fiscal capacity. These programs are designed to help individuals.

Equalization is provided to those provinces that could not otherwise provide adequate levels of services to their residents without resorting to unduly high levels of taxation. Now, federal off-loading has also affected the fiscal equalization process. British Columbia is not eligible for equalization payments and, therefore, not directly affected by these changes.

Do you still wonder why there is little Conservative support in the province of B.C? Changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act which came into effect in 1990 will cost our province an estimated $60 million in increased income assistance costs in 1992-93.

The federal government has reduced its share of British Columbia's reforestation costs by $50 million.

In the mid-1980s, the federal government purchased $58 million worth of labour force training from B.C. Under a new agreement, the federal government gives only first consideration to provincial institutions for purchases up to a maximum of $26 billion in 1992-93. Are you trying to shut down the engine of economic growth in the west, at a time when there is a desparate need to retrain the unemployed?

As well, the federal government has reduced its payments to B.C. for the cost of child welfare services to off-reserve status Indians by $6 to $8 million a year.

Buck-passing has raised our province's costs in many other areas, including farm income stabilization, crop insurance, police services, economic development, social housing and correctional facilities.

The combined negative impact on British Columbia of federal cuts to smaller programs is at least $160 million in 1992-93.

In 1991, the federal government redesigned the unemployment insurance program. As senators are aware, the number of weeks of employment required to qualify for unemployment insurance was increased and it became more difficult to get benefits out of the program. As a result fewer people were eligible for unemployment insurance. This put pressure on provincial income assistance budgets and those of the municipalities, particularly in 1991 when employment growth slowed.

At the same time the federal government restricted the amount of income assistance that it would cost-share with my province and with Ontario and Alberta, as I mentioned earlier. This has had the effect of transferring to my province and to others the major portion of the incremental costs of providing food, clothing and shelter to a growing number of unemployed who are coming to B.C. from all over the country. These costs are reflected in income assistance expenditures. They are large and continue to increase rapidly. Increased income assistance expenditures are the results of policy decisions to increase the levels of benefits and rapidly expanding case loads. Case load growth has been the major factor.

Approximately 280,000 people in B.C. are now receiving income assistance, if dependents are counted. The rising number of people receiving income assistance can be attributed to a number of causes, including the slowdown in the economy, the work force expanding more rapidly than the jobs are being created, partly because of job-seekers who have come to B.C. from other parts of the country, and people from abroad. No wonder the people of B.C. are angry. To my friends on the other side of the chamber I can only suggest that you are leading us into ruin.

April 20 will mark the 339th anniversary of Oliver Cromwell's speech to the infamous Rump Parliament. Cromwell said on that occasion, "You have stayed in this place too long and there is no health in you. In the name of God, go!" I commend the words of Cromwell to that supine and silent group of government apologists who occupy seats on the other side of the chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I had not intended to participate in this debate but it occurred to me as I listened to the other senators opposite and on this side that this measure is not properly labelled. In truth, it is an invisible constitutional bill. It establishes forever and a day within my province an eleventh province. That eleventh province is an invisible province whose people reside within the boundaries of Metropolitan Toronto.

This province is composed of 140,000 people, about the same size as Prince Edward Island. It is composed mostly of a third of our children. The people of this province do not have enough to eat; do not have sufficient clothing. That means that at least once or twice a month they have to get their weekly food at a food bank. During this period of growth in Ontario, the food banks have increased from 40 in the early eighties to over 140 food banks at the present time.

Essentially, honourable senators, we are institutionalizing by constitutional means an eleventh province in my province, except that these people have no voice. They have no power; they have no progress; they have no upward mobility to move from their state. As my honourable colleague the senator from Alberta said, we have established an under class. That under class is not getting smaller; it is growing.

There is, after all, honourable senators, a failure of our old Constitution. There is an attempt by the government to establish a new type of Constitution which will entrench this under class.

In every book that I have ever read of political science, I have been told that the purpose of government was to do three things: first, to feed the hungry; second, to provide clothing and shelter to those who need it; and third, to provide social justice. That is the permanent test of political philosophy in every book that I have read concerning the history of the growth of democracy. Surely, on those three simple tests, this bill fails, and because it fails, it should be withdrawn.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I want to speak briefly on behalf of the people from the Maritimes and, in particular, those from New Brunswick. It is no secret that over the years—and especially since the Tories came to power in 1984—a large number of people from the Maritimes have had to leave for either Ontario, Alberta or British Columbia. It is no secret that when the economy goes bad, generally speaking they are the first ones to suffer and to lose their jobs.

● (1540)

Over the years, people in the Maritimes have not been very happy that somehow since Confederation the provinces of central Canada, particularly Ontario, have progressed while they have gone down. Nevertheless, through the federal-provincial programs Ontario has always contributed in large measure to the well-being of the people in the Atlantic provinces and the poorer provinces.

For the life of me, I cannot understand, in a time when we are in a constitutional crisis, why the federal government would say to the three best-off provinces, "Regardless of the number of people you have depending on social assistance programs, we want to decrease your expenditures by 5 per cent. Senator Kelly, who I understand comes from the Toronto area, knows very well that in the 1981-82 recession or depression—call it what you like, because for a lot of people these recessions are depressions—the poor were never affected as they are today.

I come from a small village and I know a lot of poor people who have had to move to Toronto to look for jobs. They sometimes call me or write to me in desperation. When you are poor in Toronto and cannot pay your rent, or when you have to use every cent you have just to pay the rent, you need social assistance to feed and clothe your children. It is the people who are affected. It is not the government of Ontario. It is not government at all. Can't you see the difference between people and governments? The number of food banks has grown from about 75 to 300 in the past few years. Thousands of kids in Toronto don't have enough food. They are hungry. Don't you care?

More and more, this country is becoming like the United States and other countries where the rich get richer and the poor starve to death. People in government and business do not seem to understand that, when the working people are not working and have no money to spend, business goes down. That is one reason why the people of Canada have lost confidence in the government. Why is it that consumers are not spending? It is because they have lost confidence.

For the past seven or eight years the social safety net, which has been in place for decades, has been under attack from every side. Fishermen and farmers tell me that they are worried. People 50 years of age are worried that, if the trend continues, by the time they are 65 there will be no old age pensions. There will be no family allowance. Therefore, they are not spending their money. The fishermen in my community had a good season last year, but they are not spending their money. They are hanging on to it because they are scared.

The Unemployment Insurance Program has also been attacked from all sides. The people are worried and they are not spending. They have lost confidence.

Legislation like this bill that Senator Kelly is defending, and all other such legislation that his government has imposed on the people of Canada since coming to office, has destroyed the confidence of the poor people. They are worried. The older people and seniors tell their sons and daughters about the 1930s. There was wealth in Canada in the 1930s but where was it? They found out when war broke out. But at least when the war measures were put in place the people regained their confidence, and for 30 or 40 years the people of Canada had confidence in their institutions. Sure they changed governments, but who cared? I was not worried when the Liberal Government of Canada was defeated in 1978, because I thought we would have a continuation.

I am worried now, not for myself, perhaps, but for the poor people of Canada. Every day when senators rise to defend this kind of legislation they show that they are forgetting about people and thinking in terms of parties and power; they are thinking of themselves, people with power and money, and forgetting the reasons why people should have confidence in elected governments.

For God's sake, it is time for you to change. It is time for you to go back to what you were saying before 1984, that the social safety net is a sacred trust. If you had lived by that commitment you could have stayed in power two or three terms; it would not have mattered. Now it matters because you have destroyed the confidence of the people of this country. I am worried that the whole country will pay the price. For God's sake, wake up.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, having been, in the other place, Parliamentary Secretary to two Ministers of National Health and Welfare, I was proud of the social legislation of the Liberal governments between 1963 and 1984, and of the great progress that was being made in establishing a social safety net for Canadians, especially as it would look after them in times of hardship, such as during the present depression. However, today we have reached third reading on Bill C-32, and I feel sad. I am sad, not only because this piece of legislation will hamper the needs of the provinces with respect to welfare payments for their disadvantaged people, but also because this piece of legislation is taking place under a cloud of diminished parliamentary democracy in this chamber.

● (1550)

This legislation is being passed under the cloud of closure. For the first time in the Senate's history, we are having closure on a piece of social welfare legislation. The Conservative government and senators opposite should be ashamed of their action today; doubly ashamed because this feature of closure was brought in improperly. It was brought in in June of last year on a mere majority. A major change to our rules such as introducing closure to our debates should have been passed by a two-thirds majority, as required both by the present and the previous Rules of the Senate of Canada.

Honourable senators, this method of forcing legislation on the Senate is so improper that provincial governments should not only challenge this bill in the arena of public opinion but also in the high courts of this country. British Columbia challenged this piece of legislation and won in their court, but they lost in the Supreme Court of Canada, unfortunately.

In my province of Ontario, the Minister of Finance has estimated that this ceiling on the CAP will cost the province at least $1 billion in the fiscal year that ends today. I have heard other estimates that in future years it will cost double the amount each year until 1995, when this legislation is supposed to expire.

Unfortunately, the people who will suffer under this legislation are the poor people; the poor who are getting poorer every year in Canada. The type of government that we have here, this so-called neo-conservatism, reminds me of heartless Reaganism in the United States and Thatcherism in the United Kingdom.

There are a few other remarks I would like to make. As a physician, I deplore the deterioration of the quality of health care in my province of Ontario, thanks to the federal government which has no heart for the poor and the sick of this country. More and more hospitals are closing more and more beds, laying off nursing staff and other help in the hospitals.

We know that the costs of health care have escalated out of all proportion to inflation, to quality of health care, or to the minimal growth of Canada's population, even with abundant immigration. However, this past winter and the one before, the Auditor General of Canada severely criticized the federal Department of Health and Welfare for its shoddy accounting practices, and also for its several apparent exorbitant expenditures such as travel allowances, presumably including the cost of shipping persons to other locales because medical service was not available locally.

The shadows of inside arrangements and price fixings are not dispelled by a department that is still two years in arrears for its books and full accounting of its spending. More important, honourable senators, the federal Department of Health and Welfare and the provincial ministries of health have, in one generation of 20 years and especially in the past decade, racked up expenditures some 15 times the cost of Medicare in its early years. I ask, has the health of Canadians degenerated fifteen-fold or has the population of sick people increased to such an extent that the cost of socialized services has escaped into orbit?

I would like to point out to honourable senators that in this period of time the single distinctive historical event, besides an increase in labour wage settlements and unionization of health care professionals, is the widening practice of performing procedures that are not health care at all. Here I mention the procedure of abortion, which is actually not health care.

Even in the other place NDP member Dawn Black, a proponent of access to abortion as a social good—something to which everyone should have equal access—concedes that abortion on demand has created a crisis in health care in Canada. In 1990 alone, over 95,000 recorded abortions were performed on Canadians, inclusive of some 1,500 performed in border states under the pretence of health care. As a result of this apocalyptic destruction of a small population, the actual number of young women of child-bearing years has been decreasing in Ontario. This is a direct result of the fact that they were not allowed to be born. The high numbers of abortions have, in 23 years, eliminated many women from our midst.

Honourable senators, there is no escaping the facts being debated here this afternoon. It is inadequate for the government, indeed for any government, merely to apply a poultice to the growing canker of high costs of health care in the provinces. Limiting transfer payments will only rub salt into these gaping wounds. What is needed, in truth, is a study of expenditures in non-elective procedures, in incidental outlays, in the failure of cost controls, in the need for expensive wage settlements and for lay-offs.

What must seriously be taken into account is whether or not this extra so-called "health procedure" is criminalized in statute, and whether or not it belongs in the federal jurisdiction alone and is not eligible health care.

Last year Superior Court Justice Kennedy in Nova Scotia pointed out that, in pith and substance, abortion belongs in the field of criminal law, a solely federal jurisdiction. Bill C-32 should be returned to the other place and reintroduced, perhaps, in an omnibus bill to specify with greater care and detail what is payable to the provinces for Medicare and what is not eligible health care.

Honourable senators, we had this great economic summit last week here in this city and it seems to me that it just crashed to the ground. It appears that the federal government does not see the needs of the provinces. It also appears that the federal government is blind to the needs of the people of the provinces. It is also very evident that the federal government is dumb. Yes, it is plain dumb and it has no compassion. It has no understanding of the hardships that Bill C-32 will bring upon the people of the provinces.

I appeal to you, honourable senators, to open your ears, your eyes, and your hearts to the poor people who are going to be wronged by this legislation. Let us stop Bill C-32 from passing.

PRIVATE BILL

ROYAL SOCIETY OF CANADA—BILL TO AMEND ACT TO INCORPORATE—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Castonguay, seconded by the Honourable Senator David for the second reading of Bill S-7, an Act to amend An Act to incorporate the Royal Society of Canada.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, when Senator Castonguay also spoke to this bill on second reading on February 28 last, he mentioned how the Royal Society of Canada was incorporated by an act of Parliament in 1883. When reading the Debates of 1883, one is struck by how closely the Royal Society of Canada was modeled after the Royal Society of England and France's l'Academie.

The sponsor of the original legislation in the House of Commons, Mr. Tassé, took pride in the fact that that Queen Victoria herself—and at the north end of our gallery there is a handsome bust of Her Majesty, as she then was, looking down on this debate—approved of the initiative. Mr. Tassé told the house:

> Presumptuous though it may appear for mere colonists, as we are generally called, I am proud to say that it has received the cordial approbation of her Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, who, we are happy to realize, at all times manifests the most lively interest for the development of literature, arts and sciences, not only in the United Kingdom, but wherever Her Imperial Sceptre extends—over Her vast domains on which the sun never sets. Far is it indeed from our aspirations to rival the famous Royal Society of England; but we wish to follow in its footsteps, inspired by its example, by its glorious traditions, and lay the foundation for a grand and powerful literary institution in this great land of Canada.

That was March 19th, 1883, at page 262 of the Debates.

Mr. Tassé also took pride in a letter received from Camile Doucet, permanent secretary of the French Academy. Senator Simard, and perhaps Senator Murray, might be interested in this. I would like to be able to read from this letter in the language in which it was originally written, but unfortunately the House of Commons Debates were not published in French until 1896. So although the secretary of the French Academy wrote to the Royal Society in French, and although Mr. Tassé read the letter to the House of Commons in French, only an English translation is available in the House of Commons Debates.

In any event, what I am about to read is a part of the letter, as translated, that the permanent secretary of the French Academy, Camile Doucet, wrote to the Royal Society of Canada.

> The Academy thanks you for having informed it of your organization, and for having done so with so much cordiality, and in language so elevated, so pure, and so French. The old Academy of France delights to extend its right hand of fellowship to the new born Royal Society of Canada, and wishing that it may, after 300 years of existence, be as flourishing as her elder sister has the happiness to be to-day.

I should say that the quote I had, not only of the letter but from Mr. Tassé's speech says, interestingly:

> After Recess.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF CANADA

Mr. TASSÉ (Translation)

So not only the letter was written in French, but Mr. Tassé's entire intervention was in French but was only published in English. It was not available in French.

The objects of the society were set out in the preamble of the 1883 legislation. They were "to encourage studies and investigations in literature and science", to publish original works and papers "of merit", to "offer prizes or other inducements for valuable papers on subjects relating to Canada", to aid in research, and, "to assist in the collection of specimens with a view to the formation of a Canadian Museum of archives, ethnology, archaeology and natural history".

Bill S-7, which amends the 1883 act, does not change the preamble, though some of it does now seem dated, particularly the reference "to assist in the collection of specimens with a view to . . ." establishing a museum. Time has, blessedly and impressively, overtaken the "with a view to" part.

We, of course, now have a network of museums, be they under federal or provincial jurisdictions. Federally we have, among others, a National Archives and Museum of Natural History, and provincially the institution which comes most readilyto my mind,—which is understandable, I suppose—is the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto.

In any event, Bill S-7 leaves the preamble unchanged. The key amendment in the bill before us is the repeal of section 1 of the 1883 act, which severely limits the holdings of the society. Section 1 provides that the "annual value of real estate held at any one time for the actual use of the Society shall not exceed $4,000." I do not know what the magic is in $4,000 for property, but that, of course, appears with regard to property qualifications of senators also. Though $4,000 may have been a princely sum in 1883, today it would not even pay the property tax on a commercial building, and Bill S-7 proposes that the society continue to have the power to acquire and dispose of real and personal property, but without limit as to value. That is the key provision before us.

● (1640)

What is interesting is that, although the limitation of $4,000 in real property occupied but two lines of section 1 in the 1883 act, the section itself is more than one page long for this reason: It contains the names of all the founding members of the Society. I have an observation I want to make about that, but perhaps honourable senators may be interested in first hearing some of those names. They might ring a familiar bell for general or special students of history.

The first name I refer to is John William Dawson, who was the principal of McGill and a geologist. These descriptions, incidentally, do not appear in the 1883 act; just the names appear. I provide this additional information for whatever edification it might be:

—John William Dawson who was the principal of McGill, a geologist, and the first Canadian-born scientist of worldwide reputation.

—The Honourable Pierre-Joseph-Olivier Chauvreau, who was a lawyer, a senator, premier of Quebec, and dean of Laval's law faculty.

—Sir Daniel Wilson, who was one of Canada's best-known scholars, and the first president of the University of Toronto.

—Sir John George Bourinot—a name that will be familiar—whose work on procedure we still refer to.

—Alfred Richard Cecil Selwyn, a geologist, after whom the Selwyn mountains that straddle the Yukon-Northwest Territories were named.

—George Lawson, Canada's first professional botanist and founder of the Botanical Society of Canada.

—Charles Baillairgé, member of the fourth generation of the Baillairgé family of architects, sculptors and painters. Charles Baillairgé designed over 180 buildings, supervised construction of the Parliament buildings in the 1860s, and was the chief engineer for Quebec City for more than 30 years.

—Robert Bell, also a geologist—that so many of these prominent Canadians were geologists and scientists indicates the importance of Canada's mineral resources—who surveyed Northern Ontario for the transcontinental railway and was one of Canada's leading explorers of the Far North.

—Sir William Osler, writer, educator and at the turn of the century probably the best known physician in the English-speaking world. He became the first professor of medicine at Johns Hopkins University in the United States, and then Regius professor of medicine at Oxford.

[Senator Frith.]

—Napoleon Bourassa, architect, author, painter and sculptor, one of Canada's leading 19th Century artists.

—The Honourable Félix-Gabriel Marchand, lawyer, journalist and playwright who, in 1897, became premier of Quebec.

—Lieutenant-Colonel David Denison, a military historian of international repute and commander of the Governor General's Body Guard that fought in the 1866 Fenian Raid.

—John Macoun, explorer and Canada's foremost naturalist. He alone discovered more than 1,000 new species of plants. His collection of flora and fauna became the foundation for the National Museum of Natural Sciences.

—Joseph-Clovis-Kenner Laflamme, priest, scientist, professor of geology and physics at Laval. When he died in 1910, he was acknowledged as being the leading scholar in French Canada.

—The Reverend William Lyall, writer, philosopher, and professor at Dalhousie. His major works concerned the bringing together of the emotions and intellect in man.

—The Reverend John Clark Murray, scholar, philosopher, and a fighter for women's political and educational rights.

—John Watson, the only Canadian philosopher ever to be invited to give the prestigious Gifford Lectures in Edinburgh, Scotland, author of eight books and more than 200 articles.

—Louis-Honoré Fréchette, playwright, unofficial Poet Laureate of French Canada, the most important man of letters in 19th Century Quebec.

—Sir Sanford Flemming, about whom I suppose I need not say anything.

I know I can say personally that I can remember that my father, although he was famous for many more things, was a civil engineer, and in his earliest career actually did surveys out west for the old Grand Trunk Railway. I remember him talking of Sir Sanford Flemming who did the same thing, among other things, but achieved more distinction than my father did in that field. Of course, as you know, Sir Sanford Flemming is famous for much more than that.

Honourable senators, these are the names that loom large in the history of our country, but which, unfortunately, fewer and fewer Canadians have any knowledge of.

That brings me to an important part of this bill, because with the repeal and replacement of section 1, those names are to be struck from the act which incorporates the Royal Society of Canada. I do not think that is a good idea. It is something that the committee should look at.

I mentioned earlier that Bill S-7 does not change the preamble which contains the objects of the Society. However, the preamble begins with the words, "Whereas the persons hereinafter mentioned have . . ." It then goes on to say what they have joined to do, the names that I have just mentioned, these distinguished Canadians in our history. They joined together to form the Royal Society of Canada.

If the preamble remains unchanged but the names are removed through the repeal and replacement of section 1, apart from the unfortunate removal of the names of these distinguished Canadians, there will be a certain inconsistency, because the preamble says, "Whereas the persons hereinafter mentioned have . . .", and then when you read on in the new bill, you do not find those "hereinafter mentioned" persons. As I say, if the preamble remains unchanged but all the names are removed through the repeal and replacement of section 1, we will have a consolidated bill which in the preamble refers to persons who are not named and do not exist—names that have been chucked into the dust-bin of history.

Perhaps Senator Castonguay could help me with this. His remarks of February 28 made no mention of any change to the objects of the corporation or to the preamble which contains those objectives. I can only assume that this is not what was intended by the directors of the Royal Society of Canada. I cannot imagine that the Royal Society in Britain or l'Acadamie in France would ever change a bill that would remove the names of the original founders. I do not think we should do so.

In addition to replacing section 1, Bill S-7 repeals sections 5, 6 and 8 of the 1883 legislation.

Section 5 provided that the by-laws of the Society were to continue as the by-laws of the new incorporated entity. As Senator Castonguay mentioned, this provision has been overtaken by time. Sections 3 and 4, which deal with the making of by-laws, gives the Society all the authority it needs in this respect.

Since section 6 of the 1883 act provides that the officers of the Society will continue as the officers of the newly incorporated Society, I do not think that 109 years later these individuals still require the protection that that provision afforded them.

Finally, section 8 is being deleted. This is how that provision reads:

> No person otherwise competent to be a witness in any suit or prosecution in which the Society may be engaged, shall be deemed incompetent to be such witness by reason of his being or having been a member or officer of the Society.

Senator Castonguay mentioned that section 8 was being repealed because it had served its purpose. I do not quite understand that. Perhaps we can explore in committee what that purpose was and how time has rendered it redundant.

The last item I wish to deal with is section 9 of the original act, which reads:

> The Society shall make annual reports to the Governor-General and to both Houses of Parliament, containing a general statement of the affairs of the Society, which said reports shall be presented within the first twenty days of every Session of Parliament.

• (1650)

I was somewhat puzzled as to why that section was not being deleted by Bill S-7, and this is why. Though the Royal Society of Canada is obligated to report annually to both Houses of Parliament, it did not so report in 1991 or in 1990. It last reported, as best I could determine it, on October 3, 1989—two and one-half years ago. Section 9 requires it to report within 25 days following the start of a session. We have been in the Third Session of this Parliament since May 13, 1991, and there is still no report. Why do we want to have this directive of the Parliament of Canada if the Royal Society prefers to ignore it—apparently with impunity?

Do not misunderstand me, honourable senators; I am not suggesting that section 9 should be repealed, but the committee should look at either removing it—which I hope they do not do because I think we should have the report—or in some way making it clear that we expect compliance.

I do not believe that any of us have difficulties with the primary objective of Bill S-7, namely the removal of the $4,000 real property limitation, but I cannot say that I am captivated by some of the drafting that has been employed in Bill S-7 in an attempt to achieve this straightforward objective, and I have explained why.

What am I asking the committee to particularize in its study of this bill? Well, the bill before us sweeps out the door the names of giants in Canadian history. I do not think we should do that. The end result is that it produces a new Royal Society of Canada Act that is internally inconsistent. Perhaps the committee will be able to provide us with a solution, or at the very least some answers, as to why this approach was taken. I am sure that it was just an oversight—that is, I hope it was.

While it is undertaking this study, perhaps the committee could determine why the society is asking that section 9 remain in the act, particularly since it has shown little inclination to abide by it recently. I also mentioned that it might be singularly appropriate for the committee to have a look at the reason why section 8 has become dépassé, because there is no explanation for it. It may very well be that it has, but I ask the committee to impart that.

In closing, honourable senators, I made it clear at the beginning that we support this bill at second reading in the expectation that some of these irritants, or should I say discrepancies will be addressed by the committee.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, first, a few words of explanation as to why I am speaking after Senator Frith. Indeed, Bill S-7 is in my name. Unfortunately, I have been unable to attend the Senate the day the bill was to be read a second time, and Senator Castonguay was kind enough to take my place on that occasion.

So, at his request, I am rising today as if I had introduced the bill myself on second reading. I wish to thank the honourable senator for having stood in for me.

About Senator Frith's comments, I think that, as he said himself, considering that the bill will be passed unanimously on second reading, the proper time to deal with his comments is at the committee stage.

Incidentally, I must say that I was very impressed by the account of what had become of the founders of the Royal Society, particularly by their request as the result of which Her Majesty authorized the creation of the Royal Society.

Indeed, in the early days of the Royal Society, many distinguished people contributed to Canada's history. I think in particular of P.J.O. Chauveau who, as Senator Frith mentioned, was Premier of Quebec at the time of Confederation.

He also was, in those days, Minister of Education or Minister of Public Instruction as he was called then, after having held the position of Superintendent of Public Instruction in the Province of Canada. Having worked in that field most of my life, I realize that this great figure did play a very important role in shaping my perception of Quebec's history, especially in the field of education.

Strangely perhaps, Félix-Gabriel Marchand, who later became Premier of Quebec, was also involved in education which was one of his goals. While he was Premier, in 1896 or 1897, he tried to restore the Ministry of Public Instruction which had been abolished in 1875. He managed to put his legislation through the Commons so to speak, I mean the equivalent of the House of Commons, the National Assembly.

It is the Senate, or its equivalent the Legislative Council, which killed the bill creating or re-establishing the education department.

Time has changed. Anyway, we could go on about all the famous people who helped create the Royal Society of Canada. Senator Frith did it to a certain extent. I took the liberty of adding a few details on some of them. This being said, I propose that the Senate pass unanimously Bill S-7. After that, I will propose that the Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Tremblay, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, pursuant to rule 136(8) I must interrupt the proceedings. The Senate will now adjourn during pleasure to await the arrival of the Honourable the Deputy of the Governor General.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

ROYAL SOCIETY OF CANADA

REFERENCE TO 1883 EDITION OF HANSARD—CORRECTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to correct a statement I made yesterday during my intervention on Bill S-7. I must say this is a bit embarrassing.

When I was speaking on Bill S-7, I mentioned that the Debates of the House of Commons were not available in the French language until 1896. That surprised a number of us. It certainly surprised me when I received the material; so I checked. I am embarrassed to confess that it was not the Debates of the House of Commons, but rather those of the Senate, that were not available during that period.

Senators might remember that yesterday I said that I wanted to deal with a letter from Camile Doucet and with statements made by Mr. Tassé at the time of the establishment of the Royal Society of Canada. I had wanted to read it in French because the intervention had been made in French and the letter had been in French. However, I could not get the original version from the Commons Debates. So we made a further check. When we inquired of the Library to obtain the original French text as it appeared in the 1883 Debates, there was a misunderstanding as to which Debates we were referring to. That is when we were told they were not available.

Honourable senators, here is the correction. There is, in fact, a French text, or a French translation, of the House of Commons Debates from the time of Confederation. However, those wishing to read the Debates of the Senate in the French language can only do so for the period of 1896 onwards, except for the four sessions of the First Parliament, 1867 to 1871, which the Library translated into French later as a Centennial project.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): There is a constitutional provision for that.

Senator Frith: The information that we were given was that the Constitution provides that you can use either language, not that they must be translated.

Senator Murray: And the Journals and records must be?

Senator Frith: You can use them in both. But we were told that the French language in that first period was simply not used in the Senate with any regularity. Anyone who wishes to pursue this is welcome to do so, but that is where the trail ended in our investigation yesterday.

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): For those who are counting, the two important numbers of days for the calling of an election are 234 for the democrats, and 620 for the others.

NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE

IMPENDING PLAYERS' STRIKE

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, with so many serious problems inflicting our country and the world, some may regard as inconsequential any reference to hockey. The fact is, however, that hundreds of thousands of Canadians love our great national game and all of Canada looks forward to the Stanley Cup play-offs to provide the emotional thrills and the psychological lift for Canadians to escape from their winter doldrums into spring and summer.

It is unbelievable, therefore, that for the first time in the 75-year history of the National Hockey League the players may be going on strike within the hour. It will be a sad day for hockey and for Canada should this action be taken. At a time when Canada is suffering from high unemployment and the closing of factories and businesses from coast to coast, most Canadians will find it difficult to understand why this action is necessary.

As a director of the Vancouver Canucks, I can tell you this. In the past two years, the National Hockey League has undergone an unprecedented degree of change. There have been rapid and radical changes in the economics of the game, which has seen hockey salaries rise to an average of over $300,000 a year. Under the proposed new free agency system, NHL players would earn an average of $420,000, along with substantially improved life pensions at the age of 62.

Significantly, down through the years the National Hockey League has gone from a position of profit to one where substantial losses are threatened. The players have the figures. Indeed, they selected four teams for their own detailed financial scrutiny. They must know the gravity of the situation. The NHL will go from an overall loss of $9 million this year to a substantially greater loss in 1993-94.

For Canadian NHL teams there are special and very costly problems which relate to the differences between the system of taxation in the United States and the current tax regime in Canada. The cold truth is that unless NHL owners and the players adopt a concept of partnership, major league hockey teams in North America, particularly certain Canadian teams, will be in serious trouble.

This great game cannot survive in the deeply divisive, adversarial climate that from time to time has afflicted major league baseball and football in the United States. Understandably, the players—and there are many great ones—would like to have even more money and the owners would like to realize a satisfactory return on their investments.

Is there a rich and lucrative pot of untapped television revenue? The fact is that hockey will never be America's favourite sport. As a result, rich television contracts have not been secured for the game. Instead, the average fan supports the teams; the average, loyal, hard-working fan in Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal, Quebec and in the league's U.S. cities—and I hope there will soon be many fans in Ottawa.

What will happen if it is necessary to raise the price of tickets to $40 a game? Many tickets are now over $30 a game. This is not idle speculation; it is a fast-approaching reality. Is the great popular game of hockey to become a luxury for the economic elite in this country? Canadian franchises could be in serious trouble, and I suggest that more than one Canadian team will be forced to relocate south of the border if a realistic approach is not adopted.

What is to be done? Right now we need a vivid and tangible expression of the concept of partnership. This is a political suggestion. Get the teams back on the ice. I suggest that in politics, regardless of the way we vote here, we would ask the players to accept the present package with a commitment that within a six-month period talks would continue, that there would be a full sharing of economic data and information pertaining to all of the teams, that trust would be re-established and that both sides would move together in the interests of the fans who have supported this great game with fierce and uncommon loyalty.

Let us get on with the playoffs. Hockey is one of Canada's greatest and proudest exports. It would be a tragedy if it were to go into decline because of a lack of vision on the part of any of those associated with it. Meanwhile, let those of us in public life work to modify our tax laws so that NHL franchises in both Canada and the United States operate on the same level playing surface.

I appreciate the generous allowance of overtime for my remarks granted by Your Honour and honourable senators.

GREECE

THE LESSONS OF HISTORY

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, yesterday, during a speech of mine, Senator Lynch-Staunton remarked that I speak more of Greece than I speak of Canada.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: In positive terms.

Senator Gigantès: Indeed. Napoleon said that Greek history is composed of wars between villages described by great historians. Great historians have a lot to teach us. Santayana said that those who ignore history are condemned to repeat it.

I wish to speak to Senator Lynch-Staunton, in particular, about Linear B, which is an alphabet of the Minoan civilization that was discovered in Crete. It was deciphered by a young English architect in the fifties; it was found that the Linear B tablets contained the account books of businessmen—not history, not poetry, not literature. Because that Minoan civilization, the one after the big earthquake in the sixteenth century, was so obsessed with business and so little with literature or poetry, it disappeared. It was the Tory Minoans who lead that civilization to perdition.

There will be more Greek for you, sir. I shall try to have some every day.

NORTH ATLANTIC ASSEMBLY

SUBCOMMITTEE ON VERIFICATION AND TECHNOLOGY—REQUEST TO APPEND REPORT DENIED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, on Monday last I tabled in the Senate a report of the Canadian participation in meetings of a subcommittee of the Science and Technology Committee of the North Atlantic Assembly. In tabling the document, I neglected to make the normal motion that it be appended to the proceedings of that day. With unanimous consent, and given the historical importance of the document, might I have permission to have it appended to today's proceedings?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): I think we should establish a policy on the printing of such reports, no matter how important they may seem. I would suggest that Senator Hastings put this matter down as a Notice of Inquiry or a Notice of Motion so that we can discuss the whole principle.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Senator Bonnell: You are refusing leave to append it?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is what I said.

Senator Hastings: It is your motion; it is your rule.

The Hon. the Speaker: I presume it is agreed?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): No, honourable senators.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I said that we refuse to give leave to Senator Hastings for reasons already stated.

The Hon. the Speaker: That is what I mean. Leave is not granted.

THE ECONOMY

MISMANAGEMENT OF MONETARY POLICY—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday, April 2, 1992, I will call the attention of the Senate to the government's mismanagement of the economy, and particularly monetary policy.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): We currently have the lowest interest rates in 20 years. What are you talking about?

Senator Olson: It is essentially the same notice as one that fell off the Order Paper due to the 15-day rule.

Senator Barootes: If that is so, may I ask if it is permissible to reintroduce such an inquiry?

Senator Frith: The answer to your question "... may I ask ..." is no.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: I have the honour, honourable senators, to present petitions signed by 25 citizens of New-Brunswick opposed to the goods and services tax. Theses petitions are mainly from Fredericton and Saint John.

I have the honour to present petitions signed by 75 citizens of New-Brunswick opposed to the goods and services tax. These petitions are mainly from Fredericton, Saint John and Lincoln. These Canadian citizens numbering 100 in total will no doubt, when the time comes, remind the government that it refused to heed their pleas.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

NATIONAL REFERENDA—CHANGE IN GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to what appears to be another change of policy of the government with regard to a national referendum on the constitutional question. I recall the facts to be as follows. I am sure that if they are wrong, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, with his passionate proclivity for pedantry, will hasten to correct me.

Senator Murray: It is a passion for accuracy.

Senator Frith: Senator Barootes, you were here the other day when he turned around and gave you all a lecture and you were all nodding. Don't you remember that?

Senator Barootes: That is only because you were not listening!

Senator Frith: You were nodding then just as you are nodding now. The government had prepared legislation to lay a foundation for a national referendum. I then recall that some of the leader's colleagues among the government's supporters, namely those from Quebec, had adamantly opposed a national referendum.

Senator Thériault: You mean Bouchard!

Senator Frith: I remember Mr. Blackburn and Mr. Benoit Bouchard. I then understand that Mr. Blackburn had withdrawn his embargo. I see today on the wire that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, Benoit Bouchard, has said that the government may need a referendum bill if talks with the provinces, territories and aboriginal leaders fail.

My first question is: Is that sequence causatively connected? Can the Leader of the Government tell us anything more about the government's policy and change of view on a national referendum?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition speaks of a change in policy. The policy of the government on this matter was first set forth in the Speech from the Throne, read in this chamber on May 13, 1991.

Senator Bonnell: It has been changed since!

Senator Murray: I quote from pages two and three of Hansard of that date:

> After receipt and consideration of the committee's report, my government will propose a plan for a renewed Canada for consideration by the people of Canada. You will be asked to approve enabling legislation to provide for greater participation of Canadian men and women in constitutional change.

Senator Frith: Right. So?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the policy of the government has not changed.

Senator Frith: In between times it never changed? So far, you are confirming what I said. That is exactly what I remember.

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Frith: Was there never any change? Was I wrong about the fact that many of the Quebec members of the caucus and cabinet publicly opposed a national referendum?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my recollection is that there was an additional vote of confidence on that Speech from the Throne. It passed handily in the House of Commons. Therefore, one must assume that all those who supported it support the policies outlined in the Speech from the Throne.

Having said that, the public debate to which my honourable friend refers, and which did engage a number of members of the Conservative caucus, was principally about the timing of the legislation that is referred to in the Speech from the Throne.

Senator Frith: It is too bad we do not have television coverage in here, but perhaps the record will show that the Leader of the Government smiled throughout most of that answer.

Senator Murray: Do I not always do so?

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL PACKAGE—GOVERNMENT ALTERNATIVES

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Prime Minister is reported to have said in the other place that if the federal government does not receive approval from the premiers for its constitutional package that he is ready to move on other fronts, such as a referendum, a plebescite or a possible election. Would that not be a political confrontation with the premiers of the provinces? I am asking the honourable gentlemen if he could confirm that.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the resort to plebiscite, referendum or general election would not be a confrontation with the provincial governments. The resort to one of those mechanisms would take place after a deadlock-producing confrontation with the provinces.

Senator Bosa: Does the leader recall that Mr. Mulroney at one time stated, in criticism of the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau for having moved unilaterally on the patriation of the Constitution, that he would introduce a new civility in government in dealings between the federal government and the provinces.

Is that the new civility that the Prime Minister is now demonstrating?

● (1420)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am glad the honourable senator has asked that question. There is no way that the federal government could move unilaterally to amend most parts of the Constitution. Any plebiscite or referendum, or general election for that matter, would seek an expression of opinion from the people. There are amending formulae ranging from bilateral action by the federal Parliament and one province through to the general amending formula involving six provincial legislatures and Parliament on up to ten provinces and Parliament. Regardless of what might happen in any popular consultation, the process of amending the Constitution would not be changed. It might simply be expedited by a popular consultation.

Senator Bosa: In the patriation of the Constitution one province did not come on board. It now appears that one premier has stated emphatically that he will not compromise on the triple-E Senate. Consequently, were there an election, referendum or plebiscite and the federal government decided to proceed with the Constitutional package, we would have the same situation as when the Constitution was patriated.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, more than one premier has occasionally placed himself in a corner from which politically it was difficult to emerge. We hope that a spirit of honorable compromise will prevail and that it will be possible to reach agreement as between the federal government and all the provinces. Mr. Clark is working diligently to that end. The committee of federal-provincial ministers is meeting on an average, I believe, of once per week between now and the end of May. So we are expending all our efforts to attempt to achieve an accommodation and honorable compromise between the parties. If this fails, then we will, as the Prime Minister has indicated, have to consider other options in order to expedite the process.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, it is my wish that the ministers will succeed in reaching a compromise and concluding this very heated debate on constitutional reform. However, Mr. Trudeau also tried very hard to reach a compromise, but he did not. The present Prime Minister accused him of not being civil to the premiers and then indicated that he would introduce a new civility into the dialogue. It appears to me that Mr. Mulroney is headed into the same sort of situation—a situation of which he at one time was quite critical.

Senator Murray: It is not a matter of civility, honourable senators. My friend will recall that it was a matter of the constitutional conventions, as the Supreme Court of Canada later found. My friend, who has been around here for a long time, will recall the white paper that was tabled back in the 1960s by the Honourable Guy Favreau, the then Minister of Justice, who I think was closer to the truth about what the Canadian constitutional tradition required when he said that for major constitutional change unanimous agreement of the provinces was necessary.

SCIENCE POLICY

DEMISE OF SCIENCE COUNCIL OF CANADA—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I should like to thank the Leader of the Government for a response to a question I asked recently about the unhappy demise of the Science Council. The Leader of the Government pointed out that NABST had published a series of reports and that they were available. In his answer, he listed them, and I sent for them. They are extremely interesting.

● (1430)

I thank him for bringing them to my attention because even though I am very interested in this field, I certainly would not have known about them had I not had the opportunity to ask the question.

AMALGAMATION OF SOCIAL SCIENCES AND HUMANITIES RESEARCH COUNCIL AND CANADA COUNCIL

Hon. Lorna Marsden: That leads me to another question about science policy. Here I simply seek enlightenment. I am confused about the thinking behind the government's move to amalgamate the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council of Canada and the Canada Council, bodies that have been separate for the past 17 years. I am particularly confused because of the release by the Honourable Bill Winegard, the minister responsible, of the details of funding for the three federal granting councils. I understand that the budgets of SSHRC and the Canada Council will be kept in separate envelopes; am I correct about that?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I honestly do not know. However, I invite the honourable senator to put whatever questions she has on the record and I will obtain answers very quickly.

Senator Marsden: Let me then say that I would be grateful if the Leader of the Government in the Senate explicated in some detail the rationale for a merger which certainly has no scholarly or substantive advantage, as far as anyone can see, and appears to have no financial advantage, as far as anyone can see. It is a mystery to many of us why it would occur. Is there some other agenda going on here that I have simply missed? I look forward to receiving a full response from the minister.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as my honourable friend has mentioned, for quite a few years following the mid-1950s the functions were grouped under the one body, the Canada Council, and I think the experience was not so terribly bad.

I will see what further explanation, besides the obvious economic and financial one, may be available from the government on this matter.

Senator Marsden: If the minister does not think that experience was bad, I draw to his attention a new book by Donald Fisher entitled: "Social Sciences in Canada: 50 years of National Activity", published very recently by Wilfrid Laurier University Press. It is an excellent explication of why it was so bad and why this new move is probably not desirable.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA

"OPEN HOUSE" PUBLICATION—SIGNIFICANCE FOR SENATE

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have in my hands a publication put out by the Public Information Office of the House of Commons entitled "Open House." It contains, in my opinion, some doubtful, if not heretical, material.

I would like to quote extracts from pages 2 and 3. In referring to the legislative process the publication states that the first test is the House of Commons and the second test is the Senate. That is questionable, because we all know that we also introduce bills here and they undergo their first test in the Senate. That is one matter.

The statement that provokes my curiosity is the following:

> If the House [of Commons] and the Senate cannot agree on amendments—although this rarely happens—the House [of Commons] requests a meeting of representatives of the two chambers so that a solution can be reached.

Does that mean that only the House of Commons can request a meeting with the Senate, or is it still within our grasp for the Senate to request such a meeting? In other words, is this new doctrine or is it just a heresy?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not at all certain that the Constitution or the rules provide that either house may seek or convene a conference. It may be that that initiative does have to come from the House of Commons, but I am not certain. I would like to look it up.

Senator Stewart shakes his head. If I am in error, I would like to be corrected now so that the record may be clear.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I am not prepared to accept Senator Murray's last statement.

There are many matters one could raise out of this publication. I appreciate that it is a pro domo publication by the House of Commons. Nevertheless, it invites the public to get involved. It states: "write to your Member of the House of Commons with your views on proposed new laws." Of course. But members of the public should know that they can also write to Canadian senators and their views will be heard.

What is particularly offensive about this pro domo publication is that it has a photograph of the House of Commons—I should note in passing that it is in both languages and I am quite pleased with that. It has a photograph of the green house; it has a marvellous photograph of the Speaker of the House of Commons; it has a photograph of the Peace Tower carillonneur. However, it does not have a photograph of our august Speaker of the Senate. Is that a deliberate omission, or is he not sufficiently dignified to appear in this publication? What is wrong with the Senate? Is this just House of Commons propaganda? Is the House of Commons going to abolish us tomorrow? We should know what they have in mind.

Senator Barootes: Was there a question there?

Senator Corbin: Yes. You were not listening again.

JUSTICE

DEMISE OF LAW REFORM COMMISSION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate, since he is dealing with other institutions that are being liquidated, could give us the rationale for liquidating the Law Reform Commission. Will the functions of the national Law Reform Commission be taken up under another umbrella within the federal government?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I would expect that the Department of Justice would play the role that the Law Reform Commission has played in the past.

In a word, the Law Reform Commission is being wound up because we believe it has done an excellent job and has served its purpose.

Senator Grafstein: The basis for establishing an independent body such as the national Law Reform Commission had to do with the arm's length principle. If the Leader of the Government in the Senate were to examine the Debates of the Senate, he would see that at that time it was felt important to have an independent law advisory body that could examine not only the functions of the law generally, but also those activities that come under the purview of the Department of Justice.

Prior to the establishment of the Law Reform Commission there was a law reform body within the Department of Justice and it was felt at the time that that should be segregated and set out on its own. Is there some reason why the rationale which pertained several decades ago has somehow been lost?

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators. The fact is that there are available to the government now, and to Parliament and to the public, many more sources of independent advice and legal scholarship than we had in the days prior to the establishment of the Law Reform Commission. We now believe that it is not strictly necessary to maintain such a commission at public expense.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS—TIMING OF RATIFICATION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government a question about the negotiations that are now under way respecting a North American Free Trade Agreement.

Senator Murray: Are you in favour or against?

Senator Olson: I would like to know something else about it.

Senator Murray: You need more information?

● (1440)

Senator Olson: Yes. At various times up to and including yesterday, there have been a number of statements made in Washington by some of the leading proponents of such a free trade agreement. They say that it should not be brought before the Congress of the United States prior to the election to be held the first week of November, because if it is, it is destined to fail.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate obtain for us some assurance that the people of Canada will be consulted, in the same way as the people of the United States are to be consulted? In other words, will such a measure be introduced only after an election, so that the people of Canada will have had an opportunity to express themselves respecting this negotiation?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have given the assurance here recently that any free trade agreement would be placed before Parliament, and therefore Parliament would have an opportunity to review, debate and decide on it. That is the only assurance that I am authorized to give on that matter at this time.

Insofar as the United States is concerned, notwithstanding the speculation of various people, including some officials in that country, our understanding is that the administration in the United States remains committed to trying to complete negotiations and have a North American Free Trade Agreement ratified in the present calendar year.

Having said that, I am sure it will be obvious to everyone that the longer the negotiations continue and the closer we get to the November election, the less likely it becomes that it would be possible for the Americans to ratify any agreement before November.

PARLIAMENT OF CANADA

CONVENING OF CONFERENCES OF BOTH HOUSES

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government, in answering a question a moment ago, wanted to be advised—I think he said "now"—about the seeking or convening of conferences of both Houses of Parliament. I looked it up. I have the fifth edition of Beauchesne, and I quote from citation 815:

> Either House may demand a conference upon the following matters:

It lists a number of matters and includes:

> . . . to offer reason for disagreeing to, or insisting on, amendments; or any other subjects allowed to be proper for such a proceeding.

The authority that is given is Bourinot at pages 274 to 280. I do not have Bourinot here, but that is what Beauchesne says.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for that.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

CNR—PURCHASE OF U.S. LOCOMOTIVES—EFFECT OF UNITED STATES "BUY AMERICA" POLICY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the government has expressed concern on a number of occasions about cross-border shopping, and indeed has taken some action under pressure from the provinces to do something to remedy the situation. Nevertheless, recently the government allowed Canadian National to purchase locomotives in the United States. The Mayor of London, Ontario, Tom Gosnell, at that time said, "It's the ultimate cross-border shopping trip."

However, he went on to say something else, and this is what I would like to ask the minister about. He noted that the London plant is excluded from bidding on contracts for U.S. government-subsidized companies such as Amtrak because of "Buy America" policies.

Can the minister tell us exactly how far that prohibition extends? In spite of the FTA, are we prevented from bidding on government contracts in the United States or on contracts with any corporation that receives subsidies from the U.S. government?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will obtain a clarification of that situation from my colleague the Minister of International Trade and bring it in as soon as possible.

I think I should state for the record with regard to this locomotive order that Canadian National placed the order with the lowest bidder. That was General Electric. However, I think honourable senators should be aware of what the economic impact will be as a result of this decision.

An order to rebuild 50 locomotives for a U.S. railway firm, Burlington Northern, has been directed by GE to its facility in east-end Montreal. Additionally, GE agreed to direct foreign export orders of 26 new locomotives placed by Iran and 10 placed by Uruguay to the same facility.

The value to Canada of the total CN deal is approximately $75 million, whereas the GM Locomotives package would have generated approximately $40 million. I am told that, in total, 518 person years of work within Canada will result from this procurement package; by contrast, 327 person years of work would have resulted had the bid of GM Locomotives in London, Ontario, been accepted. Under both scenarios, 70 person years of work are projected within Canada's rail supply sector.

Senator Molgat: So it has meant, then, a shifting of jobs from London, Ontario, to Montreal? That has been the ultimate result?

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators, that is not the statement that I have just read on behalf of the Minister of Transport. I have indicated some decisions that have been taken by General Electric, not to transfer from London, Ontario, but to direct work to the Montreal facility.

Senator Molgat: But the effect will be exactly that? It will mean less jobs in London and more jobs in Montreal, is that correct?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am explaining to the honourable senator that the overall economic impact of these decisions is more positive for Canada than would have been the case if the bid of GM Locomotives in London had been accepted.

Senator Molgat: But you still have not answered my question. It has meant a shift of jobs from London to Montreal.

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators. That is not a correct interpretation.

Senator Olson: That is what you said.

Senator Murray: That is not a correct interpretation, and I invite the honourable senator to read what I have said before drawing conclusions of that kind.

Senator Molgat: That is the effect of the decision. It will mean less jobs in London and more jobs in Montreal. That is the result of the government decision.

Senator Murray: No. There is no government decision.

Senator Olson: Is the government no longer a shareholder in CN?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator knows the answer to that question as well as I do. He also knows that there is a board of directors of CN which runs the affairs of that company.

Senator Olson: So you do not take any responsibility for that?

[Senator Murray.]

THE BUDGET

SOCIAL PROGRAMS—ELIMINATION OF PRINCIPLE OF UNIVERSALITY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have two questions to direct to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

As we all know, this government has attempted several times to eliminate the universality principle in federal social programs in this country. Just yesterday, the Conservative senators voted for the ceiling placed on the Canada Assistance Plan. In the budget, we learned that the Minister of Finance had eliminated the universality of child allowances. Will this government continue to eliminate the universality principle as it applies to our social programs, or will it stop here?

● (1450)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, I do not quite know what the honourable senator has in mind when he asks that question.

However, with regard to the vote taken yesterday, I should say that what the government voted in favour of was a 5 per cent cap on increases in federal funding under the Canada Assistance Plan to three provinces: Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. They will receive at most a 5 per cent increase. There is no cap on the payments to those provinces that are recipients of equalization.

As far as universality is concerned, the honourable senator is aware of the decision that was taken in the budget with regard to the family allowance. I am happy to say that that decision, which is to devote more emphasis and more financial resources to those in greatest need and, in particular, to assist families of the working poor, has been very well received in the country.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, this will be the last question in Question Period. Please go ahead, Senator Haidasz.

Senator Haidasz: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

JUSTICE

INCREASE IN SALARIES OF FEDERALLY APPOINTED JUDGES

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

There have been many complaints concerning the freezing by the government of public servants' wages. Yet, we heard yesterday that over 900 federal judges have received a 5 per cent increase in their salaries. How can the government justify this discrimination?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, the process for reviewing judicial salaries was set up, I believe, by our predecessors, although I may be wrong. Nevertheless, there is a process in place for reviewing judicial salaries. That process led to the increases to which the honourable senator refers.

We will either have a process of that kind or we will not. We followed it to its logical conclusion.

THE SENATE

ORDER AND DECORUM

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to draw to your attention rule 19(3) of the Rules of the Senate.

It is, at times, very hard for me to follow what is being said in the chamber because there are so many private conversations going on.

Rule 19(3) states:

> If Senators have occasion to have private conversations in the Senate Chamber, they shall go below the Bar . . .

ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION TABLED

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—HOURS OF COVERAGE OF NEWSWORLD PROGRAMMING

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 55 on the Order Paper—by Senator Molgat.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

MEMBERS OF POLISH COMBATANTS' ASSOCIATION IN CANADA

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to draw your attention to the presence in our gallery of some Polish Canadian Visitors. They are Mr. Marion Fijal, National President of the Polish Combatants' Association in Canada, and Mr. M. Szczecinski, immediate past President of the Polish Combatants' Association in Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1992-93

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doyle, for the second reading of Bill C-61, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing on April 1, 1992.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the adjournment allowed me to read Senator Doody's comments. I listened carefully to them, but I wanted to read them as well.

As he points out, essentially, this is the usual bill that we receive. He also points out that there are a number of technical changes contained in the bill.

Senator Doody: Yes.

Senator Molgat: As we are all aware, technical changes sometimes have a way of developing into rather major changes. However, I hesitate to question my good friend Senator Doody since undoubtedly he was given the information pertaining to these changes by the department.

I hope that when the bill arrives in committee we will have the opportunity to study it thoroughly in order to ensure that the technical changes are, indeed, only that, with the rest of the bill being but normal procedure. Thus, we have no objection to sending the bill to committee. At third reading we will have the opportunity to express more opinions on the subject.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the intervention of Senator Doody at this time will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Doody: Thank you, honourable senators. One thing I neglected to point out while I was making my intervention on second reading—

Senator Molgat: Is there more?

Senator Doody: Yes, there is, and it is very important. Only Senator Frith can really appreciate it.

This is not a borrowing bill; it is a borrowing authority bill. It will not cost the government one cent if we pass this bill. Later on, perhaps it might.

Senator Frith was always at great pains to point out this distinction when he was on this side of the chamber. I take my advice from him. I want to assure honourable senators that the same is true in this particular case.

Senator Frith: In your place, I would have rubbed it in, too.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, I would like to mention that if the minister is available, and even if the Senate is not sitting tomorrow, the committee will be sitting at 11 a.m. in consideration of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT BILL

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer, seconded by the Honourable Senator Ross, for the second reading of Bill C-13, to establish a federal environmental assessment process.

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, the bill we are examining today is one that our side supports in principle. At the same time, there are areas that need to be examined more carefully. I shall address some of these today with the hope that we can improve the bill at the committee stage.

First, I believe that this bill offers a framework that is a significant improvement over the current method of dealing with environmental assessments.

For at least the last decade, increasing public attention to the environment has put impact assessment in the limelight making it a greater priority for governments.

The idea was given further momentum in 1987 when the Brundtland Report recognized environmental assessment as a key to implementing its concept of sustainable development. The report recommended that countries adopt impact assessments as they were seen as necessary for initiating many of the report's legal and institutional recommendations.

At the present time, federal environmental assessments are conducted according to the Environmental Assessment and Review Process Guidelines, otherwise known as EARP, introduced in 1984. It has become very clear that this process is not working as well as it could be.

● (1500)

The most obvious examples are two recent court decisions involving provincial dams, the Rafferty-Alameda in Saskatchewan and the Oldman River Dam in Alberta. Both of these decisions upheld the constitutionality of the Guidelines Order. They said that, where the federal government is required by statute or law to make a decision with respect to a project, it is required to comply with the guidelines and conduct an environmental assessment. However, because the guidelines were not intended to be binding, they could not be interpreted as having the status of federal law as the courts had done. Clearly, change is necessary.

Owing to this, the impact assessment process itself has been ad hoc and fraught with duplication and confusion. The guidelines have been the only way of enforcing assessments and their unsuitability has frustrated both the public and private sectors.

Despite promising a legislated environmental assessment process in the 1984 and 1988 elections, it was not until June 1990 that the government introduced Bill C-78 into the House of Commons. Liberals in the other place voted against Bill C-78 at second reading because they felt it was too narrow in scope and that it gave ministers too much discretion. They also had doubts about its enforceability.

The Liberal view was confirmed by the strong and widespread opposition to the bill that was voiced by witnesses at committee stage. The bill died on the Order Paper as the government prorogued the session of Parliament before clause-by-clause study.

In the next session, the Minister of the Environment reappeared before the committee with Bill C-13, a bill with the same objective as Bill C-78, but with several improvements. In spite of these improvements, another set of hearings confirmed that several concerns with the bill were still outstanding. Finally, after additional amendments, the bill was passed in the other place.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to review the substance of this bill in detail. I believe it is important at this stage to highlight the areas of the bill that the Senate committee should examine. The result will hopefully be a much improved bill.

Bill C-13 makes it necessary for a federal authority—a minister of the Crown, an agency of the government, or certain departments or departmental corporations—to conduct an environmental assessment of projects that involve the federal government in various ways. Specifically it applies to projects receiving any federal financing where the federal government must issue a permit, licence, or approval for a project, or where the project comes under federal jurisdiction or impacts on federal land. The purpose of the environmental assessment is to ensure that the environmental effects of projects receive careful consideration before responsible authorities take action in connection with them.

The bill is based on the principle of self-assessment—that is, integrating environmental concerns into the planning stages of projects. The "responsible authority" must take into account environmental concerns as early as practicable in the project's development.

One of the concerns with this bill is that it does not go far enough—it applies only to federal projects and not to new government programs and policies. It is particularly ironic that the government has twice promised measures whereby proposals going before cabinet would be subject to an internal environmental assessment. The first time was on February 4, 1989, when Luçien Bouchard was sworn in as Minister of the Environment. He said, and I quote:

> It will not be possible for the government to make a decision without an environmental assessment . . . The new government thinking is in keeping with the concept of sustainable development. This is my commitment. This is the will of the Prime Minister.

On June 18, 1990, the then Minister of the Environment, Robert de Cotret, promised that an internal environmental assessment would be required for policies going before the cabinet. He promised:

> . . . on a mandatory basis, [to] have an environmental assessment made of any kind of Cabinet document that came to Cabinet.

At the same time, when introducing the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, he boasted that Canada would be ". . . the first government in the world to implement environmental assessment of policy initiatives" and he promised a public statement on these implications.

Over three years have passed. We have yet to see a single such policy assessment and we are now presented with Bill C-13 where these assessments appear to be limited to government projects. Those are two commitments by members of the Conservative cabinet that cannot be allowed to disappear down the memory hole.

I must say, as an aside, that I would be very interested in knowing what Mr. Bouchard's views are on environmental assessment today in his new incarnation.

In any event, the omission of environmental assessment reviews of policies will have to be considered carefully by the committee when it reviews the bill.

The second area that the committee may want to explore is how projects are selected for assessment. A concern seems to be that the projects requiring assessment in this bill are only those specifically laid out in regulation. In other words, if it is not on the list, it does not require assessment.

The process works as follows: Certain projects go immediately to a comprehensive or a mandatory study. These will be listed in regulations. They are projects that are already known to pose significant risks to the environment. They tend to be large-scale projects like oil and gas developments, major hydroelectric developments, highways, pipelines, and large industrial plants. These projects will be subject to a public review panel or mediation process.

Honourable senators, witness after witness repeated in the other place that it would be preferable to have the list the other way around—that everything is covered unless it is specifically excluded by regulation. This would make it much more difficult for the government to exempt a project from environmental assessment. Those projects whose environmental effect is uncertain would be less likely to "slip through the cracks" and not be included on the mandatory list.

Also, the committee might want to consider that the method proposed in the bill will be difficult to administer. There could be far more items off the list than on the liste, which would lead to uncertainty and require time and effort to confirm.

There is another aspect to the assessment process contained in this bill that requires further study. I refer here to the decision of the responsible authority whether or not to proceed with the project in question. The decision is made after the responsible authority considers reports from the review panel, the mediation, or the comprehensive review. In the event that the responsible authority is proceeding with a project that has been reported as having adverse effects, we want to ensure that the panel report and the responsible authority's reasons be fully disclosed and in a timely manner.

The government boasts of opportunities for public participation created by this bill. However, one problem with the bill is that it does not include a mandatory funding program. While it gives the minister the power to establish such a program, it is purely discretionary.

Intervenor funding is an integral part of the entire environmental process. It considerably improves decisions made and is one of the few avenues extant in society for public participation in decisions regarding major project developments. Empowering people to protect the environment and to participate in environmental decision-making is key to a sustainable economy, and intervenor funding is key to this empowerment.

Honourable senators, when asked about this issue, the government spokesperson referred to the Participant Funding Program announced in November, 1991, as part of the Green Plan. I am concerned about two things: First, the Green Plan Fund is a meagre $8.5 million over six years. That is a little over $1 million a year. Second, the government recently cancelled the Court Challenges Program, a very similar initiative in the area of human rights.

Honourable senators, the Court Challenges Program had a legislative base. If it is the government's inclination to cancel this program, what safeguards do we have that the participant funding program in the Green Plan would not also be cancelled?

The issue of third party funding must be considered by the committee. The Senate committee may also want to explore the nature of the compulsory review that is required of the bill five years after its passage. The bill calls for a closed-door ministerial review. The minister would consult only those he considers appropriate. In keeping with the bill's spirit of openness, a review by an established parliamentary committee, one that includes hearings for witnesses, might be preferable.

Finally, honourable senators, in light of the events over the past few weeks, I would like to take this opportunity to encourage the Quebec Minister of the Environment to come before our committee. He has indicated that he has serious problems with the bill and we owe him, or any other provincial minister, our time and attention. I have in my hand a letter that the Quebec minister sent to each of us on the committee. In that letter, the minister claims that the bill encroaches on areas of provincial jurisdiction. He says that will produce numerous duplications and result in many legal disputes.

We have a responsibility to carefully consider Mr. Paradis' concerns when we examine this bill in committee. I say this, keeping in mind the role of the Senate as a forum for addressing and representing regional views. Thus, the Senate committee is the perfect venue for Mr. Paradis to outline his difficulties with the bill.

Honourable senators, Bill C-13 is a step forward for this country in the area of environmental assessment. There are still some areas of concern in the legislation and I have reviewed these with you today.

On motion of Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Government Notices of Motion:

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> THAT when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, April 7, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

EIGHTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, seconded by the Honourable Senator Chaput-Rolland, for the adoption of the Eighth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Special Joint Committee for a Renewed Canada—expenses), presented in the Senate on 19th March 1992.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I was just having an out-of-space discussion on this particular item with Senator Molgat and Senator Stewart, both of whom have expressed some very real concerns and questions on it.

This particular item is the budget for the Special Joint Committee for a Renewed Canada. It is a rather large amount of money. The Senate's share is one-third of this amount. We have to have approval because, obviously, the amounts have to be paid since the last fiscal year closed yesterday. In order to have the authority to pay the amount due out of last year's accounts, we need the concurrence of the Senate.

The amount of money required for the Senate's share of the expenses of this committee has been earmarked in the existing Estimates of the Senate from amounts of money that were previously allocated for other items and then transferred from one place and another to avoid our having to request supplementary supply for this item. Therefore the money is available.

The item was brought to the attention of the Internal Economy Subcommittee on Budgets months ago but, as there was neither sufficient information nor detail, it was postponed for further consideration. Subsequently, the chairmanship of the Senate side of the joint committee changed, and a new set of numbers were put together which were subsequently brought to the attention of the subcommittee. The subcommittee examined them in some detail, had an exhaustive discussion with the Senate chairman and the clerk, and decided to recommend to the Senate that the amount requested be approved on the condition that the final accounting be submitted to the subcommittee and, through the subcommittee, to the Senate, at the earliest possible moment. In other words, as soon as the last accounting is in and the last bills are paid, the amount will be presented to the Senate in detail.

At this time the final figures are not available because the final bills have not been paid. There are bills outstanding for special advisors, constitutional expertise and so on. Some of these people have not yet submitted their final figures. When these numbers are submitted we will be most pleased to make them available to the Senate. On that condition, I would ask that senators approve this request for funding.

The bookkeeping, accounting and detailed payments of accounts for the special joint committees, which are comprised of one-third Senate and two-thirds House of Commons, are done through the House of Commons. We do not have any control to that extent here in the Senate. We receive a request for one-third of the funds that are approved by the accounting department of the House of Commons. Once we have looked at the final accounts and agreed that they are in order, we will make that money available. At this time it is obviously necessary that the Senate participate with the one-third which we agreed to when we set up the joint committee.

With that in mind, I ask for Senate approval of this item.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Before the honourable senator resumes his seat, may I ask him a question. He says that when all the bills have been paide, a final accounting will be given to the Senate. Will that accounting show all the moneys expended by this special joint committee, or will it show only the one-third chargeable to the Senate?

Senator Doody: No, that will show the entire expenditure of the joint committee, one-third of which will be the responsibility of the Senate. The entire account will be presented to us.

Senator Stewart: That is a helpful answer, honourable senators. Today's date is April 1. Now, at the beginning of a new fiscal year, we are being asked to authorize payments for money that has been spent in the previous fiscal year, not for a purpose which suddenly emerged but for a purpose which was anticipated months and months ago.

● (1520)

We are told by Senator Doody that it is necessary that we approve this expenditure. In other words, someone has gone ahead and contracted to make very large payments. After the fact, we are told that it is necessary that the Senate retrospectively authorize the payments. Surely this is most peculiar. What other committee of the Senate would be allowed to behave in this way?

It would be embarrassing to resist the authorization, particularly when it is put so attractively by Senator Doody. It would be a matter of dereliction not to call the attention of the Senate to what is going on here. Very large sums of money have been spent in our name. In the new fiscal year, on April 1st, we are told, "You have no choice, you Conservative senators, you Liberal senators, you independent senators; you have no choice but to pay up the money that we contracted months ago." This is shocking.

If we cannot handle the constitution of a special committee of both houses of Parliament in a more satisfactory way, it is very doubtful that we can ever handle the Constitution of a country at all.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I wish to say that the authorization for the funding of the joint committee was made months and months ago when this house and the House of Commons authorized the Senate and the House of Commons to set up a committee to do "thus and so" and to incur expenses and hire staff, or whatever the phraseology of the motion is.

As I attempted to explain, the actual amounts of the expenses incurred were late in coming in. I find it difficult to apologize for that, because I also find it a poor way to do business. I simply say that when one is in a one-third position in an organization, and the other two-thirds runs the show, perhaps the best one can do is as Senator Stewart is doing: Call the matter to the attention of the Houses and ask for a better system to be established.

It is unfortunate that this item went unresolved beyond the end of the year. I find it hard to apologize for that, either, because it is not my motion. I think it would have been far better had we brought this to a head two or three days ago. It would have been much cleaner and neater.

The fact remains that the Senate has committed itself to a one-third participation in that joint committee. Therefore the Senate has an obligation to pay its one-third of the expenses involved. The Senate has undertaken to present, and will table in this chamber, a full accounting of the expenses incurred, not only our third but the entire bill for the proceedings. Beyond that, I do not know where I can go at this point.

Senator Stewart: I do not want to persist too long. Senator Doody says that the Senate has committed itself to paying one-third of the expenses. Suppose the expenses had been $9 million?

Senator Doody: We would have had to declare bankruptcy.

Senator Frith: Or call an election.

Senator Stewart: So you answer my question; the answer is yes.

Senator Doody: There may be some clause under the bankruptcy laws where we could ask for protection; I do not know. I do know that we do not have that kind of money. However, we do have $1.3 million secreted.

Senator Stewart: Thank you for answering my question in the affirmative. If we did not have the money, we would have had to declare bankruptcy—

Senator Doody: That is right.

Senator Stewart: —because it would have been a genuine, eligible claim against this house.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the exchange we have had has been a valuable one, because it relates to the eternal problem that we have with joint committees. Every time we participate in a joint committee with the House of Commons, the same thing occurs.

Senator Stewart's point is well taken, that we ought to find a different system of doing this. We have no control over the expenses. Once we decide that we will participate in a joint committee with the House of Commons, we just agree to pay. I assume that when we do that, there is an understanding that we can go back for Supplementary Estimates to cover any such expense. However, there is no way that we can forecast it in our budgeting. It is an unfair charge on us in that regard when we have no control over it. Perhaps we should exclude those things from the Senate budget and deal with them entirely separately, and not have them appearing as a regular expense of the Senate. We ought to find some mechanism to do it.

The other point I wish to make is that we should have some say as to how the expenditures are proceeded with. We normally have a joint chairman, but perhaps we ought to have another way of control during the course of the action so that it is not automatically a decision by the House of Commons.

My last point is that, as I recall it in committee, Senator Doody agreed that we would be getting further information. I assume that once we get the final bill in total, we will be allowed to question certain items and get more details. That is my understanding. Whether we do it in committee or here in the chamber, I wish to have that understanding, that we can ask for and receive further details on any of the expenditures.

With that proviso, I am prepared to let the matter proceed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, our position on these committees is like that of a minority shareholder in a private company. You must put up your money for your shares, you are responsible for the debts of the company, but you have no control whatsoever over its destiny or its decisions.

Former senator and then-Lieutenant Governor of Ontario, John Aird, told me he was always guided by two rules in life: One was to never interfere in the matrimonial affairs of another person; the second was to never take a minority interest in a private company.

Senator Doody: I thank honourable senators for their comments. I would be reluctant to accept the vision of Senator Aird about refusing to take a minority interest. The Senate struggle is to attempt to get the minority interest—

Senator Frith: There is one answer, legally, to that situation.

Senator Doody: Sorry I interrupted, senator.

Senator Frith: I wanted to allow you to continue on that point.

The one answer to taking a minority interest is to have a shareholder's agreement, which I think is exactly what Senator Doody was suggesting earlier.

Senator Doody: That is a perfectly legitimate and reasonable pursuit to be devoutly followed and then hopefully consummated.

Senator Molgat said that I had agreed that we would have an accounting. My memory tells me that we insisted we would have an accounting. Under that proviso, we have recommended to the main committee of Internal Economy that it ask the Senate to approve this budget.

These are an unusual set of circumstances and not very pleasant ones. I am not happy to be in a position of asking that it be approved, but nevertheless it is essential that it be done. The bills must be paid. The Senate does have an obligation in this respect, and an accounting will be presented to the Senate. As I say, I would be most happy to table the final accounts here in the chamber for the consideration of honourable senators.

Along that same line, when we come to the next item we may anticipate, instead of being after the fact, a joint committee budget.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

CONSIDERATION OF FIFTH REPORT—DEBATE CONCLUDED

Leave having been given to revert to reports of committees:

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations (Public Service Employment Regulations), presented in the Senate on 30th March, 1992.

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, I would like to comment briefly on the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations, concerning the Public Service Employment Regulations.

The report was prepared by the Standing Joint Committee for Scrutiny of Regulations, and its purpose is to protect the rights of appellants in Public Service appeals.

Appeals may be made, for instance, against appointments without competition, appointments by closed competition or against dismissal or demotion.

According to the committee, the regulations fail to ensure that the appeal process is consistent with the basic requirements of fairness and equity. For instance, the committee points to the fact that there is insufficient disclosure of evidence, that documents are not provided before the hearing and that hearing deadlines are too tight.

This is not the first time a committee has intervened in this area, since on May 9, 1988, the Senate adopted an initial report on the subject. However, only four months later, on September 29, 1988, the Public Service Commission rejected the recommendations of the committee in their entirety. The committee then decided to pursue the matter further, and the Chairman of the Public Service Commission subsequently testified before the committee.

Submissions were received by the committee from members of the Public Service Alliance of Canada. The committee also took into consideration a number of submissions provided by interested individuals.

Honourable senators, the report before us today contains seven specific recommendations on the appeal process. I will not read the complete list, but perhaps I may say that we favour full disclosure of the evidence and that we recommend prior disclosure of grounds for dismissal. We preclude the use of unknown documents without first showing them to the appellants. The committee also recommends extending the notice period for hearings to two weeks from the present three days.

The question arises why we need this report in addition to the previous one. The answer is simple: Bill C-26 was tabled in the other place on June 18, 1991. This bill concerns Public Service reform.

[Senator Doody.]

When the bill is voted on, its passage will inevitably lead to the implementation of new regulations, and the committee hopes that the suggestions contained in this Fifth Report will be accepted by the appropriate authorities.

Thank you, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: As no other honourable senator wish to participate in the debate, this report is considered debated.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

NINTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bolduc, for the adoption of the Ninth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Special Joint Committee on Conflict of Interests—subject-matter of Bill C-43—proposed expenditures), presented in the Senate on 19th March 1992.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, I should like also to move the adoption of this report. It is the same sort of budget in some respects, but very different in others. It is a very modest budget and involves a great deal less money.

The amounts were made available to the senators when Madam Lavoie-Roux introduced the matter some days ago. The report is timely in that it is within the current fiscal year for which the funds are being asked. This is a committee of which our honourable friend across the way, Senator Stanbury, is the joint chairman. Any questions that honourable senators might have on this particular budget certainly can be answered by Senator Stanbury.

We who are members of the sub-committee and of the main committee are quite satisfied with the amounts of money asked for on the various items, and are quite happy to recommend the budget to the Senate for its approval.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the same thing applies here to the comments that were made on the other bills. It is another joint committee and we are locked into the situation.

Occasionally, with respect to joint committees we might consider saying that we should be running the operation. We did that some years ago on the Senate Reform Committee, in view of the fact that it was dealing with this chamber. The house agreed. Although they were paying two-thirds, the committee was actually administered by the Senate and it was the Senate staff who handled all of the arrangements, and so on. We should consider that every now and then when we deal with a joint committee.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, when we compare this proposal with the one made in the eighth report of the committee, what stands out most are the bottom lines. In this case we are being asked to share one-third of $75,000. In the case of the Special Joint Committee for a Renewed Canada, we are asked to provide one-third of $3.9 million. Technically, as Senator Molgat says, the problem is the same, namely, professional services will have been engaged. Obviously they are not as good as the professional services required for the other committee because they will cost a lot less.

Putting aside the question of principle, I am much less disturbed by the ninth report than by the eighth report because in the case of the eighth report we are told that it is necessary for the Senate to come up with $1.316 million, after the fact.

Senator Doody: Senator Stewart is quite right. The amounts of money involved are vastly different. Most Canadians will agree that the definition of the job of the Special Joint Committee on the Renewal of Canada was vaster, more complex and certainly far more important than that of the second committee.

● (1540)

The second committee can quite comfortably sit in Ottawa. It does not have the obligation to travel and gather information or to hire the same kind or amount of expertise as would be necessary for a study of the Constitution of Canada. I was relieved indeed, when I read in the budget of the Special Joint Committee on Conflict of Interests that they were not proposing to go to Australia to examine what might be going on there—or even to the United Kingdom or France. The opportunities were limitless.

That remarkably diligent and frugal committee resisted all these temptations. They agreed to do their work right here in the capital. For that they are to be congratulated. In so doing, I in no way condemn the efforts of the Special Joint Committee for a Renewed Canada.

Senator Frith: They did go to Meech Lake.

Senator Doody: And survived.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, the thing that is remarkable is that in the case of the Special Joint Committee for a Renewed Canada well over $1 million was spent for professional and other services. Will Senator Doody undertake to get the documents, the learned papers that were produced as a result of this expenditure? In the case of the other committee, the one on conflict of interests, professional and other services cost a total of about $50,000. It is quite a different situation. I should have thought that for well over $1 million for professional and other services there would be almost an encyclopedia of constitutional wisdom that would be available to be tabled in the Senate.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I do not want to carry this on indefinitely, although I am tempted. Certainly, I will try to get the information that the senator has asked for. I agree that there are limitless opportunities for a growth industry here. Perhaps we should try to bring it in and lay it on the Table.

As for comparing the two joint committees with respect to the hiring of experts, I would guess that most of the experts on conflict of interests are readily available at no cost to the committee. They can be called on from their parliamentary positions and asked to comment. So far as I can, I will certainly try to get the information for the honourable senator. For that amount of money I may need help to bring it in, but I will do what I can.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

FISHERIES

FOREIGN OVERFISHING—DEPLETION OF NORTHERN COD STOCKS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall, calling the attention of the Senate to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries: The Marketing of Fish in Canada "East Coast Fisheries", dated December 1989; and specifically as it relates to the recommendations applicable to the present state of the fish stocks due to foreign overfishing.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I am sure Canadians from coast to coast have watched with admiration during the past few days as Newfoundlanders set out for the Grand Banks to convince our friends from other nations that they would be wise to stop overfishing. While I know that all Canadians support Newfoundlanders in this effort, I am sure that many Canadians must wonder what it is all about. It is about the future of the Newfoundland fishery. It is about the future of Newfoundland's economy.

Honourable senators, when I was appointed to this chamber I chose as my designation Bonavista. As a youngster I lived in the town of Port Union and in later years represented the Fishermen's Union Trading Company at Port Union. I also represented S.W. Mifflin in Catalina, J.T. Swyers in Bonavista, and other firms in the area. I made many friends and know the people to be hard working, industrious and friendly.

I was shocked when I heard of the closing of the Fishery Products International plant on the border of Catalina-Port Union. This is the largest and most modern plant in Newfoundland and, I believe, in all of Canada. The plant employs a maximum of 1200 workers. These workers come from all over the peninsula. The closing affects some 75 communities to a larger or lesser degree. The areas affected near the plant are the towns of Bonavista, Catalina, Port Union, Melrose, Elliston, Newman's Cove, Knight's Cove, Trinity and Port Rexton. In fact the whole of the peninsula is affected. It is not just the workers at the plant and their families, but the fishermen, the trawler crews, the supermarkets, the gas stations, the convenience stores, the fishery suppliers, et cetera. This closing has the same effect on the area as a large auto plant closure would have in Ontario.

Three years ago our Conservative friend, Senator Jack Marshall, issued a report on the east coast fishery. If only other Conservatives had listened to Senator Marshall and his wise views we might not now be in the situation we are in today.

I would suggest to honourable senators that there are three main causes of the crisis in the Newfoundland fishery. I will also suggest that there are nine ways in which the government can, today, take action to correct this crisis.

The first cause of the crisis is the mismanagement of the cod stock. Since 1989, when Senator Marshall and his committee issued their report, the Province of Newfoundland has repeatedly pressured the federal government not to set the total allowable catch for cod so high. In 1989 Newfoundland recommended that the catch be set at 125,000 tonnes in order to allow the cod stock to grow back. The federal government ignored this wise recommendation and set the allowable catch at 235,000 tonnes.

In 1990, as the problem worsened, Newfoundland once again pleaded for the total allowable catch to be 125,000 tones, but the government set the catch this time at 190,000 tonnes. In 1991, for the third time, Newfoundland requested that the catch be lowered, this time to 120,000 tonnes. For the third time the national government set the catch too high, at 185,000 tonnes. It is only in the last month that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has lowered the allowable catch to 120,000 tonnes, a quota reduction of 35 per cent. Unfortunately, Newfoundland now faces the worst crisis in its cod history of 400 years.

The offshore fishery is closed this spring. Thousands of trawlermen and fish processors are out of work. This happened because the federal government failed to listen to Newfoundlanders and because the federal government ignored serious scientific warnings.

The second cause of the cod crisis is overfishing on the Nose and the Tail of the Grand Banks by foreign fleets. As the boats of Newfoundland fishermen lie idle, 85 or more huge foreign vessels from Europe are catching cod immediately outside Canada's 200-mile zone. Last year these vessels took 47,000 tonnes of cod, despite a moratorium agreed to by the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization. Since 1985 NAFO has imposed a moratorium, but, despite that moratorium, Spanish and Portuguese boats, with the approval of the European Community, continue to ravage the cod stocks.

Senator Corbin: Shame.

Senator Petten: This overfishing puts at risk an important source of food for the world. The actions of the European Community are not threatening just Newfoundland's cod stocks, they are threatening the world's cod stocks. I have heard various cabinet ministers say that they are doing all they can about the issue, but they must know that their efforts to date have not been good enough.

● (1550)

The third cause of the fishery crisis, and this is one for which I do not hold the government accountable, is the rapidly expanding seal population on our east coast.

Honourable senators will know that the situation is tremendously serious but, as I have said, there are nine steps to be taken to correct the problem. First, Canada should exercise custodial management of the stocks on the Grand Banks. As a country with the greatest interest in the environmentally sensitive Nose and Tail of the Grand Bank, Canada must exert fishery management and enforcement measures over those areas. This would not only be in Canada's national interests, but it would uphold the moratorium called for by NAFO. Custodial management of the Grand Banks by Canada would therefore protect the interests of the world.

The second measure that could be taken to help deal with the problem in the fisheries would be for the federal government to give serious consideration to Newfoundland's proposal for joint federal-provincial management of the fishery off Newfoundland's coast. Honourable senators should understand that this proposal is a major compromise of Newfoundland's traditional position. In his meeting with the Prime Minister on March 3, Premier Wells stated that Newfoundland was no longer calling for total provincial jurisdiction. The Premier believes that, by working together, the Government of Canada and the Government of Newfoundland can develop the steps necessary to deal with foreign overfishing and to help our fish stocks recover.

I know that many politicians at the federal level have expressed concern in the past about allowing Newfoundland a say in management of the fishery. I would like to point out that Newfoundland needs a say since the fishery is the mainstay of my province's economic livelihood. Newfoundland has demonstrated a responsible attitude by consistently calling for lower cod quotas and by consistently calling for more stock rebuilding and conservation measures.

The third step to overcome the problem in the fishery is an expanded seal harvest. We all know that culling the seal population causes some international opposition, but we now have humane techniques for harvesting seals. The truth is that a new seal harvest is a responsible and prudent response to a major problem. I hope that our European friends will understand that if we do not control our seal population successfully, we will lose our fish stocks completely.

The obvious need to expand our seal harvest leads me to the fourth measure that we need to take. Canada needs a strong information campaign to explain to the world the very serious problems occurring on the Grand Banks. Canada must take steps to raise the world's awareness of the environmental disaster being caused by overfishing. For its part, Newfoundland has already started such a campaign, to raise the awareness of Canadians with respect to the problem.

On March 17, Premier Wells addressed the Globe 92 Oceans Forum in Vancouver. He was in Halifax on March 24, where he addressed the Chamber of Commerce. Today the Premier is at the United Nations, where he will try to win world support against overfishing by Spain and Portugal on the Grand Banks. He will make his case to the final negotiating session for the Earth Summit.

The premier will also have talks today with the ambassadors and senior representatives of Spain, Portugal and the European Community. Last week, Newfoundland fishermen met at the United Nations with people from other countries concerned with overfishing. The federal government must back up the efforts of the province, the union and the seafood companies.

In considering the future of the fishery, the fifth step we need to take involves long-term income stabilization. In this regard, I welcomed the announcement last week by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans of the establishment of a task force to look at the long-term income of people who have suffered because of the poor Atlantic fishery. I sincerely hope that this will not just be another government study but will result in concrete measures. For those who might wonder why the government should concern itself with the long-term income of fishermen, I would ask them to consider that it is not innocent fishermen who can be blamed for foreign overfishing or wrong government decisions on fish quotas.

The sixth step flows directly from the fifth. In addition to a long-term program, Newfoundlanders need immediate short-term aid. We need to provide specific measures for families affected by the current situation. We all know that federal government funds are hard to come by, but I repeat that the cod crisis in Newfoundland is the worst in 400 years, and came about through no fault of Newfoundland fishermen.

The seventh, eight and ninth steps we need to take all deal with looking to the future so that we are prepared to do our best once the fish stocks recover. These three measures can be summarized in three words: infrastructure, research and marketing. We must maintain the infrastructure so that we will be in a position to benefit once the fishery is in a healthier position. We need more research to avoid repetition of the current crisis. We need more marketing skills to ensure that the future fishery is market sensitive with an emphasis on quality, secondary processing and good marketing arrangements.

Honourable senators, I thank you for your indulgence in allowing me to set out in detail the problems and some possible solutions for Newfoundland's fishery. I know that you have exercised patience because you understand how important the fishery is to my province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

As Premier Wells said to Newfoundlanders in his speech in the House of Assembly on March 5: "The future of this province, for as far as anybody alive can foresee in the future, will be substantially dependent on what we do with the fishery."

Honourable senators, that is why this debate is so important and that is why I would urge my friends in government to take steps to deal with the current problems and to ensure a prosperous fishery in the future.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, I would like to speak briefly with respect to the remarks of the honourable senator from Bonavista. Only a senator who has a surname similar to that of another senator is designated by a geographic area in his or her province, and sometimes I think that is unfortunate. "The senator from Bonavista" sounds very good and gives immediacy and concreteness to a person's liaison which otherwise one might not have.

Therefore, following the senator from Bonavista's reference, I would like to say that when I came to Ottawa I was asked if I would like to have a designation, it being recognized as highly unlikely that there would be many other Ottenheimers here. However, I did in fact take one and it is Waterford-Trinity.

● (1600)

Of course Trinity, as the senator from Bonavista knows, is a bay in a community adjacent to Bonavista, which is also a community and a bay. Indeed, the factory that he referred to as closing up in Catalina is in fact situated in Trinity Bay in the communities he referred to. Hundreds of people will be losing their jobs in our communities of both Trinity and Bonavista Bay. This whole area is economically as one. Indeed, the area is called the Bonavista peninsula, with Bonavista Bay on one side and Trinity Bay on the other side. However, I certainly agree with everything that my honourable friend has said.

There is something that probably many senators realize but that is not generally realized across the country, and that is that the very fibre of Newfoundland society is threatened. It is not only that the province with the highest unemployment in Canada will have even more unemployment; it is not only that the province where the standard of living is approximately 52 per cent of that of the national average will be under further economic pressure: It is that the very raison d'être of Newfoundland, and that includes Labrador, is under threat.

Newfoundland was first colonized for no other reason than to prosecute the fishery. Although there are other economic activities there today, it is still the fishery which is the economic and social backbone of the province. It is even more than that. It is almost the psychological frame of reference which unifies the people of Newfoundland and Labrador. It is amazing that even in those parts of the province that have other industries, such as Grand Falls, Stephenville and Cornerbrook, there is still a very high level of interest in the fishery and I think a recognition that it is the coastal communities—what we call the outports—which constitute the fabric of Newfoundland life. In that, we probably share many characteristics with certain parts of the other Atlantic provinces.

The reasons for this situation have been indicated by the senator from Bonavista. There is the foreign over-fishing. There is also the consumption of fish by the seal population, and this, I thinke, is very difficult to quantify. It is a factor, but how great I do not know. I think we have to recognize as well that our own efforts as Canadians are a contributing factor.

A lot of this is perhaps hindsight, but many honourable senators will remember after the proclamation of the 200-mile limit it appeared as if there was a great bonanza of wealth for the coastal provinces of Canada. Now it is recognized that without care, without conservation, without being conscious of environmental imperatives, the resources of the sea are under serious threat. I think we have to realize that obviously a very serious element is over-fishing, but in order that we do not become too complacent or pharisaical, we also are to blame for certain short-sightedness in the past.

In Newfoundland in recent years there has been a tension—I am not sure if you would call it a conflict, but certainly a tension, certainly opposing views—with respect to the value, the wealth, and the importance of the offshore fishing effort vis-a-vis the inshore. For a number of years the plight of the inshore fishermen has been more and more threatened by foreign overfishing, yes, but to a certain extent as well by increased offshore activity of Canadian vessels.

With respect to offshore fishing, I think our own Canadian government's quota system with respect to the domestic effort recognized the importance of conservation and limiting the exploitation of the resource. The continuing problem is just outside the 200-mile limit; what is called the Nose and Tail of the Grand Bank.

What is quite anomalous here is that whereas international law in terms of fishery only recognizes the coastal state's jurisdiction up to the 200-mile limit, international law recognizes the jurisdiction of a coastal state with respect to the hydrocarbon resources of the Continental Shelf, irrespective of where that shelf stops. That also applies to living sedentary species. The Grand Bank's Continental Shelf extends beyond 200 miles. It certainly is an anomaly that the coastal state may exercise, according to agreed-upon international law, jurisdiction for nonrenewable resources to the extent of the Continental Shelf, and yet for a resource renewable and mobile—technically they are called the straddling stocks—the coastal state, so far, has not been recognized as legitimately exercising jurisdiction.

I compliment the present government of Newfoundland, Premier Wells and those who worked with him, on the document which I recently received with respect to that government's position and their development of a philosophy that Canada should exert a custodial jurisdiction with respect to the renewable resources beyond 200 miles to the limit of the Continental Shelf. They are the straddling stocks. Certainly, it will be important, I think, for Canada to push this concept at the meetings in Brazil in June with respect to the environment. NAFO, the North Atlantic Fisheries Organization, has proven to be an ineffectual instrument. Its decisions are not enforceable.

Historically, going back a number of years, it was the Soviet Union, the East Bloc countries and Cuba, which traditionally sided with Canada with respect to limitations on the foreign fishing effort, and it was the west European countries which voted against these limitations. Of course, today it is largely, although not exclusively, certain West European countries, and to a very large extent Spain and Portugal.

The situation is very complex. Those two countries have traditionally fished on the Newfoundland Grand Banks, but of course they fished with the traditional technology of going there in vessels and fishing with hand lines. That went on for centuries. I suppose what has happened is that our sense of responsibility toward our environment and toward future generations has not kept pace with the developments of technology. The human factor has lagged behind the technological one. If one thinks of the implications of that with respect to the fishery, and indeed with respect to other areas of human activity, then the consequences can be frightening, as indeed they are in the fishery.

[Senator Ottenheimer.]

● (1610)

Certainly, the people of Newfoundland, and I would think those of the other coastal provinces, count upon the Government of Canada to make as strong a case as possible bilaterally with western Europe, and in particular with Spain, Portugal and other countries that are overfishing. They are also counting upon the government to make a strong case in the world forum which will be provided in Brazil and, hopefully, on a continuing basis in the United Nations.

As much as these resources are the very substance of a Newfoundland way of life, they also represent an important and renewable source of protein food for the world community. Indeed, it is this aspect which can be subsumed into a custodial responsibility which Canada can exercise.

In the final analysise, I think it will be necessary—and I think it has happened already—that we impose the restraints on ourselves. In fact, Canada has imposed restraints on the offshore Canadian fishing effort. There are those who argue that it came too late, but that is a historical argument—it has been done. This gives Canada the moral weight to continue its efforts of persuasion with respect to foreign countries.

Surely, it should be possible with an entity such as the common market, a group of countries with which we share many political institutions, ways of life and values, to come to some accommodation. It was upsetting to see that, recently, Germany has become involved in fishing beyond the 200-mile limit. This is something which has been done by Spain and Portugal for a number of years, and it is inexcusable on their part. However, in the case of Germany, which does not have any historic activities in the area, and which is not in the same position economically as Spain or Portugal, it is even more opprobrious.

Hopefully, therefore, the Government of Canada, the editorial opinion and Canadian public opinion will be a meaningful representation in Canada's efforts to stop the overfishing, and to obtain recognition for a custodial jurisdiction, which is an exercise of an international jurisdiction; not just a national one. Hopefully, our friends in the common market with whom we have so many political, economic and historic ties, can be convinced in this regard. While it is absolutely inimical to eastern Canada's interests, it is not in the best interests of the world community which needs, and may need to an even greater extent in the future, the renewable source of protein.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, we have just heard two very helpful and wise interventions on the subject of the crisis confronting the North Atlantic fishery.

I have a special interest in this matter because, as a senator from Antigonish-Guysborough, I represent several fishing communities. One of them is Canso. I am told that Canso is probably the oldest settled fishing community in North America. I am also told that it has the distinction of being the first place in North America where taxes were collected regularly—something which was done by the Spaniards in the early 16th Century. Governments always remain the same. The Spaniards devised a technique by which to impose taxes on drying fish in Canso.

There are other fishing communities as well. There is Port Bickerton and Bickerton West. All these places, and others in Guysborough County, depend upon the health of the North Atlantic fish stocks. That may help explain why, on February 27 of this year, I quoted in this house an editorial from the Globe and Mail. At that time I quoted the following sentence:

> The government dismissed Mr. Harris as a "purist" who did not understand the socio-economic problems of the fishery.

Further down in the debate I quoted again from the editorial wherein the Honourable Bernard Valcourt was quoted as having said the following concerning the quotas of fish to be caught:

> These levels will allow the stocks to regenerate, not fast enough for the purists perhaps, but sufficient to ensure that massive social and economic dislocation and hardship is prevented.

That was the position of the then Minister of Fisheries.

As a result of the question I asked on that day, the Leader of the Government in the Senate had an answer prepared. I think it is important that I should call to the attention of honourable senators the final paragraph of that reply. It appears in the Debates of the Senate for March 18, 1992, at pages 1081 and 1082. It is a thoughtful paragraph:

> There is a tendency to forget that the marine environment is not static, but changes over time. In that respect, the marine environment is no different from that of the land where droughts, floods, or other environmentally-induced disasters are known to occur. Droughts and floods are difficult to refute as the cause of hardship because they themselves, as well as their impacts, are so visible to us. Changes and disasters in the marine environment are more difficult to demonstrate as they are only detected through their impact on fisheries, which can themselves be affected by other factors (e.g., overfishing). This leads us to 1991, when it seems that unusual environmental changes occurred. In fact, the lack of capelin and the decline in the availability of cod in 1991 coincide with the occurrence of unusual environmental conditions off Labrador and Newfoundland. For both capelin and cod, the catch levels cannot by themselves explain the sudden changes in abundance and distribution. In sum, both cod and capelin are part of an ecosystem that seems to have changed in 1991 as a result of large scale changes in environmental conditions. As well, it seems clear that the growth seal herds in recent years has placed considerable additional pressure on capelin stocks, and possibly through them, or directly, on cod.

I wanted to bring that paragraph to the attention of the house to remind us that, after we have taken into account all the measurable factors, the in-shore catch, the off-shore catch, and the catch taken by foreign fleets, which may be hard to gauge, there remains the matter of the environmental ecosystem.

We have tended over the years to assume that providence would assure that there would be fish from year to year, and indeed from generation to generation. We talk of fish as a renewable resource, but the present situation drives home to us that we cannot leave everything to providence, particularly when we are engaging in all these artificial interventions in the ecosystem. It drives home to us that we really do not know very much about the life cycle of a cod fish. That was made clear to our Standing Committee on Fisheries three years ago.

It is highly desirable that we know more about the effects of environmental circumstances on these important natural resources—important to the people of Newfoundland, important to the people of Nova Scotia, important, indeed, to the people around the world. I am happy that the Committee on Fisheries under the chairmanship of Senator Rossiter has been activated, because it is long past the time when that committee should have been making an effort to encourage research, which to some extent is already under way, into the life cycle of our fishery resources and into the more intangible factors which bear upon the reproduction and growth of those resources.

In conclusion, I again want to congratulate Senator Petten and Senator Ottenheimer for very thoughtful and helpful addresses.

On the motion of Senator Molgat, for Senator Thériault, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY NFB FILM PRESENTATION—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay:
> That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the contents of the CBC/NFB series "The Valour and the Horror" and report upon the said production to determine the authenticity of the three part series viz Savage Christmas: Hong Kong 1941; Death by Moonlight: Bomber Command; and In Desperate Battle: Normandy

1944, due to the mounting unfavourable reaction of the said production.—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I am indebted to Senator Molgat for letting me enter the debate at this stage.

Honourable senators who have seen "The Valour and the Horror", that three-part film series produced by the National Film Board and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, will recall the segment called "Death by Moonlight". That is the part where we are shown how the bloodlust of one man in the Second World War drove Canadian airmen into a fury of unnecessarily bloody raids on the great cities of Germany.

In pursuit of the folly of Air Marshall Sir Arthur Harris, we are taken back by archival film to scenes of airborne victory that sustained the morale of the free world through long years of war. But we are told now that much of what we thought was triumph was terror.

In the end, we are taken with two embarrassed Canadian veterans to modern-day Hamburg to meet women who survived the firebombing of their city in July of 1943. "They have lived," says the narrator, "with the sense of incalculable loss."

> Woman: So, what do you feel now?
> Veteran: We were sent over to do a job and we were fighting Hitler, not the people of Germany.
> Woman: Sure.
> Veteran: I was 20 years old.

The narrator takes the veterans to a reunion on the Rhine of aging German fighter pilots. Says the narrator:

> After Germany was finally defeated, many began to have second thoughts about the allied bombing campaign, including some of the allied airmen themselves ... The Canadians are meeting some of the fighter pilots they fought against. Fifty years ago, they would have killed each other on sight. Now they toast the comradeship that can only be understood by veterans of the air war. The German victims of Bomber Command are estimated at 593,000, most of them women and children.

That is what the narrator says. A young Canadian airman appears. He is played in the film by an actor speaking, we are told, words from letters, diaries and interviews.

> Actor: We must have killed a lot of people with those big bombs we had there. It hurt me because I think we have no right to kill those people. I did 35 missions. When I came back home, my nervous system was shot. At night it was a scene from hell, nightmares. I broke two teeth of my wife. Finally I had to sleep alone on the floor. As for my crew, one is a drunk, one is on drugs, and the third one got heavy shrapnel within his inner regions and will have a colostomy all his life. Another one fell from a turret ladder and shattered his back, and the last one got both legs shot off.

And what became of Air Marshall Harris in all this muck?

The narrator explains:

> Because of area bombing, Harris was shunned after the war. He died bitter but unrepentant in 1984.

[Senator Stewart.]

Honourable senators, you will recall that Senator Marshall notified us of his intention to have the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, through its subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, look into the circumstances involved in this production for the CBC and the NFB.

My interest in this business relates only to that Death by Moonlight episode of "The Valour and the Horror" which has aroused such a storm of criticism among veterans of the Royal Air Force Bomber Command.

● (1630)

Like many of my old comrades, I am offended that such a piece of distortion and despair should be lumped into a solemnly intoned dedication to the 46,000 Canadians who died in the Second World War.

I would hope that Senator Marshall, whose energy and earnestness in these matters is respected, would agree with me that "The Valour and the Horror" should not be banned or withdrawn. I have argued too long and too loud against censorship to turn to advocacy of silence at this stage. What I would look for in the study which is about to begin is some explanation of how such a concentrated package of negativism can make its way to public viewing under the imprimatur of two experienced national agencies. Producers should have freedom and, indeed, encouragement to make fictional and nonfictional works according to their own standards. But, "docudramas" that speak from narrow points of view are often mistaken for "the real story". Government-financed agencies should not have freedom to screen them without disclaimers or accommodation of any kind for other approaches to the truth.

The problem with the urge to say "thou shalt not" to either institution in any circumstances is that it inevitably raises arguments about censorship and begs the question whether a government in a country well beyond its pioneering should be involved even in arm's length ownership of institutions capable of shaping historical perspectives in ways that do not answer to any code or discipline imposed beyond that of their own appointed managers.

This film sets up a picture of innocent, naive Canadian boys going unwittingly to their deaths to satisfy the battle lust of a malevolent master.

In the Canadian Encyclopedia a half page, among 2090 pages, is given over to the Second World War exploits of the Royal Canadian Air Force. It is perhaps fitting, in a peaceable kingdom, that the comments pronounce on neither the valour nor the horror experienced in nearly six years of exhilaration and agony. The score card is there, however. Seventeen thousand fatal casualties occurred. Nearly 10,000 of these Canadian lives were lost in the RAF Bomber Command.

Laszlo Buhasz, in his review of "The Valour and The Horror" series for the Globe and Mail, says that the film:

> —turns over the rock of propaganda and probes about in the writhing slime of political expediency, incompetent leadership, a degree of British complacency and condescension toward both the enemy and their own colonial troops that reeks of a failing empire and its defunct values and the most horrendous of cruelties men are capable of inflicting on each other. If there are two overwhelming emotions provoked in this series, they are anger and disgust.

Well, that is how Buhasz saw it. He speaks of propaganda. As the war progressed, propaganda was hardly able to imitate the horror of the truth, which many of us who were involved refused to believe when it was revealed to us. Only by dwelling on that fact will we be able to examine honestly what Mr. Buhasz calls "the most horrendous of cruelties" revealed by "The Valour and The Horror".

On May 13, 1943, the Allied Chiefs of Staff met in Washington D.C. to announce the beginning of Operation Pointblank. Its aim was "the progressive destruction and dislocation of the German military and economic system and the undermining of the morale of the German people to a point where their capacity for armed resistance is fatally weakened and to permit initiation of final, combined operations on the continent." That policy was accepted, indeed hailed, in London and Ottawa, as well as in Washington.

In this undertaking American airmen, exploiting their country's technological advances in bomb aiming, would concentrate on daylight precision attacks on aircraft factories and the like. Bomber Command in the RAF would set about nighttime raids upon the vast production concentrations in the Ruhr and cities such as Hamburg in which 2000 industrial targets had been pinpointed among the docks and nesting places for marauding submarines.

The rhetoric of May 13, 1943, was bold when measured against the allied capacity to deliver. Consider, with the help of Martin Gilbert and his history of the Second World War published by Stoddart in 1989, the justification for such a message in the historical context of the spring of 1943.

On the very day that Operation Pointblank was launched, Dr. Josef Goebbels wrote in his German diary that in the latest action against partisans in Croatia "more than 13,000 rebels were killed—among them many intellectuals." On May 16, the Germans launched Operation Gypsy Baron near the eastern front, a three-week anti-partisan sweep involving five infantry divisions, one armoured division and supporting aircraft. Of the 6,000 partisans in the area, 1,584 were killed and a further 1,568 were captured in the Bryansk area.

That same day, May 16, SS Brigadier Jurgen Stroop reported to the Fuhrer: "The Warsaw ghetto is no longer in existence."

● (1640)

The Jewish revolt which had begun on April 18 had ended that evening, Stroop wrote, "by blowing up the Warsaw synagogue." As well as the 14,000 Jews killed in the fighting or sent to their deaths at Treblinka, a further 42,000 were sent to labour camps in the Lublin district. Stroop was awarded the Iron Cross, First Class. Where, if these facts are recited in the film, would Mr. Buhasz direct his anger and his disgust?

The RAF was not idle. On May 13, bombers attacked the Skoda Munition Works near Pilsen. Then, on May 16, came Operation Chastise in which Wing Commander Guy Gibson led his famous skip bombers against the Mohne, Eder and Sorpe dams. Two of the three dams were breached, but six bombers were shot down over the Dutch coast and two more over target. Goebbels said the damage was heavy and the Fuhrer was angry. 1,268 people were killed; Germany was forced to move 50,000 labourers to the Ruhr from the Todt Organization forces working at and near the rocket launching sites of the Atlantic Wall.

Martin Gilbert writes:

> Anti-aircraft guns needed elsewhere were brought to protect dams not only in the Ruhr but elsewhere throughout Germany, although none were needed.

Said Goebbels:

> The Fuhrer is exceedingly impatient about the lack of preparation on the part of our air force.

Yet, the narrator of the "The Valour and the Horror" says the principal product of this costly dambusting was a jolt for RAF public relations. Says the narrator:

> Precision bombing did not really interest the Bomber Command . . . Killing civilians did not bother Arthur Harris.

In Volume III of "Royal Air Force 1939-45", Hilary St. George Saunders writes:

> It was the Air Force that for years went out night after night over the sullen realm of Germany to conduct the only offensive within our power.

Saunders repeatedly reminds us that:

> . . . first, foremost and beyond all was the establishment of dominion in the air over the enemy. Not until this had become an accomplished fact was victory certain; not until it had become a commonplace was victory secured.

And what does Saunders say about Harris? He calls him "this resolute chief of Bomber Command". He says in 1954 that Harris:

> . . . is a figure round whom the winds of contention still play. He was as fixed as the proverbial rock. His allotted task was among the most vital of the war and he accomplished it to the full. If some of the consequences appear odious in the eyes of those who cherish sentimental illusions concerning war, the tenacity and skill with which he carried out his orders cannot be challenged. He saw his duty plain and fulfilled it.

There is no quarrelling with history's record of a commander zealous and jealous in the carrying out of his own terrible mission to hasten the end of a long, long war. If he was not a nice man, Montgomery and Patton and Crerar and McNaughton were not nice men either.

To reduce Harris to caricature; to have an actor—even a "superb actor", as one critic called him—stand by the Union Jack and read the most familiar Harris quotations as if they had come from Edgar Allen Poe, offends those who new Harris.

Toward the end of the Death by Moonlight episode, the narrator tells us that pilots in Bomber Command were treated at the end of the war as "an embarrassment". He says:

> They had been ordered into the skies over Germany to bomb cities and then they were blamed for the civilian deaths that resulted."

In his 1985 "Military History of Canada", W.L. Morton laments:

> The value of the Bomber Command offensive is still hotly debated . . . The Canadian toll in Bomber Command was greater than the death toll of the Canadian Army as it fought from Normandy to the Hochwald Forest. It is too painful to admit that 9,980 young Canadians died to very little purpose.

Still, Morton acknowledges successes. He writes of Air Vice Marshall C.M. McEwen's command of Six Group—the nexus for all Canadians who served in the Command:

> By the end of 1944 (it) boasted the highest accuracy and the fewest casualties of any group.

It had turned its reputation around.

In his vivid summing up, Hilary Saunders says this:

> Lancasters bent on raiding the Ruhr depended on oil tankers reaching Liverpool; and, less immediately, but just as surely, oil tankers bent on reaching Liverpool depended on Lancasters raiding the Ruhr. In modern warfare, such relationships are intricate, subtle and ubiquitous.

Unfortunately, the CBC and the NFB have left the whole scope of interdependence beyond their magnifying glass. Did they fear that credit would be taken from victorious armies if they acknowledged that they would never have been able to leap from their landing craft had German forces and production centres been left to do no worse without interruption, or had the 2 million Germans diverted to anti-aircraft service been fresh and available on either the Eastern or Western fronts, or guarding of flying bomb launching sites? In the first two months of 1945, the rockets killed 2,000 Londoners.

In its final moments, this episode of "The Valour and the Horror" finds valour only on one side. The actor who plays Freeman Dyson, a scientist and, as the narrator calls him, a brilliant analyst of the bombing campaign, speaks of his admiration for the enemy—the Luftwaffe. The actor says:

> The night fighters and their supporting organizations (in the closing stages of the war) put up an astonishing performance, continuing to fight and cause us serious losses until their last airfield was overrun and Hitler's Germany ceased to exist.
> They had the advantage of knowing what they were fighting for . . . We had given them, at the end of the war, the one thing they lacked at the beginning, a clean cause to fight for.

● (1650)

Says the narrator:

[Senator Doyle.]

> A lot of German fighter pilots still have mixed feelings about the task performed by their adversaries in Bomber Command.

On March 16, 1945, Goebbels described the "astonishing performance" of his countrymen as he saw it. This is a quote from Mr. Goebbels. He states:

> German defence capability in the air has been promised so often and this promise has been broken so often that one would prefer to see some results before considering the promise a real one . . . We are continually coming across fresh subterfuges to avoid the combing-out process by the Staff for Total War . . . We shall have to use fairly rough and ready methods if we are to succeed. The leader in this passive resistance is the Luftwaffe . . . The German people are degenerating almost into hopelessness. There is a very sharp criticism of the Luftwaffe.

In matters of war and peace there will never be easy agreement between victor and vanquished. Even between factions of those who win, overviews differ wildly and are made more worrisome as the concerns of generations are layered upon the history of the time. Scrupulous respect should be shown for the records and recollections of all.

Parliament must not leave Death by Moonlight alone in the vaults where films are kept, lest, a generation on, it is screened again and there is no one to deny that it is what it claims to be—a fit tribute to the thousands who lost their lives in the terrible war of 1939 to 1945.

How that might be avoided may be indicated in the study advocated by Senator Marshall.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the contents of the CBC/NFB series "The Valour and the Horror" and report upon—-

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was quite in agreement with Senator Doyle's speaking on this motion, but I was under the impression that it would remain in my name until Senator Marshall had the chance to be here. I have had a brief discussion with him and I should like it left in my name until he is present.

The Hon. the Speaker: You are adjourning the debate, then, Senator Molgat?

Senator Molgat: Yes. I thought it would remain in my name.

On motion of senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have been led to believe that there would be general agreement that the remaining Inquiries, Motions, and so on, stand.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That is my understanding also, but again with no change in numbers, I presume.

Senator Murray: That is the practice as I understand it, honourable senators. That being the case, and hearing no dissent, I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 7, 1992, at 2 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, those of Senator Murray's colleagues who are democrats will be calling an election, or asking for one, within 228 days. The ones who are cowardly and contemptuous of democracy will be doing so in 614 days.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CBC MINI-SERIES "THE VALOUR AND THE HORROR"

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, with reference to the three-part mini-series by the CBC, "The Valour and the Horror", I have extracts from three letters.

The first reads:

> . . . first episode . . . dwells on the horrific suffering of the Canadian prisoners of war following their defeat . . . second episode . . . laid considerable emphasis on the horror caused by the bombing of Hamburg, Berlin and other cities. Two airforce veterans interviewed . . . were put in a position of almost personally having to apologize for their . . . bombing missions. No mention was made of the heavy raids by Germany on London, Coventry or Portsmouth when the Luftwaffe tried to hammer Britain into rubble . . . final episode dealt with the Canadians in the Normandy campaign . . . an excellent example of selecting historical facts and using them to "prove" a preconceived bias . . .

The second letter reads in part:

> . . . real horror is that the CBC and NFB, with our tax money, produced that pack of lies and anti-Canadian, anti-British and pro-Nazi propaganda in the first place. I landed on the beaches in Normandy . . . we did not have drunken, bumbling idiots commanding us . . . failed to explain the overall strategic plan of the Normandy Battle . . . The Nazis of the SS units were killers, trained since youth. We were, for the most part, just young Canadians who valued our way of life and our home enough to fight . . .

A third letters reads in part:

> . . . astounded by the narrowness of the scope of the presentations . . .
> . . . the heroic actions and the willingness to defend freedom displayed by Canadians and others in the First and Second World Wars should not be denigrated by those who seem to have scant knowledge of the facts and are only interested in twisting them to make a case for their anti-war philosophy . . .

May I conclude by congratulating Senator Doyle on his presentation the other day. I am sorry I was not here, but I read it with interest.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, we had similar discussions when the Billy Bishop film was referred to the Senate Veterns Affairs sub-committee. I would like to repeat what I said then, which is that I do not think the Senate of this country is a board of censors. I would urge that we stay out of this matter.

Senator Marshall: I think I should respond to Senator Gigantès, if it is permissible.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Marshall, the rules forbid that, unless you get leave. Is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Marshall: I just want to say that we are not trying to act as censors. However, I am sure anyone would agree that objecting to the denigration of the Canadian forces and any of the Allied forces is not censorship, it is telling the truth. Senator Gigantès is a protector of national unity. How can we have national unity when the CBC, despite its duty to Canada, at will and with the taxpayers' money, tells the Canadian forces in no uncertain terms that they were no good and that their generals were responsible for the loss of hundreds of Canadian lives. That is shameful. It is certainly not the Canadian way. Is that what Canada is all about?

I want to say to Senator Gigantès that last Sunday there was a parade in front of the War Memorial with the Prime Minister and the Governor General of Canada present. They paid respect to those who fought at Vimy Ridge in 1917. The day before the parade, one part of the series of films on "The Valour and the Horror" aired on the CBC. It showed the film on Normandy and told the people of Canada that, while the Canadian soldiers of the First World War forged a nation at Vimy, those who fought on the beaches were no good and were untrained, and some of our leaders were drunks.

Is that what the honourable senator means by his comments about censorship, or should we not be telling the truth?

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I spoke earlier for only 10 seconds. I will now take the rest of my three minutes.

What that series has said about "Bomber" Harris is very close to the truth. I was there. I was among those who were there. There are few of us.

Senator Marshall: I was there too.

Senator Gigantès: Bomber Harris was somebody who held the same view as Haig held in the First World War, which is that the winning army is the one which has one soldier standing when the opponents do not have one.

Yes, there were mistakes, many mistakes on both sides. That does not mean we do not respect our fighting people when we say that mistakes were made. How can we ascertain if there were mistakes, and how can we learn from those mistakes, if we do not talk about them?

NORTHWEST CANADA CONFERENCE EVANGELICAL CHURCH

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition for the Northwest Canada Conference Evangelical Church, praying for the passage of an Act to amend an Act to incorporate the Northwest Canada Conference Evangelical Church.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 75 citizens of Ontario who oppose the goods et services tax. These petitions come mainly from Toronto, Downsview, Oshawa and Thornhill.

Honourable senators, I have also the honour of presenting several petitions signed by 507 citizens of Ontario who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions come mainly from Toronto, Willowdale, Kitchener, Waterloo, Cambridge and Brampton.

[English]

These petitions represent a grand total of 582 Canadians who cannot accept the GST and are particularly angry that, for the first time, a government was so insensitive about culture that it applied the GST to books and periodicals.

Senator Olson: Shame!

Senator Hébert: These 582 citizens do not forget easily and probably they will not soon forgive, either.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE CONSTITUTION

BEAUDOIN-DOBBIE REPORT—STATEMENTS OF MINISTERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government and refers to our exchange of last Tuesday regarding the support or non-support by Ministers Bouchard, Masse and Loiselle of the government position with respect to constitutional reform. He promised me that he would be bringing me some documentation to show speeches made by these honourable gentlemen. Has he been able to obtain any such documentation?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not aware that I made any commitment of that kind. If I did, I will review the situation and do what I can to bring in the required information.

Senator Molgat: The exchange—and I refer to Debates of the Senate —took place at page 1286. The government leader said that all three ministers fully endorsed the Prime Minister's statement that the Beaudoin-Dobbie Report was the best offer that Quebec had ever had. I then said:

> Mr. Minister, we would be delighted to hear about a speech by one of these three ministers. Bring us a speech that shows they said something positive about Canada and the Beaudoin-Dobbie report. If you are so sure, bring it in. We can wait.

Senator Murray: That is what you said, but I see no commitment there on my part to do anything.

Senator Molgat: But you did say that they had defended that report, and that you were sure they had. Show us how they did so, and show us where.

Senator Murray: I myself have seen—and I am sure that my friend has also—several of these ministers in the course of television interviews, or heard them in the case of radio interviews, doing exactly what I said they had done.

I do not know whether prepared texts of such speeches are available. Many ministers speak without the assistance of prepared texts. If they have them and they are available, I will be glad to table them.

Senator Molgat: With the immense clipping service that the government has, I am sure there will be no problem at all. If these ministers have made so many statements defending Canada, I am sure that my honourable friend can easily find them.

Senator Bonnell: One or two at least!

Senator Molgat: If he could supply them to us, it could be important. We have seen that these ministers are saying that they do not agree with the report and that they will not go and defend the government's position in the province of Quebec. The government cannot have it both ways. Will the minister undertake to use his vast resources of research to obtain for us at least one or two illustrations?

● (1430)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will see what is available in that line. When there is something, I will bring it to the attention of the honourable senator.

CANADA POST

DEFICIT POSITION—DEPARTMENTAL USE OF PRIVATE ENTERPRISE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have a further question on another subject. I should like to know what government policy is with regard to the Post Office.

In a recent issue of Quorum, I see this story.

> CanPost deep in red.
> Canada Post ran more than $100 million in the red last year because of the postal strike and recession.

Then there is a specific quote from one of your ministers.

"It's in that order, but I don't have the exact figure," Government House Leader Harvie Andre said when asked about the whopping deficit in an interview.

However, in another issue of Quorum, there is this story. It is in French.

[Translation]

CanPost Should be Privatized: Several federal departments prefer to call upon a private company controlled in part by the Post Office Department of the Netherlands rather than on the Canada Post Corporation to handle their mail overseas.

According to an official of InterPost Systems Canada, Mr. Bob Anderson, those departments are Supply and Services Canada, Environment Canada and Energy, Mines and Resources Canada.

[English]

We have a situation where, on the one hand, Canada Post is losing $100 million and, on the other hand, government departments are using a Dutch company to do their mailings instead of Canada Post. Surely this does not make sense.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The honourable senator ought to take a look at the legislation which his government introduced when they established Canada Post as a Crown corporation. It is a fact that Canada Post enjoys a monopoly in certain aspects of its activity. In other aspects, it is in a highly competitive environment. Government departments, like other shippers and users of such services, want to get the best service and the best price. After all, we are dealing with taxpayers' money.

I think, by the way, that the adverse financial results in the last year will be seen to be due in some considerable measure to the labour problems that Canada Post experienced for some time in 1991.

SOUTH AFRICA

REMOVAL OF SANCTIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. We have been following recently the progress that the government of South Africa has been making in dismantling the practice of apartheid. It appears that the government's actions in that regard are highly supported in the white community, as evidenced by the referendum that was held recently in that country.

We have also learned that the European Economic Community has recently lifted sanctions on South Africa. Does the Canadian government intend to follow suit, now that South Africa appears to have met some of the conditions that the Canadian government imposed?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The short answer to that question, honourable senators, is no. We will not be lifting our sanctions until the criteria established by the Commonwealth last summer are fully respected.

MACEDONIA

RECOGNITION OF SOVEREIGNTY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Is the Government of Canada presently considering the recognition of Macedonia as a sovereign state?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Not that I am aware of, honourable senators.

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

GENEVA NEGOTIATIONS—EFFECT OF U.S. ELECTIONS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Perhaps the Leader of the Government would assist a great many Canadians who have an intense interest in the results of the trading negotiations that are currently proceeding in Geneva. I ask the question today because there have been a number of commentators, particularly from Washington, who have said that they do not believe any further progress will be made in dealing with those negotiations until after the November election in the United States. If that is so, perhaps it would be appropriate for a spokesman for the Canadian government such as the Leader of the Government in the Senate to level with Canadians and tell them what is really going on in Geneva. He might tell us, for instance, what to expect with respect to a number of matters that are of great interest, such as Article XI, export subsidies on grain, and a number of other vital trading matters that are under discussion there.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have tried on several occasions to explain to the honourable senator what is really going on in Geneva. The last time we discussed this matter, I referred to the discussions that had taken place between President Bush and Chancellor Kohl of Germany, but this news served only to fuel the honourable senator's indignation.

I can tell him that following those bilateral talks between Germany and the United States, informal discussions have been taking place between the United States and the European Community. We also have reason to believe that Chancellor Kohl will use Germany's influence in the European Community to try to move towards a rapprochement with the Americans.

As it happens, talks between the United States and the European Community will resume on April 22, but it is anybody's guess whether we will be able to meet the April 29 deadline that was set for an agreement. That is where the matter now stands.

Senator Olson: I wonder whether the minister thinks he is being fair to Canadians in giving that kind of a reply when there has been no progress to report. In all the answers that he has given in this house, there has been no indication of progress at all. He talks about some negotiations or discussions that have gone on between Germany and the United States. I asked him if anything useful had happened, and there were a lot of words in his reply, but all it came down to was, "I do not know."

Now he is again raising the hope that something useful might happen between April 22 and April 29. In addition to the farmers who are intimately involved, there are a lot of other people in this country who have a very vital interest in these matters. Surely we all have the right to know what is really going on. A number of highly respected reporters who have been at the meetings in Geneva are unanimous in saying that they think it is long past the date when anything useful can be done this year.

Senator Murray: If that is the case, honourable senators, the cause will have been an inability to break the impasse between the United States and the European Community on the question of agricultural subsidies. The honourable senator is aware of the proposal in the Dunkel text having to do with the phasing down of agricultural subsidies. The honourable senator is also aware that, so far as the United States is concerned, this is a minimum that will be acceptable. It seems the position of the United States is that they will countenance no watering down of provisions which they already regard as the minimum acceptable.

● (1440)

On the other hand, the European Community, influenced as it is by several big agricultural nations, is of the view that the text must be watered down, that the phasing down of agricultural subsidies is too great a burden for them to bear too quickly. There the matter stands. The Americans and the Europeans are meeting again, as I said, on April 22. I hope that in the interests of world trade and liberalized world trade, in which we all have such a large stake, they will be able to make some progress.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, there was a time when the Canadian negotiator at these types of meetings had some influence. Is the minister now saying that it is inevitable that we have to accept what the Americans say, and that is it?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator knows the answer to that question as well as I do. I think it is a rather cheap shot on his part.

Senator Olson: Cheap shot? It is what happened!

Senator Murray: It is a cheap shot on the part of the honourable senator to be attacking the Canadian negotiators from the Canadian government who have played an important part in bringing negotiations as far as they have come in the Uruguay Round.

I am still waiting to hear where the honourable senator stands on the question of agricultural subsidies and the Dunkel text. The last time I heard the honourable senator address the text he said it was unacceptable, and not just because of Article XI. We have no disagreement on that, but he said the text generally was unacceptable. Perhaps we could hear from him at some appropriate time and he could offer some guidance to the negotiators.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I could advise the minister that it would probably be better if we had a different government, a government that could send people over there who could negotiate effectively. If the minister wants to call it a cheap shot he can do so. I have described exactly what has happened, and he knows that.

I say this to him: If after five years we still stand in the corner, cap in hand, wringing our hands because the Americans say this or that, we have nothing else to say or do. That is what has happened. That is not the way the Canadian government used to act before this government came to office. I want to tell the minister that many Canadians believe that it is about time the spokesmen and negotiators of this government stand up for Canadians and the interests of Canadians. I would like him to level with them and tell them what is going on so that, if they are unable to exercise any influence on those negotiations, at least they can tell Canadians where they stand so they can prepare themselves for the kind of trading negotiations that will be taking place.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there is a very good newspaper in Medicine Hat. It has not escaped their notice, and therefore should not have escaped the notice of the honourable senator, that the Canadian representatives—not only the Prime Minister and the ministers who have been dealing with these issues in multilateral fora, among heads of government and at ministers meetings, but also our ambassadors, including Ambassador Gerald Shannon, for example—have been making forthright and vigorous statements upholding the Canadian interests in these talks.

Senator Olson: They have been a total failure to date.

Senator Murray: I am sorry the honourable senator feels that way. Perhaps he would be surprised to learn that one of our Canadians has been chairman of the group dealing with agricultural subsidies at the GATT. I come back to the essential point here: When you have two huge traders like the United States and the European Community deadlocked on an issue such as agricultural subsidies, the process comes to a halt until that deadlock can be broken, and all the fulminations of the honourable senator will not help. He was standing up here in great indignation a week ago because Chancellor Kohl and President Bush had the temerity to have a meeting on the subject in Washington.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the minister at least ought to get his facts straight. I agreed that they can hold meetings any time they like; they do not have to ask us.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: What I disagreed with and felt a little cheaper about was that the Canadian government had agreed that they could negotiate the Uruguay Round without Canadians even being at the table. They were willing to accept that.

By the way, on your other point, that great newspaper in Medicine Hat is only great once in a while—when it agrees with me.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF VIMY RIDGE—STATUS OF MERCHANT MARINE VETERANS LEGISLATION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I wish to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Since this is the seventy-fifth anniversary of Vimy Ridge, where many of our Canadian boys lost their lives in World War I, and since the minister the other day went all the way to Halifax to announce that he would bring in legislation for the mariners, when can we expect that legislation rather than words and promises?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the minister has indicated that this will be done. It will be done as soon as it possibly can. I am not certain how much legislation will be required. It seems to me to be quite a straightforward decision to implement; so it should not take very long.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, these straightforward decisions are not taking place. Some things they can do by regulation, but I do think they have to bring the act in and amend it as well. Would it not be a great time to bring that act in and pass it through here in a matter of three days so that these pensions could go to these veterans as we celebrate the seventy-fifth anniversary of Vimy? Since the minister thinks it will happen soon, I will give him another week to see if he can bring in that legislation.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, in the announcement by Mr. Merrithew, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, he said he would soon introduce legislation for the merchant navy veterans. I am informed that in the course of his comments he said that he would be bringing in the amendments within weeks.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, as I understand it we have only a few weeks left before we adjourn for the summer holidays.

Senator Murray: Don't take anything for granted.

Senator Bonnell: All I am going by is the calendar of the other place.

Senator Doody: Don't go by the other place.

Senator Bonnell: That could mean the fall before this legislation is brought in. As these veterans have reached the age where some of them die each day, they would like to have that legislation enacted as soon as possible.

Senator Murray: I am glad to have your undertaking that you will pass the legislation in three days.

Senator Bonnell: We will do the very best we can. I would pass it in three days, but I do not stand alone. We will give it every bit of support we can give it. We will not hold that legislation up provided it gives fair treatment to the veterans.

THE ECONOMY

STATUS OF BANKRUPTCY LEGISLATION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: My next question is: When can we expect the Bankruptcy Act to get through the other place and into this house so that we can get some protection. Last year over 75,000 bankruptcies occurred in Canada. This year, in the month of January alone there were 6500 bankruptcies. Many people are hurt by these bankruptcies. When can we expect that legislation to proceed?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will consult with my counterparts in the House of Commons on that matter. Meanwhile, of course, if the honourable senator is anxious to get on with it, we could always consider a pre-study.

Senator Frith: I am glad to see you almost choked on that statement. There is some honour left in you.

Senator Bonnell: I am suggesting that we get the legislation here to make whatever amendments we think are necessary for the good of the provinces and the people.

● (1450)

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know when the bill will arrive in the Senate. I will have to make some inquiries. Of course, even the government leadership in the other place can never be certain as to the exact date a bill will receive passage in that chamber. However, I will try to obtain an educated guess from my friends in the other place.

Senator Frith: There is a good comparison here. The government knows exactly what it can do under these rules. There is no problem there; just slam it through.

COPYRIGHT

STATUS OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, perhaps I could add to the list of vintage ideas that we would like to see in the form of legislation and ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if there is any sign of legislation coming forward on the copyright revisions promised by the Honourable Flora MacDonald many years ago. They were also promised again last fall.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall make enquiries.

THE CONSTITUTION

BEAUDOIN-DOBBIE REPORT—NATURE OF ADVERTISEMENTS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps the leader of the Government in the Senatee could advise whether or not the government is presently conducting advertising concerning the Beaudoin-Dobbie report? I have seen television advertisements which mention that report. Which government department is the source? Perhaps he could advise us what the program is.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, television advertising is running now referring to the report of the Beaudoin-Dobbie joint committee and, as I recall, indicating an 800 number where people can call to obtain further information on that report. That advertising is being paid for out of funds that are under the control of the Federal-Provincial Relations Office.

Senator Molgat: I thank the minister for his answer. Perhaps he could obtain the details for us. For example, what is the budget? Where are the advertisements shown? In which languages are they shown? Are the advertisements the same in both French and English?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the answer to the last part of the question is yes. I have seen both the French and English versions of the advertisement. It will be no difficulty for me to obtain and bring in the budget, the stations and the frequency with which the commercials are being shown.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask His Honour to tell us, under the rules, how much time there is remaining for the Opposition—or anyone else, for that matter—to ask questions?

The Hon. The Speaker: I am informed that there are six minutes remaining, honourable senators.

FISHERIES

FOREIGN OVERFISHING OF FLOUNDER AND FLATFISH—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, it would be a shame to waste the six minutes remaining. If we can obtain some true and factual information from the government, that six minutes may be very valuable.

Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate can tell me, or find out for mee, what the Government of Canada and the Minister of Fisheries is doing to stop the overfishing of flounder off the coast of Newfoundland and Canada. The flounder catch has been overcaught by 12 to 15 per cent in the last two years.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I answered questions on this matter the other day.

With regard to the flounder, as with the cod, the Minister of Fisheries, the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, all ministers of the government, are exerting all of our efforts to try to pressure other nations to respect internationally agreed-upon quotas.

Senator Bonnell: I thought the previous answers the minister gave to questions related to cod. My question today relates to flounder and flatfish.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, overfishing is the problem, and the solution lies in their being some respect for the stocks on the part of those foreign countries involved. We are doing all that we can to try to ensure that they show that respect.

Senator Bonnell: The European Community has agreed to curtail the fishing of cod off the shores of Newfoundland and the coast of Canada provided we give them some of the other stocks that we are not utilizing. Have we ever thought of giving them the seals?

THE CONSTITUTION

BEAUDOIN-DOBBIE REPORT—PROPOSED REALLOCATION OF POWERS

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, may I return to the subject of the Beaudoin-Dobbie report and ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether or not the government has prepared economic studies relating to the structure and sharing of tax revenues that would emerge as a result of that report? In other words, what would be the shift of tax revenues to the various provinces from the central government through whatever means as a result of the proposed reallocation of powers under the Beaudoin-Dobbie report?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): No, honourable senators.

Senator Grafstein: Does the government intend to do so?

Senator Murray: Not for the present, honourable senators.

Senator Grafstein: The province of Ontario has raised the question of the currently unfair structure of transfer payments. Would it not be useful for the federeal government, on behalf of the citizens of the province of Ontario, to at least explore what the economic impact would be of the Beaudoin-Dobbie report if it were to be adopted by the government in its current form?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there are so many variables and hypotheses involved in trying to do such a calculation that I am not sure it would be very meaningful.

So far as the Government of Ontario is concerned, they would be well advised to try to get their own sums right first.

Senator Grafstein: The Premier of Quebec put the question of economic federalism on the table. Several weeks ago, he stated that his real concern was essentially the reallocation of economic powers. I would suspect that in saying that, essentially the Premier of Quebec is looking for a reallocation not only of political power but also of economic power. I further assume that any reallocation of economic power would be at the expense of the federal government. The government should be interested in indicating to the people of Canada, and in particular to the people of the province of Ontario, what such a reallocation of economic power would mean in terms of dollars.

Senator Murray: I do not know what type of economic powers the honourable senator is talking about, or what statements he is attributing to Premier Bourassa. Anything I have heard Premier Bourassa say has been to the effect that the Canadian economic union is something that we must work to preserve and strengthen.

Senator Grafstein: I cannot remember the exact date of his speech, but he talked about domineering federalism. He allowed that the intrusion of the CBC into the province of Quebec would continue as a non-injurious symbol of the presence of federal power in that province. Beyond that, he said he was really interested in the economic questions as they relate to the proposed powers that he was seeking for his province.

Has the government given any thought to the Premier's speech as it relates to the restructuring of economic power as opposed to political power, and to determining who would be the winners and who would be the losers?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I saw the news conference by Premier Bourassa to which the honourable senator is referring, but I do not want to make myself the interpreter of Premier Bourassa's thoughts or declarations. His objection to the report of the joint committee insofar as it touched on the exercise of constitutional powers was—and is—that each of these situations would have to be negotiated case by case.

• (1500)

[English]

It was in that connection that he used the phrase "domineering federalism". He prefers, as he has made clear, a clean-cut division and reallocation of powers in the Constitution. I think that when my honourable friend talks about economic powers he is reading more into Premier Bourassa's declaration than the premier intended.

The Hon. the Speaker: The time for Question Period is now over, unless there is agreement to continue.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

TAXATION

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL REVENUE SHARING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, if I recall correctly, in the 1955 Tremblay Commission the province of Quebec was concerned because at that time it was spending under 35 per cent of the tax dollar under provincial control. In 1992, close to 70 per cent of the tax dollar is now expended by the provinces, particularly the province of Quebec.

How high must the percentage go before the government is concerned that the economic power of the central government is so diminished and weakened that it is of no use to the rest of the country?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is a very interesting point for debate. I would invite the honourable senator to elaborate on it at the appropriate time. If he does so, I hope he will trace the circumstances under which we have moved, through shared-cost programs and the like, to a situation where the exercise of the federal spending power has so diminished, as he says, that something like 70 per cent of total dollars is being expended by provincial governments. As I say, it is an interesting point for debate.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have five delayed answers to questions: one asked by Senator Simard on March 17, 1992, concerning the imposition of a surtax on wood products in New Brunswick; one asked on March 25, 1992, by Senator Marsden regarding access to reading materials; one asked by Senator Corbin on March 26, 1992, concerning highway construction in eastern Canada; one asked by Senator Wood regarding Veterans Affairs, ceremony at Canadian Memorial; and one asked by Senator Grafstein on March 31, 1992, regarding the government's response to an Ontario economic analysis.

NEW BRUNSWICK

IMPOSITION OF SURTAX ON WOOD PRODUCTS—EFFECT ON BUSINESS

(This is in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 17, 1992 by the Honourable Jean-Maurice Simard)

Premier McKenna's remarks are unwarranted. The termination of the Canada-United States Memorandum of Understanding was strongly supported by the industry and the key lumber exporting provinces. The Federal Government was successful in pressing for the exclusion of the Atlantic provinces from this investigation.

The Federal Government objects strongly to all aspects of this decision and will fight this case to the end, and win. There is strong cooperation among federal and provincial governments, industry and their respective counsel in defending Canada's interests.

COMMUNICATIONS

ACCESS TO READING MATERIALS—EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorna Marsden on March 25, 1992)

The new book publishing initiatives recently announced by the Minister of Communications will not limit the access Canadians have to books.

The amendments to the Copyright Act will provide a stronger basis for publishers and exclusive agents to protect their contract rights in the Canadian market:

—they will clarify the rights of publishers with regard to exclusive licensing; that is, the acquisition of publishing rights for the Canadian market;

—they will give Canadian distributors the tools they need to ensure that their exclusive distribution contracts are respected as long as they provide adequate service to their clientele.

As a point of principle, exclusive distribution contracts have to be recognized within the Copyright Act. This safeguard will make it possible to strengthen the infrastructure of the Canadian distribution system which is so essential to the promotion and dissemination of Canadian books.

Exclusive distributors and their clients—bookstores, libraries and others—will have the opportunity to establish the parameters of their relationship with respect to price and service, and the results of those negotiations will be reflected in regulations under the Copyright Act. This will not force anyone to sign exclusive distribution contracts, nor will it create new distribution rights. Simply, where such agreements exist, stronger protection will be provided to Canadians.

Public institutions (i.e., Government departments, both federal and provincial, libraries and educational institutions) will be allowed an exemption to import a single parallel copy of a book.

Finally, it should be noted that the recognition of exclusive distribution rights exists in most western countries, notably in the United States and Europe.

EASTERN CANADA

HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION—FEDERAL FUNDING

(This is in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 26, 1992 by the Honourable Eymard Corbin)

The Minister of Finance indicated in his 1992 Budget that the Government is prepared to work with the provinces to explore ways in which the national highway system might be upgraded in a fiscally responsible manner.

At the recent First Ministers Conference in Toronto, federal and provincial governments agreed to give priority consideration to the proposals for a national highway system. Federal and provincial ministers of transport, in consultation with ministers of finance, will explore options, including examination of funding issues and implementation priorities, consistent with fiscal restraint.

No decision has been taken with respect to funding. The matter is under active review, in consultation with the provinces.

The Federal Government intends to conclude agreements with various provinces, which would respond to national priorities for the national highway system. However, these agreements would have to be consistent with our need to be fiscally responsible.

THE ECONOMY

FIRST MINISTERS CONFERENCE—ONTARIO ECONOMIC ANALYSIS TABLED—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL RESPONSE

(Response to question raised by Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein on March 31, 1992)

This document entitled Setting the Record Straight was prepared by the federal government in response to the Ontario paper released at the Finance Ministers Conference in Toronto.

Role of federal transfers ($23 billion)

Mr. Rae has his facts wrong: total federal transfers to provinces in 1991-92 were $37 billion (as shown on page 98 of the 1992 Federal Budget); Premier Rae has forgotten to count in some $12 billion in tax point transfers and $2 billion in cash transfers to provinces.

The federal government cut transfers (to the provinces); further cuts are planned —The federal government has not cut transfers to provinces; in fact, they have grown by nearly $12 billion from 1984-85 to 1992-93, or over 5 percent per annum over that period;

—that's well over the comparable rate of growth of federal program spending (4 percent);

—there are no plans for cuts in the major transfers to the provinces;

—indeed, the federal government has legislation before the House which will increase Equalization payments to have-not provinces by $600 million over the next two years;

—the 1992 Federal Budget contained no measures affecting major transfers to provinces (while severely restraining other federal spending).

In 1988-89, the federal government collected more than $5,000 per capita in Ontario, but spent only $3,360 per capital in Ontario —Canada is more than a balance sheet;

—every province benefits from being part of Canada: from the existence of a Canada-wide market, from the strength of our financial institutions, our wider pool of trained people, education facilities and technology;

—these benefits are far more important than those which can be directly measured by flows of federal revenues and expenditures.

Federal support for these important programs (health, education, social assistance) is falling rapidly

—Federal support has been increasing, not falling;

—under the three major transfers (Equalization, EPF and CAP), payments to Ontario have grown from over $6.1 billion in 1984-85 to $9.9 billion in 1992-93 (an increase of 62 percent); —for Canada, the comparable growth has been from $23.5 billion to $35.4 billion.

From 1988-89 to 1991-92, the Equalization ceiling reduced revenues of lower income provinces by $3.1 billion —Equalization payments to less wealthy provinces have grown from $7.3 billion to $8.0 billion over that period, an increase of nearly $700 million.

During that period, disparities between lower and higher income provinces widened —Disparities between rich and poorer provinces have narrowed, not widened, since 1984-85.

The federal share of health and higher education spending in Ontario has declined from a high of 52 percent in 1979-80 to about 31 percent in 1992-93

Federal offloading in social assistance has hit Ontario particularly hard

—The facts speak otherwise: between 1984-85 and 1992-93, federal support for health, education and social assistance spending in Ontario will grow from $6.1 billion to $9.9 billion;

—that's a 6.2 percent annual rate of growth compared to 4.9 percent for the rest of Canada.

Ontario is hit the hardest

—There is only one taxpayer in Canada;

—all governments must contribute to deficit reduction;

—Ontario's debt charges, as a percentage of its revenues, amount to 11.6 cents on the dollar, compared to 33.4 cents for the federal government;

—Ontario is expected to bear its share of spending restraint; Ontario's per capita income remains the highest of any province in Canada.

New (fiscal) arrangements are needed —In the 1991 Budget, the federal government recognized the need for reform of the transfers to provinces: "we want to ensure that, in the future, the system of transfers:

provides for the sharing of the opportunities and benefits of Confederation; supports a more efficient and competitive Canada; and maintains the principles and standards that are the basis of Canadian citizenship while respecting provincial flexibility."

—since then, we have tabled legislation to renew and improve the Equalization program, and we have been actively working with the provinces on transfer reform.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, before we proceed to Orders of the Day, may we please revert to Notices of Motions. I would ask leave to raise a matter that I trust is satisfactory to all concerned.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Is the honourable senator asking for leave?

Senator Nurgitz: I am asking for leave to revert to Notices of Motions.

Senator Hastings: I wonder if I might ask for some indication of why he would ask for this at this particular stage.

Senator Nurgitz: Certainly. I ask for leave to revert to Notices of Motions, honourable senators, in order that I might move that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be able to sit today at four o'clock. The reason for this is that at its meeting this morning the committee decided to hear from the Minister of Justice with respect to the Young Offenders Act. The minister is available today at four o'clock. When I learned that, I immediately notified Senator Hastings and Senator Neiman, who was with him. Otherwise, we will not have an opportunity to hear from the minister and, of course, the committee will then have to decide whether to proceed with the bill without the minister or wait until another time.

The normal time slot for this committee is today when the Senate rises, much to the objection of Senator Hastings, who does not like that, as do none of the rest of us. I would ask leave to be able to sit at four o'clock. In addition to that, this is the only time at which we can get the minister.

Senator Hastings: I thank the honourable senator for his explanation as to why he is asking for leave. I presume, out of respect for the minister, that we should grant the leave and hear her with respect to this bill she wishes passed. It would seem me, however, that, if the minister really was anxious to have this bill, she should have provided us with a little notice of her appearance. If she had not been in such a damned hurry to get out of town to sell the bill, she might have made arrangements to appear before the Senate with some degree of notice so that we could adequately prepare for her appearance.

Having said that, I certainly will accede to her request on this occasion to facilitate her appearance.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as I have said in the past, we are always reluctant to grant leave, but we have done it when a good explanation was forthcoming.

I might point out in passing that one of our colleagues asked for leave last week and leave was refused by the other side. I would just point that out.

I would also point out that the minister may be in a very great hurry now for the bill, but if you look at the record from the other place you will see that that bill was introduced in the House of Commons on May 29 of 1991. It went to committee on that date and did not come out of committee until the 31st of October. It finally passed the House of Commons on November 25. It was introduced here on the 26th of November. Second reading began on the 4th of December and was concluded on December 5. Here we are into April and now there is a great rush; the minister has to be heard this afternoon at four o'clock.

I just want to point out that once again this place is being rushed, while the House of Commons takes all the time it wants. I do not believe that that is the way we should be proceeding. However, if those are the circumstances and my colleague who represents us on the committee is prepared to agree to it, I will not oppose it.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I might say, just for the record, that the invitation was extended to the minister at about noon today, and that is the reason for this late date and late time.

Honourable senators, leave having been granted to revert to Notices of Motions, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Rule 59(1)(a) I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax):

> THAT the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to meet at four o'clock in the afternoon today, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that Rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the Senate to adopt the motion?

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, as I indicated, I will support the motion. However, as has also been indicated, this bill has been around for a year and a half and yet suddenly this afternoon we must hear the minister by four o'clock.

There is no mystery as to why we have to hear the minister at four o'clock when we read the press release she issued this morning declaring "Protection of Society Week" from April 6 to 10. She then goes on to herald all of the legislation which Parliament has been asked to pass under her leadership which is going to make this nation safe and sacred as a result of her efforts. One would wonder, honourable senators, if the minister has not commenced her leadership campaign with this press release today.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it the pleasure of honourable senators to adopt the motion?

[Senator Molgat.]

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer, seconded by the Honourable Senator Ross, for the second reading of Bill C-13, An Act to establish a federal environmental assessment process.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I adjourned the debate on this matter the other day in order to allow others to speak. That is why I did not rush to rise now in the hopes that we would hear from some of our colleagues opposite on this bill.

[Translation]

I was looking forward to hearing from the honourable senators from Quebec, especially those who have been Cabinet members in the Quebec legislature, in view of the letters sent to us by Minister Paradis on this issue.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): And what we have read in the papers.

Senator Molgat: And what we have read in the papers. I must admit that I am confused. I am not quite sure of what this bill does? Who is right? Is it Mr. Paradis, who objects violently so to speak to the bill, or is it Mr. Charest, who introduced this bill in the other place?

So, I had hoped that they might voice their opinion. That would be most helpful.

I must say that what I read in the papers does little to help me understand. Here is an article from Le Soleil indicating that Mr. Paradis, the Quebec Minister of the Environment, is heading today for the State of Massassuchetts, where he will address a group at Harvard University. It states that Mr. Paradis supports the environmental assessment of the Great Whale project saying that it is credible. A global agreement would even exist between the federal and provincial governments, the Crees and the Inuits.

On the other hand, there is this other article which states the opposite. Granted, it is not Mr. Paradis speaking. It is Mr. André Beauchamp who, if I am not mistaken, is himself a former Quebec minister. In any case, he says that Hydro-Québec has no structured system to follow . . .

I see some honourable senators shaking their heads. Let me read you the quote:

> Such is the view the former president of the Public Alliance for the environment expressed yesterday before the participants to the Great Whale forum held in Montreal. He also alluded to the former Parti Québécois government of which he was a member . . .

I am at a loss. He may not have been a Cabinet minister. At any rate, here is how the end of this article reads:

> As a matter of fact, he cannot get over . . .

Talking about Mr. Beauchamp.

> . . . how low political ethics have fallen in Quebec. He quotes as evidence the fact that it took a province-wide public debate, three lawsuits and an incredible loss of prestige at the international level to get Quebec and Hydro to carry out an overall impact assessment on the Great Whale project, which would in fact be a bare minimum in America.

These are the two points of view. I think it is essential that the Senate should hear both sides of the argument. Up until now, we have heard the government's opinion which is that this is a very good bill and that we should proceed. However, we know that Mr. Paradis is of a totally different opinion.

So, if you could enlighten me on this point, I think it would be most helpful in the context of our discussions here, in the Senate.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I do not know if I will help ease the anxiety of the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, but I will take a few minutes to tell you where I stand on Bill C-13, which as we know is the bill to implement the federal environmental assessment process.

We know that this bill is the result of a long process of discussion and consultation and I do not want to go over all the steps that this Bill C-13 took since discussion on it began in 1987. It was actually introduced in 1990, I think. At that time, it was Bill C-78, but it died on the Order Paper. It was re-introduced as Bill C-13 and has gone through parliamentary committees and many consultations.

I would simply say that we agree on the principle of the bill and I think that no one today disagrees with a bill to protect the environment or with doing what must be done to ensure proper environmental assessment.

That being said, I must also add that we cannot hide our concerns about some clauses that should certainly be considered further and looked at more closely to ensure that their application would not create conflict between the federal and provincial governments due to their respective jurisdictions.

Of course, for now, we do not have all the answers to these questions. Like you, we saw the conflicting viewpoints or approaches that appear different in certain respects, although I think it is not being totally rejected by Quebec.

I must also refer to what I read of Quebec Minister Paradis's statements and federal environment minister Charest's statements. We definitely feel that they have some points in common and I think that both agree that appropriate assessment action should be taken when these problems arise.

But I still think that this whole matter of how some clauses will be applied is a problem. In this regard, I think that this bill will be referred fairly soon, I suppose, to the Senate Committee on Energy and the Environment and I am glad about it.

I think that we will then have the opportunity to hear the Quebec Minister of the Environment, who is prepared to come before this committee. We will certainly hear from the bill's sponsor as well.

This will help us determine much more clearly and precisely, without getting into conflicts that have something to do with the constitutional debate and so on, whether the respective jurisdiction of both levels of government is respected or whether on the contrary the bill could lead to needless problems due to failure to respect the sharing or jurisdiction.

Honourable senators, as I see it, and perhaps some of my colleagues from Quebec would agree, the committee process will make it possible for us to take a long, hard look at what is involved and to consider the consequences or the repercussions of this legislation on the treatment of provincial and federal jurisdictions.

As far as I am concerned, the sooner this bill can be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, the better. It will be an opportunity for us to examine a bill that is of vital importance, a bill that fills a vacuum, since it arises from a ruling by the Supreme Court, further to environmental guidelines issued in 1983-84, if I am not mistaken. I see this legislation as part of the whole process. I hope that if there is any disagreement, and I am not sure about that right now, we will be able to find solutions that willl help us take a giant step forward on the way to protecting our environment.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as we pointed out, and as Senator Kenny said earlier, Senator Lavoie-Roux has indeed answered some of our questions. We are not entirely satisfied with this bill but we are willing to let it go to second reading, while reserving the right to propose amendments later on.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, this bill has very obvious provincial repercussions, not only in Quebec but in other provinces as well. Therefore, in view of their interest, I suggest that a formal letter be sent to the provincial governments inviting them to appear before the committee, and that we allow them enough time to prepare their submissions. The committee, therefore, should not be called within the next two weeks. In other words, there should be a time lapse sufficient for the provincial spokesmen to be well prepared at the committee hearing.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

TENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Tenth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (security in the Senate), presented in the Senate on March 25, 1992.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I would like to propose the adoption of this report that deals with the implementation of the Contingency Plans for Emergencies in the Senate. I would like to take this opportunity to thank Senators Kenny and Kelly who have been the architects of this project that goes back well over a year. The principal feature of the Plans, if adopted would be for the Senate Protective Service to organize and train itself to handle any security matter up to life-threatening situations.

The Plans would also permit the Senate Protective Service to call for assistance from outside authorities, such as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Ottawa Fire Department. This would be in cases of life-threatening situations. This is a significant change of Senate security policy. If the Plans are adopted, the Senate Protective Service will develop training procedures with the House of Commons and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to coordinate the implementation of these Contingency Plans.

It must be understood that this is a report which, considering the confidentiality of such measures, will not be tabled as a comprehensive report. I ask the Senate today to adopt at least the spirit of this report. Thank you.

Hon. Gildas Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to take this opportunity to thank Senators Kelly and Kenny who, as the chairman of the Committee indicated, were the two architects of this report.

I believe that we often think that security is not really a big problem in Canada and that we need not worry about it. Yet, when you see what happened in our city just two days ago at the Iranian embassy, you understand that there are now forces around us that were not present 20 years ago and that must be taken seriously. When Senator Kelly proposed the creation of a special committee on that issue a few years ago, he aroused the interest of senators. This report is the conclusion of a good job by those two senators and I want to thank them.

On motion of Senator Lavoie-Roux, report adopted.

SCRUTINY OF REGULATIONS

CONSIDERATION OF FOURTH REPORT—DEBATE CONCLUDED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations concerning the Central Registry of Divorce Proceedings Order, presented in the Senate on February 27, 1992.

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, regarding this issue, there were reports in the newspapers that the figures that were submitted to us, and when I say us I mean the Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations, by the Department of Justice were inaccurate.

In fact, the minister of Justice wrote to the Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations on March 19, 1992 to provide us with new figures showing that the direct and indirect costs of services provided to those that had paid fees for divorces were not those that were previously given to us. I insist on the last paragraph of the letter sent by the minister, which says:

[English]

> I regret that incomplete information was provided to the committee and I would be pleased to provide whatever further information you may require respecting this matter.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the problem examined in our report arises from the following principle: No department may charge Canadian citizens a fee for services rendered either directly or indirectly if the amount charged is in excess of the cost of the services rendered.

At the time, the Department of Justice charged divorce applicants $10 as a fee for recording the names and addresses of parties in divorce proceedings, which was entirely acceptable. The Scrutiny of Regulations Committee wrote to the Department of Justice to ask what its revenues were from these fees, as well as the direct and indirect costs of providing the services to those who paid the $10 in question.

From the figures we were given by the Department of Justice, we deduced that during the past five years, a total of approximately $ 3,500,00 had been paid by divorce applicants and that the direct and indirect costs of services rendered represented barely two-thirds of revenues, which meant that about 33 per cent of the amount collected by the Department of Justice was excess revenue.

As you know, the imposition of a tax requires an Act of Parliament and cannot be prescribed by regulation.

Further to the report we tabled in this Chamber and in the other place, the Department of Justice informed us that the figures it had provided were not necessarily wrong but did not reflect the actual situation. Today we were informed that according to the new figures sent by the Department of Justice, the direct and indirect costs show that the profits generated by the fees paid by divorce applicants do not represent 33 1/3 per cent but 10 per cent of those fees. Of course, the Scrutiny and Regulations Committee does not conduct criminal investigations. However, I believe that on the basis of the figures we were given before by the Department of Justice, we had the right to say it was illegal to impose a kind of tax that only the Parliament of Canada has the right to levy.

Honourable senators, according to the figures we will examine in the months to come, it is clear that we are now down to a profit if we can call it that of 10 per cent. We are not here to split hairs. I think that at this stage, we must accept the figures we have been given by the Department of Justice. They have nothing in common with those we received before. That is why I say we were right to table this report, because it merely emphasizes the fact that no department may charge fees that exceed the cost of services rendered, either directly or indirectly, to those who paid the fees for those services.

We were right to table this report when the Department of Justice sent figures that showed there had been a profit of 33 per cent. Today, we have amended figures, which that we intend to examine at the appropriate time, that show a profit of only 10 per cent. I don't think your committee would have tabled its report if we had had those figures at the time.

Honourable senators, those were my comments, and once we have examined the new figures sent by the Department of Justice, we will table an additional report, if necessary.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to congratulate our joint committee chairman and all our colleagues on the committee for the good work they have been doing and are continuing to do. The matter before us is but one outstanding example of that good work.

The Scrutiny of Regulations Committee is certainly one of the most hard-working in the Senate. It looks like pretty dull work, and I think a good deal of the time it is. I have only attended one meeting of the committee over the years. I must say that I was surprised to find out how interesting it was. Perhaps that is because of the fact that I am a lawyer, and perhaps it would not have been as interesting for others.

I think it would be a mistake for us just to wring our hands over the abuse that this committee has elucidated for us on this particular case of the Divorce Registry. It is worthwhile to take just a moment to situate this report in the context of subordinate legislation, something which is a problem that exists for all Parliaments everywhere.

The problem is that when legislation is passed it is often necessary to give the executive—that is, a ministry—the authority to pass regulations in order to implement the purpose of the act. That is a reasonable request. It is a reasonable consequence of the parliamentary system, and a reasonable consequence of the need to implement legislation without providing for every comma and every word.

The problem, of course, is the potential for abuse. Once the authority is given to pass these regulations which, by the principal statute, are given the full force of law, one transfers to public servants the authority to make law—and I mean make law; law that is just as effective as any that we pass.

Senator Nurgitz: Sometimes far more.

Senator Frith: In some cases it is more effective because it is more detailed in its application, as Senator Nurgitz is implying.

I congratulate the members of this committee again. They have found something here which has attracted attention. When they do all their other good work and find out there has been some error in the implementation of regulations with regard to the planting of tomatoes, for example, which in fact happens and is important, that good work does not catch attention.

This matter of the Divorce Registry caught attention. I think that every time we get a chance, or at least on a regular basis, we should remind ourselves as parliamentarians and as legislators that this potential for abuse of subordinate legislation exists.

In this case, what has really happened is that the public servants in this department—and I am not singling anyone out; there is nothing personal involved—have passed, in effect, a tax. They have raised revenue. If there is anything that has been jealously guarded traditionally by parliamentarians since the beginning of their existence, it is the right to impose taxes and to raise funds. Traditionally, the king was gradually forced to go to Parliament and say, "I need money." Parliament, over the years, kept acquiring more exclusive authority to levy taxes and raise funds.

What has happened here, and I am sure this is just one example of the millions of examples around the world where there is subordinate legislation, is that, as Senator Grimard and his committee's report points out, revenues from fees levied to operate and to defray the costs of the Divorce Registry soon exceeded the direct and indirect costs.

The committee sets that out most articulately at page 567 of the minutes of the committee. On that page there is listed for the years 1986-87 through to 1991 what the direct and indirect costs were and what the revenues were. For example, in that first year that is listed, the direct and indirect costs were $315,000; the revenues were $800,000.

What happened was that the people who were paying the fees were being taxed. Money was being raised beyond the cost of administration and revenue was obtained for the Consolidated Revenue Fund, not from all taxpayers but from the ones paying the fees.

● (1540)

The potential for pernicious results of this kind are such that all Parliaments have tried to find ways of controlling it. Sometimes they put in the statute that regulations will require some form of approval or reference. But it is quite rare that that happens. Once we pass the law and delegate the legislative authority to pass regulations that have the same effect as law, we have handed law-making over to the civil servants and to the administration.

The possibilities for abuse are such that, for example, in Australia the Senate plays a very important role with regard to subordinate legislation. Remember that we are not talking about an isolated occurrence. This goes on day after day in all parliamentary jurisdictions. In Australia the regulations do not have effect until they are approved by the Senate.

Some of you will remember that our colleague, Senator Godfrey, was a great champion of a similar role for the Senate of Canada. We might seriously consider this once again, now that we are closer to the possibility of Senate reform than we ever have been in history. I hope that the chairman of this committee will take this on and become a champion for a joint committee, or preferably a committee only of the Senate. It is a role that the Senate could successfully play and one that, if fulfilled, would do a great service to the taxpayers.

On its specific merit and on the important role the committee has played in signalling again the dangers of subordinate legislation, I congratulate the chairman and the members of the committee. I hope that you will pass on our compliments to your colleagues on the other side.

The Hon. the Speaker: May I inform honourable senators that if no other senator wishes to speak, this report is considered debated.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY NFB FILM PRESENTATION WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Tremblay:

That the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to examine the contents of the CBC/NFB series "The Valour and the Horror" and report upon the said production to determine the authenticity of the three part series viz Savage Christmas: Hong Kong 1941; Death by Moonlight: Bomber Command; and In Desperate Battle: Normandy 1944, due to the mounting unfavourable reaction of the said production.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, Motion No. 30 is a motion that I introduced to examine the authenticity of the three series film "The Valour and the Horror". When I introduced this motion I did it for a selfish reason, namely, to focus attention on the seriousness of the CBC production. However, I forgot that under the mandate of the Senate Sub-committee on Veterans Affairs are included ". . . all other matters relating to veterans affairs", which would cover us without having to introduce this motion, although it has served a purpose.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Marshall, I presume that you are closing the debate on this motion?

Senator Marshall: I am suggesting that I would be in agreement with removing the motion from the Order Paper, and I so move.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Would you just finish your comment as to why?

Senator Marshall: We have the authority under the present mandate of the Senate Sub-committee on Veterans Affairs. It reads: ". . . to examine the veterans health care regulations and all matters relating to veterans affairs," which covers the waterfront.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: So you do not need the authority of the motion?

Senator Marshall: That is right.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, to have the motion withdrawn?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Paul David: I am sorry, Senator Marshall, but the motion that you are speaking of will be presented tomorrow.

Senator Frith: What do you mean?

Senator David: It has not been passed yet. I was informed this morning that this motion, for reasons unknown to me, has not been passed. It is being prepared today and will be presented tomorrow.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Is Senator David speaking about the motion establishing the sub-committee?

Senator David: Yes; on the study.

Senator Molgat: We passed the budget for it, did we not, at the Internal Economy Committee?

Senator Frith: It is certainly good to have the money there, if we are to have a committee.

Senator David: The motion that has been referred to by Senator Marshall will be dealt with tomorrow, but we can close the debate if the Senate will pass the motion tomorrow.

Senator Marshall: I don't understand.

Senator Frith: I am confused now.

Senator Marshall: It was agreed at the main committee that the sub-committee be struck, and that took place quite some months ago. I do not know if the clerk is under a mistaken impression that it was not, but I am sure that it is in the record somewhere.

Senator David: We have a new chairman and new clerk on the committee. Perhaps the communications are difficult.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I should like to know what the antecedent of this "motion" is. What we have is a motion from Senator Marshall to give the committee authority to do something. He has then explained that the committee does not need that authority because it already has the authority.

Senator David then tells us that "this motion will be passed tomorrow". I do not know what motion it is that he is speaking of, because I understood that Senator Marshall had informed us—in order to get our leave to withdraw the motion—that he does not need this motion. What motion is it? Does he not already have the authority, as he says?

Senator David: I think the best thing to do is to speak with Senator Marshall and review everything so that we can tell you exactly what will have to be done.

Senator Frith: If I understand well, the motion is withdrawn with the permission of the Senate.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I don't know where we stand. Do I understand that the motion is withdrawn?

Senator Frith: It is withdrawn, with leave.

The Hon. the Speaker: The motion will be withdrawn, then. Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if we are to stand all remaining Orders, I like the Lynch-Staunton formula for doing so, because then the clock does not tick. If that is so, can we revert so that my Tibetan motion will not have its clock ticking?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): There is one exception. I believe that Senator Olson wishes to speak on Inquiry No. 35.

Hon. H. A. Olson: You can stand all the others, though.

Senator Frith: It is just that when we have en bloc standing, the clock is still ticking.

Senator Molgat: Should we stand all the others with no change of number and go to Inquiry No. 35? Is that agreeable?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECTS OF GOVERNMENT POLICY—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the economic chaos created by the government in its pursuit of lower inflation and high interest rates.—(Honourable Senator Murray, P.C.).

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, may I just make a comment on Order No.18? It says that Senator Olson is calling the attention of the Senate to the economic chaos created by the government in its pursuit of lower inflation and high interest rates.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): I like the wording of that.

Senator Olson: It is good. There was a good speech that went with it, too. Senator Murray adjourned that motion and has been waiting until the number is now up to 15. He still has not made any reply to it.

Senator Frith: That just proves the economic chaos.

Senator Olson: Yes, it does. He does not seem to want to answer it, either.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, let me make it clear that I will be glad to defer to any other honourable senator who wishes to take part in this debate.

Senator Frith: Time is running out. It is at number 15.

Senator Olson: This is its last day.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Does Order 18 stand?

Senator Frith: The rule says, "unless otherwise ordered." I take it we are otherwise ordering because we want to hear from Senator Murray, do we not?

Senator Olson: He wanted to make a speech. For some reason, his research did not entice him to finish it.

Senator Frith: All right. I will just have to put up with not hearing from Senator Murray, then. I am choking it down.

Order stands.

THE ECONOMY

MISMANAGEMENT OF MONETARY POLICY

Hon. H.A. Olson rose, pursuant to notice of April 1, 1992:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the government's mismanagement of the economy, particularly monetary policy.

He said: Honourable senators, this inquiry has somewhat the same objective as the one we just stood. What it says is that I will call the attention of the Senate to the government's mismanagement of the economy, particularly monetary policy.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Again, you have a real way with words, Senator.

Senator Olson: Yes. This wording happens to be very accurate from the standpoint of the people I try to represent here, as well as from my standpoint when I look at the economy. It is in terrible condition.

The government stands back, watches Canadians suffer, and says, "Well, we have to get the fundamentals right." The Minister of Finance has said that again in the last two or three days. He was asked when he intended to take some action with respect to monetary policy and those things that are clearly within the jurisdiction of the federal government in order to get Canadians back to work. He made a lot of excuses and said, "We have to get the fundamentals right." I guess he is talking about some fiscal arrangements and debt management and all those sorts of things.

Honourable senators, we have had enough of that. The agriculture sector, particularly in oilseeds and cereal grains, has been financially very sick for about five years now. We keep getting the same answer, that they cannot do anything about it because the European Economic Community and the United States are having a dispute over export enhancement subsidies. That was clear five years ago in Uruguay when the negotiations started. It is still going on.

Of course the European economy, specially the industrial base in what was then West Germany, was paying the major share of the subsidies that were paid to the farmers within the European Economic Community. The United States Treasury was paying the subsidies to the American farmers. I want to admit and acknowledge that even this government, in the first two years, made some rather substantial funding commitments to the programs that were already in place by the previous government, such things as the Western Canada Stabilization Program and a couple of others. They keep throwing that at us even today, that they were extremely generous in that respect.

I have to say thank you very much to the Leader of the Government that the government acknowledged that that was the right policy at the time. However, they have now stopped doing that, and the price of grain has gone down even further. That is the grievance we have at the present time.

The situation is becoming so severe that even bankruptcies have stopped. The foreclosures that are made by the banks and other financial institutions who have lent money to the farmers out there have stopped. What are the banks to do with the land? They cannot even rent it to anyone for a song. Even if a farmer pays no taxes and no rent on the land, the price of grain is so low that he cannot break even because of the costs of operating. The banks know that, but this government does not seem to understand.

Honourable senators, I want to make a short speech today; however, there is one other matter, and that is monetary policy, and this government seems to be completely oblivious to it. They do not seem to understand what the problem is. One of the basic problems, of course, is that the past Minister of Finance, the Honourable Michael Wilson, and the present Minister of Finance, Don Mazankowski, have apparently accepted the philosophy of the Governor of the Bank of Canada. That means that you do everything for the purpose of lowering inflation, no matter what the cost. Put interest rates up until you squeeze the economy, and keep on doing these things so severely that you create a recession. As a matter of fact, we are in a depression now.

So that there is no misunderstanding that the government believed that what they were doing was the right thing to do, on October 12, 1990, the Prime Minister had this to say:

> We are going to squeeze inflation out of the economy because, of all the ills that can be visited on an economy, inflation is the most insidious. In the process, we have induced a slowdown.

I want to repeat what the Prime Minister said, honourable senators:

> . . . .In the process, we have induced a slowdown.

Mr. Wilson said as much in his budget of February 19, 1990. There is no misunderstanding that they intended to play with the monetary policy so severely that they would squeeze all the inflation out of the economy. They have almost done it. I think it is getting down. Some economists will say that it is down to zero now, with the exception of what the GST did to it in the last year or so. Perhaps when the figures for March are compared with March, 1991, there will be zero inflation.

[Senator Olson.]

Honourable senators, we keep hearing the Minister of Finance say that we have to get the fundamentals right first. That means we have to get inflation down to zero. I think he talked about two per cent in his last budget speech. We get it down to that point, and then we expect that there will be capital investment in Canada such that it will create jobs and put people back to work.

The main point that I want to make today is that the people of Canada, or most of them, are afraid of this government. They are afraid of their monetary policy. Every time the Canadian dollar moves down a little bit, the following Thursday the Bank of Canada increases the interest rates. You have people who were caught the last time around and who have made up their minds they will not be caught again. It has cost them very dearly. All the people in the lumber business, in the pulp and paper business, in the oil business, in agriculture—in fact, in anything that we export—as well as most of the provincial premiers have advocated that the value of the Canadian dollar should go down to its economic level, based on the economic factors at play at any given time. However, this government does not allow that to happen, nor does the Bank of Canada.

● (1600)

What people are afraid of is that if the dollar does go down so that our exporters can be competitive on a "real-world" basis, and thus face the real factors in the economic world, this government will increase the interest rates, thereby increasing their debt service charges to the point that they will have to simply say, "We will not borrow any more money. We will not make capital investments at the rate we can probably get today", which is probably 8.5 per cent or 9 per cent, or in some cases a little less. The fear is that if the economy does pick up at all or if the Canadian dollar goes down—either one or the other—this government, or the Bank of Canada with the blessing of this government, will put interest rates back up again.

The last time that happened, the rate went from about 9 per cent or so, which was the going rate, to where some people were paying 14.75 per cent prime, long before they had received a return on their investment sufficient to retire the debt. That is an impossible situation. Therefore I hope that the government will change its monetary policy and let the Canadian economy move forward a little.

I also hope that the government will stand back and let the Canadian dollar find its rightful level based on economic factors alone, and not allow interventions by the Bank of Canada to force the dollar back up again through higher interest rates.

Senator Murray: What do you recommend?

Senator Olson: I recommend that you get out of the way and let the Canadian economy function properly. That is what you need to do with regard to monetary policy. Goodness knows, or heaven knows or whatever—that is your philosophy, that you will deregulate a lot of other things such as airlines, gas prices—

Senator Frith: Airports.

Senator Olson: Airports and so on, and all of these industries, everything you have deregulated, have failed in the severe depression. It seems as if the government wants to cop out of governing altogether. The Canadian people would like to change the government so that they can have a government that is willing to govern.

Senator Murray: Give us your advice on the dollar.

Senator Olson: I am trying to make the point that the lumber industry in this country is sick.

Senator Murray: What about the dollar?

Senator Olson: If the Bank of Canada would get out of the way and let the dollar find its rightful level—

Senator Murray: What is that?

Senator Olson: —which it would, then the exporters of pulp and paper in this country would be better off.

Senator Murray: What is its rightful value?

Senator Frith: You are saying that the lever is the one which would be established if there were no interference?

Senator Olson: Exactly, but the honourable senator does not seem to understand that. In any event, I have read what competent people, such as the economic departments of some of the major banks, such as the provincial governments who have been looking at their economic well-being based on the figures, who have the research facilities to enable them to look at such things and come up with answers, have to say and they are almost unanimous in saying that the Canadian dollar ought to be under $.80, at about $.78 or $.77, which is where it would settle if the Canadian government would leave it alone, but they will not.

Senator Murray: What would be the effect on inflation?

Senator Olson: Of course, there is an effect on inflation. Governing Canada is not a simple thing where you have simple black and white rules. You say that you will do it this way. You have to be in there with opinions and management advice every week of the year. That is expected of the Canadian government. That is why I refer in my motion to the government's mismanagement as being the problem.

I could bring up a few other things. This government has not had the courage to bring in fiscal arrangements that will bring their fiscal obligations down. They say, "Look, we have program spending down to where there is no deficit. All the deficit is in debt service charges."

Senator Murray: We are running the government operations in the black.

Senator Olson: Long before this government came into office, it was the responsibility of whoever was in office to pay the interest on the national debt.

Senator Murray: You drove it from 11 cents on the dollar to 33 cents.

Senator Olson: Every time you have a deficit of $30 billion or more, you add to what the debt service charges will cost in the next year. That is pretty simple and this government should understand that. Instead, they come up with a bill that will give them some camouflage, that will establish a debt reduction account. What a farce.

The government has all the authority it needs to manage this economy. It is a pretty complex thing but you have to do it. You cannot just say you will fob off the airlines, gas prices and everything else and let the market economy look after things. I really do not like to be diverted like this because I am talking about your monetary policy.

Companies all over this country, particularly in my province of Alberta, are downsizing every week and they will keep on downsizing because they do not believe that this government will allow them to make any investments, nor are they confident that the debt service charges will be anywhere near where the government has projected them to be. The oil industry is in deep difficulty over this matter. Agriculture, as I said a few minutes ago, is in the same situation. I know a lot of farmers who borrowed money for capital investment back—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I must inform you that unless there is unanimous consent, the honourable senator must adjourn his debate. Is it agreed that he may finish?

Senator Murray: Give him an opportunity to complete his thought.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Olson: I will not abuse the courtesy if there is agreement. However, I think we should change the rules as soon as we possibly can.

Senator Frith: We should. You are making good suggestions and Senator Murray is making notes. He will take them all back to cabinet.

Senator Molgat: No doubt they will accept them.

Senator Olson: The conclusion I want to make is rather simple. It all depends on what the government's main interest is when they set up their own monetary and economic policy. The banks have been doing all right under this government. They have had the highest net profits of any period in history when the country was in recession. Can you believe it? It is hard to believe but, up to October 31, 1990-91, the Royal Bank has a net profit of $983 million; the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, $811 million—

Senator Forrestall: Are you criticizing that?

Senator Olson: I am criticizing it because in any economy there are problems with the distribution of the benefits of that economy. For the banks to make these kinds of enormous profits at a time when the rest of the country is in recession means there is something wrong with the management of that economy.

To finish, the Bank of Montreal made profits of $595 million in that same period. That may be good for the banks and the shareholders of the banks, but I am interested in the people who work on the farms, in the lumber industry and the pulp and paper industry.

● (1610)

It should be up to someone else to talk about the fishing industry, but I am also concerned about the difficulties there. Not only have the cod stocks been depleted, but there are other problems caused by the mismanagement of the government.

Senator Simard: What would you do for the poor fishermen?

Senator Olson: I would change the monetary policy so that they are not crippled by debt service charges.

I implore the minister to recommend to his cabinet colleagues that there is something wrong with the monetary policy of this country. People do not dare to borrow money because they do not trust this government and the Bank of Canada, which is responsible to this government, to leave interest rates alone while they are trying to pay off the debt that they have incurred for expansion.

Economists are sitting back waiting for people to start buying automobiles and major appliances. A person who has been crippled with debt overhanging him will not get caught in that situation again, if he can possibly help it. The rank and file of the country has no intention of sinking itself into debt and being caught with 18 per cent to 21 per cent interest on its credit cards. A person will only allow that to happen to him once, because that type of debt is a most debilitating problem.

At the present time, the credit card debt in Canada is at an all-time high of $13 billion. It is interesting to note that approximately 50 per cent of credit card holders pay off the unpaid balance at the end of every month. Therefore, only half of them are paying all these debt service charges. The government apparently does not intend to do anything about that situation. Interest charges on credit cards are still at 18 per cent to 21 per cent.

I implore the government to change its monetary policy so that people can borrow money at a reasonable interest rate. Although interest rates have decreased, people have no confidence and are simply not borrowing. It is the monetary policy, the inconsistency of the government and the mismanagement of the economy that is holding us back from getting out of this recession.

This morning I heard some figures that indicate that in the month of March, the third month of this quarter, the Canadian economy is slipping again. It picked up a little in January and it picked up a little less than 1 per cent in February, approximately .8, but all the scores and marks are not yet in.

Senator Murray: Did you look at the export figures?

Senator Olson: Yes, I looked at the export figures.

Senator Murray: Did you look at the housing start figures?

Senator Olson: Yes. I am also looking at people who need jobs. If a person does not have a job, he or she does not have any income.

Senator Murray: Your point is that the economy has not started moving again?

Senator Olson: No, it has not.

Senator Murray: It has.

Senator Olson: The minister states that it has. He is correct; it moved up approximately 1 per cent in January and the same in February. Is that something great? However, now it appears to be slipping back again and that is unfortunate.

Senator Murray: What is your evidence for that?

Senator Olson: I listen to economists who spend their entire working day looking at these indicators. It would be sad if that happens again.

I asked questions earlier today about whether or not we are to get any response out of this government on the negotiations that are going on in order that people who sell and obtain from sales in the international grain market can look for some relief. I was advised that if the United States and Europe agree, we will get somewhere. However, there is no indication at all that Canada would influence those discussions. We always hear that we have to wait for Europe and the United States. That is not the way the Canadian government used to act. They used to get in there, and they had some influence.

Senator Frith: And every Thursday, Senator Murray got up. You better start doing that.

Senator Olson: Yes, every Thursday.

Senator Murray: You fought against free trade with the Americans. Now you are fighting free trade with the Americans and the Mexicans.

Senator Olson: The Leader of the Government in the Senate should make a speech and explain what is going on.

I hope all honourable senators opposite, especially the minister, will realize the damage that they have done to the Canadian economy and try to change their view. Is it just for the benefit of the financial institutions that the government is running the monetary policy? They are the ones that are winning, there is no doubt about that. What about trying to run it in such a way that the average Canadian gets some economic benefit out of the monetary policy?

Senator Murray: We presently have the lowest inflation in 20 years.

Senator Olson: Together with the highest unemployment rate, the most misery and the largest number of food banks.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, April 8, 1992

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE ECONOMY

CONTINUING RECESSION—EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, you must have seen today the bad news about the recession continuing and the statements that continue to come from business people, other than the president of the Bank of Montreal, the economists who make fat livings doing research for business people and journalists who work for newspapers that have been bought by business people—all of whom try to tell us that Keynesian measures to stimulate the economy and end a recession do not work, despite the historical evidence that they do.

If a lie is repeated often enough or long enough, it is soon believed by a large number of people. In the long run this besmirching of legitimate economic techniques for bringing relief to those who suffer in a recession may be the most destructive thing that people of the Tory philosophy will have done to this country, to the United States, and to other western countries.

You and your friends have a very heavy burden to bear—a burden of guilt.

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the reading of the election clock is as follows. For today, Wednesday, April 8, 1992, following Senator Murray's test as before, the respecters of democracy have 227 days in which to call an election. The cowards who are contemptuous of democracy have 613 days left.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Wednesday, April 8, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

TENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-12, An Act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, December 5, 1991, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendments, but with observations.

Some Committee members have doubts about the implementation, rather than the intent, of this bill. For a variety of reasons, they have expressed concerns about the effectiveness of the Bill and whether it would realistically achieve the goals set out by the Minister.

Concerns were also expressed about the lack of uniformity in the potential administration of Bill C-12, together with discrepancies both in judicial interpretations of the Bill and in the rehabilitative programs implicit in the Bill.

Some members of the Committee also expressed concern about whether there was adequate funding for rehabilitative programs, and whether they were sufficiently addressed in Bill C-12. In particular, it was noted that prevention of youth crime can only be addressed by social programs which are preventative rather than justice programs which are, by their very nature, either regulatory or punitive.

Since these concerns are largely outside the scope of this particular Act, however, we have decided to address them in a letter to the Minister, which is attached to this Report.

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: At the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, before we adopt the motion on this report, I had understood that I was to get a copy of some figures before the report was to be presented. Also I would like to say that I read in the Toronto Star—

Senator Petten: A good paper.

Senator Bonnell: —of April 8 the following:

> A new law that would increase the jail sentence for convicted teenage killers to a five-year maximum could be in place by the end of the week, Justice Minister Kim Campbell says. A Senate committee last night approved a clause-by-clause review of amendments to the Young Offenders Act that would increase the maximum penalty from the current three-year maximum.

In other words, to five years. I do not think that article is correct, and before proceeding to third reading, I would like the chairman of the committee to give an explanation to the Senate correcting this statement in the Toronto Star.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Bonnell, according to rule 98 (4), you are out of order. You can speak on the matter at third reading, but this is not the time.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I do not know what the order says or what the Speaker is saying, but I understand this: A motion was introduced in this house that a bill be read a third time tomorrow. That motion was seconded and the Speaker asked if there was agreement. I got up to state whether or not I agreed. What is the sense of asking me whether I agree or not if I cannot say a word? There is something wrong here.

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, it is quite clear by the rules that a report presented to the Senate shall be received without debate. The honourable gentleman was debating.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): That is not the point at all. Of course the report is accepted; it is presented without amendment and it is therefore adopted without debate. Then the rules say that the sponsor shall move a motion as to when the bill shall receive third reading. A motion was made. The motion was that the bill be considered at third reading tomorrow. That motion is before the house—not the acceptance of the report but the motion as to when the bill should get third reading. That motion was then put to us, and it is before us. We were asked whether we approved. Senator Bonnell wants to speak to that motion, and he is entitled to do so. He is not speaking to the report.

Senator Doody: No.

Senator Frith: Yes. Why is that so hard to follow?

Senator Olson: Because they want to get their own way all the time.

Senator Frith: The Speaker rose and asked when the bill should receive third reading. Quite properly, the sponsor, Senator Di Nino, moved a motion. The motion is that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading debate tomorrow. That is the motion before us. That is the motion that Senator Bonnell is speaking to, not to third reading of the bill, and not to the report. He is perfectly in order. He is only asking that when the bill comes up for third reading, certain information be furnished.

Senator Olson: Why can't you get that straight?

● (1410)

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators—Senator MacDonald included, who is there with his hands open saying "hallelujah!"—why don't you let me have the floor and stop interrupting me.

Honourable senators, I am not looking to hold the bill up. I am not against the report of the committee. I do not want to hold the bill up so we cannot have third reading tomorrow—

Senator Doody: Speak on third reading.

Senator Bonnell: I am trying to.

Senator Doody: This is not third reading.

The Hon. The Speaker: Honourable Senator Bonnell, you are not debating the motion, you are debating the bill. That can be done on third reading, but not at the present time.

Senator Frith: He is not doing that.

The Hon. The Speaker: That is what the rule states.

Senator Frith: He is asking for information. We have a motion before us that third reading debate take place tomorrow. That is the motion Senator Bonnell is speaking to. He is asking the Chairman of the committee, or someone, to provide certain information for debate tomorrow. That is perfectly in order on the motion to have third reading tomorrow.

Honourable senators, all the Chairman needs to do—which I expect he will do—is state that he will try to get that information so it is there for us tomorrow. This request for information is relevant to the motion to have debate tomorrow.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, very briefly, at the committee, information was requested by Senator Bonnell which he was to receive today. He will receive it today; at least that is my understanding.

There is some information that Senator Bonnell read in the Toronto Star. I have not read it. I did not give the information to the Toronto Star. Frankly, most things I read in that newspaper are erroneous. I cannot be held accountable for matters beyond my control. I don't know who gave the paper that information. I am aware of no media people who were at the meeting and I do not know who gave them that information. I regret that Senator Bonnell received erroneous information.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, in order to have the record straight for the Speaker—not for other senators because they understand that I am speaking on the motion—I agree that I will have an opportunity to speak on third reading.

Senator Doody: Senator Frith explained to us that Senator Bonnell rose to ask a question for information from the chairman. Now the honourable senator tells us that he is speaking on the motion.

Senator Olson: You cannot tell us how to ask questions, because you do not know how.

Senator Bonnell: I am speaking on the motion that is before the Senate.

Senator Frith: Senator Bonnell wants to know whether he can vote in favour of the debate taking place tomorrow, because he wants some information provided for use in that debate.

Senator Bonnell: The Speaker asked the senators if they agreed to the motion, which was moved and seconded, that the bill be read the third time tomorrow. That is the motion. I now rise to speak on the motion whether the bill should be read the third time tomorrow or left until next week. I think the bill should be read the third time tomorrow. I agree with that.

The Chairman of the committee promised me that he would provide information, and I should have had it this morning. I do not know when I will receive it—perhaps this afternoon, perhaps next week, but the Chairman has stated I will receive it and I take his word on that.

I am interested in whether tomorrow on third reading the promoter of the bill will contradict the statement that was supposed to have been made by the minister—not by a member of the press who was at a meeting, but by Minister Kim Campbell herself.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Simard: You are reading from the Toronto Star not from the minister's statement.

Senator Bonnell: I am telling you what the press said.

Senator Simard: Who cares about the Toronto Star?

Senator Bonnell: I care. I care about misinformation that goes out to the press because somebody does not have the facts. The minister should have had the facts. The fact is, as far as I understand, these kids who are 16 and 17 years of age can get life imprisonment under the new legislation. That is not five years. It is life. They can come up for parole after five years. They are entitled to a parole hearing.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. Senator Bonnell, you are debating the bill right now, not the motion. You can do that tomorrow at third reading. According to our rules, you are out of order.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I am going to abide by what the Speaker says. I think he is wrong, but I am going to back off for a very simple reason. I want the people of Canada to know these kids are entitled under this new legislation to life imprisonment, not five years as the minister states.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please. We have a motion. Do you wish to speak on the motion, Senator Molgat?

Senator Molgat: I am rising as a result of the—

The Hon. the Speaker: I presume, Senator Molgat, you want to speak on the motion.

Senator Molgat: No. I wish to ask a question, essentially, on what has gone on. In my understanding of our rules, and if I have not understood correctly, I would be happy if someone were to quote the rule, a motion is always debatable with the exception of an adjournment motion. An adjournment motion is not debatable and must be voted on immediately. It seems to me that other motions, being a proposal to the Senate, are debatable motions. A motion that a bill "be read the third time tomorrow" sounds to me like a debatable motion. If it is not—

Senator Frith: Why ask us to approve it?

Senator Molgat: I would like to have the relevant rule outlined to me in that regard. I think we ought to clear it up.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, in the hope of being helpful, and without necessarily drawing a firm conclusion on the matter, let me invite the attention of honourable senators to Rule 63. It states:

> 63. (1) Except as provided elsewhere in these rules, the following motions are debatable:
> (a) substantive motions, except dilatory or procedural motions;
> (b) for the second reading of a bill;

(c) for any amendment, or an amendment to an amendment, to a debatable motion;

(d) for the adoption of a report of a standing or special committee;

(e) for the third reading of a bill;

(f) for instructions to a committee;

(g) for an address to His Excellency the Governor General not merely formal in its character;

(h), for the appointment of a standing or special committee;

(i) for the reference of a question other than a bill to a standing or special committee;.

(j) for the adoption, while in Committee of the Whole, of the motion, clause, section, preamble, title or bill under consideration;

It continues. I do not think I need to read (k), (l)—

Senator Frith: It is helpful. This is clearly a procedural motion, is it not?

Senator Murray: Fine. If my friend—

Senator Frith: Therefore it is debatable.

Senator Murray: No. Except for—

Senator Frith: I thought for a moment we were still allowed to debate some things here. How foolish of me.

Senator Murray: My friend is mistaken. It says:

. . . . the following motions are debatable:

(a) substantive motions, except dilatory or procedural motions;

The Leader of the Opposition correctly identified the motion made by Senator Di Nino as a procedural motion.

Senator Frith: Is it?

Senator Murray: My friend just said it was.

Senator Frith: Do you think it is?

Senator Murray: Yes, I do, as a matter of fact. I think I agree with my friend on that point. The motion—

Senator Frith: Why bother asking us if we approve it if we cannot debate it? What is the point?

Senator Murray: I am not drawing firm conclusions. Rule 63(1) lists all of the debatable motions.

Senator Doody tells me that Rule 98(2) is quite explicit. It states:

A report presented to the Senate shall be received without debate.

● (1420)

Senator Frith: No one is quarrelling with that. I stood up and said that.

Senator Murray: No one is quarrelling with that, the Honourable Senator Frith says.

Senator Frith: I said that before. There is no question about that.

Senator Murray: I invite the attention of my friends to rule 98(4) which states:

When a committee reports a bill without amendment—

Which is the case here.

Senator Frith: Yes, this is exactly the one.

Senator Murray: It continues:

—such report shall stand adopted without any motion, and the Senator in charge of the bill—

That senator is Senator Di Nino in this case.

—shall move that it be read a third time on a future day.

Senator Frith: As I said, that is the perfectly correct cause of action. That is the motion we are discussing.

Senator Murray: The question before us is whether that motion is debatable. I say, and I think the honourable senator agrees, that according to rule 63(1), Senator Di Nino's motion that the bill be read a third time is not debatable.

Senator Frith: Why?

Senator Murray: If you were to read rule 63(1), you would see that it states:

Except as provided elsewhere in these rules, the following motions are debatable:

(a) substantive motions, except dilatory or procedural motions;

I would contend, as Senator Frith does, that this is a procedural motion.

Senator Frith: I do not think it is.

Senator Olson: No way!

Senator Murray: Now the honourable senator has changed his mind.

Senator Frith: I do.

Senator Murray: Because it does not suit your argument.

Senator Frith: No, because it is linked with the word "dilatory".

Senator Murray: And that makes all the difference in the world?

Senator Frith: It does. I see that is a joke to the leader. However, if he were to look at Beauchesne he would see under "dilatory and procedural motions"—

Senator Murray: Sure.

Senator Frith: Don't say "sure"; it is there. I know the very thought that perhaps there is an opportunity for some debate on some motions, such as this one, is a laughing matter under the present rules. However, on reflection, I do not think it is at all clear that this is a procedural motion.

If it is linked with dilatory motions, and if honourable senators were to read any of the authorities, they would find that procedural and dilatory motions are of a certain character. I doubt if we will find that this kind of motion is a procedural motion.

Senator Murray: The moment has passed, I think, when we can—

Senator Frith: When we can have any debate around here? I agree.

Senator Murray: —ask for a ruling on this matter because I think the motion has already been agreed to, but it may come up another—

Senator Bonnell: It hasn't been agreed to.

Senator Murray: Very well, then, I think we have stated the arguments on either side. We will place the matter before the Speaker and ask him to bring in a ruling in due course.

Senator Bonnell: Before that is done, honourable senators, may I read what Senator Murray skipped over when he read rule 63, the one he read so well. It states, "... the following motions are debatable:" Then rule 63(e) states:

> for the third reading of a bill;

The motion that the bill be read a third time tomorrow is what we are debating.

Senator Frith: Anything that does not suit Senator Murray's interpretation, he will laugh about. Senator Bonnell is quite right; let's hear from him.

Senator Murray: "Third reading of a bill" means when we get to the stage where the bill is about to be read for a third time. That is not the motion we are dealing with here.

Senator Bonnell: The motion here is that the bill be read a third time tomorrow.

Senator Murray: No. The motion is that the bill be put on the Order Paper for debate on third reading tomorrow.

Senator Thériault: You are out a mile!

Senator Molgat: In any case, honourable senators, while we are discussing the rules, I am thankful to Senator Doody for having reminded us of the provisions of rule 98(1). It states:

> A report from a select committee shall be presented by the chairman of the committee or by a Senator designated by the chairman.

Rule 98(2) states:

> A report presented to the Senate shall be received without debate.

Senator Doody is quite correct.

Rule 98(4) states:

> When a committee reports a bill without amendment, such report shall stand adopted without any motion, and the Senator in charge of the bill shall move that it be read a third time on a future day.

To show you the inconsistency in these new rules, honourable senators, I take you back to rule 63(1), which states:

> Except as provided elsewhere in these rules, the following motions are debatable:
> (d) for the adoption of a report of a standing or special committee.

[Senator Frith.]

We find two rules which contradict each other.

● (1430)

Senator Murray: Except as provided elsewhere.

Senator Molgat: Then what is the point of saying, "for the adoption of a report?"

Senator Murray: There are reports that do not necessarily deal with legislation. This is a report on a bill.

Senator Frith: We will get a ruling.

Senator Murray: I would ask that some consideration be given by the Chair and its advisors to see where we stand on this matter in due course.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, on a point of order, let us just think this out for one moment. If I were the sponsor of a bill and moved that the bill "be read the third time tomorrow," the Leader of the Government in the Senate could get up and say, "I want to amend that motion. I do not want the third reading until next week." That is debate. That is why that motion is debatable.

I am not saying that the content of the bill is debatable, but the motion that that bill should be read next week or tomorrow or now is debatable. That is common sense for anyone who has sat in any kind of Parliament.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, Hear!

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, if I may, it has been a long time since I have had the opportunity to say a word on a procedural matter—a year as a matter of fact, and I have felt very neglected and isolated. But the honourable senator opposite asked us—and I do not have a direct quotation of his words—to look at it carefully.

Senator Thériault: To take a minute to think about it.

Senator Ottenheimer: Right, to think about it, to apply our minds to it. I will try to follow the honourable gentleman's example.

With respect, I do not think his argument holds water. It has a bit of a leak in the glass, or some might call it a sieve.

Senator Thériault: We tried to punch a hole in it but there is none.

Senator Ottenheimer: The time will come when there will be a motion before the Senate that this bill be now read the third time. That is not today. That is not now. That motion that the bill be now read the third time comes before the Senate at a specific time.

Senator Thériault: And I oppose it.

Senator Ottenheimer: Then if it is voted in the affirmative, it is accepted. If it is voted in the negative, it is rejected. If there is an amendment made to it, then that amendment is either accepted or rejected. But the motion which was made today is not the motion that the bill be now read the third time.

Senator Thériault: You mean tomorrow.

Senator Ottenheimer: It is asking for the concurrence of the Senate, or the decision of the Senate, on whether the question of the third reading of the bill will be put tomorrow.

Senator Frith: Why should that not be debatable?

Senator Ottenheimer: First of all, I am trying to address your honourable colleague's interests, because he stimulated me—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Ottenheimer: I mean intellectually, procedurally—in no other way. But procedurally he stimulated me.

Senator Frith: It is tough to find a place to have fun around here but finally we have found one.

Senator Ottenheimer: I am trying to make the distinction, and I think Senator Frith will agree as well, that there is obviously a difference regarding the motion that a bill "be read the third time now"—whenever that "now" might be. If it is passed, we all know what happens and eventually there is Royal Assent.

The motion with respect to when the bill will be read the third time, voted yea or nay, is obviously quite different, because one could vote for this motion, and there is no Royal Assent. One could vote against the motion and the bill would not be up for third reading tomorrow. That would be the effect.

This specific motion is votable, and I would think there could be a division on it—

Senator Hastings: But it is not debatable.

Senator Ottenheimer: No, I do not think it is debatable. That is the point. It is votable, but that does not mean it is debatable. Every motion is voted on, but not every motion by the very fact of being a motion is necessarily debatable. The distinction essentially is found when you look at the effect of a certain action. When the question before the Senate is, "Shall this bill now be read the third time?", and there is an affirmative vote, the result of that is Royal Assent to bring it into law.

This particular motion before the House is to the effect that the bill be considered for third reading tomorrow. The affirmation of that motion has nothing to do with Royal Assent whatsoever. Probably the simplest, and I think the most obvious, explanation is that, prima facie, it is quite—

Senator Thériault: Debatable.

Senator Ottenheimer: —procedural. The rules say that procedural motions are not debatable. The basic question before the Chair is whether the motion is procedural or not. I thank my honourable friend opposite, because, in his kind invitation that we should bring our minds to bear upon this question, he did give me the opportunity to speak, however briefly, albeit I am sure cogently and to the point, on this very important issue.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, if my honourable friend means what he says, that he was permitted to speak and did so very briefly, I would not want to hear him at length. In fact, honourable senators, it is so simple, it is so much common sense. Parliament is governed by rules and common sense.

I repeat, if I make a motion that a certain bill be read the third time tomorrow, and if the Leader of the Government has any reason why that bill should not be read tomorrow on that motion, he will rise in his place and will explain why it should not be read tomorrow, and that is debate.

Senator Murray: Or vote against it tomorrow.

Senator Thériault: Of course, it is debatable.

Senator Ottenheimer: My honourable friend did not stimulate me that time. I am not going to reply.

Senator Sparrow: Is this motion sickness? Is that what we are talking about?

Senator Bonnell: I have been stimulated for a moment to say that, had I received an answer to my question, we could have saved a great deal of the Senate's time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure then, honourable senators, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate?

Senator Frith: We want a ruling as to whether it is a debatable motion or not.

The Hon. the Speaker: I agree with Senator Ottenheimer, and I have said that before.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Frith: When you talk about stimulation, this is a brand new source of stimulus.

The Hon. the Speaker: I said exactly the same thing before. It is quite clear to me. It is a procedural motion and, therefore, it is not debatable.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, let us make it very clear that we disagree with that ruling. Unless some of my colleagues disagree, I do not feel we should have a standing vote to appeal it. I simply do not want to be confronted in the future with the argument that we accepted that ruling. If the Speaker had taken the time to check the point raised by Senator Murray as to whether this is a procedural motion—because it is not on its face a procedural motion—then I should like to hear the authorities for it.

Senator Murray:: What is it then? Is it a substantive motion?

Senator Frith: It is just a motion. As Senator Murray pointed out, they are all debatable "except". The question is whether this falls within an exception. It is an exception to an exception, really. A substantive motion is defined; a procedural motion is not. A substantive motion is defined in our rules as a motion that stands on its own and is not connected with anything else. I would not think this is a substantive motion, because it is clearly connected with this legislation.

Whether it qualifies under the exception of "procedural" is something which I hoped the Speaker would reserve upon. Frankly, I would be prepared to have the motion carry and the bill dealt with at third reading tomorrow, but also to have the Speaker look into it a little more carefully.

● (1440)

It seems to me that the right basis upon which to hold the motion as being not debatable would be the point raised by Senator Murray. Moreover, I think that the question of whether this is really a procedural motion should be looked into, because there is no definition in the definition section of our rules.

Senator Molgat: I might add, with all due respect to my colleague Senator Ottenheimer, that rulings based on his opinion really do not hold water in this house. There are other authorities which we might consult.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, perhaps that was a slip of the tongue, but I had said exactly what Senator Ottenheimer said. Perhaps I should not have said that I agreed with Senator Ottenheimer. I apologize for that, but I had said the same thing before.

Senator Frith says that it is not a procedural motion. If senators agree, we will do a little research after we adjourn today and I will come back with a statement tomorrow. In the meantime, will senators agree to have third reading tomorrow?

Senator Frith: As long as it is understood that what we want studied is rule 63, and more specifically, the basis upon which this is not a debatable motion under that rule.

On motion of Senator Di Nino, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND FEDERAL POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION AND HEALTH CONTRIBUTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-60, to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-secondary Education and Health Contributions Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): As honourable senators are aware, our standard procedure is that we should follow the Senate rules and not give leave to proceed with bills any more quickly than what the rules provide for. There are very sound reasons for those rules. They are to permit time for preparation and reading between first and second reading. There are some very valid reasons for this procedure and that is the policy that we intend to follow.

Nevertheless, when there are special exceptions, we are prepared to look at the reasons for those exceptions. In this case my understanding is that the provincial governments are anxious to get this legislation passed because, until it passes, there is no possibility of funds moving from the federal government to the provincial governments. We know that this government has been squeezing the provincial governments as it is, and we are not anxious to be part of any further squeezing.

However, from my discussions with the Deputy Leader, it is my understanding that if we do give leave today, we will proceed tomorrow to Committee of the Whole, at which time we would have the responsible minister present to answer questions. On that understanding, and on the basis that the provinces are anxious to get this legislation, I would be prepared to give leave on this one occasion, on the understanding that there will be opportunity for speeches later this day and also tomorrow, if required, before we proceed to Committee of the Whole.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: That is agreed.

Senator Molgat: And on the understanding also that there will be no pressure by the government to proceed with any further bills, and that there will be no further bills coming from the House of Commons this week.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Did we receive a response from the Deputy Leader of the Government to the questions asked by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The schedule which Senator Molgat has outlined is the one we discussed earlier; that is, that we would ask for leave to go to second reading today and into Committee of the Whole tomorrow and hear either the Minister of Finance or the Minister of State for Finance, depending upon which one is available. As far as I know, there is no further new legislation coming here this week, but if there is, there will be no pressure put on anyone to have it passed quickly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, and bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

PRIVATE BILL

NORTHWEST CANADA CONFERENCE EVANGELICAL CHURCH—BILL TO AMEND ACT OF INCORPORATION—FIRST READING

Hon. H.A. Olson moved that Bill S-9, an Act to amend the Act of incorporation of the Northwest Canada Conference Evangelical Church, be read the first time.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by Hon. Senator Neiman, that this bill be read the second time on Tuesday, April 14, 1992.

This is a very short bill calling for an amendment to one section of the church's present charter, and to a second clause to give a French name to the church.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Senator Olson, seconded by Senator Neiman, that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, April 14, 1992.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, and bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday, April 14, 1992.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CORRECTION TO NOTICE OF MOTION IN MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS

On Notices of Motions:

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, yesterday I gave notice of a motion. That notice of motion does not appear in correct terms in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate at page 9, notice no. 34. However, the notice that I gave yesterday does appear accurately at page 1327 of the Debates of the Senate.

I thought I ought to bring this matter to the attention of the Senate because when the motion is called later this day, the motion that will be moved will be the one that I gave yesterday as it appears in the Debates of the Senate, rather than a motion in the terms that appear in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of yesterday's date.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by a number of Canadian citizens protesting the goods and services tax. They are in the same form as those that I have previously presented on behalf of other Canadian citizens protesting the GST. They ask for its repeal and for an immediate election.

Today's petitions come from Ontario, New Brunswick, Alberta, and Quebec. There are 9 from Ontario, with a total of 205 names; 1 from New Brunswick, with 23 names; 1 from Alberta, with 22 names; and 1 from Quebec with 15 names.

The cities from Ontario are Etobicoke, Mississauga and Toronto; from New Brunswick, Fredericton and Saint John; from Alberta, Falher, Girouxville, Rainbow Lake and Valleyview; and from Quebec, Chateauguay, Lemoyne, Longueuil and St-Hubert.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 75 residents of the province of Ontario who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitions are from Willowdale, Toronto, Guelph and Etobicoke.

Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 552 residents of the province of Ontario who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitions are from Etobicoke, Mississauga, Toronto, Scarborough and Oakville, adding up to a grand total of 627 Canadian citizens who took the trouble to sign these petitions, write down their addresses and ask the senators for their help in getting at least books and periodicals exempted from the GST.

This should be of special interest to Senator Chaput-Rolland who is not listening right now but who at the time shared the concerns of writers, journalists, publishers and book sellers. So we have 627 more Canadians, in addition to hundred of thousands who so far have expressed their disagreement with the GST.

[English]

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a number of petitions that have been put together by the Association of Iroquois and Allied Indians of London, Ontario. The people who signed the petitions are from a number of parts of Canada: B.C., Toronto, the Big Cove reserve in New Brunswick and various other places. I did not count the signatures, but they are in the proper form. I expect there are up to 300 names on the petitions.

This group of citizens calls upon the Senate to fulfil its responsibilities to the citizens of the First Nations in Canada by taking immediate steps to rectify the deficiencies of the policy guidelines, including changes which will protect the taxation immunity of First Nation citizens both on and off reserve lands, including those citizens who do not as yet have recognized reserve lands.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

EFFECTS OF GOVERNMENT POLICY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if, today, he would care to take the opportunity to revise some of the impressions he tried to give yesterday with respect to the economy being on the way up. He advised me to have a look at export figures and housing starts.

I brought along a few of today's newspapers. They indicate that the recession's dark clouds linger and that forecasters agree that the condition is getting worse, not better. The forecasters who agree are the OECD, for example, the International Monetary Fund in Washington, and the World Bank. I wonder if the Honourable Minister would not like to adjust the impression he was trying to give yesterday that we are on the way up, when all the experts in the world do not agree with that view?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I indicated yesterday that housing starts had increased by 12 per cent in February.

Senator Olson: Why did you allow money to be taken out of retirement funds?

Senator Murray: As a matter of fact, honourable senators, there were two factors contributing to the increase in housing starts. One, indeed, was the excellent provision in the February budget providing for the use, under certain circumstances, of RRSP funds.

Senator Perrault: A Liberal proposal, by the way.

Senator Murray: I am glad the honourable senator approves of it. The other factor, of course, is the 5 per cent downpayment provided for in an executive decision some time previous to that. People who know the housing industry and are in the housing industry have stated quite flatly that these policies and initiatives by the federal government have been strong contributing factors to the increase in housing starts.

I mentioned exports yesterday. I did not have the figures at my fingertips, but I am glad now to place on the record the fact that exports were up 5.4 per cent in January, the biggest increase in five years. I am sure the honourable senator, who is an optimist by nature, will rejoice in those statistics.

Senator Olson: The impression that the minister was trying to give yesterday, as is clear from reading Hansard, is that the economy is on the way up and is primarily driven by increasing economic activity in our export markets, particularly the United States. Yet, the OECD, the IMF and the World Bank have indicated there is no justification to say that the Canadian economy will improve as a result of increased activity in the world economy.

Honourable senators, I know the minister does not want to mislead Canadians. That is why I thought—

Senator Haidasz: He only believes in Statistics Canada statistics.

Senator Olson: —he should have an opportunity to correct the impression he tried to give yesterday.

Senator Murray: My honourable friend mentioned the OECD and the IMF. The fact is that the OECD, the IMF and the Conference Board of Canada have all forecast that Canada will lead the industrialized countries in economic growth this year.

Senator Haidasz: Who said so?

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Murray: None of those bodies have revised that forecast or have any reason to change it.

TAXATION

"WHERE YOUR TAX DOLLARS GO"—NUMBER AND DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENT PAMPHLET

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have received a number of extremely angry calls from shoppers in the Greater Vancouver Area. I wanted to ask the Leader of the Government questions arising from the protests I have received.

The shoppers allege that a government publication entitled "Where your tax dollars go" is being distributed by the Oakland, California-based Safeway Company through its supermarkets on the lower mainland of Vancouver. I have a copy of the pamphlet here. It says, first of all, that all of our debt problems are because of the preceding government. It says under the program of "Transfers to Persons", honourable senators, that this generous government will ensure that unemployment insurance payments will be $17.2 billion in 1991-92, when, in fact, this government has removed itself entirely from unemployment insurance.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): No, that is not accurate.

Senator Perrault: We know what happened to unemployment insurance, that the burden has been placed on the backs of the workers and the backs of the companies.

This pamphlet boasts about increased child benefits. It says that the GST is designed to help the poor people of Canada.

Senator Haidasz: Who said that, Statistics Canada?

Senator Perrault: The whole thing is a shocking, blatant distortion of the facts. It is not to the credit of this government to issue this kind of tawdry propaganda at this time. It is not even on recycled paper, for heaven's sake! Surely the government has a responsibility to tell the truth.

These are the questions that I ask the Leader of the Government: How many copies of this pamphlet, "Where your tax dollars go", have been printed? How are they being distributed? How many have been dumped in the Safeway stores in the Greater Vancouver Area? Are there any other supermarkets in on this public relations caper? I would like to know that.

● (1500)

Furthermore, how much did this pamphlet cost? We are told that the government wants to save the taxpayer money and help the poor, benighted workers of this country. How much did this pamphlet cost and under whose authority was it distributed? What right does the government have to issue false propaganda? The late, unlamented Pravda matched this level of intellectual integrity.

The pamphlet states:

> After almost two decades in which the debt has grown sharply . . . the tide will turn next year as the economy begins to grow faster than the debt . . . ..

A debt that took decades to build—

It also refers to "this hard-working government", and so on. For heaven's sake, this is nothing but propaganda. Even if the government had suggested that the Official Opposition and other opposition parties should have the same distribution access to the shares owned by this American company, one could say that at least they want all sides to be heard. But this thing flies in the face of the facts. It is almost juvenile in its attempt to persuade shoppers that this government is working in their interests.

Those are my questions. I hope the Leader of the Government has taken them down. First, how many copies were made, and second, where is the distribution taking place?

Incidentally, they have a section in here—and Senator Olson and my other Alberta colleagues will be interested to hear this—where they are saying, in effect, that they are working to make the rich provinces pay their "fair share". It mentions "rich provinces". It mentions Alberta and B.C. as rich provinces. The pamphlet also states that they have restrained the salaries for senators. That is one of the claims that is being made for the government. Well, they are certainly doing that.

The pamphlet also states:

> Equalization funding helps lower-income provinces to provide public services—including health care and post-secondary education—that are comparable with those in richer provinces. All but three provinces—Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario—receive equalization payments.

Perhaps that phrase slipped into the western edition of this pamphlet and was not meant to be distributed to western readers. It does not say that there is a high level of unemployment in the province of British Columbia and that in some of our communities there is over 40 per cent unemployment. Yet you have capped the Canada Assistance Plan at five per cent. With thousands of people coming in from all over Canada, seeking ways to make a living, the government has been totally unfair in its treatment of the two western provinces in this particular instance.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the honourable senator is mixing up several initiatives. First, there are the equalization payments which do not go—and have not gone for a long time, if they ever went—to the provinces of Alberta, British Columbia and Ontario.

Senator Perrault: I read directly from the pamphlet.

Senator Murray: Yes, I appreciate that.

In the same breath, the honourable senator is discussing a bill which passed in this place within the past week or so, involving a cap of five per cent on annual increases to payments to the provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan, those provinces that are not recipients of equalization.

In the course of his presentation, the honourable senator asked several precise questions. I did not take notes of them but the Hansard reporter has done so. I will see to it that replies are brought in in due course.

Senator Perrault: I have an additional question: Did the government at some point contact Safeway Corporation of Oakland, California and say, "Will you please distribute this government material for us," or did the request come from the California, U.S.-based and owned corporation that they wanted to help distribute materials to assist the government? These are important facts to know.

Whose initiative resulted in these things being located in the information racks in certain supermarkets?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I shall make enquiries as to what the arrangements are for distribution of those materials.

THE CONSTITUTION

BEAUDOIN-DOBBIE REPORT—TELEVISION ADVERTISING—ACCURACY OF REPRESENTATIONS

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. To begin with, this is a follow-up on questions that were asked yesterday by Senator Molgat concerning a television ad that is being aired currently recommending that people phone in and inform themselves of the contents of the Beaudoin-Dobbie Committee Report, the report of the Special Joint Committee of the House of Commons and Senate on a Renewed Canada.

The government leader undertook yesterday to get for Senator Molgat information on the budget, the stations and the frequency with which the commercials are being used. I should like to ask him if he could also provide us with the text of the commercial.

I was watching television last night and the commercial whizzed by. I was somewhat startled to note that it described the report as a unanimous report of the committee. It then went on to list the various points that came out of the committee report on aboriginal rights, distinct society, and other subjects. It also mentioned Senate reform, which caused me to perk up my ears because, as all honourable senators will know, the unanimity of the report was subject to the expressed dissents on various issues contained within it.

This is important on the subject of Senate reform because the Liberal members of that committee very explicitly made a dissenting comment on a critically important section of those recommendations. That section concerned references to the effectiveness of the Senate and a recommendation by the committee that, in the case of a deadlock on normal bills, the House of Commons should be able to override a Senate veto.

The dissent from the Liberal members was quite specific, which is what caused me anxiety in seeing this advertisement on television last night. Just to make it clear again on the record of this house, I should like to read the three pertinent paragraphs from the report of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, which specifically note:

> The Liberal members of the Committee believe that a fundamental objective of Senate reform is to provide a more effective control of the Executive.

> The Liberal members of the committee disagree with the majority recommendation concerning the powers of the Senate because of the proposed House of Commons override of a Senate veto of legislation. Such an override will undermine the effectiveness of a reformed Senate.
> Therefore, the Liberal members of the Committee recommend that a reformed Senate be granted an absolute veto on all bills, except for appropriation and budget bills for which a 30 day and a 180 day suspensive veto respectively would apply, after which period the appropriation or budget bill could be passed in the House by a simple majority.

Clearly, this statement in no way falls under the heading of unanimity.

● (1510)

First of all, can the government leader get us the text of that ad so we can have a closer look at it? Secondly, can he perhaps draw to the attention of the people in the federal-provincial affairs office of the Privy Council that this ad, in this instance at any rate, could quite rightly be viewed as misleading.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be glad to obtain a copy of the text of the ad. I recall seeing it. I have no recollection that the ad attributed to any party or honourable senator views that they did not express. My recollection of the ad is that, while it did refer to a unanimous report, it simply mentioned some of the subjects that were dealt with in the report. I hope the drafters were as careful as I am sure they tried to be, but I shall bring it in so that we can both have a look at it and have a further discussion at that time.

BEAUDOIN-DOBBIE REPORT—RELATION TO CONTENT OF NATIONAL REFERENDUM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Thank you. As we all know, with television the perception of the juxtaposition of these statements could in itself create an impression that is not accurate. That leads me to my next point. Again, it centers on the committee report.

I want to ask the government leader a couple of questions about recent statements by the Prime Minister this week regarding his interest in what was a proposal by our party last fall, a national referendum as a means of giving Canadians the opportunity to express themselves on a package that the government presumably will be coming out with shortly after May.

The Prime Minister has been very glowing in his comments about the joint committee report. In fact, he has talked about it as perhaps the most outstanding document on constitutional issues in 125 years. Having heard his comments, one would believe that, in part at least, the package that he and his cabinet will be bringing together and that might form the basis of a referendum question will be influenced by this report that he views so highly.

Therefore, it was with growing concern in the past few days that I noticed comments from both the chairpersons of the joint committee on the work that that committee has produced. On the one hand, Senator Beaudoin himself is reported as saying to journalists that he is now part of a new committee of Conservative members and senators who are looking into improving the report in terms of its approach to Quebec. They have been studying a document that goes over all the interests of Quebec that have been stated since 1936, he said. He added, "We are trying to see how the package can be brought closer to the pulse of Quebec."

I contrast that comment with his co-chair's comments of a few days ago. Mrs. Dobbie talked particularly about the Senate and what the report said about the Senate. She suggested that in any final package Senate reform should be entrenched as essential, but the consultation about it should be put off for a three- to five- year period. To quote from the Globe and Mail of March 27.

> "The parliamentary committee's senate-reform proposals, including elected but proportional representation and limited power, were a throw-away forged in haste and fatique," Mrs. Dobbie said, adding that the committee itself doubted the effectiveness of the proposals.

My question to the government leader in the Senate is really an obvious one. If we are to have a referendum, the contents of that question are of absolutely fundamental importance to every region of this country. Given the comments that have been made about the report, particularly as it refers to Senate proposals, could the government leader assure this house that the views of Mrs. Dobbie and the recommendations as they stand in that committee report, over which she has cast a very dark cloud, will certainly not be the foundation of a referendum question, because, as the honourable leader knows, that will not provide a fair opportunity to people in the regions in the east and west of this country to express themselves in favour of Canada.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, first of all, I believe that the report of the joint committee is an excellent report, and I would have said so had I taken part in the discussion on it in this chamber. The Prime Minister has said, in as many words, that it is an excellent report. We have never regarded it as anything more than another step in a process.

Is the cabinet being influenced by it? Of course we are, as we are being influenced by discussions that are under way principally between Mr. Clark and his provincial counterparts. On the basis of the Beaudoin-Dobbie Report and the discussions with the provinces, we will, at some point before the end of May, I trust, have an official position to put forward on behalf of the government, which, we hope, will also have the support of a good number of provinces and, of course, of a majority of the Canadian people.

As for the referendum, it is true that the idea of a consultation with the Canadian people has been put forth, whether it be by referendum or plebiscite. My friend's political party has advocated that for some months. As I pointed out the other day in the Senate, we had stated our policy in the Speech from the Throne that opened this session, when we said that legislation would be placed before Parliament to provide for a public consultation on these matters. With respect to Mrs. Dobbie's statements, the honourable senator knows that I am not responsible for those. She is not a member of the cabinet. She is quite free to express her personal opinions on these matters, as I am sure she is doing.

As for the question that might be put in a referendum, and indeed whether it is a referendum or plebiscite or some other national consultation, these are matters to which the government is now giving its consideration.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would like to re-emphasize to the Leader of the Government in the Senate that, as he and his colleagues and the Prime Minister are being influenced by the report, may they also be influenced by the context in which one of the co-chairs of the committee has placed significant recommendations concerning Senate reform and the kind of changes that should take place in this Parliament.

● (1520)

If indeed the co-chair of the committee regards these recommendations as a throw-away concluded in haste and fatigue, and that the committee itself did not have confidence in the effectiveness of those recommendations, surely that context must influence the considerations of the Cabinet as it uses this report on which to base some of its conclusions or its suggestions.

Senator Murray: We heard a fair bit during the debate on this report about the presence of haste and fatigue; we heard it from Senator MacEachen in his intervention. Clearly there are contrary views to those expressed by Mrs. Dobbie. My honourable friend expresses some of these contrary views and these, too, will be given every consideration.

FORESTRY

POSSIBLE REMOVAL OF U.S. DUTY ON CANADIAN LUMBER EXPORTS

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, with regard to the serious problems facing our forestry industry in Canada, a report appeared yesterday in the media to the effect that a number of members of the U.S. Congress, moved, as they suggested, by a spirit of generosity, stated that if we would allow Canadian logs to be exported to the United States, they would consider removing the ludicrous and unfair duty which they have slapped on Canadian lumber exports.

Have there been any official communications with the United States regarding this exotic proposal, bearing in mind that the Americans do not allow exports of their own logs?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have not replied in any formal manner to that proposition. Let me simply say that I agree with the honourable senator. Our intention is to fight this matter at the United States Commerce Department and at the International Trade Commission where it now is. We will take it to the GATT, if necessary. We will use the dispute settlement mechanisms of the free trade agreement, if necessary. We intend to fight it and we are confident we will win.

Senator Perrault: I welcome that statement by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is of enormous importance to our industry.

SOUTH AFRICA

REMOVAL OF SANCTIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, on television last night we saw that the Secretary of State for External Affairs—with her attractive new hairdo—had travelled first-class to Cape Town and met Nelson Mandela. She also met with President de Klerk and apparently stated that Canada would not follow the European Community by lifting the embargo on oil and other products.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us why the Canadian government is still waiting to lift the embargo on products to South Africa?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that same question—without the gratuitous, insulting and sexist references to the minister's hairdo—was put by another senator yesterday, and I answered it.

The answer to the question, in short, is that we are not removing sanctions until the criteria established by the Commonwealth nations some months ago are fully respected.

MACEDONIA

RECOGNITION OF INDEPENDENCE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: While the Secretary of State for External Affairs was in Cape Town, we also heard that Canada has approved the independence of Bosnia-Herzegovina and will be exchanging diplomatic relations with that country.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us why the government has still not approved the request from Macedonia for diplomatic recognition of its independence?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will ask for a status report on that matter from my colleague.

NATIONAL FINANCE

RELATION OF INTEREST RATES TO NATIONAL DEBT SERVICE CHARGES

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, Mr. Don Drummond, who is the Director of Fiscal Policy with the federal Department of Finance, has said that there is room in the Canadian economy for further declines in short-term interest rates. He states:

> We do think that there is further scope for interest rates to fall.

He went on to explain that he did not know whether this would happen with interest rates, a decline in the Canadian dollar, or a combination of both.

I would ask the minister if he could give a commitment that the government will stay out of the way and let those declines take place, in order that the debt service charges paid by many Canadians can go down?

Senator Simard: And inflation go up.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Bank of Canada is the monetary authority in this country.

Senator Olson: Is it not responsible to the government?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator knows what the provisions are of the act. He also knows that the Bank of Canada intervenes to ensure a steady and stable market.

What the official from the Department of Finance was referring to, I am sure, is the encouragement that we received from recent experience in this connection: Interest rates have declined in the last three weeks; the bank rate, which fell another 8 basis points last week, has dropped more than 40 basis points in the last three weeks; short-term interest rates have fallen more than 6.5 percentage points since May 1990. Inflation was 1.7 per cent in February, one of its lowest levels in 20 years and, as I have pointed out on many occasions, the lowest rate of inflation among all the major industrialized countries.

What the official from the Department of Finance was stating, in a quite dispassionate and non-political way, is that the government is on the right track.

Senator Olson: I thank the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate for the information. However, the question was: Will the government stay out of the way and let those declines take place?

Senator Murray: The recent experience should surely encourage the honourable senator.

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions.

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday, April 9, 1992, I will move:

> That, the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology have the power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matters of bills and estimates as are referred to it.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to three questions from four senators—the same question was asked twice on March 17 and 18 by Senator Frith and Senator Fairbairn regarding the Court Challenges Program: a question asked by Senator Kenny regarding Wood Buffalo National Park on March 24; and one by Senator Marsden on April 7 regarding the Copyright Act.

[Senator Olson.]

JUSTICE

CANCELLATION OF COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Response to question raised by the Hon. Royce Frith on March 17, 1992 and by the Hon. Joyce Fairbairn on March 18, 1992)

April 2, 1992

Dear Ms. Wilson:

Thank you for your correspondence expressing your concerns about the termination of the Court Challenges Program.

The responsibility for the Court Challenges Program rests with the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship. The role of the Department of Justice is to provide policy and legal advice to the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, as it does to all other Government departments, when requested to do so.

In times of fiscal restraint, difficult and unpopular decisions must be made by governments. It is with regret that this government announced its decision to terminate the Court Challenges Program.

Please be assured that, as Attorney General of Canada, I will continue to monitor federal legislative and regulatory proposals to ensure their compliance with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedom.

Thank you for taking the time to bring your concerns to my attention.

Yours sincerely,

A. KIM CAMPBELL

WORLD CONSERVATION

WOOD BUFFALO NATIONAL PARK—ENVIRONMENTAL EFFECTS OF BENNETT DAM

(Response to question raised by Hon. Colin Kenny on March 24, 1992)

A recent study identifies Bennett Dam as the major, but not sole, factor contributing to a drying trend in the Peace-Athabasca Delta. A re-charging of the delta can occur naturally through a major Peace River flood or a major ice jam on the Peace River, such as that which occurred at the Town of Peace River in February 1992; otherwise, a gated control structure on the outlet of Lake Athabasca would be needed. Environment Canada staff, in cooperation with other federal and provincial government agencies and local residents, are continuing analysis of hydraulic and biological changes and their causes. A study of potential mitigating measures will be initiated later this year.

Presently, there are no discussions taking place with B.C. Hydro regarding the Peace-Athabasca Delta. Discussions are underway with the Government of British Columbia with respect to a Mackenzie River Basin Master Agreement. If an agreement is reached, the delta is certainly an area that could be addressed.

COPYRIGHT

STATUS OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorna Marsden on April 7, 1992)

The drafting process has begun on legislation regarding changes to the Copyright Act. Because of the complex nature of the proposed legislation, public consultations are taking place as the bill is being drafted.

This process, while necessary, is delaying the introduction of the legislation into Parliament. At this time, it is not possible to accurately predict when it will be introduced.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1992-93

THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody moved the third reading of Bill C-61, an Act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing on April 1, 1992.

Hon. Fernand Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, I am not concerned about the substance of Bill C-61, but I simply want to draw your attention to the fact that in the other place, a royal recommendation accompanied the bill at the first reading stage.

Bill C-61 authorizes the government to borrow money. It is not about the appropriation of funds. The royal recommendation which accompanied the bill reads as follows:

> His Excellency the Governor General recommends to the House of Commons the appropriation of public revenue under the circumstances, in the manner and for the purposes set out in a measure entitled "An Act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing on April 1, 1992.

However, no appropriation of public revenue is required for the purposes set out in the bill. In fact, interest payments on the amounts to be borrowed are statutory expenditures that do not require appropriation. All administrative or other spending that is not statutory and which is associated with the issue of securities or bonds is covered by the Estimates of the Department of Finance.

Honourable senators are aware that in February 1990, the National Finance Committee tabled a report in the Senate under the heading: The Form of the Royal Recommendation. In its report, the committee said that the form used since 1968, and I quote:

> . . . .does not serve to make clear what, if any appropriations the ministers are seeking by bills tp which royal recommendations are appended.

This comment appears at page 7 of our report.

When he appeared before the committee on Thursday, April 2, to defend Bill C-61, the Minister of State (Finance and Privatization) and his officials were at a loss to explain why the bill was accompanied by a royal recommendation on first reading.

In 1989, when our committee considered the matter of these recommendations, the Chief Legislative Counsel of the Department of Justice, who had been invited to appear before the committee, admitted that he and his colleagues tended to err on the side of safety when they had to decide whether a royal recommendation was necessary in the case of a particular bill. It seems that in the case of Bill C-61, officials once again "erred on the side of safety" since I doubt this bill should have been accompanied by a royal recommendation.

Nevertheless, these comments should not be seen as grounds for rejecting the bill on third reading.

Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I should like to take the opportunity provided by the Borrowing Authority Bill, 1992-93, to revive a subject which I have dealt with on earlier occasions, namely Canada's foreign indebtedness and its significance to the management of the economy. In fact, what I have to say might assist honourable members in reaching a conclusion for themselves on the question posed a moment ago by Senator Olson asking the Leader of the Government whether the government would have the latitude to permit, without intervention, decreases in the interest rates. I will argue that the growth of our foreign indebtedness, and particularly the growth of borrowing abroad by governments in Canada, has a considerable significance for the management of the economy and also for the assurance with which one can approach the inevitability and the reliability of future decreases in interest rates.

I am sure honourable members will have forgotten that on April 9 last year I spoke on the third reading of Bill C-93, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods and Related Agreements Act, and on that occasion I expressed concerns over Canada's growing international indebtedness.

Honourable members may also have forgotten that my concern went back as far as 1989, when I raised the subject based upon facts contained in a government publication entitled Canada's Economic Prospects for the 1990s. That document brought to our attention the fact that Canada's international indebtedness, its gross national debt, was estimated to have risen to over 38 per cent of gross domestic product in 1988 from 35 per cent in 1985. At the end of 1991, Canada's net liability position reached $270 billion, or almost 40 per cent of GDP. The gross foreign liability position or indebtedness was $490 billion, or 72 per cent of GDP. These figures are considerably worse than the ones I estimated last year.

The Bank of Canada figures on the capital account reveal net increases of Canadian liabilities to nonresidents rising from $24.8 billion in 1986 to $34.2 billion in 1989, to $32.7 billion in 1990, and to $32 billion in the first three-quarters of last year. That is according to the Bank of Canada Review, February, 1992. Honourable senators will note these are net increases in liabilities.

As I said in my speech of last April 9, the use of foreign capital to finance economic investment in Canada is a positive feature of our history. However, as I pointed out at the same time, the trend has been for direct investment to decline relative to portfolio investment, for re-invested earnings to decline relative to new direct investment, and for new business and expansion to decline relative to foreign acquisition. I hope these trends which amount to a deterioration of the quality of foreign investment in Canada are being reversed; however, I have not found any evidence to justify that conclusion.

Looking, for instance, at transactions with nonresidents for the past three years both in Canadian bonds and in Canadian stocks, one is struck by the imbalance between the two of them. The net purchase of Canadian bonds by nonresidents amounted to $17.2 billion in 1989, $13.4 billion in 1990, and a whopping $26.4 billion in 1991.

● (1540)

The equivalent figures for Canadians stocks are particularly interesting when one puts them in the face of the figures I have mentioned for bonds. The equivalent figures are as follows: $3.8 billion in 1989; minus $1.7 billion in 1990; and minus $1.0 billion in 1991. In brief, nonresidents in the past two years have been selling out Canadian stocks while making massive purchases of Canadian bonds.

Let me add to these figures transactions with nonresidents on money market paper so as to give you a global view of transactions with foreigners in Canadian securities. The figure for 1989 is a $22.3 billion inflow; for 1990, $17.2 billion; and for 1991, a total inflow of $29.2 billion.

Let me complicate the picture by adding another aspect. These transactions in Canadian securities with foreigners should also be seen in the light of transactions by Canadians which are generating an outward flow of capital. My attention was caught, honourable senators, by a Bank of Nova Scotia report mentioned in the Financial Post of March 23 of this year, according to which Canadians shifted out of Canada $8.4 billion of their savings into liquid assets last year—four times the 1990 amount. Of these $8.4 billion, some $4.8 billion moved into foreign stocks, prompted, according to the bank, by the comparatively weak corporate earnings performance in Canada. Almost $1 billion went into foreign bonds, and some $2.5 billion moved into bank deposits which, again according to the bank, "... may reflect the opening of accounts by the growing number of firms which have moved their operations south of the border."

[Senator MacEachen.]

Whatever analysis one applies, one must admit that $8.4 billion is a considerable movement of capital into stocks and bank deposits by Canadians in a single year.

I leave it to senators, many of whom are quite competent, to speculate on the causes of such significant movements in Canada's international transactions in securities. However, I venture to say that the level of interest rates, interest rate differentials and the prospects for the Canadian economy are matters which presumably weigh on the minds of foreign investors.

I should add that in order to pass a considered judgment it is also appropriate to look at the share of those inward movements of foreign capital which is absorbed by government sector financing. How much of the inflow of capital is being used up in Canada by governments, including the provincial governments and the federal government?

As we know, the financial resources going to the government sector are used to finance current or past consumption, and are therefore sterile in terms of economic development. Their medium- and long-term effect is to pile up foreign indebtedness.

One would have to examine also what inflow, if any, of this foreign capital absorbed by provincial governments was used for capital investment. I do not know what that could be, but it is certainly not, in the case of the Government of Canada, used for capital investment.

Last April, I drew attention to the fact that the share of foreign savings used to offset the government sector deficit has been climbing in recent years. We are using in Canada the savings of foreigners to offset government deficits, and that has been climbing. Expressed as a percentage of the GDP, it was 1.7 per cent in 1988; 2.9 per cent in 1989; and 3.3 per cent in 1990. It is expected to be 3.8 per cent in 1991.

Just to put these last two figures into perspective, the government in its 1989 publication entitled, "Canada's Economic Prospects in the 1990s", predicted a figure of 1.7 per cent for 1990. That was quite wrong. As I just indicated, it turned out to be 3.3 per cent.

Also predicted was an average of 1 per cent for 1991-94 which hardly seems to be achievable now. Obviously, the trend has not yet been turned around, and the government has not improved its credibility in the eyes of foreign investors by making such wild predictions which, in this sector, as in others, have turned out to be wrong.

I also believe, honourable senators, that the trend is confirmed by figures on net transactions with non-residents in Canadian bonds for both the government sector as a whole and for the Government of Canada. In the last three years, transactions with non-residents by the total government sector amounted to $11.6 billion in 1989, something which I talked about several years ago. It was $11.2 billion in 1990; and an extraordinary $24 billion in 1991. The total government sector in 1991 drew in $24 billion in the form of savings of foreigners—not Canadians—in order to finance its operations, to put it generally.

For the Government of Canada alone, the figures are $9.8 billion in 1989; $6.8 billion in 1990; and $6 billion in 1991. If we compare this last set of figures on Government of Canada transactions with the net capital inflow on the capital account of the balance of payments, we can see that the share of federal borrowing abroad accounted for 39 per cent of the total net inflow of capital in 1989. The share declined to 24 per cent in 1990, and to 17 per cent in 1991.

The available figures for last year are the most striking, as they indicate a huge surge in foreign borrowing by levels of government other than the federal government. The total volume is $24 billion. Of course, this raises a number of questions to which I will return in a moment.

I should point out now that with federal government financial requirements, that is, the amount of money which the Government of Canada must raise in order to finance its shortfalls in any year, amounting to $21.6 billion in 1991-92 and $19.7 billion in 1992-93, about a third to half of these requirements are likely to be met by foreign borrowing if the present pattern is maintained.

● (1550)

If we take the year with the largest federal government exposure, which I think was close to $9.8 billion, and in that year, if the deficit were $30 billion which it roughly turned out to be, then we were financing one-third of the deficit by foreign borrowings—by the savings of foreigners, not by the savings of Canadians, which is a different matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, according to our rules, the time is up. As usual, if you want to extend the courtesy to Senator MacEachen, you may grant leave for him to continue. Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator MacEachen: By way of summation, honourable senators, I have so far dealt with Canada's liabilities to foreigners by looking at inward and outward flows of capital starting with figures from the capital account of the balance of payments and breaking them down into their various components to bring out, in particular, the share absorbed by the government sector and by the Government of Canada, because I thought that the government sector would be of particular interest to honourable senators.

I would want to conclude this overview with a few additional figures on outstanding foreign liabilities, or, in other words, the stock of debt resulting from cumulative yearly flows. My figures come from the Statistics Canada publication entitled, "Canada's Investment Position in 1991" which became available last week.

At the end of 1991, Canada's gross liabilities were estimated to reach $490 billion. That is close to half a trillion dollars, which represents 72 per cent of GDP.

Canada's international assets were estimated to reach $220 billion at the end of 1991. Canada's net liability position—that is, its gross liability position less international assets—was $270 billion based on book value. As I pointed out earlier, this is almost 40 per cent of gross domestic product.

Whichever way we look at it, we have to conclude that Canada has joined the ranks of the most heavily indebted countries in the world.

Let me put these startling figures in perspective by giving you some corresponding figures, let's say, for 1983. Canada's gross international liability position was under $250 billion; its net liability position was under $100 billion. With a balance of payments surplus on current account, we were actually reimbursing foreign indebtedness.

Let me refer to the statement that was made in the government publication in 1989 on this point, in which they said that at the present time they were borrowing heavily abroad, not only for other reasons but for government operations. Last year it was in the amount of well over $20 billion.

In an earlier period, according to this document, the level of net private domestic savings was, in fact, high enough not only to finance government deficits but also to turn Canada into a net supplier of funds to the rest of the world. That is, Canadian excess savings flowed to other countries. The current account was in surplus. That is why I say, with a balance of payments surplus on current account, we were actually reimbursing our foreign indebtedness. That, of course, has changed. In eight years, our foreign debt has roughly doubled.

The picture is even more disquieting if one looks at the composition of that foreign debt. In 1985, the first full year of Conservative government, direct foreign investment in Canada amounted to $87 billion. In 1991, direct foreign investment amounted to $125 billion, an increase of $38 billion. Considering that this is the most productive form of investment, one should describe this increase as quite modest. Let me contrast this figure with figures of stocks, bonds, and other debts of corporations and governments held by nonresidents.

In 1985, the liability position under this heading amounted to about $127 billion. In 1991, the corresponding figure was $282 billion, an increase of $155 billion, which is by no means modest. The increase in government foreign liabilities tells the story. In 1985, government sector liabilities held by nonresidents amounted to $63.8 billion; in 1991, the amount reached over $154.6 billion, a $91 billion increase, more than double the increase in direct foreign investment. The total federal liability increased from $27 billion in 1985 to $82 billion in 1991, an increase of $55 billion in eight years.

Maybe at this point it is appropriate to quote the following observation from the 1990 budget papers:

> Government deficits increase our liabilities to foreigners and lower our prospective standard of living.

That is so because we not only have to pay an annual service payment on this federal government liability of $82 billion in 1991, but at a certain point, we have to pay off the principle. That has quite a different effect on the economy and on Canada than a debt held in Canada in which the service payment is paid to Canadians and in which the principle itself is paid to Canadians. That is why, in the government's 1990 budget papers, the document states, "Government deficits increase our liabilities to foreigners and lower our prospective standard of living."

In his analysis of the budget, the Leader of the Government stated that the fundamentals were right, that because interest rates are decreasing and because inflation has decreased, we are fundamentally and solidly based for a strong recovery. I believe that the Leader of the Government has overlooked a number of other items in the equation which question very seriously the assertion that the fundamentals are right.

● (1600)

Some of the fundamentals are not right. In my view the Canadian economy is highly vulnerable and the government has not addressed some of the basic imbalances that were building up in the second half of the 1980s. We know that the fiscal and monetary policy pursued by the government brought the economy to a halt and that monetary and fiscal policy is not contributing very much to recovery. We know that the fiscal policy has failed to break the back of recurring budget deficits at levels which the former Minister of Finance himself recognized as being unsustainable. In the meantime, the government has added to the problem by building up very sizeable foreign indebtedness on its own accounts. In my view the result, namely its proclaimed achievements—lower interest rates and inflation rates—may rest on a very fragile foundation. A combination of lower interest rates, a sagging recovery, persistent budget deficits and an overhanging external debt of growing magnitude will drive down the value of the Canadian dollar. This indeed has already occurred.

At some point the Bank of Canada will have to decide whether, with a depreciating exchange rate, inflation is being imported at an unacceptable rate. If so, the interest rate will have to be raised to keep on target with inflation. Or the interest rate may have to be raised to defend the Canadian dollar and to keep up an adequate flow of foreign savings into Canada given the dependence of the government sector. A higher interest rate, for whatever reason, will hurt recovery.

We have, in my view, been very fortunate that the Canadian dollar has not yet been targeted for international speculation. I leave it to you to judge for yourself the contribution which a massive inflow of more than $29 billion of foreign savings must have made to slow down the move of the Canadian dollar toward a lower exchange rate. Twenty-nine billion dollars flowing into the country each year requiring the purchase of Canadian dollars would have no effect except to strengthen the Canadian dollar and militate against a lower exchange rate. I also leave to you to judge the significance of an $8.4 billion outward flow of Canadian savings in 1991. That is just last year. Given the speed at which capital moves internationally, I think that these flows deserve our attention. And that is all I am trying to do. I am trying to attract attention and maybe provoke some debate on what all of this means for Canada, because it is a change. Our reliance on foreign borrowing, particularly in the government sector, in the last eight years, shall I say, has to be recognized and we are justified in asking a few questions on the management by the government of Canada's fast growing international indebtedness.

[Senator MacEachen.]

One question that occurred to me as I looked at this problem is why the government financed such a large share of its budget deficit out of foreign savings rather than domestic savings. Why did we go abroad to borrow so much? Was it to reduce its own access to our domestic money market under pressure from the private sector? Did the private sector say, "Leave Canadian savings to us and you go a broad"? What was the reasoning behind the government's activity? Did it have a choice? Was it the attraction of interest rates abroad? Was it to help the Governor of the Bank of Canada defend the Canadian dollar or maintain a high exchange rate? Was it a byproduct of the government's high interest rate policy? Is the Governor of the Bank of Canada happy with what he describes in the bank's 1991 annual report as "the widening appetite around the world for investments in Canadian dollars"? Is he happy with that, especially when most of it is in the form of non-direct investment in the form of bonds and so on?

These are some quite interesting questions. Is the Government of Canada concerned with the recent spectacular accumulation of foreign debts by other levels of government in Canada? Why are the other levels going abroad for the billions and billions of dollars? Is that good? Does the government think it is good? Has it provided any leadership? Has the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance suggested to the provinces that they talk about this and discuss whether it is a good thing or a bad thing and how they are going to discharge their obligations in the future?

I sense that we have a problem building up here but I do not have the answers to these questions. I hope that they are available and that they can be made available so that we can have a better understanding of what goes on.

We are all aware of the importance of consumer and foreign investment confidence as key factors in Canadian economic recovery. I am not going to add to the problems by making gloomy forecasts, but I have raised signals in the Senate about this growing foreign indebtedness. I have searched the documents put out by the Minister of Finance and I did not find a word on this great upsurge in government sector borrowing abroad last year. Why did it come about and why is it being sustained? Certainly my comments have gone unheeded and the result is that our fiscal policy has become increasingly immobilized as an instrument of sound macro-economic management and that pending an upturn in the world economy, the Canadian economy has to adjust in the worst possible circumstances with the economic, social and human costs all too familiar to us.

Out of sensitivity to those who have given me extra time, I will conclude at that point and say that I would like to make some further comments on some other aspects of the economic situation under another heading.

I do invite honourable senators to look at some of the comments which I have made. If I have fallen into error I would like to be shown the error of my ways, which would reduce some of the apprehension I feel about certain aspects of the Canadian situation today, particularly what the future holds in view of our growing indebtedness abroad, especially in the government sector.

● (1610)

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Senator MacEachen, I have a brief question, because trying to keep track of your statistics is difficult. Do you have any figures which refer to government sector borrowing abroad, federal versus provincial? Did that pass me by somewhere? Did you give those figures?

Senator MacEachen: Yes, I have given the global government sector borrowing abroad, and I have broken that down to give the federal government sector. Both of those figures were in my statement.

Senator MacDonald: Are they readily available? Could you repeat those?

Senator MacEachen: In the last three years, the total government sector amounted to $11.6 billion in 1989, $11.2 billion in 1990, and $24 billion in 1991. For the Government of Canada, the comparable figures for each of those years are $9.8 billion, $6.8 billion and $6 billion. When you compare $6 billion with $24 billion, you see what a great explosion there has been in borrowing abroad by the non-federal government sector. It is all part of our foreign indebtedness.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Quebec Hydro is a major borrower.

Senator MacEachen: If it were all capital development, one would have less concern, but I have not been able to figure that out yet.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND FEDERAL POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION AND HEALTH CONTRIBUTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved second reading of bill C-60, to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act.

He said: Honourable senators, there are two major sections to Bill C-60: Equalization renewal and improvement of tax administration. I want to touch on each one separately and briefly, beginning with equalization renewal.

The commitment to equalization payments exists so as to enable provincial governments to provide reasonably comparable levels of public services at reasonably comparable levels of taxation. In 1992-93, the government will provide about $8.5 billion in equalization for the less wealthy provinces.

In renewing the equalization program, this bill provides a number of improvements, especially when one considers the federal government's fiscal position. These improvements are worth over $400 million to the provinces in the current fiscal year. Of this, roughly $200 million would be ongoing and $200 million would be a one-time benefit.

There are four components of the renewal package made possible by this bill. First, the equalization program is renewed for two years; second, improvements will be made in a measurement of fiscal capacity; third, the equalization ceiling will be re-based; and finally, a technical irritant related to the interaction of equalization and another federal transfer program—the Established Programs Financing, known as EPF—will be eliminated. The effect of this irritant has been to reduce payments to the have-not provinces under EPF. All the affected provinces will be compensated retroactively for revenues they have foregone, and this bill will ensure that the situation does not recur.

This bill renews the equalization program for a two-year period rather than for five years. The two-year extension period will provide impetus and flexibility for further changes in the context of the ongoing review of the three major transfers to provinces. These transfers are Established Programs Financing and the Canada Assistance Plan, as well as equalization.

I will now deal with tax administration. The bill contains measures that will facilitate the administration and enforcement of federal taxes by provinces and vice versa. Examples of the kind of arrangements that these measures are aimed at facilitating are the administration of the federal goods and services tax by provinces and the collection of provincial sales taxes at the U.S. border by federal customs officials. So far, only Quebec has agreed to the tax harmonization that makes such arrangements possible, but it is hoped, naturally, that other provinces will follow suit.

In addition, these amendments will simplify remittance and banking arrangements when administration agreements are entered into. For example, in cases in which a province administers a federal tax, a taxpayer will be able to make out a single cheque to the province covering both federal and provincial tax. The agreements can cover income taxes or sales taxes. These kinds of arrangements ensure better and more efficient administration of taxes and thereby contribute to a better tax system.

This bill provides for a fair and generous renewal of the equalization program while maintaining fiscal responsibility. In addition, by facilitating the mutual administration of taxes between the federal and provincial governments, the tax measures will contribute to improving the country's tax system as a whole.

The provinces are on side with regard to equalization renewal and improvement, and I believe all Canadians are very supportive when it comes to making tax administration simpler, more effective and less costly.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, Bill C-60 was introduced on February 20 in the House of Commons, and yet the vote on this bill did not take place until last night. Once again we would renew our appeal to the government, as we often do, to conduct its business in such a way that we are not dealing at the last minute with legislation that, while having some routine aspects, has other aspects that are of interest to parliamentarians to discuss.

As the sponsor of this bill has said, the bill renews equalization payments for two more years, until March 31, 1994, while renegotiation of equalization payments is underway. Discussions have been under way for the past 20 months. We will look forward to the final results.

Normally, the renewal would be for five years. This two-year period will be a crucial two-year period in the country and, no doubt, equalization will play a role in the general climate of negotiation.

There are serious problems with equalization. No doubt that is the content of the discussions between the federal and provincial governments. Especially in relation to the EPF, to those provinces receiving support, we recognize the need for the technical realignment of EPF, with provinces receiving equalization to be worked out. In fact, the bill does this by re-basing the ceiling.

These are not the only provinces that have concerns with Established Programs Financing. Of course, the bill does not deal with the situation in the other three provinces. It does not raise the other issues which we complained about, and continue to complain about.

The cuts to the Established Programs Financing escalator used to be tied to the GNP, but since 1986 it has been partially de-indexed: GNP less two percentage points. There has been a series of legislation over the past five or six years which has cut back on those transfers. For us, this remains a very serious problem. This legislation was not intended to deal with improving this situation, but it might have taken the opportunity to do so.

However, the renewal of equalization payments and the technical adjustment to the EPF are not where our questions lie. The interesting part is the framework provided by this legislation for federal-provincial administrative agreements over taxes. The word "administrative" is emphasized, but "administrative" covers a lot of ground.

The effect of this bill will be to make the harmonization of the GST between the federal and provincial governments more feasible and attractive through joint collection of federal and provincial taxes. On one side, this makes it easier for the taxpayer in the sense that the taxpayer will be able to pay one cheque to one level of government and balance off debts owed to government through payments received from another level.

On the other hand, by this kind of harmonization you reduce the knowledge that the taxpayers have of the link between the services provided by a layer of government and the taxes paid to that layer of government. This is worthy of some debate. What about the consciousness that taxpayers will have of where their tax dollars are going and how those adjustments are being made? It all sounds very mild and routine in the legislation, but equalization and tax harmonization are both matters crucial to the maintenance of national unity—a sensitive matter at any point in this country, but particularly so now.

Honourable senators, we recognize the need for the quick dispatch of this bill to meet the needs of the provinces. Indeed, the deadline was March 30 and this legislation will have to be retroactive. We look forward to asking questions of the minister—who I understand will appear tomorrow—concerning the state of negotiations over equalization—for example, why 1992-93 is the year in which the legislation is being brought forward after 20 months, and why 1992-93—obviously an election year—has been chosen as the year on which to change the ceiling on EPF. There are some obvious questions to be asked there, as well as why there will be a sweetener in that particular year.

Certainly, on the question of tax harmonization, it is important to know whether money will be saved; how much will be saved, and to whom those savings will accrue. After all, these are our savings. It is also important to know how the federal-provincial negotiations, which are mentioned as part of this legislation, will take place should this bill pass and tax harmonization be in effect.

Therefore, honourable senators, we will look forward to being able to put these kinds of question to the minister as soon as possible.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, I would like to discuss a matter of procedure. It seemed, at the beginning of the debate on this bill, that it would eventually be referred to the Standing Committee on National Finance. Now, there is an agreement between the two parties to the effect that this bill will be examined tomorrow in a Committee of the Whole.

I received a brief from the Canadian Medical Association, in both official languages. It is not very long. I wonder if, as is usually the case in committee, we could annex this brief to the Debates of the Senate of today or tomorrow.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): If the brief is not too long, why not read it?

Senator Leblanc: It is not excessively long. I will be pleased to read it to the honourable senators.

> The Canadian Medical Association is a voluntary professional association with 45,000 physician members. Its organizational structure includes 12 divisions (10 provincial plus the Yukon and Northwest Territories medical associations) and 37 affiliated societies including the Canadian Paediatric Society, the College of Family Physicians of Canada, the Society of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists of Canada, the Canadian Psychiatric Association, the Canadian Medical Protective Association and most of the medical specialty bodies.

This, of course, is in preparation for what follows.

BACKGROUND

> The Canadian Medical Association (CMA) has a long-standing commitment to enhancing the health of Canadians and to maintaining the integrity of Canada's health care system. Federal financial support has helped to shape this system and is integral to maintaining its national character.

The "Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act" has been the focus of much debate in recent years. It has also been the object of several briefs submitted by the CMA. These briefs have usually centred on the Established Programs Financing Agreements (EPF) arrangements components of the Act. In particular, the CMA has expressed concerns in the past about the destabilizing effects that unanticipated changes to EPF have had on health planning and management in Canada. The adverse effects of reductions in the rate of growth in the EPF entitlements have been felt most acutely in the less affluent regions of the country.

It is against this backdrop of continuing concern about the future financial integrity of national health programs that the CMA is submitting this brief on Bill C-60. The Act that is being amended once again is as important as it is complex. Few would be so bold as to profess to understand all its technical intricacies, but the CMA believes it is important to share with legislators its views on what we believe to be Bill C-60's principal features.

Our concern is not just with the bill itself but also with the unfair financial burden the Goods and Services Tax continues to place onn the shoulders of the medical profession—a burden that Bill C-60 will only increase.

THE FEDERAL TRANSFER PROGRAM

The Federal Equalization Program, by targeting federal transfers to those regions most in need, helps to ensure that reasonably comparable levels of necessary services are available at reasonably comparable levels of taxation. It is the centrepiece of Canadian fiscal federalism and has been very successful in reducing interprovincial disparities in fiscal capacity. Certainly, health programs across the country would not be nearly so uniform in the absence of such a program.

The CMA commends the government for taking action to increase equalization payments by some $620 million over the next two years. In the short term, this will undoubtedly help the less affluent provinces to cope with the pressures on their health and social service programs.

This respite does not, however, provide much comfort in the longer term. The CMA notes that the federal government has opted for a two-year extension of the Equalization Program, rather than the normal five-year term. No doubt this reflects, at least in part, the current economic and constitutional uncertainties. We can only hope that it also reflects a recognition on the part of the government of the need for a fundamental review of the whole system of federal-provincial transfers (see below for new structure).

Health services, like most publicly-funded programs, need to be planned and managed carefully if we are to achieve maximum value for the taxpayer's dollar. One prerequisite for effective planning is reasonable predictability and stability with respect to the funds that are going to be made available. Like taxpayers themselves, the managers of the health system need to know in advance the dollars they will have to work with if they are to budget appropriately.

Another prerequisite of effective health care planning is the explicit recognition of the diversity of health and other public sector needs across the country. When dollars are tight, we must redouble our efforts to ensure that they are spent as effectively and efficiently as possible. As needs vary across the country so do the costs of meeting these needs. Roads in British Columbia or Newfoundland are more costly to build and maintain than those in Saskatchewan or Prince Edward Island. Similarly, the higher population of native Canadians or seniors living in a province like Saskatchewan entails higher costs for health care than it does in provinces like Alberta or Ontario. Why, then, do we continue to provide equal per capita grants or equalization payments that are insensitive to relative fiscal need or differing per capita costs?

HEALTH TRANSFERS

The most notable feature of Bill C-60 is what is not in it. This is the first such bill in some years that does not further erode federal health transfers to the provinces. While the Bill does not exacerbate already intense pressures on provinces/territories to finance the growing health budget, nor does it stem the inexorable slide in health-related cash payments.

The CMA had hoped that the government would have taken this opportunity to stabilize cash payments to the provinces/ territories. Given the reductions in EPF transfers, the CMA believes that health programs have already done more than their fair share to help the federal government get its financial house in order.

Over the next two years, we understand that governments will be re-examining all of the basic structures of our system of fiscal federalism. This review will have to balance the twin goals of affordability of and accessibility to necessary publicly-financed services. The CMA challenges the Government to break with tradition and invite key stakeholders into this review process. While expertise on the more technical aspects of federal-provincial transfers may sometimes be lacking, the stakeholders will help the fiscal experts to understand the underlying needs that such arrangements are designed to meet. The form such arrangements take must follow the function they are intended to serve. For too long we have seen the order reversed.

REPEALING AND REPLACING THE TAX COLLECTION AGREEMENTS

Much of Bill C-60 concerns itself with expanding the scope of the "two-way" flow of funds between the two senior orders of government. The current Tax Collection Agreements provide the legislative authority for the federal government to collect personal and corporate income taxes on behalf of (most) provinces and remit these revenues back according to provincially established tax rates applied to a federal base. This Bill provides for a reciprocal arrangement whereby a province or territory could collect a tax (such as the Goods and Services Tax - GST) on behalf of the federal agreement and remit amounts back to the government according to legislated rates.

If this is an accurate description of the essence of the proposed amendments, the CMA takes this opportunity to remind legislators of the fundamental inequity built into the current GST. Physicians, unlike any other category of taxpayers other than perhaps landlords, to take advantage of input tax credits because the services they provide are exempt from the GST.

Their net costs of practice have increased considerably since January, 1991. The CMA is mounting a national impact study on the effect of the GST on physicians; provincial studies suggest that this discriminatory tax treatment costs Canadian physicians $80 to $100 million a year in additional practice expenses

And now I come to the last page.

The CMA's concern with respect to Bill C-60 is that it opens the door to provincial "harmonization" of the federal GST. While we are not in a position to argue the economic pros and cons of harmonization, we are concerned about the down-stream implications for physicians. Before provinces or territories adopt the broader GST tax base, the current discriminatory features fo the federal tax on physicians must be removed. To do otherwise would be to subject the medical profession to yet another unfair tax load. The medical profession is asking for no more than the other stakeholders have received through a tax rebate (e.g., 83 per cent afforded hospitals) or some similar "equal yield" tax considerations. We challenge legislators, in reporting back to the government, to insist that steps be taken immediately to remedy this injustice.

To summarize, the brief has underlined the need to establish a predictable and fair system of intergovernmental transfers that will support Canada's health programs well into the future. It also calls attention to the discriminatory tax being levied against physicians and demands that legislators take the steps necessary to remedy this injustice before provinces begin the graudal process of sales tax harmonization.

This brief was submitted in both official languages and I will table it now.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

• (1630)

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I belive it is understood that we will transform ourselves into Committee of the Whole tomorrow afternoon. I merely want to put on record that Mr. Mazankowski has confirmed his appearance for around 3:15 p.m.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I foresee no problem in being ready at that time. I simply want to leave it open in case some members should wish to speak. The understanding we had earlier, I think, will hold.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

DEBT SERVICING AND REDUCTION ACCOUNT BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard moved the second reading of Bill C-21, relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada.

• (1640)

He said: Honourable senators, I wish to deal with legislation that will establish an act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada.

[Translation]

More than two thousand years ago, a Roman, Publilius Syrus, wrote:

The debtor gives up his freedom.

Is that wisdom not just as appropriate for all Canadians today?

[English]

Honourable colleagues, we all know that our federal government carries a public debt of some $420 billion. This debt is a burden that limits our economic freedom. It also restricts the government's ability to help those in need who are still feeling the painful effects of the recent recession. It channels a large portion of government revenues to one purpose only, namely, paying interest charges, and it weighs down our prospects for prosperity by putting pressure on interest rates. The legislation before us is an important tool to free Canadians from the straitjacket of national debt.

If there were a need to demonstrate the importance of this bill, Senator MacEachen did so in his eloquent speech earlier this afternoon when he was discussing the problems faced by a country such as Canada that has its debt held by foreign countries.

It has been said many times that neither governments nor ordinary Canadians can borrow to pay for their daily bread. Senator MacEachen reminded us of that this afternoon when he stated that much of the $24 billion borrowed by Canada in 1991 was spent to help us finance the current deficit.

However, when we listen to Senator MacEachen we have to be very careful. Very often he speaks out of both sides of his mouth. I agree with him when he says that Canada should keep its borrowing—

Senator Molgat: I am not sure that terminology is acceptable parliamentary language.

Senator Simard: What word do you object to?

Senator Molgat: Stating that a member speaks out of both sides of his mouth is debatable.

Senator Simard: Yes, debatable. We can debate that sometime, or the Speaker can rule on it.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if I were asked to rule on it at the present time, I would say that it should not be used.

Senator Simard: I know you cannot use the word "lie" and "liars" and I certainly did not infer that in any way, Senator Molgat.

On the one hand, Senator MacEachen states that Canada should keep its foreign borrowing to a minimum. Yet he and his party and you, Senator Molgat, participated in a government that left Canada heavily in debt. For the last seven or eight years, every time the Conservative government tried to increase taxes and make the system fairer, the senators opposite opposed it by stating that Canadians cannot live with apparent or slight increases in taxation. Every time the government attempts to cut down or impose another measure, the opposition opposes it. However, as we said at the time and as we keep saying, these measures help keep the deficit under control and, if possible, to reduce it.

I would advise senators opposite to perhaps be more logical and—

—and a little more consistent because if all the measures that you fought, and I just listed two, tax increases since 1984 and spending cuts that you also opposed, if we had given in to criticism and to your demands, in 1991, we would have borrowed not $24 billion but probably $40 or $50 billion. I hope that some other colleagues will support me and help me get this message through to Canadians.

Although we can see some remorse in Senator MacEachen's statements, perhaps he would support the measure contained in Bill C-21 ensuring that revenue from privatization or exceeding the projections for the GST will go into this fund to reduce the deficit.

In the coming days, I hope to hear such words and receive support for this bill. It is never too late to repent and do what is right.

[English]

In other words Senator MacEachen, in his own way, set the stage for study of this bille, and we are looking forward to his support.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the bill that we are starting to consider is a major tool to free Canadians from the national debt burden.

It establishes a special account into which the net proceeds from the goods and services tax will go. This account will also be credited with the net income from the privatization of Crown corporations and the contributions of Canadians who are anxious to improve Canada's financial situation. These contributions totaled $375,000 for the first ten months of the fiscal year.

Funds deposited in the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account can be used for only one purpose: to pay the interest on the public debt and eventually to reduce the debt itself. The bill specifies that the Auditor General must verify the account every year.

I would remind you that this is not a one-shot legislative measure. Senator Molgat will recall that in the final hours of the GST debate, they moved an amendment that would create such a fund. We were opposed to it then because it was obviously a tactic of the Liberal opposition to delay the bill beyond January 1 of the following year. We certainly did not want Canadians to be the victims of such a manoeuvre. So if the Liberal senators were serious a few years ago when they proposed that amendment, they will no doubt be even more inclined to support it today. I am really looking forward to see whether, true to their Liberal logic, they will give us that support. I hope so.

This initiative is part of a vast action plan to regain control of Canada's deficit and debt problem. Among the related measures, we would mention the Spending Control Act, which is now before Parliament, and all the measures that we have taken to cut spending.

This approach is needed to put the national economic renewal on a sound basis. The deficit and the debt are serious problems, we all agree, which must be resolved if we want to benefit from a prosperous, growing economy. Therefore, we must reduce Canada's appetite for borrowing abroad, with the consequence that flow from it.

You will again allow me to point out the seriousness of our debt problem by mentioning the following facts: the present $420-billion debt is more than $15,000 for every man, woman and child in Canada.

Furthermore, it cost about $41.5 billion last year just to pay the interest on that debt. It is the government's largest budget item.

Despite the lower interest rates, we had to spend more last year on interest payments on the debt than on old age security, family allowances, veterans' pensions and unemployment insurance combined.

Why are we in such a situation? The answer is clear.

Today, Canada is faced, as I said earlier, with a $420 billion debt, because during the seventies and the early eighties, we had a government that spent more on programs and public services than it received in revenue. Meanwhile, the deficit soared, and instead of cutting back, the government spent even more, especially before an election.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: The deficit has doubled since you came to power.

Senator Simard: I'll get back to that, Senator Hébert. Meanwhile, I wish you would let me finish. Maybe you should check your petitions and make sure you get another delivery tomorrow. Just let me finish my speech, and I will answer your questions later, if I have any time left.

In 1984-85, the government had an operating deficit of $16.5 billion, and this was only for program spending and operations. In addition, it owed $22 billion in interest charges on the national debt, adding up to a total deficit of $38.5 billion, the highest deficit in our history. At the time, the government was spending $1.33 for every dollar it received in the form of revenue.

As a result of this "buy now, pay later" policy, the national debt was almost multiplied by eight in only ten years, when it increased from $27 billion in 1974-75 to $206 billion in 1984-85.

This figure should be remembered as the prime cause of the financial problems we face today.

Without the compound interest on this $206 billion debt, the federal deficit today would be zero, Senator Hébert, as I am sure you will understand. In fact, this year we would have had a $10.1 billion surplus which we could have used to stimulate the economy and possibly reduce taxes or provide an exemption or subsidies for people who, as Senator MacEachen and Senator Hébert keep reminding us, buy books and can no longer afford them. It could also be used to lighten the tax burden as a whole and to pay down the debt.

When the present government came to power in 1984, it knew it would have to act quickly to deal with the debt by dealing with the cause: federal spending. The government did so. It established a wide-ranging expenditure control program. It cut program spending as much as it could, whenever it could, and strongly contained growth in other areas.

This spending restraint produced very good results.

Between 1984-85, and 1991-92, the Progressive Conservative government capped increases in federal program spending—all spending with the exception of interest payments on the debt—at 3.9 per cent annually, compared with an annual increase of 13.8 per cent during the fifteen preceding years.

Expressed as a percentage of the Gross Domestic Product, federal program spending has dropped to its lowest level in twenty years. And since spending has not progressed as fast as revenues, we now have an operating surplus.

This surplus indicates that the increase in the national debt since 1984-85 is due strictly to the interest charges on the debt the government inherited, because, Senator Hébert, for your information, the present government did not add a cent to the debt.

● (1650)

Unfortunately, we must service the debt, which may entail further deficits and an increase in the debt, especially since the economic slowdown means that the government's revenues will be lower than expected. We must do more in order to break the vicious circle of debt servicing and deficits.

The debt servicing and reduction account, according to Canadians we consulted, is a key step in achieving this goal, and it assures Canadians that the net revenues of the GST will be used only for deficit reduction.

By net revenues we mean the GST revenues after deduction of the various rebates and credits that are directly a part of the goods and services tax, for example the low-income GST credit, the input tax credit, the housing rebate, the tourism rebate, and the GST transitional grant to small business.

To reinforce this initiative, an important complementary measure which consists in legislated limits on program spending is now before Parliament. It would result in a program ceiling of government spending over the next five years.

Legislated spending controls will represent a fundamental change in how the government operates. Difficult choices and trade-offs and reallocations will be required if spending exceeds the limit set out in the Budget.

Working together, the two measures will ensure that the GST revenues will not be used to fund new programs but only be used to reduce the deficit.

These measures will help improve Canada's fiscal position.

Thanks to its commitment to keeping tight control on spending, the government has managed to maintain the deficit at $31.4 billion during the past year, despite the fragile state of our economy. The deficit is expected to decline by nearly $4 billion to $27.5 billion this year and to $22.5 billion in 1993-94.

The need for additional borrowing will be eliminated by 1995-96. We will then start paying down publicly held debt for the first time since 1969-70.

Honourable senators, the debt burden created by a federal government that spent too much and lived beyond its means for many years cannot be eliminated overnight. We must act in a manner that is fiscally responsible. The government must also be able to count on the support of the Liberal Party of Canada, the Official Opposition in both Houses and on the NDP. I think the challenge facing us now is to act responsibly and impose strict controls. Perhaps I should say to continue to impose strict controls, with the firm resolve to bring the debt down to its previous, far more reasonable levels.

In any case, the creation of the debt servicing and reduction account is a first step, which reflects our commitment to pursuing and increasing our efforts to achieve this fundamental objective. This bill deserves the unanimous support of this House, because all Canadians stand to benefit. Thank you, honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON A RENEWED CANADA

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the report of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, dated 28th February, 1992 (Sessional Paper 343-416A).

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, given the time of the day and the fact that I would be speaking to a less than a packed house on an important matter, I shall be brief and concentrate on but one point.

By way of preamble, I should like to extend my congratulations to all honourable members of this chamber who served on the committee, and who spent many hours travelling across Canada listening to witnesses. It is a tough job. It is important and, indeed, right that we salute our colleagues for their work and time in conducting the hearings and in preparing the report.

I wish to focus on the proposal concerning a social covenant. As honourable senators know, this matter is dealt with at pages 87 and 88 of the report. There are a couple of points that I would like to reflect upon.

The first is this. I understand where the committee is coming from in its desire to place in the proper context the nature of the social rights that Canadians want to see addressed in a constitutional fashion, as well as the importance of recognizing the justiciability model that is appropriate—indeed, necessary—to deal with the kinds of rights that would be included in a social charter.

I think it would be of more help if the wording of the report were other than what we find on page 88 where it is stated, "These commitments express goals, not rights." I respectfully disagree with that proposition. I understand why, because of the unique justiciability model that is required to deal with these social rights to be included in a social covenant, the committee felt it necessary to include those words. However, in my opinion, it is not necessary to have denied the existence of social rights.

Indeed, I suggest that the opposite to what is stated is the case. That is to say, these commitments express rights, not simply goals.

Let me explain, honourable senators. One can categorize human rights into two general major categories. On the one hand are the classical freedoms, civil and political rights, rights such as the right to life and freedom from arbitrary arrest. These are rights to which many refer as self-executory rights. The citizen will enjoy these rights, provided that the state does not interfere with them.

On the other hand are the economic, social and cultural rights. They are rights such as the right to education; the right to health; the right to work. I would describe these as "programmatic rights". They do not occur automatically, but rather they require the organization of society and a program of schools, for example, in order for the right to education to have any meaning. Without a health delivery system, the right to health would be somewhat hollow.

Thus, we recognize the right to health, the right to education and the right to work as "programmatic rights". Quite appropriately, the model of enforcement of these rights is a different model from that which we see for the enforcement and the promotion of civil and political rights.

Honourable senators, these social issues that Canadians have brought to the attention of the joint committee have been recognized for a long time by Canadian governments as human rights. For example, in March of 1976, as a result of having received from the federal government and all provincial governments an agreement that Canada should deposit an instrument of ratification with the Secretary General of the United Nations, the Privy Council bound Canada to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights by international treaty law. In other words, honourable senators, from a legal positivist point of view, Canada, with the concurrence of all governments, said, "Here are some human rights in the social economic and cultural sphere that we recognize."

There are a couple of points I should like to make about that matter. I hope that the government, if it continues to elaborate the social charter with other governments, it will steer away from the notion that they would have to deny that the right to education is a human right, for international law has established that it is a right. The international covenant establishes that the right to education is a human right. The international covenant establishes that the right to education is a human right.

● (1710)

Honourable senators, the exciting thing, it seems to me, and something that the governments can build upon as we go forward in the elaboration of the social covenant, is the agreement which was achieved in writing from every government in Canada. That agreement led the Government of Canada and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to deposit the instrument of ratification of the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights.

In other words, we have in writing a standard of human rights, social, economic and cultural, about which all governments within Canada have said, yes, we recognize these human rights and we are now in a position to be able to use that foundation to articulate in some detail the social covenant which the joint committee has recommended and which I support.

Honourable senators, the unanimous consent of the 11 jurisdictions, the fact that we have here a written standard of the social rights already agreed to by the jurisdictions, means that in deciding upon the content of the social covenant, it should be at least as comprehensive as that found in the international covenant to which we have bound ourselves as a nation.

Before I make a few comments on some of the substantive rights contained in the covenant, and which hopefully will be elaborated in the social covenant, let me say this: As the joint committee has indicated, you need a different model of the justiciability, a sort of reporting mechanism, something very much like that which was followed by the Council of York when it elaborated its European social charter. So also we, as a participant bound by the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights, provide a report to the Special Committee of the United Nations that oversees the implementation of this, if you like, international social covenant.

Therefore the seed for that kind of a model for the promotion of the Canadian social covenant has been set. We have agreed upon this model from an international standpoint and, therefore, it is a model which I recommend we build upon domestically.

In conclusion, honourable senators, in terms of the content of the social charter, the Beaudoin-Dobbie report at Recommendation 36.1, for example, recommends a high quality of education. The international covenant to which we have already bound ourselves is far more elaborate in reference to education. I do accept that this is a principle which the committee is recommending be elaborated upon, that we go forward but, at the same time, listen to some of the detail of the right to education which already exists with the agreement of all provinces, with the consent of the federal government, and as part of the international standard.

The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, to which Canada is a State party, says in Article 13:

> The States parties to the present Covenant . . .

—that means Canada—

> . . . recognize the right of everyone to education.

State parties agree, Canada agrees:

> . . . that education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality and the sense of its dignity, and shall strengthen the respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. They further agree that education shall enable all persons to participate effectively in a free society, promote understanding, tolerance and friendship among all nations and all racial, ethnic and religious groups . . . ..

States parties, Canada, recognizes:

> . . . that, with a view to achieving the full realization of this right:
> (a) Primary education shall be compulsory and available free to all.
> (b) Secondary education in its different forms, including technical and vocational secondary education, shall be made generally available and accessible to all by every appropriate means, and in particular by the progressive introduction of free education . . . .

It is interesting, honourable senators, that we have agreed since 1976 that:

> (c) Higher education shall be made equally accessible to all, on the basis of capacity, by every appropriate means, and in particular by the progressive introduction of free education.

One can argue whether or not we have been going in that direction, but at least we have here a beacon. That is one of the exciting things about the social covenant, honourable senators. It is a beacon. We must have a model of enforcement. There are different models of justiciability, not just the classical ones. Some kind of an auditing system would indeed be quite appropriate.

Honourable senators, I conclude because of the time of the day. The European Community went through much of the same discussion we are now going through with reference to national unity and the place of human rights, including not only civil and political rights but also social, economic and cultural rights.

I draw your attention, honourable senators, to the idea seen in the European setting of drawing up a treaty under the auspices of the Council of York to guarantee fundamental rights in the economic and social matters, an idea which dates back even to the preparatory work of the European Convention on Human Rights as early as 1949.

Both the European system and the International Covenant system to which we are party have recognized the programmatic nature of these rights but nevertheless have found it appropriate, rather than denying that these rights exist and having recognized the real problem, to urge that we find a different means to promote them.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would honourable Senator Kinsella permit a question?

Senator Kinsella: Yes.

Senator Molgat: Does he see these rights as enforceable through the courts, and if so, through what mechanisms?

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, I do not see them enforced through the courts in the ordinary sense of civil and political rights, but rather in the court of public opinion, in the court of Parliament, in that type of court. In other words, the model of justiciability, as is the European experience and as is the United Nations experience, is a reporting on the progress that a member state has taken to achieve, for example, the objective of the right to higher education.

● (1720)

So the general principle, and what is suggested in the report of the joint committee, is that with respect to these rights—mind you, they say they are not rights, but I hope I have made my point that they are rights; we recognize them already as rights—the real issue is that we have to find the appropriate forum for promoting these rights. Even in the United Nations system and the European social charter system there is a recognition that these rights are enriched progressively, based on the ability of a member state to be able to pay for them.

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I too wish to join in the debate on the consideration of the report of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada dated the 28th of February, 1992.

Last week when I was speaking with my former co-chair, the honourable Senator Beaudoin, he suggested that it would not be inappropriate if I made a few remarks about aboriginal rights in view of the fact that I was a member of the liaison committee within the special joint committee that dealt specifically with aboriginal rights under the special joint committee. I was honoured to be afforded this opportunity to speak on this topic. As a relative newcomer to the Senate, the opportunity and privilege to play a small part in the development of the report on the renewal of Canada during this pivotal time in our country's history is something I shall always cherish.

It was just a little over a month ago that representatives of the three national parties represented in the House of Commons and the Senate presented their unanimous report. In so doing they supported the recommendation for the entrenchment of the inherent right of aboriginal peoples to self-government within Canada. As a member of that special joint committee and the liaison committee that met with a number of aboriginal groups to seek their views on the implementation of this self-government, I am extremely pleased with the commitment to the inherent right that is contained in the Beaudoin-Dobbie report. It certainly was a long time in coming.

As a member of the Beaudoin-Dobbie Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada I, along with members of my subcommittee, listened to a great number of witnesses and read a great number of briefs which brought to light the long history of mistreatment of aboriginal peoples by the Government of Canada.

The Indian Act of 1876 allowed the government to legally take Indian status away from any man who was literate and debt-free. This happened automatically when an Indian became a soldier or a professional. Women who married non-Indians lost their status. Natives were not allowed to leave reserves without passes. Traditional systems of band government were undermined and foreign concepts were imposed. Central rituals were banned—the potlatch and the sundance of the west, for example. Native children were regularly taken away from their homes and put into residential schools where abuse was widespread. It was only in 1960, under the leadership of the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, that Indians were given the right to vote in the elections of the land that was once theirs.

While many of these laws have changed over time, the cloud of the Indian Act still casts a shadow over the aboriginal peoples of Canada. For example, bylaws passed by aboriginal councils can still be overruled by the federal government, and the wills of aboriginals on reserves are invalid unless the government approves them. Statistics also show the continued ill effects of this cultural stripping. Infant mortality, suicide and the rate of high school dropouts among aboriginals far exceed national averages.

So it is a well deserved victory and triumph for aboriginals to be recognized as having the inherent right to self-government within Canada. But there is no time to celebrate. The June constitutional deadline is less than two months away and there is still a great deal to be done. Perhaps the biggest task is to iron out the details and scope of the terms "inherent right to self-government" and "distinct society". We have all heard a great deal about these terms, but many of us do not understand their deep-rooted significance or widespread implications.

While the recommendation of the Beaudoin-Dobbie report to the government of Canada is to include in the Constitution the concept of the aboriginal peoples' inherent right to self-government, the exact content and parameters of this idea of self-government are subject to interpretation and negotiation and have yet to be determined.

In order to understand the significance of the term "inherent right to self-government", it is necessary to present a very brief snapshot of what has taken place up till now regarding aboriginal constitutional recognition within Canada. In 1982, aboriginals were included in the Constitution in three sections: section 25, which protected the special rights of aboriginal peoples from any adverse effects that might flow from the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms; section 35, which gave aboriginals a constitutional guarantee by recognizing and affirming their treaty rights—it also loosely defined aboriginals as including Indian, Inuit and Métis peoples of Canada; and, finally, a later addition, section 35.1, which called for the convening of a First Ministers Conference to include representatives of aboriginal peoples of Canada before any constitutional amendments directly affecting aboriginals could be enacted.

It is interesting to note, honourable senators, that, as I speak, the Right Honourable Joe Clark is meeting in Halifax to discuss aspects of the constitutional issues, and aboriginal groups are invited to participate.

The three First Ministers meetings that followed these 1982 constitutional additions focused on the right of aboriginal self-government to set the agenda for aboriginal constitutional matters which remain with us today. Since these constitutional inclusions were put into effect there has been much discussion on whether aboriginal right to self-government is an inherent right flowing from aboriginal sovereignty or one that flows from the federal-provincial governments by way of a constitutional amendment. Until very recently the federal government always took the view of a contingent right approach which required the content of self-government to be defined by agreement between federal and provincial governments prior to any entrenchment in the Constitution. This approach has always been held unacceptable by the aboriginal peoples of Canada because it presupposes, of course, that the right was to be created by the Canadian Constitution and did not exist before.

However, the constitutional proposal released last fall, entitled "Shaping Canada's Future Together", moved away from the contingent right approach. But its language made it difficult to determine whether it is to recognize an already existing inherent right to self-government or whether it is proposing to entrench a newly created right, one conferred on aboriginal peoples by the federal and provincial governments. The exact words in "Shaping Canada's Future Together" suggest that there be "an amendment to the Constitution to entrench a general justiciable right to aboriginal self-government in order to recognize aboriginal peoples' autonomy over their own affairs within the Canadian federation".

The recent constitutional discussions have brought forward the reservations that the federal government has with committing to the inherent right to self-government phrasing in the Constitution. The Minister for Constitutional Affairs, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, has explained the government's reluctance to allow this terminology without defining limitations to its scope. His exact words were as follows:

● (1730)

> Our concern with that term is straightforward. We believe that the word—undefined or unmodified—could be used as the basis for a claim to international sovereignty or as the justification for a unilateral approach to deciding what laws did or did not apply to aboriginal peoples.

[Senator Oliver.]

Mr. Clark went on to say:

> Our concern with inherency is not with the word but with the meaning. If we can be shown that an amendment can be drafted to ensure that an inherent right does not mean a right to sovereignty or separation, or the unilateral determination of powers, we will look at that. If Aboriginal Canadians can help define what inherency would mean in practical terms—in terms of authorities and jurisdictions and powers—in such a way that the integrity of this federation is not put in question, we would welcome that. We are not opposed to inherency.

Aboriginal leaders do not have the same concern with the phrase "inherent right to self-government" as expressed by Mr. Clark. In response to a question from the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, Yvon Dumont of the Métis National Council stated:

> We want to make it very clear . . . that the Métis saw themselves as nation builders within Canada . . . We wish to continue to be part of Canada. We are not seeking sovereignty from Canada, we are not seeking separation; we are seeking recognition within the Canadian confederation.

It seems that the difference has the possibility of becoming almost a Catch-22 situation. On the one hand, the federal government is reluctant to use the term "inherent" without parameters to determine the precise meaning of the word. On the other hand, aboriginal peoples want the term "inherent" in the Constitution before any negotiations aimed at defining the scope or limit of self-government even begin. We heard this argument repeatedly as we toured Canada from east to west and up to the north, listening to the various representations.

At this point, the result seems to be somewhat of a compromise. The phrasing of "inherent right to self-government within Canada", which is used in the report of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, implies aboriginals will be masters of their own destiny in many instances, but still have some limitations as they will remain a part of Canada.

In February, the Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples published a list of recommendations for successful constitutional reform for aboriginals. We found the report of the Royal Commission very useful and very instructive. You will recall that in the Dobbie-Beaudoin report, excerpts from the Royal Commission were included. The list suggests, in a general sense, the way to implement the right of aboriginal peoples to self-government in the Constitution. The Royal Commission stated that:

> Any new constitutional provision should satisfy six criteria. It should indicate that the right is inherent in nature, circumscribed in extent, and sovereign within its sphere. The provision should be adopted with the consent of the aboriginal peoples and should be consistent with the view that Section 35 may already recognize a right of self-government. Finally, it should be justiciable immediately.

Firstly, the commission stretched the importance that the right of aboriginal peoples to self-government be explicitly identified in the Constitution as "inherent" in nature. That is what the Beaudoin-Dobbie report states. The commission report states that "no other word (than inherent) can do justice to the fact that their right to self-government springs from sources within the aboriginal nations, rather than from within the written Constitution of Canada."

In this way, aboriginals are recognized as the people with the deepest and the most resilient roots in the original traditions of this land, rather than merely recipients of rights that the federal and provincial governments are prepared to bestow upon them.

The second recommendation of the commission focused on the scope of the inherent right to self-government. Its report says that the right to self-government means that aboriginal governments would co-exist with federal and provincial governments under the Constitution.

Ironing out the details of the scope of aboriginal self-government will continue to be a major task. There must be continued negotiations with aboriginal peoples and officials of federal governments and provincial governments to determine what it should be.

It is beneficial to look at an American example which illustrates that the inherent right to self-government does not necessarily carry with it unlimited powers. In the United States, Indian governments were declared by the Supreme Court to hold inherent powers of self-government, and yet to exercise those powers within certain limits: Limits by treaty, by federal law and by their status as protected nations. This status precludes them from entering into treaties with other nations and prevents them from asserting criminal jurisdictions over non-Indians.

Apart from this, tribal governments in the United States have jurisdiction over marriage, child welfare, estates, taxation, licensing, real property and commercial transactions. They maintain law and order and administer criminal justice within their territories, subject to specific statutory limitations.

In Canada, we have some aspects of this form of self-government already in practice, but this comparison of American Indian policy to the Canadian situation is inappropriate, given the fact that the United States has failed to provide constitutional entrenchment for its aboriginals and that the American Indian right to self-government is subordinate to the overriding powers of Congress. However, from the American model, it can be seen that the inherent right to self-government does not require unlimited powers.

The Royal Commission on Aboriginal Peoples recommends that the powers related to self-government be limited in varying degrees depending upon the particular subject matter. Their report says that certain powers of the aboriginal government should be sovereign and, as such, take precedence over federal and provincial laws. At the same time, federal and provincial laws will take precedence in other spheres of jurisdiction; and some areas of jurisdiction will be exclusive to aboriginal authority while others will be shared.

Former Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, Brian Dickson, who is a member of the Royal Commission and who appeared at the aboriginal conference here in Ottawa a month ago, stressed the importance of developing a very flexible model of self-government for aboriginals. When he spoke at the Constitutional Conference on Aboriginal Affairs last month, he said:

> There can be no single model of aboriginal self-government. There are scores of distinct aboriginal peoples in Canada; their needs are not identical nor are their aspirations. Whatever process is created to flesh out the concept of self-government, it must be flexible and allow for a variety of responses . . . Various groups want and need different powers and responsibilities.

The former chief justice went on to add the following:

> Self-government can mean a number of different things to a number of different people. It can and perhaps ought to mean municipal government for some, as is the case with the Sechelt Band in British Columbia; for others it can and should mean the product of a modern treaty, as is the case with the James Bay Cree. For still others, it may refer to a constitutional relationship.

In summary, the former chief justice said:

> The presence of one form of self-government should not deny other forms.

Recently, Ovide Mercredi, the National Chief of the Assembly of First Nations, has made demands that aboriginals be recognized as a distinct society in the same way that Quebec will be. This request for a distinct society arose at one of the constitutional conferences in Toronto and again at the constitutional conference in Vancouver.

In view of the time and the fact that others may wish to speak, I will summarize the remarks I wanted to make about distinct society to say that it was clear from the representations made to the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee that "distinct society" for the province of Quebec—that those words and that language is very important to the province of Quebec.

● (1740)

On the other hand, it is very clear that the aboriginal peoples of Canada are equally distinct in their language, culture and traditions. It is hoped that there can be found language that will not take anything away from the distinctness of the society in Quebec but that also can define the distinctness of the aboriginal peoples.

I thank you, honourable senators, for hearing me on this matter.

Senator Molgat: Would Senator Oliver permit a question?

Senator Oliver: Yes.

Senator Molgat: Senator Oliver, you have obviously followed it very closely and you are a regular attender at the meetings of the committee concerning the whole question of aboriginal requests.

In that whole question of the inherent right to self-government, was there a linkage or do you see a linkage anywhere between that and land claims?

Senator Oliver: The answer to your question is that in a number of discussions, particularly in the latter days of the committee doing its study and research, there were suggestions that there should be some kind of linkage. There were others, particularly aboriginals, who said clearly that there was a linkage. The people who made the latter assertion were treaty Indians. They found that the linkage arose by virtue of their particular treaties.

Senator Molgat: Does that not, then, present a problem not in the Northwest Territories, where the land is owned by the Queen in right of Canada, but in the provinces where, apart from land that is privately patented, the land is now owned by the Queen in right of the province? Can you then have simply a federal action without absolute provincial action? Can you simply change the Constitution without a clear-cut approval by the provinces in that regard?

Senator Oliver: First, as Chief Justice Dickson has said, there will be a number of different forms of self-government and a number of different approaches taken across Canada for different aboriginal groups. Implicit in what the chief justice was saying is that for some people such as the Métis, who do not yet have a land base, land claims will be one of the first things that they will negotiate with the federal and provincial governments. For those who do have a land base, such as the Inuit in Iqaluit, they would not have the same concerns and they may well begin the process of negotiation of something other than land.

The answer is that individual and different aboriginal groups will begin to negotiate with the federal and provincial government under different heads or for different powers. Some will likely start with land and others will not. But the constitutional negotiations between various aboriginal groups, the federal and provincial government will continue, not only on land but also on other issues and powers.

Senator Molgat: But if there is a linkage, an action by the federal government will bind the provinces—at least morally, will it not?

Senator Oliver: Civil rights, though, is also a provincial matter, and therefore on all of these negotiations it is likely that there will be continued negotiations and consultations with the three levels.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, could I rise on a point of clarification? I was very interested in Senator Oliver's comments, but he cut them short. I was under the impression that the debate on this issue had no reasonable time limit. Is that still the case? I intend to participate in the debate at a date in the not too distant future, and I was wondering if that is still the understanding.

[Senator Molgat.]

Senator Molgat: That was certainly the understanding on our side. If Senator Oliver wishes to proceed, we have no objection. We did not rise to ask any question. Indeed, if he wishes to adjourn the debate and carry on on another day that would be quite acceptable, too. If he had further things to say, that would be valuable.

Senator Oliver: I would like to adjourn the debate, then.

On motion of Senator Oliver, debate adjourned.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. During Question Period this afternoone, I was shocked and offended by the choice of words used by the Leader of the Government in the Senate in describing my reference to a minister's hairdo during my question.

My genuine intentions in that instance were to be complimentary. As a parliamentarian since first being elected to the other place in 1957, as a father of three daughters, with four granddaughters, and as my question this afternoon was put with good intentions, I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to withdraw his offending remarks from the Hansard record.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if that was an apology by the honourable senator for the reference to a minister's hairdo, then it is on the record and one is glad to hear it. One is also glad to hear that the honourable senator did not intend the remark in any derogatory fashion. Nevertheless, it was and is gratuitous, offensive and sexist. Far from withdrawing that description of the remark, I repeat it.

Senator Haidasz: May I just add that if my remarks offended the Leader of the Government in the Senate or any other person, I would like to withdraw my remarks.

Senator Murray: I fully appreciate the statement that was made by the honourable senator and I congratulate him on that. I have had occasion in this place to reconsider remarks that I had earlier made, and have withdrawn them, and, having done so, I can only thank the honourable senator for what he has just done.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

LOUIS RIEL

MOTION TO TABLE RELEVANT DOCUMENTS ADOPTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, pursuant to notice of Thursday, March 19, 1992, moved:

> That there be laid before this House all papers, documents, letters, faxes, electronic messages, courier messages, minutes of meetings, and recorded messages between the office of the Right Honourable Joe Clark, Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, (and/or any persons in his office or department) and Mr. Yvon

Dumont (and/or any persons in the Manitoba Métis Federation Inc. and the Métis National Council), concerning Louis Riel.

He said: The reason I want to put my motion at this time is that it seems likely we are going to recess, and, as it is a request for papers, I should like to get it into a motion during that time.

Why do I want these papers? The explanation is simple. I see conflicting requests from different Métis groups. There is, for example, presently a request from Alberta for a pardon for Louis Riel. Yet this is not my understanding of what the Manitoba group has asked for in the past. I am trying to sort out exactly what the requests are, and that is the reason for my request for the correspondence.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. William M. Kelly, pursuant to notice of April 7, 1992, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of its examination and consideration of such bills, subject-matters of bills and Estimates as are referred to it; and

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within and outside Canada for the purpose of such studies.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE SENATE

RHÉAL DUPUIS—FELICITATIONS ON RETIREMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, one does not have to sit in this chamber very long before he or she can become somewhat detached or even oblivious to the symbols and traditions which surround us.

I wish to refer in particular to the arrival and departure of the Speaker and his entourage, known as the Speaker's Parade, and especially to the Mace Bearer who places the Mace on the Clerk's Table at the beginning of each sitting.

The Mace is a symbol of authority in many legislative bodies across the world. Its history, as such, begins after the Norman conquest. There are, by the way, a number of theories as to the exact origin of our Mace, the most accepted being that it was in use in the Province of Canada until 1867 and has been used in the Senate ever since.

Rhéal Dupuis, the present Mace Bearer, began his career in the Senate in 1975, was appointed to his present position in 1980 and will be retiring at the end of this month. Therefore, today may well be the last day that we will see him in the Speaker's Parade.

[Translation]

I therefore wish to take this opportunity, speaking on behalf of all our colleagues whom he had occasion to meet in the course of his career in the Senate, to express our appreciation of the truly outstanding way in which he performs all the duties of his position.

As for one particular detail, honourable senators, I know I am not alone in noticing that no matter how many times he carried the Mace, he always did so with the dignity and respect we owe this historic symbol of our parliamentary system.

Speaking on behalf of all of us, I wish him a long and happy retirement, in the company of his family and friends.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, speaking on behalf of our group, I would like to express our feelings of regret upon the departure of our friend Rhéal.

To look at him, one could hardly believe he is old enough to retire. Of course nowadays, early retirement is common, and people do not necessarily retire at the usual age!

Rhéal certainly served us very well during the years he was here in the Senate. In fact, I have one advantage over my colleague who just spoke, in that I twice had another position in this House , that of Speaker pro tempore, now filled by my colleague, Senator Bélisle.

At the time, I had the advantage of being able to follow Rhéal every day—when I was on duty—when entering this Chamber. So I saw him from a different perspective!

Speaking on behalf of all of us, Rhéal, I think I can safely say that we will miss you, we wish you the very best and we hope you will come back and visit, even if you no longer work here!

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the clock for today for the democrats is 226 more days, for the cowards, 612. If we take the same break as the House of Commons, the clock will be ticking while we are away and I will have an up-to-date report on our return.

VIMY RIDGE

COMMEMORATION OF SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to bring the attention of the house to a memorable and glorious, if sad, day in Canadian history. It was on Easter Monday, April 9, 1917, that Canadian troops first went into battle as a complete Canadian corps under Canadian command and distinguished themselves at Vimy Ridge.

It was a sad day in that the losses were extremely high. It was a glorious day in that it marked for Canada a very important step forward in our international position.

The battle of Vimy Ridge and the Canadian success there had a great deal to do with the way Canada was regarded by other countries subsequent to the war. If we had a place in the subsequent negotiations, in the activities of the League of Nations, eventually in the Statute of Westminster, much of the credit for that belongs to those courageous young men who gave their lives at that time. We owe them a great debt of gratitude.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I join with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. I grew up on the legend of Vimy Ridge. It was fresh in the minds of the generation that went before mine. I have always considered it a very great privilege to have lived in a time when I could talk to people who fought in that historic battle.

I think in particular of one, Ernie Thomas of Collingwood, Ontario, who is still alive and flourishing, but is not quite equal to the long journey back to the memorial at the Ridge. Ernie liked to talk about the things he saw as a stretcher-bearer and of the terrible feel and, above all, the smell of battle—the smell of dead horses and of dead men. He said, "We never forgot that, and I hope a lot of people never forget it."

I say to Ernie today that yes we shall, a lot of us, remember that terrible time of battle and the great distinction that befell Ernie and his comrades.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

CANADA

CITIZENSHIP WEEK

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, we will not be in this place during the week of April 12 to 18, which is Citizenship Week. Perhaps, then, we should take the time to remember what a great privilege it is to be Canadian, given all the trouble that there is around the world.

I do not know if it is proper for me to do so, but I am wearing a pin that recognizes Citizenship Week. I am told that we should not display our affiliations in Parliament, but this is such an important occasion that I think we should all display our support.

One of the things that worries me about our population is that the birth rate in Canada is declining. If we do not allow more immigrants into this country, our rate of development will slow. With Citizenship Week on the horizon, I was surprised today, on reading the paper, to find out that the minister has expelled 1,200 would-be refugees to their home country rather than giving them any consideration.

We should all recognize Citizenship Week as Canadians and, regardless of our former nations or nationalities, celebrate during this week the fact that we are one country, united and strong.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, I want to join with my honourable colleague opposite in his celebration of Canadian citizenship. Those of us—and there are a number in the chamber—who were not born in this country but were welcomed with open arms by Canada and have become an equal participant in the citizenship and makeup of this country, have a particular feeling for that word and for that position of privilege.

I wish to add a couple of comments to my friend's remarks. One is that there are several ways of increasing the number of Canadians. We could think of others, as well as immigration, which you know I support. My dear friend Senator Doyle is laughing at me. It is absolutely correct, sir, that we could certainly increase the production of children in this country, which is not a bad idea.

Honourable senators, I wish to refer to Senator Bonnell's comment about the expulsion of 1,200 would-be refugees. If the honourable senator reads the article correctly, he will see that those who were expelled were those abusing the privileges that this caring and tolerant country offers others from around the world. It is important that the message be sent out to the rest of the world that we have a welcoming, tolerant, and caring society, and that that attitude relates to all things and, in particular, to immigrants and new Canadians.

● (1410)

We also should send the message out that refugees will be dealt with within the rules that we establish and within the international rules that that body establishes.

In conclusion, honourable senators, let me once again state that, along with Senator Bonnell and the rest of you, I am proud to be a Canadian.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

FIRST REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Len Marchand, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples, presented the committee's report concerning the expenses incurred by the committee during the second session of the Thirty-Fourth Parliament:

Thursday, April 9, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on Aboriginal Peoples has the honour to present its

FIRST REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized by the Senate to incur expenses with respect to its study on the relations between the Aboriginal Peoples and the Government of Canada, reports pursuant to Rule 105, that the expenses incurred by the Committee during the Second Session of the Thirty-fourth Parliament are as follows:

Professional and Special Services	$ 598.00
Transport and Communications	450.13
Other Expenses	263.42
Total	$1,311.55

Respectfully submitted,

LEN MARCHAND
Chairman

Senator Marchand: You big spenders take special note. We spent $1,311.55.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 75 citizens of Ontario who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions come mainly from Toronto, Woodbridge and Mississauga.

I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 496 citizens of Ontario who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions come mainly from Sault Ste. Marie, Toronto, Thornhill, Brampton, Scarborough, Mississauga, Willowdale and Peterborough.

This makes a grand total of 571 citizens very strongly opposed to the GST, especially as it applies to books and periodicals. If I were on the other side of the House, I would probably think that these 571 voters, whom we really cannot all name, were on the Refugee Board and the Board of the CBC.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

COMMUNICATIONS

NATURE AND COST OF GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Yesterday on the CBC national news there appeared a story about a new government advertising campaign—another one!

In its February budget, the government claimed that it was cutting $75 million from its advertising budget. Yesterday it was reported that $25 million is to be spent in the next few months on advertising designed to convince Canadians that things are not that bad.

Senator Molgat: More advertising?

Senator Frith: Yes, after the cuts to the advertising budget.

Senator Molgat: Difficult to believe.

Senator Frith: Apparently these advertisements, among other things, will highlight businesses that have done well under free trade.

Will the government present a balanced view in this campaign? Will it show, for example: One, the hundreds of plants that have closed down since the implementation of the free trade agreement? Two, even one out of the hundreds of thousands of Canadian workers who have lost their jobs in the manufacturing sector since 1989? Three, will these advertisements provide any useful information to these workers about the adjustment programs that Mr. Wilson talked about yesterday?

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is true that the February budget indicated that the government would be cutting the budget for communication activities by $75 million. We are in the process of doing so. We are also in the process of reallocating communications and advertising budgets to reflect the priorities of the government.

In that connection, I do not think it is accurate to say that we are planning advertising campaigns to convince people that—

Senator Frith: Things are not that bad?

Senator Murray: "Things are not that bad."

Senator LeBlanc: Things are pretty bad in the polls.

Senator Murray: There are two advertising campaigns planned under the aegis of the Departments of Industry, Science and Technology and International Trade. One of these is a "Buy Canadian" campaign with which I am sure no honourable senator will disagree.

Senator Frith: That is proper under the free trade agreement?

Senator Murray: Yes, it is. I think the honourable senator will be very interested to see that the message of the advertising campaign is that, not only for price but for quality and service, Canadian products and services are at least equal to, if not superior to, foreign competition and that Canadians should think Canadian and buy into Canada.

I may say that the campaign, of which the advertising segment is a part, is being planned in conjunction with the Retail Council of Canada and with various business organizations in the private sector.

As for the "success stories", this advertising campaign builds upon a similar campaign that was conducted some months ago largely in the print media. The honourable senator may recall that campaign with its slogan: "Yes, we can." The intent of this new campaign, building on the previous one, will be to show how Canadian companies do compete successfully around the world. This is a matter of generating both understanding and pride in the achievements of the Canadian private sector, and in no sense—

• (1420)

Senator LeBlanc: You can't be serious.

Senator Murray: Yes, we are serious. I know the honourable senator has quite a bias against the private sector and Canadian business. He and some of his colleagues have had a hate on for Canadian business for many years. However, that is his problem. It is his ideological hobbyhorse, and I leave it to him. Surely no honourable senator will quarrel with the intent of this campaign which, as I say, is to generate understanding and pride in the achievements of the Canadian private sector. There was absolutely nothing of a partisan nature to be found in any of this advertising.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am pleased to hear the figures are so encouraging on "Buy Canadian" and I thank the minister for the information about the support of the Retail Council of Canada, because I do remember vividly their fierce support of the GST and FTA.

I ask the Leader to take into account, while convincing us that there is "absolutely nothing" of any partisan nature in this campaign, whether, in its balanced and nonpartisan view, as I asked, it will show the hundreds of plants that have closed down since the implementation of the FTA, any of the hundreds of thousands of Canada workers who have lost their jobs in the manufacturing sector since 1989, or whether it will provide any useful information to these workers about the adjustment programs. I expect the answers will be "no", "no", and "no", but I would be delighted to be surprised by some "yes" answers to those questions.

After he has had a chance to have a detailed look at those questions, perhaps the Leader of the Government could include a consideration of the fact that 13.9 per cent of Ontarians under 60 were on welfare in June of 1991 compared to 5 per cent in the 1982-82 recession; and in February of this year, 1.151 million Ontarians were receiving welfare. That is one million, one hundred and fifty-one thousand men, women, and children.

The government is now proposing to spend $25 million to tell them things are not that bad. I hope there will be an explanation as to why that money is better being spent this way than on measures to help these unfortunate people.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the short answer to the question is that the government does not consider it our responsibility to further disseminate the wild exaggerations of Miss Maude Barlow and her friends. We leave that to the honourable senator and his colleagues.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not think anyone will be surprised to hear that the government is not engaged in promoting the "wild exaggerations" of Maude Barlow. That was not my question. Of course I do not expect the Artless Dodger to deal with any of these questions, but I do remind him that that is not what I asked.

I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the government would show the hundreds of plants that have closed down since the implementation of the free trade agreement—a fact, not a wild exaggeration; whether it will show the hundreds of thousands of Canadian workers who have lost their jobs—not an exaggeration.

Senator Perrault: Four hundred and sixty-one thousand.

Senator Frith: Information about the adjustment program; is that a wild exaggeration? That is all I am asking. Will there be information about that? Will there be something dealing with the situation in Ontario that I mentioned? None of that has anything to do with Maude Barlow.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator attributes the closure of hundreds of plants to the free trade agreement without really being in a position to document his assertion. There will be ample opportunity in another arena, and that is the electoral arena, for Mr. Chrétien, Mr. Axworthy and other Liberals to mount the barricades again and advocate their policy, which is to tear up the free trade agreement. I suspect they will have as much success as their predecessors had in 1988.

● (1430)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the question was whether it would present a balanced approach. The inference is that it will not be balanced. The questions are on the record.

Senator Murray: As are the answers on the record.

Senator Frith: The leader's "answers" are on the record. We can leave it to the people of Canada to see whether he has come even close to dealing with the questions that were asked.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN—USE OF CANADIAN AGENCIES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the fact that the government has virtually wiped out the Canadian advertising industry, I am interested in knowing what is the ongoing policy of the government concerning Canadian advertising as opposed to American advertising. Could the leader inform us as to how much of this campaign being discussed by my leader has been done by American advertising agencies, and how much by Canadian advertising agencies?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, first, I do not accept the premise of the question, namely, that the government has—what was the phrase?

Senator Davey: "Wiped out".

Senator Murray: —has wiped out the Canadian advertising industry. I should like to hear the honourable senator elaborate on that assertion at the appropriate time.

Secondly, I know that there is a policy with regard to government advertising business. The effective ownership and control of those companies carrying out advertising must be Canadian, if they are to receive advertising contracts from the Government of Canada. Off the top of my head, I do not recall which agencies are carrying out the "Buy Canada" and the "Yes, we can" campaigns. It will not be difficult for me to get the names of those companies and to inform my honourable friend.

Senator Davey: I would withdraw the words "wiped out". I should more accurately have said "destroyed". "Wiped out" is, perhaps, unfair. "Destroyed" is not unfair, in my opinion, because I think the industry has been destroyed.

I would very much like to have the information on these campaigns.

Senator Murray: No problem.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, just to complete the discussion of this subject, I want the record to show, since I am quite glad to have the questions and the so-called answers examined on the record, that the source of the numbers I was using, particularly those regarding Ontario, was not Mrs. Barlow. Their source was Canada's national newspaper, the former employer of our colleague, Senator Doyle, the Globe and Mail. I would be glad to give him the details, if he wants them, but he can find them in that newspaper himself, I am sure.

RADIO CANADA INTERNATIONAL

EFFECTS OF CUTBACKS—FUNDING FOR GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, the late Ogden Nash once wrote, "No McTavish was ever lavish".

The Leader of the Government in the Senate talks about the efforts of the government to save money, but his government is very lavish in other directions. He cannot be a McTavish.

The announcement about this gross spending program to propagandize Canada is an affront to all of the taxpayers in this country who have been asked to make a sacrifice. On the one hand, we have this offensive advertising campaign. I hope the Leader of the Government will give us the names of the companies placing the advertisements. Let us find out the names of the principals.

Senator Murray: I just undertook to do that.

Senator Perrault: I appreciate that very much.

I have three short questions arising from my preliminary question.

On December 5, 1990, CBC President Gerard Veilleux announced that the CBC would no longer fund Radio Canada International.

On March 22, 1991, the CBC Vice-President, Michael McEwen, informed RCI that the government had decided to reduce its budget by one third, cut its staff by one half and eliminate three-quarters of RCI produced programs.

On March 25, 1991, the last of the RCI programs to be cut went off the air.

On March 28, Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Clark, announced the financial package worked out by the government.

Will the government not reconsider the devastating cut that hit this Canadian shortwave service? Does the Leader of the Government realize the number of Canadians who regard as mandatory equipment a shortwave receiver so that they can keep in touch with Canada when they are abroad, let alone the vast non-Canadian audience that we have in other countries?

The cut removed one-third of RCI's $20 million budget, eliminated half the staff and three-quarters of RCI produced programming. Yet, the government has not been convinced to the point to reverse its decision to underfund RCI and have recently resisted efforts to call for an inquiry into the cuts.

It is so embarrassing that even people associated with the government are critical. Let me read a quotation from Jean-Pierre Hogue, Conservative Deputy Chairman of the Commons Committee on Communications. He said this to advocates for the restoration of this service:

[Senator Frith.]

> Having listened to you I feel almost guilty . . . Somebody must be wondering what does all this mean? There is no visible sign of madness, until now, but somebody's brains must be addled. I am talking about the government or its members.

Do you really accept this kind of criticism from your own back-bencher, who says that your brains are addled? For heaven's sake, you must have a talk with Mr. Hogue.

What I ask the government leader is this: Will there be an independent examination of the series of efforts that led to the cut, and the assumptions that were made? Can we have some explanation as to how a short-term saving of $6.5 million, which is only a minuscule amount compared with the cost of the big, lavish advertising campaign announced yesterday, makes any sense at all, in view of the impact on the service?

There are numerous other questions that remain unanswered, such as: Did the CBC really have the legal right to relieve itself of responsibility for financing Radio Canada International? The Broadcast Act suggests the contrary.

Who made the decision that RCI would either be eliminated or have a reduced budget? Why were some ministries contacted and such an obvious one as Tourism left out? Why was it felt that we could stop broadcasting to our major economic partners, the United States, Germany and Japan?

All it would take to reinstate the service is a restoration of that $6.5 million, or most of it. Cut back on some of your propagandizing. Cut back on this pamphlet campaign that you have going into the supermarkets of western Canada.

Every day that the government delays, the overseas service loses more listeners who have grown up to appreciate the CBI brand of outstanding Canadian journalism. As it is, we are now faced with repeated rebroadcasts of domestic programs, or generic productions that cannot be topical. Just listen to the nation's voice abroad and you will find out that all I have said is true.

My final sentence is this: All of the G-7 countries are increasing their involvement in shortwave broadcasting. Canada is the only one to have retreated in this regard. Canada is the only one to cut back funding for a world-class service. It is incredible that on the 125th anniversary of Canada's existence as a country we are still questioning whether we should be talking to the world on a daily basis.

Restoring this service is important not only to Canadians but to non-Canadians around the world who are still waiting for a reversal. I hope the government will come to its senses.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is an issue that was brought to our attention some considerable time ago and, indeed, on several occasions by our colleague, Finlay MacDonald.

I will make inquiries to see whether there is anything that can be added to the replies that have been given on previous occasions and, in particular, whether there is some further information that can be brought in in response to Senator Perrault's questions.

PUBLIC WORKS

EXCLUSION OF MARITIME FIRMS FROM CONSTRUCTION OF FIXED LINK—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John M. Forrestall: Honourable senators may recall that a couple of weeks or so ago I inquired of the government as to its position with respect to a report commissioned in Atlantic Canada dealing with the economic spin-offs that will be available to New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and particularly Prince Edward Island, as a result of the fixed link, should it go ahead later this year.

At the time, the Leader of the Government was not in a position to respond. I wonder if he is now in a position to respond to my inquiry.

● (1440)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will respond to that question now rather than during the time for delayed answers, because the notes I have are in one language only and it is our custom to table documents in both languages.

The Government of Canada's requirement for the fixed link project is to maximize the regional benefits to Atlantic Canada. The three competing developers, and Borden Bridge Company, Strait Crossing Inc., and PEI Bridge Limited, successfully addressed these criteria in their response to the Stage II proposal call by agreeing to maximize the use of goods, services and labour from the Atlantic provinces. A study completed by the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council in July of 1991 provided information which is being used by the government to ensure maximum participation of Atlantic Canadian companies in the project.

The study emphasized that the project would generate substantial economic benefits to the region and would provide Atlantic Canadian companies with additional business opportunities. The APEC study also stressed the competitive aspect of the process and the necessity for the government to ensure maximum use of Atlantic Canadian companies. I quote:

> There is no reason to believe that the Maritime provinces could not obtain substantial contracts, especially if Public Works uses its powers fully.

Should the project proceed, a socio-economic benefits committee headed by the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency will closely monitor the contracting activities of the successful developer with the view of enforcing the terms of the government's agreement with the developer and ensuring maximum participation of Atlantic Canadian companies in the development of this project.

It should also be noted that a more recent study commissioned by the Greater Charlottetown and Greater Summerside Chambers of Commerce, carried out by Coopers & Lybrand, concluded that $533 million, or 71 per cent of the total estimated project costs of $750 million, can be supplied by Atlantic regional businesses. This study also estimated that, in total, the project will create 3,534 person-years of employment and that the potential demand for labour within the region amounts to approximately 80 per cent of the total labour project.

Essentially, the reports in the Atlantic press emphasize the cautionary aspects of the APEC report without stressing the positive aspects of the project on the economies of the Atlantic provinces. In anticipation of the project proceeding, the developers have had many contacts with businesses in the Atlantic region. The level of preparedness of regional companies gives confidence that Atlantic Canada will benefit substantially from this project.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I am glad to have that report about the fixed link to Prince Edward Island. However, I hope that the 15 minutes you took to read it will not come off the time for Question Period, because it is a delayed answer which you were prepared to give later on.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

TOBACCO TAX—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lorne Bonnell: Can the minister tell me why the Government of Canada has backtracked on the imposition of an excise tax on tobacco?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): The government intends to proceed with the legislation on that tax but we will not, at the moment, collect it because the purpose of the tax was to discourage smuggling. Mr. Jelinek, the Minister of National Revenue, made it clear at the time that if we could find better ways to deal with the smuggling problem we would do so.

In cooperation with the industry, the police forces, the Department of National Revenue and others, we have found better ways to deal with the problem. While we are giving ourselves the authority by Order in Council to start collecting the tax, we do not intend to do so while these new measures, which were announced yesterday, are proving to be effective.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

PROTECTION OF FARM MARKETING BOARDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Lorne Bonnell: I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate, since his government has flip-flopped on the tobacco tax, whether there is any possibility they might also flip-flop on the North American Free Trade Agreement? The minister said yesterday that the only items holding up that agreement were the auto pact and the textile industry. He did not say one word about our farmers in Canada, nor about our marketing system for Atlantic Canada, nor about our poultry industry, our hog industry—all the industries where we used to have marketing boards. That question is not holding anything up. He will simply destroy that whole system. Why did the minister not even mention protection for our farmers, as well as for the auto industry and the textile industry?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government is taking a very strong and unambiguous position in the GATT negotiations with regard to the supply management system in this country. This has been the subject of exchanges during the Oral Question Period between Senator Olson and other honourable senators opposite and myself. I do not know why the honourable senator would come to the conclusion that the government, having taken such a strong position in the multilateral discussions involving 100 countries, might take a different position in the trilateral discussions with the United States and Mexico.

Senator Bonnell: I do not know, either. That is why I am asking the minister to find out for me why, on the very same day that 45,000 farmers were gathering in front of this building, his government representative was down in Washington agreeing to the free trade agreement and the elimination of the Canadian marketing system, the latter to be replaced with a tariff system to be phased out over ten years. That is what they were agreeing to. I am aware that they have not yet signed that agreement, and I hope the minister will not get up and tell me so. However, the minister is saying that the only differences among the parties now concern the auto pact and textiles, without a word about the fate of the farmers in this country.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have to tell the honourable senator that he is totally misinformed. The Government of Canada never agreed to any such thing.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

CUTS TO FEDERAL FUNDING OF JUVENILE JUSTICE SERVICES

Hon. Lorne Bonnell: Yesterday, the clerk of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs gave me a report showing how the aid to the provinces under the Young Offenders Act has been capped. I notice that, under the Memorandum of Agreement respecting federal contributions to juvenile justice services, most of the provinces received exactly the same amount as in previous years, but Prince Edward Island's funding was cut by over 50 per cent, from $5,176,000 down to $2,224,000. Why has that province's funding been capped at that low rate compared to all the other provinces?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have an answer to that question.

Senator Bonnell: If you do not have an answer, will you obtain an answer to that question?

Senator Murray: Well, of course.

Senator Bonnell: Good.

SOUTH AFRICA

REMOVAL OF SANCTIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Peter Bosa: I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, if I may have his attention. Actually, this is supplementary to a question I put to him on April 7 concerning the lifting of sanctions in South Africa. On that occasion, I elucidated the fact that the South African government was in the process of dismantling the practice of apartheid and that they were in the process of extending the vote to all citizens of South Africa. I asked whether Canada intended to lift its sanctions in that country, as the European Community has done.

I read in the Globe and Mail today that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has intimated that perhaps she will convince her colleagues in the Commonwealth to lift the sanctions. I am wondering whether the leader could tell us what changes in criteria have taken place between April 7 and today, April 9?

● (1450)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there has been no change in the criteria, nor am I in a position to know or to say how much closer South Africa may be to satisfying the criteria that the Commonwealth laid down. The point is that we take these decisions in concert with our Commonwealth partners. We have found that doing so is a very effective way to proceed. The minister, Mrs. McDougall, has made it clear that we will not lift sanctions until the criteria laid down by the Commonwealth have been satisfied, including appropriate transitional arrangements in South Africa which, to the best of my knowledge, have not yet been agreed upon.

Senator Bosa: Could the honourable gentleman outline the criteria that the Commonwealth has imposed before recognition can be given to lift the sanctions?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, let me get a formal statement on that matter from the department, and I will bring it into the chamber.

CUBA

TRADE RELATIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, given the changes in the world situation, the situation of Cuba becomes particularly interesting. I wonder if the Leader of the Government could tell this chamber whether the government's policy toward trade with Cuba has changed, or whether the government is contemplating a change in the trade relations with that country?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will ask for a status report from the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, I wonder if the minister would be kind enough to ask what the Government of Canada's reaction is to the recent movement of the leadership in Cuba towards a relationship with a number of Arab states? There have been meetings recently in Havana involving the leaders of the Cuban government and representatives of the governments of Iran, Libya, Syria and Tunis. I wonder whether the government has an interest in that situation and whether that kind of realignment would have any impact on our policy?

Senator Murray: I would be glad to put that question to my colleague as well, honourable senators.

FISHERIES

FOREIGN OVERFISHING OF NORTHERN COD—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. A few days ago, the European Community offered to cut the amount of northern cod taken in international waters just outside the 200-mile limit, if they were allowed the entry to Canadian ports that has been denied them since the early 1980s. News reports say the European fisheries ministers will reduce their established catch level by half. How can this be a concession, since they have no legal right to catch northern cod in the first place!

The Honourable John Crosbie has called the offer an insult and a gimmick. I certainly agree with him. In light of the foregoing, my question is: Are the negotiations continuing and, if so, at what stage are they now?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): There again, honourable senators, I would ask for an update from my cabinet colleagues on that matter. The honourable senator has correctly quoted the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Mr. Crosbie, as to Canada's response to that non-offer or to that non-concession by the Europeans. I do not think there is anything I need to add.

Senator Frith: It was not a non-offer; it was a non-concession.

THE CONSTITUTION

BEAUDOIN-DOBBIE REPORT—STATEMENTS OF MINISTERS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): My question is for the Leader of the Government. Has the minister been able to obtain any statements, clippings or smidgeons of information from radio stories where Ministers Loiselle, Masse or Benoit Bouchard have said anything favouring the Beaudoin-Dobbie report and favouring Canada?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I must confess that I have not been terribly diligent in my search since our exchange the other day, as I do have other things to do.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition: Advertising campaigns—

Senator Murray: Well, yes, as a matter of fact.

Senator Frith: —telling the whole story.

Senator Murray: Again, I want to assure the honourable senator that if anything turns up, I will be glad to share it with him.

Senator Frith: But you will be looking the other way.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have four delayed answers to oral questions, the first one raised on March 26 by Senator Marsden regarding government policy on child benefits; another by Senator Bonnell on April 7 on the status of bankruptcy legislation; another on the same day by Senator Molgat on the nature of advertisements regarding the Beaudoin-Dobbie report; and another on April 8 by Senator Haidasz regarding the recognition of Macedonia.

THE ECONOMY

EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT POLICY ON CHILD BENEFITS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorna Marsden on March 26, 1992)

With regard to the amount of benefits, a one-child family with earnings of $20,000 who did not claim the child care deduction would receive the maximum basic benefit of $1,020 plus the maximum earnings supplement of $500 plus the child care-related benefit of $213 for a total of $1,733.

If this same family claimed the child care expense deduction, it would not receive the additional child care-related benefit of $213, and its total benefit would be $1,520.

The basic benefit for a family with one child and earnings under $3,750 would be $1,020.

With regard to costs, over the next five years, the federal government will be spending an additional $2.1 billion, or $400 million annually, on the enriched child benefit. These expenditures are in addition to expenditures on current benefits for the 1992 tax year, that is for Family Allowances payable during 1992 and for the Child Tax Credit that will be paid in 1993 in respect of the 1992 tax year. Total expenditures on the proposed Child Benefit will amount to $4.9 billion annually.

THE ECONOMY

STATUS OF BANKRUPTCY LEGISLATION

(Response to question raised by Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell on April 7, 1992)

The Government hopes to proceed with the passage of the bankruptcy legislation shortly after the Easter Break.

THE CONSTITUTION

BEAUDOIN-DOBBIE REPORT—NATURE OF ADVERTISEMENTS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas L. Molgat on April 7, 1992)

The advertisements for the report of the Joint Parliamentary Committee on the Constitution began on March 27, 1992 and will run to April 19, 1992 with a one week break from March 31 to April 5. There is a possibility that the advertisements will be extended to April 30th. The advertisements will run on all networks and all markets.

The cost for the advertisements, including production costs and media placement, amounts to $1.9 million.

MACEDONIA

(Response to question raised by Hon. Stanley Haidasz on April 8, 1992)

The people of Macedonia have a legitimate claim for recognition. Together with our friends and allies, the government wants to see this recognition as a positive contribution to the stability of the Balkans, not a negative one.

Canada will continue close consultations with friends and allies on this issue.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has maintained close contacts with both Canadians of Macedonian and Greek origin who are interested in developments in the region.

RULES OF THE SENATE

SUBSIDIARY MOTIONS—SPEAKER'S STATEMENT

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the question was raised yesterday whether or not the motion moved by Senator Di Nino "that Bill C-12 be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate" is a debatable one. I ruled at the time that, in my opinion, it was not debatable and promised to return to the House today with a more detailed explanation for my ruling. I do so now.

[Translation]

Honourable sénators, Rule 63(1) describes explicitely which motions are debatable. Rule 63(2) states that:

> "All other motions unless elsewhere provided in these rules or otherwise ordered, shall be decided immediately upon being put tothe Senate, without any debate or amendment."

[English]

The motion "that a bill be read the third time on a certain date" is neither a substantive motion nor a dilatory motion. According to our parliamentary authorities, quite clearly it is what is called a "subsidiary motion". Beauchesne's Sixth Edition, citation 559(4) states:

> Subsidiary motions are used to move forward in different stages of procedure through which they must pass before their final adoption. Motions for the readings of bills are in this class.

[Traduction]

Erskine May's Twenty-First Edition, at page 321-2 states:

> "Substantive motions are self-contained; subsidiary motions may be (1) ancillary motions dependent on an order of the day, such as the motion that a bill be now read a second time, or that the House agrees with a report of a committee; (2) motions made for the purpose of superseding questions such as motions for the adjournment of a debate; (3) motions dependent on other motions such as amendments."

[English]

Some subsidiary motions are debatable. For example, rule 63(1)(b) allows for debate for the second reading of a bill; rule 63(1)(c) for any amendment; rule 63(1)(e) for the third reading of a bill. However, nowhere in rule 63(1) does one find that a motion for the appointment of a reading of a bill, be it second or third reading, can be debatable. Since rule 63(2) specifies that all other motions not listed in rule 63(1) are to be decided without any debate or amendment, which rules were the basis for my ruling, the motion proposed yesterday by Senator Di Nino regarding Bill C-12 cannot be subject to debate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Table gave me a copy of the ruling. It reflects a careful study of the relevant provisions as we requested.

During debate yesterday, I showed Senator Molgat the Beauchesne extracts that are referred to here, and I agree that this is clearly a subsidiary motion. Unfortunately, that is not the wording that is used, and some subsidiary motions are debatable. Our rules use the words "procedural motions", which unfortunately led to this debate, because that is what is called "not a term of art". In other words, there is no definition of it. There is no place where you can turn to find out what it means.

For that reason, it would be worthwhile to have the decision appealed, but I am quite happy to have it stand on division so that it will come to the attention of the committee that is doing the review of our rules and have them focus on whether or not we want to define it, to change it to say "subsidiary", or do something with the fact that the concept "procedural rule" is hanging out there with no definition.

It is for that purpose that I would appeal the ruling, but I am happy to have it stand on division if, as I anticipate, my colleagues opposite support the ruling.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yes, we support the ruling; and yes, we do support the idea that the committee looking into our rules might further consider whether some definition of procedural motion or other option should be considered as they study these rules.

Speaker's ruling sustained, on division.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Sylvain, for the second reading of Bill C-60, An Act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as we agreed yesterday, we will be going into Committee of the Whole on this item—that is, unless someone else wishes to speak to it—but we have to put the proper motion forward first.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Yes, honourable senators. Yesterday I made that proviso, unless others wish to speak. I know of no other senators who wish to speak now, so we are prepared to proceed to Committee of the Whole.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I then move that after the bill is given second reading, we resolve ourselves into a Committee of the Whole. The minister will be coming to us immediately after Question Period in the other place. Perhaps we could approve the referral to Committee of the Whole and then go on to another item of business and suspend it and return to this item as soon as the minister arrives.

Senator Molgat: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to Committee of the Whole later this day.

Motion agreed to and bill referred to Committee of the Whole.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino moved the third reading of Bill C-12, to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, if the motion is debatable, I should like to make a few observations before the Senate renders a final decision with respect to Bill C-12, in the hope that I might convince honourable senators to let wisdom prevail so that we can return this bill from whence it came, or at least return it to committee for study.

I say that, honourable senators, because Bill C-12, as we have it before us, is a rather sad, sick reaction by the government to a few highly publicized, exceptional cases of violence by young people. Its response, honourable senators, is to increase custodial treatment by increasing sentences and punishment towards the offender without any consideration being given to rehabilitative programs. It does not address the problems of violence by our young people, but rather, in the guise of introducing "flexible sentencing", it introduces harsh penalties. It does so in spite of the accepted knowledge of those associated with corrections that longer sentences and increased punishment have no effect whatsoever with on the incidence of violence or crime in society.

That seems to be the history of this government. It started in 1986 with the introduction in this house of Bill C-67 and Bill C-68, which was to detain in custody anyone who might reoffend during his earned period of release under mandatory supervision. The fact that you cannot identify who will reoffend does not matter. The government of that day had to enact that bill to convince the people that keeping offenders in longer was a matter of better public protection.

I cannot understand how the public can go on letting this myth be forced on them by the government, this myth that, the longer the sentence, the more protection there is afforded to the public. The fact is that the longer the sentence, the more violence we have in society. No one seems to address or accept that fact. Punishment by way of longer sentences has no effect whatsoever with respect to violence in society.

Probably the worst offence on the part of this bill is that it represents a direct frontal attack on a conception I thought we had come to accept with respect to the young offender, namely, that there was a system for young offenders which would be separate and apart from the adult system, for obvious reasons. It was to be a system in which they would have their own judges, courts and institutions. This bill makes it much easier, and is sending the signal to the judges and the courts that we have made it easier,to move the offender from youth court to adult court. Witness after witness who appeared before the committee confirmed the fact that by making it easier we would have more youths going to adult court with the resultant longer sentences. The Minister of Justice said that the changes would boost public confidence, yet witness after witness said there was no appreciable increase in public protection provided by this bill.

The long-term interests of society, honourable senators, can best be served by the rehabilitation of the offender into an acceptable citizen within our midst. But that lesson is completely lost on this government, which retains the age-old thought and policy that public protection means longer sentences in custody, when that does not contribute to public safety but may, in fact, aggravate the violence.

● (1510)

This bill increases sentences and will increase the numbers in custody. It offers nothing to troubled youth with respect to mental health, education and welfare systems in trying to focus on the problems of youth. What about the problems of drug and alcohol abuse and learning disabilities? Family abuse and poverty are not addressed, and there is no intention of addressing them. All of these things make a great contribution to the difficulties with respect to youth criminality.

There are no plans for a national day care policy or other areas of social commitment. Indeed, there is a commitment to reduce contributions to programs, as was indicated by my colleague, Senator Bonnell, with respect to the federal contribution to juvenile justice services. In 1991 it was $161,900; in 1992 $156,922—a slash of $5 million with respect to the Government of Canada's contribution to the program services of youth in conflict with the law.

Money will be saved in the short run. However, honourable senators, I rather suspect that a price will be paid in the future as we let this idea of custodial programming solve our problems.

Notwithstanding the fact that all of the witnesses repeatedly called for better programs and facilities for young people, the government's answer is to drag more youths into the justice system and transfer them to adult court. Witness after witness repeatedly stated that incarcerating young people is unacceptable and potentially dangerous to many. This was confirmed by a representative of the Criminal Lawyers Association who recalled to us a situation where a senior official of Correctional Service Canada testified at a transfer hearing before the Ontario Court of Appeal and stated that in the penitentiary "there exists a real risk of physical danger, a risk of becoming involved in involuntarily sexual activities, and the likelihood of the young person having to accept or adopt the codes of behaviour in living in such places."

Honourable Senator Di Nino says that putting more young people into that environment is much more humane and less punitive than the existing law; that it is real. Let me quote from the Corrections Digest of February 5, 1992, which stated:

> The case involves Clifton Redman, who was an 18-year-old with no criminal record when he was arrested in 1983 on burglary and theft charges.
> Redman, then 5-foot-6 and about 130 pounds, was initially placed in a unit of San Diego's South Bay Detention Facility designed for so-called young and tender inmates—those who might face harm in the general jail population.
> About a week later, however, he was transferred to the area of the general population after an argument with another inmate.
> Redman was assigned to a two-bunk enclosed cell with Kevin Clark, 27, incarcerated for violating parole after conviction on a sex offense and listed as an "aggressive homosexual" who had been moved from the jail's homosexual module after reports that he manipulated and coerced sexual favours.
> Clark raped Redman on the first night in the cell . . .
> The next day, Redman was gang raped by Clark and two other inmates. He was raped by Clark the next morning, as well, before being released from custody.

Honourable senators, I cannot, in my wildest imagining, classify that as more humane treatment. That is the treatment that awaits the young offender when he is consigned to the penitentiary.

Lest San Diego seems far away, let me read to you from a letter that I received from an older inmate in a penitentiary not very far from where we are right at this moment. He stated:

> My life began in orphanages and foster homes with no solid emotional ties . . . I do not recall anything closely resembling a happy childhood . . . If you examine my warrants of committal you will discover that I was placed in a provincial jail with adult felons in 1955. My age then would have been 14 years old. I received 15 days at that time for drunkenness and resisting arrest.
> After doing time in a provincial jail in 1955, I was then sent to reform school for five years in 1956 for stealing a truck, which should tell you they knew I shouldn't have been in an adult jail the year previous. During my time in jail in 1955, I was raped repeatedly and forced to provide sexual release for others in order to be protected from the violent rapes of other inmates. You call me a homosexual by choice in reports, but none of you were there to protect me from that abuse.

We will not protect them from that abuse with this bill. We will send them off in bigger numbers for that same type of abuse, for that "humane treatment." Also, there will be more of them going. Professor Nicholas Bala, who appeared before the committee, stated that "for murder offenses, there will be more transfers and for other offenses, it is possible there will be more transfers."

The Executive Director of the Canadian Foundation for children, Mr. Brian Weagant, stated that "there is no question that this was a response to the public and the Attorneys General asking the government to get a little tougher in some way to restore public confidence . . . I think it is going to facilitate transfers. We have sent a message through these amendments, that 'we are making it easier for you.'"

[Senator Hastings.]

It will make it easier for crown attorneys to have these young people sent off to adult court and to federal institutions.

Honourable senators, there is nothing in this bill that, with the wildest imagining, could contribute to public protection. There is nothing in this bill, as the minister said, that would lead one to think there would be any deterrence to violence by young people. There is nothing to provide some reasonable programs for youth or address the problems of youth in trouble with the law. There is nothing with respect to public education. The public needs to be informed with respect to youths in trouble with the law.

However, there is a great deal in this bill with respect to political opportunism. There is a great deal in this bill for a government in trouble, and which, with this bill, can answer the misinformed screams of the multitude with retribution and vengeance.

In conclusion, honourable senators, no society should allow its young people to be placed in these circumstances. I thought we had accepted that principle with the Young Offenders Act. I thought we had accepted that principle when we signed the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child, which states:

> Every child deprived of liberty shall be treated with humanity and respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, and in a manner which takes into account the needs of persons of their age. In particular, every child deprived of liberty shall be separated from adults unless it is considered in the child's best interest not to do so.

● (1520)

I remind you, honourable senators, we were a signatory to that convention. Of course, when the Prime Minister got home, after being front and centre, we had to withdraw. It is a sad day for every Canadian to know that we cannot be part of that convention because of our policies. We cannot live up to that convention, as reflected in this bill.

In his opening statement to that Children's Summit, the Prime Minister specifically invited the children "to listen carefully to what we say and, in the coming years, to hold us to our commitments. I hope none of us will be found wanting." Honourable senators, the Prime Minister and the government will be and have been found wanting in respect of Bill C-12.

There is nothing offered in this bill to address the problems of youth or youth in conflict with the law. There are no rehabilitative programs provided for whatsoever, either within custody or without custody. It offers only brutal, raw, punitive punishment. For those reasons, I would hope that we on this side join in voting against it.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I move the adjournment of the debate so that we may go into Committee of the Whole and hear the minister on Bill C-60. We will come back to this item right afterwards, as agreed, I believe.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, debate adjourned.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS AND FEDERAL POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION AND HEALTH CONTRIBUTIONS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 3.

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, seconded by the Honourable Senator Sylvain, for the second reading of Bill C-60, An Act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Nathan Nurgitz in the Chair.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, if it is the wish of the committee, I would bring the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, The Honourable Don Mazankowski, to the committee.

Pursuant to rule 21 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable Don Mazankowski, Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, was escorted to a seat in the Senate Chamber.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, I believe all honourable senators know the Honourable Don Mazankowski, a member of the House of Commons for Vegreville since 1968. He has served as Minister of Transport, President of the Treasury Board and Minister of Agriculture, and has been Deputy Prime Minister since 1986 and Minister of Finance since April of 1991.

We are very glad to welcome you here to the unreformed Senate of Canada. Stay as long as you like. We are always very happy to have you here.

I think Mr. Mazankowski has a brief opening statement to make on the bill, after which honourable senators may wish to ask questions about various clauses.

Mr. Don Mazankowski, Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance: Thank you very much, Senator Murray and honourable senators. I am pleased to come before you to speak about Bill C-60, the renewal of the equalization bill, which basically is part of a longer bill. For all intents and purposes, we are focusing on the renewing of the equalization program.

Essentially, the package consists of four components. First, the equalization program is renewed for two years. Normally this is a five-year measure. I will get into the reasons for the two years later on.

Secondly, we are proposing to make improvements in the measurement of fiscal capacity. This is an ongoing challenge, and we have reached agreement with the provinces on some improvements in that regard.

Thirdly, the equalization ceiling will be rebased to 1992-93.

Finally, a technical irritant which has cost the receiving provinces considerable amounts of money is being removed. That is the interaction of the equalization and the Established Programs Financing where it has served to short-change receiving provinces from that which they are entitled to. That is going to be eliminated. The effect of this irritant would be to reduce the have-not provinces' cash payments under EPF, and under this we will be compensating the provinces retroactively for revenues they have forgone. This bill will ensure that this kind of situation does not recur. We will be going back and settling with them to 1988-89.

The bill renews the equalization program, as I said, for a period of two years rather than five years. We are going through a comprehensive review of fiscal transfer programs, and the consultations with provinces are going to continue. The two-year extension period will provide impetus and flexibility for further changes in the context of the ongoing review of the three major transfers to provinces. Those are the Established Programs Financing, the CAP, which is the Canada Assistance Plan, and the equalization program.

In addition to the important equalization initiative, this bill proposes to confirm the government's authority to enter into agreements with the provinces in respect of the mutual administration of taxes and to simplify mutual tax administration in this country. This is to authorize provincial governments to collect on behalf of the federal government and the federal government to collect on behalf of the provinces. The bill will therefore facilitate cooperation between the federal and provincial governments in the mutual administration and the enforcement of each others' taxes. It will simplify the payment, and payments for taxpayers and governments.

● (1530)

I should tell honourable senators that there has been a lot of discussion with respect to this bill with finance ministers. There have been many meetings, and they are ongoing. The provinces are supportive of this issue. They are pleased about some of the improvements that we have made.

Of course, they are looking forward to its speedy passage. One of the reasons for the delay in bringing the bill before the house was the fact that we wanted to ensure that we had provincial government support for the initiatives we were bringing forward.

Honourable senators, I am joined by Mr. Russ Robinson, who is the Assistant Deputy Minister who looks after these matters, and Mr. Frank Gregg, who has headed up our team in the negotiations with the provinces.

I am now prepared to answer your questions, honourable senators, or to listen to your comments.

Senator Frith: Minister, you referred in your opening statement to a comprehensive plan. So you will understand the context and why we oppose this bill but see no advantage in delaying it, it is because we see it as part of a comprehensive plan that is dismantling important structures of federalism.

I believe I am not twisting or making tortured inferences when I say that this government appears to have the intention to cut transfer payments of all kinds to the provinces. We saw it with Bill C-32, the Canada Assistance Plan legislation, which extended a freeze on CAP transfers to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. This legislation, by the government's own estimate, will cost those three provinces over $2 billion.

We saw something similar with Bill C-20, which extended the two-year freeze on Established Programs Financing, a freeze first introduced in the last session as Bill C-69.

I checked the government's estimate. As I read it, in the 1990 budget papers, that freeze would reduce EPF transfers by $7.364 billion over five years. That was before the freeze was extended for another three years as a result of the provisions of Bill C-20.

Mr. Minister, have these discussions that you referred to with the provinces included discussions as to how the provinces will absorb the costs of these cuts? What advice, if any, have you and your colleagues been giving the provinces about adjusting to these losses?

Mr. Mazankowski: Senator Frith, there has to be some misunderstanding here. This measure is not a cut in funding to the provinces. It is an enrichment of about $400 million this year, and $200 million next year.

I find it strange answering a question which is fundamentally flawed to begin with.

Senator Frith: Do you quarrel with the overall plan to reduce and cut transfer payments to the provinces?

Mr. Mazankowski: I certainly do.

Senator Frith: That is very good news.

Mr. Mazankowski: The history of transfers to provinces has been quite the contrary. In 1984-85, the transfers to the provinces, both in terms of cash and tax points, was $25.6 billion. In this past year, 1991-92, the figure reached $37 billion. In the current fiscal year it will reach about $39 billion. In the next fiscal year it will be in excess of $40 billion. That is not a cut; that is an increase.

Senator Frith: I refer you to the budget papers of 1990, Table 3, which is headed "Expenditure Reductions and Management Initiatives". Under the third point are the words, "Programs frozen for two years—" I take it this is an example of an expenditure reduction"—EPF—$7.364 billion." If I were a province, I would not feel enriched.

Mr. Mazankowski: You will find my figures, Senator Frith, in the budget papers.

Yes, there has been a reduction in the rate of increase from the planned expected expenditures. For example, under the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan, there has been a ceiling of 5 per cent placed upon those provinces which are categorized as the "have" provinces.

Senator Frith: Is that not a reduction? If I am in a province, should I feel enriched about that?

Mr. Mazankowski: An annual increase of 5 per cent per year does not sound like a reduction to me.

Senator Frith: But it is a reduction; it is capped.

Mr. Mazankowski: It does not sound like a reduction to me, Senator Frith, and it is not a reduction. In fact, in terms of the so-called "have not" provinces, that growth is almost 8 per cent per year, and you are opposed to it. I am sure the "have not" provinces will be most interested in that.

Senator Frith: So my company, namely, the provinces, who have the impression, and who are complaining that they have been subject to reductions, and who have given speeches about it, and whose positions we have put on the record, are all mistaken. They should not feel impoverished? They should not feel that they have to scramble to find sources of revenue because of your policies, but should feel enriched? I am not the only one who feels this way.

Mr. Mazankowski: I repeat again, Senator Frith, transfer payments to the provinces have increased, and are increasing. They have increased from a level of $25.6 billion in 1984-85, to a level of $37 billion in 1991-92, to $39 billion in 1992-93, and in excess of $40 billion in 1993-94. That is not a decrease.

Yes, the rate of growth has been contained somewhat, but the rate of inflation is running today at about 1.6 per cent to 1.7 per cent. Obviously, you cannot continue to have increases at the rate of 10 per cent and 12 per cent per year when you have inflation at that particular rate.

We have a debt problem. We have a deficit problem. Each and every one of us in our respective administrations are called upon to deal with this issue.

Senator Frith: I can understand it must be very difficult to deal with such wrong-headed ingrates who seem to be complaining about your programs, and to whom I have been listening. I take it they will be able to read the evidence of this session of the Committee of the Whole and, perhaps, find it a bit bracing. They will understand that they have been wrong all this time and feel better about what has been happening. All we can do, I suppose, is let them read the record.

Mr. Mazankowski: Senators, just for the record, and so that there is no misunderstanding, I can read the quotations from the recipient provinces who have expressed a great deal of pleasure about this particular provision.

The Finance Minister of Newfoundland said, "This is a real breakthrough and will help us get us through these troubled economic times."

The Finance Minister of Prince Edward Island expressed his concern that the results of the 1991 census could negate financial gain to the province from a renewal package. He wanted removal of the equalization ceiling, and was pleased with the rebasing.

Nova Scotia's Finance Minister said, "It takes pressure off us."

The Finance Minister of New Brunswick said that he is pleased with all components of the package.

Quebec is moderately satisfied, while Ontario is satisfied. Manitoba is pleased with the overall package, as is Saskatchewan.

Senator Frith: It just shows one cannot trust the newspapers and what we hear these people say.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: I will certainly be the first one to tell them that, no matter what they tell me, the Minister of Finance tells me they are delighted with the government's programs as far as relations with the provinces are concerned.

● (1540)

Senator Marsden: If I understand correctly what is going on in this bill, the base year for the ceiling provision is being changed to 1992-93, so there is no ceiling on the 1992-93 entitlements. As well, the value of the equalized tax transfer in the determination of program entitlements will reflect the equalization ceiling so that there is a benefit to the provinces of, I gather, more than $200 million.

In addition, because of the tax base improvements which are reflected in this bill, there will be additional benefits for the provinces of about $200 million, according to my information, in each of the two years that this bill will be in force.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is correct, Senator.

Senator Marsden: After 20 months of negotiating the equalization provisions, and given that all of this is happening in 1992-93, especially on the first matter that I raised being the potentially very large transfers to the provinces because of the ceiling change, why should the taxpayer—as opposed to the provincial authorities you cited—why should the taxpayer not be deeply cynical that all of this transfer is going to happen in an election year?

Mr. Mazankowski: That was certainly not one of the considerations taken into account. The equalization bill expired at the end of this fiscal year and there were a number of irritants that had to be resolved. We also recognized that this would have some positive benefit on the provinces meeting their current difficulties. It is clearly our expectation to continue to work on improving the tax base and improving the standard so that the equalization program can, in fact, work as it was intended to.

What we are dealing with here is not a fundamental restructuring of the program. We are really dealing with a number of irritants which have been before us for some time. The timing certainly has nothing to do with an election, unless you know when the election is going to be called. When we concluded this in January, it may have seemed ideal to think we should have had an election within a couple of months after rewarding the provinces with $600 million. We have a number of issues that we have to deal with.

The comprehensive fiscal reform that is part and parcel of the ongoing work is something that we will continue to work at. There are some provinces that want to deal with the issue of the cap on CAP. Obviously the ceiling was an irritant, when it which was put in place on the first occasion in 1982 and renewed again in 1987. The rebasing of it provides us with an opportunity to deal with that further.

There are still a number of outstanding issues with respect to equalization that have to be considered, such as the tax-back and the cost of providing services and the tax base. That work will continue to go forward. Hopefully, we can make improvements as we go along. But these, Senator Marsden, were really important issues that were bothersome irritants. I think the fact that we were able to deal with these found favour with all provinces.

Senator Marsden: Believe me, I would not argue with the benefits that are being transferred to the provinces, because I do believe the burden is being felt very badly there.

Senator Frith: I have a supplementary about the two years versus the five years.

Senator Marsden: Please go ahead.

Senator Frith: Is it not correct that they are usually five-year renewals?

Mr. Mazankowski: Yes, indeed.

Senator Frith: The reason it is not a five-year renewal this time is that there are some outstanding irritants?

Mr. Mazankowski: That is correct.

Senator Frith: Were there no outstanding irritants on other occasions?

Mr. Mazankowski: I cannot speak to that. I presume there were outstanding irritants. I think the provinces would have been reluctant to accept this kind of program for five years without addressing the other irritants that are on the table. Dealing with the specific ones, as we have done in this particular case, gives us the opportunity to continue the work and applies pressure on all of us to address these other outstanding issues, which I must say are very complex.

Senator Frith: Are you ssaying that these issues did not exist previously, or that no issue like them existed previously?

Mr. Mazankowski: Some of them have existed for quite some time. Mr. Robinson may be able to give you some specific timelines on those. Some examples of the issues before us are the issue with respect to the need factor, which has a bearing on the province of Newfoundland; the way in which we consider resource revenues, which is an issue that affects Saskatchewan; there is a condition known as the tax-back which affects Newfoundland and Nova Scotia; the way we deal with property taxes, the assessed value or another measure—those are the kinds of issues which are ongoing and are very difficult to sort out.

Senator Frith: I can understand that. I am trying to relate it to the two years versus five years.

Mr. Mazankowski: I tie it into the major transfer review. Mr. Wilson, in his budget of 1991, proposed that we would be going through a major review of the fiscal transfers to streamline our approach while at the same time considering the irritants that the respective provinces have on their lists.

Senator Marsden: This bill will expire on March 31, 1994. I take it that you and your colleagues in the provinces will be in negotiation throughout this two-year period for the next round. Can you tell us to what extent the timing of these negotiations is linked with the question of constitutional change?

Mr. Mazankowski: These particular issues have been driven by their own strength and their own issues as contained within the irritants that the provinces have and by our concern for a greater degree of predictability and a program that works as it was intended.

Because the principle of equalization is, indeed, enshrined within the Constitution, we consider it an absolute necessity to transform that requirement into reality, and to that extent we continue to work at it. Obviously anything we can do from a federal point of view to enhance the relationship between the federal and provincial governments in the structural sense and in the program sense is going to create better harmony in terms of the unity of our country. Obviously that would be a factor whether we were facing a constitutional crisis or not.

Senator Marsden: My next question has to do with tax harmonization which, for the non-insider, looks pretty mysterious. You really raised my anxiety level in your opening statement by saying that you and your provincial ministers agreed this is a good thing, which probably means it is a very dangerous thing for the citizens that you agree on tax harmonization. Will there be money saved in the administration of taxation by the harmonization proposal?

Mr. Mazankowski: Very definitely so. Whether we can achieve it or not is another question. I don't think there is any question that, if we can harmonize our tax systems, it is not only more efficient but removes a level of frustration from the tax-paying public. To the extent that that can be achieved, I think it is a worthwhile goal.

At the federal-provincial level, we have a number of study groups which continue to work at finding ways to reduce duplication and overlap, and to identify cost drivers. To the extent that we can harmonize more effectively, which is not always possible, but I think it is a worthy objective, we can save money to the taxpayer.

Senator Marsden: Will the money saved then be returned to the provinces or to the federal government? How will the savings be negotiated between the levels of jurisdiction?

• (1550)

Mr. Mazankowski: There is only one taxpayer, and whether it goes to the province, the municipality or the federal government, it is the taxpayer who wins.

Senator Marsden: No, I think that is untrue. The federal government is downloading—for reasons which have been explained many times—many of the costs onto the provinces, I would argue. You might not agree, but let us just accept as an assumption for the moment that the provinces are bearing a greater part of the burden than ever before. The province I represent is subject to the cap on CAP and, for all other reasons, is bearing a great burden. It makes a material difference whether those tax savings go to the federal or provincial governments from a taxpayer's point of view.

Mr. Mazankowski: We both want to save, and if we save, we save our respective taxpayers.

You talk about the federal government offloading. Well, if you were to run the country in a strictly applied jurisdictional sense, we would not be involved in training, skills upgrading and education. Yet, we will spend $3.4 billion this year on training, skills upgrading and things of that nature. To follow your logic, I suppose we should not be involved in the building of roads, and yet we are very much involved in the building of roads in the Atlantic region. There are additional pressures for us to get involved in other forms of infrastructure that are strictly provincial and federal responsibilities. Yet, we do get involved. We get involved in many social programs in the provincial jurisdiction.

Senator Marsden: With respect, that is beside the point.

Mr. Mazankowski: It may be beside the point, but it is a fact of life.

Senator Marsden: There are many other facts.

Senator Frith: So is the price of potatoes.

Mr. Mazankowski: What is the price today?

Senator Marsden: The point I was making is you say there is only one taxpayer as though it is automatically a good thing that there be tax savings over harmonization. However, my argument is that it is not automatic. It may be a good thing in an abstract, general sense, but my question is: Which level of government will receive those savings, and how will the negotiations between the levels of government involved in tax harmonization take place or proceed?

Mr. Mazankowski: Whether it is in the area of harmonization in the collection of taxes, or whether it is in the removal of an activity that is duplicated and not necessary, obviously there will be times when one level of government will experience the bulk of the saving, and other occasions when it may be split on a 50-50 basis. It depends. I do not think you can apply a hard and fast rule.

Senator Marsden: In other words, there are no rules established at the moment for the way in which those savings will be distributed?

Mr. Mazankowski: What we are trying to identify, first and foremost, is savings. If we can identify savings and streamline and improve the way governments do business, then we can fight about how we will divide it up. I do not see it as a problem.

Senator Marsden: If you do not see it as a problem, that implies that the feds will do better than the provinces.

Mr. Mazankowski: I also pay taxes provincially. I am not one who believes that applying the responsibilities in a strict jurisdictional sense is the "be all and end all". We are faced with a constraint of fiscal resources that we must deal with in a very real way. To the extent that we can find ways and means of utilizing our resources in a more effective fashion and get more value for the dollars we spend, all legislators, whether they be provincial, municipal or federal, must devote a great deal of attention to that. We are attempting to do that at the federal-provincial level.

Senator Marsden: Will all provinces be treated the same way in such negotiations, or will there be variations from province to province in the way that tax savings are realized?

Mr. Mazankowski: It depends on the extent to which they want to get involved in harmonization. Some provinces are more eager to do this than others. This is enabling authority to do that. It is up to the province and the federal government.

Senator Marsden: My next question is a question of ignorance; I do not know the answer.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am surprised by that.

Senator Marsden: When those negotiations take place, will it be necessary for a bill to come before Parliament on the questions I am raising, or is that all at the regulatory level?

Mr. Mazankowski: It depends upon the nature of the legislation. It is hard to speculate. If you are talking about a new tax measure, whether it emanates from the provincial or the federal level of government, it would obviously have to receive parliamentary or legislative sanction at that level.

Senator Marsden: Mr. Minister, people in political life are often concerned that the citizen realize from which level of government benefits spring. That is quite reasonable, but citizens are also concerned. If a regime of tax harmonization should come into place—for example, over collection of the GST—how will it be clear to citizens which level of government is collecting taxes and how those taxes are being redistributed? Do you have planned, in parallel, a program to make that identification clear?

Mr. Mazankowski: We have harmonization in place now. I live in Alberta; I am an Alberta taxpayer, and I send my cheque to the federal government. I send it to the Receiver General of Canada. So, we have tax agreements in place today.

If you are asking me how it is divided up, I am not sure. I would have to go back and look at it. That is the way the system works now in every province, with the exception of Quebec. It has its own taxation system. Alberta collects its own corporate tax; but, on a personal tax basis, you send a cheque to the Receiver General of Canada.

The federal government collects taxes on behalf of the province of Alberta. That is why we have the tax agreements. That is part and parcel of another initiative I referred to.

There was a paper released six months ago with respect to a tax on income, wherein the provinces wanted greater freedom to move away from the tax agreements with the federal government and establish their own level of taxation and their own tax collecting system. Some provinces are inclined to go that route; others want to retain the status quo. A study was put together on this, with a public discussion that has been ongoing, and we are looking at that particular provision. There were specific guidelines associated with it; i.e., that we wanted simplicity in the tax system and some degree of harmonization, transparency and flexibility. Those are basic and essential requirements for any tax system.

What we are putting in this bill is not something new. It is, in effect, something that exists today, and will require the cooperation of the two levels of government for it to take place.

Senator Frith: The question was how can the taxpayer tell which level of government is imposing the tax, and your answer is he cannot?

Mr. Mazankowski: Well, it is right on your tax form when you fill it in.

Senator Frith: You said you could not tell in Alberta.

Mr. Mazankowski: Just for clarification, I said I cannot tell right now because I do not have the figures in my head, but you have it on your tax form when you fill out your tax form.

Senator Frith: If you have harmonization with the GST, would the result be the same? Could you tell?

Mr. Mazankowski: Of course.

Senator Frith: When you are paying at the wicket, if there is harmonization of collection, will you know?

Mr. Mazankowski: Obviously. That is not something that we can dictate to the provinces, whether or not it is transparent. The way in which the GST is applied is a matter for businesses within the domain of the provinces. Some prefer to have it transparent.

Senator Frith: I was not blaming anyone. I was asking if you would know.

Mr. Mazankowski: Some prefer to have it embedded in the price, but it can always be calculated.

Senator Marsden: Mr. Minister, perhaps I should rephrase my question. We all send our cheque to the federal government but, as you just said, on our tax forms it is very clear which government is taxing us.

Senator Frith: With respect to income tax, it is very clear.

Senator Marsden: With respect to the sales taxes, at a typical store in Ontario, the customers pay. They curse the federal government for the GST; they curse the provincial government for the PST, and everybody agrees and goes home.

If I understand the proposed harmonization—and that exists in Quebec—how will that social ritual take place, the symbolic shaking of fists at government taxes?

This is Senator Frith's question. How do you know whether the sales tax you are paying is at a federal or provincial level if it is a one-lump, harmonized tax?

● (1600)

Mr. Mazankowski: I thought it was on the sales slip. I find it rather strange that everyone is concerned about identifying the GST, yet we have had an FST in place for approximately 60 years. No one knew whether they were paying it, or what they were paying it on, or what amount it was. At least you have something. You know that you pay a 7 per cent GST.

Senator Frith: That is not what we are asking. We are really looking for information regarding whether or not the planning that you refer to as harmonization will result in people knowing or not knowing. That is all. I thought your answer was that how they do it will depend on the province.

Mr. Mazankowski: We cannot dictate to the provinces how the GST should be implemented.

Senator Frith: I understand.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is, whether it can be embedded in the price or whether it can be transparent.

Senator Frith: Or even whether it is put on sales slips.

Mr. Mazankowski: We have always indicated that our preference is that the GST be transparent so that people know what they are paying. All we can do is give that recommendation.

Senator Frith: I understand.

Senator Marsden: But because transparency was the basis of the GST could you not be absolutely non-negotiable in your negotiations with the provinces on this matter? Could you not say, "We will harmonize at the level of collection, distribution, or whatever, but it will always be clear to the taxpayer what they are paying"? Could you not do that?

Mr. Mazankowski: For example, my province of Manitoba makes it mandatory to disclose the taxes, whether they be provincial or federal, when you buy the article. That is required by law.

Senator Marsden: And is it not equally true that the federal government could say exactly the same thing in a harmonization agreement, namely, "Make it mandatory"?

Mr. Mazankowski: We can say it, but my understanding is that we cannot impose that.

Senator Frith: I understand that. I think you are right.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is what we have been saying. When Mr. Wilson brought in the GST he indicated that we wanted transparency in the tax because for the first time people would have a better idea of what they were paying in the form of tax and what they were being taxed on. Judging by the flack that we take at the checkout counter every time we buy something individually I can tell you that it is pretty transparent in most places that I go to.

Senator Marsden: That is precisely why one expects that the federal government might be trying to harmonize it out of existence. You are assuring us that the federal government is not trying, through harmonization, to make it less transparent than it is now?

Mr. Mazankowski: We are trying to accommodate here. This is not the issue in this legislation, with respect. This is something that was incorporated to help the provinces, if they so desire, to enter into tax agreements of any sort with the federal government.

Senator Frith: It was brought up in the debate that harmonization was one of the things you were talking about and one of the reasons you wanted to have it for a period of two years instead of five years.

Mr. Mazankowski: We continue to talk about the issue of harmonization—how we can improve the competitive situation of Canada and how we can stop or contain cross-border shopping. It is all part and parcel of our collective approach to try to deal with these issues.

Senator Bonnell: Welcome, Mr. Minister, to this upper chamber. We are pleased to see you here. We would rather have you on this side. We will perhaps wait until next year for that to occur. You are one of my favourite members of the government.

Senator Frith: Do not consider that a formal offer yet!

Senator Bonnell: Since you are one of my favourite members of the government, I would hate to see you not have any power in the other place, because I would rather you were over here. I should like to extend that invitation to you now. You could probably have the seat that the present leader has now, if you so wished. In fact, you could probably have our leader's seat.

Senator Frith: Certainly, as long as I am over there!

Senator Bonnell: The fellow who is presently the Leader of the Government does not seem to have any answers when we ask him, but you seem to have a lot of answers.

Perhaps you can tell me something concerning the EPF funding to the provinces for their health and education grants. Can they still spend that money building roads in some of the provinces?

Mr. Mazankowski: I am not sure that they do or could, but that was Mr. Lalonde's intent. Perhaps Mr. Robinson can respond to this in terms of what sort of checks and balances there are.

Senator Frith: Is that one of the irritants?

Mr. Mazankowski: No. It is not one of the irritants. It is a matter of the accountability of EPF and other transfers.

Mr. Russ Robinson, Assistant Deputy Minister, Federal-Provincial Relations, Social Policy Branch: It is true that converting to the block file in the late seventies and disconnecting from the dollar for dollar or 50-cent dollar regime freed the provinces up to allocate moneys more flexibly within the health and education sectors and allowed them to make their budget decisions about the growth of those sectors with less influence through that 50-cent dollar regime. Those were the purposes, because some real binding straits had developed over the years allowing some things to be shared and some things not to be shared, and so on.

I was around at that time. I recall the discussion about the provinces wanting more flexibility for the development of both their education and their health sectors. They get their money on a per capita basis now, untied to the actual spending in those accounts in the provincial budgets themselves.

Theoretically, one could say that they are spending the money on roads, although it is clear that they spend a lot more on their health and education sectors than simply the EPF grant.

You have heard provinces talk from time to time about what the share has become over time as if the old regime was still there and being accounted for on a shared basis, even though they are no longer linked or tied. The answer that we always give when we are asked is that the commitment of the provinces on the health sector is through the Canada Health Act and through the other agreements and involvements that the federal government has on the health side.

On the education side, it is pretty much up to the provinces how big their post-secondary education budgets are, how fast they grow, the demography, their own particular circumstances, and so on. There are vehicles available. For example, they can go through the council of ministers and ministerial discussions, or through programs that still do have joint involvement, such as the Canada Student Aid Program, and so on. There is a fair amount of federal-provincial linkage. But the EPF money does not state what you must do this with it, with labels attached to it.

Senator Bonnell: My good friend the minister, to whom I just offered a seat over on this side, answers the questions in much the same manner as our present leader does—that is, by passing the buck to someone else to answer the question.

Mr. Mazankowski: I just want to make sure that they are accurate, that is all.

Senator Bonnell: Our present leader never seems to have an answer. He always says that he will find out and come back to us later on. But we still want you here, Mr. Minister.

Mr. Mazankowski: Thank you very much.

Senator Bonnell: Could you tell us why Prince Edward Island's payment involving juvenile offenders for this year has been cut? We were cut 50 per cent from last year's budget.

Mr. Mazankowski: I cannot answer that specifically, but I would be very glad to look into it.

Senator Frith: We now know where he learned all that.

Senator Bonnell: Prince Edward Island last year got $5,176,349.00 and now the amount is $2,224,377.00 under the Young Offenders Act. You might find out some information for me and send me a note concerning that.

Mr. Mazankowski: I will do that for you.

Senator Bonnell: Thank you very much, Mr. Mazankowski. Welcome to the Senate.

Senator Haidasz: At the great Economic Summit Conference in Toronto a couple of weeks ago we heard my premier, Mr. Bob Rae, complain that he does not get enough money to cover his expenses in taking care of post-secondary education in Ontario and the rising health-care costs.

● (1610)

Can the minister tell me this afternoon how much the system of federal funding is hurting Ontario, as far as providing for the costs of post-secondary education and health care are concerned?

Mr. Mazankowski: Transfers to the province of Ontario since 1984-85 have grown at an annual rate of 6.2 per cent. The total transfers in money and in tax points will reach $10 billion in 1992-93. That is up from $6.1 billion in 1984-85. In terms of the Established Programs Financing for this year, the Ontario government will receive $7.7 billion. That is a substantial increase. I do not have the figures for 1984-85.

However, in total between CAP and EPF, the growth of the transfer payments to the province of Ontario has been at an annual rate of 6.2 per cent. That is a faster rate of growth than Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland, Alberta and British Columbia. Only two provinces had a higher rate of growth in terms of transfer payments on an annualized basis and they are Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Senator Haidasz: Mr. Chairman, how can the minister state that this is enough money for health care services when in Ontario there is talk of shutting down whole hospitals, not only hospital beds, and laying off nurses and health care workers? In Ontario we have a decreased level of health care because of the rising costs of health care. Why does the federal government not increase funding for provinces to meet the high standards of health care in order that they do not have to shut down hospitals and/or cut hospital beds and lay-off nurses and other health care personnel?

Mr. Mazankowski: Nobody wants to see hospitals close down or health care services cut.

Senator Haidasz: We see it almost every day.

Mr. Mazankowski: When transfers to one province are increasing at the rate of 6.2 per cent on an annual basis and program expenditures are being contained to a rate of 3.5 or 3.6 per cent, it means having to cut disproportionately in other areas.

Senator Haidasz, we inherited a burden of debt that we have to deal with. As Canadians, all of us have to deal with it. There is only one taxpayer. Premier Rae agrees that when inflation is down at a level of 1.6 to 1.8 there cannot be expenditures of 5 per cent and 6 per cent. I agree with him. We all have to discipline ourselves. I said earlier that we have to find ways to utilize our scarce resources more effectively and get more value for the dollar that we are spending.

Ontario is not being shortchanged. Next to Saskatchewan and Manitoba, it has the highest rate of growth on an annual basis of all the provinces in Canada. It received $10 billion this year. There is an amount of $39 billion being transferred by the federal government to the provinces to provide for health care, education and welfare payments.

Ontario has the distinction that, during a period of approximately five years from 1985 to 1990 when it had one of the biggest booms in the post-war period, its rate of growth under the Canada Assistance Plan was at the rate of 17.5 per cent per year. That cannot continue any longer. We all have to discipline ourselves. As Premier Mike Harcourt so eloquently stated, "We are at the stage where we can't spend more, we have to spend smarter."

[Senator Haidasz.]

Senator Haidasz: That means, Mr. Minister, that our once great health care system is being eroded because accessibility is being denied to many sick people for the reason that the provinces have stated, namely, that they cannot afford it, and for that they are blaming the federal government. Has the federal government abandoned the main principles of the national health care system?

Mr. Mazankowski: There are $40 billion in transfers to the provinces largely for social, health and education purposes. Does that sound like an abandonment of that principle? Certainly not.

Senator Haidasz: The hospitals are closing down beds and laying off nurses. In the hospitals I visit I see a deterioration in health care.

Mr. Mazankowski: You are part of the old school that believes in continuing to drive up the deficit further or tax more. I ask you, if you want to spend more money, who do you want to tax, or do you want the deficit to go higher? You cannot have it both ways.

Senator Haidasz: Mr. Minister, have you not searched for ways of cutting certain expenses in National Defence or other areas of federal spending so as not to harm the national health care system?

Mr. Mazankowski: We have cut $2.2 in this budget. I have to tell you and other honourable senators that not only the provinces but indeed the stakeholders in the health sector recognize that we have to look at ways and means of reducing costs in the delivery of our health care. The Premier of New Brunswick is taking a leadership role in that; the Premier of Newfoundland is involved. Even the Premiers of British Columbia and Saskatchewan recognize that the growth in expenditures in the health system have to be disciplined. It is encouraging that both levels of government recognize this.

The people involved in the administration and the distribution of our health care system, which is one of the best in the world and one that we want to maintain, recognize that we have to do some things a little differently. To that end, at the First Ministers' Conference in Toronto we agreed to have a meeting of health ministers and finance ministers to see what we could do to sort this issue out.

No one wants to undermine the integrity of Canada's health care system. We want to improve it, and make it affordable. Some people even talk about a second generation of Medicare to face the realities of our times. This is an issue that is clearly on the plate of federal and provincial administrations. As a federal government, we have not deviated from the essential principles enshrined under the Canada Health Act which are accessibility, comprehensiveness, affordability, public administration and universality.

Senator Haidasz: Mr. Minister, you brought into our discussion the Premier of British Columbia. In the House of Commons you must have heard Ms. Dawn Black, a member from British Columbia, state that one of the reasons we have a crisis in our health care system in Canada is the increased demand on that system of providing abortions for everyone who requests such a procedure.

● (1620)

StatsCan told us a week or two ago that, in 1990, over 95,000 recorded abortions were performed in Canada. I would like to know whether the Minister of Health or the Government of Canada agree that abortion, which is not essentially health care, should receive federal funds.

I was astounded about a week ago to hear on the national news that the British Columbia Minister of Health has said that, except for the Catholic hospitals, all other hospitals in British Columbia must provide access to abortions. No judgment nor law in Canada says that abortion is health care. Does the government condone the announcement of the B.C. Minister of Health that some hospitals do not have to provide abortions, but that all the others must provide abortions, even though abortion is a matter of federal jurisdiction? I want to know today whether the federal government approves of federal funds being spent by the provinces to provide abortions, which are not health care.

Mr. Mazankowski: As Mr. Robinson pointed out, the issue of accountability is fairly loose in terms of the transfer, whether it be equalization, Canada Assistance Plan or EPF, and the details and standards that are provided are certainly not outlined explicitly within the guidelines. That is essentially a matter for the provincial administration. We provide the funding on the basis of the formula.

The Chairman: I have just two short questions. I understand there is one from Senator Marsden and one from Senator Frith.

Senator Marsden: I come back again, minister, to the question of the two-year renewal as opposed to a five-year renewal. I have understood and appreciated the reasons you have given. It was you who proposed this to the finance ministers, I understand, at the meeting on January 30. You proposed that it be renewed for a two-year period. Can you amplify a bit more on the reasoning behind the choice of two years, as opposed to three years or one year?

Mr. Mazankowski: I suppose if we had thought we could finish with the other issues, we would probably have gone for one year. I am told that this process had taken some 20 months or so, and there were some 12 or 15 meetings. It is not the easiest thing in the world to get everyone together. It is not the easiest thing in the world to develop consensus. I guess it is fair to say that, with the issues that we have here, there was a reasonable degree of consensus developed, and so we went ahead with it.

However, there was further work that had to be done on the other issues. Having presided over the many meetings that we had, I think we simply wanted to allow ourselves sufficient time to try to ensure that we were in a position to make progress on the other outstanding issues, while at the same time dealing with the broader issue of the comprehensive fiscal reform review that we were going through. There is really nothing magic about it. It is just a matter of practicality and time pressures.

Senator Marsden: Thank you.

Senator Frith: Minister, these are not really questions. In fact, they might not even require comment. They might require a short comment, but they are not cross-examination or debate.

Firstly, you understand that this process we are currently involved in is a substitute for a study by committee so the bill can go through. I want to put on the record just where I got the wrong-headed idea there were reductions rather than enrichment. In the 1990 budget, I understood Mr. Wilson to say that expenditures in this area would be reduced. The reference is at page 78.

> For 1990-91 and 1991-92, the per capita EPF transfer will be held to the 1989-90 level. This means it will grow with the population increase of each province, or about 1 per cent nationally. Federal cash expenditures will be reduced by about $870 million in 1990-91 and $1,540 million in 1991-92.

I think your previous answer comments on that. I merely wanted to get that down as to why I raised the question of whether we were talking enrichment or reduction.

My other question concerns harmonization. I agree that harmonization obviously simplifies the collection. There is an assumption that if one simplifies the machinery, one must save money. I am curious to know whether there have been studies of the actual mechanics showing such savings. If not, it may be worthwhile in the context of the assumptions that one makes. If there are such studies, perhaps you could furnish them to us. It is not important to do so today.

Mr. Mazankowski: The only one that I am aware of, Senator Frith, and I am not sure how detailed it was, is a point that was made when we were considering the GST. There was a sense that if we could have harmonized the operation of that tax with provincial sales taxes, we would have reduced the administration costs by roughly 50 per cent. Whether that is clearly quantified or not, I am not sure. I will see what information we have on that.

Mr. Robinson: There is an example in a different form, and that is the system that we already have harmonized, the collection of personal income taxes. This provision in the bill would allow these kinds of things to be negotiated with the provinces on sales or other taxes.

With regard to personal income tax, some provinces have undertaken studies to look into the costs of leaving the joint collection and setting up their own separate collection, which is a sort of deharmonization. I believe those studies have shown the cost of separating the two and running two systems would be very substantial. It is kind of a reverse example, if you like.

Senator Frith: I understand those two answers would certainly encourage one to think that whatever difficulties there might be in arguments against harmonization, the assumption seems prima facie to be a reasonable assumption, that it would save. I think both those answers were relevant.

My last point is really curiosity, too. I want to talk about the province that I represent, Ontario. You say that it will receive $7.7 billion this year. I think that is the figure. It does not really matter. I am not trying to hold you to the figure.

Mr. Mazankowski: I believe I said $10 billion.

Senator Frith: This is really, as I say, a question of curiosity. We know that Ontario is complaining. I suspect that you do not think they have good reason to complain. Why do they say they are complaining? What do they say is their reason for feeling that they are being shortchanged? That is the impression one got from reading about the exchange between you and Mr. Rae. I do not want to exacerbate that. You understand the difference between whether you agree with him and what he says.

● (1630)

Mr. Mazankowski: Senator, I empathize with the difficulties in that province. It is having fiscal pressures, just as we have. I never argued that point at all. I simply tried to make the point that Ontario was not being shortchanged or hard done by vis-à-vis the way in which we were treating other provinces.

I can clearly state in a categorical way that since 1984-85 the rate of growth of transfers to the Province of Ontario has risen at an annual rate of 6.2 per cent. In aggregate terms, that is an increase of over $3 billion, from $6.1 billion in 1984-85 to $9.924 billion—and I rounded that off as $10 billion—in 1992-93.

Only two other provinces, the Province of Manitoba, which grew at the rate of 6.6 per cent, and Saskatchewan, which has grown at the rate of 8.2 per cent, because of the tumultuous decline in farm revenues, have had a faster rate of growth of program transfers from the federal government.

I certainly sympathize with the difficulty that the Treasurer of Ontario is going through, because we are going through the same thing.

Canadian taxpayers believe that they have been taxed to death. They want governments to be leaner. They want the administration of government to be more effective and more efficient. They do not want increases in taxes. They want the deficit to come down and the debt to be dealt with. That is our challenge.

Mr. McKenna, in his response to Premier Rae on Canada A.M. the day after the little dust-up, said, "Welcome to the club, Premier Rae. We have been going through this for quite some time."

Senator Frith: You say he was treated fairly on the principle and in comparison to all provinces. Is the complaint that he ought to be treated better because of the extent of the contribution? Or, is it just a matter of pressure?

Mr. Mazankowski: Senator Frith, it is because the Province of Ontario has been hit harder in relevant terms than the other provinces in this particular recession. There has been a decline in the number of manufacturing jobs. It has been hit hard. As a result, revenues have declined.

We have had a serious decline in our revenues. For example, in this fiscal year our revenue decline is in excess of $5 billion from that which we expected. Next year it will be $7 billion. We would have been much happier not to trim. When program expenditures in transfers to provinces are growing at the rate of 6 per cent to 8 per cent—and we are trying to confine our own program expenditures to 3 per cent—and when we are dealing with a big figure like $40 billion, we really have to shave other programs to meet that 3 per cent target while maintaining a 6 per cent or 7 per cent annual increase in these large expenditures.

We would have preferred not to have had to do this. But it is part of the challenge of trying to deal with the double problem of our deficit and getting a handle on our debt, while trying at the same time to treat all provinces and individual Canadians in a fair and equitable fashion. It is not an easy balancing act, believe me.

Senator Frith: Thank you, Minister. You have been very forthcoming. We appreciate that.

Someone said, and I hope you will take this in the humorous way in which it was intended, that may still be a lemon but you have put white-walls on it.

Senator Molgat: Mr. Chairman, could I ask a very quick question? You referred to cost benefit studies by certain provinces on the harmonization of income tax. Were these the western provinces we have been talking about?

Mr. Robinson: There have been some in Ontario, but certainly it is the case for British Columbia.

Senator Molgat: Are those studies available?

Mr. Robinson: From the provinces, yes, I believe so.

Senator Molgat: You do not have them?

Mr. Robinson: I do not think so. The British Columbia ones were publicized. There has been speculation in the press about Alberta studies, but I have not yet seen any from there. The B.C. ones were done some years ago, and then I think repeated at least once in recent years.

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, not only does the minister have other commitments this afternoon, but we interrupted debate on another bill in order to go into Committee of the Whole on this one. We are hopeful of returning to that bill and moving, if we can, toward Royal Assent later this afternoon.

The minister has been with us for an hour and a quarter. I want to thank him on you behalf for a very thorough, stimulating and interesting discussion.

Perhaps as the minister and his officials withdraw, Mr. Chairman, you would want to conduct the committee through a clause-by-clause examination of this bill.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Minister. You and your officials may be excused.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming from earlier this day the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Di Nino, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doyle, for the third reading of Bill C-12, an Act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code.

Hon. Mabel M. DeWare: Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure to stand today to make a few points relating to Bill C-12.

Today, our judges have two choices with respect to sentencing young offenders convicted of murder: three years or life. This bill gives judges other options in sentencing. In the youth court they have the option of sentencing to five years less a day; in the adult court there is the option of parole within five or ten years.

The sentence of five years less a day in youth court provides for three years of detention and two years of rehabilitation, which we believe would prepare a young person for a role in the community and for moving back into society. I agree with Senator Hastings that rehabilitation is a must and is the answer to a young person's becoming a part of society once again. However, I do not agree that we do not have any facilities in place, although I realize there has to be considerable work done in this area.

● (1640)

The minister has started Phase II to amend the Young Offenders Act. It is in progress now and will deal in part with facilities and programs. The minister states that this amendment will be introduced within the next year.

Today, because of the extent or seriousness of the crime, our judges have no choice but to transfer a youth to adult court where sentence is imprisonment for life without parole for 25 years. Several cases are pending today where the court must decide whether to transfer at this moment or to sentence a youth. If we pass this Bill C-12, we will give those judges an option.

Bill C-12 is not perfect, honourable senators, but I ask my colleagues to recognize the urgency and importance of this bill, and I urge you to pass it today.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I do not think I can add too much to the very eloquent words spoken by Senator Hastings earlier. His words reflect very closely my own feelings with respect not only to this bill but to the government directions with respect to corrections in the juvenile offender field, generally.

I have to admit that the public has a right to be concerned—and I am glad they are concerned—about the rise in juvenile crime over the last 10 years. It is up 144 per cent, according to the latest Juristat. That covers the same period, incidently, that the Juvenile Offenders Act has been in effect. Several of my colleagues in this chamber sat on the committee studying the bill which was to replace the much-discredited Juvenile Delinquents Act, and which was to bring in a new era and a new attitude in dealing with young offenders so that they could soon be returned to society as fully contributing citizens.

The steady increase in the number of juvenile offences and re-offences since then has confirmed that that simply has not happened. The standard government response—and I must say this of previous governments as well—has been to make amendments to the act. "To make it work better", "to make it more effective" are the phrases often used. They usually deal with technical and procedural matters which will facilitate the work of law enforcement officials or the courts.

Now we have Bill C-12. The chief rationale for this bill, according to the Minister of Justice and her officials, is to deal with an anomaly in the act to which Senator DeWare just referred which governs sentencing of juveniles convicted of murder. In youth court, if convicted, a youth—he or she—can presently receive a maximum sentence of three years. If transferred to an ordinary or adult court and then convicted, the youth must receive, for first degree murder, a sentence of life with no possibility of parole for 25 years. Judges having to make that decision have rightly said that there is far too great a disparity between those two absolute choices. Most witnesses agreed that Bill C-12 is an improvement in that it will offer a range of possible sentences somewhere in between the two extremes.

The other positive comment I can make about the bill is that the increase of the sentence in youth court to five years, with the last two being served under conditional supervision, allows more time for working with really difficult juveniles and, hopefully, rehabilitating them. The question is, what assurances do we have that the rehabilitation programs now in place are effective? The statistical evidence is meagre but would tend, obviously, to prove the contrary.

A possible great negative to the changes in those provisions is that they will very likely increase the number of transfers to adult courts, since murder charges constitute only a minute proportion of the total number of cases for which a transfer may be ordered.

I should remind honourable senators that our enlightened laws continue to permit the transfer of juveniles of 14 years and older to ordinary courts and possibly into adult prisons for all indictable offences, with the exception of a few less serious offences which are reserved to the exclusive jurisdiction of provincial court judges.

The great tragedy of our present approach to corrections is that we cannot seem to divest our minds of a fixation that the protection of society is paramount and that the best way to protect ourselves is to punish those who offend us and, if possible, incarcerate them. If that does not work, punish them more severely and imprison them for longer periods. We pay lip service to rehabilitation when we talk of treatment. We forget that children are a vital part of society, and that we have a special duty to protect and help them because of their age and vulnerability.

[Senator Neiman.]

We need to remind ourselves again and again that the vast majority of those who enter the juvenile court system have been victims themselves: victims of neglect, of psychological, physical and sexual abuse, of social and emotional deprivation. Should our government not concentrate more on the protection of children rather than looking for new reasons to put them away without providing the help they really need? We should invest more of our money in our children in order to ensure the future wellbeing of all our citizens, instead of putting that money into more custodial institutions and more beds in those institutions.

The minister advised us that her department is working on what she terms Phase II of changes to the Young Offenders Act which will contain, presumably, much improved rehabilitation features. I gather we will not see the final proposals for some time. However, I have asked the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to make a special and urgent request to the Minister of Justice to refer the draft proposals to the Senate so that our committee can make a study of them, just as it did some years ago with a draft Evidence Act.

In the meantime, I should like the minister to know, if she is not already aware of it, that there are many experienced workers in the youth offender system who have rehabilitation programs tested and available which, they assure me, could help to reduce the recidivism rate by up to 50 per cent. We should not wait for the formulation of additional programs when we have the means available to make a difference today. As more than one of our witnesses told us, and as Senator Hastings emphasized again today, the ultimate protection of society is the rehabilitation of our offending youth.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, I wish to inform you that if the honourable Senator Di Nino speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: Honourable senators, I have sympathy with some of Senator Hastings' and Senator Neimans' opinions but we must also recognize that all youth cannot and should not be treated the same. In my opinion, Bill C-12 is less punitive. In a clearer, more flexible way, Bill C-12 can balance the need to protect society from the few youths who, in the opinion of the courts, require different responses, with the need to restore offending youths as useful and productive members of society.

I urge my honourable colleagues to support this legislation.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1992-93

THIRD READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doyle, for the third reading of Bill C-61, An Act to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year commencing April 1, 1992.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators will be pleased—perhaps some will be less pleased—to hear that the election clock is still ticking. If the government of which Senator Murray is a member respects democracy, Canadians will cast their ballots within 200 days of today. However, if, in the words of Senator Murray, the present government is cowardly and contemptuous of democracy, the day of reckoning remains 586 days away.

Hon. Michel Cogger: And your count is 2,382 days.

Senator Frith: And yours, sir? Can you speak with the same certainty?

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was going to say that the government will be happy, but that is not true—at least, I do not think so. The government will probably be unhappy to learn that the parliamentary break itself has not abated opposition to its iniquitous GST.

I have petitions in the usual form opposing the tax, asking that it be withdrawn and asking for an election to correct—

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: You realize that you have come down in the polls. Do you still want an election?

Hon. H.A. Olson: We will take an election anyway.

Senator Simard: I suppose you would want an election in November.

Senator Frith: No.

An Hon. Senator: Keep it up!

Senator Frith: I can only hope that Senator Simard speaks for the government. Is he suggesting that the government needs to have an election because of that change? If so, hear, hear, sir.

Senator Simard: Oh, boy!

Senator Frith: The list of cities on the petition from Quebec—

Senator Simard: That is poor planning on your part.

Senator Frith: We notice the attention that Senator Simard is paying to these, perhaps for the purpose of advising his colleagues to call an election. These petitions come from Quebec: Asbestos, Brossard, Chicoutimi, Dollard-Des-Ormeaux, Granby, Hull, Joliette, Jonquière, Kirkland, Lemoyne, Longueuil, Montréal, Pierrefonds, Rosemont, Rougemont, St. Amable, St. Bruno, St. Georges, Ste Hélène, St. Hubert—

Senator Simard: You had a capital meeting there recently.

Senator Frith: I don't know—perhaps of these people, but it certainly had nothing to do with me.

Senator Simard: That is certainly about the size of your meetings.

Senator Frith: What was that, Senator Teed?

Senator Teed: He is well rested.

Senator Frith: Senator Simard continues to, as Senator Forsey used to say, dream in technicolour—

Senator Simard: You are dreaming.

Senator Frith: —that the opposition these Canadian citizens have to the GST does not exist. He likes to think it does not exist, but check with them.

Senator Simard: Yes, but we are doing something about it by improving the situation.

Senator Frith: The petitions are here. The petitions are tabled. He can check.

Senator Simard: All you can do is talk about it.

Senator Frith: The addresses are there.

Senator Simard: You are just talking about it. We are checking with them.

Senator Frith: Perhaps he is checking with them; I hope he is. The names are here; they are all signed. If he wants to verify that fact then we encourage him to do so.

As I was saying, there are St. Isidore—someone else he can check with there—St. Jean Port Joli; St. Marc des Carrières; Sherbrooke; Val d'Or, and Villeroy.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate is chuckling over the fact that there are so many cities it sounds like the TransCanada Highway. I am sure we need not ask whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate, when dealing with and responding to the opposition to the GST, is chuckling on behalf of the government. I think we can assume that he is, and that this chuckle is the expected chuckle from the government, as far as the opposition of these people to that tax is concerned. He thinks the GST is a joke. A very bad joke, I may say.

Senator Murray: Where does Mr. Chrétien stand on that matter?

Senator Frith: I want to make sure that it continues to be on the record that the government, through the government leader and Senator Simard, is laughing at this point, laughing away at any citizens of Canada who sent these petitions in. Let the Senate record show that the response of the government to your petition is laughter and derision and smirks and shrugs. Senator Murray is smiling at the moment. Senator Simard is about to say something to ridicule these Canadians, laughing as he is now.

Senator Simard: That is not going to work.

Senator Frith: It is not going to work, he says. Senator Simard is reading a paper and laughing.

To those of you from Asbestos and Brossard and all those other places in Quebec, let it be known that Senator Simard thinks you are a joke. So does the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The same applies to those of you from New Brunswick from Anse Bleu, Bas-Caraquet, Burnsville, Caraquet, Dugas Office, Grande Anse, Maisonette, Moncton—

Senator Simard: Grand Anse, Maisonnette, Caraquet, Anse Bleu—I was there a week ago for two days and nobody mentioned the GST. It is the Liberal senators who are making a show of the GST. They are making fools of themselves, that is what the people will remember.

Senator Frith: I do not need to put that on the record; Senator Simard has done us the favour of putting it down himself. Of course, nobody raised the GST with the joker, with the laugher, Senator Simard. Maybe now he might understand why.

Senator Simard: They are quite happy to do their fair share.

Senator Frith: The petitioners are also from Grande Anse, Maisonnette, Moncton, Pokesudie Island, Pugeon Hill, St. Léolin, St. Marie-sur-mer, St. Simon and Ville Blanchard. If Senator Simard is getting ready for the Senate elections, he might pay attention to what these people are saying. He says that no-one raised it with him. The implication to all of you who signed these petitions, I suppose, is that Senator Simard not only laughs at you, but accuses you of some insincerity, perhaps even fraud, but you can ask him about that.

I say to those of you from Ontario that the Government Leader in the Senate, Senator Simard and others who are laughing, think that it is a joke that you from Kapuskasing, North Augusta, Ottawa and Vanier should deign to complain to the government about the GST. That is how they treat your petition.

I say to those from Alberta, those from Edmonton, Falher, Girouxville and Valleyview that the government thinks you, too, are all a joke.

In summary, there are 31 petitions from the province of Quebec. Let the record show that the government is still chortling and laughing at these petitions. Remember that, all of you who took the trouble to petition your Parliament. This is what the government thinks of your petitions. On the 31 petitions from Quebec with 624 names, the government laughs at each of you. The government laughs at those from New Brunswick with 159 names. From Ontario there are 34 petitions, and from Alberta there is one with 23 signatures. That is a total of 74 petitions with 808 names all against the GST, all sneered and laughed at by the government, but fortunately Parliament still exists in spite of the government and so these petitions will be tabled.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 518 citizens of British Columbia who are opposed to the goods and services tax. What will rejoice the senator that we know on the other side and who was laughing so hard earlier is that all these 518 citizens are from the same community, Kamloops, which will reduce accordingly the time spent reading this petition.

[English]

These 518 citizens of British Columbia are opposed to the GST for all kinds of reasons. They mention a few of them in their petition, some of which I think I should read to honourable senators.

First, they simply oppose the new tax. Second, they are opposed to the manner in which it was introduced—and I understand that—with little regard for thousands of briefs submitted by Canadians. Third, they are opposed to further taxes while the government continues to spend, spend, spend. Fourth, they are opposed to the open-ended ability to increase the percentage of tax charged or the massive amount of administration money necessary to operate the system.

QUESTION PERIOD

JUSTICE

LAW OFFICERS—ALLEGED USE OF EXCESSIVE FORCE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I do not need to bring to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate the riots that took place in Toronto yesterday afternoon, evening and into this morning.

We have read that officials of the Department of Justice are thinking of bringing in amendments to the Criminal Code with regard to the use of excessive force by law enforcement officers. I think it is understood that the allowance in section 25(3) of the Criminal Code for the use of painful and even harmful force is based on necessity alone. The onus of proof is on the peace officer who inflicts harm to establish that his action was truly necessary for the purpose of arrest.

An incident also occurred in the constituency which I represented in the other place, Toronto—Parkdale, where an alleged drug dealer was shot twice in the chest.

Will the Department of Justice make public its rationale for revising current statutory provisions in the Criminal Code? More especially, will the department address the more essential problem of effective prosecution, including cooperation by Justices of the Peace and Crown Attorneys, against the excessive use of force and against cruel and unusual punishment?

Failing this, fiddling around with the Criminal Code will never suffice to protect society from civil strife and its violent results.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the short answer to the question asked by the honourable senator is that the Minister of Justice, Mrs. Campbell, will address those questions when she introduces her legislative proposal on this matter in the near future.

REQUEST FOR INQUIRY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, during the riot in Toronto yesterday we saw signs which read, "No Peace Without Justice". Because of all the sad events that have occurred, especially to visible minorities and their treatment by our justice system, is this government satisfied with simply changing the clause concerning excessive force in the Criminal Code, or will it do something more, such as conduct an inquiry into the reasons why the justice system is alleged to be unfair to visible minorities?

● (1430)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, while I appreciate the terms in which the honourable senator has put the question, I am sure he will understand my complete reluctance to be drawn into a discussion which might even give the appearance of commenting on the tragic incident which took place in Toronto. I do not have all the facts in this matter, nor does the Government of Canada. In any case, we should not at this juncture comment on that incident.

I may say the legislative initiative referred to by the Minister of Justice has been the subject of discussion for some considerable time among federal, provincial, and territorial Ministers of Justice. As long ago as last September at their meeting in Yellowknife, the ministers agreed in principle to amend the Criminal Code with respect to restricting the use of deadly force by peace officers. At that time, Ms. Campbell promised further consultations with the provinces and territories on the matter.

In referring to the question of possible independent enquiries, the ministers did discuss at that time the need to have appropriate procedures in place to conduct independent reviews in cases where deadly force had been employed. In December of 1989, Ontario petitioned the federal Minister of Justice, asking for modifications to Section 25 in the near future. More recently, the Ontario Solicitor General has been in touch with us on this matter. There was a federal-provincial-territorial meeting of senior justice officials in February of this year. There was a call, spearheaded by Ontario, for immediate legislative action to resolve the issue.

The initiative that Ms. Campbell refers to is not some spur-of-the-moment response to a particular incident, but rather the result of considerable discussion and consultation. Less than two months ago, Ms. Campbell wrote to the Black Action Defence Committee to indicate that subsection 25(4) of the Criminal Code was under review and that she hoped very shortly to be in a position to introduce a legislative proposal on the issue.

PROPOSED RACE RELATIONS INSTITUTE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: I have a further supplementary question. In view of the grave importance and urgency of this matter, I ask why the government has not acted on the proposal that it made two years ago with respect to establishing a race relations institute with a budget of $24 million. What is preventing the government from putting that proposal into action?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would have to ask for a status report on that matter from my colleague, the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

DEMOLITION OF DALY BUILDING—USE OF SITE FOR PARK—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government regarding the site of the former Daly Building just off Confederation Square. The demolition of the building is complete. The National Capital Commission has recently announced that they intend to keep the site as rubble surrounded by a fence. They do not even intend to sod it. Their intention, as I understand it, is ultimately to build an office complex on that site. Their rationale for doing so is that they need the revenue.

All of us passed the Daly Building on a regular basis. We know now that it is gone. The site is a natural bridge between the Market, Parliament Hill, and Sparks Street. For the first time in my life I have had an opportunity to see the part of the Chateau Laurier that is now exposed because of the demolition. It is also an opportunity to see a side of the Department of Revenue building that is very attractive. It would be a pity if the NCC were to proceed in the manner that they are proposing.

I would go further and say I do not think Ottawa is in need of any further office space at this point. It certainly is not in need of any more retail space, as any of the merchants along Rideau Street will attest.

Will the government please direct the National Capital Commission to create a park on the site of the now-demolished Daly Building?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the National Capital Commission does operate at some arm's length from the government. I am not sure it is open to us to direct them to establish a park on that site.

As far as I am aware, the government does not have a position on the matter. That leaves me free to say that I agree with everything the honourable senator has said.

I shall find out from Mr. MacKay, who reports to Parliament for the commission, whether there is anything official to report. I am not aware that a firm decision has been taken by the NCC on the matter.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DEPARTMENTAL EXPENDITURES—REQUEST FOR BREAKDOWN BY PROVINCE

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The Minister of Defence announced that 17.4 per cent of the National Defence budget was spent in the province of Quebec.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us what the department's expenditures have been in each of the other nine provinces?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, I am sure these figures are available, and I will try and get them a few days from now and table them here in this Chamber.

DEPARTMENTAL EXPENDITURES—REQUEST FOR BREAKDOWN BY PROVINCE

Senator DeBané: Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate also obtain the figures for expenditures by other federal departments, by province? And finally, I would also like to ask the minister whether he really thinks this is the way the country should be run, and I am referring to this prorating on a per capita basis. Is that the main consideration that should guide the administration of this country?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, this is what used to be referred to as cheque book federalism. I do not agree that this is the way the government is running the country. It would be harder to obtain figures for every single government department and agency, but I will make inquiries to find out what information is available.

[English]

GENERAL AGREEMENT ON TARIFFS AND TRADE

STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS ON ARTICLE XI AND EXPORT SUBSIDY PROGRAMS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder whether the Leader of the Government can give us an update on the present status of the GATT negotiations that are taking place in Geneva, particularly in light of some news reports, or at least news speculation, that the negotiations are more or less suspended until after November because of the election that will be taking place in the United States. That really means there will be no further serious discussion or negotiation taking place until 1993.

A very large number of people in Canada are interested in what may happen to Article XI of the GATT agreement, as well as the terms and conditions put on that article by the export subsidy programs that are being carried out by both Europe and the United States at the present time.

● (1440)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have a report from the scene, as it were. All I can tell the honourable senator is that during the last week of April the Prime Minister met with Jacques DeLors, the president of the European Economic Community's commission. Mr. DeLors told the Prime Minister that he had made new proposals to President Bush with a view to breaking the impasse in the agriculture negotiations. While there have been reports that these would not lead to the required breakthrough, our understanding is that the United States continues to study the DeLors proposals.

The Prime Minister took the occasion of his meeting with Mr. DeLors to emphasize Canada's wish to see a result that allows us to continue our system of supply management in agriculture, and the Prime Minister reports that Mr. DeLors is sympathetic to our concerns.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, projected deadlines were put in place some time ago, I believe; but they have been postponed at least once and perhaps more than once. The deadlines I am talking about are those that have been recited by Mr. Dunkel from time to time.

Has that been changed? Has there been an agreement by the countries which are part of the negotiations to have those deadlines further postponed, or is it simply a matter that one of the participants, namely the United States, simply is not going to come back with its position until after those deadlines have passed anyway?

Senator Murray: That is not the position as we understand it, honourable senators. My information is that both the Europeans and the Americans still hope to have the main elements of a deal worked out by early summer.

[Senator Murray.]

MULTICULTURALISM AND CITIZENSHIP

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION OF INQUIRY INTO RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, today in the Toronto Sun the Prime Minister was accused of not being able to resist making, in a speech in British Columbia, an analogy between the violence in Toronto and that in Los Angeles. Obviously, this issue is of concern to us in Toronto in terms of the recent and unhappy events in the last day or so.

In light of the situation, would the government consider establishing a Royal Commission immediately to examine the root causes of racial discrimination in the country and suggest ways of eradicating them?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Minister of Justice has indicated that she intends to take certain legislative initiatives in the area of the use of force by the police, for example. As I started to indicate a while ago, we have been making concerted efforts to fight racism in this country. Indeed, the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship has, as one of its priorities, the fight against racial discrimination and prejudice in this country. We will take the honourable senator's suggestion into consideration.

Senator Grafstein: I would like to make the point that the Prime Minister obviously states, if one is to take him at face value, that existing institutions, including those created or governed by him, are not satisfactory, since he suggests that there is still racism in the country that leads to violence or could lead to greater violence. Therefore, it seems to me that there is an admission on his part that the current government is not addressing these root problems.

I would ask the government to re-examine that in the light of the Prime Minister's comments, and perhaps make a fresh start by looking at the problem through independent eyes with a Royal Commission.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not accept the premise of the honourable senator's question, that the Prime Minister has admitted that Parliament and the government are not addressing the question. I have just tried to indicate some of the ways in which the government is trying to address the question, specifically through programs such as the Race Relations and Cultural Understanding Program and its Blueprint for National Action on Race Relations of the Department of Citizenship and Multiculturalism.

It does not necessarily follow that if we still have a problem in the country the solution to the problem lies in the appointment of a Royal Commission.

TRANSPORT

NATIONAL HIGHWAYS SYSTEM—STATUS OF PROPOSED HIGHWAYS PROGRAM

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is directed to the government leader in the Senate. At the time of the recent economic meeting of first ministers a number of statements were made about the possibility of having a national highways program. Various figures were discussed at that time in a working paper for the Prime Minister, I believe.

He is quoted as having said:

> It is the intention of this government to conclude, at some early moment, some agreements with various provinces in this particular area to provide for better roads.
> These are the kind of things that we can do in short order that will have a very substantial impact on job creation both in those areas and across Canada.

That meeting, as I recall it, was in the early part of March. We are now into May and the construction season will be getting under way. Will the government be announcing its program in this regard? When can we expect to have details?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the state of the country's transportation facilities was the subject matter of considerable discussion at the first ministers' meeting. There has been a study completed of what is called the National Highways System. I think my honourable friend is familiar with that. The first ministers have taken that into consideration.

As a matter of fact, the Minister of Finance, in his budget in February, indicated that the question of infrastructure, including such matters as highways, was a live one before the government and that the improvement of our transportation system is closely linked to the government's objectives in terms of our competitiveness, trade and prosperity.

But the short answer to the honourable senator's question is, yes, there will be announcements in the very near future on this matter.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to table a number of delayed answers to oral questions. There are answers to two questions raised on March 24 by Senator Marsden, one regarding departmental transfers of foreign service officers, the other on the impact of these transfers on gender. There are responses to a question asked on March 26 by Senator Frith on the Dryden Inquiry; one asked on April 1 by Senator Molgat on the purchase of U.S. locomotives by CN; one asked on April 8 by Senator Perrault on the government pamphlet "Where Your Tax Dollars Go"; and questions asked on April 9 by Senator Bosa, on sanctions against South Africa, by Senator Marsden, on trade relations with Cuba, by Senator Davey, on the government advertising campaign, by Senator Bonnell, on cuts to federal funding of juvenile justice services in P.E.I., and by Senator Perrault, regarding Radio Canada International.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorna Marsden on March 24, 1992)

> The Department of External Affairs and International Trade Canada (EAITC) remains committed to the principle of consultations with all unions. Management at EAITC considered the practical options in this case and was confronted with a dilemma given the requirement of budget secrecy and the fact that, until late in the budget process, it was not clear which of a number of potential departmental items would be in the actual budget speech.
> One option would have been to consult associations and unions at the last minute and even then only on matters not in the budget. That option would have put management in the position of having to prevaricate to preserve budget secrecy if asked "is that all there is?"
> The other approach was to consider all the transfer decisions in the sphere of the budget and to treat them the same way as management had to treat the one item—cultural and academic relations—which was specifically mentioned in the budget speech.
> Management at EAITC decided that all of the transfer decisions were, in reality, a single package and that it made the most sense to treat them that way in the period leading up to the announcement.
> It should be noted that within minutes of the Finance Minister announcing the EAITC budget transfer item in the House of Commons, the distribution of comprehensive information kits for each departmental employee started, including for those at our missions around the world. Senior management at the Department also met the next morning with involved employees to explain the transfer decisions and to answer questions. Since that time, management has been meeting with associations and unions concerned to discuss the implementation process for these transfer decisions and to address issues of concern.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY—GENDER IMPACT OF DEPARTMENTAL TRANSFERS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorna Marsden on March 24, 1992)

> The Government's rationale for transferring the immigration program from the Department of External Affairs and International Trade Canada (EAITC) to the Department of Employment and Immigration Canada (EIC) was to make both departments more effective by linking up policy formulation and program delivery. We recognize that there is a higher percentage of women in the immigration stream than in the other foreign service streams and that these women will be transferred to EIC management.

The Department of EAITC is losing good employees as a result of the transfer. That said, the regrettable loss to EAITC of the women involved does not mean that they are being lost to either the public service or the foreign service. All immigration officers will continue to represent Canadian interests abroad working out of our missions, as is currently the case.

The Department of EAITC remains committed to increasing the number of women in its ranks and to this end a priority in our annual Foreign Service recruitment program remains the hiring of women and visible minorities.

TRANSPORT

DRYDEN INQUIRY—RELEASE OF REPORT—GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

(Response to question raised by Hon. Royce Frith on March 26, 1992)

Transportation safety is the top priority at Transport Canada. Each year the department devotes considerable time, energy and resources to maintain and improve the safety of Canada's national transportation system, which is already one of the safest in the world.

Since 1985, when the government introduced its policy of Economic Regulatory Reform, the government has taken appropriate action to ensure the integrity and safety of Canada's aviation system. Amendments to the Aeronautics Act in 1985 introduced the most progressive aviation safety legislation in Canada in more than 60 years.

The Aeronautics Act was further enhanced as recently as March of this year when Bill C-5, An Act to amend the Aeronautics Act and to amend an Act to amend the Aeronautics Act, was given Royal Assent.

Improvements to the Canadian Air Navigation System have also been made. These include the $800 million Radar Modernization Project, to be completed next year, which will improve the entire air traffic control radar-surveillance system. The $658 million Canadian Automated Air Traffic System, to be completed by 1996, will provide pilots and controllers with improved air traffic capabilities.

This government, in the interest of furthering aviation safety in Canada, established the Dryden Commission of Inquiry headed by Justice Virgil Moshansky to inquire and report on the contributing factors and causes of the crash of an Air Ontario jet at Dryden in March 1989. Since the release of his final report on March 26, 1992, Justice Moshansky has acknowledged that the Department of Transport has anticipated and accomplished much in addressing the concerns identified in the report.

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

In response to the recommendations received from Justice Moshansky, the department has made far-reaching changes within the aviation industry on the critical issue of de-icing. In addition to the gate-hold procedures already introduced and a new secondary de-icing facility, state-of-the-art de-icing facilities will be permanently installed at Pearson International Airport and new training and educational programs on de-icing have been sent to industry representatives. New safety audit procedures have been introduced so that inspector resources are being used in a more focused way. For example, after a merger, air carriers are audited within six months after start-up and a Transport Canada inspector is assigned to that operation.

Justice Moshansky's final report contained 191 recommendations; 49 per cent of these have been either completed or are underway. All of the recommendations will receive due attention.

As outlined earlier, during the period of economic regulatory reform beginning in 1985/86 significant action was taken by the department to maintain the level of safety. The department increased inspection resources by an annual average of four percent.

The Minister of Transport has assured that resources will continue to be increased, as required and where considerations of safety dictate. All required action will be taken to enhance the Government of Canada's ability to ensure the safety of Canadian travellers.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

CNR—PURCHASE OF U.S. LOCOMOTIVES—EFFECT OF UNITED STATES "BUY AMERICAN" POLICY

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas L. Molgat on April 1, 1992)

Unless otherwise required by international trade obligations, U.S. federal government departments and agencies are required by law to favour U.S. suppliers in procuring goods and services. This requirement dates back to the original Buy American Act of 1933.

Chapter 13 of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement (FTA), which covers government procurement, opens U.S. government supply contracts valued at over $25,000 (U.S.) to Canadian suppliers. In the case of these covered contracts, the U.S. government agencies which are listed in the annex to Chapter 13 have waived the application of the Buy American Act. The FTA, however, does not cover Government contracts for services or construction, nor does it apply to funding programs.

The procurement policies of Crown corporations and other state corporations are also not covered by the FTA.

In the case of Amtrak, supply contracts do have "buy American" requirements. The Rail Passenger Service Act prohibits Amtrak from buying goods valued at more than $1 million (U.S.) from foreign vendors unless substantially all of the components are of U.S. origin.

Government procurement policies are the subject of negotiation in both the Uruguay round of multilateral trade negotiations and the negotiations on the North American Free Trade Agreement. Canada's objective is to expand access to the U.S. Government procurement market through the liberalization of remaining barriers such as the Buy American Act.

TAXATION

"WHERE YOUR TAX DOLLARS GO"—NUMBER AND DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENT PAMPHLET

(Response to question raised by Hon. Raymond J. Perrault on April 8, 1992)

The department of Finance printed 150,000 copies of the brochure entitled "Where your tax dollars go". The cost of the printing amounted to $25,000.

The pamphlet was distributed to Members of Parliament and was also included in ministerial and departmental correspondence. Targeted mailing lists and InfoNet Media services (a division of Strategium Media Inc. of Rexdale, Ontario), which operates a supermarket information centre network, were also used to distribute the pamphlet.

A total of 110,000 brochures were distributed through Safeway stores in Greater Vancouver. Safeway is only one of over 40 regionally, provincially and nationally incorporated supermarket chains—representing a total of 904 stores—who lease consumer advertising/distribution points to InfoNet Media.

The government of Canada has not entered into agreements with any supermarket chains. The participating supermarket outlets offer space for display/distribution centres operated by InfoNet Media and exercise no control over what is being displayed or offered to consumers by that company.

SOUTH AFRICA

REMOVAL OF SANCTIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

(Response to question raised by Hon. Peter Bosa on April 9, 1992)

Canadian sanctions policy was developed and continues to be managed within the context of the Commonwealth.

At the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting (CHOGM) in Harare in October 1991, leaders endorsed the programmed management approach to the lifting of sanctions recommended by the Commonwealth Committee of Foreign Ministers on Southern Africa (CFM) in Delhi in September (the Secretary of State for External Affairs chairs this Committee).

The programmed management approach links changes in the application of sanctions to real steps by the South African Government to end apartheid.

Heads of government agreed in Harare to the following:

— the immediate removal of "people-to-people" sanctions, including: restrictions on visa issuance, the promotion of tourism and official contacts; boycotts on cultural and scientific contacts; and the ban on direct air links;

— the removal of economic sanctions, composed of trade and investment measures, when appropriate transitional mechanisms have been agreed upon which would allow all parties to participate fully and effectively in negotiations;

— the removal of financial sanctions when there is agreement on the text of a new democratic constitution in South Africa, or earlier if all parties to the negotiations called for their removal;

— the retention of the arms embargo until a new post-apartheid South African Government has been established (under the new Constitution) with full democratic control and accountability.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs made it clear throughout her recent visit to South Africa that Canada continues to support, and will adhere to, the Commonwealth criteria for lifting sanctions.

CUBA

TRADE RELATIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorna Marsden on April 9, 1992)

The Government does not anticipate any change to its trade policy towards Cuba. Canada considers the expansion of trade with Cuba as an important factor in our bilateral relations.

Canada has had trade relations with Cuba since the beginning of the century. In 1991, bilateral trade was worth $280 million.

The Government does not anticipate that Cuba's attempt to develop closer ties with some Middle Eastern countries will affect our trading or other relations with Cuba.

COMMUNICATIONS

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING CAMPAIGN—USE OF CANADIAN AGENCIES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

(Response to question raised by Hon. Keith Davey on April 9, 1992)

Two Canadian advertising agencies are involved in the recent department of Industry, Science and Technology ad campaigns.

PNMD-Publitel is handling the television and tabloid ads for the "Canada, buy into it" campaign.

The MacLaughlin Group is involved in the "Yes, we can" television advertising. This firm is also preparing brochures for both ad campaigns.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

CUTS TO FEDERAL FUNDING OF JUVENILE JUSTICE SERVICES

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorne Bonnell on April 9, 1992)

Federal contributions under the Cost-sharing Agreement are conditional on receipt, by the Department of Justice, of claims from the provinces and territories for the cost of eligible services provided to young persons under the Young Offenders Act.

Claims for fiscal years 1988-89 and 1989-90 from Prince Edward Island were delayed until May 23, 1990. Consequently, there were no contributions made to the Province between November 20, 1988 and June 20, 1990. Federal contributions have now been remitted for all years up to the end of 1991-92, for example, March 31, 1992.

Therefore, the payments totalling $5,176,349 and $2,224,377 in 1990-91 and 1991-92 respectively, represented contributions made towards costs incurred by the Province in those two years, as well as prior years' costs; as follows:

Breakdown of Contributions to Prince Edward Island in 1990-91 and 1991-92

Year Paid	Year to Which Contribution Applies
	1986-87(1)	1987-88(1)	1988-89(2)	Sub-Tot
1990-91	109,696	70,066	1,321,529	1,501,291
1991-92	0	0	96,712	96,712

1991-92	96,712	96,712	1,934,241	2,127,665
TOTAL	1,934,241	1,934,241	1,934,241	5,802,723

YEAR PAID	TOTAL
1990-91	5,176,349
1991-92	2,224,377
TOTAL	7,400,726

1. The amounts shown for 1986-87 and 1987-88 represent balances paid to settle final claims;

2. The capped amount for 1988-89 is $1,934,241 which is made up of $1,418,241 paid in 1990-91 and 1991-92 and $516,000 paid in 1989-90.

RADIO CANADA INTERNATIONAL

(Response to question raised by Hon. Raymond J. Perrault on April 9, 1992)

In December 1990, the CBC Board of Directors announced that it would not be able to provide the international service any longer. The government recognized the importance of Radio Canada International (RCI) and approved a five-year plan to keep RCI on the air.

The department of External Affairs and International Trade now has a contract with the CBC, who provides an international service in seven languages. This contract involves $80 million of new funding, a considerable amount, which in these times of fiscal restraint demonstrates this government's commitment to the international shortwave service. This arrangement has been commended by the recent report of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

The Standing Committee on Communications and Culture recommends that, in recognition of international objectives in trade and culture, the Government of Canada review the mandate of Radio Canada International with a view to clarifying and strengthening its future role in projecting Canada's image and interests through international broadcasting; further, it recommends that funding for RCI remain the responsibility of the Department of External Affairs, with the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation providing programming, production and delivery.

The funding for RCI in 1991-92 was $13.5 million and, as published in the Main Estimates, will be $14.7 million for the 1992-93 period.

ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION TABLED

UNITED NATIONS—BUDGET OF CANADIAN AMBASSADOR

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government) tabled the answer to Question No. 5 on the Order Paper—by Senator Marshall.

● (1450)

DEBT SERVICING AND REDUCTION ACCOUNT BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Simard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Di Nino, for the second reading of Bill C-21, An Act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I take it that under the new rules we cannot move adjournment of the debate in anyone's name. We have someone who proposes to speak on this matter, but under the new rules, all orders stand in the name of the government. I will simply move the adjournment of the debate. We intend to proceed with it this week.

Order stands.

EXTRADITION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. R. James Balfour moved the second reading of Bill C-31, to amend the Extradition Act.

He said: Honourable senators, the incidence of transnational crimes, greater ease of mobility by fugitives across borders, and the increasing complexity of extradition proceedings underline the need for Parliament to enact modern extradition law, a law which is capable of accommodating current demands.

Canadians are deeply concerned about our legal system operating as an impediment to Canada being able to return persons whose extradition is properly sought from Canada. These concerns about our extradition laws have grown as a result of the recent high profile cases of Ng and Kindler. The concerns have to do with the sense that Canada might become a haven for fugitives fleeing prosecution or punishment for crimes committed in other countries.

Canada has a reputation as a society which places a high value on justice, and it is repugnant to this sense of justice that the perpetrators of criminal acts can escape having to face the consequences of these acts by crossing the border into Canada. One must recognize that much of the public's concern rests on the seemingly interminable legal appeal proceedings which typify extradition from Canada. The excessive delays in the present Canadian extradition process result from the fact that under the current Extradition Act it is possible for fugitives to pursue numerous routes of appeal. Streamlining the appeal process was the first priority of the government's current review of extradition law.

On September 17, 1991, the Minister of Justice tabled Bill C-31, to amend the Extradition Act, in the House of Commons. This piece of legislation is the culmination of efforts to reduce the inordinate delays that are currently possible in regard to the appeal and review of extradition cases.

In developing a more streamlined appeal and review system, the Minister of Justice, in her speech to the other House, stated that the government had been guided by the following basic principles:

1) The appeal and review process in extradition matters should resemble, as nearly as possible, the remedies available to those charged with criminal offences in Canada;

2) The person whose extradition is sought should enjoy the protection of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms;

3) To the extent possible, duplication of proceedings (such as having a court render a decision with respect to the same person more than once) should be avoided;

4) The appeal and review process should be expedient, but be sufficiently flexible to permit the person to have a fair hearing by both the minister and the courts;

5) The division of functions as between the judiciary, to examine the evidence, and the minister, to assess the humanitarian and other foreign policy concerns related to surrender, is clearly respected;

6) Our international obligations to our extradition treaty partners to return offenders must be respected.

These principles which underline the bill are fair and are worthy of adherence. I am pleased, therefore, to stand before you today to speak in favour of this initiative and to invite all honourable senators to support this legislation and to give it timely consideration. The need for the amendments contained in the bill is urgent.

Bill C-31 represents the first phase in the reform of the Extradition Act. The second phase of the reform of Canadian extradition legislation will involve the review of all other aspects of the Extradition Act and the Fugitive Offenders Act. I understand that a review of this legislation was undertaken by the Department of Justice in 1990, that work on this second phase is quite advanced and that we can expect to review that package within the year. Today, however, my remarks will focus on Bill C-31.

The purpose of the bill is essentially to reduce the lengthy delays which currently exist in extradition cases while, at the same time, protecting the rights of the person who is sought by foreign authorities.

The present extradition process has two stages. The first is a judicial stage where a judge decides whether there is sufficient evidence against a person requested by the foreign state to subject him or her to surrender. In the second stage, described as the executive stage, the Minister of Justice decides whether to surrender the requested person.

Under the present law, in an extradition case an appeal of the decision of the extradition judge and a review of the decision of the Minister of Justice are held consecutively and in different court systems—the former in the provincial superior courts and the latter in the federal court system. The decision of the extradition judge is subject to basic court proceedings. An appeal of the decision can then be heard by the provincial or territorial courts of appeal and eventually by the Supreme Court of Canada. It is only after those appeals, if any, have been exhausted that the Minister of Justice is requested to surrender the fugitive. The decision of the Minister of Justice can then be reviewed by the Federal Court, and then by the Supreme Court of Canada.

I believe that Bill C-31 will go some distance in setting to rest the perception that Canada could be a safe haven for fugitives who have committed serious crimes abroad. The provisions of the bill detail the means available to challenge the judicial and ministerial decisions which are made after Canada receives an extradition request from a foreign state.

The amendments contained in Bill C-31 speed up the extradition process in several ways. First, the number of appeals available to a fugitive are decreased. Extradition depends on the decision of both a judge and the Minister of Justice, and the bill precludes the option of reviews of the minister's decision by the Federal Court of Canada. Instead, the jurisdiction to hear appeals of extradition decisions made by the minister or the judge who sits at an extradition hearing is to be assigned to the respective provincial or territorial court of appeal.

Second, that court will have a comprehensive power to control the appeal and review processes, examine both judicial and ministerial decisions at the same time, and ensure that appeals and reviews are conducted efficiently and fairly. The bill allows hearings of appeals to be combined, which in turn reduces the number of opportunities to take a given case to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Third, in order to ensure that the steps in the court process move along quickly, the proposed legislation stipulates specific procedural time limits in order to keep extradition processes moving. For example, there are time periods for counsel for the fugitive to make submissions to the Minister of Justice and for the Minister of Justice to decide upon surrender. The bill provides a statutory recourse if the time periods are not met. These clear-cut and time-specific rules will expedite extradition cases.

• (1500)

Essentially, honourable senators, in place of the current protracted procedures, the bill provides a streamlined appeal structure which is both fair to the fugitive and expeditious. As well, the new procedures are consistent with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The amendments strike an appropriate balance between efficiency and fairness.

[Senator .]

While the effect of the amendments is basically to speed up the expedition process, the person whose extradition is sought is afforded appropriate Charter protections in respect of the decisions of the judge or the minister. The bill strikes a proper balance between clear need for efficiency in extradition cases and the importance of safeguarding the rights of individuals.

Bill C-31 deserves swift passage so that expedition cases can be handled efficiently and fairly, and Canada can better meet its commitments to other members of the international community in matters relating to expedition.

On motion of Senator Lewis, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

NORTHWEST CANADA CONFERENCE EVANGELICAL CHURCH—BILL TO AMEND ACT OF INCORPORATION—SECOND READING

Hon. H.A. Olson moved the second reading of Bill S-9, An Act to amend the Act of incorporation of the Northwest Canada Conference Evangelical Church.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-9 is a very short bill. It has two clauses only. One clause repeals subsection 7(2) of Chapter 79 of the Statutes of Canada 1928. That will remove the limitation of this church to hold more than $1 million worth of assets. It does not put in any new limitation; it just removes that particular limitation.

The other clause of this bill provides a French name for this corporation. I could try to pronounce it but it would be better if some people who are familiar with these French words could read it. It simply provides a French name which hopefully means the same as the North West Canada Conference Evangelical Church. That is all the bill asks of Parliament.

I hope that honourable senators will agree to pass second reading. I presume we would then send the bill to a committee in order to hear other explanations from the officers of the church.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Olson, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

GLOBAL PARLIAMENTARIANS CONFERENCE ON HUMAN SETTLEMENT AND SUSTAINABLE DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Pat Carney rose pursuant to notice of March 24, 1992:

That she will call the attention of the Senate to the 1992 Global Parliamentarians Conference on Human Settlement and Sustainable Development, held in Vancouver, B.C., from 16th to 18th March, 1992.

She said: Honourable senators, I would like to call attention to the Vancouver 1992 Declaration from the Global Parliamentarians Conference on Habitat regarding Human Settlements and Sustainable Development. I attended this conference with the honourable Ray Perrault from March 14 to March 20. I would like to inform my fellow senators of the activities and issues considered at the conference in the interests of establishing and perserving high quality human developments.

The Conference on Human Settlements and Sustainable Development was attended by representatives from 64 countries which was quite an amazing turn-out for this Vancouver event. All participants endeavoured to further the objectives of the global parliamentarians on habitat.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot even hear myself speak. Could you please restore order?

The Hon. the Speaker: Order. Honourable senators, I think we should grant the courtesy of listening to Senator Carney. We have a rule that says conversations should be held outside the Chamber, and not in the Chamber.

Senator Carney: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The participants from 64 countries who attended this conference in Vancouver agreed that our objectives were to promote and support human settlement issues in national parliaments and other national fora.

I would like to draw special attention to the contributions of my caucus colleague Robert Wenman in organizing the conference and establishing the Global Parliamentarians as an official association which will further coordinate its future activities with similar United Nations-sanctioned organizations. In recognition of Mr. Wenman's efforts and dedication to this issue, he was elected as the first chairman of the association.

● (1510)

Central to the discussions at the conference was the challenge of maintaining the quality of life in cities undergoing rapid growth. Associated problems of social service delivery and infrastructure planning can be found in cities around the globe, first and third world. Growth and planning related concerns exist in my hometown of Vancouver and to a more immediate and pressing degree in cities such as Calcutta, Rio de Janeiro and Mexico City.

To address these problems a new spirit of cooperation must emerge between urban planners and parliamentarians at all levels of government. I would like my fellow senators to note the involvement at the conference of municipal, provincial, and federal government representatives, all of whom recognized the complexities and urgency of the situation we in Canada and other peoples around the world face.

Arcot Ramachandran, the Under-Secretary General for the UN Centre for Human Settlements, participated in the conference and emphasized the need for cooperation in his opening speech. Mr. Ramachandran observed that people who live in cities are both the immediate cause and victims of the pollution cities emit. Of course, we all know that cities and urbanization are not an evil in and of themselves. They provide unparalleled opportunities for cultural interchange and the production of wealth. Urban planners need to consider the effect their proposals will have on the environment and human populations before they begin their work. Otherwise, the after-the-fact assessments will be dealing only with symptoms, not the problems themselves. I should point out that a major impact of these problems in these cities is on women and children. They are the leading victims of problems of urbanization.

Delegates to the conference spent the week sharing ideas on planning and urbanization developed through experiences in their own communities. The result of this week of discussions was the Vancouver 1992 Declaration on Human Settlements and Sustainable Developments, a comprehensive series of recommendations to improve urban management programs around the world. Land-resource management, environmental infrastructure, sustainable transport and energy systems and human resource development: these were some of the issues that were assessed, and extensive recommendations for actions in each area are provided in the declaration. I would encourage all senators who are interested in preserving the quality of our cities and our environment to take the opportunity to review and seriously consider this document.

Rather than read the report, I would ask the permission of honourable senators simply to table it instead, and I urge you to examine some of the issues and recommendations so that we as parliamentarians can do our part on this important issue.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Report tabled.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

CBC MINI-SERIES "THE VALOUR AND THE HORROR"—COMMENCEMENT OF SUBCOMMITTEE HEARINGS

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I want to take this opportunity to advise members of the Senate that the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs is now in the planning stages to hold hearings on the series of films, "The Valour and Horror". We will need help, and I appeal to interested senators, particularly the many distinguished veterans we have here, to join us. We would appreciate your appearance at the hearings, which will start some time in June.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I make a brief comment, under Senators' Statements, referring to the comments made by Senator Marshall?

I had told Senator Marshall that my colleagues on this side did not support his initiative and that, had he proceeded with his earlier motion, we would have opposed it, because, in this case, we do not think it is an appropriate role for the Senate to be involved in—as I explained to him, without getting into the merits of the film itself.

Moreover, I want to say on behalf of my colleagues that they find it a bit difficult to attend meetings of the subcommittee held on a Wednesday, since that is caucus day. I believe one Wednesday meeting has already been held and others are planned for the future.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, the meetings that we intend to hold will not take place on Wednesdays. We will try to have a series of meetings in as short a period of time as possible. At the committee, there was an all-party agreement that that would be the way to proceed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I note that we have no Order Paper before us. Did the government dispense with the Order Paper?

Senator Molgat: That must be one of the obscure elements of the new rules.

The Hon. the Speaker: I understand, honourable senators, that it is on its way. It should be distributed at any moment.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe there is a problem in proceeding without having the Order Paper before us. I really doubt that the Senate can proceed, just as it cannot proceed when there is no simultaneous interpretation. I am not trying to be niggling on this, but I think it poses a fundamental problem for the Senate.

Senator Frith: Perhaps the people who prepare this document believe that if it is not available we will just proceed without it. I do not think we should encourage that attitude. Let us suspend the sitting to the call of the bell until we get the Order Paper.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I cannot give you an explanation. I am informed that it is on the way. May I suggest that we proceed with the routine proceedings and—

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: — when we get to Orders of the Day we will have the document.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton: I suggest we suspend to the call of the bell until the document is before us.

Senator Frith: The bell can be rung when we have the Order Paper.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Thank you for raising that.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: We will have a five-minute bell.

Honourable senators, I understand that the Order Paper has just arrived. Is it your pleasure then to rescind the five-minute bell? The document is being distributed now.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: But we will not proceed until we all have it.

MOTOR VEHICLE SAFETY BILL

REFERRAL TO COMMITTEE—NOTICE OF MOTION TO WITHDRAW BILL S-8 FROM TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE AND REFER BILL TO LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Thursday, May 7, 1992, I will move:

That Bill S-8, An Act to regulate the manufacture and importation of motor vehicles and motor vehicle equipment to reduce the risk of death, injury and damage to property and the environment, which was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, be withdrawn from the said committee and referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions from 527 residents of British Columbia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions, like yesterday's, come mainly from Kamloops. This means that in two days, Kamloops has sent us more than a thousand signatures.

"BRIGHTER FUTURES" PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT FUNDING FOR CHILDREN AT RISK

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate that relates to the government's program called "Brighter Futures".

I am asking for some background information regarding that program. I have the outline of the program under the headings of "prevention, promotion, protection and partnership". I do not need details of the program at the moment, but I have seen preliminary research that indicates that over the past five years Canadian children have been deprived of some $5 billion in programs for children—programs that otherwise would have taken effect.

Can the Leader of the Government ask his colleagues or the appropriate department to see if those figures are approximately correct? In the meantime, I will also be working on more detail about that $5 billion.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in the absence of some further detail or documentation of the assertion the honourable senator has made, it would be very difficult to do what the honourable senator asks.

What he has suggested is that there is $5 billion of benefits that Canadian children are not receiving that they might otherwise have received but for some intervention on the part of the Government of Canada.

Senator Frith: Yes, such as capping or indexing. If the Leader of the Government is inviting me to obtain more detail, I will try to do that.

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Frith: Very good.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

USE OF DALY BUILDING SITE

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Once again, my question is with respect to the site of the Daly Building. Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate be supportive of the idea of establishing a small, special committee of senators, perhaps three or five, to examine the question over the next three or four months?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am loath to impose upon honourable senators in that way.

Senator Frith: Oh, impose; please impose.

Senator Murray: It is up to honourable senators to decide whether they want to form a special committee or a subcommittee of an existing committee, or even an informal committee to pursue an ad hoc subject of that kind in this way. I would have no objection if it is the wish of honourable senators to pursue the matter in that way.

CANADA-FRANCE RELATIONS

ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON—STATUS OF BOUNDARY DISPUTE

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I would ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he has anything to tell us about the decision with regard to the boundary dispute between Canada and France in the area of St. Pierre and Miquelon? Has a decision been made on that matter? If not, when is a decision anticipated?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the last note I saw on the matter indicated that we had been advised informally that the judgment would probably be rendered toward the end of this month or early next month. Yes, I am told that the decision can now be expected at the end of May or early June.

THE ECONOMY

INTERNATIONAL BUSINESS MACHINES—REDUCTION OF IBM'S CANADIAN WORK FORCE

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: International Business Machines, or IBM, has announced that it is about to reduce its workforce in Canada by roughly 20 per cent by patriating jobs in the sales, marketing and other administrative services to the United States. Is the government aware of this issue, and have there been discussions on the matter with IBM? Further, does the government feel that there are any means at its disposal to restrain IBM from continuing to sell into the Canadian marketplace while repatriating jobs to the United States?

[Senator Murray.]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not personally aware of this matter but I will ask my colleague, Mr. Wilson, whether he has anything to report on that matter.

JUSTICE

CAUSES OF RIOTING IN TORONTO—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would bring to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate that, for the second night in a row, riots by roaming youths have again occurred in downtown Toronto streets causing damage to businesses and upsetting peace and order there. Since it is the government's duty, by virtue of the Constitution of Canada, to make sure that we have in this country peace, order and good government, I would like to ask what the government has done or is planning to do to seek out the root causes of this rioting, and to provide jobs for the disadvantaged and school dropouts who are apparently causing or participating in these riots. Would the Leader of the Government bring us up to date on what the government has done or is intending to do in this matter.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is nothing I can add to what I said yesterday on that subject.

● (1420)

I remain reluctant to comment on the particular incidents in Toronto. Under our Constitution the administration of justice is the responsibility of the provinces. With respect to the root causes of these incidents, the honourable senator is speculating as to what they may be, and I decline to enter into that type of speculation.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would inform the Leader of the Government in the Senate that the RCMP is also involved in law enforcement in Toronto and the RCMP is the responsibility of the Solicitor General of Canada, a member of the Government of Canada. How can this government then, like Pontius Pilate, wash its hands and have nothing to do here?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I repeat, the administration of justice is the responsibility of the provincial authorities.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

USE OF DALY BUILDING SITE

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I noticed his lack of enthusiasm for the Senate's involvement in the preservation of some space on the site of the Daly Building.

He may wish to use a very important precedent to convince his colleagues. I refer to Les Jardins du Luxembourg in Paris. The Senate of France directly administers all aspects of those gardens, including providing the staff for the greenhouses which produce the flowers for this world-famous public park. Perhaps, using this as an example, he might encourage his colleagues to be more imaginative.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, one learns something new every day. I must confess that I did not know that the Senate of France was in charge of Les Jardins du Luxembourg. That is an interesting precedent and an interesting example.

If our friends here on both sides want to pursue the issue of the use of the space that was formerly occupied by the Daly Building, I have no objection to that. If they wish to speculate on the possibility of having the Senate get into the parks business, I have no objection to that either.

Senator LeBlanc: Perhaps I could make a suggestion to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. One of the real problems is the difficulty faced by taxpayers who live outside of the Ottawa area in trying to gain access to Parliament Hill, accompanied by children or people who are handicapped.

Since the site of the Daly Building is, I am told, to be boarded up, perhaps the terrain could be levelled and made into a summer parking lot to be used by taxpayers from outside the Ottawa region for a minimal charge.

Senator Murray: That is another interesting idea, honourable senators, and I shall certainly convey it to the responsible authorities.

IMMIGRATION

REFUGEE BOARD—SUSPENSION OF OFFICERS—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in early March, as a result of problems that arose at Refugee Board hearings, three individuals in the Toronto region were suspended by the Chairman of the board, Mr. Gordon Fairweather. At that time it was indicated that their salaries ranged between $71,000 and $91,000. Mr. Fairweather stated, when they were being suspended, that their appointments could only be cancelled by the federal government and that any decision about terminating their contracts would have to be made by the Privy Council. In view of their substantial salaries, can the minister indicate to us whether, indeed, payment has ceased to these people? What is their status?

● (1430)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall have to inquire.

TRANSPORT

PORT OF CHURCHILL, MANITOBA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Earlier in the session I had asked the Leader of the Government about a statement that had been promised by the Minister of Transport regarding the Port of Churchill for this year. Subsequently, I did get the reply that the government intended to keep the Port of Churchill open.

Obviously, in order to succeed, the port has to have some traffic going through it, and the traffic, essentially, has to be grain traffic. Will the government take some steps to ensure that there is grain traffic going through that port in order to justify keeping it open? As honourable senators know, Churchill is the only port in the prairie region of western Canada, and is an important element insofar as prairie grain growers are concerned.

My understanding is that the Russians, who are proceeding to purchase more grain from us this year, are indeed interested in receiving shipments through Churchill because there is a savings in freight.

Will the government do something to facilitate this matter?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): There again, honourable senators, I shall have to ask my colleague Mr. Mayer, the Minister of State in charge of the Wheat Board, to let me have a report on this matter.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to oral questions raised on April 1 by Senator Marsden regarding the amalgamation of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council and the Canada Council; on April 8 by Senator Fairbairn regarding the television advertising of the Beaudoin-Dobbie report; and on April 9 by Senator Petten regarding foreign overfishing of northern cod.

SCIENCE POLICY

AMALGAMATION OF SOCIAL SCIENCES AND HUMANITIES RESEARCH COUNCIL AND CANADA COUNCIL

(Response to question raised by Hon. Lorna Marsden on April 1, 1992)

A transition committee has been formed to present recommendations to the Minister of Communications on the specific details of the merger of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council (SSHRC) and the Canada Council. Issues such as appropriate funding mechanisms are expected to be addressed by the committee. In addition, the transition committee has been charged with developing arrangements to respect the integrity of both the research and arts mandates and maintain the present practice of peer review. The transition committee is co-chaired by Dr. Paule Leduc, Director of the SSHRC and Director designate of the Canada Council, and Ms. Joyce Zemans, Director of the Canada Council.

The Minister of Communications announced an annual funding increase for the SSHRC of four percent over the period 1992-93 to 1995-96 which is an indication of the Government's commitment to support this important area of endeavour. The increase will result in an additional $40 million for university research and training in social sciences and the humanities. The Government is strongly supportive of the work being done by both the Canada Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council. The best interests of these organizations will be served by combining them into one new agency with the critical mass needed to create a higher public profile.

The existence of an international cultural and academic unit within the organization will allow for a continuation of efforts to enhance the exposure of works and performances of Canadian artists abroad as well as provide access to international markets for artists and products. In addition, the increased size of the organization will allow the new council to further the development of Canadian studies abroad and improve international recognition of the intellectual achievements of the Canadian scholarly community.

THE CONSTITUTION

BEAUDOIN-DOBBIE REPORT—TELEVISION ADVERTISING — ACCURACY OF REPRESENTATIONS

(Response to question raised by Hon. Joyce Fairbairn on April 8, 1992)

Following is the text of the televised commercial regarding the Beaudoin-Dobbie Report: "We've all been hearing a lot about the work underway to renew our constitution. This process isn't easy but it's important. The future of Canada depends on it.

Recently, a Special Joint Committee of the House of Commons and the Senate consulted with Canadians across the country, then made a unanimous report to Parliament. It includes recommendations in areas such as Québec's distinct society and the linguistic duality of Canada, self-government for Aboriginal peoples, Senate reform, a new sharing of responsibilities between governments, a social covenant and Canadian economic union. This report marks another step in the renewal of Canada's Constitution.

For your copy of the Special Joint Committee's report on a renewed Canada, call 1-800-561-1188. Get informed. Canada is worth it."

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

FISHERIES

FOREIGN OVERFISHING OF NORTHERN COD—STATUS OF NEGOTITATIONS

(Response to question raised by Hon. William J. Petten on April 9, 1992)

No negotiations are under way with the European Community (EC) on resuming Canada/EC fisheries relations, including granting of privileges in Canadian ports for EC fishing vessels.

The EC's fishery for northern cod outside 200 miles is contrary to the moratorium decided by the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization (NAFO) and should cease.

In response to an EC proposal and to ensure that all NAFO members understand the critical situation of northern cod, Canada has requested a special meeting of the NAFO Scientific Council to review the state of the stock.

The government has no doubt that the NAFO Scientific Council will confirm the Canadian scientists' finding that the northern cod stock is under extreme pressure.

EXTRADITION ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Balfour, seconded by the Honourable Senator Beaulieu, for the second reading of Bill C-31, An Act to amend the Extradition Act.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, the matter we have before us today for consideration is the second reading of Bill C-31, which proposes amendments to the Extradition Act. That act was enacted in 1877 and has remained in effect largely unchanged since that time. The object of the act was to provide a means whereby a person in Canada who has been accused or convicted of a crime in a foreign state with which Canada has entered into an extradition treaty or arrangement can be apprehended and handed over to that state. This action, of course, would follow the request of a foreign state for the return of a fugitive.

The act provides the procedure to be followed for the apprehension of the fugitive and the process for determining whether the fugitive is extraditable. One of the criteria under the act is that the fugitive has committed, or is alleged to have committed, an offence that is a crime both in the requesting foreign state and in Canada. There are provisions that afford the fugitive with legal remedies and protection.

As Senator Balfour has explained, the process is a two-stage procedure. First, the fugitive is apprehended on warrant and then brought before a superior court judge who decides, on evidence to be submitted, whether that evidence is sufficient to justify the handing over of the fugitive to the foreign state. The hearing is handled in the usual manner under our judicial system, and the judge's decision is subject to appeal to a provincial appeals courts and, eventually, to the Supreme Court of Canada. Should the judge's determination that the fugitive be committed for surrender be upheld by the final court of appeal, then, in the second phase of the procedure, the Minister of Justice shall determine whether in fact the fugitive will be surrendered.

At this stage, there is a further hearing at which representations can be made. The Minister's decision is itself appealable to the Federal Court, the Federal Court of Appeal, and ultimately to the Supreme Court of Canada. All this procedure can take several years to process, during which time the fugitive remains in custody in Canada.

The delays in the extradition process have led the public to feel that too much consideration is given to fugitives subject to the extradition procedure. The whole process is brought into disrepute, and a feeling exists in the public mind that greater leeway is given to fugitives than is given to persons accused of crime in Canada itself.

The high profile cases of Ng and Kindler have only highlighted this view and led to a fear that Canada is becoming a haven for fugitives fleeing their own countries in order to evade due process there. It is even believed that knowledge of how Canada is such a haven is becoming worldwide, thus encouraging more fugitives to come here. All of this has provoked a demand for amendment to the extradition process; that it be tightened and speeded up.

The intent of the present bill is to provide for a swifter and more streamlined process of hearing, appeal and review. The bill seems to meet this objective, whilst providing the protections of our judicial system similar to that provided to those charged with offences in Canada. The basic objectives of the bill and the proposed new procedures were well set out by Senator Balfour in moving second reading, and I will not elaborate on them.

To the extent that the bill deals with this narrow aspect of the administration of the Extradition Act, it appears that it deserves support. There are other aspects of our extradition legislation that require attention, and it is to be noted from what Senator Balfour said that a review of such is under way. We can only hope it will not be too long delayed.

It remains to be said, however, that this bill's provisions are long overdue and should have been brought forward long before this. It appears as though the bill is only now being proposed in reaction by the government to strong concern expressed by the public, when the administration should long ago have been aware of its need.

In conclusion, I would say that whilst supporting the bill in principle, it remains to be seen what observations will be made in committee when the bill is studied there in detail for the effectiveness of its provisions. Once passed, however, the bill should be put into effect immediately.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Balfour, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

DEBT SERVICING AND REDUCTION ACCOUNT BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Simard, seconded by the Honourable Senator Di Nino, for the second reading of Bill C-21, An Act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, I should like to make a number of comments on Bill C-21 and, if possible, attempt to throw additional light on some of the arguments that were made by Senator Simard in moving second reading of the bill.

Senator Simard said that Bill C-21 would prove to be a major tool to free Canadians from the national debt burden.

● (1440)

Whatever the merits of the bill may be, it certainly will not do that. Bill C-21 is not a policy. It is not a program. It is not a tool. Its passing will have no effect on expenditures, no impact on revenue, no impact on the deficit, no impact on borrowing, and no impact on financial requirements. It will have absolutely no effect on any reality relating to the fiscal management of the country.

What it does do is try to present the reality in a more favourable light. Of course, its purpose, through an accounting manœuvre, is to make it appear that the GST is synonymous with deficit reduction. We have all heard about the fungibility of money, and because of the fungibility of money the GST revenue will have no more effect on the reduction of the deficit than revenue from any other source. When this bill is passed it will pass into oblivion, seldom to be recalled, because bills that are purely window-dressing do not have much impact.

Senator Simard told us what the bill is. It is an accounting procedure in the Consolidated Revenue Fund that will credit net proceeds from the GST and from privatization to that account. From this account, payments will be made to service or pay down the debt. That will happen in any event, whether the bill is passed or not. The Auditor General will audit the accounts, so that all Canadians can rest assured that it is not being mishandled.

That sounds all right and one might be reassured, except that the budget papers tell us that this account itself will have a deficit of more than $20 billion per year over the next five years. That does not change anything. It is not intended to change anything. Perhaps that will become clear in the committee when members have an opportunity to examine officials.

Mr. Gerrard, chief economist of the Canadian Taxpayers Association, gave an explanation of the usefulness of the account as follows:

> Money is fungible. Just because the government chooses to establish this particular accounting system does not affect the bottom line that the government has a deficit.

The fact is, and the bottom line is, that as long as the government's expenditures exceed its revenues there will be a deficit. No matter how you count the beans, or the dollars, there still are not enough. Putting some of them in a new basket does not change the fact that the government is still spending more than it collects.

The Department of Economic Research of the Toronto Dominion Bank criticizes the debt service and reduction account as follows:

> This [account] is, of course, a public relations sham as all revenues go to reduce the deficit and a separate account has no meaning whatsoever.

I will not spend a lot of time talking about the bill itself. It will do no harm, and it will have no real impact on anything. Therefore, it ought not to be dealt with in itself, except that it provides an occasion to deal with a number of fiscal issues that were raised by Senator Simard in his comments. I regret that he is not here this afternoon, because I have some puzzlement arising from his analysis which he might want to clear up.

Let me begin by putting the matter in perspective. When the Conservative government came to office in 1984, the public debt of Canada was about $206 billion. Today, it is about $420 billion. That is contained in the budget documents. The public debt has more than doubled.

Senator Carney: It is your debt.

Senator MacEachen: Whatever comments may be made, the reality is that we have a public debt of $420 billion, and we had a public debt of $206 billion in 1984-85. It is those realities that I wish to analyze and with respect to which I wish to ask some questions concerning how all this happened, because there are various interpretations. That is the first fiscal reality.

Another fiscal reality is that, today, the deficit is just about where it was in 1984-85. It has come down a bit after eight years. I think in his first statement to the House of Commons in the fall of 1984 Mr. Wilson said, "The deficit we inherited is $34.5 billion." I have put that amount on the record several times. When Senator Kelly used the figure of $38 billion, I asked him if he would please comment on how the inheritance to which Mr. Wilson clearly referred and stated in the fall of 1984 had suddenly become $38 billion. Senator Kelly has not replied. The statement to which I refer is reported in Hansard of the House of Commons.

[Senator MacEachen.]

Today, the deficit is about $31 billion. There has not been a significant reduction in the deficit. There has been some slight progress, and there was better progress in the earlier period of the government than there has been in the later period. I analyzed that rather carefully in an earlier speech.

We are still hovering around $30 billion. The only improvement is in the projections. They have always been better than the reality, and they continue to be better. Mr. Mazankowski is projecting a lower deficit down the road, and we will travel that road expectantly.

Let me just refer to what Senator Simard said.

• (1450)

There has been an addition of $214 billion to the debt since the new Conservative government came into office. Senator Simard says that really this cannot be attributed in any way to the present government; that it is the responsibility of the former government; that even though this government has been in office for eight years, they have been powerless and helpless and incapable of affecting the public debt. It is all the result of the Liberal debt.

There is no doubt that there was a debt in 1984-85.

Senator Barootes: You admit it.

Senator Perrault: A modest debt.

Senator MacEachen: But in our absence the debt has increased to $420 billion. However, that has apparently not been the responsibility of the present government. We have been the unseen hand that has increased that debt and doubled it as we sat in the opposition.

When Senator Simard spoke on the bill on April 8, he said, at page 1368 of Hansard, that the present government did not add a cent to the debt. Senator Simard referred to the compound interest that has accrued on the public debt since 1984. I presume that he had in mind the chart which appeared on page 16 of the 1992 budget papers entitled, "How Compound Interest Pushed Up the Debt". Those of you who have looked at the budget papers will see, on page 16, that the chart shows compound interest of $239 billion on the 1984-85 debt. The budget papers explain, and I quote:

> Although the net debt has more than doubled since 1984, more than all of the increase reflects compound interest on the debt that existed already in 1984.

Senator Simard carried the thought one step further in saying that if compound interest on the 1984-1985 debt accounts for more than the debt increase since that time, the Conservative government is not responsible for any part of the increase.

I do not think it is that simple. I think Senator Simard should have looked more closely into the argument and, to begin with, at the definition of compound interest. I need some clarification on what compound interest means in this case.

The ordinary understanding of compound interest is that it is a payment on principal and accumulated interest. Is there any disagreement on that? If not, it is understood to be defined as the interest calculated on principal and on the accumulated interest. Senator Simard should know that the service charges on the public debt are paid in full every year. There is no accumulation of interest and, therefore, there can be no compound interest. It seems to me that that, then, is a very misleading comment to make.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear.

Senator MacEachen: I presume that the Department of Finance is serious in this table which is entitled, "How Compound Interest Pushed Up the Debt". If you look at it, there is the national debt in 1984-1985, $206 billion, and then the next block is compound interest on the 1984-85 debt, $239 billion. There is another block, operating surplus since 1984-1985, $25 billion, and then the 1991-1992 national debt equals $420 billion.

Senator Simard based his analysis on this table. Would he explain to us, when he concludes on second reading, the calculations on which the $239 billion compound interest has been made? Would he also give the calculations of how the operating surplus of $25 billion was reached? It would help me understand the analysis that was put in the budget papers, that was repeated in the Commons by Mr. Mazankowski, the Minister of Finance, and repeated in the Senate. It is a new argument. This idea that all the debt accumulation since 1984 is the responsibility of the government of the preceding era has never appeared in the budget papers before. In any event, we will await some clarification on that point. Perhaps Senator Simard can help me.

However, there is another aspect that I am somewhat —

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Can I help you in saying that your time is over, but with unanimous consent, you may continue?

Senator MacEachen: Your Honour, would you refer to rule 38(3), please? I understand that the person who makes the reply on a government bill has 45 minutes. Have I gone 45 minutes?

An Hon. Senator: It seems that way.

Senator Barootes: Somebody says it seems that way, but go ahead.

Senator MacEachen: Yes, I heard, Senator Barootes. My hearing is excellent and I do not need recycled comments.

In any event, I really want clarification. The second point that Senator Simard should have considered is that the debt is incurred not as a result of the payment of carrying charges but as a result of borrowing by the government. You add to the debt each year by borrowing. The service charges are expenditures like any other item in the expenditure plan, whether it be medicare, equalization payments or national defence. It is an expenditure like any other. But when there is a shortfall of revenue in relation to expenses, you borrow, and when you borrow, you add to your debt. Am I right?

The figures we have to look at are the figures on the government's financial requirements. I should point out, in case this has not come to Senator Simard's attention, that for the first three years of this government, total government borrowing always exceeded debt carrying charges. The cumulative difference in those first three years is $20 billion. I would therefore like an explanation of how it would be possible for the Liberal government to have been responsible for that cumulative difference of $20 billion.

I would like to relate this problem to the state of the economy and to the overall policies of the government. I am sure Senator Simard would not argue that the policies of the government have no effect whatsoever on the service charges or the debt carrying charges, that they have no effect whatsoever on the interest rates that are paid on the public debt.

● (1500)

We know that the Minister of Finance has had his projections destroyed because of increased interest rates as a result of the monetary policy which he himself decided to follow. I have, on previous occasions, talked about the high interest rate policy which began in 1988, which has only recently abated and which, during its life, contributed greatly to the exorbitant interest charges on the public debt. That, in turn, exacerbated the debt and the deficit and it has to be factored in in any analysis rather than relying on the simplistic propagandistic table in the budget papers to which I have just referred. Take a look at the high interest policy and ask what impact it has had on the accumulation of the public debt. Tell me it has had none and you will find a disbeliever.

Finally, still looking at the government's financial requirements, I should point out that until 1984-85 foreign exchange transactions tended to reduce the government's financial requirements while they have very significantly increased these financial requirements since 1986-87. The cumulative increase, since 1986-87 due to foreign exchange transactions up to the end of the financial year 1990-91, is $24.8 billion. That is not a small amount, and I note that a $3 billion contingency to manage foreign exchange transactions is being sought by the government for 1992-93.

I would ask Senator Simard whether he has taken this into account and whether he can tell us whether the government borrowing requirements have been significantly affected by its management of foreign exchange transactions over the last five years. That is another factor that has to be brought to mind.

Let me look at another aspect of government policy which has exacerbated the deficit and the debt. Unfortunately, the Minister of Finance rarely recognizes the role of economic growth in helping to balance the budget. By Senator Simard's own admission, the economic slowdown results in reduced levels of tax revenue which in turn increase the deficit. I might remind honourable members—and I have dealt with this before in the Senate—that the economic slowdown was induced by the government in the second quarter of 1990 in the pursuit of its policies. It induced the economic slowdown a full year before the onset of the current world-wide recession. People have forgotten that we were in recession a year before Europe was, except for the United Kingdom. That was the reality. The Minister of Finance is prone to say that this is a world-wide recession. It may be now. It was not at the beginning. That has had a very definite effect on these quantities that we are talking about at the present time.

I do not know the point of going back eight years to dredge up the debt, which we know existed, as an explanation to cover up all these other matters which were under the direct management and control of the government.

Senator Simard: I have a couple of good reasons.

Senator MacEachen: They seem incapable of saying, "Yes, this is our responsibility. We have been in charge for eight years; we knew what we were doing and we take responsibility; it occurred because of this." In its budget papers the Department of Finance has pinned all this debt on the former government. Well, who cares? The public knows. The people are perfectly aware. Polls taken by the government itself indicate that the public is satisfied that the current economic situation is in the hands of the government, and the public holds the government responsible for that.

Senator Simard: They should not be allowed to forget what took place before 1984.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, when Senator Simard attempts his simplistic analysis of debt accumulation, I am sure he knows better. I am sure he is more sophisticated, and I am sure he is not taken in by the figures which he put on the record and the explanation for them.

Senator Simard: I take full responsibility for those figures.

Senator MacEachen: Absolutely. Then you will be able to explain this table, I hope.

I think it is worth recalling a bit of the history and reminding Senator Simard of the predictions versus the performance. Mr. Wilson's budget in May, 1985, predicted, in his "clear and realistic medium-term plan" that the budget deficit for 1990-91 would be about $16 billion. That was his projection, not mine, not Mr. Lalonde's, not Mr.Trudeau's. In 1991 it turned out to be $30.5 billion. The February 1990 budget prediction held that the deficit for 1991-92 would be $26.8 billion. It will turn out to be $31.4 billion according to the budget tabled last February.

As I said earlier, the projections are always better than the performance. The figures for the future are better than those for the past and the present.

In his first budget in February 1992, the present Minister of Finance revised Mr. Wilson's 1991 predictions for a deficit of

[Senator MacEachen.]

$6.5 billion in 1996. Mr. Mazankowski predicts a deficit of $8.5 billion.

I regard these projections with a certain amount of scepticism because of the probability that the circumstances will change and that unforeseen developments will take place that will disturb the projections of even the best meaning Minister of Finance.

Mr. Mazankowski, for example, said in the House of Commons:

> I should say that if we had followed the same policy course that was prevalent prior to 1984-85 and into the year 1984-85, had we done nothing, we would be looking at a deficit today of something on the order of $100 billion. That would be very, very serious.

● (1510)

Mr. Wilson, speaking in 1984 in the House of Commons, said that even with high interest rates, if we followed the present course, the federal government deficit would continue to increase and could reach $50 billion per year by the year 1990. Mr. Wilson, in 1984, said that it would be $50 billion, and Mr. Mazankowski said last year it would be $100 billion. How can you pay much attention to projections of that kind? How can we have confidence?

Senator Simard: I will let you know.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have asked quite a number of questions. They are mostly factual, but I must come back to the world of reality and ask the Senate whether it is realistic, sensible or even fair for the Minister of Finance or Senator Simard to construct a criticism or to construct an explanation of performance on the expectation that Canada should have had absolutely no public debt in 1984-85, given that we had experienced a deep and sharp recession, falling revenues, and increasing expenditures for a lot of reasons? We had a public debt partly because of that and partly because of other reasons.

Does Senator Simard know of any industrialized country in the world that emerged from the 1981-82 recession without a substantial public debt and without having increased the public debt? Even the neoconservative models of President Reagan and Margaret Thatcher, followed by Prime Minister Mulroney, had substantial public debt in 1984-85.

The Minister of Finance says in his budget, "Understand my problem: We have had a recession; we have had to increase expenditures to help those who need help." How true it is!

The explosion, for example, in the payments under the Canada Assistance Plan in the provinces encouraged the government to decrease the rate of increase. Ontario itself had to face extraordinary new burdens because of payments under the Canada Assistance Plan alone. Why? Because of the recession. And it is true.

The Minister of Finance said, "Understand the problem I have had." But when he goes back to the past, he says, "Well, we were entitled to have a debt-free Canada in 1984-85." That is totally unrealistic. If we conduct a debate on our public finances on this basis, then we are subjecting the debate to ridicule.

In trying to get some clarification of it, I showed this table to a very knowledgeable person who has followed public finance for years. I said, "Have you seen this?" He said "Yes, it is nonsense, and I put it to one side." And it is nonsense.

Honourable senators, I hope that we can get down to the realities rather than producing a table of this kind which is based on an expectation that Canada ought to have had no public debt in 1984-85 —

Senator Simard: That is not what we are saying at all. Come on now!

Senator MacEachen: —and that any addition to that public debt in the succeeding eight years has absolutely no relationship to government policy, government programs, or changing economic conditions, but must be totally attributed to what prevailed in 1984-85.

I do not think it reflects favourably on the level of debate to push this too far, but we can continue this, if we wish, in committee and at third reading, because it is worthy of a more profound examination than was given in the earlier statement by Senator Simard.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I suppose it is possible to take the level of the deficit in 1984-85, apply the appropriate interest factors to it and, through compounding, come to the conclusion that the debt of today and the growth from that period to this period is due purely and simply to the debt that existed at that time. You could do that with a number of elements in the deficit that would one way or the other make up the debt over a period of time. It seems to me, however, that it begs the question.

The fact of the matter is that the debt of some $484 billion exists. The job that faces any government is to determine how that can be reduced. I personally favour the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account, which would channel the GST revenues and revenues from privatization and donations to the reduction of the debt. In one sense, it is an accounting entry and nothing more, because, if that revenue goes to that fund, and that fund goes to reduce the deficit, that revenue does not go to the deficit directly, but the fact of the matter is that, in any accounting regimen, it indicates more clearly what is happening to the revenues from the GST, and it illuminates the concept that the deficit and debt should be reduced.

Senator MacEachen raises a very interesting point; that is, not that you can attribute the increase in the debt to compound interest, but that you can attribute it to government policy, and most especially the policy of the central bank.

We have achieved in Canada an inflation rate that is almost nonexistent. We have achieved it at a great cost to our economy. Whether we were right or wrong in the way we moved in that direction, I do not know; but I do know that it was necessary to bring inflation under control, and stringent monetary action had to be taken and was taken.

That situation has caused a tremendous loss of jobs and loss of production throughout Canada. The time has come, surely, to rectify that situation. As Senator Roblin said, if there was a war against inflation, that war has been won.

● (1520)

Now comes the time to start to expand the economy, because that is the only way, in a non-inflationary environment, that you will reduce the deficit. Our spread of interest rates between here and the United States, our main trading partner, is far too large. The Canadian dollar exceeds parity pricing between here and the United States.

You see a lot of comment today on the reduction of productivity within Canada. A good deal of that productivity loss is due to the difference in the exchange rate between the two countries. The time has come to lower that exchange rate and to move our pricing down to parity pricing. We now have to get the economy moving. The governor of the Bank of Canada must be told by the Minister of Finance, who has the ultimate responsibility for monetary policy as well as fiscal policy, that actions must be taken, not to administer interest rates but to increase the aggregates of monetary policy and to put more money to work in the economy, which will have the effect of lowering short-term interest rates, lowering the exchange rate and increasing the revenues to the central government.

Those increases can be taken today, in my judgment and in the judgment of many other people, without inflationary consequences. If that were done, then you would have a reduction of the deficit. That is the only hope. We are now allowing a stringent monetary policy to do far too much damage to this economy. It must be changed. The governor must be told.

Concerning "the level of the dollar", the governor says that "We allow the dollar to find its own level; we do not interfere". But the fact of the matter is that every time the dollar drops there is a massive move to buttress it by foreign exchange transactions and increases in interest rates. The Governor does care where the Canadian dollar is. That more than anything is the central focus of his policy. It must now change. Maybe I should not criticize his past policy—although I have criticized parts of it—because it has had the effect of reducing inflation, but the time has come for the government to change that policy and to allow the Canadian economy to grow and to expand.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators —

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to inform honourable senators that, if the Honourable Senator Simard speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, all I want to say is that in a few moments I will suggest that Bill C-21 be referred to the Committee on National Finance.

I want to thank Senator MacEachen and Senator Everett for their interesting contribution, as usual. Since I was out of the Chamber when Senator MacEachen began his reply, I will have to refer to today's Hansard. No doubt I will have some answers for him in turn.

Officials, experts and others on the National Finance Committee can thoroughly question the bill's provisions and provide answers. That is about all I want to say now.

[English]

In closing, I should hope that Senator MacEachen will not advise everyone to put aside this budget speech, or a schedule of the budget. Whether it is the one dealing with the growth of this $200 billion, the document, the whole speech, the principles and the figures are important enough that they should be given close scrutiny. It will be our job to give a better understanding, if that is what is needed, to Senator MacEachen regarding the value of our argument.

I agree with Senator MacEachen that what has taken place since 1984 has had an effect on the deficit. Government policies and programs, some of which were consistently fought by the opposition, and legislation, as well as external events beyond the control of this government, have influenced the size of the deficit during the last eight years. But one cannot isolate or forget the fact that, yes, this government inherited a debt of $200 billion—and it certainly inherited a structure of programs, some of which this government has felt necessary to do away with or change.

Having sat in this place since 1985, I remember when the opposition—that is, Senators Frith, MacEachen and others —fought tooth and nail to make sure that Canada did not get out or did not try to get out of this mess and reduce the appetites of people and the deficit. We take full responsibility for what has taken place since 1984.

Senator Frith: Good.

Senator Simard: But Canadians should not forget—and this is where Senator MacEachen and I disagree at times — that the people who created that mess up until 1984, and left us and Canadians with this debt and many problems, are the same Liberal Parliamentarians who, since 1985, have failed to tell Canadians where they stand or what they offer as alternatives for programs that are being reviewed, modified or replaced by the present government. Since 1985 they have failed to tell Canadians what they would change and have failed to give support to changes that we on this side have proposed. Moreover, Canadians should not be allowed to forget that interest rates in 1982-83 were at 18 and 20 per cent.

● (1530)

As Senator Everett has said, the government had to take steps, and did, to come up with measures to ensure that inflation did not get out of control. That in turn created, yes, some plant closures and what have you, and a reduced rate of growth in the economy. However, in committee and at third reading I shall try to set Senator MacEachen's mind at rest by giving him my answers to his questions as well as the answers of the government.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the vote is called, I should like to make our position very clear. Normally I would call for a recorded vote on this bill, but it is in fact such a useless bill, total window dressing, that I will not even give it that credibility and I shall simply be calling for a "no vote", on division.

Senator Haidasz: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

Senator Molgat: On division.

The Hon. the Speaker: pro tempore: In my opinion the "yeas" have it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

TWELFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE CONSIDERED—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the twelfth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (draft regulations re financial institutions—interim report), presented in the Senate on May 5, 1992.

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, I address this House today to present the interim report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with respect to certain provisions of the regulations arising from the new legislation to reform Canadian financial institutions.

I addressed this House on December 12, 1991 on behalf of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to present the reports on the legislative provisions governing banks, insurance companies, trust and loan companies and cooperative credit associations. When the Minister of State for Finance appeared before our committee, he discussed these new provisions and said that he would be pleased to hear the committee's comments on certain key regulations arising out of the legislative framework that had been adopted and that he would have no objection if the Senate committee helped him draw up these regulations.

Pleased with this show of confidence, the committee got down to it and went to work on some regulations, namely those that were the most discussed or the most contentious and those that were criticized by the various groups consulted. The regulations concerning insurance operations, joint venturing, affiliated directors, demutualization of insurance companies, use of confidential information and issues related to federal-provincial harmonization were dealt with. The cooperation of the Department of Finance helped speed the committee's work and ensure that the achievement of the June 1 target date for the implementation of the financial institution legislative reform package would not be affected.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce held public hearings on Tuesday, March 17; Monday, March 23; Tuesday, March 24 and Friday, April 24. It gave priority to the regulations that are essential for the promulgation of the whole legislative reform package, that is the actual implementation of the four bills that we approved last December. The hearings dealt with all these regulations, except those on demutualization and confidentiality that will take place a little later in May. In addition, the hearings on the important issue of privacy require consultation in keeping with the size of the problem. These particular regulations are not needed for the legislation to take effect.

In other words, for the laws to take effect, some regulations must be issued and implemented immediately, although regulations on other parts of this legislation can wait till a later stage. The committee has already begun its hearings on this question; however, it intends to hold more hearings in order to fulfil its mandate as it should. The issue of privacy concerns all Canadians. It is quite important for our fellow citizens and for us to be sure that any information we give on ourselves, our past, our abilities or anything that may have been said about us is kept under control.

At the present time, there is no control on the flow of information, either inside or outside the country. We believe this is an important issue and that everyone should have a chance to air their views on the subject.

Throughout its proceedings, the committee has tried to bear in mind that changes must be implemented gradually and should not upset the dynamics of our financial institutions, since otherwise the consumer will suffer. In fact, the consumer will also have to adapt to the new provisions and find out what his rights and obligations are in the various sectors. At this stage, it would be appropriate to mention the main objectives supported by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, commonly referred to as the OECD, an international organization that covers the entire financial system. Its objectives are to promote competition and protect the consumer. These objectives are reflected in the changes we have made here in Canada.

We see this, for instance, in the regulations on affiliated directors. Affiliated directors are directors who have a special interest that might restrict their ability to look at a problem objectively and thus impair their judgment. The committee wanted to minimize potential conflicts of interest among members of a board of directors, and this is a way to protect the consumer and protect the stability of financial institutions. The concept of affiliated director does not exist anywhere else, so we could say Canada is breaking new ground.

I would now like to comment on the regulations for joint ventures, the usual term used in English. Formerly, companies were allowed to invest not more than 10 per cent of their assets in joint ventures in lines of business related to financial activities. There was a very clear distinction between minority and majority investments. The new legislation allows investments that, although they may not provide a controlling interest, are above the present maximum. In fact, the Superintendent of Financial Institutions has the discretionary power to approve such investments and to require that undertakings be sufficient to ensure the continued solvency of companies.

Financial institutions can make strategic alliances with the help of minority investments. These alliances make it possible for institutions in one financial sector to penetrate other sectors, both in Canada and abroad. Europeans have used this approach with tremendous success. Strategic alliances are critical because of the improved access to capital and expertise. They provide companies with the flexibility to enter and learn new and different businesses.

In addition, in many cases it is the only way to enter some foreign markets because of the limitations on foreign ownership. For instance, a Canadian company that does business in Indonesia, where foreign ownership is limited to 30 per cent, will never be able to acquire a controlling interest. In the past, this was not allowed, or at least not to any extent. A cap of 5 per cent, as suggested by the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, is simply unrealistic in today's world. A five per cent interest in a company does not confer any power or right of scrutiny or authority to add or include the company's surplus abroad. Some institutions in this country are already above that limit. This means they will not be able to make further investments.

Our committee believes that an aggregate limit of 10 per cent regulatory capital on non-control investments is more appropriate, especially since investments beyond this limit could still be made, subject to the approval of the minister. In other words, when the minister feels it is appropriate to expand this provision, Canadian investors will acquire additional flexibility. The committee also believes that certain issues of particular interest to the provinces should be examined. Harmonization of federal and provincial regulatory policies is one of the reform's objectives. The committee is aware that consultation is necessary to resolve jurisdictional issues that may arise in a number of areas, including the security activities of financial institutions and minimum capital requirements.

I think it would be appropriate at this point to comment on underwriting by deposit-taking institutions, a subject that raised considerable concern. The regulations must provide the details of insurance activities and of the relations between deposit-taking institutions and insurance companies, agents or brokers.

The committee tried to come up with a realistic form that takes into account the possibilities of information transfer between deposit-taking institutions and their subsidiaries, without upsetting the current competitive balance; in other words, that takes into account the activities that various types of institutions may and may not engage in at the present time. In its analysis, the committee considered various schools of thought in an attempt to identify approaches that were equitable.

Policies differ widely in France, Germany, the United States and Canada. There are as many different provisions or approaches as there are countries. This is something we cannot ignore, but we must also consider our own requirements.

From now on, financial institutions will be able to expand their range of services. However, on the crucial issue of the flow of information between banks and insurance companies, agents or brokers, no specific policy has been agreed on. The on-going debate over this issue, with Finance clearly playing an active role, was an indication that no firm decision had been made, while two contradictory views were advanced at the time.

The committee considers it would not be in keeping with the spirit of this reform to issue regulations that would allow deposit-taking institutions to set up insurance networks. The committee is therefore in favour of a restrictive approach. It believes this would limit abusive practices and enable all players in the financial services sector to adjust gradually to the new legislation, which is in the interests of all concerned.

The new legislation has introduced a fundamental change in the ability of financial institutions to operate in a variety of areas, namely by allowing them to acquire and establish subsidiaries operating in another financial sector. For instance, at the present time we have the so-called four pillars: banks, insurance companies, trust companies and credit unions. In future, any of these will be able to acquire a subsidiary in another sector, but will have to do business in that sector through its subsidiary. I am about to conclude my remarks.

It is important that financial institutions in Canada have access to new opportunities to expand and diversify that will enable them to succeed in the extremely competitive global financial markets within which they operate. When opening business offices abroad, our financial institutions must be released from the domestic constraints imposed in this country. It is important that the regulations not place these financial institutions in a strait-jacket that will impede innovation and place them at a competitive disadvantage.

On the other hand, the soundness of the financial framework in Canada must never be jeopardized. The changes must proceed in an orderly fashion so that the overall system can adapt. The new legislation has made a giant leap forward. The new regulations must ensure that the changes to come can be absorbed by the system with no serious impact on its overall soundness.

Honourable senators, it is with this perspective in mind that the committee submits its twelfth interim report, and it is the same perspective in which it will examine future regulations. The committee will shortly finish its study of the regulations concerning demutualization and the use of confidential information. I will then have the privilege once again of rising in this Chamber to table the committee's latest reports on the reform of financial institutions.

Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, in rising to comment on the Twelfth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and to enlarge a little bit on the remarks of Senator Poitras, I intend to deal with two or three specific issues the committee addressed in this report.

By way of background, some of you will recall, as Senator Poitras has said in his remarks and as we both mentioned in this chamber when the bills were passed at the end of last year, the minister had asked the committee to do a rare thing, and in fact, to the best of our knowledge, perhaps a unique thing: He asked the committee to hold public hearings on the draft regulations before they had the force of law.

The minister did this only with the committee in the Senate. He did not put the regulations to any committee in the other place. I think it is fair to say he did this because the financial services industry and the government value the kind of debate which takes place at our committee hearings and the input which can come from these hearings.

The other benefit one might note is that the two issues which are covered in this report and on which I will say a few words are, in fact, fairly controversial issues from the government's point of view. Therefore, from the government's point of view, there was some advantage in holding hearings and having the Senate committee take a position. It is my understanding the government intends to adopt our position almost in its entirety.

Let me comment on the two controversial issues on which the committee discussed and heard most of its evidence. The first issue deals with the extent to which banks are to be allowed to get into "the business of insurance," to use the terminology of the act. It is kind of interesting. The act says up front there will be a collapse of the four pillars, thereby presumably implying, at least indirectly, that banks will be allowed to get into insurance. It then proceeds to explicitly state that there are a number of insurance-related activities which banks cannot get into, specifically activities relating to networking and using the branch structure as a means of retailing insurance. The act itself is silent on what constitutes "the business of insurance" other than to specifically outlaw the use of the branch network as a distribution system.

The challenge to the government, which the government then in turn put to the committee, was to attempt to define in regulatory form what Parliament meant when both the House of Commons and the Senate passed these bills last December—bills which contained the phrase saying that banks could not get into "the business of insurance."

The evidence before the committee was not very consistent. The banks, on the one hand, argued that getting into "the business of insurance" meant the only thing fundamentally they could not do was sell insurance through branches. They had a few other modest restrictions, but that was their basic position. The insurance industry, on the other hand, argued that there was no way in which any information could go from a bank to an insurance company, even though the act explicitly allows a bank to have an insurance company subsidiary.

The evidence before the committee showed reasonably clearly that it is very difficult to draw a line saying certain kinds of information can be passed from a bank to an insurance company without, in effect, upsetting the competitive balance that exists among companies now in the insurance business. The expensive part of marketing is finding good prospects. Having to do a mass-marketing approach in order to find a handful of truly potential customers is very expensive. The bank could enable its insurance company to reduce that marketing cost by giving the insurance company targeted lists of potential customers. You can target a market to the extent that information provided by a bank to its insurance subsidiary enables that subsidiary to ferret out good prospects inexpensively.

The committee's view was twofold: First, that clearly violated the provision in the act which said that banks should not be allowed to network insurance. Second, it clearly affected the competitive balance between insurance companies, since those which were owned by banks would have an information base that would be significantly better than those which were not owned by banks. Therefore, the committee was left with the dilemma of trying to decide whether or not the passage of any information could, in fact, upset the competitive balance which the acts, as they were put through last December, were explicitly designed to protect.

The net result was that the committee decided to recommend in this report, in terms of the regulations, that no information should be allowed to pass from the bank to an insurance subsidiary about the bank's customers. The simple reason for that is it is our view that the passage of almost any information, in effect, constitutes networking in one form or another. This particular issue was highly controversial in the committee hearings, and I suspect it will be highly controversial when the government issues its own regulations. As I said, I am led to believe those regulations will fairly closely parallel what this committee recommended.

Those regulations will, in fact, cause some difficulty for the banking industry. They will feel, in a sense, that the regulations are slanted against them. My response to that, and I think it is important for this chamber to understand, is two-fold:

First of all, this chamber twice recommended that banks be allowed to network in insurance, once in a report in 1985 and again in a report in 1989. That was the unanimous position of the Banking, Trade, and Commerce committee for five or six years. The fact of the matter is that, in designing the balance which went into the four bills which were passed last December, the committee essentially tried to treat the four pillars reasonably equally. Each got some things they wanted; each got some things they did not want, and, more importantly, a competitive balance was kept among the four. Those bills explicitly outlawed networking. To that extent, those bills went against the recommendation of this committee twice in the past.

Faced with that problem, and even though the committee was in favour of the principle of networking, clearly our responsibility was to ensure that the regulations to be passed by the government in fact reflect what is in the act as opposed to reflecting a policy which we would have preferred. That is to say, it seemed clear to the committee that one could not use the regulatory approach to allow things to happen which the act clearly had intended would not happen.

It is for that reason that many of us who favour perhaps even a more complete collapse of the four pillars than now exists nevertheless felt compelled to support regulations barring the transfer of any information in order to ensure those regulations were consistent with the spirit and, indeed, the letter of the act.

A second comment I would make on the information issue, because it deals with a subject that our committee will be studying starting very shortly, is the issue of privacy. The information which a bank collects on an individual is sensitive. Many people consider conversations with bank managers as not significantly different, in terms of secrecy and confidentiality, from conversations they might have with lawyers, doctors or priests. Thus, there is an important public policy question on the issue of how and under what circumstances information an individual gives to a bank may be passed to others, even if those others happen to be companies which are subsidiaries of the bank.

● (1600)

That issue is a sensitive one to consumers of all kinds. It is an issue with respect to which the government will need to bring in some regulations. Our committee has agreed to hold hearings on the matter in the coming weeks to flesh out what an appropriate set of regulations might be. We are looking to regulations which balance consumer and privacy protection interests of individual Canadians with not tying the hands of our large financial institutions. I suspect that we will report to the house on this matter before we rise for the summer.

The second main issue covered in this report deals with another controversial issue that originated in this chamber in a report of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee under the chairmanship of Senator Ian Sinclair. In 1985, we recommended to the government in our eighth report that new conditions be put into the Bank Act to define exactly what is meant by the term "independent director". In the last six years that term has evolved from "independent director" to "affiliated director". The report deals with the question of "affiliated director". Most honourable senators who are familiar with business terms would think of it in the context of an "independent director".

The question asked was this: Should there be any limit or any requirement that a financial institution have a fixed percentage or a minimum number of independent or unaffiliated directors? If so, how should the term "unaffiliated director" be defined?

The issue arose in the 1985 report of the committee when we were looking at the Bank Act revisions for the following reason. The committee decided to recommend that the government continue the policy that had existed in this country for a long time, namely, that banks must be widely held. That is the so-called 10 per cent rule, which says that no single individual can own more than 10 per cent of a bank.

In 1985, the committee's view was that there should be put in place a 10 per cent rule to ensure the widely held ownership of a bank. In so doing, it ensured that a bank would always be under the control of management. That is to say, the board of directors would always be selected by the existing CEO, since it would be impossible for a group of shareholders to make a significant change in the board because of the 10 per cent rule.

[Senator Kirby.]

In turn, that led the committee to say that in order to ensure that the board of directors is genuinely independent and not simply the captive of bank management, it is in the public interest to have one-half the directors on a bank board truly independent of the bank. I say "bank" here because at that time we were dealing only with the Bank Act.

We made such a recommendation. Subsequently, it appeared in a slightly modified form in the acts which were passed in this house last December. The basic change was that the number was reduced from one-half of the board members to one-third of the board members. It was extended to include all financial institutions, not just banks or widely held companies.

That begs the question of what constitutes an independent director. We had an interesting discussion of this subject in committee. In their briefs the banks suggested that a director is independent so long as his loans are in good standing with the bank. In other words, one could owe the bank hundreds of millions of dollars, but, provided the interest is being paid, one is independent.

It struck those of us who had gone through the 1985 hearings that this was a long way from the concept of "independent" that we held. At the time our concern was that not only must a director be independent, but there must be a public perception of his independence. We suspected that it would be difficult to convince the average person on the street that, if one is an officer of a company that owes a bank several hundred million dollars, one is truly independent of that bank and of the wishes of the members of its board.

We recognized that perception is as important as reality. There was no suggestion at any of the committee hearings, going back to 1985, that bank board members had not operated in the interests of their shareholders. What has been an issue is that, in evolving public policy and debate over what constitutes conflict of interest, perception is an extremely important part of that area of law. In fact, a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate is now looking at that specific question as it concerns parliamentarians.

In considering the question of what constitutes independence or an unaffiliated director, our view as a committee was that, if an individual, either personally or as an officer of a corporation, is beholden in any significant amount to a financial institution, then that individual is not truly independent and unaffiliated. Therefore, that individual would have to count as an affiliated director. He could still sit on the board but he could not be counted in that one-third of directors who are unaffiliated.

In my view the recommendation in this report is a stringent one. I realize that a number of financial institutions will complain that we are being too stringent. I should tell honourable senators that one of the complaints they will hear is that our restrictions create a problem because there are not enough qualified people to sit on bank boards. Those of you who were here a decade ago may remember a bank chairman, when asked why there were no women on his board, commenting that he would love to have women on the board, but there were not any sufficiently qualified women to sit on it. I point that out because the argument that there are not enough qualified people is a relatively spurious one. I think it is regarded as such by members of the current committee, just as it was by members of the committee in 1985 and 1989.

What we have tried to include in our recommendation is a tough test. We understand it is a tough test. It is not an accident that it is a tough test. It is a test designed to ensure that a financial institution which takes individuals' deposits, and to that extent has a safe-keeping role, has on its board a significant number of people who would have no difficulty in speaking up in the best interests of all the shareholders of that company.

This tough test means that, if one has even reasonably large personal loans, or sizeable corporate loans and is an officer of the corporation, then one cannot be regarded as independent. Incidentally, since there are a number of members of other professions in this chamber, if one is a member of the legal profession in a firm that does a significant amount of business with a bank, then under those circumstances one cannot be regarded as independent either. It is conceivable that a bank could—and I am not saying that one would or ever has—exercise considerable leverage over you. Therefore, it is our view that, if the public interest is to be served and the public perception of independence is to be achieved, it is important that these conditions be passed.

Honourable senators, those are the two main topics covered in this report. I went into some detail because I suspect there will be significant commentary on them in the professional and the business press.

As Senator Poitras said in his opening remarks, we will be returning shortly to a continuation of hearings on regulations. As we complete our consideration on various pieces of them, we will be reporting back to this chamber. The next area we deal with will be demutualization of insurance companies. How do they move from being a mutual company to an equity company? This is a complex problem but one which is increasingly being faced by large mutual companies which are finding it very difficult, if not impossible, to gain access to new sources of capital unless they can become an equity-based, share-based company.

The second issue which I think will attract considerable attention, not only from the business community but from the consumers' association and a variety of other public interest bodies, will be the issue of privacy. What is the nature of information passed from an individual to a bank manager or to a representative of a bank? How does one ensure that adequate information is given to the financial institution for both business and competitive reasons on the one hand and, on the other, how do you ensure the privacy of that information and that kind of dialogue which is clearly desired by Canadian consumers and, indeed, expected by them?

Therefore, honourable senators, we will be returning to those two issues between now and the end of June. In the meantime, I would urge passage of this report.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

FISHERIES

FOREIGN OVERFISHING—DEPLETION OF NORTHERN COD STOCKS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall, calling the attention of the Senate to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries: The Marketing of Fish in Canada "East Coast Fisheries", dated December 1989; and specifically as it relates to the recommendations applicable to the present state of the fish stocks due to foreign overfishing.—(Honourable Senator Thériault).

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, we have heard much debate on the near-destruction of the northern cod fishery. We have heard figures cited that attest to the fact that ecological disaster looms in ocean waters off Atlantic Canada. We all know that extinction of a once-bountiful resource will eliminate thousands of jobs in Atlantic Canada with a devastating impact on Newfoundland and Labrador. Some of our more reflective citizens understand this to be another assault on our global commons.

It is, of course, contemporary conceptions of international law which dictate that the Exclusive Economic Zone extends only 200 miles offshore. The natural ecosystem of our vast continental shelf is arbitrarily ruptured by such conceptions. Stocks of migrating cod, turbot and flatfish which inhabit the well-known Nose and Tail of the Grand Banks straddle this artificial divide.

Many scientists believe the spawning stock biomass concentrated outside present jurisdictional lines are subject to imminent destruction, thereby threatening the entire northern cod stock. Contemporary international law does not provide us with a balance between flag-state liberty and the rights of coastal state jurisdiction over such straddling stocks. It is as though a page were missing in the vital subject matter of fisheries jurisdiction. We find ourselves in the unlikely position of an author, unable or unwilling to write the final page.

Our present government seems an unlikely source of such authorship. At present they pursue diplomatic avenues as a last resort before unilateral action. We see no reason to believe any real success will come of this. We witness innumerable visits to North Atlantic Fisheries Organization members, for example, in preparation for special meetings on the issues, some of which I understand will begin next week in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia.

We have traditionally lauded our unique Canadian talents at multilateral diplomacy. I do not mean to denigrate such activities, but I think we all have to be persuaded by the reality that NAFO is a fundamentally flawed organization and that its overhaul will require extensive revision. For example, a clear definition of "overfishing" is yet to be established. There is a lack of any reciprocal enforcement mechanism. The well-known "objection" provisions of Article XII of the NAFO Convention inhibit legitimate conservation measures. And I could go on.

The point is, honourable senators, that such a revision requires not only lengthy talks—involving time that we do not have—but also it requires a spirit of compromise, a collective will to move to such revision. The lack of such a spirit is demonstrated in the attitude of the European Community and, of course, the perennially most aggressive nations in this regard, the nations of Spain and Portugal.

The government tells us that a unilateral approach must be resisted because of our commitment to the rule of international law. We have other areas of multilateral activity, we are told, which could lead to solutions. As an alternative to dealing with NAFO, we can submit a case to councils of international arbitration with recourse to dispute settlement provisions contained in Articles 286 to 296 of the 1982 Convention on the Law of the Sea.

We could argue that grave breaches of customary principles of state responsibility have occurred. Canada could do so in accordance with, for example, Principle 21 of the Stockholm Declaration on the Human Environment, on the grounds that overfishing on the high seas has caused injury to Canada and that such violations demand compensation from the flag state to the injured state.

[Senator Graham.]

The point is that we do have a number of legal options. The fact that the Law of the Sea Convention is not yet in force, however, makes the provisions for such recourse rather tenuous.

While our commitment to international law is therefore unquestionable, the present ambiguity regarding even basic legal definitions—the weakness of the 1982 Law of the Sea Convention which, for example, includes a lack of the coastal state enforcement among many others—make this an unlikely arena in which to resolve our present impasse.
