Bill C-81 is an exceedingly important measure with profound implications for how and with what results we will govern ourselves. Our basic system of decision-making is one of representative government; that is to say, it is a system where representatives make decisions for the people, and this system has served us very well. It is better fitted than any other to dealing with complex issues and with the preservation of civil liberty. It is certainly better fitted than any other to dealing with our present constitutional morass. Building on our system of representative government, we have made our country indisputably one of the most truly democratic countries in the world.

It is in this context that we must bear in mind that the use of referenda can be very damaging to representative government. Why is that? It is because a referendum is basically an end-run on the system of representative government. A referendum does not cope well with complex issues and can easily ride roughshod over civil liberties. A referendum is easily manipulated, and because governments do not ask questions they cannot win, it tends to inflame passions and compound public ignorance. The keystone of our governmental system is Parliament; the referendum displaces Parliament.

Does this mean that I see no use for the instrument of a referendum in our system of government? No, it does not. There are some things for which a referendum is uniquely fitted. Once a consensus has been reached, a referendum can be used to confirm that consensus. A referendum can be useful to seal an agreement, to etch an understanding as permanently as it is possible to do so in the fundamental law. However, a referendum must not be used to try to beat, or trick, or bludgeon people into agreement.

For the federal government to aim a referendum at a particular province in an effort to destabilize its government is especially odious. This is, however, but one example of how a referendum can be terribly misused. There are others. Used clumsily, ignorantly, dishonestly, a referendum can plant division and bitterness beyond fixing. The truth is that a referendum can be a supremely antidemocratic weapon. History gives many examples of that, even some in our own country. Consequently, a referendum should be used only for what cannot be done in any other way.

Fortunately, our system of representative government is extraordinarily rich and flexible. It offers many ways of dealing with our problems. Consequently, it is not unrealistic to require that all its avenues must be exhausted before the country is confronted with a referendum. Obviously this includes, if necessary, having a general election. A general election rather than a referendum is especially to be desired where a government is old, tired, and wanting for lack of credibility. The polls make it clear that Canadians overwhelmingly regard this as an accurate description of the state of the present government. In times such as these, there is every reason to ask people to supply a fresh government, a new set of representatives.

The present bill is not entirely bad. It has been prepared in draft form a number of times by different governments. Nonetheless, even now it contains some points for real and serious concern. The question of funding is one example. These points have been well identified by the opposition, and I support their criticisms, but my concern goes beyond that to a fear that the system of government itself is not adequately protected by this legislation. Under the bill, Parliament is not really in control of the use of the referendum, much less the question posed. The spending of money is clearly not sufficiently controlled, and manipulation of the whole process by the government is not effectively avoided.

However, above and beyond those concerns, many Canadians will ask themselves, can the government really be trusted to use this bill wisely? When one looks at the impatience, some would say the arrogance, that the government has shown in the use of its majority in basic constitutional matters, even on the use of closure in the other place on this bill, for example; when one looks at the vagueness and the uncertainty of the government's constantly-changing, sometimes contradictory plans; when one looks at the lack of method the government has shown in raising interest groups, however important they may be, to the status of governments in the negotiations; when one looks at some of the side remarks ministers have made, such as, for example, the suggestion that the government might use this bill to specifically target the Government of Newfoundland; when one looks at these matters as evidence of the skills and the competence the government has demonstrated time and again in its negotiations, one has to ask if the government really knows what it is doing with the constitutional file.

We must be especially careful that a referendum on the Constitution does not become a referendum on the present government. I believe the government knows this, but it seems to be waiting and hoping that some opportunity will come for it to get out of the hole it has dug for itself.

By its own admission, the government cannot tell us what it will do with the great powers it is taking for itself in this bill. It proposes that Parliament give it a blank cheque. For Parliament to do so is, so far as I am concerned, profoundly irresponsible. This, honourable senators, is why I cannot and will not vote for this bill.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I spoke on second reading of Bill C-81, so I will not repeat myself by making a long statement today. Senator Fairbairn last Friday and Senators Frith and Pitfield today have laid out many of the main concerns I have with this bill. However, I will present a number of additional amendments to try to improve the legislation.

I should say, though, that in presenting these amendments I am again struck with trepidation at the prospect of this bill proceeding as is, unamended. I am convinced that there is a fundamental problem with because of a lack of fairness inherent in the process outlined in the current bill. If we do not address the issue of fairness, the whole referendum process could be rendered useless or, even worse, destructive to the unity of Canada.

First among our proposed amendments, honourable senators, are the amendments that would facilitate the existence of two umbrella committees, one for each side of the question, under which all contributions, expenses and spending would be much more easily and fairly governed.

I am sure that senators who have been following this bill, or reports in the media about the bill, will be aware of the discussion surrounding the idea of umbrella committees. I do not think I need now go into the subject of such committees, other than to say that witnesses before our committee, including Professor Peter Aucoin, indicated that they were needed; that they would be acceptable to the courts if structured properly; and without their adoption, the administration and finances involved in the process would be out of control. At least, that is what he said.

Since there are a series of amendments that are purely designed to facilitate the introduction of umbrella committees, and because these amendments are so long and so technical, I would rather not read them unless you insist. I have made copies of them available through the Clerk, which you should have ample time to study prior to our vote this evening.

As for the other amendments that I am presenting today, each addresses the issue of fairness concerned predominantly with the financing issues. I will read each of these because, although they are chiefly based on finances, they each have merit on their own.

The first has to do with indirect referendum expenses. It would read as follows:

> That Bill C-81 be amended in clause 2(1) by striking out line 13 on page 3 and substituting the following therefor:
> "porting or opposing during a"

This amendment, by excluding the reference to "direct" in the definition of referendum expenses, would require registered referendum committees to include indirect expenses such as polling and research costs. This would thus require full disclosure of expenses when reporting to the Chief Electoral Officer as required by Section 19 of the bill.

The question is: Are we or are we not to have a complete accounting of the money spent? Where committees are spending the money, we want all the expenses listed and described. I think that is a reasonable request. It is worthwhile for us to know that groups are either mistaking direct expenses for indirect, or intentionally trying to misrepresent expenses, or camouflaging their spending. If all expenses are included, the system will be less complicated with fewer misunderstandings and opportunities for abuse.

The next amendment is regarding contribution limits. It reads as follows:

> That Bill C-81 be amended in clause 14(a) by adding after line 16 on page 15 the following:
> (2) No individual, corporation, trade union, political party, or other group shall make a contribution to a registered referendum committee or committees that, in the aggregate, exceeds one thousand dollars.
> (b) and by renumbering the previous clause and any cross-references thereto accordingly.

This amendment would set a limit for contributions to committees by individuals and groups. As we heard from Professor Aucoin in committee, the Lortie Commission found that in the last election, 98 per cent of individuals who contributed to campaigns contributed less than $1,000. Approximately 92 per cent of corporations and 71 per cent of trade unions contributed under $1,000. Certainly, then, this limitation is a reasonable one.

[Senator Stanbury.]

Furthermore, as Professor Aucoin concluded, without the existence of umbrella committees, spending limits become unenforceable and out of control. Therefore this limitation on contributions would at least help with the personal expense limits I am recommending and, with the changed spending limits and a redrafted definition of expenses, provide some semblance of fairness.

The third amendment relates to expense limits. It states:

> That Bill C-81 be amended in clause 15(1) by striking out line 20 at page 15 and substituting the following therefor:
> "period that, in the aggregate, exceed one"

This amendment would reduce from $5,000 to $1,000 the amount that individuals and groups can spend outside the activities of a referendum committee. Those who wish to spend more than $1,000 would be required to register as a referendum committee.

Again, the Lortie Commission has found that, in the last election, 98 per cent of individuals who contributed to campaigns contributed less than $1,000 and would spend less, therefore, as individuals.

The last amendment on finances has to do with committee spending limits. It would read as follows:

> That Bill C-81 be amended in Clause 15(3)(a) by striking out line 36 at page 15 and substituting the following therefor:
> "1992, is 25 cents; and"

This amendment would reduce the amount referendum committees are allowed to spend from 56.4 cents per registered voter to 25 cents. It is simply a measure to decrease how much is spent. If there are two umbrella committees, then there should be limits imposed on the capacity of each committee, and if there are limits, as already exist, they should be reasonable.

The last amendment I would move has to do with the broadcasting provisions. It reads as follows:

> That Bill C-81 be amended in Clause 21 by striking out lines 25 and 26 at page 20 and substituting the following therefor:
> "hours of broadcasting time and a minimum of three hours of broadcasting time for purchase during prime time"

This amendment would introduce guaranteed broadcast time for sale. Although provision is already made for free broadcast time to be made available, there should also be a certain amount of time that could be purchased equally by anyone wishing to do so. It would ensure that broadcasters would not determine who they sold time to based on the side of the referendum question supported. Again, this is an issue of fairness, both real and perceived.

Honourable senators, the purpose of this legislation and of the referendum is to encourage public faith in the system. If the financial aspects of this bill are not sound, if expenses can be buried and not reported, and if contribution limits give more influence to the side with more money, how is that scenario, which is quite likely under the provisions of the current bill, going to inspire confidence? How will it encourage the public involvement of people who are already convinced that they cannot have any influence in the political process? Should we not be trying to inspire confidence in Canadians that we are doing this in good faith and for them, not for us? Perhaps, honourable senators, we should think honestly about this before embarking on this process. There is so much at stake.

I therefore move that Bill C-81 be now not read the third time but that the following amendments to it be made seriatim. I will read them again if honourable senators so wish, although I did read most of them during my speech.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, that this bill be read the third time.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Riel, P.C., that Bill C-81 be not now read the third time, but that it be amended in Clause 2:

" "referendum committee" means, as the case may be, the committee comprised of such persons and groups as support a referendum question or the committee comprised of such persons and groups as oppose a referendum question."; and

That Bill C-81 be amended by deleting Clause 13 and the heading preceding Clause 13 and substituting the following therefor:

"REFERENDUM COMMITTEE

13. The Governor in Council may make regulations governing referendum committees, including regulations

(a) providing for such matters as may be necessary for the proper operation of referendum committees, including the name under which they are to be known and the manner in which they are to be established;

(b) providing for the setting up of local branches of referendum committees in each electoral district;

(c) providing for the affiliation to the referendum committee supporting the referendum question or to the referendum committee opposing the question, as the case may be, of persons who, or groups that, support or oppose the question, as the case may be, and prescribing norms and terms and conditions with respect to the affiliation and financing of such persons or groups;

(d) prescribing, for each province, the maximum amount of referendum expenses that may be incurred by either referendum committee;

(e) prescribing the maximum amount of referendum expenses that may be incurred by either referendum committee throughout Canada or in two or more provinces specified in the proclamation issued under subsection 3(1).

14. (1) A referendum committee intending to incur referendum expenses throughout Canada or in more than one province shall file with the Chief Electoral Officer a request for approval of the proposed apportionment of such expenses.

(2) A request for approval shall be signed by the leader of the referendum committee and shall name the provinces in which the referendum expenses are to be incurred and the amounts which the referendum committee intends to incur for each province.

(3) Not later than five days after receipt of a request for approval the Chief Electoral Officer shall notify the leader of the referendum committee of the Chief Electoral Officer's decision to approve or not to approve the proposed referendum expenses apportionment.

(4) The Chief Electoral Officer shall approve a request for approval if, in the opinion of the Chief Electoral Officer, the manner in which the referendum expenses to be incurred by the referendum committee are intended to be apportioned among the provinces specified in the proclamation issued under subsection 3(1) in which such expenses are to be incurred fairly reflects the distribution of the Canadian population between such provinces.

(5) A referendum committee that incurs referendum expenses throughout Canada or in more than one province without prior approval by the Chief Electoral Officer is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding fifty thousand dollars.

15. (1) Where the total referendum expenses incurred by a referendum committee throughout Canada or in more than one province are less than stated in the request for approval referred to in section 14, the referendum committee shall ensure that the apportionment of the referendum expenses of the committee among the provinces specified in the proclamation issued under subsection 3(1) in which such expenses are to be incurred fairly reflects the distribution of the Canadian population between such provinces.

(2) A referendum committee that contravenes subsection (1) is guilty of an offence and is liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding fifty thousand dollars.

(3) Where a referendum committee commits an offence under this Act, the leader or chief agent of the referendum committee who directed, authorized, assented to, acquiesced in or participated in the commission of the offence is a party to and guilty of the offence and is liable on summary conviction to the punishment provided for the offence whether or not the referendum committee has been prosecuted or convicted."

That Bill C-81 be amended in Clause 17 by striking out lines 25 to 29 at page 17 and substituting the following therefor:

"maintain a registry in which shall be recorded the name, address and telephone number of the chief agent of each referendum committee."

That Bill C-81 be amended in Clause 18 by striking out lines 30 to 47 at page 17 and lines 1 to 16 at page 18, and substituting the following therefor:

"18. (1) Every referendum committee shall appoint a chief agent and an auditor.

(2) Where the position of chief agent of a referendum committee becomes vacant or the chief agent is unable to perform the duties of chief agent, the committee shall forthwith appoint a new chief agent and file with the Chief Electoral Officer a notice in writing, signed by the leader of the committee, of the name, address and telephone number of the new chief agent and a statement, signed by the new chief agent, that the signer has accepted the appointment as chief agent of the committee.

(3) Where the position of auditor of a referendum committee becomes vacant or the auditor ceases to be qualified as an auditor or becomes ineligible to act as an auditor before having complied with this Act in respect of any referendum finances return of the committee, the committee shall forthwith appoint a new auditor and file with the Chief Electoral Officer a notice in writing, signed by the leader of the committee, of the name, address and telephone number of the new auditor and a statement, signed by the new auditor that the signer has accepted the appointment as auditor of the committee."

That Bill C-81 be amended by striking out lines 6 to 45 at page 21 and lines 1 to 45 at page 21 and lines 1 to 37 at page 22 and substituting the following therefor:

"polling day, allocate equally between the two referendum committees the broadcasting time to be made available under section 21.

(2) Each referendum committee shall indicate on which networks it wishes broadcasting time to be made available to it.

(3) In order to allocate broadcasting time, the Broadcasting Arbitrator may request additional information from the referendum committees.

(4) The Broadcasting Arbitrator shall, as soon as possible after completing the allocation and, in any event, not later than Monday, the twenty-first day before polling day, send a notice in writing of the allocation to the referendum committees, every network affected by the allocation and the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission.

(5) An allocation of broadcasting time to be made available by a broadcasting network is final and binding on the network and on the referendum committees.

23. The Broadcasting Arbitrator shall, on request, provide the referendum committees with the names and addresses of all network operators."

That Bill C-81 be amended in Clause 25 by striking out lines 3 to 5 at page 23 and substituting the following therefor:

"25. (1) Each referendum committee shall, not later than Tuesday, the".

That Bill C-81 be amended in Clause 34

(a) by striking out line 21 at page 28 and substituting the following therefor:

"travenes subsection 15(4) or (5) or"; and

That Bill C-81 be amended in Clause 2(1) by striking out line 13 on page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

That Bill C-81 be amended in Clause 14 be amended (a) after line 16 on page 15 the following:

"(2) No individual, corporation, trade union, political party, or other group shall make a contribution to a registered referendum committee or committees that, in the aggregate, exceeds one thousand dollars."

(b) and by renumbering the previous clause and any cross-references thereto accordingly.

That Bill C-81 be amended in Clause 15(1) by striking out line 20 at page 15 and substituting the following therefor:

"period that, in the aggregate, exceed one"

That Bill C-81 be amended in Clause 15 3(a) by striking out line 36 at page 15 and substituting the following therefor:

"1992, is 25 cents; and"

That Bill C-81 be amended in Clause 21 by striking out lines 25 and 26 at page 20 and substituting the following therefor:

"hours of broadcasting time and a minimum of three hours of broadcasting time for purchase during prime time."

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motions in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some. Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motions please say "yea".

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators opposed to the motions please say "nay".

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we had agreement last week that the vote would be held at 9 o'clock this evening, at the same time as the vote on the amendments proposed by Senator Fairbairn on Friday.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: I would like to speak on the amendments for a moment, if I may, honourable senators.

Senator Frith: I believe we need leave for that in view of the fact that we have just dealt with them. However, if the honourable senator asks for leave, I think it should be given.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Di Nino: I am afraid I did not rise quickly enough. I am disturbed about Bill C-81 as I am generally with referenda. That type of a public consultation can have some rather severe and serious implications, particularly if the results are divisive to the country. I hope we do not have to use this tool and that the Government of Canada, together with the provinces and the other parties involved in the negotiations and discussions on the survival of our country, can reach a conclusion acceptable to all. But if not, as I understand it, this legislation will enable the government to handle, with a certain amount of flexibility, some of the issues those in government are asked to deal with.

I would like to touch upon some of the comments made by Senator Frith and Senator Stanbury. I am totally opposed to a two-committee structure. I believe that goes against the democratic system of this country, although I am aware that it may have been used in the past, particularly in Quebec. However, that was a totally different situation. Generally that is not the type of situation where referenda are used in other countries.

The two-committee system would deprive me, others, or groups of people in this country who do not wish to associate themselves totally with a particular position, of the democratic right or the opportunity to express ourselves. That would be absolutely wrong and it is unCanadian.

The association of spending limits with these committees is just as wrong.

We have not seen the specific referendum question or questions. We do not know whether it will consist of one question or 17 questions; or how the questions will be worded, but we do know that they will require a "yes" or "no" answer. Not all will necessarily agree with the formation of the question or questions. Therefore, there may be groups, individuals or organizations who will wish to put forth their own point of view.

I am surprised about the spending limits. These organizations will have to raise this money, although some of it will come from the public coffers. It will be wonderful to have 30, 40 or 200 organizations hustling to raise or borrow money for the survival of this country. It will be marvellous for me as a Canadian if 100 committees are each able to raise and spend $9 million, which is nearly $1 billion, to save this country. I don't think that is negative; it is positive. Are we to put a cost on what the survival of this country should be?

• (1510)

Senator Frith: It is good news for those who have lots of money.

Senator Di Nino: Senator Stanbury talked about the Lortie Commission. It recommended no limits on the Canadian Elections Act.

With respect to limiting contributions to $1,000,as opposed to $5000, I make the same argument I made a moment ago with respect to those who are willing to dip into their pockets, and savings and assets, to put on the table their money as well as their words to save this country. The figure of $5,000 was used in 1978 dollars by the Liberals in their enabling legislation for a referendum. If it was appropriate then, $5,000 is worth a great deal less today, and we know that. It is still not an inappropriate amount.

What is to stop individuals from distributing $5,000 to their families and friends in $1,000 "limits", if that is what is being suggested? That would be a farce. It would have absolutely no bearing on the amount of money being contributed.

Again, I do not understand the concern of my colleagues opposite. We are talking about the most important issue that this country has had to deal with in 125 years: the very survival of the country—and you are suggesting that I should not be able to contribute $5,000 if I can afford to? Surely, if I do that, or borrow it at my own expense, since I must pay the money back, that is a positive, not a negative step.

The same thing applies to the comment made by Senator Stanbury with respect to reducing the spending limits from 56.4 cents to 25 cents. I do not want to repeat myself there.

As with any other piece of legislation, this bill is not perfect, but it is the best piece of legislation that could be arrived at after consultation with many people, organizations and the different parties. Twenty different amendments were accepted in the House, amendments made by the opposition and by the government.

This bill gives the Government of Canada and the Parliament of Canada the flexibility to be able to design a referendum that will fit the needs of the time if that referendum is to be held. Unlike my colleagues opposite, I think the legislation should be supported, and I hope you will support Senator Murray's motion.

Senator Frith: Should we all support the amendments too?

Senator Di Nino: Just the motion.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I appear before you as a man who, not very long ago, opposed the idea of holding a referendum on the Constitution. I did not think it was a sensible way to deal with so profound a problem.

Having received a letter 25 pages in length, which some of the rest of you may also have received, from a man named Patrick Boyer, who is a member of Parliament from Toronto in the other place, I undertook to write him a letter and tell him how I felt. I said:

> I agree with you that a plebiscite, or even a referendum, can be a useful and democratic tool and that it "sometimes" will do nicely to get politicians off hooks that might gore us. Big ballots work best in small arenas. They were great for deciding local option, but lousy for invoking national prohibition. They may, however, work nationally where the question is not festered by regional differences, religious overtones, or—and this is a big "or"—where nationalism, ingrained over centuries of striving to live together while remaining emotionally apart, comes into play.

My letter to Patrick Boyer, the referendum man, cut from there to the great national issue of 1942 and Mackenzie King's plebiscite to relieve wartime government of its promise not to send soldiers overseas against their will. I was not employed by the Globe and Mail in 1942, but I did agree with that newspaper's post-plebiscite editorial, in particular with this fragment—

Senator Frith: The beginning of a beautiful friendship.

Senator Doyle: It was indeed, sir.

It began with this fragment:

> How much stronger Mr. King would be had he not tampered with his grave obligations and exposed to the world the fracture in Canada's unity.

I said to Mr. Boyer:

> In the end, it was not exposure to the world that did the damage. It was the exposure of Canadians to each other.
> And that brings me smartly up to 1992 and your campaign, which I know is gathering steam, in favour of democracy unlimited. You may be right, but I still need convincing.

And here I stand, not seven years, but six weeks, later, speaking in the Senate in support of third reading of Bill C-81, and against certain amendments thereto, this act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada.

How do I explain my change of heart? Well, I can assure you that the metamorphosis did not come with a heavy hand at caucus. Nor did it come, as it might have, with a careful rereading of Mr. Boyer's letter. He did say this:

> It seems unbecoming, in a democratic country, to appear too reluctant to incorporate such a procedure for participation, or to only threaten that such a direct vote would be held 'as a last resort'.

What has softened rather than overhauled my position on referendums is the think-tank in which members of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have immersed themselves since Bill C-81 was sent to them for study.

What has seeped through my several thicknesses of skull since we began to examine the legislation is that the government's availing itself of referendums is very much a two-stage process that requires two distinct decisions which must be taken at quite different times.

First of all, Parliament must consider enabling legislation well before the time when it might be needed. Having taken that decision and gone through the process which now engages us, the government will be equipped to make a decision to use or not use without delay or prevarication. Certainly, there will not be time available at that crucial stage to rush off and search for the necessary authority. I am reminded here, honourable senators, of my grandmother's oft repeated rule: Wear your overshoes and you will have them with you if it snows. Don't wear your overshoes and snow it most certainly will.

The secret, then, is to provide Parliament with the widest possible space in which to create the precise instrument which might be needed for purposes not yet precisely described. At least, this would seem to me to be the case, not the case that was just sketched for us by the senator on my right—I always have difficulty remembering the name there— on one of his occasional appearances in our midst. He seems to have come here to thrust upon us the argument that referendums are great things, but not in the hands of this government, which he cannot trust.

It would have been helpful if, on some of the other issues which have engaged us in the last year, he had been here to tell us why he did not trust those decisions. It would have been helpful if he had been here to hear, perhaps, the speeches given recently by our leader on this side on what is happening to the recovery of this country, or if he had even been here to say where the leader was at fault. But no, he comes to tell us that the referendum proposed in this bill would be in real danger of becoming a bludgeon, an anti-democratic weapon that would not be sufficiently controlled, and that the government cannot be trusted to use this legislation wisely.

The honourable senator says that the referendum might be used to target Newfoundland. The government has indeed argued that the legislation might be used in a single province to reconcile a single piece of a problem that must be dealt with. But the ministers he spoke of—the unnamed ministers—did they use the word "target"? Have we reached that stage? Has that happened to us?

The honourable senator says that the government may be waiting and wanting to get out of the hole it has dug for itself. That is an original idea. At least I thought it was when I read it in the Globe and Mail last Friday. I am not sure to whom the words, "profoundly irresponsible", which he used, should be applied.

I must go on with a bit more here. I have heard arguments from those who would go further with the referendum than this government has gone. With the acquiescence, one supposes, of all those constitutionally concerned, they would require referendums whenever constitutional change is proposed. "Leave the legislation on the books", I think is one expression I heard. This government makes no such proposal, nor does it consider it paradoxical in the existing circumstances to sincerely hope that this legislation, once in place, will not be needed in the campaign on which we have all embarked—the constitutional underpinning of our country's unity.

It is no secret that the government saw no need to hurry such legislation through, although the use of some mechanism for consulting the people was contemplated in the throne speech. As the unity processes have made their imprint, we have come to this stage which the government leader, Lowell Murray, described the other day. He said:

> While we think it is only prudent and reasonable to equip ourselves with the power to call a referendum if necessary, we are not prepared to bind ourselves to it; still less are we prepared to burden any such referendum by requiring a regional majority formula which could only make a referendum campaign more difficult . . . and divisive.

Honourable senators, that hardly strikes me as the statement—disagree with it though you may—of a man about to wield a bludgeon. If we were preparing to use some new and secret weapon upon this country's democratic institutions, I do not think we would say that we have no plan to use the referendum, that we are simply holding it as one of an array of processes that may still be needed before we are finished with this constitutional business.

Honourable senators, this is not, as Harvie Andre says, a perfect bill. At meetings of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee, I have made no secret of my continuing reservations regarding parts of the legislation, but those doubts are focused on aspects of the Elections Act rather than on Bill C-81 itself. In particular, I find myself opposed to archaic aspects of a law that allows Parliament to demand free time from broadcasters when it makes no such confiscations from other media outlets. I was surprised to hear my honourable friend Senator Stanbury introducing an amendment on this very question. If he wants to make an amendment, why not go to newsprint? But no, the only place he worries about the government inundating us with persuasive argument is, again, the broadcast media. There is no suggestion here that the press need be in some way controlled. Is that because all the champions of freedom of the press sit opposite, as we may be told this coming week in another forum?

Senator Frith: A lot of advertising dollars there.

Senator Doyle: There is an aspect of Bill C-81 that deserves more than passing attention. It springs from the fuzziness of the criticism directed at the cost of this consultation to glean the public's opinion without compulsion to accept that opinion as the basis for legislation. My friends opposite know well enough the differences and the risks that ride between legislative and political imperatives. That aside, there should be absolutely no confusion on the business of expense. Bill C-81 does not authorize any government expenditures beyond those incurred by the Chief Electoral Officer in the course of his duties as prescribed by the Elections Act.

My other colleagues in the committee may have other arguments to make or answers to give. Perhaps I should have dealt more thoroughly with Senator Stanbury's arguments, but they seemed to me to be simply a compilation of what we heard from several witnesses without any embroidery of any kind. Perhaps they shoulde be considered, weighed and judged against whatever merit there may be in our claim that this government has chosen many roads in its search for constitutional unity. It was unjustly accused of not doing that two years ago with Meech lake. Well, we have opened every door, every avenue, and we are accused of trying to find every secret and shabby route available.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, according to rule 38(4) the time is up. But with unanimous agreement, Senator Doyle may continue. Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Doyle: I have really finished. You have been generous with the time and with your attention. I am grateful for that.

I have one more comment to make. The other day, when the constitutionalists and the kings who had gathered in Ottawa had departed and we were left in this place, honourable senators, with no one more controversial than Boris Yeltsin, Canada's national newspaper saw portents in the lull. It said, "A certain scepticism about Ottawa's intentions is starting to ripple quietly through the constitutional debate . . ."

A lull? Quiet ripples? Had the Globe and Mail come closer to our chamber, it might have heard the thunder from the scratching of the senators' quill pens.

Hon. Mabel M. DeWare: I had no intention of speaking on Bill C-81, but I have been working with it on the committee and have enjoyed very much listening to the witnesses. I especially enjoyed listening to the minister the other night, whom we kept for two and one-half hours.

I wish to address two points that Senator Stanbury made. The first point was reducing the limit for voters from 56.4 cents to 25 cents. The amount of 56.4 cents is based on the Canada Elections Act spending limits for national parties. This form was laid out in the Canadian Elections Act, and Bill C-81 attempts to follow the Canadian Elections Act wherever possible. The 56.4 cents is not an amount that was just sort of plucked out of the air. I thought I would bring that to the attention of the Senate and have it put it on the record.

The other point concerns the guarantee of a minimum of three hours of broadcasting time for purchase during prime time.

Bill C-81 only requires networks to provide free broadcasting time. It does not require them to provide a regular time for purchase; it leaves it up to individuals or groups to negotiate with the networks for broadcasting.

The other night it was made perfectly clear to us that the CRTC regulation requires broadcasters to provide equitable coverage. We had a lengthy discussion on what was equitable. In a case where one of the groups felt that it did not have the money or was not capable of buying broadcast time, but could use only the free time, it would be up to the CRTC to ensure that equitable coverage was provided in one way or another. They could do it in their public affairs programs or in news broadcasts, but it is a regulation by the CRTC that equitable coverage of the points of view in an election or referendum be covered.

Even though one of the parties might not be able to buy broadcast time, that time would be available to them because their side would have to be portrayed by someone. They could be asked to come in during the public affairs broadcast time; they would probably be invited to give their views. In that way they would be covered.

The legislation plus the regulations for the CRTC would ensure that the views of all parties were portrayed in the event that we did have a referendum.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak on this Order, we will stand this item until the vote at 9 o'clock tonight. Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I move the third reading of Bill C-82, to amend the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and the National Housing Act and to amend another Act in consequence thereof.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable Senators, I wish to make some comments on third reading concerning co-op housing. They will quite brief and I will have them ready for tomorrow, after which we will be ready to vote on the legislation.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government a question on this bill concerning co-op housing. It was brought to my attention this morning that a group of people from the Atlantic provinces is petitioning the Government of Canada not to proceed with this legislation. Even if there is no funding, it is their belief that the co-op movement in Atlantic Canada is sufficiently strong that, if they had the legislation as it was before, without funding, they could proceed with some construction. I wonder if the Leader of the Government is aware of this.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): No, I am not, honourable senators.

Senator Thériault: You should be. You do not care any more.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I propose that we continue the debate on the second reading of Bill C-51 and Bill C-52 as it was begun on June 17, dealing with them together since they cover the same subject and because the remarks will apply to both bills.

The Hon. The Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES WATERS BILL

YUKON WATERS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of Senator Cochrane for the second reading of Bill C-51, respecting water resources in the Northwest Territories, and the second reading of Bill C-52, respecting water resources in the Yukon Territory.

Hon. Willie Adams: Honourable senators, I want to say a few words on Bills C-51 and C-52. First, I wish to congratulate Senator Cochrane, who moved second reading last Wednesday. I do not have much information to add to that provided by Senator Cochrane, except to say that these bills will replace the Northern Inland Waters Act, or NIWA, as it is referred to, which was enacted in 1970.

These bills are very important to residents of the Yukon and Northwest Territories. In future, it will be very important to have a Waters Act in those areas, particularly when one considers the impact that Bill C-13 may have once it is passed in the Senate and the House of Commons.

Bill C-51 and Bill C-52 are similar. Often in the territories the circumstances in the east are different from those in the west. This is particularly true for those of us who live in the Eastern Arctic. I have travelled through areas in the Yukon, and conditions in those areas are quite different from conditions in my area. The lakes or rivers may run in a different direction, and people may live off the land in a different manner. However, we are all concerned when rivers run through areas where people live.

Approximately one year ago, we were particularly concerned when Alberta was discussing building a pulp mill. Some of the rivers supplying water to people in the territories were going to flow through the area where the pulp mill was to be located, and many communities were concerned, because a polluted river will affect both drinking water and fish.

I have lived for many years in Ottawa and heard many concerns expressed about the Ottawa River. People cannot go near the water because it is so polluted. Sometimes I feel privileged to have lived in the territories and not to have been concerned about the drinking water. Anywhere one goes in the territories one does not need to worry about the water being polluted.

I would like to support Bills C-51 and C-52. I understand the bills would establish two 4-to-9 member water boards for the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. I believe that those boards will be very active and will work well with officials from the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and other government departments.

The bills were introduced in the House of Commons in December 1991. It is now June 1992. The legislation is concerned with municipalities. Up until now, it has been the municipalities and some communities which have been responsible for the supply of running water. In some cases, water is delivered to houses. This legislation will ensure that people have drinking water and that those who provide it have a licence to deliver it.

Where I live in Rankin Inlet we have water and sewer services. Some of the other smaller communities rely on water trucks to deliver drinking water to houses. In some cases this delivery is controlled by the health services department to ensure that the water is fresh.

In some cases we find the water ourselves. But in some years there is not a great deal of rainfall in the summertime, which not only causes fish to die but which prevents us from storing enough water for the coming winter. Fish usually run upstream to the lakes, but if there is not enough water, they die, because there is less oxygen.

As I said earlier in my remarks, this is why sometimes in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories the water is not always the same, especially in the wintertime. Some rivers get low in water and the char die out because there is not enough oxygen.

Honourable senators, to my knowledge these bills will help us in the future in terms of protecting some of the bodies of water which we have in the Northwest Territories. In the meantime, we have to protect ourselves, especially to ensure that mining companies are not polluting in areas where people live and rely on natural sources of drinking water.

I support the bills, honourable senators.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and bills read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Cochrane, bills referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources.

AN ACT TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS IN RELATION TO PENSIONS AND TO ENACT THE SPECIAL RETIREMENT ARRANGEMENTS ACT AND THE PENSION BENEFITS DIVISION ACT

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Nancy E. Teed moved the second reading of Bill C-55, to amend certain Acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangement Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act.

She said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to open debate on second reading of Bill C-55, to amend certain acts in relation to pensions, and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act.

This bill is a first and important step in the efforts to reform the various public sector pension plans. What does Bill C-55 do? As the title suggests, it amends a number of existing statutes such as the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the RCMP Superannuation Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

Bill C-55 also introduces two new acts, one of which is the special retirement arrangements act which would permit revisions to existing plans for non-career diplomats and the Lieutenant Governors of the provinces. In addition, it would provide for the establishment of a new type of plan for those covered under all those statutes except that applicable to Members of Parliament.

The second new act proposed is the Pension Benefits Division Act dealing with the division of pension benefits on marriage breakdown. There are also related and consequential amendments required to the older Defence Services and RCMP Continuation Acts, as well as the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act.

If I may, I would like to make a general comment or two about this bill's use of a combination of statutory and regulatory authority to meet its objectives. In a number of areas where there are general policy changes to be enacted, Bill C-55 provides for regulations to complete the initiative. There are a number of reasons why this combination of statute and regulation is appropriate. The statute quite precisely sets out the general principles, the changes to be made, and then provides for regulations to fill out detail. This means that valuable time is not spent in the House of Commons and in this chamber in consideration of a large number of technical matters. If the two acts on the schedules are included, the bill is already some 140 clauses long.

The regulatory route is a more responsive and flexible mechanism for secondary issues which fall within the general principles set out in the statutes.

There are some important safeguards attached to the making of regulations. For example, the Statutory Instruments Act requires that the Clerk of the Privy Council inspect regulations before they are made to ensure that they are within the statutory authority; that they do not constitute an unusual or unexpected use of the authority under which they are made; and that they are not inconsistent with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Canadian Bill of Rights.

The Statutory Instruments Act also requires that regulations of the sort contemplated by Bill C-55 be published in the Canada Gazette. Therefore, there is no question of there being secret regulations. Finally, there is the review of regulations by the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons for the Scrutiny of Regulations. This is a very visible process, honourable senators.

An important advantage of using regulations to fill in the detail of statutory principles is the opportunity for more direct dialogue on these details with the members of the pension plan. The President of the Treasury Board has made a firm commitment to consult with the joint employee-management advisory committee on the content of regulations contemplated by Bill C-55.

I will now turn to the specific provisions of the bill. Essentially, the legislation proposes measures of two general sorts. First, some measures would address fairness issues where the government has been committed for some time to moving forward, and where continuing delay means difficulty for plan members and their families. Second, a number of measures are designed to ensure that the various plans comply with the requirements imposed on all pension plans in Canada by changes to the Income Tax Act in 1989 and given full effect by regulations promulgated in January of this year under that act.

These tax changes ensure that members of public-sector plans have the same access to tax-assisted retirement savings as other Canadians, no more, and no less. Bill C-55 proposes changes to each of the pension statutes to ensure that they provide pension plans that can continue to be registered under the Income Tax Act. This means that employees can continue to receive tax relief on their pension plan contributions.

This notion of tax compliance means that certain features of each pension plan can no longer be provided under the registered plan. For example, the Income Tax Act limits the maximum pension to be earned under a pension plan to $1,722 for each year of plan membership. Under the federal plans, this limit is not specified, and it is necessary to incorporate the limit in each of the statutes by limiting the level of salary on which benefits can be based.

This might well mean reduced pension coverage for certain employees. I think it is important, honourable senators, that public service employees and members of the Canadian Forces and the RCMP know that their employer would not use the excuse of tax compliance to cut back on the retirement income they rely on. Many employers provide retirement income arrangements beyond the tax- prescribed maximum, and this is the route that the government has chosen to follow.

This would be accomplished, honourable senators, as it is in the private sector, by providing for benefits outside the registered pension plan through a separate arrangement permitted under the Income Tax Act. For all plans other than that for Members of Parliament, this would be done by regulations to be made under the proposed Special Retirement Arrangements Act. These regulations would allow for a new fund to be established, known as the Retirement Compensation Arrangements Account.

To accomplish the same end for members of Parliament, the existing arrangements for MPs have also been divided into an "on-side" registerable plan and an "off-side" plan to be set up as a retirement compensation arrangement. Both plans would be provided in the statute.

Before going on to the proposed changes to each of the major plans, I would mention another amendment that affects all plans as well as the new arrangements I have just described. Bill C-55 proposes that all plans be operated on a fully-funded basis. That is, employee contributions and employer contributions should be at levels that, along with future interest earnings, would be sufficient to provide for the benefits of employees as they are being earned.

Up until now, basic pension benefits have been paid out of the Public Service Superannuation Account, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Account, the RCMP Superannuation Account, as the case may be, and post-retirement indexation has been provided out of the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account. This bill proposes that all contributions would, in the future, be made to the relevant superannuation account, and the balances in the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Account related to each of the pension plans would also be transferred to the main accounts. Basic pension and indexing benefits would not be changed and would be paid from the combined account.

Employee contributions would not be changed, but the government would contribute at the level necessary to maintain full funding. Any existing or future unfunded liabilities would be recognized and amortized by additional government contributions.

I realize this has been quite a detailed explanation of some highly technical provisions, but I think it is important, honourable senators, to describe both the tax-driven changes and the financing amendments because each, in their own way, should reassure employees about the stability and security of their benefits.

I mentioned earlier that this bill proposed measures designed to increase fairness in the various plans. I would like to describe a few of these changes.

First, the Public Service Superannuation Act would be amended to allow part-time employees to become contributors, if they so choose. Right now, only those people working 30 or more hours per week contribute. All employees who are employed to work more than 12 hours per week on average would now qualify to contribute. People who are now employed part-time could chose to become plan members, while those who become employed on a part-time basis in the future would automatically become contributors. In addition, people could elect to count periods of prior part-time service occurring after 1980 for pension purposes.

The extension of the pension plan to part-time workers is, I would think, of particular interest to women, who make up the majority of part-time employees. They will now have the same range of options as they plan for their post-retirement income as those working full-time. This is a real step forward.

Another long-standing commitment that would be recognized in this legislation is the provision of an early retirement program for operational employees of the Correctional Service of Canada. I understand that these employees have worked very hard in the last few years to convince the government of their need for this program. This is very stressful and often dangerous work, and employees need to know that there are options available to them if they cannot remain in these jobs as long as other public service employees.

Further, it is important from the point of view of meeting departmental needs and ensuring public safety that this labour force have this flexibility. While the details of the program await regulations, and the President of the Treasury Board has promised that employee representatives and the department will be consulted on the specific provisions, he has also indicated that it will be similar to the early retirement scheme for air traffic controllers.

That scheme allows an individual to retire at age 50 with 25 or more years of service and receive an unreduced pension with indexing payable at age 60. Like air traffic controllers, Correctional Service employees covered by this new plan would be required to pay additional contributions.

In my remarks about part-time employees, and again when I was talking about Correctional Service employees, I used the word "options". The bill also includes provisions to allow extended periods of leave without pay to be dealt with with more flexibility. Again, this flexibility is really about giving people more options, about letting them make decisions that reflect their own individual circumstances.

We all know, honourable senators, that pension plans do not affect only the contributing members. For many people, they are also an important element in the financial planning of the entire family. I would draw the attention of honourable senators to provisions of Bill C-55 that will have a significant impact in this respect.

For employees of the Public Service and members of the Canadian Forces, improvements in the supplementary death benefit plans contained in Part II of the relevant act will be most welcome. These plans, a kind of term life insurance, provide coverage equal to about one year's salary with coverage declining after age 60 and a paid-up benefit of $500 at age 65. Substantial accumulated reserves make it possible to double the coverage, to twice salary, and increase the paid-up portion to $5,000 with no increase in cost for employees or the taxpayer.

Another feature of interest to members of all the major plans is the proposal to allow an individual to provide a survivor's benefit to a spouse the member marries after retirement, or in the case of Canadian Forces or the RCMP, after age 60. The individual's own benefit would be reduced to provide such a benefit.

Many people have suggested, as this bill moves through the legislative process, that the regular survivor benefit provisions of the plans simply be extended to survivors in these instances, without reduction of the member's own pension. However, the government does not believe that it would be appropriate for the plan, and therefore indirectly the taxpayer, to assume the additional liability that such an enrichment would involve. The adequacy and appropriateness of all the survivors' benefits provisions will be considered as part of a fundamental review following passage of Bill C-55. I will be talking about this review in more detail shortly.

This bill would also enact a new statute called the Pension Benefit Division Act. In most provinces, the value of earned pensions is now taken into account in determining the division of assets on marriage breakdown. Provincial pension standards legislation normally requires plan sponsors to recognize and act on court orders or legal separation agreements which specify a division of pension assets.

Right now, the federal pension statutes which would be amended by Bill C-55 do not allow such requests to be honoured. There is no doubt this has led to difficulty for some plan members and their spouses in settling their personal affairs since pension values can be a large part of the total family assets.

The government believes its pension plans should accommodate court orders or separation agreements, and this is the purpose of the new Pension Benefit Division Act. This act would allow the legal or common-law suppose access to up to 50 per cent of the value of the pension benefits accrued during the period specified in the court order or agreement. The value would then be transferred to another retirement savings vehicle or, in the case of a retirement compensation arrangement, directly to the spouse. An appropriate reduction to be determined under the act and regulations would then be made in the member's pension.

I know there are those who argue that responding to court orders or separation agreements is not enough, that this new act should provide for mandatory credit splitting the way the Canada Pension Plan does, for example. This means that if the marriage breaks down the pension value is split automatically. Some witnesses appearing before the legislative committee that studied Bill C-55 made this point. They also proposed that the bill provide for retroactivity of mandatory credit splitting so that where marriages had broken down in the past the spouse would now automatically receive a portion of the pension value.

The problems they describe are real. There is no denying the difficult circumstances that many women found themselves in because they did not receive part of the pension which their efforts and sacrifices made possible. The problem is that mandatory credit splitting would create more difficulties than it would solve. It would remove the very flexibility this new act is designed to provide. It would deny individuals the opportunity to divide this important family asset in a way that takes into account all the family property and the entirety of their financial circumstances.

It would upset those settlements made in the past where assets had been divided equitably and people have gone on with their lives on that basis. It would also place the minister of the Crown in the untenable constitutional situation of determining the appropriate division of the family asset, a matter clearly within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Honourable senators, I have attempted, in these remarks today, to explain the principal elements of Bill C-55 and to respond to some of the questions individuals and groups have raised about its objectives and specific provisions. Some groups and individuals think it does not go far enough. For example, there are the concerns expressed by plan members, both active and retired, about their role in the management of their plan; about some basic features of the plan; about the adequacy of survivors' benefits; about vesting; and about portability. These are fundamental questions, honourable senators. They go to the very heart of what a pension plan is for and how well it meets its objectives.

Questions have also been raised about the investment of pension funds and the effect that would have on fund earnings. The Auditor General has indicated that this particular issue is in need of further study. He has suggested, furthermore, that funding arrangements for public service plans have implications for the management of the public debt, and these implications must be assessed. The government agrees that all of these questions must be explored. They must be studied in a way that takes into account the interests of employees, pensioners, and those other important stakeholders, Canadian taxpayers.

The president of the Treasury Board has announced his intention to meet with his Public Service Superannuation Act Advisory Committee to begin the process of reviewing these issues, these fundamental questions, as they affect the Public Service. This committee represents unions, management and pensioners.

Bill C-55 would, for the first time, allow the Minister of National Defence and the Solicitor General to establish their own similar pension advisory committees on the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, respectively. With respect to the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, the government has announced that an independent review will be conducted of all aspects of members' pension arrangements.

As we review this bill, I believe it is important to keep in mind that it marks the beginning rather than the end of the public sector pension reform process. The next phase will provide ample opportunity for the discussion of those fundamental principles and issues which are of such concern to the government and all pension plan members.

Honourable senators, at the appropriate time I will be moving that Bill C-55 be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

COASTING TRADE BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Donald H. Oliver, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report:

Monday, June 22, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications has the honour to present its

TENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-33, An Act respecting the use of foreign ships and non-duty paid ships in the coasting trade has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Thursdy, May 21, 1992, examined the said Bill and now reports the same with the following amendments.

1. Page 6, clause 4: Add, immediately after subclause (2), the following subclauses:

"(3) When the voyage or activity in the coasting trade is to be more than fourteen days, the owner or operator of the ship for which the licence has been granted shall observe all the laws of Canada applicable to a Canadian ship operating in the coasting trade, including, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, the laws relating to manpower and immigration, labour, labour standards, safety and ecology for the period that the licence is issued.

(4) No licence shall be issued when the voyage or activity is for more than fourteen days unless good and sufficient guarantees are deposited by the owner or operator of the ship that all the laws of Canada mentioned in subsection (3) shall be obeyed."

2. Page 7, clause 6:

(a) Add, immediately before subclause (1), the following:

"(1) The Minister shall not consider an application under section 4 or 5 that is made less than fourteen days before the provision of the service or the performance of the activity described in the application is intended to commence.

(2) The Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing special circumstances which may be taken into account to reduce the delay set out in subsection (1), and the Minister may issue the licence if the fourteen day delay is not met, provided that the said special circumstances have been proven to exist."

(b) Renumber subclauses (1) to (3), and any cross-references thereto, accordingly.

3. Page 7, clause 8:

(a) Add, immediately before subclause (1), the following:

"(1) The Agency shall establish a registry of owners and operators of Canadian ships which may be used in the coasting trade and maritime unions representing employees on Canadian vessels.

(2) Upon receiving an application for the issuance of a licence, the Agency shall forthwith communicate the request to such appropriate owners, operators and unions listed in its registry to determine whether a Canadian ship would be available.

(3) When an interested person furnishes details to the Agency of a Canadian ship that is available and suitable, the Agency shall not issue a licence without first holding a hearing, if requested, and only after determining that the Canadian ship offered is not available or suitable.

(b) Renumber subclauses (1) and (2), and any cross-references thereto, accordingly.

Respectfully submitted,

DONALD H. OLIVER
Chairman

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

TWENTY-SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the twenty-sixth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (budget—Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders), presented in the Senate on 18th June, 1992.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, moved the adoption of the twenty-sixth report of the committee.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

SCOTIA SYNFUELS PROJECT

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Third Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources (Scotia Synfuels), tabled in the Senate on 15th June, 1992.—(Honourable Senator Hays)

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to speak to this reference. Senator Graham has already spoken to it and I hope some other senators will speak to it as well. It is of particular interest to senators from Nova Scotia. Many of them, even though they are not on the Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources committee, took trouble to attend meetings both in the last Parliament and in our deliberations recently on this particular report.

I had the honour to table the report last week. The report, as you all know, has to do with a project currently being planned for Point Tupper, Nova Scotia. This development, as our report points out in great detail, involves the co-processing of high-sulphur, indigenous coal and imported heavy oil into a three-prong stream of cleaner petroleum products for the eastern Canadian markets.

The project has a number of significant advantages. It would provide important energy-related benefits to a region almost totally dependent upon sometimes unreliable foreign supplies for its crude oil requirement. It would also serve to enhance regional development efforts in an economically depressed area creating employment and business opportunities, as well as tax revenues for governments. In this day and age of concerns over the environment, the project would be helpful in reducing the bulk of sulphur dioxide and nitrous oxide prior to combustion in the plant stage.

In the spring of 1991, the committee heard evidence from the project sponsors themselves, Scotia Synfuels Ltd., and officials from the two federal departments principally involved in passing judgment on the relative merits of the project, namely Energy, Mines and Resources, and Industry, Science and Technology.

We found out that for the project sponsors, receiving approval for federal financial assistance for this project has been, to put it mildly, an arduous process. Bounced around federally from department to department for many years, the proponents' request for federal aid was finally turned down in November 1990. Even though the project displayed a number of important socio-economic, technological, regional, and environmental advantages, Scotia Synfuel's request for assistance was primarily rejected on the basis that the project was deemed to be fundamentally uneconomic.

More recently, in December 1991, Scotia Synfuels, along with officials from the Government of Nova Scotia, presented a substantially altered funding proposal to the federal government. In a letter to the committee dated June 9, 1992, the president of Scotia Synfuels, Allister Gillespie, points out that the sponsoring parties now wish to promote the financial participation of the federal government in a $15 million test program and feasibility study. The results of this work, to be undertaken in conjunction with a subsidiary of the Venezuela National Oil Company named Corpoven, would then be used to establish the commercial feasibility of the Synfuels plant.

The letter also mentions that a decision has been reached to proceed with what can actually be considered as the first construction phase of the Synfuels project, the rebuilding and modification of the marine oil terminal at Point Tupper as an international commercial storage and trans-shipment facility. This is a stand-alone project with financing to be provided in part from U.S. corporate sources.

Regarding the Synfuels project's commercial stage, no longer are the proponents requesting the federal authorities to provide loan guarantees. The request for interest subsidies has also been dropped. Capital cost financing will, as before, be totally met through the private sector. What Scotia Synfuels does ask for is access to a 30 per cent special investment tax credit and excise tax remission on its derived product.

Proponents are convinced that the economics of the project have improved measurably since the funding rejection. They attribute this to lower feedstock costs achieved through the negotiation of a netback price arrangement with Corpoven; higher revenues as a result of modified project configuration; and lower financial costs given the project's eligibility for the investment tax credit.

We as a committee are recommending in this report that the government consider the revised economics of the project and, as well, the social benefits of a Synfuels plant in eastern Canada. We have urge strongly that the federal government support this worthwhile venture. It is, we believe, a project for the 1990s.

I would urge one of my colleagues—from either side of the house—to move the adjournment of the debate, because, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, I am sure other senators will wish to speak to this matter.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

CONFLICT OF INTERESTS

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on Conflict of Interests (subject-matter of Bill C-43, An Act to provide for greater certainty in the reconciliation of the personal interests and duties of office Members of the Senate and of the house of Commons, to establish a Conflict of Interests Commission and to make consequential amendments to other Acts), tabled in the Senate on June 10th, 1992.

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, I was a member of the Special Joint Committee on Conflict of Interests. Our joint chairman, Senator Stanbury, asked the senators who were on this committee to make a presentation on one particular subject.

I decided to offer some comments on the role we wanted to confer on the Jurisconsult, the person who would be responsible for administering any future conflict-of-interests legislation.

Before starting on my main topic, I would like to congratulate Senator Stanbury, the joint chairman of our committee, on the way he chaired our proceedings. I would also like to emphasize the invaluable contribution made by the other senators on this committee: Senators Balfour, De Bané, Kelleher, Oliver and Olson.

Honourable senators, to prepare our report we had to examine Bill C-43 which was the subject of our discussions.

Bill C-43 recommended more specifically the appointment of a commission that would be responsible for enforcing the conflict of interests provisions. The commission was to consist of three commissioners. I must admit that at first I felt this made eminent good sense, for the simple reason that the commission would have to deal with about 400 federal parliamentarians.

However, honourable senators, after hearing testimony by the Jurisconsult for the Province of Quebec, as well as by the Commissioners for Ontario, Nova Scotia and British Columbia, we realized that it was better to have one person look after the administration of the Conflict of Interests Act.

Why? For the simple reason that Mr. Justice Evans, commissioner for a province as big as Ontario, told us that he had plenty of time to take care of administering the Conflict of Interests Act on a part-time basis, with only one permanent employee on staff. That is why we set aside the concept of a Commission with three Commissioners, to avoid additional expenditures and a welter of bureaucratic red tape and also to be sure there would be no confusion about the decisions.

We suggested appointing a Jurisconsult and not a commissioner. Why a Jurisconsult? Because such a person would not only administer the legislation but would also advise parliamentarians, which we think is very important.

To maintain the integrity of the system, it was important, honourable senators, to establish procedures for the appointment of the Jurisconsult. In our recommendations we suggest the jurisconsult should be appointed by the Governor general in council, following an address from both Houses, tabled in the other place by the Prime Minister and seconded by the Leader of the Official Opposition, after consultation the other opposition leaders, and also after consultation with the leader of the opposition in the Senate.

In our recommendations we said that the jurisconsult is appointed for a seven-year term, that this term may be renewed but may also be revoked, as in the case of all senior officials, by an address from both Houses. One of our suggestions was that the jurisconsult should appoint public servants to help with the administration of future conflict-of-interests legislation.

We also suggested in our report that the jurisconsult should have four main functions: to examine statements by parliamentarians; to prepare public statements without quantifying them; to advise parliamentarians; and finally, to investigate violations as required.

It is important to note that we recommended on several occasions that members should be able to request a written opinion that would be binding on the Jurisconsult provided that full disclosure is made and is truthful.

In the report we tabled basically, we suggested that the Jurisconsult is not an enforcement officer, but should be—in legal terms—an amiable compositeur.

We suggested that the Jurisconsult should have the power to set up an inquiry in the following instances: first, on a complaint made by a member against another member and, second, on his own initiative. Please note that he has the power in both instances.

However, we suggested that he must set up an inquiry in the following instances: at the request of either House or at the request of the Prime Minister where a minister or a parliamentary secretary is involved.

Our recommendations were to the effect that instead of imposing sanctions, the Jurisconsult recommends one of the following sanctions to the House where the member sits: a simple reprimand or a temporary suspension with or without pay and, finally, leaving that seat vacant.

What is important is that the Jurisconsult has the power to recommend, not to decide. Ultimately, it is up to the House where the member sits to decide within 15 sitting days.

Honourable senators, we tabled a unanimous report with the understanding, however, that each of us would have an opportunity to make recommendations and suggestions. We have heard 31 testimonies in 26 hearings. At the conclusion of our deliberations, we reached a unanimous consensus: the person best suited to administer a future conflict of interest legislation would be a Jurisconsult.

Honourable senators, you will hear about other aspects of this report from other honourable senators who sat on this committee.

It was a pleasure for me to take a few moments to outline for you the very important role the Jurisconsult would play in administering a conflict of interest law. Thank you, honourable senators.

On motion of senator Lynch-Staunton, debate adjourned.

INTERNATIONAL HEART HEALTH CONFERENCE

MEETING HELD IN VICTORIA, BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Wilbert Joseph Keon rose pursuant to notice of June 15th, 1992:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the International Heart Health Conference, held on May 28, 1992, in Victoria, British Columbia.

He said: Honourable senators, I appreciate this opportunity to draw to your attention the issues discussed at an historic international conference in which I had the honour of participating last month. The International Heart Health Conference was held in Victoria, B.C., from May 23 to May 28. It was historic in that it brought together from around the world for the first time health professionals, scientists and decision-makers from many sectors and jurisdictions, including the political sector.

[Senator Grimard.]

At the culmination of the conference on May 28, the Conference Advisory Board produced a summary document entitled Bridging the Gap: Science and Policy in Action, which includes a declaration emanating from the conference, known in the heart health circle as "The Victoria Declaration", and two supporting documents, A Call for Action and A Framework for Policy in Action. This declaration represents a policy blueprint formed with consensus by international experts. For the record, I would like to read to you some of the Victoria Declaration.

> Recognizing that the scientific knowledge and widely tested methods exist to prevent most cardiovascular disease, the Advisory Board of the International Conference on Heart Health calls upon:
> - health, media, education and social science professionals, and their associations;
> - the scientific research community;
> - government agents concerned with health, education, trade, commerce and agriculture;
> - the private sector;
> - international organizations and agencies concerned with health and economic development;
> - community health coalitions;
> - voluntary health organizations;
> - employers and their organizations > to join forces in eliminating this modern epidemic through the adoption of policies and implementation of programs of health promotion and disease prevention and regulatory change directed at entire populations.

Cardiovascular disease is the leading cause of death in Canada, as it is throughout the world, especially in industrialized countries. A 1991 Heart and Stroke Foundation publication entitled "Cardiovascular Disease in Canada" reports that 41 per cent of all deaths in Canada in 1988 were due to various forms of cardiovascular disease.

There are tremendous variations among countries, Romania being notably high at 496 deaths per 100,000 population, and Japan among industrial nations notably low at 174 deaths per 100,000. Canada's rate of 264 per 100,000 stood somewhere in the middle of countries surveyed. Within Canada there are age, gender, geographic and socio-economic differences.

As people age, they are more at risk. Men are far more at risk than women, although after 70 the risk to women catches up to that of men. People living in the Atlantic provinces have a higher rate of heart health problems, and resulting death, than other Canadians; and there is a high risk for people less well off in lower socio-economic groups.

Cardiovascular disease also imposes a tremendous cost on our health care system and our economy. As of 1987, over 20 per cent of all patient-days spent in hospital were for treatment of cardiovascular disease, and cardiovascular patients had a longer average length of stay in hospital compared to other patient. Over one quarter of disability pensions paid in 1986 were because of cardiovascular problems. Add to those costs the lost years of productive work and earnings of the thousands of people who die or are disabled each year because of heart health problems. We have made some progress in Canada and other industrialized countries in reducing those heart health problems and in reducing the mortality overall at a rate of about 2 per cent per year.

The discussions at last month's conference in Victoria also underlined another problem. While we are slowly reducing the incidence of heart health problems here, they are steadily increasing worldwide because of their increasing incidence in developing nations and in central and eastern Europe. The "Call for Action" section of the Victoria Conference document "Bridging the Gap" has a very clear message for citizens, communities, and governments in Canada and throughout the world:

> Cardiovascular disease is largely preventable. We have the scientific knowledge to create a world in which heart disease and stroke could be virtually eliminated . . . We already know, from studying downward trends in cardiovascular disease in many countries, how to reduce its toll.

Not only that, but the report also points out that an attack on heart health problems would, at the same time, help to alleviate other health problems.

The major causes of cardiovascular disease are known: smoking, high blood pressure, high blood cholesterol, unhealthy diets, excessive alcohol consumption, obesity, sedentary lifestyles and stress. As the report says:

> Reducing or, ideally, eradicating them will produce declines not only in cardiovascular disease, but also in other noncommunicable diseases which share similar risk factors—for example, many types of cancer and lung and liver disease.

The message of the report is clear: A dollar given or an hour's time donated for promoting heart health is a contribution to the overall health of our citizens.

What does the International Heart Health Conference prescribe? It suggests several broad areas for action. First, educating the public about the causes and the importance of heart health problems and building consumer demand for health promotion initiatives; second, applying and extending the scientific base of information to promote policy action—for example, in publicizing dietary guidelines and smoking cessation information; third, creating political will to promote public health and resist economic pressures that would detract from a heart healthy environment; fourth, building partnerships at the local, national and international levels, including both public and private sectors, to promote public health. These broad recommendations point us in the direction of a multi-faceted, multinational attack on a range of health problems with a focus on heart health leading the way.

Some of the causes of heart health problems are simply beyond our control. Gender and age differences and genetic factors in cardiovascular risk cannot be changed by government action or promoting lifestyle change. Other factors, though, can be changed. Some are very difficult to address, such as socio-economic and geographic factors. In Canada, those go hand in hand. Our poorest people are concentrated in our poorest provinces, Atlantic Canada, and run the greatest risk of heart health problems.

Health and Welfare Canada published a superb document earlier this year, "Heart Health Equality: Mobilizing Communities for Action". That report offered us this insight:

> Heart health inequality represents a major opportunity for society to acknowledge and deal with the broad, socio-economic determinants of health . . . the heart health experience can provide valuable lessons on how persons of low socio-economic status may improve their access to health-promoting conditions.

That is a valuable observation which I believe points to an equally valuable conclusion. Our citizens must have the opportunity to prevent heart health problems. In the first place, we need to make the effort to educate people about health problems and promote healthy lifestyles. At the community level, no matter how big or small a community, much can be done to inform people about the risks of smoking, lack of physical exercise, obesity, quality diet and so on, and much can be done to encourage change in lifestyle to promote better health. Community mobilization, using the combined forces of local media, political opinion leaders and the contributions of time and energy of concerned citizens and medical experts can work wonders in creating a health-conscious local environment that can prevent the development of heart health problems.

What about the role of governments? The "Framework for Policy and Action" section of the International Heart Health Conference report includes some simple prescriptions for governments. It recommends that government take leadership in formulating national strategies for the active promotion of heart health and prevention and control of cardiovascular disease; implementing comprehensive programs to educate the public on the potential for prevention of heart disease and stroke; developing public policy supportive of social, economic and marketing environments which are conducive to healthy lifestyles.

We in Canada have the opportunity to lead the world in this agenda. The conference report concludes—and I support these conclusions—that governments at all levels—municipal, regional, provincial, national and multinational—have a primary responsibility for agreement upon and promotion of broad-scale health promotion and disease prevention. This must include a commitment to reducing health and social inequalities and the promotion of heart health among disadvantaged and lower socio-economic groups. It is also interesting that the suggestion is made that AIDS, a disease which may wipe out one-third of the world's population, is also totally preventable.

The Victoria Declaration concludes:

> A balance is needed between the resources available for treatment and those available for prevention ... Even modest levels of government funding can help to catalyze the process and promote the development of necessary partnerships. These funds or "seed monies" may also help to mobilize resources from other sectors. Compared to the cost of treating cardiovascular disease, the resources needed to implement health promotion and disease prevention programs are very small.
> Governments should realize that major savings in health care costs will be realized by preventing risk factors from appearing in the first place.
> Science is the art of the soluble while politics is the art of the possible.

The scientific information we now have before us in the field of heart health care is that even fairly limited expenditures by governments on health promotion and disease prevention in the short term can help to develop community health coalitions, encourage the private sector and media to assist in promoting healthier lifestyles, and, in the longer run, produce considerable savings for governments in the treatment of health problems.

The message I should like to leave with you is this: Through the art of the possible, through thoughtful government leadership and action now in support of health promotion programs and health-conscious community programs and coalitions, we can help save lives and prevent disabilities.

We will do so while saving health care costs, saving lost production to our economy and contributing to the health and welfare of our citizens.

With leave, honourable senators, I should like to table this report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered debated.

Inquiry debated.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, had we known that we would go through the Order Paper so quickly we would have scheduled the vote at 5:30, but it would be highly irregular and unfair to change the hour just to suit those who are here. I would suggest that we follow the original schedule of holding the vote at 9 o'clock but suspend the session and reconvene at 8 o'clock. We have already agreed to a 30-minute bell.

The Hon. the Speaker: We have agreed to a 30-minute bell at 8:30 p.m.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes. Perhaps we should reconvene at 8 o'clock.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps the honourable senator could elaborate on the unfairness a little more.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Some senators have obviously scheduled the vote into their agendas. To change the hour without any warning would be unfair. Committees are also scheduled to sit. As you know, we also have a heavy day tomorrow.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, one senator would be prepared to speak to Item No. 1 under Reports of Committees if we may have leave to revert.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: We would be happy to hear him.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON A RENEWED CANADA

Leave having been given to revert to Reports from committees.

> Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, dated 28th February, 1992 (Sessional Paper 343-416A).

Hon. Maurice Riel: Honourables senators, I want to address the issue of the Senate reform from an historical perspective.

We know that the Senate was entrenched in the Constitutional Act of 1867 at the request of and under pressure from Quebec. You can find evidence of that in every speech made by the politicians of the time, starting with Sir John A. Macdonald.

One must add that the Maritimes also wanted a Senate where they would have had enough weight to represent their regional interests as opposed to the rest of Canada, and especially Ontario.

The word "region" is very important. The Constitutional Act of 1867 establishes the Senate to represent regions, not provinces. Balance was achieved by appointing 24 senators for each region. You had then three provinces and what could be called a minority veto for political protection.

When the western provinces were created and joined the Confederation, a fourth region was created and 24 senators were added. That division of the country into four regions for the purpose of the Senate should have been and should be adhered to, in my humble opinion, during the Constitutional debate or negotiations; otherwise, it is the minority which rules, not the majority.

The veto for political protection of the three regions became the veto of a quarter instead of the veto of the third when the Western provinces joined. Clearly Quebec, as a region, was losing some of its protection powers just as were the other two regions.

One can wonder if the minority veto of one third or the new veto of a quarter offered real protection for the minorities, in the Maritimes and in Quebec, protection of every aspect of their life, that is to say of Quebec's language and education rights and protection of their commercial rights for the others. The protection of commercial rights was of much greater concern for the Maritimes. I have the feeling that this minority protection gave way to the party lines spirit which invaded the Senate just as it would have a second House of Commons.

From the start, senators were appointed according to party lines. The government was operating as in Westminster according to the system of parliamentary majority, with the Senate majority being added to the House majority, just as is happening today. I am not a criticising, I am just stating a fact.

I already said, a few years ago in this chamber, that when Sir Wifrid Laurier came into power in 1896, one could count the Liberal senators on the fingers of one hand. The Conservative majority rejected, in 1898, his bill regarding building a railroad in Ontario.

In 1913, the Tories were back in command since 1911, but the Liberals still had a majority in the Senate where there were only five Tories left in 1911. The Liberal Senators negatived the Navy bill adopted by the Tories in the House of Commons. That shows how much the Senate respected then, as always, the party lines.

That is why, in a parliamentary system such as ours, as senator Bolduc said so appropriately the other day, an efficient government always seeks to obtain the majority in the Senate. If a government has a majority in the Senate, its bills will always pass. That was the system chosen for the British House of Lords and Parliament.

In 1909, the House of Lords, with a Tory majority, refused to accept Prime Minister Lloyd George's budget. That signalled the beginning of the end for the House of Lords' powers.

Today, in Westminster, according to agreements between parties which became law during the fifties, whatever the representation of each party in the House of Lords, the government in place automatically has a "majority", a fictitious but very real majority in that House. The Lords have lost their powers except for the authority to "delete and delay", but even then, with certain restrictions.

It was therefore recognized in England that the last word should be given to the elected House of Commons.

Prime Minister Wilson, in his speech on the reform of the House of Lords, declared in the Commons that the committee had determined that the House of Lords was neither an opponent nor a competitor of the Commons.

In Canada, because there was no amending formula, the powers of the Senate were never modified except when, in 1982, it was given a six month suspensive veto on constitutional matters and when a legislation, which some labelled the iniquitous, was adopted to set the retirement age at 75.

The true mandate of the Senate in Canada is a power to review and revise and a duty to reflect. One could summarize the Senate's role with these three Rs—review, revise, reflect. Our predecessors, senators Dandurand and Arthur Meighen reflected and wrote on that subject; they deplored the narrow partisanship of the work done in the Senate and promoted the philosophy according to which the senator's role is almost judiciary.

Indeed, just what is the Senate? Sir John Macdonald said that it is a house of sober second thought. Indeed, the Senate must be the conscience of Parliament, if not of the whole country. For this, it must have a moral authority. The Senate is useless if it does not have a moral authority. It is this moral authority that will ensure its credibility in the fulfilment of its duties. The credibility of the Senate depends entirely on the actions and measures of the senators, as well as on the image that they project of their House. The Senate must be the good father of the family formed by the nation.

Since senators are appointed for a long term and are not elected, they have the duties (which I believe I have indicated) of reviewing, revising and reflecting, and they must not, in my opinion, show partisanship. A near-magistrature must bring senators to control their partisanship while still adhering to their party. They must show moderation. This is the corollary of the sober second thought.

Nowadays, the House of Lords has a significant number of Lords that do not belong to any party. They are called "cross benchers" because they sit in the main alley between the two rows of seats of the government and the opposition, where our Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod sits.

The "cross benchers" are mostly members from the civil service. They are former ambassadors, high ranking bureaucrats, etc. They are "life peers". They form the nucleus of committees, of which the most important ones monitor the European Common Market. Indeed, 90 members of the House of Lords form six or seven committees that monitor the evolution of trade, policies, as well as the European Common Market.

Eight years ago, I suggested the creation of a nucleus of independent senators in the Senate by using the section of the Constitution that gives the government the power to appoint eight extra senators. I suggested then that former Prime Ministers of Canada, as well as former Provincial Premiers, be automatically members of the Senate when they leave office, on simple notice to the Clerk of the Senate.

I figured that there is always eight to ten surviving former Prime Ministers and Premiers in total. In any case, governments appoint them (at least most of them) to the Senate.

We have had senators Hicks, Smith, Robichaud, Manning, Roblin and Hatfield, and now we have Senator Buchanan. I may forgetting others. I thought that this nucleus of "elderly statesmen" with its independent status might be able to have a positive influence on the partisanship that pervades our ranks.

[Translation]

My proposal was not accepted, which, seven years later, allowed this government to send us one day eight distinguished Canadians to give itself a majority. However, contrary to what I had expected, they did not came to the Senate as independents, but joined the caucus of the party that had appointed them. I do nos discuss their choice nor do I blame them for it because they are Canadian citizens as well as I am and certainly of high quality. I have known some of them for many years and I highly appreciate their competence and their hard-working spirit. But the immediate impact did not help improve the partisanship on either sides of this House. All that is not the fault of this group of new eight senators, for they got here in the middle of an epic battle. They did not have much choice.

I said at the time to Senator Flynn that all senators are inhibited by the Prime Minister who appointed them. So I came to the conclusion that my proposal was probably Utopian and would never be implemented although some former prime ministers, federal as well as provincial, found it serious.

Individually, the actual senators are all qualified people to sit in the Senate. Please excuse me in advance, but those who would get elected will be no better than those who are here presently. But as a group, i.e. in a caucus or in this Chamber, like any other individual under the same circumstances, senators get carried away, all stirred up and excited, and in the grip of emotion take positions they are prisoners of and when the promotion of those positions get fierce in the face of resistance, they give up all standards of common sense. I have seen it on both sides of this House; I do not set myself up as a judge, I just watch as I already said to Senator Grimard. This phenomenon is as old as the hills, it was true among the Greeks and among the Romans, in every public body. Here is how Lord Chesterfield, 200 years ago, expressed this.

• (1700)

[English]

What is certain is that when great numbers of people congregate they tend to animate each other and, collectively, do something—either good or bad, but more often bad. In that situation, individuals, who were separately peaceful grow tumultuous as a body and are ripe to take part in any mischief that may be suggested to them by their leaders.

At college, they told us "nihil in clamore", meaning to rant and to rave is pointless.

On several occasions, to sit in this house was like being on a battlefield, which brings me to this conclusion: There are no bad institutions or constitutions like there are no bad tools, only bad workmen.

Nowadays, some Westerners, and the government of Alberta in particular, want to reform the Senate and change the way senators are designated.

They want to replace the word regions in the Constitution by provinces. Instead of having 4 regions or 5 with the Yukon and the Territories, we would have 10 provinces plus two territories with the same number of senators for each province. As mentioned in the Alberta report, the object of this proposal is to offset the powers of the two central provinces.

Personally, I always thought the power of the central provinces was pretty well counterbalanced, with 24 senators from the Maritimes, 24 from Quebec, 24 from Ontario, 24 from the West and 8 other senators from various regions. That, to me, looked like a well-balanced Senate.

However, the movers of this proposal say this is a step toward a better democracy, but what is representative democracy? We always said it was rep by pop, which became a slogan in the last century. I wonder how the movers can guarantee that their proposal will always give their region or their province the majority in the Senate, and what if they lose this majority, will they want to bring some more changes in a few years to better represent the interests of their provinces? Would it not be ironic in some way if the majority, made up of 26 MPs for Alberta, voted for a bill and the 6 senators from Alberta voted against it? Would it mean that the 6 senators prevail over the 26 members from the same province?

We realize that we should have a mandatory conciliation committee between both Houses. It visits in France and in Germany. In France they have a joint committee, and in the case of a deadlock the Assembly prevails.

What do the promoters of the triple E Senate want? Surely to have more power in Central Canada. But the real power belongs to the Cabinet no to the Senate. It belongs to the government in our parliamentary majority system. Right now, westerners hold Cabinet's most important departments. Here is a short list. The Right Hon. Joe Clark is President of the Queen's Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs. Mr. Mazankowski is Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance. Mr. Epp is Minister of Energy, Mine and Resources. Mr. Andre is Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons. Mr. Siddon is Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Mr. Mayer is Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds). Mr. McKnight is Minister of Agriculture. Mr. Oberle is Minister of Forestry. Mrs. Mary Collins is Associate Minister of National Defense and Minister Responsible for the Status of Women. Mrs. Kim Campbell is Minister of Justice and Attorney General. I believe no other departments are more important than those ones.

On top of that we have the Speaker, the Chief Government Whip in the House of Commons and the Governor General. I would also add that most members from the West are government members. Forty-six out of 86, and 23 out 26 in Alberta, are government members. How can we not say that the present government is not dominated by western power? At one point we used to say the same thing about the French. The government has been in office for eight years, but does that mean that westerners do not have confidence anymore in their representatives in Cabinet and that all these ministers and members are not doing their job or are incompetent?

In fact, when I read this list, I see that all of them enjoy a good credibility. I know a few personally for whom I have much respect.

By virtue of this triple-E principle, should not Cabinet positions be distributed equally among all provinces? Are westerners ready to apply to the Cabinet the same rule they are proposing for the Senate?

I will now deal with the election of senators. I have no objection whatsoever to the election of senators, but people should look at the "landers" in Germany, where the number of senators is not the same. In France, ridings are not all the same. Paris has twelve senators, while Seine-et-Marne has only three and some regions only one.

We know that our friends in Alberta are inspired mostly by the American model, where all 50 states have the same number of senators and where the Senate has enormous powers. One must not forget that the President can veto the bills coming from the Senate. That veto can be overridden, but only by a two-third majority vote, which means the veto can stand with the support of only 34 out of 100 senators. During a recent meeting with American friends, they were complaining about the fact that, too often, the President does not have a majority in Congress and that he is prevented from having the bills he would like. They find such a situation humiliating for the President and bad for the U.S.A., and they considered our system with its parliamentary majority more in keeping with a democratic government. As you see, the grass is always greener on the other side of the fence.

France adopted a new constitution some 25 years ago. It now has a semi-presidential system where the Senate is elected, strong but unequal. The French Senate operates very smoothly. I had the opportunity some years ago to be seated at the same dining table between two French senators, a communist, a worker from Dunkirk, and an independent, a farmer from Colmar area in the Alsace region. Both spoke highly of the work done in the Senate, although they did not belong to the same party, and in fact belonged to opposite ends of the political spectrum.

Appointed or elected, Canadian senators will only be humans like ourselves, Canadians of good will from all regions of the country, equal among themselves and efficient each in their own ways. But do not be fooled, appointed or elected, senators will toe the party line, either in government or in opposition. With the system that Alberta is proposing, we would have a Senate with the same majority as the Commons, or a Senate totally divided, fragmented and orreconcilable, fostering the interests of the provinces, from the smallest to the largest. Will that cure the ills our western friends are complaining about? We will have a Senate with a majority or without a majority, that is to say a fragmented Senate.

If western Canada, and especially Alberta, believes that it does not now have enough power and influence with about fifteen of the most important ministers in Cabinet, do you think that it will have more with six senators out of a total of 64 or 66? As far as I know, the Senate does not have a big influence on our governments, and you must be quite ignorant about men and history to believe that it ever has. If the proposal made is based on such a premise, you are deluding yourself.

I am—and I said it 16 or 18 years ago—in favour of an elected Senate, as the one in France, where senators are elected for nine years by indirect universal suffrage, that is by representatives and delegates of municipalities, regional councils and other local public bodies, with a third of the senators being replaced every three years. That insures a real regional and local representation while giving a chance to send to the Senate a third of new members every three years.

And that is what counts, because democracy means allowing people to participate and choose their parliamentary representatives. Municipalities and regional councils are the real regional voters. They are different from ordinary voters who elect members of Parliament. Our city mayors and municipal councillors in all regions constantly live close to their constituents, thus they know them and their concerns better. They constantly take the pulse of their constituents. Let us rely on them.

The French experience is positive. A large majority of senators are mayors or municipal councillors. We need different voters to elect a different house, otherwise, if voters were the same, their members of Parliament and their senators would be competing one another.

Besides, we must not forget that if you elect six senators at-large for each province, election expenses would be exceedingly high in some provinces. In the State of California, where two senators are elected, it each of them tens of millions of dollars each to get elected, even with the support of their respective parties.

Either these senators accept to be financed by their parties in order to get elected and are bound to obey their wishes in the Senate, or they have to finance their campaigns from contributors monies or from their own pocket funds, like Mr. Ross Perot. If they finance themselves through fundraising, you just have to remember the Keating Five to know that it can be extremely dangerous if you do not have the support of a party to run at-large in a province-wide election. If you elect six senators at-large in the province of Alberta or Ontario, I think it will cost as much as a general provincial election. And the same goes for Quebec. You move the same people in the same environment and within the same territorial limits.

Moreover, if you elect a limited number of senators, for example, six at-large in a province like Quebec or Ontario, where the first six on a list would be elected, you would not have a minority in the Senate anymore.

You would no longer have senators like Lynch-Staunton from Quebec or Kolber or Charlie Watt. There would only be six. I am not sure whether the situation would be the same in other provinces. I could ask Senator Molgat whether members of minorities could be elected in Manitoba.

In the past 25 years, Canadian senators have been appointed on a multicultural basis, I would say. All in all, we have moved towards representing various national groups and ethnic communities.

Having senators elected by delegates of municipalities or regional councils would balance this representation more democratically because it would reflect population shifts.

If one third of the senators were replaced every three years, it would give all ethnic or professional groups a chance to be represented in the Senate and also give women's groups more representation in our House.

I gave you one point of view, honourable senators. As Senator Hays said last week, it is one among many. We are here to discuss our points of view calmly and reflectively.

I will conclude by saying that the most important consideration is the Senate's moral authority. Whether senators are appointed or elected, the Senate must have moral authority and the Senate's credibility must be strengthened, because if we do not come up with a better parliamentary body through all this effort, it would be preferable not to go through with the changes. As I said earlier, I was just repeating what ancient sages said:

> Institutions are not bad; men make bad use of them.

In summary, whether elected or appointed, the Senate will never be anything but what senators make it.

[Senator Riel.]

Hon. Normand Grimard: Honourable senators, may I ask you a question? If I understand correctly, you favour the French system which consists in having senators elected by an electoral college.

A few weeks ago at a NATO meeting, I met a French senator who was nearing the end of his third term, which means 3 terms of 9 years each—a total of 27 years. I said it was nice to have been elected three times. He said: "I will have no trouble getting elected a fourth time". I ask him why? He answered: "Because my electoral college is very small, so I only have to take care of 840 electors".

I think your argument doesn't quite hold water when you say that every nine years, one-third of the Senate would change. In any case, if we have one senator who is elected for life—and I am thinking of the Speaker of the French Senate —I don't know how many terms he has served, but for all practical purposes, I think that if we adopt the French electoral system, we will have senators who are practically there for life. I would appreciate your comments.

Senator Riel: Honourable senators, we already have that here now, and I haven't heard you complaining.

I have been thinking about this. If you consider that usually a French department has 180,000 electors, then if there are only 840, this is well below average.

Usually there are more. In Seine et Marne, for instance, I think the senator you referred to who was re-elected for a third term, which means 27 years altogether, I think he was one of the Deputy Speakers of the Senate, if I am not mistaken. Our own Speaker knows him well. Yes, he was elected, but they have three senators in Seine et Marne. Well, if the electoral college that elected them is satisfied and it works, there is really nothing to complain about, is there?

The French Senate has an excellent reputation, and it is also the House of sober second thought. In Seine et Marne, one of their senators may have been elected for the third time, but this is where they located Disney World Europe which is a very advanced concept and which put the whole Seine et Marne valley on the map.

Just because someone is 80 or 85 years old like Senator Poher who has been Speaker of the Senate for quite some time, doesn't mean the person isn't all there. In fact, Senator Poher is very much all there and he is still Speaker of the Senate. And more power to him! Does that answer your question?

Senator Grimard: Thank you, Senator Riel. 2

[English]

Hon. Dan Hays: May I ask a question of Senator Riel? I listened with great interest to your important contribution to this debate. You, like many people, have focused on the issue of deadlock if we have a Senate, whether it is 26 to 6 in your Alberta example or whatever. You have talked about the American, the German and the French Senates. I talked about the Australian Senate. They are all examples of bicameral systems that work.

However, you seem to agree with those who assume that a new Senate—let us say an elected Senate—for Canada with a strong regional or provincial bias, much more so than now, would create impossible problems of deadlock; that the senators would conduct themselves in a way that would create unacceptable problems, if I am not mistaken, for a government.

I wonder if you could elaborate on why that would occur? It does not occur in some other systems. You gave the United States as an example, but they do govern there with difficulty. We would not want to duplicate many of the problems that arise out of election expenses and so on.

Would you not agree that there is the option here to fashion a Canadian Senate that would be unlike any of the ones about which we have spoken, that would have a proper balance and would minimize the problem of deadlock? In any event, you said it is a problem. If you could comment or elaborate on why you think it is a problem, I would find it helpful.

Senator Riel: I hope I have said, from my jotted notes, that between the two Houses I recommend, as a sine qua non, a committee of conciliation. This committee should be a committee paritaire. I believe I said that. In France, it has to sit. If there is a difficulty, for instance, between 26 members of Parliament and 6 senators, and the 6 senators could contribute to or organize a veto on the same proposition, I believe it should go to the committee of conciliation and be disputed there, discussed there, negotiated there. After a period of time—two or three months, I do not know—they would arrive at a solution.

In the French system, they are given the time to negotiate, and if after a reasonable period—and I do not know the exact limit—they are not able to agree, then the government makes a decision.

We cannot say all that we have in mind when we make a speech. There is another system. You want protection for one province. But what if the members have voted on one side and the senators who are only 6 in number are voting on the other side? I would understand that if 26 members voted against a bill and the six senators voted against the bill. Then it becomes a little more serious. I believe then we should consider immediately a question of veto, because the members and the senators of the same province are all together.

If you have a different position between the two groups, the senators and the members of Parliament, I would hesitate. I believe no parliamentary system can proceed if there is no conciliation committee. In the end, we have to agree to govern the country and to reach some point of decision.

On motion of Senator Stollery, debate adjourned.

The Hon. the Speaker: The Senate will adjourn during pleasure, until 8 o'clock. Is that agreed? The bell will ring at 8:30 p.m. for the vote at 9 o'clock. Is that agreed, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

• (2000)

At 8 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

THE VALOUR AND THE HORROR—CONTROVERSY OVER NFB FILM

Leave having been given to revert to Inquiries:

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès rose pursuant to notice of June 18, 1992:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the scholarly aspects of the controversy over the inquiry by Senator Marshall's sub-committee into the film, The Valour and the Horror, prepared by the National Film Board and presented by the CBC.

He said: Honourable senators, I promise to speak five minutes and no more on the issue that Senator Marshall is bringing up in his subcommittee, which is going to cause more disgrace to rain upon the Senate, when we hardly need any more.

I am a professional historian and I should like to say a few things about historians. The veterans who are Senator Marshall's followers in this issue are going to bring their own historians to the hearings, as if historians were oracles, as if they were people who told the truth. Let me tell you that we historians are generally propagandists for one issue or the other.

A typical confrontation between two historians happened at the American philological association meeting some years ago when Professor Merritt, the great professor from Princeton, appeared there and met his favourite student, the great professor from Berkeley, Pritchert. Professor Merritt crossed his arms, snorted, and turned his back on his formerly favourite student, and Professor Pritchert crossed his arms, snorted, and turned his back on the back of Professor Merritt.

What was their dispute? They had each imagined a slab of stone the size of your desk, and at one corner of that stone was a very small area of letters carved. The rest of the inscription was destroyed except for one scratch somewhere on the stone.

Professor Merritt assumed that that scratch was the remains of a letter and reconstructed from this little piece the whole of it. Professor Pritchert said that was just an accidental scratch, not the remains of a letter, and therefore had a totally different reconstruction of what that description said. That is historians for you.

Historians, who are chosen for the purpose, are going to come and tell us that there is something noble in war. There is nothing noble in war. Britain, which fought nobly in World War II, would have been nobler to be so prepared before the war that Hitler would not have dared start it. Wars are the dreadful and murderous mistakes of politicians, and most military leaders, especially in countries that have been victorious in previous wars, are people who have not learned lessons.

Arthur "Bomber" Harris comes from the Haig tradition, which says, "If we have one man standing on the battlefield at the end and the others do not, we have won." It does not matter how many hundreds of thousands of young men, women, old men and children get killed. War, says one category of people, the followers of Senator Marshall among the Chatterdon group, is noble. We should not remember anything bad about it because somehow it will besmirch the reputation of those who fought nobly in it. But among those who fight nobly in wars, very often the commanders who stay behind at their desks are not noble. They are ignoble, they are stupid, and they think the use of brute force is all that is needed.

It is terrible that a subcommittee of the Senate should rise to criticize an anti-war film, a film that says war is an abomination. Those who lead us into war are mistaken, and in some ways are criminal.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT BILL

Leave having been given to revert to Presentation of Reports from Standing or Special Committees:

Hon. Dan Hays, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, presented the following report:

Monday, June 22, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources has the honour to present its

SIXTH REPORT

Your Committee to which was referred the Bill C-13, An Act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, April 7, 1992, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendments, but with the following observations and recommendations:

LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

Bill C-13, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, would enact a new regime for federal environmental assessments. At present, these assessments are conducted under the authority of the Environmental Assessment and Review Process Guidelines Order (hereinafter the Guidelines Order), which was approved by Order in Council on June 21, 1984. By replacing the existing Guidelines Order, Bill C-13 would provide a statutory basis for environmental assessments at the federal level. It would also implement a revised regime that would define more clearly when a federal environmental assessment had to carried out and what steps would have to be taken in such cases.

Bill C-13 has had a fairly lengthy legislative history. It was initially introduced in the House of Commons as Bill C-78 in June 1990, and was subsequently referred for pre-study to a Special Committee of the House of Commons. This Committee held extensive hearings on the bill during the following months, and it received over 70 briefs from a wide range of interested parties, including provincial and territorial governments, aboriginal groups, industry associations, the business sector, environmental groups, academics and other concerned individuals.

Bill C-78 died in Committee when Parliament was prorogued in early May 1991. However, the bill was reinstated as Bill C-13 by motion passed on May 29, 1991, and was immediately referred to a House of Commons Legislative Committee for further study.

At his appearance before this Legislative Committee on October 10, 1991, the Minister of the Environment, the Honourable Jean Charest, tabled a number of proposed amendments which were considered in a second round of hearings held in the fall of 1991, at which a representative cross-section of witnesses had been invited to appear.

A significant number of amendments were eventually passed by the Legislative Committee during clause-by-clause consideration of the bill and, as amended, Bill C-13 was reported back to the House of Commons on December 9, 1991. Additional amendments were made at report stage, although these were primarily of a "housekeeping" nature to improve the wording, and harmonize the French and English versions, of the bill.

Bill C-13 was passed by the House of Commons on March 19, 1992 on a recorded vote of 172 to 27. It was subsequently introduced in the Senate, which gave the bill first reading on March 24. Second reading was given on April 7, 1992.

Your Committee held hearings during the months of May and June. Fifteen representative groups and associations appeared before us, as did officials from the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office (FEARO) and the Department of Justice, including the Deputy Minister of Justice. We received written submissions from other interested parties, most notably the provincial and territorial governments which communicated their views to us either directly or through the auspices of the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment (the CCME). In addition, we heard from the federal Minister of the Environment, the Honourable Jean Charest, who appeared before the Committee on two occasions. We also had the privilege to hear from the Quebec Minister of the Environment, the Honourable Pierre Paradis.

We are indebted to all those who took the time and trouble to share their views with us and wish to thank them for their valuable contributions.

AN IMPERFECT PROPOSAL

Given the number of amendments that were passed in the House of Commons, Bill C-13 is a materially different proposal from what it was at its inception as Bill C-78. By most accounts, it is a much improved piece of legislation. Nonetheless, the bill remains controversial. Most of the submissions that we received called for further amendments to be made. Few of those who made representations, however, actually went so far as to state that, unless their recommended changes were adopted, the bill should not go ahead.

Your Committee has given careful consideration to the many concerns that were raised and has come to the conclusion that the bill should be recommended for adoption without amendments. We do so only with considerable reluctance, however, for, while we believe that the bill would implement a federal environmental assessment process that is superior to the process that is currently in effect, we also recognize that this is by no means a perfect proposal. In fact, Bill C-13 is a complex piece of legislation that seems to please no one completely, either because it "goes too far" or "does not go far enough."

A.The Bill Does Not Go Far Enough

Many of the witnesses that appeared before your Committee faulted the bill because it does not go far enough.

This was the position taken by the Assembly of First Nations (AFN), which was the only native association to appear before us. In the AFN's view, the bill was deficient because it did not expressly mention aboriginal and treaty rights. It also felt that the bill would not adequately protect the rights of the native people to a sound environment. It pointed out in this regard that, where a project was being proposed on lands that could affect the interests of the native people and a federal assessment was not otherwise required under the bill, the Minister of the Environment could intervene and order an assessment in such cases only where he or she felt that the project was likely to cause "significant adverse negative effects". Reminding the federal government of its fiduciary duty toward the native people, the AFN argued that this threshold for review was too high under the circumstances and that it should be lowered so that a review could be triggered wherever a project was likely to cause "adverse environmental effects."

Groups such as the Canadian Bar Association and the Canadian Environmental Law Association argued, in turn, that the bill's scope was too limited, for it would not apply to federal "programs and policies." In their view, requiring that an environmental assessment be carried out in relation to "projects" only was simply not good enough and they urged that the bill be amended expressly to apply to federal "programs and policies" as well.

Your Committee understands that the environmental implications of federal programs and policies are sometimes considered by Cabinet. This falls considerably short, however, of the government's commitment by two former Ministers of the Environment to carry out comprehensive environmental assessments on federal programs and policies. This is clearly not being done. In all events, to the limited extent that such assessments are being carried out, not a single one of these has ever been released publicly. Under the circumstances, it is not surprising that such strong representations were made to us on this issue, and that the bill should be amended to correct what many of the bill's critics consider to be a fundamental flaw in the proposed legislation.

Bill C-13 has also been faulted for its uncertain scope. As currently framed, the bill sets out in general terms the types of projects for which an environmental review might have to be carried out. The projects actually subject to review, however, and the extent of the review that would have to be carried out in relation to certain types of projects, would be defined under a variety of "exclusion" and "inclusion" lists prescribed under the regulations. Your Committee has strong reservations about this regulatory approach to law making. Suffice it to say at this point, however, that in the view of many critics, the environment would have been better served if, in the first instance, the bill had been made to apply to all spheres of government activity, subject to prescribing specific exemptions under the regulations.

Other commentators have criticized the bill because it would require that the relevant federal authorities decide whether or not the projects coming under their responsibility should be allowed to go ahead. Some argued that it would have been preferable if this function had been entrusted to a more objective and informed decision-maker, such as a specialized agency established for this purpose, or by the review panel in cases where a public hearing was required.

Where the relevant federal authority decided to proceed with a project that was determined upon review to have adverse environmental effects, concern was also expressed about whether the bill went far enough in requiring full and timely disclosure of the reasons for the decision.

A further complaint, common among the environmental and legal groups, was that the bill did not mandate the creation of an intervenor funding program, but would leave the establishment of such a program and of its operational details to the discretion of the Minister of the Environment. As a number of groups have pointed out, intervenor funding should be viewed as an integral part of the entire environmental process. It considerably improves the decisions that are made and, in many instances, it provides the only means by which meaningful public participation can be ensured where major development projects are under consideration. Pursuant to its Green Plan, the federal government has earmarked $8.5 million for intervenor funding, which is to be spent over a period of six years. Apart from the fact that many critics view this sum as too meagre for the task at hand, the reality is that this fund was established administratively and could therefore be eliminated on a moment's notice. Although a legislative base is by no means a guarantee to the continued existence of programs, it would constitute a better safeguard than the discretionary measure proposed under the bill. For this reason, several witnesses strongly urged that the bill be amended expressly to provide for an intervenor funding program.

At report stage, the House of Commons added a provision that would require a ministerial review of the new legislation five years after its implementation date, with subsequent tabling of the report before Parliament (clause 72). Many members in the House, however, strongly felt that such a review should be carried out by a parliamentary committee and, indeed, this is what was prescribed in the French version of the bill, albeit by error, we are told. The parliamentary review option was also the preferred choice of a majority of the members sitting on this Committee, who felt that a public review would have been more in keeping with the bill's spirit of openness than a review conducted by officials behind closed doors. Although not many witnesses commented on this particular aspect of the bill, there is little question that, given the bill's controversial nature, a parliamentary review would have been justified under the circumstances. This option was not adopted in the end and, consequently, the ministerial review clause has been criticized as constituting yet another example of where the bill does not go far enough.

B. The Bill Goes Too Far

On the other hand, the bill was been criticized for going too far.

The Canadian Electrical Association, for example, objected to the requirement under the bill that the "cumulative effects" of a project on the environment be considered. Pointing out that there was no agreement within the scientific community about what cumulative effects comprised, and stressing that the necessary methodology for measuring such effects had not yet been developed, they were concerned that this requirement would be subject to many different interpretations and would not lead to a process that was fair, clear, timely or single. They urged that this requirement be deleted until more experience could be gained in defining this concept, and they invited the federal government to conduct a pilot study of one of its own projects to determine the geographic scope of cumulative effects, before imposing this requirement on the private sector.

Many industry and business groups that appeared before us were in turn concerned that, under the bill, projects could be referred to mediation or panel review, if it was found that such a step was "warranted" on grounds of "public concern". Noting that the bill does not define "public concern", they complained that this measure would add uncertainty to the process, and were therefore concerned about how this provision might be applied in practice and what would be the implications of this measure for them.

There was, in addition, overwhelming concern about the potential for duplication of process under the bill. Given the breadth of projects that could be subject to review, it was felt that a significant number of projects might have to undergo both federal and provincial assessments. Consequently, there would be uncertainty as to how to proceed in such cases and, in all probability, there would be added costs and delays in getting these projects underway.

The breadth of projects potentially subject to review under the bill and the related action that could be taken by the relevant federal authorities in such cases was, without doubt, the most controversial aspect of the bill. This concern was shared not only by all the business and industry groups that appeared before, but by the provincial and territorial governments as well, most notably by the government of Quebec who, through its Minister of the Environment, strongly objected to the bill's broad scope.

Although a number of concerns were raised on this issue by the various witnesses, the most serious, in our opinion, involved allegations that certain of the bill's provisions were unconstitutional. In fact, these allegations were so forcefully argued that your Committee believes they warrant special consideration.

MAJOR CONCERNS

A. The Constitutional Question

As understood by your Committee, the constitutional question would seem to have two components. The first component concerns the scope of the bill's application. The second component comprises the factors that can be considered in conducting the assessment, and the related action that can be taken once this step has been completed. While these two components gave rise to different arguments, common to them both was the objection that, in the end, this bill would empower the federal government to encroach on areas of provincial jurisdiction.

1. Projects Subject to the Federal Review Process

Clause 5 sets out in general terms the projects for which a federal environmental assessment would have to be carried out. These are:

a) Projects for which the federal government is the proponent (clause 5(1)(a));

b) Projects for which the federal government provides financial assistance (clause 5(1)(b));

c) Projects where federal lands are made available (clause 5(1)(c));

d) Projects for which the federal government must issue a permit or grant an approval, as prescribed under the so-called "law list" regulations (clause 5(1)(d)); and

e) Projects for which the Governor in Council must issue a permit or grant an approval, as prescribed under the regulations (clause 5(2)).

In addition, clauses 46 to 53 make provision for the assessment of projects having transboundary effects or that might affect lands in which the federal government had a particular interest, and that were not otherwise subject to review under clause 5.

Of the foregoing, the following two measures have given rise to the strongest objections: the "spending trigger" under clause 5(1)(b), and the "licensing trigger" under clause 5(1)(d). Specifically, there is concern that, on the basis of these measures, the federal government could determine the fate of "primarily provincial" projects, even though its financial involvement in these projects was relatively small, or the permit or approval it had to issue was of a fairly minor and perfunctory nature—for example, permitting a power line needed in relation to a new factory (a "primarily provincial" project) to cross a CN railway line (the "perfunctory" federal licensing power).

Some of the witnesses who appeared before us believed very strongly that the federal government should not be conducting environmental assessments on "primarily provincial" projects and, consequently, urged that the bill be amended to limit the federal review process to "primarily federal" projects.

It should be noted that, in making this recommendation, few of the witnesses actually based their objections on constitutional grounds. Rather, most of them seemed to object for practical reasons. In their view, projects should be subject to only one review process and not two, and the jurisdiction having the strongest connection with the project should accordingly be the one responsible for carrying out the assessment. It was also argued that, if a reasonable assessment process was already in place at the provincial level, this process should, as a rule, apply, except in cases involving "exclusively federal" projects.

In other words, although many of the witnesses were opposed to the "spending" and the "licensing triggers," their objections were not necessarily related to the constitutionality of these measures, but rather were based on practical considerations, the foremost being that projects should be subject to only one process. The duplication of process issue is considered below.

A few witnesses, however, seemed to object on constitutional grounds. Characterizing the "spending" and "licensing triggers" as "Trojan horses" that would empower the federal government to invade areas of provincial jurisdiction, they seemed to suggest that, in constitutional terms, these measures were objectionable.

Based on the judgment handed down on January 23, 1992 by the Supreme Court of Canada in Friends of the Oldman River Society v. Canada, and the representations that were made to us on this question, your Committee is not satisfied that this is the case.

In the Oldman River case, the Supreme Court of Canada considered, among other things, the constitutional validity of the existing Guidelines Order. It is interesting to note that, in this case, the Guidelines Order had also been characterized as a "constitutional Trojan horse that would enable the federal government, on the pretext of some narrow ground of federal jurisdiction, to conduct a far ranging inquiry into matters that are exclusively within provincial jurisdiction."

The Court rejected this argument, however, and unanimously upheld the constitutional validity of the Guidelines Order. In doing so, it laid down a number of principles that would seem to provide a full answer to the concerns raised about the constitutionality of the various assessment "triggers" under the bill.

Essentially, the Court held in the Oldman River case that the "environment" was not an independent matter of legislation assigned to either level of government under the Constitution Act, 1867 . Rather, it described the environment as an "abstruse" matter that did not comfortably fit within the existing division of powers without considerable overlap and uncertainty, and ruled that both levels of government could validly enact measures on the environment that related to their own areas of jurisdiction. Pointing out that describing a project as a "provincial project" or an "undertaking primarily subject to provincial regulation" was not particularly helpful in sorting the respective levels of constitutional authority, the Court stated that what was important, in constitutional terms, was to determine whether either level of government could legislate. While local projects would generally fall within provincial responsibility, federal participation could be required if the project impinged upon an area of federal jurisdiction. The fact that federal measures might incidentally encroach on areas of provincial jurisdiction was not constitutionally objectionable, in the Court's view, provided these measures were not used as a colourable device to invade areas of provincial jurisdiction that were unconnected to the relevant heads of federal power.

When examined in the light of this judgment, the assessment "triggers" that have come under criticism would not seem to be out of order.

a. The "Licensing Trigger"

The "licensing trigger" at clause 5(1)(d) would require that an assessment be carried out on projects for which a federal permit or approval was needed, as prescribed under the "law list" regulations passed pursuant to clause 59(f). The "law list" regulations, in short, are the ones that will identify which federal powers, duties and functions will give rise to an assessment under clause 5(1)(d) and, by the terms of clause 59(f), only those provisions as have been prescribed by an "Act of Parliament or any regulation" made thereunder can actually be included in the law list.

As the Centre québécois du droit de l'environnement aptly pointed out, if there is any question as to the constitutionality of the "licensing trigger," the problem will reside not with clause 5(1)(d), since this clause merely calls for assessments to be carried out on projects subject to some form of federal regulatory authority, as set out in the "law list" regulations. Rather, the constitutional question, if any, will arise in relation to the "law list" regulations, to the extent that these regulations prescribe statutory or regulatory provisions which, themselves, go beyond the authority of Parliament or of the Governor in Council to enact.

The "law list" regulations were not placed before your Committee, at least not in their final draft form. We understand these regulations are still in the process of being drawn up. Under the circumstances, it would seem premature to take issue with the "law list" regulations and the related "licensing trigger" on constitutional grounds. Suffice it to say that, based on the Oldman River case, federal assessments can be carried out only on those projects that touch upon a federal head of power. In drafting the "law list" regulations, care should accordingly be taken to ensure that this constitutional imperative is respected. Apart from this caveat, however, your Committee is not prepared to fault clauses 5(1)(d) and 59(f) on constitutional grounds.

b. The "Spending Trigger"

Some of the legal experts who testified before the Committee criticized the scope of the "spending trigger" under clause 5(1)(b) and proposed that it be restricted, made less "invasive".

Before considering this issue, a few remarks on the federal spending power would seem to be in order. A distinction must be made here between Bill C-13 and constitutional reform of the federal spending power, dealt with by the government in its document Shaping Canada's Future Together (September 24, 1991), the Beaudoin-Dobbie Report (February 28, 1992) and the progress report (June 11, 1992). The federal spending power has existed according to the case law since 1937, and modifying it would require a constitutional amendment in some other forum. The problem cannot be resolved, nor the federal spending power restricted, by an ordinary Act of Parliament.

Bill C-13 has emerged in the middle of the constitutional reform process. It is not this bill that is going to settle the question of the federal spending power; Bill C-13 has to accept the law as it now stands. We cannot change the Constitution with a bill: the bill must respect the Constitution. If in the months ahead we wish to define the spending power more clearly in the Constitution, we must choose another forum and take action in another place.

Your Committee is however of the opinion that Parliament, in exercising its powers in the area of environmental assessments, must scrupulously respect the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces and at all costs must avoid any encroachment on areas of provincial responsibility. Parliament and the government of Canada are constitutionally restricted to their own legislative sphere. Both the Constitution and the case law are very clear on this point. All federal legislation is implicitly bound by the same obligation, since all legislation must respect the Constitution. This is the perspective that the courts will bring to their interpretation of clauses 4 and 5 of Bill C-13, and it is according to these principles that the federal government must apply the bill, once it is proclaimed into force. Any other perception or approach at this sensitive moment in our history would be ill-judged, and could have disastrous consequences.

With this caveat in mind, your Committee is of the opinion that the "spending trigger" under clause 5(1)(b) is constitutionally unobjectionable. Admittedly, the fact that a federal assessment would have to be carried out on "primarily provincial" projects for which the federal government was thinking of providing financial assistance is controversial, particularly in the province of Quebec which has forcefully objected to this clause on the ground that the federal government could use its "spending power" to control development within the province.

While extremely sensitive to this concern, your Committee believes it important to point out that, by prescribing a "spending trigger," Bill C-13 would not be breaking new ground. In fact, a similar provision is prescribed under the Guidelines Order, which, as mentioned earlier, has been in effect since 1984, and which, of course, was upheld by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Oldman River case. By providing for a "spending trigger", the bill would not, therefore, be introducing a new and revolutionary concept to the field of environmental assessments in this country. Rather, it would merely be sustaining a requirement that has been a part of Canadian law for close to ten years.

Nevertheless, the "spending trigger" is controversial, and the fact that it is not a new measure is not likely to make it more acceptable to those who oppose it. Obviously, opposition to the "spending trigger" is part of the broader controversy that, as pointed out above, has surrounded the federal "spending power" since it was upheld by the courts in 1937.

By seeking to carry out environmental assessments on projects it was interested in financing, all the federal government would be attempting to do in such cases is to ensure that it was not investing in projects that might be environmentally unacceptable. As the West Coast Environmental Law Association stated in evidence, if the federal government is to be something more than a mere cheque-clearing house, it must ensure that spending decisions on projects, in appropriate cases, are based on carefully analyzed information on the potential environmental consequences of the spending decision.

In the final analysis, your Committee agrees with this position. Precluding the federal government from carrying out an environmental assessment on projects that it intended to fund would not only be illogical, in our view, it would also be ill-advised and contrary to the public interest, for Canadians have a vested interest in ensuring that their federal tax dollars are spent wisely and not blindly.

In all events, as was pointed out to us at the hearings, the most that the federal government could do in cases where a "provincial" project was found to be environmentally unacceptable would be to withdraw its financial support. It could not, however, actually prevent the project from going ahead. If the federal government decided to withdraw its support, alternate financing should not be difficult to obtain in cases where its financial involvement would have been relatively small. Conversely, where its financial involvement would have been significant, it is questionable whether the project could in fact have been regarded as a "provincial" project to begin with.

For these and other reasons, your Committee does not take issue with the "spending trigger". We recognize the extremely controversial nature of both the "licensing" and the "spending" triggers. The problems arising in relation to these triggers, however, would seem to us to be primarily political in nature, having much more to do with the existing division of powers, than with the bill itself. Needless to say, this question is being addressed elsewhere. Bill C-13 would not seem to be an appropriate vehicle for debating this issue.

Based on the evidence before us, we are satisfied that Bill C-13 goes no further than to require that an environmental assessment be carried out on projects that touch upon a federal head of power. As this seems to be in keeping with the parameters for federal legislative action laid down by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Oldman River case, your Committee believes that, in this respect, the bill is unobjectionable.

2. Grounds for Decision-Making

The Canadian Electrical Association and the Conseil du patronat du Quebec forcefully argued before your Committee that certain provisions of Bill C-13 were unconstitutional, for they would enable the relevant federal authorities to consider, and base their decisions on, factors that came within exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

Specifically, objections were raised in relation to the following clauses:

(a) Clause 2, because it is defines "environmental effects" too broadly and encompasses elements that are clearly within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces;

(b) Clause 4(a), because it stipulates that the environmental effects of (all) projects must be carefully considered, and not just those involving an area of federal responsibility;

(c) Clause 16, because it sets out a number of factors that, in the case of "provincial" projects, only the provinces should have the right to consider. It was felt that consideration of the following factors in particular exceeded the federal government's jurisdiction where "provincial" projects were involved: the "need for, and alternatives to" the project (clause 16(1)(e)); the "purpose" of the project (clause 16(2)(a)); the "alternative means of carrying out the project that are technically and economically feasible and the environmental effects of any such alternative means" (clause 16(2)(b)); the "need for, and the requirements of any follow-up program" with respect to the project (clause 16(2)(c)); and the "capacity of renewable resources that are likely to be significantly affected by the project to meet the needs of the present and those of the future" (clause 16(2)(d)); and

By introducing the notion of "justification" into the decision-making process, there was concern that, where it was found that a given "provincial" project was likely to cause "significant adverse environmental effects", the responsible federal authority would be obliged to block the project from going ahead, not so much because of the negative environmental effects per se, but because, when analyzed in terms of such things as the "need for or alternatives to" the project, these negative environmental effects could no longer be justified in the circumstances. In other words, matters that were extraneous to the environmental effects of a project could in fact determine the fate of the project, rather than the environmental effects themselves.

Your Committee has given careful consideration to this argument. In the final analysis, we are also not satisfied that these measures are objectionable.

It should be noted that, in the Oldman River case, the Supreme Court of Canada defined the environment in broad terms. Characterizing as "unduly myopic" the view that environmental quality was confined to the biophysical environment alone, the Court cited with approval the following statement that the Canadian Council of Resource and Environment Ministers had made in its 1987 report entitled Report of the National Task force on Environment and Economy:

> Our recommendations reflect the principles that we hold in common with the World Commission on Environment and Development (WCED). These include the fundamental belief that environmental and economic planning cannot proceed in separate spheres. Long-term economic growth depends on a healthy environment. It also affects the environment in many ways. Ensuring environmentally sound and sustainable economic development requires the technology and wealth that is generated by continued economic growth. Economic and environmental planning and management must therefore be integrated. (emphasis added by the Committee)

Stating that, in its generic sense, the environment encompassed the "physical, economic and social environment", and that it was "comprised of all that is around us and as such must be a part of what actuates many decisions of any moment," the Supreme Court remarked that "it defies reason to assert that Parliament is constitutionally barred from weighing the broad environmental repercussions, including socio-economic concerns, when legislating with respect to decisions of this nature."

Based on these judicial pronouncements, the definition of "environmental effects" under the bill and the factors set out for consideration under clause 16 would not appear to be out of order. Quite the opposite in fact. If environmental assessments are to be meaningful, these are precisely the types of things that should be considered. As the Supreme Court of Canada made clear, the environment does not exist in isolation. Rather, it forms an integral part of all that is around and, as such, should be examined in relation to all other relevant factors, be they social or economic in nature.

A consideration of factors such as "the need for and alternatives to" the project would accordingly appear to be not only justifiable, but necessary in appropriate cases if the assessment is to be credible. It bears noting that a similar requirement is prescribed under the existing Guidelines Order which, of course, the Supreme Court of Canada upheld as constitutionally valid in the Oldman River case.

The Court, however, also indicated in that case that, in carrying out an assessment, the responsible federal decision-makers could consider only those environmental effects that had an impact on the areas of federal responsibility affected; they could not use the Guidelines Order "as a colourable device to invade areas of provincial jurisdiction which are unconnected to the relevant heads of federal power." In other words, there needs to be a link between the environmental effects under consideration and the relevant heads of federal power.

Your Committee recognizes that this requirement is perhaps not articulated as clearly as it could be under the bill and, in this respect, we sympathize with the concerns expressed by the Canadian Electrical Association and the Conseil du patronat du Quebec. In our view, however, it does not follow that the measures in question are unconstitutional.

If only in comparative terms, we note that the provisions of the existing Guidelines Order are worded just as "loosely." Once the process has been triggered, the Guidelines Order, like the bill, does not expressly limit the environmental effects that can be considered to those effects that are directly linked to the relevant heads of federal power. This aspect of the Guidelines Order was not faulted by the Supreme Court of Canada; nor, therefore, should it necessarily be under the bill.

If not stated as explicitly as it could be, the requirement that there be a link between the environmental effects that can be considered and the relevant heads of federal power is at least implicit under the bill. The federal authorities must be taken to know what the law is and, based on the Oldman River decision, the law is that this link must be respected.

There is a certain transparency of process under the bill which, we believe, will go some distance in ensuring that federal decisions are based on only federally-relevant considerations. In this regard, provision is made throughout the bill for public access to the various information used in the assessment process, most notably under clause 55 which calls for the establishment of a public registry. The public will therefore have access to most, if perhaps not all, of the information upon which decisions will be based. Thus, if a federal permit allowing a power line to cross a railway were refused—not on grounds related to the railway, but on other extraneous grounds—the record, in such cases, should speak for itself and disclose that the refusal was based on improper considerations.

It should also be pointed out that clauses 20(1)(b) and 37(1)(b) could work in favour of sustaining otherwise environmentally-harmful "provincial" projects, instead of blocking them. Indeed, this clause could be used to save a project whose environmental effects were otherwise "unjustified" precisely because these effects related to a "primarily provincial" project. These clauses, therefore, have a built-in flexibility that could enable otherwise environmentally-harmful projects to go ahead. Were it not for this discretion, the only alternative would be to "kill" the project under the circumstances. Given this possibility, there would seem to be some justification for this type of flexibility and it is somewhat surprising, therefore, that these clauses have come under such strong attack.

To argue that these clauses would be used to block "provincial projects" assumes bad faith on the part of the federal government. In our view, this position would seem not only premature under the circumstances, but somewhat at odds with the federal government's record of past dealings with the other jurisdictions.

At your Committee's specific request, the Canadian Bar Association (the CBA) was asked to provide an opinion as to whether or not they agreed that the impugned provisions were unconstitutional, as contended. In supplementary written submissions, the CBA's National Environmental Law Section responded that, in their view, these provisions were constitutionally unobjectionable. It made the following comments in this regard:

It may be seen that in its decision in the Oldman case, the Supreme Court of Canada has conclusively held to be constitutional a regime which permits federal assessment to extend to general socio-economic effects, technology and need for a proposal. Thus on a plain reading of the Guidelines Order and the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in Oldman, the objections of the Canadian Electrical Association are ill-founded.

Your Committee recognizes that there is disagreement on this issue. The Conseil du patronat du Québec and the Canadian Electrical Association clearly indicated that these measures were unconstitutional. The Quebec Minister of the Environment also took a similar position. The Canadian Bar Association, however, was of a different view. Significantly, this particular constitutional objection was not raised by the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment (CCME) which conveyed its outstanding concerns with the bill in a letter dated May 29, 1992 that was forwarded to the Committee Chairman on behalf of the CCME by the Honourable Carol Carson, Minister of Environment and Public Safety for the province Saskatchewan.

While your Committee acknowledges that the need for a link between the environmental effects and the relevant federal heads of power could have been made for explicit, we are not satisfied, on the basis of the evidence before us, that these clauses, as currently worded, are unconstitutional. In the absence of more compelling evidence, any doubts on this issue should, in our view, be resolved in the bill's favour.

B. Duplication of Process

As mentioned earlier, a major concern shared by many witnesses who appeared before your Committee was the potential for duplication of process under the bill, where both federal and provincial assessments might have to be carried out in relation to the same project. Industry and business groups were particularly concerned about this possibility, as were the provincial governments, but there was also concern about how members of the public would react to two sets of environmental assessments and how this might affect their participation in the process.

In recognition that some projects will involve decision-making by both levels of government, and with a view to avoiding jurisdictional uncertainties and duplication of process, the CCME recommended that Bill C-13 be amended to include a mandatory "cooperative scoping mechanism" and an "equivalency clause."

As proposed by the CCME, the "cooperative scoping mechanism" would require the relevant federal and provincial or territorial Environment Ministers, prior to the initiation of the environmental assessment, to consult one another in order to identify their respective areas of jurisdiction and the extent of their participation with respect to a proposed project, and thus determine how best to handle the assessment under the circumstances. The proposed equivalency clause would, in turn, empower the federal Minister of the Environment to transfer all or part of an assessment to a province or territory, provided the latter's environmental assessment legislation was comparable or equivalent to the federal measures.

Many of the business and industry groups who appeared before us also recommended the adoption of an equivalency clause to avoid duplication of process, as did the Quebec Minister of the Environment who argued most forcefully in favour of enacting such a measure.

The federal government has rejected including a mandatory cooperative scoping mechanism and an equivalency clause under the bill for a variety of reasons, not least of which is that it does not want to be placed in the unenviable position of having to pass judgment on whether or not the various provincial and territorial regimes meet the federal standards, and whether these regimes are being satisfactorily applied in practice. Instead, the federal government has opted to proceed by means of negotiated bilateral administrative agreements with the provinces and territories in the case of joint reviews (clause 58(1)(c)). The federal government favours these agreements because they will be tailor-made to suit the needs of both parties, while respecting the minimum requirements for review set out under their respective assessment regimes.

In the aforementioned letter forwarded to the Chairman of the Committee on behalf of the CCME, the Honourable Carol Carson reiterated the CCME's preference for a cooperative scoping mechanism and an equivalency clause under the bill. While commending the federal government for having made a "minor" amendment under clause 58 to "provide greater flexibility through the negotiation of bilateral federal/provincial agreements in the cooperative assessments of projects," she noted that the joint scoping process was not explicit, nor would it amount to equivalency. She indicated, however, that although the provinces and territories were not "entirely satisfied" with Bill C-13 and would still prefer to see their recommendations adopted, they were currently working with the federal government "to establish bilateral agreements that will reflect a consistent environmental assessment relationship across the country."

The CCME, therefore, although not entirely satisfied with the bill, does not oppose it as such, and seems reconciled to the fact that, at this point, energies would be redirected at concluding bilateral administrative agreements.

Your Committee has heard from several witnesses about how well joint reviews have been carried out in the past on the basis of an administrative agreement. In our view, if such agreements were in place, many of the concerns raised in relation to the potential for duplication of process under the bill would be obviated.

Apart from any bilateral agreements that may be reached between the parties, there are a number of other provisions under the bill that would enable the two levels of government to cooperate with each other in carrying out assessments. In this regard, pursuant to an amendment that was passed by the House of Commons at report stage, the federal Minister of the Environment was given the additional authority to establish criteria for alternative ways of conducting assessments on projects having transboundary effects (clause 58(1)(h)). In cases involving more than one jurisdiction, clause 12(4) would enable the relevant authorities to cooperate with one another, and clause 17 would enable certain aspects of a federal assessment to be carried out by another jurisdiction under prescribed circumstances. Provision is also made for the joint review of projects on an ad hoc basis (clauses 40 to 42).

The point to be made here is that, contrary to what some might have us believe, there are provisions in the bill that would promote cooperation and thereby decrease the potential for duplication of process.

The Quebec Minister of the Environment did not believe that these measures would be of particular benefit in his province, since the regime currently in effect there was structured quite differently from the one proposed under the bill.

[Senator .]

Your Committee has received conflicting evidence on how similar the respective provincial and federal regimes must be before delegation under clause 17 can occur. Given that these are largely uncharted waters, we believe that the various measures for cooperation under the bill should at least be given a try before they are discounted and we urge the governments to do so. Everyone agrees that duplication of process is in no one's interest. Every effort should accordingly be made to ensure that this problem is effectively circumvented.

Your Committee is heartened by the CCME's willingness to turn the page and work constructively towards the signing of bilateral agreements. The federal Minister of the Environment has indicated that good progress is being made on this front.

We are satisfied that, for the time being at least, the various measures under the bill are sufficient to meet the concerns expressed in relation to duplication of process. We are, however, most anxious that bilateral agreements that would meet the needs of both parties be concluded at the earliest opportunity. Otherwise, unnecessary cost and delay are bound to result, which, again, is hardly in anyone's interest. Your Committee therefore recommends that:

> The federal Minister of the Environment give priority status to the signing of bilateral agreements with the provinces and territories, and that all possible consideration be given to their concerns, particularly as regards projects coming primarily within their jurisdiction.

C. The Regulations

As mentioned earlier, although Bill C-13 sets out the general parameters for federal environmental assessments, most notably under clause 5, the regulations would define more clearly the actual scope of the bill by identifying which projects would in fact be subject to the federal assessment process, and how the latter was to be carried out.

Four sets of regulations in particular would be important in this regard. They are:

a) the physical activities "inclusion list," which would set out which physical activities would be subject to federal review (clause 59(b));

b) the "exclusion list," which would set out which projects would not be subject to federal review, including those projects where the environmental effects were considered to be insignificant , or where federal involvement in the project was deemed to be minimal (clause 59(c));

c) the "comprehensive study" list, which would identify the projects for which a more extensive study was required, as compared with an "initial screening" (clause 59(d)); and d)the "law list", which, as discussed earlier, would set out which federal statutory or regulatory provisions would trigger a federal review (clause 59(f)).

Because so much would be determined by the regulations, some critics have argued that passing the bill, as currently framed, would be tantamount to signing a blank cheque. Your Committee is sympathetic to this concern and questions whether it might not have been wiser to incorporate such important aspects of the legislation, like the "law list," in an appendix to the bill, rather than making provision for it under the regulations.

This was not done, however, and Bill C-13 constitutes yet another example of legislation, the actual scope of which will be determined not by Parliament, but by executive action. As mentioned earlier, your Committee has serious reservations about this regulatory approach to law making. We wish to reiterate our deep concern about what is this practice which, unfortunately, seems to be a growing trend with the federal government of late.

Despite the serious reservations we have on this issue, we recognize that, given the breadth of projects that could come within areas of federal responsibility, some flexibility would be needed to determine which projects should be made subject to an assessment and what type of assessment should be carried under the circumstances.

The Committee notes that the federal government has set up a Regulatory Advisory Committee to assist in the drafting these and other regulations under the bill. This Committee is comprised of representatives from the provincial and territorial governments, the business sector, industry and environmentalists, among others. By all accounts, these consultations seem to be going well. We hope that this spirit of cooperation will be retained in the months and, indeed, in the years to come, for we believe that this consultative approach to regulation making is most constructive and should be made a permanent feature so as to minimize conflicts that might otherwise occur between the relevant parties.

Given the existence of this Advisory Committee, we are not prepared to take issue with the way the bill has been structured. There are some regulations, however, that are essential to the bill's application and must accordingly be finalized at the earliest opportunity. Your Committee therefore recommends that:

The federal government give the highest priority to the development of the regulations that are essential to the bill's application and that these be drafted in a manner that is sensitive to the concerns of members of the Regulatory Advisory Committee.

ADOPTION WITHOUT AMENDMENTS

Bill C-13 has been one of the most difficult bills your Committee has had to consider in recent times. There is no question that this bill is controversial. No one seems to be entirely satisfied with it, including the members of your Committee who, barring none, believe that the bill could be improved in one form or another. We must confess, however, to being as polarized about the bill as the witnesses who appeared before us. Like them, some of us feel that the bill goes too far, whereas others believe that it does not go far enough.

Despite our differences, your Committee has concluded, albeit not without considerable hesitation, that this bill should be recommended for adoption without amendments. We make this recommendation, not because we are convinced of the bill's merits, for clearly this cannot be the case as too many of us have serious reservations about the bill. Rather, we are recommending adoption of this bill without amendments, for we believe that, even with its numerous flaws, this bill would implement a federal environmental assessment process that is materially superior to the process that is currently in place under the Guidelines Order.

Although in effect for less than ten years, the Guidelines Order has given rise to a considerable number of court challenges as regards its application. Many of its terms are ambiguous. In fact, such fundamental terms as "environmental effects" and "environmental implications" are not defined. In addition, the environmental assessment process that it sets forth falls considerably short of the process proposed under the bill. For example, the Guidelines Order does not make provision for class assessments; it does not call for follow-up programs; it does not give public review panels the power to subpoena witnesses and order the production of documents; nor does it expressly authorize the signing of administrative agreements with other jurisdictions. These positive elements are all featured under the bill, and there are more, including the Government of Canada's express commitment to sustainable development, which is set out both in the preamble to the bill and under the "purposes" clause at clause 4.

The Guidelines Order was never intended to apply on a mandatory basis and this is reflected in the inadequate process that it implements. The Oldman River decision, however, clearly established that the Guidelines Order had the force of law and had to be complied with in all cases to which it applied. This judgment has, therefore, radically changed the rules of the game and there is accordingly some urgency in adopting replacement legislation as soon as possible. The West Coast Environmental law Association pointed out that, if this bill did not proceed, it would throw environmental assessment, already in a considerable amount of uncertainty, into chaos.

Your Committee believes that, under the circumstances, there are compelling reasons to adopt Bill C-13 without amendments. We recognize that the bill has a number of shortcomings, not least of which are the 30 inconsistencies that were found to exist between the French and English versions of the bill. Considering that almost half of these inconsistencies go back to the original bill that was tabled as Bill C-78 in 1990, your Committee is deeply concerned that so many linguistic discrepancies could have slipped through, despite the extensive scrutiny that this bill has received over the years.

In our view there are simply too many inconsistencies, two of which are very substantial (clauses 33 and 72). We cannot pass this over in silence, or fail to express deep regret. This is a truly unacceptable state of affairs, indeed it is inexcusable in a Parliament that has been bilingual since 1867. To avoid delaying passage of the bill, we can rely on precedent, as the Deputy Minister of Justice pointed out, and have these errors corrected under the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment bill, as soon as possible after the bill becomes law.

The federal Minister of the Environment stated that if the bill were returned to the House of Commons with amendments, there would be a "high element of risk" in doing so. Given the uncertainty of the parliamentary calendar in the months ahead, your Committee recognizes that, if amendments were made to the bill at this time, it is not inconceivable that the bill could die on the Order Paper. Given the amount of time it has taken the bill to get this far, this is not a risk that we are prepared to take.

At the Committee's request, the Minister gave his undertaking to proceed as quickly as possible and introduce the requisite amendments under the next Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment bill, which is due to be tabled next fall. We hold him to this undertaking and therefore recommend that:

> The federal Minister of the Environment act on his undertaking and introduce amendments to correct the inconsistencies between the French and English versions of the bill under the next Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment bill.

Although we are extremely uneasy about recommending adoption of a bill that has 30 known linguistic errors, we have concluded that it would be in the public interest for us to do so, as time is a significant factor in this case.

As has been made clear throughout this report, Bill C-13 is by no means a perfect piece of legislation. Environmental assessments, however, are a relatively recent phenomenon, and time and experience will be required before the process can be expected to run smoothly. We mentioned earlier that a ministerial review of the bill would have to be carried out five years after proclamation. While it is true that some of us would have preferred a parliamentary review, the fact remains that an official review in five years time, if only a ministerial one, is reassuring to the members of your Committee.

In the meantime, your Committee is satisfied that Bill C-13 is a step in the right direction and should accordingly be implemented at the earliest opportunity. The bill has been in the making for approximately five years. Many amendments were made to it in the House of Commons.

In the final analysis, it must be remembered that this bill is, above all, about environmental assessments, and would implement a regime that is far better than the existing one. Even the Quebec Minister of the Environment conceded that, in objective terms, the regime proposed under the bill was a good one. The Canadian Construction Association even went so far as to state that Bill C-13 should be promoted as a model in all jurisdictions across Canada in order to avoid unfortunate situations of duplication and to attempt ensuring as much consistency as was possible in this very important field.

Given the government of Quebec's strong objections to this bill, there is no denying that a number of us were tempted to see if some form of accommodation could not be found by amending the bill. The solution eluded us, however, for the problems, as was pointed out earlier, have less to do with this bill, than with the underlying divisions of powers on which this bill is based. Needless to say, the debate on this question is being carried out elsewhere. We can only express our hope that any differences that exist in this regard will be resolved amicably.

There would seem to be little question that the bill before us represents a compromise between competing interests. Any amendments at this point could destroy the delicate balance that has painstakingly been built over the years. Under the circumstances, the bill should be supported. The Canadian Environmental Assessment Caucus stated that Bill C-13 should be viewed as a glass half full, rather than a glass half empty. All things being equal, we believe this to be good advice and, accordingly, recommend the adoption of this bill without amendments.

Respectfully submitted,

On motion of Senator Kelly, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

MONDAY, June 22, 1992

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

TWENTY-FIRST REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-49, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (sexual assault), has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, June 18, 1992, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment, but with the following observation:

The Committee recognizes that vulnerability to sexual assault and diminished access to justice may be related to social inequalities such as those experienced by specific groups identified by race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, age, sexual orientation, mental or physical disability, or occupation.

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

EIGHTY-SEVENTH CONFERENCE, YAOUNDÉ, CAMEROON

Leave having been given to revert to Inquiries:

Hon. Gérald J. Comeau rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, June 11, 1992:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Eighty-Seventh Inter-Parliamentary Conference, held at Yaoundé, Cameroon, April 6-11, 1992.

Honourable senators, last week, I had the pleasure of tabling the report of the 87th Inter-Parliamentary Conference held in Yaoundé, Cameroon, from April 6 to April 11, 1992.

This was a very important conference for the Cameroon Group of the Inter-Parliamentary Union because free elections had just been held in their country for the very first time on March 1st. We are delighted that the people of Cameroon were able to choose freely its representatives among candidates from several political parties.

Canada has a privileged relationship with Cameroon, because they share membership in both the Francophonie and the Commonwealth. Both are bilingual countries. Indeed, two thirds of the population in Cameroon is French-speaking, while one third is English-speaking. Canada and Cameroon also share a common interest in multiculturalism.

There are more tribal groups in Cameroon than in any other African country. Our two nations know from experience the challenge of working with two linguistic groups and advocate respect and understanding.

The Canadian embassy in Cameroon is celebrating its 30th anniversary in 1992. Our delegation was therefore delighted to pay an official visit to the capital of the country, Yaoundé.

As a matter of fact, I wish to commend our chargé d'affaires, Laval Gobeil, as well as his staff, for their outstanding work and the assistance their provided us throughout our stay.

In addition to the usual briefing and assistance, the embassy organized for us a dinner party with officials from Canadian agencies and organisations operating in Cameroon, a visit to the Holy Apostles Seminary and a tour of three local development projects. Our officials were remarkably attentive toward us.

As far as the Conference itself is concerned, some 400 parliamentarians from 91 countries attended. Three substantive issues were on the agenda, including the recent UN Conference on Environment and Development held in Brazil.

Concern was expressed about the lack of progress of the Preparatory Committee on the issues of the Earth Charter, financing the actions set out in the plan of action for the 21st century and the Climate Change Convention.

The organization and operation of democracy as well as the expression of ethnic diversity were the second item on the agenda of the Conference. Not only did the Canadian Group take an active part in the plenary session but, along with groups from eleven nations, tabled a draft resolution for the consideration of the Conference.

Delegates chose to talk also, as a supplementary topic, of the pandemic nature of AIDS, the acquired immuno-deficiency syndrome. Canada was elected, along with nine other countries, to a committee mandated to draft a resolution on that subject.

Before I conclude, I would like to draw your attention on the report on the Union committee on fundamental rights of parliamentarians. Honourable senators know that our colleague, Senator Neiman, is a member of that committee, created in 1977, which met for the first time in 1978.

Seat of world inter-parliamentary dialogue since 1889, the Inter-parliamentary Union is working for peace and co-operation between peoples and for the creation of representative institutions. Cameroon welcomed the representatives of the international parliamentary community at a turning point in its history.

We had the privilege to be among the first to meet members of the newly elected multi-party parliament of Cameroon. Our presence in that country underlined the support of the Union for the strengthening of representative institutions in Africa.

Those among us who participated to the Yaounde Conference left with a strong feeling about the importance of democratic institutions and the need to support countries fighting for democracy.

Honourable senators I urge you to read this report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

Inquiry debated.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we have a few minutes before the bells are schedules to ring. That being the case, and since we have a full plate ahead of us because we intend to adjourn tomorrow evening for the summer recess, unless there is a major conflict with committees—no doubt there will be some —I move that we adjourn until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning. That would allow us to get an earlier than usual start on our heavy agenda. I know the Deputy Leader of the Opposition will be agreeable to my suggestion. We would then have the whole afternoon to complete our business, and perhaps we could consider Royal Assent towards the end of the day and wish a happy summer to each other at a reasonable hour. I look forward to hearing the reaction from members on both sides.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we, on this side, discussed this matter during our supper caucus. It was on that basis that I approached the Deputy Leader of the Government.

If I understand correctly, the committees meeting tomorrow have no legislation before them. They are holding meetings related to other matters. Therefore, there would be no problem with respect to the flow of legislation through the Senate.

Since we can never know how the last day's events will unfold, agreeing to my honourable friend's motion would allow us some leeway so that we could, reasonably, look forward to Royal Assent in the late afternoon. Otherwise, we might find ourselves working well into the evening.

I know certain senators want to be back in their constituencies for Wednesday.

[Translation]

—Saint-Jean-Baptiste Day being a very important holiday for a number of our senators, I believe that it would facilitate their return home if we were to finish earlier tomorrow.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that we adjourn now until 8:30, at which time the bells will ring for the vote at 9 o'clock?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned to the call of the Chair.

At 8:30 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors to the chamber be locked.

REFERENDUM BILL

THIRD READING—MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, for the third reading of Bill C-81, An Act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada.
> And on the motion in amendment of the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, that Bill C-81, be not now read a third time but that it be amended on page 13 by adding immediately after line 4 the following:
> 12.1 "The Senate or the House of Commons shall not adopt any resolution during the life of the 34th Parliament authorizing the Governor in Council to issue a proclamation in order to amend the Constitution of

Canada where the amendment would directly or indirectly be contrary to the opinion expressed, in a referendum, by a majority of voters

(b) in the aggregate, in the Provinces of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland;

(c) in the Province of Ontario;

(d) in the Province of Quebec; or

(e) in the aggregate, the Provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba and in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory." —

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton, that Bill C-81 be read a third time.

In amendment, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat, that Bill C-81 be not now read a third time but that it be amended on page 13 by adding immediately after line 4 the following:

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do you wish to vote on each amendment, honourable senators?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: May I suggest we dispense with the reading of all amendments? I believe it is agreed that we can dispense with the reading of the amendments and vote on them as a block.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, that is fine so long as everyone understands this suggestion, in case any particular senator wants to be able to vote on them separately. We should make that clear.

The Hon. the Speaker: Does any senator object to having this vote taken en bloc?

If not, in amendment it is moved by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Neiman—

Shall I dispense with all 11 amendments?

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: All those in favour of the motions in amendment will please rise.

Motions in amendment of Senator Fairbairn and Senator Stanbury negatived on the following division:

ABSTENTIONS

THE HONOURABLE SENATORS

Nil

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I explained in my intervention why, if our amendments were lost, we would be supporting this bill, so I think it is unnecessary to have another vote; and the question may now be put on the main motion.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator

Lynch-Staunton, that this bill be now read the third time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 10:00 a.m.

BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

Friday, June 19, 1992

to

Both Houses of Parliament

Friday, June 19, 1992

His Excellency Boris Yeltsin was welcomed by the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate and the Honourable John A. Fraser, Speaker of the House of Commons.

Hon. John A. Fraser (Speaker of the House of Commons): Order, please. The Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, chers collègues, mesdames et messieurs. We are here today to celebrate the state visit to Canada by the President of the Russian Federation, His Excellency Boris Yeltsin. We are here, as well, to launch a new era of peace and partnership between peoples too long divided.

Fifty years ago this month diplomatic relations were opened between Ottawa and Moscow. Diplomat relations between us were born, as it turns out, of absolute necessity during the darkest days of the Second World War. Europe then lay in subjugation and Russia lay under the darkest siege.

I have stood before the War Memorial in St. Petersburg in the brutal cold of winter and I have listened to the winds whisper silently of great tragedy and enormous human loss in Russia. I have visited cemeteries from Dieppe to Sai Wan Bay and I have heard courageous veterans mourn fallen comrades sacrificed in the defence of liberty and democracy against the very same enemy.

The establishment of diplomatic relations at that time was both an act of defiance towards those who wanted to destroy us and an act of hope for better days. We indeed finally defeated our common enemy, but our relations drifted into the great desolation of the cold war. We found ourselves facing each other in a new struggle, a war waged not on the plains of central Europe or in the jungles of Asia but in the hearts and minds of men and women throughout the world.

This war as well is now over; the victory was won not by one army over another but by fundamental values and powerful ideas to which all can adhere.

[English]

Obviously, Mr. Speaker and fellow Canadians, the largest measure of the credit for this unique opportunity that now opens down the vistas of years must be given to President Yeltsin.

Courage is an abstraction to those at a relatively safe distance. But at it turns out, President Yeltsin was given no such latitude.

In the crucial days of last August on the top of a tank, at immediate risk to his own life, he dispatched the tyranny that had held Russia in the grip of fear and arbitrary power for 70 years.

The image of Boris Yeltsin last summer and his defiant message to the enemies of democracy everywhere, particularly in his own country, will remain as an historic symbol of courage and purpose so long as men and women gather in free Parliaments to defend the cause of liberty. And I tell you, Mr. President, all Canadians salute you for the extraordinary courage that you have demonstrated.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: President Yeltsin's success was the success fundamentally of the human spirit. His beneficiaries are us all.

Mr. President, you have offered us friendship and you have challenged us to join with you in bringing your country into the community of free nations. I know that I speak for every member of this House and that, sir, is a most rare occurrence.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: As I told you, sir, on both sides of the House, all of them are active supporters of mine.

I speak for every member of this House irrespective of political party because every Canadian believes fundamentally in liberty and democracy. I speak for all Canadians, Canadians across this land, when I say that all Canadians reciprocate your friendship and today we accept your challenge.

[Translation]

The ancient Greeks taught us that democracy is government by the free. The people of Russia are not yet fully free of the dead hand of debilitating ideology and the victory of values is not yet complete.

Mr. President, we understand that the way ahead is fraught with serious difficulties, even perils, and that there will be setbacks and course corrections along the way. Here in this House of Canadian democracy, I give you the firm assurance of our understanding and support. So long as your compass is set for democracy, Canadians will be at your side, Canadians of all regions, of all political parties, of all parts of society.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. President, on behalf of all members of Parliament and on behalf of all Canadians, it is with respect and admiration that I invite you today to address the Parliament and the people of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Editor's Note: Mr. Yeltsin spoke in Russian.]

His Excellency Boris Yeltsin (President of the Russian Federation): Respected Speaker of the House of Commons, respected Speaker of the Senate, respected members of the House of Commons, respected senators, ladies and gentlemen, respected citizens of a free Canada.

First of all, Prime Minister Mulroney, I thank you for your kind words addressed to a free, democratic Russia and to its President.

Thank you for the warm reception. Like you, Mr. Mulroney, I do not always enjoy such a favourable reception in my own Parliament.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: It is a great honour for me, the President of Russia, the first to be elected to the highest position of a great state, to address you from the rostrum of the highest legislative body in Canada.

The moment has arrived when two peoples who have much in common can take a decisive step toward one another. Official relations between our countries, as you said, Mr. Prime Minister, were re-established 50 years ago. But today, unfortunately, one can see how little has been achieved, how many opportunities have been missed. Now we have a rare opportunity to make up for lost time.

When people speak about Russia and Canada, they generally comment on how similar our countries are. Canada is probably the only place where a Russian could forget that he is in a different country. The amazing similarity of the nature, climate and even the wide-open spaces of our countries has left an imprint on the character of Canadians and Russians.

I continually ask myself: Given such similar circumstances, why have our countries developed so differently? Why do our peoples live so differently?

Canada is a recognized world leader in terms of quality of life. Life today in Russia is extremely disrupted, with conditions as tense as a taut string. It is easy to see the enormous damage wreaked on Russia by the 70-year dominance of the Communist totalitarian system. Here in Canada there are no echoes of the arguments with which party ideologues formerly explained the terribly low quality of life which Russians experience. Neither its northern position, nor its harsh climate, nor the alleged nationalistic narrow-mindedness of the Russian people, nor malicious neighbours are to blame for Russia's failure to develop. The main cause lies in the anti-popular stance of the former regime, in the ideology that was forced on the country. For years, the foundations that support life were systematically destroyed. But the citizens of today's Russia do not simply mourn over lost opportunities. Your country is an especially visible and attractive example of the goals which we are now pursuing.

Last August, when we faced the coup-plotters, a very dark cloud loomed not only over Russia, but over the whole world. But the collapse of the totalitarian system was total. The collapse of communistic ideology was total. Once and forever.

As the first president in the thousand-year history of Russia to be elected by all the people, I triumphantly announce this to you. Once and forever.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: The first thing we want to do now is re-establish a normal country, with a normal economy and a normal life. Not a super life, but a normal human way of life. Our tragic past has convinced us that one of the highest treasures that any human community can have is a normal way of life.

Russia knows revolution only too well. That is why I say today on behalf of all Russians that Communist revolution is an evil. We have opted for normal evolution. Russia knows arbitrariness and lawlessness all too well. That is why we have chosen a state based on the rule of law. We are more familiar than other peoples with the nightmare of totalitarianism. That is why we have chosen democracy and why we defended it in those days of last August.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: We know better than others what it is like to be everyone's enemy. That is why we have chosen openness and co-operation with the world community. Russia has opted for freedom, and no force can take it away from us.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: "We don't need any more great upheavals. We need a great Russia." These words, spoken a century ago by Russian patriot and reformer Stolypin, have not lost their relevance. On the contrary, they are full of deep, immediate meaning for us. We want our people to raise children and work peacefully. We want them to be governed not by base social instincts or ideological delusions, but by just motives and thoughts. Today, we turn to your rich experience so that we can once and forever say no to all ideological delusions that demand human sacrifices and reject morality.

Borrowing the words of poetess Anna Akhmatova, I pledge to you as President that I will do everything to ensure that Russia never again lapses into the insanity of upheaval.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: Broad new horizons have opened for Russian-Canadian co-operation. Half a century ago, our countries were allies in the anti-Hitler coalition. Today, when I visited the memorial to those who died in the First and Second World Wars and in other conflicts, I thought of the fact that Russia and Canada have never fought against one another. This is a great achievement. There is a firm conviction today that we are closer to world peace than ever before. Today, when I passed the peace monument being built, it struck me that you have chosen the most appropriate moment possible to build it, when this confidence in peace is at its peak.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: Half a century ago, our countries were allies in the anti-Hitler coalition. Today, we have every reason to speak of a new alliance between us. I am convinced that the need for this alliance has long been felt by those prepared to become direct participants in diverse Russian-Canadian contacts.

• (1130)

Both sides have no shortage of plans for co-operation. It is time we gave them the green light. From this point onward, there are no limits to co-operation between Russia and Canada in world affairs. We can pool our efforts in many different areas in order to strengthen international security, to withstand potential aggressors through collective action, to ensure that all the nations of the world observe the rules of civilized behaviour, including in their behaviour toward their own citizens and national minorities, and to solve global problems.

We applaud your policies of constructive internationalism. We ourselves have already begun to co-operate in working toward the goals identified by the international community. Your country's longstanding commitment to the United Nations organization and to institutions of multilateral diplomacy in general is well known. As is the role played by such outstanding Canadians as Mr. Pearson in working out ways to use the United Nations apparatus in peacekeeping.

This area of United Nations activity and preventive diplomacy aimed at averting conflict could become an ideal domain for applying our joint efforts. The importance of such international mechanisms is regrettably increasing, even in Europe. We have no intention of declaring Russia or any of the states that made up the former union off limits to necessary measures taken by the international community, whether through the United Nations organization or the CSCE. We want peace and calm in our house, in each family. We therefore have a stake in ensuring peace and calm outside it.

The opportunities for co-operation between Russia and Canada in world affairs are greater now than ever before. We must not let them slip by at this of all times.

Ladies and gentlemen, throughout history merchants have preceded diplomats. Such was the case in Russia before 1917. The first treaties were trade treaties. And economic co-operation occupies centre stage in Russian-Canadian relations. Our people have goods to trade, and there are areas for co-operation. Russia is rich. All that is needed is an unbiased approach unhindered by preconceptions. Given such an approach, Russian-Canadian co-operation offers substantial benefits to both parties.

For three hours yesterday and an hour today, Prime Minister Mulroney and I took part in discussions. The Government of Canada proposed a very interesting idea for developing our relations, an idea that could serve as an example for other countries as well. We particularly appreciate this, knowing that Canada too is experiencing difficulties as present. I feel that the high degree of mutual trust which characterizes our personal relations with the Prime Minister allows us to feel confident that this co-operation, these new ideas will be realized.

Russia has set a firm course toward economic reform. We realize that every last market mechanism was eradicated over a period of more than 70 years. After three generations, we have lost the historical instincts we once had for business and private ownership. No one remembers what they mean. We introduced private ownership only half a year ago, including private ownership of land and ownership by foreign private investors.

Practically no one is left who remembers life before the revolution. We realize that the economy is being overhauled during a serious economic crisis, and consequently at a time when the civil peace is highly vulnerable. But it cannot be denied that substantial progress has been achieved in half a year. There have been real changes both in the economy itself and, more important, in people's consciousness.

The people are gradually rediscovering the creativity that was crushed by Communist ideas and ideologies.

Of course, we are currently going through the most painful period, especially this year. This is bitter medicine. Unpopular measures, including price increases, must be adopted in order to shift from a planned economy to a market economy. However difficult this may be, we will not retreat.

Russians are a patient, stubborn people. With gritted teeth, they will overcome these temporary difficulties. They trust their President. They trust their government. They trust their Parliament. And that is very important.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: Every month, I find myself in various districts, regions and republics of Russia. There are 20 republics in Russia. And we have succeeded in signing a federative treaty. Blood is being spilled on Russia's doorstep, but inside Russia we have signed a treaty and preserved the civil peace without spilling a single drop of blood. Russia has remained united and indivisible throughout this period. That is very important to us.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: Russia's young government of reformers the President of the Russian Federation will support to the end. And it is practically impossible now to force him into retirement. I will not resign until my term expires in 1996. You will never catch me sick. I am extremely healthy. I will therefore support this government of reformers to the end.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: We took our first steps toward a market economy on January 1 of this year. The main one was the freeing of prices, and the government is prepared to take the reforms further. You know that before leaving on this official visit, I asked Parliament to confirm Mr. Gaidar, who is currently acting in my place, as Prime Minister of the Head of State of the Russian Federation. And he is only 36 years old. He is a bold, young reformer.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: One of the main principles for choosing people to serve in the government, as ministers or vice-president, besides considering their professional or business skills, is to select democrats and ensure that none of them is older than the President.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: We call for full co-operation with other countries. I am confident that a revival of the Russian economy will be beneficial not only to us, but to our partners as well. If you invite our specialists, talented young people, to come and study, after studying in Canada for a year, they will return to Russia to advocate Canadian experience, the Canadian market and the Canadian economy. And this co-operation with develop still further.

• (1140)

I believe that one of these people, who will number approximately 150 over five years, as the Prime Minister and I agreed today, may very well develop into a new and talented President of Russia to follow me.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: Of course, I am sure that new president will be more talented and more intelligent. That is understandable. Such is history. Today, Russia attaches special importance to western investment and co-operation in the technical field. Today, we agreed on technical co-operation aimed at ensuring the safety of nuclear power plants. We have a program drawn up. The fact that it will be implemented through joint efforts is a complete guarantee that all nuclear power plants will be absolutely free of danger and under the control of the IAEA.

We are not asking for any special injections of money or materials. I want to be quite forthright about that. If Canada did find an opportunity of this kind then, of course, it would help us overcome our problems in this very painful period.

It is true that Russia does not yet offer all of the conditions necessary for accepting private capital from abroad. But before this visit, a series of laws were adopted and decrees promulgated that clear the way for private capital, mainly by making it possible to own property and land, thus facilitating the construction or privatization of factories, buildings, and so on. It is our firm intention to promote this process energetically and to complete it the very near future.

To achieve this, there is no need to invent anything new. Our course, our norms and standards, are those accepted throughout the world. I realize that many Canadian firms are not waiting for an ideal investment climate to develop in Russia. That is how one must act: without being afraid of taking a risk. I do not doubt that this risk is worth taking. Any western investor who fails to enter this unique Russian market this year or next should keep in mind that 1994 will be too late: there will be no room left in the market.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: There is no other way open to us, no alternative to normal economic development. When Russia is rich and flourishing, as I am certain that it will be, we will surely not forget those who were the first to take a risk, a warranted risk.

We have an area for bilateral co-operation that has always attracted much attention: the Arctic. We are much concerned about the situation in the far north of Russia and Canada. The spectrum of problems ranges from the status of aboriginal peoples to environment protection.

Of course, our problems differ in scale. The entire population of the Canadian Arctic is around 100,000. You have no major industrial centres above the Arctic Circle. But I think that I am not mistaken in saying that only together can we solve all of the problems involving the Arctic. Only by working together. Of this I am convinced.

The prosperity of the countries in this region, and above all of Canada and Russia, depend in large measure on conditions in the Arctic. Experience has shown that co-operation between us in this area cannot develop exclusively through dialogue between our capitals. We must therefore emphasize immediate links between the direct participants in co-operation, and above all between the people who actually live in these Arctic regions. They are more interested than anyone in seeing prosperity and the well-being that follows come to their extremely forbidding land.

There is another area of mutual interest in the Russian-Canadian dialogue that might be opened up for further avenues of bilateral co-operation. I wanted to begin my address by congratulating the people of Canada on the 125th birthday of the Canadian federation. From my heart and on behalf of the entire Russian people, I sincerely congratulate everyone in Canada on this anniversary.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: Our states are federative in nature. This creates unique opportunities for making the ties between our states better reflect the needs and aspirations of our people. Russia is very interested in studying Canada's experience in managing relations within a federation. We will learn from you how to solve problems in a civilized way through negotiations.

And now a few words about the problems facing the Commonwealth of Independent States of the former union, which are causing many people around the world to worry. This unique intergovernmental organization is currently in the building stage. But it has already proved itself to be a working mechanism for finding the most acceptable form of mutual relations between the republics. At the same time, a process is under way in the Commonwealth whereby republics are both falling apart and coming together. However difficult it may be for us to ensure that this highly complex process remains governable, the seventh and most recent meeting of the heads of government of these countries can be considered the most productive meeting in terms of results.

Respected parliamentarians of Canada, you have considerable opportunities for positively influencing the development of Russian–Canadian co–operation. As I have said before, the advantages to be derived from co–operating with Russia may not all be immediately apparent. They must be explained, but this will not be difficult in the new atmosphere characterizing our relations. I urge you to make active use of your opportunities in Parliament and in the ridings when speaking with the Canadians who elected you to actively promote the dialogue between Russia and Canada, between our peoples.

There is every reason to speak of fundamental national interests shared by Russia and Canada and of human aspirations shared by the ordinary people in our countries. This is what has enabled us, after decades of isolation, to base Russian–Canadian relations on a solid legal foundation: the Treaty on Concord and Co–operation which will be signed today. The community of interests of which I speak cannot be built on thin air. As you know, much is being done in both countries to ensure that it becomes a constant theme of the domestic and foreign policies of our countries.

Speaking from this lofty rostrum, I would especially like to mention Canada's active contribution to the development of the dialogue between us. We are grateful for the solidarity which the people and political leaders of your country showed for a democratic Russia in August. I remember the telephone conversation I had at that time with Prime Minister Mulroney. It had enormous significance, and Russians will never forget it. Russians know about it. Russians remember it, and will continue to remember it for the rest of their history.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: Your solidarity has continued in the form of Canadian economic and humanitarian assistance to Russia. We value highly the heroism of individual citizens and organizations, including the Salvation Army's renewed activity in our country.

Today it is no less important or urgent that we learn the language of mutually advantageous co–operation and partnership in business.

We have a clear vision of what we are striving toward in our country, in the world and in our relations with Canada. And many would do well to study the development of our relations.

Our intentions are not secret. We are prepared for hard work, which is the very essence of any partnership. We have a long and difficult road ahead of us. I am convinced that our peoples must travel together if they are to attain the best results.

I want to wish Russians and Canadians a happy journey and success in developing peaceful areas of mutual co–operation. Thank you.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. President, Mrs. Yeltsin, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Prime Minister, honorables collègues du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes, distinguished guests:

[Editor's Note: Mr. Charbonneau spoke in Russian.]

We are honoured by your visit and very grateful that you have shared with us as parliamentary colleagues your international preoccupations and your determination to carry through the program of reform and restructuring upon which your country has launched itself.

Your presence in these precincts testifies to your faith in the solid basis of the friendly relations between our two countries and to our confidence in your courageous leadership.

We are all the more touched by your presence here today in that we know very well that you are required to be ubiquitous in order to respond to the exigencies of your post on the national and international levels.

As president of the young Russian federation, your leadership has been and remains preponderant to your people, as it does for the collectivity of nations.

Your remarks to us today confirm your indefectible will to succeed in attaining your goals.

[Translation]

Mr. President, we are all aware of the balancing act you have to perform, caught as you are between attraction for the West and respect for the Russian soul.

Your great writers of the last century made us keenly aware of these differences between the two societies, both so rich in virtues and so laden with an uncounted heritage.

We remember Dostoyevsky, in particular, who in search of a fair balance between the pro-Western and pro-Slavic forces agreed to modernization for Russia if it respected the nation's traditions.

Like you, he worked for understanding of different cultures. In his tribute to Pushkin, he wrote, "Our vocation is European and universal. Is not being Russian, perfectly Russian, the same perhaps as being a brother to all men?"

[English]

In a historical continuity, Tolstoy and Chekov both called for the rejection of a completed past but on the condition that the characteristics of their ancestral customs be preserved. Then, as in our own century, it was the political system in place that was seen as bearing the blame for stagnation and frustrated hopes.

You, Mr. President, have had the courage to confront and repudiate the doctrinaires who were so mistaken about the nature of man.

Without renouncing for the people of your federation their rooted national traditions, you are bringing them into a universal current of liberty.

All the world remembers how you stood up (in every sense of the word) in front of the White House in Moscow, not quite a year ago, to defend liberty and democracy when they were threatened. We are convinced that the same democratic and courageous spirit will carry you forward in the future.

To borrow the language of a sport at which you excel, tennis, we want to wish you, in all your battles with adversity, a final score of game, set, and match.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker Charbonneau: Once more, Mr. President, we congratulate you on the eminent and challenging role to which you dedicate yourself in these critical years and we are grateful to you for sharing with us your main concerns and your intention to continue your work in space and time. We thank you and wish you good luck.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Speaker Fraser: Mr. President, Madam Yeltsina, Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, members of the Senate and the House of Commons, honoured and distinguished guests:

On behalf of all members of the House of Commons I take great pleasure in welcoming you today to this august Chamber.

[Translation]

The momentous changes which have reshaped the global political landscape over the last several years have left us facing new and daunting challenges. Perhaps no country is more acutely aware of this than the Russian Federation.

[English]

We are seeing today in Russia and the other new republics of the former Soviet Union one of the most remarkable transformations in history.

Communism is now a fading memory, and in its place have been planted the seeds of democracy. Among the new republics, Russia is taking the lead in sowing these seeds.

You have shown tremendous courage, Mr. President, in introducing bold economic reforms.

Russia possesses enormous economic potential, blessed as it is with immense natural and human resources; however, only a continued commitment to economic reform will ensure that these resources are effectively tapped.

We are a sensitive people, Mr. President, and we are aware that the transition to a market economy brings with it unavoidable hardship; the Russian people have displayed patience and courage in the face of economic adversity, and in so doing they have earned the respect and admiration of all Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker Fraser: We feel certain that, despite the many obstacles that remain, the historic spirit of the Russian people will ultimately prevail.

Canada will do all it can to help. As one of the G–7 countries we helped assemble the recent $24 billion assistance package to Russia which will be tied to an economic reform program devised by the International Monetary Fund.

• (1200)

On a bilateral level, Canada has pledged considerable assistance, and, as you mentioned during your last trip to Ottawa, Mr. President, we have fulfilled all our promises.

We have provided your country with substantial grain and other credits, as well as a wide variety of technical and humanitarian assistance.

We hope that trade and investment ties are also growing.

Clearly, we are in a special position with relation to Russia, a position which we understand, a position that brings a responsibility to us which we want to accept.

Both countries now have an unprecedented opportunity to build on what should be a natural friendship. The last 50 years have perhaps blinded people to the striking similarities and unique ties that exist between our countries.

You mentioned that being here from your country you could feel at home. Canada's vast expanse of land, our northern geography, our climate, our abundant natural resources, our multicultural tradition, even our hockey tradition—all these we share in common with Russia.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker Fraser: We have taken steps to strengthen these ties.

Part of our technical assistance is aimed at upgrading Russian resource industries such as oil and gas.

As northern neighbours, both countries support the creation of an International Arctic Council which would deal with environmental and security concerns in the region.

Also on the environmental front, which you mentioned, sir, Canada recently pledged to help Russia ensure the safety of its nuclear reactors.

We need to cultivate these bilateral ties.

Perhaps the best way to do it is to encourage people–to–people contact.

[Translation]

In May, the House of Commons held a week–long seminar on the theme of "Canada's Federal System of Government", which attracted delegations from the newly emerging democracies of central and eastern Europe, including one from Russia.

We look forward to more such parliamentary cooperation in the future.

[English]

Finally, our countries share a common concern over security. The Cold War is over, and a new era in international politics has emerged.

Canada supports and encourages you, Mr. President, in your continued efforts to preserve regional and international security.

Your recent agreement with President Bush to slash strategic nuclear weapons represents an historic breakthrough, and we trust that relations with your neighbours in the Commonwealth of Independent States will show similar goodwill and co–operation.

Your leadership on this matter, Mr. President, is well known in this country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker Fraser: In closing, Mr. President, let me say on behalf of all who are here today what enormous respect we have for your achievements as President of the Russian Federation during a difficult period. Your courage has been mentioned.

Perhaps it is appropriate to remind ourselves of what Mr. Churchill said once when asked: "What is the greatest quality a person may have?" He said: "Courage, because it secures all others".

Sir, you are an example of that and we are very proud of you.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker Fraser: We value our growing friendship with your country, and look forward with great eagerness to increasing our ties in the future and helping you in whatever way we can.

[English]

Thank you very much, Mr. President, for being with us. You will be welcome again. To you and madam, we wish you good luck and Godspeed.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

VETERANS AFFAIRS

THE VALOUR AND THE HORROR—CENSORSHIP OF NFB FILM

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I rise to speak again on the issue of the inquiry by the Sub-committee on Veterans Affairs of a CBC-NFB film. The issue here is censorship and it is censorship by a central institution of the federal government. It is censorship of something that cannot harm any living being. Censorship of a criticism of faulty leadership in a war that occurred some 50 years ago is unthinkable, illogical.

Whenever the state has invaded the field of art and free expression to impose censorship, the results have been bad for the society. The Soviet Union was imposing that sort of censorship on expression. Soviet art suffered, Soviet thought suffered. Soviet freedom, of course, was nonexistent. Everybody suffers from censorship.

Like other things, a prohibition of censorship cannot be absolute. Of course, art or films showing the abuse of children, trying to make money out of such horrors and perversities, should be censored. But to censor a movie presented on CBC, made by the National Film Board, because it says that our military leaders in the past made mistakes which cost the lives of young Canadians, lives that could have been spared had that military leadership been more intelligent, more able, that is unthinkable. I cannot understand how we, as a House of Parliament, allow one of our sub-committees to engage in this kind of inanity.

I heard another objection. While our bombing of German cities was stressed as being too cruel, as being unnecessary, the film did not talk of the equally cruel and unnecessary bombing of British cities. Both were horrible! Are we not to say that we made mistakes in the way we treated our enemies—we a civilized society, a democracy? Rather, we must stop this kind of expression. Because of what? Because Mr. Chadderton and his people dislike it?

I ask once more that the Senate please direct Senator Marshall to cease and desist and leave this matter alone.

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators will be amazed to know, I am sure, that the election clock is still ticking. If the government of which Senator Murray is a member respects democracy, according to his own definition, Canadians will cast their ballots within 150 days. However, if, in the words of Senator Murray, the present government is "cowardly and contemptuous of democracy", the day of reckoning remains at 537.

Since we might be adjourning today, I want to put two other items on the record concerning the clock. First, I will explain how these calculations are made.

First, a government respecting democracy would have an election within four years. The day of the last general election was November 21, 1988.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: What about the 1984 election?

Senator Frith: Therefore, the next election should be held by November 21, 1992.

For a "cowardly and contemptuous of democracy government"—pay attention particularly, now—subsection 4(1) of the Charter states that:

> No House of Commons . . ..shall continue for longer than five years from the date fixed for the return of the writs at a general election . . ..

The date set for the return of the writs at the last general election was December 12, 1988. The House of Commons, therefore, cannot sit beyond December 12, 1993. This is the date that the "cowardly and contemptuous of democracy" government would see as representing the end of its term.

Since we are proposing to adjourn until Tuesday, September 22, 1992, and the clock will be ticking in the meantime, those counting the time remaining will want to know that on Tuesday, September 22, 1992, the democrats will be left with 59 days and the contemptuous ones will be left with 445 days.

THE SENATE

TRIBUTES TO DEPARTING PAGES

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have been told that two of our Pages will be leaving us after this break. I have here some notes about them which I will use to put on the record some facts about these young people. I know that the Leader of the Government also wishes to say something about these fine young Canadians.

Michelle MacDonald first arrived at the Senate in September 1988 and worked as a Page until June of 1990. She returned home to Prince Edward Island, and so she missed the enviable experience of being here during the GST debate.

She was called back to the Senate in January 1991 to fill the vacant position of Chief Page. Her term as Chief Page was not without challenge, however. Seven new Pages had to be trained, and her competent and thorough leadership allowed the transition to be made with a minimum of difficulty.

Am I interrupting you, Senator Simard?

Senator Simard: Maybe she can find a book at a 99 cent store at a reduced rate?

Senator Hastings: What are you talking about? You are babbling again.

Senator Frith: Senator Simard wants to plug my book. I certainly do not wish to interrupt him if he wants to do that.

Senator Doyle: Which book?

Senator Frith: Did I hear someone ask "Which book?" Was it by any chance Senator Doyle? The book in question was being referred to by your neighbour, so I assume he can tell you about it, but if you want any further information it is available at my office.

Michelle MacDonald's term as Chief Page, as I was saying, was not without challenge. Seven Pages had to be trained, and her competent and thorough leadership allowed the transition to be made with a minimum of difficulty. She graduated this year from the University of Ottawa with a B.Soc.Sc. with a concentration in Political Science, and she hopes to continue in the civil service—and we hope she will—either here in Parliament or in the Manitoba legislature.

The second Page who will probably not be back after the break, honourable senators, is Cathy Piccinin. Cathy has spent a lot of time on the Hill. She worked in Senate Debates before becoming a Page in January of 1990.

This year, Cathy graduated magna cum lauda from the University of Ottawa with an Honours Bachelor of Arts in History. She has been awarded a fellowship by the University of Ottawa for her post-graduate studies. Her other immediate plans include legislative work for the Secretary of State.

Next something we may not know about. I am told that the Pages will sorely miss Cathy's humour and singing. In order to take in a concert, one has to stay after the Senate has adjourned, because her particular stage for performance is the Senate chamber while the Pages are cleaning up after we have left. Therefore if anyone wants to stay for this afternoon's or for today's noon concert, you have been given plenty of warning, Cathy. I am happy to say that it is a benefit concert, and there will be no admission charge.

Apparently, one of Cathy's favourite shticks, as they say, is to sing refrains from Bugs Bunny cartoons which, with her departure, will no longer enliven the preparation of the Chamber, nor will her knowledge of the intimate workings of Parliament be there to help.

[Senator Frith.]

Cathy leaves with one regret. She has never had a chance to actually take the floor formally in this place, which I suppose is possible with unanimous consent. We will see about that.

I have been asked by the Pages to add one thing, and that is that the remaining Pages would like to thank Michelle and Cathy for their guidance and patience. Their warmth, talents and experience will be missed, but not so much as they will be. They, the Pages, also join us in wishing Michelle and Cathy all the best for the future—health, happiness and successful careers.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

• (1015)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to associate myself fully, and on behalf of all of my colleagues on this side, with the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition, in particular to thank Michelle and Cathy most warmly for their services in this chamber over the last little while.

For the most part, as we all know, our Pages have their studies and the rigorous demands of academic lives to contend with. At the same time, they are here contributing in a very real way to the work of this chamber and assisting honourable senators in their duties. I hope, and believe, that they are learning while they are here with us, that what they are learning is good, and that what they are learning helps to improve their knowledge and increase their respect for the workings of our Parliament. That, at any rate, is the intention, and I hope we are succeeding.

All of them, as I say, have the demands of their studies at the same time as they are subject to a somewhat unpredictable schedule here in the Senate. Nevertheless, they carry out their duties cheerfully, courteously and competently. Their work is, without exception, most satisfactory as far as I and all of our colleagues are concerned.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: In particular, I want to extend our thanks and our very best wishes to Michelle and Cathy, but on this day, possibly the last day before we adjourn for the summer, I would include in my thanks and good wishes all of those who serve honourable senators as Pages in this chamber.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON A RENEWED CANADA

CLARIFICATION OF QUESTION

Hon. Maurice Riel: Honourable senators, I would like to provide some clarification further to questions or comments by Senator Grimard on the age or number of senators in the French Republic. The average age of senators in France is 61. The average age in the French National Assembly is 51. This reflects the difference in eligible age, which is 35 for the Senate and 23 for the National Assembly.

I would also like to say that most senators, 136 out of 319, or 43 per cent, are between 61 and 70 years old. Ninety, or 28 per cent, are between 51 and 60; 36, or 11 per cent, are between 41 and 50; only 49 are over 70.

I also want to say, on the remark that a senator could be elected with 840 delegates or grand electors, that it is possible, but the average is 2,500. This morning, I checked by telephone with the main administration office of the Senate of the Republic and I was told by fax that the bill changing the electoral college for senators is now under consideration.

The number of delegates from municipal councils would no longer depend on the size of the council but would be strictly proportional to the population of the community, with one delegate for every 500 inhabitants or part thereof.

I think this shows a good representation by age and number for senators in the French Republic.

Secondly, I scratched a note on the short speech I gave yesterday and I wanted to submit it. I suggest that in Canada we give cities of over 500,000 inhabitants more senators because cities have different problems and additional problems due to immigration, population shifts and mobility. Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver, Calgary and Edmonton have over 500,000 inhabitants. I think that is worth considering.

This concludes my statement. Thank you, honourable senators.

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

INTERIM REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella, Acting Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, tabled the tenth report of the committee.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS CONCERNING DECISION TO SELL RAIL LINE PRESENTED

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the twelfth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications concerning the committee's inquiry into the decision of Canadian National Railways to sell the main railway line between Truro and Sydney, Nova Scotia.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate of this day, and that it form part of the permanent record of this house.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I realize that no debate is in order at this time, but perhaps I might ask that we revert to this item after government business so that my colleague, Senator Graham, who initiated the inquiry, may speak on the matter. I understand that that would require leave. However, I simply make the request now and we can deal with it later.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps Senator Oliver would correct his motion. It is not necessary to print the report in both the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and in Debates of the Senate. That procedure is an old form which is no longer used.

Second, we would be happy to consider discussion on this report. I would certainly like to accommodate my colleagues opposite, particularly Senator Graham. It is unfortunate that Senator MacDonald is not here to engage in the discussion since he chaired the committee which has tabled this report. I hope that we can return to it following discussion on the same committee's report on Bill C-62 and the report of the committee on that bill that we received yesterday.

Senator Oliver: Honourable senators, I would be pleased to amend my motion on the report as recommended by Senator Lynch-Staunton.

On motion of Senator Molgat, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration later this day.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES WATERS BILL

YUKON WATERS BILL

BILLS WITHDRAWN FROM STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES AND REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, yesterday we referred Bills C-51 and C-52, acts respecting water resources in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources.

After hearing Senator Adams speak, I noticed that there appeared to be general support for these two bills. Therefore, if it is the wish of the house to have these bills passed today—assuming that leave is granted for third reading—the minister responsible, Mr. Siddon, could appear before the Committee of the Whole sometime this afternoon. In that way, we could accelerate the procedure.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I assume that we will be having Royal Assent today. The Deputy Leader of the Government has not yet announced it but I assume that that will be the case. In view of the fact that these bills are noncontroversial, that they are of assistance to the two territories, and that I believe it has been impossible to arrange a meeting of the energy committee in the near future, we would agree to that procedure.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I should mention that it is the intention, barring unforeseen developments, to have Royal Assent towards the end of the day.

On that basis, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(f):

> That Bill C-51, respecting water resources in the Northwest Territories, and Bill C-52, respecting water resources in the Yukon Territory, which were referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources, be withdrawn from the said Committee and referred to a Committee of the Whole later this day.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SEXUAL ASSAULT AND DIMINISHED ACCESS TO JUSTICE—EFFECTS OF DISCRIMINATION—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 531 residents of British Columbia who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitions are from Kamloops.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 502 residents of British Columbia who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitions are from Victoria.

Before the sitting, senator Simard wanted to know whether I had any petitions from New Brunswick. I was a bit too hasty and said no, by mistake. I apologize to senator Simard and to the entire population of New Brunswick which has been sending petitions like these for two years.

I therefore have the honour to present petitions signed by 50 residents of New Brunswick who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitions are from Fredericton.

So we have a grand total of 552 petitioners which, with the petition Senator Corbin just presented, adds up to more than 1,000. These petitioners object to the GST and, more specifically, as it applies to books and periodicals.

I may remind senators who sometimes look a bit bored while they listen to these petitions, that I am receiving practically every day and that there will be plenty until the next election.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Does Senator Hébert intend to spend the summer in Ottawa to wait for these petitions to come in and inform his colleagues accordingly as he receives them? I think it would be a nice gesture, and it would be a wonderful opportunity to show his colleagues he is prepared to go to great lengths to make his point and to give them a chance to judge his sincerity or lack of sincerity.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

WESTERN SAHARA—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate will know that I worry about the Western Sahara, and other nasty conflicts elsewhere in the world. I do not know who will worry about them when I have left this chamber, but I hope I am able to persuade one of my colleagues to stand up and ask from time to time so the Government will not lose track.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government has a response to my earlier question asking for an update on the situation in the Western Sahara.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): I don't believe I do, honourable senators, but I will do some research this very day and, even if the time for Question Period has expired, I will send the honourable senator any information that I have.

Senator Marsden: Thank you.

CANADIAN FORCES IN YUGOSLAVIA—PARTICIPATION IN ARMED INTERVENTION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. More and more people are recommending, putting forward the idea, suggesting that a strike force go and put an end to this slaughter, these bloody hostilities which are still going on in spite of all attempts made to pacify warring factions in the former Yugoslavia and its regions.

Is the Canadian government involved in any plan for an armed intervention? If so, does the Canadian government intend to involve Canadian forces already deployed in an essentially peacekeeping role, assigning them the mission of intervening alongside other armed forces in an open conflict?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, I have in front of me a briefing note from External Affairs on this issue. The note was prepared in English. So, if my hon. friend does not mind, I will read him this note on a possible military intervention.

[English]

We are in close consultation with our NATO allies on how best we can assist in seeing this tragedy come to an end. No option can be dismissed, but at the moment there are no plans for outside military intervention. We are trying to use UN forces to permit relief operations to take place, but both sides are constantly violating cease-fires.

[Translation]

The honourable senator will know that the UN Security Council has passed a resolution, Resolution 758, dealing with the reopening of the Sarajevo airport. My notes indicate that certain conditions were to be met before this operation could get under way . . .

[English]

First, that a durable ceasefire exists, and second, that the warring factions have withdrawn their weapons. The U.N. military observers are currently verifying whether these conditions exist. The commander of the U.N. forces reports to the U.N. Secretary General on this question. The Secretary General, of course, reports to the Security Council.

Finally, I have to report that three Canadian members of the U.N. peacekeeping operation in Sarajevo were injured on June 20 when their jeep was hit by a mortar. This will not deter our contingent from pursuing its mission as soon as possible.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I thank the leader of the government for this information. However, I want to ask him specifically what would happen if the Canadian soldiers that are in that region under the aegis of the United Nations became involved in an interventionist conflict; in other words, what would happen if the peacekeeping aspect was left aside and if we literally got involved in an act of war? In such circumstances, would the government consult both Houses of Parliament before committing Canadian forces to this type of operation?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Canadian Forces will not go to war. They are there as peacekeepers.

THE CONSTITUTION

BEAUDOIN-DOBBIE REPORT—STATEMENTS OF MINISTERS—STATUS OF RESPONSE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it is likely that we will be adjourning today. Has the minister been able to get for me speeches, comments or anything from the part-time ministers, Mr. Masse and Mr. Bouchard, defending Canada, particularly in their province of Quebec?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not know why my friend refers to Mr. Masse and Mr. Bouchard as part-time ministers. They are extremely hard-working and devoted ministers. Mr. Masse is at the Ministry of National Defence, which faces many operational and policy challenges that he is meeting more than satisfactorily. Mr. Bouchard is in the extremely sensitive and difficult portfolio of National Health and Welfare, the ministry with the biggest budget in the Government of Canada. This week alone, he and Mr. Mazankowski, the Minister of Finance, are attending meetings with their provincial counterparts, the provincial treasurers and ministers of health.

These ministers are both working overtime in the interests of the Canadian government and the Canadian people. Both of them are also, it is needless to add, dedicated to national unity, and the record will amply prove that.

Senator Molgat: I thank the minister for that very interesting discourse on the two ministers, but he has not answered my question. Has he yet found a document, a press release, a statement or anything in which they have defended Canada, in the province of Quebec in particular? That is the reason I say they are part-time ministers. One of my colleagues says "part-time Canadians". Are they defending Canada in their province?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I reject absolutely the rather offensive description of my cabinet colleagues. I must confess that, while I have undertaken to bring to the attention of the honourable senator press clippings or transcripts of interviews or statements that these ministers have made, I am busy, too, and I have not really treated this as a priority matter. Perhaps the summer will give me the leisure time to give this matter the attention it deserves.

Senator Molgat: I will be waiting with bated breath when we resume in the fall for the undoubtedly large stack of documents my friends will have.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

COASTING TRADE BILL

MOTION TO ADOPT REPORT OF COMMITTEE NEGATIVED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the tenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications (Bill C-33, An Act respecting the use of foreign ships and non-duty paid ships in the coasting trade—with certain amendments), presented in the Senate on 22nd June, 1992.

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, if I may be permitted, I would like to say a few words on the report as a longstanding member of the committee with particular interest in this legislation.

As the chairman indicated, we have very recently concluded our hearings on Bill C-33, entitled, "an Act respecting the use of foreign ships and non-duty paid ships in the coasting trade". If you really think about it, the perspective inherent in such a title seems a little strange. We are a sovereign nation yet we now concern ourselves principally with how best to accommodate the interests of foreign flag vessels and reflagged vessels. What amusement this must cause in many maritime nations, particularly our neighbours south of the 49th parallel!

When the U.S. enacted the Jones Act in the early 1920s, they prohibited all foreign vessels from entering their coasting trade. That prohibition was ratified in the recent free trade agreement, wherein the Americans insisted the agreement not be applicable to their shipping. Canadians cannot participate in their coasting trade, but Americans can in ours, if they get a licence to do so.

We have become, in this country, highly adept at respecting the use of foreign vessels in our waters. Bill C-33 codifies this facility. I am not sure it is a facility of which I, as a Canadian, am particularly proud. We have traditionally observed the principle of reserving Canadian waters primarily for Canadian flag vessels for the transportation of goods and products. That principle is now being set aside. Bill C-33 clearly signifies the beginning of the erosion of that principle.

I have never believed that a fundamental objective of government was to set limits to the progress of a nation. I have never believed that the representatives of a sovereign people should preoccupy themselves with the interests of foreign states. On the contrary, I have always believed that there are no fixed limits to the ambitions and energies of our peoples. If legislation is in some way the catalyst to those energies, if it is in some way the voice of our collective sovereign will, if it is all of that, then we must amend Bill C-33 in accordance with the amendments proposed by Senator Forrestall in the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

We must do so because C-33 relates to the way in which we regard the waters of Canada and the seas surrounding Canada. I do not believe we should regard those waters as something other than the territory of Canada. Indeed, I am mystified by those who believe we should allow practices on the waters which we would not tolerate on the land or in the air.

This is a broad policy issue upon which I believe that we, as Canadians, must reflect. We would not tolerate on the land or in the air people bringing other people, who have not got work permits, to work at wages determined by a foreign flag, by the jurisdiction of the Liberias of this world. Yet we do so in our inland waters at a time when 50 per cent of our own Canadian seamen are unemployed.

For those among us who want to rush passage of the bill, who wish an expeditious passage of the law respecting the rights of foreign vessels in our waters, who feel this is a primary concern, I offer a very strong note of caution. We must all remember that the principal task of government is not to set boundaries to the energies of our people. Our task is not to discourage our adventurous citizens, but to reward them for such endeavours. I might remind you that one simple signal is sent by this bill to all maritime nations that Canada now rewards the brave crews of American, Norwegian and Bahamian vessels in its coastal waters. It encourages the dynamism of foreign adventurers, but Canada discourages the vigour of its own people.

The catalyst to our present problem was a 1987 amendment to the Canada Shipping Act which allowed for exemptions throughout Canadian waters to be granted to foreign ships for voyages in Canada. The effect of that amendment was that exclusive protection, which until that time had existed for all voyages in inland waters, from Anticosti to Thunder Bay, became subject to the granting of a licence. As a consequence, it was now possible to have a voyage between Thunder Bay and Toronto being undertaken by a European ship or an African ship—a concept which raises an interesting question, that is, whether this amendment of 1987 was unknowingly put in. Perhaps that would be a kinder interpretation, because it dilutes a protection that had existed until then. As it now stands, there is authority for granting an exemption for a voyage anywhere in Canada, including the protected area. When I say "anywhere", I mean in that area which, until 1988, was protected, the area west of the Anticosti line.

Bill C-33 allows the NTA to issue licences anywhere in our coastal waters, including the previously protected area.

The earlier Bill C-52, which died on the Order Paper, had a 14-day waiting period between the request of a shipper for a waiver and the granting of a licence. The unamended Bill C-33 dispensed with that 14-day waiting period. This is the heart of what I have referred to as the discouragement problem. Allow me, please, honourable senators, to explain.

• (1050)

The bulk of the domestic fleet in Canada is the Great Lakes Seaway fleet, and the fleet is getting older. We see no national policy in shipping. Indeed, Bill C-33 sets no such national policy.

Many of the ships in the Great Lakes are flagged out, often with flags of convenience, many with crews from other countries. We are watching at the present time the extinction of a once proud domestic fleet.

While we have engaged constructively as a people in signing international agreements regarding endangered species, we seem to do less well in recognizing the demise of our Great Lakes fleet. Honourable senators, there must be efforts made to preserve this fleet and to rebuild it.

I come back to the 14-day waiting period. We all want our shippers to have efficient and unimpeded service. But surely we must attempt to balance this with an objective of equal value; that is, the right of a Canadian shipowner to respond to a trade opportunity. The retention of a 14-day waiting period is essential to achieving this balance—a marriage, I might add, between Canadian shippers and Canadian shipowners; a marriage made in Canada. I am fully in favour of such a marriage, and I am fully in favour of legislation which consolidates the interests of Canadian shippers. Unhappily, Bill C-33 focuses solely on the interests of the former.

Our Great Lakes fleet has been built to optimize the Seaway. Indeed, many feel the future of the Seaway is linked to the ongoing provision of a decent sized and capable Canadian fleet. We therefore must give our Canadian fleet owners an opportunity to respond to waiver requests—a reasonable ability to respond to a waiver request. That request may prove to have long term implications. It may encourage a Canadian operator to consider his ability to provide a ship himself.

Honourable senators, we must assist Canadian ships to become operational. We must not discourage them from becoming operational. While I am fully aware of the demands of the marketplace, I know that the built-in lead time will allow the Canadian shipper the possibility of repositioning his ships. If there is no breathing time, he will have to give a "no" response.

This bill means the end to prospects for a diversified, specialized Canadian fleet. It means recognition that we will tolerate the extinction of our Great Lakes fleet. This is an unhappy development because, when there has been a requirement in Canada to service Canadian business and new technology has been required, we have been the first to go out and do it. I refer to self-unloading technology and to the conversion of vessels to transport cement and asphalt as illustrative of this general historic propensity.

That 14-day waiting period is therefore a powerful signal because it generates a climate of protection in the Maritime industry, an industry in which huge investments are called for. Without this climate, we will not attract the investment and we will not obtain the jobs for Canadians. Honourable senators, we cannot expect an investor to invest $30 million to $40 million if legislation within this country allows shippers to use foreign flag vessels, with the end result that the vessel, built at such great cost, could lie idle.

If I might add, that is how the Americans maintain their fleet. It is how, in this hour of decline, we must resurrect our Great Lakes fleet.

A 14-day waiting period consolidates a made-in-Canada marriage. I heard no convincing evidence in the testimony presented to us that shippers' interests would be seriously or adversely affected. Much talk is made of the need for fast action and the expeditious granting of licences. I do not find the bulk of the testimony convincing in this regard.

Bulk shipments are generally contracted up to a year in advance. We do not have a huge shipping industry, and an investigation by the NTA does not have to take a month. A thorough investigation on both coasts, and on the lakes, is needed in order to find out what is available and what kinds of ships are required.

Often, this issue regarding requests for waivers comes down simply to the suitability of a ship. There is, of course, a great capability for distorting the suitability of a ship, and the potential for such abuse is encouraged by Bill C-33. It takes documentation and investigation to be able to determine whether a suitable ship is available or not.

We must monitor available Canadian shipping capacity and the capability to respond to a waiver request. A centralized database of Canadian ships available must be maintained. The idea of a transparent registry is only an exercise in common sense. Publicity is an important element. If it is part of the public policy of Canada that the coasting trade is reserved for Canadian ships, then there should be publicity any time there is a divergence from that. The public should know about the divergence.

That is the rationale behind this amendment. The amendment is rounded out by the suggestion that, even afterward, there should be publication made saying that we granted a licence to operate for a certain period of time, why this licence was granted, and so on. Intimately tied into all of this is the 14-day lead time.

Finally, honourable senators, many of us remember the uproar caused by the voyage of the Manhattan through our Northwest Passage in the late 1960s. We responded at that time with great vigour to the potential threat posed to the fragile ecosystem of the Arctic regions. We did not then preoccupy ourselves with the interests of foreign states. Indeed, we did not then believe, as a sovereign nation, that legislation should be drafted to accommodate the interests of foreign flags.

There was a real spirit to those times. Canadians were seen as a brave and adventurous people who did not hesitate to exert sovereign control over their waters as they did not hesitate to exert sovereign control over their land and airspace. Today, we legislate principally as to how best to accommodate the interests of foreign flagged vessels in our inland waters. We do not legislate to protect our coasting trade for Canadian ships.

I might remind honourable senators that one simple signal is sent by this bill to all Maritime nations. It is that Canada encourages the dynamism of foreign adventurers but discourages the dynamism and the vigour of our own people. It is only right, therefore, that we amend this bill to set the record straight and to provide much needed encouragement to our own citizens of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as indicated to the committee, these amendments are unacceptable to the government. I would like to review them briefly one by one. By doing that, perhaps I will dispel some of the apprehensions and concerns that have been touched on in Senator Graham's remarks, not all of them properly founded.

The first amendment would require that owners of foreign ships observe all the laws of Canada for activities lasting more than 14 days. The use of foreign crew on foreign ships temporarily engaged in the coasting trade of Canada is already governed by the Immigration Act. As soon as Revenue Canada receives the advice from the National Transportation Commission that no suitable Canadian ship is available, an authority is issued to the applicant that spells out the conditions to be met prior to issuance of a licence, including the requirements with respect to labour and immigration.

The effectiveness of the current situation is clearly demonstrated by the fact that, for over half of the temporary permits issued in 1991, Canadian seafarers were employed on foreign ships. In the remaining cases, due to the short-term nature of the activity or the fact that specialized skills were required to operate specialized equipment, it was not practical to replace a foreign crew with Canadian seafarers.

If this amendment is accepted, it is conceivable that opportunities will be foregone due to the requirement to satisfy an arbitrary and unrealistic time frame for replacing foreign crew with Canadians. For example, in offshore activities, the practice has been to train Canadians to perform specialized functions and replace foreign crew when they become proficient. Such training often takes longer than 14 days. Clearly this amendment would preclude the possibility of enabling the amount of training required to ensure the safety of the crew, and a foreign ship would not be permitted to operate. Since no suitable Canadian ship would be available, the activity would not be performed, a business opportunity would be lost, and less Canadian seafarers would be employed.

We cannot support this amendment because it would supersede the current provisions of the Immigration Act which have proven to be effective and responsive to current needs. It would represent a duplication of a clause which already states in the act that the issuance of a license:

> ... does not affect the application of any law of Canada that imposes safety or pollution prevention requirements in respect of ships.

Amendment number two would require that an application for a coasting license would not be considered less than 14 days before the provision of the service is intended to commence.

Experience with the current system of issuing coasting licenses clearly demonstrates that the imposition of a mandatory waiting period is not warranted. The waiver system is used on those rare occasions when a suitable vessel cannot be found as a result of the canvassing of the domestic trade. In most cases, the applicant has contacted existing Canadian operators prior to the filing of the application. The length of time required to process an application will depend on the specific circumstances of each application. In some cases, the availability or nonavailability of a Canadian ship can be ascertained to all parties' satisfaction within a short time given the wonders of modern communications technology. Therefore, there is no need to artificially frustrate commercial efficiency through the imposition of a mandatory waiting period.

At the committee hearings, many examples were provided through oral and written briefs outlining the difficulties which would result from the introduction of a 14-day clause in this bill. The Atlantic Provinces Transportation Commission, the Canadian Offshore Vessel Owners Association, the Council of Forest Industries, the Shipping Federation of Canada, and the Chamber of Shipping of British Columbia, all provided concrete examples of situations where a 14-day clause would frustrate commercial efficiency and reduce job opportunities for Canadian seafarers by impeding the use of specialized vessels not available in Canada. Their evidence was that this would result in lost trade opportunities because, if goods were not moved quickly enough, it would encourage the movement of goods by other modes.

Under the existing temporary entry system, which does not require a mandatory waiting period, over half of the temporary permits issued in 1991 involved jobs for Canadian seafarers. The evidence indicates that, rather than provide more job opportunities for Canadian seafarers, the proposed 14-day clause would likely eliminate job opportunities.

The main argument for a 14-day clause appears to be a concern that the waiver system will be abused by the NTA administrators, and insufficient time will be allowed to determine whether a Canadian ship is suitable and available to undertake a specific activity. There appears to be a misconception that, if someone asks for a waiver tomorrow, he will get it. In fact, in 1991, the average time taken by the National Transportation Agency to determine whether a suitable Canadian ship was available was eighteen days. Only seven applications were approved in seven days or less and, in those cases, the unavailability of a Canadian ship had been clearly demonstrated prior to approval. Flexibility is necessary to deal with the unique circumstances associated with each application.

There are provisions in the bill to deal with any potential abuses. The bill provides the Governor in Council with regulation- making powers to describe the criteria under which a licence will be issued and to limit the number of vessels receiving coasting licenses. If abuses were to be identified, such regulation-making powers could be used to correct the situation.

Therefore, we cannot support the introduction of a 14-day clause because of our desire to avoid introducing measures which frustrate commercial efficiency and impede Canadian competitiveness. That is exactly what the 14-day clause would do.

Finally, I will speak on the third amendment, which is the requirement for a ship registry, hearings, and publication of licenses.

The requirement to establish a ship registry as proposed would be a duplication of the information system which already exists at the National Transportation Agency. The existing system works well to ensure that potential Canadian operators are advised of any request to use foreign ships. Clauses 9 and 10 of Bill C-33 deal specifically with the information requirements of the agency, and additional bureaucratic systems are not necessary.

The proposal to conduct a hearing when requested by an interested person would unnecessarily frustrate the efficiency of a system that is working very well. However, Bill C-33 further strengthens the agency's accountability by making it responsible and accountable for the determination of the suitability and availability of Canadian ships. This provision, which is found in clause 8, should satisfy any concerns about accountability for decisions. Those are my comments on the amendments themselves.

I want to correct one impression Senator Graham may have left with his statement that Canadian ships had absolute exclusivity in the waters west of Anticosti before 1987. I will demonstrate that that is incorrect.

In 1987 the Canada Shipping Act was amended to allow exemptions for foreign ships if no Canadian ship was available. Prior to 1987, exemptions were allowed for foreign ships through an Order in Council which had been passed on an annual basis since 1973. Prior to 1973, each license issued to a foreign ship required a specific Order in Council.

This system proved unworkable, particularly during the 1973 energy crises when foreign ships were urgently required to carry oil from the west coast to the east coast. Therefore exemptions to allow foreign ships in the waters west of Anticosti existed long before 1987. The only change that occurred in 1987 was the provision of the enabling mechanism to deal with these exemptions.

Finally, honourable senators, one question often asked during the hearings was: Who does benefit from Bill C-33? Let me briefly answer that question.

Although the bill attempts to find a delicate balance between the diverse needs of Canadian shipowner-seafarer and Canadian shipper-consumer interests, there is no question that the bill provides substantial benefits for Canadian shipowners and seafarers over the existing regime.

The bill extends the coasting trade to include exploration and exploitation activities above the Continental Shelf.

In committee, many witnesses expressed concern about a lack of control of offshore activities. Addressing this concern is precisely what the bill is intended to do: Provide better protection for Canadian offshore activities. The bill extends the definition of coasting trade to include all commercial marine activities in Canadian waters, activities which are presently not covered. The bill provides specific powers to the Governor in Council to limit the number of coasting licenses and restrict the conditions under which they are issued if this becomes necessary.

The bill places additional restrictions on the use of foreign passenger ships in the Great Lakes Seaway system. It also eliminates a preferential treatment for British ships in Canadian waters on the east and west coasts.

The bill clarifies the definition of "coasting trade" to include the carriage of goods by ship, or by ship and any other mode of transport, from one place in Canada to any other place in Canada, either directly or by way of a place outside of Canada, so that any movement of goods through another country is still part of Canada's coasting trade.

I think we can agree that all these changes are for the benefit of Canadian shipowners and seafarers, therefore we urge rejection of the report and, when the time comes, support of the bill at third reading.

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, I have no apologies to make. It was never my intention to destroy what is, for most purposes, a reasonably good bill. I set out merely to try to strengthen its provisions.

Nothing in these three amendments is substantive in nature. When asked, government officials repeatedly said that they could live with these amendments. They consistently said that the amendments were not necessary, and that what they attempted to effect is provided for in other parts of the act and in other pieces of legislation. Honourable senators, that may be so to a certain extent but the provisions proposed by these amendments are not found in the act itself, and it is the act which portrays Canadian attitude and philosophy with respect to our coasting practices.

Honourable senators, I believe these amendments should be included in the bill because our legislation will then send a message to the world which more correctly portrays the Canadian perspective.

If, as the honourable senator has suggested, the act is so good that, for example, it provides for excluding foreign ships, and so on, then why not spell it out in the act? This is about the fourth time this act has been re-written since 1968—that is, since the days of the Darling Report. I had the privilege of participating in the development of the legislation to this point. I thought that its predecessor, Bill C-52, was a rather good act. I was sorry to see it die on the on the Order Paper. It included the provisions that we are now attempting to place back into the law, particularly with respect to the 14-day period.

We have been told that it takes an average of 17 or 18 days—in exceptional cases it can be done a lot sooner—to determine whether or not a suitable vessel is available for the work at hand. We are just asking for 14 days.

The purpose of the 14 days is to serve notice that this is not a rubber stamp process. Indeed, you have to demonstrate, first, your need; second, that you did not wait for the opportune moment, like the day before you wanted the vessel, before applying for a waiver; and, third, that there were no suitable ships available. I mean that in the specialized sense, in the sense of activity on the Seaway, and with respect to specialized activity like the movement of salt. I do not consider the movement of bulk cargo such as oil and grain, except through the Seaway, to be specialized work. That is a general activity now. Most ships built for that general trade are quite convertible from liquid to bulk and other types of cargo. It makes it easy for companies to conveniently pre-position their ships at certain ports.

I hate to pick on the Irving Oil Company, but they are often set up as an example. I think they are less guilty than we sometimes portray them, but in the past they have been found to act very comfortably. In other words, in the past they have registered vessels offshore and kept them tied up in Saint John, New Brunswick, or in Halifax. These would be ships with perhaps Canadian officers but foreign crews. They would then apply for a waiver and, lo and behold, there would then happen to be one ship right there in the port and the waiver would be granted. That is the type of activity the 14-days' notice would attempt to correct.

It would be transparent, because another amendment that I moved would require that a registry of ships be put together and effectively operated by the National Transportation Agency in a way that was apparent to everybody—in other words, not only the shipowners, but also the crews and the unions.

The fact that 30 days after the granting of a waiver there would be a requirement to publish the details of that application and the granting of the waiver in the Canada Gazette provides a further protection. People engaged in seeking waivers would always know that someone was looking over their shoulders and that there was always a possibility that someone might just say, "You are not doing that quite correctly."

Senator Graham has touched on the four or five main points that preoccupied the committee during its hearings. I should like to try to point out my concerns to senators concerning these amendments, namely, the 14-day waiver notice and the provision that beyond 14 days a vessel with a foreign crew that was granted a waiver would then have to comply with Canadian law.

It remains a practice and fact that seamen on foreign registered vessels operating in Canadian waters do so with the tacit understanding of Revenue Canada, Employment and Immigration Canada and Labour Canada. The fact of the matter is that they are foreign nationals. They are aliens. They do not have Canadian work permits. Anyone else coming into Canada must comply with Canadian law before going to work here. That is fairly simple and fairly straightforward. Everyone recognizes and understands the reasons for that law and the need to comply with it. But not so the government with respect to seamen. They can come in and work at will for protracted periods. Sometimes these waivers last more than a year.

If foreign seamen are to be working in Canadian waters, enjoying the benefits of our country, and the protection of its laws and the health programs we have, as well as all of the other benefits, what is wrong with putting that in the act and making foreign owners and operators comply with Canadian law? They do not necessarily have to change crews all the time. That is not what we are suggesting. We are suggesting that they should have to comply with Canadian law and that the operators or the owners should have to demonstrate, to the satisfaction of the Canadian authorities, that these seamen are required and that there are no Canadians to fill those jobs. I do not see anything wrong with that at all. As a matter of fact, it would be of great benefit to Canadians.

Senator Graham mentioned at one point that it is a little ironic that, while the Americans, who have the enjoyment of the provisions of the Jones Act with respect to their coastal shipping, simply do not allow waivers of any kind except for emergency purposes governing the government's specialized activity, we, on the other hand, are making it a simple process. We are saying to the world that our country and our waters are open to commercial activity. We are saying, "Come and enjoy it and we will protect you." It is more than just the thin end of the wedge. The term "erosion of our sovereignty with respect to our three coasts" is very evident and apparent. Sooner or later someone will come along with a vessel that can transit the Seaway at significantly lower costs, obtaining waivers on the ground of suitability. But that suitability includes determination of costs. That is one of the criteria. A vessel for $50,000 a day may not be suitable when you only want a $10,000-a-day vessel, and that works in reverse. If I can transit the Seaway for a quarter of the cost today, then for economic reasons, that is probably the way I would want to go.

Honourable senators, we should protect against that possibility, and by staying with the bill as it was before being amended by the committee I think we are inviting a further decline in our sovereignty in this respect.

Honourable senators, the question is before us. It has been suggested that the report of the committee be rejected, and that the bill be voted upon. I must say, honourable senators, this is the first time in 27 years that I have found myself at such a distance from my legislative colleagues. However, I am pleased and proud to say to those who are interested and concerned that I have had an opportunity to speak for some Canadian seamen and officers and for their families in this regard. This is their livelihood; this is their life. If we do not speak for them, I do not know who will.

Honourable senators, I thank you for the privilege of this opportunity to make a few brief comments.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Oliver, seconded by the Honourable Senator Teed, that this report be adopted now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those Honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators opposed to the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, prior to his leaving the Chamber, my opposite number gave me his proxy. Therefore, he has agreed to a 20-minute bell.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It could be shorter than that, as far as we are concerned. If it is 20 minutes, that is fine.

Senator Kelly: What we want to do is get an indication of your total strength today, so we thought 20 minutes would do.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, there will be a 20-minute bell. Please call in the senators.

The Senate adjourned to the call of the bell.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave now.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in view of the fact that we will be having Royal Assent this afternoon, I am prepared to grant leave. There is nothing to prevent a senator from debating third reading or from proposing amendments, if such is the wish.

The Hon. The Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(b), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Rossiter, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cochrane, that this bill be read the third time now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Molgat: On division.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION ACT

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kinsella, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kelly, for the third reading of Bill C-82, An Act to amend the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act and the National Housing Act and to amend another Act in consequence thereof.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday I said that I wanted to make some comments about Bill C-82 on the particular subject of co-ops; that is, cooperative housing. I have been building a file on the subject of cooperative housing for some time. Overnight and this morning I had the chance to review it. I found that much of the material was very handily synopsized by one of the items I had in the file, to wit, an address by a colleague in the House of Commons, Mr. Joe Fontana, the Liberal housing critic. He made this speech on June 6, 1992, in Winnipeg. I shall not read the speech, but I should like to excerpt some of his comments and, in particular, some of the facts he put on the record about co-op housing.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Order.

Senator Frith: I am sure we all feel the same when we are making a speech: We do not really expect our colleagues to listen to us, but we do appreciate it if they do not compete with us.

At any rate, honourable senators, on the subject of co-op housing, according to material I have just referred to, the record appears to support quite eloquently the fact that this federal government is not dedicated to, or even interested in, providing affordable housing. If anything, it wants to vacate the field. In doing so, the government is ignoring the fact that co-operative housing is 40 per cent cheaper to operate than subsidized rental housing, ignoring the fact that 164,000 taxpayers are currently on waiting lists for co-op housing, and ignoring the fact that the co-op program has successfully delivered low-cost housing to specific groups with specialized needs, such as seniors, recent immigrants, aboriginals, the disabled and single parents.

Co-operative projects, honourable senators, are mixed income communities, not, as some have described them, "ghetto housing". Ironically, this government is also ignoring its own statements and analysis of this program. Minister Elmer MacKay some time ago announced that he would renew the social housing and co-op housing program with a budget of $6.1 million. In announcing his decision the minister said in a press release of just a few months ago, December 17, 1991:

> The revised program will make more effective use of scarce tax dollars, ensuring federal subsidies are fully directed towards a mix of low- and moderate-income families.

But the government soon reneged on that promise when the Minister of Finance, Mr. Mazankowski, in the House on March 11 said:

> How is it that it is well targeted when 50 per cent of those who occupy these units are not in effect qualified under the provisions of social housing?

Mr. Mazankowski, it seems to me, revealed an ignorance of the co-op program, because he failed to realize that this same 50 per cent of the occupants pay market rents for their co-ops. These units are not subsidized. So here was the government praising the co-op program a few months ago, and now the Minister of Finance is making excuses for eliminating the successful and cost effective program.

What makes the government look even more hypocritical is its refusal to allow proposed co-op housing developments to access the financing mechanism that has made them so financially cost effective. The ILM, the indexed-linked mortgage, was developed for co-op housing, and the federal government's own evaluation concluded that ILM encourages the lowest possible financing cost. The ILM financing mechanism apparently was also available for non-federally subsidized co-ops. When the government eliminated the federal co-op housing program it also eliminated the ILM. Therefore, one of the most innovative mechanisms ever offered by the government to reduce financing costs was terminated without any consideration for the consequences. The elimination of ILM appears to be just a spiteful act on the part of the government calculated to prevent co-op housing from being delivered by any other group.

The government appears to be what is sometimes described as the dog in the manger, the metaphor being that the dog in the manger does not eat the hay but stays there to prevent the horse from eating it. The federal government appears to have a hidden agenda for cancelling the co-op housing program and cutting off what was its lifeblood, which in fact had been provided by this government. So, step by step, the government has been progressively eliminating the federal role in housing through the budgetary process, but not through constitutional dialogue.

In the initial proposals released in the document entitled, "Shaping Canada's Future Together", the government indicated it was willing to withdraw its participation in the housing sector. At a convention of the Conservative Party last August, members sent such a message to their leadership when they passed a resolution that discouraged the government from pursuing policies that would create access to affordable housing.

The government is effecting constitutional change in practice, as I mentioned earlier, by appearing to want to withdraw from the field through the budgetary process rather than through a constitutional dialogue that addresses the concerns and needs of the provinces and of Canadians generally. By eliminating co-op housing the government is ignoring the need for fixed income housing and therefore ignoring its responsibility to create healthy Canadian communities.

By cutting housing expenditures so severely, the government is abdicating its responsibility to provide adequate and affordable shelter to Canadians. The recent budget slashed funds for new social housing units by over 50 per cent in the next three years. The cut will cost low-income seniors, families and disabled persons at least 25,000 homes in the next five years. In addition, 50 thousand low-income households will not get the money they need to improve their substandard houses. This will also result in the loss of approximately 35,000 jobs and about $2 billion of housing construction across Canada over a five-year period.

It seems to me that we do not need legislation that prevents the delivery of effective housing such as co-op housing. We do need a government that will spend the little bit required to encourage this country's most positive housing program, namely, cooperative housing.

That is the bad news about this bill. However, there is good news in this bill, but that good news is the government can exploit to partially solve the bad-news scenario I have just outlined.

Passage of this bill will mean that the CMHC will be permitted to lend directly, thereby cutting out the middleman. This will amount to an approximately 1.5 per cent saving. In response to questions asked by my office, I am told that saving will amount to $150 million of present budgets. If that is so, the government should reinvest that $150 million into social housing, especially co-op housing. In my opinion, that would be the best-possible and biggest-by-far bang it could get for those bucks.

Hon. Pat Carney: I would like to reply to the remarks made by Senator Frith. The points he raised are extremely interesting. We mutually support the concept of co-op housing and social housing. However, some of his concerns are not adequately linked to our need to target the funding for truly low-income Canadians.

Passage of this bill will eliminate the co-op Index Linked Mortgage Program. That program uses an innovative financing instrument called the "Index Linked Mortgage" which is, basically, a loan on which monthly payments of principal and interest rise over time with inflation, less 2 per cent. Therefore, the payments are less.

Federal funding assistance is provided to fill the gap between the cost of operating the project and the occupancy paid by co-op members. About 50 per cent of the units in the co-op ILM projects are targeted to low-income households which receive additional funding assistance under the Rent Supplement Program. Of course, the remaining 50 per cent are moderate-income households.

Basically, given the deficit situation and the tough economic realities, the provisions in this bill try to target scarce resources exclusively at those in greatest need.

It act provided assistance for cooperative housing to promote security of tenure for households unable to access home ownership, but today clients of the program who are moderate-income households do have more opportunities to access affordable, decent housing on the private market through such instruments as lower interest rates and the use of the RRSPs.

Low-income Canadians who cannot access decent, affordable and suitable housing in the private market will continue to be assisted through the ongoing Social Housing Program. That is a very important point. Co-op projects will continue to be available under the totally targeted non-profit housing program for those Canadians in need; and the federal government will continue to support the 14,800 units which have already been built under the co-op ILM program. Low-income households living in the ILM co-ops will continue to be supported under the Rent Supplement Program.

Senator Frith's suggestion about using the savings to finance social housing is certainly worth examination. I would certainly be prepared to make that recommendation to the minister.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, may I have leave to make a short additional intervention?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: I would thank Senator Carney for adding some important facts to this debate, and particularly for her comment about considering using the savings effected by this bill to finance social housing.

For the reasons I mentioned, namely, the good parts of this bill, and because of what Senator Carney has said, I believe we should support the passage of this bill.

ENERGY EFFICIENCY BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson moved the third reading of Bill C-41, respecting the energy efficiency of energy-using products and the use of alternative energy sources.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT BILL

THIRD READING—DEBATE SUSPENDED

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer moved the third reading of Bill C-13, to establish a federal environmental assessment process.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources which studied this bill, I would like to speak to it. I will be speaking to it in the context of the report that the committee has presented on the bill. With your patience and indulgence, honourable senators, I have a rather long speech. It is in your hands as to whether or not you wish to hear the whole of it.

To begin with, I should like to thank the witnesses who appeared before the committee. They were 15 in number, not including the federal minister and officials from the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office.

I would also like to thank the honourable senators, some of whom are permanent members of the committee and some are not, for the patience and courtesy they showed me during the proceedings on Bill C-13. They were lengthy and, in some cases, contentious. Throughout, the courtesy of honourable senators was appreciated and made all our work a lot easier.

At the same time as I thank honourable senators I would also thank those who supported the committee, in particular, Monique Hébert from the Library of Parliament, who spent the weekend working on the report that is before the Senate and which I now intend to address. I should mention as well the Clerk of the committee who also worked on the weekend. Throughout the process of the hearings on Bill C-13, we had good support from those assigned to the committee.

Bill C-13 replaces the existing federal environmental assessment regime, commonly known as the EARP Guidelines, or the guidlines order. This was an order implemented by Order in Council under the official name Environmental Assessment and Review Process Guidelines Order.

Since its implementation in 1984, this guidelines order has given rise to a number of court challenges aimed at compelling the relevant federal authorities, be it the federal ministers of transport, fisheries and oceans or some other minister, to conduct an environmental assessment in accordance with the guidelines order before taking whatever steps they are required to take under the laws they administer. This could be, for example, an obligation of the minister of transport to conduct an environmental assessment before granting approval under the federal Navigable Waters Protection Act in relation to the construction of a dam on a waterway governed by that act.

There has been, in the past, some reluctance on the part of the relevant federal decision-makers to comply with the guidelines order and to conduct an environmental assessment on a systematic basis. One reason for this reluctance was that the guidelines order was considered to be a mere administrative directive instead of a legally binding obligation. Consequently, there was some resistance on the part of the federal authorities to conduct these environmental assessments, particularly where "primarily provincial" projects were at issue.

Environmentalists, however, viewed the guidelines order in a different light. In the hope of blocking projects they opposed, they launched court actions to compel federal authorities to live up to their obligations under the guidelines order and conduct the requisite assessment.

The environmentalists were victorious in the end. In a judgment handed down in April, 1989, by the Federal Court, Trial Division, in the case of Canadian Wildlife Federation v. Canada, the Canadian Wildlife Federation succeeded in obtaining a court order compelling the federal minister of the environment to conduct an environmental assessment in relation to the Rafferty and Alameda Dam projects in the Province of Saskatchewan. This judgment was upheld on appeal by the Federal Court of Appeal, but was not appealed further.

In a more recent case, the courts were again asked to order the relevant federal authorities to conduct an assessment under the guidelines order. This case was launched by the Friends of the Oldman River Dam Society which was seeking to block the construction of a dam on the Oldman River in the Province of Alberta. Unlike the previous case, however, this case went to the Supreme Court of Canada.

In a far-reaching judgment handed down on January 23 of this year, the Supreme Court ruled that the guidelines order had the force of law and had to be complied with in all cases to which it applied. More significantly, however, the court also held that it was constitutionally permissible for the federal government to enact laws in relation to the environment even though these might incidentally encroach upon areas of provincial jurisdiction.

It is perhaps not an exaggeration to state that this judgment sent shockwaves through the Canadian environmental community. By establishing that the federal government could carry out environmental assessments on projects that involved an area of federal responsibility, the Oldman case was hailed as a landmark decision by environmentalists. On the other hand, it brought home the fact to all governments that the federal government could, legitimately, conduct environmental assessments on any project over which it had some jurisdiction, even though these projects might be "primarily provincial" in nature.

It is within this context that Bill C-13 was referred to the Senate committee. It should be stressed, however, that although the bill came to us only recently, it is by no means a bill that was pulled together at the eleventh hour in response to the court challenges that were launched under the guidelines order. In fact, the bill had its genesis in the April, 1989, Speech from the Throne. At that time, the Government of Canada announced its intention to reform and provide a statutory foundation for its environmental assessment process.

Bill C-13 was introduced in the House of Commons as Bill C-78 in 1990. Although Bill C-78 died on the Order Paper when Parliament was prorogued in May of 1991, it was reinstated as Bill C-13 in the new session of Parliament.

Taking its predecessor into account, Bill C-13 has now been before Parliament for two years. It is far from perfect. It is a controversial piece of legislation that has been universally criticized. No one seems to be entirely satisfied with this bill. The reasons for dissatisfaction, however, are as varied as there are provisions in the bill. Some believe it does not go far enough, whereas others believe it goes too far.

There is little question that when viewed in isolation, Bill C-13 is a difficult piece of legislation to support. To begin with, it was challenged on constitutional grounds by several groups that appeared before us. In addition, the Quebec Minister of the Environment, from whom we had the privilege of hearing, strenuously objected to the clause in the bill that would allow federal environmental assessments to be carried out on "primarily provincial" projects simply because the project might receive some measure of federal financing.

The committee was sympathetic to these concerns. Indeed, we recognized that the scope of this bill is very broad, for it could potentially apply to any number of projects that touched upon some area of federal responsibility, however incidentally, when looked at in terms of the project as a whole.

In the end, however, the committee was not satisfied that this controversial "spending trigger", as it has come to be known, or any of the other measures that could trigger an environmental assessment under the bill were, per se, unconstitutional. In coming to that conclusion, we relied quite heavily on the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in the Oldman River case. In addition, we received conflicting legal opinions on this issue from the legal witnesses who appeared before us. Groups like the Centre Québecois du droit de l'environment and the Quebec Bar Association clearly indicated that, in their opinion, the impugned measures were constitutionally unobjectionable.

Another factor that weighed heavily on the committee's deliberations on this issue was the fact that the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment, CCME, which outlined its outstanding concerns with the bill in a letter that was forwarded to my attention as committee chairman, did not at any time challenge the bill on constitutional grounds.

This is not to say that the CCME gave the bill a ringing endorsement. On the contrary, it expressed disappointment that its recommended changes had not been acted upon. It did not, however, take issue with the bill on constitutional grounds. This fact was most significant in the committee's collective mind.

The committee recognizes that there is room for honest disagreement on this question. Based on the submissions received, however, we could not agree that the bill was ultra vires the Parliament of Canada.

There is little question that Bill C-13 is politically sensitive because it has the potential to be a far-reaching and invasive instrument. As was pointed out to us in evidence, however, the real constitutional problem lies not with the bill itself but with the underlying division of powers on which it is based. Obviously Bill C-13 cannot be expected to resolve ongoing controversy over the constitutional division of powers. As we all know, this crucial issue is being debated in another forum. Bill C-13 would not seem to be the proper vehicle for raising any differences that may exist in this regard.

From a practical point of view, the committee was extremely concerned about the submissions made with respect to the bill's potential for duplication of process. Underscoring the breadth of projects that could be subject to environmental review under this bill, witness after witness from the business sector and industry were deeply concerned about the fact that two sets of environmental assessments might have to be carried out in relation to the same project, one at the federal level and one at the provincial level.

Duplication of process was also a major concern with the CCME. In order to avoid the potential for duplication of process, the CCME proposed a twofold amendment to the bill. One of the amendments—termed "a cooperative scoping mechanism"—required that as regards projects involving both levels of government, the relevant authorities would have to get together beforehand to determine how best to handle the environmental assessment under the circumstances.

The other amendment—the equivalency clause—would have enabled the federal minister of the environment, in cases of joint review, to transfer all or part of the federal assessment to the other jurisdiction, provided the latter's assessment process met the federal standards.

[Senator Hays.]

While making it clear that adoption of the foregoing amendments were still its option of choice, the CCME indicated that the provincial and territorial governments were currently working with the federal government to establish bilateral agreements that would reflect a consistent environmental assessment relationship across the country. It would have made our job much easier, honourable senators, if that task had been completed before having to deal with this bill because we were told that, together with the regulations, which we have not seen, those agreements would address many of the concerns we heard.

The CCME must be commended for its constructive approach. Rather than digging in its heels and insisting that its proposed amendments be adopted, it seems intent on making the best of the situation by working with, instead of against, the federal government in order to make the system work. Obviously, it is in no one's interests that two environmental assessments be carried out in relation to the same project.

While the CCME's two-prong proposal appealed to a number of members of the committee, the fact is that the federal government decided against this approach. However, in our view, a cooperative approach in this difficult area is crucial. Every effort must therefore be made by all parties concerned to include these bilateral agreements at the earliest opportunity. If this were done, many of the problems raised by witnesses, as I said before, would be resolved.

Given the bill's broad scope and its concomitant potential for applying to a wide range of primarily provincial projects, it is equally important that, in negotiating these bilateral agreements, the federal government be aware of and be as sensitive as possible to the concerns the provinces have in relation to projects coming primarily within their jurisdiction.

The broad regulation-making powers that cabinet would have under Bill C-13 were also an area of serious concern to the committee. In this regard, the bill only provides a general outline of the types of projects that might be subject to review. The regulations, however, will set out in detail which projects will actually be subject to review and what type of review will have to be carried out in relation to these projects.

Since so much would, in fact, be determined by regulation, it is not surprising that so many witnesses warned that, by adopting this bill, Parliament would be signing a blank cheque. This remark hit home. Bill C-13 constitutes yet another example of where legislation is defined not by Parliament, where it should be, but by executive action. Unfortunately, the regulatory approach to law-making seems to be a growing trend with the federal government. Needless to say, the committee is deeply concerned about this because we are basically being asked to sign a bill of goods without having seen them.

Hon. John Stewart: I am reminded, honourable senators, of a book published in about 1928 by Lord Hewart. It was entitled The New Despotism, and it dealt precisely with the supplanting of statutes law by Orders in Council, a practice that this government has recently taken up with great zeal.

Senator Frith: They are born despots so it is not surprising.

Senator Hays: All governments seem to think that governments will never change, and historically that has proven to be wrong in almost every instance. That is one of the reasons I have raised this issue. To an extent, Parliament's role is diminished and that brings upon us other problems.

Bill C-13 is an extremely controversial project. A major reason for this is that no one knows for certain what will eventually be set out in the regulations. Even if these regulations had been tabled in final draft form before the committee, we all know that a modification to them is only a cabinet order away.

The bill's uncertain scope has been one of the most controversial aspects of the proposed legislation. Surely it would have been better and wiser if the most important of the regulations, such as the law list, had been set out in an appendix to the legislation—the law list being one of the features of the bill, specifically contained in clause 5, which sets out the general types of projects subject to automatic review under the legislation.

Hon. the Acting Speaker: I regret to inform Senator Hays that his time has expired.

Senator Hays: Mr. Speaker, I do not have much more to add.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that Senator Hays have leave to complete?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hays: The only positive comment that can be made in relation to this regulatory approach to law-making is that the federal government has set up a regulatory advisory committee to assist it in drafting the important regulations. This advisory committee is comprised of, among others, representatives from the provincial and territorial governments, the business sector, industry and environmentalists.

Before this bill can be proclaimed into force, a number of these regulations must be completed, given that they are essential to the bill's application. Under the circumstances, the committee recommended that these be drafted with all due dispatch and that the federal government remain sensitive to the concerns of the members of the advisory committee. As these regulations will define in greater detail the actual scope of the bill, the concerns of the provinces and of the territories should be accommodated to the greatest extent possible.

The final point I would like to touch upon involves the inconsistencies in the English and French versions of the bill. I am not going to say very much about it because I know other colleagues, on both sides, will have some comments. In the interests of time, I will simply leave it to them to express concerns about some egregious errors in the legislation in terms of, as I see it, simply not dealing with changes as between the French and English versions of the bill. As honourable senators will know, there was an attempt in committee to amend the report to ensure that these would be dealt with.

To conclude, Bill C-13 has been before Parliament for two years. There has been considerable public consultation on this bill. There are concerns, some of which I have touched upon. If I wanted to, and with your indulgence, I could go on at considerable length in dealing with these concerns in some detail. However, I have touched on the important ones that come to mind.

Honourable senators, I will conclude my remarks at this point and thank honourable senators for their patience during the meetings of the committee. In conclusion, I see lots of room for improvement in this bill. It is an extremely important area where we are breaking new ground. One of the witnesses said to the members of the committee that the world has changed; it will never be the same, with environmental issues now playing a role in not only bio-physical decisions but also economic decisions, and combinations of the two.

Another concern expressed by many people is that the bill provides that we take into consideration in an environmental review not only the environment alone but also the cumulative effects of a particular project on other environmental issues that may not be directly related to the project, as well as on certain economic issues in terms of alternatives. This has given rise to understandable and valid concerns on the part of the provinces. I expect, honourable senators, that on this bill we may hear other comments from other honourable senators, in particular from the government side on this issue.

Having said that, I see the need for the legislation. We will have to learn on the job, as it were, to deal with this important, new problem that we are faced with, namely, the environment; how to deal with it and how to ensure that what we do will preserve our environment in keeping with the general public feeling of this time, much of which had its roots in the Bruntland Commission Report and the idea of sustainable development for the future of the world.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, we are considering a very important bill, a bill dealing with the environment. I think that each of us should care deeply about this planet of ours and pass on to future generations a nice place to live in, a place with a quality of life.

I have had substantial concern for the environment for a number of years now. That is why I sat on the Standing Committee on Energy, Environment and Natural Resources until just recently.

Needless to say that legislation must be made in that area. That is why I support the principle of this bill. I did participate to the best of my abilities, as I should, to the work of the Committee on this issue. I have heard many testimonies and asked many questions. I also made the best suggestions I could think of.

The report before us reflects the many concerns of members and witnesses. I will not discuss again the content of the report that Senator Hays has done his best to explain given the time he had. I would imagine that those of you who have not already had, will make a point of skimming through it.

The fact that a committee of the stature of the one to which this bill was referred to concluded its report by mentioning, in the last paragraphs, the need to find out if the cup is half full or half empty expresses clearly the situation approving this bill puts us into.

Of course, language is among the weak points of this bill. Should the French version of this bill prevail or was the bill originally drafted in English? There are so many incredible discrepancies that one could almost wonder if, on the other side of this House and in the other place, the government members even had the time to read through it.

On two occasions, the Minister of the Environment testified before us and we were given assurances that the minister will promptly remedy to this situation. Aside from this major flaw, I think we should take the word of the minister for it and believe that the appropriate corrections will be made to this bill.

As for the rest, Senator Hays mentioned of course that a lot of corrections were needed. It seems to us that no effort was made to give it a second try so to speak. A little effort could have brought a much needed consensus between the parties.

That is why, honourable senators, to make clear how important this bill is in my opinion and the need for these bills to be well-thought-out by the time they get to us, which calls for pre-study if need be to avoid this kind of situation, I will have no choice but to abstain from voting when this bill is read for the third time. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Claude Castonguay: Honourable senators, I would like to add my comments on this bill before we proceed with the final stage. From the committee report Senator Hays presented this morning, it is clear that this bill contains numerous weaknesses. What we have before us is legislation that was poorly drafted.

Like all my colleagues in this House, I would imagine, I am in favour of the principle of the bill. I have no hesitation on that score.

Among the bill's weaknesses there is one I feel is particularly serious. As a minister I was a member of the Quebec government for a number of years. I have also been anobserver of the political scene for more than 30 years, and one of my conclusions has been that the federal government's use of its spending power to encroach on areas of provincial jurisdiction is the factor which has contributed most to all the conflicts we have seen between the Government of Quebec and the federal government and, in some instances, between the federal government and other provincial governments.

[Senator Poitras.]

This morning I saw in the newspapers that a professor at the University of Victoria, who had just published a study, had reached exactly the same conclusion that the federal government's exaggerated use of its spending power was instrumental in making federalism what it is today.

I would also say that this use of its spending power put the federal government in its present disastrous financial situation. However, that is not specifically relevant to this bill.

Personally, I think it is a serious mistake that clause 5 of the bill should open the way for the government to intervene, on the basis of its contribution to certain projects, and impose its own environmental assessment process.

Past experience has shown that federal officials will want to use that power, although the minister has assured us his intentions were honourable and has tried to reassure us. Experience has shown that probably, officials will soon want to maximize the authority conferred under the bill. And we will most certainly go through another series of conflicts and duplications of process, often at the expense of the private sector.

I think my point is clear. I don't think further explanations would be useful, and in any case, others have argued the same point before the committee, including the Quebec Environment Minister.

As was pointed out by Senator Poitras, there are discrepancies between the English and French versions. Some of these are minor, but in several cases, there are discrepancies that would require amendments. These are not simply corrections to improve the wording. There are discrepancies that must be corrected by introducting amendments.

If I understood correctly, the minister promised these changes would be made some time this fall.

I hope that if the minister introduces amendments to harmonize both versions of the bill, he will also propose an amendment similar to the one suggested by Senator Beaudoin when the bill was considered in committee. The similar amendment would ensure that the bill would be limited, as I think it should be, to establishing a framework for environmental assessments in areas under federal jurisdiction.

I don't think an amendment of this kind could be considered contentious. I am afraid I disagree with the minister when he says that the slightest amendment an unbalance the entire bill so that it could not adopted.

Since I do not wish to delay the bill's adoption, as I do not wish to be misinterpreted as my colleague Senator Carney seems to have done, judging from a report in the media, it is certainly not my intention nor the intention of my colleagues to obstruct this bill.

Instead of voting against the bill on third reading, as I felt I must do, I would rather abstain, as will Senator Poitras and some of my colleagues. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I think Senator Stewart would like to ask a question, so I will yield to the senator.

• (1230)

[English]

Hon. John B. Stewart: Would Senator Castonguay permit a question, please, for clarification?

Senator Castonguay: Certainly.

Senator Stewart: I thank the honourable senator for his willingness to do so.

I need some help. The honourable senator said that he would be in favour of an amendment to the bill—or if this bill is now enacted, to the act later on—to the effect that the act is to apply only to areas under the legislative jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada. I should have thought that to be an absolute presupposition of all federal legislation. It hardly needs to be stated that if a provision goes beyond the legislative jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, insofar as it goes beyond it will be ultra vires the Parliament of Canada. In other words, the amendment would seem to be painting the lily.

I cannot believe that I understand correctly what Senator Castonguay has said. I must have misheard him. Will he help me on this point?

Senator Castonguay: I understand what you are saying, senator. I will try to explain, and possibly Senator Beaudoin, who introduced the amendment in the committee and who is a constitutionalist, may be allowed to intervene on this question.

My point is that there are areas that are clearly of federal jurisdiction. It is to these areas that the bill or the legislation should apply. It should not apply to areas of provincial jurisdiction by the mere fact that the federal government may be spending money on a project in order to make the evaluation. In other words, if a project comes under provincial jurisdiction, the provincial government should make the evaluation; if it comes under federal jurisdiction, the federal government should do so. The fact that the federal government spends money in connection with a project should not allow it to intervene if that project is under provincial jurisdiction.

There are obviously projects where the two governments will be involved jointly or have joint jurisdiction. That has happened in the past. That was explained in committee—the minister made this very clear that in these cases, the objective will be to agree on one evaluation instead of having the two governments act. This is what I meant. I hope that is clear.

Senator Stewart: In other words, if the amendment had been made there would be a limit on what the Government of Canada could do under this law in virtue of the constitutional spending power?

Senator Murray: No.

Senator Castonguay: I do not think this bill should limit the spending power of the federal government. However, it should clarify the application of the bill in cases where the federal government is spending some money.

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. In his remarks, Senator Castonguay made reference to comments that I had allegedly made about his comments.

I strongly support this bill within the parameters that Senator Hays has laid out, and I strongly disagree with Senator Castonguay. However, I want to assure the chamber that I have never, in print or otherwise, commented publicly on Senator Castonguay's view. I may do so in the future, but I have not done so to this point.

Senator Molgat: He was just anticipating.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I am rising to speak. However, if the Honourable Senator Spivak is rising to put a question, I will yield.

Senator Spivak: I, too, wish to speak but I will yield to the Honourable Senator Corbin and speak after he does.

Senator Corbin: I should like to speak now because His Honour the Speaker has recognized me, according to the new rules.

I wish to speak in English before I get under way. I have in my hand a document which contains the list of errors, misprints and inconsistencies that have been identified in the text of the bill that is before us, and which was the object of a motion in the committee to the effect that the committee adopt the recommendations for modifications to the bill. Unfortunately, the motion was defeated.

This document is dated June 8, 1992 and it is stamped "secret". I do not know how it got into the hands—

Senator Murray: Arrest that man!

Senator Corbin: No one can arrest me in this house. I enjoy parliamentary privilege.

I suppose the document came into our hands because of the fact that at some point in time it ceased to be a secret, but someone forget to erase the stamp. The members of the committee were well aware of these comments and proposals. However, the motion was defeated.

There is one note that I would like to read because I consider it very important. Many people do not understand the manner in which laws are drafted at the federal level in the Department of Justice. Note 1 on this document states:

> The French version is not meant to be a translation of the English version, but rather a stand-alone version in its own right. Consequently, one can expect some variation between the two versions, provided they capture the same meaning and convey the same idea.

That is a very important statement. I believe that it has yet to sink into the minds of many people in this place that the French text of proposed legislation, of bills, is not strictly a translation of the English. Neither is the English strictly a translation of the French in cases where the draft bill has been originally drafted in French. They stand in their own right on their own merit.

Therefore, I find offensive the suggestion that we can pass the bill even with the defects, most of which seem to appear in the French text. I find it doubly offensive in view of the statement I have quoted, and in view of the fact that we have an Official Languages Act in this country.

I also find it offensive for another reason. This second chamber has the role, the mandate, the duty to revise, to re-examine, to reflect on and, if need be, amend legislation which comes to us from the other place. It is rather astonishing that this bill arrived here in such a defective form, either in the English or in the French version. There are defects in both texts, some of which are not simply typing, spelling or syntactical errors. They are fundamental flaws.

In some instances, the French version and the English version are not the same as to meaning. Although there are other examples I could point to in support of what I advocate, let me refer you to this one instance. I am reading from this "secret" document.

Pertaining to the five-year review, clause 72(1) of the French version refers to "Committee of the House" and the English version refers to "the Minister". That is quite a distinction. Is it the minister or is it a committee of the house that is concerned here? Is it Parliament or the minister, solely and singly, who will keep counsel for himself, and will parliamentarians have an opportunity to voice their views?

I find it totally unacceptable to allow that type of fundamental discrepancy to be printed in a bill which His Excellency the Governor General, or his representative, will be asked to sanction today.

It is also unacceptable for another reason, and here I speak of all of the suggested proposals for amendment: The province of Quebec, in particular, has expressed strong reservations about—— the substance of the bill, the purpose of the bill.

If there is one province for which we should pass laws in French for them to use and understand, if we really want their cooperation, I think we should have a French text that is completely free of flaws.

I am really ashamed that the Senate does such a thing; indeed, that Parliament tolerates such a situation! Either we have self-respect as French-speakers or we do not! The Province of Quebec is respected or it is not! The Official Languages Act of the federal government and of the Province of New Brunswick is respected or it is not! This is not the first time.

[Senator Corbin.]

Why must we French-speakers again have to put up with texts that contain mistakes? It is offensive! I am indignant that people take it for granted that we will always approve defective texts.

I have no major problems with the objectives of the bill. That is not what I want to discuss today. I come back, as I have many times in the past, to the quality of French texts, bills and legislation that's all.

Honourable senators, I believe that the committee erred by refusing to include the proposed amendments made when the bill was being considered in committee. I think that was a mistake.

I think that we should not miss the opportunity to return this bill with amendments to the House of Commons to show the members there the pile of mistakes that they let slip through in this bill. We must wonder whether they did a serious job or not.

Did the representatives of the French-speaking community in the House of Commons do their job? Did they avoid doing it? I really wonder.

An elected Upper House is proposed! If members in the other place do not have time to deal with the defects in the French version of legislation, do you think that elected senators will have more time? Where will they find the time?

I am also shocked (this is not a personal attack) that the minister of that department (whom I will not name) agreed to approve bills in such condition.

However, I accept that he promised the committee (twice, we are told) to introduce a bill in the fall to correct these errors, inconsistencies and contradictions between the two versions.

I think that we senators should have done so ourselves as members of the House that reviews legislation; we should have done so with full knowledge. I regret very much that we did not and I feel embarrassed about it.

Thank you, honourable senators.

Debate suspended.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in view of the hour I propose that we suspend the sitting until 2 o'clock, when we shall return and have tributes to Senator Leblanc, as agreed. Then there are a couple of minor items. There is a report which a committee chairman wishes to table, and there is a motion which I intend to put.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Before we continue with Bill C-13?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Yes, just to get them out of the way.

Senator Frith: Will you tell my colleague Senator Molgat what that means, please?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It is to allow the draft regulations under Bill C-81 to go a committee of the Senate. It is a requirement of the law and we should do that today.

Senator Frith: Definitely, but I do not think we should do it before we finish with Bill C-13.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I thought I would get it on board. I am in everyone's hands.

Senator Frith: In any event, you and Senator Molgat can work it out.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended.

At 2 p.m. the sitting of the Senate resumed.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT BILL

THIRD READING—DEBATE SUSPENDED

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I will only take a few moments to express my reservations, as did some of my colleagues, concerning Bill C-13.

You will remember that I had done so on April 8 in this very Chamber. Today as then, I agree with the principle of the bill. I think that no one in this chamber would disagree with a bill which attempts to correct a major flaw, the lack of legislation on the environment.

I then alluded to the possibility of federal encroachment on areas of provincial jurisdiction. The bill was indeed referred to a parliamentary committee in order to hear various opinions and to try to solve this contentious issue which seems to me all the more important in today's context as we discuss the new distribution of powers between both levels of government.

It would seem that we are having a hard time remembering the lessons of the past. We know full well that a great number of problems we are confronted with today in the Constitutional debate originate in this overlapping of responsibilities regardless of the jurisdiction of each level of government.

Two problems arise from this bill. The first one was alluded to by Senator Corbin and other colleagues on this side of the Chamber. It relates to the discrepancies between the French version of the bill and the English one.

There are about 30 mistakes, the vast majority of which are rather minor except for two. I must tell you that my concerns are shared by others, and in particular by Senator Chaput-Rolland who, as you know masters the French language much better than I do. One cannot but wonder how, after so many years of bilingualism in federal institutions, one can still find such mistakes, not typographical mistakes but really mistakes that could have far-reaching consequences.

In this regard, we got assurances that there is a process, a mechanism, to correct such things and I am convinced that it will be done. The second problem concerns section 5 of this bill which allows the federal government to encroach on areas of provincial jurisdiction.

First, I want to take this opportunity to thank senator Beaudoin who tried, with an amendment tabled in committee, to find a bench mark which seemed to me to be rather simple and easy, namely that the provisions of section 5 should apply regarding provincial jurisdictions. The result was not what some of us from this side had hoped for.

In the circumstances, not only is there a principle at stake with the issue of possible intrusion, but I also fear that, on a practical level, the federal government is not creating problems that it could avoid if the Act was amended in the way suggested by senator Beaudoin.

Many of us here who have been involved at the provincial level know that very often, problems originate from these grey areas or this confusion in the division of powers. I would say that up to a point, because we should not exagerate, I was a victim of that confusion in the field of health and social services. I imagine that the same thing could happen in this case; moreover, knowing human nature and the tendancy to challenge governmental decisions, whether those decisions are made by a provincial or federal government, it is very easy to imagine that some lobby, industry or individual unhappy with a decision made at a certain level could ask the other level to intervene.

So, I regret that these changes were not made. I do hope that in this difficult constitutional context, this will not be yet another opportunity to make demands, often for political purposes or purely partisan motives. In spite of it all, this important bill for the environment will certainly be passed.

I would like to conclude with one last comment. I have always regretted, and I have never had the opportunity to say it until now, that some Quebec ministers have deemed appropriate to avoid taking part in any discussions on issueks that could have important consequences. It is true that the Quebec Minister of Environment appeared before the Senate Committee, but it may have been a bit late to convince his counterparts from the other provinces and get their support. I make a distinction between a minister and the leader of the government in Quebec who is obviously in a very different political arena.

In concluding, I once again express my regrets that senator Beaudoin's amendment could not be adopted, knowing full well that it would not be adopted today either. I will decide what I will do when the time comes to vote. In the last two months, I have consistently expressed reservations concerning some aspects of this bill.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

THE HONOURABLE JOHN BURDETT

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to draw your attention to the presence in the gallery of the Honourable John Burdett, Member of the Legislative Council of the South Australia Parliament and a member of the Legislative Review Committee of this Parliament.

THE HONOURABLE FERNAND-E. LEBLANC

TRIBUTES

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on July 1 of this year, when we celebrate the 125th anniversary of Canada, we will also celebrate the 75th birthday of Senator Fernand Leblanc.

However, in this day of celebration, we will experience some sadness because our dear friend, Senator Leblanc, will no longer sit in this House.

Senator Leblanc was born in Montreal in 1917. He studied at the Collège de Montréal and then at the Université de Montréal where he graduated as an accountant and got a B.A. in Science.

Senator Leblanc has been a prominent figure in the political arena for more than half a century. He was president of the Young Liberals as well as of the Liberal Association of Montréal-Mercier in 1939. The federal riding of Laurier benefited from his skills as an organizer during the 1953, 1957, 1958, 1962 and 1963 election campaigns.

He won five out of five. A perfect record. In baseball they would say: " he batted one thousand". If there had been a Fernand Leblanc in each riding in Canada, there would be no representation of Prime Minister Diefenbaker on Parliament Hill, giving this sullen look to Liberals when they approach Centre Block.

[English]

At age 43, Fernand Leblanc began his service as a public official when, in 1960, he was elected as city councillor at St. Hippolyte-Terrebonne. A by-election in 1964 sent Mr. Leblanc to the House of Commons. He was re-elected in the general election in 1965. In the House of Commons he was a member of committees dealing with housing, urban development and public works, immigration, Indian affairs and human rights, and citizenship, and quickly made a name for himself as a conscientious and hard worker.

On March 28, 1979, Fernand Leblanc became a senator after Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau recommended that he be summoned to the Senate. While his most famous service here has been as chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, he has been an attentive, dutiful and effective senator and a parliamentarian meriting praise, thanks and affection from all Canadians who know or have met him.

It is unfortunate that Senator Leblanc will not be available to us as the debate on the Constitution continues, particularly if the government decides to avail itself of the opportunity provided in Bill C-81 to hold a referendum. Senator Leblanc was the head of the "no" committee in the provincial riding of Mercier during the Quebec referendum in 1980. No doubt his reflections and advice would have been helpful here this time round; and I am sure they will be welcomed from outside the chamber.

In closing, I wish to quote from a statement Senator Leblanc made when he was called to the Senate. This quotation is from the Debates of the Senate of April 24, 1980.

[Translation]

> Honourable senators, the honour that is bestowed upon me also carries with it enormous responsibilities of which I am acutely aware. I will certainly make all the necessary efforts, not only to feel at home and familiarize myself with the very important work done in this House, but also to try to reach the level of competence of my predecessors and colleagues.

[English]

Honourable senators, today we pay tribute with our praise and thanks for Senator Leblanc's admirable fulfilment of that promise.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, next Wednesday, Canada Day, our friend and colleague, the honourable Fernand Leblanc, will celebrate his 75th birthday.

This means the end of a 28-year parliamentary career, which started with the by-election on February 10, 1964 in Montreal—Laurier, where Fernand Leblanc proudly defended the banner of the Liberal Party of Canada, led by Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson.

During his 14 years in the House of Commons, he won the respect of Prime Ministers Pearson and Trudeau, by whom he was appointed chairman of a number of parliamentary committees and also parliamentary secretary.

He also won the confidence of his constituents who re-elected him in four general elections. However, during his 14 years in the Senate, I always felt that Fernand Leblanc was better suited to the non-partisan traditions and constructive atmosphere of this House than the adversarial climate that prevails almost constantly in the other place. TheseHis personal and professional qualifications made him a model senator. He shared with us his considerable expertise in the accounting field as a member of the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance. He became chairman of the committee in 1984, after being Deputy Chairman for several years under his predecessors, Senators Everett and Doody.

As chairman of the National Finance Committee, which has a very busy schedule, he decided to make a careful study of the Estimates, a rather boring subject for the uninitiated but extremely important for Parliament and the country.

As you may have noticed, honourable senators, he had an abiding concern for matters dealing with the evaluation of government programs. All members of his committee agree that Senator Leblanc always tried to reach the broadest possible consensus. He is truly a real player. He always chaired the National Finance Committee in such a way that partisan considerations always bowed to the professionalism of its members, a professionalism that found its ultimate expression in its Chairman, Senator Leblanc.

To the very last he stood firm against attempts by a number of our colleagues, including our friend, Senator Simard, to indulge in partisan remarks. I think this is wonderful, and Senator Leblanc is to be commended for his patience.

For his tremendous dedication to the finances of this country, he deserves the sincere thanks of Canadians and all his colleagues. We are delighted to have among us a colleague who is so respected, both as a parliamentarian and as a Canadian. We wish him good health, good luck and au revoir.

Hon. Louis J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, very briefly, I would like to say that the first time I met Senator Fernand Leblanc, I had the impression of meeting tranquillity personified. That impression has not changed. Now, many years later, I am definitely convinced that Senator Leblanc, not Roméo, personifies tranquillity.

After many years in politics, one would think tranquillity is something that would be hard to maintain as a former politician. However, Senator Fernand Leblanc has managed to overcome tremendous obstacles while remaining excessively tranquil.

It is unfortunate that because of the laws of this country, we are to lose a senator of the calibre of Fernand Leblanc. We are certainly not losing him because of the laws of human nature, because he got married for the second time in April. The senator's human nature is still alive and well!

I must say I will miss Senator Leblanc, not just because he has the office next to mine, or because our assistants—some people call them secretaries but we called them assistants—are great friends, but because we are very good neighbours and have become good friends.

I will miss Senator Leblanc, and I am sure he will be missed by other senators as well. I am sure the country will miss him, because Fernand Leblanc, a Quebecer and Montrealer, is a great federalist. If he could vote for the unity of this country 6 million times over, he would do so.

I wish him a happy retirement with his wife Claire. I also hope he will be able to travel as often as he does now, because he enjoys travelling.

Not long ago he was in Paris, France, and in April he was in Hawaii for his second honeymoon. He is very fond of travelling, and I hope he will be able to travel for a long time.

I wish him good health and bon voyage.

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, as Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, I would also like to pay a tribute to the professionalism of our eminent Chairman, Senator Leblanc, who has controlled the operations of our committee very skillfully since 1984.

Not only does he have an intimate knowledge of our country's finances, parliamentary procedures and the organisation of our Committee on National Finance, he also knows the programs very well. Under his leadership, our committee produced some excellent reports on the Canadian public administration.

I would like to name a few, but there were many more which I will not mention. There were, among others, reports on comprehensive auditing, which is, as you know, the modern term for what we used to call simply audit.

Our committee also prepared a very interesting paper, thanks to the driving force of Senator Stewart, a report on the Royal Recommendation.

Under the chairmanship of Senator Leblanc, we also produced a document, which I consider important, on program assessment within the federal administration. And finally, we are preparing a report on Public Service 2000 to which Senator Leblanc also contributed a great deal of his time.

I would like to thank Senator Leblanc not only for his professionalism, but also for his remarkable objectivity. As another honourable senator said, senator Leblanc treated each member very equitably, including Senator Simard who is, I must admit, a very devoted colleague in this committee.

On behalf of all the members of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance as well as myself, I would like to wish Senator Leblanc the best of all retirements, excellent health and time to enjoy happy moments with his wife.

Hon. Maurice Riel: Honourable senators, Fernand Leblanc grew up on the Plateau Mont-Royal in Montreal and this means something for Montrealers. It is a small neighbourhood stretching from Mont-Royal Street to St-Joseph Boulevard and from St-Denis to De Lorimier, with a park in its centre, the Lafontaine park.

Since before the war and when we were in school, in Montreal we would recognize each other according to the French Canadian Catholic parish to which we belonged, let me say, that in that small territory, we could find St-Stanislas de Kotska, St-Pierre Claver, l'Immaculée Conception, the Très Saint Sacrement, St-Louis de France to name but a few, since religion was still strong in those days.

As far as population was concerned, it was a totally French-canadian area, as much so as the Lac St-Jean region is nowadays. In those days, Camilien Houde was still mayor of the city; he remained so until 1940, and came back in 1945 after a "holiday" for the duration. On June 24, we used to celebrate the St-Jean, the biggest event of the summer. Decorated floats would parade between the firemen's bands and the bands from all the schools, including St-Arsène Orphenage and St-Stanislas where Fernand Leblanc attended school.

Those were good times. We were young, the Crash still clouded our economy, we were poor but happy. I lived on Parc Lafontaine and I visited friends on Fabre, Garnier, Papineau, Christophe-Colomb and De Lorimier streets.

Fernand Leblanc was a local kid and in this environment where he only had friends, he got involved in politics at a very early age and became active with the Young Liberals even before the War.

At the federal level, it was the Mackenzie King and Adélard Godbout was provincial premier. During the War, Mr. Godbout granted Quebec women the right to vote and created Quebec Hydro, in 1944, by nationalizing several utilities in the Montreal area; they were Montreal Light, Heat and Power, Beauharnais Power and a few others; later the Lesage administration extended this nationalization throughout Quebec after the 1962 elections.

Fernand Leblanc, as a member of the Young Liberals, and president for his riding, supported these program elements of the provincial Liberal Party just as he had supported the efforts of the King administration during the war and later, those of Mr. St. Laurent's government.

In those days, the country was united and content, Mr. King would amend the Constitution through a simple exchange of letters with the provincial Premiers, if not just by phone.

The dark years were to come. Mr. Duplessis came back to power in 1944 and those years between 1944 and 1960 were long years (too short for some, but too long for others). Sixteen lost years. But being in the Opposition has its merits.

In 1951, the Quebec Liberals elected as their Leader Georges Lapalme, a man of thoughts, and during these trying years under Duplessis who lacked neither finesse nor imagination nor know-how, he was put to the test. Nevertheless, we never ceased to encourage our Leader and it is during that time that George Lapalme, a solitary philosopher, conceived the agenda for the Quiet Revolution which he handed down to Jean Lesage in 1959, together with an organised party. The Father of the Quiet Revolution, the one and only, is Georges Lapalme; the others came after the 1960 victory; René Lévesque and Gérard Pelletier recognized it publicly and paid tribute to him when he died.

[Senator Riel.]

Fernand Leblanc stood by during all these years and without his support and faithfulness, and that of countless others like him, for his leader and for the Quiet Revolution agenda , it would never have been come about. Again in 1962, during the elections on the second wave of nationalizations of power utilities, Fernand Leblanc was behind Lesage, Lapalme and Lévesque while we were on the verge of losing the elections because of an outrageous increase in school taxes in 1961 (between 500 and 1 000 per cent) due to changes brought about too hastily by theoreticians and other academics who had joined the government bureaucracy after the 1960 elections.

All this to tell you that, as a personal witness of those days and as a member of the Lapalme team since 1951 when I was elected president of the Quebec Young Liberals while Georges Lapalme was party leader, Fernand Leblanc really became, through his support, a true and tried father of the Quiet Revolution, if there was one besides Georges Lapalme.

I am not saying that I have the authority to grant paternity certificates for the revolution but, since I was there, I know who was there and who was not. It has become fashionable to say or to convince oneself that one was there at the right time, but as is always the case during a war, there are those who fight and those who win and they are not always the same ones.

That is why I want to pay this tribute to Fernand Leblanc by recognizing his fidelity, his unfailing support, when they were necessary but unpopular.

I only refer to the distant past, to the years before Fernand Leblanc came to Ottawa. Because others spoke about that time, I will not talk about the well-known Pearson and Trudeau years. I want to especially pay homage to the long and ever-lasting devotion of this son of the plateau Mont-Royal for his country and his province.

Last Sunday, I read the review of a biography of Harry Truman in the literary supplement of the New York Times; the writer quoted from the book this sentence on Harry Truman which I apply to Fernand Leblanc:

[English]

> Truman held to the old guidelines: Work hard. Do your best. Speak the truth. Assume no airs. Trust in God. Have no fear.

[Translation]

And I can say Senator Leblanc also lived by those rules. It reminds me of a British poet from the turn of the century who said:

[English]

> For when the One Great Scorer comes to write against your name, He marks—not that you won or lost—but how you played the game.

I can vouch that Fernand Leblanc played the game.

Hon. Raymond Perrault: Honourable senators, day after day, we are informed by the media and the pollsters that politicians and politics are held in very low esteem by the public. Yet those of us who work in this imperfect system are deeply aware of the fact that there are many, many people of all parties working constructively to help build a better Canada, a better society. Fern Leblanc is one of these. I join in the generous and well deserved tributes which have been paid to him this afternoon.

As a British Columbian, I thank him particularly for his deep and abiding interest in all of Canada, from coast to coast to coast and from sea to sea to shining sea; for his unfailing interest in problem solving, not just in the region of his origin, but in the Atlantic provinces, in the north, in the prairies, indeed, in all of western Canada; for his unfailing interest in building a better country; for his work to help us solve problems, not only in our regions but for his work here in the Senate.

Fern Leblanc has always been a constructive influence here in the chamber and in his committee work: Patient and long-suffering when required. He has been invariably tolerant and, always, he has brought to his work a great sense of humour. May I join, then, with others in the eloquent tributes they have paid to Fern Leblanc. I join with all senators in wishing him a very happy and enjoyable and certainly a productive retirement.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, both Senator Stewart and I are members of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance; we have conspired together and I am speaking for both of us when I add to the tributes being paid to Senator Leblanc this afternoon.

The finance committee may be one of the most interesting committees in the Senate, but it is certainly, in my experience, the very best organized and best run. Much of the credit for that must go to Senator Leblanc, aided by the Clerk of the Committee, John Demarais, whom I see in the Gallery, and the excellent researchers the committee has had during my time, Jeff Greenberg and Ted Ketchum.

The committee has done a great deal of good work in the years that I have been here, beginning with the sub-committee on the financing of post-secondary education—a complicated matter which is still under consideration in the country and to the debate of which I am sure the committee report will add a great deal, and continuing to other reports which have been mentioned here earlier.

In addition to work on special reports, however, that committee has made the Estimates and the Budgets some of the most exciting work going on. That is not an easy matter. It is largely because of Senator Leblanc's exemplary management of the committee, his orderly mind, and his very generous nature and attitude to all members of the committee. He has continued and expanded the fine reputation of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

We are all very grateful to him, indeed, and wish him many years of happiness and a long and healthy retirement.

[Translation]

Hon. Mario Beaulieu: Honourable senators, when I was appointed to the Senate two years ago, some of my friends opposite said hello Mario, welcome to the Senate, and I imagine they included Senators Riel, Pierre De Bané, Hébert and especially Senator Leblanc.

I wish to salute an old friend. We did business together. We worked on projects more than 30 years ago, in 1963 and 1964. I always had fond memories of Fernand Leblanc who was a great Montrealer and gave up his seat for Mr. Chevrier in 1967-68, if I am not mistaken. He was a diligent and regular worker in the Senate, who stayed on the sidelines.

I want to salute a great Montrealer before he leaves us.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, excuse me for being somewhat slow to rise in my seat. I thought there might be other senators who wished to add to these tributes!

I would like to start by thanking the previous speakers for their kind words of praise. I think that from time to time they may have been slightly exaggerated, but in any case, I enjoyed it all and I am starting to feel rather satisfied with myself!

As you will find out later on, after 28 years in an institution like Parliament, it is not easy to cut the ties that bind.

Personally, I feel torn between the pleasures of complete freedom from all the constraints of political life and a certain reluctance to have all this freedom. What am I going to do with it? Of course it will all depend on my state of health. One thing is certain: I am sure I will miss this place.

I am proud of having served Quebec and Canada, especially in 1980 when as Senator Frith mentioned, I was the only senator to chair a «no» committee and win the riding of Mercier, although the provincial member was a fervent separatist.

I am also proud of having served Quebec and Canada for 15 years in the House of Commons as the member for Laurier, following, with great difficulty, in the footsteps of that great Liberal, Lionel Chevrier.

I am also proud of having served Quebec and Canada for 13 years in the Senate, following in the footsteps of my father-in-law, Senator J. Eugène Lefrançois, who remained in the Senate longer than I did.

I said I was proud of having served my province and my country. I would like to add that it was also a very great honour.

I would now like to say a few words on two issues that I really care about. The first concerns this continual struggle against the gradual erosion of Parliament's prerogatives. This may not be the right time to talk about it with you, but you will agree that it may be one of the few opportunities I have left to do so.

As Chairman of the Committee on National Finance, I of course consider the opinions expressed by my colleagues from all parties, Senators Stewart, Marsden, Bolduc and Kinsella, and all other members of the committee who, each in their own way, remind witnesses of the need to respect the rights of Parliament. I am not talking about the rights of parliamentarians here, but the rights of Parliament as an institution.

Over the years, I have noted the opinions expressed by those senators and all others members of the committee and I added my own voice to those who defend Parliament's right to know, that is, to be informed openly and to be informed by officials who appear before committees. In return, the committees have the obligation to report openly to Canadians through the Senate. This openness, or "transparency", as it is now called, must constantly be defended.

The second point that I want to make overlaps with the first. It concerns the nature of the work done by Senate committees in general and the National Finance Committee in particular.

Indeed, the nature of this work has been changing since the National Finance Committee was created 73 years ago. You see, it is almost as old as I am, 73!

Today, the committee examines bills on various subjects: the government's borrowing authority, salary restrictions in the public sector, fiscal arrangements with the provinces, the organization of the federal public service and financial assistance to the regions, to name only a few.

However, this evolution has not always been smooth. In the case of the National Finance Committee, it has been gradual. In the past 20 years, the committee has been able to show that a review of the government's spending estimates is more useful if it covers all spending and how it is presented rather than a detailed analysis of the departments' intentions.

[English]

During the last five years, the National Finance Committee has even further modified its approach to the study of the Estimates. It has done this by moving away from what I call those "blockbuster" reports that took the best part of three years to produce—for example, "Federal Policy on Post-Secondary Education"—to studies which could be encompassed in one fiscal year: "Comprehensive Auditing, 1988"; "The Matching Grants Program, 1988"; "The Form and Use of the Royal Recommendation, 1990"; "The Program Evaluation System, 1991"; and soon, I hope, a report on the implementation of PS 2000.

[Translation]

As regards the committee report following the tabling of the White Paper on the Public Service, it seems impossible to me to publish it before July 1st, date on which I will be leaving, although a draft is presently under consideration in committee.

It has been a pleasure and an honour for me to have served in what was often referred to—quite rightly—as an unreformed and unrepentant Senate. I wish you all success and good health. Over the months and years to come, I plan to be spending more time with my wife, two sons, three grandchildren and many friends.

[Senator Leblanc.]

Some Hon. members: Hear, Hear!

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT BILL

THIRD READING —MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DIVISION DEFERRED

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 6:

Resuming third reading debate on bill C-13, An Act to establish a federal environmental assessment process.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I rise because the comments Senator Lavoie-Roux made reminded me of a few things that we, as Canadians, Quebecers and citizens of any Canadian province, might as well forget about and stop bringing up, because they are unavoidable.

Senator Lavoie-Roux talked about overlapping. It is impossible not to have overlapping. I mentioned in a previous speech the case of this project for the operation of a power station in New-Brunswick, the toxic wastes from which will fall on Quebec. That is overlapping, caused by the wind. There will always be some overlapping. So, all these unavoidable things must be taken into consideration?

Naturally, it is also unavoidable that there will be a federal deputy minister who will tell his minister: "Just look at blokes, at the provincial level. They have no national outlook." And there will be a provincial deputy minister who will tell his minister: "What do they know in Ottawa? They do not understand our province!" That kind of thing is unavoidable. It happens all the time, even in countries with a single government. We should overlook this in our discussion of Bill C-13.

I agree with Senator Lavoie-Roux that several concerns Quebec has about this bill are legitimate, but not on the basis that overlapping is avoidable. It is not!

I would also want to address a typically governmental view Senator Lavoie-Roux has expressed, that is to say that if there is overlapping, if there are two levels of government one can deal with, then there is some loss of government control. I certainly hope so! Pardon me, Senator Lavoie-Roux, but that is exactly how the minister and his senior officials feel: "How can this individual dare attempt to get away from my grip by dealing with another level of government?" This applies to both levels of government. They both have this attitude. It should be overlooked.

Above all, I want to associate myself with what Senator Lavoie-Roux said about the lack of conformity of both versions of the bill.

That cannot be overlooked. It is really irritating, especially when we are told that the good version, theoretically, is the English one.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Nobody said that!

Senator Gigantès: Nobody? Well, even more so if you mean that the French version is the one that is correct. Just switch the image around then. If the good version is the French one, don't we give a damn about the English-speaking majority? And conversely, if the good version is the English version, don't we give a damn about the French-speaking minority? It is infuriating, especially when we are dealing with such an important issue, an issue with such an impact on the future of this country.

I do not see how we could examine this bill when we don't know which of the two versions is the most reliable one. We can go to court and ask the court to rule that both versions are equally valid.

I think the subject is too important to consider adopting this bill before dealing with these discrepancies.

Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, I would like to comment briefly on Bill C-13.

I had the pleasure of attending all the committee sittings. We heard witnesses, and I want to make it quite clear that they did not all agree on the matter of the scope of this bill.

I would like to say, first of all, that we are all in favour of protecting the environment. Of course the Supreme Court, and this was said repeatedly before the committee, made it abundantly clear in three landmark decisions that the provinces and the federal government had the legislative jurisdiction to pass legislation to protect the environment. This jurisdiction is based on their ancillary power.

I, for one, am delighted that the federal government has decided to intervene in this area, and I hope the provinces —Quebec has done so already and some other provinces as well —will also intervene in this area. I think it is extremely important.

I know, and Senator Castonguay and others have said as much, that this is all happening at a time when we are considering constitutional reform. My colleagues, Senators Poitras, Lavoie-Roux and others, say this is happening at a time when we are talking about spending power.

I want to make it clear that Quebecers and Canadians in general feel that the constitutional talks at the inter-ministerial level must settle, once and for all, the thorny issue of federal spending power. Some excellent proposals have been made to set the parameters of tomorrow's spending power, and I hope that an agreement will soon be reached at that level.

I also wanted to comment on the matter of the French wording, and I am thinking of the concerns of Senator Corbin and Senator Gigantès as well as our own. Previous speakers raised a number of discrepancies between the French and English versions. We all agree this is totally unacceptable.

Both official languages are on the same footing. It seems to me that after 125 years of federalism and bilingualism, we could have come up with something better than the product we have before us today.

Fortunately, these discrepancies can be corrected. At least, the minister has promised he would introduce legislation some time this fall to deal with a situation that is totally unacceptable.

I understand the concerns of previous speakers, and I endorse the principle of what they said.

On Friday and Monday in Committee, I proposed an amendment that was defeated by one vote. My concern was as follows: I know that in various parts of Canada, including Quebec, the division of powers is a fundamental issue. I think it would be appropriate to stress that each legislature and the Parliament of Canada should respect the legislative jurisdictions provided under the Constitution.

I know these concerns are strictly a matter for discussion. I did what I thought I had to do, considering the concerns in my province about the division of powers.

I know that we all want this bill to be passed as soon as possible. However, as Senator Poitras mentioned, I think some colleagues will abstain.

I endorse this position. While I support the federal government's intervening in an area as crucial and important as the environment, I am very concerned about the division of legislative jurisdictions.

This was a brief explanation of my position in committee yesterday and the approach we have taken today.

Thank you.

[English]

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I rise to support the speedy passage of Bill C-13. As Senator Hays suggested, it seems so long since this morning.

The process that led to the drafting of this bill began five years ago with nation-wide public consultations about the state of environmental assessment law in Canada. From those consultations, it was clear that Canadians wanted strong environmental assessment at the federal level.

In response to these public expectations, in the course of the 1988 election campaign, the government committed itself to introducing legislative environmental assessment in its next mandate. Indeed, this commitment to environmental assessment was a major plank in the government's re-election platform and was reconfirmed by the Prime Minister himself on many occasions.

It is important to recognize the importance the government has accorded this piece of legislation. It is not housekeeping; it is not incidental. It is fundamental to the government's record, not only on the environment, but on government itself.

Honourable senators, I want to compliment the Minister of the Environment, Jean Charest, for the manner in which he has brought this legislation to fruition, and I particularly want to compliment his Parliamentary Secretary, the Honourable Lee Clarke, for the pivotal role he played, and the unusual manner in which two environmental lawyers, Brian Pannell and William Andrews, contributed to this legislation by assisting at the clause-by-clause stage. Brian Pannell is from my province, and I must admit that I availed myself of his advice on the legal issues of this environmental legislation.

I will try to keep my remarks as condensed as possible, because I understand I am the last in a long line of speakers. However, there are some important issues to bring forward.

The process of drafting the reformed legislation was not a smooth one. The current Environmental Assessment and Review Process, the EARP Guidelines, originally promulgated in 1984, became the subject of numerous court decisions. As the case law developed from Rafferty-Alameda to Oldman to Kemano, it became clear that the current guidelines were binding and had the force of law. Some vagueness in the wording of these guidelines led to a series of judgments against federal ministers who were found to have violated their own laws. Pressure increased to reform environmental assessment, not only from the environmental community, but from the subjects of environmental reviews, and the provinces, that found the court interpretations of the EARP Guidelines unacceptable. The province of Alberta took the matter all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada, and all the while the new legislation was making its way through the house.

The period of time since a reform of environmental assessment was first proposed, including our debate on Bill C-13 today, has been a period of cavalier disregard for environmental assessment law in Canada. The reason the federal government has been the subject of unprecedented judicial review is that the public desperately needed the federal government to fulfil its obligations to environmental assessment. That desperation was the direct result, I would contend, of the environmental insensitivity of provincial governments.

The inadequacy of provincial environmental assessment and the thwarting of their objectives when pet megaprojects of the provincial governments were threatened, is an underlying motif of this entire debate, and I should like to address a few remarks to that theme.

It is important to detail the context within which this legislation is proposed. It is not only the constitutional issue that is under debate here, although the context touches upon that issue. Canada was hailed as a leader among nations at the recent Rio Conference in pushing for codification of national environmental conventions and, rightly so, it was a stirring role. Yet, from sea to shining sea the Canadian landscape is littered with examples of laws that have been more honoured in the breach than in the observance, laws which are the instrument of enforcement for sustainable development. It is hoped that Bill C-13 will change that landscape.

[Senator Spivak.]

I would like to mention a few of these examples, some of which occurred some time ago, and some more recently.

In Ontario, the provincial environmental regime is viewed as more sophisticated than that in most other provinces. Still, it must be remembered that perhaps the most flagrant abuse of environmental process occurred in that province. I refer to the decision of the provincial government of the time to exempt the world's largest nuclear installation from any public environmental review. Now, years later, the Darlington facility is nearly completed, billion of dollars over budget and, according to the Atomic Energy Control Board, non-functional. Ontario taxpayers will have to pay billions of dollars as a result of that decision.

In the neighbouring province, my own province of Manitoba, several projects have received special treatment from provincial governments. The decision to cede one-fifth of the province to the large pulp and paper company, Repap, and to allow the expansion of the Pas pulp mills, received only rudimentary review until the Rafferty-Alameda court decisions forced the government into more comprehensive hearings.

In another high profile instance, environmental groups are still protesting the federal government's refusal to hold a federal environmental review. Ironically, the project in question is the headquarters of a major conservation organization, Ducks Unlimited. In what can only be seen as a bizarre contradiction, Ducks Unlimited decided to build its office on a protected Ramsar wetlands site, the Oak Hammock Marsh. In order to accommodate Ducks Unlimited, the provincial government amended its wetland protection legislation to allow construction. Despite setting this dangerous precedent, the project has not been subjected to federal review, even though, in my view, it clearly impacts on the federal government's responsibility for migratory birds and our treaty obligations under the Ramsar Convention.

Two groups, Conservation Canada and the Canadian Environmental Defence Fund, have announced they will go to court to force the federal government to subject the Ducks Unlimited project to an environmental review. However, the building is almost finished, despite objections from prestigious international organizations.

The history of the Rafferty-Alameda dam and the Oldman River dam in this environmental assessment program is well known and does not have to be detailed. However, it is germane to look at the federal review panel report on the Oldman River dam which was issued in May of this year. Its first and virtually unanimous recommendation was that this dam should be decommissioned. It was found that the Oldman River dam project was unacceptable on environmental, social and economic grounds. Federal ministers, however, rejected the strong recommendation that the dam be decommissioned. The panel's further recommendation also called for negotiations with the Peigan Nation and significant efforts at mitigation. If the province should fail to live up to these conditions, the panel unanimously recommended that the dam be decommissioned at that point.

The federal ministers of transportation and the environment have not commented on this last recommendation, but the panel's report should serve as a strong object lesson to anyone contemplating short-circuiting environmental reviews.

I would emphasize that the panel found the Oldman River dam project would not have passed even rudimentary cost-benefit analysis, not to mention environmental impact analyses.

It is against this backdrop of provincial governments bending the law and, in some cases I would think, breaking the law in order to build megaprojects that Bill C-13 has emerged. Clearly, the Canadian public wanted and expected the federal government to assume its responsibilities for thorough, predictable environmental review.

When Bill C-13 was initially introduced it clearly fell short of these expectations. It narrowed the scope of application of the federal government in the environmental assessment process. It also included many concepts which environmental groups felt would lead to compromising the environment in the interests of federal-provincial harmony.

Since then, the bill has been the subject of two go-arounds in a special legislative committee. Environmental law watchdogs participated in a clause-by-clause review. The government put forward many amendments and allowed the passage of others to significantly improve the bill. This is to the credit of the Minister of the Environment. The weaknesses of the bill have been adequately covered in the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources under the section entitled, "The Bill Does Not Go Far Enough." It does, however, in my view, represent the best possible consensus among the divergent groups that have an interest in the legislation.

I would like to comment briefly—because this issue has been at the heart of this debate in the Senate—on the testimony of Quebec's Environmental Minister, the Honourable Pierre Paradis, on the issues raised in his testimony on June 17.

In his testimony before the Energy and the Environment committee he claimed that federal assessment is required for any project that has an aspect, however insignificant, which might fall under federal jurisdiction. If anything, in my view, this bill can be criticized for too narrowly drawing the scope of what projects would trigger investment. Under Bill C-13 projects in the provincial realm may well impact on federal jurisdiction—the interests of indigenous people, the fisheries, migratory birds and so on. If no federal land, money or federal permit is required under a prescribed list of sections of acts, to be set out in regulation; and if it is not a one-of-a-type project set out regulations under the "comprehensive" assessment list, also to be set out in regulation, then it matters not if federal jurisdiction is affected. The federal process will not be triggered.

Minister Paradis also stated that the act is objectionable in triggering assessment where the federal government provides money for the project. Again, this criticism, in my view, respectfully, goes to the heart of the federal government's responsibility for environmental assessment. The recent decision of the Supreme Court of Canada made clear that environmental assessment is an essential part of governmental activity and that the federal government has an obligation to review the environmental impact of its activities, including the impact of where it spends its dollars.

The Quebec minister's objections are perhaps due to a different reading of the bill. That is evident from his description of Bill C-13 as extending the application of the federal assessment process to any project or concrete activity to which the federal government's only intended contribution is through its spending power. Clearly, if there has been one understood, uncontested aspect of the EARP guidelines for the last eight years, it is that EARP funds apply wherever federal funds are involved. There is nothing new in this.

If, in fact, God forbid, Bill C-13 were not approved at this juncture, it would mean all provinces would have to live with the existing EARP guidelines, which actually extend the federal government power more broadly than does Bill C-13. As has been mentioned, this sudden focus on spending powers stems from an over-broad interpretation of section 5(1)(b). Historically, and as perpetuated by Bill C-13, it is only where the federal government has allocated specific dollars for a specific purpose that an EARP is required. It is not the case that general spending for regional development will have to be traced to a specific project for federal environmental assessment.

The final argument that will not stand, as presented by some industrial representatives, is that this bill will unnecessarily hinder economic development. Far from it. If any lessons can be drawn from the litany of abuses of the environmental assessment process that is our history—and I have just mentioned a few examples—central among them is that, in the absence of adequate environmental review, projects that are completely unjustified on economic grounds continue to be built. Inappropriate development, the squandering of taxpayer's dollars on schemes destined to failure, does not help our economy. Quite the contrary, if we had had proper environmental assessment of development projects, taxpayers would have saved billions of dollars. These funds could have been applied to labour intensive, economically productive projects to meet the same goals in an environmentally appropriate manner.

I have tried to make the point that, in the headlong rush to bring into reality favourite pork-barrel schemes, governments ride roughshod not only over the environment but over sound economic judgment as well. Little wonder that most Canadians want the federal government to live up to its responsibilities for environmental assessment. It will not only help to protect our environment, it may well help to protect our pocket books from unproven economic development schemes.

It is even possible that, through experience, environmental assessment procedures will come to be widely recognized as a sane and rational way, perhaps the only way, of doing business. I would urge my colleagues to support Bill C-13.

Hon. Roch Bolduc: Honourable senators, I would like to say something about Bill C-13, but not the language issue. I am very sensitive to what Senator Corbin said on that aspect, but it seems that we have an assurance that the necessary amendments to correct these deficiencies will be made in the fall. That is not what I would like to talk about, however.

I want to talk about the substance of the bill and one particular clause. I would not want to start with an overview. I want to say first of all that I am for the bill, in that I want the federal government to have environmental legislation. I think that is clear: the federal government has responsibilities throughout the country, for air pollution, acid rain, the St. Lawrence River and Great Lakes, and so on. Of course the federal government has a responsibility.

Some problems are continental in scope, others are Canadian. Therefore the federal government has a responsibility. We need federal environmental legislation. That is why I voted for the bill on second reading.

Secondly, I would like to say that I am sensitive to environmental issues and that is nothing new for me. In the 1950s, I was a young civil servant in Quebec City and I set up a scholarship program to send our civil engineers to study sanitary engineering at Harvard, MIT, Cornell and several other places. So I was already very aware of this issue 35 years ago.

Thirdly, in 1972, when Claude Castonguay was Minister of Health in Quebec, we passed the first environmental bill in Canada. So you know that we are not against the environment. I would like you to know that.

Fourthly, I was Deputy Minister of Municipal Affairs for five years. I was involved with aqueducts, sewers and things like that. No one needs to tell me about them. I was always having run-ins with CMHC because they made regulations and standards that never applied. We know about that. So I knew about battles between bureaucracies. No one needs to tell me about it.

I do not approach this intellectually but in a very down-to-earth way. I tell you that clause 5 as it is written will lead to incredible bureaucratic chaos, and I find that unfortunate. It would have been so simple to add after "financial assistance", "except for projects within provincial jurisdiction". It would not be so earth-shattering to say that. The provincial government will do the assessments for federal-provincial programs to finance the building of schools or hospitals. I think that is simple.

Everybody should be able to understand that. However, this is not what it says. It says that the federal government will have to make an assessment. And you know what happens when we talk about evaluations. Just look at section 16. Section 16 is far-reaching; it deals with the content and even the object of the decision. I know what it is, because I was a civil servant for a long time. What can I say? The minister evidently does not have time to read the document prepared by his civil servants! That is what happened and that makes me sad because we do need a good act and it would not take much to improve this bill.

[Senator Spivak.]

Unfortunately, we are headed towards bureaucratic struggles and guess who will suffer from this situation? It is not those who are paid by the government, all these environmentalists and new missionaries. They are all paid by the government; indeed, you will note that, generally speaking, those who are involved are all bureaucrats. More often than not, it is the businesses that will suffer from this situation.

It makes me unhappy that we could not clarify such simple things that are important in day-to-day administration. Unfortunately, that is how it is going to be, it seems, because it is urgent and we are at the end of a session and on the other side, they are incredibly flexible, as you know, so that the bill will be passed, don't worry about it. However, I regret that such things come up at the end of a session. I am not happy, I can tell you. I find it unfortunate.

At any rate, I will say no more because sometimes we get carried away and say more than we intend to. I find it unfortunate that we cannot change such simple things as that, which I think would be in the interest of everyone in Canada and the provinces.

As far as these issues are concerned, we must realize that there are a number of problems that are federal. That we must admit, as I said earlier. However, there are quite a few in fact the majority that are under provincial jurisdiction. It so happens that environmental issues are by definition linked to a given territory, so most of the time these are local issues, and that is something we must not forget.

So we have the federal spending power, and if people don't sign a piece of paper, and if they don't enter into an agreement with the federal government, they will have to provide their own financing. It certainly is tempting to sign this piece of paper and to get money from Ottawa. But then the federal government turns around and says: Assessment, and in fact the minister has to say this. He has to, but it does not make sense. In any case, for the time being that is my position. I think it is all very unfortunate. But the environment bill will be passed regardless, except I will not be able to vote for it on third reading.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there have been a number of excellent interventions on Bill C-13. I want to begin by saying that I think this is a good bill, and I think this is a good report. We support the objectives of the bill. We support many of its provisions to achieve those objectives. However, we also share with all senators concerns about its imperfections as carefully set out in this report, a report which itself reflects the excellent bi-partisan work of one of the Senate committees. I recommend the report to honourable senators for reading, because the concerns that have plagued this bill and plagued the attainment of its objectives, both in Parliament and in the press, are all dealt with and dealt with quite objectively.

The report immediately confronts the fact that almost everybody thinks that it is an imperfect proposal, and the differences of opinion seem to depend on the range of the imperfections.

The report deals with evidence, proposals and propositions, that are gathered together under the heading "The Bill Does Not Go Far Enough"; it then deals with those who felt that the bill goes too far; it deals with the constitutional question under the heading of "Major Concerns"; it deals with the licensing trigger, the spending trigger, the grounds for decision-making, and in all cases it deals with the evidence that was brought and the arguments on each side.

It deals with the duplication of process, what is sometimes called scoping. It deals with the problem of the extreme breadth of the regulatory power and the risk of the new despotism, as Senator Stewart describes it. It sets out what the critics have to say about it. It then concludes by having taken that into account with its suggestion that the bill be adopted without amendments.

For myself, one of two principle concerns left after reading about the committee's work, and also reading the report, was the question of the difficulty of balancing federal with provincial interests, and particularly the position taken by the province of Quebec. Quebec's provincial interests always have this additional dimension of the need to preserve language and culture which touch, quite properly, the concerns of the province of Quebec in every case, and to an extent exceed those of other provinces.

I find, however, having listened to the debate, that even the government members of the Senate from the province of Quebec, while uncomfortable, appear to be prepared to—I do not quote them on this, but I use this expression because it is an expression that has been used with respect to other imperfect proposals—hold their noses. Maybe they are not holding their noses. Maybe they are perfectly content.

I went over the list of government supporters from Quebec in the Senate: Senator Beaudoin, Senator Beaulieu, Senator Bolduc, Senator Castonguay, Senator Chaput-Rolland, Senator Cogger, Senator Lynch-Staunton, Senator Poitras, and Senator Sylvain. I hope I have not left any out. Listening carefully to the debate, I am sensitive to their concerns.

Senator Murray: Senator Lavoie-Roux.

Senator Frith: Senator Lavoie-Roux, excuse me.

Senator Murray: Senator Grimard.

Senator Frith: Senator Grimard. Any others that I forgot? No? As we used to say to jurors, "So say you all?"

I take it that you all say that I am from Ontario, and I should not lose any sleep worrying about the interests of Quebec being trampled on by this bill. That brings us to the only other concern, and that is the concern that it seems to me also attracts bipartisan attention, or ought to attract bipartisan attention, for each of us as senators and our role under the Constitution as senators, and of course thereby the role of the Senate.

Let me read to you what this excellent committee has said about that concern, a concern shared obviously by many senators on both sides:

> We recognize that the bill has a number of shortcomings, not least of which are the 30 inconsistencies that were found to exist between the French and English versions of the bill. Considering that almost half of these inconsistencies go back to the original bill that was tabled as Bill C-78 in 1990, your Committee is deeply concerned that so many linguistic discrepancies could have slipped through, despite the extensive scrutiny that this bill has received over the years.
> In our view, there are simply too many inconsistencies, two of which are very substantial (clauses 33 and 72). We cannot pass this over in silence, or fail to express deep regret. This is a truly unacceptable state of affairs, indeed it is inexcusable in a Parliament that has been bilingual since 1867. To avoid delaying passage of the bill, we can rely on precedent, as the Deputy Minister of Justice pointed out, and have these errors corrected under the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment bill, as soon as possible after the bill becomes law.
> The federal Minister of Environment stated that if the bill were returned to the House of Commons with amendments, there would be a "high element of risk" in doing so. Given the uncertainty of the Parliamentary calendar in the months ahead, your Committee recognizes that, if amendments were made to the bill at this time, it is not inconceivable that the bill could die on the Order Paper. Given the amount of time it has taken the bill to get this far, this is not a risk that we are prepared to take.
> At the Committee's request, the Minister gave his undertaking to proceed as quickly as possible and introduced the requisite amendments under the next Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment bill, which is due to be tabled next fall. We hold him to this undertaking and therefore recommend that:
> The federal Minister of the Environment act on his undertaking and introduce amendments to correct the inconsistencies between the French and English versions of the bill under the next Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment bill.
> Although we are extremely uneasy about recommending adoption of a bill that has 30 known linguistic errors, we have concluded that it would be in the public interest for us to do so, as time is a significant factor in this case.

What are those inconsistencies that the committee recommends we ignore and leave to someone else to correct? If we acknowledge all these errors, but do not insist that they be corrected, that we will rely on an undertaking that they be corrected in the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act, it is important that we know exactly what we are proposing.

The inconsistencies are as follows: In clause 4 (a), there is a problem with the expression "de décider".

In clause 12 (4) the French version requires the other jurisdiction to offer to cooperate. That does not exist in English. Another problematic expression is "in whole or in part".

In clause 15 (3) there is an inconsistency between the French version of this provision and the French version of the definition. I am just touching on the highlights of each inconsistency.

In clause 16 (1) (c) the word "envoyées", and in 16 (1) (e) the word "screening" are problematic.

In clause 18 (1) the French version should specify one exclusion list, not many.

In Clause 18 (2) the notion of "information" is not reflected in the French version.

In clause 19 (4) the French version does not capture the sense of "use or permit the use of".

In clause 21 (a) the concept "conformité avec les règlements" does not exist in English.

In clauses 24 (1) (c) and 24 (1) (d) there is inconsistent drafting in the French version.

Clause 33 (2) was given particular attention by the committee. In that clause the French version should say "Minister" not "Governor in Council". I will read that clause because it was highlighted by the committee.

> The Minister may establish a roster of persons, to act as members of any review panel to be established pursuant to paragraph 1 (a).

The French version says:

> "Le gouverneur en conseil peut établir une liste . . ."

Those versions cannot be reconciled. One says one thing and one says another.

There is a lack of consistency between 37 (1) (a) and 20 (1) (a) in the French version, particulars of which are contained in this paper which I would be quite pleased to table. The columns are headed, "Section number", "Nature of Discrepancy", "Section Amended" and "Proposed action and comments".

In Clause 37 (2) line 17 should specify "de cette autre loi".

In clause 38 (2), in line 6 in the French version, "suivants" is misspelled.

In clause 40 (2) (a) the French expression used for "review panel" is not the defined term.

[Senator Frith.]

In clause 40 (3), line 26 in the French version does not capture the essence of "is permitted".

In clause 41, line 42 in the French version contains a syntactical error, "à l'effet que . . .".

In clause 42 at line 26 in the French version the word "commission" should precede the word "examen".

In clause 43 (1) at line 39 of the French version it is not clear what substitution the minister can authorize. This is a rather important omission.

At clause 50 (2), line 2, the adjective "negatifs" is missing.

At clause 50 (3) the expression "any federal authority" at line 13 in the English version is not picked up in the French version. There is another discrepancy in the same clause.

In clause 51 (1), at line 16, the term "ordonnance" should be "injonction", which is quite a difference.

In clause 54 (2) there is no English equivalent to the expression "accords internationaux" at line 1 on page 39.

In clause 55 (3) (b) the French version uses "commentaires". The correct word is "observations".

In clause 58 (1) (e), at line 5, the French expression "examens substitués aux examens par une commission" should be simplified to accord with the English expression.

In clause 59 (c) at lines 9 and 10, the words "liés à une activité concrète ou à une categorie d'activités concrète" should be deleted because there is no English equivalent.

In clause 59 (1) the word "programme" is missing from "programme de suivi", a defined term.

Another important discrepancy is to be found in clause 72 (1). The French version refers to "Committee of the House" and the English version says "the Minister". Let us have a look at that one because it was also singled by the committee.It seems to me, honourable senators, that this discrepancy will be of particular importance when we deal with the question of correction by miscellaneous statute law amendments. Clause 72 (1) reads:

> Five years after the coming into force of this section, a comprehensive review of the provisions and operation of this Act shall be undertaken by the Minister.

The French version reads:

[Translation]

> 72.(1) Dans les cinq années qui suivent l'entrée en vigueur du présent article, un examen complet des dispositions et de l'application de la présente loi doit être fait par le comité, soit de la Chambre des communes, soit mixte, que le Parlement désigne ou constitue à cette fin.

[English]

Honourable senators, here is a bill that, as parliamentarians, we surely should be interested in. This is an imperfect bill.

Senators on all sides accept that there are substantive deficiencies. We seem to accept that the bill should be passed eventually but, because it is imperfect, we support the provision in the bill requiring that a review be conducted. But who is to do the review? Are we, as parliamentarians, satisfied that the review should be done by the minister as the English version provides, or would we rather have it done by Parliament, as the French version provides?

In clause 72 (2) the word "étude" at line 19 should be "examen".

In clause 73 (2) the English version, at lines 36 to 39, has no French equivalent.

In the first part of "Definitions", "project" in the English subparagraph (a) is not captured in the French version. This is important because in interpreting any bill one turns, of course, to the definition sections. The word "operation" is not captured in French.

Honourable senators, if we say we respect that part of our function under the Constitution which requires that we review and improve legislation, can we be satisfied that we have done our job with respect to Bill C-13?

Let us read again why the committee wants us, in spite of all the problems, that, to neglect what, it seems to me, is clearly our duty. The committee says:

> We recognize that the bill has a number of shortcomings, not least of which are the 30 inconsistencies that were found to exist between the French and English versions of the bill. Considering that almost half of these inconsistencies go back to the original bill that was tabled as Bill C-78 in 1990, your Committee is deeply concerned—

I should think so. I compliment our Senate committee on that. The report goes on to state:

> — that so many linguistic discrepancies could have slipped through, despite the extensive scrutiny that this bill has received over the years.

As Senator Spivak and others have said, this bill has been on the table, or on the rails, for a very long time.

Why do we have two houses of Parliament? One of the reasons is to require legislation to go through the sieve of examination. Yet here we have a bill that has been looked at by so many in so many contexts and it still has serious problems.

The next paragraph reads:

> In our view there are simply too many inconsistencies—

Too many for what? I would think, from reading that, that it means too many for us to let them go by. There have to be too many measured against some standard. It goes on to say:

> — two of which are very substantial (clauses 33 and 72). We cannot pass this over in silence, or fail to express deep regret. This is a truly unacceptable state of affairs—

• (1540)

Senator Beaudoin said, "C'est tout à fait inacceptable." I do not understand what that means. Does it mean it is "tout à fait inacceptable", completely unacceptable, but that we are to accept it? Is it acceptable or not? Do we find it acceptable as senators?

I tell honourable senators that I am sure—but I may be wrong—that there is not a single senator on the government side who is satisfied with this bill. I am sure there is not. Having heard the debate and having read the committee report, I know that not one senator is satisfied with this. I would even go so far as to say that there is not one senator who feels comfortable with it.

"... indeed, it is inexcusable..." What does that mean? Does it mean it is inexcusable and therefore we excuse it? Does the word "inexcusable" mean "excusable"? Does the word "unacceptable" mean "acceptable"? If it is inexcusable, it is inexcusable and we ought not to excuse it. If it is unacceptable, we ought not to accept it.

> This is a truly unacceptable state of affairs, indeed it is inexcusable in a Parliament that has been bilingual since 1867.

That was pointed out by Senator Corbin and others.

The report goes on to state:

> To avoid delaying passage of the bill, we can rely on precedent, as the Deputy Minister of Justice pointed out, and have these errors corrected under the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment bill, as soon as possible after the bill becomes law.

What does "as soon as possible" mean? How soon is it possible? I have been told that there was information given to the committee in its consideration that this process takes years—anything up to five years. Is that as soon as possible? It could be a few years.

Senator Barootes: Do you want to take a bet on that five year thing?

Senator Frith: Do you mean on it being up to five years?

Senator Barootes: You said five years. I will take a bet it is less.

Senator Frith: I will tell you what I will take a bet on, sir. It is that you are not listening. I will take a bet on that, because if you read what I said, and if you have listened to what I have said, you will know that I said the information that was given to the committee was that it could take years, up to five years.

Senator Barootes: You are just reading someone else's report; you are not making a speech.

Senator Frith: That was information given by one of your colleagues in the Senate, sir, who has experience in such matters.

I tell honourable senators that if we accept the information the committee has received, corrections could take years. Each of us must decide individually that we are satisfied that that is as soon as possible and that we are satisfied that we have performed our function as senators.

What are the tests for something going into that act? How does one decide that an amendment is a miscellaneous statute amendment, uncontroversial and purely, technically correct? I am informed the two honoured tests are that, first, they cannot go to the purpose of the bill, otherwise they are not miscellaneous; and, second, that they cannot be controversial.

Can we honestly say that these are not controversial? Can we say as senators that there is no controversy as to whether it should be the minister or a committee of the House? I think there is controversy. I say that as a fact. I do not say you should accept my opinion as to which it should be, but it is clear that it is controversial.

Can we say that there is no controversy over the question of whether the five-year review should be conducted by the minister or by Parliament? Of course there is controversy. Therefore, honourable senators, I do not think we as senators should accept an undertaking that these discrepancies will be corrected by miscellaneous statute amendments. Two of the most important ones do not qualify for such treatment.

The report goes on to state:

> The federal Minister of the Environment stated that if the bill were returned to the House of Commons with amendments,. . .

Did he say that it would be dead? Did he say that the bill is gone? No. He said that:

> . . . there would be a "high element of risk" in doing so. Given the uncertainty of the parliamentary calendar in the months ahead . . .

I am not clear that there is anything particularly uncertain about the parliamentary calendar that is not always present. It is always uncertain. However, they are saying to us senators, "Don't do your job in this case because in the months ahead the parliamentary calendar is uncertain." Certainly, most of you who have come to us from the other House would reply, "What else is new? Of course it is uncertain."

The report goes on to state:

> . . . your Committee recognizes that, if amendments were made to the bill at this time,. . .

Do they say that it would die? No. Do they say that it might die? No. It states:

> . . . it is not inconceivable that the bill could die on the Order Paper.

[Senator Barootes.]

Are those the kind of grounds on which they are asking us as senators to make an exception? Can honourable senators think of any piece of legislation that will ever come to us about which one could not say that it is not inconceivable that it could die on the Order Paper? Can honourable senators think of any piece of legislation that will ever come to us with respect to which the parliamentary calendar in the months ahead would not be uncertain, or that there would be a "high element of risk"?

It seems to me that what we are being asked to do as senators—and not as opposition, or government, but all of us as senators—is to face the usual Hobson's choice we have as senators. It does not take us long to get used to that Hobson's choice once we are appointed to this place. That is to say, if you do nothing, then what are you here for? If you do anything in the course of your job that is inconvenient to the government—not just this government, but any government, and I have held the job on that side of getting government legislation through—then you are asked to make an exception for a number of reasons that, it seems to me, exist in practically every case of legislation that comes to us.

Do we say to ourselves, to our own consciences, "I am prepared to make an exception in this case, but the only basis I can make it would apply in just about every case; that is, every case in which we as senators play our role." Very frequently when we play our role, we are a damned nuisance to the government. That is what Parliament is set up for.

It seems to me that if we accept this undertaking, then we will be getting undertakings in every case. In effect, it is a form of Senate reform. We do not need this particular function as a Senate. All those aspects of our duties can be performed by the Miscellaneous Statute Law Amendment Act, although the tests that the committee were told about by the Deputy Minister of Justice are tests that these inconsistencies do not meet.

Honourable senators, I support this bill and want to have the opportunity to vote for it, warts and all, imperfect as it is. Even its most severe critics tell us that it is better than nothing at all. However, I do not feel comfortable abdicating the function that we are given in the face of such -- to quote an adjective used in another context by the Leader of the Government in the Senate—"egregious" errors.

If ever there have been egregious—the origin of which, as I understand, is standing out from the flock—errors, then they are here, some thirty of them, in varying degrees of seriousness. Two of them are deadly serious. They are total inconsistencies which make the sections impossible to operate. To ask us to ignore them, it seems to me, is to ask us to swallow more than we should be asked to swallow, and to take a part of our responsibilities cavalierly and not seriously.

I know this will not be easy. I want to assure honourable senators that I share the constraints they feel, the discomfort they feel at not passing this bill immediately because of the need for its objectives. But I really think we are at an important crossroads. The record will show that we have agreed in the Senate to allow a bill to be passed absolutely full of errors, including errors that cannot be corrected by a Statute Law Amendment Act.

Therefore, I propose, seconded by the honourable Senator Molgat:

> THAT Bill C-13, an Act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, be not now read the third time but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources in order to correct the inconsistencies that were found to exist between the French and English versions of this bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Will those honourable senators against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators. Is there agreement on the length of the bell?

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, with agreement, I would ask for a 20-minute bell. The Senate adjourned to the call of the bell.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT BILL

THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT NEGATIVED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cochrane, that Bill C-13 be read the third time now.

In amendment, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Molgat:

> That Bill C-13, an Act to establish a federal environmental assessment process, be not now read the third time but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources in order to correct the inconsistencies that were found to exist between the French and English versions of the bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): If you read the French version it will concord with the English version.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do you want me to read the French version?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: The nays have it.

Motion in amendment of Senator Frith negatived on the following division:

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Mabel M. DeWare: Honourable senators, I move the third reading of Bill C-49, to amend the Criminal Code (sexual assault).

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I hope that I will only take a few minutes of your time, but I would like to make some comments on Bill C-49. Like some of the other bills we have studied in the Senate today, it has its imperfections and is somewhat controversial. However, I do not think that any of the members who studied the bill in this house or in the other place disagreed with the principle of the bill, which is to achieve a fairer balance between the rights and protection of the victim of a sexual assault and the person or persons accused of that offence.

Unfortunately, we have had very little time to study the bill thoroughly, so we took advantage of the evidence that was presented to the legislative committee in the other place, which heard some 23 witnesses. The Legal and Constitutional Affairs committee made an effort to canvass the earlier witnesses who had problems with the bill.

In response to some of the objections which were heard in the other place, the Minister of Justice herself recommended certain amendments to the legislative committee, and they are contained in the present bill.

After the bill passed the other house, the Canadian Bar Association, which had had several objections, stated publicly that it felt that its principal objections had, in fact, been met by the amendments made at the request of the Minister of Justice.

The Criminal Lawyers Association of Ontario had many objections and reservations with respect to the bill. We made an effort to have the two eminent counsel who had appeared in the other place appear before our committee. Unfortunately, neither one was able to come, nor were they able to send someone else, as they had undertaken to do, even though we phoned them several times to ask if they could send someone to our committee hearings during the last couple of days.

The Canadian Civil Liberties Association had some reservations, some of which were met by the amendments. This morning I spoke with Mr. Alan Borovoy, the head of that association. He, too, was unable come. He told me that he still had strong objections to a couple of clauses in the bill, even the amended clause that concerns the publication of evidence at trial. His other principal objection was with respect to those clauses covering consent and the definition of consent which he felt should be hived off from the rape shield clauses because they demanded different considerations. However, I do not think that he would have gone as far as saying that this bill should be held up because of other benefits which it obviously provides.

Our final witnesses yesterday were from REAL Women, a group which had also given a brief in the other place. They objected in general to the tenor of the bill which they considered was unbalanced in favour of women and did not protect men sufficiently.

I do not know if all honourable senators received a memorandum today in the name of Senator Haidasz. He echoes some of the concerns REAL Women expressed to us yesterday. I would like to make one comment about his opening statement here: "This bill will have the direct effect of reversing the presumption of innocence as the accused will bear the onus to prove consent."

With great respect, I must disagree with that. I do not think the bill does that at all. It states that the complainant must establish a prima facie case of not having given consent before the accused has to answer.

In any event, some of the objections of the representatives of REAL Women who spoke to us yesterday could probably be answered by our legal advisers, more learned in the law than myself. In any case, I do not want to go into any further detail on that at this point.

In spite of the objections we heard, I am satisfied with the general validity of the bill and that most of its provisions are probably secure from Charter challenges. However, one of the more vulnerable provisions removes from the accused the defence of intoxication that is self-induced. Witnesses pointed out that the courts have acknowledged that there may well be a state of inebriation when a person would be incapable of forming the necessary criminal intent to commit an offence. No doubt that provision will quickly be subjected to close judicial scrutiny in various courts across Canada, and eventually in the Supreme Court of Canada.

Yesterday, Professor Don Stuart put forward his argument again that there should be degrees of culpability of sexual assault, as there are degrees of seriousness in the range of charges from manslaughter to murder and arson, with a range of appropriate penalties.

The minister, whom we questioned later on this particular aspect of the bill, gave her reasons for preferring the present formulation. Witnesses representing LEAF, which is a legal organization associated with the National Association Committee on the Status of Women, as well as the National Organization of Immigrant and Visible Minority Women of Canada, strongly supported her position.

I must say that I remain more persuaded by Professor Stuart's contention that a lack of distinction between degrees of seriousness of various types of sexual assault tends to trivialize a charge of rape by placing it in the same category as all sexual touching cases. As he stated in his brief:

> Rape is a crime of violence but also involves the expression of male sexuality and power with particularly serious consequences for victims.

These women's groups which supported the minister on practically all aspects of the bill still continue to argue that there should be an additional paragraph in the preamble which would make special reference to the vulnerability of certain groups and categories of women.

The minister continued to resist the request, so the committee decided to at least acknowledge what is obviously a social and legal fact by referring to the problem in its report. I am glad that Senator Spivak gave notice this morning of a motion asking the Senate to join in expressing its special concern, not only for those women, but for similarly disadvantaged men and children.

The committee would have welcomed much more time to study Bill C-49. However, given the uncertainty of our future legislative calendar, it decided that the bill had so many more beneficial features than possible pitfalls that it could not risk having the bill fall into the parliamentary pool of unfinished business. I support Bill C-49 and recommend that honourable senators do so as well.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES WATERS BILL

YUKON WATERS BILL

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-51, respecting water resources in the Northwest Territories, and Bill C-52, respecting water resources in the Yukon Territory.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole, the Honourable Senator Nathan Nurgitz in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I understand the Minister is available and ready to enter the chamber.

Pursuant to rule 21 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable Thomas Edward Siddon, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, was escorted to a seat in the Senate chamber.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is a pleasure to welcome to the Senate for the first time, I believe, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Honourable Tom Siddon. Mr. Siddon has been in Parliament since 1978 and, as a minister of the Crown, has held various portfolios since 1984. For the past two and a half years he has been the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Siddon is accompanied by officials of the department. Mr. Hiram Beaubier is Director General, Natural Resources and Economic Development Branch, and Mr. Brian Gibson is Senior Offshore Waters Officer. Both are from the department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The minister has a brief opening statement to make.

The Honourable Thomas Edward Siddon, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development: Honourable senators, I am pleased to be here to speak to you for a few moments about Bill C-51, the Northwest Territories waters act, and Bill C-52, the Yukon Territory waters act, new legislation to replace the Northern Inland Waters Act. I cannot stress enough how important these bills are to northerners and in fact to all Canadians who have an interest in water management in the territories north of the 60th parallel.

[Senator Neiman.]

As honourable senators would know, northerners have a special relationship with the environment. They recognize it as both productive and fragile. They have the respect that comes from knowing that a healthy environment supports them and from being keenly aware that the northern waters are a cornerstone to that healthy environment.

Bills C-51 and C-52 acknowledge and recognize the value of our northern water resources. They also acknowledge that the legislation which was enacted in 1970, the current Northern Inland Waters Act, needs updating to be in tune with the requirements of the 1990s, and indeed to meet the requirements of the next century. The new bills proposed today address inconsistencies and weaknesses that have come to light over the past several years. It would be a disservice to leave these problems uncorrected for a longer period.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to remind those present that the government has been responsive to all of the various groups who are interested in the substance of these bills. The bills have been amended to accommodate the concerns of many interested parties, whether they be water users, industry and domestic water users, environmental groups, first nations or the territorial governments.

The three principal objectives of the proposed amendments are to streamline the licensing process, to allow for greater recognition and protection of instream water users and to ensure greater regulatory compliance by the holders of water use licenses. With these bills we are modernizing and strengthening water management in northern Canada. These changes will ensure a speedier licensing system and so give northern industry, especially mining and the energy sector, greater certainty in order to plan their future developments.

At the same time renewable natural resources will also stand to gain from these changes, as environmental protection measures will be strengthened in many respects. The changes will also protect domestic water supply and instream water users who would become eligible for compensation should their interests be affected in any negative way by a licensed use of water. Among those who will benefit from this measure of compensation are aboriginal peoples, who depend on fishing and the water quality for their income and their food supply.

These proposals, honourable senators, are supported by northerners, such as northern environmental interest groups, native peoples, mining and other industry, and the territorial governments. I ask that you, as well, lend your support to these proposed pieces of legislation here today.

Senator Frith: These two bills come to us with a very good reputation. Our colleague on this side, Senator Adams, spoke in support of them yesterday. For the record, could you tell us what, if any, opposition there was to these bills. You mentioned that there were various groups who had been accommodated. Can you tell us what the principal objections were to these bills and how you addressed them?

Mr. Siddon: Senator Frith, there were some concerns felt by the mining industry, especially the placer mining industry of the Yukon, who, prior to 1970, were not accustomed to being regulated at all. For that reason, we established an advisory committee called the Yukon Mining Advisory Committee, and it was comprised of representatives of the placer mining industry as well the course mining industry.

I think if anyone knows the Yukon and the instinct of miners, there is a tendency to feel that much of this environmental regulation and extra process and the threats of fines and penalties under the law is something that interferes with their way of life, and that in that vast, unspoiled territory of the Yukon or the Northwest Territories, they are not really doing any significant harm to nature and should not be subjected to the onerous burdens that new legislation such as this would impose.

There was an extensive period of consultation with representatives of the mining industry who sat as members of the Yukon Mining Advisory Committee, together with representatives of the Yukon Conservation Society and the Yukon First Nations. Through that process and under the able chairmanship of Mr. Bill Dunbar of Northwest Tel, the concerns that the mining industry had expressed were largely addressed.

There have also been concerns with respect to the confusion that might arise as between the regulation of water use and the broader environmental processes under the environmental assessment and review guidelines order and now, as of today, I gather, under the new Environmental Assessment Review Act, Bill C-13, which I believe has just passed this house. There were a variety of concerns of that nature because change is always unsettling, but I am persuaded that for the most part these interests have been addressed.

Senator Frith: Can you reassure us that you know of no groups that would have wished to make serious objections to the passage of the bill had we, rather than proceeding in Committee of the Whole, dealt with the legislation in the standing committee and invited objectors?

Mr. Siddon: If you like, Senator Frith, I could table a chronology of the consultation process which had been followed in building up the preparation and the drafting of this bill since 1987, and a list of the participants who have been consulted and involved right through to the stage of the legislative committee which sat in the other place for several days reviewing and receiving last minute submissions.

I would be remiss if I did not point out that there was intervention by representatives of the Dene Nation, for example. I think it was Mr. Erasmus, who suggested there had not been ample consultation to take into account the aboriginal interests and, in particular, the incomplete nature of land claims and treaty process in the Northwest Territories.

There was some concern expressed by the Counsel of Yukon Indians to the same effect, that this legislation should not preempt or foreclose certain privileges and prior uses which will be promised and guaranteed to the First Nations people when land claims are concluded in the various areas of the north where such claims are now under negotiation.

We have taken those concerns into account, and I am satisfied, and I can give that assurance to honourable senators.

Senator Frith: They are reassured?

Mr. Siddon: I have certainly reassured them, and those points have been debated extensively. When the land claims are brought to cabinet, having been initialled and ratified by each of the First Nations groups, then assuming the government agrees to ratify this legislation, it will be drafted in the form of settlement legislation and brought to the two houses.

The rights of First Nations people will be assured, and any inconsistency between those agreements and the present legislation will be resolved by way of recognizing the paramountcy of those land claims agreements.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, that seems to be an appropriate time to pass the questioning to my colleague Senator Adams, who knows a great deal more about this latter subject than I do.

The Chairman: Senator Adams.

Senator Adams: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you, minister, for coming to the Committee of the Whole. I have a few questions. There are two bills. It confused me that the clauses are exactly the same for both territories, as you answered to a question from Senator Frith. It sounds like most of your witnesses came from the Yukon, and I was wondering if you had any people who showed interest in these bills who hailed from the Eastern Arctic.

Mr. Siddon: Senator Adams, from the Northwest Territories we had representation from the N.W.T. Chamber of Mines, the Government of the Northwest Territories, the Canada Petroleum Association, the Northwest Territories Water Board, the Dene Nation, the Métis Nation, and the Tungavik Federation of Nunavut. The interests of the Eastern Arctic Inuit people were certainly taken into consideration and brought before the drafters as this legislation was prepared.

Senator Adams: In clause 10—and both bills are exactly the same—I am not sure how many board members you intend to have from both territories. Is it four to nine members from each territory, or is it a total of four to nine, or do you have four to nine members over all, from the provinces and both territories?

Mr. Siddon: It is my understanding that the water board created under each piece of legislation will be comprised of up to nine members. I am not sure I heard the question clearly.

Senator Adams: According to Clause 10, there will be four to nine members on the board, or appointed by the minister.

Mr. Siddon: Perhaps I might, for a moment, consult Clause 10.

Senator Adams, I thought I heard you say 49, but it was four to nine members. The discretion of the minister may be exercised in terms of the total number of members sitting on the water board. Three of the members are nominated by the government of the Northwest Territories, and it is at the minister's discretion as to whether or not to accept those names. I would not want to contemplate today exactly how many board members we might anticipate. As with the structuring of most such boards, I would certainly want to ensure that there was a strong regional representation, or sectoral representation, in particular to ensure that the people of the Eastern Arctic were properly represented on that water board.

Senator Adams: In the meantime, before any licence is approved, the decisions of those boards will have to go through the minister from the Northwest Territories, and from there to you for final approval for that licence?

Mr. Siddon: In the case of the minor users for which there would be a less onerous application process, it would not be mandatory that public hearings be held. That would be a matter at the discretion of the chairman of the water board. The water board chairman could sign and issue licences without recourse to the minister.

In the case of major or Type A water users, the final approval of a particular project and water licence would rest with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The minister could delegate that authority by special arrangement to the appropriate territorial government minister, and that would anticipate the likelihood of devolution of these authorities to the territorial government and could anticipate the ultimate division of the Northwest Territories into two territories, at which time appropriate amendments to the N.W.T. Waters Act would result.

Flexibility is built into the legislation which allows for an orderly progression toward devolution and local authority in the decision-making process.

Senator Adams: As you know, we passed Bill C-13 about 20 minutes ago. Is it correct, as the Minister of the Environment has stated, that the passage of Bill C-13 will not affect the future approval of licences to mining companies in the territories?

Mr. Siddon: Senator Adams, the environmental assessment legislation which you have just passed, deals with the broad questions of environmental impact which might result from a particular development project which could encompass the impact on fisheries, wildlife, human health and many other factors surrounding forest lands.

The waters legislation, on the other hand, provides an administrative regime for the use of water alone and how the use of that water must be regulated to ensure that the interests of other water users are not negatively impacted and, in the process, to ensure that what is deposited into the water does not cause a harmful environmental consequence.

Therefore, the Northwest Territories Waters Act and the Yukon Waters Act will provide a regime for licensing the use of water, but they will not administer these other environmental factors and pressures which may arise. The legislation before the house today is designed to be compatible with the environmental assessment legislation and the Canadian Environmental Protection Act which has now been in place for two years.

If there is the necessary screening relating to the way in which water is used, it will be done in a way such as to conform with the requirements of the environmental assessment and review legislation so that there will be no duplication. But if larger questions relating to the impact of a project on wildlife or other natural amenities were to be a consequence of a project, that would be reviewed under the environmental assessment legislation which has just been passed.

Senator Adams: Do you anticipate long delays in the future? I am a member of the committee which studied Bill C-13. Some mining companies which appeared before the committee were against this legislation because they thought it would result in long delays in the future for mining companies that want to develop the mining industry. Implementing the provisions in Bills C-51 and C-52 will be a long process. In the meantime, they will have to go through the Minister of the Environment. How many months or years will that take? Many projects could be lost. Approval for small projects may only take a couple months, but for bigger ones it may take a year.

Mr. Siddon: It is a fact that those who have been accustomed to pursuing development in northern Canada have not, in the past, been unduly burdened by excessive regulation or processes, and they are very uneasy about any additional regulatory requirements or onerous penalties for noncompliance.

One of the purposes of bringing forward these two new pieces of legislation is to separate large-scale projects, or what we call "the projects of major water users", from the fairly routine projects and which are seasonal in nature, such as placer mining. So we have provided a second category of licences, the minor users licences, or "B" licences, where there would be a very streamlined process.

One purpose for the amendments was to provide a very quick screening process which did not have to get involved in a large number of other environmental factors but was only to focus on how much water was to be used, how it would be taken from the river or stream, and how it would be redeposited to ensure that a lot of silt or other contaminants would not be dumped into the main water course, doing damage to fish, for example.

There is in the proposed new legislation a means of fast-tracking these processes to the benefit of many of the interests of which the senators speaks.

Senator Hays: It is a pleasure to join with Senator Murray in welcoming you, Mr. Siddon. It is good to see you again.

One of my questions has been covered in part by Senator Adams. It has to do with the legislation we have just dealt with in this place. As I understand your answer to Senator Adams' question, you do not envisage these water boards ever falling under the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, but rather that this kind of environmental regulation will always be carried out "stand-alone" from the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. That somewhat surprises me because many have suggested that this kind of environmental regulation would logically fall under this new legislation.

Mr. Siddon: Senator Hays, I did seek to point out that we do not wish to duplicate unnecessarily the processes provided for under the environmental assessment legislation and that are provided for here. In a technical way, this legislation deals exclusively with the use of water, the processes which must be followed, and the penalties for noncompliance.

At the same time, there is incorporated in the legislation provision for public hearings, as there was under the old Northern Inland Waters Act. Under the existing Inland Waters Act, public hearings are required to be held by the respective water boards. In the new legislation, where minor licences are concerned, public hearings will not be mandatory, but we will expect the chairman and the members of the water boards to take into consideration any concerns that might be expressed by the public with respect to broader environmental consequences. If those concerns are triggered, appropriate screening would have to be initiated under the environmental assessment and review process.

I am told that there has only been one major northern mining project referred to an EARP panel to date. That was the Baker Lake uranium mine which I think you could imagine would be, for obvious reasons, of a broader interest than that which pertains to the use of water.

I believe there is an adequate linkage built in between this proposed legislation and the broader environmental review process.

Senator Hays: My last question has to do with notes that I have received to the effect that some native communities that are still in the process of settling land claims in the Yukon would prefer that the bill which applies to the Yukon not be passed at this time, or at least not be finalized until after their land settlement is finalized. If that is the situation, why is the government not responding to it?

Mr. Siddon: In fact, senator, there was quite an extensive debate on this question when the bill was before the legislative committee and then the Committee of the Whole in the House of Commons. In some of the land claims agreements under negotiation there is provision—and the federal government has accepted the request—that laws adopted under first nations government, or which are incorporated in land claim settlement agreements, will take precedence over existing laws of general application.

Because we have negotiated an umbrella final agreement, and we are in the process of negotiating final band agreements with individual Yukon First Nations, the Council of Yukon Indians has suggested that this principle of paramountcy be incorporated in the present legislation, Bill C-52 in this case since it pertains to Yukon, in anticipation of concluding the land claim agreement.

There was an attempt in the other place to amend Bills C-51 and C-52 to recognize the paramountcy of aboriginal land claims agreements where those agreements provide for special authorities or recognition of aboriginal rights. Our response to that suggestion has been that we cannot anticipate a land claim agreement until it is signed. The Government of Canada will certainly live up to all its undertakings as provided for in such an agreement, but the agreement in itself has no weight or force in law until the settlement legislation is enacted by Parliament.

When the land claim agreement is concluded and the settlement legislation, or the self-government legislation as the case may be, is brought to Parliament, our undertaking in each case is to clearly incorporate in that legislation consequential amendments to this legislation to accommodate those special circumstances within the territories that would be the subject of that land claim agreement. We did not feel it would be proper practice to anticipate such agreements until they had been negotiated, ratified and brought to Parliament.

Senator Kinsella: May I have a brief explanation of the words set out in clause 33, which state:

> The Governor in Council may make regulations
> (a) on the recommendation of the Minister and the Board,

What do you envisage in practice for both boards? In clause 10 the bill allows for a range of four to nine members. What do you envisage in terms of the size of the two boards?

Mr. Siddon: Senator Kinsella, as I indicated in response to Senator Adams, I would like to ensure adequate representation of all interests with which a particular board might deal. Those interests might be different in Yukon than in the Northwest Territories.

My guess is that the number of members would be somewhere between six and nine. For example, in the Northwest Territories, we would have to be concerned with the Dene people, the Métis people, the Inuit people, as well as the Government of the Northwest Territories, the mining industry, prospectors and environmental interest groups. Somehow, we would have to reflect this range or complexity of interests in the structuring of the water board as a result.

Could you repeat the first part of your question, senator?

Senator Kinsella: Is it right that under clause 33 the regulations may only be made on the recommendation of both the minister and the board?

Mr. Siddon: It has been explained to me, senator, that that provision only applies to the particular matters delineated under clause 33, subclauses (a) and (b), that is, those which deal with water management areas consisting of river basins or other geographical areas and substances and classes of substances. They are matters in which the expertise of the water board would have significant bearing. The minister should not make decisions on regulations without at the same time taking into account the expertise of those who sit as members of the water board.

Senator Frith: That will give you some idea, minister, of how we handle simple, non-controversial, unanimously supported bills.

Mr. Siddon: Senator Frith, I would not want to make any comparisons to the other place in responding to your comment. I find it quite cordial around here. One wonders if one would have to be elected to arrive in this place.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the minister is always welcome here in the unreformed Senate of Canada. On that pleasant note it remains only for me to thank him and his officials for their attendance before the committee, for his explanations and for having dealt so thoroughly with the questions that honourable senators put to him.

Thank you, minister.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Honourable senators, is it your wish to dispense with clause-by-clause consideration of the bills?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall I report both bills without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting is resumed.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-51, respecting water resources in the Northwest Territories, has examined the said bill and has directed me to report the same without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time, honourable senators?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred Bill C-52, respecting water resources in the Yukon Territory, has examined the said bill and has directed me to report the same without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time, honourable senators?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: With leave, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the third reading of Bill C-70, to amend the Criminal Code (jury).

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

AN ACT TO AMEND CERTAIN ACTS IN RELATION TO PENSIONS

AND TO ENACT THE SPECIAL RETIREMENT ARRANGEMENTS ACT

AND THE PENSION BENEFITS DIVISION ACT

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Teed, seconded by the Honourable Senator Simard, for the second reading of Bill C-55, An Act to amend certain Acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Acts and the Pension Benefits Division Act.

Hon. Royce Frith: Honourable senators, I want to make a few observations about Bill C-55, after which I hope the bill will be given second reading and referred to committee today.

Honourable senators, it is no secret that the proportion of Canada's population generally described as "elders" or "seniors" is increasing. It has been reported that this trend is responsible for the CBC's decision to move The National and The Journal up one hour from 10 p.m. to 9 p.m., the theory being that baby-boomers are going to bed earlier these days.

These baby-boomers will soon be ready to retire. Retirement is often said to be the golden age when people enjoy the fruits of their lifelong labour. However, there is the other side of the coin to retirement and that is the financial-planning side. Besides doing the things planned for over the years, retirees must take into account that they will be on a fixed income for the rest of their lives, usually lower than the income to which they were accustomed.

Governments have a particular role to play with respect to the financial position of retirees. They must provide a framework for pension plans to ensure a stable financial setting for Canada's older citizens.

Through legislation, the federal government regulates standards for pensions. First, the Pension Benefits Standards Act defines minimum standards for pension plans for federally-regulated employers, while, second, the Public Service Superannuation Act regulates the pension plan for federal public servants. The third general area is the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act which deals with pensions for members of Parliament.

Bill C-55 deals with the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act, and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. I will try to confine my remarks to the first two of these, that is PSSA and MPRAA.

The most recent Public Service Commission Annual Report indicates there are approximately 212,000 full-time employees in the federal public service. These are the people who run the approximately 70 federal departments and agencies which deliver government programs to Canadians. It is important that those who are attracted to the public service and who make their careers there are highly qualified people. The Commission partially ensures this by relying on the merit principle in selecting candidates.

In the private sector, qualified candidates are usually attracted by the offer of higher wages. In the public service, we seek to do this by offering a combination of competitive wages and benefits. One of those benefits is the pension plan.

Bill C-55 has, as its purpose—and I think this is important—the promotion of equality and fairness in pension legislation. It proposes to do this by amending legislation which covers the federal public service pension plan and the Members of Parliament pension plan.

With respect to the public service pension plan, the bill attempts to introduce fairness by dealing with issues such as pension-credit splitting on marriage breakdown, allowing part-time employees to contribute to the pension plan, and improving the leave-without-pay provisions vis-à-vis pension contributions.

Senator Teed covered these but just to remind you, the current legislation does not allow for the splitting of pension credits in the event of the breakdown of a marriage or common-law relationship. In today's society, divorce and common-law relationship breakdown is a more common occurrence than it has been in the past. The bill before us recognizes this trend and attempts to bring an element of fairness to the respective financial positions of the former partners. Again, we underline the word "fairness" which is the sought-after leitmotif for this legislation. It would permit the division of plan members' pension benefits at source. With a spousal agreement or court order, up to 50 per cent of the pension credits could be transferred to a retirement savings vehicle for the spouse. The plan member's benefits would be adjusted accordingly. This provision would place a portion of the pension benefits under the direct control of the ex-spouse, rather than having to rely on the goodwill of the former spouse to make pension payments every month.

While this is an improvement over the current legislation, further improvement would have been possible. It would still be applied for in the courts with the costs that go along with the court action. This act will establishe the right, but the enforcement requires resort to the courts. This indicates that the bill does not recognize the, to use a popular expression in another context, "inherent right" of ex-spouses to share in pension benefits.

On the second issue, another reality that the bill works toward realizing is the existence of part-time employees in the public service and their need for pension coverage. The Public Service Commission reports that approximately 5,500 employees in the public service are part-time workers. Currently, employees who work less than 30 hours per week cannot pay into the pension plan and, consequently, they cannot draw a pension when they retire.

Under this legislation, part-time employees who work a minimum of 12 hours per week would be able to pay into and receive benefits from the pension fund. Those employees would also have the option of buying back previous years of part-time service, as far back as 1980. All current and future part-time employees would be required to pay into the pension plan.

Note, they will be "required", which makes one wonder whether this requirement will cause any financial hardship on part-time employees who may have no interest or expectation of receiving a public service pension plan. It is a sort of compulsory check-off, and I am sure the committee will give consideration to that requirement.

My third and last point concerns periods of leave without pay. Bill C-65 also recognizes that circumstances may force an employee to take periods of leave from his or her job over the course of his or her career. It would allow employees on leave without pay for a period of more than three months to choose whether or not to count as pensionable service that amount in excess of three months. Again, it is a question of fairness. The employee is allowed by the bill to "buy back" the period and pay for it at a later date over a longer time frame. This is another provision that promotes fairness and equality in the Canadian workplace.

Although there are some good provisions in this part of the bill, there are a number of areas that could be looked at by the committee because they seem to have been ignored. For example, there is no indexing guarantee to ensure the future security of inflation protection. The bill also does not address the comparability of the rate of return of pension plan investments to private sector plans and does not discuss the basic plan design or its management. Perhaps we should ask ourselves whether we should go a little deeper, and whether we are not just skimming the surface of this problem and the application of fairness to its solution.

The last part of the bill that I should like to deal with is that concerning the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. Salaries and pensions for members of the House of Commons and senators seem always to be a sore point with the public —in fact, a sore point for everyone: The public, the media, and the members of the House of Commons and senators themselves. There are, and have been, many suggestions for pain killers with respect to this sore point.

In 1989, the Commission to Review Allowances of Members of Parliament examined the perception that parliamentarians are overpaid, overpensioned and underworked. The commission found, upon examination of that perception, that:

> By the very nature of their job, Members of the House of Commons face considerable pressures: 60- to 80-hour work weeks; no job security; considerable travel; no privacy; and demands from constituents, interest groups and political parties. In addition, parliamentary life is very difficult for members of either House of Parliament who have a family. It is easier for those MPs with grown or no children or those who are independently wealthy. They, however, are in the minority. Most MPs are middle-income earners with families. In this, they are representative of most Canadians.

I have no statistics, but I think that most senators would be so described.

The commission recognized the sacrifices many members of both houses make. They also recognized the need to attract capable persons to office. Thus, salaries for legislators are somewhat competitive with the private sector, while the pension plan recognizes the risks inherent in being a legislator.

How will Bill C-55 affect the pensions of members of the House of Commons and senators? Not very much. Primarily, the act would be amended by this bill in order to achieve compliance with the Income Tax Act.

Currently, MP's pensions accrue at the rate of five per cent a year, while senators' pensions accrue at the rate of three percent a year. The maximum allowed by the Income Tax Act, as of January 1, 1992, is two per cent. These pensions are collectible at any age after six years of service. However, tax rules require a reduction in pensions payable before certain age and service thresholds are met.

The bill would divide the current legislation into two parts: the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Account, otherwise known as RAA, and the Members of Parliament Retiring Compensation Arrangements Account, or the RCA. The RAA—that is, the Members of Parliament Retirement Allowances Act— would provide benefits permitted under pension plans registered with Revenue Canada under the Income Tax Act. The other one, the RCA— that is, the Compensation Arrangements Account—would provide benefits not permitted under plans registered with Revenue Canada under the act. There are no reductions in benefit levels or accrual rates, and there would be no change to the ages at which benefits are payable.

The bill does not work towards bringing fairness into legislators' pensions as MP's pensions will still accrue at a greater rate than that for senators.

That brings us back to the sore point. Because it is a sore point, it is not often that legislators have an opportunity to deal with their pension plans. If there is any unfairness or inequality as between the pension plans for members of the House of Commons and for the Senate—as I believe there is—then, colleagues, this is an opportunity to correct that unfairness rather than consolidate that unfairness and inequality.

In my own experience, this opportunity has only come up twice in 15 years. The last time the members of the House of Commons wanted to increase their pensions—they are unable to do so, of course, unless the statute providing that their pensions be changed be approved by the Senate—the inequality was pointed out. The government asked if senators had a specific set of studies and a refined plan to address and remedy the inequality. The senators did not. The government then said, "Get one and we will consider it." I am telescoping here; I have quite a large file on the subject.

I was Deputy Leader of the Government at the time. We set up a committee. We had the actuaries in and we studied all the costs of equalizing and found the costs to be low on an annual basis: a one time six-figure payment, and after that something like $35,000 or $40,000 a year—not per senator but for all senators in order to address the inequality.

We almost got the item cleared, but all the parties in the House of Commons could not agree. The bus door closed and the bus left. But the bus has just come around again, because we are dealing with amendments to the pension legislation.

For the record, here is how the pension arrangements compare, and here are the facts for the committee to consider. If the objective is to have the same plan as the House of Commons, the Senate plan would be a mandatory contribution of six per cent of basic salary; the House of Commons plan, a mandatory contribution of 10 per cent of basic salary.

With respect to maximum pensions, the rule for the Senate is 75 percent of the average of the best six consecutive years after 25 years. The maximum pension for the House of Commons is 75 per cent of the average of the best six consecutive years after 15 years. Accrual rate for the Senate is three per cent per year. Accrual rate for the House of Commons is five per cent per year. Of course, senators would need to make up whatever contribution was necessary in order to bring the plan up to the level of that of the MP's.

The current system has been said to be inequitable for some recipients. Of senators who are currently receiving a pension, 10 per cent receive less than $5,000 per annum. This is as of May 8, 1990. Approximately 55 per cent receive less than $15,000 per annum. Approximately 80 per cent receive less than $25,000 per annum. Of surviving spouses, 19 per cent receive less than $5,000 per annum; 63 per cent receive less than $10,000 per annum; 75 per cent receive less than $16,000 per annum; and none receive above $25,000 per annum.

An improved plan is possible. It would require amendments to the Member of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. Amendments to that act are before us now, Parts I and III.

Honourable senators, my parting question is: Based on Bill C-55's alleged principle of fairness and equality, it seems to me that there is not fairness and equality in the pension plans as between the Senate and the House of Commons.

I leave it to the committee to consider that lack of equality and lack of fairness in that comparison, and offer to provide more detail of the information I have put on the record if the committee wishes to address it. I ask the committee to consider that question and in its report to us I hope that it will include some recommendations, including amendments if necessary, or if thought appropriate, fair and equitable, to remedy what is a long-standing inequity and unfairness in the pension provisions for members of the House of Commons and senators.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, for Senator Teed, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON CANADIAN FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS TABLED

Leave having been granted to revert to Reports from Committees:

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the twenty-second report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce as part of a special study of the proposed regulations arising from the new legislation to reform Canadian financial institutions.

This is the second interim report and it is on the transformation of mutual insurance companies in Canada.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Poitras, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE DESIGNATED TO REVIEW REGULATIONS PROPOSED BY CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Bill C-81, which was passed last night and to which Royal Assent will be given today, requires that a copy of each regulation that the Chief Electoral Officer proposes to make be deposited with the Clerk of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Commons, and that these regulations then be referred to a committee of the House of Commons, and to a committee of the Senate to be chosen by the Senate.

To provide for this, I move the following motion: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(i), I move:

That pursuant to subclauses (6) and (7) of clause 7 of Bill C-81, An Act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be the designated committee to review the regulations proposed by the Chief Electoral Officer.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

Senator Frith: Very prudent, and we will all infer that you are planning a referendum this summer.

THE SENATE

FELICITATIONS TO SENATORS AND STAFF

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Before moving the adjournment motion, honourable senators, which will include a date in September that we hope can be respected, we must nonetheless keep in mind in our summer plans the possibility of being called back in July or August to deal with the matter Senator Frith has just mentioned.

I want to thank all the employees of the Senate who have made our task that much easier over the last few months. As was the case at Christmas, I do not intend to name any one group or any one individual in particular. Unfortunately, for obvious reasons we are not able to be in contact with all of the personnel; so to those whom we see casually, those with whom we are in contact on a day-to-day basis, and those whom we hardly if ever see, I want to express appreciation for their excellent efforts on our behalf.

[Translation]

— and for meeting the requirements of each and every senator in order to make their tasks easier.

[English]

This session has seen a lot of legislation passed. It has been a productive few months, and it could not have been done without the cooperation of all senators.

Senator Molgat mentioned a few weeks ago that he was pleased that, in the last-minute rush, legislation was getting to this place a little faster than normal. I want to thank him and his colleagues for their cooperation, which allowed the legislation to get through. Positions have been maintained; arguments have been advanced. All the time necessary has been provided to debate each bill, and the results have been more than satisfactory.

SAINT-JEAN-BAPTISTE DAY

BEST WISHES

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to wish my fellow Quebecers an excellent, wonderful and happy national holiday tomorrow.

We in Quebec are very lucky compared to other Canadians. We can celebrate our belonging to Canada twice in a week; tomorrow we celebrate our pride in being Quebecers and next week, our pride in being Canadians.

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Government Notices of Motions:

Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, September 22, 1992, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to say a few words to associate my views and those of my group with the words expressed by the Deputy Leader of the Government.

I particularly want to thank the staff. I know that this is a place of great uncertainty. You never know when things will happen and when they will not happen. You lay plans, and all of a sudden you must change them. No one is affected more than the members of the staff. It is much more difficult for them than it is for the senators. We appreciate very much their continued support. They maintain a good, spirited attitude through it all and never seem to complain. We owe them a great debt.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, my comments apply, of course, to those staff members we see here in the Chamber and all the others whom we do not see but who support us throughout the year.

With respect to the comments regarding the work of the Senate, we have indeed accomplished a great deal. As I mentioned a few days ago, we received legislation from the other place a little earlier than normal. I was not asked to give leave too frequently, and, when I was asked, it was under circumstances that were understandable. Honourable senators, that is a much better way to run our affairs.

I join in wishing all of you a very pleasant and well-deserved summer holiday.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

INFORMATION

ANNUAL REPORT OF COMMISSIONER TABLED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the report of the Information Commissioner for the period ended March 31, 1992.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the Senate will now adjourn during pleasure to await the arrival of the Honourable the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Gérard V. La Forest, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Airport Transfer (Miscellaneous Matters) Act (Bill S-11, Chapter 42, 1992)

An Act to amend An Act to incorporate the Northwest Canada Conference Evangelical Church (Bill S-9)

An Act to incorporate Green Shield Canada (Bill S-10)

An Act to amalgamate The Montreal Board of Trade and The Chamber of Commerce of Metropolitan Montreal (Bill S-12) The Honourable Andrée Champagne, P.C., Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable The Deputy Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bills:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March 1993 (Bill C-87, Chapter 43, 1992)

To which I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bills.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy of his Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to ignore the clock?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-62, RESPECTING TELECOMMUNICATIONS—CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Ninth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications (Subject-matter of Bill C-62, An Act respecting telecommunications), presented in the Senate on June 22, 1992.—(Honourable Senator Oliver).

Hon. Donald H. Oliver moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, yesterday I had the honour to present the Ninth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications which deals with Bill C-62, an act respecting telecommunications.

This report, adopted unanimously by the committee, represents the culmination of many hours of hearings and long hours of work on the part of senators who participated in the pre-study. The importance of the subject matter of this bill is such that I wish to comment on the process the committee went through and on the report that was tabled.

The committee had the advantage of having the services of several excellent researchers and technical assistants: Professor Hudson Janisch, a well-known Canadian authority on telecommunications; Mr. René Lemieux; Mrs. Susan Alter; and Mr. Bruce Carson.

Our committee conducted a pre-study of Bill C-62. As you know, the pre-study process began some 20 years ago in this place with Senator Salter Haydon, who chaired the then National Finance and Banking Committee. It is a process whereby the subject matter of a bill may be studied by the Senate while the bill is still before the House of Commons. It works best when the bill is complicated but the subject matter is not politically controversial, which, I believe, is the case with Bill C-62. Certainly, I am hard pressed to think of an area which is more complicated. We were particularly fortunate in the pre-study in that Bill C-62 had only received first reading in the House of Commons. Our committee was then perfectly placed to offer recommendations or amendments which could be adopted by the house during its committee stage of the bill, after second reading.

I am aware that pre-study has not been common in this place since 1984. I believe it should become commonplace again. It allows the Senate to efficiently and effectively fulfil its legislative function in Parliament. As well, it gives the Senate a meaningful role in the policy-making process of the central Parliament. If we can study the subject matter of legislation prior to either approval in principle, or the commencement of committee stage in the House of Commons and make meaningful recommendations, then we are performing a legitimate legislative function. I believe this bill will benefit from the committee's deliberations and that more ministers should consider sending their bills to the Senate for pre-study.

During the period from May 14, 1992 to June 8, 1992 the committee held public hearings. More than 90 witnesses attended, representing 39 organizations. We were particularly fortunate with the high calibre of information and insights elicited during this process. The witnesses, rather than simply answering prepared questions with prepared answers, actually entered into a dialogue with members of the committee. The pros and cons of each clause were debated back and forth between senators and witnesses. Many witnesses approached me privately after the hearings to comment on the high quality of debate and the fact that they were eager to supply as much information as the committee needed in order to write its report. For example, representatives of Stentor, formerly Telecom Canada, stayed with us for approximately an hour beyond their scheduled time in order to give us as much information as possible and to answer our questions.

I wish to thank both the Minister of Communications, the Honourable Perrin Beatty, and representatives from the CRTC for appearing twice before the committee. Not only did they appear on two occasions but they undertook to answer, and in fact did answer, written questions put to them by the committee.

We felt our hearings and subsequent deliberations over our report took on an added importance because the minister informed us that he was looking forward to receiving our recommendations and would not hesitate, provided they did not go towards the pillars of the act, to incorporate them into the bill through amendments put in the House of Commons.

In addition to the minister and the CRTC representatives, we were fortunate to hear witnesses who represent every facet of the telecommunications industry. Their presentations and briefs were extremely useful. They will certainly prove to be useful in the other place during its study of Bill C-62.

At the risk of leaving someone out, we found particularly helpful the briefs presented by Telesat, Stentor, Rogers Communications and the Media and Communications Law Section of the Canadian Bar Association. These witnesses not only commented on the legislation, but prepared amendments to the text. As well, representatives from all the major trade associations appeared before us, including those from the resellers.

We also benefited from the appearance of the Consumers Association of Canada and four unions involved in the telecommunications area, including the Canadian Labour Congress. All of these witnesses were particularly forthcoming and helpful; and when we asked for follow-up material to be delivered to us, invariably it arrived in a timely fashion and was of great use in the writing of our report.

Virtually all sectors and regions of the country have said that this legislation is a priority. Business representatives of consumers and numerous studies have all concluded that a modern and efficient legislative framework is crucial to Canada's competitiveness in telecommunications.

The Railway Act has regulated our telecommunications industry for the past 90 years. It was designed in 1908, an era of slow-moving, small and scattered markets. It now presents regulatory impediments to modern markets that must respond quickly to new business opportunities.

I would now like to deal with the specifics of our report. By way of introduction I believe it is important to consider the changing nature of the telecommunications industry in Canada. It employs over 125,000 people and generates over $21 billion in revenues. In 1990 the industry achieved a growth rate of 8.6 per cent after inflation, compared with a 0.3 per cent growth rate achieved by the national economy. As a percentage of GDP, the industry is larger than agriculture, twice the size of mining, and over four times the size of logging and forestry. It is Canada's leading high-tech industry.

The telecommunications industry is of vital importance to the other businesses in Canada. In order for other businesses to be competitive in world markets, it is necessary that we have the best telecommunications network possible.

It is of critical importance for Canada to have innovative and low-priced telecommunications services. This will only come, as Allen Taylor, the Chairman and CEO of the Royal Bank, expressed in a letter to the committee when he said, "If there is competition among service providers, then only with competition will competitiveness be achieved." The telecommunications industry in Canada is in a period of transition from monopoly to competition. Competition was, of course, spurred on by the recent CRTC decision in the Unitel case.

The commission in that case came down squarely in favour of "open competition" for all new carriers who could meet the entry rules laid down in the decision. Bill C-62 will have to be capable of accommodating, guiding and furthering this massive transition.

The committee in its deliberations, however, kept in mind that, in the furthering of competitiveness, we should not lose sight of the needs of the general public, including low-income Canadians. We recognized that balance must be found between ensuring and encouraging business competitiveness on a national and international scale and the need to ensure universal, affordable, reliable telephone service for Canadians.

We heard from witnesses of the "chaos" that followed deregulation in the United States and the break-up of AT & T. We are not deregulating in Canada, and we believe we can benefit from the experience in the United States.

Bill C-62, in typical Canadian fashion, attempts to find a middle ground. It provides for limited regulatory forbearance with some room for tighter forms of regulation. I believe it is only fair to say that, while much was made of the situation a few years ago in the United States, we heard no hard evidence of contemporary consumer dissatisfaction with competition in the United States.

What clearly emerged in the hearings was a consensus that Canada needs comprehensive new legislation to ensure that it reaps the full economic and social benefits of its strengths in telecommunications.

Bill C-62 provides national legislation for a national industry. It grants the regulator the CRTC clear authority to forbear selectively from full regulation. It authorizes a more flexible and innovative regulatory process which is more responsive to the changing nature of the telecommunications industry itself.

This industry is almost fully Canadian-owned. It is a crucial agent of economic development—not only because Canada is growing, but because the services it provides are essential to the competitiveness of many other industries. Our financial institutions, transport companies, manufacturers, retailers, the service sector—and countless others—rely on an advanced communications systems to do business at home and to compete in world markets.

However, at the present time, with the Unitel decision in hand, Bill C-62 provides important restrictions on the ownership of major carriers in the telecommunications industry. Clause 18 of Bill C-62 provides that the major telecoms must have 80 per cent Canadian ownership. This will discourage AT & T coming into Canada to take advantage of the Unitel decision. Also, we have recommended that holding companies in the industry be at least two-thirds Canadian-owned.

These are the only restrictions on foreign ownership in telecommunications, and it is important that they be put into effect as soon as possible. With the Unitel decision and with no restrictions, telecommunications in Canada is vulnerable. It is of vital importance that this bill be proceeded with now.

The bill also responds to the Supreme Court of Canada's AGT decision of 1989 which granted exclusive jurisdiction over the major telecommunications carriers to the federal government. Subsequently, six out of seven provinces affected by that decision signed agreements with the federal government on telecommunications—that is close to 90 per cent agreement. It establishes, in the words of the Royal Bank, "one national telecommunications environment." We believe this to be of vital importance. Clause 3 of Bill C-62 places provincially-owned telecommunications companies within the scope of federal legislation.

The Province of Manitoba has reacted well to this new reality and has entered into a Memorandum of Understanding with the federal government. The implementation of this agreement awaits the passage of this legislation.

Although Bill C-62 is national legislation, applying to an industry that is national in scope, one of the most important aspects of this bill is that it recognizes that, because of the economic impacts of telecommunications, the provinces have a legitimate interest in the development of Canada's telecommunications system. The government has, in part through Bill C-62, and in part through other measures, ensured that the provinces will be involved in the decisions that will shape Canada's telecommunications future.

This brings me to the problem of Saskatchewan. The Government of Saskatchewan, representing Sask Tel, is opposed to this legislation. This opposition flies in the face of recommendations made by the Saskatchewan Branch of the Consumers' Association of Canada and recommendations of the Prairie Task Force on Telecommunications. The Consumers' Association has stated that regulation must occur on a national level to avoid duplication and the possibility of contradictory findings at two sets of hearings held on the same subject matter. The Minister of Communications has also pointed out that, through national regulation, rates in Saskatchewan would be set as part of a public process. We regret that the Government of Saskatchewan denied access to the committee of the report of experts which we understand is positive in its support of national regulations.

The committee, in its report, has urged the Government of Saskatchewan to reconsider its position. I publicly request it to reconsider. The minister has offered to meet with officials in Saskatchewan in order to draft a MOU satisfactory to Saskatchewan. We understand that Saskatchewan is concerned with Section 7, the objectives section of the bill. Your committee has suggested changes which, perhaps, could be considered by all parties.

Bill C-62 is vitally important to the telecommunications industry at this time. It creates vehicles, especially through regulatory forbearance, to encourage competitiveness. It establishes Canadian content rules for those who wish to enter the industry, and it establishes a national regime of regulations. These are all of tremendous importance, especially in light of the CRTC decision in the Unitel case, which I referred to before, which allows competition in the industry, as this will encourage new participants as we move away from the monopoly-based industry.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Oliver, under rule 27, your time is up. Of course, as usual, if senators wish to give unanimous consent, you may continue.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Oliver: It is not my intention to repeat verbatim every recommendation of the report and the reasoning behind each recommendation. However, I wish to elaborate on a few—especially where the committee recommended substantive changes to the bill.

The committee supports the concept of placing policy objectives in the bill. By the linkage of policy objectives and regulatory powers, Parliament will have given the clearest possible guidance to those responsible for the implementation of the legislation. However, the committee was not impressed with the objectives as contained in the bill. The objectives did not emphasize competitiveness to the degree that the committee thought necessary. In some ways it reads like a grocery list. We have redrafted it and have included another draft given to us in an appendix to the report.

The committee believes that, through the creation of a competitive environment which is regulated by the CRTC in the fashion envisaged in this bill, Canada will be able to maintain affordable, reliable, universally accessible telecommunications service, and will still be able to advance to a leadership role in this industry in the world.

We expressed concern in the report with the potential that the bill creates for political interference with the quasi-judicial process of the CRTC through the power of direction, exemption and the vary or rescind power. The Minister has more discretionary authority over the industry than we believe is needed. We have therefore recommended that the exemption power be transferred to the CRTC; that the power to issue directives regarding national security, foreign policy, and international communications be eliminated from the bill; and that the "vary or rescind" power contained in clause 13 be changed to a "set aside or refer back" power. It might be worthwhile when the bill is being considered in the other place for them to examine the possibility of that "refer back" taking place before the "setting aside." In other words, if on the "refer back" the asked-for changes are not made, then the minister might consider setting the decision aside.

Bill C-62 seeks to establish a ministerial licensing regime for Canadian carriers. Your committee has recommended that the idea not be proceeded with. We believe that it would do nothing to enhance competitiveness and, in fact, would submit the industry to a totally unnecessary form of regulation. We note in our report that entry control, consultation with provinces and the enforcement of Canadian ownership criteria can be accomplished through other means, most notably the CRTC.

Your committee notes that forbearance is at the heart of Bill C-62. It allows competition to take place whenever competition is sufficient to ensure an open market. We have made recommendations that there be a presumption of forbearance where effective competition exists. We also heard from witnesses who stated that once forbearance is established, there should be a presumption against re-imposing regulation.

We also believe that with forbearance there is a positive role to be played by the Director of the Bureau of Competition Policy. We suggest that he be consulted in the exercise of exemption or forbearance powers.

Witnesses also suggested that when considering forbearance, the CRTC take into account the public interest. Senator Spivak was one who elicited this from a number of witnesses. The commission may also wish to examine local circumstances to determine whether competition exists and forbearance should be ordered.

The issue of the protection of privacy came up for discussion before our committee on a number of occasions. We recommended that the bill be amended to take into account the concerns expressed by the many witnesses. These concerns went far beyond the mere elimination of junk faxes and unwanted phone calls. Perhaps a new section could be placed in the bill giving the CRTC power to deal with this issue in the course of its regulatory procedures.

Your committee recommended that a time limit be placed on the CRTC for the making of decisions. This may be another area that could be looked at in the other place. It has been suggested that perhaps a more positive way to deal with regulatory lag is to develop measures to speed up the decision-making process. Alternatively, a presumption could be established in law that a matter is approved until a study is completed showing that it should not have been approved.

In conclusion, recent events make it even more urgent that we deal with Bill C-62. In its decision of June 12 on competition and long distance service, the CRTC underscored the strategic importance of telecommunications to the efficiency and competitiveness of the Canadian economy. The commission further determined that increased reliance on competition is the best means of meeting the future needs of Canadians. Without Bill C-62, we would have the undesirable result of a competitive marketplace subject to legislation and designed for the regulation of monopolies. Unnecessary regulatory requirements would dilute the benefits of competition.

We live in a time when technological change takes place at an ever-increasing rate. What is unthinkable today is implemented tomorrow and then overtaken by some other invention a week later. We must move in the direction of allowing competitiveness a place to thrive. Government must step back from its position of regulating every aspect of the industry and let the marketplace affect business and business affect the marketplace.

We believe this bill is a first step along the way to creating an environment where competitiveness can flourish. We also believe that the Canadian goal of universal, affordable telephone service can still be maintained. I urge the government to proceed with this bill, but at the same time urge the government to consider our recommendations very carefully and to incorporate them.

I thank you, honourable senators, for letting me exceed my allotted time.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I will begin by congratulating Senator Oliver for the expeditious way in which he presided over the committee deliberations on what is obviously a very complicated piece of legislation. I want to commend other honourable senators who participated in a very meaningful way.

I also had quite extensive remarks on this particular bill but, in view of my interest in speaking on another report from this committee, I will confine myself to just a few concerns that we have noted. It may be that I will be able to get back the time that I give up at this time.

As Senator Oliver said, this has been a very exhaustive study. We spent long hours and days examining this bill in a comparatively short period of time. We have heard from a range of industry representatives, from unions, from groups representing low-income Canadians and so on.

It would be worthwhile, I suggest, for all honourable senators to examine that very extensive list of witnesses. I think it is fair to say that we have advanced Parliament's understanding of telecommunications issues in a very meaningful way. We, of course, hope that our insights and suggestions for improvement will not only help deliberations in Parliament but also the debate among Canadians on the issues at stake in this dynamic telecommunications environment.

I do hope that this is not the last time we address telecommunications issues in Parliament because we have certainly learned that this industry's rapid pace of evolution and its tremendous economic impact requires the constant attention of policy makers. I encourage colleagues in both chambers to keep this issue near the top of their list of priorities.

The committee did a very good job and members of the committee on this side welcome the report as a significant step in the development of a new framework for telecommunications in Canada, but we are cautious about some of the committee's recommendations and I would like to explain just a few of those concerns.

There are some points in the bill which require very serious discussion and review. The last word has obviously not been spoken, but we have not all reached the same conclusion on some issues, and we believe that further study is needed. This is not a minority report. I would call it, perhaps, our minority paragraph in order to transmit our concerns to Parliament.

That being said, let me now address some of the issues that we believe merit further consideration by Parliament in its deliberations on this legislation.

I think it is fair to say that there is still a debate over how resellers should be treated with respect to this bill. There are arguments by the industry that the present definition of resellers in the legislation would see them being regulated. I believe that the Department of Communications disagrees. We think the pre-study report serves to focus attention on this issue but we believe that further study is indeed required.

I also hasten to add the suggestion I have heard that resellers might be able to have their concerns met through the forbearance clause or the exemption power of the bill. Because these serious questions remain, we believe the issue of resellers should be the subject of further consideration.

We have a problem with the committee's recommendation with respect to removing any reference to sovereignty, to politics and to culture in clause 7, principally because there must have been a good reason to put them in the bill in the first place. We, therefore, cannot agree at this time that they be removed. Instead, we would like to have further study done on the impact of both their inclusion and/or their exclusion.

With respect, we have not come to the same conclusion as the majority on the committee that the enactment of exemptions within the actual legislation is a good idea. Presumably, one of the benefits of being able to grant an exemption is that it can also be taken away if doing so is in the public interest, thus maintaining flexibility. Therefore, it seems to add a very high degree of inflexibility, in my judgment, to have legislated exemptions. We also transmit this concern to Parliament for further consideration.

Before agreeing with the notion of replacing the "vary or rescind" provisions of the Railway Act with the "set aside or refer back" proposal, as recommended in this report, we should encourage Parliament to hear further testimony on how this power would interact with the Power of Direction.

We have also come to the conclusion that further debate and discussion is necessary on the question of telecommunications company ownership requirements. In particular, we recommend that Parliament review the stated Government of Canada policy, since 1987, of an 80 per cent domestic ownership rule for these firms. Why, we ask, should this policy now be changed? Again, I look forward to a revisiting of this issue by Parliament, on behalf of all Canadians with an interest in a truly Canadian telecommunications infrastructure.

Finally, we have some concerns about the issue of granting a "presumption" of forbearance rather than, as the bill states, creating the ability of the CRTC to forbear or cease from regulation in areas where it deems appropriate. The question we raise is whether the presumption of forbearance is in the public interest. We simply would like to hear some additional discussion on this question, about its impact, about the impact of not having a "presumption" of forbearance in the act, before going forward.

With that, honourable senators, I feel we have come a fair way down the road in assessing what is a very important piece of legislation which, in the future, will have a profound impact on all Canadians. A tremendous amount of information has been assembled. Many key issues at stake in the information revolution are now on the public record.

We have been impressed by the ability of the telecommunications sector to contribute to Canadian competitiveness in world markets. We must, of course, be ever mindful of the role our telecommunications system plays in helping individuals communicate and share both the idea—and the ideal—of one Canada.

With these priorities in mind, I once again welcome this report, acknowledging that we have questions about some of its recommendations. I look forward to Parliament's thoughts and reflections on this constructive and valuable piece of work.

[Senator Graham.]

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Before we proceed further, honourable senators, was there not an understanding that consideration of the report on the Truro-Sydney line would be called now?

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Yes, I believe that we put that item on the Orders of the Day.

Senator Molgat: It should appear now, should it not, under Reports of Committees?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: It was ordered earlier that that report be put forward. This morning, the report was tabled and it was agreed that we would call it for discussion later in the day. I think this would be an appropriate time to do so.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS CONCERNING DECISION TO SELL RAIL LINE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the twelfth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications concerning the committee's inquiry into the decision of Canadian National Railways to sell the main railway line between Truro and Sidney, Nova Scotia.

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, it is possible that I may go slightly over the 15-minute time limit. I would ask honourable senators in advance for leave, and their tolerance and cooperation in that respect.

This has been a long and very emotional trip. When I introduced a motion of inquiry into the potential sale of the Truro-Sydney line, I pointed out that the line is an active, living presence in our part of the world and that it is essential to our economic survival. If one considers the broad array of players in the ongoing story of the Truro-Sydney line—taking into account CN, the private shortline operators, the marketplace, the various levels of government and the public interest—I believe that if you then listed the principal players in the overall scheme of things, the public interest must always prevail.

I refer to the public interest in the context of the present and future economic development of Nova Scotia. However, I do not do so without the fullest realization that the issue of the Truro-Sydney line is, to a very important extent, rooted in our historic struggle for equity in Confederation.

Honourable senators, the past experience of Atlantic Canadians within Confederation has led many of us to recognize the value of eternal vigilance. At no time in my life have I been more aware of this than throughout this inquiry.

When the representatives of Peat Marwick testified before the committee, they advised honourable senators to accept the marketplace as the regulator of our affairs. I have always been distrustful of catch phrases such as "railway rationalization". Early in this century the catch phrase was "rate equalization". The old Intercolonial Railway was included in a symmetrical system in which a return on capital was the principal consideration. The symmetry proved to be misguided. In the immediate post-war years, such misguided symmetry led to disastrous consequences. A dramatic exodus of approximately 150,000 Maritimer and Maritime skilled workers began.

If one substitutes the word "marketplace" of today for the term "rate equalization" of yesterday, it becomes clear that such catch phrases possess a potential deadly significance. The real peril is faced by real people—they are the ones to be permanently disadvantaged by the lexicon of the day.

Honourable senators must remember that CN intends to sell, not lease, the 415 kilometre line between Truro and Sydney. They intended to do this as an overnight sale because, as they told us, they needed the cash. Once the line was sold, we were told, they were out of the railway business forever between Truro and Sydney.

The architects of the policy of rate equalization at the turn of the century would find the Vice-President of CN, Atlantic Canada, Mr. Marv Blackwell, an excellent companion and kindred spirit. The Crown corporation today believes a return on capital is the principal consideration, as did they.

We must not forget, honourable senators, that the Crown corporation has rights. More important, it has responsibilities. The Government of Canada, the people of Canada, have entrusted the operation and management of that line to CN. As long as it is in the national rail business, CN has the same responsibility to the citizens who live and work in the areas between Truro and Sydney as it does to the citizens between Montreal and Toronto.

If CN really needs the cash, it should begin by planning to acquire some real cash by selling off the Montreal-Toronto line, or privatizing the whole system.

Yet, CN feels we must accept its assumption that its right—yes, legally it does have that right—to sell the line precludes its responsibilities. The Crown corporation felt confident that this assumption would be accepted because up until now the federal government has aided and abetted a process of casual divestment. CN actively demarketed the line over the last few years, cutting back its sales personnel from seven to one. That has been their standard practice in Atlantic Canada, and that practice has generally preceded abandonment.

CN decided to sell the Truro-Sydney line because the sale process under the National Transportation Act was less cumbersome than the abandonment procedure. 3

That decision was irresponsible. A logical railway-road balance no longer exists in Nova Scotia. Our road system cannot stand the additional truck traffic generated by divestiture. It has been pointed out that one tractor-trailer does the equivalent damage of 9,600 automobiles to Nova Scotia's highways.

Honourable senators must remember that the Truro-Sydney line carries hazardous goods such as propane, chlorine and caustic soda.

I have called CN's decision irresponsible and I do so with the fullest appreciation of the fact that any act suggesting potential abandonment by a private entrepreneur would force that traffic onto our highways. I would suggest to honourable senators that the public interest is, therefore, in this case, the principal consideration. We cannot afford and we will not tolerate the suggestion that CN's expressed need for cash is the principal concern in this whole affair. The people of Nova Scotia do not tolerate this suggestion, and the Government of Nova Scotia does not and has not tolerated this suggestion. There are, you see, no existing guarantees in place to forestall any future attempt at abandonment by a private operator.

The Truro-Sydney line is our lifeline in eastern Nova Scotia. Mayor Manning MacDonald of Sydney made this point to the committee, as did the representatives of Sysco, DEVCO, and Stora Forest Industries. The president of Stora, Tom Hall, has said that if you tried to trade off roads for rails in eastern Nova Scotia, you would be building roads to nowhere.

Make no mistake about it. Nova Scotia is a poor province. We cannot afford the uncertainty generated by a transitional sale to an entrepreneurial organization whose sense of responsibility to the regional concerns of our part of the country is still an unknown factor.

To those who advise us to accept the premise that the marketplace will serve as a viable regulator of our affairs, I would ask only one question: Where are the guarantees? I would suggest to all honourable senators that there are none.

Allow me to explore this area just a little more as I now turn to the majority committee recommendations as tabled. The entire report was structured to support an argument for sale to a shortline operator. The perspective of the authors seemed to be that we should consider the interests of CN as the principal interests in this affair. We are told, for example, that there are only three options for the Truro-Sydney line: First, sale to a shortline operator; second, continued operation of the line by CN with possible application for abandonment at a future date; and three, government intervention to protect the line for the foreseeable future. The list of options illustrates my point about argument and perspective.

Another option, onewhich appears in the Liberal dissent, is based on the view that CN is a servant of the people of Canada, that it is not the master of the domain—it has been "entrusted" the line by the Government of Canada.

There is another very plausible option and it is that the Government of Canada continue to entrust the management and control of the Truro-Sydney line to CN. Moreover, the Government of Canada must direct, and it does have the power to direct, CN to put adequate resources and personnel in place to ensure that the potential of the Truro-Sydney line is fully realized.

This has always been a thoroughly plausible option but one that the committee chose to ignore. We are asked to accept the veiled threat that, if forced to continue operation of the line, CN may apply for abandonment. We are asked to believe that this spoiled child—a creature of the people of Canada, their agent—will be allowed to exercise exclusive rights to divestiture without any parallel commitment to responsibility. We are asked to further believe that the federal government will serve as the instrument of the spoiled child and that it will intervene presumably after the horse has left the barn.

Upon conclusion of a sale to a private operator, the federal government will say that this line now operates under provincial jurisdiction, and is no longer the responsibility of the Government of Canada. It will be, of course, correct, in that position.

If the line ceases to be viable under shortline status, a status arbitrarily conceived by the authors—remember, the Truro-Sydney line is an historic part of the main line in this country —there will be no potential federal subsidy for the line even if its continued operation was critical to the defence of the public interest.

Again I ask those who ask us to accept the marketplace as regulator of our affairs to tell us where the guarantees are. Again, I suggest, there are none. Let me just refer to the majority recommendation number 1 which states:

> That the Government of Nova Scotia should urgently reconsider its present position and make every effort to ensure that a private shortline operator would be successful. The committee has examined the performance of shortline operators in both the United States and Canada and is persuaded that a private operator has a better chance of success than a line that continued to be operated by CN.

Honourable senators, the Government of Nova Scotia has taken a position not to grant a permit to a shortline operator. In the preamble to the majority recommendations, we are told that such a position is "intractable" and that this only adds to the "uncertainty for a region of the country deeply concerned about its future".

The Government of Nova Scotia has come to realize the jurisdictional implications of the intended sale. The province must establish regimes associated with the regulation, maintenance and adjudication of railways because that line will fall under its jurisdiction. At present, the province possesses an antiquated railway act and no railway expertise. It is hard to imagine the provincial position as "intractable" in such circumstances.

The province has come to recognize that unpreparedness is simply a recipe for disaster. It is simply a matter of common sense. You do not issue a permit to a private operator unless the regimes integral to the public interest—and incidentally the safety regimes that the federal government already has in place number over ten—unless they are solidly conceived and in place.

[Senator Graham.]

I remind honourable senators that the Truro-Sydney line is one of complex topography. It serves a diverse range of shippers, and it carries hazardous goods. The province of Nova Scotia should then be congratulated by the authors of the report for its prescience, not castigated as being unrealistic or intractable under the circumstances. The province cannot issue a permit to a private operator because the protective mechanisms vital to the public interest are not in place. We must all recognize the national implications associated with divestiture in an era of provincialization.

This issue is not one of great significance solely to the province of Nova Scotia. It is of critical importance to the province of Alberta presently revising its railway act—again after the horse has left the stable—and it is of equal importance to the province of Ontario in the aftermath of the sale of the Godderich-Exeter line and, indeed, to all other provinces in this country where similar divestitures are planned by CN.

I asked for one more day of hearings to provide us with testimony on the vital question of provincial regimes. I was denied that request. I deeply regret this because the Truro-Sydney line is but the tip of the iceberg and the heart of the issue is really the question of the relative states of unpreparedness of the provinces in the face of the so-called "shortline phenomenon".

I further dispute the assertion contained in recommendation number 1 that we were persuaded by the performance of U.S. and Canadian shortlines that a private sector operator has a better chance of success than a line continued to be operated by CN. Yes, we did hear from American witnesses. No, they could not relate their experience to the Nova Scotia scene. Indeed, no semblance of comparison exists between the American and the Canadian railway experiences. Tom Payne, President of CWR, an Alberta grain line, appeared before us. However, we could see no semblance of comparison between the CWR and the Truro-Sydney line. The fact is, CWR has been heavily subsidized and, after a recent Supreme Court decision, operates with non-unionized labour, and that in itself is important enough to raise serious questions about its value as a model for Nova Scotians.

Let me read majority recommendation number 2 which states:

> That, notwithstanding the refusal of the Government of Nova Scotia to issue a shortline operator an operating permit, it is in the best interests of those most concerned with the continuation of the service that CN proceed with its efforts to sell the line to the most qualified bidder. Lengthy delays in consummating a sale may result in a situation where traffic on the line has declined to the > point where a successful shortline operation may no longer be possible. The Committee further recommends that the sale agreement should require that the railway right-of-way must continue to be maintained and that the land involved in the sale must not be used for non-railway purposes.

The last sentence is worthy of note. It is a pity it does not also protect the continued rights-of-way of property owners on either side of the tracks. The second recommendation is basically untenable, honourable senators.

It is both illogical and irresponsible to suggest that CN continue its efforts to sell the line when the province has indicated that it would not issue a permit to a shortline operator. I cite from Chapter 1 of the report, which summarizes the regulatory process:

> . . . the sale will be conditional upon the purchaser obtaining an operating licence from the province . . . indeed . . . the NTA will only approve the sale agreement . . . if the company acquiring the railway line has received all regulation approvals . . .

In this case, it would be from the province of Nova Scotia.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Graham, according to the rules, I must remind you of the time. Will senators give the Honourable Senator Graham the time to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Graham: I thank honourable senators.

Since there is no provincial readiness to dispense the kind of approvals that I just referred to, which are necessary under the NTA, the question is really a moot point. The recommendation continues to advise that lengthy delays in consummating the sale may result in a decline in traffic to the point where a successful shortline operation is no longer possible.

Let us look at the realities here. We have been told that the traffic on the line is in fact declining. That this has no doubt been the byproduct of CN's demarketing of the line—remembering that they went from seven sales persons to one — remains an important point. However, we are asked to believe that the lengthy delays in consummating the sale will lead to a further decline. The implication is that the line must be sold now. This flies in the face of all logic, but only partly because of the stance of the Government of Nova Scotia.

We are asked by the committee to take a monumental leap of faith. In spite of projected traffic decline, we are asked to believe that a private operator will make a long term commitment to a money-losing situation. The committee seemed so intent on assisting CN in bailing out from its marginally profitable line, the Truro-Sydney line—a line owned by the Government of Canada, the people of Canada, and a line entrusted to CN for management and operation—that they ask us to accept the implausible assumptions contained in Recommendation No. 2.

Finally, I will read Recommendation No. 3 from the majority report. It states:

> That if the sale of this line should be aborted or if the operation of the line by a private owner should fail in the future, for whatever reason, the Government of Canada must ensure continuation of service. The committee is of the opinion that a clear case has been made that the economic future of the region is dependent upon the continued operation of the line.

I fully agree with the assertion that a clear case has been made for the fact that the economic future of the region is dependent on the continued operation of the line. That is why the public interest demands an unequivocal guarantee. The problem is: potential financial failure of a private operator and/or possible abandonment.

The difficulty is that no such guarantees exist. It is not logical to assume that the Government of Canada will at some point step in again, after the horse is out of the barn, to ensure continuation of service. As I have pointed out earlier, this would entail a form of federal subsidization of a line under provincial jurisdiction. Indeed, it is a pity that the authors of the report did not read their own words only a page before.

In chastising the Government of Nova Scotia for demanding a federal guarantee and in rebuking the province for arguing that the line should not be sold unless the Government of Canada could provide a guarantee that the service be maintained, the authors argued this way:

> In light of these conclusions, the Committee is of the opinion that the position of the Government of Nova Scotia on the sale of this rail line is somewhat unrealistic, especially with respect to the possibility of federal government intervention to guarantee the future of the line at this time. Why indeed, would the government step in at this point?

It further states:

> It would appear that the Government of the Nova Scotia is relying totally upon the Government of Canada in this matter. It either wants the federal government to intervene immediately and guarantee the future of the line or, should NTA allow the sale to go through, to overturn its recommendation. Either of these options really means that the federal government would likely have to provide a subsidy to keep an unprofitable rail line in operation.

That thinking is persuasive. However, if the authors of the report had followed their own good sense as outlined on page 32, they could not possibly have arrived at the conclusion expressed in Recommendation No. 3.

Finally, honourable senators, the Liberal members of the committee disagreed with the majority recommendations set out above, as I just stated, and proposed the following:

> Whereas the Truro to Sydney line is an integral part of the "national railway" system;

Whereas rail transportation between Truro and Sydney is absolutely necessary to certain industries fundamental to the economic viability of eastern Nova Scotia;

Whereas the privatization of the Truro to Sydney line would relieve the Government of Canada of any obligation to assure both the continued operation and the safe operation of rail service between Truro and Sydney;

Whereas the privatization of the Truro to Sydney line would have the effect of imposing all or almost all the responsibility for ensuring both the regulation and continued operation of the line on the Government of the Province of Nova Scotia, a responsibility that Government has declined to assume;

We recommend that the National Transportation Agency consider making a determination that the privatization of the railway between Truro and Sydney would not be in the public interest.

Moreover we recommend that the Government of Canada continue to "entrust" the management and the control of the Truro to Sydney line to CN, and that CN be directed to put adequate resources and personnel in place to ensure that the potential of the Truro to Sydney line is fully realized.

I thank honourable senators for their tolerance and patience.

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable senators, following Senator Graham's comments to a logical conclusion, we would have the government subsidizing, paying for and running everything in the country. I do not think he intends that, but listening to him, that is the impression that one is left with.

The committee faced some difficult decisions. The evidence that was placed before us in the final analysis gave us no indication whatsoever of several fairly salient facts. Indeed, their pertinency would lead me to suggest to Senator Graham that, as forceful as he has made his comments, it is somewhat wishful thinking and wishful thinking is not in the best interests of maintaining rail service between Truro and Sydney.

There are two or three factors that are quite apparent here. The first one is to be found in recent action by governments—that is, for those who care to recall, the last conversion of CN debt to equity. The government of the day made strong overtures and firm undertakings that were later in force that that was the last kick at the can by Canadian National. Similar advice was given on a number of occasions to Air Canada. That advice was that they just cannot continue to run up debt and come back to the government every seven or eight years for consolidation by way of conversion to equity.

That remains a fact. The Government of Canada has instructed Canadian National Railways to act in contemplation of good business practices and on profit. Having directed them to do that, it is hardly logical or sensible, the first or second time there is the appearance of a problem, to change your mind and tell them that they must do that which you have told them they could not do.

[Senator Graham.]

Honourable senators, it was quite clear—and indeed CN expressed this clearly—that CN feared it could not maintain a profitable service and would eventually have to apply to abandon the line. They made that very clear. They made clear the fact that it was only marginally profitable, not that they needed a massive cash infusion.

• (1850)

There was a comfortable arrangement between the Maritime office of Canadian National and its head office in Montreal with respect to cash, but that was not the be all and the end all, and was not the purpose for the action proposed by CN to put up for sale that particular line. It was because the line was marginally profitable, and, under existing laws, it was close to the capacity within law to abandon the line. It was so close that CN decided that, while the line was still healthy and marginally profitable, it would put the line up for sale expressing the firm belief, based on evidence —not just whimsical thinking—and based on the track record of short-line operators both in Canada and the United States that private operators, personally or directly involved, could do a better job than Canadian National itself, whose mid- and long-term business plans were dedicated and directed to the development of dense and highly-used rail lines in other parts of Canada—the maintenance of an active national line fed by an active and profitable feeder line service throughout the country.

Once an application has been made to abandon a line, then Senator Graham's reactions, understandable fears and concerns come into play, because by then it would be too late. By then we would have to turn to government—not necessarily the federal government, but to provincial governments and municipal governments.

As early as February 18, the committee considering this matter was clearly of the single, unanimous opinion that common-carrier rail freight service between Sydney and Truro must be maintained as long as there is a demand. It was to that opinion that we were addressing this report.

How is that service best maintained? There is not one single shred of evidence to suggest that the service in question is best maintained by Canadian National, who wanted to put the line up for sale—and who, indeed, have put it up for sale —and who told us clearly that, if the sale failed at some point in the not too distant future because of declining profits, they would apply for abandonment.

What do we do to be practical and helpful? We heard the province of Nova Scotia's adamant position that no matter what happened, it would not issue an operating permit. The Minister of Transport in Nova Scotia is presumably fully aware of that which he was talking about. His presumption, of course, is that, without an operating permit, there would not be a sale and CN would be obliged to continue.

The difficulty with that kind of thinking is that the government will not direct Canadian National to do today what it was told yesterday not to do. Until somebody comes in front of us and says, "Yes, the government is prepared to look at feeder lines," and "Yes, it is prepared to subsidize," we can only move forward on the understanding that Canadian National is very clear with respect to its intentions.

Uncertainty has crept into this issue. That is why we urgently recommend the province of Nova Scotia to reconsider its position. Uncertainty does not lend any strength to the sale; it does not help the sale at all.

The committee was not happy with the absence of safeguards. We did not feel that the safeguards suggested in the Peat Marwick report were safeguards at all. To suggest that the committee's report does other than indicate concern about the long-term viability of this area is not an accurate reflection. I wish the honourable senator had not gotten quite so carried away with it.

Honourable senators, Senator Finlay MacDonald—who chaired these sessions before he was forced to step aside for a few months—repeatedly reminded the committee and the witnesses that there did not appear to be any option other than a sale to the private sector. If there were other options, he requested the witnesses and members of the committee to provide those options—having listened to the evidence—other than the three recommendations based on the conclusions of the report.

Honourable senators, the recommendations are there. As Senator Graham has pointed out most eloquently, one of the positive aspects of the report is that it gives people across the nation an opportunity to have a look at what happens when Canadian National tinkers with active and economically necessary lines. We can express the well-founded hope that the people who care to read the report will find a struggle between the government directing Canadian National Railways to do something, and the committee coming to the only logical conclusion left open to it; that is, encouraging the sale of the line to a private operator. Should the private operator fail, then guarantees must kick in because there was no doubt in the committee's mind, going back to as early as February 18—that the common-carrier rail freight service between Sydney and Truro must be maintained as long as there is a demand.

Honourable senators, I believe that we have taken the right direction. The recommendations speak strongly to the question, and I would express, on Senator MacDonald's behalf, his regrets about not being here to participate. He would want to say to you that we have not seen the end of this question, but that we must approach it logically.

We must not let wishful thinking creep into this question, because we will not easily or readily convince the federal government, the Department of Transport and the Prime Minister of this country to tell Canadian National Railways that what we told them about operating in contemplation of a profit we did not mean at all.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I agree with the dissent recorded at the conclusion of the report. However, there are three points which I wish to make, and I make them chiefly in response to what Senator Forrestall has just said.

• (1900)

He has told us that it would not be logical to ask CN Railway to act contrary to the instructions of the government. That brings up the whole question of privatization. CN was created as a national railway system to assure continued service on various precursor lines. We now have come to the point where the privatization of parts of that system is being considered. Surely, if the basic idea of having CN as a nationalized system service was to assure service, then the parts of the system that ought to be privatized first are those that are highly profitable, and the parts of the system that ought to be the last candidates for privatization are those that are only marginally profitable. Otherwise, what is the point of having CN as a publicly owned system? That whole question has to be thought through. It has not been thought through up to this time.

The second point is that the proposed sale of the line between Truro and Sydney is not simply a matter of privatization. When we talk about privatizing the portion of the CN system between Truro and Sydney, we are not talking only about privatization. We are also talking about provincialization. We are talking about the off-loading of jurisdiction and responsibility from the Government of Canada to the Government of Nova Scotia of a line of railway. That result may be an unintended result. Nevertheless, it is the result of privatization in this case, where both Truro and Sydney are within the same province.

I saw no evidence in the committee that the Government of Canada had anticipated that particular aspect of privatization. Privatization, yes, that had been thought through; but the fact that in a case like this privatization would entail provincialization had not been thought through. The jurisdictional question did not seem to have been anticipated, nor indeed did the attendant financial question.

Senator Forrestall has told us that if the line were to be privatized and then at some point in the future the question of abandonment came up, at that point guarantees must "kick in". I think those were his words. Guarantees by whom? Can we anticipate that at that point the Government of Canada is going to say, "We tried privatization; it has not worked; so now gratuitously we will come back on the scene and help the Government of the Province of Nova Scotia to discharge its responsibilities. That is a hope for which we have seen no foundation.

There is a third point that I would like to make concerning the majority report supported here tonight by Senator Oliver and Senator Forrestall. That point ties in directly with provincialization. The report states that the committee recommends "that the government of Nova Scotia should urgently reconsider its present position and make every effort to ensure that a private shortline operator would be successful."

In other words, the majority of the committee has taken upon itself to say to the government of Nova Scotia, "We really know your business better than you do. You should acquiesce in this off-loading by Ottawa. You should acquiesce in this transfer of jurisdiction and responsibility. You should cooperate submissively."

Honourable senators, I think the majority is being presumptuous, if not impertinent, in undertaking to tell the Government of the province of Nova Scotia what it should do. I certainly would never agree to either the substance or the tenor of that recommendation. I cannot believe that the majority of the committee stopped for a moment to realize what they were doing.

Before I conclude, I should like to say that, for the most part, the work of the committee was well done. As Senator Graham has said, the work was truncated at the end.That was unfortunate because this proposed sale raises questions which are likely to come up again and again across Canada.

If the committee had had an opportunity to have carried its work through to the very end, the study done by the committee would have been invaluable as guidance in future cases; but that was not to be. The majority did not want it to be done.

The effort that Senator Graham has made is very commendable. I believe that all members of the committee would agree with me on that. He has done a good service to the Senate; he has done a good service to Nova Scotia.

The Senate should not accept the majority report. Rather, the Senate should accept the report put forward by the Liberal minority on the committee.

On motion of Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), debate adjourned.

JUSTICE

CANCELLATION OF COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Dalia Wood rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, June 10, 1992:

> That she will call the attention of the Senate to the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program.

She said: Honourable senators, I rise today because of the government's decision to cancel the Court Challenges Program. This program was of critical importance to equality-seeking groups because it provided modest funding for test case litigation of federal laws and regulations which groups and individuals felt were in violation of section 15, equality rights, of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The Court Challenges Program gave disadvantaged groups and individuals the ability to use the rights guaranteed to them under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and to enable challenges of government legislation which may violate these rights which are fundamental to our democratic system in Canada. Let us not forget that it was essential to minority groups in this country—to women, to disabled groups, to native groups and to multicultural groups—that whenever their rights were being infringed upon, they could turn to this program to obtain financial assistance; groups which this government has a preference to target.

By abolishing this program, the government is removing a unique mechanism that can and has been used by groups to defend their constitutional rights. Since the government's budget announcement to abolish the Court Challenges Program, I have received letters opposing the termination of the program from coast to coast of this great country of ours. For the record, the following is a list of concerned citizens whose letters have been received on the funding cuts. Because of the late hour I will not read them all: Bertha Wilson, Faculty of Law at the University of Ottawa; D.M. McRae, Dean of Common Law at the University of Ottawa; Marc Cousineau, Associate Dean of Common Law, University of Ottawa; Philip Bryden, President of British Columbia Civil Liberties Association; Roland Penner, Dean, Faculty of Law, University of Manitoba; Faculty of Law, University of British Columbia; Allan Hilton, Alliance Quebec; Commission Nationale Des parents francophones; Fédération Des Communautés Francophones et Acadienne du Canada; Native Women's Association of Canada; Gérard Lévesque, Directeur Général, Association des juristes D'expression Française de l'Ontario; Président, Société des parents pour l'éducation Francophone and from La Fédération des Franco-Colombiens.

These people have reminded us all that to attempt a challenge of federal legislation on Charter grounds is a very expensive proposition and can easily cost $100,000 or more. The Court Challenges Program was a low cost program, if we consider that during the past seven years the government, which was committed to spending over $8 million, only spent $4.9 million, or roughly $750,000 per year.

Since 1985 the program has received under its equality rights component 951 applications, 310 of which have been funded. Court decisions or reports have received 115 applications and there are still 156 active files. The discrimination topics speak for themselves. One hundred and fifty-five discrimination cases have received funding; 60 aboriginal applications have received funding and the list goes on for a total of 175 applications on other discrimination topics.

The language rights component, as you all know, is a very dear aspect to me. Let me list the achievements on this component. A total of 171 applications have been received. Court decisions or reports have been received for 56 applications and there are still 27 active files. At the court level there are 77 cases. The breakdown on the topics of language rights are education, legislative bilingualism, judicial rights, fundamental rights and language of work. On those topics, 90 cases have received funding.

As you know, honourable senators, many of the cases assisted by this program have had far-reaching effects. For example, the linguistic rights branch of the program has assisted in the clarification of constitutional language rights guarantees by financing important test cases. Take legislative bilingualism, section 133 of the Constitution Act, 1867, and its counterpart, section 23 of the Manitoba Act 1870. The Supreme Court stated that the purpose of section 133 was to "ensure full and equal access to the legislature, laws and courts for francophones and anglophones alike." The reference is Manitoba 1985, 1 S.C.R. 721 at p. 739.

Did that resolve the issue? Indeed not. The courts have been obliged to consider numerous instances. Legislative instruments that have been found to violate these constitutional provisions include Blaikie, 1979; Collier, 1990; Bilodeau, 1986; and Manitoba language rights 1985. Most recently, this issue was again considered by the Supreme Court in the Manitoba language reference 1992, and in the case of Rouyn-Noranda. In the area of language rights, I might mention the Ford Chaussure Brown judgment on freedom of expression and the right to use languages other than French on public signs in Quebec.

Minority language education rights presents special issues. While the Supreme Court in its judgment in Mahé provided a large and remedial interpretation of section 23, it did not address the specific remedies for individual cases. It viewed the matter of implementation of these constitutional rights to be undertaken on a case-by-case approach between individuals and the respective provincial governments. Needless to say, many issues remain unresolved and outstanding, issues that go to the actual access and quality of education available to many citizens and their children. In Quebec, the requirements enunciated by the Supreme Court have not been complied with.

The Chambers Task Force on English Language Education, whose report was recently deposited, had to petition the government once more to make good on this obligation to the English speaking community. The issue fundamentally is the right of Canadians to avail themselves of those rights to which they are entitled under the Canadian Constitution. Integral is the right to meaningful and real access to justice. The program as described above has afforded that opportunity, and has given meaning to the exercise by Canadians of their constitutional rights. To quote Alliance Quebec, "Where would the rights of Canadians be without the Court Challenges Program and where will they be without it?"

We must not leave out the unemployment insurance benefits for people over 65, federal language training programs, hate propaganda, fair pensions, importation and distribution of racist pins, the rape shield law, and the list goes on.

The abolition of the program would leave without a remedy hundreds of groups and individuals who have initiated court challenges at the trial level and those who have not yet had the opportunity to do so. The abolition of the program would also have a definitely negative impact on those groups and individuals who have initiated legal proceedings in a trial or appeal court. After the February 27 Treasury Board decision, many beneficiaries of the program would have preferred not to commence legal proceedings if they had known they could not receive financial support up to the conclusion of the proceedings and the exhaustion of their revenues. Therefore many of the cases that are at different stages of the program are dead.

If we compare cuts with increases or allocations in other areas of the federal budget, we begin to see the sad picture of the government's value judgments. At least this was a relatively low cost program that provided a guarantee for all Canadians that their rights would be respected and the democratic process would remain intact. The government has acknowledged in many ways that this was a very valid and useful program, since more than 300 cases have been heard so far. Assuming that the program served Canadians well for 14 years, I ask why it would no longer be useful in today's budget?

As a senator who sits as a Liberal, I was proud that the Court Challenges Program was specifically put together by a Liberal government in 1978. Created to deal with constitutional issues under the BNA Act and then extended to the 1982 Charter of Rights and Freedoms and then to section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Court Challenges Program was originally intended to help citizens who wanted clarification of language rights through the courts. Financial assistance was provided to groups and individuals for test cases based on the language rights provision of the Constitution.

You must appreciate, honourable senators, that the program was intended to serve as a tool to promote our two official languages. Our country is going through a period of constitutional renewal. It is a process of inclusion through which we are still attempting to include an entire province in the Constitution of Canada.

• (1920)

The Charter of Rights and Freedoms is an integral part of our constitution. It is important that we understand that, with the removal of funding support to the Court Challenges Program, we have effectively made the Charter of Rights and Freedoms exclusive to those people who, financially, can afford to challenge it.

Disadvantaged persons will not be able to go through the courts to redress wrongs that may be perpetrated on them by arbitrary acts of the federal government.

Let me put it in perspective by comparing the United States to Canada. After 200 years of having a constitution, there continues to be litigation to determine the exact meaning of the American Bill of Rights. That is no less true with our Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I therefore ask honourable senators to urge this government to seriously consider extending the program until other various avenues are explored. This government owes it to all Canadians.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Wood for bringing this inquiry to the floor of the Senate along with the impressive data that surrounds the Court Challenges Program since its inception, for it concerns a matter of major importance for all Canadians. In lieu of the time, honourable senators, I will take the adjournment of this debate in my name.

On motion of Senator Kinsella, debate adjourned.

THE GOVERNMENT

RECORD OF GOVERNANCE—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry by the Honourable Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition):

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to the disastrous record of the Conservative government.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I am sure Senator Frith, if he were here, would proceed on this very interesting inquiry, so, under the circumstances, we would ask that it stand.

Inquiry stands.

NATIONAL FINANCE

THE "BIG LIE"—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Inquiry by the Honourable Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition):

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to this Government's "big lie" about the federal deficit.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): As mentioned in relation to the previous matter, with the same observation and for the same reason, I would ask that this matter stand.

Inquiry stands.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO CHANGE DATE OF TABLING OF FINAL REPORT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras, pursuant to notice of June 18, 1992, moved:

> That notwithstanding the order of reference adopted by the Senate on December 17, 1991, the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to table the final report on the special study on the draft regulations ensuing from the new legislation on Canadian financial institutions, no later than October 29, 1992.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, September 22, 1992, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, September 9, 1992

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators will know that I would not have forgotten, and they will be pleased or displeased to hear that the election clock is still ticking. If the government of which Senator Murray is a member respects democracy, to use his words, Canadians will cast their ballot within 72 days. However, if, in the words of Senator Murray, the present government is cowardly and contemptuous of democracy, it can put the day of reckoning off for 458 days.

THE LATE HONOURABLE GEORGE JAMES McILRAITH

TRIBUTES

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on Wednesday, August 19, at the age of 84, Senator George McIlraith passed away. He had had a long career, one filled with accomplishment and public service.

A lawyer by training, politics attracted George McIlraith early in his university years. In 1940, he was president of the Ottawa Liberal Association. That same year, he was first elected to the House of Commons to represent the riding of what was then known as Ottawa West. He was 31 years old at that time. He started then on what would today be called a roll—nine straight election victories. He never lost one.

Mr. McIlraith soon became, and remained, a well-respected member of the House of Commons, in the process acquiring the many talents that that job requires. There is no question that he cared deeply for his constituents, helping everyone who sought his assistance. Approximately 2,000 people, many of whom were affectionately called "George's people", attended a tribute in 1972 when he retired from the House of Commons.

Over the years, George McIlraith held many positions in the house, such as Parliamentary Assistant to the Right Honourable C.D. Howe, who was Minister of Reconstruction and Supply from 1945 to 1953. Mr. McIlraith was appointed a Queen's Counsel on May 5, 1953. He was the senior opposition trade critic from 1957 to 1963. In 1963, then Prime Minister Lester Pearson appointed him to cabinet as Minister of Transport.

George McIlraith became President of the Privy Council in February of 1964, where he was given responsibility to implement the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Government Organization. The same year he became the Government House Leader in the House of Commons and held that post with steady skill and devotion until 1967. His encyclopedic familiarity with parliamentary rules and traditions were useful to him and to his success in his position, and became a permanent part of his considerable reputation as a parliamentarian.

In 1965, he was appointed Minister of Public Works, in which position he was responsible for the operations of the National Capital Commission. He well merits the credit he has been given for the commission's successes, some of which we now enjoy during the time we spend in the national capital.

As a result of his work in this department, Ottawa now has the National Arts Centre, the Western Parkway, more than $50 million of downtown office towers including the National Press Building, a number of bridges including one that was named after him in 1972, and a chain of NCC parks.

On July 6, 1968, Mr. McIlraith was appointed Solicitor General for Canada, which position he held during the FLQ crisis.

In 1972 he retired from the House of Commons after serving as a member for 32 years, and was summoned to the Senate on April 27 of that same year.

Our colleague Senator Davey, in his book The Rainmaker, has described George McIlraith as someone who loved to talk. At page 93, he says:

> "How George loved to talk. He enjoyed great success as house leader primarily because he talked so much that the Tories—eventually driven to distraction—told George to do whatever he wanted, but just to stop talking! McIlraith reported to one Cabinet meeting armed with so many documents and books that he could barely carry them under his arm. He asked the Prime Minister if he should read them, or just summarize their content. 'Which, George,' said Pearson, 'will take longer?'"

George was relatively brief when he first spoke in the Senate. On May 15, 1972, only moments after having been introduced, together with Senators Norrie, Hicks and Graham, George McIlraith was prodded by Senator Flynn to speak to a message from the House of Commons which expressed agreement to amendments made by the Senate to a bill respecting the use of the expression "Parliament Hill". George McIlraith had sponsored this bill in the House of Commons, had spoken to it in that chamber, and now was invited to speak to it again in the Senate. If George was tempted to wax eloquently about the legislation or about the unique position he found himself in, he resisted. He simply said:

> "I shall not speak about the bill because I think its purpose is self-evident, but I should like to thank honourable senators for the improvements, otherwise called amendments, made to the bill in this place before it procured final passage. I believe I should add nothing more on the subject tonight. I thank you."

His first speech in the House of Commons was similarly brief—only two paragraphs long; but after he grew comfortable, first in the House of Commons and then in the Senate, it is certainly true that he did not hesitate to express his views in a detailed fashion. He was a superb politician and politics dominated his life and his thought. He talked about it with enthusiasm and keen insight.

He often called on me, and I know on others, after his retirement. I had a great chat with him just days before he died. It was then evident to me, and to Jean Kerr, who was also a lifelong friend of George's, that his body was falling very far behind his bright and lively mind.

When George retired from the Senate in 1983, he was praised, and justifiably so, by members on both sides of this chamber. At the time of his retirement, Senator David Walker said, "Life is always pleasant when George is around . . .".

Well, with George now gone, life becomes somewhat less pleasant for us all, especially those whose lives are filled with politics, and, if Plato was right, that is all of us, because man is, after all, a political animal.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition in his tribute has given us an outline of the career of the late Senator McIlraith. It remains for me to say a few words of appreciation on behalf of the Prime Minister, my cabinet colleagues and honourable senators on this side.

The immediate family of the late George McIlraith, and his political family which is the Liberal Party of Canada, are justifiably proud of his life and of his rich legacy of public service. He brought honour and distinction both to his personal family and to his political family.

Those of us outside his personal and political families also rejoice in his legacy. As Canadians and as parliamentarians, we are its beneficiaries.

The public career of the honourable George McIlraith was, of course, remarkable for its longevity. Elected 10 times to the House of Commons, he was a member of that chamber for 32 years and of the Senate for 11 years. Still it is not for the length of his public service but for its quality that George McIlraith will be remembered. In the City of Ottawa and among his peers in Parliament, he was renowned for his devotion to his constituents, his concern for their problems as individuals, and for their common interest as a community.

[Senator Frith.]

The Leader of the Opposition made mention of some of the public facilities such as parks, bridges, roads and buildings in the National Capital Region that were built during Mr. McIlraith's tenure as Minister of Public Works. Many of these facilities are of aesthetic beauty and cultural significance. They are valuable assets to Canada and to the capital region. That they stimulated investment, employment and economic confidence and improved the quality of life of George's constituents only added to his satisfaction and pleasure in having built them.

George McIlraith's allegiance was not just to his constituents, nor even to the country alone, but to the democratic and parliamentary process; the process best able, as he often told us, to secure the liberty of the individual. Perhaps that devotion to our institutions is what made him such an exemplary party man and such an outstanding parliamentarian; a person whose adversaries were admirers, never enemies.

The speeches George McIlraith delivered in this chamber from 1973 to 1983 on the constitution, and on parliamentary reform in particular, show his mastery of these subjects, his profound understanding and profound respect for our institutions. The reforms he proposed—and there were many—were practical, timely and always based on principle. There is a philosophical coherence to his speeches on those subjects which makes them interesting, thought provoking and relevant 20 years after they were uttered.

In one of his speeches here, Senator McIlraith expressed his dismay that, as he put it:

> We have entering Parliament now a group of parliamentarians educated . . . in the political science faculties of our universities.
> . . . who have been taught that government is a science instead of an art, which it is in fact.

The honourable George McIlraith refined and practised the art of government with unsurpassed devotion and skill. To the student of government, Parliament and politics and to the aspiring practitioner, he was a model of what a parliamentarian would wish to be and should be.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I should like to say a word or two about my late friend, the honourable George McIlraith. I was his parliamentary secretary when he was Leader of the Government in the House of Commons.

Three principal points come to my memory when I think back to his political career. One is that he was an assiduous grassroots politician. Reference already has been made to that quality by the Leader of the Opposition and by the Leader of the Government here today.

I could never sort out George McIlraith's motivation, whether he was so attentive to the concerns of the people of Ottawa because he was determined to get re-elected again and again, or because he enjoyed thoroughly meeting with people, talking with them and helping them. I suspect that the truth is that he himself could not have sorted out that relationship if he had been challenged. Suffice it to say that it was very frustrating to go for a walk with George McIlraith because we would advance only about eight or ten paces before there would be a new conversation with yet another constituent.

The second thing I want to mention is his highly conscientious attitude toward the expenditure of public money. I could give several examples of that, but the one that comes immediately to mind was his reaction when the tenders came in for the first segment of the proposed fixed crossing to Prince Edward Island. I remember his reaction very well. He said, "There, that proves that you cannot trust the engineers." The lowest bid, as I recall, was approximately 100 per cent higher than the best estimate of the best engineers.

The third point I wish to mention, and Senator Murray got close to this one, was his ability as Leader of the House of Commons. His immediate predecessors, if I recall correctly, had been the Honourable Jack Pickersgill and the Honourable Guy Favreau. Mr. Pickersgill had his approach, Mr. Favreau had his approach, and Mr. McIlraith had his own approach, a very different approach.

Mr. McIlraith was not a bellicose leader. He avoided rigid positions. He did not even think harshly of those across the floor, even though they sometimes were frustrating—people like Mr. Diefenbaker and Gordon Churchill. No, he always thought well of them and spoke well of them. He understood that they too had their reasons and principles.

Mr. McIlraith practised the art of house leadership in a way that in the last few years seems to have been forgotten. He served the House of Commons well as the Leader of the Government; he served the government of the day very well; and he served the people of Canada well. Honourable senators, I have happy recollections of a man whom I am glad to say was a good friend.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

THE HONOURABLE LORNA MARSDEN

TRIBUTES ON APPOINTMENT AS PRESIDENT AND VICE-CHANCELLOR OF WILFRID LAURIER UNIVERISTY

Honourable Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as we have all looked ahead wondering what the future holds for us as senators, one of our colleagues, perhaps showing remarkable prescience, decided some time ago that her future was not here. For her, it was academia, where, after all, she had already distinguished herself for most of her life. We all congratulate, I am sure, Senator Lorna Marsden on her recent appointment as President and Vice-Chancellor of Wilfrid Laurier University. On behalf of Liberal senators, and I suspect of all who sit in this chamber, I wish her all success in her new role.

Honourable senators, each of us has had the opportunity to work in some way with Lorna Marsden and to see firsthand the quality of her work. We know that she will make the same valuable contribution to the university as she has made with respect to everything else she has turned her talented hand and brain to.

Since being summoned in 1984, Senator Marsden has been active and dedicated in the work of the Senate. In 1989, she became Chair of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, and she has been active on the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for a number of years. Under her tutelage, the committee published a number of important reports, including Accessibility to the Hospital Services—Is there a Crisis?, Child Poverty and Adult Social Problems, and Children in Poverty: Toward a better future.

During her eight and one half years in the Senate, the honourable senator has made many well-informed, penetrating and articulate contributions to debate on many pieces of legislation and on a wide variety of issues through Inquiries and in Question Period, including such subjects as the GST, the Canada Pension Plan, child poverty, and violence against women.

However, the Senate is but a line on a long list of achievements in Lorna Marsden's life. Her first degree from the University of Toronto was in 1968. She completed her second degree, a Ph.D. in Sociology, at Princeton in 1972, and she holds an Honourary Doctorate of Laws from the University of New Brunswick.

Upon completion of her doctorate in 1972, Senator Marsden became a member in the Department of Sociology at the University of Toronto. Senator Marsden served as Chair of that university's Department of Sociology from 1977 to 1979 and Associate Dean of the School of Graduate Studies in Social Sciences from 1979 to 1982. She was Vice-Provost, Arts and Sciences, in 1983.

The research that Senator Marsden has undertaken as part of her scholastic pursuits has contributed largely to the area of social change in Canada. Her major publications include Lives of their Own: The Individualization of Women's Lives and The Fragile Federation: Social Change in Canada. She has also written a number of articles, including "Feminist Influence through the Senate: the Case of Divorce", "New Machines in Small Offices: Gender Technology and Communication", as well as articles on affirmative action, tax reform, and the baby-boom generation.

I am told that she is currently working on a book about the first 13 women senators.

Senator Marsden is also a force in the women's movement. She served as a member of the Ontario Committee on the Status of Women from 1971 and as president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women from 1975 to 1977. For years, we in the Senate have counted on her—as well as many other similarly concerned women senators—to keep us informed of women's concerns and to bring women's issues to light in debate.

Senator Marsden has been active in the community at large as well. She was a member of the editorial boards of the Parliamentary Review, Canadian Studies in Population, the Canadian Journal of Sociology, and the Journal of the Addiction Research Foundation. She is also a trustee for the Elsie Gregory MacGill Foundation, which supports the advancement of women in engineering, and is a member of the Advisory Board of Women in Education Administration in Ontario.

Senator Marsden was a founding member of the Board of Child, Youth and Family Policy Research Centre in 1986 and she remains a member of the executive committee.

Honourable senators, Wilfrid Laurier University's gain is our loss. Senator Marsden brought so much knowledge and experience to the Senate and worked very hard at her role as senator. Unfortunately, Lorna Marsden cannot be with us today, her resignation having become effective as of August 15 or September 1— certainly before today. She is thus personally unable to leave us with her parting thoughts. She asked, however, that I read into the record a statement that she sent to me, which I can do after the Leader of the Government has made his tributes and spoken about Senator Marsden on behalf of his side.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, by way of preparing for this occasion I reviewed in the pages of Hansard some of Senator Marsden's speeches in this chamber over the past eight years, as well as some of the exchanges I had with her during the Oral Question Period over the past six years. This exercise served to remind me how often I had disagreed with her, and how greatly I admire her.

For Lorna Marsden, political action is about ideas—that is, the advancement and implementation of ideas that would raise the standard of living and improve the quality of life of her fellow citizens, especially the disadvantaged. Any disagreement with her was always on means, not on ends to be pursued.

As the Leader of the Opposition has mentioned, Lorna Marsden has excellent academic training and a brilliant record. Her impressive academic credentials and her personal qualities of leadership have been recognized in her appointment to positions of honour and responsibility at the University of Toronto and by her election earlier this year as president of Wilfrid Laurier University.

What is most admirable about Lorna Marsden is that she has never confined her talents to the relative safety of the academic seminar, or to commenting on public policy from the sidelines. She brought her convictions, her commitment and her ideas to the policy process of her party, the Liberal Party, there to test them in the world of pragmatism, compromise and accommodation in which national political parties must operate. She operated with apparent ease and much skill in our parliamentary world, alert to all the competing priorities, the conflicting views and the many nuances of our world, never abandoning her principles but always prepared to cooperate with others in achieving objectives with which most of us are agreed.

● (1430)

The Honourable Lorna Marsden has been an excellent senator, and an asset to Parliament. Her departure is a loss to this place and can only be viewed with regret. I wish for her every happiness and satisfaction in her new office as President of Wilfrid Laurier University and I thank her for having given so much to Parliament with so much dedication and for the honour and pleasure of having served with her.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, in the antechamber to this chamber there is a stone memorial of Senator Cairine Wilson, the first woman summoned to the Senate. Just as Senator Wilson led in her day Lorna Marsden leads in our day.

It was my privilege and one of the great joys of public office to be invited to escort her into the Senate when she took her oath of office, which now seems only a moment ago yet was eight and a half years ago.

Lorna Marsden is an extraordinary, talented, Canadian—a Liberal, social activist, champion of the disadvantaged, aesthete, author, pamphleteer, gardener, educator, speaker, legislator, executive, world traveller, policy advisor, network creator, counsellor and, above all, friend, par excellence. She has what someone has defined as genius: an infinite patience for detail. No job is too small; no activity is too demeaning for her to undertake, from phoning to knocking on doors, to stamping letters, to continually canvassing people engaged in any aspect of her multifaceted endeavours.

We will probably not see her like again, if measured purely on the universal contribution she has made to so many aspects of life in our time. She has left the Senate to return to her first love, academia, as President and Vice-Chancellor of a great Canadian institution bearing an even greater name, Wilfrid Laurier.

Our solace is that our loss will be Wilfrid Laurier University's grand gain. It may be a far, far better place she goes to than she has ever been. We can only hope—and we share her wishes—that it is a far, far better thing she goes to do than she has ever done.

May I convey to Lorna our best wishes for the future, and our appreciation for a bright, glowing, remembrance of things past.

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I want to add my good wishes and congratulations to those that have been given today to Lorna Marsden in undertaking her new career. I know she will do brilliantly and that she will take the same attributes to that particular office as she brought to the Senate. We will all miss her and I personally will miss her.

I agree with the words that speakers before me have said about her. There are no superlatives that can match her efforts in her work.

She will be greatly missed because she represented in this Senate a first-rate twentieth-century mind. We will have to strive mightily to fill the particular role that she played here. It was my great pleasure to serve with her on several committees, including the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee and the Subcommittee on Child Care. She was not only honest, intelligent, penetrating, efficient and practical in all the things she did—not to mention her great quality of leadership, but she of course shattered every myth about ivory tower intellectuals. She is truly a very distinguished Canadian, a great feminist, and a caring and wonderful person, and I wish her well in her new career.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, it is impossible to overstate the quality of the contribution that Senator Marsden—or Lorna, as I am sure all of us in this chamber think of her —has made in everything she has done in her life, whether it has been in academic circles, in politics or in Parliament here in the Senate. When I think of her, I really think of three words: humanity, fairness and humour. She was a good friend before I came to the Senate and certainly, as Senator Spivak has said, that friendship became even closer through causes in which we share an interest.

Lorna has always been and always will be a crusader for rights: the rights of children; of young people; of seniors; of people all around the world, particularly the third world, who are seeking even the most basic rights. And, always, she has been a crusader for the rights of women.

Lorna has been a true leader in the women's movement in its most critical development in the last 25 years. She has really been at the forefront of that movement; always working towards equality, employment opportunity, the ability to earn, and the ability to receive benefits. Equity has been the centre point of her contribution. Beyond that —and this has been spoken about by her in this house—she has been in the forefront of promoting the right for women to lead lives of freedom—freedom from fear, from harassment and from abuse.

As a political colleague, Lorna has been a fierce believer in the democratic process, be it in the country, in Parliament or in the Liberal Party of Canada, of which she has been and will continue to be a very strong and determined member. Always she has been in the vanguard of reform. Indeed, over the past two years she was the chairperson of the committee for constitutional reform within the Liberal Party and did a tremendous job at it.

All of Lorna's attributes will make her one of the finest presidents any university in this country could have, because, throughout every cause she has espoused and every concern she has voiced, education has been the continuing theme. Wilfrid Laurier University and the students who seek to learn there have gained a great ally in our Senator Marsden, and the Senate has lost a true friend and one of its finest members. I know that all of you wish her great success and happiness and I join with those feelings with great friendship.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to add briefly a few words of regret on behalf of the Senate, and particularly for our group, over losing Senator Marsden to her new career. She has really been a tower of strength.

Shortly before Senator Marsden was appointed to the Senate, it so happened that I was elected Speaker pro tempore. By coincidence the Speaker was away and I was in the Chair when Senator Marsden was introduced in this chamber. I want to say a few words on her departure. Of course, I had known her for some years before that through the Liberal Party where she had been a great worker.

She was an outstanding senator. When I listened to Senator Frith describing her activities—the things she has done, her writings and her involvement in many other activities in public life—I found it amazing to think she was a working senator. She was here, active on committees, steadily working; a really strong working senator. Indeed, for our group, for the past few months she acted as caucus chairman. She was prepared to take on any responsibilities that she felt she could handle properly. I know of no responsibilities that Lorna could not handle admirably, and I wish her well in her new post.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, on behalf of colleagues on the current Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, we salute Lorna Marsden on the leadership she has provided in the past.

On a personal note, Lorna's work has been known to me for many years. A couple of years back, we were delighted to host her in our province of New Brunswick to receive a special honour, as Senator Frith mentioned. I have known Lorna's work in the human rights field for many years, and I wish to record our appreciation for her sense of social justice with which she served this chamber and Canadians so well.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, this is the statement that Senator Marsden asked me to read to you. I will read it verbatim. It is addressed "To the Senate of Canada on behalf of Hon. Lorna Marsden, Toronto-Taddle Creek - resigned." and it states:

> Since Parliament did not reconvene during the summer as planned, I have not had the opportunity to say some words of thanks and farewell to all senators and, through the Senate Debates, to the many members of the Senate staff.
> Therefore, I have asked my leader to do so on my behalf.
> It has been an extraordinary privilege and splendid education to have sat in the Senate since January, 1984. I have made many new friends among senators and staff and will very much miss seeing you all regularly and working with you.
> The privileges of a senator are many but the greatest of all is to be part of a tradition as old as our country of representing the people of our provinces and maintaining our Parliament. During my years here, events have made it possible to see how delicate the balance of Parliament and of democracy is and to appreciate how seriously one must take the term "honourable" when applied to Parliamentarians. Being a senator calls for special sensitivities to these issues and it has been a great pleasure to work with so many who are conscious of these responsibilities.

I have worked under three leaders of my caucus each of whom has taught me a great deal and to whom I am very grateful. The two Whips of our Caucus have truly been extraordinary at managing to remain friends and confidants of everyone and I am grateful to them. Serving on the Senate Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology and on National Finance has been like a wonderful, perpetual graduate seminar — my idea of luxury—and I believe we have accomplished some excellent work together. The Special Senate Committee on Youth Issues was a formative experience that has changed my life in several ways. Out of all my work in the Senate have emerged new commitments in voluntarily work, new research and publications, and many new alliances and friends. So I thank all of you and I especially thank the Senate and Committee staff who have been the source of much wisdom, guidance and a lot of good jokes. That includes the Librarians of Parliament, the Security staff, the messengers, and staff of the Parliamentary Restaurant, the craftspeople who made the cabinet in my office match the antique desk, and, above all, those who have worked in my office, especially Helene Damphousse and Carolyn Hume.

It appears that there may actually be reform of the Senate, although I will remain sceptical until the last moment. Reform is needed but I hope that the many fine and important traditions and procedures that balance the power in this country will not be lost. Under any circumstances I wish everyone many happy years and the best of luck, and I hope to see you all from time to time. Wilfrid Laurier University is a welcoming place and we would love to have you as visitors.

CONSENSUS REPORT ON THE CONSTITUTION

REPORT TABLED

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have the honour to table a document entitled "Consensus Report On the Constitution," being the final text, dated August 28, 1992 at Charlottetown.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I ask if copies of that document will be distributed to all senators today?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my friends the Deputy Leader of the Government and Senator Doody tell me that copies of this document has already been distributed to senators. However, I shall verify that, and if they have not reached any honourable senators I will see that those senators receive copies.

The Hon. the Speaker: I am told, honourable senators, that we will have more copies available within a few minutes.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

TWENTY-THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX TO MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the twenty-third report of the Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs concerning the regulations proposed by the Chief Electoral Officer pursuant to subclauses (6) and (7) of clause 7 of Bill C-81, An Act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this House.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[English]

Senator Lynch-Staunton: The printing should only be in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, but not necessarily also in the Debates of the Senate. I believe that is the old form.

Senator Frith: I am bound to say that it may well be so. I was reading from notes prepared by the Officers at the Table. I place my confidence in them.

(For text of Report see today's Minutes of the Proceedings, p. 1357)

Honourable senators, I would ask leave to make a few comments about the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is that agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am not asking for approval today, but I would like to make some explanation for your consideration.

Honourable senators, I am happy to table the report of the recommendations made by the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on the regulation made pursuant to section 7(3) of the Referendum Act adapting the Canada Elections Act. Since the procedure involved in this matter is a somewhat novel one, I should like to refresh your memories as to how our committee became involved.

Subsections 6 and 7 of section 7 of the Referendum Act require the Chief Electoral Officer to deposit proposed regulations with the Clerk of the Senate, as well as with the Clerk of the other place, at least seven days before the regulation is to be made. The proposed regulation then stands referred to a designated committee, in this case the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, pursuant to a motion of this chamber on June 23, 1992, to make such recommendations as they consider appropriate. In fact, the report that I am tabling today contains the committee's recommendations which were sent to the Chief Electoral Officer on Monday, July 13, 1992. Because we have already submitted our recommendations to Mr. Kingsley, we are simply tabling them in the Senate today for information purposes. We are not seeking concurrence.

On June 26, 1992, the Chief Electoral Officer deposited with Mr. Gordon Barnhardt a regulation which he proposed to make on July 8, 1992, adapting the Canada Elections Act for the purposes of a referendum. I will read you the full letter, since it is quite succinct, but I would first like to stress that we are dealing only with the adaptation of the Canada Elections Act and not with any new regulations which might be appropriate for referendums.

Section 7(4) does allow the Chief Electoral Officer to make regulations respecting the conduct of a referendum, and more generally for carrying out the provisions of the Referendum Act, but such regulations are not what was put before us. Doubtless such regulations will be proposed if and when the Chief Electoral Officer thinks them necessary. In this instance, however, we are dealing only with the adaptation of the Canada Elections Act, in itself a massive task.

If you remember, the first step was to avoid trying to develop a completely new set of regulations under the Referendum Act but to start by adopting whatever provisions of the Elections Act applied and then to go from there.

This is the letter that should also go on the record to bring us up-to-date with the work of the committee, and to bring us to where we are today as far as the referendum legislation and adaptation stand. It is from the Chief Electoral Officer to Mr. Gordon Barnhart, Clerk of the Senate, and it is dated June 26, 1992.

Dear Mr. Barnhart:

In accordance with subsection 7(6) of the Referendum Act, I am depositing for review the proposed regulation which adapts the Canada Elections Act for the purposes of a referendum. The authority for this regulation is contained in subsection 7(3) of the Referendum Act, which reads as follows:

"(3) Subject to this Act, the Chief Electoral Officer may, by regulation, adapt the Canada Elections Act in such manner as the Chief Electoral Officer considers necessary for the purposes of applying that Act in respect of a referendum."

The date on which I propose to make the subject regulation is July 8th, 1992.

In adapting the Canada Elections Act by regulation, it was necessary to examine that Act in order to determine how each section would work in the context of a referendum. At the outset, Elections Canada was required to eliminate from the adaptation those sections that were set out in Schedule II of the Referendum Act as not being applicable to a referendum.

I add that that was established by the legislation.

Thereafter, we studied each remaining section to determine whether the particular provision required adapting. In some cases, no adaptation was required as the section could be read to apply either to an election or a referendum. Therefore, these sections were not included in the regulation. The regulation contains only those sections of the Canada Elections Act that require adaptation in order to apply to a referendum. For instance, references to "election" matters such as "election documents" had to be changed to the appropriate referendum vocabulary or concept.

To explain, this was in effect a three-stage process. The overall process was the adaptation. That was effected by first excluding certain parts of the Canada Elections Act, then adapting those that applied without change, and then by regulation changing those that required change; that is, those that were left after the exclusion.

Pursuant and according to the above-mentioned subsection of the Referendum Act, we limited ourselves to adapting the legislation; no amendments whatsoever have been made.

This is of use to us with regard to the subject of the referendum that is, I believe, being debated right now in the House of Commons.

The final result is that the law that is applicable to a referendum is the following:

1. The Referendum Act;

2. Those provisions of the Canada Elections Act that are applicable to a referendum and that do not require any adaptation; and

3. Those provisions of the Canada Elections Act that have been adapted for referendum purposes by the Chief Electoral Officer in the attached regulation.

An Office Consolidation will be published soon after July 8th.

I would also request that a copy of this letter and the relevant material be sent to each Member of the Committee. Should Members have questions concerning this regulation, may I suggest that they be channelled through the Clerk of the Committee to the General Counsel, Mr. Jacques Girard. Recommendations could be dealt with in the same manner but referred to my attention.

I would also request that this material be submitted to Members of the Committee forthwith as agreed, in order to allow us to meet the time frames.

Yours truly,

Jean-Pierre Kingsley.

Honourable senators, it is easy to understand the urgency attached to putting this regulation in place. However, it is also easy to understand that, in the first week of July, most Parliamentarians were taking a well-deserved and much-needed rest. I would like to record here my deepest gratitude to those senators who made themselves available to study and comment on this regulation, despite the short notice and inconvenient timing. I speak of Senators Keon, Marshall, Cogger and Kenny. If the referendum that has now been announced goes as smoothly as we all hope it will, these senators can take some considerable credit.

I do not intend to comment on the recommendations in detail, since they are on the technical side. I would, however, like to note how gratified I am at the show of non-partisan cooperation on all sides. As I mentioned in concluding the hearings, the Chief Electoral Officer is to be complimented on completing such a Herculean task in a short time frame and still giving two committees of Parliament an opportunity to look at the regulation.

Mr. John-Pierre Kingsley, the Chief Electoral Officer, responded as follows, and I quote:

Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I really appreciate the comments you have just made. Obviously we have already agreed to postpone la prise du règlement [to ensure that the committee has time to respond.]

We asked him to delay the time. He had picked July 8, and we asked him to delay the time further to allow us the opportunity to have our counsel and another representative from our research staff go word by word through the proposed regulations, and he acceded. That is what he means when he says:

Obviously we have agreed to postpone la prise du règlement [to ensure that the committee has time to respond]. I want to add that I personally find this kind of process very reassuring. I feel that the final adaptation of the Act will benefit significantly from the input of both this committee and the house committee, and sincerely thank you and your committee for the interest you have demonstrated in this matter.

It is quite reassuring to me because, as was said, it is not an undaunting task to have to adapt this legislation. When I was asked whether I would welcome the opportunity for a committee or committees of the house and of the Senate to review this adaptation, I said yes. In my mind, this was entirely justified. Thank you very much.

In my mind, this is precisely the functioning relationship between parties, and between Senators and the public service that, on these occasions and under these special circumstances, we should be striving to achieve. I think we can all take some pride in how well the very difficult and time-constrained process worked to the mutual benefit of all concerned.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, at the next sitting. I do remind honourable senators that we are not asking for concurrence but of course would welcome comments made when senators have had an opportunity to read the material, and therefore I suggest the next sitting for taking the report into consideration.

On motion of Senator Frith, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

REFERENDUM QUESTION—NOTICE OF INQUIRY—LEAVE DENIED TO PROCEED LATER THIS DAY

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I intend to place before the Senate the possibility of proceeding with an inquiry today, an inquiry which would draw the attention of the Senate to the decision of the government to hold a referendum on the Constitution on October 26 next, and to the proposed question that will be put to the people of Canada in that referendum.

My cabinet colleague, the President of the Queen's Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs, will be tabling shortly that question and speaking to it in the House of Commons.

In making this suggestion, I do not have in mind the convenience of the government. That is not a factor here. I simply make the suggestion to see whether it would suit the convenience of honourable senators to begin our discussion of the referendum and of the referendum question somewhat in advance of a message coming to us from the House of Commons.

As honourable senators know, the Referendum Act that we passed several months ago provides for one day's notice and a maximum of three days' debate in both houses on the referendum question. When I asked Mr. Speaker to summon the Senate back to Ottawa today, it was in the hope and expectation that the debate on the referendum question would be completed in the House of Commons rather earlier than now seems to be likely. My latest information is that, at best, members of the other place will vote on the referendum question tomorrow night at 8 p.m. If that schedule holds up, we will be asking the Senate to sit tomorrow night in order to receive the message from the House of Commons. We would begin the formal debate on the matter on Friday morning.

I do not know how many honourable senators will wish to take part in the debate or what period of time it will require. However, I am sure there are a number on this side who will want to speak. Therefore, it occurred to me that I might suggest to the house that we could begin today, by way of inquiry, a discussion of the decision of the government to hold the referendum, and of the text of the question, if the Senate wished to do so. We could then undertake the more formal debate on the matter when the message arrives.

I have not received, nor have I sought, any commitment from the leadership opposite on this matter. As I said, this is not a matter in which the convenience of the government is involved or in which there is any extraordinary urgency. The die is cast. We will have three days' debate on the matter, if we want it, once the message arrives in this place.

I simply put it to honourable senators that I am ready to proceed with a discussion of the referendum and of the question under the rubric of Inquiries, if it is the wish of honourable senators. If not, we can wait until we receive the message and begin the debate on Friday morning.

With a view to testing the waters, as it were, under Notices of Inquiries, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(2), I give notice that later this day I will draw the attention of the Senate to the decision of the government to hold a referendum on constitutional renewal on October 26 next, and on the referendum question which the government has submitted for the consideration of Parliament.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Senator Sparrow: No.

UNITED NATIONS

PEACEKEEPING—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Friday next, September 11, 1992, I will call the attention of the Senate to U.N. peacekeeping.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honourto present petitions signed by 150 residents of New Brunswick who are opposed to the Goods and Services Tax.

Most of these petitions come from Saint John and Grand Bay.

I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 506 residents of British Columbia who are opposed to the Goods and Services Tax.

Most of these petitions come from Kamloops, Vancouver, White Rock, Burnaby, Penticton and Coquitlam.

This represents a grand total of 656 unhappy citizens who will not have time to forget their discontent before the next election.

AGRICULTURE

U.S. EXPORT ENHANCEMENT PROGRAM—INCREASE IN FUNDING—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate what the response of the Canadian government has been to the announcement of the President of the United States that they will increase their funding to the Export Enhancement Program by $1 billion—that is $1 billion over and above the amount of money allocated to that agricultural program in the initial budget.

I remind the honourable minister that at the time of the announcement the international grain market had been improving. As a matter of fact, the price rose from a low of around $2.50 per bushel to over $4 per bushel, which was the price for one or two days. However, recently, the price has been around $3.80, which is about a 50 per cent increase above the bottom price set by the Chicago Board of Trade Exchange, the market which sets the international price for grain.

I have not heard, nor have the farmers, what the Canadian government's response will be to this situation. It appears that it will, to use some short terminology, wreck the international market again.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, we have formally protested the increase in the Export Enhancement Program in a letter from Mr. McKnight, the Minister of Agriculture, and Mr. Mayer, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, to U.S. Agriculture Secretary Madigan.

We are seeking early confirmation from the United States on this matter, and we are already consulting with other affected countries as to how we might together combat this move.

Senator Olson: I have a supplementary question: Has there been, to date, any response from the United States authorities, whether it be from the Department of Agriculture or any other official including the White House, to this letter of protest which you have sent?

Perhaps while you are replying to that question, you could indicate whether the Canadian government will help to promote—which perhaps is what you just referred to—a collective effort by Australia and several other countries around the world that are similarly disturbed by this announcement?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will have to ask my cabinet colleagues whether they have had any response from the American authorities to the letter sent by Ministers McKnight and Mayer. We are consulting with Australia and other countries adversely affected by the United States' decision. I should say we are also reviewing our legal options under the GATT and the FTA on this matter.

Senator Olson: More supplementary, if I may; many of us think that this a bit of an election ploy in the United States. In the event that this is so, perhaps the Canadian government can give some indication of whether they can cool this issue until after the first week of November, so that the United States can get that behind them?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I appreciate that advice and I shall convey it to my colleagues.

AIR INDUSTRY

CONTINUED VIABILITY OF AIR CANADA AND CANADIAN AIRLINES INTERNATIONAL—REQUEST FOR STATUS REPORT

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, Canada is well served indeed by two outstanding airlines, Air Canada and Canadian Airlines International. Both airlines, as we know, are experiencing some economic difficulties, as are air carriers throughout the world.

I have been in public life for over thirty years now—more years than at times I care to remember—yet I have never seen a more positive employee initiative than that launched by the employees of Canadian Airlines International. That airline has a big employment base in Alberta and British Columbia and several thousand employees in other parts of Canada. Those employees have now launched a plan to bring into being an employee equity investment plan in relation to Canadian Airlines International, and in so doing have sought the assistance and cooperation of the federal government.

I understand that this is a rather critical day in the range of negotiations that that employee group is having with PWA, the parent corporation, and with American airlines.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government can provide any information about the success of the process to maintain the viability of Canadian Airlines International and of Air Canada? They are both outstanding airlines. Any senator who has travelled on other carriers throughout the world knows just how well we are served by these two air carriers.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the comments the honourable senator has made about our two airlines. He is only doing them justice when he describes them as outstanding. They are, however, awash in debt, and there is taking place in the world, as the honourable senator knows, very considerable restructuring in the entire airline industry.

Having said that, I think we shall have some concrete information on the decision taken by the directors of PWA today, and we should have it, if my information is correct, in about ten minutes. My information is that a news conference was scheduled for 1:30 p.m. western time, at which time the directors would announce the conclusion they had come to with regard to the employees' proposal that the honourable senator has mentioned and to the latest merger proposal by Air Canada.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—STATUS OF PROJECT

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate give us an update on the status of the fixed link to Prince Edward Island? Also, regarding the boring of test holes in the strait, has the contract already been let, and if not, why are these test holes being drilled by one company and not the other two?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): I am sorry, honourable senators, I did not hear the last part of the question.

Senator Bonnell: Why are the test holes in the strait—and incidentally on top of the lobster fishing grounds of Prince Edward Island—being drilled by one company and not by the other two? Is there a deal that has been signed behind closed doors of which we have not been told?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the information I have been given, and I think the honourable Senator is aware of it, is that in July the Minister of Public Works was authorized by the government to proceed with discussions with Strait Crossing Incorporated to determine whether it would be possible to conclude a deal within the guidelines established by the government for the project.

As part of the verification process, the firm of Buckland & Taylor has been engaged to provide an independent assessment of the structure and the costs submitted by Strait Crossing Incorporated. Their work was expected to have been completed by the end of August, at which time we expect Mr. MacKay to seek direction from cabinet on how to proceed with the project. If it is decided to proceed with Strait Crossing Inc.'s proposal, final documentation will be completed by the end of November.

Senator Bonnell: Has the federal government given permission to Strait Crossing Inc. to drill those holes in the Northumberland Strait?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I should have to inquire as to what governmental body, federal or provincial or both, would be competent to provide such authorization and whether that has been done. I do not have the answer to the honourable senator's question.

Senator Bonnell: But would the provincial government have the authority to give any company the right and the privilege to bore holes in the Northumberland Strait? Is that not a federal jurisdiction?

Senator Murray: I appreciate the point, honourable senators, but I would want to verify what authorization was sought, what authorization if any was granted, and by what governmental body.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wonder if, while the Minister is getting that information, he could ascertain why it is necessary to take new borings at this stage in the advancement of this particular project. One would have thought that the information with regard to foundation conditions would have been ascertained as a first step rather than as a last step in the development of the project. I am sure that there is some good answer; perhaps the Minister would obtain that answer.

Senator Murray: I shall try to obtain the good answer, honourable senators.

THE SENATE

ELECTION OF SPEAKER IN ELECTED SENATE —GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to confirm that it is the position of the government that, in an elected Senate, the Speaker of the Senate will be elected by the members of that chamber?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there has been no determination of that question, nor of a number of other questions relating to the procedures and operations of the proposed new Senate and its relationship to the other place, except for the consensus which has been arrived at on different types of legislation, and how a disagreement between the two Houses would be dealt with.

Senator Austin: In a Senate composed as the government has agreed it should be composed, would a Speaker appointed by the Prime Minister be a consistent projection of a renewed second chamber?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, no consideration of which I am aware has been given to the question of a Speaker or a presiding officer for the new body, nor, to the best of my knowledge, have the various parties decided on how the business of the government and legislation from the other place is to be introduced and carried through the new Senate—and that would be, I expect, the responsibility of the federal government primarily. As the honourable senator knows, the proposal agreed on in Charlottetown is that there be no cabinet minister, no representative of the Crown, in the new body.

Senator Austin: I can only say that the issue of a Speaker in the renewed Senate being elected by the senators themselves is one of some importance to western senators in this chamber because it would act as a symbol of the responsibility of that Speaker to that renewed Senate which, as you know so well, will allow western provinces at least a substantial minority choice in that selection.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I take the point and will certainly convey it to my colleague. I look forward with considerable anticipation to the next question which I think is about to come from Senator Perrault, who takes a rather different position on the merits of the new Senate proposal than that of his colleague from British Columbia.

Senator Austin: I said nothing about the merits of the Senate proposal. I am only saying that, if such a Senate as is proposed by the government exists, on the point of the Speaker I would wish that the government leader could quickly say that he agrees with the election of such a Speaker by the members of that chamber. As to the rest of it, I have made no comments as yet.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, however the new Speaker is selected, I am sure every consideration will be given to an experienced senator like himself.

Senator Austin: No doubt.

PROPOSED NEW SENATE—AUTHENTICITY OF PREMIERS AS SPOKESMEN FOR REGIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, for a number of years I served in the provincial legislature of the province of British Columbia, and I have the scars to prove it. I remember that on numerous occasions involving the premiers they would repeat over and over the hoary old myth that they were the only authentic spokesmen for the regions of Canada. In their view, the members of Parliament who were elected from British Columbia would go to Ottawa and be infected with some sort of virus, and become totally useless after that. I see other members on both sides nodding their heads. It is the old myth that neither senators nor members of the House of Commons really do the job for the regions; that only the premiers can do that job.

In view of the fact that three of the premiers who helped shape this federal institution belong to a party which for years has called for the abolition of the Senate, why would we turn over to the premiers of Canada the major responsibility to fashion Canada's upper house, the Senate? Why did the government cooperate with them, it seems to me, in ignorning the mature recommendations of the Beaudoin-Dobbie Committee, whose members authored a very thoughtful effort. The committee was chaired by one of our colleagues. We ignored their efforts and opted instead for the views of the premiers of Canada who, frankly, do not know very much about the Parliament of Canada. Why did the government do it?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the chief quarrel of the honourable senator seems to be with the fact that the first ministers decided on equal representation rather than equitable representation.

Senator Perrault: Speaking to the larger question, why were these premiers, some of them literally rookies in their work, allowed to play such a pivotal role in deciding the future of this nation? The hours of labour invested by the chairman of the Beaudoin-Dobbie Committee and his colleagues, who did a first rate job, were virtually ignored.

Senator Murray: I quite agree with the comments that the honourable senator has made about the excellent work that was done by our colleague Senator Beaudoin and the members of that committee. The reality is that the Senate is an institution of Parliament, of our federation, and that it is the premiers, the first ministers, who have the responsibility to recommend changes to our Constitution, as it was in 1867. When the representatives of Upper and Lower Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick met, they decided at that time on a Senate which they felt was appropriate to those times. The first ministers, in their meetings in Charlottetown, and prior to that in Ottawa, have designed a Senate that they believe is appropriate to our times and to the future.

It should be pointed out, however, that many of the decisions relating to the election of the senators and to the procedures of this body and various aspects of its relationship to the other place remain to be defined and will be the responsibility of the federal government.

Senator Perrault: Basically the question in the minds of so many of us is who spoke for Canada during those negotiations. Who spoke for Canada? Who spoke about the need to have an effective federal Parliament?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I think my friend would find quite a number of people, not only participants in that process but Canadians generally, who would argue that the proposed new Senate strengthens the institution of Parliament as a whole and strengthens the bonds of Canadian federation. If the honourable senator feels differently, as he obviously does, he will have ample opportunity, in the course of the referendum debate in his own province of British Columbia and elsewhere if he chooses, to campaign for the "no" side or, indeed, to oppose the resolution to amend the Constitution when it comes before this body in due course.

[Senator Perrault.]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: I note that in his answer the minister said that many Canadians believe what he has just reiterated. Is it his belief that this agreement will strengthen the Senate?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I support the package wholeheartedly.

Senator Molgat: But that is not the question at hand. The question at hand is the Senate. In answer to Senator Perrault you said "Many Canadians believe that this will make a stronger Senate" or " will strengthen the Senate". Is that your view?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, it is clear to me that it will strengthen the institution of Parliament and, because it has such wide acceptance in the federation, that it will strengthen the bonds that unite us as Canadians.

Senator Molgat: My honourable friend still has not answered the question. Does he believe that this agreement will strengthen the Senate? Will it be a stronger Senate?

Senator Murray: Absolutely, honourable senators. Democratic legitimacy will strengthen the Senate.

Senator Perrault: You do not believe that for a minute.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

DUPLICATION OF SERVICES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, my question may be considered a supplementary to the question put by Senator Perrault a few minutes ago on the airline industry.

Is the government contemplating any action to call a halt to some of the irresponsible duplication of services in which the two airlines have been engaged that has led them into this morass of debt about which the Leader of the Government spoke a few minutes ago? The options are to help them out of this debt, or to do what a government ought to do, and that is to ensure that there are applicable rules to maintain the airline industry in Canada, which is so vital to the movement of people across this land.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, without necessarily accepting the analysis that the honourable senator has put forward as to the contributing factors of the financial distress of those two airlines, I can only say that we are encouraging a private sector solution to the current problem. If there is a decision on a merger, it would have to be considered by the Bureau of Competition Policy under the Competition Act and possibly by the National Transportation Agency, if that were desired by any petitioner.

Honourable senators, I do not think it is our role as a government, or the role of any agency, to establish airline schedules in the country. That is a matter in which the airlines should do what they perceive to be in their own best interests.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, what the honourable minister has just said is that this government does not want to govern the country in the interest of maintaining services that are absolutely essential to the people of this country. So the government is, as the minister has indicated, attempting to find a private interest solution to the problem. There has been a predatory, irresponsible, duplication of services which has reduced the load factor. There is absolutely no justification for this, except to run the competition into the ground. This government stood by and allowed the airlines to sink hundreds of millions of dollars into debt. We have reached the stage where we will probably not have any effective competition between any airlines, because someone must pick up those deficits. The airlines have done this deliberately to knock the other airline right out of the sky.

Will the government ever assume its responsibility to see that these essential services are maintained, and indeed make rules and regulations?

Honourable senators, there was a time when you had to apply for routes. Assessments were done by various boards and transport commissions to determine whether there was any justification for additional service. This was not done simply on the basis of running your competitor into the ground.

Will the government assume its responsibility of ensuring that Canadians have an airline service, because it is in great jeopardy at the moment?

Senator Murray: As a frequent traveller to many parts of the country, I do not agree with the honourable senator—

Senator Marchand: You had better come west.

Senator Murray: —that the previous situation was at all better than the present availability of flights.

Senator Olson: We did not have bankrupt airlines, anyway.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator is suggesting re-regulation, I presume?

Senator Olson: That is right, properly called "re-helping to govern".

Senator Murray: Nor are we convinced that that provides a solution.

Honourable senators, I may say that it is no part of our ambition or policy to encourage a domestic airline monopoly in this country.

Senator Olson: Is it the position of the government that it will not assume its responsibility of maintaining a reasonable airline service in this country?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I just indicated in reply to the first or second question that the honourable senator posed on this matter that any decision on a merger would have to be approved by the Bureau of Competition Policy and would possibly come before the National Transportation Agency, if there were petitioners who wished to bring it to that body.

Senator Olson: That is pretty sad.

JUSTICE

SOCIAL UNREST—PROPOSED MEETING OF PRIME MINISTER WITH BIG CITY MAYORS AND FEDERATION OF MUNICIPALITIES

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to bring to the attention of the honourable minister a question that I have asked on a number of occasions. My honourable friend will recall that in the aftermath of the riot in Toronto, there was a request that the Prime Minister meet with big city mayors. I asked a series of questions over a number of days following that. My honourable friend indicated that the Prime Minister was prepared to do so. Has that meeting taken place?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not know the answer to that question. I can tell the honourable senator that one of the initiatives we spoke of on that occasion is now nearing fruition. The Minister of Justice has indicated her intention to bring in a white paper, which of course would lead to legislation with regard to the "fleeing felon rule", as it is referred to in legal shorthand, and the use of force by police in those situations.

Senator Frith: Hot pursuit.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—REPRESENTATION IN SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I would like to go back to this consensus report on the Constitution in Charlottetown on August 28th. In 1873, when Prince Edward Island joined with Canada—or Canada joined with Prince Edward Island, there were several main points to that agreement. One was continuous communication with the mainland, which we have not received as yet; the second was to give us the railroad, and we lost the railroad; the third, and perhaps most important point, was that we would be guaranteed at least the same number of members in the House of Commons as we have in the Senate. Under the proposed Constitution, we will have six senators. Will we get two more members in the House of Commons, as was promised under the agreement when we joined this country?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): No, honourable senators.

Senator Bonnell: Are you going to break the agreement Prince Edward Island made with the rest of Canada in 1873?

Senator Murray: The first ministers, including the distinguished people of Prince Edward Island, have decided to amend the Constitution in those respects. There will be six senators from Prince Edward Island, but Prince Edward Island, as I understand it under this arrangement, is guaranteed that it will never have fewer than four members in the House of Commons.

Senator Bonnell: We were never to have fewer members in the House of Commons than we have senators. It is only because we have four senators that we have four members in the House of Commons. It is not because of our population. I see nothing in this agreement that takes that guarantee out of the British North America Act.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as the premier of Prince Edward Island would say, the Island emerges from the present round a net winner.

Senator Bonnell: I am not worried about whether or not we are winners or losers. Will we get two more members in the House of Commons as we were promised when we joined Confederation?

Senator Murray: Honourable senator, you will have ten parliamentarians instead of eight.

CONSENSUS REPORT—FINAL TEXT

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must point out that, under our rules, Question Period is over. Is there unanimous consent to hear a question from Senator Grafstein?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise us when the final French and English legal texts of the agreement reached by the premiers will be available?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is the consensus report, the final text. The work of translating this into the language of constitutional amendment is proceeding. That is, as the honourable senator knows, an infinitely complex task and will require considerable work and consultation among all the parties to the consensus. I am not in a position to hazard a guess as to when it will be complete. I shall make inquiries, but I do not expect it will be very soon.

Senator Grafstein: Will it be available prior to the referendum date?

Senator Murray: I very much doubt it, honourable senators. Assuming the referendum is held on October 26, I doubt that the draftsmen and the political leaders involved will have been able to achieve a complete agreement on what the honourable senator calls the final legal or constitutional text.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): I take it that the work of drafting the text is occurring before the people have said whether they want the amendment or not?

Senator Murray: Well I hope it is, honourable senators. I would be astonished if it were not, and I would regard it as rather imprudent on the part of our draftsmen and advisors were they not hard at work.

Senator Frith: Well, it is based on the assumption that people are going to say yes.

[Senator Bonnell.]

Senator Murray: Well, people can say no. Of course the final decision on these matters, this being a non-binding referendum, will be up to the legislatures of the different provinces.

• (1540)

Senator Frith: Therefore, even if the people say "no", it is possible that the government will proceed with the amendments?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, that is a highly hypothetical question.

Senator Frith: That is a hypothetical assumption you are making by going ahead with the drafting.

Senator Murray: Any government would have the right to present those amendments to its legislature. Senator MacEachen and I had a discussion on the political reality that is involved in this. My honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition can draw his own conclusion as to the probabilities.

Senator Olson: Are you saying that it will be a seamless web when it comes?

Senator Frith: It might be.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have several delayed answers to oral questions raised in the Senate on June 2 by Senator Simard regarding the moratorium by the European Community on the fishing of Atlantic cod stocks, and by Senator Thériault regarding overfishing by giant trawlers; on June 11 by Senator Molgat regarding the sale of Canadian durum wheat to Italy; and on June 15 by Senator Stewart regarding France's fishing rights in Canadian territorial waters, and by Senator Frith regarding the closure of military bases.

FISHERIES

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY—MORATORIUM ON FISHING OF ATLANTIC COD STOCKS

(Reply to a question raised by the Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard on June 2, 1992)

Mr. Crosbie's analysis has been made clear in public statements. In summary:

1) The European Community (EC) has announced a temporary suspension of its cod fishery on the Nose of the Banks and its intention to temporarily suspend all cod and flatfish fisheries in the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Organization (NAFO) Regulatory Area;

2) the EC announcement is a welcome development. Canada hopes it signals a new EC commitment to conservation outside 200 miles. Canada has asked the EC to keep these fisheries closed for the rest of the year, and to comply with all NAFO decisions henceforth;

3) in advance of the annual NAFO meeting in September, Canada will work with all NAFO Contracting Parties to finalize the details of reforms to the NAFO surveillance and control system to be considered for adoption at the meeting. If adopted, these reform measures would represent modest progress toward ending overfishing. Other important control measures would still have to be taken by contracting parties, such as inspection of fish products when unloaded in home ports, to ensure compliance with all NAFO management decisions;

4) at the Earth Summit, the EC was eventually persuaded to support an agreement on principles and measures to conserve fish stocks on the high seas. This agreement dealt with important matters, such as commitment in principle against reflagging of fishing vessels. The EC was also persuaded to support an agreement that an intergovernmental conference on high seas fisheries is to be convened by the United Nations. We are encouraged that the EC decided to support these agreements.

5) Following the Rio Summit, Canada will seek the support of its G-7 partners at the Economic Summit in July for conservation of fish stocks on the high seas including the strengthening of regional organizations such as NAFO and effective monitoring and enforcement of their conservation decisions;

6) Canada will also be concentrating its efforts on preparations for the intergovernmental UN conference on high seas fisheries.

OVERFISHING BY GIANT TRAWLERS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

(Reply to a question raised by the Hon. L. Norbert Thériault on June 2, 1992)

Offshore vessels operating in the Gulf of St. Lawrence are monitored very closely and must report their catch on a daily basis. They currently have limited cod quotas which they have access to in the Gulf. Offshore cod quotas in the Gulf are essentially used for by-catch in the 4RST redfish fishery.

For 1992 the offshore has a quota of 2,774t of 4RS3Pn cod, only 9% of the Canadian quota of 29,826t. The only other Gulf cod stock for which the offshore has had an allocation is 4TVn (J-A). For this stock, the offshore had an allocation of 3,984t in 1992 of which the entire amount was fished outside the Gulf in area 4Vn during the winter.

To eliminate the offshore from either of these fisheries would have a severe negative impact on the employment generated, and impact on a number of offshore plants both within and outside the Gulf.

The destruction of any stock is not necessarily directly related to the size of the vessels employed to harvest it. Vessels less than 100 feet in length can be very destructive if they do not follow conservation rules.

AGRICULTURE

CANADIAN DURUM WHEAT—DECLINE IN SALES TO ITALY

(Response to question raised by Hon. Gildas L. Molgat on June 11, 1992)

The statistics used by Francesco Bragga and Roberta Raffaelli of the University of Guelph in their discussion paper on durum wheat, indicate that Canadian exports to Italy have decreased at the expense of increased American sales.

Using more detailed data over a longer duration, it can be seen that whereas Canada's exports have fluctuated and decreased over the years, over the same period, U.S. exports have also fluctuated and decreased. However, over the same period there have been substantial increases into Italy of durum wheat from the European Community (EC).

These increases have almost certainly impacted on Canadian and U.S. export levels. Levies on durum imports from outside the EC are high, and this has encouraged Italian processors to maximize the use of cheaper EC-origin durum and minimize the use of the more expensive North American durum.

The Canadian Wheat Board's market intelligence sources indicate that within the Italian market there is a defined demand for a special type of U.S. durum which is grown only under the agronomic conditions found in Arizona and California. This characteristic durum is utilized mainly to manufacture pasta used in cold salads. Demand for U.S. durum in the Italian market has been largely confined to this Arizona/California "desert" durum. It would seem, therefore, that it is not Canada's grading system which prohibits Canada from exporting durum into this Italian niche market.

In the July to June 1989/90 crop year, U.S. durum exports to Italy rose above the defined demand, and in fact approached, although did not exceed the Canadian level. At least two factors are thought to have contributed to these unusually high U.S. exports. They are:

- due to the drought reduced crop of 1988, Canada entered the year with a low carryout which resulted in low shipments to Italy in the first quarter of 1989/90. This short fall was apparently filled by the U.S.;

- in anticipation of high demand prices, one of the major international grain companies positioned themselves by purchasing substantial quantities of U.S. durum which they eventually marketed into Italy.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

FRANCE—FISHING RIGHTS IN CANADIAN TERRITORIAL WATERS—STATEMENT OF MINISTER ON COURT DECISION—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF INFORMATION

(Response to question raised by Hon. John B. Stewart on June 15, 1992)

The likely impact on Canadian groundfish fisheries will be small. The key fishing areas for cod and other groundfish, which are critical for the livelihood of fishermen and plant workers off the south coast of Newfoundland, are located within the Canadian zone.

The decision gives France 3,607 square nautical miles or 11 percent of Subdivision 3Ps, off the south of Newfoundland. Some cod and other groundfish will certainly be caught in the French zone. There is little risk of French vessels being able to mount a massive interception of migrating fish in the French corridor. Cod migrates on a north-south axis—not an east-west axis through the French zone.

The Canadian fleet has historically had small groundfish catches within what is now the French zone.

The new French zone does include a portion of the Icelandic scallop beds in 3Ps. The significance for Canadian fishermen is difficult to define because the commercial fishing patterns are not as well known. There are significant Icelandic scallop resources in the Canadian zone. In any event, we may be able to obtain access to these resources in the French zone for Canadian fishermen as part of reciprocal arrangements to be negotiated.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CLOSURE OF MILITARY BASES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

(Response to question raised by Hon. Royce Frith on June 15, 1992)

The subject of adjustments to Canada's defence infrastructure is a very complex issue. Therefore, on September 17th, 1991, the Honourable Marcel Masse, Minister of National Defence, announced the creation of the Minister's Advisory Group on Defence Infrastructure (MAGDI).

The Advisory Group dealt with the factors to be taken into consideration and the methods to be employed in the rationalization of defence infrastructure. It was not, however, tasked with identifying specific facilities for closure.

The Advisory Group's findings were presented to the Minister of National Defence on June 1st, 1992, and released to the public on June 2nd, 1992.

Associate Minister of National Defence, the Honourable Mary Collins, tabled the Advisory Group's Report in the House of Commons on June 5th, 1992. The Report was referred to the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veteran's Affairs for consideration.

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

After the Committee has considered the Report, it is hoped that a process will be formally adopted which will allow for the rationalization of the Canadian defence infrastructure.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

CONTRAVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. R. James Balfour moved the second reading of Bill C-46, respecting contraventions of federal enactments.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to rise in the chamber today to speak on behalf of Bill C-46, the Contraventions bill, which provides a new and simplified means of enforcing minor federal regulatory offences reflecting the distinction between the truly criminal acts and less serious offences.

Currently, those charged with minor regulatory or statutory offences are not treated differently from those charged with criminal offences. Individuals who may be in breach of a less serious provision of a federal enactment presently have no alternative but to appear and be processed through the criminal court system.

In discussions between the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Kim Campbell, and her provincial and territorial colleagues, it was agreed that an inordinate amount of time is spent by prosecutors, court administrators and enforcement officers on the prosecution of minor regulatory offences, resulting in a waste of valuable resources, backlogs in the system, and an undue burden on the courts. This is not only inefficient, inconvenient and expensive, but inappropriate when dealing with less significant transgressions.

Essentially, the Contraventions bill establishes a "ticketing scheme" which will permit enforcement authorities to issue tickets to persons charged with a designated offence. Individuals who wish to plead guilty and pay a set fine may do so, thus avoiding the necessity of a formal court appearance. This scheme will ease the court's workload by eliminating cases which do not require a sentencing hearing or trial. In turn, this will give the enforcement personnel more time in the field and allow federal prosecutors and provincial and territorial court officers to focus on those matters which require judicial consideration.

Honourable senators, the origins of the ticketing scheme can be traced back many years. In fact, our courts have been wrestling with this matter for a number of years and in the landmark 1978 decision Regina versus the City of Sault Ste. Marie, the court confirmed that a distinction between truly criminal and regulatory offences was appropriate. That case, as some of you may recall, was concerned with the deposit of refuse by a contractor of the city resulting in pollution of a nearby creek. One of the questions before the court was the issue of the city's liability. The court's judgment was pronounced by Mr. Justice Dickson, as he then was. In his decision, Justice Dickson characterized the act of polluting as being a regulatory offence; such offences are not, he said:

> . . .criminal in any real sense, but are prohibited in the public interest. Although enforced as penal laws through the utilization of the machinery of the criminal law, the offences are in substance of a civil nature and might well be regarded as a branch of administrative law to which traditional principles of criminal law have but limited application. They relate to such every day matters as traffic infractions, sales of impure food, violations of liquor laws and the like.

Honourable senators, this particular case speaks to the fact that there is clearly a basis for establishing a different classification for different types of offences. The Contraventions bill squarely addresses this matter by providing for the development of a scheme which calls for new, simplified procedures for regulatory matters, and distinguishes between the consequences for conviction for a ticketable offence and a criminal offence.

Essentially, there are three central objectives of our ticketing scheme. The first objective is the decriminalization of minor federal regulatory offences. The Contraventions bill replaces existing criminal procedure with a ticketing scheme similar in nature to those now in place in several provinces.

The second objective is the removal of uncontested cases from the courts. This legislation enables enforcement authorities to issue tickets to offenders as an alternative to laying an information which would be dealt with like any other offence under the Criminal Code. As a result, persons who receive a ticket and wish to plead guilty can do so by paying a set fine without having to appear in court.

However, we will still preserve the right for those persons who wish to do so to contest their tickets in open court before a judge. What we are doing is offering the public the option.

The final objective of this legislative endeavour is improved enforcement of fines. It seems apparent that the ticketing scheme will facilitate and encourage early payment of fines by enabling offenders to pay the prescribed fine without making a formal court appearance.

I point out, honourable senators, that since its inception this legislative initiative has been endorsed at the federal level by 12 other departments and agencies. Each of the participants has chosen offences to be included in the "schedule of offences" which will establish those offences to be designated "ticketable". It should be noted that the Contraventions bill does not create any new offences but, rather, provides new, simplified procedures for the prosecution of persons charged with existing federal offences.

What kind of offences are contemplated by the Contraventions bill? As I have been saying, they are minor offences. For example: Hunting without a valid license; camping in a park without a permit; picking flowers on federal property; illegal parking on federal lands; or failing to dump refuse in a proper container while on parklands.

The person who receives a ticket has the following options: First, he may plead guilty and pay the set fine as indicated on the ticket without appearing in court. Second, he may plead guilty with representations, asking the court for a lesser fine or an extended time to pay the fine. Third, the individual may wish to dispute the charge and so indicates the desire to proceed to trial by forwarding the ticket to the appropriate court office.

In this latter case, where a trial is requested, the trial proceeds in accordance with the summary conviction provisions of the Criminal Code. An individual who ignores a ticket will be found guilty by default.

Finally, it should be noted that the Contraventions bill will apply to young offenders as well as adults. It is fair that young persons who engage in activities under the sphere of the ticketing scheme, such as camping, hunting and fishing, should be held responsible for their actions if they violate the law. However, in recognition that the maximum limit of $1,000 may be too onerous, the maximum fine level for a young person who is ticketed will be $100.

In conclusion, honourable senators, the Contraventions bill is simply good, sensible law reform. The philosophy behind it enjoys widespread support. It is time to put into place a law that is accessible and practical.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned,

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Wood, calling the attention of the Senate to the cancellation of the Court Challenge Program.—(Honourable Senator Kinsella).

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, on June 23 I thanked Senator Wood for bringing the matter of the Court Challenges Program to the attention of the Senate. Today I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak to this question. The Court Challenges Program was originally established, as Senator Wood pointed out, in 1978,

> . . . to deal with constitutional issues under the British North America Act and then extended to the 1982 Charter of Rights and Freedoms . . .

The original objective in 1978 was to provide financial assistance to linguistic minorities seeking to assert and clarify their rights through litigation. Since 1982, the program has included the language protections found in sections 16 to 23 of the Charter.

In 1985 the program, while being totally funded by the federal government, became independent of the government in terms of operation. That is also the year, 1985, in which the main equality provisions of the Charter came into force. I am referring of course to section 15. In addition to supporting challenges under section 15 of the Charter, the program also financed case studies and tested litigation pursuant to section 28 of the Charter dealing with gender equality and section 27 dealing with multiculturalism.

The principal beneficiaries of the program have been disadvantaged and disenfranchised individuals and groups. The program has also assisted all Canadians in reaching better understanding of the rights which affect all of us. The program manifested a concrete commitment by the government to the societal values proclaimed in the Charter. For, without the means to promote and defend human rights, statements or rights may be illusory.

In 1989, an intensive study of the Court Challenges Program was carried out by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons. After a series of open hearings over the course of almost six months, the committee unanimously recommended continuation of the program. In the May 1990 response to the committee's report the government agreed to renew the Court Challenges Program for five years, until 1995.

The objectives of this type of publicly supported court access program accrues to the benefit of all levels of government across Canada. Many of the Charter cases with wide implications for our society have featured persuasive arguments by litigants or interveners supported by the Court Challenges Program. As an example, I could cite the Andrews case on equality rights, the Mahé case on minority language rights, and Butler, a ruling which outlaws pornography that endangers women.

It was for this reason that following last February's budget I recommended to the government in early March that it reach out to provincial governments and the private sector for partners with whom we might initiate a new national rights or courts access type of program. This proposal was repeated by the Minister of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, the Honourable Gerry Weiner, during his appearance before the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology on April 9, 1992 when he stated:

> This program in particular was an excellent program . . . It was an exceptional program, a wonderful program, made in Canada, a program that may still continue and not necessarily with only our money . . .

Further on, the minister said:

> We would take a serious look at any possible opportunity. Frankly, I personally like the partnership idea, I would like to see development of a plan wherein a group of people participate, and perhaps that is the route we should go.

Since that time, several provincial ministers of justice have made statements supporting the view that a national rights access to the courts type program needs to be maintained and have indicated their willingness to be partners. In addition to that, several nongovernmental organizations have indicated their willingness to be partners. Moreover, the current constitutional round creates the likelihood that even more support for citizen participation in constitutional interpretation will be required. If, for example, a social covenant were to become part of the Constitution, any form of monitoring is likely to involve input from a broad spectrum of Canadians, many of whom would need financial assistance to participate meaningfully.

In the wake of the announced cancellation of the Court Challenges Program the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons in the other place held hearings in March and April of this year. The resulting report of that committee's work is entitled "Paying Too Dearly" and was tabled in the other place in June. That report concludes with the recommendation that the Court Challenges Program be maintained.

As an example of the kinds of cases that may falter in their progress if the program is indeed canceled, the committee in the other place mentions an application involving access to bus transportation for people with disabilities. They mention another concerning a native woman who is trying to prevent the incarceration of aboriginal women at the prison for women in Kingston. The same committee records that 72 of 85 of the equality cases currently funded are still at the trial court level and only 7 are at the Supreme Court of Canada level. With respect to language rights, 16 of the current matters are at the trial court level and only three have reached the supreme court.

To put the problem plainly, if the individuals and the groups currently pursuing constitutional challenges at the trial level happen to lose their cases there will be no money to commence the expensive process of appealing. We should recall that the program's mandate in effect required it to fund only those cases important enough to merit being appealed all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The issue of cost must of course be addressed, especially in this period of austerity. The committee report from the other place, "Paying Too Dearly", indicates that Canadians have not paid too dearly for this program. It states that independent experts have confirmed that the program's money has been well spent. It would not be efficacious to dismantle an institution with seven years of accumulated experience and then face the task of rebuilding to meet new and evolving constitutional circumstances.

The evidence received by the standing committee in the other place would suggest that the program is both modestly funded and cost effective. It may come as a surprise to critics of the legal profession that a high proportion of the money provided for the program goes towards the expenses of bringing cases to court rather than to legal fees.

In the words of one witness who appeared before the committee in the other place, "there were huge donations of free legal work by reputable lawyers across the country." Another said that "approximately half of all the legal work is just given to the program".

I ask honourable senators, where else would one get a deal like that from a lawyer?

Some ministerial spokespersons have suggested that remaining needs for litigation could be met through ad hoc assistance, possibly through the Department of Justice. Given that the government, represented by the Department of Justice, is usually the defendant in Charter challenges, such an administrative arrangement would not have the appearance of fairness. Indeed, that was why it was changed in 1985 to an independent administration. It does not sound appropriate for one litigator to be deciding if other potential litigators and interveners should have the financial means to put their cases effectively.

As the standing committee's recently tabled report contends, there is no convincing evidence that an adequate program to support court challenges would cost less if administered directly by the government.

Honourable senators, in my view, the proposal that the committee in the other place has made in the report "Paying too Dearly" commends the serious intention of the government. Given the statements that have been made by witnesses representing provincial governments and a number of non-governmental organizations, there seems to be an opportunity for a new national initiative to achieve the same objective through partnerships with law societies and provincial governments. However, the Government of Canada, in my humble opinion, must remain a major player in order to allow Canadians to have the access to the courts that is necessary to elaborate the rights which are provided for in the Charter.

In conclusion, I wish to draw the attention of honourable senators to two facets of the standing committee's June 1992 report that focused on the importance and urgency of rejuvenating the Court Challenges Program. The committee requests a comprehensive government response, but also recommends that the government make a public statement of its intentions as soon as possible. Earlier in the report, the committee observed that representations it had received since the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program showed the committee "how greatly the people of Canada value the principle of access to the courts." The committee stated that during the whole of this Thirty-fourth Parliament, it had "never received as many unsolicited submissions on any single issue."

I share the view of the committee from the other place and the views of many other Canadians concerning the importance of maintaining the Court Challenges Program or divining and determining the model that would achieve the same objective. The door seemed to have been left open somewhat by Minister Weiner when he appeared before our Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, when he stated that he was open to partnerships, and I hope that those partnerships would be explored.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question. I support him totally. I am sure that in caucus he has fought for that cause that he cherishes. Since the honourable senator feels so strongly about it, perhaps he could organize a motion or a recommendation of some type to come from him and his colleagues in the Senate which we could support and which the government could take notice of.

Senator Kinsella: I thank the honourable senator for the observation. I wrote to the government after the budget came out last February and made this suggestion. It was repeated almost verbatim by the House of Commons committee in its report "Paying too Dearly." That parliamentary committee in the other place has received a number of representations from many distinguished Canadians, such as former Justice Bertha Wilson. I will examine any appropriate instrument that I could advance in this chamber.

Senator Thériault: I thank the honourable senator. I know that he is sincere in his efforts. Perhaps most of us are here for a very short time, if some of the constitutional amendments carry through, as I hope they will, and it would show that even if we are appointed we can come together for a good cause.

On motion of Senator Molgat debate adjourned.

THE ECONOMY

MISMANAGEMENT OF MONETARY POLICY—INQUIRY STANDS

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the Government's mismanagement of the economy and particularly monetary policy.—(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.).

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would request that Order No. 35 stand until later this day in order that it can give way to Order No. 21. If there is no time left after debate on Order No. 21 is completed, I would ask that Order No. 35 be stood until the next session.

The Hon. The Speaker: Is it agreed honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

SENATE REFORM

MOTION TO APPROVE THE PRINCIPLE OF AN ELECTED SENATE CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

On the Order:

> The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hébert:
> That the Senate of Canada agrees with the principle that the Senate be reformed, by making it an elected body with sufficient membership and power to effectively represent the people of Canada in all regions of our land.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the motion, the Honourable Senator Ottenheimer in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we are now in Committee of the Whole. Senator Olson has the floor.

Senator Olson: Mr. Chairman, I sincerely appreciate the discussions that took place earlier, which led to the debate of this inquiry and I would like to express my appreciation. I owe honourable senators an explanation as to why I made the request.

There is another serious crisis coming in the grain industry. The United States has announced an additional $1 billion of funding to its Export Enhancement Program. Even though the grain market was recovering, it is now in jeopardy and it looks like there will be difficulties.

In view of that situation, I have arranged to go to Geneva and to some other areas in Europe to find out what the European response will be. I understand that I do not have any authority to negotiate anything, but we should at least understand what is going on.

• (1610)

Since I am leaving tomorrow, it is particularly accommodating to me that this matter be taken up today. If I were here on Friday, I could make my contribution to this particular motion or another motion similar to it.

Since this motion was put down by Senator Molgat in February, there have been a number of interesting developments, and one of course is that Parliament has been recalled early to deal with the question of whether there should or should not be a referendum on amendments to the constitution.

I suppose there are some positive aspects to having made that progress, and for that I am grateful. I think one thing that is certainly indicated is that all the first ministers who met in Charlottetown a few days ago were willing to compromise for the sake of Canada. That, in my view, is positive, and I hope that that will be a spirit or attitude that will be prevalent through the rest of the campaign for either a yes or a no to the question that will be put in the referendum.

Quite frankly, I think that most people will realize that, on balance, Western Canada lost a great deal in so far as the federal Parliament is concerned. We lost a large number of members of Parliament. When you talk about the relative situation, there are to be 42 new or additional members. There will be a change because Ontario and Quebec, the two central provinces, have given up a number of senators, from 24 down to six. In exchange for that, they will get 18 more members of the House of Commons for each one of those provinces.

On balance, Alberta, for example, and the western provinces generally, have lost a great deal relative to the central Canadian influence in the Parliament of Canada. Albertans know this. They are not being fooled by Premier Getty coming back to western Canada and saying that he won a Triple E Senate. It is not even a two and a half. It is not even a two and quarter E, because the effective part under the proposal has been washed out. The Senate does not have that any more, as opposed to what he claimed. In fact, it is difficult with respect to even the present situation. It is worse than it was. It was not the improvement that they were seeking.

Honourable senators, Western Canada has grown up quite a bit since 1867. It is time that there was an adjustment in the influence of members of the Canadian Parliament. They had hoped that that would happen, but it has not. The redistribution that is proposed under what is contained in the consensus report, or whatever it is that we got today, leaves Western Canada a net loser when it comes to the real business of Parliament if the Senate does not have the power that it has now to amend or stop legislation that may be discriminatory to a region. We do not use that power very often. I could make a long speech on that, that we should have restructured ourselves so that we could use it once in a while, but we did not, for whatever reasons. Most people know what my reasons are and what my attitude is.

I think we should look at this agreement and try to work on the positive parts of it. We will have another opportunity to correct that problem when the question or the legal effect is put before Parliament, because it will still be this present Senate that will be dealing with that when it comes. If we could amend that part of the whole package that deals with this redistribution of Senate or parliamentary seats so that there is an element of fairness and justice for this whole country, then I think we should do that.

Some of the things that Premier Bourassa was asking for Quebec are contained therein. At least, he says they are there. I am not trying to interpret what he means or what his people think. In any event, there is some objection to some things.

Senator Simard: Not all of what he was asking for.

Senator Olson: He did not get all that he wanted, but he got some it. He got enough so that he is willing to recommend the agreement to the people of Quebec. That is important. I think we should have the Constitution amended to deal with matters such as the distinct society and certain other redistributions of power between the federal and the provincial governments.

I also think we can and should indicate now that when that consensus report comes before this Parliament, we intend to amend that part dealing with the Senate, and either increase or re-establish the authority that the Senate has now.

I am not saying that the powers of the Senate have to be exactly the same as they were before, but they should be similar enough so that some of those provinces or parts of Canada that have grown up very significantly in the last 125 years are given the kind of respect and justice that they deserve. The regional influence in the Parliament of Canada is extremely important to Western Canada, and I suggest to Atlantic Canada. I do not pretend to speak for the people of Atlantic Canada, but I know I have heard some of them talk about it. It is just as important if not more important than distinct society and all that that means to the people in Quebec.

We should fix this situation. We can fix it if we choose to. I hope that honourable senators will join together in trying to fix it. The consequences of not doing so and letting this unfair readjustment of seats in the Parliament of Canada are very severe, because it diminishes greatly what the four western provinces can do by way of having influence in this federal parliament. All the people out there want Canada to carry on. They want Quebec, and they want Quebec to be satisfied, but not at the price of giving up as much as is indicated by the proposal with respect to the Senate.

At this stage, I am sure we are all asking ourselves, "Well, if we do not agree with it, what do we do now?" I do not think we should vote against the agreement and have a flat confrontation. That, to my mind, will not be good for Canada. However, there is one other thing we could do. We could set the whole question of constitutional reform aside for a few years.

As a matter of fact, ten years ago or so, when the constitution was patriated in 1982, we knew then that those sections of what used to be called—and still could be called—the BNA Act were completely outdated. It is so obvious. Nearly 50 per cent of the federal budget, apart from interest on the national debt, is paid into programs that are under provincial jurisdiction such as education and health and welfare. Everybody knows that.

At the time of patriation, I was in the cabinet. We believed that we should not try to force upon the Canadian people more changes than they could digest. We felt that after we had it patriated and the Bill of Rights installed therein, probably a period of 20 years should elapse before we tackled all of the other things that needed to be updated.

My plea to honourable senators is that when we get to that stage we give an undertaking to correct this one severe difficulty with the package as we know it.

We can do it. I hope that feelings of regional difficulties will not be intensified by writing somebody off. It is great to say, "Well, you can compromise. That is the great Canadian way of doing things." In that kind of compromise, it is the other guy doing the compromising. Central Canada's representation will increase by 36 seats in the House of Commons, which will have the ultimate power to decide on matters with respect to which there is any disagreement. In my view, that is not fair. Western Canadians do not believe it is fair. There will be a great deal of dissension if we fail to fix this when it does come to us.

I want to thank honourable senators again. I hope you will take seriously the plea that I am now making about what we need to do when the proper resolution is before us.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I move that the chairman report progress and request leave to sit again.

The Chairman: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Molgat that the committee rise, report progress, and request leave for the committee to sit again. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting is resumed.

Hon. Gerald R. Ottenheimer: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which was referred the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, reports having made some progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Graham calling the attention of the Senate to the repercussions of the sale or proposed sale of certain railway lines in Canada.—(Honourable Senator Corbin)

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, we are now at the thirteenth day reserved for debating this inquiry. This means that two days remain until it expires and is dropped from the Order Paper.

I rise today as I rose last time to keep this inquiry alive. I do not intend to make a long speech, especially since the situation of railway-line abandonment in this country is taking quite a drastic turn.

On entering my office today after a long absence, I noticed that the National Transportation Agency has just published quite a thick volume on transportation, including transportation by rail.

I will now adjourn the debate on this inquiry so that it can be revived. That is, the count will start over at day one with tomorrow's sitting. In the meantime, I will investigate, along with other senators, especially Senator Graham, who takes a very keen interest in this matter of railway line abandonment in Canada.

I therefore move that the debate be adjourned.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

PRIVILEGES, STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER PROPRIETY AND CONSTITUTIONALITY OF AMENDMENTS TO RULES OF THE SENATE—ORDER STANDS

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Thériault:

That the Standing Committee on Privileges, Standing Rules and Orders be authorized to consider the propriety and constitutionality of the changes and amendments to the Rules of the Senate, adopted by the Senate on June 18, 1991; and

That the Committee report no later than October 13, 1992.—(Honourable Senator Hébert).

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, as you may know, Senator Haidasz has had a very serious operation and is now convalescing in a Toronto hospital.

I wonder whether we could have an extension for this inquiry.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if that is not possible, I would suggest adjourning the debate, which could then be rescheduled, and of course I am open to other suggestions.

However, since Senator Haidasz is in hospital and this inquiry was being kept on the Order Paper for his sake, we would prefer, if at all possible, to leave it on the Order Paper.

[English]

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we appreciate the reason for the senator being absent and we sympathize with him. We had agreed in June to put his motion over until September. I suggest we follow the rules and, upon his return, we will put the motion back on the Order Paper and start over again.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, September 10, 1992

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): By using simple arithmetic, honourable senators can verify the figures I am about to place on the record. The election clock is still ticking. If the government of which Senator Murray is a member respects democracy—according to his words—the ballots will be cast within 71 days, however, if the present government is cowardly and contemptuous of democracy then the day of reckoning will not be for 457 days.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

A BILL TO AMEND THE DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY ACT AND TO MAKE RELATED AMENDMENTS TO OTHER ACTS

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-306, to amend the Department of Forestry Act and to make related amendments to other acts.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Hébert, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Monday, September 14, 1992.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the summer break has seen quite an accumulation of petitions to the Senate headed, "We refuse the dictatorship of the GST." The wording of the petitions is similar to thousands previously tabled. The petitions are all signed individually by various citizens of Canada.

In Ontario those citizens reside in Kapuskasing, Larder Lake, Oshawa, Toronto, Welland, Kirkland Lake, Mississuaga, Timmins, Virginiatown and West Bolton.

In Quebec those citizens reside in Abitibi, Acton Vale, Asbestos, Barraute, Lac Beetz, Berry, Coaticook, Cookshire, Dollard-des-Ormeaux, Drummondville, Foster, Fulford, Gwynne, Huntingdon, Ile-Bizard, Knowlton, Lamorandière, La Salle, Lennoxville, Magog, Mansonville, Abercorn, Amos, Authier, Beauceville, Belœil, Bishopton, Colombourg, Danville, Dorval, East Hereford, Frelighsburg, Grantham, Harricannaw, Iberville, Ile Perrot, Lac Allegantic, Landrienne, La Sarre, Macamic, Mancebourg and Matagami.

Also from Quebec we have Montréal, Palmarolle, Pohénégamook, Poularies, Rivière Bleue, Rochebeaucourt, Rouyn-Noranda, St. Damien-de-Buckland, St-Elzéar, St-Jean d'Iberville, St-Joseph-de-Beauce, St-Louis-du-Ha-Ha, St-Marc-du-lac-long, St-Odilon, St-Thèodore, St-Zacharie, Ste-Claire, Ste-Sophie, South Bolton, Sullivan Mines, Thetford Mines, New Glasgow, Pierrefonds, Pointe aux Tremples, Restigouche, Rivière des Prairies, Rougemont, Roxton Falls, St-Edmond, St-Eusèbe, St-Joachim, St-Leonard, St-Malo, St-Mathieu, St-Prosper, St-Urbain, Ste-Anne-de-Bellevue, Ste-Marie-de-Monnoir, Ste-Thérèse, Stanstead, Taschereau, and Val-d'Or.

From New Brunswick, we have petitions from Blacks Harbour, Campbellton, Edmundston, Grand Bay, Grand Sault, Burton, Durham Bridge, Fredericton, Grand Falls, Hatfield Point, King's County, Oromocto, St-Georges, St. Joseph, Welsford, Le Goulet, Petit Pokemouche, Saint John, Westfield, and Wickham.

From Alberta, we have petitions from Donnelly, Faust, Girouxville, High Level, Nampa, Valleyview, Edmonton, Falher, Grande Prairie, Rainbow Lake, and Peace River.

Honourable Senators, the totals are as follows: From Alberta, five petitions with a total of 118 names; from Québec, 81 petitions with 1,614 names; from New Brunswick, 19 petitions, total names 386; and from Ontario, 28 petitions with 495 names. The totals, then, for today's batch are 115 petitions with 2,264 names of people of Canada still against the GST and asking the government to repeal it, or asking us to repeal it, and to call an election immediately.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour also to present petitions signed by 547 citizens of British Columbia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Kamloops and Victoria.

I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 545 citizens of British Columbia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Pritchard, Kamloops and Nanaimo. This makes a total of 1,092 citizens of our country who continue to say no to the GST and who at the next opportunity will say no to the government that imposed this unfair tax on us in the way we know.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have answers to questions raised in the Senate on June 2, 1992 by Senator Corbin regarding talks between Canadians and Europeans on the fisheries problem; on June 11, 1992 by Senator Thériault regarding the Lamont-Spencer case; and on June 17, 1992 by Senator Perrault regarding the labour practices of Nationair.

FISHERIES

EXPLOITATION OF RESOURCES—POSSIBILITY OF TALKS BETWEEN CANADIANS AND EUROPEANS

(In response to a question raised on June 2, 1992 by the Honourable Eymard J. Corbin)

The facts have been made clear to European Community authorities by the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Environment Minister, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and senior officials, most recently in bilateral meetings on the margins of the Earth Summit in Rio. In summary, they are as follows:

-The report on June 5 of the special meeting of the Scientific Council of NAFO has confirmed Canada's findings on the state of the northern cod stock. It stated that the stock has declined sharply since 1990, apparently to the lowest level ever measured;

-Scientists believe that the rapid recent decline is consistent with mortality caused by extreme environmental conditions in 1991. The extent, duration and severity of cold water conditions are especially noted. Other factors discussed include domestic and foreign catches, consumption of cod by seals, and availability of capelin for food.

-Overfishing outside 200 miles is the key "man made" cause of the depleted state of the northern cod stock. In light of the extreme environmental conditions affecting the stock and its low abundance, the impact of foreign overfishing over recent years is even more significant than we had thought in the past;

-The dramatically depleted state of the northern cod, confirmed by the Scientific Council, underscores that in order to rebuild the stock the EC should continue its suspension of its northern cod fishery. All non-NAFO vessels should also cease fishing immediately in this area;

-Canadian directed offshore fishing for northern cod has been closed since the announcement in February of a conservation ceiling. On July 2, 1992 a two year moratorium on the northern cod fishery (2J3KL) was announced by the Honourable John Crosbie, Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The moratorium was effective immediately and will continue until the spring of 1994.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INTERCESSION IN LAMONT-SPENCER CASE

(Response to question raised by Hon. L. Norbert Thériault on June 11, 1992)

The Government sympathizes with all families of Canadians imprisoned around the world and understands that the parents will pursue every avenue possible to bring Ms. Lamont and Mr. Spencer back to Canada.

At this time, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is not prepared to petition the Brazilian government for the expulsion to Canada of Ms. Lamont and Mr. Spencer.

They have been convicted of the serious crime of kidnapping. Canada has an obligation under the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages to extradite or prosecute persons accused of such serious crimes. If expelled, they would not have to complete their sentence in Brazil or Canada, but would be returned to this country where they would be completely at liberty.

The Brazilian Justice Ministry has made it clear to the Department of External Affairs that they have reviewed the case and do not see any legal basis for requesting expulsion. The Secretary of State for External Affairs came to the conclusion that there were also no diplomatic or humanitarian reasons to make such a request. On the other hand, all legal avenues should continue to be followed.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs expressed concern over the harshness of the 28-year sentences and, on her instruction, Canada's Ambassador to Brazil, as a humanitarian matter, expressed that concern to the Brazilian Foreign Ministry.

As long as appeals are not exhausted, the Secretary of State for External Affairs believes the proper course is to continue through the Brazilian courts. Appeals of the 28-year sentences have been filed on both legal and constitutional grounds.

LABOUR

AIR INDUSTRY—LABOUR PRACTICES OF NATIONAIR AIRLINE

(Response to question raised by Hon. Raymond J. Perrault on June 17, 1992)

The parties have been involved in negotiations to renew their collective agreement which expired December 31, 1990, covering approximately 450 flight attendants. Following the completion of conciliation proceedings under the Labour Code, the employer initiated a legal lock out on November 19, 1991.

At the request of the union, mediator André Courchesne was appointed on January 20, 1992. He met with the parties on a number of occasions up to and including June 20, 1992. While significant progress was made during these mediation sessions, the parties failed to take every opportunity to explore all possible avenues of settlement.

The mediator is in contact with the parties and is continuing his efforts to find some common ground that could lead to a resumption of meaningful negotiations. The parties are being encouraged to make full use of the mediation process and to make those final decisions which would allow them to conclude a revised collective agreement.

CONSIDERATION OF TWENTY-THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Consideration of the Twenty-Third Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs (review of regulations under the Referendum Act), presented in the Senate on 9th September, 1992.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

● (1410)

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with the kind leave of my colleagues yesterday, I said everything I have to say about this report. While I do not object to its continuing to stand in my name, I did not adjourn the debate as such and I invite anyone who wishes to speak on it to do so, rather than waiting for me.

Order stands.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is the intention of the House of Commons to vote on the referendum question at 8.15 this evening, following a 15-minute bell. The message for concurrence will be sent to us thereafter.

Therefore, with leave, I ask that the sitting of the Senate be suspended until 8.30 p.m.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): For the record, the reason for suspending the sitting is that the statute requires one day's notice and, therefore, if we waited until tomorrow we could not start the debate until Monday—or Saturday. So we are really coming back tonight simply to receive the message asking for our concurrence, and to lay down the notice, after which we will adjourn until Friday morning at 9 a.m.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The sitting of the Senate was suspended until 8.30 p.m.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in the absence of my colleague, Senator Frith—unfortunately I do not have his document at hand —I can only repeat the statement he usually makes about the number of days left in the current term, based on the comments of my colleague, Senator Murray!

I wonder, therefore, if Senator Frith's could not be deemed as having been read.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(h), I move:

> THAT when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, 14 September, 1992, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO DELAY TABLING OF FINAL REPORT

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Article 59(1)f) of the rules of the Senate, I move:

> THAT notwithstanding the order of reference adopted by the Senate on Tuesday, June 23, 1992, the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to table the final report on the special study on draft regulations ensuing from the new legislation on Canadian financial institutions, no later than December 31, 1992.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO DELAY TABLING OF FINAL REPORT

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding Article 59(1)f) of the rules of the Senate, I move:

> THAT nothwithstanding the order of reference adopted by the Senate on December 17, 1991, the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to table the final report on the special study on the Canadian Deposit Insurance Corporation, the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Compensation Corporation and the Property and Casualty Insurance Compensation Corporation, no later than December 31, 1992.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 552 citizens of British Columbia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Kamloops, Vancouver and Salmon Arm.

I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 593 citizens of British Columbia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Little Fort, Chase and Pinantan Lake. This makes a total of 1,145 citizens of Canada, a very small fraction of the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who have vigorously opposed the GST, who continue to oppose it and who will remember the government's contempt on election day.

QUESTION PERIOD

CHARLOTTETOWN AGREEMENT—NATURE AND TIMING OF FINE-TUNING PROCESS

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have two or three questions for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I want some clarification, if he can give it to me, especially for the purpose of interventions later today on the referendum resolution.

My first question relates to what will happen after October 26; that is, when will we see what has been called the "fine-tuning" that has to be administered to this process?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if the Leader of the Opposition is referring to the text of the constitutional amending resolution, I cannot help him today. I do not know when that will be available. I will enquire as to whether a target date has been established, either by the Minister of Constitutional Affairs alone or in consultation with his provincial counterparts. I rather doubt it. As I said yesterday, I think honourable senators know that this is a very complex and painstaking task of draftsmanship.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I was not just referring to the actual draftsmanship for a resolution amending the Constitution, because I understand that the document that we have called the Consensus Report itself requires some fine-tuning. It says in its terms that there are items that have to be clarified or fine-tuned even before we would have a resolution.

Will there be more meetings necessary to do that fine-tuning after the 26th but before the legal drafting is completed?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am sure that the time and energies of the political leaders involved in this process will be devoted almost exclusively to the referendum campaign for the next few weeks. That having been said, however, I think we can safely say that at the official level discussions are going on between the federal government, provinces, territories and representatives of the aboriginal organizations with a view to moving this matter forward for early determination by the political representatives.

Senator Frith: Between now and the assumption that we all make and hope for, a "yes" answer, will the necessary fine-tuning process be completed by other than bureaucrats or fonctionnaires? Parties to the consensus themselves have left certain items dangling, and there will be some fine-tuning activity necessary by them before the presentation of an amending resolution.

Senator Murray: Absolutely, honourable senators. All of the work that has been done at the official level is of course ad referendum to the governments involved and the aboriginal participants in the process.

Let me say that while I tend—I think with reason—to be quite prudent about setting any time frames or any deadlines for this work, and while I have emphasized the complexity of the drafting process and the fine-tuning process, I believe the objective of all the participants is, first of all, to obtain a popular ratification of the Charlottetown agreement and then to proceed with all possible speed to parliamentary approval of the constitutional amendments that have been agreed to.

Senator Frith: At any meetings that are required after the referendum answer in order to fine-tune the consensus, that is, meetings by the political leaders who were parties to the consensus, will there also be a consultation process during that period?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I rather doubt that there would be elaborate public hearings of the kind that we have had over the last two years. However, there might well be some public consultation on particular aspects of this fine-tuning process. I do not know. Of course, there is still the opportunity, indeed the likelihood in many cases, that, when the amending resolutions come before our various legislative bodies, committees of those bodies will deliberate and hear from the public.

Senator Frith: This may be the result of an occupational hazard, but in preparing my notes for this intervention I had some difficulty using the word "accord" to describe what took place at Charlottetown. As both the Leader of the Government and I have noted, the document does call itself a consensus report rather than an accord.

There is some jurisprudence and literature on the question of an accord and what can properly be called an accord. In the opinion of the Leader of the Government, and as a part of the government's policy, is it correct to call this an "accord" or would it be better to call it a "consensus" or a "basis for an accord"?

Senator Murray: I would call it a political agreement unanimously arrived at.

Senator Frith: The Leader of the Government in the Senate once called a political agreement a "seamless web". I use that phrase to draw his mind to the description that had consequences with reference to the Meech Lake Accord, and I ask him whether the political agreement that we will be discussing, which is the subject of the referendum resolution, is in that sense all one package? I do not hold him strictly to the phrase "seamless web", but is it all one package in the sense that it will unravel if parts of it do not carry?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I will resist the temptation to reach for a phrase to describe the situation, but I think the participants would regard the agreement as a coherent whole.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 18 by Senator Neiman regarding a report of the RCMP Public Complaints Commission.

JUSTICE

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—STATUS OF REPORT OF PUBLIC COMPLAINTS COMMISSION

(Response to question raised by Hon. Joan Neiman on June 18, 1992)

An internal review by the RCMP revealed that procedural errors were committed by two members of the Force, both of whom received disciplinary measures for their inappropriate actions in this matter. (Provisions of the Privacy Act prohibit the release publicly of any personal information which would indicate the nature of the internal disciplinary measures taken).

A letter of apology was sent to Ms. Nowdluk-Reynolds by the Force on February 21, 1991. Commissioner Inkster also apologized for the treatment she received before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General on April 2, 1992.

Public hearings into the Nowdluk-Reynolds case were held by the RCMP Public Complaints Commission (PCC) in March 1992. A report by the PCC which reviews the details of Ms. Nowdluk-Reynolds' complaint and the actions taken by the RCMP in response to this complaint is expected shortly. The Solicitor General and Commissioner Inkster continue to await this report before deciding what further action, if any, might be appropriate. Commissioner Inkster has provided his personal assurances that he will not consider this case closed until he has received and responded to this report.

The public complaints process followed by the Public Complaints Commission is very rigorous. For this reason, it would be inappropriate to comment further on the PCC's review of this case.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

THE CONSTITUTION

REFERENDUM QUESTION—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government) moved:

That, pursuant to the Act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, the Senate concurs with the House of Commons in approving the following text of a referendum question:

[Senator Murray.]

Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?

_____ _____

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

He said: Honourable senators, as I said several months ago during debate on second reading of the referendum bill, I am not, and I suspect that most parliamentarians are not, a great enthusiast for referendums on complex issues in a country as diverse as ours. However, the commitment which the government made to complete and thorough public consultation has come full circle. We are now in a position where we will be involved in the ultimate form of public consultation, a national referendum on the subject of the August 28, 1992 constitutional agreement.

With the referendum there comes to a close a process of consultation that began almost two years ago with the Citizens Forum on Canada's Future. During this consultation process, we learned of the respect Canadians have for our diversity and the importance of accommodation and tolerance in our society.

Following upon reports of the Citizens' Forum and the report of the Special Joint Committee on the Amending Formula, the Beaudoin-Edwards committee, the Government of Canada a year ago produced 28 proposals for constitutional change contained in a discussion paper entitled, "Shaping Canada's Future Together." As honourable senators know, these proposals were then referred to the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, which held extensive hearings across the country, again under the chairmanship of our colleague Senator Beaudoin and of Dorothy Dobbie, MP.

The report of that joint committee formed the basis of the discussions during the multilateral process chaired by the Right Honourable Joe Clark, the President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. These multilateral discussions brought together the federal government, the provinces, the territories and the aboriginal peoples. I believe these talks progressed as well as they did and with the public support that was evident throughout because of the process which allowed Canadians to come forward and make their views known regarding the Constitution. Canadians want to be involved in the formulation of government policy on the Constitution, and in this Canada Round I believe they were.

A number of matters initially pursued with some vigour by the federal government are not in the August 28 agreement. This is largely due to the public consultation process. Such items as the entrenchment of property rights and the Council of the Federation are no longer with us. On the other hand, the social contract originally proposed by Premier Rae of Ontario is now a central piece of the agreement and it is linked to the economic union.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the question I just tabled asks Canadians whether or not they agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992.

I would like to take a few minutes to review the main aspects of this agreement. I think we should realize from the start that the agreement is the result of a consensus achieved in a spirit of compromise and mutual understanding. None of the parties involved obtained everything they wanted, neither Quebec nor the Western provinces, neither the aboriginal peoples nor the federal government. However, there are no losers.

The Constitution will contain a Canada clause that will be used to interpret the Constitution as a whole, including the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The Canada clause states that any interpretation of the Constitution shall be consistent with the preservation and promotion of Quebec as a distinct society within Canada. Quebec's distinctness arises from its French language and culture and its civil law tradition.

To recognize Canada's linguistic duality, the Constitution shall be interpreted in accordance with the commitment of Canadians to the vitality and development of the language and culture of Francophone and Anglophone minorities in Canada and with the role of governments to protect the language rights of these communities.

The inherent right of the aboriginal peoples to self-government would be recognized in the Constitution and confirmed in the Canada clause, as would the status of aboriginal governments as a third order of government within Canada.

In accordance with the general principle of the division of powers, jurisdictions granted to one province will be granted to all provinces. The provinces would have exclusive jurisdiction in eight areas that are better administered at the local level: forestry, mining, tourism, housing, recreation, municipal and urban affairs, manpower training and development and culture.

The provinces would have more responsibilities regarding immigration, and their ability to negotiate agreements with the federal government in this respect, shall be enshrined in the Constitution.

The provinces will have exclusive jurisdiction over culture, but the federal government will retain responsibility for national cultural institutions and federal agencies that work in this area.

As far as the amending formula is concerned, no changes will be made to the Supreme Court or the Senate without the unanimous consent of the provinces and, of course, the Parliament of Canada. Each province would have the right to veto constitutional changes in central institutions.

The amending formula would be changed so that the territories can obtain provincial status by negotiating exclusively with the central government. However, territorial participation with respect to the amending formula and territorial representation in the Senate will be subject to unanimous consent.

The present provision concerning the composition of the Supreme Court, according to which three judges must be members of the civil law bar, will be included in the Constitution. The federal government shall name judges from lists submitted by the governments of the provinces and territories. The role of the aboriginal peoples in appointments to the Supreme Court will be the subject of further discussion.

The Constitution would contain a new nonjusticiable provision setting out policy objectives underlying the social and economic union. These would include a comprehensive health care system; adequate social services and benefits—housing, food and other basic necessities; high quality primary and secondary education; protecting, preserving and sustaining the integrity of the environment; working together to strengthen Canada's economic union; free movement of persons, goods, services and capital; the goal of full employment; reasonable standard of living; and sustainable development.

The Senate will have equal representation from each province. The Senate's powers would make it effective, in that it could defeat legislation imposing new taxes on natural resources, delay supply for up to 30 days, and could force a joint sitting of the House of Commons and the Senate by defeating other legislation. A government which wants its legislation passed in a timely fashion will have to take into consideration the views of the reformed Senate.

This agreement represents a blueprint for a new, modernized and flexible federalism. It will make the fundamental law of the land clearer, fairer, and better able to respond to the economic and social challenges of the future.

The decision to proceed with a national referendum was not taken lightly. The risks are real, and there is always the possibility that single-issue concerns will dominate the debate. It is critical that Canadians understand that the consensus agreement they are being asked to consider is, in the view of all the participants in the negotiations, a coherent whole. It is a carefully constructed document that reflects the spirit of honourable compromise, one of the hallmarks of our national identity.

Not everyone will like everything that has been agreed to when topics as diverse as aboriginal self-government, Senate reform, recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, a new division of powers, a stronger economic and social union, the Canada clause and so on are being discussed. However,the constitutional table is not a buffet table where you can pick and choose the things you like and ignore or pass over everything else. The agreement is a package recognizing and accommodating the various competing aspects of Canadian life with the common national interest as our objective.

As the Prime Minister has said on many occasions, a referendum is an extremely blunt instrument whose potential for divisiveness cannot be taken lightly; yet it was clear to us that the best way to bring the Canada round of talks to a successful conclusion was to utilize a ratification process that closed the circle. The essential elements of the Canada round emerged from a process of public consultation, and to complete the Canada round we needed a process that would provide Canadians with an opportunity to acknowledge whether or not first ministers and aboriginal and territorial leaders successfully reflected the diverse aspirations of the Canadian people.

That is why we opted for a national referendum and why, in drafting the referendum legislation, we took many factors into account. First, we felt it important that any form of direct democracy used not be viewed as coercive by any province or group. That is why we have opted for a referendum that is non-binding on governments, for reasons that anyone familiar with Canadian history will understand. It is also why we designed the legislation in such a way as to complement, not usurp, any province's right to hold its own referendum.

As Honourable Senators are aware, Quebec has opted to hold its referendum according to that province's rules and regulations, but on the same day and with the same question as other Canadians will be asked to vote on. I understand that Alberta, whose government is obliged to have a referendum on constitutional matters, is to delegate the responsibility for conducting its referendum to the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada. In effect, Alberta will be taking part in the national referendum, as I believe will British Columbia, under the referendum law passed some months ago by this Parliament.

Second, we wanted to ensure that the rules of the game would be as fair and transparent as possible. We had our debate on this matter some months ago, but that is why the legislation proposes that the spending regime which applies to political parties under the Canada Elections Act would apply to any registered referendum committee. It is also why, in the interests of fairness, disclosure and openness, the legislation provides that all committees intending to spend over $5,000 be registered and that the contributor and their contributions in amounts over $250 be made public.

Third, to ensure that those on all sides of the question will have ample opportunity to inform the Canadian public of their views, the legislation also provides that free broadcasting time be allocated equally to both sides of the referendum question. There is also nothing in the legislation to in any way limit access of all sides to the purchase of broadcasting time.

Honourable senators, at the end of the day on October 26, Canadians will have their say. They will vote on an agreement, and, in doing so, they will have to determine for themselves, "Is this a good agreement for the country? Does it improve our country?"

In its solution to alienation of the less populous provinces, its agreement on aboriginal self-government, and in addressing the needs of Quebec and reconciling that province to the Constitution, it is, I believe, an agreement worthy of the support of the people of Canada.

[Senator Murray.]

[Translation]

An agreement on the referendum question will mean an agreement on the future of our country. For all these reasons, I believe that Canadians will say "yes" to Canada on October 26.

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think it is important that we appreciate what we are being asked to do and, conversely, what we are not being asked to do. Before us is a motion that has already passed the other place. The motion would authorize the government to hold a national referendum on the "constitutional agreement" reached in Charlottetown on August 28, 1992. I can perhaps remove the quotation marks as a result of the question answered by the Leader of the Government during Question Period and refer to it, at least here, as the constitutional political agreement reached in Charlottetown on August 28, 1992.

That agreement was reached after an exhaustive and, one might infer on several grounds, exhausting, effort. It comes to us in the form of a consensus agreement or consensus report as far as text is concerned. Again, what to call it is not clear because nothing was signed, I am told.

In any event, it was the result of an exhaustive and perhaps exhausting series of meetings between representatives of the federal government, ten provinces, two territories, and aboriginal associations. If this motion is approved by the Senate, susection 3(1) of the Referendum Act provides that the Governor in Council may by proclamation put the referendum question to the electors of Canada. We have been told that the referendum will be held on October 26, 1992. If we defeat this motion, the initiative dies. There is no House of Commons override.

Our job, therefore, is to pronounce on two questions when dealing with this motion: First, should there be a referendum? Second, should it be on the question posed?

We are not debating whether or not the Charlottetown understanding is a good package. We are debating whether or not the people of Canada should be allowed to say whether it is a good package. We are debating whether or not the people of Canada should be allowed to accept or reject what their political leaders have created.

• (0940)

We in the Liberal Party support this motion because we do believe that Canadians should have this opportunity. We have long tried to persuade the government to hold just such a referendum and our leader, Mr. Chrétien, has stated time and again,

> The Constitution doesn't belong to the politicians or the bureaucrats, it belongs to the people of the country and we should have a national referendum.

When Brian Mulroney as a private citizen was ruminating about how constitutional change should be accomplished, he said at page 61 in his book Where I Stand:

> The debate would be entirely open to the public at all times.

It must be remembered that this was said in the perspective of Mr. Mulroney as a potential Leader of the Opposition. His following words are in italics:

> There would be no sessions behind closed doors. Canadians could see and judge those who have been elected to serve them and determine if, in the interest of a more generous country, they have really answered an urgent and irresistible call to grandeur.

His failure to follow his own advice left many Canadians thinking for years that they had been left outside, waiting to hear what was, in fact, being decided behind closed doors. Amends were subsequently made with the Spicer Commission, parliamentary joint committees and conferences. Canadians were consulted—consulted to death some believe—and now on October 26 they will be asked to judge.

I believe a referendum is a perfectly appropriate and legitimate way to conclude the process. As Jean Chrétien said earlier this week on September 8, 1992, as reported at page 12733 of the of the House of Commons Debates, by adopting this motion, "...we are giving the Canadian Constitution back to the people of Canada."

The people of Canada will now decide whether what was produced is worthwhile. Therefore the answer to the question: Should there be a referendum, is "yes". We support the holding of a referendum.

Should the referendum be on the question posed? The question to be put is:

> Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?

Our answer to the second question is a somewhat hesitating "yes". I say "hesitating" because surely in any referendum, individuals potentially holding widely differing views should at least agree that the question designed to elicit their opinion is unambiguous and fair. But already some Canadians are complaining that the question is not fair; that it is not neutral. Again, the question reads:

> Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?

Honestly speaking, a Constitution, once created, is not renewed. If it is changed, it is amended. Already some are arguing that by saying "renewed" instead of "amended", the drafters have given the "yes" forces an advantage. After all, they say, "renew" has positive connotations. People are instinctively in favour of renewal. They suffer through long, dark, cold months of winter waiting for the renewal of spring. Marketers tell us that they can boost sales of an existing product just by putting the word "new" on the package. One renews marriage vows, one's faith and one's commitments—all renewals of hope. It is a word that strikes a responsive cord and a positive one. Antonyms of the word "renew" are such words as "end" or "decay"—words usually associated with unfortunate events.

The word "amendment" has no such connotations either way. It is much more neutral. However, perhaps others would argue that "amendment" does have negative connotations, having been used so often during the last several years in the context of negotiations to amend the Constitution, something Canadians seem thoroughly sick of. In fact, weariness with constitutional preoccupation is, it seems, a powerful incentive for many who will vote "yes" to the question, just to get rid of it.

Canadians have been asked on all sides to accept the imperfections of the package. We were asked again today by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and the leaders of the other parties have taken the same position. Therefore it is perhaps consistent for us to ask the people of Canada to accept the imperfection of the question.

However, I wish we were not starting off with reactions like that of the Vice-President of Gallup Canada, Lorne Bozinoff, who said:

> I wouldn't write it that way. The question is biased. That's a professional opinion.

The importance, of course, will be in retrospect when we try to judge, weigh and measure the response on October 26. We do not want the answer then given to be in any way contaminated by allegations of an unfair question.

However, let us also face up to other challenges to those of us supporting the "yes" side. There have been complaints that the question refers not to a proposed legal text but to an agreement which combines legal text with agreed upon principles and promises to conclude political accords. These principles must be translated into legal language acceptable to the participants of the talks. The political accords—which Charlottetown Mark II admittedly is not—are yet to be negotiated. Canadians therefore will not be voting on an actual amendment to the Constitution and, in certain areas, will have but a general statement of principle. Here, however, I believe the question is honest and forthright when it speaks of Charlottetown II as a "basis". I remind honourable senators that the question is:

> Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?

It is here that I find myself comfortable supporting the question and a "yes" answer to it. I am comfortable asking the Canadian people to say "yes" to the agreement as a basis for an amendment to the Constitution, thereby recognizing the considerable political achievement of Charlottetown and the work leading up to agreement on even a "basis" for amendment—recalling Dr. Johnson's admiration for bicycle-riding bears in the circus, that it is not how well they do it, but that they are able to do it at all.

For an example of "basis" versus "text" we have clause 15 of the agreement providing that the Senate will have power to ratify "key appointments made by the federal government". The section then goes on to state:

> The appointments that would be subject to Senate ratification, including the heads of the national cultural institutions and the heads of federal regulatory boards and agencies, should be set out in specific federal legislation rather than the Constitution. The federal government's commitment to table such legislation should be recorded in a political accord (*).

I pick this section because the document is studded—yea littered—with such asterisks to mark parts of the package that are intended to lead to real accords, which Charlottetown is not.

Section 15 provides some indication of what appointments are involved, but no list. What if the legislation the federal government tables is unacceptable to the provinces? Will there be more negotiations? Apparently, yes.

At the very end of the document there is a paragraph which states that certain issues were discussed, but not finally resolved, including:

> - consequential amendments relating to Senate reform, including by-elections
> - any other consequential amendments required by changes recommended in this report

There is certainly much work yet to be done. One could argue that, not only are there some loose ends to be tied, but gaping holes in the middle have yet to be plugged. This will happen after the people of Canada have encouraged us to do such things and directed us to answer "yes" to Charlottetown II.

In arguing for a "yes", we must acknowledge that we want a "yes" to an agreement among politicians which is far from ready for insertion into the Constitution of the land.

And we must be prepared to persuade Canadians that this is the best that could be accomplished given the mess that the Prime Minister put us in with eight years of heedless and needless constitutional wrangling and the resultant time pressures which were an important driving force in the process. It is very tempting to review at length the unfortunate events and decisions which swept us here, but I will leave that for another day.

So, although it would have been preferable that the question refer to a more precise document, the Charlottetown Consensus Report is what was concluded. Since, as the saying goes, "That's all there is", that is what we must work with.

[Senator Frith.]

As I have said, we are not today debating whether or not the Charlottetown package is a good package. What is before us is a motion authorizing the issuance of a proclamation for a referendum.

Though no agreement is before us, we have a duty, as do all federal and provincial politicians, to take a position on the package. We have done so. The Liberal Party of Canada believes that this consensus, notwithstanding its all too obvious shortcomings, is deserving of support from Canadians.

But as we declare our support, we must be prepared to defend the accord, if we can call it that, and to explain why we recommend it. There will be those who are will vote "no" because they believe that what was agreed to is not best for Canada. It is up to us to convince them otherwise, but not to question their patriotism or love of country because they do not agree with us.

As the negotiations on this agreement were winding down, the Prime Minister said,

> I know there will be fights and I know there will be challenges, and I know the enemies of Canada will not be happy, and they are going to be out in full force.

Although he later explained he had been referring to hard-core separatists, the impression he left was an unfortunate one.

And then, in his speech in the House of Commons on Tuesday, Mr. Mulroney reinforced the earlier impression when he said, "Basically, the referendum relates to the appreciation of what it means to be Canadian . . ." Is he implying that only those who vote "yes" appreciate Canada? He will, of course, answer no, if questioned. But what is the impression those words leave in the meantime?

There are imperfections in this package, as even the Prime Minister has admitted. Those imperfections may persuade many Canadians to vote "no". Those citizens have the right to vote "no" without fear of being insulted as somehow less Canadian or less patriotic than those who vote "yes". This referendum does not ask whether we love Canada. It asks whether we agree with the new political structure proposed by our leaders. That these are two very different propositions should be kept in mind by all of us, particularly the Prime Minister, while on the campaign trail.

As the national debate progresses, differences of opinion will become more public and pronounced. If we do not address the legitimate and reasoned concerns in a reasonable fashion, our chance for a successful conclusion on October 26 will be imperilled. Already, many misgivings about portions of the agreement have surfaced.

In his speech of September 8, our leader Mr. Chrétien had no hesitation in saying, "We are not happy with the provisions relating to the Senate." As he explained, equality has been achieved only at the expense of effectiveness. We in the Liberal Party hope that the rules of the new Senate and House of Commons will be formulated with a view to maximizing this Chamber's influence.

The rule changes forced upon the Senate by the government following the GST debate emasculated a very powerful legislative body. Perhaps it will be possible through an innovative rule book to increase the influence of this Chamber beyond that which is suggested in the consensus. That remains to be seen. In any event, while out selling this package, we will certainly have our work cut out for us when discussing the terms of the proposed Senate.

We will also be challenged when explaining the new amending formula for federal institutions, which requires unanimity, and the weak "economic union" provisions. Both these features were identified as major shortcomings by Mr. Chrétien.

But beyond these deficiencies, which our party readily acknowledges, there are other provisions which cause concern to many and which must be addressed.

We must reassure those who worry that the federal spending power provisions will prevent the federal government from implementing national programs and policies with minimum national standards, such as daycare, medicare and others.

Concerns that a coherent national environmental strategy is undermined by the exclusion of federal jurisdiction from areas such as mining and forestry must be allayed.

Fears that the transfer to the provinces of exclusive jurisdiction over labour market development and training will imperil the development of a well-educated and competitive national labour force must be addressed.

The closer we come to October 26, the greater will be the desire of Canadians for reassurance and answers to these and other questions. If we fail to provide them, we will have failed in our obligation to do everything possible to ensure that Canadians are in a position to make for themselves a reasoned and informed decision on voting day.

The "no" side, and the political leaders supporting the "no" side also must make clear what it is they do not like about the package. Preston Manning has said that he is allying himself with the "no" forces, but offers little in the way of explanation. Simply coming out against the package is not good enough, just as simply coming out in favour of the package is not good enough from political leaders. Mr. Manning has questions to answer. And we must be ready to answer the legitimate and reasoned questions of the Canadian people, if we wish to persuade them to vote "yes".

October 26, 1992, will be a dramatic and important day, forever inscribed in Canadian history, to be studied by countless generations of Canadian students, scholars and politicians. But those of us who are here now—in the "you are there" sense of Walter Cronkite's program of many years ago — must look forward to a day even more important than October 26.

Senator Murray: Senator Lynch-Staunton says it was Edward R. Murrow.

Senator Frith: No, it was Cronkite. Cronkite did the narration.

Senator Murray: I was too young.

Senator Frith: As a matter of fact, so was Senator Lynch-Staunton. That is the reason he is in error.

October 26 will be an important day, yes. But what about October 27? On that morning, what consequences will there be, if there is a "no" vote? One shrinks from the thought. But even say there is a "yes" vote. What will happen then? What is our answer to Canadians who ask that question? We must be ready to answer that question now and during the campaign.

Will this whole issue then be "behind us" and all then be smooth sailing? Or, realistically, must we not acknowledge that this noble experiment in majority-minority relations, which we Canadians have fought to keep alive and have succeeded in keeping alive in the northern half of the North American continent for well over a hundred years, will never be "behind us", but will always require our vigilance and work and our tolerant nourishing? We must not urge a "yes" vote on the basis of a delusion otherwise.

Let us face another challenge if we want to win a "yes" vote, and that is our own potential self-delusion and complacency.

We hear it argued that one of the dangers to a successful "yes" vote is the complacency and the boredom of the people and the fact that they might not work and come out in support of it. But what of our own potential complacency, complacency in the belief that, because almost all political parties and politicians are in favour of a "yes" vote, the people will be too?

We politicians are not exactly front-runners as salesmen of anything, and if we try to delude the people, or threaten them, or tell them they are fools if they do not agree with us, our support could be the kiss of death. Let us not delude, threaten or disparage them. Let us rather answer their legitimate questions and persuade them, not threaten or insult them, that they should say "yes".

[Translation]

We should not analyze the two questions I referred to at the beginning, that is: "should there be a referendum?" and "should the referendum be on the proposed question?" without addressing them from Quebec's perspective. The long review process which went on for more than six years and which is now coming to a conclusion was set into motion as a result of the five propositions submitted in 1986 by Premier Bourassa's government.

In what context should Quebec's aspirations or claims be placed?

It is sometimes useful to put oneself in someone else's shoes to better understand him. Let us suppose that 200 years ago, Ontario and Nova Scotia were the only parts of North America where English was spoken and that the French language was spoken everywhere else. Let us further suppose that all over America and Canada, French is the common language, spoken by the President and in Congress in the United States, except in Ontario, the last stronghold of the English language. If we can imagine such a context, it is not difficult to understand why Quebec is in a peculiar sitution and deserves special consideration, as would have been the case for Ontario or Nova Scotia in our fictitious situation.

That is why Mr. Bourassa, as Premier of Quebec, has seen fit to insist upon certain demands, just as the Premier of Ontario or Nova Scotia would have done in our hypothetical case. History has decided that the majority in America would be anglophone. It has also decided that Canada should be faced with the challenge of allowing an important minority, with its special caracteristics, to live and prosper in the middle of a sea of anglophones.

We, Canadians, have always met that challenge, which was again put forward when the Quebec government, through its Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, on May 9 1984, stated the five conditions for Quebec to adhere whole-heartedly to the Constitution. The Government of Quebec was presenting its demands, and I do mean "demands".

[English]

But one word, it seems to me, has played a mischievous role in our history from a certain point of view. I remember when I lived in Toronto and Mr. Lesage was the Premier of Quebec. I read the French newspapers and I would see that Mr. Lesage "demande quelque chose", and of course the translation into English was that Mr. Lasage "demands". The very use of the word "demands", rather than "asks" as the translation, created a reaction among my fellow citizens of Toronto. If he had been demanding, the word would have been "exige" or "insiste" or otherwise. I make that little parenthetical comment because the verb in the French text, of course, is "demander".

[Translation]

As I said, Quebec government demanded, first, that Quebec be recognized as a distinct society, second, that provinces have more say on immigration matters, third, that provinces participate in the appointment of judges to the Supreme Court, fourth, that limitations be imposed upon the spending powers of the federal government, and fifth, that Quebec be granted a veto on constitutionnal amendments.

Those conditions would have been supplemented by other proposals on the distribution of powers proposed in the Allaire Report and incorporated into the platform of the Liberal Party of Quebec.

I am proud to say that during these six years, even at the darkest hours, we, in the Liberal Party, have always supported the efforts made to bring Quebec freely into the Constitution of Canada. And perhaps most important of all, we have also maintained that Quebec should voice its opinion on the effect of a constitutionnal agreement on its aspirations.

If we are prepared to support the Charlottetown political agreement in spite of our grave misgivings, it is to a large extent because it meets some of Quebec's legitimate aspirations and duties; and we rejoice that all Canadians, including those from Quebec, can vote on it by referendum.

However, if polls are to be believed, it is clear that opinion in Quebec is split on this matter.

Those who support the "no" position have already explained their opposition. In particular, I am thinking of the nine members of the Campeau-Bélanger Commission who are opposed to Charlottetown II. Their statements as reported in the August 29 issue of Le Devoir are, in my view, less objectionable than those of Jacques Parizeau and Lucien Bouchard, whose predictable reactions are the result of political motivation and personal ambition.

What are the objections of the former Campeau-Bélanger Commission.

In short, they find that the Charlottetown agreement does not provide for an in-depth reform of distribution of powers; that the equal Senate makes of Quebec a province like any other and weakens its influence at the federal level; that new provinces may be established without Quebec's consent; that some Quebec fields of jurisdiction will be limited by the setting of federal goals and standards; that the distinct society clause is diluted by the enshrinement of linguistic duality; and that the minority status of Quebec within Canada will be set out in the Constitution. The Liberal Party of Canada challenges these arguments, but recognizes that all those who hope for a happy outcome to the October 26 referendum must deal with them and refute them, for they will not go away of their own accord.

I do not wish to get into a detailed analysis which would go beyond the scope of what I intended to say. I will only mention, to make my point, the importance given to recognition of distinct society status for Quebec in the Canada clause.

The new wording of the distinct society clause gives a clearer but non-restrictive definition, and the wording in the Charlottetown agreement reiterates the role of the Quebec legislature and government in the protection and promotion of the distinct society.

With these terms, we fail to see how the other fundamental characteristics listed in the Canada clause, including clause 2.1(d) on minority communities, could weaken the distinct society clause, much less threaten the French language in Quebec.

The Charlottetown political agreement provides other benefits for Quebec. I need only mention distribution of powers which, during the past few months, has been one of Quebec's principal demands.

If we take the Allaire Report as a reference point, clearly the Charlottetown agreement falls short of the report's demands. But just as clearly, it provides improvements in immigration, labour market training, culture, regional development, and telecommunications. Moreover, Quebec's position in federal institutions is reinforced, whether it be the appointment of Supreme Court justices, Quebec's representation in the Parliament of Canada, and the protection of its interests through the double majority or the veto.

We know that negotiating a constitutional accord is as much a political act as a legal act, and that politics are in the realm of what is possible, not of what is perfect. There is thus much wisdom in the Quebec Liberal Party's stance on the Charlottetown agreement. In a resolution passed by a huge majority at its last convention, it said that the agreement:

> [. . .] though less than the party's platform, represents real progress in accord with Quebec's traditional demands.

Our party is of the same opinion. It sees Charlottetown II, in spite of its serious shortcomings, as a major step in the evolution of the historical agreement that allows Quebec and the rest of Canada to develop and prosper, in an atmosphere of mutual respect. Through the referendum, it provides the people of Quebec with a rare opportunity to collectively choose its destiny.

If Canadians must recognize that Quebec must be allowed to pursue its legitimate aspirations, it is every bit as important that Quebecers, in choosing, recognize that the other provinces, particularly those at opposite ends of the country, must be allowed to insist on means for their survival and on their own demands which, for some, mainly concern Senate reform. It may be difficult for Quebec and Ontario to understand such concerns about the Senate, because they enjoy benefits derived from their large population. But it is natural for smaller provinces to seek protection through the Senate, within our Confederation.

To pursue the wonderful Canadian experiment, we must continue to build Canada, to foster relations between the national and the regional governments. History will not stop with the Charlottetown political agreement, and we must not be surprised to hear Premier Bourassa refer to further proposals and negotiations. In a country as vast and as diverse as ours, the will to keep on searching for greater harmony is part of our individual destinies.

Hon. Gérald-A. Beaudoin: Honourable senators, is the Charlottetown agreement realistic? Is it going to work? Will it benefit Canada? This to me is the fundamental question we have to answer.

At this point in our history, it is, I think, a real benefit. Let us think only of the entrenchment in the Constitution of the distinct society concept, of linguistic duality, of native rights, of a guaranteed 25 percent of the seats in the House of Commons for Quebec, of a Senate veto over linguistic and cultural matters, of improved power sharing, of limitations to the federal spending power, of the civil law component of the Supreme Court, of the protection of provincial rights in the central institutions and finally of native self-government.

A "yes" to the referendum would allow us to rapidly trigger the constitutional amendment process. It would mark the end of the present round of intense negotiations. But of course we will still be talking about agreements and the likes.

Let us have a quick look at the main clauses of the agreement.

The Canada clause is an interpretative clause which deals with the fundamental characteristics of Canada; it will be enshrined in the Constitution as section 2 of the Constitutional Act, 1867.

The Canada clause does not infringe on the powers, rights and privileges of the Parliament and Government of Canada, of the provincial governments and legislative assemblies and of the First Nations, including their powers, rights and privileges on linguistic matters.

Contrary to the Meech Lake Accord which only recognized the linguistic duality of Canada as a fundamental characteristic, the Charlottetown agreement recognizes eight fundamental characteristics, including the distinct society. It can therefore be argued that the distinct society clause carries more weight from a legal point of view since it is a "fundamental characteristic" of Canada. The distinct society is defined as one which includes a distinct language and culture and a civil law tradition. The word "includes" means that this list is no way restrictive.

The distinct society clause is mentioned in two subsections of section 2. Of the eight interpretative dispositions included in the Canada clause it is the only one, apart from the one dealing with the First Nations, which will be promoted by the government.

As for the distinct society and linguistic duality, the Charlottetown accord contains the substance of section 2 of the Meech Lake Accord and more.

The future Senate will be very different from the present one. Its members will be elected instead of appointed. They will be elected at the same time as members of the House of Commons, and for the same period. Parliament will pass an election law on this. However, it is provided that Quebec (as well as other interested provinces) will be able to have their senators elected by their legislature. This is what Mr. Bourassa wishes to do. Elsewhere, senators will be elected directly by the population.

Secondly, the Senate will be equal in terms of the number of senators representing each province, namely six, and its procedure regarding two responsibilities: the ratification of important appointments such as that of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, and the tax measures applying to natural resources.

However, in any other field, if the Senate opposes legislation passed by the House of Commons, it will have to sit in a joint session for a second vote on that bill. It is therefore a very important reform of our parliamentary system. Quebec and Ontario will each have 18 more members in the House of Commons, to make up for the senators that they will lose in the new Senate; British Columbia and Alberta will respectively have four and two more members in the House.

Thirdly, the powers of the new Senate will be different: an absolute veto as regards natural resources and a one-month suspensive veto on appropriations. There will be four types of legislation and all the bills, except the appropriation bills, will have to be passed or rejected within 30 sitting days of the House of Commons.

If the Senate rejects an ordinary bill, a joint session of both houses will be held and a simple majority vote will decide the outcome.

The suspensive veto of the Senate regarding constitutional amendments remains unchanged. Confidence in the government will not be jeopardized in the Senate. Also, there will be no minister in the Senate.

Finally, and this is a very important change, a double majority, that of all the senators present and that of the French-speaking senators, will be necessary for bills that affect the French language or culture.

[English]

The Supreme Court of Canada was established in 1875 by a federal statute, a simple statute. As has been done in other constitutions, it is convenient to enshrine in the Constitution the existence of the court of last resort, and this is provided for in the Charlottetown accord. Furthermore, we will enshrine in the Constitution, for the first time, in an express way, the "civilian" composition of the Supreme Court of Canada. Quebec will then have, quite clearly, the assurance of having three judges—one third of the court. Judges will continue, of course, to be appointed by the Federal Executive, but the provinces and the territories will draft lists of candidates and Quebec will have its own list. In the case of a deadlock, it is provided in the Charlottetown accord that a judge may be appointed on an interim basis. It is an improvement. The text of the Meech Lake accord was silent on that point.

The Charlottetown accord, in my opinion, is better than the present formula. If the accord becomes the object of a constitutional amendment, Quebec will have one quarter of the seats in the House of Commons. This provision will be enshrined in section 41 of the Constitution Act of 1982, and this innovation, in my opinion, is very important.

[Translation]

Once Senate reform has taken effect, the number of members from Quebec and Ontario in the House of Commons will increase, as I said a moment ago.

The federal spending power: the Charlottetown Agreement recognizes the federal spending power.

However, we have long known that Quebec wants to limit the federal spending power. The Charlottetown Agreement puts the provinces' right to opt out in the Constitution, under certain conditions; that is, when the federal government puts forward a new cost-shared national program in a field of exclusive provincial jurisdiction and the province sets up a program or initiative compatible with national objectives.

[Senator Beaudoin.]

This clause repeats the one in the Meech Lake Accord. The formula proposed in the Charlottetown Agreement takes precedence over the present legal provisions in this regard.

I turn now to protection for intergovernmental agreements. This is a very acceptable innovation.

A new mechanism to protect certain intergovernmental agreements from unilateral amendment will be enshrined in the Constitution. This mechanism would be in place for five years and could be renewed with the consent of the legislatures concerned.

Immigration: under section 95 of our Constitution, this is a field of joint jurisdiction, with priority to federal legislation in case of incompatibility with provincial law.

Given its disturbingly low birth rate, Quebec had a rude awakening several years ago to the importance of this field; it passed the Cullen-Couture Agreement on February 20, 1978 and renewed it in 1983 and 1991.

Labour force training and development: these two fields will be recognized as in exclusive provincial jurisdiction. At a province's request, the federal government will withdraw from fields of activity related to manpower training and development. The provinces will then be able to limit the federal spending power in these fields through intergovernmental agreements.

A word about culture: The Charlottetown Agreement recognizes exclusive provincial jurisdiction over culture. I think that is a real gain, at least for Quebec and probably for all the other provinces. But of course the federal government will continue to assume its responsibilities for Canadian cultural issues, including major institutions like the CBC.

On the other hand, it promises to negotiate cultural agreements with the provinces so that they can control culture on their territory.

Honourable senators, my time is running out so I will go quickly over what lawyers call the six sisters: forestry, mining, tourism, recreation, housing, and municipal and urban affairs. These six areas are explicitly recognized as matters of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

The Charlottetown agreement specifies that regional development should not become a separate head of power, which I think is wise. However, a new constitutional provision should require the federal government to negotiate regional development agreements with any province that requests it. These agreements would be protected through the intergovernmental agreement protection mechanism.

The agreement would repeal the power of disallowance and reservation that has not been used for many years.

The declaratory power would be limited and defined.

We finally come to a very important concept: the inherent right of the Aboriginal peoples to self-government.

It is a new right. Native people do not want delegated rights. They want the Constitution to affirm the rights that had always been theirs before Europeans arrived in America.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I must warn Senator Beaudoin that his time is expired. Is there unanimous consent to allow the honourable senator to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Beaudoin: Thank you, honourable senators.

The agreement clearly stipulates that the right established in Section 35 does not create new land rights except to the extent that such rights are provided for in self-government agreements.

Any future changes to central institutions would be protected by the unanimity rule in Section 41 of the Constitution Act of 1982.

The establishment of new provinces would become an area of federal and territorial jurisdiction through a bilateral amendment. New provinces could then be created (as was requested) through an Act of Parliament.

However, these new provinces could not play a role in the amending formula without the unanimous consent of all the provinces and the federal government. Any increase in their representation in the Senate would also require the unanimous consent of all other provinces and the federal government.

In closing, honourable senators, I think the agreement must be the subject of a referendum; it is the first time in Canada's history that a referendum is being held on such significant constitutional amendments.

Even the 1867 Constitution was not submitted to a nationwide referendum.

It will be the first time in our nation's history that the Canadian people have their say on such a fundamental issue.

An agreement must be assessed in its entirety. Any constitution is a compromise and every country must have a constitution appropriate to its needs.

I think we will be going in the right direction by saying yes in the October 26 referendum.

[English]

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I rise to make some comments on the motion before us and to support it. However, I would like to comment specifically on several aspects of both the process and the substance of the constitutional accord reached in Charlottetown. Let me begin with some comments on the process.

As members of this chamber know very well, it has long been a policy of the Liberal Party to support the principle that constitutional change ought to be approved by the people of the country as whole in a national referendum and not merely by politicians and legislators in the federal Parliament.

Indeed, more than a decade ago during the federal-provincial negotiations on the Constitution in 1980 and 1981, which ultimately led to the patriation of the Constitution and the inclusion of the Charter of Rights in the Constitution, a key point of the Liberal Party negotiating position was that the amending formula should explicitly include a national referendum as a ratification measure. Constitutional amendments should not be made merely by votes in legislatures and Parliament. Unfortunately, during the final night of negotiations on November 5, 1981, that referendum provision was dropped because of provincial opposition. The provinces did not want a federal referendum to be held in their territory. Nevertheless, support for the referendum as part of the constitutional approval process has continued within the Liberal Party since 1981.

Two years ago, in his appearance before the Bélanger-Campeau Commission Jean Chrétien argued for a referendum as part of the amending process. Repeatedly, in speeches both in Quebec and across the country, he has continued to put forward that position.

As someone who has been involved with this issue for some time, I am delighted that this government is finally willing to accept the notion that it can trust the judgment of the Canadian people on this issue. I might note, honourable senators, that this has been a recent conversion. On June 19 in this chamber, as reported at page 1823 of the Debates of the Senate in answer to a question from Senator Fairbairn, Senator Murray stated:

> . . . I should also point out that Senator Fairbairn's desire to insist on a referendum in all of the country . . . is not acceptable to the government.

That statement was made by the Leader of the Government in the Senate less than three months ago. However, it is nice to see that the government is willing, at least on certain issues, to change its mind and that it finally understands the position of the Canadian public, and, indeed, the position of the Liberal Party for more than a decade.

With respect to the referendum, before the vote is held it is important that the leaders of the government and those who intend to participate in the debate set out very clearly what constitutes passage of the referendum. There are a number of scenarios which could lead to an extremely ambiguous outcome on October 26. Again, going back to 1981, the Liberal Party position has been that a referendum would pass provided that it passed in all four regions of the country; that, in effect, a regional veto was the rule to be used with respect to counting whether or not a referendum was passed.

It does seem to me, honourable senators, that before people vote in a referendum they ought to understand, when watching television that night, whether or not it has passed. I call on the government to be very explicit in stating what constitutes passage or defeat, and make it explicitly clear that the results of the referendum will be binding on the government.

It is an affront to Canadians to ask for their opinion and then for politicians, both at the federal level and at the provincial level, to take the position that they are not necessarily bound by the outcome of the referendum. At the present time, only the Government of British Columbia, through its legislation, is bound by the outcome of a referendum; but it would be absolutely unconscionable for any government, federal or provincial, to ignore the results of a referendum or the voice of its electorate.

Having said that about the process, I would just make two or three comments with respect to the substance of the agreement which the public is asked to support on October 26.

First, I should like to comment on the so-called Senate reform proposals.

• (1040)

It is an extreme understatement to say it is the weakest part of the package. Perhaps it is an overstatement to say the NDP have finally succeeded in abolishing the Senate in everything but name. Nevertheless, it is clear that the Senate reform proposals are closer to the NDP position than to the position of those of us who have, for a long time, argued for substantially more power in the Senate. I say that as a Maritimer. Effectively what the Senate reform proposals do is absolutely guarantee that all major decisions in Ottawa will be controlled by representatives of central Canada, or Upper Canada, if I can speak as a Maritimer.

Perhaps this starkly illustrates the situation: You have a situation in which 36 MPs have been added to the contingent from Quebec and Ontario to replace the lost Senate seats. Those 36 MPs in fact exceed the total number of MPs which now exist in the Atlantic provinces, which is only 32. Moreover, if one wanted to add insult to injury, one need only note that Quebec and Ontario were given additional seats in the House of Commons to replace the senators they lost. In fact, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick also lost senators, but they were not given additional seats in the House of Commons to replace them. One inevitably asks, "Where is the fairness and the equity in that kind of a proposals?"

In looking back on the debates and having talked to some of the participants in those meetings, it is clear that the supporters of the Triple-E Senate entirely forgot the objective of Senate reform. The object of Senate reform, as, historically, it has been argued by representatives of Western Canada and Atlantic Canada, has been to significantly increase the voice of the smaller provinces in the decision-making corridors in Ottawa. That was the objective of Senate reform.

The supporters of Senate reform decided that the best way to achieve that objective was to go to an equal number of senators. The problem they seem to have had when they got into this debate, not only in Charlottetown but elsewhere, was that suddenly the numbers issue became the sole criterion for gaining added influence for the regions in Ottawa. And we see what has happened. They won on the numbers game but totally lost at the effectiveness game.

[Senator Kirby.]

What we really have now is a situation where, for all intents and purposes, the future Senate will be meaningless in terms of being able to have an impact on national decisions. It will not counter-balance the weight which the House of Commons gives to central Canada by virtue of its population.

For those who argued for a Triple-E Senate, all they got was "equal and elected". What they absolutely did not get was effective. They really got two Es and an I, where the third E has now been changed to "ineffective" instead of "effective".

Honourable senators, there may be some way around this problem—by adjusting the rules by which joint sessions of the Senate and the House of Commons are held. One could imagine, for example, a situation in which the rules of joint sittings were such that they would only be held six months or longer after the Senate had defeated a bill. The net effect would be to give the Senate a suspensive veto.

One could even go further and say that joint sittings, even though they are permitted by the Charlottetown agreement, would in fact never be held if a majority of senators from one region of the country or another voted against the particular piece of legislation.

On balance, on the basis of what was agreed to in Charlottetown, honourable senators, the basic intent of the agreement was not only to emasculate the Senate but thereby emasculate any real attempt at giving added voice and input to the Atlantic provinces and Western Canada.

Honourable senators, before the vote is held on October 26, it is important for the government to state what the rules will be with respect to joint sittings, to ensure that those of us who are concerned about the weakening of the regional voice in Ottawa will understand what, if anything, will be done to strengthen the power of the Senate by virtue of the way joint sittings will be held.

Let me, honourable senators, make just a couple of comments with respect to the economic union proposals. As some of you know, that issue has been around for a long time. It was originally included in the negotiations in 1980 and 1981 and was turned down because of, frankly, provincial reluctance to put any constraints on their ability to impede trade from other provinces. Provincial premiers wanted to be as isolationist on economic policy as possible.

When one looks at the so-called economic union proposals that are in the Charlottetown agreement, one notes that, in effect, nothing has been achieved. What has been achieved is so insignificant as to be meaningless.

It is interesting that there have been a lot of press comments about the fact that there are fewer barriers to trade now between the various countries of Europe than there are between Canadian provinces. Perhaps another observation which is worth making is that there is more movement of goods between Canada and the United States under the free trade agreement than there will be between provinces under the provisions of the "economic union" clauses in the Charlottetown agreement.

If there is an area in which the federal government failed to successfully conclude changes to the constitution which are in the economic interests of all Canadians, it is in the "economic union" area. It does seem to me this is one of the more glaring weaknesses of the current agreement.

Finally, honourable senators, I would like to just say a brief word about the distribution of powers changes that are contained in the agreement.

Many people will argue, and there has been some press commentary to this effect already, that the federal government has been drastically weakened by the division of powers. It is my view that those claims are exaggerated, frankly. While there has clearly been some transfer of power from the federal government to the provinces, this transfer of power has not dramatically weakened the federal government. What is true, however, is that the constraints on the federal spending power and, in particular, the move to fiscal compensation with opting out, do in fact pose a problem for the country as a whole. It will make future national programs, meaning national standards, virtually impossible.

One of the arguments many of us have made in the past with respect to fiscal compensation has been precisely that compensation would produce a patchwork quilt, if you want, of social programs and their standards across the country. The Charlottetown agreement proposes to enshrine that in the constitution.

There is one further division of power item which concerns me, and that is the one related to manpower training. I raise that as an issue not because I think it is imperative that one level of government or the other have that power for power's sake, but because the interests of the average Canadian, and, indeed, the interests of the business community in particular, are considerably compromised by a fragmented national manpower policy. The minute you say that ten provinces can have their own manpower training programs, you make it very difficult, particularly for smaller provinces, to run programs in those industries not necessarily found in their own province, but elsewhere in the country.

In many of the smaller provinces, one of the most important things that a young Canadian can be given is the skill necessary for that individual to take up a job, not only in his or her own province, but elsewhere in the country. The mobility of the labour force of Canada is critical, and it is particularly important for young people in the poorer regions of the country. The minute you say there will be no national manpower training policy and no national manpower program, you put enormous pressure on the provincial governments. I say this as someone who was in a provincial government for four years.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I interrupt the honourable senator to advise him that his time has expired.

Senator Kirby: May I have two minutes, honourable senators, in order to complete my remarks?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Kirby: The constraints placed on provincial governments, particularly those with small budgets, mean that they will only put manpower training dollars into programs that are particularly relevant to their province. For example, in the case of Nova Scotia, manpower training programs that might well train young Nova Scotians for jobs in the aerospace industry in Ontario, or in some of the high-tech industries in Western Canada, will probably not be offered simply because the limited number of manpower training dollars will go into Nova Scotia-based industries. This is a huge disservice to younger Canadians in the sense that it will constrain their ability to be mobile and gain useful employment outside their home province.

My view on the manpower training issue has less to do with the federal-provincial power fight or a weakening of the federal government than it does with the disservice done to Canadians across the country, particularly young Canadians, who need these skills in order to gain employment elsewhere in the country.

In conclusion, honourable senators, as I said in my opening remarks, I am absolutely delighted with the fact that the package will be put to the country in a referendum. I think that the Constitution is something which belongs to the people as a whole, not merely to politicians.

With respect to the specific substance of the package, as I have already indicated, I have a number of concerns. I think it is clear that various parts of the country did not get what they wanted. For example, Quebec did not get all the powers it wanted. Ontario did not get the social charter it was seeking. The Atlantic provinces and Western Canadians did not get the voice in Ottawa that they thought they would get when they set out on the road to Senate reform.

I suppose the best that one could say about the substance of the proposal is that unfortunately it meets our uniquely Canadian standard of exellence. That is to say, the package will result in "equalized unhappiness" for everyone in the country.

Senator Murray: I take it my friend will be voting "yes" in the referendum.

Senator Kirby: That is correct.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, it is with enthusiasm that I rise to speak in support of the motion that the Senate concur with the House of Commons in approving the referendum question before us today.

It is noteworthy that October 26, 1992 will be the third time in the history of our country that Canadians will vote on a referendum question, the first occasion being in 1898 and the last in 1942.

The proposed referendum question to be voted on on October 26 next is straightforward, concise and clear. It asks Canadians whether or not they agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached by the government of Canada, the 10 provinces, the two territories and the leadership of the aboriginal peoples of Canada.

Honourable senators, it seems elementary to assume that when a matter of public importance is put before the citizens of a country by way of a referendum vote that the voters have a right to know about the contents of the issue upon which they are voting. I believe that members of Parliament, the House of Commons and the Senate, have a responsibility to help in the understanding of this August 28 agreement.

The first element in the understanding of the substance is the realization that the process which led to the consensus in Charlottetown on August 28 has been one of the most remarkable exercises of participatory democracy ever undertaken by a modern state. Hundreds of thousands of Canadians have been involved in this remarkable development over the past couple of years. The multitude of hearings held by constitutional committees of provincial and territorial legislatures, as well as Parliament, has afforded many public fora for contributors. There has been an aboriginal process. The research and analysis conducted by academics, the televised national policy conferences and the hundreds of community meetings have allowed for unprecedented study.

This remarkable consensus was reached by 17 elected Canadian men and women on a comprehensive package of change relating to all the major constitutional issues considered in this past little while. But honourable senators, let us not lose sight of the diversity and the differences represented in Charlottetown—Canadian leaders representing a nation continent bounded by three oceans and formed from every culture and tradition. Therefore, it is clear that the content of the Consensus Report is the reflection of what Canada is all about.

Honourable senators, let me turn to a few specific issues of substance in the August 28 consensus. The Canada clause acknowledges and establishes who we are as a people and what Canada is as a nation. It captures in a few words the values, history and beliefs which make us Canadians. The Canada clause is a mirror in which we can see ourselves clearly reflected now and in the future.

That clause sets out how we have chosen to govern ourselves within a parliamentary democracy arranged in a federal state. It identifies our cultural heritage by recognizing the rights of aboriginal peoples, the distinctiveness of Quebec society and our linguistic duality. It affirms basic Canadian values, our respect for individual and collective rights and freedoms, and racial, ethnic and gender equality. It gives guidance to the courts in their interpretation of the entire Constitution. It contains a commitment to racial and ethnic equality and diversity.

[Senator Kinsella.]

The social and economic union is a statement of common social and economic policy objectives of federal, provincial and territorial governments. The policy objectives set out in the social union include comprehensive, universal, portable, publicly administered and accessible health care, adequate social services and benefits, high quality education, workers' rights and the integrity of the environment.

The policy objectives set out in the economic union include strengthening the Canadian economic union, the free flow of persons, goods, services and capital, the goal of full employment, reasonable standards of living and sustainable and equitable development.

In addition, first ministers will regularly review progress made in this regard. They have reached an agreement on the principles to strengthen our internal common market and will discuss how to implement these principles at a future meeting of first ministers on the economy.

Honourable senators, the social and economic union will not be enforceable by the courts. The responsibility for implementing the policy objectives will rest with elected governments who are accountable to Canadians. It is noteworthy that development in this area can be guided by Canada's obligations as a party to the United Nations International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.

The new Senate provided for in the August 28 agreement, while not drafted in the way I would have done it is, in my view, workable and, therefore, supportable. Based on my analysis of the proposal, and in light of my limited two years' experience as a member of the Senate, I believe that the envisaged new Senate can be successful. However, success will depend on two critical elements. The first will be the groundwork which the members of the present Senate are able to lay through such means as the constitutional resolutions which must be dealt with in this chamber and the many statutory and regulatory instruments which need to be approved.

The second condition for success will depend on the skill and tenacity of the first group of elected senators in dealing with members in the other place.

Honourable senators, any enterprise is only as successful as the men and women who work therein. Indeed, a brand new limousine in the hands of a poor driver stands much less chance of reaching Montreal than an old beat-up half-ton in the hands of a skilful driver-mechanic.

Senator Frith: And a rowboat seldom beats a battleship.

Senator Kinsella: Our success with a new Senate depends less on the proposed model than on what we will do with it.

The ultimate purpose or objective of any bicameral system of government—and this applies to the envisaged new Senate and the changed House of Commons—is to achieve the best possible legislation. Parliamentary bicameralism is maintained in the proposals with the Senate and the House of Commons each being elected.

Modern bicameralism is premised on the view that two legislative bodies with different systems of representation will likely produce better legislation. In general, the new Senate will continue to be a body of sober second thought, but the motivation for such second thought will be that the new Senate will represent a different point of view from that of the House of Commons.

Bicameralism in the renewed Canadian Parliament is significantly different indeed from the present model. One might aptly describe the new Parliament as being one hall with a salon A and a salon B, working under the same roof but with the roots of the House of Commons and those of the Senate planted in two different systems of representation for Canadians: National representation in the House of Commons and federal representation in the Senate. These two different schemas of representation will bring two different perspectives to bear on all legislation, thus helping to ensure that every province and territory, and the aboriginal people of Canada, can feel that their particular interests are adequately represented and considered.

Honourable senators, in addition to having a different schema of representation, the new Senate will have its own distinctiveness as a second chamber in Parliament. Given that the new Senate will not have a cabinet minister amongst the senators, nor will the rejection of government legislation be a cause of nonconfidence and thus bring down a government, the distinctiveness of the new Senate can be enhanced by not dividing the senators into government and opposition benches. It might be advantageous to the effectiveness of the new Senate to have it organized on the basis of provincial, regional or other such caucus groupings. The new Senate will be an effective chamber if the new senators make it effective.

In terms of some of the outlined powers in the attempt to use federal taxation power to interfere —

Senator Stewart: I wonder if the honourable senator would permit me to ask a question.

Senator Kinsella: If I may just finish, Senator Stewart, I would then be happy to answer questions if we are proceeding that way.

With reference to examples of creativity and the powers that are outlined in the agreement, any attempt to use the federal taxation power to interfere in provincial jurisdiction over natural resources will be subject to Senate control. The Senate will be able to exercise an absolute veto by a simple majority over bills that would result in fundamental tax policy changes directly related to natural resources.

The double majority for bills materially affecting the French language or culture will provide protection for the linguistic minority. The requirement for Senate ratification of many key federal appointments, including the Governor of the Bank of Canada, will ensure greater regional sensitivity in federal institutions.

The new senators might make creative use of the pre-study experience of the current Senate. Indeed, one approach to managing the study of ordinary legislation within the 30 days as required by the agreement could be through pre-study, thereby allowing the new Senate and its witnesses a good period of time to study proposed legislation.

If the Senate amends or defeats a bill, the House of Commons can invoke a reconciliation process to seek common ground. If after 30 days the reconciliation process fails, the Senate can by a simple majority trigger a joint sitting with the House. New senators may be able to develop important tactical and strategic techniques to apply to the new joint sitting process. In summary, this model of bicameralism can, with skill and wisdom, become a huge success, and I believe it will.

In closing, I would like to make a few comments as a senator from the province of New Brunswick. I believe that the accord in terms of content is good for New Brunswick. In terms of Parliament, New Brunswick is to have not only 6 senators but is guaranteed 10 seats in the House of Commons, notwithstanding that we would have fewer than 10 MPs on a pure representation-by- population basis—very important for our province.

Linguistic duality in New Brunswick is recognized and a special amendment will entrench equality of status of English and French linguistic communities in my province. A strong commitment to equalization and regional development is contained therein. The agreement reinforces New Brunswickers' support for strong central government with the ability to maintain our social programs, continued federal responsibility for unemployment insurance legislation, and the ability to initiate job creation programs, a constitutional amendment that commits the federal and provincial governments to ensuring the provision of reasonable comparable economic infrastructures of a national nature in each province, including mine, is maintained.

In conclusion, the substance of the August accord is a good compromise for a renewed Canada. It can work if Canadians are prepared to continue to work together. We have in this proposal a vision of Canada. It is one which I embrace. It is about many things, but especially it is about how Canadians united are better.

Hon. John B. Stewart: I would like to ask the honourable senator a question for clarification. It relates to the relationship of the proposed new Senate to our Parliamentary system. We are told that senators will not be eligible for cabinet posts. That immediately makes me think of Washington where members of the Congress are not in the President's cabinet. In other words, we have here a distinctly American notion.

Similarly, the accord provides that the senators may be elected by the provincial or territorial legislative assemblies. This reminds us of the method used in the 19th century in the United States. It was the Southern approach. The Southerners spoke—indeed, they still speak—of the war, not as "the civil war," but as "the war between the states." They regarded the U.S.A. as "the states united," and people as primarily citizens of the several states, rather than as citizens of the union.

Therefore in this accord, on the one hand, we have this congressionalism or this presidentialism. On the other hand, however, we are told that the Senate elections are to take place at the time of the general elections in Canada.

The question I want to ask the honourable senator is this: In view of the fact that senators are not to be eligible for cabinet posts, and in view of the fact that there is to be no government leader in the Senate—who is to lead the House, I cannot imagine—In view of these facts, will it be a requirement set forth in the final document — all we have now is a mere prospectus for a set of constitutional amendments — that members of the Senate shall not be members of political party caucuses?

Senator Kinsella: Honourable senators, my crystal ball is no better than that of anyone else, but I am operating on the fundamental principle that a tremendous amount of work has to be done, and the experience that is available in this chamber needs to be brought to bear on the grand outline that is provided in the accord. There is a great amount of experience on this hill relating to political affiliation and party discipline. That experience can help determine how the Parliament of Canada Act would be amended and how the rules of this chamber would be drafted. The bicameralism in the Canadian tradition which we are looking to build would benefit from the contribution of the experience that exists here of party discipline and efficacy—or lack of efficacy—of getting legislation through both houses of Parliament, with the eye on the ball. And what is the ball? In my view, the ball is good legislation. That is the purpose, the principle being that two houses should be able to achieve better legislation than one house.

Hon. Jerahmiel Grafstein: Honourable senators, I would like to welcome all honourable senators back from the summer vacation. On July 4th last, Daniel Aaron Grafstein, my first grandchild, was born in New York City where both his Canadian parents are presently working.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Grafstein: As we are about to engulf ourselves in the tidal waves of this momentous referendum, I ask myself what I will tell him two decades hence when he comes of age. What did I think? What did I advise? What did I do? And what do we tell Canadians who are about to embark on a perilous journey to the unknown? There are no familiar paths or signposts to illuminate our way. We are now moving into unfamiliar territory, government by referendum, so it is not easy.

I decided that first I would look through the prism I know best, the prism of Metropolitan Toronto where I live and work, and which region I proudly represent in the Senate. Metro Toronto is a microcosm of the new Canada where a third of the households speak a first language other than French or English, where the Anglo-Saxon majority has shrunk in a little over a decade to a minority of less than 25 per cent of the population, where the police can arrest in over 90 languages and can answer emergencies in over 130 languages, and where each group is a distinctive, unique society, where differences are respected and where each distinctive group is strong enough, proud enough and free enough that they need no sanction or law to guarantee or promote their distinctiveness at the expense of others. They need just the freedom, just the right, to practise their differences. And each one is proud to be Canadian and proud to live in Canada.

How can we inform these Canadians? We are being asked to fix our relations within Canada by a leap almost akin to a leap of faith because there is so little time, and really so little debate, on the Consensus Report, this deal, that will precede this democratic choice. It seems that this deal, if we are to believe what Mr. Clark said yesterday, is still a moving target.

What is the purpose of democracy? It is to enlighten citizenry in order to allow them to make informed choices, to look before they leap. Therefore these comments must serve, necessarily, as a memorandum to myself since we have received so little on the consequences of the content of the report or the wide gaps which are acknowledged by even the proponents. Yet we are asked to sell this deal to Canadians. There is a rush, a rush to judgment; and whenever there is a rush to judgment, there is always a heavier onus on the sellers. So I say, whenever there is a rush to judgment, let the buyers beware.

The executives of Canada's governments and the heads of the aboriginal peoples organizations have crafted a complex deal, yet have failed to provide adequate time for a detailed analysis of how the deal will impact upon the life of each Canadian. Ideas of taxation and transfers without clear representation or without clear understanding of accountability, ideas of hyphenated Canadianism, ideas about which, in the past, Canadians have justly and rightly been leery, are now about to be embedded in this deal. How difficult is it to turn on a searching spotlight and measure the impact that this deal will have on our lives and our future in the years ahead?

Therefore I ask myself: Does this deal contain the plans for an exciting, soaring, new cathedral made of stone that can support a flourishing body politic in the decades ahead, or is this deal a bright ice palace, shining and glistening at the start, yet so fragile that it must be rushed through a refrigeration process before light and heat can cause a meltdown?

This is not an act of Parliament that can easily be changed in the future. Parliament is not being asked to review this deal. All we are being asked now is whether we agree to ask a question. Meanwhile, the province of Quebec, stage by stage, section by section, is having an open hearing to review the deal. However, that is not what the federal government has asked of us.

Is the light emanating from this deal the light of Kafka, the light that blinds or bonds man's vision? In the mystical Book of Lights there are answers, but we are warned that to find the answers we must carefully ask ourselves the right questions. Questions, in a way, are more important and more difficult than the answers themselves. The courage required and the difficulty encountered in shaping and phrasing questions are the hidden lights waiting to be uncovered. Does each man have hidden lights, hidden resources of energy to overcome his dark side? What is hidden between the lines if this deal? What is the secret of the questions and margin of answers that will shape the very soul and aspirations of young Canada in the years to come?

Therefore, honourable senators, I set a task for myself. I tried as best I could to remove the emotions, the symbolism, the deceptions, and concentrate on the question of the deal and then the deal itself.

Proper questions have been raised about the referendum question itself. Is it fair? Experienced pollsters have suggested that a more appropriate opening would have been, "Do you agree or disagree?", and have suggested that the body of the question should conclude with referencing the agreement without the words "renewed" or "on the basis of". Both those phrases raise questions in themselves. Is this proposal in reality a renewed federalism or a changed form of federalism? Do the words "on the basis of" mean that governments will be free to interpret or amend the deal, as the deal was altered so many times in so many ways in the course of negotiations by the executives and aboriginal leaders right to the last moment? What mandate will these executives read into the vote? The people have a right to have clarity before they are asked to decide.

As for the agreement, all agree that this is a deal, an imperfect compromise. Therefore we are entitled to measure the substance of the deal based on the benchmarks we were given throughout the course of the debate.

The following are some questions I asked myself: Do you agree that this deal will strengthen the nation's economy; yes or no? Do you agree that this deal will improve the governance of the nation; yes or no? That the deal will enhance individual rights; yes or no? Expand national social programs; yes or no? Enrich our nation's culture; yes or no? Reduce trade and investment barriers between provinces and regions of the country; yes or no? Cause increased taxation; yes or no? Amplify the rights of the disabled and the disadvantaged in our society; yes or no? And finally, sustain the Charter as our paramount source of rights; yes or no?

When I ask these questions, other people immediately confront me with the challenge: Why even ask such questions if the consequences of the answers will lead to the destruction of the subject matter itself, Canada? Canada, we are told, will fall apart if this deal fails. We will have to start all over again. This is a rather explosive and dangerous rationale, and it could lead to self-fulfilling prophecies. We should be very careful with words such as this because the words which we seek to save us may end up destroying that which we seek to preserve.

It is very hard to contend with this argument, but there is a difference, a fundamental difference now, different than before. Now, no part of this country can falsely argue or falsely claim that it was humiliated. No province of the country can say it was left out if the voters choose to disagree. In Quebec, we are told that the debate is now centered on the deal itself, not on the sovereignty option. We are also told that in Quebec and Ottawa, this is not the end of constitutional negotiations; it is the beginning of the beginning.

Whether this deal is approved or not, Canadians in all provinces may have a first choice. The choice may be for a moratorium. A majority of Canadians may ask for a moratorium. They may be tired. They may prefer the imperfect present to an uncertain, imperfect future. They may prefer the status quo.

Many believe that the 1867 Constitution has served us well. Surveys in the past have demonstrated that Canada is the best place in the world to live, based on the present Constitution. Yet nobody to date, no pollster to date, as best as I can understand it, has asked Canadians in all regions if they are satisfied with the current Constitution. Indeed, the strongest argument I have heard for the deal is that we should get it over with—in fact, we must get it over with or we will fall apart. This seems to me too fragile a basis upon which to construct a new Constitution for the next 100 years.

Let us turn, however, to the questions on the deal reached in Charlottetown. Why in the social charter is there a right to collect social benefits under existing programs but no right to work? Why can provinces opt out and receive federal tax revenues, which would increase the national deficit and the national debt, and not require such provinces to at least co-sign on the resulting debt? Who is a "francophone"? Can my grandson ever be a "francophone"? Who is an "aboriginal"? Can I ever become an "aboriginal" if I learn a native dialect? What is "culture"? Will these definitions divide or unite Canadians? Are we creating "homelands", a notion that all Canadians abhorred in the South African Constitution? What are the boundaries of the "distinct society"? What is the overlap? Will the concept of linguistic equality from coast to coast be eroded? This is a concept of linguistic equality which was debated and which is now fretfully accepted by a majority of Canadians.

In order to demonstrate my concern on linguistic equality, honourable senators, I want to turn to one provision on page 12, section 30 of the Consensus Report on the Constitution. Referring to the powers that are to be transferred exclusively to the provinces, which include forestry, mining, tourism, housing and recreation, the report says this:

> Considerations of service to the public in both official languages should be considered a possible part of such agreements.

Does this mean that services may be provided on a unilingual basis in provinces except New Brunswick, which under this deal will be bilingual? Will tourism, recreation and housing be offered on a unilingual basis in all provinces except New Brunswick? These are serious questions affecting our vision of equality and national unity.

There are other questions that I must ask myself. Who pays? What is the inflationary cost of this deal? Do citizens have a right to know the financial costs as well as the political consequences?

The Leader of the Government in the Senate has advised us that the legal text of this agreement will not be available until October 26. This is certainly a very curious way to convince and persuade a democracy that this new constitutional palace has ample room for the expression of diverse views and the aspirations of all Canadians. In Denmark, each citizen received a complete and final text of the Maastricht treaty before they were asked to choose the next step. They rejected that agreement, and the EEC did not fall apart.

Honourable senators, I wait to hear others answer these and other questions, mindful of the imperative that the consequences of rejecting this imperfect deal may be chaos; but to imply or suggest that this deal augers the end of constitutional wrangling or debate in this country is inaccurate and misleading.

This national debate did not start well. At first, we were told we could not even question this deal. It was unpatriotic or worse. Again, this is a rather curious form of democratic leadership. Is it appropriate in a democratic society, bonded together by political parties, to condemn those who would ask questions and then attempt to marginalize or exile them to the outer fringes of party and public life? Surely politicians and citizens are entitled to publicly question themselves about this important matter. If the essence of this deal, these Constitutional proposals, cannot stand the light of careful examination by questions, those anxious authors must be very frightened that hidden crevices might be discovered.

We have gained from this constitutional debate. One lesson is absolutely clear: The impulse for Canada, based on the polls I have seen in every village, town and city, in every region and every province, remains strong for Canada. The impulse to continue together is strong and, if anything, the constitutional process has demonstrated that Canadians in all parts of Canada are generous, patient and prepared to compromise, perhaps even more so than their political leaders.

A final question: Is this deal built on our strengths or our weaknesses? Over a century ago in the heart of Europe, when we were constructing a new Confederation in North America, a new order in Europe was being developed; not necessarily a better order. It was called the White Revolution. History might provide us with some insight. The leader was Bismarck. Henry Kissinger wrote:

> The new order was tailored . . . to restrain the contending forces . . . by manipulating their antagonism.

Of this period, Kissinger, that master of realpolitik, wrote again:

> Whenever peace—conceived as the avoidance of war—has been the primary objective of a power or a group of powers . . . the system has been at the mercy of the most ruthless member.

[Senator Grafstein.]

So, honourable senators, and so to my grandson Daniel, we are left with more questions than answers. Next it will be up to the wisdom of the people of Canada to decide. May the forces of light illuminate their deliberations.

Last weekend, senators, I attended a delightful wedding of two working Canadians of Jamaican origin—both hard-working Canadians—on Eglinton Avenue West. I attended this wonderful wedding together with their families and friends from Toronto, New York, Jamaica and England. A very dignified gentleman sat down beside me and said, "Senator, we love Canada. Whatever you do, and I am not sure what the right thing is because it is pretty confusing to me, keep Canadians together. We have got a great future here."

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): May I assume that the honourable senator will be voting "yes" in the referendum?

Senator Grafstein: Every question begs a question, honourable senators.

Hon. Nancy E. Teed: Honourable senators, I rise today to take part in this debate on the national referendum question and on the Charlottetown constitutional agreement. I do so with a great deal of pride in my country and pride in the goodwill of its people and its political leaders to make this country work.

I believe the work that has been done towards the constitutional agreement during the past two years has been truly overwhelming. It started with the Citizens' Forum on the Constitution and a special joint comittee on the amending formula, continued through the presentation of the government's 28 constitutional proposals, then through the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada—to mention only a few of the processes, committees, etcetera—and finally, the multilateral process, which concluded with this comprehensive agreement for constitutional change. I wish to salute all those who participated in the various processes that brought us to the Charlottetown agreement.

I have analyzed this agreement from my perspective as a New Brunswicker, a former Minister of Health and as one who passionately cares for the future of my country, and, just as important, at least to me, the future of the region I represent. Let us not kid ourselves; the failure of this country to hold together would be nowhere more keenly felt than in Atlantic Canada. We would be isolated from the rest of Canada, if indeed the rest of Canada held together.

Atlantic Canada, because of the nature of its economy, small population and distance from large markets, would be hard hit should Canada fail. Higher interest rates, flight of capital, lost investments, stock market declines and a further recession are all possibilities. The separation of Quebec from Canada would increase the isolation of the Atlantic provinces in the Canadian federal system. The region would be less visible than Quebec and Ontario.

I believe the unanimous Charlottetown agreement on constitutional renewal reflects the constitutional aspirations that Atlantic Canadians themselves have articulated throughout the process that preceded the Canada round of first ministers' discussions. Atlantic Canadians' interests going into the talks were clear. At the end of the day the federal government's ability to act decisively in the national interest had to be preserved. A stronger voice for Canada's regions and national affairs had to be provided for, and Canada's traditional commitment to equality had to be reaffirmed. This agreement meets these objectives.

Nothing in the new agreement will diminish the federal government's ability to initiate new national programs that respond to the real needs of people. However, provinces wishing to opt out of new national programs will be able to do so with full compensation, if they undertake similar programs better suited to their particular needs and interests but compatible with national objectives. More to the point, federalism will become more flexible. The federal government will defer to any province's wish to restrict its spending in most areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction and will transfer, upon request, relevant responsibilities and resources to that province. Where a province wishes current arrangements to continue the federal government will maintain its commitments.

This is an important caveat for Atlantic Canadians who have traditionally relied on a strong central government to ensure equality of opportunity and a fair share of the benefits of the Canadian federation.

In areas of shared jurisdiction the agreement will provide for a greater level of stability and predictability than has been the case. For example, the requirement for advance notification of possible changes to funding arrangements and such national cost-shared programs as a Canada Assistance Plan will be entrenched in the Constitution. So will the government's commitment to equalization and to the provision of regional development assistance to ensure a comparable economic structure in each province and territory. These two are important gains for Atlantic Canada, a region that for a long time has sought to acquire the essential tools it needs to take in hand its own development.

The consensus reached on a reformed Senate, which provides each province an equal number of Senate seats regardless of population or size, is also a step forward for Atlantic Canada. It recognizes the principle of provincial equality as a fundamental characteristic of the Canadian federation. The new Senate will oblige the lower and upper houses of Parliament to speak to one another and will be given the power to block arbitrary and discriminatory taxes on natural resources through a simple majority vote.

It would also have the power to exercise an absolute veto over appointments to federal boards and institutions such as the Bank of Canada, thereby ensuring greater regional balance and sensitivity in federal appointments. Atlantic Canadian senators will be vigilant in ensuring such appointments are familiar and sympathetic to our regional needs, concerns and aspirations.

A strong economy and an effective, viable social safety net are perhaps more important to Atlantic Canadians than to other Canadians. The strengthened economic union that results from this agreement will prevent the creation of new impediments to inter-provincial trade, thereby facilitating the free movement of goods and services and of people within Canada and improving competitiveness and the business environment. This is a goal long sought after by New Brunswick.

By way of media announcements this morning, I understand that the Atlantic premiers met yesterday in Nova Scotia and signed an agreement relative to removing the economic barriers between the Atlantic provinces. I hope and pray that what I heard in the media this morning is correct, because it is a step in the right direction.

At the same time the "social union" proposals clearly state that adequate health care, social services, responsible access to housing and food and quality education would all become objectives of the Canadian federation.

Finally, the new protection afforded linguistic minorities in the agreement and the decision to recognize the aboriginal Canadians' inherent right to self-government both provide for new strengthened partnerships among all Canadians. In particular, I am pleased about the specific constitutional amendment agreed to between the federal government and the New Brunswick government to entrench the equality status of the English and French linguistic communities in New Brunswick, including the right to distinct educational and cultural institutions.

This historic agreement is good for all Canadians and allows all parts of the country to move forward together to meet the challenges of change. It is for all those reasons that I will join with my premier, the Honourable Frank McKenna, colleagues in this chamber, colleagues from the House of Commons and all New Brunswickers to ensure that citizens become as well informed as possible regarding the Charlottetown agreement so that the majority of New Brunswickers will vote for Canada on October 26.

Honourable senators, I will vote in support of the motion as moved by Senator Murray.

Senator Molgat: Is my friend not going to ask Senator Teed for a scorecard?

Senator Frith: Is she taking the "fifth" also?

Senator Teed: I stated that in my remarks.

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I value this opportunity to share with you some of my views as a senator from British Columbia, which is also a separate region of Canada. I do so in a way that seeks to express the turmoil that this constitutional process is causing in my province. I assure you that British Columbians have followed, as much as any part of Canada has, the constitutional debate that we have had for such a long time now in Canada, and the spirit of Canada is strong in British Columbia. However, there is also a sense of disaffection amongst a substantial number of people in my province about the weight and significance that British Columbia will hold and deliver to the Canadian Confederation of the future.

British Columbians have a sense of themselves as an expanding province, as a province which is Canada's gateway to the Pacific and Canada's western province in the north-south axis of North America. A very substantial number of the people of North America live in the north-south corridor from California to Alaska. It is a region that has an awareness of itself as a region.

In the Pacific Northwest we talk about regional arrangements and we give it the name Cascadia. There has been a strong movement in the province of British Columbia, as well as in Alberta, along with the states of Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Alaska and some parts of northern California, to develop regional ties, to reduce barriers in trade and the movement of peoples and to reduce the qualitative legal barriers that domestic laws on both sides of the border have created, so as to allow the development of a new sense of society, and of course more active commerce.

Senator Frith: Qualitative legal barriers?

Senator Austin: I am talking about customs tariffs and the whole array of politically imposed and regionally imposed—in the sense of states and provinces—barriers to movement. This development of Cascadia I see, along with many British Columbians, as a positive development. It has been furthered, however, by an increasing sense of isolation from the east-west ties. What has gone on in central Canada, what Senator Kirby called Upper Canada and also Lower Canada, the old province of Canada, is seen by many in British Columbia as increasingly less relevant to the interests and the affairs of the people of British Columbia. I regret that. The development of positive attitudes to a region is consistent with national loyalties. I believe that the Canada that we have been committed to, the Canada that I believed in and do believe in, is a noble experiment and demands our first loyalty and our first commitment.

Today, many British Columbians are asking whether there is sufficient reason to give Canada that level of commitment and loyalty. Of course British Columbia will remain in Canada. Of course British Columbia will accept the political institutions that are achieved in the Charlottetown accord, if they are acceptable to the rest of Canada. There is a difference between the spirit of commitment and the form of commitment. It is that spirit of commitment that is in issue in British Columbia today.

In terms of British Columbia's achievements in these negotiations, I believe that the leadership of the province of British Columbia has much to account for in terms of its responsibilities to the people of British Columbia. I do not bring blame to the total constitutional process. Each province in these negotiations is here to look after its own interests. The federal government, to give it its due, has earnestly sought a national compromise. As one observer of Canada stated, "a Canadian is someone who takes moderation to extreme." That is a good definition of some of the negotiating positions of the federal government.

With respect to the issue that I touched on at the beginning—the role of British Columbia in the federal process—I believe that through the results of the negotiating process and the lack of a fixed vision on goals, to which Senator Kirby referred, this Senate as it will be reconstituted by the Charlottetown accord will, so far as British Columbia is concerned, be of no particular significance. The sense that British Columbia has truly an appropriate role and impact on the exchange of ideas, the exchange of issues that manage Canada, that make Canada grow, that make us a greater country, has been damaged, and the result of the Charlottetown accord will leave British Columbia with a larger sense of indifference than ever before.

I have always seen Parliament as the place for the trade-offs within a democratic political system which create a greater good for us all. I have always seen the genius of the British parliamentary system as leaving something for each part of the negotiating process and for each interest in that negotiating process.

When we set out to deal with constitutional issues in the era of the early 1970s and again in the early 1980s, it was to make and reinforce the supremacy of Parliament as a place for the negotiation, trade-off and settlement of the key issues of the Canadian Confederation; it was building this Parliament that we saw as the absolute fundamental issue in the greatness of Canada and in the working together of its peoples. In that sense, the Charlottetown accord is an absolute failure. "Absolute" is a strong word. It is a failure. In the Charlottetown accord we have created parallel structures that weaken this Parliament. We have a regime of premiers who are also now part of the national governance of this country although they are not elected nationally. In the Charlottetown accord we have agreed that we will have a separate system of consensus outside of this Parliament with respect to the structures and many of the policies that will affect the running of this country. I think that weakens Canada.

So far as this chamber is concerned, while I have always advocated an elected Senate, and did so at the first opportunity I had to speak in this chamber when I became a senator, I did not have in my mind—and could never have had in my mind—the concept of the Senate as it is described in the Charlottetown agreement. That Senate will not represent western interests. It will not serve effectively as a check on the executive, which was one of its principal reasons for being brought into existence originally. I cannot see its role as effective in serving the interests of the minorities of this country. In fact, to be frank, senators, the future Senate described in the Charlottetown agreement will be a standing royal commission, elected by some provinces and chosen by the executive of other provinces if the current provisions in the Charlottetown agreement are carried through into our constitution. With different qualities for entry, no doubt we will still get a highly competent group of people in this chamber. However, their influence as regional representatives will pale before that of premiers and of other authorities. Their significance in terms of their relationship with the House of Commons will be as perhaps today only in terms of the quality of the individual and the standing of that individual. It will become a more partisan chamber and the idea that it will be reflective of the national issues of the mid and longer term has been virtually eliminated. The way in which senators are chosen will be linked to party and will, perhaps, be linked to the leadership of the party.

The candidates for election, where senators are elected, will be chosen by parties or by party leaders. Because it will be a house of minorities, they will be bound to party discipline. They will be committed to it before they are chosen to run. Where the provincial premiers decide they should make the choice through their majority in their elected legislatures, they will be bound to another brand of partisanship. What kind of a Senate will that be? I do not believe that Canadians in their right mind, except for the premiers and the prime minister, would want that kind of Senate to represent them; nor do I believe this Charlottetown accord represents the wishes of a majority of Canadians for an elected upper chamber.

What we have seen is that the very people in this country—and they are a very small minority—who wish to avoid being checked in any way, shape, or form by an upper chamber are constituted as the architects of the upper chamber. The Prime Minister, and I do not refer only to the incumbent but to any prime minister, would seek to have as little check by an Upper House as possible, and of course the premiers have no desire to have rivals for their authority here. These are the people who are our architects.

I know senators here share with me many of these views. I have seen no fire for the Charlottetown accord in this chamber on either side of the house. I have seen no argument that it contains a new soul for Canada. I have heard nothing from any senator that says that this will reinvigorate Confederation.

Let me come, then, to what we have before us. For the reasons that Senator Kirby gave and other reasons, I certainly support the resolution being referred to the people of Canada. I have always thought that constitutional changes are the property of the people. I think that is the way to discourage constitutional change except when absolutely required in a country. I do not believe constitutions are ordinary pieces of legislation or that they should be at the will and the whim of passing interest groups. Too much of that is reflected in the Charlottetown accord.

I believe strongly that a referendum process belongs in the Canadian constitution. I wish to God that there had been a referendum before the Canada Act, 1982, had been brought to law, because the issues that have flowed in the last ten years would have been settled then. This country would now be responding to the economic and social challenges that the world is seeing. Those are challenges, as all senators know, that are immense. It will be a struggle for Canada in the years ahead to meet its present standards of excellence. Other societies are on the march. Other societies have achieved technical —

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I wish to advise the senator his time has expired. Does he have unanimous consent to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Austin: Other societies have achieved enormous technical advances, and they have a sense of their own identity. That sense of identity, whether it be German, Japanese, American, or Mexican, brings about a common sense of being in the world. It brings about a sense of team work. It brings about a sense of purpose. We are a country still struggling to evolve a common identity. We are very much still a new country in that sense, and we have not forged for ourselves an identity which is a rallying point for the people of Canada.

Marshall McLuhan said, at an earlier time and in a happier Canada:

> Canada is the only country in the world that knows how to live without an identity.

I think if he were here today, he would want to rewrite that particular statement. I think we have not yet learned how to live without an identity. Of course what Marshall McLuhan was describing was the highest and most noble characteristic of any nation, to understand that its identity is in its compassion towards its peoples, its tolerance of difference, the fairness of its legal system, the effectiveness of its democracy, and its capacity to earn a standard of living which is at least equal to that of any other country in the world.

It is with a heavy heart and no enthusiasm, as honourable senators have seen, that I make these remarks. I will answer Senator Murray's question before he asks it. Yes, I will support the Charlottetown accord on condition:

On condition that I am satisfied that it quiets the issue of constitutional change in this country for a reasonable period of time and that the government will forthwith state that its purpose is to conclude these issues within the Charlottetown accord in constitutional terms and then leave the question of constitutions for a long period of time and turn to other issues; on the condition that statements such as those being made in Quebec and Ontario, that this is only a way station in the evolution of the Canadian identity and constitution, and that there will be another station immediately ahead of us, are not part of the issue and are not part of the government's purpose.

Senator Murray: How do you expect those conditions to be met prior to October 26?

Senator Austin: I want a statement from the Prime Minister on behalf of his government that the issues contained in this accord will be settled according to the accord or within the framework of the accord, and that once constitutional legislation is passed that flows from this accord, it will not be the purpose of the government to entertain further constitutional change to the constitution which requires unanimity or seven out of ten provinces for a period of five years from that time.

Senator Murray: For clarification, I think what the honourable senator is asking is that the federal government would undertake to veto any proposal for any proposed amendment of the constitution originating with the provinces during that period.

Senator Austin: No. I have no difficulty with the federal government carrying out studies, holding exchanges, doing analysis, but that it will not bring forward legislation for national debate for a period of five years.

I say to you, and I hope honourable senators will understand, that what will carry the approval of the constitutional accord in the province of British Columbia, and what will carry it in the province of Alberta, where I believe there is some difficulty obtaining approval, is the assurance that the agenda of this country will not be driven by constitutional questions for a period of time into the future.

Quite frankly, and I say this with caution but I believe out of necessity, there is a deep resentment in western Canada and in my province—I will speak for my province particularly—that the national agenda has been driven too much by constitutional issues and too much by the internal debates within the province of Quebec. I say that not with approval, but to state what I believe is a fact in the life of my province.

I believe the health of this country depends on turning to issues that most concern individual Canadians, their security, their potential for economic mobility upwards, the lives of their children, and the opportunities which this country can afford those children. I believe with all my heart that if this country will turn in that direction, then our future will be secured in a way that will be a security to this nation itself. Thank you, honourable senators.

Senator Murray: I take it my friend will let us know prior to October 26 whether the conditions he has posed for a "yes" vote have been met.

Senator Austin: I think it will be on the record, honourable senators, whether those conditions have been met. If you meet those conditions, something which will be easy to see, then I assure you my vote will be in the affirmative.

Senator Frith: This is, however, to be a secret ballot, I take it. You will not be asking all Canadians to tell you how they will vote, will you, Senator Murray?

Senator Murray: Just my colleagues in the Senate.

Hon. John Buchanan: Honourable senators, almost 14 years ago I attended my first federal-provincial conference as a participant, and at that time we discussed the Constitution of Canada. For over 12 years thereafter I attended, as a participant, every federal-provincial conference on either the economy or the Constitution. Most of them over that period of time were on the Constitution.

I was also a signatory to the 1982 accord which was mentioned this morning. Frankly, that was an imperfect document, leaving out, as it did, some 8 million Canadians from the Constitution of Canada.

I was also a signatory to the 1987 Meech Lake Accord, as well as to the completion of the accord in 1990. In my opinion that accord was an excellent document, although it was certainly not perfect. We also saw the failure of the Meech Lake Accord.

Over the last number of months I listened to what was going on with the premiers of Canada and the Prime Minister. Having sat as I did with every premier since 1977, as well as three prime ministers, I could not help but say to myself that it was déjà vu, in that much of what was being discussed had been discussed for many years. Those discussions culminated in 1990 with the unfortunate failure of the Meech Lake Accord.

We have before us now another document which, frankly, is not a perfect document. After all, in political life in dealing with the Constitution there is no possibility of getting what could be called a "perfect document".

The booklet which has been distributed to us states, "Our Future Together—An Agreement for Constitutional Renewal". That is exactly what it is. Canadians are rather tired of the Constitution debate. They have been listening to it for many years. It is time to get on with other things.

For that reason and many others I certainly will be voting "yes" on the referendum, as I will be voting in favour of the resolution before the Senate.

Therefore, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senate Buchanan, debate adjourned.

UNITED NATIONS

PEACEKEEPING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, September 9, 1992:

> That he will call the attention of the Senate to UN peacekeeping.

He said: Honourable senators, last week I attended the annual meeting of Liberal International in Mainz, Germany. The discussion ranged from free trade in a changing world to the evolving situations in Latin America, Africa, East and Central Europe.

On Saturday, with some 500 delegates from 35 countries, I had the privilege of chairing an in-depth discussion entitled, "United Nations Peacekeeping and War Prevention."

The principal panellists for the discussion were Paavo Vayrynen, Foreign Minister of Finland; Helmut Schafer, Minister of State for Foreign Affairs, Germany; and Brian Atwood, President of the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs in Washington.

I recognized that the request for me to serve as chairman of the debate was to many of the Europeans present only an instinctive gesture toward a citizen from a country with a well known tradition of peacekeeping. For me, personally, it was not only a honour but a deeply felt challenge.

As I prepared my notes for the occasion, it became a cause for deep reflection on the kind of country I know Canada to be. Those reflections were especially relevant as I consider the historic events of today.

Among other things, I asked myself why it was that Canada had developed a national facility for international peacekeeping — in fact, a pathfinder role. I did so with the very conscious memory of a remarkable Canadian who was the first mentor to some honourable senators still in this chamber, a man I had the honour to know personally, the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson.

Mr. Pearson carved out a multilateralist identity for Canada. As President of the United Nations, he made that body a principal pillar upon which Canada's foreign and defence policies were conceived. It was Mike Pearson who was the architect of the first United Nations peacekeeping mission to Suez in 1956 and who later was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize for his efforts.

Mr. Pearson, better than anyone I know, understood the accidents of geography and of history. Canada was thrust between the superpowers at the northern end of the world. This meant an important lesson, one common to all glacis states—that security had a broad and multi-faceted meaning. It meant that Canada was, as John Holmes once said, a country without a region. In fact, our region was the world. As a middle power, we would concentrate our effectiveness at the margins, as Mr. Pearson was fond of saying, for it was at the margins of the world where peace would be conceived.

If there are many roads to peace, our polar preoccupation ensured that we explore as many as our national capabilities would allow. Our polar preoccupation ensured that we would, indeed, be pathfinders in this area.

Many a fine Canadian soldier-diplomat explored those roads. Major-General Lewis Mackenzie returned recently from one of them, a horrifying road into a place called Sarajevo, a road that many of my congress colleagues in Germany last week had travelled themselves.

Lewis Mackenzie is a Nova Scotian by birth. To me, it is worth noting that part of his education was attained in my home area at Xavier College, now the University College of Cape Breton.

In a meeting I had with General Mackenzie shortly after his return, the world's best known peacekeeper noted that every country in trouble has taken down the Canadian telephone number and is saying, "Hey, we would like you to come and help out here, too."

And I remembered thinking at the time, well, when we pick up the phone, we had better have a good understanding of the implications.

I do not think I have to tell honourable senators about the broad meaning and the nature of threats to security in our decade. Third World poverty is a threat to security. We cannot hide, as global citizens, from the disease, misery and environmental refugees of the other side of the world.

Our traditional notions of the military threat are now surrounded by the new marauding forces of our time—the forces of hypernationalism, of hatred, of the proliferation of weapons. They are the apocalyptic destroyers of whole societies. They feed upon each other with a frightening congeniality.

We presently watch the destruction of Somalia. We watch as former Yugoslavia collapses with a terrible ferocity. We want to pretend that this is our brother's problem. But the phone is ringing. Canada has been her brother's peacekeeper many times in the past. Our telephone number is well known. Many will say to us, as General Mackenzie pointed out, "Hey, we would like you to come here and help out". And there will be desperation in the tone of that call.

And when we answer the phone, we had better understand the implications. The international community now hovers on the realization that circumstances may entail the use of force to save lives. Canadians may be asked to assist in the rebuilding of whole societies where even essential civil infrastructures have ceased to exist.

While in Germany I had a strong sense of what that kind of building would entail. Perhaps the fact that the congress was held in Mainz—a city nearly entirely rebuilt after allied bombings in World War II—contributed to my appreciation of the enormity of the task.

I do not presume to tell honourable senators what they already know—that devastation on the other side of the world means that we can expect many more of our brothers to ask us to be their peacemakers.

When, therefore, as Canadians, we pick up the phone, we must be prepared to anticipate the full significance of the request, because peacemaking may be an even more formidable task in the future. It may include the rebuilding of stable communities. It may include the negotiation of assurances that minority groups will not be destroyed. It may, among many other tasks, include assistance for refugee protection and famine relief.

Evidently, we need to think about the implications before we even answer the phone. We have to, as Canadians, ask ourselves a lot of important questions.

We know the burdens on our soldier-diplomats will be even more formidable in the future. Are we ready to commit the resources to sustain new roles of peacemaking? Are we prepared to train them to cope with the prerequisite demands that a broad-based definition of security entails? Do we, as Canadians, have a sufficient understanding of the relationship between security and military capability? Do we believe, honourable senators, that Canada could play an important role, a crucial role, as a model and an educator for other national forces? Do we, as a nation, have the will to be our brother's peacemaker?

We must understand that the implications are different now. The phone is ringing. Our brother wants us to engage in assisting him to build a lasting infrastructure for peace. So what do we tell him?

I believe Canadians will answer that call and we will say "yes". Our history dictates the response.

When World War II left much of the world in ashes, we dedicated ourselves to reconstruction. We were asked to help build an infrastructure for peace. We did it then and hopefully we will resurrect that spirit and we will do it again.

Canada is a nation built on ethnic and cultural compromises. It is a microcosm of the international community.

We know that international unity is a process and that we must work hard to keep that process on track. Peace is also a process. And we must, as Canadians, keep that process on track. That is why I believe, honourable senators, that, when our brother again calls and asks, "Hey, can you help out?", we will answer that call and we will say,"Yes"—"yes" with our hearts, "yes" with our minds; because that indeed is the Canadian way.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, September 14, 1992, at 8 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, September 14, 1992

The Senate met at 8 p.m., Senator Gerald Ottenheimer, Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

Prayers.

SENATOR'S STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators will be pleased to hear that the election clock is still ticking. There are 67 more days for democracy, but 453 days for those cowardly and contemptuous of democracy.

TRIBUTES

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, earlier today we lost a great Canadian. Though that is a term frequently used, I use it without reservation because when Paul Martin died this morning, he left behind a bright trail of accomplishments and achievements.

At a dinner in 1984 to establish the Paul Martin Chair, an endowed professorship at the University of Windsor, former U.S. ambassador G. Mennen Williams said: "To try and pay tribute to Paul Martin is like trying to describe the Crown jewels—there are so many different facets to his career." In reviewing all of the activities in which he was involved, the accomplishments he made in his 89 years, I, too, found it difficult to determine what to say and what to emphasize.

Paul Martin's education was most liberal. He was educated at the University of Toronto, Osgoode Hall Law School, Harvard Law School, Trinity College at Cambridge and the Geneva School of International Studies. He was awarded honourary degrees from a number of universities including Michigan, Dalhousie, Toronto, Laval and Queen's.

The list of awards Mr. Martin received is far too long to list completely. However, he was awarded the Sir Alfred Zimmern Scholarship in 1930, named an honourary life member of the Royal Canadian Legion in 1936, and awarded the Christian Culture Award in 1956.

Paul Martin began his career in the House of Commons when he was elected in the general election of 1935. He was re-elected to the House of Commons in the next nine elections and served as the member of Parliament for Essex East for 33 years until 1968. On April 20 of that year, he was summoned to the Senate and appointed Leader of the Government, a position which he held until his retirement in 1974.

In Parliament, he held many positions of great importance. He first became a member of the Privy Council in 1945 when appointed Secretary of State. One of the first acts he was instrumental in passing was the first Citizenship Act which declared Canadians to be Canadian citizens, and no longer British subjects.

From 1946 to 1957, he was Minister of National Health and Welfare. It was his work during this period that prompted Mitchell Sharp, his successor at External Affairs, to say this morning that Paul Martin was the father of our social security system. It was Paul Martin who was largely responsible for many of the social programs we value today, such as universal family allowances and the federal old age security program. Though not the responsible minister for medicare, we are told that his ceaseless advocacy in cabinet for the program was crucial to its introduction in the early 1960s.

In 1963, he was appointed Secretary of State for External Affairs. In this capacity, he headed many delegations to NATO and the United Nations and was involved with the Auto Pact negotiations and the establishment of U.N. peacekeeping forces in Cyprus.

Of the 33 years served in the House of Commons, Mr. Martin served 24 years in the cabinets of Mackenzie King, Louis St. Laurent, Lester Pearson and Pierre Trudeau. These were then followed by 6 more years in the Senate as Government Leader.

In his first speech in this Chamber, the honourable senator said:

> I came here to continue, in co-operation with senators on all sides, to work for the national good. My aim—and this I should state at the beginning—is to contribute as best I can to the activity and the strength of this chamber, which I recognize, as well as the Government of Canada.

He went on to discuss the importance of the Senate and of preserving the Senate. He did not believe that we had to wait for Senate reform to improve the Senate, but that it could be done through hard work.

The last time he spoke in the Senate, which was on his retirement on October 30, 1974, Mr. Martin talked about his faith in our Canadian parliamentary system:

> My wish is to speak in favour of our Canadian parliamentary system. We must not lose faith in that system. Let us defend it, against those who feel it is obsolete. We must of course define it and find new ways to improve it, but the principle is good.

When he left the Senate in 1974, he did so in order to become Canada's High Commissioner to London.

Besides his parliamentary responsibilities, Mr. Martin was active in a number of other activities. He was an official delegate to the League of Nations in 1938 and a member of the Canadian delegation to the United Nations General Assembly in 1946 and 1949. He was instrumental in ending a nine-year deadlock for the admission of 16 new members to the United Nations.

In 1979, he established the Canadian Institute for Advanced Legal Studies at Cambridge University. The purpose of the institute was for the further education of judges, professors and lawyers.

He won, in August, of 1982 the Canadian Award by the John G. Diefenbaker Memorial Foundation. A spokesman for the foundation said that Mr. Martin exemplified the ideals of his adversary, John Diefenbaker, involving freedom of the individual and free enterprise.

Mr. Martin's autobiography has been published in two volumes. The first volume is called A Very Public Life—and many of us here shared in a reception for him when that book was launched; the second volume is called So Many Worlds. He completed the second volume at the age of 82.

He was named Honourary Chairman of the 1987 Ontario March of Dimes campaign. His personal bout with polio as a child had inspired him to work at this task with a great amount of vigour.

On July 1, earlier this summer, Paul Martin was elevated to the title of the Right Honourable Paul Martin. That is the highest title that can be given to a holder of public office in Canada.

In a Toronto Star article he wrote on May 22, 1984, discussing the Liberal leadership convention, Mr. Martin quoted Sir Wilfrid Laurier, his personal hero:

> I am a Liberal. I am one of those who believe that in all human affairs there are abuses to reform, new horizons to discover, and new forces to develop.

Paul Martin worked relentlessly to reform the abuses he saw, discover those new horizons, and to develop those new forces. He will long be remembered in Canadian history as a great man, and his mark on our society will continue to shape our futures.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the great Canadian political figures of an earlier generation are fast disappearing from our midst. These are people who began their political careers at about the onset of the Second World War. They were in Parliament during those tumultuous and traumatic war years. They held office and guided Canada's destiny through the epochal social and economic changes of the post-war period. In the 1960s and 1970s they were still at the forefront of national affairs, active in deliberations on the Constitution, language policy, national unity, foreign affairs.

• (2010)

Last week we paid tribute to the late Honourable George McIlraith. This morning came word of the passing at the age of 89 of Canada's senior Privy Councillor, Paul Martin, who, as the Leader of the Opposition just mentioned, was very appropriately raised to the rank of Right Honourable on July 1, 1992, the one-hundred-and-twenty-fifth anniversary of our Confederation.

Paul Martin's parliamentary career began in 1935 with his election to the House of Commons and ended in 1975 with his departure from the Senate to take up new responsibilities as Canada's High Commissioner to the United Kingdom. Over those 40 years Paul Martin became a Canadian political legend for his electoral successes, his political and parliamentary skills and the strong leadership he gave to two of the most senior portfolios of government, National Health and Welfare and External Affairs.

His political personality was so prominent that journalists and others usually overlooked, or were unaware of, his brilliant academic background and his great intellectual gifts. In his remarks, the Leader of the Opposition referred to the academic career of the late Senator Martin. Those who knew him well and were in a position to judge these matters always described Paul Martin as a person of great erudition and scholarship.

Earlier today, I read his maiden speech in the House of Commons delivered on June 18, 1936 at the age of 33. This was during the Throne Speech Debate in the first session of that Parliament. The speech was almost entirely devoted to foreign affairs. The M.P. who had immediately preceded him in the debate was the eminent J. S. Woodsworth. Mr. Martin proceeded to take issue with something that Mr. Woodsworth had said, and he stood his ground even when Mr. Woodsworth rose to protest the interpretation that had been made of the remarks.

Paul Martin then went on to suggest to Prime Minister Mackenzie King, who was also in the house that night, that he ought to reorganize the Department of External Affairs into various geographical sections. He then continued to deliver a marvellously cogent speech on the League of Nations, its history, Canada's role in it, the use of economic sanctions and military force and the implementation of various treaties to which Canada had been a party. In passing, he took exception to a speech that had been delivered in Hamilton sometime previously by the former Prime Minister, R. B. Bennett, then the Leader of the Opposition, and then he concluded by making four constructive suggestions to the government, including Canadian membership in the Pan American Union, which I think was the predecessor of the Organization of American States.

This was a cause that Paul Martin was still advocating 40 years later. He hoped, he said at that time, that his speech would not be considered presumptuous. Whatever his elders may have thought of that, the speech reads like a tour de force, even today. His first speech in the Senate on September 18, 1968 and his farewell speech to Parliament on October 30, 1974 are, both of them, well worth reading.

His final speech especially was an eloquent tribute to the parliamentary institutions which had been his home for 40 years.

[Translation]

The honourable Paul Martin personified the spirit of bilingualism and biculturalism upon which our Confederation was founded.

Throughout his public life he showed untiring devotion to Canadian unity.

By birth a Franco-Ontarian, he was always very aware of the aspirations of Quebec and concerned about French-speaking communities in the other provinces.

In 1971, he was with Prime Minister Trudeau at the Victoria Constitutional Conference. Near the end of his life, Mr. Martin had the pleasure of seeing his son, Paul Martin junior, elected to the House of Commons as member of Parliament for a Quebec riding, and to witness the remarkable progress of his son in parliamentary and public life.

We are pleased that his son is keeping up the excellent tradition of public service which his name will always symbolize for us.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to join in the comments made by my colleagues Senators Frith and Murray about our old friend Paul Martin.

Anyone who has done anything in politics, certainly on the side of the Liberals, but even in the other political parties, could not help but come into contact with Paul Martin eventually.

For myself, I have been active in the Liberal Party for many years in my province, and we could always count on Paul Martin if we needed a speaker or someone to take part in our campaigns. He was always there to help us.

However, it was in this place that I really came to know Paul Martin, as, a short time after my appointment here, when he was Leader of the government in the Senate, I was myself appointed party whip.

At the time, senator Martin did just about everything! He was Leader of the government in the Senate, Deputy Leader of the government in the Senate, and even whip on occasion.

We worked very closely together for some time. That's when I came to appreciate Paul Martin fully for what he was, a dynamic man, a man of ideas, a man for whom Canada was everything. He was a real patriot, always a Canadian first. Today, we have lost in Paul Martin one of the great architects of our society, of our generous society, of our society which feels a duty towards the poor, the sick and the disadvantaged. It is thanks to men like Paul Martin that we were be able to build our Canadian society.

I therefore wish to express my sincere sympathy to Mrs. Martin and to their son Paul. Of course, they have lost someone much closer to them than we have, but we have all lost a friend and a great Canadian.

[English]

Hon. John Buchanan: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words about the late Right Honourable Paul Martin. I have known Mr. Martin personally for the past 14 years. I believe you will find it interesting to learn how I came to meet him and to know him.

• (1520)

In 1978, I was invited to the Press Club Dinner here in Ottawa with a friend of mine from Cape Breton who had done very well in the business of journalism here in Ottawa and on the hill, Stuart MacLeod. I was sitting next to Mr. Martin at that dinner, having been introduced to him just before the dinner. He told me that in 1971 he was in Halifax, staying at the Nova Scotian Hotel during the Tory leadership campaign, and had watched it on television. He said, "I picked you as the winner."

I said to myself at the time, "It is safe enough for him to say that to me now," because I had won, but that was seven years after the convention. I thanked him very much and said, "Why did you think I'd win?" "Well," he said, "I will tell you. When I entered politics in the 1930s, there was a gentleman came to see me. I had known him before, and he was the secretary of the YMCA. They were planning a dinner for the Windsor-Sarnia area. He, as the secretary of the rather new YMCAs in the area, wanted me to be the guest speaker at a fund-raising dinner. At first I declined, but he had rather persuasive powers, and finally I said, 'Well, maybe I will do it, but I will have to have some time to think about it.'"

"The man said, 'You don't have much time because the dinner is in two weeks. I have to give notice that you are the speaker. Look, I will make a deal with you: If you will be the guest speaker at the YMCA dinner, then I will work for you in the upcoming election.' This was in 1935."

Paul Martin looked at me, and he said, "You know, he was such a superb organizer that I accepted that offer. I said, 'Fine, I will speak at your dinner if you will be one of my chief organizers in the upcoming election.' He was, and I was elected, and he worked for me in two more elections after that. His name was Buchanan, and that is why I thought you'd win." I said, "What was his first name?" Mr. Martin said, "Angus." I said, "That was my Uncle Angus who was the secretary of the YMCA."

That was my first meeting with Paul Martin. From then on, whenever I was in Ottawa, I would call Mr. Martin.

In 1982, I believe it was, when I was in London, he attended a dinner for my wife and me when he was the High Commissioner. During the dinner, he told everyone assembled the story about Angus Buchanan having been his top organizer in his first two elections. Then he quickly turned and he looked at me and said, "The one question I want to ask is, What happened to you, young Buchanan? Your uncle and I understand your father were strong Liberals."

Well, I gave him an answer that I will not repeat here because we are a nonpolitical body. I was awfully happy to be there for two reasons: First, to be at the dinner and, second, to hear that great gentlemen, the Honourable Paul Martin, call me "Young Buchanan".

I saw Mr. Martin not too many months ago at Montreal airport. He had a tremendous memory. I went over as he was being wheeled into the Air Canada lounge. I said hello to him and started to tell him who I was. He said, "Oh, no, I remember. You are Angus's nephew." He turned and he told the people with him the little story about Angus Buchanan. I was waiting for him again to say, "What happened to you, young Buchanan?" but I guess I looked older to him then so he did not say it.

You could call Mr. Martin one of God's good gentlemen. To me, he was always a gentleman.

● (2030)

Mr. Martin was many things: statesman, politician, parliamentarian, and Canadian. He will be long remembered by the people of this country.

On a personal note, I wish to extend my sympathy and that of my family to his family. He will be sorely missed.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, speaking of winners and losers I first met Paul Martin in 1958. There was a model Parliament at St. F. X. University. There were a lot of young people who later became political luminaries who were participating. I think of Paul Creaghan, who is now a Supreme Court Justice in New Brunswick and who had been a cabinet minister in the Conservative government of New Brunswick. Gerald Doucet was the Minister of Education in Nova Scotia. I am sure Senator Murray, although he had graduated two years earlier, was lurking somewhere in the background, as I am sure Senator MacEachen was.

Some special advisors had been imported for the occasion, including Gordon Churchill, for the Conservative Party on the campus, Doug Fisher for the then CCF, and Paul Martin for the Liberals. The federal election was imminent. Paul Martin thought I should run, and he told me so. He told me what a great life it was and what a wonderful profession politics was. That night in 1958 I announced my candidacy. As the record will show, I was defeated. The present Prime Minister of Canada was the Conservative campaign manager on the campus and Rick Cashin of Newfoundland, the President of the Newfoundland Fishermens' Union, was the Liberal campaign manager. We won the campus, but not much else. As a matter of fact, Senator Finlay MacDonald was president of the Conservative Association in Nova Scotia at the time.

[Senator Buchanan.]

Some 14 years later I was sworn into this chamber with the late George McIlraith, the late Henry Hicks and the late Margaret Norrie. Upon my arrival Senator Martin said, "Congratulations, you finally arrived." I am not sure that he would share those sentiments today with respect to his enthusiasm or optimism concerning my future in this chamber.

While he was there we wanted to make use of his presence. It was suggested by the local party brass that we should book some time on radio station CJFX. When we sat him in front of the microphone he said, "What would you like me to do, 30 seconds, 60 seconds, two minutes, five minutes, 10 minutes or 15?" I said, "Well, let's shoot the bundle and go for 15." He replied, "That means I will speak for 13 minutes and I will give you a minute at the beginning to tell them who I am and a minute at the end to tell them who I was." In his own eloquent, convincing way, Paul Martin went on for 13 minutes, finished exactly on the second, and the rest is history.

For many years, the Senate itself used to sit on Tuesday nights. On many occasions, he invited me, as I am sure he did others, to go for a ride when the Senate adjourned, when he began to unwind. Richard Greene will remember that well. He would unwind behind the wheel of his Chrysler, which I am sure came from Windsor. Very few people would know that he smoked a cigar on those occasions. He always thought he could hoodwink me into thinking that I was there so that he could enjoy the pleasure of my company. However, halfway up the Parkway he would say, "What does Allan say?" Allan MacEachen was the Leader of the Government, President of the Privy Council in the House of Commons, and Paul was the leader here. Paul really thought I knew more than I did when it came to MacEachen's tactics in the House of Commons.

Honourable senators, Paul Martin was probably the most consummate politician in the world. He was the voice of the old, the voice of the young, and the voice of the young at heart. He was the passionate advocate of the average Canadian.

I know, as Senator Buchanan mentioned earlier in regard to his many visits to London and to Paul Martin when he was the High Commissioner, how much he was respected abroad. He was admired and respected in his own country. Indeed, he was loved both at home and abroad. His record speaks for itself. Canadians shall always be in his debt.

To his family, I extend an expression of the deepest sympathy.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, I am pleased that Senator Buchanan made a reference to Paul Martin and his presence at a Press Gallery dinner. It would be wrong to have an evening of tribute to the right honourable gentleman without mentioning his close relationship with the press.

The honourable senator mentioned a gallery dinner. As many are aware, there is an anthem that is sometimes sung in the alcoholic aftermath of Press Gallery dinners. It is sung with great gusto to the tune of Land of Hope and Glory. The words go like this, "George Drew knew my father, father knew George Drew!"

You would never have heard that song at our house when I was growing up in Chatham, Ontario in the 1930s and 1940s. But you could hear my sister and my brothers boast, "Paul Martin knows my father," and, better still, when the time came, "Martin's the man, and we know him."

As my father explained it, Kent County had foolishly elected a Tory and it had been necessary for Paul, like a great horned owl, to spread his wings from his nest in Windsor to cross the 52-mile line to Chatham and watch over us for Mr. King.

I was the first of my clan to go into the newspaper business, but my brother Bill followed. The link—press and politics—with Paul Martin was forged for life, particularly for my brother Bill, who was making his start at the Windsor Star.

I was still at the Chatham Daily News when Paul marked one of those great occasions that Senator Frith mentioned that punctuated his early career in politics. He was Secretary of State in the St. Laurent government and as such he devised and carried the legislation that, as Senator Frith said, gave the most of us who dwelled in this land Canadian citizenship. Coming as it did two years after the end of the Second World War, it carried great symbolic weight.

Let me tell you, it was a bigger story in the Chatham Daily News than it was in George Macullagh's Globe and Mail.

On the stroke of midnight, in 1947, we all became Canadians. At the newspaper, we put a watch on both hospitals to greet the first child born a Canadian citizen in our circulation area. Lordy be! It was a little girl. And her father's name was Martin. I have forgotten now which one of the Chatham Daily News team agreed with the baby's mother that the child should be called Pauline and that Paul Martin should come from Windsor to the little village of Paincourt to be Pauline's godfather. I did not have to twist his arm.

Two Sundays on, there were flowers and half the Catholic hierarchy of Kent County at the Paincourt baptismal font, but by early morning, southwestern Ontario was sheathed in ice. Martin's car, Chatham bound, was ditched by No. 2 highway near Tilbury. Our photographer and I caught up with him in the old Fargo pickup truck that we had borrowed from the Chatham Daily News circulation department, and we slithered through to Paincourt.

Paul held the baby for endless picture opportunities. He spoke briefly in English and at length in soaring French. We slithered back to Chatham where the man managed to tour both hospitals before heading out to Windsor and a previous engagement in his own constituency.

I learned from Paul Martin what a grinding job of work politics can be. I learned a lot about social welfare and about the United Nations and eventually about England. Convoluted prose and all, I admired the man and what he did with his great career.

I was also grateful—as so many of his followers were grateful—for his uncommon notice of the mini-milestones in our careers. A note, a call, a handshake, a shared confidence, even after you had revealed your political colour and it was not Grit red.

That did not matter. After all, Paul Martin knew your father.

The Hon. Raymond J. Perrault:: The eloquence of the tributes to Paul Martin, honourable senators, is certainly indicative of the fond memories we hold of him.

I was at a Liberal Party seminar on the weekend, and there were a number of prospective candidates discussing canvassing techniques—yes, we're already preparing them, Mr. Leader! One very timorous chap rose and said, "When I get on that doorstep, I often have difficulty answering the questions they direct to me. Just how do you handle a controversial question?" I said I can only quote a story about Paul Martin. One day when he was asked his views concerning one very vexatious issue, he is said to have replied, "Some of my friends are for this issue and some of my friends oppose this issue. And may I say, without equivocation, I am for my friends. Next question."

I knew Paul Martin starting when I was a young Liberal, and I succeeded Paul Martin as Leader of the Government in the Senate. He was truly a great man. I think probably he was one of Bell Telephone's greatest customers. He would call people at all hours of the night and day. One chap told me that if Paul Martin had learned something about Pacific time, he might have become leader of the Liberal Party. He said that when Paul was seeking the leadership, he would phone British Columbia at five o'clock in the morning and press his cause—too early for most British Columbians!

I remember his final hours as Leader of the Government in this place. He telephoned me and said, "Would you please come down to my office? This has to be the most lonely time of my whole career. I don't know whether I can face it. I will only be here for another two hours."

I wish that I had taken along a tape machine to record his reminiscences and his recollections of his life as a person active in government and in opposition. The thing that struck me at the time, and as we all know, was that he was a consummate professional politician, in the best sense of the word. Yes, and he had great respect for his opponents and a knowledge of how to run successful political campaigns. But beyond that he had those marvellous qualities referred to by previous speakers—a genuine concern for the human condition and a genuine desire to help those less fortunate.

He was an extremely effective player on the international stage, as able a Canadian as we have ever had on that scene. When he went to Great Britain as our High Commissioner, he was highly effective in that post.

Yes, I remember those last two hours of his active political career. Finally he said, "It is eight o'clock. I think it is time to go. Would you walk to the gate?" I said I would be pleased to.

We walked to the gate outside Parliament, and, looking at the lights in the Centre Block, he said, "Well, that's it. It's tough to leave." Those were his final words as he went on to his new responsibilities.

Paul Martin was identified with social reform very early in his career, even in his early twenties. He had a great, well-justified, reputation in international affairs. He fought many effective battles as High Commissioner. It was anything but an honourary post as far as he was concerned. You may recall his fight to achieve fair Canadian landing rights at London Heathrow. One of his great victories in negotiations with the British government.

Long after he had left Parliament and had finished his post in London, he would telephone with advice and ideas and suggestions for the party and his friends in Parliament. I suspect he contacted people in other parties as well, he was so interested in the entire process.

Paul Martin will certainly be missed by all of us. We have only good memories of him. I offer my condolences to the members of his family. I join with all of the other well-deserved tributes paid to him this evening.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantés: Honourable senators, everyone has said good things about Paul Martin, and I believe all of them, for I loved the man. Some members opposite may disagree when I describe the following as one of the very good things he did. He gave me landed immigrant status six hours after I asked for it in Washington. I will always be thankful to him for letting me in.

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall: Honourable colleagues, in the Parliamentary restaurant, down one aisle, is a fairly sacred place. It is the last alcove in the Parliamentary precincts of our restaurant. In that alcove in that restaurant, through all the years that I have been here, and as I understand it for much longer than that, there has been a table to which members of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada have been able to go and enjoy their dinner with their colleagues in privacy. Over the years, to the best of my knowledge, our alcove has been the only alcove that welcomed and entertained with delight members of the Liberal Party of Canada.

As a young man I enjoyed dinner at the table in that alcove with my colleagues, listening and learning, and frequently to that table would come the right honourable gentleman of which we speak. He did not need an invitation. He would invariably sit at the head of the table where he was in full view of all those who might be dining in our restaurant. He would order, with deliberateness, his usual meal.

While at the dinner table, Mr. Martin would enter into the conversation, sometimes describing it, sometimes outlining it for amateurs, certainly always dominating it. He was, as has been said here this evening, always a gentleman, always a partisan, never engendering ill will, always welcomed, always thanked for coming, never embarrassed when people got up and left, having finished their dinner at our common table.

[Senator Perrault.]

The Right Honourable Lester Pearson used to join us from time to time, as did other very distinguished gentlemen with whom I have sat and served in the House of Commons. The Right Honourable Paul Martin was welcome at that table. He was a distinguished visitor. His views were always welcome. I came to know him quite well in the mid 1950s. It was that aspect of his character and countenance, his capacity to come at will to our common table and know that he was accepted, that I will always remember.

I join with others in paying tribute to his family, particularly to his son Paul.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZE TO PERMIT ELECTRONIC MEDIA COVERAGE

Hon. R. James Balfour, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(f), moved:

> That the Subcommittee on Security and National Defence of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs be empowered to permit coverage by the electronic media of its public proceedings with the least possible disruption of its hearings.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 75 citizens of the province of Ontario who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions are mainly from Toronto, Sudbury, Guelph and Peterborough.

I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 521 citizens of British Columbia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions are mainly from Vancouver, Richmond and Victoria.

Finally, I have one last petition from Nanaimo, in British Columbia, and Oakville, in Ontario, which reads as follows:

[English]

The GST is the first federal tax to ever apply to books, magazines and newspapers in Canada. Over the past year, the GST on reading materials has reduced reading in Canada and harmed our publishers, book stores, libraries, students and writers.

The Prime Minister promised in October, 1990, to review the effects of the GST on reading material after a year, and to examine its impact. It is time for that review. It is time to restore the traditional zero tax rate to reading in Canada.

[Translation]

By the way, it will soon be two years since the Prime Minister made this promise on the basis of which Senator Solange Chaput-Rolland voted against the Liberal amendment to exempt books from the GST in spite of all the qualms she had about it. On October 30, 1990, Senator Chaput-Rolland formally undertook to remind her Prime Minister of his promise, and I quote:

I swear before my fellow Senators . . .

So, along with the above-mentioned petitioners, her fellow Senators are still waiting.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

REFERENDUM QUESTION—MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN MESSAGE FROM COMMONS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton:

That, pursuant to the Act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, the Senate concurs with the House of Commons in approving the following text of a referendum question:

Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?

yes no

and,

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, I rise today to participate in the debate on the referendum question. At the outset, I want to say that I am encouraged to see that the constitutional file may be coming to an end. The judgment of people will be rendered on October the 26 in a national referendum and shortly thereafter in an election.

The Charlottetown accord of August the 28, which we have in front of us today, appears to meet many tests that satisfy traditional Liberal principles. All political parties have been asked to play a constructive role. The views of Canadians have been considered through the work of parliamentary committees and constitutional conferences. Most important, Canadians will have the opportunity to vote in a referendum.

Our leader, Jean Chrétien, has for some time now demanded that there should be a referendum so that all Canadians over the age of 18 can have their say. I am pleased to see that the government finally had the courage to follow the Liberal advice.

The Liberal party has also insisted that any agreement must reflect the commitment of Canadians and their governments to linguistic duality. It must acknowledge that the partnership between French and English exists across the country. French must not be restricted to Quebec, and English must not be restricted to the rest of Canada.

We have also called for the recognition of the inherent right of the Aboriginal peoples to self-government. Such a recognition will make Canada a nation of tolerance and respect. It will be a new beginning for Aboriginal people and will lead to the and to the cycle of poverty and dependency.

Honourable senators, this agreement is a major step in the right direction—but this agreement is not perfect. It is a compromise, and a compromise with many problems.

I have several specific problems with this accord that I want to put before you today.

First, under this deal the individual and minority rights of the Charter will be undermined by Quebec's distinct society clause. The Charter was put there by my party to protect individuals and minorities from the tyranny of the majority. Quebec's French-speaking majority should never be permitted to suppress the rights of the English-speaking minority, any more than Canada's English-speaking majority should be permitted to suppress the rights of its French-speaking minority.

Second, in my view, culture as described in the agreement gives the provinces powers that no federal government in our country has ever had. For the record, "a province should have responsibility for cultural matters within their province". But the federal government should have responsibility for cultural matters that transcend provincial boundaries.

I would remind honourable senators that the reason there is a Canada clause in this agreement as opposed to simply the distinct society clause is that Canadians demanded that the federal government have a role in protecting minority rights throughout Canada—and in particular within Quebec, if they are to be given added powers through a distinct society clause.

It is no mere accident that the words "The role of the Federal Parliament and the provincial legislatures to preserve the fundamental characteristics of Canada . . . is affirmed" were dropped after the failure of the Meech Lake Accord. Canadians spoke out and said in no uncertain terms that the federal Parliament should not be restricted to preserving the status quo. It, like the Quebec government, should have the opportunity to actively promote culture. Again, I quote from the accord.

> The Government of Canada commits to negotiate cultural agreements with provinces in provision of their lead responsibility for cultural matters within the province and to ensure that the federal government and the province work in harmony.

Honourable senators, I have yet to see the parochial interest of any provincial government in this country be in harmony. In the last eight years alone, we have seen a constant struggle for provincial powers, and this agreement talks of harmony?

If that was not enough, the Prime Minister has said that the wording "The federal government should retain responsibility for national cultural institutions, including grants and contributions delivered by these institutions" has subsequently been changed after Charlottetown. It will now require those national institutions to get provincial approval to make grants to organizations, leaving them only the power to grant to individuals. This means that the Quebec government will be able to stop any federal funds from being used to support English theatre—or for any cultural minority for that matter. This also means that the Alberta government can stop the federal government from supporting French culture within Alberta. So who punishes their minority first in the name of the majority, and who simply punishes their minority in retaliation?

[Senator Wood.]

There is still another major issue affecting the very essence of Canada, personally disconcerting to me as co-chairman of the Official Languages Committee, and that is a sentence which pertains to forestry, mining, tourism, housing and recreation. One of the terms of the agreement would state that, ". . . consideration of service to the public in both official languages should be considered a possible part of such an agreement."

Honourable senators, does this mean we are going to renege on the Official Languages Act? The words "should" and "possible" render the whole spirit of the agreement suspect, and I really need clarification on this item.

There is another issue here. Today, this chamber has been asked to approve a question for the Canadian people to see if they will agree to permit the Constitution of Canada to be changed, based on the August 28 agreement, even though there have already been subsequent changes. Does this mean that, if they vote "yes" in the referendum, this latest change will be overturned, or does the fact that this referendum is not binding mean that the whole agreement can be renegotiated? I do not know the answer.

Canada is a multicultural society, not just a bicultural society. The federal government must never be limited in its role of protecting minorities.

My third criticism is that this deal has given us a half-elected, half-effective Senate. What happens when this is combined with an even larger House of Commons?

Let me quote the text of the August 28 agreement:

> The Constitution should be amended to provide that senators are elected, either at large by the population of the provinces and territories of Canada or directly by the members of their provincial or territorial legislative assemblies.

Honourable senators, Britain tried to put the same kind of clause into the agreement covering the European Community, but it was rejected in favour of direct election, and for good reason.

First of all, whenever a separatist provincial government is in power in Quebec—and several of my colleagues opposite will recall that the separatists came to power not because voters wanted separation, but because voters wanted change—whenever separatists control the government, what can we look forward to in this chamber? We can look forward to a separatist sitting here in my seat. Do you think for a moment that even one such separatist senator would represent the English and the minorities of Quebec? Minorities would no longer have their rights safeguarded by the Charter of Rights.

The Liberal party has said many times that all senators in Canada and in all provinces and territories must be elected. All people under the law of the land must be equal. Honourable senators, the people in Quebec must have the right to vote.

Unfortunately, honourable senators, the present government has once again tried to make an unholy alliance between the Quebec separatists and the western libertarians, thus forcing the country to the brink so that Liberals who love this country will have no choice but to go along for the ride.

Today I sit in this chamber as an ordinary Canadian citizen, fluent in three languages. In future, I will be required to select one of my languages so that the Speaker can decide if I have two votes or one on matters relating to culture and language. Furthermore, it is the same Speaker who will decide what legislation relates to language and culture.

May I, with great anguish, remind honourable senators of the incident where the Senate Speaker called the vote and locked the doors before Liberals were able to gain entrance. It would seem to me, therefore, more prudent to curtail the powers of the Speaker, especially in matters of language and culture, as we do not know who will be named Speaker under a partially-appointed, partially-elected regime for the Senate.

I know what it means to be asked to vote in a referendum. As a Quebecer, I lived with the referendum in 1980, which was a far more divisive debate. As part of the federalist forces I truly believed that we were near the brink. I believed that a "yes" vote on the referendum would herald the end of my country. With hindsight, it would not have happened. A "yes" vote in that referendum would not have been the end of Canada. It would have been the beginning of long negotiations; negotiations which quite likely would have resulted in an agreement similar to the one reached in Charlottetown. At the worst it would have been a practice run for a second referendum to be held on sovereignty.

Honourable senators, if we were not then at the brink then we are not at the brink now. A "no" vote is simply a vote against the deal. I have just given you several strong reasons as to why a "no" vote might be the preferred option. A "no" vote will not be the end of Quebec. Canadians, including my fellow Quebecers, see this government for what it is. They will not view this government's failure to create a strong agreement or to achieve a victory in the referendum as an indication that an agreement is not possible. I believe Canadians do not have high expectations of this government and will not be surprised by its failure.

Even if Canadians and Quebecers did have high expectations of this government, a "no" vote will simply mean a second referendum in Quebec—this time to be held on sovereignty, a question many federalists and separatists feel should be asked right now.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Excuse me, honourable senators, there is so much conversation going on in this house I can barely hear my colleague, who is just three seats away from me. Could we ask the Speaker to re-establish order, please?

Senator Wood: That brings me to the motion before us today which is on the question. We are not being asked to approve the final agreement. In fact, Canadians will not even be permitted to do that. We are being asked to approve the question which will be put before Canadians. The proposed question reads as follows:

> Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992? Yes or no?

Honourable senators why did the government pick the word "renewed" as opposed to "amended"? In a recent letter to the editor, Sydney Hicks, the cousin of a former colleague of ours, the late Senator Hicks, wrote:

> I do not believe the Prime Minister chose the word "renewed" simply to put a spin on the referendum question, I believe he chose it to weaken the question. The word "amended" is a strong word.

I agree with Sydney Hicks and I believe the clause concerning culture is evidence of this. The culture clause has, admittedly, been renegotiated since Charlottetown. If the question said "amended" and Canadians voted to "agree that the Constitution of Canada be amended on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992", then this revamped clause would not be allowed. The premiers and the Prime Minister could not continue to make changes to the agreement on whim. They would be honour bound to respect the text of their agreement and the wishes of the Canadian electorate. All that would be left to do would be for the Department of Justice to draft legal text which reflected the agreement, in the same way that the Department of Justice must respect a decision of Cabinet when preparing legal text for Parliament.

I am concerned about the agreement as it now stands. I am concerned about how much of this agreement will be renegotiated over the weeks and months ahead, and I am concerned about the ambiguity of the question. Because of that, I feel I must abstain pending some clarifications. I will then bide my time until the next general election so that we may see a new government in Ottawa lead by the Liberal Party—a Liberal Party which is committed to strengthening the half-elected, half-effective Senate through standing orders and parliamentary legislation; a Liberal Party that would have brought Canada proper constitutional change so that it can prosper into the twenty-first century; a Liberal Party that would have brought Canadians a fair referendum question.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when my honourable friend says that she will abstain, does that mean that she will abstain from voting on this question, or does she intend to abstain on October 26?

Senator Wood: Could you repeat the question?

Senator Murray: Does my honourable friend intend to vote in the referendum on October 26 and, if so, will she be voting yes or no?

Senator Hébert: You do not have to answer that question.

Senator Wood: No, and I know what he wants me to say. However, I want to wait until I hear more about what is happening. It was not easy for me to say today that I would abstain. In fact, I changed that sentence two or three times in the past four or five days, but the more I read about this question the more I just could not go without saying that I would abstain. So quite honestly, I will wait until later, before making a decision on that matter.

Senator Murray: That is fair enough, honourable senators. I will put my friend down as doubtful.

[Translation]

Hon. Claude Castonguay: Honourable senators, we are starting a referendum debate that will be extremely important to the future of our country. We will soon be asked to answer yes or no to a single question: Are you in favour of renewed federalism on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?

This evening, instead of discussing the various provisions of the agreement, I would rather discuss some of the implications of an affirmative or negative response.

To answer the question, our fellow citizens will, of course, want to examine the various provisions of the agreement reached by the first ministers and representatives of the Aboriginal peoples on August 28.

If they generally agree with what is being proposed and if they feel these proposals constitute a balanced response to the main concerns of Canadians in the various regions of this country, they will answer yes.

However, if they do not like or disagree with some of the provisions or deplore what they see as oversights or do not like the way a certain issue is dealt with, they are likely to answer in the negative. I am not saying this is not a responsible or intelligent approach, but I feel it is incomplete and may involve some very real risks.

First of all, we cannot isolate the present process from its context, and we cannot ignore the predictable consequences of a negative response.

The referendum on October 26 will be a unique event in our country's history. Considering the extremely elaborate consultation process and the negotiations conducted for weeks and months, I think this agreement represents what it was humanly possible to achieve at this time.

Basically, what we have here is an attempt to bring Quebec back into the Canadian Constitution, after the abortive attempts of 1982 and 1990. This agreement also attempts to restore the political balance between the various regions in this country by changing the composition of the House of Commons and the Senate. It is an attempt to clarify and restructure the roles of both levels of government.

[Senator Wood.]

I think the realistic approach taken to this problem helps to reconcile two almost contradictory concepts of the country. There are those who, for valid reasons, believe in the need for greater decentralization, while others, whose reasons are equally valid, believe in the need for a stronger and more proactive central government.

The proposal also contains a Canada clause, which expresses the values to which Canadians in all the provinces are committed and the principles on the basis of which the country should continue to develop in the future. There is also a clause that describes the fundamental characteristics of this country and its people.

The agreement also recognizes the right of Aboriginal peoples to self-government and establishes the foundations of a social and economic union involving all Canadians.

This is a very substantial agreement. Others would probably emphasize a different aspect or a particular issue that was not covered. I am sure we all have our own ideas on the subject.

Personally, there are some questions I would have liked to see dealt with differently. However, I don't think that is the important thing here. We should realize that this agreement is the product of reasonable compromise and, as I said earlier, constitutes what it was humanly possible to achieve at this stage in our history.

I think we should also recognize the fact that we cannot regulate everything in the Constitution, as some people seem to think. The constitution of a country should contain, as someone said earlier, an expression of values and certain basic principles. One can only say so much in a constitutional text, simply because the application of the principles and the fundamental givens contained in the Constitution must always be one step ahead of circumstances that change with the passage of time.

As we have seen in the past, many questions can be legislated. They can also be dealt with through administrative agreements with the provinces.

We must realize that constitutional reform is a very difficult exercise.

When dealing with matters of principle and symbols, the slightest deference or compromise is soon perceived as a sign of weakness. As we have seen in Quebec during the past few weeks, for some people compromise is practically synonymous with betrayal.

We must also recognize the fact that the very democratic process to which we are—fortunately—committed does not make things any easier.

We all know it is extremely difficult and sometimes impossible to negotiate in the public view. Although this particular process included a number of confidential or private sessions, it was for all practical purposes a public process, because every day we could follow the discussions almost exactly as they unfolded. What makes the situation even more difficult is that the media, which are always looking for newsworthy incidents, tend to report on the progress of negotiations as though this were a game with points to be won or lost. If someone agrees to change his position on a matter he is perceived as the loser, and the person who convinced him as the winner.

How a constitution should be interpreted is also important. I am not a constitutional expert, of course, which is why I prefer to quote those who are more knowledgeable.

Only last week, Philippe de Grandpré, who not long ago was still a judge on the Supreme Court, recalled that a constitution should be interpreted openly, constructively and affirmatively.

After all, we are talking about an agreement made by the citizens of a country to establish the kind of relationship they will have in the future, and such relationships must be as affirmative as possible. It is only reasonable that the Constitution should be considered from this perspective rather than one that is limited and reflects extreme distrust.

I was listening earlier to my colleague who spoke a few minutes ago and who asked a number of questions about aspects which, though important, are subordinate to the overall picture.

I hope that in the days and weeks to come she will consider as she said she would, this particular aspect of the Constitution. In other words, that we should take a positive approach to such documents.

Before saying no to this agreement, we should remember there are other matters to consider as well.

First of all, we live in a world of global markets, where it is becoming increasingly difficult to remain economically competitive. We live in a world where every field of activity is feeling the pressure of competition. There is no escape!

In this regard, it seems to me that we are especially vulnerable to our American neighbours. The penalties they have imposed on our exports, to judge by what happened later on, have most often been quite arbitrary. This is a constant reminder of our vulnerability faced with such an economically powerful neighbour, but we are also vulnerable to the outside world. We have had a striking example of this in recent months during the GATT negotiations, especially in the field of agriculture, and this is but one example of our vulnerability to the outside world.

In this context, it seems to me that, whatever our province of origin, whatever our past history in relation with constitutional agreements, we should all of us Canadians remain united.

We cannot afford to speak with separate voices and try to compete and keep up our position in a world where the blocks are becoming increasingly powerful and where economic interests are more and more demanding.

In this economic context, we cannot forget either that a great number of our fellow citizens are unemployed and that the future is especially bleak for our youth. I believe that we cannot afford to discuss the issue of constitutional renewal indefinitely. We shall have to meet enormous challenges in the near future. It is more than time for us to put all our energies in discussing these extremely important issues for our future and for the future of young Canadians.

We cannot afford to allow the present climate of uncertainty which now weighs down our economy to subsist. Many investment decisions have been deferred for months and even years. This climate does not affect only investors, but also the behaviour of our fellow citizens. It is now clear that economic recovery depends not only on the investment decisions of businessmen or on the decisions of our governments, but also on the attitudes of ordinary citizens and the climate among the general population.

Therefore, before rejecting this agreement, it seems to me that we must be aware of its context and not look in detail into only some of its aspects.

Before thinking seriously of rejecting this agreement, we must also consider some other negative effects which could only, in my opinion, result from this rejection. Abroad, the rejection of this agreement could be interpreted as a sign that Canada is no longer able to deal with its internal problems. I think this would be the worst thing that could happen to Canada's reputation and prestige at the international level. Fortunately, even if we are being watched closely and nervously, as we know, our reputation abroad is yet excellent. Before rejecting an agreement like this one, I believe we must consider this.

The rejection of the agreement could only have negative effects on the market. At this stage, and in the present context nobody can predict what the consequences could be. Everyday, we see what is happening in Europe, particularly with regards to the simple possibility of France saying no to the Maastricht treaty. All European countries will be affected.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: The time of Senator Castonguay is up. Will all senators, let the senator continue?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Senator Castonguay: We see that a "no" from France would virtually have a domino effect, not only on European countries, but even here in Canada. So, who can predict the consequences of a negative answer to the referendum of October 26? I for one am convinced that those who say that those consequences would be almost nil see what is going on everyday, right before our eyes.

If the rest of Canada, if a significant percentage of our fellow citizens in the other provinces were to give a negative response, for many Quebecers this would indicate that for whatever reasons, the rest of Canada is incapable of responding satisfactorily to the aspirations of Quebecers.

We must not forget that in 1982, when the Constitution was patriated and the Charter of Rights was entrenched, Quebec, for various reasons with which one may agree or disagree, was not a party to the 1982 agreement.

We also know what happened in 1990 and what Quebec's reaction was at the time. The memory is still vivid. There was a very strong reaction. There is no reason why a negative response on October 26 would not trigger a reaction that would be at least as strong if not worse. A rejection of the agreement would, I believe, create a major political crisis in this country. I am not trying to dramatize the issue. However, the fact remains that the three major federal parties, through their leader in the House of Commons, are now committed to supporting this agreement.

The ten first ministers of the provinces are also committed, and the aboriginal leadership has done likewise. We can hardly expect that after this broad support, a rejection of this agreement would merely involve a return to the status quo. It would be unrealistic to think so. Obviously, no political party and no citizen of this country would stand to win anything by rejecting the agreement. We would all lose.

But if we consider for a moment the implications of a positive response, it seems to me that some of these implications are important enough to make us forget about the few doubts we may entertain about any part of the agreement.

And if, during the course of the campaign, it becomes evident that Canadians from other provinces are ready to vote yes massively, that can only have a positive effect on the campaign in Quebec which, from what it looks like now, will be rather difficult. If Quebecers feel that the vast majority of Canadians support the proposals before us, I am convinced that it will have an extremely positive effect on them.

If the agreement is accepted, not only will it mean that Canada is able to settle its own problems, but it will show the world, at this particularly difficult time in history, how we can reconcile different views on what a country must be, how we can create harmony between people of various ethnic origins, people who came here at different times and helped build our nation.

It seems to me that such an example could be very useful as we see countries like Czechoslovakia breaking up, others like Yugoslavia sinking into an absolutely horrendous civil war, and a whole series of countries of the former Soviet Union desperately seeking to settle their inter-ethnic problems.

What would be fantastic on the Canadian scene, if we succeed, is that we will have used a largely democratic process. This would clearly be an extremely important lesson for these countries which, in some cases, although they advocate democracy, have not yet really experienced it. It would also have a definitely positive impact on our economy and I, for one, am convinced that the effects would not be long to be felt and that we could at last devote a lot more of our time and energies to solving the very real problems we are facing.

[Senator Castonguay.]

As I said earlier, the people who would be tempted, for various reasons, to say "no" to this agreement should remember that the answers they did not get this time around could most probably come in the shape of legislation, other arrangements or agreements. I think they should also remember that it is important to believe in our capacity as Canadians to solve our problems peacefully.

Despite some fights and quarrels we had through the history of our 125-year-old country, which are natural since we are human, I think we ought to look to the future with confidence and to answer positively to the call of our political leaders. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Would the honourable senator entertain a question?

Senator Castonguay: Yes.

Senator Molgat: You mentioned the risks and the effects of a negative answer. Could you tell us what effect a positive answer outside Quebec and a negative one in Quebec would have? In your opinion, what would happen then?

Senator Castonguay: This is an issue I would rather address from Quebec's point of view. Of course, if Quebecers were to vote against this agreement, I think—and I am not in the best position to know—that the rest of Canada would react very negatively because I believe that a sincere effort was made by all concerned in the agreement before us to reach compromises that seem, if not always fully satisfactory, at least reasonable.

So, if I am right, this negative reaction would prevent further negotiations as well as a simple return to status quo. I fail to see how a government could start such a process all over.

It seems to me that Canadians from other provinces who are not concerned only with the Quebec issue may also want to move on and make headway on other aspects of this agreement. They could not wait forever for Quebec's OK.

Without speculating about various more or less negative scenarios, I think we can at least draw the conclusion that a simple return to status quo would be impossible, that we would go through very hard times and that, for those who support Quebec's independence, it would be a major step in that direction and almost an irreversible one.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would like to congratulate Senator Castonguay and to praise him for not being a constitutional expert. Constitutional experts are lawyers and lawyers are trained to find the most minute flaw in any agreement and to keep hacking at it. We may have an exception here with Senator Beaudoin but other constitutional experts develop models, perfect visions of what a Constitution should be according to their constitutional studies. If an agreement, which cannot be anything but political, does not exactly reflect their ideas, they get mad and they criticize it.

However, as you already heard and I am sorry if you are tired of hearing it, perfection goes against the spirit of democracy. I hope that Senator Lynch-Staunton will forgive me for referring briefly to Greece and to Solon, the father of modern day democracy. The only difference between Solon's Constitution which included a House of Commons, a Senate made up of aging persons of distinction . . .

Senator Molgat: An elected Senate?

Senator Gigantès: The only difference with our current Canadian Parliament was that elections were held every 36 days. Since the electorate was always assembled at the same place every day, elections could be held very frequently. After he had written that constitution, Solon was asked whether he had written the best constitution possible. He said no, I wrote the best constitution acceptable to Athenians. He tells us in his poems which he wrote on this experience and which we can still read today that both sides hated him for that constitution. Yet, that model of government survived to this day.

Democracy is a system where compromise has to be made between perfect models. Those who sell gas would like to sell unlimited quantities. Environmentalists would like to ban gas altogether. We have to find a medium term between those two extremes and both sides resent that. Voters do not choose the political party that promises Utopia but the one with answers repulsive to the least number of people.

There is a complication in a federation. First, all citizens must make concessions, and then the premiers have to do the same at the legislature level. Once all these concessions hve been made, we end up with something which is far from perfection, though this is fortunate because perfection means tyranny, danger, inflexibility.

That is why I do not mind at all the fact that this agreement is not perfect. There is something wrong in this country, the best country in the world; and it is to believe that everything can be solved constitutionally. It is said in the Bible that God created a constitution, the ten commandments, but we still have problems. As Senator Castonguay said, and I agree with him, there are other avenues. There are political agreements between governments. A certain amount of fatigue will come into play. We will end up with something far from perfection, but the alternative is worse.

I would like to say a few words about Sir Ivo Jennings, a famous British constitutional expert, who was hired by Pakistan, at the time of its creation, to write a constitution. That was in 1948. He had asked for £50,000 in advance. In those days, that was about $250,000, that is to say a lot of money. Five years later, he send the government of Pakistan a letter saying this: Writing a constitution would be a waste of time, as it would not last very long. Yours truly, Sir Ivo Jennings. That was all he gave them for their money, but it was sound advice. Nevertheless, the government wrote a constitution, to be violated every six months or so.

I would like to say a few words about Mr. Bourassa whom I admire very much. He was widely criticized. I believe that in the circumstances he could not do otherwise. He understands, as Senator Castonguay was saying, that the international economic situation is very uncertain. I am convinced that we are moving towards protectionism between the various trading blocs. Japan and its Asian partners are going to become protectionist. If you leave a group, if Quebec was to leave the group to which it now belongs, it would have to negotiate its re-entry, at a time when people would be less than welcoming.

Senator Castonguay is right to say, and this is not economic terrorism, that if the rest of Canada or, let us say six Canadian provinces including Ontario, say yes and Quebec says no, there will be such bitterness that renegotiating the re-entry of Quebec will be very difficult. It will take a long time and it will hurt everyone on both sides.

There is a group in Quebec that I do not even want to criticize because I am of Greek origin and because we owe modern Greece to a group of people who believed deeply and religiously in the idea of independence in the 19th century.

This notion of independence still exists, but it dates back to the 19th century, before we were joined by the technology of the world stock markets, before the global economy, before the creation of economic blocks. One of the 12 EEC countries is now giving to a central institution powers which in theory should belong to independent countries.

We can say such things over and over again, but the ideology of nationalism is very strong in some places, especially with a people that thought of itself as a vanquished people for such a long time. Before, we had the priests and the teachers, and we now have their successors in the medias, the singers and actors, all those people who have always dreamed of an independent Quebec. This is not an unworthy dream. However, I believe that this dream should remain a dream if we want the good of Quebec because we are living in a world where it's cold outside. It is not a good thing to get out of a system which works pretty well just to try your luck on your own.

However, this idea is very attractive when it is fed by a slip in the relations between the English and the French by the events of 1982 and by the failure of Meech.

Mr. Bourassa, a federalist premier, must become a kind of acrobat, a juggler to find his way in this maze, to appease his constituents and to put the economic facts before them without being charged of selling out for a few dollars. It is his duty to protect the welfare of Quebec and he is doing so as well as he can.

He was accused of not participating for very long in the constitutional talks. If I had been in his position, I would have done the same because what Senator Castonguay was referring to, namely the media coverage of what was going on, looked like the description of a boxing match or a baseball or hockey game. We were humiliated! We lost! My side did not score a goal when it could have!

At least, Mr. Bourassa stayed away from all that long enough to let things calm down somewhat. He has a very difficult task before him.

It is much more difficult to talk about reason and economy than to talk like a "coach" saying: Those damned people; they hit us so now we have to hit them back. The economic romanticism, not only in Quebec but in every country, is always easier to use as a weapon than to say: Listen, I have done some calculations and the budget does not balance.

It is a lot harder to sell cold hard facts than it is to sell enthusiasm: come on, let's go for it. Shoot first gentlemen; we will die, but we will not surrender. All this is so beautiful. It does not work but it is beautiful. This is part of the 19th century.

Mr. Bourassa must fight against something that will be praised by all the troubadours and media. It is difficult. If we do not understand that and if we vote no, we will destroy it and we will destroy Canada.

I am not a Quebecer with old roots. I am a Quebecer by marriage, if you will; I married a Quebec family. I do not believe that Quebecers, even those who are not very romantic among my relatives, could accept being slapped in the face, because this is the way it will feel to them, twice within five years, by having an accord, signed by all the premiers, torn up twice in five years.

This will trigger a wave of violent and difficult emotions. Unreasonable people take power on both sides of the barricades that are raised following something like a "no" vote.

Some argue that such considerations are at the expense of principles. I should like to come back to the beginning of my speech, where I said that democracy does not work so much on principles. There are indeed some principles, such as respect for the individual, et caetera. But there are also things like how exactly things are managed. On what chair does the deputy minister rest his behind? How much power does he or she have relative to another deputy minister? That is not the kind of thing that make or breaks a nation. It is not a matter of principle, but food for turf wars, as we say in English, and there will always be turf wars. To put an end to these wars, we would have to shoot every high school history teacher on the planet and to do away with deputy ministers, with all due respect to those of you here who have been deputy ministers and who, no doubt, are exceptions to the rule.

I will certainly vote yes. I will militate in favour of the "yes" because there is no other choice. As a Quebecer, I am here to stand up for Quebec. I am deeply convinced that separation, which would be inevitable following a "no" vote either in English Canada or in Quebec, would be catastrophic for my province, the province where I live and plan to keep living, with my children, nephews and nieces whom I love dearly.

It is for their good that I am speaking up. Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as usual I will ask my friends opposite. I just want to check whether my friend will vote yes on October 26.

[Senator Gigantès.]

Senator Hébert: I do not have to answer that question.

Senator Gigantès: I do not understand why you are asking me the question, considering I have already said I will. Had I known you were going to ask the question, I would have refrained from telling, just to pester you. I have no right asking that question and it is improper to do so in a democracy. I will make my statements as I see fit. No need to question me.

Senator Hébert: You have asked it often enough. We do not want to hear it any more.

[English]

Hon. John Buchanan: Honourable Senators, I said a few words on this topic on Friday and I do not intend to repeat what I said on that occasion, except to reiterate that from 1978 till 1990 I was very privileged to participate in over 20 federal-provincial conferences, many of them on the Constitution. I was privileged to sign the constitutional accord which came about as a result of the conferences between 1978 and 1982. I was privileged also to sign the 1987 Meech Lake Accord and to then sign a final, 1990 accord in the Conference Centre in June of 1990. I am now privileged again to be able to participate in what may be the final round in constitutional discussions for at least five years or more in this country.

I believe that on October 26th the people of Canada will vote "yes" in the referendum, which will give this country stability as far as the Constitution is concerned for many years, and will probably assist us in lasting at least another 125 years as the great country that we are.

I have only a few words to say about the agreement itself. I believe it is an excellent agreement, for which Canadians will vote "yes". It has many similarities to the Meech Lake Accord, but I believe that it goes further than the Meech Lake Accord. That accord was agreed to by every provincial government and by the Government of Canada but, unfortunately, events in the three-year period after it was signed ensured that it failed.

However, this new agreement, the so-called Charlottetown agreement, will not founder because it will go to a referendum of the people and the people will have the final say in advising the governments on what the will of the people is.

This is a good agreement. As many have said before me, it is not a perfect agreement, but in political life there is never anything that is perfect for everyone. Government is the art of compromise; certainly not compromising principles, but compromising positions and changing positions from time to time in the interests of the country. I believe that this is what this document is all about. I like the title on the fact sheet, "Our Future Together", because that is what this agreement is about.

The Canada clause contains basically the same wording as did Meech Lake. It recognizes Canadian federalism, the rule of law, linguistic duality and Quebec's distinct society.

One of the puzzles of political life in Canada is why some people, even today, question the distinctiveness of Quebec society. To me, and to literally millions of other Canadians, that is not new. Quebec has had a distinct society since Champlain sailed up the St. Lawrence River in 1618.

Senator Comeau is not here but I do not think he will mind me saying this. He pointed out something to me that I think should be corrected. There is a publication that states that Champlain sailed up the St. Lawrence River in 1618 and founded the first permanent French settlement in North America. It may be a play on words, but I want to remind honourable senators and others that Champlain sailed from St. Croix Island in 1604 to Port Royal in Nova Scotia, where he founded the first permanent settlement by Europeans in North America, and it was French Acadian. That is just a little correction that I think should be made.

By the way, as I mentioned once before in the Senate, there was an attempt to correct me by a Governor of Florida years ago who insisted that St. Augustine, Florida, was the site of the first permanent settlement in North America. I told him that was absolutely incorrect, that it was Port Royal, as I still maintain, and I was backed up by the five governors of the New England states.

Champlain sailed up the St. Lawrence River and Quebec was founded. It has been a distinct society within Canada since then. As a colony, it was distinct. As a province, it has been distinct in its culture and its language. The rule of law of Quebec is based on the civil code rather than the common law, which is very distinct.

As former Premier David Peterson said in the Conference Centre a few years ago, every schoolboy and schoolgirl in Canada must be taken aback by the opinion that some people held at the time that Quebec was not a distinct society, because every schoolboy and schoolgirl recognizes and appreciates that Quebec does have a distinctiveness that other Canadian provinces do not have, in its language, its culture and its rule of law.

The other items in the Canada clause are building blocks for the future of our country.

I was privileged over the years to attend every conference on Aboriginal rights. Over those years I did not understand, and still do not, what specifically is meant by "Aboriginal self-government". I think this document does the right thing. It sets out that the Aboriginal peoples of Canada have a right to self-government, the definition of which will be worked out within a period of five years.

I was privileged to participate in those discussions over those years and am now again privileged to be a participant in ensuring that the Aboriginal people of Canada, the first Canadians, are getting this recognition for self-government.

I see no difficulty with the rest of the agreement. I agreed with the reform of our institutions before and I agree with it now. The situation of the Senate and the House of Commons is a little different. Their expansion is to ensure equality among the provinces as far as numbers are concerned, and the number of members of the House of Commons and Senate does not increase in total.

With regard to the social and economic union, we are now entrenching in the Constitution many of those items that we have enjoyed for many years, including all of our great social services that are the envy of other people throughout North America and probably the western world. High quality primary and secondary education for all residents of Canada will be included in the social union as will protecting and sustaining the environment.

Under the economic union, the people of Ontario and Western Canada will finally be able to drink Moosehead beer, for instance. It was ridiculous, on going to Florida, to see people on the beaches there wearing T-shirts declaring "The Moose is Loose" when the moose was not loose in Ontario, although it is now. Showing my partiality as a Nova Scotian, I hope that the Moosehead you drink here in Ontario is brewed in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia and not in Saint John, New Brunswick. I still have a bit of that left in me.

Honourable senators, the economic union will go a long way to curing all of the problems that we have had in Canada and will provide for the free movement of goods, services and capital throughout the country, which will add to the competitive spirit that we have in this country, and will continue to have in the years to come.

I wish now to deal with the federal spending power. Over the years, I have found it extraordinary that people would argue about entrenching in the Constitution such privileges as we have enjoyed over the years, such as the right of provinces to have programs which are compatible with national programs, and with the objectives of those national programs. The provinces would run their own shop, so to speak, and be provided with funds from Ottawa. That is only entrenching what we have been doing since the 1950s and through the 1960s with medicare and hospitalization. Those people who say that the brakes will be put on national programs, I can tell you they are absolutely incorrect. It will not do such a thing. The economic union and social union, in my opinion, will be entrenching in the Constitution of Canada matters such as that which we have enjoyed for many years.

Honourable senators, I have no hesitation in saying "yes" to this agreement. It is not a perfect agreement, but it is one that certainly will ensure that our country stays together and that our country will continue to be strong.

Honourable senators, I want to take a few minutes to congratulate those people who were involved in the agreement. Some people may think that attending conferences is not difficult, or not stressful, or not hard work. I want to assure you that it is. Senator Murray knows that. He participated in many of them, and they were stressful. It is hard work. Those who think that the conference begins at 9:00 in the morning and ends in the afternoon are wrong. Some of those meetings go on well into the night; 12 hours, 16 hours a day. They are very stressful.

Every conference needs a leader. In a non-political way, I want to congratulate and thank the Prime Minister of Canada, the Rt. Hon. Brian Mulroney. He has been a leader. He is the person who has led over the last number of years in the constitutional debate. I have been there, and I have watched him at work. I have watched people of other political stripes congratulate him on his tenacity, durability, negotiating power, knowledge, and the fact that he is a workaholic when it comes to this kind of negotiation. He exudes confidence and ensures that when others believe that an agreement is moving away, he will pick up on that, call a halt to the proceedings so that new ideas can be discussed, and then go at it again. He has the ability to get things done. I am not the only one to say that; many people in this country have said that. Premier Roy Romanow—who I attended conferences with when he was the Attorney General of Saskatchewan back in the 1980s—called Prime Minister Mulroney a superb negotiator and congratulated him publicly a few weeks ago.

Honourable senators, I also want to congratulate the Rt. Hon. Joe Clark. There is a tenacious fellow. At times, when others would have just said "That is it; enough; let us stop this," he marched on. He may have grumbled, but he marched. It is due to Joe Clark's work over the last four months that we are where we are today. He travelled from one end of this country to the other, from British Columbia to Newfoundland, over a four-month period. Every night on television, we would see the Rt. Hon. Joe Clark attending, speaking and commenting on public sessions called to discuss the Constitution. He was a person who gained the admiration and respect of people from one end of this country to the other as he assisted in ensuring that this agreement would be achieved. I salute him. He is a great Canadian, parliamentarian, superb negotiator and leader.

Lastly, the premiers of the provinces and the leaders of our Aboriginal peoples were able to compromise not their principles but their positions, and change their positions when those changes were necessary to ensure that the agreement would be finalized.

The old saying is that a chain is as strong as its weakest link. In Canada, as a result of the work of the premiers, the Prime Minister, and leaders of the Aboriginal groups, we now have a country that is as strong as all of our provinces; and with this agreement, all of our provinces are and will continue to be very strong.

As I have said, these conferences are strenuous affairs. Sometimes politicians can be brought down to earth. I remember at one of these conferences, massive crowds would gather outside the Conference Centre. Joe Ghiz, Clyde Wells and I were coming back to the hotel, having escaped from most of the media. Two gentlemen were standing in front of the hotel. When we walked by they said, "Pardon me, but could we ask you a question?" Clyde Wells, who was very shy and did not want to talk to the press, kept going. Joe Ghiz did not hear them, but I did. I turned and I said, "Yes, what is the question?" I thought they were newsmen. They said, "Well, we are from the United States, and we heard that Robert Goulet is around here and wondered if you had seen him. We want his autograph." We were brought back to earth quickly.

[Senator Buchanan.]

Senator Doyle: Did you find Mr. Goulet?

Senator Buchanan: I looked for him but did not find him. I would like to have seen him myself.

The Minister of Health of Nova Scotia and I were taken down to earth once, literally and also in another way. We were travelling by helicopter to a small part of Nova Scotia, a little place called Advocate. I recommend it to you. It is probably the second most picturesque spot in Canada. The first would be the Cabot Trail in Cape Breton, and the second would be the very picturesque drive from Parrsboro through to Advocate and Advocate Harbour. The road now is completely paved all the way around to Amherst.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Do you take reservations, too?

Senator Buchanan: The Minister of Health and I were on our way to Advocate to turn the sod for the new hospital. That was a big day in that area. It was such a wonderful day that the schools were closed for the day so that all of the children could be there to watch the sod-turning. The helicopter hovered over the field, and it pushed all the people away, including the children from the schools.

● (2220)

The helicopter landed. When the blades stopped rotating there was a rush of kids and they all had their little notebooks, papers and pens. Gerry Sheehy and I were getting out of the helicopter. I was getting a pen out. I noticed they had pens, but I was ready with mine to sign autographs. When we got out one of the kids passed some paper to me. I signed it and he looked at it and said, "Who are you?" Gerry said, "This is the premier." The kid said, "We don't want your signature, we want the helicopter pilot's."

Honourable senators, I certainly recommend and commend this agreement to the people of Canada, particularly to the people of Nova Scotia. It has been said—and I have heard it in the Senate and outside the Senate—that Canadians may not appreciate the full meaning of the question that has been asked in the referendum because they will not understand the details of the agreement, and, moreover, the legal text has not been worked out. That may be true, but I do not believe it to be so. We have to give Canadians more credit than that. Canadians have been following this constitutional debate for years, and particularly for the past four months. I believe they understand what is going on here. I believe that they appreciate what this debate is all about.

I have heard some people say that the people of Canada will vote "yes" because they want to get the Constitution matter behind them. That is partly true, but I believe they will vote "yes" because it will ensure that this country will stay together; they will vote "yes" to keep the country together, united and strong. They know that this compromise agreement is the vehicle to ensure that this country stays together and continues to be strong.

I do not think this agreement will be difficult to sell—perhaps "difficult to sell" is not the right phrase. I believe it is an agreement that can be explained to the Canadian people. I believe that a vast majority of the people of Canada will vote "yes" because this agreement will ensure that this country will continue to stay together, united and strong, and in 125 years we will praise this agreement as a renewal of this great Confederation that is the envy of the world.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I have enjoyed the presentations by my honourable colleagues this evening and I appreciate the privilege, even at this late hour, of making a contribution to the debate on the referendum question.

When Jean Chrétien concluded over one year ago that the process of public discussion on constitutional reform must culminate in the expression of public acceptance in the form of a referendum, I agreed with him heartily. Now that the Prime Minister has finally come to the same conclusion I find myself in the unusual position of agreeing with him too, and—

Senator Molgat: Painful.

Senator Stanbury: —wishing the Canadian people all the best in the outcome of this exercise. During the debate in this house on the bill to create the Referendum Act, I indicated my concerns about some aspects of the bill, and I now want to try to ensure that my prediction of potential problems fails to be fulfilled. In my brief comments I want to address a few concerns about the process of this referendum and the practices involved. I also want to address myself to the specific question and the importance of an affirmative response to that question.

My main concern with the referendum—and this has a relationship to the question before us—is for the need of absolute fairness in the upcoming campaign. Fairness must be unequivocally assured from the beginning of the referendum process. Now that the decision has been made to go ahead, the conduct of the referendum must be perceived as being absolutely fair in every sense. Otherwise, even after the vote has been taken and a result announced, there will not be a strong sense of legitimacy to carry that decision through to public acceptance of the constitutional package.

The people have to have faith in the system before they will put any stock in the result. After all, the only thing that makes a referendum worth conducting and spending $100 million on is the assumption that the result will have enough moral weight to influence provincial and federal legislators to accept the public's decision. If the referendum campaign is manipulated and cheapened by participants, it will not earn the public's confidence; more likely it will earn their disdain, and in turn will not have the legitimacy to convince legislators of their moral imperative to respect the answer given by Canadians. The consequences will be serious.

The Chief Electoral Officer is the official charged with being the guardian of this fairness, at least to the extent that the statute and regulations allow. Unfortunately his best efforts will not be enough. The participants in this debate must accept responsibility for their own actions. They have to make sure that they do not succumb to the temptation to misuse or exploit the system. Some have already found that temptation too great. If this becomes the norm in the referendum campaign, the public's suspicion and lack of faith in the result and its corresponding distrust of those who sponsored the referendum will, no doubt, be pronounced and lasting.

As for the specific question before us today, the wording certainly appeared straightforward at first glance. Nevertheless, concerns have been expressed about some built-in bias to the question. I am sure you have heard the arguments; some of them have been expressed by my colleagues. The reality is that the question is not that bad. Perhaps it is weighted and perhaps that was the intention of the drafters, but I do not think it will matter come October 26. By the time the vote comes, everyone who intends to vote will be sufficiently aware of at least the generalities of the package to be able to answer this very general question.

However, the concern expressed about the question is an example of how careful we must be. If the question is perceived as biased, that in itself may open up the process to suspicion by the public. If the public thinks that a little manipulation of the question has in fact been accomplished, then the people may very well be more likely to suspect more manipulation and consequently be sceptical about the entire process. We must guard at every turn against the temptation of those in control of the process to tilt it in their own direction.

Participants should restrain themselves from the temptation to spread propaganda and half truths. They should regulate themselves, concentrate on educating the public and engaging them in a reasonable debate. If the result of the referendum is to reflect the recent judgment of Canadians and not a propaganda victory, the proponents of the deal will have to exercise restraint in both their spending and their rhetoric. The federal government especially should resist the temptation to spend public money to stampede Canadians with emotional appeals to patriotism.

One of our chief responsibilities as community leaders is to see that Canadians have the opportunity to know what is in the accord. A copy of the accord should be made available to each Canadian and there should be venues for discussion. Canadians should be able to get their hands on a copy of the Consensus Report from any federal office, and especially from post offices across the country; better yet, a copy could be sent to each home. Canadians should have the opportunity to read the accord, not just to listen to what others are telling them about what it says and means. The Consensus Report is not long or written in complex legal jargon. Canadians can, and should, take the responsibility to inform themselves. Ultimately, and sadly, it is the only assurance they have that they are not being manipulated by those trying to sell or defeat the deal.

The Consensus Report is not a perfect deal in the sense that there are many parts which would not commend themselves to us if they were standing on their own. However, in an effort to renew Confederation, each provincial leader and each native leader, aware of the needs of his or her particular constituency, has pleaded for and bargained for measures which, in the end, were acceptable to the federal government and acceptable to each of the others.

This accord represents an agglomeration of federal, Aboriginal and provincial requirements stuck together by the mortar of compromise and melded by the honest desire to save our nation. Sending it back for improvement will accomplish nothing.

Given the realities of the political environment, there is virtually no room for movement from the broad agreement described in the Consensus Report. For instance, Mr. Allaire, who wants 22 areas of exclusive jurisdiction for Quebec, would meet equally resolute politicians who would never come close to agreeing to such an arrangement. It is not about to happen. Jacques Parizeau is being intellectually dishonest to suggest to Mr. Allaire that it might happen.

In the same way, Mr. Manning, who is someone else who is showing dissatisfaction with this deal, would conclude that Quebec already has too much power and that the equality of the provinces should be held out as the central tenet of Canadian federalism. The opinions of these two men are only one example of the irreconcilability of certain positions. There are many areas where positions are irreconcilable and the only way to maintain the union is through mutual accommodation.

Accommodation is exactly what was achieved by leaders who were forced to listen to each other and respond to the pressures on their colleagues. We know what would happen if Mr. Allaire and Mr. Manning, each of whom says he wants a united Canada, were forced to sit down together to decide the fate of the Constitution between themselves. We would no longer have a united Canada. No one can possibly get everything that his or her own self-interest demands. No man is an island unto himself. Honourable senators, if our objective is a united Canada, then we must accept compromise and be prepared to accommodate each other's needs and aspirations.

I firmly believe that the compromise that was concluded in Prince Edward Island, after months of consultation and education of the public, after a lot of very good work by parliamentary committees, and after negotiations based on the good faith of Canada's leaders, is as close to meeting everyone's concerns as we can get while still maintaining an agreement. In fact, I would challenge anyone to tell me what changes could be made to this deal that would be widely accepted among the signatories. Almost all participants have had to settle for something less than they wanted in the deal; but just the same, they all accepted the deal because none amongst them was willing to settle for less than a united Canada.

Therefore the question is: Will Canada fall apart if this constitutional package is rejected? Will Canada stay together if it is approved? Nothing is assured. Certainly, I do not agree with those who believe that the country has the luxury of three choices: This deal, another deal, or the status quo. First, what makes anyone think that another, "better" deal could be negotiated if this one fails? "Better", of course, means a closer match to their particular ideal for a constitution. That has been the assumption in the past, but has it so far proved true? No. Many different people have been at this game for many years. Generations of politicians have tried their hand at it. It is obvious that, in the context of our present institutions, a better deal cannot be reached.

[Senator Stanbury.]

As evidence of that, I would point out that some of the most ardent opponents of the Meech Lake Accord have been the authors of this deal. Some would say, "Well, the status quo is certainly better than this Charlottetown accord, so if the accord dies we will still be better off." Perhaps, but not very likely. My experience tells me that there would be horrendous consequences stemming from that scenario. Of course, I will not go into great detail about these consequences, because that is what the media has termed "scaremongering" and my wife and my children and grandchildren would not want to have a scaremonger for a husband, father and grandfather. Nevertheless, I would hope that Canadians would give some serious thought to the probable result of a rejection of this consensus.

I do not think that it is overly dramatic or inaccurate to say that our options are two: This constitutional deal or no constitutional deal, and the very real possibility of a sovereign Quebec. Support for sovereignty in Quebec rose past 60 per cent after the defeat of the Meech Lake Accord in 1990, and it remains at historically high levels. It is conceivable that Quebecers would delay, or even defeat, a referendum on sovereignty if this package is rejected, but it seems unlikely. I, for one, would prefer not to test waters that cold.

Furthermore, let us not forget that a failure to ratify would also stand as an historic disappointment to Canada's Aboriginal peoples. This is a watershed time in their history as Canadians. Who amongst them would have the mandate to return to a negotiating table after rejection?

As for the possibility that these amendments, if passed, will only be the beginning of further change, I would offer these facts: The Constitution, especially with the changes to the amending formula, will be more difficult to change. Moreover, changing the Constitution would require a mandate from the Canadian people in order for a government to do so, and a mandate to change the Constitution will not soon be coming from the Canadian people. If or when it does come, the political environment will ensure that there is a wide-ranging mandate for change before politicians get too far into the process.

The interests of one province will not, and cannot, drive the agenda after an affirmative answer to the referendum question by the people of Canada and the implementation of these amendments. Yes, constitutional change is an ongoing historical process, but no, future amendments will not be made against the wishes of most of the partners in Confederation and most of the Canadian people.

This deal, the Consensus Report which the media has dubbed the Charlottetown accord, is an answer for today and is likely to mark the end of a chapter, but when there is a mandate from Canadians for change there will be change, and again this change will be reached through the promotion of specific interests and then the reconciliation of those interests to the national interest.

Honourable senators, to conclude, the farther we stray from the ideals of fairness and honesty in this debate and referendum, the less credibility the result will have in the end. Moreover, to ignore the political realities and the range of interests that make up the Canadian state would be the greatest folly imaginable.

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, it is with a great deal of pride that I join the debate dealing with the constitutional agreement reached in Charlottetown on August 28, 1992, and the referendum question based upon that agreement.

As you may know, I was fortunate to have participated directly in one of the processes which resulted in this agreement. I was named as a member to represent the Senate on the Special Joint Committee on a Renewed Canada, which met from the middle of last summer until it tabled its report in this House on February 28, 1992.

My participation on this committee, and especially my participation in the work of the subcommittee which dealt with Aboriginal issues, gave me a better, clearer understanding of the complexity of the constitutional problems facing our country. It is with this in mind that I wish to state how remarkable I believe is the achievement of the first ministers and Aboriginal leaders who participated in this last phase of the Canada round.

I would like to convey to all the participants in the Canada round my heartfelt congratulations for a job well done. The multi-lateral consensus that has been achieved is a remarkable accomplishment of common sense and reflects the Canadian spirit of positive accommodation and compromise.

The consensus came to us last Thursday in a message from the other place. The Senate is asked to concur in the text of the referendum question: "Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992? Yes or no."

Senator Murray, my leader, I am pleased to advise you that I am going to vote "yes" to the question, because a "yes" vote will, in my judgment, ultimately benefit the province of Nova Scotia and Canadians generally.

A constitution is much more than words on a piece of paper. It is the fundamental law of the land, something that expresses to the world at large who we are as a people and what it is we aspire to.

This agreement was born out of a process which has been described by Senator Stanbury as one of broad consultation. All those affected by it were represented at the negotiating table. The end result reconciled the reality of Canada as a pact between its Aboriginal peoples, two founding languages and cultures, and large and small provinces. It gives definition to equality by immediately acknowledging in words and in substance the equality of women and men, of races and ethnic groups, of large and small provinces, and of Canada's Aboriginal people. No one is given special status in this agreement, but our diversity is acknowledged and celebrated.

I would specifically like today to address three matters contained in the agreement. The reason for outlining some of the background in these three agreements is to help give some reason for why "yes" may be justified, and in my opinion is justified, as the answer to the question. They are essentially legalistic matters, but that is the discipline that I have been associated with for 25 years.

Today I should like to address the distinct society clause, the changes to the Supreme Court of Canada, and the part of the agreement dealing specifically with the Aboriginal peoples of Canada.

The distinct society clause first arose in the Meech Lake Accord and became a lightning rod for criticism of that document. Its purpose was to describe the people and the province of Quebec as home to the French population of Canada and indeed North America. The failure of the Meech Lake Accord to obtain the necessary approvals in the time limit allowed did not diminish the importance of this clause to the people of Quebec, nor did the demise of the accord lessen the desire of Quebec to have the clause placed in the Constitution.

Therefore, it was to no one's surprise that it surfaced again in the government's constitutional proposals presented in September of last year, except that this time it appeared in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms as interpretive of the Charter. Also, examples were given of its meaning. It included, in relation to Quebec, a French-speaking majority, a unique culture, and a civil-law tradition. It survived in this form in the report of the Special Committee on a Renewed Canada.

The distinct society clause is the recognition or the affirmation of a legal, sociological and demographic fact. Canada is composed of two great language groups, French speaking and English speaking, and the majority of the French speaking community lives within one of our largest provinces where it is itself a majority. Legally, various British statutes affecting British North America enacted long before Confederation recognized the distinctiveness of Quebec. For example, the Quebec Act of 1774 responded to French Canada's demands for the preservation of its laws and customs. The Constitutional Act of 1791 divided Quebec into two parts corresponding to the linguistic and cultural divergences of its inhabitants. These two statutes acknowledged and provided the political framework for a distinct society in Quebec with institutions, laws and cultures quite different from those of other political communities in North America. In 1867, Confederation recognized and re-established Quebec's distinct society as an autonomous political community while it embraced the principle of linguistic duality in the political institutions of a new country that would eventually span a continent.

The Charlottetown consensus agreement places the distinct society clause in the Canada clause, which is interpretive of the entire Constitution, including the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I believe this is its rightful place. However, the passage of time has not made the clause less controversial. During the last two weeks, a group of law professors and constitutional experts in Quebec have written an open letter to La Presse and Le Devoir explaining that the coupling of the distinct society clause with the linguistic duality clause in the Canada clause rendered the distinct society clause useless to Quebec.

This is not the opinion of the federal government or of the government of the province of Quebec; nor, may I say, is it my opinion. On Tuesday, September 8, 1992, former Supreme Court Justice Louis-Phillipe de Grandpré and former Canadian ambassador to the United Nations Yves Fortier testified before the committee in Quebec City examining the Charlottetown agreement. Mr. Justice De Grandpré said that the distinct society clause was a step forward for Quebec and agreed that the province's language laws were not threatened by the Canada Clause. Mr. Fortier stated that the distinct society clause in this agreement is clearly stronger and clearly more precise than it was in Meech Lake.

I believe the distinct society clause accomplishes what it intends to do. It forces the courts, when looking at the constitutionality of either a Quebec statute or a federal statute, to construe it on the basis of the distinctiveness of Quebec. In relation to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, it has been stated that this clause will be a prime consideration of the courts when determining if a statute is to be judged constitutional.

No, the distinct society clause does not create a legislative head of power for the province of Quebec. However, it does provide it with a powerful weapon which the courts must recognize and apply when construing Quebec laws or laws that specifically apply to Quebec. It is a clause that should not be feared or resented in the rest of Canada, because it does not place Quebec upon a higher level than any of the other provinces. It recognizes and forces the courts to deal with a reality that exists, the reality of Quebec.

I now wish to say a few words about the Supreme Court of Canada and the fact that it will now be enshrined within our constitution. The rule of law is fundamental to our democratic institutions, and the independence of the judiciary guarantees the maintenance of the rule of law. At the apex of the judicial system stands the Supreme Court of Canada. It was created in 1875 as a general court of appeal. In 1949, with the abolition of appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the United Kingdom, the Supreme Court became the court of final resort in all new cases emanating from Canadian courts and tribunals. In addition to cases which come to the court on appeal from lower appellate courts, the Supreme Court is empowered to hear references from the federal government on important issues. This reference power, although limited in use, is an important mechanism for determining the legal and constitutional validity of important issues while avoiding prolonged proceedings in the lower courts.

[Senator Oliver.]

● (2250)

With the adoption of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Supreme Court has become an even more important and influential national institution. This institution is not presently entrenched in the Constitution. Rather, it is established under a federal statute, the Supreme Court Act. Under the terms of this act, the Supreme Court is composed of nine judges, including the Chief Justice of Canada, who are appointed by the Government of Canada.

The Supreme Court Act stipulates that at least three of the judges of the court must be selected from the bench or bar of the Province of Quebec in recognition of its civil law tradition. By convention of representation from other regions of the country, usually three judges are appointed from Ontario, two from the West and one from the Atlantic provinces.

The Charlottetown agreement proposes that the present composition of the Supreme Court—nine members with three from the Quebec bar—be entrenched in the Constitution. This is particularly important to the Province of Quebec because it means that its proportion of judges on the Supreme Court will never be diminished, at least not without the consent of the Province of Quebec.

The Constitution would also require the federal government to name judges from lists submitted by the governments of the provinces and territories. A provision will also be placed in the Constitution allowing the federal government to act unilaterally should a list not be submitted in a timely fashion or no candidate be acceptable. This is virtually the appointment procedure which occurs today in that broadly based consultation takes place among the bar associations and the provincial and federal governments prior to an appointment being made.

It is my belief that this will not regionalize the court. This has always been the major concern. That is to say, enshrining this procedure in the Constitution would mean that certain provinces would look to certain judges to support their cases in disagreements with the federal government. This has not been the result to date, even though this appointing procedure has been used informally. I doubt that it will be the case in the future, especially when the federal government is left with the final say on this matter if a nominee is unacceptable.

Finally, I should like to turn my attention for a few moments to the remarkable section of the Charlottetown agreement dealing with Aboriginal peoples. As I mentioned earlier, I was a member of the so-called liaison subcommittee of the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee which dealt specifically with Aboriginal issues. This subcommittee met with Aboriginal representatives across Canada, meeting for a day with the Métis National Council in Edmonton, the Assembly of First Nations in Vancouver, the Native Council of Canada in Yellowknife and the Inuit-Tapirisat in Iqaluit. The committee heard from leaders of Indians of Nova Scotia, Quebec, British Columbia, Yukon and the Northwest Territories, Métis in Manitoba, treaty Indians in Saskatchewan and Inuit in the Northwest Territories. If I had not realized how complex this issue was before I became involved with the subcommittee, I certainly realized it after those consultations had been completed. I therefore have the greatest appreciation for the negotiations and compromises which took place to arrive at that part of the agreement dealing with First Nations.

I would like to touch on just a few of the main features of the Charlottetown agreement, in view of the hour and in view of the fact that other honourable senators still want to speak tonight.

Honourable senators, by this agreement the Government of Canada is to recognize within the Constitution the inherent right of Aboriginal peoples to self-government within Canada. This includes all Aboriginal peoples, including status and non-status Indians, Inuit and Métis. This is a very important aspect of the agreement as it affirms, once and for all, the inherent right of Canada's Aboriginal peoples to govern their own affairs, a right which will be entrenched in the basic law of the land.

Recognition of the Aboriginal peoples' inherent right to self-government is a milestone in the history of this country. For Canada's first peoples it represents a victory for justice and self-esteem, and a practical step toward greater prosperity. This recognition of self-government is important because it will secure the legitimate place of Aboriginal peoples in the renewed federation, and assist Aboriginal communities in realizing their full potential within Canada.

Self-government is not a new concept to Canada's Aboriginal peoples who, as we know, governed their own affairs long before European settlers arrived in this country. But they have been unjustly denied this basic right for too many years. This is an opportunity to change the relationships of the past, a past in which Aboriginal peoples have often been treated as second class citizens, and recognize and respect the inherent right of the first peoples of Canada.

Honourable senators, the agreement also calls for the recognition of Aboriginal governments as a third order of government within Canada. In order to ensure some measure of consistency with federal and provincial laws, Aboriginal laws made by self-governing jurisdictions will have to be consistent with Canadian laws which are essential to the preservation of peace, order and good government.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, the rules require that I point out to the honourable senator that 15 minutes has passed.

Senator Oliver: May I take one or two minutes more, honourable senators?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Oliver: In addition, the Charter of Rights and Freedoms will apply to Aboriginal governments as it does to federal and provincial governments. Until self-government agreements are in place, existing laws will continue to apply.

With respect to the financing of self-government, it has been agreed that matters relating to financing will be dealt with in a political accord. This responsibility will be shared by the federal, provincial and Aboriginal governments. The types of costs involved in implementing Aboriginal self-government would include, for example, the cost of negotiating self-government agreements and establishing governmental institutions, if they are not already in place. However, these costs would be incurred over an extended period as self-government is phased in. There is no reason to believe these costs would be significantly higher than maintaining the status quo.

In any case, the right to self-government for Aboriginal peoples is ultimately a matter of simple justice, not of costs and benefits. This being said, the implementation of Aboriginal self-governments will have significant economic and social benefits for Canada as a whole. The first step toward self-reliance is self-esteem, and self-esteem is an essential ingredient of independence. With a greater ability to control effectively their own affairs, Canada's first peoples will be able to act responsibly so as to reduce their dependency on government, and contribute fully to Canada's economic and social growth.

Honourable senators, I think this is a good agreement. I truly believe this agreement as it affects Aboriginal peoples and all peoples of Canada is worthy of our whole-hearted support.

Hon. Consiglio Di Nino: I thank honourable senators for allowing me to speak for a few moments at this late hour.

First, I should like to congratulate all those who participated in the arduous and complex process at Charlottetown. I am most satisfied with the results of the historic consensus reached on August 28, 1992.

I am happy that our leaders have recognized and confirmed Quebec's uniqueness and distinctiveness. I have always cherished this Canadian distinctiveness. Indeed, it may well be the reason why Canada to-day remains an independent country.

I am particularly delighted with the gains made by the Aboriginal peoples. Canada's original inhabitants have been subjected to many injustices and indignities which should shame us all.

Their self-respect, their independence, their culture, their way of life, their religious and spiritual beliefs, their dignity —these things were taken away from many of them. We are only now learning the extent of the damage. Frankly, I doubt that we can ever fully repair the damage or properly repay our debt.

The Charlottetown consensus is far from perfect, as you have heard. Others have expressed opinions on areas of disagreements. This evening, I should like to make some brief comments on sections of the Canada clause.

The Canada clause is another positive step for Canadians. It sets out Canadian fundamentals and principles. It will guide the courts in their interpretation of the Constitution and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Many Canadians who are not Aboriginal or of French or English background—about a third of our citizens—have felt left out of the process and are concerned that they are not being appropriately recognized in this round of constitutional renewal.

Clause 2(e) states:

> Canadians are committed to racial and ethnic equality in a society that includes citizens from many lands who have contributed, and continue to contribute, to the building of a strong Canada that reflects its cultural and racial diversity.

While it may not satisfy everyone, the racial and cultural diversity and equality are clearly identified and recognized. Could more have been done? Yes. But clause 2(e) is a good step forward, a part of the evolution of Canada, which is yet a very young country.

I am confused, though, by the different wording in clause 2(d). It states:

> Canadians and their governments are committed to the vitality and development of official-language minority communities throughout Canada; while clause 2(e) and other clauses only commit Canadians and not their governments.

Some have suggested that this may be discriminatory and may lead to a different interpretation and judicial weight, and have suggested adding the word "governments" to clause 2(e). I believe that in the context of the Constitution, "Canadians" includes governments. The people are the government. To clarify this confusion, I suggest that the word "governments" in clause 2(d) is superfluous and unnecessary and that it should be removed, resulting in all the clauses having the same force and weight.

Honourable senators, the main criticism I have of this constitutional round is the failure of our leaders to deal with the notwithstanding clause, which I believe to be offensive and undemocratic, especially in a fair and caring country like Canada. It has no place in a democratic society.

The only real purpose of a notwithstanding clause is the abrogation of individual or minority rights, which to me is unacceptable. If there are cases where individual or minority rights have to be restricted, provisions have been made in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The next time around, let us scrap this offensive clause.

Honourable senators, Canada is a wonderful land where tolerance and understanding are fundamental values respected by a wide majority of our citizens. Discrimination and racism will always be with us, but in Canada it is not and must never become widespread. The regular and frequent integration of races and cultures in our country is producing a new identity, the identity of the future, or, as I like to say, a race of mongrels, which in human beings is a most wonderful thing. All three of my grandchildren are what I lovingly call "mongrels"—a mixture of genes from different races, colours and creeds.

For their sake and the sake of your grandchildren, I will fight to keep this country together, because it is worth fighting for—the best that the world has to offer. Therefore, I urge all Canadians not to seek perfection but to accept the reasonable compromise reached by the leaders of our nation.

Honourable senators, in answer to the question that will undoubtedly come from my leader, the honourable Senator Murray, I intend to vote "yes" on this motion to concur with our colleagues from the House of Commons in approving the text of the referendum question, just as I will vote "yes" on October 26 on the referendum. I hope you all will, as well.

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, for Senator Everett, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

THE LATE HONOURABLE BRUCE HUTCHISON, P.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, Bruce Hutchison, Companion of the Order of Canada and dean of Canadian journalists, died yesterday. We owe him our attention and our thanks.

Back in 1943, when he was 42 years old, the up and coming West Coast reporter wrote these words:

> No one knows my country, neither the stranger nor its own sons. My country is hidden in the dark and teeming brain of youth upon the eve of its manhood. My country has not found itself nor felt its power nor learned its true place. It is all visions and doubts and hopes and dreams. It is strength and weakness, despair and joy, and the wild confusions and restless strivings of a boy who has passed his boyhood but is not yet a man.

When I first came across Hutchison's book, I was far from home in an RCAF barracks. I had just travelled twice across this unknown country and, almost at a sitting, I devoured all 318 pages that led to journey's end at Kispiox, where Chief Solomon Nalth welcomed the traveller in a shower of white feathers from the breast of an eagle.

Here was a writer, said I, who knew what was he talking about. Much more important, here was a writer who knew what I, the reader, was thinking about.

Whether he was telling us why Mackenzie King admired Adolf Hitler, or why Mike Pearson disliked Pierre Trudeau, Hutchison caught your eye, informed your curiosity, and, for the most part, left the judgment to you. On paper, it seems a simple formula. In fact, it is an almost forgotten art.

That his greatest successes—both in the newspapers he wrote for or edited and in the books that excited so many readers—that his greatest successes were judged to be eminently fair accounts of the business at hand is, in itself, remarkable; for Hutchison came to prominence in an era when, instead of a personal bias, a reporter was expected to reflect the affiliation of the paper he worked for. It was not an illogical arrangement in those days, when most Canadian cities were served by two or more newspapers each with firm political ties. How Hutchison served as a soldier in Lester Pearson's army in the opposition is recounted in The Far Side of the Street, an autobiography of exceptional charm and candour.

Leap back to the day in 1957 when Pearson dropped his "bombshell" in the Commons. "Mr. Diefenbaker", says Mike, "should resign and permit the experienced Liberals to return to government." "Even the press gallery laughed", says Hutchison, as he joins Blair Fraser to rescue the leader's ego in a dreary CBC studio.

I have known people who have argued mightily with Bruce Hutchison. As an editor I had the temerity to do so myself. I have never known a dissenter who was not better off for the exercise and more circumspect the next time round.

Hutchison's book, The Unknown Country, won the Governor General's Literary Award for Creative Non-fiction. Two more awards from Rideau Hall have followed.

From his home in Victoria, he quite successfully edited the Vancouver Sun without bothering to commute. It was there, on his beloved island, that the prizes and citations piled up. There, at the age of 90, he published his first novel.

I began this tribute to a great Canadian journalist with a quotation from The Unknown Country. I close with lines the Vancouver Sun first printed in 1945 when Hutchison was 44, lines that were even more pertinent and important when he died at 91 yesterday.

I quote from Hutchison:

> Many people accept the label and the slogan of democracy, but a very large number refuse to accept its full implications—namely, that the public must be free to do absolutely what it pleases, by majority vote, at any time.
> That is, when you come to think about it, a very staggering theory. It is confined to a small part of the world, the few democracies, and it has existed for a couple of generations at most . . . Yet this is the logical and inevitable end of the system of government we have been developing. We have, in fact, gambled everything on the vast unknown and unknowable swarm of men and women who make up the nation.
> That gamble has been taken and we cannot withdraw from it. But, if we are to trust the public, surely the first job of a democracy is to educate the public, both in the schools and in their adult years; and if they are to be educated, surely the first things they must have are the facts; and those who suppress the facts, in the government, in the courts or in the press, imagining that they are saving the state from the people, are denying the whole system . . . It is when they suppress in the name of democracy that they become dangerous.

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe that a Canadian of the stature of Bruce Hutchison certainly deserves to have his passing noted in the records of the Senate and to have the Senate record something of his distinguished contribution to Canadian life. I know I share with many senators the pleasure of having an honoured place on my library shelves for two of his books, and I think it particularly fitting that his Senate eulogy, if I may call it that, should be delivered by Senator Doyle. I thank him for doing so in such an eloquent and touching manner.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, the late Bruce Hutchison was a true conscience of the nation; he was a British Columbian, but above all he was a great Canadian.

I served in the British Columbia legislature for a number of years. On the wall of the Press Gallery there is a picture of the young Bruce Hutchison, raw as a reporter could be. He soon acquired a fabulous reputation for veracity, for his ability to lift his sights above the politically petty and the mundane, and for his ability to direct his thoughts, through his writing, to the basic challenges to the province of British Columbia and to the nation from coast to coast. He had a true love of his province; a true love of this country.

Bruce Hutchison had many opportunities to relocate in Toronto or Montreal or New York. He had many, many offers, but he consistently said "No. British Columbia is my home, and I can do my creative work and live a good life in this province," which he did. We were very proud of him.

Bruce Hutchison never regarded his role as a media person as a licence to attempt to destroy the reputations of politicians by unearthing scandals or digging around in the darkness. He was a positive force for good; a perceptive observer of the human condition. The hurried and frantic press scrum was not for Bruce Hutchison. Rather, he was an observer of facts. He would put those facts on paper and then, after studying the facts, offer his own views as a good British Columbian, as a good Canadian.

He regarded his vocation as one imposing upon him a responsibility to be a builder, to be a member of the building crew rather than a member of the wrecking gang. He will be missed at this time in our history as a nation, when we are determining in precisely what direction we will go. Somehow, I feel certain that, in another dimension, Bruce Hutchison will continue to help us keep this great country united and strong.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

MEMBERS OF EASTERN CARIBBEAN INTER-PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I wish to draw the attention of honourable senators to the presence in our gallery of some distinguished visitors. They are members of the Eastern Caribbean inter-parliamentary delegation who are visiting Canada under the auspices of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. I have interrupted these proceedings because these ladies and gentlemen have a tight schedule and might have had to leave the Senate before I had an opportunity, on your behalf, to welcome them.

Present in the delegation are the Honourable Wilfred St. Clair-Daniel, Speaker of the legislature of St. Lucia and senior Speaker in the Commonwealth; the Honourable Ivan Buchanan, Speaker of the legislature of St. Kitts; and the Honourable Montgomery Maule, Speaker of the legislature of St. Vincent.

Among the non-Speaker parliamentarians with us today are Honourable Kenny Lalsingh, MP, of the legislature of Grenada; Mrs. Ruby Wade-Bramble, MLC, of the legislature of Montserrat; Senator Winston LeRoy Inniss of Barbados; and the Honourable Walwyne Brewley of the legislature of the British Virgin Islands. The delegation is accompanied by Mr. George Brancker, LL.B., Clerk of Parliament of Barbados and Secretary to the delegation.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Ladies and gentlemen of the Eastern Caribbean, on behalf of honourable senators, I am pleased to welcome you to our country and to our chamber.

THE CONSTITUTION

REFERENDUM QUESTION—TACTICS OF GOVERNMENT LEADER

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, before the gracious greeting by the Speaker of our visitors in the gallery, we were speaking of someone whose death will be much regretted. I would like to pass from that to someone who is very regrettable. I mean the Leader of the Government in this chamber, who does not seem to have learned a lesson from the Meech Lake experience, where his bullying tactics made the passing of that accord difficult. There he was yesterday, trying to browbeat first of all Senator Wood and then me into declaring things that we had already declared; hectoring, standing up there like a sort of petty school master, trying to frighten his colleagues.

An Hon. Senator: Pit bull.

Senator Hastings: Badgering.

Senator Gigantès: Badgering, that's right. He has not learned anything. He is L'exécuteur des basses œuvres in this place, just as Harvie Andre is in the other place. I bring up Harvie Andre because he attacked one of our colleagues, Senator Hays. Senator Hays appeared on Canada AM, saying that he had some problems with this accord. Then up pops Mr. Andre and he says, "Oh well, he was in the Senate during the National Energy Program and he did nothing to help Alberta." Senator Hays was not in the Senate at that time, and this is the typical low blow, or kick-below-the-belt tactics of the pit bulls of the Tory Party.

Senator Perrault: Disgusting!

THE LATE HONOURABLE BRUCE HUTCHISON, P.C.

TRIBUTES

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would not want the occasion to pass without adding to the expressions of sentiment of others in this house my respect and affection for the late Bruce Hutchison. So often when we eulogise people here we have to do it in terms of our own relationship with them, and very often in terms of what they have done for us. Bruce Hutchison has a very special place in my memory because he was one of those who agreed back in the 1960s to support a move within FP Publications, which was the chain to which his newspaper belonged, to take a gamble, for the first time, on having a resident woman in the FP Bureau here in Ottawa.

I was dispatched across the country on a tour of newspapers in that chain, and was grilled by editors and publishers about myself and why I had been chosen for the job, until I got to Victoria. Mr. Hutchison was not in the office. He said, "Come out to my home," which was outside Victoria, where we sat under a tree and he told me his philosophy of journalism, which he finally reduced to two words, and they were, "Be honest".

That is what Bruce Hutchison always was. Not only was he a superb writer but he knew the heart and soul and measure of the pace of this country as perhaps few others ever have.

• (1420)

Bruce Hutchison did not confine himself strictly to writing about his country in isolation, but almost every year took a leave of absence to travel to Washington, or to travel to London, and spent time putting Canadian problems and Canadian concerns and opportunities in a larger context.

He was a gentle man, a kind man, and for all of us who have read him and known him, this is a sad day, but he leaves an absolutely memorable legacy in this country.

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable colleagues, I would also like to make a few brief comments on the contribution that the Hon. Bruce Hutchison, P.C., has made to this country. He was the essence of British Columbia. He was the essence of Canada. He represented many values that we all cherish. He was an environmentalist before the rest of us ever thought of the concept. He cherished the independence of Canada and those Canadian values that I hope our new Constitution can encompass in the Canada clause.

I also want to point out something which may have been overlooked, although I did not hear the words of Senator Doyle. Bruce Hutchison was a writer who still practised his craft at the age of 91. He regularly wrote a column for The Vancouver Sun of such candour and brilliance that it would never occur to anyone to wonder the age of the author. He serves as a reminder to Canadians that one is never too old to practise one's craft in this country; one is never too old to love one's country.

As we enter this important debate on the referendum, a debate that British Columbians have many problems with and many questions about, we will miss his counsel, we will miss his advice and I would love to know how he would have voted, Senator Perrault.

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the election clock is still ticking. For those of you on the government side whom Senator Murray would describe as democrats, there are 66 days left before the election should be called. If, however, in the words of Senator Murray, any of you are—and I am sure none of you are—contemptuous cowards of democracy, then you have 452 days left.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 525 citizens of British Columbia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Kamloops and Vancouver.

I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 527 citizens of British Columbia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Victoria, Kamloops, Terrace and Logan Lake.

I have the honour to present petitions signed by 77 citizens of Ontario who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Toronto, Oakville, Scarborough, Bradford, Hamilton and Mississauga.

Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 503 citizens of British Columbia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Kamloops and Clearwater.

Finally, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 541 citizens of British Columbia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions come mainly from Nutsford, Kamloops and Cachecreek.

● (1430)

In these petitions, then, a total of 2,173 Canadian citizens are opposed to the GST and will not have forgotten on election day.

QUESTION PERIOD

CONSENSUS REPORT—OFFICIAL LANGUAGES—DIFFERENCE BETWEEN ENGLISH AND FRENCH TEXTS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a number of questions for the Leader of the Government, but because of the importance of the debate that we are engaged in I will leave those aside except for one which has to do specifically with the matter before us. That is the reason I ask it.

I am referring to the document given to us, the Charlottetown Consensus Report on the Constitution, and my question concerns problems in respect of official language groups across the country, minority groups.

According to the English text, under the Canada clause, the statement is quite precise. It says:

> The Constitution . . . shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the following fundamental characteristics: . . .
> (d) Canadians and their government are committed to the vitality and development of official-language minority communities throughout Canada;

[Translation]

However, when you look at the French text, as my friend knows very well since we talked about it, it says:

> Toute interprétation de la Constitution . . . doit concorder avec les caractéristiques fondamentales suivantes:
> d) l'attachement des Canadiens et de leurs gouvernements à l'épanouissement et au développement des communautés minoritaires de langue officielle dans tout le pays;

The French text is a lot weaker than the English text. I know there was some discussion about that, but I would like to know precisely what the position of the government is on that. Is it going to change the wording to reconcile the two versions so that they have the same meaning, what is going to happen?

[Senator Hébert.]

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, it is not up to the federal government to decide, unilaterally, to reconcile or to change anything in the wording of the Charlottetown agreement.

[English]

I understand the point that the Deputy Leader of the Opposition is making about the apparent difference between the French and English texts. This has been the subject of some commentary in the public media and by various interested parties. I have no doubt that we will be hearing more about this matter as the referendum campaign proceeds.

[Translation]

Senator Molgat: Is the minister saying that the government will keep this version and not try to make both texts identical—which they are not at this point. In the English version it is clear that governments have an obligation to develop, while in the French version it comes across as a vague statement of good intentions or whatever, but not as an obligation.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the difference is between the word commitment in English and attachement in French. Frankly, I am not well informed on current discussions between federal and provincial, territorial and aboriginal officials.

I do not know whether this provision of the Canada clause is actually being discussed by the parties concerned. I will ask my colleague about this later on, and I will try to give the Senate further information in due time.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE PRIME MINISTER AND THE PREMIER OF QUEBEC

Hon. Pierre de Bané: The Leader of the government in the Senate knows, I imagine, that according to section 56, both versions are valid. On the other hand, although the Leader of the government is not a legal expert, I am sure he will agree that, if our various constitutional acts all translate committed by s'engager, with the exception of the Charlottetown agreement where, for the first time, committed is translated by attachement, it is clear that the Supreme Court would rule that the constituent authority had a reason for not using the time-honoured translation of committed, which is engagé. If, for the first, time another word was used instead, it is pretty obvious, as was said just now by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, that they do not want to give the same protection to official language minorities.

That being said, I would now like to ask the Leader of the Government the following question. On the first page of today's La Presse, there is a reference to an exchange of letters between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Quebec during the days following the Charlottetown agreement. May I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to table this correspondence so that we could read it?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, my friend must realize that the consent of both governments is required before this kind of correspondence can be tabled in Parliament. I would be glad to put the question to the Prime Minister's Office.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

FIXED LINK—STATUS OF PROJECT

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, with respect to the province of Prince Edward Island and Charlottetown, where the latest accord was reached, the whole question of the fixed link is very important.

I understand that the Department of Public Works Canada is now removing the tourism information bureau, the handicraft shops and other little boutiques on the Wood Island Shore near the Caribou-Wood Islands ferry terminal.

Is the removal of these shops and stores and restaurants and tourist bureaus the first stage of the fixed link, which will see the removal of the ferry between Wood Island and Caribou? Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate please give me an update as to what is taking place at Wood Island and why these buildings are being removed?

● (1440)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not at all aware of the activity to which the honourable senator refers at Wood Island. However, I state that there is no intention on the part of the government to terminate that ferry service.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, when the minister has more time, will he dig out the details so that he can provide us tomorrow with an answer concerning what is happening at Wood Island?

Senator Murray: As I understand it, the honourable senator is speaking about changes that are being made affecting some of the concessionaires at the terminal. I will make inquiries of the responsible minister and bring in a detailed report for my honourable friend.

THE CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIER OF QUEBEC— GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I wish to go back to the question raised by Senator De Bané. He referred to a newspaper story concerning letters which are alleged to have been exchanged between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premier of Quebec.

Are we to understand from the minister's response that there was such an exchange of letters, that the exchange of letters dealt with proposed amendments to the Constitution of Canada, and that there is a possibility that the two governments would decline to make those letters available to this house and to the Canadian public?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government in the Senate): Honourable senators, I really do not know the answer to that question. As I came into the chamber, I had an opportunity to see a copy of La Presse on the desk of my colleague Senator Simard. I read the headline and the first two paragraphs of the article.

What the article said was that La Presse had obtained copies of an exchange of correspondence between Prime Minister Mulroney and Premier Bourassa. I would have to make inquiries as to whether there has been such an exchange of correspondence, after which I might then be in a position to answer the rest of the question as to whether the two governments think it appropriate to table that exchange of correspondence at this time.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

THE CONSTITUTION

REFERENDUM QUESTION—CONCURRENCE IN MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton:

That, pursuant to the Act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, the Senate concurs with the House of Commons in approving the following text of a referendum question:

"Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?

_____ _____

yes no"

and,

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I rise to take part in this debate with a certain amount of sadness. I had thought that in the negotiations on the Constitution, there would be a trade-off between the concept of a distinct society for Quebec to be contained in the Canada clause, and a greater clout at the centre for the Prairie provinces and the Maritimes in the operation of the federal government. That would be achieved, of course, by an elected, effective and equitable Senate. I must say I never agreed with the concept of an equal Senate.

Quebec did achieve its distinct society status and that interpretive clause sets the threshold for the attainment of further powers by the Province of Quebec over the next few years.

Indeed, Mr. Yves Fortier, a former ambassador to the United Nations, appeared before a legislative committee of the National Assembly and made the following statement. He said, "The concept of a distinct society in the present agreement is much stronger than it was in the Meech Lake Accord." He said, "The courts will give the provision priority over other fundamental characteristics outlined in the proposed new Canada clause when they interpret the Constitution."

Mr. Fortier, a constitutional lawyer, went along with Mr. Bourassa's recent statement that the agreement was only the first step toward greater powers for Quebec.

On the other side of that attainment, it seems to me that the Senate has really been emasculated; emasculated due to the slavish attachment of the western premiers and certain premiers in the Maritimes to the concept of equality. Indeed, power within this Senate and within the federal government has been arrogated to Ontario and Quebec and away from the Prairies and the Maritimes.

We can look at some of the details of the make-up of the new Senate to understand what has happened to the power of this body. Senators can be appointed by the legislative assemblies of the various provinces. Quebec intends to do just that. Surely, if senators are appointed by a legislative assembly, the loyalty of those senators is to their provincial government. Surely, an elected Senate was fundamental to the concept of a new Constitution for Canada.

If, on the other hand, it is determined by a province that its senators will be elected, that election will take place at the same time as the general election. In other words, if the House of Commons dissolves, then all of Parliament dissolves and the Senate is involved in the same general election as the House of Commons.

Federal legislation governs how the general election will take place and how the election of senators will be determined. Under those circumstances it is highly unlikely that we will have any concept of proportional representation. The election will be direct, as it is in the House of Commons. The end result will most likely be that the Senate will reflect the same distribution of seats as the House of Commons; something which will greatly reduce the independence of the Senate.

I had hoped that the Senate would be elected at prescribed times that would not coincide with the election of the House of Commons. Indeed, I had hoped that there would be some method of proportional representation so that the representation would be wider and more independent. Over and above that, this new Senate is not to be a confidence chamber, and it is not to have any representation in the cabinet.

There are four categories of legislation with which the new Senate will deal. They are supply bills, legislation materially affecting the French language and culture, fundamental tax policy changes directly related to natural resources, and other, or ordinary, legislation.

Dealing first with other legislation, the Senate has 30 sitting days to deal with such legislation after it has been disposed of by the House of Commons. A defeat of the legislation in the Senate triggers a joint sitting of the Senate and the House of Commons. One has to take into account that if the Senate is elected at the same time as the House of Commons by direct election, then it is highly unlikely that a great deal of legislation that comes from the other place will be defeated in the Senate. That is so because government supporting senators will likely be in the majority.

At a joint sitting, the majority determines whether the legislation passes or fails. The Senate goes to that joint sitting with 62 seats. The House of Commons goes with 337 seats. That is an additional 42 seats over what they have today, and, of those 42 seats, 36 are going to Ontario and Quebec.

One can understand that the Senate vote will likely be split and will be quite close if the legislation is defeated in the Senate. The result, I suggest, is that there will be precious few joint sittings, and, when there are, the government in the House of Commons will generally override the veto of the Senate.

Then we come to the question of supply bills. Those are defined in the legislation as taxation, borrowing, and appropriation bills. For some reason, they exclude fundamental policy changes to the tax system. I assume that, under those circumstances, those fundamental changes would be dealt with as ordinary legislation.

As far as supply bills are concerned, it is not 30 sitting days after the Commons deals with the legislation; they must be dealt with in 30 calendar days. If the Senate defeats the legislation or amends it, then it can only be suspended by the Senate for a total of 30 days. It can then be repassed by the Commons.

Then we come to the classification between ordinary legislation and supply bills. Interestingly enough, the originator of the bill determines whether or not it is a supply bill. In most cases, the originator will be the government.

The appeals from that determination are to the Speaker of the House of Commons who is only required to consult with the Speaker of the Senate. The Speaker of the Commons makes the final determination.

If supply bills were confined to a broad classification—that is, the budget, the main borrowing bills, and the main appropriation bills that arise out of the Main Estimates and the Supplementary Estimates—then that probably would not be a problem. But senators are aware that a number of bills that go through have attached to them an appropriation. They get what is called a Royal Recommendation. By virtue of that, they become supply bills, and under the proposals the Senate can only suspend those bills for 30 calendar days.

Look at the situation that will obtain then. The government of the day—and let us assume that we have an aggressive government—will determine whether or not a bill is a supply bill or an ordinary bill. If it is a supply bill, then, by virtue of the fact that moneys are appropriated by that bill, and the Speaker of the House of Commons backs up the government, as he or she probably will, the Senate only has a 30-day suspensive veto. No longer will it be able to defeat the legislation and cause a joint sitting of the two houses.

I have had some experience dealing with appropriations, Main Estimates, and Supplementary Estimates, and I can tell honourable senators that there are a number of bills that go through Parliament that have appropriations attached to them.

The free trade bill would be a case in point. Those bills under this legislation would become supply bills, and the Senate would lose all power to deal with them other than to suspend them for 30 days.

There is also another aspect that is somewhat arcane but nonetheless worthy of examination. Quite often in the Main Estimates and the Supplementary Estimates, there are what we call one-dollar items. The government legislates by putting into the Estimates an amount of $1, and then amends existing legislation.

If one thinks about it, if they bring in the Main and Supplementary Estimates with $1 items, those are supply bills; again they can legislate through that method and the Senate cannot do more than suspend the bills for 30 days.

So there is a real hole here. The Senate would not be able to deal with the legislation on the basis of causing a joint sitting; all it could do is suspend it for 30 days. As I have said, in the hands of an aggressive government, there is no way that I can see that this could reasonably be stopped, unless there was a much stronger Commons speaker than we have had in the past.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): With regard to the earlier point of the honourable senator, does he not agree that the Charlottetown agreement tries to limit the definition of supply bills so that the definition could not cover as wide a variety of legislation as Senator Everett and Senator Stewart suggest?

I draw my friend's attention to page 6, paragraph 13 of the Consensus Report.

Senator Everett: That is a very liberal interpretation of the proposal. It refers to revenue and expenditure bills —supply bills. Then it goes on:

> In order to preserve Canada's parliamentary traditions, the Senate should not be able to block the routine flow of legislation relating to taxation, borrowing and appropriation.
> Revenue and expenditure bills ("supply bills") should be defined as only those matters involving borrowing, the raising of revenue and appropriation, as well as matters subordinate to these issues.

My legal interpretation of that, not having practised law for some considerable length of time, would be that, even under the ejusdem generis rule, this language would be interpreted by most courts as giving a pretty broad ambit to the government of the day to decide that a bill, while albeit not being a major appropriation bill arising out of the Main or Supplementary Estimates, could be a supply bill because there was an appropriation attached to it.

Moreover, the proposal states quite clearly that the initiator of the bill will decide what kind of bill it is. I think anybody interpreting that clause at the bottom of page 6 would say that there is a broad ambit in the hands of the initiator of the bill to make that determination, and if the Commons Speaker agrees that is the end of it.

The honourable Senator Murray may be right, and at some future date I may apologize to him for being a less talented interpreter of the clause than he is. Indeed it may be, in terms of usage and custom, that the kind of thing that I am talking about does not occur. But the fact of the matter is that the potential is here for that sort of thing to occur. Through the designation of these bills as supply bills, or through the use of $1 items, the power of the Senate would be very greatly reduced. There are two other categories.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, the rules require that I point out that 15 minutes have elapsed. Is there leave for the honourable senator to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, during this debate we have had a number of requests from honourable senators for an extension of time, and I think we should accept that generally in this debate. Certainly from our standpoint, we have no objections.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: May I interpret that to mean that there is consent that, during this debate, the Speaker will have no onus under the rules to point out that 15 minutes have elapsed?

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I think it would be wiser if we did not allow unlimited debate. This is an important issue, and I think time limitation has worked pretty well so far. It is good that the Speaker alerts us when the 15 minutes have expired. To date, the Senate has been understanding and senators have been allowed to finish. I would urge the His Honour give a reminder, if need be, in each case.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I just wish to understand the Senate's position: Is it that the Speaker shall continue to point out when the 15 minutes have elapsed, and ask for leave for the senator then speaking to continue?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Everett: I thank honourable senators. I will try to be as brief as possible. However, when a question is asked in the middle of a speech, I think the clock ought to stop running. I thank honourable members for their courtesy.

There are two other categories of legislation, as honourable senators are aware. One deals with fundamental tax policy changes directly related to natural resources. In that case, the majority of the Senate will decide whether the tax legislation will pass or not. That decision cannot be overridden by the House of Commons, and the document itself says that the definition of what sort of legislation would be involved here is still to be determined.

In terms of tax legislation, there really is no rational reason for that particular legislation to be subject to the veto of the Senate without reference to the double majority. It is obviously there for political reasons, to get Mr. Getty onside. I accept that as one of the realities, but it is not very good reasoning in terms of tax legislation.

The final piece of legislation that will be dealt with by the Senate is legislation materially affecting the French language and culture. Again, the originator of the bill will determine if a bill falls under that category. In this case there will be an appeal to the Speaker of the Senate, who will operate under rules to be established by the Senate.

It is interesting that in the case of supply bills the Speaker of the House of Commons makes the determination. There are no rules. However in the case of the Senate, with regard to French language and culture, the Speaker of the Senate will make the decision but there will be rules. I think that is preferable and should be applied to the determination of what is a supply bill in the House of Commons.

It is intended that those rules of the Senate will provide adequate protection for francophones and, indeed, upon induction into the Senate, senators will declare whether or not they are francophones for the purposes of this legislation. They can be challenged and, again, that challenge will be determined by the rules of the Senate.

All legislation materially affecting the French language and culture will be decided by a double majority; that is, a majority of the Senate and a majority of the francophone senators. There will be no appeal from that decision. I find that hardly democratic when one considers that perhaps as few as six or seven francophone senators, at least five of whom will come from the province of Quebec, having been appointed by the National Assembly and not elected, will determine all legislation that materially affects the French language and culture. That is not good democracy, in anyone's terms.

Finally, the Senate will be responsible for the ratification of certain appointments. The one that is mentioned in the legislation is the ratification of the appointment of the Governor of the Bank of Canada. There will be other key appointments to be ratified by the Senate, but what those appointments are is to be determined by federal legislation. These will include the heads of national cultural institutions and the heads of federal regulatory boards and agencies. Again, a majority of the Senate decides. There is no appeal from that decision.

It may be a good idea; I do not know. I am somewhat apprehensive about it. With regard to the Governor of the Bank of Canada, as much as I have disagreed with some of the policies of the present Governor of the Bank of Canada, I am not so sure that it is a good idea to try to get commitments in advance from the Governor in respect of what policy he would exercise if certain conditions arose. I just do not think that that would be good business, and I do not think he should be put through that grilling, although I admit that there are arguments on the other side.

[Senator Everett.]

I think we could see the kind of circus we have seen in the United States Congress as a result of this change, because that will be the main opportunity for the senators who will grace this place to have public visibility, and they will most certainly use it.

Finally, one wonders whether a Senate of this size can really do its job. There will be 62 senators. Ordinary legislation has to be dealt with in 30 sitting days after the Commons disposes of it, and supply bills in 30 calendars days after the Commons disposes of them. Time will have to be allotted for the joint sittings. There will be the ratification of appointments, which will involve lengthy hearings. Then there is the normal committee work of the Senate, both in respect of legislation and in respect of providing a forum for future legislation. I think the senators under that scenario will be very busy people. They may rise to the occasion but, by the same token, an awful lot might not get done.

In short, honourable senators, we certainly did not get what I hoped for. I think we have ended up with a Senate with greatly reduced power. The west has lost out on the deal and power has moved from the west and the Maritimes to the central provinces which, in my judgment, was never intended. We got our equal Senate, but we got precious little else.

I will vote for the question in the referendum because I think the question should be dealt with. I would only hope that in the period leading up to the referendum, an explanation, not just of how the Senate works but of how this whole deal is to work, is given to the public so that the decision is made on the facts. People should not make their decision on the basis that if we do not make a deal now, the country will go down the drain.

In other words, I believe there should be a rational examination of the very complicated agreement that was reached between the Premiers and the Prime Minister so that the Canadian public can understand what they are getting into. It is fine if they decide that this is what they want, but I hope to goodness that they decide on what is contained in the deal and not on some concept that if you vote against it, you are against Canada and if you vote for it, you are for Canada.

Hon. Solange Chaput-Rolland: Honourable senators, I will not try your patience too much because my text is only three pages long.

Today, I will not speak as a Conservative senator, if possible. I would like to speak as a Quebecer who is a Canadian and one of Quebec's older generation. You must remember that I have seen a lot. Like all my fellow citizens from here and elsewhere, I am very aware of the seriousness of the situation in Canada.

I will say right away that I will vote "yes" to Canada without hesitation, without fear and openly wherever people will hear me.

It would really be a lot to ask me to say that this agreement is so good that it is cause for no concern; however, it is no longer the time for us to express our concerns but our certainties.

[English]

There are two aspects of the national referendum of which I feel morally and politically obliged to remind English-speaking senators on both sides of this House. The first deals with the chance that all English-speaking senators on both sides of this institution possess to begin with. Every single one of you can voice openly your qualms and uncertainties concerning some articles, lines, and constitutional divergences without upsetting the fragile balance that confronts Quebecers who, like me, believe in Canada. Your own province may even vote "no" to this accord without risking the breakup of this country. The party to which you belong in this house and in other houses may lose its provincial or even federal election without necessarily breaking up the country.

Each and every province of Canada is endowed with what is termed "Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition". May I remind you, as gravely and as seriously as I can, without any esprit de partisanerie politique qu'au Québec, our government does not have an opposition; it has an option, and that option is "sovereignty". This is our alternative, an alternative that too many English-speaking Canadians do not take seriously enough. When you go into ridings across the land, you can, as you have done here, well criticize the accord. Many of you have done it, and justly so. Yet your criticisms do not endanger the frail equilibrium between a sovereign and a Canadian province. In Quebec, if those of us who believe in Canada begin once again to analyze, scrutinize, assess and evaluate the consequences of this accord, we will only serve —and serve very well at that—Mr. Parizeau and his party and Mr. Bouchard and his party.

Secondly, I wish to touch briefly on an experience I lived during the referendum of 1980. I still bear the scars of that ordeal. In most Canadian homes, members of your families may have different political views on your individual societies, but rarely will you confront yourself with parental feuds. In Quebec, it is already a tragic reality. Sons and daughters are too often against mothers, fathers and grandparents. Friends and neighbours have insulted each other and will again. It has already started. An important sector of our press has already stabbed Mr. Bourassa in the back. He does not deserve the contempt he has so far received from some of your own compatriots and too many of mine. I wrote in La Presse in the week of August 24 how appalled I am as a writer and a journalist by what I read and hear in our francophone and anglophone press.

For all these reasons, I hope that many of you in this House, as well as in the other, will think of Quebec with respect and with a greater understanding and will refrain from repeating how tired you may be with our difficulties, with our nationalism, and our unfortunate intolerance concerning minorities. Again, if you think that Quebec has received too much in this deal, keep in mind the awesome number of Quebecers who believe, and say, that we have received too little. Also keep in mind, whatever your political affiliation may be, the constitutional weight Robert Bourassa has carried on his shoulders for the last two years, whether we approve of the way he has done so or not. He does not only defend his party's policy and his own convictions, but he also defends the continuity of our country. If he loses the referendum, and he might well do so, if the accord is torn apart by criticism, I believe firmly that Canada will lose a part of its soul; and if Quebec breaks away from Canada, it will also lose the other part of its soul.

So at long last, senators, in this present house, I wish that all of us, whatever our reservations about this accord may be, could put the interests of the country before the interests of our respective parties.

[Translation]

As for me, I will tell you again with all the seriousness of which I am capable that my "yes" is without reservation for my country, not because of politics but because of something my father said to me:

> I do not want to leave my children a smaller country than I received.

Neither do I! Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[English]

Hon. Colin Kenny: Honourable senators, the question before us today is this:

> Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992? "Yes" or "no".

The resolution really asks us three things: First, do we support the idea of a referendum; second, do we agree with the proposed wording; and third, do we believe that October 26 is the right date?

The beauty of a referendum is that the people decide in a direct way about an issue, and no one can quarrel with that. The difficulty with a referendum is that the process is open to manipulation and is potentially divisive. This is particularly true when the issues involved are complex and the only answer is "yes" or "no". It presumes that there is no other solution than acceptance or rejection of the whole package. The issue is complicated further in this case because the entire debate is and will be highly charged with emotion rather than being a carefully reasoned examination of what is best for Canada.

The next thing we must consider is the wording of the question, and the wording is obviously flawed. There is no doubt that the first three words "do you agree" are leading in a way that will bias results, and the word "renewed" should be replaced with something neutral, such as "changed" or "altered". It is a pity that the authors did not have enough confidence in the substance of their proposal to allow it to be put in a manner that professional pollsters would consider fair and unbiased.

Finally, regarding the date of October 26, it is too soon. There is just not enough opportunity for Canadians to absorb these proposals, to consider how they will work and decide if this proposal will make Canada a better place.

All of this is happening in an atmosphere that has been poisoned by a government that has elevated the debate to a life-and-death struggle for Canada. It is not, except perhaps for politicians who are struggling for power. Canadians know that this is just another constitutional proposal, and they have seen dozens of those and the country has survived.

I get a great feeling of discomfort when I see everyone in this institution lining up on one side in an effort to rush something through, particularly something that was devised only a few weeks ago, of which none of us has yet seen the final text. We are told that this is the best deal that Canada can expect and that anyone who dares oppose it is an enemy of Canada. We are also told that we have to accept this deal because Canadians are fed up with constitutional discussions. We are told that if we do not accept this scheme, Quebec will separate. We are told that without this deal our economy will suffer and the dollar will weaken. If this deal is so good, if it will resolve our constitutional questions for decades, if it will keep Quebec in Canada and if it will strengthen our economy, then surely it can stand a little scrutiny.

Even the text we have now says two quite different things when you compare the English and French versions of paragraph 1(d) of the Canada clause. Is this just a question of "The Gang that Couldn't Shoot Straight", or is the government trying to appear committed to minority language rights in English Canada while soft- pedalling them in French Canada? How well thought through is the substance of the text if the English and French versions of the proposal do not give the same message to Canadians from coast to coast? Why did the government not wait a few weeks so that Canadians could see the final text? Why can we not take a few months so that Parliament, the provincial legislatures and the people can examine how this agreement will affect the lives of Canadians?

Who is measuring the constitutional proposals against the tests that are really on the minds of people, such as: Will this deal do anything to help Canadians find and keep good jobs? Will this deal do anything to improve the education of our kids? How will these proposals enhance our health care system? What is there in this deal that will make our neighbourhood safer? Will these changes do anything to improve the security of older Canadians? How will these proposals make Canada and Canadian industry more efficient at home and more competitive abroad? Will this deal give us a political system that will work, or it will it simply reinforce the differences and divisions within the country?

[Senator Kenny.]

What I do not like about this process is the sudden rush to judgment. You can surely say that we have been at this for years, but what has really happened? Was the Meech Lake adventure really necessary or was it a clumsy effort that backfired and exacerbated divisions between Quebec and the rest of Canada? People in Quebec were offended because the Prime Minister described a rejection of Meech as a rejection of Quebec. Quebec was not being rejected; a bad deal was being rejected.

After Meech, we were put through a long period of consultations that were substantially ignored. First, the Spicer Commission and then the government's proposals of September 1991, and then the Senate and Commons committee hearings with 3,000 submissions and 700 witnesses. Then we had six national conferences, and then we had the round of meetings from March 12 to July 7, when Joe Clark announced a new deal that could not be substantially changed.

Then, between August 4 and August 28, the Prime Minister chaired four secret meetings and emerged at the end with a completely different deal. Then he had the gall to announce, before anyone could even see a completed text, that opponents of this deal were enemies of Canada. So here we are, less than three weeks later, rushing to approve a referendum question the supporting text of which no one has yet had time to consider.

How is the government handling the process? They are stifling discussion by putting anyone who questions the merits of the proposals into bed with the separatists or the Reform Party. Joe Clark is saying that a decision to oppose the deal is giving in to extremists and playing politics with the future of the country. This is nothing more than a new form of McCarthyism. Do not examine the merits of the proposal, just scare people into silence by telling them they are unCanadian, then ram the referendum question through Parliament and get a decision by October 26—yes or no, all or nothing; this is the only solution that will save Canada.

Honourable senators, this might well be the right thing for Canada, but when do we get a chance to sit down calmly and talk about it? If it is such a good deal, why the scare tactics and the big sell? Will the world come to an end if one more constitutional proposal does not work out?

Canadians are sick of artificial deadlines, all or nothing deals, seamless webs, constitutional roulette. They will not accept bullying cloaked in patriotism, or any deal just to have a deal. They resent the tricky manœuvring, the loaded wording, the rushed timing of this referendum proposal.

As a Parliamentarian forced to deal with this motion, I take comfort in the fundamental wisdom of Canadians. I have no doubt that on October 26 they will make the right decision in spite of this government's manipulation.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, has the honourable senator decided how he will vote on October 26?

Senator Gigantès: Oh, come on! Do you intend to be a guttersnipe all your life?

Senator Kenny: You will find out in due course.

Senator Thériault: Can't you shut up for God's sake! You caused enough problems in 1990.

Hon. Mabel M. DeWare: Honourable senators, as a Canadian I would like to say how very disappointed I was this week to hear the National Action Committee on the Status of Women rejecting the Canadian round, a proposal for a new Constitution. This Canada round package, agreed to in Charlottetown, was arrived at after years of negotiations, as you all know. Ten years, yes. We can even go back to Victoria 1971. A "yes" vote on October 26 and a ratification in the legislatures of this country to the Canada round is the most important issue before us today. How can the national action committee say that this package undermines the rights of women?

The constitutional package was adopted by our first ministers, territories and Aboriginals with all Canada in mind. In the 1970s and 1980s, many interest groups were formed in the country whose purpose was to improve conditions for women and children in Canada. These organizations worked very hard to institute the concept of equal pay for equal work, for child care, to establish and fund shelters for abused women, for abortion rights and, yes, you might say anything that would create equal status for women in this country today.

I am not condemning the progress these organizations have made in this time. However, if they refuse to vote yes to help keep Canada together, I am afraid that all they have worked for will be for naught. I cannot understand why they do not see that the only way their goal of improved conditions and equality for women and children in Canada will come about is by economic development.

● (1530)

With economic development will come improved imports and exports, more investment in Canada, more consumer spending. All this will come about when the international community knows that Canada has put its constitutional package to bed and is united as one whole community.

The women represented under the NAC will realize that a "no" vote will hinder their progress. They will not have funds to continue their cause and their fight for women's issues because, if we lose this debate, the economy will not allow them to continue their work.

Women of this country, this package is for you, for all of us. For men, women, teenagers and our children and grandchildren. I urge you to vote "yes".

I have always been so proud to see our Canadian flag raised at the Olympics, the Summer Games and the Winter Games. This week in Barcelona at the Para-Olympics, we have children competing for themselves and competing for us and they are so proud to represent Canada.

Fellow parliamentarians, let us make these young people proud of us and vote "yes" on October 26.

Hon. P. Michael Pitfield: Honourable senators, in the aftermath of the failure of Meech and post-Meech, the federal government was presented with a wonderful opportunity: the challenge of leading the provinces in the definition of a perception of our country that would unite the enthusiasm of all Canadians.

Canadians desperately want that. Canada needs it. The elements required for it have been there for some time. All that is needed is a government that is capable of iterating the idea and having the people believe in that idea.

For a while it could be hoped this might happen, that Canadians would be enabled to rid themselves at last of the endless conflicts over national unity that drain us of our energy and our creativity, seeming to cripple at birth so many important national dreams and endeavours.

In the event, the government has unfortunately been unable to meet this challenge. It did not lead. It followed. The consensus report of August 28, 1992, that it has produced not only has no central concept, but is in fact internally inconsistent. A dab here and there; more of this, more of that. At the end it will add greatly to the complexity and the weight of the already top-heavy, governmental, constitutional burdens we have. While it compounds the flaws of our constitutional system it militates against the genius of our system.

Now, in the irreversible consequences of the acceptance of pactism in our Constitution, we begin to see the real tragedy of Meech. We are presented with nothing more than a bunch of trade-offs between governments and some of the major interest groups in the country. The report has little relevance to the ordinary people. Certainly it will not unite their enthusiasm. It is far from the renewal it boasts to be. On the contrary, there is good reason to fear that we are witnessing the birth of a monster.

It is proposed that we have a referendum based on this document. We have no choice but to do that. Ottawa, Quebec, and to some extent other governments, have got themselves into a position where there has to be a referendum to get each off a hook that is overwhelmingly the result of partisanship, greed and ambition.

Moreover, we are put in the position where we have to support these proposals because, if we do not, there will be unleashed allegations of hostility to Quebec and injury to the unity of Canada which, however much unfounded, will nonetheless be vigorously exploited for the purpose of enabling the politicians involved to stay in power. In the constitutional version of "Chicken", the game is not to fear putting the existence of our country at risk.

Even now, with an eye to electoral advantage, a devious piece of legislation, tens of thousands of government employees and hundreds of millions of dollars are being marshalled to spread the illusion of a constitutional agreement that does not really exist.

The referendum is founded upon a document that few, even of those inside government, have read or are likely to read. Though ministers speak of it and the media through habit have come to call it "an agreement" or "an entente", it is officially entitled "a consensus report", and that is really what it is: at most, largely an agreement to work out an agreement. Upon close examination there is not yet that much substance, nor that much consensus to it. To refer to it in reverential tones as "an agreement" or "an entente" is boasting of a manly prowess that is not really there. It is, in my view, premature to talk of who won this or who gained that. There is as yet much to come.

The document itself recognizes that the consensus it reports is far from complete. Had it been regarded as complete, federal and provincial ministers would have signed it as they have signed others on similar occasions in the past. It is not signed. It is nowhere near ready to be signed.

If it were complete, it would not have to acknowledge—as it does—that "dissents . . . are not recorded in this summary document."

If it were complete, then federal and provincial ministers would not have had to resort to the use of the contrivance of "a political accord", as they do 24 times, to accommodate the inability to cast their agreement in legally binding language. Nor would they have had to note the 16 or 17 political accords that are nothing more than agreements to someday agree. Nor would the document record that ministers have decided not to pursue 14 major issues and to leave six others unresolved for the time being.

The test of this basis for a referendum should, of course, be in examining the legal texts. Senator Murray has said that we are unlikely to see these texts before the referendum. Mr. Clark scoffs at the idea that anyone other than the lawyers would want to see them at all. But there are very few Canadians who will want to trust the government in this regard. The fact is that, even where there is agreement in principle, a critical amount of the detail is still missing and, obviously, the detail could make the principles meaningless.

There is no reason to believe that the government will take the sanctity of the law any more seriously than it takes the role of members of Parliament. Members got the consensus report the day before this debate began. The government will be just as cavalier in dealing with other uncertainties—and there are many uncertainties. For example, where further political consultation is required, and a lot is, we do not know whether the government will call for further federal-provincial meetings—of ministers or officials—or what will happen after the referendum, presuming the "yes" vote wins?

[Senator Pitfield.]

● (1540)

We do not know whether the package must be accepted and dealt with as a whole or whether it can be trotted out for enactment piecemeal and who is to decide how to proceed.

One could go on and on. The fact is that there is so much uncertainty that one cannot but suspect that either parliamentarians, and the Canadian people with us, are pawns in what is basically a con job or that ministers are floundering, fighting for time, and winging it as they go.

How have we come to this pass? The answer is that Canadians are so fed up with constitutional demands and threats that they are prepared to do almost anything, to believe almost anything, in order to get the constitution out of the way, in order to get on with resolving the economic problems which the country faces and which are more real and certainly more immediate.

Politicians have been arguing over the Constitution for so long and with such sorry results that everybody wants the debate to end. Many people do not care for the moment at what cost. The fear and frustration of the present situation has engendered an attitude of indifference to the accuracy of what is said and the cost of what is promised. The attitude is one of, "damn the torpedoes, full speed ahead."

It is in the context of this fatigue, this exasperation, of overwhelming impatience and the mood of virtual irresponsibility that goes with it, that appeals for vengeance upon Canada's enemies can be made and other forms of intimidation can be practised. Then ministers can be freed from being called into account when it is said that there is this wonderful package of reforms, that the proposed referendum will put an end to constitutional demands and the threats of separation.

The credibility and integrity of our institutions of government, which are the foundations of our democracy, demand that our people know that the referendum is not going to end the constitutional battle, that the consensus report will inevitably whet many appetites for more. As Premier Bourassa said last week, "We've only just begun. The debate will not end with the referendum."

Those who have hopes of peace and certainty settling over the land and financial stability creeping back into the markets would do well to face up to reality.

The Prime Minister and Mr. Clark are dashing around speaking of this "entente" when there is no entente, this "package" where there is no package, this "renewal" when there is no renewal. Business and opinion leaders call people to hold their nose and vote. Simply urging people to be realistic is to invite recrimination. For the moment it is "in", if not quite to cast about pointing the evil finger at the enemies of Canada, at least to talk mellifluously of how the referendum is not intended as a contest between those who believe in dividing Canada and those who believe in a united Canada. The referendum relates to an appreciation of what it means to be a Canadian. You are either proud to be a Canadian or you are not. You either love Canada or you do not. No one can be obliged to do either.

What is the use of this kind of talk from a Government except to imply that such intolerance may just be permissible at this juncture? Indeed, how does this kind of talk differ from that of those in Quebec who would argue today over who is or is not "pur laine"? How far are we already from the demagoguery that is the plague of the referendum technique?

Look carefully at the question the government wants to put in its referendum. Leave aside the manipulative purpose behind the word "renewed." On its face, the question does not seek the ratification of an entente but rather approval of a document as a basis for negotiation. It does not say, "Do you approve of the agreement of August 28, 1992," but rather, "Do you agree that the Consensus Report can be the basis of an agreement?"—an agreement, moreover, it says, for the "renewal" of the Constitution of Canada.

Along the way, it lets Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Bourassa claim small victories, wiggle out of uncomfortable undertakings, and reset the agendas of their governments. It would be imprudent to block these escapes. Further failures by Mr. Mulroney and Mr. Bourassa at this juncture would only add to our problems.

I regard the distinction between approval of an agreement and approval of a basis for agreement as vital. What we have is not an agreement. It could be the basis for an agreement, and thus the importance of what happens after the referendum is won. What is terribly important is that a "yes" to the referendum question not be translatable into a blank cheque for further constitutional adventures, much less that this government be enabled to ram down our throats its version of what implementation of the Consensus Report should be. That is going to require a great deal of further discussion.

The question as it is written is comparatively innocuous, but there are great dangers in what governments are leading, and the media are accustomizing, people to read into it: That it is an entente. Where? That it will solve our constitutional problems. How? That it will end constitutional demands and threats? With what shared vision, what common purpose, what mutual respect? Certainly not anything that is in the final document as it now stands.

In other words, at this critical moment in our affairs, we must realize that while we are all sick to death of the constitutional debate, it is not over no matter what we do. There is no magic out there. No one on the political scene today seems to have a view of the country that can bring on that widespread self-confidence that is the only real source of unity, the only way of tapping the vast resources of energy and enthusiasm so many of us feel but somehow are unable to let loose for our country.

We have to keep trying. Somewhere down the road we will find the better times and the better leaders to do the better things. For the moment, what matters is not just to work for beneficial results on October 26, but also vigilantly to keep a careful discipline on the claims made for dealing with the results afterwards.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I want to speak in favour of this motion which would permit Canadians to vote in a referendum October 26 on the Consensus Report on the Constitution which was reached in Charlottetown, August 28, between the Prime Minister, the ten provincial premiers, the two territorial leaders and the leaders of the four main Aboriginal organizations in this country.

Indeed, a referendum has been on the constitutional agenda of the Liberal party for over a decade, and particularly in the proposals set out by Mr. Chrétien over the last two years, so that all Canadians could cast a vote on changes to the fundamental document of Confederation. Only now has this government been convinced of the viability of the referendum as an instrument to be used nation-wide, and this is a welcome conversion.

I was also pleased to hear Constitutional Affairs Minister Joe Clark say last week that the referendum must be supported by a majority in each province in order for this deal to move ahead.

This referendum vote, risky though it may be, will clarify in our minds what the people in this country think and not what the politicians or the journalists say the people think. Certainly we have differences of opinion and levels of frustration. Our diverse population, our geography, our scattered resources, even our weather, make that inevitable, but those differences are a far cry from a desire to divide our country.

Canadians in weeks ahead will hear reasoned and passionate speeches on both sides of the referendum question. They will also, given the time and opportunity, be able to read the Charlottetown agreement. Our responsibility as legislators is to do the same. We must tell Canadians what we think about it. We must ask the questions we think are necessary of those who finalized the deal. Canadians will be listening for those answers.

The document forming the basis of the referendum question is complicated and the changes it proposes are major. They include an elected Senate, which I will discuss in a moment because we are the Senate and are all acutely interested in that part of the agreement. At long last there is recognition of the inherent right of Aboriginal self-government within Canada, an historic move forward for our first citizens, and one which has been a major objective of my party for the last several years.

There is recognition of Quebec's distinct society as defined by the reality of its French-speaking majority, its unique culture and its civil law tradition. The objectives of a social Charter and an economic union will be enshrined in the Constitution, while at the same time there is failure to move ahead on the important issue of the common market and the removal of trade barriers between our provinces. There is a redefinition of the use of the federal spending powers in areas of provincial jurisdiction which has raised questions of too little, too much or unequal, particularly in terms of manpower retraining.

There are changes to the amending formula which would require unanimity for future alterations to the Senate, the House of Commons and the role of the Supreme Court of Canada. There would be a return to the pre-1982 rules for admission of new provinces through bilateral negotiation between the federal government and the territory involved, an issue which may not attract much attention here in the south but one which is of critical and sometimes passionate concern to northern Canadians.

There is a Canada clause which commits Canadians and their governments to the development and vitality of official language communities throughout Canada, and which commits Canadians to the recognition of racial, ethnic and gender equality.

There are positive elements in this agreement. There are also disappointments. I do not think it is wrong to speak out about those disappointments. As a survey last week for the Toronto Star, CTV, La Presse and the Vancouver Sun made clear, Canadians will not tolerate a referendum campaign that is simply geared to politics of fear which would define degrees of patriotism in its citizens.

This agreement was forged after substantial and painful efforts at compromise by all the participants at the negotiating table. It was an honourable effort. We must talk about the substance of the agreement as it really is and not surrounded by expansive rhetoric which can only lead to disillusionment. That does not mean that the impact of the agreement will be lessened. It does mean that Canadians will be able to form opinions based on reality. Nowhere does this apply more clearly than in our discussion of the Senate which, once again, was a dominant factor in whether an agreement was to be forged at all, as was the case back in 1867.

The proposed new Senate, honourable senators, is not a true Triple-E Senate. This is not the Senate that Don Getty really preferred, or Clyde Wells, or Robert Bourassa, or Bob Rae, or any of the other premiers. It is not the Senate that Brian Mulroney preferred. It is not the Senate that Jean Chrétien or Audrey McLaughlin preferred. It is not the Senate that Westerners preferred -- certainly not this Westerner. My colleagues tell me it is not the Senate that Atlantic Canadians preferred.

What kind of a Senate will this be? Will it work? What can we do to give it meaning? Believe me, I have thought a lot about this in recent days, as I am sure all honourable senators have. I have thought about it against the background of a strong desire of the people in the provinces of Western and Atlantic Canada to have greater influence in the national decision-making process. I have thought about it from the general point of view of most Canadians that modern legislative institutions in this country must be accountable and credible through election.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

I have always believed that that criterion has to be the first major step of Senate reform—that Canadians, not Prime Ministers and not Premiers, must be able to choose their senators and get rid of them if they do not measure up.

This agreement sets out the basis for Senate elections, even though the negotiators were not bold enough to do it straight and clean. Instead, the provinces may decide how those elections will be carried out—by the people or through the legislatures, as Quebec has indicated it intends to do in the beginning.

I believe that the legislature route will be shortlived, primarily because the people of such a province will force change through their political system, as happened in the early part of this century in the United States. They will insist that they be allowed to make that choice and not the government of the day through its legislative majority.

Senators are to be elected during a federal election—certainly not my preference. How they are to be elected is not specified.

Honourable senators, in my view our negotiators did Canadians a great disservice by failing to produce a model which clearly would provide election by proportional representation. We now have bitterness growing across this country over the issue of gender equality and the potential establishment of legislative quotas in some provinces and not in others. In my view, that is not the way to proceed.

Women are dividing over the restrictiveness of equality quotas versus the need to have some concrete political means of breaking down the barriers which keep women outside our legislative chambers. Proportional representation would have offered that chance, not just for women but for minority groups as well. Perhaps there is still some hope in this area as provinces consider how they will go about their elections.

We will have a precisely equal Senate, province by province. That was a principle which some premiers such as Mr. Getty and Mr. Wells held to be greater than any other principle in Senate reform. Everyone knew that equality would be at the expense of some effectiveness, but not that equality itself would be qualified.

Right off the mark, the larger provinces gain in the House of Commons what they lost in Senate seats, plus a guaranteed 25 per cent of Commons seats for Quebec. Some adjustment was made for British Columbia and Alberta as areas of population growth.

The increased numerical dominance of central Canada in the federal Parliament is clearly evident to people in Western and Atlantic Canada, and that fact undercuts any extravagant claims for substantial legislative influence in this equal Senate.

Having said that, this proposed Senate would not be an ineffective body, and I do not intend to depict it as such. First, senators would have influence on government through the very fact of their election by a vast number of voters. There is no doubt in my mind that this influence would grow as the new system became established.

Second, the veto over tax policy changes related to natural resources is a real power. Rarely would it ever be tested here, but it would be there as a constant reminder to governments of the potential veto in this area.

Third, the double majority required for legislation affecting the French language and culture is a real power, which makes it even more important in my mind that all senators be elected by the people.

Fourth, the Senate will be able to introduce legislation, as it is able to do now, but we rarely do it. I believe an organized effort at initiating strategically focused bills by elected senators could take on a new and important significance.

Fifth, the Senate would have a new role in ratifying appointments to senior government positions—which is not yet clear—that have a significant impact across the country.

However, there remains the serious question of all other so-called "ordinary" legislation.

A simple majority defeat or amendment in the Senate would trigger a joint parliamentary sitting process where the issue would be decided by a simple majority vote. The same would be true of a Senate bill in the House of Commons.

With a 337-person House and a 62-person Senate, it is hard to find a permutation or a combination under which the Senate view ever would prevail.

Honourable senators, I think our negotiators just ran out of steam when they got to this part. It does not make a lot of sense, except to those who admit that they succeeded in ensuring that senators could not overrule the House and produce messy situations for the government party.

I suggest that this was a serious misjudgment, but there will still be an opportunity to adjust it. Parliament itself must define the procedures, not just of the Senate but the process surrounding the operation of a joint sitting. How long would it take? When would it occur? How would it be organized? When would a vote be called? I suggest our Parliament can ensure a measure of balance in legislative influence for this new Senate if the will is there to do it.

Canadians certainly want changes to be made, and they want this atmosphere of constitutional crisis to end. With their instincts and their hearts, a majority of citizens all across this country want to vote for the unity of Canada. Yes, the process of negotiating the details of this umbrella constitutional agreement will go on between governments. It always does. It is a part of the process of governing in a federation such as ours.

Honourable senators, in the last seven years I believe we have been pushed down a path which has already led us beyond the status quo. We cannot simply stop this process and start it up again at some distant day in the future without serious consequences.

Our country has been strained to the limit by these debates. A referendum defeat, in my view, would not produce a moratorium. It would produce, perhaps, irreconcilable division in Canada between provinces and between peoples that would have critical consequences for the economic and social health of our citizens who live, work, and raise their families on this magnificent territory. That truly would be a tragedy.

In spite of some of my reservations, I can only conclude that our country itself needs a victory in the referendum so that we can focus on the tough priorities affecting the daily lives of Canadians. We need to be able to think and plan with confidence for a secure and productive future in a united nation.

Because of this conviction, I support this motion. I will campaign for the agreement wherever I can be useful. And I expect all parties in this Parliament will fulfil their responsibilities to make the creative adjustments that will allow a new order of governing to work for Canadians.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am one of those who is not too enthusiastic about a referendum as far as it concerns our country, because it simply is not an integral part, or even a normal part, of the Canadian political decision-making process, unlike what we find in other countries such as in Switzerland and in many states south of us. Many can remember the referendum in Colorado on the Denver Olympics and the famous Proposition 13 in California. Ballots in many states this November will have questions on various issues.

However, this is not a normal process in this country. As a matter of fact, this will only be the third consultation of this sort. The first was on prohibition, and the result was so inconclusive that the then-Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, decided to let each province settle the matter individually.

The second was on conscription in 1942, a very divisive event in our history, a time when the country was already divided over the extent of its commitment to the war effort.

At the provincial level, we have had a number of referendums: For instance, the one in Newfoundland on joining Confederation in 1949; and of course, the most recent one in Quebec which was also very divisive, as Senator Chaput-Rolland has pointed out. I know families who are still affected by the tensions of that time. In particular, I know of one Quebec MP and his brother who have not spoken to each other ever since. This, I fear, is not an isolated case.

Quebec, historically, has constantly striven to protect its identity through the full exercise of the constitutional powers available to it. This is not a recent phenomenon. As a matter of fact, it goes back some 100 years when Honoré Mercier became premier of the province. Alexandre Taschereau, who was a dominating figure in Quebec for the first three decades of this century and premier during much of the 1920s and 1930s, had a constant preoccupation with the encroachment of federal jurisdiction, whether perceived or actual. Maurice Duplessis spoke of provincial autonomy based on a strict interpretation of the BNA Act.

[Translation]

Jean Lesage followed this with "Maître chez nous". Daniel Johnson's slogan was "Equality or independence", and we find much the same sentiments today in the words "distinct society".

My point is that Quebec's priorities, aspirations and well-founded concerns are not brand new, and I think we should remember that today. Whatever the outcome on October 26, Quebec will always be on the alert. And no matter which party happens to be in power, it will always be imperative for that party to protect and promote the vitality of the culture and customs of Quebec society.

[English]

The English version of the question that was asked in 1980 reads as follows:

> The government of Quebec has made public its proposal to negotiate a new agreement with the rest of Canada, based on the equality of nations.

By the way, the word in French is "peuples" and "nations" is certainly not an accurate translation of that.

The question continued as follows:

> This agreement would enable Quebec to acquire the exclusive power to make its laws, levy its taxes, and establish relations abroad—in other words, sovereignty—and at the same time, to maintain with Canada an economic association including a common currency. No change in political status resulting from the negotiations will take place without the people's approval at another referendum. On these terms, do you give the Government of Quebec the mandate to negotiate the proposed agreement between Quebec and Canada?

The government at the time chose the option of sovereignty association because the polls convinced it that there was a better chance of winning than if it simply went for sovereignty or independence.

Having read and studied it carefully, I, frankly, could have answered yes to that question, and I said so on more than one occasion. I quickly realized that would have been the wrong thing to do because, each time I expressed my opinion, I was told that I was only encouraging the separatist cause. In other words, the referendum of 1980 quickly turned into a "Canada, are you for it or against it?" exercise, a most deplorable turn of events but, I suppose, inevitable.

Now the question on the Charlottetown agreement threatens to develop into a similar confrontation which, in turn, may well lead to various conflicting interpretations of the result. Is "oui" the same as "yes"? Is "non" the same as "no"?

[Senator Lynch-Staunton.]

I can only hope that those who will be called to lead the debate will resist the temptation to stir up emotions by appealing to patriotic instincts and will, instead, argue the merits of the agreement.

As for the agreement itself, it is not difficult to find flaws in it. It is, after all, the result of a compromise amongst various parties with conflicting approaches and views on a number of key issues.

Of course the agreement is not perfect. Why apologize for that? Who would expect it to be perfect in the first place? Rather than harping on this, Canadians should rejoice in the fact that an agreement was possible, has been arrived at, and has the unanimous support of our federal, provincial, territorial and Aboriginal leaders—not a mean feat in itself.

There are still many questions to be answered. I have some apprehension regarding the election of senators. We are led to believe that some could be named by provinces and others would be elected. I am uncomfortable with the concept of a double majority. I have difficulty in reconciling two elected houses functioning efficiently in a parliamentary system. I wonder at the meaning of "self-government".

But these and other preoccupations will not dissuade me from voting "yes". The question we are asked to answer refers to a renewed Constitution on the basis—and I emphasize the three words "on the basis"—of the August 28 agreement. I interpret this to mean that, once approval is given, the final text will build on the consensus. No doubt clarifications and even changes will take place along the way, but the main thrust, as expressed in the consensus, and hopefully approved by a majority of Canadians in all provinces, will remain.

The whole history of Canada has been that of daring, of a daring people. Canadians dared to build a country when few would even have tried. The first explorers, the traders, the surveyors, the builders of the railroads, the great waves of immigrants—all was done in a daring way, as more often than not they were going into the unknown with very little but hope.

Canadians dared again in 1867. Once the BNA Act initiated a new relationship between the provinces, things did not go smoothly—far from it. The last 125 years have been marked by a series of changing relationships within the federation, of new definitions, of revised sharing of responsibilities and dividing of jurisdictions, always in an evolutionary sense, for Canadians are a people who profoundly believe in evolution, not revolution.

Now we are called upon to express ourselves collectively on the latest phase of this evolutionary process. Canadians are asked to dare again, to confirm an agreement which, despite its flaws and imperfections, nonetheless represents significant progress in the search for even more harmonious relations between all Canadians.

In voting "yes" on October 26, Canadians will contribute significantly toward this end and the rest of the world will look on in envy as what is known to be the best country in the world becomes even better.

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, my remarks will be very brief in the interests of time and trying to avoid repetition. At the outset, I want to congratulate Senator Everett on his comments dealing with western alienation, the issue of francophone voting and the effectiveness of the new Senate. I identify with and adopt his remarks as my own in the interests of saving time.

In trying to avoid being caught up in the wave of emotion and "bad Canadian-good Canadian" and "better a bad deal than no deal", and so on, I have tried to examine this question as I would a major labour contract that I was going to try to sell to the membership. If I took this agreement in this form, with the absence of all the detail, to the membership, before the meeting was over they would run me out of the hall and, at the earliest opportunity, would throw me out of office.

To add to the confusion, I find it difficult to understand that an option in an effective and elected Senate would be gender equality. I understand that this is a platform or a plank in the federal NDP policy, but does it really belong as an option here?

I read with interest Senator Carney's comments in the Toronto Star the other day. She said:

> I would not want to run from a women's list of Senate candidates, as B.C. Premier (Mike) Harcourt has proposed. I've always run in British Columbia as a person, and I have won my nomination against men and women and I have won my elections against men and women. And I hope when the new Senate is elected, British Columbians will have the same opportunity to do that . . .

Premier Harcourt has stated that he wishes to have 50 per cent of the seats for British Columbia reserved for women and 50 per cent reserved for men. I do not like that idea because it is a quota system and a quota system is unfair not only to women candidates but also to voters because it limits their participation to a certain number of seats and limits their representation on issues.

Premier Harcourt did say that about ten days ago. A few days later he said that if you voted "yes" on the referendum, it was giving him a mandate to impose gender equality. A few days later, because of the hostility and anger of the population, he said that that was not carved in stone and did not necessarily apply.

After their retreat last weekend, one of the lady ministers announced that it was a done deal, that there will be gender equality. A few minutes later, Premier Harcourt announced that he was the premier and it was not a done deal.

Now that we have that clear, we can get on with the vote.

If they were going to make this an option in the Constitution, why did the premiers and Mr. Clark not have the courage to go all the way and have true gender equality? Why did they not limit the voting for lady senators to women only and for men senators to men only? Some would say that sounds ridiculous. Perhaps it is, but is it any more ridiculous than the following scenario of what could happen?

We have an election on a particular date to elect six senators for British Columbia. Let us assume that the first three elected—one, two, and three—are new senators, men, and the next three are used senators like Perrault, Austin and Lawson. We are elected four, five and six. During the victory celebration Premier Harcourt walks in and announces that those who were elected four, five and six are to be replaced by those who were not elected but ran seven, eight and nine. The Premier then appoints them in our place, to be part of the new elected Senate.

I agree with Senator Fairbairn that during the negotiations someone ran out of steam.

I know that what Senator Pitfield and others have said is true, that there is a lot of tiredness amongst the population, that they want to get this deal over with and to get on with the Prime Minister's promise to deal with the economy and so on. However, I have attended a number of conferences in British Columbia. It may be because we have so many "hot-liners" talking about it, but the fact is that we have a very well-informed population that is very angry and think this is a bad deal, not only for the West but for British Columbia. They believe that we were badly out-negotiated. Whether that is our fault or the fault of the entire committee, I do not know. They believe that we are not fairly represented by the number of seats we were given. They believe it was a wrong decision to solve the problem of Western alienation by giving a greater concentration of power to Ontario and Quebec. There is considerable anger and hostility and they are going to be good and courageous Canadians and many are going to vote "no".

Unlike a bad labour contract, which you can renegotiate two or three years later to correct your mistakes, it appears that this deal will run longer than that. It may run forever, or even longer than that if we cannot agree on what "forever" means. So it is going to be very difficult to make those kinds of changes.

If I went into negotiations saying, "If we have any grievances or problems, we will resolve them with 337 management representatives and 62 of us, and we will take a majority decision to resolve your grievances in the future," they would probably go for a butterfly net and check whether I was certifiable.

There is a lot of anger and hostility. Surprisingly, there are an awful lot of Canadians who know what is going on here. I have recently attended two major functions involving large groups of people, and one of the groups was largely composed of Conservatives. Not one person there said they would support the referendum. One of the reasons they gave was that this new chamber will be far less effective than what we presently have. I think that is true. We have been totally emasculated. It will be totally ineffective and the people of Canada are aware of it. I do not accept that you are a bad Canadian if you vote "no". Being a Canadian means having the courage, if you see a wrong, to right it. It means that if you see something outstanding that needs to be corrected, you stand up and speak about it, and I think that many Canadians will. I do not accept that this is our only chance, that it is better to have a bad deal than no deal. I support the idea of a referendum. I have great difficulty voting "yes" for the package as negotiated. I would want a lot more detail and a lot more information; only then could I, like other ordinary Canadians, make a reasoned judgment on this question.

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I wish to say a few words on this motion. I spent five months on the constitutional committee, and I was a reasonably faithful attender. I was one of those who signed the Liberal position on the Senate and on other matters.

When I received the Consensus Report on the Constitution the other day, I found it unusual that we had just spent $25 million studying the Constitution, holding large conferences and consulting with thousands of Canadians across the country; but though there are quite a few points in this document, I do not see any of that work referred to.

As I recall, the Prime Minister said when the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee report was released that it was perhaps the best report that had ever been received in Parliament. He had nothing but very extravagant, good words to say about the substance of that committee which, as I say, cost the Canadian taxpayers $25 million and took a lot of work by the participants from all parties going around the countryside trying to resolve these thorny issues.

To my surprise, when I read through the Consensus Report on the Constitution and reach the end of it, I notice that there are fourteen issues which we dealt with in the constitutional committee that are not dealt with in this report. Fourteen issues which we resolved were left unresolved.

At the end of it then, I see another six issues that they claim to have discussed, one of which is extremely important involving the notice of change to federal legislation respecting Established Programs Financing. That was something that the joint committee took very seriously because, as you know, the federal government is accused of unilaterally cancelling programs in which it had previously participated without giving proper notice to provinces. I was surprised when I saw that that issue had been discussed, but even though this is a provincial document put together by provincial premiers, the issue was not resolved. Yet it was the provincial premiers who had been the most preoccupied with the question of the federal government changing Established Programs Financing without proper notice.

As I look through this so-called "Final Text" from Charlottetown, which is far from final, I see that it is the basis for an agreement, but that very few issues have been settled other than the issue of the three federal institutions. If the decision in the referendum is "yes", then the people of Canada have authorized changes in their principal federal institutions: The House of Commons, the Senate and the Supreme Court.

It seems to me that those changes legitimise, in the way that they are presented, the old compact theory of Confederation which has been discredited for so long. The argument made at the end of the 19th century was that Canada is, in fact, a compact between provinces and that the sovereignty of states, contrary to what Sir John A. Macdonald said in 1865, is paramount. That is the position endorsed in this document, if the people of Canada agree.

The implications for future constitutional change—for example, residual power, which was of such concern to the Fathers of Confederation and which is not dealt with in this document —will then be dealt with by the premiers because this will legitimise the fact that they are the real Fathers of Confederation. This is the notion of executive federalism. The premiers will have successfully usurped the power of Canada, and the next power they will be after will be the residual power, because that is really the essence of Canada; residual power being the difference, as Sir John A. Macdonald pointed out in his great speech, between what the Fathers of Confederation decided was needed to avoid the American problem of the sovereignty of states. That is really what is dealt with in this report.

Honourable senators, Senator Kenny made an extremely valuable observation—and others have been made this afternoon—that more time should be given to Canadians to reflect on the implications of this fundamental change in the Canadian Constitution, the way Canada is constituted, and who constitutes Canada. Of course, if the "yes" vote prevails on October 26th, there will have been a massive revolution in Canada, and I hope that Canadians have time to understand that that is what this is all about.

Honourable senators, I do not have any more to say at the moment other than that I will be supporting the approval of the text of the referendum question. Though I think the time is short, I do also have great faith in Canadians.

I realize I may be contradicting myself, but I believe that whatever decision they arrive at will be a sound one. Even though the time is short they will see through, as people always do and always have, any attempts to take them in a direction in which they do not want to go.

One of the most valuable contributions to the process by the constitutional committee was the creation of the five conferences. Many people with different views, representing a cross-section of Canadians, attended those conferences and I certainly came away from the conferences convinced that, no matter how they were structured —and I had some questions about the structuring—their views could not be suppressed no matter how clever the attempt at suppression. Canadians want first to feel like Canadians.

I live in Ontario but I am not, first, an Ontarian; I am, first and foremost, a Canadian. My country is Canada. I left those conferences feeling more cheerful than I thought I would because I realized that the others who had attended also felt like Canadians. On October 26, they will be looking at this series of proposals, this mixture of legal and nonlegal proposals, with a very practised eye. I think they will reach the right decision.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, "there is no wisdom like frankness", said Benjamin Disraeli a century ago. I hope I can comply with this worthy counsel. I believe I have tried to do so for the 20 years I have spent in this chamber.

Last Friday I spoke in the Senate about a panel I chaired on United Nations peacekeeping the previous weekend in Mainz, Germany. I told honourable senators that it was a cause of some reflection on my part, a reflection on the kind of country I want Canada to be, a reflection on why we had developed a pathfinder role in this area. I referred to General Lewis Mackenzie's remarks when he pointed out to me, on his return from Sarajevo, that every country in trouble takes note of the Canadian telephone number and says, "Hey, we would like you to come and help out here too." I pointed out that when our brother calls and asks us to help out as his peacekeeper I confidently expect that the response will be yes. I said that I expect Canadians will do that because they realize peace is a process, and we as Canadians must keep that process on track.

Oliver Wendell Holmes once said that the great thing in this world is not so much where we are but in what direction we are moving. These are words I cherish as a Canadian because national unity, like peace, is a process. We must work hard to keep that process on track. In fact, we as Canadians do have the privilege of working overtime in the service of our special community, in the interests of our compassionate northern democracy.

Canadians as a people have rejected the status quo as their master. Something new has been created here but the struggle is unfinished. I see this as a source of optimism and a source of challenge. I have always believed it to be impossible to set boundaries to the Canadian spirit.

As I flew home from Europe last week, I witnessed the geographic symbolism of our unfinished struggle as a people. From the air the coastline of this great country seems almost reluctant to relinquish control to the Atlantic. The land itself is locked in a perpetual struggle for dominance with the sea. The struggle is unfinished. Water, lakes, ice, the Laurentian Shield, the prairies, the Rockies, all are locked in a struggle for supremacy as the traveller proceeds through the vastness of Canada. We remain as pioneers to many. How else can it be? To the aerial traveller it appears to be merely circumstance which cements this thin strip together north of the U.S. border. Canadians know differently. They have rejected the status quo in favour of an unfinished struggle. They have decided that the direction in which they are moving is more important than where they are presently.

For the Europeans I spoke with recently, there is a sense of genuine concern and wonderment about the present state of our union. Many of them are aware that our experiment in nation building has lead to a functioning multicultural federation. It has become a source of encouragement to those who wish to build a European community, a common house from the Atlantic to the Urals. They look to us for encouragement. We have built such a common house from the Atlantic to the Pacific in the Canadian way. We have demonstrated to the international community that nation building is, indeed, a daily act of will. We have demonstrated there are no boundaries to the energies of our people. As D'Arcy McGee pointed out in Halifax in 1864, "Only those who have a vested interest in their own insignificance have opposed our union".

So Europeans say with concern, many of them fluent in five or six languages—a source of joy and challenge to them, not of fatigue—"We read that you are suffering constitutional fatigue; that many of you will do anything to put an end to your unfinished struggle. We hear and read that Canadians are tired of the process of nation building. Such a disappointment", many of them said to me. Canadians are known to be global adventurers, scornful of marginality; a country whose institutions are the envy of the world.

Canada has been known as a common house whose foundations rest in responsible radicalism. It is a special kind of place; yet, today, many pioneers in the international community look to us for counsel on the parameters of democratic pluralism. They look to us for blueprints by which to build psychic bridges across Europe from a nation whose engineering feats in their construction are legendary. Instead, they hear that Canadians are tired; they suffer constitutional weariness. But most of the world's population would give anything to trade their problems for ours.

In Atlantic Canada it goes without saying that times are hard. Our human resources have been marginalized. It is the marginalization of our resource which is the fundamental tragedy of our time. Poverty frequents the once proud communities of Atlantic Canada. It has become a generational problem. Too many younger people have lost the tools they need to make things happen, to make change happen. For too many Canadians these tools are rusting away. We are a nation whose statistics speak of underinvestment in productivity—in economic productivity, and in social productivity. The statistics speak of our humiliation. Unemployment stalks the land unimpeded, particularly in my part of the country. The confidence of our people —the collective will of our people to continue—is sapped.

With this in mind, like many other Canadians I am mindful of the imperfections of the Charlottetown accord. I am concerned about the potential threat to minimum national standards in areas such as medicare, day care and the like presented by this prospectus, by this general agreement. I know that the relevant amendments remain to be negotiated. However, I am alarmed at the implications presented by the spending power provisions.

I am not alone in these concerns in Atlantic Canada. I am equally worried about the potential transfer of jurisdiction over manpower training and labour market development to the provinces. Self-administered, poorer regions could become low-skill labour ghettos, inimical to the interests of Atlantic Canadians. The implications for Canada's poorest provinces are clearly enormous.

Let me look briefly at the Triple-E. The trendy alliteration has been almost hypnotic. It obscures the fact that there is very little substance to most of the "E"s. The Charlottetown deal will provide for a new Senate which is as unequal as it is ineffective, and as it is at core unrepresentative.

Allow me to begin with the procedures for election envisaged by the agreement. I do not think that anyone in this chamber is unaware that provincial governments can control the election process. The Senate, it is anticipated, will become an antechamber of rampant partisanship—an antechamber of differing classes of senators rather than a chamber of sober second thought.

I am on the record as being a solid supporter of an elected Senate. However I am concerned with the elected Senate as proposed. I think it must be remembered that while the Senate has always had a regional role, senators were meant to represent their regions or their provinces and not their provincial governments. I throw out a word of warning in this regard. We must exercise vigilance in introducing congressional and confederal elements into the Canadian parliamentary system. We must, as a people, think this aspect through with care.

I am equally persuaded that the Charlottetown proposals will not in any fashion lead to a more effective Senate. To begin with, I would like to remind those who wish to reform the Senate for reform's sake that there is much considerable testimony that the Senate as presently constituted does perform useful and necessary functions as a legislative chamber. It is also worth remembering that the senators themselves have, in the past, attempted to reform the Senate in very useful ways. However, the time and circumstances were never right.

We are now told that the Senate should become a protector of minorities and regional expectations. I am fully in support of such a legitimate role for the Senate. But the Charlottetown deal does not confer such a role on the upper chamber; indeed it arguably threatens the useful functions now carried out in the Senate.

There is a temptation for reformers to make the best the enemy of the good. Canadians must be warned that there is very little effectiveness for a new Senate in the proposed agreement. There is very little equitability in it either. The deal ensures the dominance of the centre in the Canadian Confederation. With the new composition in the House of Commons, the Charlottetown numbers game guarantees the perpetual subordination, in my opinion, of Atlantic Canada in federal decision-making. Therefore I ask the citizens of Atlantic Canada to be vigilant in these times.

[Senator Graham.]

I do not want anyone to misunderstand my position. Who can say "no" to a request for a referendum? I am not asked to debate the Charlottetown package here at present. I am asked to say "yes" or "no" to an issue involving the Canadian people as vital agents in constitutional change—in fact, as agents of last resort. I say "yes" to this. And when October 26 comes around, I will say "yes" again. I will do so because national unity is a process and we must keep that process on track.

I do not see this as a national exercise involving winners and losers. If that were the case, Nova Scotia would be a loser, except that we would be out of the constitutional quagmire for a long time. We want to get on with the business of government, because times are hard and the challenges of an age of globalization are great.

I do not see this as a national exercise involving renewal or decay. I ask only one thing of Canadians: I ask them to exercise vigilance in their choice on October 26 and reflection and perseverance in ascertaining their vote. For the issue is not simply: Do you love Canada? The issue is whether we are prepared to work overtime in an unfinished struggle. Canada is a nation state in constant transition. It is a daily act of will. We must ask ourselves if we are prepared to be late for dinner in the service of our country, in the service of constitutional peace. I believe the answer will be "yes", for that again is the Canadian way.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, where they have been used, constitutional referendums have been intended to prevent executive governments and also legislatures from having a monopoly of constitutional change, and also to provide legitimacy for constitutional amendments.

We are being requested by the government to approve the text of a referendum question to read as follows:

> Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992? Yes—No.

This request by the government puts three related questions to the Senate. First, is this the right time to hold a constitutional referendum? Second, is it desirable to promote the constitutional amendment package forecast in the Charlottetown accord? Third, is the wording of the referendum question the appropriate wording?

The government says "yes" to all these questions. And it now asks the Senate to give the same response to each of those three questions. It asks us to say "yes" not to one question but to three questions.

Perhaps what I am about to say next will reveal my background. I will ask what rules should be followed by a government in launching and conducting a referendum when that government wants an affirmative response from the people? The first rule is that the question ought to be neutral. The question ought not to be loaded by the spin doctors, because there is a risk that the members of the electorate will vote "no" in protest against the insult implied by the spin on the question.

Second, the question ought to deal directly with the substance of the proposed amendment. This means that a referendum question ought not to deal with a complex package of amendments. The risk of asking for the support of a package of amendments is that the entire package will be rejected because of the inclusion of one amendment or because of the omission of some other amendment.

● (1650)

For example, in the present case, many voters in Nova Scotia and Western Canada may vote "no", not because of their attitude towards Quebec, but because the new Senate will produce a result diametrically opposite to the result that was sought. Again, many voters may vote "no" because, with regard to language and culture, half the francophone senators will be able to veto a decision of even a unanimous House of Commons and all the other senators. We know that if a majority does not vote for any motion, that motion does not carry. A tie is not sufficient to carry a motion. Again, many will vote "no" because the package does not entrench rights for specific groups such as the disabled. There is a risk that many people will vote "no" because of these and many other defects of inclusion or omission.

Another rule is that any amendment for which approval is sought in a referendum ought to be in its final terms. If what is approved is only a vague outline, an outline to be put into final terms later, there is a risk that legitimacy, which is one of the purposes of the referendum, will not be gained. On the contrary, there is a serious risk that the amendment, when finally made, will be regarded as illegitimate. People will say, "That is not what I voted for." Again, any referendum message that a government wants to have carried ought to be carried by popular messengers. Otherwise the message, regardless of how good it may be, may be rejected because the messengers are not persona grata.

Another rule in promoting an amendment in a referendum is that a government ought to avoid advancing ulterior reasons for voting "yes". The clear implication of the use of ulterior reasons is that the amendment cannot stand on its own merits. I was reminded of the importance of candid speech on public matters by what Senator Doyle said so eloquently today when he spoke about the late Bruce Hutchison. What would Hutchison have said about some of the ulterior reasons that are now being put forward in support of the proposed amendment package to be voted on in the referendum on October 26?

For example, we are told, "Say yes and Canada will enjoy constitutional peace for 50 years." But when we look at the text of the Charlottetown Accord we see that five or ten years of constitutional battles are inevitable. Then we are told that if the constitutional accord achieved at Charlottetown is approved on October 26, we will be able to get on with making the economy move again. "Just put this package behind us on October 26 and there will be jobs, jobs, jobs." Senators, there is a grave risk that such ulterior reasons zealously advanced will plant the shrewd suspicion that the amendments proposed in the referendum are defective.

Another rule is that in promoting an amendment in a referendum, the government ought to avoid heavy expenditure, especially when many citizens have no money. Such expenditure is liable to arouse hostility, hostility that will bring forth a "no" vote in the referendum.

Now, senators, add up the risks of breaking these rules, and add to them any other risks that come to mind, and the conclusion must be that the proposed referendum on October 26 may fail. I am compelled to conclude that the referendum proposed by the government for October 26 is both ill-conceived and fraught with desperate risks.

I do not believe that the Prime Minister intentionally contrived the political and constitutional situation in which Canada finds itself today. Why did the government decide to propose the enactment of an act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada? That was Bill C-81, a bill which received Royal Assent on June 23, 1992. I think we know the answers. First, it was known that the government of Quebec was committed by law to hold a referendum on sovereignty on October 26, 1992. Second, it was anticipated that a consensus of the premiers and the other negotiators, a consensus acceptable to the government of Canada, could not be achieved. Taking these two points into account, the government of Canada wished first to be able to propose its own set of constitutional amendments before the Quebec referendum, and second, it wished to be able to give its proposed amendments legitimacy and weight by means of a successful federal referendum.

What happened? Well, early in July, the Prime Minister left the country on important public business, and while away he lost control of the constitutional amendment process. On July 7, 1992, the premiers, with the cooperation of Mr. Clark, came up with their own scheme, a scheme which Mr. Clark said could not be substantially changed. Listen to that. "Prime Minister, you cannot change this scheme substantially." Thereafter, the Prime Minister and his cabinet colleagues were tied to that scheme by the bonds of collective responsibility. They had lost the initiative.

Why were the premiers able and willing to come to an agreement in July? First, they wished to maintain and to promote the unity of Canada. Second, and notice this, they wished to avoid the creation of an effective Senate such as had been proposed by the Prime Minister and his colleagues in September 1991. Third, the first minister of Quebec and perhaps others were anxious to avoid the popular election of senators.

● (1700)

Put together the desire to avoid an effective Senate and the desire to avoid the popular election of senators in every province, honourable senators, and we understand why there had to be provincial equality in the Senate. At least one element of the constitutional trinity —the Triple-E—had to be retained and the element that was least threatening to the premiers was equality. That is why the premiers dealt with Senate reform as they did.

Then the next step was that Quebec, perhaps understandably, could not agree to an equal Senate without gaining what could be defended in Quebec as adequate compensation. Accordingly, there are to be 18 additional members for Quebec in the House of Commons. And if Bourassa is to have 18, surely Bob Rae, too, must have 18.

Naturally, Premier Rae was absolutely delighted. He got 18 additional members in the House of Commons for Ontario in return for the virtual abolition of the Senate. No member of the New Democratic Party had ever imagined such an achievement— the virtual abolition of the Senate and 18 new seats for Ontario. What a magnificent achievement! If we are to have someone negotiate for Canada abroad, put Bob Rae's name at the top of the list. He did a great job for Ontario and the NDP.

This process is how the Prime Minister and most of his colleagues have been trapped. They have been Shanghaied. They have been caught up in an ill-conceived scheme; an ill-conceived scheme from which they cannot escape. They are being swept into a referendum fraught with risks. I suspect they see those risks clearly. That is why at times they lapse into shrill rhetoric.

Where does that leave us in the Senate? To vote in favour of Senator Murray's motion is to vote for a constitutional referendum on October 26. To vote in favour of his motion is to approve the wording of the referendum question. To vote in favour of his motion is to vote for the constitutional changes based on the Charlottetown accord.

Do not deceive yourselves, honourable senators. You are not voting only on the question of whether a referendum with certain words will take place. This referendum is intended to advance the actualization of the constitutional changes set forth in the Charlottetown accord. The advancement of that accord is what you will be voting for, honourable senators.

For example, if you vote in favour of this motion, honourable senators, you will be voting for an ineffective Senate. You will be voting for a Senate that will be nothing but an expensive nuisance. You will be voting for an option that is so bad that it would be better if there were no Senate at all.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Stewart: It will be to vote that Ontario will have 18 seats in the House of Commons over and above the 99 seats now allotted to it. It will be to vote that Quebec will have 18 seats in the House of Commons over and above the 75 seats now allotted to it. That makes a combined total of 210 out of 337. That is what you will be voting for, honourable senators.

On the other hand, are there reasons why senators should not vote "no"? Yes, there are. A "no" vote here this afternoon may be misunderstood as a vote against Quebec. A "no" vote may be misunderstood as a vote against the aspirations of Canadian Aboriginal people. Alas, a "no" vote may be misunderstood as a vote for the present unreformed Senate.

[Senator Stewart.]

I say that this referendum proposal is highly risky. It is a venture into shallow reef-strewn waters. The government decided early in July that it had no alternative to taking this risk. That is the government's decision. Fortunately for me, I do not have to say that I believe this referendum is wise. I think this referendum seriously endangers the future unity of this country. It does so because it offends against most of the rules I have set forth this afternoon.

Honourable senators, I do not want to play this government's game. I will abstain on this motion.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Would Senator Stewart clarify for me a couple of his remarks?

Senator Stewart: Certainly, if I can.

Senator MacDonald: I have never heard that a "yes" vote means constitutional peace, Senator Stewart, which you just said it does. I understood that this was a continuing process, something referred to by Senators Graham and Fairbairn. Where did the honourable senator get the idea that we would have constitutional peace if we have a "yes" vote? That is my first question. I have others.

Senator Stewart: I have heard it said, and I do not have texts here before me, that the people of Canada are sick and tired of hearing about the Constitution. They are distressed at the enormous sums of money that already have been expended on conferences which, as Senator Stollery has said, apparently have had little or no impact at all on the substance of the accord. They want all this behind them. They say, "Let's vote 'yes' and be done with it so that we can get on with the task of making this country prosperous again."

One lady, a very good Liberal lady, by the way, perhaps known to the Honourable Senator MacDonald, recently said to me, "I don't care what's in it. Sign it so that we can have peace and prosperity."

Senator MacDonald: Senator Stewart, you have given ways in which a "no" vote may be interpreted or misinterpreted. My question is not exactly hypothetical, but would you give us your opinion as to what would happen in the tragic event that a "no" vote—clear and absolutely unambiguous, carries the day on October 26? Can you give us some idea as to what you think the consequences might be in that case?

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I could guess, but let me remind Senator MacDonald of what Senator Castonguay said last night. He described in ominous language what would happen if Canadians outside Quebec vote "no". I say this referendum risks that outcome because of all the mistakes that this government has made in bringing on this referendum in this way at this time.

But when Senator Castonguay was asked by Senator Molgat what would be the consequences of a "no" vote in Quebec, what did he say? He ducked the question. Now, Senator Castonguay is from Quebec. He is in a far better position to deal with that question than I am. And if Senator Castonguay feels that it is desirable to evade the question, I cannot see why I should attempt to forecast the result of a negative vote in Quebec on future developments in Quebec.

Senator Perrault: Is this Question Period?

Senator MacDonald: My third question would be: What happens if there is a resounding "yes" vote and all of the information, all of the legal texts still have to be dealt with? Because I can pick as many flaws in this accord as anyone in this chamber. However, I really do not see the purpose in doing it. I admit that it is natural that it would arise in a motion just strictly on a referendum question, but we would still be in the position where we would have, as Churchill said, "Rah, rah, rah", instead of "War, war, war". And that is the question I am putting to you in your abstention.

Senator Stewart: I cannot say confidently that I understand the question, but I think I have an intimation of what the senator is getting at. I argued—and, if I am wrong, I hope that someone will not just say so, but will demonstrate that I am wrong—that the government's plans went awry when Mr. Clark went along with the premiers in July. He failed to fail. And from then on the other members of the government have been caught up in an avalanche not of their own making.

I do not think it is up to me, as one senator, to undertake to try to tell the government how it can, at this late date, get off that slope. Perhaps if the Prime Minister, when he returned from Europe, had said, "No way. We will not be carried along by one member of the government"—Let us remember that Mr. Wilson spoke out and also other members of the cabinet. Perhaps at that point, this derailment might have been stopped by the government without much grief.

But at this late date, I cannot give them a remedy for their plight. I do not think it is incumbent upon me to try to do so. They have the responsibility. Do not apply to me for salve for these self-inflicted wounds.

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, if I may ask a question in clarification, I am interested in the honourable senator's argument relating to the Senate as conceptualized in the Charlottetown Consensus Report.

Do you find no element of bicameralism in that proposal? And if you think there is an element, obviously new, can it work?

Senator Stewart: I thank the honourable senator for his question. Let us put aside, first, the question of bills that appropriate money. Senator Everett, I felt, opened up that problem quite effectively.

If we define an appropriation bill as one that requires a Royal Recommendation—sections 53 and 54 comprise the only place in which the word "appropriation" appears in the Constitution now—then the free trade bill with the United States could be classified as an appropriation bill. It appropriated money and was introduced in the House of Commons with a Royal Recommendation.

It may be that the definition of appropriation bills—of money bills, to use language which we have heard here repeatedly—will be narrowed down to include only bills based on Estimates. That takes us to the second category of bills —most of the others. If such a bill is defeated or amended in the Senate, there is to be a joint session of the 62 senators and the 337 members of the House of Commons.

We can anticipate two situations in the House of Commons. There will be the situation where the government of the day will have a good working majority. In that case they can readily out-vote in a joint session even a unanimous Senate.

The 62 senators in a joint sitting might be decisive against a very closely balanced House of Commons, but surely that is precisely the situation in which a second chamber is not required to check the executive.

Insofar as bills that materially affect French language or French culture are concerned, I think we are into some uncertain waters.

First, what is a francophone senator? Is it one who can pass a language test, or is it someone who, although his or her French may be amateurish, genuinely represents a considerable francophone population?

Let us imagine a situation in which there are 12 Francophone senators, five from Quebec, seven from outside. We then have a situation where a tie vote will defeat a motion, notwithstanding that, at the logical extreme, every member of the 337 members in the House of Commons and all the other senators are on the other side.

Let me say two things in conclusion. First, the Senate now projected is diametrically opposite to the Senate that Premier Getty and Premier Wells initially advocated. They lost out in the negotiations.

Second, it seems to me that this proposed Senate, partly composed of senators popularly elected, partly composed of national delegates, with its limited powers, is going to be so insignificant that this Senate will amount to nothing other than a very expensive nuisance. If we must go in this direction, if this is the only reform of the Senate now available to us, let us abolish the Senate and be rid of it.

[Translation]

Senator Norbert L. Thériault: Honourable senators, I would like to express very briefly my thoughts and my position on the motion before us today.

As I did during the debate in 1990 on the Meech Lake Accord, I have carefully read everything I could find about the agreement that is being submitted to a referendum.

Today, as usual, I carefully listened to the people who are supposed to be constitutional and parliamentary experts, including Senators Everett, Pitfield and Stewart.

First, I want to express my concerns. I am concerned about the kind of response the question will get from Canadians and especially from Quebecers.

I am concerned that Senator Murray seems to be making a point of asking each Liberal senator, especially, how he intends to vote on the question and that he is taking notes. This worries me—not because because you are involved, Senator Murray—because I get the impression, and I hope I am mistaken, that there is a plan afoot to gather information to play party politics with the referendum question. I think that is a cause for concern.

Senator Murray should know that one the main reasons why Meech Lake was rejected—or at least he ought to know—was that the Prime Minister said, too soon after Meech Lake, that he rolled the dice.

I hope we do not get into a situation where the government or the Prime Minister or Senator Murray say they will roll the dice.

My second concern as a Francophone is the situation in Quebec. As a Francophone outside Quebec, I think it is very important that my Canada should include Quebec. I think we should remember there are people in this Chamber . . . and that Mr. Bourassa himself is somewhat to blame for a situation that is almost 50/50, according to the experts in Quebec today. The reason why today, Bourassa is faced with a Jean Allaire and Mario Dumont and others is that, as I see it, he went too far. These people are right to doubt his sincerity.

That being said, I support without reservations the question Canadians will be asked on October 26.

I do so as a Francophone outside Quebec and as a Canadian. I do so because I believe that the Association des francophones acadiens and the Fédération des communautés francophones et acadiennes reflected the feelings of Francophones outside Quebec in their press release.

Like a lot of other people, I could query all the points raised by those who took part in this debate. I respect the right to raise these points, but I think you could take just about any agreement, just as lawyers could take a legal text and they would be split down the middle on how it should be interpreted.

Because of my background, I have an appreciation of elected representatives at the provincial level as well. When ten first ministers belonging to various political parties with different positions on different issues and with different political philosophies are able to reach a consensus with the Government of Canada, I have to respect that.

There is a tendency among people who have only worked in Ottawa to think that only federal members or members of the federal Cabinet are real Canadians and have the answers to all Canada's problems. That isn't true. Since 1867, Canada has had a system that consists of two levels of government, each with its own responsibilities. Because I worked with a premier for ten years at the provincial level, I believe this premier was just as good a Canadian—and he still is—as any Prime Minister you could see in Ottawa or anywhere else.

[Senator Thériault.]

I hear my friend Senator Stewart, a parliamentary expert, say he is worried about the fact that there will be 18 more members from Quebec and 18 more from Ontario, but what difference does it make to us in the Maritimes? At the federal level, this country has always beem led by Quebec and Ontario, and that is only normal, because they happen to have most of the members. Whether they have 18 more or less is not going to make that much difference. I know a lot of points were raised by my colleagues.

I believe in the new Senate. I say sincerely that if I were 30 years younger and decided on a political career, I would go for the new Senate, because for once, at least in Ottawa, in the central government, in Parliament, I would feel equal with a man or woman from Ontario or Quebec because there would be six senators from New Brunswick, six from Ontario and six from Quebec.

For those who are concerned about the Senate's powers—they may not be all the powers that I would have liked to see—I am convinced that with 62 elected senators, it will not create problems. As an aside, what concerns me is that Quebec is thinking of having its senators elected or appointed by the legislature. I do not believe that will last long, for example, because when the senators from Quebec have served one or two terms here, they will feel the pressure to be elected by the people.

You know, in 1867, almost half the debates on the 1867 accord dealt with the Senate and its powers. At that time, there was an elected legislative council in every province of Canada. The leaders at the 1864 and 1867 conferences opted for an appointed Senate because they thought that an elected Senate or elected legislative bodies had too much power.

Among the quotations that I noted in these discussions, I would mention one by George Brown in 1867 in opposition to the election of senators. He said this:

• (1730)

[English]

> . . . It has been said that members of the Upper House ought not to be appointed by the Crown, but should continue to be elected by the people at large. On that question my views have been often expressed. I have always been opposed to a second elective chamber and I am so still, from the conviction that the two elective Houses are inconsistent with the right working of the British parliamentary system . . . [W]hen the elective element becomes supreme, who will venture to affirm that the Council — —of course, "council" meaning the legislative council that was replaced by the Senate—

> — would not claim that power over money bills which this House claims as of right belonging to itself? Could they not justly say that they represent the people as well as we do, and that the control of the purse strings ought, therefore, to belong to them as much as to us? It is said they have not the power. But what is to prevent them from enforcing it?

I base my approach to this Senate on this type of philosophy.

Honourable senators, can you imagine six senators elected from Ontario, six senators elected from Quebec—and I hope they will be elected by the people of Quebec—or even six elected senators from New Brunswick? Do you think, if I were one of the six elected senators from New Brunswick and there were ten MPs in the other place, that I would not feel, and rightly so, that I have as much right to speak for my people as those elected members in the other place? It will not happen that way.

While the opponents to this proposed Senate can make a case on paper, I believe they fail to understand the human element in elected people. I am prepared to say that the new Senate will be effective once people have learned to work together in this place. There will be 62 new senators. It is farfetched to say that there will be a government in the other place elected with a majority of more than 62. It will not happen very often. It is farfetched to say that the elected Senate could not be effective, because if the government of the day does not see to it that there is cooperation between this place and the elected members of the other place, they will have trouble with every piece of legislation that comes to this place. The senators will, for 30 days, be able to withhold their consent to every piece of legislation that comes before them. I say this is a much better situation than we now have.

Honourable senators, I have now been in this place for 13 years. I can honestly say that never, in my wildest dreams, did I dream of becoming a senator. I had no interest in the Senate until I was appointed.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: Until there was a vacancy.

Senator Thériault: I am glad I accepted the appointment, because I met a lot of good and experienced people. I admire the ability of those who sit in this chamber, but, as an institution, I must honestly tell you that I never thought the Senate was very effective.

[Translation]

I want to be able to tell my children and grandchildren or at least read to them what I said about the debate on this amendment, when they wonder where their father or grandfather was when that decision was being made. I support this agreement. I am in favour of a yes vote in the Senate, and I beg Quebecers and above all I beg the thousands of Acadians living in Quebec to consider their compatriots who are outside Quebec and to consider this country which has been good for Quebec. In spite of what we have heard from the other side of this Chamber in the past few years, Quebecers have come a long way inside Canada. A small group that had practically no power in 1867, has expanded to include five million Quebecers who have a lot of power, a lot of energy and a great deal of influence on decisions that are made in this country.

You know, it really hurts me when I hear so many Quebecers or French Canadians, as we used to say, who are almost ashamed to admit that Wilfrid Laurier, Georges-Étienne Cartier, Saint-Laurent, Trudeau and Mulroney are Quebecers, Quebecers who helped build this country. I hope common sense will prevail on October 26, in Quebec and the rest of Canada.

In concluding, I hope that my descendants will be able to say that when this agreement was adopted, their father or grandfather was there. In fact, I have already started in my part of the country to work with Conservatives, New Democrats, men and women, it doesn't matter. I want Canadians, including Quebecers, to say yes on October 26. It will not end all further constitutional talks. There will be more, because we are a confederation with two levels of government. There will always be some discussions. However, it is time we made up our minds. And I suggest we make up our minds to stand up for Canada on October 26.

[English]

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, all of us, regardless of party, love this country, and we have nothing but good to say about its potential and its future. The strong and opposing views expressed here reflect our concern about that future, despite the fact that we may differ on a great many points.

I must say that the process which has been set in motion to produce this new constitutional package is terribly flawed. The fact is that, for well over four years, Canadian constitution building has been the main growth industry in the country. I have attended many of the conferences, and I have shared with many others dreams, hopes and ideas about the future of Canada. I have seen some magnificent ideas developed, and initiatives enunciated, yet, in this package, we see very few of them. Those ideas included excellent recommendations which came from committees where a number of honourable senators here this evening have served.

Where have we arrived after spending at least $25 million of taxpayers' money on committees, commissions, studies, parliamentary hearings, along with costly citizen involvement sessions? In fact we have left the task of designing new federal institutions and a new Canada to a group of premiers, each with his own narrow provincial priorities. Again the question must be asked: Who spoke for Canada at those critical meetings in Charlottetown?

Now we have before us what has been described as the constitutional package, a package which is incomplete and devoid of detail. We are asked to journey into an unknown country, to take a giant leap of faith.

My friends, this is not the Grasshopper Control Act that we are discussing. This is not the Weed Abatement bill. I suspect that here in the Senate we would give more time to consider measures of thos kinds. Here, we are only considering the nation's future.

In the individual family, career and political decisions which we take week after week, we would never sign contracts or agreements on the basis of such a dearth of information as we have about this package. The lawyers are literally still drafting the details.

I ask myself this question: Are we being fair with this generation and the generations to come by approving this process of constitution building through exhaustion, rushing through Parliament a set of infinitely critical proposals so that arbitrarily established political deadlines may be met?

At some point in the process, may I express the fervent personal hope that a free vote will be declared, allowing all members of all parties to vote according to conscience. The future of this nation is more important than politics and there are moral issues involved in deciding the future of this country, just as important issues as capital punishment or abortion and other "conscience" issues where free votes are permitted. Indeed, some of the package's proposals are severely flawed.

Will there be a reformed Senate? The proposed Senate is nothing like the long sought-after Triple-E model. The major proposals for Senate and Commons changes fall short of what they should be, so much so that if possible an attempt should be made to improve and change them for the sake of the country and the future before they are enacted into law. Where is the Senate-inspired idea for election by proportional representation to help assure that a greater range of dissident voices can be heard? The premiers did not like it so they pulled it out.

Many of us had hoped that half of the senators would be elected between general elections or at specified fixed intervals to keep a government more conscience of its commitment to the people of the country. The premiers said they did not like it. The premiers rejected the concept and they have recommended that Senate elections be held at the same time as general elections, thus minimizing the ability of citizens to censure governments.

The premiers did not like the proposal for an effective suspensive veto for the Senate, so it was kicked out, too. Why not a six, eight or twelve month suspensive veto to allow time to mobilize regional views and concerns about possibly bad legislation?

There are no plans to make the Senate less political, as many committees have suggested. The premiers did not like it. Why not a Senate which would permit those of all parties to work effectively and cooperate freely in efforts to serve the great regions of this country? Abandoned are proposals to have the Senate act as a check on an excessively powerful executive. The premiers did not like it.

The number of senators will be reduced from 104 to 62. The premiers said, "We want to save money". Then in a volte face, they proposed an increase in the number of members of the House of Commons by 36.

[Senator Perrault.]

Is it too outrageous to suggest that at some point in our history there should be a reduction in the ratio between the Senate and the House of Commons from, say, 337 to 62 senators to 240 in the Commons to the same 62 in the Senate? It would save almost $100 million a year. Proportionately, we havee far more members in Canada between the Senate and House of Commons than they do in the Congress of the United States.

When are we to start saving taxpayers some money? At the same time, we could improve the opportunity for the new Senate to play a real role in determining the fate of legislation by establishing a ratio which would at least admit the possibility, once in a while, of the Senate winning a vote.

One can only conclude that the premiers and the present Prime Minister prefer a weakened Senate. Indeed, three of the premiers are members of a party which for years has called for the abolition of the Senate. A former leader of the NDP of British Columbia said the other day, "Sure it may be weaker but I have always wanted to kick at the Senate anyway, so I guess it is a move in the right direction." On the other hand, we are told by the government apologists that this is an effort to create a dynamic new Senate, for heaven's sakes. They know better.

Canada's premiers may have certain policy differences but like their predecessors down through the nation's history, they hold steadfastly to the belief that they are the only legitimate spokesmen for the regions. I say it is a lie.

Obviously this latest group of premiers is not about to create a new and reinvigorated Senate which might serve to challenge that discredited myth. The new reformed Senate would be elected but only in certain provinces. Mr. Getty, that famous quarterback from years back—he will be premier for a while yet—said that we now have a Triple-E Senate that we have won on all counts. What about the sacred principle of an elected Senate? Some premiers are said to be considering the attractive option of appointing senators through their legislatures. In effect, some are saying, "We nay appoint ours."

One premier, Mr. Bourassa, has jettisoned the idea of direct election of senators and he has declared that Quebec intends to appoint its senators through its legislature. The first ministers' revised version of Senate reform would permit an unelected chamber in at least one province and would allow senators to be chosen in various ways.

The new Senate would not be equal in any kind of regional sense. An equal Senate would be created but only in a narrow, nominal fashion. Unless major changes are made, it would not be effective. May I say that I help to speak for the province of British Columbia, which is the third largest province in the Confederation, the most rapidly expanding province, and I am proud of that. I know my other Senate colleagues — Senator Carney, Senator Lawson and Senator Marchand and Senator Austin— are equally proud of our great province. However, there is real anger on the West Coast.

In order to achieve so-called equality in the number of senators per province and to "compensate" central Canada for its so-called "sacrifice" in permitting a reduction in its present seat allocation in a weakened Senate, the premiers were persuaded to give Quebec and Ontario many more seats in the powerful House of Commons where the real power is. The sales line in central Canada now is, "The Senate is now a paper tiger. We have taken its powers away. The real power is in the House of Commons."

Of course, they are right. Early in the negotiating process, Ontario's Premier Rae called for a "generosity of spirit" on the part of all people sitting around the negotiating table. That "generosity of spirit" inspired him to demand and receive 18 new Ontario seats in a strengthened House of Commons in exchange for an 18 seat reduction in the new, weakened and almost powerless Senate. Premier Harcourt of British Columbia said, "It was only fair; it was 18 for 18"—18 Senate seats for 18 extra Commons seats for Ontario. Predictably, Premier Bourassa was offered and accepted a similar reward to assuage his feelings of anguish about losing 18 of his Senate seats.

As an unexpected bonus Quebec would receive a guarantee that, whatever happens to Quebec's population in the future, that province, with Canada's lowest birth rate, would always have 25 per cent of the House of Commons membership. It is a bonanza that no province could refuse.

Is there anger and concern in British Columbia? There certainly is. British Columbia has been under-represented in the Senate for years and has been offered no such compensation. Indeed, the first version of the constitutional package would have reduced British Columbia's share of Commons seats. The only province in Canada with an initial percentage reduction in Commons representation also happens to be the fastest growing.

In the hockey world the kind of selfless Ontario-Quebec sacrifice of their precious Senate seats in return for compensation in the form of a handsome number of new seats in the House of Commons would be something like trading three Pee Wee league hockey players for Wayne Gretzky, Eric Lindros and Mark Messier.

The naivete of the premiers' concession to Canada's largest two provinces boggles the mind. Yet Premier Harcourt flew back to the West Coast, figuratively clad only in a barrel and waving a piece of paper saying, "I have achieved peace in our time". Under cross-examination by media people, Premier Harcourt wasn't quite sure just what had been achieved for B.C.

• (1750)

At a later press conference, he was hard-pressed to convince British Columbians that Charlottetown was anything but a disaster.

It was it was proposed initially that there would be six new western members in the so-called "reformed" House of Commons, four from British Columbia and two from Alberta. A promise of a further three British Columbia seats has now been made to lessen the sense of outrage and injustice felt on the west coast. Unlike, however, the 36 Ontario and Quebec bonus commons seats, their electoral impact will not be felt until the year 2003.

Under the proposed redistribution in the House of Commons, Quebec would be allotted one member in the House of Commons for every 74,000 Quebecers, or 93 seats. Good for them! But, on that scale, British Columbia should get 44. Under this proposal it gets only 39 and Premier Harcourt originally agreed to only 36. Alberta should get 34, but the shrewd Premier Getty quarterbacked Alberta to only 28 seats. The four western provinces together should get 106 seats. They actually get 95, scarcely enough to compensate for the fact that we have 1 million more people than Quebec. Therefore, the west will initially suffer an under-representation of 11 seats, enough to decide an election. But Quebec also gets that guarantee of 25 per cent of the House of Commons seats, regardless of its population. So, as its population proportion declines, the under-representation of the west will only worsen.

Needless to say, the premiers of the two most westerly provinces have been introduced thoroughly and painfully to the considerable negotiating skills of their central Canadian counterparts aided and abetted by the office of the Prime Minister.

Unfortunately, the Senate proposal in its present form may only serve to widen the gulf between western Canada and central Canada. The troubling fact is that the 18 extra House of Commons seats proposed for Ontario alone total more than Manitoba's entire House of Commons allocation of 14 seats. Central Canada's total of 36 new House of Commons bonus seats would be eight more than the 28 House of Commons seats now held by Manitoba and Saskatchewan combined. So much for enhancing western influence in Parliament and so much for Premier Rae's "generosity of spirit".

Will it be an effective Senate? Only one type of bill could be killed by the Senate: Legislation changing tax policy on natural resources. There are no federal taxes on natural resources now, so that "power" is really meaningless and irrelevant.

As far as other tax measures are concerned, how would senators explain to the people who elected them that they have no power at all over the taxes which the government wants to impose? Incredibly, all money bills would have to be dealt with in 30 days by this new so-called "reformed" Senate. If not, this joint assembly of the House of Commons' members and senators decide by a majority vote. The government majority of 337 House of Commons' members would be able to out-vote the 62-plus senators under almost all circumstances. A myth? Listen to these figures.

Using the percentage of seats held by the eight majority governments elected since 1949 and extrapolating from those figures, assuming a 337-member House of Commons and a 62-member Senate, at no time could 60 per cent of the senators opposed to legislation have defeated the majority government in a joint sitting of the two houses. No wonder some NDP spokesmen in British Columbia are saying that we have now created the Senate as a paper tiger.

In only four majority governments could 100 per cent of the senators opposed to government legislation have defeated the government, and they would all have to vote together, which would be a minor miracle. Put another way, 60 per cent of the senators opposed to legislation could only defeat a majority government with 51.7 per cent or less of the seats, and 100 per cent of the senators opposed to legislation could only defeat a majority government with 59.1 per cent or less of the seats. If the figures analysis is extended back to the 1930s the same results are obtained.

It is a hoax and it is a fraud to suggest that the new elected Senate would exert any meaningful power on decisions made in this country. Ordinary legislation which is debated and approved in the House of Commons, but defeated in the Senate, would go to a joint Commons-Senate vote where its fate would be sealed—again, within 30 short days. No more battles about the goods and services tax. No more battles about drug prices. No more battles about crucial issues affecting the Canadian people. Muzzle any controversy in 30 days.

Senator Murray: No more time.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, I would ask for an extension of time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I take it, honourable senators, it is agreed that the time be extended.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Perrault: Together with all of this, few people, including members of the media, realize the extent to which Senate power has been eroded in recent months. If one compares the powers of the Senate to the new rules imposed on the Senate, this is a crippled chamber.

In recent months, changes to the rules of the Senate forced through following the GST debate virtually emasculate the opposition. The Senate Speaker has been given broad new power to control events in the chamber, even though he is appointed directly by the Prime Minister, instead of being elected by his peers, as is done in the House of Commons.

The Speaker of the Senate has now been given the authority to cancel or delay indefinitely a scheduled sitting of the Senate. If he decides, for whatever reason, or following direction from the Prime Minister, that the Senate will not meet for the next six months, there is absolutely nothing anyone can do to have the Senate meet earlier. Most of those in the media seem not to be aware of this. I wonder if the members in the other place are aware of what has happened in this chamber.

The Speaker of the Senate has now been given the authority to cut off debate on any points of order and questions of privilege, matters that concern the operation of the Senate itself, and traditionally determined by the members.

I would like to pose the following scenario. Imagine the "reformed" Senate with its 62 members. Remove the two leaders and the two spokespersons on a bill and 58 senators remain. Even if every one of them spoke for the full 15 minutes, debate would be over in 14.5 hours. If the government members chose not to speak, the debate could be concluded in half that time. I will not go into all the rest of the details of the recent changes to the Senate rules. I suggest to honourable senators who have not read them that they open the book and be horrified.

I welcome the announcement by Mr. Chrétien who stated that when he becomes Prime Minister—and that cannot come too soon—he will make a priority an attempt to make the new Senate and its rules more effective. Mr. Chrétien has said that before a new Senate is elected, there would be some time to work on rules respecting, for example, the time that must pass between the defeat of a bill in the Senate and the convocation of a joint session of the Senate and the House of Commons. He believes that the rules for a joint session could also be structured in such a way as to ensure real debate. That kind of commitment by Jean Chrétien is encouraging.

However, the fundamental changes proposed are bad for the Senate. The constitutional package, I believe, fails utterly to provide for a new more powerful, effective Senate empowered to protect the rights of minorities and to provide the people of Canada's regions with enhanced representation in Ottawa.

Before this package is accepted, I hope changes are made. Even if significant changes in Senate rules are made by a new government, I fear that the new Senate will be stripped of any real powers and could be converted into little more than an expensive talk shop.

The so-called "reformed" Senate could become a benign and toothless tabby cat—able to gum issues, but never able to interfere in any meaningful way with the decisions of the House of Commons and directives from the office of the Prime Minister.

Obviously, the premiers and the current Prime Minister want it that way. So much for the goal of a better Constitution and a more united Canada.

Today I brought to the chamber with me an amendment I had hoped to place before honourable senators. However, after conferring with the Leader of the Government in the Senate and with others on both sides, I have made the decision not to proceed because my initiative would not succeed and I would not want to cause another divisive factor to enter this debate here in the Senate. However, I would like to read my proposed wording and I hope the government will consider acceptance of this suggested amendment. It is as follows:

> That the motion be amended by striking out the words that come after the words "the following", and by substituting therefor:
> That texts of two referendum questions, to be put at the same time:
> With the exception of proposals relating to the House of Commons and the Senate, do you agree that the

[Senator Perrault.]

Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?

And, in particular, while approving in principle the establishment of an elected Senate —

— which I have supported for years—

— do you agree that the proposals for changes in the Senate and the House of Commons as contained in the agreement reached on August 29, 1992 should be adopted?

• (1800)

There is so much anger in Western Canada about the powers and the numbers of Western representation in the Senate and the House of Commons that I suggest that this resolution be put in two parts. There are some acceptable proposals in the package. There are some thoughtful ideas in it. I would not like to see the whole package defeated because of anger over one section. I think it would be a constructive idea to accept my proposal for amendment.

Because of the plan to grant each province the right to veto any future changes in the Senate and certain other national institutions, the possibility of real Senate reform may be lost forever unless action is taken now to give a new elected Senate representing the regions real powers to help determine the future of this nation.

In their present form, the Senate proposals, in my view, are not good enough for Canada. Many of the package's supporters claim that while its proposals are far from perfect, on balance they represent the best compromise available at this time. However, in my personal view, change is possible, even at this late date and without compromising the full constitutional package, and thus my suggestion for a reworded resolution. At the very least, an effort can and should be made to improve the proposals relating to the Senate and to certain other sections of the package. These constitutional reform recommendations could be so much better.

Hon. Herbert O. Sparrow: Honourable senators, first of all, let me make it clear to Senator Murray, before he asks the question, that I am going to vote "no" on the vote today and I am going to vote "no" in the plebiscite when the time comes.

Senator Murray: I am glad to have such a forthright statement from you, senator.

Senator Sparrow: Let me just tell you why I am going to vote today against the holding of a plebiscite. I believe that by voting for that, in some way I am giving my tacit approval to the contents of the proposed constitutional changes, and I am opposed to the majority of the proposals in those constitutional changes.

I saw the government and Parliament encourage the forums across this nation to go out and listen to the people of this country. We had the Spicer Commission, the forums, and the parliamentary commission go out, and they studied for two years at great cost. They made firm proposals about a Triple-E Senate and about many other aspects of the Constitution. It was called the Canada round.

During the course of one week, Joe Clark and the premiers got together and brought forward a proposal that did reflect to some degree what the Canadian people had told us, but that was not good enough. The Prime Minister called the premiers together again and in one week brought forth constitutional proposals that do not bear any resemblance to what the Canadian people told us they wanted. The proposals that are there for a Senate are not what the Canadian people told us they wanted.

As Senator Perrault told us, they were clearly talking about a Triple-E Senate: elected, effective and equal. We know we have not got that. We know that, instead of an effective Senate, what we will have is a reduced Senate, with extra seats going to the House of Commons.

Can you tell me how I can go back to the people of Western Canada or Saskatchewan and say, "You got a hell of a deal, guys. It's really great for you."?

We did not get the Triple-E Senate; we got something that is ineffective, and to compensate for that we are going to give Ontario and Quebec each 18 more seats in the House of Commons. Do you know that Saskatchewan only has 5 per cent of the vote in the House of Commons now? What does the new proposal do? It gives it 4 per cent of the representation, with no power in the Senate.

Who decided that we would give Quebec and Ontario 18 more seats each, or 36 combined? Who decided that? Did the Canadian people in all of those forums recommend that? No. The recommendations were for a Triple-E Senate and for the existing make-up in the House of Commons to remain the same. So who brought this idea forward?

When the Western Canadian premiers came back, Getty and Romanow, they said, "We got what we wanted." They don't know what they're talking about, because that was not what we told them we wanted.

I am supposed to go to the people and say, "Here, vote in this referendum. We are not going to tell you what is in it. We are not going to give you any text on it." Parliamentarians can have the text and they can vote on it, but we don't trust the people of Canada to have it. We do not trust Canadians with the full text of that agreement.

It is like buying a used car from Doug Everett. He says "Yes, this little old lady is coming in to buy the car. Take the thousand dollars, and then take the car and put sawdust in the transmission and the rear end and heavy oil in the motor, because she will not know the difference."

Senator Gigantès: Is that what he does?

Senator Sparrow: No, that is not what Doug Everett does. I really take that back. It was only and expression. But that is what we are basically saying to the people.

People are now going across this country saying, "Everybody gave a little." Well, tell me what Quebec gave. Tell me what Ontario gave. Just tell me what they gave. I can tell you what Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba gave. They gave away their representation in the House of Commons and they gave away an effective Senate. That is what they gave. They gave Quebec or are giving Quebec in perpetuity 25 per cent of the votes in the House of Commons even if British Columbia is going to have a greater population in the future. That is what we have to go back and tell the people of Saskatchewan. "Yes, everybody gave a little; but, no, the other provinces, Ontario and Quebec, did not give a little."

The Atlantic provinces gave a little. I will tell you how little they gave. They gave Ontario and Quebec additional seats in the House of Commons The extra seats given to Ontario and Quebec number more than the Atlantic Provinces presently have. Yet they say, "That is fine. We will accept that. That is a fair ball game."

Really, we use the expression that Ontario and Quebec have "sucked the hind tit" all these years anyway. It is not Saskatchewan and Alberta that have done that. It is not a question of our having done that. No, it is Ontario that has been so hard done by all of these years; so let us make it just a little bit better for them.

I can understand why Getty went home and within a few days of getting home, and of telling his people, "We got what we wanted," announced his resignation as leader of the party. I can understand that. How do you sell the people of Alberta on this issue?

I am going to vote "no" when the vote comes, and I am going to say this: I think the Conservative party in this country, the Liberal party in this country, and the NDP in this country have betrayed Western Canada. I think the voice that is there is betrayal. That is a fact. That is what happened. We shrug our shoulders and say, "Let's give tacit approval to this referendum and let's con the Canadian people into saying "yes." We will decide later how we are going to divide up the spoils."

The vote is going to go through today. Obviously, we all know that. However, I do not think the vote is going to go through when the time comes for the referendum vote, because I can see that ground swell moving in British Columbia, Alberta and in Saskatchewan. I can see that ground swell, and I would not be afraid of what might happen after there is a "no" vote.

I will tell you this: We are not afraid of Canada breaking up because of this particular issue.

• (1810)

Remember, honourable senators, what we have done in this country. In 115 years—not 125 but in 115, and the last 10 years have been the pits—with about 16 million people in this country, on average, we have built the greatest country in the world. In fact, we had the second highest standard of living in the world. We did that because we were proud Canadians and we had equal provinces all across this country.

[Senator Sparrow.]

Do you know what we did, honourable senators? Paul Martin was one of the architects of this. We built the second highest standard of living in the world. We brought the poor people farther up the scale, and closer to being equal to all of us in the economic structure. We are rapidly losing that, and we will lose it much faster if we give an even greater power base to Ontario and Quebec.

Canadians asked for free trade among our own provinces. That is not even referred to in the agreement that is before us. If Ontario wants to keep the products of Saskatchewan out of its province, it can still do that, and it may. We cannot have that. That was but one of the items we asked for, and we are not getting it.

This agreement is not a good deal for Western Canada. I will tell anyone I see that it is not a good deal for Saskatchewan. I do not want Quebec to leave Canada. I do not think she will. But the issue in this case will not make any difference as to whether she leaves or does not.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is now 6 p.m. The rules require that the Speaker vacate the Chair until 8 p.m., unless it is the wish of honourable senators to ignore the clock.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I ask leave to ignore the clock and continue the proceedings.

Senator Molgat: I gather from the numbers who have indicated they still want to participate in the debate that we can probably conclude our work within a reasonable time tonight, rather than having to return later.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I should like to participate in this debate. I do not intend to take long.

Western Canada is a part of this country that will be affected most profoundly by some of the issues dealt with in the constitutional initiative that we are being asked to vote on today. Whether we want to or not, we will be involved in the referendum campaign. Thus, we should develop a position.

I last spoke on this subject in debate on the question concerning the Beaudoin-Dobbie report. I gave a rather lengthy speech on Senate reform in which I used the Australian Senate as a basis for comparison. I did so because I think the Australian situation is relevant to ours. It is a parliamentary democracy that has an elected Senate which is playing a significant legislative role in that country. I felt that that was a good starting point for us.

First, I should like to make a few comments on the process. I can dispose of that briefly by saying that I am glad we will be having a referendum. I would vote in favour of the idea of a referendum. I have listened to those, in particular Senator Stewart, who have reservations. I identify with his concerns about voting "no" to the idea of a referendum being misinterpreted particularly by the people of Quebec and that that would not be a good idea. In any event, I am glad that all Canadians will have an opportunity to participate in this debate and to vote one way or the other at the end of the process.

Predictably, I should like to talk about the substance of the consensus agreement; that is, the idea of Senate reform and why I think it will be difficult to convince Albertans to vote in favour of it. It is because as a people they have had a strong desire to change the method of governance in Canada to allow for an opportunity to have a more direct relationship with those they elect than they now have with their members of Parliament or senators.

Albertans are heavily influenced by the American system because of their full access to their news and current affairs coverage. They have been involved in a debate with various groups, including the Canada West Foundation, the Triple-E group and others in Western Canada which, through the force of logic or intuition, have pushed the idea of a different kind of Parliament. It is a Parliament that would involve a group of people that is elected and who will come back to the electorate that elects them and account to them, either through defeat or re-election, based on what they do for them. I refer to a parliamentary group which would exercise some power as a check on the exercise of executive power, in particular in majority government situations. I do not think, realistically, that anyone would expect a U.S. or Australian type of Senate.

Let us look at what the First Ministers have proposed. I believe it falls so far short of the expectation of Albertans that if we proceed without more, then the sense of betrayal would be great. As I said a moment ago, convincing Albertans to vote in favour of the consensus agreement will be most difficult.

The real power of the proposed Senate would be exercised in a joint sitting of the House of Commons and the Senate. The other powers are interesting. There are not that many appointments which would have to be ratified, although there are some.

I think that the double majority is okay, but only if we get what we want in terms of this different kind of governance. It certainly does not do anything for Western Canada.

In terms of another National Energy Program, I think a federal government wanting economic rents would find another way of collecting them. I do not think that is a significant matter. It is a symptom of the problem. A constitutional means of addressing the problem is not what we want. We want to address the cause of the problem, which is the type of governance we have. Those are all fine, but they are not significant powers.

The significant power of the Senate is proposed in a joint sitting. The ratio of members of the Commons to members of the Senate would be 5.4 to 1. Doing a rough calculation, and the arithmetic of honourable senators should substantiate it if they are interested, a majority government with 51.7 per cent of the seats in the House of Commons could ignore completely 60 per cent of the senators voting against something in a joint sitting. That means that since 1949, in no majority government would the Senate with 60 per cent voting against legislation have had any effect in a joint sitting. This assumes that the other 40 per cent voted with the government.

I use the figure of 60 per cent because most majority governments are elected with 40 per cent of the popular vote. That is not a significant power. The obvious way to address that would be as the Australians have done, which is to ensure that the relative size of the House of Commons to the Senate would be such that a joint sitting would be meaningful. In Australia, as I observed in June when I spoke on the Beaudoin-Dobbie report, the nexus provision of its Constitution says it will never be more than two to one; that is, two members of their House of Representatives to every senator.

It is unlikely we would achieve that kind of ratio. However, something in the neighbourhood of 200 to 62 would start to make the Senate and the house in a joint sitting meaningful. I do not think that the likelihood of a federal government on a stand-alone basis, with support from Parliament, changing the number of members of the House of Commons downward is a likely scenario, given the propensity and the self-interest of members of the house not to do that. In any event, it would be a way of addressing the matter. I do not know whether or not that is even an option, and I will look carefully at it. It is, of course, important as to whether or not I vote "yes" or "no" myself.

The other means of giving the Senate power would be with a long suspensive veto, which would mean that it would have to have complete control over the joint sitting process, such that it could delay it for a long time—for example, one year. The premiers and the Prime Minister in their consensual agreement have proposed a 30-day timeframe within which ordinary legislation could be considered.

Those are things which would have to evolve and evolve quickly. By "quickly" I mean to say that they would have to be seen from the perspective before October 26 to ensure that Albertans would have a reason to support this package. 2

The other area of concern is the method of election and the term of office. In Australia, as you know, for many years the term was the same as for the members of the House of Representatives. But then they changed it, and their method of election was "first past the post". In turn, they changed that in 1919 to a form of proportional representation, and then, once again, in 1949, they made a change—this time to their present system of a single transferable vote. Why? Because, over that period of almost a century, they discovered that those other systems did not work. For that reason I think we would be very foolish if we did not learn from their experience. To start back in a pre-1919 situation with the proposed Senate for our new Parliament is not a good idea. I do not think we should do that. We should learn from the Australian experience.

The term of office there was coincident with that of the House. It is now a fixed six-year term. Many doors have been closed by what appears to be, as many have observed here in their speeches today, an attempt to abolish the Senate without actually abolishing it.

There are some non-constitutional opportunities through the time frame which a joint setting could take to deliberate or deal with legislation. There could be a reduction in the size of the House of Commons so that the ratio of senators to MPs would be more realistic; there are perhaps other means that could evolve to address some of the concerns we have. "Evolve" is a relative term. I want to emphasize that it would have to be something that we could see happening soon, from a pre-October 26 perspective.

Honourable senators, I could talk about other aspects, but they have been dwelt upon in great detail and very well on both sides of the debate, judging by what I have I read of yesterday's proceedings, which I missed, and from the debate I have heard today.

The issue for me as to whether or not this is a supportable package from the perspective of my province and my region has a great deal to do with more than is on the table. I have tried to describe what that "more" might be. If that "more" is not there, I think this proposal is in trouble in my province. I cannot speak for other areas.

I am very sensitive to the misinterpretation of that by other parts of Canada, in particular, Quebec. I regret that, but I must weigh that against the sense of betrayal that would be felt in my province in the event that this consensual agreement proceeded through all the detail. The feeling that we have as an electorate in that region is that we have addressed our issue, that the different kind of governance did not occur. That sense of betrayal would be devastating and I think would create just as big a problem. We must avoid that.

I support the idea of a referendum. I will vote for the legislation that we are considering now. I wanted to talk about the substance to some degree, and I have because I think it is important. Others have done it. Those are my principal concerns with respect to the Senate reform issue.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I have noticed that all of the speakers this afternoon have come from this side of the house.

Senator Murray: Not so.

Senator Robichaud: Well, almost. It may be that we succeeded in putting the members on the government side of the house to sleep. They have not been very vocal this afternoon, but a lot of people on this side have been very eloquent. I will not name anybody in particular, but I was impressed with the quality of this debate.

I will not go into any matters of technicality; I will deal with no numbers—numbers of seats, or numbers of senators or of members in the House of Commons. I will not do that. I will talk for about 30 seconds or so on principles, on the essence of what is before us.

[Senator Hays.]

In my opinion, the resolution before us should not exist in the first place. I think we should have left the situation the way it was after 1981. I think we created a monster and the monster is there because it has been created by the government. We have to face a situation where there is a monster. We have to take a vote on the 26th of October. We should not have to, but we have to. And we have to make a decision.

It took me some time to make up my mind as to whether I would vote "yes" or "no". It took me some time. Maybe 30 minutes. But I have decided that I will vote "yes." I will vote "yes" because it is a lesser evil. Voting "no" throughout the country, I think, would be disastrous. It would be bad for the country.

But I will say this. An amendment to the Constitution is not the end of the world. It is not its Constitution that controls a province or a country. It is the people who are in place who control it. Under the Constitution that we have had for 125 years, we have been prosperous and, as Senator Sparrow said, we became the envy of the rest of the world. Why did we not leave it alone?

But we have to face the fact that certain changes have been suggested. I do not care about the changes that have been suggested. I do not care what will emanate from future conferences—because there will be changes. Bureaucrats, lawyers, are going to get together and they will amend certain things some more. What the heck? It is the people that we put in place who count for the welfare of the country.

And I say this to my fellow Canadians. Let us get on with the work. Let us get this problem behind us. Let us get on with the country. Let us get on with the economy of this country. I will vote "yes."

Louis St. Laurent, I remember, in 1957, after he had been defeated, was asked what part he would take in the election. He said, "Well, I will vote and, well, I may tell the people how I will vote.".

I am going to vote "yes", and I am going to tell the people why I voted "yes."

Hon. Pat Carney: Colleagues, I have listened to many excellent speeches here this afternoon. I have agreed with some of the speakers, particularly some of the remarks of Senator Ray Perrault. I have disagreed with others. But I want us to be mindful of the fact that we are not voting on the constitutional package at this point in time. Because of the emotion that has been expressed, that may be overlooked. We are voting on the text of a referendum question. Surely those of us who intend to vote "yes" on this motion can do so calmly and without the emotion that has been generated today.

The question before us is:

> Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?

That is the question before us. If the debate on the referendum shows that the proposals are unfair to the West, or any other region, there is not a Western senator in this house on either side who would support it. If it is considered fair and the debate and the text and the arguments are fair, I would think that we would all support it.

In any event, it will not be up to us. It will be up to the people who vote on the referendum.

This is only the third time in our history that we have had a referendum. The first was in 1988 on prohibition. The second was in 1942 on conscription. Both of those earlier issues divided the country, and, clearly, when the powers that be decided to have this present referendum they realized that this could be an issue that divided us rather than uniting us, but that is for the future and that will be for the people to decide after the debate takes place.

I suggest that we move now, Mr. Speaker, to deal with this motion before us which deals in very essential words, in English and French, with the question on the wording of the referendum itself.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, the purpose of this debate is to consider the advisability of consulting the people on amending the Canadian Constitution. Personally, I have always thought that any amendment to the Constitution must be approved by the people because usually the changes are irreversible and a new government and the ones that come after cannot as a rule modify it later. They are irreversible changes and that is why I am very much in favour of having the people approve the basic law of the land. That is what many other countries do, like France, Switzerland, Australia and so many more. Changes to the fundamental law must be approved by those who hold the ultimate sovereignty, that is, the people in a democracy.

Nevertheless, I feel a certain unease. Of course, this is not due to the desire to consult the people, no. I feel uneasy because for years I have heard something quite disturbing in my country. I heard it recently when I was a member of the commission originally chaired by Mrs. Dobbie, an MP, and co-chaired by Senator Castonguay and later by Senator Beaudoin. Basically, what people in every region told us is that they do not get enough from the central government and they want more. "What more will Canada do for my province?" That essentially is what I heard. I was on it with Senator Barootes, who is indicating to me that he agrees with my analysis. We saw these increasingly strident displays of selfishness in our meetings. In every region and every province, people asked us, "What more will I get out of this whole exercise?"

Today I read in La Presse this big article by my friend and learned colleague, Senator Beaudoin. He detailed the devolution of powers from the central government to the provinces and especially to his province and mine, Quebec, and he expressed it in terms of gains for Quebec. That is how every provincial premier is selling this constitutional change to his constituents: "Here are the 'gains' I made in Ottawa, here are the things I grabbed from the central government." I say that if that is the spirit, we are all dreaming if we think that national unity will be stronger the day after these constitutional changes are ratified. I think that what has been happening in the past week should open our eyes. For example, I see the premier of my province saying that he forgot some things that he wanted to get in Charlottetown. Today he wants to make sure that the central government promises to devolve these powers to him.

I am thinking of the premier of a province, not my province of Quebec but another province, who said not so long ago: "Let us arrange our affairs so that the destiny of our province will never be subject to the federal Parliament." I say that is not the way to strengthen national unity. Honourable senators, I have always thought that if this country breaks up one day, history will record that it broke up because the citizens of this country were not worthy of it. That is the basic issue. Each and every one of us must not only make demands on the central government; we must also say what we are prepared to do to deserve this country.

[English]

We have to decide, once and for all, not only what we want to extract from Ottawa, but what each of us can give to our country to earn the right to be called a Canadian. This is what we have to do, and I have not heard very much about that.

[Translation]

I think it is time we realized what kind of country we are living in. This country recently ranked first in the world for its quality of life. This means that all of the countries, including Switzerland, France, Great Britain, Sweden, Japan, Germany and the United States, ranked lower than Canada. Canada is number one, Canada, which is already the most decentralized federation in the world.

I have yet to hear a single leader, especially at the provincial level, say what they are prepared to do to deserve this country, to live in this country. Doesn't the fact that we are signing free trade agreements with the outside world, with foreign countries, and that we can't manage that in our own country, say enough about the selfish attitudes in this country because, in the end, federalism means merging our collective solidarities.

If we are not prepared to do that, if the only kind of constitutional change we want is the kind that will make the central government powerless so that in the end, the two most populated provinces will be governing this country, I say that is no way to deserve this country of ours.

[English]

Senator Murray: Honourable senators —

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: May I remind honourable senators that, if Senator Murray speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, since Friday morning, when I moved this motion and the Leader of the Opposition replied for his side, 31 honourable senators, if I have counted correctly, have followed us in the debate. There have been, as Senator Carney mentioned a moment ago, some excellent speeches. Much as I would like to, I cannot do justice to all or even some of them in closing this debate.

I disagree profoundly with some of the things that have been said, but honourable senators have raised important issues. Almost all of these issues are of long standing in this country, hardy perennials that have been discussed in the greatest detail for many years. Contrary to what Senator Kenny has indicated, these are not issues, nor are the solutions material that has been sprung on the Canadian people by the first ministers a few weeks ago. In constitutional discussions and debate in this country, as in many other matters, there is truly very little that is new under the sun.

Honourable senators, I believe that the Charlottetown agreement gets us on the way to resolving these issues; but of course they do need, and will need, what I hope will be a final airing in the course of this debate, in the course of the referendum debate, and in the legislative ratification process that will follow. In this context, I agree that we have many months of debate on the proposed constitutional resolutions still ahead of us, and no one that I know in the federal government or the provinces has tried to pretend otherwise. What the referendum will decide is whether the principles arrived at in the Charlottetown agreement provide an acceptable basis to proceed to amend and renew the Constitution.

There is very little to which I would take exception in the speech that was made on Friday morning by the Leader of the Opposition. Indeed, I intend to return to some of his comments because they provide the most effective rebuttal to some of the criticisms that I heard from Liberal senators who followed him in the debate. However, I cannot let pass, and I am sure he does not expect me to let pass, his characterization of the past eight years as ". . . heedless and needless constitutional wrangling . . ." for which he blames the Prime Minister, ". . . and the resultant time pressures which were an important driving force in the process." En passant, I should say that it is the 1982 amending formula with the provision for three years permitted for ratification of most constitutional amendments that resulted in the time pressures which operated during that period.

However, when the Honourable Senator Frith proceeded to speak in French later in his speech, he gave a much more objective and indeed more accurate description of the background to the current constitutional discussions.

[Translation]

On page 1977 of the Debates of the Senate, the Hon. Senator Frith said:

> The long review process which went on for more than six years and which is now coming to a conclusion was set into motion as a result of the five propositions submitted in 1986 by Premier Bourassa's government.

A little later, he added that history:

> — has also decided that Canada should be faced with the challenge of allowing an important minority, with its special characteristics, to live and prosper in the middle of a sea of anglophones.
> We Canadians have always met that challenge, which was again put forward when the Quebec government, through its Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, on May 9, 1986, stated the five conditions for Quebec to adhere whole-heartedly to the Constitution.

[English]

So what was in English a heedless and needless eight year constitutional wrangle became in French "un défi à relever".

He went further when he said . . .

[Translation]

— and I quote page 1978:

> I am proud to say that during these six years, even at the darkest hours, we, in the Liberal Party, have always supported the efforts made to bring Quebec freely into the Constitution of Canada.

[English]

Honourable senators, that is a very accurate, objective and sympathetic recitation and description of the circumstances which form the background to the present constitutional discussions. I raise the matter not so much to score a point on the Leader of the Opposition or to contradict him, but because one still reads and hears academics, eminent scholars, even some Canadian statesmen, and today the Honourable Senator Kenny, with some severity declaring that it was all a terrible mistake on the part of Prime Minister Mulroney ever to have "reopened the constitutional file in 1986", as if the constitutional file had been closed in 1982.

Honourable senators, we all know that there was, and remains, some glaring unfinished business out of the 1982 Constitution. Quebec was not a party to that agreement. When Premier Bourassa put forward the five conditions under which Quebec would give its political assent to the 1982 Constitution, the other provinces, with the encouragement of the federal government, agreed on a Quebec round with a view to reintegrating Quebec into the constitutional family on the basis of those five conditions. Still, as I say, some commentators reproach Prime Minister Mulroney and the other provinces for having responded positively to this initiative on the part of the new federalist Quebec government led by Premier Bourassa. What response would they have had us make to this Quebec initiative? A negative response? And what would have been the consequences of that?

[Translation]

I want to congratulate the Leader of the Opposition on a statement he made at page 1978, where he said: If we are prepared to support the Charlottetown political agreement in spite of our great misgivings, it is to a large extent because it meets some of Quebec's legitimate aspirations and duties; He went on to add further on:

> Our party is of the same opinion. It sees Charlottetown II, in spite of its serious shortcomings, as a major step in the evolution of the historical agreement that allows Quebec and the rest of Canada to develop and prosper in an atmosphere of mutual respect.

I must say I would have been delighted to hear a similar statement from the honourable senator during the debate on Meech Lake, an agreement in which neither he nor his colleagues, could find any thing to their liking.

● (1850)

[English]

Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition is right in insisting that those campaigning for the "yes" side in this referendum must address the concerns that have been and will be expressed about the Charlottetown agreement. He is right also, I believe, to insist that the "no" side also explain themselves and their alternatives. At page 1975 of Hansard he goes on to say:

> . . . I find myself comfortable supporting the question and a "yes" answer to it. I am comfortable asking the Canadian people to say "yes" to the agreement as a basis for an amendment to the Constitution, thereby recognizing the considerable political achievement of Charlottetown and the work leading up to agreement on even a "basis" for amendment . . .

I do not disagree with his description of this agreement as being a basis for amendments to the Constitution, nor does the government disagree. Essentially, I cannot disagree with the point that Senator Pitfield has made in that respect. Senator Frith goes on to enumerate some of the areas where details still have to be agreed to, and nobody has tried to pretend otherwise or to mislead the Canadian people by pretending that this is an agreement arrived at in such detail that nothing more needs to be discussed or negotiated.

Senator Kirby, in his speech on Friday, asked what constitutes passage of this referendum. The honourable senator knows, as we all know, that its result will not be legally binding on governments, but the political reality is that if this referendum is defeated in even one province the least that can be said is that those amendments requiring the consent of ten provinces would be in trouble and, therefore, perhaps the whole package would be in jeopardy. It would be—and I think Senator MacEachen and I had a discussion about this at the time of passage of the referendum bill—a brave premier who went ahead with legislative ratification of the Charlottetown agreement over the expressed opposition of his population in a referendum.

Those of us who support the "yes" side will have to concentrate first on getting the vote out. There are honourable senators in this place who know that business and who understand how important and how difficult it is. We have to imbue Canadians with a sense of the importance of this referendum for the future of the country. Second—and this is all work of the same kind as we have at election time, except that this is not a partisan issue—is the matter of mobilization, organization and motivation of voters. We have to motivate them to vote "yes". We have to make every effort to get every last voter that we can encourage to come to the poll and support this agreement as a basis for constitutional amendment. There will be time afterwards to analyze the vote by region, language and all the various demographic factors.

We will be asking them, as the Leader of the Opposition has correctly stated, to vote for a set of principles. Yes, Senator Pitfield, some elements of this agreement require a little and some other elements require a great deal of refinement and definition. The rules of the new Senate, as a number of you have pointed out, will have to be agreed to. The powers and financing of Aboriginal governments will have to be negotiated and agreed to, an infinitely complex matter; but isn't the entrenchment of an Aboriginal right to self-government in the terms agreed to in the Charlottetown consensus a step well worth taking, an historic step for this country? I say, "Yes". The agreement for those provinces that want the federal government to withdraw from certain areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction will have to be arrived at. So there will be much negotiation, debate and disagreement.

I hope also there will be goodwill and flexibility, for we are embarked on a process which I do not deny, and no one denies, will be lengthy. It is a process that will take time and a great deal of goodwill to succeed.

I make these points about the essence of the question that is being put to the Canadian people—we are asking them to vote on a set of principles—because I believe that there is a danger that if the example set by some honourable senators in this debate were followed, this agreement would be "nickled and dimed" to death before it had a chance to go anywhere. I think in particular of some of the comments, and I will refer to some of them later, that have been made by Senators Grafstein, Austin, Wood and even Senator Pitfield.

To those honourable senators on the opposition side, if they are not persuaded by anything that I or my colleagues on this side have said, I commend to them and ask that they reflect on the speeches that have been made not only by their own national leader, Mr. Chrétien, but the Leader of the Opposition here and the speeches we heard last night from Senator Gigantès, Senator Stanbury and today from, among others, Senator Fairbairn, Senator Thériault and Senator Robichaud. These speeches, it seemed to me, had a sense of historical perspective, of political reality and considerable sensitivity to the opportunity that our country must grasp now.

Again, we are talking about a set of principles and the question I ask is whether those principles are clear enough to allow Canadians to make an informed judgment on whether they are acceptable as a basis for constitutional change. The Leader of the Opposition, Senator Castonguay and others responded eloquently in the affirmative. I do not disagree with Senator Stewart of Antigonish Guysborough that there are dangers to a referendum, but his lack of enthusiasm for this referendum puts him in a minority in Parliament. More important, I think the criticisms he made and the faults he finds in the proposed referendum could be attributed to any referendum that I can think of.

Senator Grafstein on Friday, and Senator Kenny this afternoon, set out some of the many criteria by which they would judge a constitutional proposal. There was everything in it from enriching our nation's culture, in the case of Senator Grafstein, to making our neighbourhoods safer, in the case of Senator Kenny. I think they expect too much of a constitution. I think they expect too much of a constitutional agreement trying to resolve some of the outstanding issues that have been before this country for many years. Neither this agreement nor any constitution will solve all the problems of the world or even of the country for all time.

● (1900)

Honourable senators, just in parenthesis, because I referred to Senator Stewart a few moments ago, I believe he was—unintentionally I am sure—unfair in his reference to Senator Castonguay when he said that our colleague had ducked the question as to the effect of a negative vote in Quebec in this referendum.

Senator Castonguay dealt with that question, I thought, very directly. I will read the essence of what he said last night in answer to the question. As reported at page 2006 of Hansard, he stated:

> Of course, if Quebecers were to vote against this agreement, I think . . . that the rest of Canada would react very negatively because I believe that a sincere effort was made by all concerned in the agreement before us to reach compromises that seem, if not always fully satisfactory, at least reasonable.
> So, if I am right, this negative reaction would prevent further negotiations as well as a simple return to the status quo. I fail to see how a government could start such a process all over.
> It seems to me that Canadians from other provinces who are not concerned only with the Quebec issue may also want to move on and make headway on other aspects of this agreement. They could not wait forever for Quebec's OK.

Senator Castonguay concluded by stating:

> Without speculating about various more or less negative scenarios, I think we can at least draw the conclusion that a simple return to status quo would be impossible, that we would go through very hard times and that, for those who would support Quebec's independence, it would be a major step in that direction and almost an irreversible one.

[Senator Murray.]

I find that statement quite unreserved and unequivocal.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I think it is only fair to Senator Castonguay that I should a say a word on two on this, if Senator Murray will permit me.

What Senator Castonguay dealt with in his response to Senator Molgat's question, as we can see from what Senator Murray has just read, is the result in the rest of Canada if there is a negative vote in Quebec. What I meant when I said that he had "ducked the question" was the consequences in Quebec if this referendum elicits a strong negative vote in Quebec?

Senator Murray: It is there in the last paragraph.

Senator Cogger: An almost irreversible step.

Senator Stewart: Perhaps this is an unfair question to Senator Murray, but is Senator Castonguay saying that if Quebec votes negatively, the result will be that Quebec then will move on to independence? If that is what he meant then I withdraw the word "ducked".

Senator Murray: Well, I do not think I should interpret, and I do not think I can improve on Senator Castonguay's own words. He said:

> I think we can at least draw the conclusion that a simple return to status quo would be impossible, that we would go through very hard times —

I am quoting from the English version of something that I believe he stated in French, but I am sure that the English version is accurate.

> — and that, for those who support Quebec's independence, it would be a major step in that direction and almost an irreversible one.

Honourable senators, Senator Stewart in his remarks also, I regret to say, regurgitated some of the media speculation that we saw in July and August as to the purpose of a national referendum, and indeed what the motives of the Prime Minister and the government might be.

We have never made any secret about it. All of us who were involved in the discussion on the referendum bill in June made it clear that there were a number of circumstances in which a national referendum would be advisable. It was possible that the government would decide that we needed a national referendum to break a deadlock. It was possible, in the best case scenario, that we would need a national referendum to ratify an agreement and, as I think I said in the question period if not in debate, while a referendum is not part of our amending process, using it to ratify a political agreement among first ministers could serve to expedite the formal ratification process.

The Prime Minister and Mr. Clark were unequivocal that a negotiated agreement was always our ideal. It was always our goal. It was always our purpose. The media, for whatever reason, continued to attribute other motives to the Prime Minister, that he wanted a failure so that he could go ahead with some unilateral federal initiative and ask the Canadian people to ratify it.

Honourable senators, to anybody who understands anything about politics or the current state of politics in this country, that was an absurd suggestion on the part of the media. The strains that that scenario would place not only on our government and on our party but on all political parties in this house would be enormous. We fought. Mr. Clark and Mr. Mulroney, all of our advisers, worked unceasingly for an agreement. We have an agreement. The principles of that agreement or consensus, if one wants to call it that, are what we will be voting on in a referendum.

There has been discussion here about the consequences of the vote on October 26. I agree with those who say that we are far better to emphasize the positive consequences of a "yes" vote than to dwell on the negative consequences of a "no" vote because, no matter how carefully one phrases it, no matter how delicately one approaches the subject, one always runs the real risk of being accused of scaremongering if one speaks of the negative consequences of a "no" vote. I agree again with the Leader of the Opposition that the "no" side has some explaining to do, and should be called upon to make those explanations and to explain their alternatives.

I believe that the immediate effect of a "yes" vote will be a sense of achievement and unity rather than the sense of failure and division that have characterized the Constitutional debate in this country for so long. I believe that a "yes" vote to this consensus document, to these principles, will result in increased confidence among Canadians of our ability to resolve together other challenges, and the main challenges before us are primarily economic. I believe that a "yes" vote will result in an increased sense of security and stability in the relationships among Canadians, the relationships between Quebecers and other Canadians, the status and the security of linguistic minorities and the relationship of Aboriginal peoples with the rest of society. Even if what we have agreed on are the terms of a negotiation and the principles for negotiation, the parameters of a negotiation of self-government for Aboriginals, they see it as an enormous step forward and an enormous opportunity. I think we should see it that way, too.

Senator Pitfield can characterize it if he likes as the birth of a monster. I think there is a rebirth of opportunity for Canada and for Canadians in this Charlottetown agreement. I do not want to overstate it. As I have already said, there is so much work to be done to realize the promise of the Charlottetown agreement, but popular ratification and the referendum of the Charlottetown agreement will be a solid base for nation building in the future.

Honourable senators, a number of our colleagues have been pretty severe in their analysis of the proposed new Senate. Senator Kirby saw it as a great weakness of the consensus document, as did Senator Everett, Senator Lawson, Senator Graham, Senator Perrault and Senator Sparrow. It is true, as a number of them have pointed out, that this new Senate would have less power than some of the models of the so-called equitable Senate that were on the table, including the proposals that the government brought in in September a year ago in the report of the Beaudoin-Dobbie committee. The proponents of the Triple-E Senate, Premier Getty and others, clearly attached greater importance to the symbolism and the reality of equal representation for each province. To them, that E, it appears, was the most important of the Three Es.

I agree with Senator Fairbairn and Senator Thériault that the proposed new Senate is certainly not necessarily a weak institution. It will have the power to defeat taxes on natural resources. It will have the power to defeat measures materially affecting the French language and culture. It will have the power to delay supply bills for 30 days. It will have the power to force reconciliation and joint sittings of the House of Commons and Senate by defeating other legislation.

As to the new senators themselves, whether they are elected by the voters at large, as it appears will be the case in nine provinces and territories or, as will apparently be the case in Quebec, by their elected National Assembly, they will enjoy a democratic legitimacy that the present Senate does not have. Because there will only be six per province, and here I take up a point that Senator Thériault has made very forcefully, they will have been either elected at large in the province or by constituencies that are vastly larger than the constituencies that elect members to the House of Commons. I believe this difference will give them a political status that is quite important. There will be no minister in the Senate. The government as such will not be there. The elements are present for considerable institutional independence.

Some see a Senate that will be swamped by the more numerous House of Commons. No one can tell how a particular parliamentary institution will evolve. It will evolve on its own. I believe it is as likely—and it is possible, certainly—that this institution will evolve in a different way, creating, as Senator Fairbairn and Senator Hays have suggested, its own procedures and using its powers to the full to influence government policy and legislation.

The Leader of the Opposition raised a question, as did Senator Kirby, Senator Austin, Senator Grafstein and Senator Graham, of the federal spending power. We went through this argument in the Meech Lake debate. I do not want to cover all that ground again.

[Translation]

For the federal government to hold an unlimited spending authority is inconsistent with a Constitution which gives some legislative powers to the provinces in certain areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

That is a distortion of Canadian federalism.

[English]

Contrary to what Senator Kirby predicts, there will be national social programs. There will be national objectives. Dare I use the word national standards? Why not? The difference will be that these will be arrived at in negotiations between the federal government and the provinces in whose exclusive jurisdiction these fields are. They will not be imposed by Ottawa. In a country as vast and as diversified as ours, the provinces must be free to establish their own priorities in these fields which are within their exclusive jurisdiction and to tailor federal-provincial programs to their particular needs and circumstances without having decisions imposed on them by the federal government.

I think it is a matter of regret that so much of the discourse of federal politicians in this and other constitutional debates has a tendency to denigrate provincial governments and legislatures. Provincial legislators have to get elected. They are responsible to their voters. It seems to me that we have to show somewhat more respect for their sovereign authority in their own fields. Who says, for example, that the federal government or Parliament is the fount of all wisdom when it comes to progressive social policy? Medicare is the example which is so often referred to here. Although I recall it was in the Liberal platform of 1919, the first medicare program we had in this country was brought in by the NDP government of Saskatchewan.

Neither do I agree with Senator Kirby's apprehensions and those of Senator Graham expressed earlier today about manpower training in the hands of the provinces. I think they under-estimate the creative and innovative capacity of provinces when it comes to policy and programs in these fields. Senator Kirby feels that, without federal supervision, the provinces will fall back on training for their traditional economic activities, thus marginalizing their work force and impeding the mobility of their young people. Is it not also possible that skills training, integrated with education, placement, social services and economic development in a provincial regime, will provide more and better opportunities for the individual? Is it not also possible that provincial governments will use skills training to help promote investment in new economic development opportunities in the province? Is it not possible, so long as we try to level the playing field, as they say, by equalization, that some more competition among provinces in these fields will be healthy?

In any case, I have to remind Senator Kirby, Senator Graham and others who have brought up this subject that there is a stipulation in the Charlottetown consensus that at the request of any province not wishing the federal government to withdraw from labour market training, the federal government would be required to negotiate an agreement to maintain its labour market training and development programs in that province.

[Senator Murray.]

Finally, Senator Austin said, as reported at page 1990 of Debates of the Senate:

> In the Charlottetown accord we have created parallel structures that weaken this Parliament. We have a regime of premiers who are also now part of the national governance of this country although they are not elected nationally. In the Charlottetown accord we have agreed that we will have a separate system of consensus outside of this Parliament with respect to the structures and many of the policies that will affect the running of this country. I think that weakens Canada.

Honourable senators, I do not know how we are to coordinate education, training, social programs and so forth, if it is not by federal-provincial collaboration. How are we to remove these interprovincial trade barriers which Senator Sparrow and others have mentioned if it is not by concerted action? How will we implement some of the international treaties that the federal government enters into, whether in trade, environment or human rights, without provincial collaboration because so much of the provisions of those treaties affect provincial jurisdiction?

This is a federation. We do have shared sovereignty. The provinces are sovereign in some areas. We all have to work together.

Senator Austin described his province of British Columbia and British Columbians when he said:

> British Columbians have a sense of themselves as an expanding province, as a province which is Canada's gateway to the Pacific and Canada's western province in the north-south axis of North America.

He also stated:

> There has been a strong movement in the Province of British Columbia . . . to develop regional ties, to reduce barriers in trade and the movement of peoples and to reduce the qualitative legal barriers that domestic laws on both sides of the border have created, so as to allow the development of a new sense of society, and of course more active commerce.

He is describing the uniqueness and the distinctiveness of British Columbia and its economy, as well as British Columbian society and the aspirations of its citizens.

I should point out that the Charlottetown consensus, among other things, will give British Columbia, if it wants, more control over immigration. British Columbia, if it wants, will have more control over manpower training. If it wishes, we, the federal government, can butt out of some of the provincial jurisdictions such as forestry, tourism, mining, recreation and regional development.

This measure will not weaken Canada, as Senator Austin contends. It will enable British Columbia to develop its distinctive and dynamic economy in its own way. British Columbia will continue to derive, I believe, the advantages of being part of a greater entity that is Canada. In that sense, this agreement is good for British Columbia and it is good for Canada.

Senator Austin laments what he calls our lack of a sense of identity. He compares us unfavourably with Germany, Japan and Mexico. Honourable senators, I mean no offence to any of those countries when I say they can have their sense of identities and the history that goes with them.

As for us, ours is a greater dream and a more noble vision. I believe the Charlottetown agreement will help us get on with fulfilling it together.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, there is no reply to reply, and I am aware of that, but I will ask you to permit me one sentence only. It is that the observed or inferred inconsistency between the heedless and needless course and what was said in French is based on my and his leaving out of a very important phase after the accord of 1982 and the position the Liberal Quebec government took when the five principles were advanced. I will explain that in some detail on another occasion. Stay tuned.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton:

> That, pursuant to the Act to provide for referendums on the Constitution of Canada, the Senate concurs with the House of Commons in approving the following text of a referendum question:
> "Do you agree that the Constitution of Canada should be renewed on the basis of the agreement reached on August 28, 1992?
> _____ _____
> yes no"
> and,
> That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators opposed to the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is there agreement that there be a 15-minute bell?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, with leave, I would ask for a 15-minute bell. There may be some senators across the street in the Victoria Building.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Call in the senators.

• (1930)

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it was moved by the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton:

SENATORS' STATEMENTS

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the election clock is still ticking as expected. Democracy lovers have 65 days; those cowards contemptuous of democracy, 451 days.

CHARLOTTETOWN ACCORD—GENDER ALLOCATION OF SENATE SEATS

Hon. Pat Carney: Honourable senators, 62 years ago, Ottawa housewife and welfare worker Cairine Reay Wilson became the first Canadian woman to be called to the Senate of Canada. She won that distinction because five Canadian women had won from Britain's Privy Council a legal admission that women were "persons" and thus eligible for Senate appointment.

The move by some premiers to allocate elected Senate seats by gender in their provinces under the proposed Charlottetown accord would deny women that historic and hard-earned right to be considered persons. The move would not only negate history, it would fetter the future for Canadian women seeking political office for the following reasons:

1. It establishes a quota system which is unfair to women, restricting their participation to a predetermined number of seats regardless of the merit of women candidates in the future.

2. It confines women to the "women's quarters", limiting them to so-called "women's issues" rather than encouraging them to tackle the hard-core economic and social issues which challenge our society.

3. It is demeaning to women, conveying the notion that women can attain political office only on the basis of their sex, not their merit, thus reinforcing the stereotypes of the women's "place" in society.

4. It emphasizes the difference between men and women at a time when we need to stress those common concerns which should unify us. At least, says a B.C. feminist, violence against women will be discussed in the Senate, ignoring the fact that this issue involves men as well as women.

5. It does not deal with the real barriers to women's participation in both the private and the public sector, which are the corporate culture and attitudes which require a thorough change if women are to feel comfortable balancing work and family responsibilities.

6. It treats women as a "minority" which requires protection at a time when women form the majority of the Canadian population and will, in this decade, make up the majority of the Canadian workforce and graduates of post-secondary institutions.

7. It restricts voters' democratic rights, won over centuries, to choose the "best person" from among our peers to make and enforce the rules we live by.

8. It particularly restricts the rights of westerners who are being asked to approve a major expansion of House of Commons seats to Central Canada—without sexual quotas—in return for Senate seats allocated by sex.

9. It ignores the possibility that better methods can be employed to increase the participation by women by encouraging political parties to seek out, nominate and elect more women candidates.

10. It is insulting to ask women and men to stand for office on the basis of their genitals, not their ability to make a contribution to our country. No Canadian should be elected to the Senate on that basis.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

ELEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX TO MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Noel A. Kinsella: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Eleventh Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology respecting its examination of the subject matter of Bill C-86, to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day, and that it form part of the permanent record of this House.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed that this report be printed as an appendix?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see today's Minutes of the Proceedings, p. 1392)

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Kinsella, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there are two pieces of legislation we would like to dispose of before we adjourn until after the referendum. One is Bill C-55, which is presently before the National Finance Committee, which is meeting this afternoon and tomorrow evening, I believe. I do not think its report will be ready until the early part of next week. The other is Bill C-80, which is being given third reading in the House of Commons this evening and which we would like to send to committee before we adjourn.

Based on those priorities, I suggest we adjourn until four o'clock tomorrow afternoon and then come back next Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock. I hope that by the end of Tuesday next we will have disposed of that essential business.

Therefore, I move, with leave of the Senate and not withstanding Rule 59(1)(h), That, when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, 17th September, 1992, at four o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in view of the circumstances, the schedule indicated by the Deputy Leader of the Government is probably the best we can do. I had hoped that the report of the committee studying Bill C-55 would be ready for Friday and that we might be able to dispose of our business on that day, and I was prepared to grant leave under the circumstances, inasmuch as a number of us will be away for a funeral tomorrow. However, if we cannot have the committee report, there is no point in agreeing to sit on Friday.

The Deputy Leader said that he thought we could dispose of this matter in one day, namely Tuesday. I should hope that he is not taking that as guaranteed, because I cannot give that kind of guarantee. It will depend in part on when we receive the report on Bill C-55. I hope we will have it before we arrive at 2 o'clock on Tuesday so we can at least go over it in order to prepare for the debate that might ensue on it. There is also likely to be some debate on Bill C-78, which is another major bill. Therefore, I would not want to guarantee that we will complete everything in one day.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO STUDY FARM SAFETY AND FARM RELATED HEALTH ISSUES

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, September 22, 1992, I will move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be authorized to undertake the special study on farm safety and farm related health issues.

ENERGY, THE ENVIRONMENT AND NATURAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO PERMIT ELECTRONIC MEDIA COVERAGE

Hon. Dan Hays, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(f), moved:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources be empowered to permit coverage by the electronic media of its public proceedings on its emissions of gas study with the least possible disruption of its hearings.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, the Standing Committee on Energy, the Environment and Natural Resources met at noon today to consider steps to be taken in completing its study on the economic instruments issue with respect to maintaining greenhouse gas emissions below threshold amounts. The committee proposes to proceed as planned with its work in October. One of the pieces of its work will involve a roundtable discussion with stakeholders and senators.

After some deliberation, the committee decided that it might be useful to have that proceeding recorded, in the event that either the community cable channels or the parliamentary channel are interested in televizing it.

In order that we might be able to do so, if those arrangements can be made, we are now coming to the Senate today to ask for a motion to that effect. I am speaking to it without having given the appropriate notice because it will be impossible for me to be here tomorrow or next week.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 540 citizens of the province of Nova Scotia who oppose the goods and services tax.

These petitions are mainly from Sydney, Sydney Mines,Medicine Hat, Glace Bay, Louisbourg, Inverness, Evanston, Lower River, Grantville, Florence and North Sydney.

Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 511 citizens of Alberta who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions are mainly from Edmonton, Red Deer, Camrose, Drayton Valley, St. Albert, Barrhead and Spruce Grove.

Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 323 citizens of Saskatchewan who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions are mainly from Saskatoon, Regina, Lemberg and Moose Jaw.

Finally—as you can see, honourable senators, the ball is rolling again across the country!—I have the honour to present petitions signed by 140 citizens of New-Brunswick who oppose the goods and services tax. These petitions are mainly from Caraquet, Village Blanchard, Pointe-Brûlé, Haut-Shippagan, Amherst, Maltempec, Pont-Landry and Poremauche.

[English]

There is a total of 1514 angry citizens who will most certainly stay angry until the next election.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Jack Marshall: I have the honour to table a petition submitted to the Senate by the RCAF Prisoners of War Association, Ottawa Branch, under the presidency of A. J. Little. The petition is a result of that branch's sending out 120 petitions which brought in 1220 individual signatures from across Canada, and even from the United Kingdom.

If I may summarize, the petition has to do with the series of films The Valour and The Horror, comprising Savage Christmas: Hong Kong 1941; Death by Moonlight: Bomber Command; and In Desperate Battle: Normandy 1944. I will read the main paragraph:

> WHEREAS it is considered that the series of films has done grievous damage to the reputations of those who died for Canada and of those who fought for Canada, and has caused grief to surviving family members, and has demeaned Canada as a nation and the sacrifice and heroism of Canadian veterans everywhere, the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to support the activity of the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs in examining the authenticity of the aforementioned series of films.

Honourable senators will probably be elated that one of the 1220 signatures is that of a very prominent Canadian who served in the Parliament of Canada for many years, the Honourable J. W. Pickersgill.

PRIVATE BILL

DAI AL-MUTLAQ—PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Norman K. Atkins: Honourable Senators, I have the honour to present a petition from Dr. Syedna Mohammed Burhanuddin, of the City of Bombay, in the State of Maharashtra, India, praying for the passage of an Act to incorporate the Dai al-Mutlaq as a corporation sole in Canada.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Could you explain to us what that is all about?

Senator Atkins: I would be happy to. I thank my fellow senator for asking the question. The Dai al-Mutlaq is a small group in Canada that has built a temple in my area of Ontario. The head of the group is looking at a legal entity to be incorporated as a corporation sole in Canada. This is an offshoot of a larger Muslim group that has come over from India.

QUESTION PERIOD

REVENUE CANADA

TAXATION OF LOW-INCOME EARNERS —GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, during the summer break I was reading the June 1992 issue of CA Magazine, a professional magazine put out by the Chartered Accountants of Canada. In that magazine, I came across a rather disturbing letter written by Mr. Ron J. Schwartz of North York.

In that letter Mr. Schwartz makes clear the basic inequity and unfairness inherent in our taxation system. He also questions the principles on which Revenue Canada executes this regime. Since it is a short letter, I should like to read it into the record and ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to tell us what is the government's answer to the concerns expressed therein.

The letter reads as follows:

> I experienced something this tax season that I had to share. As a CA student working for a large Toronto firm, I decided to volunteer some of my time to help prepare tax returns for low-income taxpayers in the city's Parkdale region. Their average income varied from $10,000 to $14,000 a year. It boggles the mind how a person living alone can survive in Toronto (or any Canadian city) on $10,000 a year. To add insult to injury, Revenue Canada has the audacity to tax people in this income bracket.
> I prepared a tax return for an elderly man who earned $12,500 in 1991. How do you tell someone in this income bracket that he has to pay $1,500 in taxes? What justification, other than pure greed, does Revenue Canada have to tax someone who is living below subsistence level?
> Don't get me wrong. I do not believe in "free rides" nor do I believe in the "Robin Hood" methodology of stealing from the rich and giving to the poor. I do, however, believe that this country can survive without Revenue Canada grabbing the last dime these people do not have in their pockets.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall take the question as notice and ask whether the Department of National Revenue can prepare a reply to it.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

TRADEOFF OF TELECOMMUNICATIONS JURISDICTION FOR CONSTITUTIONAL SUPPORT—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It refers to a news item that appeared in the Globe and Mail of last Saturday. The headline reads: "Feds barter telecom powers for support on Constitution. Business users' group outraged by secret tradeoff." It goes on to state:

> The federal government has privately agreed to grant Saskatchewan a five-year extension of provincial jurisdiction over telecommunications, says a spokeswoman for federal Communications Minister Perrin Beatty.
> But the secret request, granted by Ottawa in return for Saskatchewan's support of the accord on the Constitution reached in Charlottetown late last month, has prompted at least two other provinces to ask for similar treatment.

Is it correct that in order for the government to obtain the support of the Province of Saskatchewan for the Constitution it traded off this extension?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would have to ask for a report from my colleagues Mr. Clark and Mr. Beatty on this matter. I do believe that Bill C-62, which has been pre-studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, and which is still before the House of Commons, provides for just the sort of administrative agreement to which the honourable senator refers between the federal government and the provincial authorities.

However, I will look into the matter and bring in a report as soon as I can. It should not take very long.

AGRICULTURE

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND NEW BRUNSWICK POTATO FARMERS—ERADICATION OF VIRUS—REQUEST FOR UPDATE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, it is a wonder that the leader finds times to look into all of these matters for which he does not seem to have answers. Perhaps he might also ask the Minister of Agriculture to give us an update on what is transpiring with respect to the PVY-n virus which affects potatoes in Canada, California and other parts of the United States.

[Senator Frith.]

The Prince Edward Island seed potato market has been seriously disrupted by the finding of this PVY-n virus in the crop. Can the minister give us an update on the situation, so that the potato seed market in Prince Edward Island can return to where it was a few years ago before the PVY-n virus was found? Can he give us an update on the potential for again selling Prince Edward Island seed potatoes to the United States this year?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the Department of Agriculture advises me that federal officials are working closely with all provinces and the industry to remove PVY-n virus as a trade impediment in order to facilitate the opening of markets for seed potatoes. Leaf sampling is nearing completion. Positive fields have been found in Ontario, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. Follow-up sampling and trace-back is under way.

I am also informed that at the bi-national panel meeting on August 6 and 7 between officials from Agriculture Canada and the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the USDA endorsed the eradication plan as being biologically sound. The plan will be used as a basis for the Final Rule which should be in place before the 1992-93 shipping season.

The import requirements on the Final Rule are not dependent on the number of finds but will be based on the zoning concept around positive fields. Agriculture Canada has completed the confirmatory testing on a sample of Florida potatoes. It was found positive. Import restrictions are being developed for Florida, North Dakota, Maine, and Wisconsin.

COMMUNICATIONS

ACCESS TO INFORMATION—AVAILABILITY OF GOVERNMENT POLLS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rarely find myself in a situation where I can compliment the government on any matter, but today I have found one. That is the fact that the Minister of Immigration, the Honourable Bernard Valcourt, released details of a public poll which he had had taken shortly after he tabled his Immigration Act. The results of this poll indicate the support—I suppose you could call it—for the government proposals insofar as the public is concerned, so I think it is commendable that the results of this poll were released.

I wonder if the minister would then agree that the details of all polls should be released. The government does a great deal of polling, and if it is able to produce a result to back a government initiative of the government such as this immigration bill, which is controversial, showing it has public support, would it not be proper that the details of all polls should be released? After all, they are paid for by the Canadian public and they should be available not only to the government for its purpose when it wants to support something. Everyone should have access to all of the information that is available.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, hundreds of polls are undertaken. The details of all of them are accessible under the Access to Information legislation.

Senator Molgat: That is the problem, is it not? Recently, when requests have been made under the Access to Information Act, the government has been refusing such requests and saying, no, we will not release the details of such polls.

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators, that is not quite the case. The Access to Information legislation provides for exemption on certain grounds. With regard to polls, we have taken the position in very few cases that the release of—not the poll itself in most cases but of certain questions and answers would, for the time being at any rate, be prejudicial to the conduct of federal-provincial relations and, therefore, we have declined to release either those questions or answers on those grounds. In some cases, we have sought to delay the release of a whole poll until so doing would no longer be prejudicial to the conduct of federal-provincial relations.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, on this same poll, could we find out whether it was available to the minister before he tabled his bill?

The surprising thing about the bill is that it tends to satisfy, shall we say, the rather wrong-headed reactions of a majority of Canadians, who according to the poll are starting to rise up against immigration and refugees, as is happening in other countries.

Obviously, the bill is completely along those lines. It is a very reactionary bill. We wonder whether it was not inspired by the polls, in order to flatter the least noble elements of public opinion.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I absolutely reject the hon. senator's statement that the immigration bill is reactionary.

On the contrary, the bill makes it clear that the government intends to keep the immigration levels as they are. The rate of immigration to our country will not go down, but we absolutely want to regulate it efficiently and fairly, both for immigrants and for the country.

I would draw to the hon. senator's attention that senior officials of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees strongly support the refugee provisions of the bill.

Senator Hébert: That does not answer my question, but since the Leader of the Government in the Senate, UN High lCommission for Refugees, he might perhaps have referred as well to the dozens of witnesses less subject to influence, like the Canadian Bar Association and the Toronto Human Rights Association, for example.

I know that you raise your eyebrows when we talk about human rights and that annoys you! But what do you want, that's the way it is!

I also think that the government must not present such a reactionary bill to us by invoking the United Nations High Commission; indeed, we had a delegate from it who criticized many parts of the bill but of course, understandably, in a rather diplomatic way, since that organization is funded by developed countries including Canada.

That is not the best witness you could quote!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I know full well that the Canadian Bar Association, expressed some reservations about the bill. The minister, Mr. Valcourt, tried successfully, I believe, to satisfy several of the Bar's objections.

I would also remind the hon. senator that the outgoing chairman of the Canadian Immigration and Refugee Board, Gordon Fairweather, also strongly supported the bill that is now before the House of Commons.

Senator Hébert: You must not leave this House under the impression that you had extremely favorable witnesses. Mr. Fairweather was appointed by your government to do a job that he did well, I admit. I do not want to criticize Mr. Fairweather, but he is not a totally objective witness in the circumstances.

The reason you named those two is that there are no others! All the rest strongly attacked this bill.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I wish to remind the hon. senator that Mr. Fairweather was appointed Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission by the previous government, headed by Prime Minister Trudeau.

In any case, all I can say today is that the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology chaired by Senator Kinsella has just completed a pre-study of this bill.

Within a few months, the Senate will have an opportunity to deal with all the details of the bill because we will have it officially before us.

JUSTICE

SOCIAL UNREST—PROPOSED MEETING OF PRIME MINISTER WITH BIG CITY MAYORS AND FEDERATION OF MUNICIPALITIES

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, does the minister have an answer for me yet on the potential meeting of the Prime Minister with the mayors of the major cities in the aftermath of that unfortunate riot in Toronto? I have asked the question on many occasions and the reply has always been, "He is thinking about it, I think." Has he done it?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Lynch-Staunton is looking into that matter and will be reporting in due course.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

NATIONAL FINANCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. C. William Doody: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 59(1)(a), I move:

> That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have power to sit at four o'clock in the afternoon on Thursday next, September 17, 1992, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 96(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, could Senator Doody tell us whether there will be witnesses at that hearing and who they might be?

Senator Doody: Allow me to present a brief explanation. The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has been charged with the examination of Bill C-55, a bill affecting Public Service pensions and other pensions. We have had a series of meetings. We have heard five or six groups of witnesses and single witnesses. We have meetings scheduled this evening, starting at six o'clock and continuing until we have heard another five or six groups or individual witnesses.

Tomorrow afternoon, in order to present, in a collated fashion, the concerns that have been expressed by these witnesses, we would like to have Treasury Board back to reply. The minister is not available, as he is out of town, but his Parliamentary Secretary may be available. In any event, the officials will be there to answer whatever questions honourable senators may have in order to prepare reports.

We should finish our hearings on Thursday afternoon. In order to do that, of course, we will have to get the permission of the Senate to sit.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

CONTRAVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Balfour, seconded by the Honourable Senator Chaput-Rolland, for the second reading of Bill C-46, an Act respecting contraventions of federal enactments.

[Senator Murray.]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to thank Senator Balfour for the explanations he gave us on this bill at second reading. On rereading his material I find that the proposal is sensible. The bill purports to substantially simplify the settlement of minor offences, and that is a forward step.

I was concerned about the number of items in the bill that will come under the regulations. One of our eternal problems with bills is that too much goes into regulation. That is why a committee like the Joint Committee for the Scrutiny of Regulations is absolutely essential in a democratic system. It is the only way that Parliament can exercise any control over the powers of regulation that most bills give. This bill does give very substantial powers of regulation.

However, there is a saving factor in the bill, as pointed out by the honourable Senator Balfour in his speech. He said:

> It should be noted that the Contraventions bill does not create any new offences but, rather, provides new, simplified procedures for the prosecution of persons charged with existing federal offences.

That is a saving factor in that the bill does not empower the government to create new offences. That is definite. I accept the statement of the senator in that regard. So we are satisfied that at least they will not create any new offences. However, I still have some concerns, even with that proviso. It is a question of what types of offences will be included under this system. Senator Balfour covered some of them. He said:

> . . . minor offences. For example: Hunting without a valid licence; camping in a park without a permit; picking flowers on federal property;

I agree that those are not major offences, but earlier in his comments he referred to the case of Regina versus the City of Sault Ste. Marie. That case had to do with the deposit of refuse by a contractor of the city resulting in pollution of a nearby creek. If that is an example of a minor offence, we have to be concerned about what the government might include in this. If it is just a matter of throwing a couple of cardboard boxes in a creek, you might consider that a minor offence, but if it is a matter of putting some dangerous materials in a waterway, I do not think that falls under minor offences in any way. That becomes a major concern.

I hope that when the regulations are produced they will be sent to us so that we can see the kinds of things they consider minor offences. With our present problems with pollution we cannot gather that putting refuse in a creek and polluting it is a minor offence. We should have a look at those regulations when they are produced.

My other concern is with enforcement; who will be enforcing the new procedures? The bill establishes that under regulations the government will have the ability to decide who the enforcement authorities are. I do not think there is any problem when we deal with police officers. These are trained people. However, there is another designation which comes under "enforcement authority". It says:

> (a) any person, or member of a class of persons, designated by the minister responsible for administering the enactment creating the contravention . . .

● (1450)

We ought to have clarification as to who the government will empower to issue the tickets. We ought to know that these people have had some training, at least, and that they are not just employees, say, of the Parks branch. If we are dealing with the right to issue a ticket to someone for a contravention, the employees should have some training and be in a position to exercise due authority.

I realize that when we discuss the principle of the bill, we should not go into the clauses of the bill, and yet I do not know how I can deal with the principle without dealing with the specifics.

Senator Frith: Some clauses contain principles, of course.

Senator Molgat: I am referring to clause 8.(1)(f) on page 4 under "Designation of Offences". It finishes off by saying:

> . . . as the case may be, in the parts of Canada that are specified in the regulations.

This concerns me. If I read this correctly, under this subclause the law will not be the same across Canada. It specifically refers to the "parts of Canada that are specified in the regulations". I would hope that, whatever the outcome of the bill, it would apply throughout Canada, unless the Speaker or Senator Balfour can give us an explanation as to what is meant by "parts of Canada". Is there some logical explanation? Off hand, I cannot see any.

If, for example, we are dealing with national parks, which are to be covered under the bill, surely the rules would be the same in all national parks. There would be no exemptions. Similarly, several departments are now apparently prepared to proceed under this new law—Agriculture Canada, Atomic Energy Control Board, Canadian Ports Corporation, Communications Canada, National Defence, Environment Canada, Fisheries and Oceans Canada, National Capital Commission, Public Works Canada, St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and Transport Canada. Therefore, many government departments are prepared to use this new law in order to simplify their procedures. I agree with that, but the law ought to be the same wherever you are in Canada.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators —

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Balfour speaks, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, Senator Molgat has raised some significant and important issues with respect to this legislation, which I think could most appropriately be explored in greater depth in committee. Therefore, I recommend that Bill C-46 be sent to committee for further study.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Balfour, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Jacques Hébert moved the second reading of Bill C-306, to amend the Department of Forestry Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Honourable senators, it is a pleasure to move the second reading of Private Members' Bill C-306, An Act to amend the Department of Forestry Act and to make related amendments to other acts.

This legislation was introduced by the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur, Mr. Guy Arseneault, to change the name of the Department in the English version of the Act by substituting the name "Department of Forests" for "Department of Forestry"'.

According to the sponsor of this private member's bill, such a change is required for the following reasons: the French and English designations do not match; the term "Forestry" is misleading and the name of the Department must be a reflection of its mandate.

Incidentally, I should point out that the Department of Forestry supports this bill which was voted unanimously.

The main reason for this change is to make sure that the name of the Department be seen to mean the same thing both in French and in English. The translation for "Ministère des Forêts" is "Department of Forests". Unfortunately, the French "Forêts" was translated by "Forestry", which does not convey the same meaning.

[English]

The second reason behind this proposed change is that the term "forestry" is confusing. According to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Forestry and Fisheries entitled "Canada's Forests: The Federal Role", the term "forestry" conveys different meanings to different people. For instance, to many environmentalists, the term denotes the lumber industry, while industry representatives and others feel it covers all forestry operations and their management. In short, the word "forestry" seems to focus far more on industrial development than does the word "forests", which has a far broader connotation.

Third, the mandate of the new forestry department stipulates that the ministry must play a key role in promoting the sustainable development of Canada's forests. In fact, the mandate emphasizes that the department will work towards ensuring that meeting the needs of the present does not compromise the needs of future generations; it ensures that the department will play a key role in preserving Canada's valuable forests. Accordingly, the new name "Department of Forests" is a more accurate reflection of the ministry's mandate than the actual designation.

In conclusion, this bill seeks to correct a minor flaw in the designation of the department. It has received the unanimous support of all parties in the House of Commons, and I am certain it will be given the same treatment in this House. Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Hébert, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

CONSIDERATION OF TWENTY-THIRD REPORT—ORDER WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

> Consideration of the Twenty-Third Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs (review of regulations under the Referendum Act), presented in the Senate on 9th September, 1992.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am seeking advice from the Table or the Speaker. When I introduced the twenty-third report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, which deals with the regulations under the Referendum Act, I spoke at that time and I have nothing further to say about the matter. If no one else has anything further to say about it, perhaps it would be a good idea to consider it debated and remove it from the Order Paper. We can always restore it, if suddenly some great interest springs up.

Order withdrawn.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

TWENTY-SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the twenty-second report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (regulations regarding the conversion of mutual insurance companies in Canada), tabled in the Senate on 23 June 1992.—(Hon. Senator Poitras).

Hon. Jean-Marie Poitras: Honourable senators, before moving adoption of this report, I would like to recall, very briefly, that this is a matter of considerable importance.

It concerns allowing mutual insurance companies to "demutualize" as we said, and we conducted a study of the proposed regulations. In its report, your committee recommended the conversion of mutual companies. This involves a change in name and terms. It means that mutual insurance companies can revert to being stock companies without a break in continuity. This is very important, because we are talking about life insurance, long-term policies, and so forth. The committee's report approached the subject in this perspective.

Your committee also felt it was important to consider the two types of policy holders: participating and non-participating. There was considerable debate following the submissions we received to determine whether only one or both owned a mutual company.

In our report we recommended that prior to demutualization, there should be two votes: one by all policy holders of the mutual company which must be a majority vote, and a second vote by shareholders or participating policy holders. The agreement of both groups is required. It was felt this was a guarantee for the general public.

We also submitted that in the case of conversion, there should be very specific rules for informing the public, and it was suggested that prospectus-type information would be appropriate. In other words, there would be a list of all relevant information, as well as a recommendation by independent outside auditors.

Reorganization would be attractive to companies that might not be in excellent shape, as well as to companies that are developing rapidly and need new capital. We believe it would also make it possible for our financial companies to remain Canadian and continue to develop and prosper. That is the intent of this report, and I recommend that it be adopted.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, if no senator wishes to speak, this item is considered debated.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday, September 17, 1992, at 4 p.m.

GENERAL ELECTION

NUMBER OF DAYS LEFT IN CURRENT TERM

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, for the democrats, there are 64 days until election—

Senator Barootes: How long for the communists?

Senator Frith: For the cowardly and contemptuous, perhaps now speaking up; for those who are in that category—was it Senator Barootes who wanted to know?—there are 450 days.

Senator Barootes: For the communists, how long?

Senator Molgat: Time marches on.

QUEBEC

IMPUGNATION OF PREMIER BY BUREAUCRATS

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, if you were listening—and why should you?—you may have heard me in the past say nasty things about deputy ministers. I have always considered them to be usurpers of power, closer in character to the Politburo of the old Soviet Union. They lie to their political masters; they hide information; they come to think of themselves as little tin-pot dictators who hold the truth exclusively.

We have an example of dreadful treachery in Quebec on the part of Mme Diane Wilhelmy and the unnamed public servant to whom she was talking on the phone, attacking her master, Premier Bourassa, and using all the slogans of his opponents in her conversation, such as negotiating on one's knees, with holes in one's knees, and all that. I strongly suspect that either she or the unknown person with whom she was talking did the taping themselves. Why? Because they had probably invented in their heads a constitution that they considered better than the one that was finally negotiated.

Many of us have invented constitutions right here. I have invented several. Reforms of the Senate abound. There was one by Senator Bolduc. Senator Beaudoin invents a constitution every other day. Mme Chaput-Rolland was a participant in a great constitutional proposal.

When our political masters, or the government, or others do not accept those proposals which we may think are best, do we turn around and stab them in the back? No, but a deputy minister did that to Premier Bourassa. Another one, Mr. Tremblay, said that Mr. Bourassa was too ill, too weak, that he could not manage to speak at the meetings during negotiations. Yet we see him day after day, answering question after question on his feet in a really tough fight against very abusive opponents. This Mr. Tremblay wants us to believe that Mr. Bourassa does not have the physical or intellectual strengths to do his job. Why? Because he occasionally switched to French. Why did he switch to French? Because the particular nuance of the word in French was important to him, and he wanted to make sure that the French word was in the record.

CONFLICT OF SITTINGS WITH MEETINGS OF COMMITTEES

Hon. Royce Frith (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am a great supporter of the Senate's committee system and I know that those who operate the committee system have been long suffering and patient with the fact that the Senate occasionally acts as a bit of a nuisance and holds sittings which then conflict with the timing of committee meetings. Today we have the National Finance Committee studying Bill C-55. I have a file here of some questions I want to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board, who is appearing to-day before that committee. However, their meeting is scheduled for 4 o'clock, as is the Senate sitting.

● (1405)

As I say, on this occasion I suppose we have to recognize that it is the Senate that has caused inconvenience to the committee system. Perhaps we should establish a system whereby we could ask permission of whatever organization runs the committee system to have the Senate sit notwithstanding the fact that a committee may be meeting at the same time.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 225 residents of Manitoba who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitions come from Winnipeg and Brandon.

Honourable senators, I also have the honour to present petitions signed by 500 residents of Quebec who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitions come from Lauzon, Lévis, Saint-Raphaël, Saint-Siméon, Cap d'Espoir, Charlesbourg, Beauharnois, Bonaventure, Montréal, Grande-Rivière and Pavos Mills.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 285 residents of Ontario who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitions come from Owen Sound, Chesley, Markdale, Hawkesbury, Alexandria, North Bay, Kitchener, L'Orignal and Cornwall.

Honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 528 residents of Alberta who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitions come from Edmonton, Red Deer, Calgary, Millet and Sherwood Park.

And in concluding, honourable senators, I have the honour to present petitions signed by 500 residents of Saskatchewan who object to the goods and services tax. Most of these petitions come from Saskatoon, Regina and Prince Albert.

These 2,038 Canadians opposed the GST in 1990, and they continue to oppose it today, as do most Canadians. Only the cynical Conservative government continues to support this heinous and regressive tax; a tax that has sown the seeds of Canada's economic misfortune. I fully agree with these 2,038 Canadians when they demand the abolition of the GST.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRESENTATION OF PETITION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present a petition containing 169 signatures from the Ottawa Branch of the RCAF Prisoners of War Association. The petitioners are from Ontario, Saskatchewan—indeed, from across Canada.

The petitioners avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your petitioners in certain assurance that your Honourable House will therefore provide a remedy.

This petition concerns the series of films entitled The Valour and the Horror which include Savage Christmas: Hong Kong 1941; Death by Moonlight: Bomber Command; In Desperate Battle: Normandy 1944.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-62 ADOPTED

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Oliver, seconded by the Honourable Senator Comeau, for the adoption of the Ninth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications (Subject-matter of Bill C-62, An Act respecting telecommunications), presented in the Senate on 22nd June, 1992.—(Honourable Senator Lynch-Staunton).

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, because time ran out last June, when the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on the subject-matter of Bill C-62 was tabled, I did not have an opportunity to speak to it. Therefore, I wish to make a few brief comments today.

Before doing so, I wish to commend the members and the chairman of the committee, Senator Donald Oliver, for the very competent manner in which they conducted the business of the committee; and I commend the chairman in particular for his unfailing courtesy, both to the witnesses who appeared before us and to committee members alike, for his talent in bringing out the best in everybody and for his guidance of the work that produced this excellent report on a very important piece of legislation.

I most strongly support that thread of discourse in the report which holds that the telecommunications system does not exist to serve the business community only, although in that capacity it is, and will continue to be, the engine of growth for the Canadian economy, and will ensure our survival in the international marketplace.

In the words of the report, the telecommunications system must facilitate the movement of information and the exchange of ideas which promotes national unity, regional development and international competitiveness. The telecommunications system, then, must serve the needs of individual Canadians, and government policy must be designed to protect the public interest.

I also support the following statement in the report:

> The Committee is firmly of the view that any shift to greater reliance on competition must not be at the expense of . . . affordable and accessible basic telephone service. It is essential that the crowning glory of monopoly telephony, universal service, not be compromised in this transition. Hence the need for legislation such as Bill C-62 which creates a framework within which regulatory decisions will have to be made to preserve the best of the past while allowing market forces greater room for future growth and innovation.

The committee stance favouring openness in decision-making, its concern that transparency is not to be found in all parts of Bill C-62, and the recommendations for improvement in the proposed bill are an important contribution, as are the strengthened recommendations relating to the individual right to privacy.

With regard to policy objectives, which are in clause 7 of the bill, I find myself at variance with what is contained in the report on two counts. I refer, first, to the recommendation that references to sovereignty, politics and culture be removed. I think that the original wording, that telecommunications has an essential role in the maintenance of Canada's identity and sovereignty, is not only true, but vital, and should stay in.

As well, the idea that a communications system should serve to safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, political and economic fabric of Canada makes a clear distinction between means and ends, and provides clear guidance to those responsible for the implementation of the legislation. The orderly development in Canada of a telecommunications system must serve these policy goals.

Second, although many witnesses complained, with justification, that these policy objectives were in many instances inconsistent, one with the other—for example, competitiveness at the domestic level may require a number of industry participants, while competitiveness at the international level may require significant concentration at home—I do not think the committee's model, as proposed in the report in Appendix I, would improve the situation as much as the model proposed by the Public Interest Advocacy Centre, one of the groups that appeared before the committee.

The committee tends to stress efficiency, reliance and dynamism, whatever that last may mean, as top priorities. These are, of course, valuable concepts, but again, I believe, insufficient to provide the broad policy concepts that in my opinion are desirable in public policy of so sweeping a nature, so enormous in its impacts, and so susceptible to rapid technological change.

I have just a word or two to say with regard to the licensing regime proposed in Bill C-62, which the committee recommended should be eliminated completely. It is to be hoped that, if the minister takes this advice, which would be an improvement in the proposed legislation, the original reasons for the licensing provision will be met through other means.

Those reasons were, first, to enforce necessary Canadian ownership requirements. In that regard, the committee was told by witnesses that this could be accomplished through the Act or through the CRTC. The second reason was for purposes of entry control. In this vein, we were told again that this responsibility could be undertaken by the CRTC and did not warrant a third layer of regulation.

The third reason given by the minister for the new licensing regime was the need for provincial consultation and the ability to have unique agreements with individual provinces made under a departmental licensing power. Here, the concern expressed by the committee was that such a practice—the negotiation of individual agreements with provinces—would lead to the very fragmentation the bill was designed to remedy. However, I do not think this need be the case. Other agreements have been made in other fields without adverse results.

In the case of Manitoba and Saskatchewan, which are small marketplaces, there may be special circumstances that require provincial consultation. Moreover, provincial consultation was touted as one of the advantages of this new bill to the provinces. Thus, some method of enforcing agreements reached with provinces as a result of consultation needs to be developed in the absence of a licensing regime, although consultation should not be construed as a veto.

The critical function of regulation in the telecommunications business is to provide Canadians with affordable basic telephone service. It is axiomatic that Canada maintain effective public telecommunications utilities at the local service level. Basic local service cannot simply be left to the competitive marketplace. There will always be telecommunications companies willing to serve major business users and there will always be a need to maintain some cross-subsidies to ensure that households in rural and remote areas have affordable telephone service—which brings me to my last comment on the forbearance question.

The primary test that should be applied before there is forbearance from regulation should go beyond the simple question of whether there is competition in a given market. The regulator should also determine that it is in the public interest to relieve the companies in that market from the burden of regulation. The regulator must be satisfied that there is a structure in place to ensure that necessary utility functions will not be adversely affected by deregulation of any competitive sector.

The regulation of telecommunications in Canada should also reflect the regional differences across the country. While a single national regulatory agency is desirable, it would be highly inefficient to make rates and services uniform across the country. Consumers in various regions have different priorities which should be reflected in the services they receive.

In the past, regional priorities were reflected through decisions of provincial public utilities boards. In a national regulatory environment, there must be a structure to ensure that provincial and regional needs are reflected in national decisions. All too often national decisions are made as a result of concerns which dominate the political agenda in central Canada with little regard for issues that are important to consumers in the West. That is why the Memorandum of Understanding between Manitoba and the federal government is such an important matter.

There must be a real decentralization of the national decision-making organizations, such as the Department of Communications and the CRTC, so that these organizations become sensitive to the needs of consumers and businesses from all regions.

This requirement could be reflected in stronger language within the policy objectives in the bill to ensure that the officials in these agencies are distributed across Canada, making use of electronic communications to run their organizations on a decentralized basis.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, September 22, 1992, at 2:00 p.m.
